House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Monday, February 14th, 1921.

FIFTH SESSION, THIRTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The Parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 14th day of February, 1921, met this day at Ottawa for the despatch of business.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from Mr. O. M. Balfour, Acting Military Secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate Chamber at three p.m., on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that during the recess I received communications from several members, notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of John Hampden Burnham, Esq., member for the Electoral District of the West Riding of Peterborough, by resignation.

Of Hon. Rupert Wilson Wigmore, member for the Electoral District of St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

Of Hon. Fleming Blanchard McCurdy, member for the Electoral District of Colchester, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

Of Hon. Martin Burrell, member for the Electoral District of Yale, owing to the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out new writs of election for the said Electoral Districts respectively.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Chief Electoral Officer has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of Hon. Rupert Wilson Wigmore, for the Electoral District of St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert.

Of Hon. Fleming Blanchard McCurdy, for the Electoral District of Colchester.

Of Sydney Smith McDermand, Esq., for the Electoral District of Elgin East.

Of John Armstrong MacKelvie, Esq., for the Electoral District of Yale.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

OATHS OF OFFICE

Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of Oaths of Office, introduced and read the first time.—Right Hon. Arthur Meighen.

REVISED EDITION

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

On your return to your Parliamentary duties, I am glad to be able to congratulate you on the relative prosperity of the country and its comparative freedom from the feeling of unrest which has agitated countries not so fortunately situated. Following the conditions of expansion due to the war, a period of contraction was inevitable. Restriction of credit involving a certain limitation of production and business has been universal, but this Dominion has been less affected than other countries, and a feeling of confidence prevails. A general reduction of the cost of living has set in, and the country, save in certain limited areas, has been blessed with a bountiful harvest.

In spite of this contraction, the annual revenue of the country has been well maintained, and my advisers considered that certain taxes, imposed in part to check extravagant purchasing, had fulfilled their purpose and might be withdrawn. Accordingly, with a few exceptions, these taxes have been remitted, freeing industry and business and thus promoting employment.

Unemployment, the world-wide result of the conditions to which I have referred, though less widespread in Canada than elsewhere, has received the most anxious consideration. Of the charges for the relief of general unemployment, measures have been taken to bear a substantial share, and special measures have been taken to assist disabled and partially disabled ex-service men. These will be submitted to you for approval.

An investigation is being conducted by the Department of Labour into systems of Unemployment Insurance and Old Age Pensions.

There will be submitted to you for approval the important agreement concluded last year with the Governments of the British West Indian Colonies for the purpose of drawing still closer the trade relations between Canada and these Colonies and of improving the means of communication and intercourse.

The First Assembly of the League of Nations was recently held at Geneva. Representatives of forty-one nations, including those of Canada, met and deliberated together in a spirit of harmony that promises much for this great experiment. Much time was necessarily devoted to the work of organization, but other measures were also agreed upon which are calculated to promote stability and good-will in international intercourse. Most important of these is the draft scheme for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice which will be submitted to you for approval at an early date.

My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry, and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every province. The hearings necessary for this purpose have now been completed, and the conclusions founded thereon will be submitted to you in due course. It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained; but that the Customs duties imposed to that end should be no higher than is essential to ensure good standards of living among our working population and to retain and make possible the normal expansion of the industries in which they find employment.

A Bill for the repeal of the Conservation Act will be submitted to you, there being provision made for carrying on the essential functions of the Commission of Conservation in the appropriate department of the Government. This measure will, therefore, avoid very considerable duplication of services, and permit consequent saving of expense without detriment to the public advantage.

A Bill amending the Dominion Elections Act to provide for necessary revision of the electoral lists applicable to the vote shortly to be held in the province of Ontario respecting the Canada Temperance Act will be submitted to you.

Bills relating to copyrights, the simplification and consolidation of the Income War Tax Act, 1917, and amending Acts, scientific research and other matters will be submitted to you.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the last fiscal year will be laid before you. Estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted at an early date, making provision for the various services of government. These have been formed with a view to strict economy, having due regard to the obligations of the country and the exigencies of the public service, and any possible contraction, following the expansion of the period of the war, has been diligently sought.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful consideration of the important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that Divine Providence may direct and prosper all your consultations to the safety, honour, and welfare of our Sovereign and this Dominion.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I beg to move, seconded by Sir George Foster:

That the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Tuesday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except introduction of Bills until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House under rule 10, said Committee to be composed of Messieurs Reid (Grenville), Calder, McCurdy, Middlebro, King, Lemieux and Crerar, and that that portion of rule 10 limiting the number of members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS

Report of the Chief Electoral Officer in conformity with the Dominion Elections Act.—Mr. Speaker.

Joint Report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms, with my approval, has appointed Louis Charles Panet, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of Parliament.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Mr. SPEAKER: I beg to present a communication from His Excellency the Governor General approving a minute of the Privy Council appointing Right Hon. C. J. Doherty, Minister of Justice; Hon. J. D. Reid, Minister of Railways and Canals; Hon. J. A. Calder, Minister of Immigration and Colonization and President of the Privy Council; and Hon. E. K. Spinney, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Eleventh Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, entitled "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

On motion of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

Tuesday, February 15 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS TABLED

Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries; Annual Report of the Department of Naval Service.—Hon. C. C. Ballantyne.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Works.—Hon. F. B. McCurdy.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at this time I desire, and I think the House would wish me to do so, to make some reference to the vacancies that have occurred in our midst by death since we last met together. The number whose loss we have to lament on this occasion is even larger than is usually the case, although seldom it is that we meet in these halls without having to lament the taking away of some of our numbers.

The first to whom I wish to refer is the late member for the electoral division of Medicine Hat, and Secretary of State, the Right Hon. Mr. Sifton. Mr. Sifton's services to his country were in a larger variety of fields and in posts of uniformly higher dignity than falls to the lot of most public men in Canada. He was first a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories; he was a member of the Territorial Government in the early life of that country; and subsequently was Chief Justice of the Northwest Territories. Following upon that and an intervening period during which he engaged in the practice of law, he again became Chief Justice of Alberta, and after that was Premier of his province. From that post of distinction he came to this House some three years and a half ago and has occupied three positions in the Cabinet of Canada, all with acceptability—indeed, with distinction. The dominant—or, at least, the most outstanding—characteristic of Mr. Sifton was the swiftness and directness of his intellect, the capacity he had for reaching to the centre of a problem at first grasp, and of coming to his conclusions surely and firmly and almost invariably correctly. In this House he was not often heard, and that was a matter of regret, I am sure, to us all; but when he spoke, what he said was a contribution to any discussion in which he took part. It was in the Council Chamber that he displayed his talents to the best advantage; it was there that the virility and energy of his mind stood out in such striking contrast to the quietness of his disposition and demeanour. I am sure I am only voicing the sentiments of all of us when I say that Canada has lost a distinguished servant and that his Colleagues have lost an able and most agreeable companion and co-worker.

The next hon. gentleman to whom I would refer is the late member for Yamaska, Mr. Gladu. With him I came less personally in contact, he being on the other side of the House, and not commingling here as much as some; but it was my duty and my pleasure to read many of his speeches. I can well recall one of them in particular, delivered, I think, something over ten years ago, in which the grace and elegance of his diction was very clearly and impressively reflected, even in the English translation. He enjoyed that capacity of which so many of his race are possessed—of clear, forceful and easy expression; and I am sure all of us will agree that he was a distinct acquisition to Parliament and will mourn sincerely his loss.

Colonel Harry McLeod has also been taken away since last we met here. The member for York-Sunbury, too, served his country in more fields than one. For some years he represented a constituency in the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick, and for a short time he was a minister in the Government of that province. His interests were, perhaps, as much in the military field as in the political field. He was a student of military tactics and military matters generally, and attended manoeuvres in this and in other countries for purposes of study—and, indeed, in the late war, served in the fields of Europe. In this House he had, I think, more than the usual number of close friends, attracted to him by that quality of loyalty to his friends which all of us admire so much. His contributions to parliamentary discussions were not many; but they were valuable, and as a man chiefly and as a parliamentarian as well, we are sorry we shall see him no more here.

The mutations of time affect the complexion of every institution in the world; the hut of the poor and the palace of the rich are not exempt, nor is the hall of Parliament; the energy and usefulness of this House rest not only on the fidelity of its present members, but on the memory and virtues of those who have gone.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to join with my right hon. friend in paying a tribute to the memory of our deceased colleagues and in expressing the sympathy which this House as a unit will feel with the relatives and friends of the deceased members. As my right hon. friend has just said, the vacant places which greet us at the meeting of Parliament as we reassemble from year to year are more expressive in their mute eloquence than any words we are capable of uttering on an occasion such as this. But while our words are necessarily few, our sense of personal loss is very real and our sympathy for those who have been bereaved is deep and sincere.

In view of what my right hon. friend has already said of the hon. members who until but yesterday were to be numbered amongst his supporters, but little remains to be added by way of personal tribute to their memories. Both of them, as he has mentioned, were gentlemen who had played an important part not only in the public life of their respective provinces, but in the larger arena of federal politics and, indeed, in the still wider arena of world affairs.

The late Right Hon. Arthur Sifton's life was associated with the upbuilding of our Canadian West, in which he had lived for considerably over half a century. As a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories and as Commissioner of Works in the Haultain ministry, and later as Chief Justice and Prime Minister of the province of Alberta, he was permitted to play an exceptional part in laying the foundations of constitutional government in Western Canada. That he did so in a manner which will be an enduring monument to his ability is perhaps the highest tribute that could be paid to his memory. As my right hon. friend has said, we heard his voice but little in this House. Through ill-health he was prevented from taking much part in the affairs of this Parliament; but he was privileged to take a part in international transactions of the greatest magnitude, and in so doing to add further distinction to his own name and to that of his province.

The late hon. member for York-Sunbury, Colonel McLeod, had a career not altogether dissimilar, though cut prematurely short by ill-health consequent upon services rendered to his country overseas. Like the late Secretary of State, he was a distinguished member of the legal profession. Before entering this Parliament, he had been actively identified with the affairs of his province as a member of the local legislature and also as a member of the Government. When the war broke out, he raised a regiment in his native province and crossed the seas on active service in Europe with the Canadian Expeditionary Force. A life of such disinterested and patriotic public service speaks for itself.

Of the three members whose decease we deplore, the late hon. member for Yamaska, Mr. Oscar Gladu, had the longest association with this House. He was first returned to Parliament in 1904 and was re-elected in 1908. He was defeated at the general elections of 1911, but was re-elected in 1917. It is true that he did not take a large part in the way of official position, but he nevertheless was actively identified with the political events of his province and of this country. He was essentially a tribune of the people and he spent his life in advocating their cause and espousing the principles of Liberalism for which he stood. Few men in Canadian public life have possessed in larger measure than Mr. Gladu the talent of popular oratory, the power to sway masses of men by the spoken word, and his gift in that direction has left for him an abiding place in the memory and affections of the people. To those of us on this side of the House who knew him intimately, he will ever be remembered as the most ardent of Liberals, the most loyal of supporters, and the most genial and devoted of friends.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. JAMES McISAAC AND SECONDED BY MR. J. A. MacKELVIE

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the Session.

Mr. JAMES McISAAC (Kings P.E.I.) moved:

> That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of King's, I sincerely thank the Prime Minister for selecting their representative to move the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Highly as I appreciate the honour thus conferred, I am fully conscious of the importance and responsibility of the task, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I approach it with considerable diffidence and some trepidation of heart. I realize that the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the parliamentary session, from one year to another, occupies a unique position; he enjoys much freedom in blazing his own trail and developing, in his own way, the theme of his discourse, and under your wise guidance is, to a very great degree, immune from the danger of trangressing the ordinary rules of Parliamentary debate. He is at liberty indeed to "pursue things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme." But this very freedom, this immunity, may constitute his difficulty and his danger. He may, perhaps, incline to too great reticence on the one hand or too great extravagance on the other. It is, therefore, the part of wisdom to adopt a middle course, for, as it is very concisely expressed in the Latin tongue, "medio tutissimus ibis."

Mr. Speaker, before referring to any of the important matters contained in the Speech from the Throne, I desire to tender my cordial congratulations to the right honourable leader of the House on his elevation to the important, exalted and honourable position of leader of the Government, and Prime Minister of the nation. The office of Prime Minister of Canada at any time requires talents and statesmanship of the very highest order; but at the present time, when so many onerous, difficult and intricate public questions present themselves, the need for intellectuality, wisdom and prudence is accentuated. These qualities, I believe, our Prime Minister amply possesses. In this connection I cannot refrain from giving expression to a thought that presses upon my mind, I wish to pay my profound tribute of respect and admiration for the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) who led the Government of Canada safely and well through the dark and never-to-be-forgotten days of the world's tragedy, and who for our sakes, by his devotion to duty and self sacrifice for the exaltation of his country, has become a casualty of the war.

In the speech from the Throne it is stated:

> On your return to your Parliamentary duties, I am glad to be able to congratulate you on the relative prosperity of the country and its comparative freedom from the feeling of unrest which has agitated countries not so fortunately situated. Following the conditions of expansion due to the war, a period of contraction was inevitable. Restriction of credit involving a certain limitation of production and business has been universal, but this Dominion has been less affected than other countries, and a feeling of confidence prevails. A general reduction of the cost of living has set in, and the country, save in certain limited areas, has been blessed with a bountiful harvest.

But, Mr. Speaker, what Canada has accomplished in the period following the war up to the present is in a sense not less remarkable than her marvelous achievements during that titantic struggle. By reason of the Government's wise and provident financial management during the war period, as well as by reason of increased production and rising war prices, the finances of the country were greatly augmented, and as a consequence Canada emerged from the war in an exceedingly strong position industrially and financially. Our bank deposits had increased enormously, and by far the greater part of our loans was held by our own people, whose savings they represented. But scarcely had the armistice been signed when new and onerous obligations confronted the Government. The problems of demobilization, reconstruction and rehabilitation generally, had to be grappled with and solved. Industries in many instances had become dislocated, and in not a few cases the arteries of commerce had been destroyed or seriously impaired. All these problems, and many more, confronted the Government. Enormous sums of money had to be found to meet the interest on the war debt, for pensions to the wounded and maimed returned soldiers, and for the dependents of those who fell in the country's cause. These numerous and perplexing problems required the immediate attention of the ministry and had to be dealt with concurrently with the ordinary business of government. An era of extravagance and abnormality had set in, and a thousand and one circumstances intervened to render still more arduous the conduct of public business. When we bear these facts in mind, it is a source of extreme satisfaction to know that Canada has been able to be more generous in her military pensions than any other country in the world. She has met all her war obligations generously and promptly, and in that respect stands to-day in an enviable position as compared with any of the allied or associate nations. Her trade, manufactures, and banking business have all been splendidly sustained. The assets of Canadian banks amount to more than two-and-a-half billion dollars, and our national wealth per capita, based on bank figures, is $2,500, as compared with $2,400 in the United States is only $65.80 per head. investment in Victory bonds of $86, while the investment in Liberty bonds in the United States is only $65.80 per head. Canada leads the world in her per capita production of food material, and we still have 441 million acres of untilled arable land. Canada's foreign trade amounts to about $300 per head of population, whereas the per capita proportion of the foreign trade of the United States is only $87.

Canada does more business per capita than any other country in the world, and was the only country that maintained uninterrupted transcontinental transportation during the war. She has her own steamships on all trade routes of the seas. According to population, she leads all countries in transportation facilities, having one mile of railway for every 218 persons. Our nearest competitor is the United States, and that country has only one mile of railway for every 404 inhabitants. The transition period has set in, and the trend towards contraction is inevitable, but in this, as in other respects, we may confidently hope that Canada will be less affected than other countries, and that she will proceed by gradual steps towards a normal and permanent trade basis.

Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I referred to Canada's transportation development. I instanced the fact that she had her own steamships on all the trade routes of the seas. I wish to develop this point a little more. We who have been brought up by the sounding sea and whose ears have been early attuned to the thunder of its surge, are perhaps somewhat like Byron's Childe Harold—we love the ocean and find music in its roar. To turn from the sea and speak of the ships that sail thereon is simple and natural. I wish to refer to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. This enterprise was inaugurated by the Government under the immediate direction of the Hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) during the war period, when it was very difficult, if not impossible, to procure ships to connect with our railways in order to transport our products abroad. The enterprise had scarcely been started when it was confronted with a serious handicap. Steel shapes and plates for these ships had to come from American firms, and were supplied only when it suited the manufacturers. This caused long and annoying delays in the construction of Canadian steamships. To overcome this difficulty the Government of Canada, through the Minister of Marine, entered into an arrangement with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, at Sydney, Cape Breton, to establish a rolling-mill plant, with a capacity of 50,000 square feet of plate per day. In consequence of this arrangement, the building of the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was rapidly advanced, and now a great fleet of splendid Canadian ships, built from Canadian material, by Canadian workmen, in Canadian yards, and manned by Canadian officers and men. sail the seas of the world, and some of them have already circumnavigated the globe.

These great argosies bear away to our antipodean cousins under the Southern Cross; to the distant East and to all corners of the civilized world, Canada's natural and manufactured products. Each one of these ships has incorporated as an affix to its name the word "Canadian", and all fly the white Canadian ensign. Apart altogether, Mr. Speaker, from the splendid part they play in Canadian transportation service, they constitute the grandest and most widely extended advertisement for Canada that could be conceived. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is a national transportation enterprise for which the Government and the Minister of Marine deserve the sincere thanks of all Canadians. The speech from the throne refers to the matter of tariff revision as follows:

My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a Committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry, and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every Province. The hearings necessary for this purpose have now been completed, and the conclusions founded thereon will be submitted to you in due course. It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained; but that the Customs duties imposed to that end should be no higher than is essential to ensure good standards of living among our working population and to retain and make possible the normal expansion of the industry in which they find employment.

Mr. Speaker, the declaration set forth in this paragraph of the Speech indicates quite clearly the intention of the Government in relation to the tariff. A customs tariff such as we have in this country, of necessity requires revision from time to time. Changes in trade conditions, the springing up of new industrial centres, and many other circumstances, of their very nature render such adjustment imperative. In order to have a tariff established on an accurate and scientific basis, revision, following investigation, is necessary. The Government, therefore, acted wisely in appointing a cabinet committee to secure information all over the country. The revised tariff, which will be presented during the session as stated in the Speech, will be based on the principles of the national policy, having for its essential qualities the requirements of revenue and the principle of protection to Canadian labour and Canadian industries, including agriculture. This is the manner of customs tariff inaugurated by Sir John A. Macdonald, and which has prevailed in Canada for over forty years. Under this tariff, Canada's industries have developed and Canadian workpeople have found abundant and lucrative employment. This tariff assures commercial stability and affords a guarantee of security to investors in new enterprises. Our cities and urban centres have grown great and populous under the ægis of this tariff, and outside capital has sought investment within our national bounds. In consequence of this tariff, no fewer than six hundred branch factories have been established in Canada by American manufacturers, representing a capital investment of approximately $400,000,000 and affording employment to about 87,000 people. Surely a tariff that produces such results as these is the best and the only tariff for Canada, and should be perpetuated.

Mr. Speaker, from whatever view-point we survey the situation at present, in retrospect, or in outlook, the position of Canada must inspire confidence and optimism. Canada has passed through the crucible. She has been tried and has not been found wanting. The great deeds so splendidly achieved within the last six years, in war, in peace, in commerce and in finance, have placed our country in an enviable position and have made her the object of admiration and emulation by sister nations. Her splendid record of the past is sufficient guarantee of her capability to meet all emergencies in the future, but in order to do this Canadians must do their full duty, they must be true to themselves. The great dramatist put into the mouth of Polonius in his address to Laertes these memorable words: "This above all, to thine own self be true." Let Canadians be true to themselves, true to their country, true to the great heritage entrusted to them. Let them exhibit that same spirit of duty, service and sacrifice that characterized them during the dark and never-to-be-forgotten days of the war. Let them cultivate a vigorous and virile national sentiment. Let them stand together united in the bonds of national amity, and then there need be no question of our great nation's marching forward on the road of progress, prosperity and righteousness to the proud position she is destined to attain among the world's great nations.

Mr. JOHN A. MacKELVIE (Yale): Mr. Speaker, while, of course, I appreciate very greatly indeed the high honour that has been extended to the County of Yale in affording me this opportunity of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I must confess that I approach the task with a feeling of diffidence bordering almost upon the point of reluctance; for no one can realize better than myself that my inexperience and ignorance of parliamentary procedure and usage may possibly lead me into errors which I would naturally desired to avoid. I feel further handicapped in being called upon to follow a gentleman who in such eloquent periods has so gracefully expressed sentiments which I am sure are concurred in by a large proportion of this House. I fully realize also the extent to which I must suffer in any attempt to hold the attention of this House by reason of the fact that my predecessor in the County of Yale was a gentleman who, I know, often gave expression to sentiments that were couched in the most graceful and forceful language that could enchain the attention of an assembly such as this. I sincerely trust, therefore, that hon. members will refrain from any comparison between my language and the utterances that from time to time fell from the lips of the former Secretary of State, the hon. Mr. Martin Burrell, whose retirement from active political life, I may say in passing, has caused very widespread regret throughout Yale, and, I feel sure, in other parts of the Dominion as well; and I believe I am but voicing the sentiments of this House when I say that that gentleman carries with him into his new position such knowledge and literary attainments as must eminently qualify him to fulfil the very high expectations of every member who was associated with him for so long in his valuable services in this House.

At this juncture, Sir, perhaps I may be permitted to express the very great satisfaction entertained in the West, and more particuarly in British Columbia, over the fact that another Western man has succeeded to the portfolio of Agriculture, at one time held by Mr. Burrell; and we, Sir, consider it a matter for great congratulation that the interests of our two great basic industries in Yale, farming and fruit growing are now in the experienced and capable hands of Hon. Dr. Tolmie, and will be under such competent and I know, succesful guidance.

It is for me a matter of personal inclination and a duty which I owe to a large section of my constituents to express in very sincere, but I fear very inadequate terms the sense—the deep sense—of appreciation that our people feel over the exaltation to the highest office in the gift of Canada of the Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen, whose clear-cut and forceful exposition of his policy as regards fiscal and other issues, during his tour of the West, gave very complete satisfaction indeed to the great majority of the constituency which I represent. In passing let me say that that constituency of Yale is perhaps one of the largest in the Dominion and as big, I suppose, as any five eastern counties. Its basic industries, as I have already intimated, are those of agriculture and horticulture; and you can realize, Sir, what satisfaction and what relief it afforded the men engaged in those activities to hear during the Prime Minister's tour through the constituency such unequivocal and lucid expressions as he uttered regarding the tariff in particular.

After listening to the very able and very comprehensive review of the Speech from the Throne which the mover has presented I feel that there is but little of interest or value to this House that I may be able to add. It is, apparent, I suppose, to all of us that these are times of particular strain and stress. We are passing through a period of unparalleled uncertainty and unrest. Wherever, outside this favoured country of Canada, we turn our eyes our vision seems darkened and disturbed by scenes of distress, poverty, and agitation of all kinds. For years to come, perhaps, it will be a matter of great difficulty for this old world of ours to shake itself down to a position at all approaching stability. War and carnage still stalk through a large portion of Europe. Turbulent agitators taking advantage of the times, are strenuously, actively and continually engaged in an attempt to guide men's minds into channels of revolutionary intent. I am sorry to say also that an active, a well conducted, and energetically pursued propaganda of hate and suspicion is being promulgated in order to create strife between labour and capital. These are problems, I suppose, that will require the attention of thinking men for many years to come. I am, Sir, I think, to be classed among the ranks of what we might term reasonable optimists. At least, I have the most profound and abiding faith in the potential greatness and glorious future of this country of ours, and in its manifold and magnificent resources which as yet have not been touched, by way of development, only on the outer fringes. But, nevertheless, I can see that there is a kind of shallow and superficial optimism which seems to be in the habit of closing its eyes when difficulties or dangers of any kind present themselves, and which is always bound to be unprepared when a crisis or emergency arises. It is against this tendency of the times I think it behoves us all to guard ourselves.

Under such conditions as I have spoken of it is natural, that in Canada as elsewhere, one of the problems to which we have to give earnest consideration is that of unemployment. I am thankful to say that in the constituency which I represent that condition has not, as yet, become a very serious menace—though it is, of course, not entirely absent. I venture to say, Sir, owing to the very wise and very energetic course pursued by the Government in the demobilization of our troops and in the re-establishment of our men in civil life the fact is very largely to be attributed that the condition referred to is not more wide spread and more acute in Canada than is the case to-day. Surely, never was there a young country which staggered under a greater burden of responsibility in regard to measures necessary to re-establish our returned men in some way, and to provide pensions for themselves and the dependents of those who so gloriously and heroically upheld the honour of the nation and of the empire during the terrible period of the war. And surely, Sir, no Government on earth ever approached that problem with a more courageous, determined and sympathetic spirit. As we all know—if we are at all frank with ourselves—marvels have already been accomplished in regard to the re-establishing of our returned men. Of course there have been mistakes, there have been blunders and shortcomings in matters of detail; but I maintain that what has been accomplished constitutes a glorious achievement for Canada. While much still remains to be done I misjudge the temper of this House, and the temper of the citizens of Canada, if we begrudge anything further which can reasonably be done to relieve and assist these men of whom the nation has cause to feel so proud and whose devotion to duty and whose sacrifices have laid a debt upon the country which can never even partially be liquidated by material recompense.

In this connection too, I am glad to note in the Speech from the Throne that consideration is being given to the questions of old age pensions and unemployment insurance. I feel quite certain that the House will approach the consideration of these subjects with very sympathetic feelings knowing, as we all do, that a certain proportion of our population—very often through no fault of their own—labour under disabilities and burdens, and if anything can be done to relieve them it is our duty, I think, to make an effort to do so.

It will be acknowledged, I think, that the ability of this country to meet the obligations thrust upon us by the war, and, consequently, our progress and prosperity, are inseparably wrapped up with the tariff issue. This is a most important matter, and in a constituency such as that which I have the honour to represent, it is indeed a very vital matter. Fruit growing in the Okanagan and elsewhere throughout Yale has now reached a stage where it is become a very important industry. I can recall the days, Sir, probably about twenty years ago, when the first full car of fruit was shipped out of the Okanagan, and it was an occasion for celebration. This year I hope that we will be able to send forth an output of fruit exceeding 5,000 cars. The course towards this phenomenal growth and measure of success has been by no means an easy one. The road we have traversed was full of obstacles and difficulties, which at one time seemed almost insurmountable; and I am firmly convinced that had it not been for the well-advised action of the Borden administration in raising the duty on apples from 13 to 30 cents a box, the industry in the Okanagan to-day would have been almost extinct. I have no desire to enter largely at this time upon a subject which I know is fraught with so many contentious issues, but I know full well that my constituents would consider me a traitor to their interests did I not upon all occasions endeavour to combat with whatever energy in me lies any attempt to reduce or eliminate the duty on fruit, without which protection our industry could not live.

There were times during the lean years in the fruit growing industry when my office used to be invaded time and again by men who came to me for advice and who were in absolute despair. They thought that I was responsible for their coming to that country and investing their all in fruit lands, and perhaps in some instances they were right. Up to 1914 the industry was in such a languishing condition that nothing but ruin seemed to stare these men in the face. South of British Columbia lie the two great fruit-producing States of Washington and Oregon, and extending east of those States are large and populous American cities affording the orchardists the best possible market for their No. 1 or fancy fruit; and it was their system to sell their fancy grades in that market and to send in their other grades on consignment to our prairie provinces—which are naturally the markets for the Okanagan fruit—at prices which meant ruinous competition for our growers, and which glutted the prairie markets until on some occasions not a box of British Columbia fruit could be sold. It was under these circumstances that the fruit growers of our district approached the Government as I have indicated and were successful in getting the tariff raised. In 1910 the production of fruit in British Columbia amounted to $250,000. By 1919 this had grown to such an extent that out of the Okanagan Valley alone was shipped fruit and its by-products, including canned and evaporated goods, amounting to over $7,000,000—an almost phenomenal growth in something short of ten years, due, as I have said before, to the protection given our industry by the tariff.

Speaking in a general way, Sir, on this tariff question, as far as I myself am concerned I belong to a class who are firmly convinced that the economic safety and prosperity of this Dominion depend upon following a similar course in regard to a protective tariff to that pursued in succession by Conservative, Liberal and Unionist Governments. I belong to a class that have perhaps two fundamental principles in regard to their political creed. First, as regards the larger realm of the British Empire, we believe most firmly in what we consider to be a sane system of Imperialism; we believe in maintaining the closest possible affiliations and associations with the Mother Country, while at the same time leaving Canada absolutely mistress in her own house. And as regards our domestic policy, we conceive that, to say the least, any deviation from the principle which underlies a protective tariff is a course of folly leading straight forward to disaster.

Now, Sir, I have noted some other points upon which I thought I might speak, but I think perhaps, in spite of the kind invitation to extend my remarks, I will not transgress further upon the good nature of the House. But there is just one other point to which I should like to make brief reference, and perhaps it is not altogether the most unimportant topic to which our attention might be directed. The remarks from the mover concerning the "sounding sea," reminded me that I too was privileged during my boyhood days to watch the tide come up the bay of Fundy—and although I saw the bore I did not, I hope, become one in consequence! But I was going to say that it was my privilege then to be associated in that country, which contains a very large French population, with a number of boy friends of that race, and the endearing associations then formed, and the respect and esteem in which I have held the French people ever since, have never been obliterated. I thought it was particularly fortunate that in his first political speech after being raised to the high position of Prime Minister, the leader of the Government expressed himself in such forceful terms on the necessity of fostering in this country every possible sentiment that would tend towards bringing about more amicable relations between the two great races which form the bulk of our population. I think he touched a chord then which must have found a deep response in every true Canadian breast.

I wish to remark in conclusion, that I hope nothing will occur during the course of this Parliament that will even in the very slightest degree tend to create any dissension between the two races. I wish I were capable of expressing the sentiments which I desire to convey in the beautiful French tongue, but I am debarred from that pleasure, and in rougher and less ready language I wish to say that it is my sincere hope that we will all with one accord endeavour to foster and stimulate everything tending towards an increase of amicable relations and deeper friendship between the two races, until in fact and in deed the time may come as far as Canada is concerned when the names French and English are merged into the more general and more comprehensive one of—Canadian.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to extend my congratulations to the hon. members who have just moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I am sure that my hon. friend the member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaac) will look upon this as a sort of field day for Prince Edward Island, inasmuch as he and I, comprising half the representation of that province, have been privileged to be the first speakers in this important debate. That his speech was very creditable to himself and to the Island, is, I think, the highest compliment that could be paid him. I hope he will not feel that I speak at all ironically when I say that, having listened to his poetical quotations and classical allusions, I believe he might have applied to his own speech the words which he quoted from Byron's Childe Harold in reference to the ocean—that there was considerable music in its roar.

I must also congratulate the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) on the speech which he made in seconding the Address. As all hon. members know, this is his maiden speech, and usually the making of one's first speech in Parliament is not an easy matter. All who have had the privilege of listening to his address will, I am sure, feel that in the member for Yale the House has found an acquisition to its debating ability.

With many of the sentiments that have been expressed by both the mover and the seconder of the Address, we on this side of the House are in most hearty accord. There have been on the other hand references to some of the matters spoken of in the Speech from the Throne, there have been references to the present administration, with which I would take issue and which I would discuss at some length if this were the appropriate time and occasion. However, during the course of the debate there will be opportunity to take up matters of the kind.

In one respect, in particular, I find myself in hearty accord with the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne—I join with them in extending congratulations to my Right Honourable friend (Mr. Meighen) upon his attainment of the high and responsible position of Prime Minister.

Perhaps he will permit me to say in public what I have already said to him privately, that on personal grounds it was to me a source both of pride and of pleasure to learn that His Excellency had chosen as his first adviser one who in university days was a fellow undergraduate, and whose friendship, through a quarter of a century, had survived the vicissitudes of time, not excepting the differences of party warfare and acrimonies of political debate.

I realize, in the discharge of our public duties in the opposing positions in which we now stand in virtue of our respective political faiths, there is much that needs to be said that may bring a challenge to all the virtues we possess. I can promise him, however, that in seeking to fulfill the demands of public obligation, I shall strive with him to preserve the highest traditions of our public life, and to be governed in all things by its amenities, and never by its animosities.

Mr. Speaker, if I do not undertake to refer at any length to the Address which His Excellency has presented to the House, I hope it will not be thought of as being in any way discourteous to His Excellency. There is one matter which transcends all others in importance, and that is the present position of the Government and of this Parliament with respect to the will of the people. By what right by what authority, do my right honourable friend and the members of his ministry presume to carry on the Government of this country? That is the question which the Administration must answer to the satisfaction of Parliament and of the country, before consideration can be given to any of the lesser matters mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Can the will of the people be further ignored, and their rights in matters pertaining to legislation and administration be further usurped?

In the olden days of British history there was a time when the Crown, in order to find out under what authority certain gentlemen throughout the Kingdom exercised the rights and privileges of positions and offices they held, issued to such persons, a writ known as quo warranto, to discover by what right, by what warrant, they held the positions which they occupied. King Edward I served the barons of his day with this writ of quo warranto to discover by what warrant, by what right, they were enjoying certain privileges. Later the Crown made use of the same writ as a means of discovering by what warrant and by what right certain of the chartered cities of England exercised coveted privileges. It was used, I think, by other sovereigns in order to find out by what warrant and by what right certain sheriffs carried on the duties of their office. In the name of the people of this country I should like to ask my right hon. friend, by what warrant, by what right, he attempts to carry on the government of Canada at the present time?

Since we last assembled in this Chamber, changes of far-reaching import and significance have taken place. The Government which was then in power has resigned and a new Government has been formed. In order that the situation may be fairly understood outside this House, may I direct attention to certain facts and circumstances. Since Parliament last assembled every member of the old administration has resigned his position; for the Prime Minister, in tendering his resignation, tendered also the resignation of every member of his Cabinet. Indeed, there was a time subsequent to the prorogation of Parliament last year—a brief moment it was, of course—when there was no ministry carrying on the government of this country. My right hon. friend selected one colleague on the day that he was sworn in; others he selected some three days later, and others later still.

The ministry which we met when Parliament was last assembled was a Unionist administration. It was a Government that had been formed from each of the historic political parties on a basis of assumed equality in numbers and talent. It was formed with relation to a particular issue arising out of the war which was then in progress. It purported to be a war administration, concerned solely with the successful prosecution and termination of the war and problems incidental thereto. Upon its character, its personnel, and its purpose in these particulars, it made its appeal to the electorate and won the support which returned it to power.

The Government which meets Parliament to-day is an entirely new and different Government. Will my right hon. friend contend that in character his is a Union Government? Will he contend that it is a coalition composed of members of both the old political parties, chosen because they are supposed to be of equality in talent as well as in numbers? Will he contend for a moment that it is a war Government with a mandate from the people of this country to carry on their business? Those are questions which I want my right hon. friend to answer when he rises to address the House. The ministry has, as I have said, changed in character, in personnel, and in purpose from the Government formed in 1917.

Permit me to enlarge for a minute on these several points. As I have already said, the ministry which meets Parliament to-day has an entirely different character from the ministry which we met when Parliament was last assembled. That ministry was a Unionist ministry. My right hon. friend will hardly contend that his ministry is a Unionist ministry. He was the first to destroy the word "Unionist"; he absolutely cut it out of the vocabulary of his Government. He will hardly say that his ministry is composed of the members of the old historic parties. He, almost more than anyone else in this country, has been doing all he can to destroy the reputations of the old political parties and to say that they have outlived their usefulness. Surely he does not believe that any one is deceived as to the character of the present administration through the use of the name "National Liberal and Conservative" which, despite his abuse of the historic parties, he has chosen as that of his administration. Was there ever such a jumble of inconsistencies and insincerities!

My right hon. friend will probably contend that the situation thus created was not dissimilar to situations which arose after the death of Sir John A. Macdonald, when Sir John was succeeded in June, 1891, by Sir John Abbott; when Sir John Thompson succeeded Sir John Abbott in December, 1892; when Sir Mackenzie Bowell succeeded Sir John Thompson in December, 1894; and lastly when Sir Charles Tupper succeeded Sir Mackenzie Bowell in May, 1896. In other words, he will probably contend that in the course of one Parliament one ministry has a right to succeed another as in that period between 1891 and 1896. I presume my right hon. friend will attempt to have the House believe that the succession in office of his ministry to the previous ministry is a case parallel to the cases which I have just mentioned. As a matter of fact, there is no parallel.

The governments of which I have just spoken between 1891 and 1896 were all Tory Governments, holding office by virtue of a policy upon which the electors had passed in March, 1891, in normal times and under normal conditions. They were one in character, in purpose and in aim. The Government which my right hon. friend has formed cannot lay claim to any succession of that kind. The Government which he succeeded was a Unionist Government; the Government that he has formed to-day is a reactionary Tory administration; it is a reversion back to a type of Toryism such as this country has not known for a great many years. Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend will hardly contend that there is anything of a coalitionist character in his administration. The former Government was a coalition Government, or so-called at all events; it pretended to be such; but the Government of my right hon. friend is wholly different in that respect.

One of two alternatives alone is possible. Either the Government of my right hon. friend is, as it purports to be, an entirely new Government, with a new name, a new Prime Minister, a new set of principles and policies, and the support of a new party, the existence of which remains as yet to be discovered; or it is the soiled remnant and ragged edges of the old Unionist administration which it itself disowns, travelling under counterfeits and aliases, and purporting in all things to be what in reality it is not.

Take whichever alternative you will, the consequence is one and the same. The Government is without authority from the people of this country to conduct its affairs, and stands as a usurper of their political rights even in the eyes of multitudes of those who helped to return to power the previous administration.

But, Sir, lest there should be any doubt as regards the character of the present administration, may I refer to the personnel of the two administrations? It is necessary to do this in order to bring out one of the points which I think it is of importance to bring out, namely, the difference between the basis on which the Government of my right hon. friend was formed and that on which the previous administration was formed. Aliases, disguises and counterfeits aside, the character of the two administrations is to be determined by the respective personnels. Here is a list of the names of those who composed the ministry of the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) at the time that it made its appeal to the people. I think I am in order in quoting the names at this moment:

The Prime Minister, Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden.
Minister of Trade and Commerce, Rt. Hon. Sir Geo. E. Foster.
Minister of Finance, Hon. Sir Thomas White.
Minister of Justice, Hon. Chas. J. Doherty.
Minister of Labour, Hon. T. W. Crothers.
Minister of Railways and Canals, Hon. J. D. Reid.
Minister of Overseas Military Forces, Hon. Sir A. E. Kemp.
Secretary of State, Hon. Martin Burrell.
Postmaster General, Hon. P. E. Blondin.
Minister of Interior, Hon. Arthur Meighen.
Minister of Inland Revenue, Hon. A. Sevigny.
Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and Naval Service, Hon. C. C. Ballantyne.
Minister of Customs, Hon. A. L. Sifton.
Minister of Immigration and Colonisation, Hon. J. A. Calder.
President of Privy Council, Hon. N. W. Rowell.
Minister of Militia, Hon. S. C. Mewburn.
Minister of Agriculture, Hon. T. A. Crerar.
Minister of Public Works, Hon. F. B. Carvell.
Ministers without Portfolio: Hon, Frank Cochrane, Hon. Sir Jas. A. Lougheed, Hon. A. K. Maclean, Hon. G. D. Robertson.
Solicitor General, Hon. Hugh Guthrie.

In looking over that list one is struck first of all by its coalitionist complexion as it was held out in evidence before the people at the time. There were four ministers without portfolio, the Solicitor General adding one more to the ministry. There were eighteen other ministers, seven of whom were chosen from the ranks of the Liberal party. If we add the name of one of the ministers without portfolio, that would mean eight of one complexion politically, and ten of the other, so as to make what the people were led to believe at that time was a sort of fifty-fifty administration. Of those members, the following have ceased to be members of the administration, either through death or resignation:

The late Hon. Frank Cochrane.
Sir Robert Borden.
Hon. Sir Thomas White.
Hon. T. W. Crothers.
Hon. Martin Burrell.
Hon. A. Sevigny.
Hon. T. A. Crerar.
Hon. F. B. Carvell.
Hon. S. C. Mewburn.
Hon. A. K. Maclean.
Hon. N. W. Rowell.
The late Hon. A. L. Sifton.

In other words, twelve of the members of the Administration which went before the country in 1917 have ceased to be members of the present Administration. I am prepared to admit that the personnel might to a limited extent be expected to change with time; but there is this significant point to be noted in connection with the changes that have taken place in the Administration, that for the most part the resignations have been of those hon members who entered the ministry at the time they did because they believed it to be a ministry formed for war purposes, and who joined the ministry to give that Liberal complexion which a real coalition was expected to have. With these hon. gentlemen having resigned from the Government in the numbers they have, I ask my right hon. friend how does he presume to regard his ministry as in any sense a legitimate successor to the one which preceded it?

My right hon. friend in his speeches throughout the country has had a good deal to say about the war record of the late Administration. He has urged that record as a ground why his Administration should have the confidence of the people of this country. I would ask him, has he observed that the Ministers, who, for the most part—there are one or two exceptions, I admit—were responsible for such record as the Government made during the war are the ones who have since left, and are not members of his Administration? Either he has no confidence in them, or they have no confidence in him. Will my right hon. friend presume to say that none of the credit of the late Administration in the carrying on of the war was due to the hon. gentlemen who are not members of his Administration at the present time? Let us take one or two names. We were told that the Hon. F. B. Carvell was a strength to the whole Government because of his personality. Will my right hon. friend say that his ministry has not been weakened through the loss of a member like the Hon. Mr. Carvell? Take the case of the present member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn). Is he not entitled to any credit in the late Administration for the winning of the war, as my right hon. friend likes to put it? Surely my right hon. friend has no right to seek credit for his Administration on account of the services of the hon. member for East Hamilton, who is not in the ministry at the present time. Take, similarly, the case of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). There was a gentleman representing the agricultural interests of this country, as well as one who was a strong liberal at the time he was taken into the Administration. His name was given out to the public as that of one who lent strength to the Administration because of those circumstances. He is not in my right hon. friend's Administration at the present time. He is directly opposed to him. How can my right hon. friend lay claim to any public confidence in his Administration on account of what the hon. member for Marquette did in helping forward the work of the Government during the period of the war? Then there is the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). Though he was a Minister without portfolio, he was Chairman of several important committees, and rendered valuable service. He is not in my right hon. friend's ministry, but is sitting opposite to him at the present time. How can my right hon. friend possibly claim that his ministry is entitled to carry on by virtue of the services which the hon. member for Halifax rendered during the period of the war? Then there is the Hon. N. W. Rowell, the former President of the Privy Council.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member, I think, was quite in order in referring to the personnel of the ministry to give their names, but in referring to hon. gentlemen individually who are at the moment members of the House, it would be better, and most certainly the correct practice, if he would refer to them by the names of their constituencies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very pleased to defer to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, which I recognize to be quite proper. The point I wish to make plain is that as respects the Unionist Administration the personality of the gentlemen composing it was an all important consideration. The name of the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), the former President of the Privy Council, was put forward all over this country as that of one who led the Liberal party in the province of Ontario, and it was put forward particularly to support the claims of the Government on Liberals in Ontario. How can my right hon. friend claim for himself any expression of confidence on the part of the people in virtue of the presence in the former Administration of the hon. member for Durham? He is no longer a member of the ministry.

Then I would ask my right hon. friend, what about the former Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White). His name and his reputation stood high in this country at that time. Surely he is entitled to some of the credit of the late ministry in the matter of the winning of the war. Can my right hon. friend lay claim to any of that credit for his ministry? The hon. gentleman whom I have just mentioned is not today a member of the ministry. My right hon. friend has been unable to induce him to come into his Government.

Lastly, I ask my right hon. friend, is no credit due to the former Prime Minister Sir Robert Borden? He had long and distinguished service in the position of Prime Minister, and his name and the circumstance of his experience was a factor in helping to win the confidence of the people for his Administration. How can my right hon. friend claim any credit for what was accomplished through the ex-Prime Minister's efforts in the winning of the war as a ground on which this ministry should have the confidence of the people at the present time, seeing that the ex-Prime Minister has resigned and is unwilling to come into my right hon. friend's ministry?

So I say, if we go over the personnel of the Cabinet as it existed at the time it made its appeal to the people of Canada as a Unionist Administration and compare it with the present Government, we find the two so different in character and in personnel that it is presumption, to say the least, for my right hon. friend to assume that he is entitled to any credit for work which the previous Government carried on, or to any continuance of confidence from the people of Canada as a result.

May I ask my right hon. friend this question, and I hope he will answer it—Does he believe that if he himself had been called upon to form a Unionist Administration in 1917, he would have been able to do it? Does he mean to say that if he instead of the ex-Prime Minister had gone before the country as Prime Minister seeking support for a ministry at that time that the people would have given to him the confidence which was given to the late Prime Minister and the colleagues he had about him? Unless he is prepared to stand up and say that he was just as capable of forming a ministry as the ex-Prime Minister and that the people have just as much confidence in him and his present colleagues as in the ex-Prime Minister and the group that surrounded him, by what authority does he presume to carry on government, as one holding the confidence of the people of this country?

But, Sir, not only is the character and the personnel of the ministry changed, as I have described, but what is most important of all, the aims and purposes of the two ministries are entirely different. The Unionist Administration went before the people of this country as a war Administration, for the purpose of carrying on the war and dealing with the problems of the war. Will my right hon. friend say that this is a war Administration? Unless he is prepared to say that he is entitled to the confidence of the people of this country at the present time as the leader of a war Administration, by what authority does he presume to carry on the Government of this country?

I might quote at considerable length from the statements which were given to the people of this country at the time as to the purposes of the late ministry. I shall not take up the time of the House in quoting at any great length from the different statements made; two or three will, I think, be pertinent enough. As to the purpose of the previous Unionist Administration, I shall quote only from the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), who formed that Government, and from my right hon. friend who is leading the Government at the present time, and I will ask my hon. friend after he has listened to these statements, to be good enough to say whether he is prepared to stand up in this Parliament and affirm that the ministry which he is leading to-day is the same in aim and purpose as the ministry which was formed in 1917.

Here are one or two statements made by the ex-Prime Minister at the time the Unionist Administration was formed. Speaking at Toronto on November 21st, 1917—the quotation will be found in the Mail and Empire of the following day—the then Prime Minister, the present member for Kings, said:

> My purpose in forming a Union Government was to bring within it such a personnel as would be thoroughly representative of all those elements of the population of Canada that were willing to stand behind the Government in its efforts to win this war, and to fight the battle for humanity, for civilization and the fate of the world.

Speaking at Oshawa on Nov. 26, 1917, as quoted from the Toronto Globe of the following date, the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) said:

> Union Government—does any man know of any reason why there should not be union and national unity in this country when national peril confronts us? The issue is whether the war effort of Canada is to be maintained, or whether Canada is to get out of this war. That is the issue.

That was what the right hon. the then Prime Minister of this country told the people at the time of the last election. He distinctly stated that the issue was whether the war effort of Canada was to be maintained or whether Canada was to get out of the war. Can my right hon. friend who is now leading the Government (Right Hon. Arthur Meighen) describe the issue before the country at the present time in those terms? Can he find anything which will justify him in maintaining an administration on the basis on which the Unionist Government was returned at the last election?

Speaking at Milton on November 29, 1917, as will be seen from the Toronto Star of November 30, my right hon. friend the member for Kings, the then Prime Minister, made a statement which is to be found quoted in several papers. I shall quote from two because they are significant:

> "There is only one issue after all in this campaign," said Sir Robert, "whether we shall keep our pledge or bond given to those men at the front, or whether we shall abandon them when they need our help most".

I will ask my right hon. friend to pay particular attention to these words, which are taken from the Toronto Star:

"There is only one issue in this campaign, whether we shall keep our pledge, etc."

The Mail and Empire, referring to the same speech, quotes the right hon. gentleman in these terms:

There is only one issue in this campaign—only one that I can see to-day—

Observe, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend repeated the statement—only one.

—whether Canada shall maintain her effort in the war and support the men who have gone forth on the pledge of her honour, or whether Canada shall relax her effort, withdraw from the war, and practically leave these men to consider themselves abandoned and betrayed.

I submit that when the people of this country were told by the then Prime Minister that there was only one issue—only one—in such plain terms that every man, woman and child in this country could understand the nature and meaning of it, the services of the administration elected on that issue were at an end when the issue ceased to exist; and when a Government comes along two years after the war is over and attempts to carry on the affairs of this country without appealing to the electorate for any vindication of its position, it is usurping the authority of the people. I ask my right hon. friend what becomes of the theory that government is carried on in virtue of the consent of the governed? The governed gave their consent on one issue, an issue which has long since passed. Yet the hon. gentleman presumes to carry on to-day without even consulting the electorate. He ignores them in the most flagrant manner.

The Prime Minister of that day, however, was not the only one who described to the people of this country what the issue was. My right hon. friend himself made a good many speeches during that campaign. He and two of his colleagues at the time were, I think, the first to address a large public meeting in Canada, the one that was supposed, to use his own words, "to sound the appeal of the new government." That meeting, as he may recall, was held in the City of Winnipeg. It was largely attended, and an account of it is given in the Manitoba Free Press of October 23, 1917. A three-page report appears in that issue of the Manitoba Free Press, and it was quoted all over this country. The hon. member for Marquette (Hon. Mr. Crerar) was one of those who spoke along with my right hon. friend, and the Hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization, who is also President of the Privy Council at the present time (Hon. J. A. Calder). They were all present, and these are the words of my right hon. friend. He said that his purpose, and that of the colleagues appearing with him on the platform was to present the principle and to show forth the spirit that had brought them together, and "to sound the appeal of the new government." He was dealing both with the principle and with the spirit of the new Government. As he listens to his own words, I want to ask him whether he thinks that principle and that spirit apply to his administration at the present time. I will not quote the whole of his speech; I shall merely give extracts:

"Our Government, for which we stand to-night, is founded on the rock of compulsory service, and on that rock we will still build it.

Will he stand up in this Parliament and say at the present time that his Government is founded on the rock of compulsory service? and that on that rock he is still building?

Mr. BUREAU: It is merely an aggregation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To continue:

I want to make it as clear as I can that the only way Canada can give the verdict of "carry on" is to vote for the Union Government. We can only vote for or against the Government.

In other words, he describes the issue as being that of "carrying on". I admit that the phrase to carry on might be used as a cry for his present administration, but I think he had a different purpose in mind at that time. I do not think my right hon. friend intended to have that cry serve a double purpose. Then he said further:

We can only vote for Borden and Union administration, or vote for a man who, no matter under what flag he may be running will be a follower of an administration headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This vote for Borden or Laurier is a vote to carry on the war or to quit.

Now, may I ask my right hon. friend when he tells the country that the whole question at that time was between Borden and Laurier, whether that is the question before the country at the present time? Between Borden and Laurier? Where, may I ask my right hon. friend, does he come in? My right hon. friend was modest at that time. He was careful to exclude himself. He did not presume to stand along side of those distinguished gentlemen as being equal to them in political stature. But he has changed his attitude since. Here is another sentence from the speech he delivered then, and I would call his attention particularly to it. He said:

There never was a clearer issue before the people than today. It is simply an issue of Union Government and a vigourous prosecution of the war, or Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Canada's virtual withdrawal from the war.

I think my hon. friend knew better than to say what he did say in reference to Sir Wilfrid Laurier at that time, but apart from that portion of the quotation, let me repeat what he said as to the issue itself:

It is simply an issue of Union Government and a vigorous prosecution of the war.

Is that the issue at the present time? I am sure my right hon. friend cannot lay claim to office in virtue of those terms. My right hon. friend concluded his speech with this reference which is interesting:

I appeal to the people of Manitoba, I appeal to the people here, to give to this Government its mission, to the Prime Minister of this country his mission, to carry on. He is the man who will perform the task.

Now what was my right hon. friend aiming at in that remark, when he said that day, speaking about the Prime Minister, "He is the man?" He did not then say "I am the man"; but that is what he is saying to-day. He is telling the people of Canada to-day that the verdict which was given in 1917 was a mandate to him to carry on the Government of this country. Now I say that unless he is prepared to stand up and make that statement here, in the presence of his colleagues and the members of the House generally, neither he nor his Government has any authority to carry out what they propose to do and they are acting in direct violation of the spirit of the constitution of the country.

Mr. Speaker, there is a matter to which I wish particularly to refer in this connection. I notice that in the Speech of His Excellency to Parliament reference is made to the Customs Tariff. That reference begins:

My advisors are convinced of the necessity for the revision of the Customs Tariff.

Well, they have got along thus far but it has taken them a long time. We told them year after year there was need for that revision. It is interesting to notice that my right hon. friend now admits that there is need for revision; but I want to ask him by what right he and his ministry are presuming to undertake the revision of the tariff? That is the question that should be answered I think before we discuse the tariff one way or another in this House. My right hon. friend knows, or ought to know that when an appeal was made to the people of Canada in 1917 there were certain questions, certain subjects, which were expressly excluded from consideration by the electorate and by the Parliament that was to be returned that year. It was recognized it would not only be difficult but that it would be impossible to form a Government if certain questions were to be considered by the parliament then to be elected. The tariff was one of those questions and I now say to my right hon. friend that when the Government of 1917 was formed it was with the distinct understanding that the tariff would not be brought up in parliament under that administration. Therefore he has no right and no authority to introduce that subject for discussion at the present time; it should remain for the consideration of a parliament that is truly representative of the people of Canada.

Let me make perfectly clear to the House just how far my right hon. friend and the colleagues who were associated with him at that time went in expressly excluding the tariff from any consideration by this parliament. I shall take first the speech that was delivered by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Here is the statement of that hon. gentleman made at the meeting at which my right hon. friend was one of the speakers:

After I had taken my seat in the Cabinet, a friend of mine in Ontario, one of the most intelligent among the eastern farmers, met me in Toronto. The first thing he said to me was, "What concessions did you get on the tariff?" I told him that I had not got any, and that I had not asked any. That is not to say that I did not feel strongly on the tariff, but I feel that the present issue is not the tariff, but the winning of the War, and to prosecute that great purpose this Government has been formed, and old political opponents like the gentlemen you see here on the platform have struck hands across the Cabinet table of the nation and are going to guide the nation's destiny in this time of peril.

I ask my right hon. friend if he hears those words? Let me repeat them again:

That is not to say that I do not feel strongly on the tariff, but I feel the present issue is not the tariff but the winning of the war.

Could there be a clearer statement than that made by a member of the Government at the time? The hon. member for Marquette was speaking as a member of the Government. He was speaking as a member of the Government of which my right hon. friend was at the time a member, and he said at that time that the tariff would not be considered. On the basis of that assurance he made his appeal to the electors of western Canada, and of other parts of the Dominion as well. In the face of that I ask my right hon. friend how can he presume to deny to the people of Canada the right to return a representative parliament to deal with that issue when the time comes for it to be taken up.

The hon. member for Marquette was not the only minister who spoke in that way at that time. A member of the present administration—the Minister of Immigration and Colonization —(Mr. Calder)—also gave his word to the electors of Canada as to what would be done by the administration. I now ask my hon. friend (Mr. Calder) how he reconciles his remaining as a member of the Government which contemplates a revision of the tariff with the statements which I am about to read to him—statements made at a time when the Minister of Immigration and Colonization gave his word of honour as a public man to the people of Canada as to the grounds on which the administration should be returned in 1917. The Minister of Immigration and Colonization said:

It is because we are in the war, and all that it means, that we three men happen to sit just where we are to-day. The one main issue is whether we are to carry on or not. We have simply consented to union for the immediate purpose of this war and the solution of the problems arising out of the war and we are prepared—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KING: I hear hon. gentlemen opposite applauding the statement as to dealing with the issues that grew out of the war. Do hon. gentlemen opposite mean to say that the tariff is an issue that grew out of the war? If so they can place any issue under heaven in a similar category. If my hon. friend (Mr. Calder) now holds such a view, he surely entertains an entirely different mental attitude from what he did at the time to which I refer, when he declared that the tariff was to be excluded from consideration by the Government. In 1917 my hon. friend was very careful to say that the tariff would not be a matter to be considered.

My hon. friend (Mr. Calder) went on to say:

We were prepared for the time being to sink our differences of opinion in so far as many of the domestic and local problems which we have are concerned. We must do that to get union. Just imagine what would have happened if Mr. Crerar had sat down with Sir Thomas White to try and get together on questions of tariff.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Let me repeat: the hon. minister said:

Just imagine what would happen if Mr. Crerar had sat down with Sir Thomas White and tried to get together on the question of the tariff.

I ask my hon. friends opposite who applauded the idea of the tariff being an issue growing out of the war whether they will applaud that remark? Unless hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to do so they have no right to presume that the tariff is a question with which they can deal to the exclusion of a parliament so empowered by the people. My hon. friend went on to say:

We would never have had Union if one of the requirements was that it had to be reached on the question of the tariff.

I ask my hon. friend, as a member of the present Government and as a member of the Government speaking at that time, whether he meant what he said on that occasion.

An hon. MEMBER: He was only joking.

Mr. KING: Was my hon. friend telling the people the truth at that time or had he something else in his mind? Was he quite sincere in what he said then? I find difficulty in reconciling his utterances with his remaining at the present time in a ministry which is attempting to deal with the tariff. Let me read the sentence again:

We would never have had Union if one of the requirements was that it had to be reached on the question of the tariff.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who said that?

Mr. KING: The Minister of Immigration and Colonization, the present President of the Privy Council. He went on to say:

We found it absolutely necessary on both sides, on the Conservative Party's part and our own, to sink all differences of opinion in connection with these domestic problems. So far as I am concerned, on the questions of tariff, banking, agricultural credit, land settlement, and all those problems affecting our western people, I stand where I stood three weeks ago, and I am certain my friend (Mr. Crerar) does not stand far from that position. But for the time being, we let them go by the board, and we go into this union with an entirely different purpose.

Again, may I ask, in the face of such an appeal to the electorate, the bonafides of which were vouched for by his presence on the platform, and with the Minister of Immigration and Colonization still one of the ministers in his own administration, how dare my right hon. friend presume to say that his Government is justified in dealing with this all-important question, without first giving to the people of Canada an opportunity to return to Parliament a House of Commons that will give a proper expression to their views?

At that time the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and my right hon. friend were standing side by side; to-day they are standing directly opposite to each other, taking directly opposite positions. And why did my hon. friend for Marquette leave the ministry of which he was a member? He left it because he felt it was formed for a particular purpose, and when that purpose was fulfilled, that was as far as it had any right or authority to go. He took exactly the same position that my hon. friend has taken here, that the tariff was not an issue with which this Parliament could deal one way or the other. Under these circumstances I ask my right hon. friend, when he retains in his cabinet a colleague who has given a pledge of that kind to the people, how does he presume to suggest to His Excellency that the tariff is a question for discussion at this particular session of Parliament?

But the honourable member for Marquette and the honourable the Minister of Immigration and Colonization were not the only speakers who expressly excluded legislation with respect to the tariff from the jurisdiction of the Unionist Government, or who gave assurances, which the Canadian public were justified in taking as final and authoritative, that the tariff would not be dealt with until some subsequent appeal were made to the electorate with specific reference to domestic issues. The right hon. the Prime Minister himself also spoke with special reference to the tariff. I have already quoted the nature of his appeal on the general issue. Here is what he had to say more particularly with reference to the tariff:

> In time of peace we can afford to support a candidate with a reservation, but in time of war they are a menace to a nation. I make no imperious demands. I only ask the people of this country to see the issue as it is, and to rise to a certainty that a vote in opposition to the new administration is a vote which will imperil the conditions under which we work for the war. We ask from no man and from no woman a reversal or abnegation of his or her convictions on fiscal matters or tariff matters or any other subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says "hear, hear." I would ask him: Will he presume to say that his ministry in attempting to legislate on the tariff in the present session is not obliging the men and women of this country to forego an expression of their views on the tariff question? If my right hon. friend will say that he intends to appeal to the people, then I am quite prepared to admit that he may not be denying them that right which he then said he would not take from them. But if he presumes in this session to attempt to deal with the tariff, the people will hold him guilty of as great a breach of faith as it is possible for a public man to commit.

> We only ask that they postpone the prosecution of those opinions and convictions, and subordinate them to the infinitely greater necessity until we get through these abnormal times. This is all the appeal we make. The accepted basis of union was the only basis on which union was possible at the present time. What Mr. Calder, Mr. Crerar and I ask is that the people of this country unite on the same basis that the Government of the country united.

In the quotations I have cited, you have heard from the lips of the then Minister of Agriculture and the present Minister of Immigration and Colonization what the accepted basis of union was. They have both said that it expressly excluded any dealings with the tariff. My right hon. friend joins with them in an appeal on that ground. Again, I ask, how dare my right honourable friend presume to say that his Government is justified in dealing with this all-important question, without first giving to the people of Canada an opportunity to return to Parliament a House of Commons that will give a proper expression to their views?

Well, Mr. Speaker, one is almost at a loss to imagine what my right hon. friend can say in reply in view of the statements which I have just quoted.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do not worry; you will know soon enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I know already what he will say. He and his colleagues in different parts of the country have apparently found it necessary to work out a defence for their position, they realize they are on the defensive in this matter, and when addressing different meetings they have attempted to make an explanation to the public, which they hope will be accepted. As far as I have been able to follow the remarks of my right hon. friend and his colleagues, there are broadly four grounds upon which an attempt will be made to justify the continuance of this Government. First of all he will seek refuge in the law and the constitution, in the limit of time permitted a Parliament by the British North America Act; in the right of a ministry to exist so long as it has a following in the House of Commons, or, in other words, the plenary powers of Parliament to legislate as it pleases. Next, he will seek to defend his position on grounds of literal interpretation. He will contend that no pledge was given by the Government of my right honourable friend, the ex-Prime Minister, that it would hold office only for war purposes, or, to use his own words, that the Government "did not commit itself"; and, finally, he may make mention of personal considerations, and repeat what he has also said elsewhere, namely, that the Leader of the Opposition does not want a general election.

Let me briefly examine each of these several contentions. First, my right hon. friend will argue that his right is based on the law and the constitution. He will no doubt quote to this House section 50 of the British North America Act, which is as follows:

> Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer.

He will tell the people that inasmuch as Parliament has the right by the constitution to sit for five years, therefore it is entitled to sit for that length of period. Let me say to my right hon. friend, what I am sure he knows quite well, that a legal right does not constitute a legal or moral obligation to continue the term of Parliament for five years under the limit of time fixed by the constitution. More than that, as my right hon. friend knows, the main purpose of the constitution in limiting the time is to place a limit on ministries such as his, which would continue in office forever in the absence of any time limit.

If my right hon. friend will look to British parliamentary procedure, as well as to the procedure of our own Parliament in the past, he will find that the constitutional practice all along has been not to exhaust the full limit of time, but rather to have regard to the issues which come before the people, and to dissolve Parliament when the old issues have been settled and new issues arise. Let me cite to my right hon. friend by way of exact reference the British Parliamentary practice under a rule which is similar to ours.

There was a period when the time of the British Parliament was not limited; it could sit indefinitely. Then it became necessary to limit the parliamentary period, and it was first fixed for seven and afterwards for five years, similar to the limit which is to be found in our own constitution. The position in the case of the British Parliament under that legislation was exactly the same as the position of this Parliament under the British North America Act.

Before the Triennial Act, 1694 (6 Will and Mary C. 2) there was no constitutional limit to the continuance of Parliament but the will of the Crown. Under the Septennial Act, 1715 (1 Geo. 1st 2C. 38) it ceased to exist after seven years from the day on which, by the Writ of Summons, it was appointed to meet, a period which was reduced to five years by the Parliament Act, 1911—May's "Parliamentary Practice," 12th Ed., p. 53).

Now, let us examine for a moment the duration of the various British Parliaments from 1865 up to 1911, during which period the limit fixed by the constitution was seven years.

The Parliament elected in Great Britain in 1865 lasted for 2 years and 9 months.

The Parliament elected in 1868 lasted for 5 years and 1 month.

The Parliament elected in 1874 lasted for 6 years.

The Parliament elected in 1880 lasted for 5 years and 6 months.

The Parliament elected in 1885 lasted for 5 months.

The Parliament elected in 1886 lasted for 5 years and 10 months.

The Parliament elected in 1892 lasted for 2 years and 11 months.

The Parliament elected in 1895 lasted for 5 years and 1 month.

The Parliament elected in 1900 lasted for 5 years and 1 month.

The Parliament elected in 1906 lasted for 3 years and 11 months.

The Parliament elected in 1910 (Jan.) lasted for 9 months.

The Parliament elected in December, 1910, passed the Parliament Act, 1911, which reduced the parliamentary period to five years. On account of the War, this period was extended from year to year, until after the termination of the War, and in December, 1918, a general election was held.

This record shows us that with one single exception no British Parliament from 1865 down to the present time has run within a year of the full period of the term allowed by the constitution. It shows, too, that about one half of all the parliaments that met in Great Britain subsequent to 1865 used only one half of the period of time provided by the time limit of the constitution. Why has that been the case? The answer is simply this: The spirit of the constitution is much more important than the letter of it. The letter of the constitution provides a limit beyond which the term of Parliament may not run, but having regard to the rights of the people the parliaments of Great Britain have for the most part found it desirable and necessary to exhaust only about one-half, some of them two-thirds, of the full period which the constitution allows.

Take, next, the history of our own Parliament since Confederation. In Canada, notwithstanding the 5 year limit fixed by the British North America Act, the duration of the several Parliaments since Confederation, has been as follows:

The 1st Parliament dissolved July 8, 1872, 4 years, 9 months, 15 days.
The 2nd Parliament dissolved January 2, 1874, 1 year, 4 months.
The 3rd Parliament dissolved August 17, 1878, 4 years, 5 months, 24 days.
The 4th Parliament dissolved May 18, 1882, 3 years, 5 months, 27 days.
The 5th Parliament dissolved January 15, 1887, 4 years, 5 months, 8 days.
The 6th Parliament dissolved February 3, 1891, 3 years, 9 months, 28 days.
The 7th Parliament dissolved April 24, 1896, 4 years, 11 months, 30 days.
The 8th Parliament dissolved October 9, 1900, 4 years, 2 months, 26 days.
The 9th Parliament dissolved September 29, 1904, 3 years, 11 months, 20 days.
The 10th Parliament dissolved September 17, 1908, 3 years, 11 months, 18 days.
The 11th Parliament dissolved July 29, 1911, 2 years, 10 months, 20 days.
The 12th Parliament (the War Parliament) dissolved October 6, 1917, 6 years, 3 months, 17 days.
The 13th Parliament, until February 14, 1921, 3 years, 3 months, 27 days.

The seventh Parliament ran to within one day of the time limit. There was in power at that time a Tory administration like the present, which was doomed, and the members of which knew it. I suppose my right hon. friend and his colleagues, being similarly situated will regard this as the precedent they should follow and will endeavour if possible to hold out, not to the last day but one, but the very last, if that is at all possible. The Thirteenth Parliament, this present Parliament, has lasted for three years and three months; it has already lasted longer than some of the other Parliaments which have assembled in Canada. The Parliament that was dissolved in 1908 lasted for three years and eleven months; the Parliament that was dissolved in 1911 had lasted for only two years and ten months.

These figures afford ground for some interesting reflections. In the first place, it will be observed that this very Parliament has already had a longer existence than the Parliament which was dissolved on July 29, 1911. The late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the same legal rights under the constitution as my Right Hon. friend. He had a much more powerful following in Parliament. His appreciation of the spirit of the British constitution and his sense of public duty and obligation to the electorate were, however, a little higher and keener than those of my right hon. friend. He recognized the rights of the people as superior to those afforded his Government under the constitution. He believed that Government should be carried on only with the consent of the governed. He dissolved Parliament to afford to the people their constitutional right of passing upon a great issue which was an issue other than that of the elections of 1908.

It will be further observed that the existing life of this Parliament, joined to that of its predecessor, already comes within less than three months of exhausting the time limit of two consecutive Parliaments enjoying the full length of term permitted by the constitution: also that, already, it is within less than a year and three months of the duration of the preceding three Parliaments of the Liberal Administration.

When it is recalled that since 1911 the people of this country have had no opportunity to pass upon distinctly Canadian issues, and that in the interval men who fought for their country overseas have been denied all privilege of even hearing these issues discussed at a general election, that only a fraction of the women of the country have had a voice in government though all have since been admitted to the franchise; that hundreds of thousands of citizens were disfranchised in 1917; and that practically all young men between the ages of 21 and 31 have never yet had opportunity of recording their votes with respect to matters of vital domestic concern, the injustice to the electorate, of attempting further to prolong the life of this Parliament, must be apparent to all.

If we are to have regard for the spirit of the constitution, rather than the letter, it is perfectly clear that it is the rights of the people, with respect to important national issues, which is the determining factor in deciding the length of time for which a Parliament should sit—issues upon which a ministry has been returned to power, and new issues upon which the people have a right to be consulted, and to make their will known. Clearly, the spirit of the constitution demands at the present time, both as respects the issue upon which the Government of 1917 was returned to power, and which has ceased to be an issue, and the domestic problems which have arisen in this post-war period, and which present new and far-reaching considerations requiring immediate solution, that the present Parliament should not exhaust the period of time which the legal limit permits, but that the people should be entitled without further delay to an expression of their will at the polls.

The next contention of my right honourable friend will be that Parliament is supreme; that so long as the Government is in a position to command a majority in the House of Commons, it is all-powerful, and that its rights and powers to legislate cannot be curtailed in any particular.

Here, again, may I say that no one will question the supremacy of Parliament where Parliament is duly constituted. But once more, it is to the spirit of the constitution, not to the letter of the law, that, in existing circumstances, we must look for a fair and just interpretation of the rights and duties of Parliament.

The theory of the supremacy of Parliament, as it is understood in our day, is based upon the assumption that Parliament represents the will of the people as expressed through representation effected under a franchise which preserves the people in their full right of control over Parliament. Will my right hon. friend maintain that such can be said of the existing representation in this House of Commons? No one knows quite so well as my right hon. friend that the franchise under which the representation of the present Parliament was effected was anything but of that nature; that, as a matter of fact, it was a franchise so framed and brought into being and administered as to constitute the worst betrayal of the rights of the people which this country has ever known. Except that the nation was at war at the time, it would not have been tolerated even by those who were ready to profit by its unjust provisions, and their still more unjust manipulation at home and across the seas.

What was the ground upon which the late Sir Wilfrid, then leader of the Opposition, and the Liberals in Parliament consented to an extension of the term of Parliament for one year in 1916? It was that the rights of the people in the matter of their control over Parliament were in no particular being abridged. Sir Wilfrid made it very clear and distinct that he would not consent to an extension—and the Prime Minister had already said that he would not attempt to get an extension unless Sir Wilfrid Laurier agreed to it—if the people were being robbed of their control over Parliament one way or the other.

Here are the late Sir Wilfrid's words as expressed at that time:

> I would observe, first of all, that it is not proposed here to alter the principle of the constitution. It is not proposed to override the control which the people have over Parliament. It is simply proposed to suspend for the time being the operation of the constitution. If it were proposed to make away altogether with that principle which is embodied in the constitution, certainly I would oppose such an attempt with all my might. But no such thing is proposed. This measure simply proposes that the constitution shall be suspended for twelve months, at the expiration of which time it will resume its full force.

Well, how were the rights of the people in the matter of their control over Parliament secured at that time? One instrument was the then existing franchise, embodied in the Dominion Elections Act, 1898, under which the Government of the day, as well as its predecessors of an opposite political faith, had been returned to power. Is it conceivable that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and those who surrounded him at the time, would have agreed to the extension had they believed that during the period of that extension the people would have been robbed in so large measure of the provisions of a law specially framed to preserve them in their right of control over Parliament; that in its stead an Act would be placed on our statutes which would take away from thousands of electors whose approval of the extension was taken for granted on grounds of patriotism at the time it was made, the political rights of citizens which they then enjoyed; and give to other thousands of women, specially favoured, political rights not previously enjoyed and withheld from all other loyal and devoted women in the country.

When the Franchise Act as it existed at the time the extension of Parliament took place, was changed, the representative character of Parliament was doomed from the very outset, and the Parliament which was returned under the different election Acts, Acts framed for war purposes, cannot be said to represent the will of the people at the present time. I think my right hon. friend must admit that the franchise under which this Parliament was returned was a franchise framed only for war purposes. The two Acts under which this particular Parliament has come into being are the War-time Elections Act and the Military Voters' Act. Under the War-time Elections Act, rights were, as I have said, taken away from large numbers of people of this country; they were disfranchised; they lost their control of Parliament. Since that time they have been taxed without any representation in Parliament one way or the other, so that there has been a direct violation of the spirit of the constitution in that regard. I will not enlarge upon the different iniquities of that measure, but amongst the Government's own supporters of the day it would never have passed except for the fact that we were in the midst of a war at that time and the War-time Elections Act was excused as a war measure for war purposes only. How can my right hon. friend contend that a Parliament returned under a measure such as that can be of a representative character at the present time?

The Military Voters' Act was a measure passed by this Parliament for the purpose, not of defeating the will of the electorate, but of giving expression to it. My right hon. friend knows, perhaps more than anyone else in this House, that that Act was used to effect the representation in this particular Parliament. I shall spare the House a recital of that disgraceful chapter in our national history, whereby advantage was taken of the Military Voters' Act to coerce, in the matter of their political rights, thousands of the young men of this country who were serving their country and the cause of freedom overseas, and whereby their votes, together with the votes of hundreds of men and women who had never seen Canada, were poured by emissaries of the Government into specially selected constituencies, with no object other than that of ensuring the defeat of candidates opposed to the Administration, a course of action which, by the way, has been openly defended and commended by my right hon. friend on the very floor of Parliament. My right hon. friend knows quite well that there are sitting in this House of Commons to-day many members who would not be sitting here at the present time if the election had taken place under the old Dominion Franchise Act instead of under those particular Acts.

Unless we have a representative Parliament, what becomes of any theory of the supremacy of Parliament? The supremacy of Parliament is based in every particular upon the circumstance that Parliament is supposed to be truly representative of the will of the people. I have not, however, mentioned these two particular measures for the purpose of enlarging upon the iniquities which helped to disgrace the record of our Canadian history at the time; my purpose is to draw the attention of Parliament to the circumstance that both those Acts have been repealed, and that we have at the present time upon the Statutes a new Franchise Act which was passed by this Parliament at the last session. The meaning of that is simply this, that this Parliament recognized that the franchise under which the members of the present Parliament had been returned was not a franchise which adequately represented the views of the people of this country at the present time. They recognized that that was a franchise permissible only for war purposes and that its ends were served when the war was over. When we have a new Franchise Act passed by this Parliament which gives the right of the ballot to thousands of citizens who had not that right previously, for the Government to continue to carry on in view of the support that it is getting from representation effected under those old methods, constitutes, I maintain, a direct usurpation of popular government in this country.

That brings me to the third point on which I think my right hon. friend has already attempted to justify his carrying on of the Government of the country. He has attempted to justify it on a literal interpretation of what was said in the campaign of 1917. He has said that the then Prime Minister gave no pledge at that time; that the Government of that day did not commit itself. That line of defence implies such colossal deception that I do not think any ministry could feel itself so unworthy as to come before the people on such a ground.

Does my right hon. friend wish it to be assumed that when he and his distinguished predecessor in the high office of Prime Minister of Canada were appealing in the name of patriotism to men and women of all classes to forget party and party considerations, when they were appealing to mothers for their support that an end might the more speedily be made to the sacrifice of their sons, and the slaughter of human lives, that all the time they were cherishing a mental reservation which looked beyond the winning of the war to personal aggrandizement and the maintenance of political power when the war was won, regardless altogether of the nature of their appeal. The thought is too abhorrent even to entertain. I refuse to believe any thing so unworthy of my fellow countrymen, and least of all of those who have come to occupy a distinguished position in our public life.

I do not wish to take up too much time in discussing this matter further. I might, however, direct the attention of my right hon. friend to a very important circumstance, namely, that fortunately some of his former colleagues in the late ministry view their obligations to the people in a different way from that in which he is prepared to view his obligations at present. We have had five resignations by Liberal members of the previous ministry, and I think all of them have been on the ground that the hon. members who resigned felt that when they entered the Unionist administration the public believed they were entering a war administration and that when that administration had served its purpose, their right to continue longer in office was at an end. On June 4, 1919, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) resigned; on August 2, 1919, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Carvell) resigned; on January 1, 1920, the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mewburn), then Minister of Militia and Defence, resigned; on February 23, 1920, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) resigned, and on July 8, 1920 the then President of the Privy Council, the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell) resigned. All of these gentlemen have read their obligations to the people in terms wholly different from those in which my right hon. friend is reading his obligations at the present time. They, at least, did not have any mental reservations one way or the other in what they were leading the people to believe at the time they entered the Unionist administration and appealed to the country.

I have mentioned certain members of the late Government who have read their obligation in a different way. There is one other member of the Government that I should like to quote in the matter of obligation, because he happens to be a member of my right hon. friend's administration. I think there are only two of the original so-called Liberal members of the day who went into the Union Administration who are now in my right hon. friend's ministry. I have here a quotation from a speech made by my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) in this Parliament at the time the hon. member for Marquette resigned from the Government, and perhaps it will be worth while to give it just to show how my hon. friend viewed the matter of resignations at that time. Here is what he said (Hansard, p. 3341):

> Let me ask hon. members of this House what would be the consequences if we all followed the course taken by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Suppose the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) resigned, and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), and the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Maclean), and myself and others should resign—at which point there was some interruption, when my hon. friend continued:

> Do not be too sure, my friends, the task of carrying on government in this country and the responsibilities that are thrown upon public men are not so alluring as some hon. gentlemen seem to think. I say that if those resignations did take place there would immediately be a political crisis in this country, and one thing, and one thing only, could happen: either the Prime Minister would have to appeal to the country, or he would have to advise the Governor General to call upon my friend who leads the Opposition to form a new Government.—(Hansard, p. 3341).

Well, all these resignations, and others, save alone that of my hon. friend, have taken place. Are we to assume, then, that he is the slender thread on which the fate of the ministry hangs; that it is to his presence in the ministry we owe the aversion of a political crisis, and the one thing and one thing only that could happen? If that be so, let me assure my hon. friend that the greatest service he can render the country is to drop out of the ministry just as speedily as possible.

I come now to the last mentioned of the arguments enunciated, namely, that the leader of the Opposition himself does not desire an election. I would hesitate to make mention of this contention, since it is so puerile, were it not that my right hon. friend himself has put it forward on different occasions, and one or two of his colleagues have busied themselves whispering it about.

What, may I ask, have my wishes or desires to do with this matter, or, for that matter, the wishes or desires of my right hon. friend, or any other member of this House on either side of you, Mr. Speaker?

It is not a matter of wish or desire; it is a matter of right and duty: the right of the people to self-government, and the duty of their representatives in Parliament to be scrupulous in the defence of that right whenever it appears to be infringed. It is the basis of all our liberty, and our one sure defence against arbitrary behaviour and revolutionary tendencies in matters of government.

My right honourable friend says he has been all over Canada and has heard no demand for a general election. That only proves that his hearing is not as good as my own. I may tell him that I also have crossed the Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and everywhere I have gone, it is the one demand I have heard.

But if he has not heard it, perhaps he has seen it in the record of the by-elections which have been held since the termination of the War. They reveal an overwhelming public opinion against the Government.

Whilst a general election has been refused the by-elections show an overwhelming public opinion against the Government. The Government's record in the by-elections is a tale of defeat, a story, for the most part, of enormous majorities wiped out, and enormous majorities recorded against them. Since the armistice was signed there have been in all sixteen by-elections. These are divisible into three groups: by-elections of hon. members opposite who are in the ministry; by-elections held in constituencies that were won by the Liberals in 1917; and by-elections in constituencies that were won by the Unionist Administration in 1917.

Take the case first of by-elections of Ministers. We all know that constituencies normally are gratified to see their members made Ministers of the Crown. It requires a strong wave of popular indignation to defeat a minister; usually his return is by acclamation. That was so in the case of my honourable friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). It was recognized by the country that at this, of all times, it was important the country should have a Minister of Finance, and that he should be as free from embarrassment in the discharge of his duties as possible. So my honourable friend from Kingston was permitted to take his seat unopposed. It was not the same, however, with the other honourable ministers. In the case of my honourable friend the Minister of Agriculture, (Mr. Tolmie) his majority as a Minister was reduced, in the city of Victoria, from 8,764 which he obtained when returned as a private member, to 2,134 when returned with the prestige of a Minister. In the case of the present Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore) as my hon. friends know, he was only opposed at the last moment and a good deal was said and promised by my hon. friend and others to encourage the electors of that constituency during the campaign. His majority was reduced, in the city of St. John and the counties of St. John and Albert, from 7,917 when returned as a private member, to 4,155 when returned as a Minister of the Crown. Then, in the case of the present Minister of Public Works, (Mr. McCurdy) in the county of Colchester he was elected by acclamation as a private member in 1917; but in the by-election, running as a member of the present Administration, he was strongly opposed.

Let it not be forgotten that in the case of all the ministerial by-elections, the Government had the choosing of the constituencies and the opening of all of them. They were careful to select what they conceived to be their strongholds in the respective provinces. In all these elections, they only retained seats previously held.

Coming now to by-elections of the second group, what does the record show? In the case of constituencies won by the Liberals in 1917, not one has been lost.

There was the constituency of Prince, P.E.I., which was contested in the general elections. The by-election there was won by acclamation. In Quebec East an election was fought in 1917, but the Government did not dare to put up a candidate against my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) in the by-election. In Kamouraska, where there had been an election in 1917, my hon. friend (Mr. Stein) was returned by acclamation in the by-election. In St. James, Montreal, in that great metropolis and industrial centre, my hon. friend (Mr. Rinfret) was elected without opposition from a Government candidate.

That is the record in regard to the voice of the people in the case of hon. members who were returned for constituencies held by the Liberals in 1917. Contrast that with the constituencies won by the Government in 1917 and see what the voice of the people is when it gets the only expression possible. We have been denied general elections but the by-elections serve to give some indication of the will and wishes of the people.

There have been eight by-elections held in constituencies that were won by the Government in 1917.

Of the eight they have retained one, and lost seven. The one retained was Yale. In the by-election which was held in that constituency this year the Government received only 389 of a majority, whereas their candidate, a minister, in the general election in 1917, had been returned by acclamation. That is all they received. Now what about the other constituencies? Here are the results so far as the Government is concerned. In Glengarry and Stormont an election was held on the 27th of October, 1919. In the general elections of 1917 the Government's candidate was returned by acclamation: in the by-election there was a majority vote of 2,376 against the Government. In Assiniboia the Government's candidate received, in the election of 1917, a majority of 4,524. In the by-election there was no Government candidate. In Victoria-Carleton where in the general election of 1917 a Minister was returned by acclamation, there was a majority against the Government in the by-election on October 27th, 1919, of 3,544. In Timiskaming, in the elections of 1917, the Government candidate was returned by a majority of 2,150. In the by-election on April 7th, 1920, there were three candidates running ; the Government candidate came in at the foot of the poll, a total vote of 5,316 having been registered against him. In North Ontario, in the general elections, the Government candidate received a majority of 1,555 while in the election on December 9, 1919, the Government lost the constituency which was carried by an Opposition candidate by a majority of 185.

Now we come to the period since the assumption of office by my right hon. friend. Two by-elections have been held since he has become Prime Minister in each of which he has made a special appeal to the people for support and confidence in his government. In 1917 the Government candidate in the constituency of East Elgin received a majority of 308. In the by-election, as my hon. friend will remember, there were three candidates running, and the total majority against the Government was 2,263. Then there is West Peterborough, in which there were five candidates. In that riding the Government candidate, in the election of 1917, had a majority of 3,418. In the election just concluded, as my right hon. friend knows, the combined majority of the four candidates against the Government was 7,331. I ask my right hon. friend to say whether it is possible to have a plainer expression of public opinion than that evidenced in these several by-elections?

May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that since the armistice Canada is the only country among the nations of the British Empire and among the countries that form the associated and allied powers wherein the Government has denied to its people the right of a general election in order that they might return a representative parliament? I think my right hon. friend, if he has not given attention to that aspect of the question, will find it perhaps the most serious of all. Of all the self-governing countries that compose the British Empire, including the United Kingdom, the governments have permitted their people, since the armistice, to return representative parliaments. The people of Canada alone have been denied that right by their government. Of all the countries of the allied and associated powers, that took part in the war, this is the only one in which the people have not been accorded the right of returning a representative Parliament. Not only that, Sir; even countries in the Orient and in South America, even enemy countries, have given to their peoples the right to choose representative parliaments since the signing of the armistice.

Let me give my right honourable friend the record in this respect. In the United Kingdom a general election was held in 1918. Is the example of the British Parliament not one worthy of being emulated here? The people in the Old Country were not more interested in after war conditions than we are. The Government that had been formed and carried on in England during the war was a Unionist Administration, but the Prime Minister of England had a very different sense of obligation to the people from that which my right honourable friend has shown, because he did not lose any time before he gave the people a right to return a new parliament to deal with post-war questions. In Australia a general election was held in December, 1919. Are the people of Canada so inferior to those of Australia that they cannot be given the same right to return a representative parliament? Are they not to be trusted as much as the Australians to choose representatives who will do their duty by the public? Come to New Zealand. General elections were held there in December, 1919. Again, I ask, are the people of this Dominion not to be given the same right as the people of New Zealand in this respect? What about South Africa, the latest country to come within the Empire? South Africa has had not one but two elections since the signing of the armistice. The first election was held in February, 1920, and the other has been concluded within the past week. Are our people so inferior in calibre and in appreciation of the rights and duties of citizenship, so incapable of administering their own affairs, that they are not to be trusted in the same way as the citizens of South Africa? Take the island of Newfoundland. It had its general elections in November, 1919. Why should our people be denied that right?

Now, let us go outside of the British Empire and look at the nations that compose the allied and associated powers.

France suffered in the war, and she has her post-war problems to deal with. She had a general election in November, 1919. Italy had a general election in November, 1919; Belgium had a general election in November, 1919; The United States had a general election in November, 1920. Japan had a general election in November, 1920. Every one of the countries that comprise the allied and associated powers has given to its people rights which have been denied the people of this country by the present administration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Even Mexico has given the people that right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Even Mexico, as my honourable friend states. But we may go further and say even China. China in 1917 had a general election; Argentina in 1918; Denmark in 1918 and 1920; and Greece and Germany in 1920. Yet my right hon. friend denies the citizens of this country rights which even enemy countries have granted their peoples.

In addition to that, there is not a single province in this Dominion—with the exception of Alberta and Saskatchewan which provinces had their elections a little prior to the signing of the Armistice—that has not had an election since the signing of the Armistice. The electors throughout the country are the same people, for Federal purposes, and if the Provincial Governments have found it possible to appeal to the people, on what ground does my right hon. friend presume to say that the electorate of Canada, taken collectively, are not to be accorded the same right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell me when the elections took place in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. KING: I stated, but the Prime Minister apparently did not hear me, that all the provinces had held their elections shortly after the Armistice, with the exception of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not hear the hon. gentleman state the exception.

Mr. KING: The elections in Alberta and Saskatchewan, I believe, were held in July 1917.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This House was elected in December, 1917.

Mr. KING: Yes, but I am speaking now of the period subsequent to the signing of the Armistice. It was a short time before the signing of the Armistice when these particular provinces had their elections. Does my right hon friend think that the people of the different provinces are so inferior that they are not to be entitled to a general election? The Government of which he is the head is denying to the people of Canada rights which every Government that has a real appreciation of its duty to the people, has long since conceded. May I say to my right hon. friend that I think he will find that the only Governments which have not allowed their people a general election are those of Canada and Russia.

My right hon. friend, in his public addresses, has had a good deal to say about Bolshevism. He seems to regard all those who are not of his way of thinking as Bolshevist. Let me ask him what is Bolshevism other than the usurpation of government by a group, through some act of violence which defies the laws, usages, and customs which constitutional procedure has devised to preserve representative institutions. So long as the consequences, in robbing the people of their rights, are the same, it matters but little what the method employed may be. The only fundamental difference between the usurpation of the powers of popular government in Russia and its usurpation by the present administration in Canada, is that in Russia physical violence has been the instrument used by the usurpers to effect their purpose, while in Canada it has been legislative violence.

When a comparison of this kind is even remotely possible, it is evidence, Mr. Speaker, of the lengths we have drifted away from the spirit of our constitution, from the responsible self-government which is the very foundation of our political freedom.

It was not alone our Parliament buildings which suffered partial destruction during the period of the war; our parliamentary institutions suffered destruction in large measure along with the rest. Customs usages and practices, intended to preserve the free, representative, self-governing character of our Parliament and the responsible character of its ministry, were one by one temporarily set aside, one by one ignored, until to-day we are witnessing open defiance of the most fundamental of all principles of free government, namely: the right of the people to control their own Parliament.

What matters it if we preserve the form and letter of the law and of the constitution if the spirit is lacking? "for the letter killeth but the Spirit giveth life".

We have reconstructed our Parliament Buildings and made of them a glorious edifice, of which as a nation we are justly proud. But unless we can restore the spirit of our forefathers, which made the constitution what it is; unless we can make of these halls of parliament a citadel of a people's liberties, we will have erected over the sacrifices of the war only a whited sepulchre, a thing in form and appearance outwardly beautiful, but within a charnel house of disillusionment full of intrigues and deceptions, full of broken pledges, of shattered ideals, of lost visions, of vanished faiths, and containing the seeds of a nation's decay.

What is it, Mr. Speaker, that works havoc in human lives, that destroys the noblest of friendships, that blights all that is most sacred in our human relations? It is the loss of confidence that comes through disillusionment, through the broken pledges, the shattered ideals, the lost visions, the vanished faiths. Cruel, indeed, it is when that breach in confidence comes between man and man, between friend and friend, between race and race, between nation and nation; but when it comes between a people and its Government, there is no saying what injury it may ultimately work.

What we need to-day is to seek to restore to the people faith in our parliamentary institutions, through conceding their right of control over the Parliament of the country. We know that there are rights under the law; that there are powers under the constitution; these we are prepared to concede to the limit. But is there no such thing in our national economy as public morality? Is there nothing binding in conscience and in honour between those who rule a people and those who have permitted them to rule?

The people know, they do not have to be informed upon the grounds of the support given by them to Union Government in 1917. It was demanded of them in words of patriotism; it was engraven upon their hearts in terms of human sacrifice. Confidence in the patriotic motives of the members of the Government was the essence of their support. That confidence has gone. The people thought they were returning patriots to power. They find in office to-day only office seekers, and office holders, those who love the loaves and the fishes, who make broad their phylacteries, who enlarge the border of their garments, who love the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets, who make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within are full of extortion and excess.

Confidence in government, Mr. Speaker, will never be restored till the people regain the control over Parliament and the executive which they have lost. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) that the following be added to the Address:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers do not possess the confidence of this House or of the country, and that their retention of office constitutes a usurpation of the powers of popular government.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a few moments remain before six o'clock in which I may at least undertake the task of complimenting, in terms and in spirit sincere, the efforts of the mover and seconder of this Address, and of acknowledging some of the personal references that have passed from the previous speakers.

The mover of the Address has not only done credit to himself and to his province, but has contributed to this debate a literary charm that constitutes, to the present point at least, one of its main excellences. The seconder is a new member, and I only speak the mind of all the hon. members here when I say that he has disclosed an ability and a grasp of Canadian affairs that constitute him at once a real asset to Parliament, an acquisition to debate, and an honour to his constituency and to his province.

I have to thank both of them for their kindly references to my accession to this office, and having done that, I pass to acknowledge, in the spirit in which I know it was meant, the very generous terms in which personally the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to myself, and to the hope he expressed that the conflicts of parliamentary life and debate will not disturb the long standing friendship that has existed between us, nor in any way perturb the amenities of our personal, or, indeed, of our public intercourse. I am under no temptation whatever at the present time to believe that his hope will not be realized to the full. I have known the leader of the Opposition for, I think, something over a quarter of a century. I think I understand his public opinions and I think I can clearly get the meaning of his speeches; and I assure him here and now that if the essential humour of his addresses is always to be so thinly covered by a veil of argument and satire, as it was this afternoon our relations will never be distured in Parliament.

In the meantime, until the House resumes the debate, I will attempt to discover and then to answer what there is of matter in his address.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (continuing): Mr. Speaker, my desire is to extract as fairly as I can what there is of substance in the speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King) in the way of an attack on the position assumed by the present Government—to extract it and place it before the House in such form that at least the House can understand what the attack means and what was the argument by which it was sought to support that attack. I will have to drag the substance from under a mass of hyperbole, but the effort must be made.

I may have the aspiration—but if I have I certainly have not the talent—to rival my hon. friend in the power of declamation, a power that he has exercised throughout most of his life and which he has brought to some degree of perfection. All I aim to do in my humble way is to place before this House, in understandable terms, and through this House, before the country, the position this Government honestly takes; and the position which it believes it is in duty bound to take in the interests of the people.

My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) places before the House an amendment to the Address, in which he declares that this Government, has not the confidence of this House. Well, if that is the whole purpose of the amendment, it has no purpose at all. If the motion for the Address is defeated, that means that the House has no confidence in the Government. So the first question that arises in one's mind is: Why is this motion before the House at all? Why is this amendment here? It serves no purpose in the world—that is to say, so far as getting an expression of opinion on the part of this House is concerned as to confidence in the Government. I do not think I will proceed very far before the House will understand just what my hon. friend had in mind in bringing up this naked amendment for discussion. It was not so much to throw an issue into Parliament as to see that Parliament did not get an issue at all.

Last session we had this same amendment—or, rather, we had an amendment calling for a dissolution, which my hon. friend says is still his persistent object and purpose. But he had the grace last session to embody in the amendment some reasons why in his judgment dissolution should take place. Last session he read the following as the reasons why the House should dissolve and an appeal to the people should be made:

> The regrettable protracted absence of the Prime Minister, the widely accepted belief that it is not his intention to return to the duties of his office, the makeshift arrangements for the direction of important departments to which no minister has been regularly appointed, the attempt to carry on the public business when the three eastern Maritime Provinces are entirely unrepresented in the Cabinet—these and other things—
> The other things being all unspecified—
> —operate to produce a condition of uncertainty and instability from which a vigorous and efficient administration of the Dominion's affairs cannot be expected.

And those reasons are absent from this amendment. Why? Because they all ceased to be true. The very opposite is the fact in every instance, and my hon. friend, in search for some reasons that he could append to and embody in his amendment, finds none at all; so he simply comes forward with no reasons and states that the House should express its lack of confidence in the Government.

He wants to know by what right this Government is in office. By the sane right that every government is in office in Canada to-day or has ever been in office in this country—by the right of the confidence of a majority of the Parliament elected by a majority of the people. My hon. friend thought we had no right to be in office last session, but on every vote the government was sustained by a large majority, particularly on the vote in which he wished to declare that a dissolution should take place, "Oh", he says, "you may have a majority in Parliament, but you should not be there because you have a new Prime Minister and a new Government". Did not all the members of the old Government, he says, go out of office with the Prime Minister? Why certainly they did. Did they not all declare allegiance to the new Prime Minister and the new Government and take the oath of office again? Certainly they did; that is the case with the advent of every new Prime Minister in the history of every country. That was the case in the instance recited by my hon. friend of Sir John Abbott and Sir John Thompson. It was also the case when the present member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) resigned the post of Premier of Nova Scotia and was succeeded by Mr. Murray. It was the case when Mr. Hardy became Premier of Ontario. It was the case when Mr. Martin, the present Premier of Saskatchewan took office there. It was the case when Mr. Stewart, the present Premier of Alberta, took office in that Province. It was the case when Mr. Oliver, the present Premier of British Columbia, took office in his Province. In every case all the members of the old government went out when a new government came in.

But, my hon. friend says, I would concede you the right if only in point of character, in point of purpose and in point of aim you agreed with the government whose place you took. Well, I tell my hon. friend that in point of character, in point of purpose, and in point of aim, we are in full accord and harmony with the government we succeeded, in every respect and to the last jot and tittle. In purpose and in policy we are the same. In every respect we are a continuation of that government—in every respect in which Mr. Hardy's government was a continuation of that of Sir Oliver Mowat; in every respect in which Mr. Murray's government was a continuation of that of the hon. Mr. Fielding at that time; in every respect in which Mr. Martin's government is a continuation of the government of Mr. Walter Scott. In all these respects we follow in the direct line of the government whose place we take in office. Did my hon. friend refer to the policy of this government in seeking to show that there was a divergence and departure from the course pursued by the late administration? He never refered to policy at all. The policy is published and is well known; in no particular does it diverge; in no particular is there a departure; this Government is a legitimate successor and continuation of the government which it succeeded.

What, then, does my hon. friend resort to in order to show that we have no right to be in office notwithstanding the fact that we enjoy the confidence of a majority of Parliament and notwithstanding that our term of office is still some two years from its expiration? "Oh," he said, "you came into office in 1917 on the basis of a union, and you are a union no more." I try to put it in some understandable form. He argued, in substance: You are not, in point of the constitution of your government, in line with, in accord with, or the same as, the Government you succeeded. Well, how do we differ? He reads the names of members of the Government who have gone—members of the Government led by the hon. member for King's N.S. (Sir Robert Borden) and shows that some of them have retired from office; and he wants to know how it is that we assume the virtues of those who have retired. Well, really, I am not able to put that in understandable form at all. It is true that some have retired from office; I suppose six or seven or eight have done so. But of all those who have retired, only one, retired because of any difference in principle or policy from the Government from which he departed—only one who after his retirement failed to support the Government of which he had been a member, and did not continue the support of that Government in this House. Because men retire from office feeling that for reasons of their own they cannot longer give the kind of public service and the great labor required of public office, does that mean that the character of the Government is altered? Does that mean that the Government lacks public confidence? Why, one might just as well argue that if a member of the Government dies it is evidence that public confidence is gone. Never in the history of this country has a government sat in office with so many ex-ministers of the Crown sitting behind it in full accord with its policies and principles. And, forsooth, that is the government my hon. friend refers to in language of unparalleled exaggeration as composed of merely office-seekers and office-holders, eager to draw the salaries of ministers of the Crown, filled with all manner of scriptural vices and extortion and excess. Rather than draw the fruits of office and engage in the responsibility and continued labours that the enjoyment of office entails, there have gone from this Government, one after another, men who are not only in full accord with the policy of the Administration, and with all members of the Administration, but whose belief and expressed belief it was that the duty of the Government was to carry on as before.

My hon. friend tells us that in 1917 when this Government was elected, the issue was the carrying on of the war, and he is right. That was the great issue of the 1917 contest, not only great but overwhelmingly great: that was the issue that overshadowed all others, and in the main was the reason for the vast popular majority which this Government succeeded in obtaining. But does that mean that this Government has no duty save to carry on the war? But if it had no duty save what my hon. friend himself is willing to accord it, namely the duty of dealing with the problems of war and the problems that succeed and grow out of the war, this Government's duty is not yet done. Is there an hon. member who will argue that we in Canada are even substantially past the problems of the war? There is not a problem that confronts us now, not a difficulty that we have to surmount, not a mountain that we have to scale, that is not placed where it is and is not of the magnitude that it is by reason of the war, and is not directly, in point of character and origin, related to the problems of the war and growing out of the war itself. Is re-establishment complete? I agree, very much has been done; I believe more has been achieved in this country than in any other. But to say that all the problems of re-establishment are solved is to utter language that undoubtedly argues a lack of acquaintance with conditions in Canada at this hour. But, though the war and the problems of the war were the first duty of the Government, though the carrying on of the war was the great overwhelming issue in the contest that elected this Government, the duties of this Government were just as wide and sweeping in their scope, just as inclusive of everything that pertains to Government in Canada as were the duties of any Government ever entrusted with power. In the platform on which we appealed to the electors in 1917, though it was set out in the plainest terms that the carrying on of the war was the great purpose of that campaign, there are no less than thirteen or more other distinct duties which the Government set itself to perform; some of them related to the war, many of them only remotely related to the war, many of them not so much connected with the war as are the problems that now confront us. This Government set itself the task of carrying those duties out.

Was this Government absolved from the duty, yea, the necessity, of dealing with every question that ordinarily comes within the scope of the functions of a Government? If we were so circumscribed, if we were so restrained, who was to carry on this work who was to be responsible? Was nobody to attend to it? Did we not have to attend to it? "Ah," my hon. friend says; "you have no business to touch the tariff at all; you should not touch anything except something connected with the war." Does he know that during the very first year after the Government was elected and while the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was a member of the Government and all the elected members of the Government were there, the tariff was affected, the tariff was, indeed, reduced? And the following year the same? In every year of our existence the necessities of the tariff situation were attended to. No general revision was brought on, but that was because the time had not come when a general revision could be made with advantage to this country, when the necessary information could be obtained and when we would be in a position to lay before Parliament the terms of a revision that would be sufficiently studied and thought out. But in relation not only to the tariff, but to every other subject, the Government had dealt with these problems in the same way as it would deal with the war or any problem arising out of the war. It is true that in the concert of principles upon which the members of the Government came to common ground in the fall of 1917 we did not then agree on any matters of permanent tariff policy for Canada, and the words of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) quoted by my hon. friend this afternoon were true and apt words: they spoke no more than what was the fact. But because it was not necessary to agree upon that issue for the purpose of union at that time, did that preclude us from agreement at any time on what should be the lines of tariff policy in this country during the constitutional term of office of this Government? The Minister of Immigration and Colonization did not say so. My hon. friend himself never thought so until very lately. Why, when, did it occur to him that this Parliament had no right to deal with the tariff? That is a new thought that was born in his mind in the course of the Peterborough election. Will the House believe that it is not yet twelve months since the Leader of the Opposition seconded a motion in this House demanding that the Government deal with the tariff at once? But let me come back to the argument that I did not fully complete, namely, that the composition of the Government is different in that those who came from the Liberal party are not so numerous as they were before. My hon. friend quotes some six or seven; he claims, I think, that there were eight who were there. Well there are five to-day, and there is one who has been deceased for only a very few days, so that it seems to me it is straining a little too much to say that a reduction from eight to six is such a breach of the whole constitution of this country that we are landed now in chaos.

When my hon. friend was being carried away with the magnificence of his own declamation, particularly in those last fifty awful sentences, surely the thought came to his mind—and if it did not, it must have come to the minds of many of those who sit around him—that he was overdrawing the picture; that even if everything he had argued for was right, even if the little points he made had driven him to the conclusion that he sought, he had wholly overstated the consequence and so grossly exaggerated it that it was becoming pretty close to the absurd. Is the whole moral structure of this country going to go to pieces, because a Government retains office when Parliament has by no means run its full term but when in the main the great issue upon which it was elected has been decided? Even if he is right in his contention, does it necessarily follow that there has been some terrible, vicious, vile, and permanently destructive act perpetrated against the people of the country?

But in the first place, when did the doctrine first arise that after the great, say even the only, issue upon which an election is fought is decided, the government ceases to function? When was that subscribed to by any writer on constitutional law or history? When was it subscribed to even by hon. gentlemen opposite? In the history of this country there have been many elections in which there was virtually one issue, and one issue alone, upon which the verdict of the people was obtained. That was the case in 1891. That was the case in 1878. That was the case in 1904, when the late leader of the Liberal party in this country, assisted without a doubt by my hon. friend, went to the electors of Canada on the issue of building the ill-fated Transcontinental railway. When he was returned, with the help of my hon. friend upon that issue, and when, in pursuance of the mandate which they said they had obtained, they went on with the construction of that railway, did the fact that they did so mean that their functions were ended? Were they then believers in the theory that they had no mandate from the people of this country to do anything else except to build the Transcontinental railway? And in 1911, when honorable gentlemen opposite were defeated on the issue of reciprocity, when there was indeed a new and big departure in public policy proposed in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite, and when the country was appealed to on that issue, and as a consequence reciprocity was defeated, did it follow that the Government should not continue—that they had no power for example, to deal with other grave issues that confronted the country? And even if the Prime Minister through stress of circumstances should be compelled to resign and a new Prime Minister should come, does it mean that the new Prime Minister is a usurper, and guilty of all the crimes ascribed to me by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Mackenzie King)?

Then he told us we were the only Government in the civilized world that had denied the people the right to elect a new parliament after the Armistice. Well, I do not know that we need be very much disturbed as to the precedent that may be set in China, or even in Germany, or Austria, or Russia, but if there is anything in my hon. friend's contention that can be argued from precedent set in any of the Dominions or the Motherland, then possibly he would have said something that would have given colour to his contention. But is that the case? One would have thought by his reference to Australia that their position was quite analogous to ours, and by his reference to New Zealand that the case was the same there. Is he aware that in New Zealand the Government there was elected in 1914, and that although by the constitution of that Dominion they had only a three-year term for their Assembly, actually, by extending the life of Parliament, they went until December 1919, over six years, and then appealed to the country? And because, after more than six years—when their term was three—they went to the country, my hon. friend argues that in this country, after three years,—yea, a year ago, he said, after two years—when our term is five and when our election was held in December 1917, we must by virtue of the example of New Zealand, go to the country too. In the case of Australia, the facts are very similar, although there was no extension there. In the case of Great Britain, the Lloyd George government, which was the successor of the Asquith administration, but which did not feel that because Mr. Asquith retired it must appeal to the country at once, carried on for some years.

It did appeal to the country late in the winter of 1918, I think, but only after that Parliament speaking from memory, for seven or eight years, whereas its term by constitutional practice is about five years. There is therefore no argument to be drawn from any British case.

Here in this country we were elected on a war issue, we actually went to the country in war time. The British Government did nothing of the sort. They did not go to the country at all until after the war was over. The war being over they appealed to the country, whereas we went to the country just shortly before the war was over; that is the difference between us and the British Government.

My hon. friend says: You went into power as a war Government, and now that it is peace time it is your business to step out. If that is the case, a peace Government that is elected in peace time should step out when war comes. Does my hon. friend remember the hue and cry he himself raised and that his leader and the members of his party raised, when, in 1914 after the outbreak of war, the Government then in office, a peace Government, elected in peace time, was complained of for even contemplating an election at that time. Why, they fairly tore the purple off the clouds for fear we would go to the people, although we, a peace Government, were then confronted with the difficulties of war. My hon. friend's argument, if there was anything in it, would work both ways.

The fact is both the spirit and the letter of the constitution of this country may be defined thus: The term is five years; the usual practice is four years; the Government is entitled to hold office during that term, provided it maintains the confidence of the representatives of the people as reflected in the parliament elected. In the history of this country or any other that I have any knowledge of the only departure from such a practice has been on occasions where some overwhelmingly important issue has arisen, where a departure of policy of major consequence is proposed by the Administration, and when, as a result, it is desirable that the will of the people as to that departure be known. Those occasions have arisen in Great Britain; they have arisen in Australia. Will my hon. friend say that they now have arisen here? Is there a great, sharp issue of public policy dividing this House? Is there, Mr. Speaker? Did you hear anything of it in the speech of my hon. friend? I would like if such an issue could be raised, but we do not propose any radical departure of public policy in the first place. We do not propose to give the people of this country anything save what they have voted for almost times without number in this country.

Where, I ask again, is the great issue that has arisen? Oh, my hon. friend says, the only issue is that you should not be there—that I should be there instead of you. Well, what would be the issue in the country if we dissolved Parliament? The issue my hon. friend raises would be settled once dissolution took place. He says we should appeal just for the sake of an appeal, that we should have an election just for the sake of an election. Well, you have an election once you dissolve Parliament, but on what are you going to fight the election in this case?

If a big issue does arise, if it is clear-cut and unmistakable, if it goes to the very fundamentals of public policy, then there is justification for a government laying down the reins of office which the people have entrusted to them, even before the full maturity of its term. But until that does arise, and in that form, while a government maintains the confidence of Parliament, it is recreant to its duty to depart from office and abandon the trust reposed in it and be stampeded by the voice of a party press or a party leader, whoever he may be. The hon. member quotes words used by myself in Winnipeg in 1917. By every word of that speech, by every word of that appeal, I stand. I invite the honourable gentleman to quote more from that speech; I do not think it will detract at all from the quality of his own. He quotes as well from speeches of the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. Mr. Calder), by whose remarks also I stand. Undoubtedly, if three, four, or five members of a government retired at the same time and for the cause assigned by the honourable member for Marquette (Hon. Mr. Crerar), that is a blow from which perhaps no administration could recover. That is one thing. For one minister to retire merely because he disagrees on a point of public policy—not, mark you, because he does not think we should touch the tariff, but because he thinks we did not touch it enough, for that is why he retired—that is a very different thing from many men retiring at the same time because of a divergence of views on a great issue of public policy. It is one thing for one to retire at one time and another at another time merely because they cannot give more of their time to public service; but it is a wholly different thing for all to retire in a section from the Administration on a point of principle and policy. Now, I hope my honourable friend apprehends that difference; if he does not I should be glad to try at least to emphasize it more.

I was endeavouring a moment ago to indicate to this House that my honourable friend had a reason for placing this amendment in the naked shape in which it appears before Parliament. I intimated that in my judgment it was anything at all but because he was anxious to throw before the electorate of Canada a clear issue for discussion and decision. It was rather because he was intensely anxious to see that no clear issue got before the electors at all. He says that all that it is appropriate to discuss now is whether the Government should be in office or not. Last year he told us that the House should dissolve as well. This year he tells us that we should not discuss the tariff at all, but last year he complained because we had nothing about the tariff in the address. Last year he bewailed the fact that there was no declaration of principle in that address as to the policy of the Government. Let me read what the hon. gentleman said. Reciting one complaint after another in regard to the address that had just been delivered from the Throne, he used these words:

> But, Sir, there is a further limitation in the speech from the Throne which serves to reflect the mind of the Government in another particular. The speech discloses an entire absence of any policy on the part of the administration in regard to the economic, social, and political questions which are uppermost in this country at the present time.

Complaining that the Government had not declared in the announcement from the Throne at that time its position in regard to the great economic questions which he declared then divided the country, he proceeded in the next paragraph to complain because, instead of proposing a reduction of duties on foods, we had dared to insert in the address a reference to a solution of the opium problem. He said:

> I submit that the people of this country are much more concerned at this time with the question of foods than the question of drugs, and that it would have been much better if the Ministry in advising His Excellency what should be brought before this Parliament for discussion, had propounded some policy which would help to relieve the high cost of living instead of skirting about that great issue and dragging in small affairs such as legislation for regulating the sale of drugs.

It did not seem to be in the mind of the hon. gentleman then that the Government elected in 1917 had no authority to deal with the tariff. If did not seem to be in his mind that the Government so elected had nothing to do with questions extraneous entirely from the war. Indeed, he complained because no explicit declaration of policy and principle was included in the speech from the Throne; and later in the session, in the debate on the budget, instead of contending then that Parliament had no right at that time to revise the tariff, he complained in his speech that the revision that had been promised had not been brought down before, and urged this House that, pending the completion of the work of the committee which was to investigate tariff matters, pending the completion of that work and the revision that would ensue, the House should then, at the last session, revise the tariff in the manner described in his resolution, that resolution was rather vague, it is true, but which was intended to give the people of the country the impression that there should be a revision right there and then with a view to reducing the cost of foodstuffs and the costs of implements of production and some other things that were vaguely embraced in the resolution he proposed.

Now, will the hon. gentleman tell me how it is that if last session was too late to revise the tariff, this session is too soon? Will he tell me how a Parliament elected in 1917 had power last session to revise the tariff and has not that power now? Will be explain the constitutional principle upon which he distinguishes the one from the other? Will be tell me how it is that, if Parliament last session had revised the tariff, that if the same parliament that sits here now had done what he decided it ought to do and had the right to do, the constitution would have remained inviolate and chaste, whereas, should we dare to touch the tariff now, in so far as even a single article is concerned, the whole thing would go to smash?

I think I can explain the change that has come over the dream of the hon. gentleman. In the last few paragraphs of his speech, he referred to certain by-elections. He referred to some that took place a year ago, some that took place a year and a half ago, and others that took place more recently. He had been contending for a long while that we could not lay any claim to the virtues of the administration of the hon. member for Kings, Nova Scotia (Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden); and having laid down that proposition and established it, as he thought, to perfection, he then proceeded to ascribe to us all the misfortunes that had befallen that administration. It would be interesting indeed if the hon. gentleman would tell us by what process of reasoning he strips us of any credit for what that administration did and then attributes to us all the misfortunes which he says befell it? The fact is that very little attention was given by that Government to by-elections or any other elections once it was made certain that there was a majority behind it in this House determined to carry through to a successful conclusion the vital programme laid before the people in 1917. This Government came to power with the support of almost seventy of a majority in this Parliament and its first, almost its exclusive, function was to carry on the duties of office, and it was negligible, even indeed if it were a duty at all, to seek Government support in by-elections. As time went on the condition modified gradually, as would naturally be the case, and we have been able of recent months to give more time to those contests. Since this Government came into office there have been five by-elections, in every one of which this Government was represented by a candidate standing for what the Government stood for. In the by-elections in St. John and Colchester we had such candidates. We thought it was at least of importance that the people of those counties should know well what we were standing for, and should have some one to vote for who represented those principles. I see a smile on the face of the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe), and I am reminded of a similar smile that swept over his countenance just about a year ago, when he pointed to the fact that, except for the Prime Minister, there was no representative in the Cabinet fo the bereft Maritime Provinces and when he told the House that the reason there was none was because we dared not open a constituency there. That is the last occasion that I remember seeing the same vivid smile on the face of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BUREAU: Then the Prime Minister must have been blind for a long time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, we had a contest in those two constituencies, and the leader of the Opposition proclaims in this House the total lack of confidence in the present administration in the city of St. John because the Minister of Customs was elected only by a majority of a little over four thousand. Why, he said, we (the Opposition) only put in a candidate at the last moment. Why at the last moment? What was the matter with the first moment? I can remember well when that seat was opened. I can remember well when the challenge of the member for East Quebec was accepted. I remember well when the leader of the Opposition announced through the press of this country that there would be no election by acclamation there; that he would see to it that the Government was confronted with a real candidate in the constituency. But, somehow or other, he was not able to carry out his threat until very close to the contest. It was not possible even then for him to get a candidate to stand in the county of St. John for what he stood for. At last when one did appear he tried to at least bring some show of success by proclaiming that rather than be a Liberal he would be an "independent Liberal," and in that capacity he ran.

In the county of Colchester my hon. friend (Mr. King) and his party had no representative at all. Not a man in the county of Colchester represented his party. Perhaps there was not a man in the county who knew what his policy was. There was a candidate of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) who is represented to-day by the distinguished member for Red Deer. There was a candidate of that party in the county of Colchester and they had some rather questionable support — support from men who advocated very strange doctrines, very strange doctrines, indeed, doctrines put into practice in only one country in the world that I know of. But that party had a candidate and its candidate was buried under a majority of some fifteen hundred voters.

Then there came an election in the County of Yale and in the County of Elgin on the same day. Did my hon. friend have a candidate in the County of Yale? I do not hear him say either yes or no. But he supported a candidate in the County of Yale. Now I am going to state the reason why it is that this amendment—in its naked form, stripped of all substance—is put before the House. My hon. friend supported a candidate in the County of Yale all right, but a candidate whose views had just as much relation to his own as the blood of a South African negro has to mine. Were the tariff views of that candidate in the County of Yale in accord with those of my hon. friend? Had they the faintest resemblance to them? The only tariff view he had, or ever espoused, was the determination to see to it that there was sufficient protection on fruit. He did not care much about anything else so far as I heard, and I heard him make several speeches and I read his platform. He was determined that there should be sufficient protection on fruit anyway, and I suppose because of that he was supported by the Leader of the Opposition. Did my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) or the party that he represents have a candidate in the County of Yale?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I was not there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well the only affiliation of the candidate with the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Clark's) party that I could discover was that he called himself a farmer. In point of platform, in point of argument, and in point of principle he was just as remote from the party led by my hon. friend from Red Deer as the South Pole is from the North.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I believe in cheap fruit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but that was not the chief desideratum of the candidate of the Farmer party in the County of Yale. Well, the result—very fortunately for this country, and fortunately for Yale and to the credit of the electorate—was the return of my hon. friend (Mr. McKelvie) who so happily seconded the Address this afternoon.

In the County of Elgin there was a candidate that stood, I think—although he was very chary about pronouncing his views—on something akin to the Liberal platform of 1919; but he too sought to evade the odium, or whatever it might be that attached to that platform, by declaring himself an independent Liberal. At all events, so near was he to my hon. friend in name at least, that he succeeded in being buried at the foot of the poll by some thousand or more votes below the second candidate; and the vote that in that county individually stands behind a policy that this Government frankly supports was divided in the Town of Aylmer and divided throughout the county between the so-called independent Liberal candidate, and the candidate that supported the Government, so the candidate following my hon. friend from Red Deer managed to be elected by a narrow majority. If there is consolation in that for the Leader of the Opposition, it is at least a striking demonstration of the contention that in certain circumstances consolation is not very hard to discover.

Now we will come to the election in Peterborough. I have been anxious to say a word about that election, mainly for the lesson that may be drawn from it by my hon. friends angularly across the way—they who have been courted by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), they whose affections have been sought to be engaged by the Leader of the Opposition, and a marriage with whom was the purpose of his extended trip through the prairies and on through the Rockies. I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friends to what took place in the County of Peterborough; to where my hon. friend stood in the County of Peterborough and to where his candidate stood; to the tactics pursued by the gentleman supported by my hon. friends in a contest in that county. Does anybody in this House know to-day on which side of this great issue, an issue which, a year ago, my hon. friend declared to be vital to the electorate of Canada, the successful candidate stood? One would think to hear the address of the leader of the Opposition that the people of Canada were not the least concerned about anything in the way of policy, that it really did not matter what the Government stood for, that it really did not matter what the Government had achieved in a great and prolonged crisis—that matters industrial, social and economic were not of the slightest concern to them, but that all they were concerned about was whether or not we or he should sit in the seats of power. That is what he endeavoured to contest West Peterborough on, and he then and there put himself in a position that he will find the utmost difficulty in extricating himself from just so long as he is a public man in Canada.

He supported, I said, a candidate in Yale who stood for protection on fruit—on foodstuffs; he supported a candidate in West Peterborough who stood for free trade on foodstuffs and protection on everything else; and my hon. friend expressed delight—a really most inscrutable delight—in the election of a candidate in the county of Elgin who stood for protection on nothing at all. My hon. friend also seeks a working alliance with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), and is very hopeful he is going to get it; he wants from hon. gentlemen angularly opposite nothing on earth but their votes to place him in power; he is ready to accept any candidate—even one of them—as long as such candidate will support him, it does not matter what his principles or policy are, all those things count for nothing; the only thing that counts is whether the candidate will vote for the hon. member for Prince, the leader of the Opposition. Here is the candidate supported in West Peterborough, and this is the platform that he ran on, supported by the leader who declared throughout his whole speaking campaign in Western Canada that his policy was practically identical with that of the farmer's party—practically identical—that they were both great Liberal movements, both in full accord with these historic principles of Liberalism. I will read some of the "historic principles of Liberalism:"

I am not and never have been a free trader and do not support free trade.

"But," says my hon. friend, "may be he just wants a tariff for revenue." That is the camouflage that is often thrown over it. Well, see how he expresses it, if all he wants is a tariff for revenue. He declares that "I will stand by Canada's industry and Canada's labour until the last," in contradistinction to being a free trader. That is one of the "historic principles of Liberalism," fought for in the county of Peterborough, and supported by the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne (Mr. Fielding) and by the leader of the Opposition. Then he goes on:

You know my record for the last fifteen years, and my policy has been, Peterborough First.

That is not all; perhaps there is something more direct than that. All this is from his own published advertisement, signed by the Liberal committee of the county of Peterborough, and consequently must be in ful harmony with the "principles of Liberalism." Here are a few more specimens of Liberalism:

I believe in the protection of industries—

That is pretty straight.

—and the protection of labour. I believe in a greater and more prosperous Peterborough. Can anyone dispute that belief when it is expresssed by a man whose very existence depends on the progress of industry and its consequent results? Mr. Gordon will be one of the first to suffer from the effects of industrial depression brought about by a lower tariff.

I know that is not all, and am sure my hon. friends opposite will have no difficulty at all in seeing how striking is the "issue that divides the electorate of Canada" on this tariff matter. Here is another specimen:

I stand for the protection of industry, and by that I mean the protection of labour. The standard of living and character of the working home are grand tests of civilization.

Such are the "historic principles of Liberalism" fought for in that county. I ask attention to those matters on the part of my hon. friend from Red Deer and all those who sit around him, whose affections are sought to be entwined by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and who know right well that they exist in his mind as public men for one purpose, and one only—to catch the low tariff vote in certain parts of Canada while he catches the high tariff vote in other parts of Canada, and by the numerical addition of the two tries to exalt himself to power.

This candidate in the Peterborough election declared that I was guilty of conduct unworthy a public man, that the tariff was not an issue, that he stood for protection, and that I would deserve all I might get for being so "shameless" as to obtrude the tariff issue there at all.

Now, I ask this House: Are we to be invited by the leader of the Opposition to dissolve Parliament and go to the country on this issue—because he told us last session it was the great issue, and I do not know what has arisen since—when no human being in this Dominion knows where the leader of the other party is on the issue, and when he is determined that no human being shall ever know? In the Speech from the Throne which we are discussing now there is a paragraph that defines clearly and definitely where the Government stands, a paragraph that states the principle in words that no man can fail to comprehend, a paragraph that in so stating our policy places it exactly where it stands in the published platform of the party. I should like to know how we are to get that issue to the people until my hon. friend does the same. And he has a chance now. May I ask you Mr. Speaker: Has he accepted the chance? Is there a single hon. gentleman in this House, on that side or on this or anywhere else—particularly among those whom I am addressing now, behind the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark)—is there one single hon. gentleman here who does not believe that the Leader of the Opposition, instead of accepting the issue laid down in the Speech from the Throne, will now commence a process of evasion and dodging, a process that he has been carrying on for months in this country? Is there an hon. gentleman in this House who even has a suspicion that the Liberal platform of 1919 will ever be put into effect if the Liberals are returned to power? Did the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) give any reason for that hope in the speech he made to elect Mr. Gordon in Peterborough? The burden of his speech was just this: I am not quoting the Liberal platform, he told them; I have not a word to say about it; but you remember what was done in 1896—and we will just do the same old thing again. They would do the same thing again as was done in 1896 by the party whose leader declared in Western Canada that his principles were identical with those of hon. gentlemen behind the hon. member for Red Deer.

Now, will my hon. friends angularly opposite but draw the lesson from that? I have never disputed the honesty of the mind of my hon. friend from Red Deer—never disputed it for a moment. On this tariff issue would he prefer to support a party whose position he knows and knows to be consistently maintained, or would he rather support another party whose position he does not know from one week to another, and who, he in his heart believes would put into effect the principles and policies of this Government on the tariff if he were returned to power? I ask him to say, in allegiance to his conscience, which of the two he would rather support. Does he think that in the state of confusion that now prevails throughout this country, where the issue is evaded and avoided and dodged at every opportunity—as it is going to be dodged, if I mistake not, even in this debate—does he think that in these circumstances there is any possibility of a declaration on this issue on the part of the people of Canada?

We are not proposing any departure from the historic policy of this country pursued under this Government, under the late Government, under the Government of which the leader of the Opposition was himself a member. We are not proposing any departure. If we were we would not have the support of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. Mr. Calder)—the one man who, as between himself and the Leader of the Opposition and the members who sit around him, has been consistent on this tariff issue. He is standing where he stood when the Liberal Party were in power on the tariff issue; he is standing just where the member for Shelburne and Queen's (M. Fielding) intends to stand and said in Peterborough he would stand if the Liberal party got into power. The difference between him and them is this, that in the meantime he is not pretending to stand somewhere else whenever it suits a constituency so to pretend; that in the meantime he is not seeking an alliance with men whose principles are diametrically opposite, by camouflaging his own. That is the difference between the Minister of Immigration and hon. gentlemen opposite.

Right now, they have an opportunity to show the people just where they stand on this issue. Are they ready to abide by the platform of 1919? If they are, let this session not go by, let this debate not go by, until hon. gentlemen stand up squarely to the Speech from the Throne and tell the people of Canada that that is so. For such can be the only issue if a dissolution of this Parliament takes place.

My hon. friend tells us that we are usurpers, and all the rest of it, because we are holding power. Do you know what he has started already in Western Canada? Do you know the tactics pursued by his press—and a most subservient press it is? Why, they are declaring in those provinces to-day that if Parliament is dissolved at this time it is a "sharp trick" on the part of the Prime Minister. Does my hon. friend know that? If this House is dissolved, they say, at this time, before the western people are placed in a position by a redistribution bill to have their voice in the policies of this country; if we take the step of dissolving Parliament, it will be a sharp trick on the part of the Prime Minister. This is what the press of the West says, a press supporting my hon. friend. Well if they say that before we dissolve, what do you think they are going to say after we do? Do you think "sharp trick" would at all compare with the language they would use then? Why, from one end of the country to the other there would be a roar of protest from the Liberal press—in which the Leader of the Opposition would join, I have no doubt—on the ground that we had robbed the electorate of that country of their due voice in Parliament; that we had stifled it for five years merely to catch a chance verdict of the people. Let the leader of the Opposition look at the columns of the Calgary Albertan, a paper that supports him to the hilt—and let him see there a challenge to me to dissolve Parliament and deny the West their rights. I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen angularly opposite to these facts. Do they want the West represented by a fraction of its proper and due representation in a Parliament that may last for five years? Do they think it is better to do that in order to get a verdict on the tariff issue in the state the tariff issue is in to-day by virtue of the manipulations of hon. gentlemen opposite? Does my hon. friend from Red Deer think it is worth while? Now, I would like him to say.

The West will be undoubtedly entitled under the census to from ten to twenty-five —no one knows how many more seats in this Parliament. If this House is dissolved before redistribution that representation is denied. If this House is dissolved nothing can be gained except a confused and utterly uninterpretable verdict on the tariff issue that can get no government anywhere and can be a mandate to no Government at all. Indeed, there can be no result whatever except the return of at least one consistent body to this House, large or small, and the deception of both wings of the other body. That is the only verdict that could be given under the conditions that obtain to-day. Consequently, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances that obtain now; under the conditions of public policy and the discussion of public principle that to-day obtain by reason of the statements and speeches of public men, the clear duty of this Government, for the present at all events, is to carry on and to carry out its policy so long as a majority of the members of this House repose confidence in the Administration.

That duty we intend to perform. That duty through three and a half years we have sought to discharge. I do not think that in the history of Canada any other government has more zealously held to its programme, more clearly, definitely and determinedly sought to carry out the mandate upon which it was elected, to discharge all the duties of government. In doing so, it neglected its party affairs and, indeed, by some of its policies, though they were in the public interest, shattered its party organization from coast to coast. That has been the record of this Government. From now on until the dissolution of this House we intend to pursue the duty that we have pursued until now. The course that we pursue will be submitted to this Parliament elected by the people of this country, and while we enjoy the confidence of the representatives of people of this country we do not intend to shrink from our course or to be stampeded from it by the declamation of the leader of the Opposition.

My last word is this. In the past few months since I have had the honour to discharge to the best of my ability the responsibility that now is mine, I have missed no opportunity to obtain from the leaders of hon. gentlemen opposite specific and clear statements of their position on the issue which they say should be submitted to this country for decision. I regret to say that I have failed. In the speech from the Throne that great paramount issue and others as well are placed before this House for discussion. The position of the Government on that great issue is unmistakably clear and the opportunity is given to hon. gentlemen opposite, of all shades of opinion and from all parts of the country, to be equally frank in their statement of their position. Let them first discharge that duty and, until they do so, let them not say that there is sufficient issue for the country to decide.

On motion of Mr. D. D. McKenzie (Cape Breton North and Victoria) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of right hon. Arthur Meighen, the House adjourned at 9.20 p.m.

Wednesday, February 16, 1921.

The House met at Two o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Tuesday, February 15.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, now that I am becoming somewhat of a familiar figure in this House and more or less of an old member, and having, of course taken part year after year in the discussions of the House, I would much prefer on this occasion that the duty of replying to the Prime Minister would fall to some more competent and capable hands. As, however, it is my duty to undertake this task, I will set about to do it to the best of my ability and somewhat to the satisfaction, I hope, of at least some of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the Chamber.

I must at once follow the time-honoured form of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the Address. It has always been desirable that this duty should be performed with ability and dignity becoming this time-honoured institution of Parliament, and I am pleased to be able to say that the gentlemen who had the duty in hand yesterday performed it at all events to my satisfaction. In the mover, (Mr. McIsaac) we have a more or less experienced gentleman in this House, but I was pleased indeed that the seconder, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), though unused to Parliamentary practice and discussion acquitted himself so well. I am sure that speaking in this House for the first time is difficult enough under any circumstance, but it is more difficult when one is put up against the very important job of seconding the motion for an address in reply, as was the duty of the hon. member for Yale yesterday. I was sorry, however, to find some of the "old Adam" traditions handed down to the hon. member for Yale. I find that, while an excellent man in many respects. he has fallen victim to the pernicious effects of the apple as did his forefather many years ago. I am sorry to find that, while no doubt a free trader when he was watching the absolutely free-trade performance down in the Bay of Fundy, the tide going out and coming in on a waterfront unequalled in any part of the world—this would naturally lead one to be a free-trader with wide comprehensions of free trade—the hon. member for Yale in other circumstances, fell, as it was rather natural for him to do under the influence of the "apple" and the "apple tree." We hope however, that after he has been here for a while, he may forget those things and once more come back to the ideas which he inhaled by the seaside in the fair province of New Brunswick.

Let me further congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) upon the position of honour and responsibility to which he has attained. He is the successor of great men: he follows, in the same office and in the same chair in this great and free country, such men as the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson, the Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden and others whose names are not so strikingly familiar. He will gain inspiration from consulting the record of those great men and I have no reason at all to doubt that with his ability, which is by no means small, he will do justice to the position which he now occupies.

I must also hasten to pay tribute to my own leader (Mr. King) for the very excellent speech which he delivered in this House yesterday. I am proud to say that we all realize more than ever, if that be possible, that we have a distinguished man at the head of the party, and most certainly he acquitted himself with the highest possible credit in the task which he had in hand.

Ever since the present Prime Minister came into this House, I have had a seat, part of the time on this side, and part of the time on the other side of the House supporting the then government. I have watched with interest and satisfaction the right hon. gentleman's style of argument and presentment of a case, and I have always found him to make the very best possible case out of the material at his disposal. But yesterday I was disappointed in his speech. I did not expect to like it, but I do not like it even as much as I expected. I thought that he did not answer the arguments put forward by the leader of the Opposition. It was possibly because they were unanswerable. I will do the Prime Minister the full justice of saying that if anybody at all on that side of the House or in his party could have answered the arguments put forward for their own disappearance from this House by my leader yesterday, he himself would be the man. Yesterday, however, he did not display his usual masterly ability, and certainly he fell short of answering the arguments put forward. It is perhaps natural for a man to desire to hold on to power and to the high office in which he might find himself, and natural also for a party to be desirous of holding on to power; but let me say to the Prime Minister and to the Government that it is not in accord with democratic principles. We in this country are proud of saying that we are democrats to the hilt, that our Government is a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and that the voice of the people must prevail. The moment there are indications that we have lost the confidence of the people and no longer truly represent them, all the satisfaction and pride which goes with being in power vanishes, and if we still persist in holding office, then office brings no honour to ourselves or to those whom we once represented. When that stage is reached, I think it is the duty of the Government and of an individual to place himself in the hands of the country and say: I am at your disposal; if you want me continued in office, say so; but if you do not want me and my colleagues continued in office you have also the right to say so, and we shall bow to your verdict. That, in my judgment, should be the conduct of public men in this country, but I am sorry to find that it is not the disposition of the present Prime Minister or his Government so far as their attitude was indicated in the speech of the right hon. gentleman here yesterday.

A good many arguments were put forward by the right hon. gentleman in support of his retention of office. He particularly referred to the difficulty of going to the country before the census was taken and a redistribution Bill had been put through the House, and before the general housekeeping arrangements, so to speak, had been made. He laid stress upon the fact that the press of the Northwest cried aloud against anything tending towards a general election before these preliminaries had been settled. He mentiond one paper, the Calgary Morning Albertan, as will appear in the Hansard report of his speech, and invited us particularly to see what that paper said about the impropriety of going to the country before the census was taken and the provinces of the West had received their proper quota of representation. Now, I have in my hand the Morning Albertan, to which no doubt the right hon. gentleman has made reference, and I particularly invite my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice to listen to the quotation I shall give from that paper. From his experience on the bench he knows very well that when a lawyer stands up in court and quotes an authority, if it should turn out that that authority is directly against him, it is usually a bad knock-out for his case, and the judge usually tells him that his case is directly opposed to what he wishes to make out of it, and that if that authority is to be followed, he will have to decide against him. Well, the Prime Minister yesterday rested his case largely upon what the Morning Albertan said about an election. Now, this is what that paper says in its editorial of February 9, two days after the famous election in Peterborough.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Famous and fatal.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Both famous and fatal. This is what it says:

> What about an early December election? If the Meighen Government believes that it has any chance of winning, then it will go to the country at once. Then, and no sooner. Unless it is convinced that it has a fair chance of success, it will not risk an election.
>
> A Governement which without any mandate of any kind has kept control for two years after all excuse for continued existence has been exhausted, will not act from sentiment even if West Peterborough and East Elgin have called so loudly. The Government will continue in office as long as the law allows, or until it is defeated in the House, or until it believes that it has some advantage in an appeal to the country.
>
> The people of Western Canada have some objection to an early election, because it would mean the old representation. Our number would be enlarged if an election were postponed until after the census of the present year. However, it would be better for Western Canada to go under-represented for three or four years than that all of Canada should be under control of a Government which has not the confidence of a majority of the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I merely wish to say, with the hon. gentleman's permission, that the editorial which he read from the Albertan is not the editorial to which I refer. The editorial to which I had reference was published about two months ago and used the exact language I used? If the Albertan is capable of changing that language, that is not my fault.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a revised edition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You are always revising.

Mr. McKENZIE: Now, we had reason to believe yesterday that my right hon. friend was right up-to-date and that he was not dealing in old garments of the Albertan. He was speaking yesterday, the 15th. instant, and this was published on the 8th.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They may change back again.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, they may, but I venture to submit that the people of Canada will not be satisfied that the editorials of the Albertan newspaper are sufficient justification for the Prime Minister to base his arguments upon. This only goes to show that when one is in a desperate situation he is ready to grasp at straws. I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that the astute mind of the Prime Minister was rather led astray by somebody who told him that there was such a thing in the Albertan, and he jumped at a fatal conclusion. And although he will not, I know, do it publicly, I should like the Prime Minister, privately at the first caucus of his party, to tell them that anything he said about the Albertan on which he bases his case is absolutely false and falls to the ground, and that for the present the case made out by the Leader of the Opposition is entirely undefended. It is quite possible that the Prime Minister will not be disposed to listen to anything we say on this side of the House. If he were well advised by his own friends and supporters, and if he felt that the country was behind him, he would heve a perfect right as a party leader to pay little or no heed to anything we might say on this side, although it is always well to take warning and accept admonition from whatever quarter it may come, and to consider carefully whatever observations may be made by even one's keenest enemies. One would have expected the Prime Minister, ere now, to have paid due attention to what his own best friends have said, and I think he would be wise hereafter to consider their opinions. Now, last year a dear old friend of his party, the Montreal Gazette, tendered some sage advice to them and expressed some opinions regarding the Government at that time. That paper said then:

> The art of government is most difficult under the best auspices; but a leaderless ministry, destitute of policy, must be the despair of its friends. The public memory is short, and public gratitude is an unknown quantiy. The electorate required a guide, a policy, an association with those who invite confidence, and the Government offers neither guidance, nor principles, nor familiarty with the people. The situation is not suddenly precipitated; it began with the conclusion of the war. Since then futile efforts at permanent coalition have more than once been made, and Minister after Minister has dropped out until the situation has become difficult for the Government, and despondent for its supporters.

That was the opinion of that newspaper about a year ago. Reference was made to the matter when the House opened last year, but the Prime Minister will probably tell me that that article has no bearing upon the present situation, that they might have been finding fault with the personnel of the Government and with the leadership of those days, but that the conditions that prevailed then have passed, a new leadership having been instituted and new members having entered the Cabinet; consequently—this is what he will no doubt contend—this criticism of last year does not apply at the present time. Well, that might be an argument. But here we are confronted with an opinion very lately expressed, and I would respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister that he burn a little more of the midnight oil and read the public press so that he may learn what his friends, at all events, are saying about him. The same friendly newspaper, the same newspaper that has always been, as far as I know, a tower of strength to the Tory party, has again spoken, as late as the 8th day of February, the day after the Government met its Waterloo at Peterborough. This is what it says:

> The Government has declared its intention to live out its term, and constitutionally has the right so to do. Its parliamentary majority may prolong its existence for nearly another two years, but will it continue as a strong ministry for that period? A majority somewhat perilous when parliament prorogued has been reduced. The by-elections won by the Government mean merely the retention of seats, and indicate no new feeling of confidence, while the contested seats like East Elgin and West Peterborough have swung to the Opposition and weakened to that extent the strength of the ministry. Governments are not constitutionally upset by the loss of a by-election or two, but no government can disregard the hand-writing, and above all no Government can gain in the present nor survive in the future that does not owe its existence to popular support. It happens that at the moment the time is propitious for an election, save that supplies have not been voted. The creditors of the Crown, meaning civil servants and those who have performed service still unrepaid and still unprovided for, are entitled to payment for service without regard to the quarrels of politicians, with which they have no part. Parliament will meet within a week. Its first duty is to provide for the services and maturing debts. If time permitted a tariff might be introduced and the Government appeal to the country upon it. If more time permitted, Parliament might have another session and after a redistribution of seats dissolve the House. In ordinary course this would be the way of procedure, the way we have hoped would be persued. But in the circumstances of adverse results from the recent by-elections, the situation has changed, and the advice we have to give to the government is to proceed with the supply bill and then permit the electorate to express its preference for parties in order that stable administration and confident policy may be carried on.

The situation is now uncertain, the life of the Ministry hangs by a thread, and under this circumstance strong and effective administration of affairs is impossible.

That, Sir, is the same authority continued. It had given its opinion of the old Government under the leadership of the Right Hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) who has gone out of office, and it has now tendered its advice and its opinion as to what the present Administration should do. This expression of opinion is added to the many authorities which were quoted here yesterday by the leader of the Opposition.

I am not fond of reading in this Chamber, for I am not a good reader, and although other quotations can be cited I will merely refer to them. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of February 9th, 1921, and in an editorial of that day practically the same language is indulged in, practically the same advice is given, and the Government is told that it should at once, in view of the result of the elections in Peterborough and other places, dissolve Parliament and go to the country. True it is held that there was a division of the vote in Peterborough and there was not a decided majority for any party, taking the vote as a whole; but the editor of the Journal—whom we all know to be a staunch supporter of the present Government, and of every Tory administration in this country for many years—tells the Government that whatever else the people wanted they did not want the present Administration. That is made perfectly evident. The Journal says the people may have voted for the Labour man, for the Farmer candidate, and for the Liberal—and they did vote extensively for those candidates—but the last thing on earth they wanted was to have anything to do with this Administration. Now, Mr. Speaker, that advice, coming from a friendly paper like the Ottawa Journal should have some weight with, and some hearing from, hon. gentlemen opposite; and it bears out, I think, the idea which I have expressed—that there is no pride or satisfaction in being the leader, or being a member, of a Government that has not the confidence of the people. The only source of satisfaction is when the man who is at the head of affairs, and those who sit with him in the Government, have the honour of representing the people. When that condition ceases there is no honour attached to the position, and the representation that the people and the country sould have is lost.

Since the advent of the Union Government to power the Winnipeg Free Press has been an ardent supporter of it, but now the Government is considered to be a sort of patch work. Somebody beside me suggests, "a crazy patch work," but I would not go so far as to say that. At all events the Government is a makeshift for the time being, and a sort of amalgamation of some of the material which formed the old Administration. I take it that the Winnipeg Free Press is friendly to the present Cabinet. I see nothing to lead to a contrary opinion, except that in its editorial of the fifth of February that journal undertakes to say what it thinks of the election in West Peterborough. Let me quote from an editorial of that date:

The result in West Peterborough is capable of no explanation which gives the least gleam of comfort to the Dominion Government. From whatever view point it is regarded it is a knock-down and a drag-out for the Administration.

The editorial is lengthy and I will merely read a few lines further from its closing observations:

Once Mr. Meighen is convinced—and we should think West Peterborough would remove the last of his illusions,—that there is nothing to be gained beyond the mere holding of office for a few additional months, from hanging on, he may decide that in the long run the interests of himself and his party will best be served by an immediate election. The Government will meet Parliament without authority of prestige. It will have a majority so precarious as to make it a highly dangerous business for it to submit legislation of a controversial character; it will be subjected to the constant taunt which will embody the truth, that it is usurping a power which the country does not wish it to exercise—and the net result must be a steady dwindling of whatever strength it may have in parliament and country. It is quite possible that the Government will act upon the advice tendered it by the Montreal Gazette; and go to the country after securing the passage of the Supply Bill by Parliament, leaving tariff revision and other difficult questions to the new parliament the probable outcome of the West Peterborough by-election will be a general election in the early summer.

Sir, those are the quotations which I regard as being in point, quotations from papers which are entirely friendly to the Government and whose opinions should be regarded by the Prime Minister and his colleagues as worthy of the greatest possible consideration.

Yesterday we were told by the Prime Minister that there was no need to move an amendment to the Address but that there could be a division upon the Address as it stood. Let me say that I am not familiar with any practice by which a vote could be taken without some amendment to the Address; and I think the Prime Minister's suggestion to his followers in that regard is entirely wrong. Before an expression of opinion could be given on the Address it was necessary to have an amendment. We do not want to vote that the Address be not passed; we want to pass the Address with an amendment which expresses our views.

It was very noticeable throughout the speech of the Prime Minister yesterday that he was not exactly upon the ground that he wanted to be. He realized that if he could get us over on the ground of the tariff that would be a better fighting position, and therefore he was apparently very much dissatisfied at the omission to say anything about the tariff in the amendment. Last year gentlemen on this side did say something about the tariff in an amendment to the Address, and I remember well the then leader of the Government causing a great deal of merriment among his friends because we suggested that the Speech from the Throne should say something about the tariff, and that the subject should be discussed on the debate on the Address. The then Prime Minister found fault with us for even suggesting such a thing. Well, we have a right to suppose that there is a continuation of ideas on the other side, and therefore this year we do not trouble them about the tariff. But there is no hope of satisfying them; when you give them one thing they want another, and even if they got both they would not be satisfied.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of discussing the tariff at this stage. I have been in this House for pretty well on to twenty years now, and during that time I have never shrunk from discussing the tariff, whether I was supporting my party while in power or in Opposition. When the proper time comes to express an opinion on the question of the tariff, if my opinion is worth anything, I shall be ready to express it. But six years ago we were promised by the Administration which immediately preceded the present one that an inquiry would be conducted throughout the country, which would be followed by a tearing down or a bolstering up of the tariff, as the case might require. That promise was not implemented until last year, when this Government appointed a tariff commission. We are told in the Speech from the Throne that the report of that commission will be submitted in due course. Does the right hon. the Prime Minister think that it would be fair to us to discuss the tariff before we have the advantage of considering that report? If so, why did he waste thousands of dollars of the people's money in sending a commission from the Atlantic to the Pacific to gather up what they are pleased to call information, which is to be put in the shape of a report and to be laid on the Table?—and, I hope, printed and distributed among hon. members so they may get the benefit of the peregrinations of the hon. the Minister of Finance.

But the Prime Minister says: Why wait for anything of that kind?—we are not going to pay any attention to it. In effect he will follow the advice that was once given by the right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster), who now sits beside him, when he said that these commissions and their reports were as thick as blackberries and were all pigeon-holed, no further attention being paid to them. I suppose this is another blackberry that is being matured. Nevertheless, I think we are justified in waiting until that report is produced. It is at all events a courtesy to the Minister of Finance that we should wait. We will be more courteous to him and to his commision than was the Prime Minister, because the latter went from the Atlantic to the Pacific declaring what the tariff policy of the Government was going to be, notwithstanding anything that this report might contain. That is hardly a justifiable course for him to take when his commissioners are collecting information on the fiscal question.

I am not going to make any attempt at the present time to discuss the tariff, but I am going to throw out an idea which I think must be acceptable to every broad-minded man, and to every man who has any sense of responsibility, as to what the government of this country must do. This is a vast country, over 3,000 miles wide, extending from the frozen zone down to the American line, a country equal to if not greater in size than the United States. We have varied interests and different classes of people, and no government can attempt to pass a tariff without giving consideration to the interests of the country as a whole. No government can expect to frame a tariff that will suit everybody; it is an impossible thing to do; but there is enough strength of thought in this Parliament and out of it to know that some happy medium can be reached by which the people's interests, both east and west, will receive due and proper consideration. That, Sir, is the line of action that I would take myself if I had any responsibilities in this matter; and while I am here I shall always have the responsibility of my vote. It is no use for any government to press home the idea that any particular section of the country is opposed to manufacturing and other interests which must necessarily exist here in order to maintain our national standing. Such a spirit is not abroad at all. But there are different ways of coming to conclusions, and we do say this Government has done reckless things, and that a better management and readjustment of matters could be accomplished by a government that had the confidence of the people and could act on its own initiative. I use the phrase "on its own initiative," Sir, because we on this side, at all events, believe that this Government never was its own master, is not its own master now, and will not be its own master while it continues with its present support in this House. We say that in 1911 it came into power backed up by many of the big interests, and that those big interests sent their man into the House as Minister of Finance because they would not trust anybody else with the handling of their money. He stayed here, Mr. Speaker, until the job was done, and then he moved out and told us to go to the cats as far as he was concerned, after they had got the last dollar of what was coming to them. That is what I mean when I say that this Government is not acting on its own initiative. It is acting as the schedule is prepared for it and as its path is blazed out by the big interests.

We are anxious to protect the big interests in a legitimate way, we are anxious that every man who has a dollar invested in this country shall be protected, and we are anxious that every industry shall prosper; but we are not anxious that the millionaire class shall have the people of this country by the throat and dictate the course of government. Such conditions are intolerable to a free people. Therefore, we purpose to wipe out this Government and to put in a government which will represent the people and will deal fairly and equitably with every man, whether he is a millionaire or a sidewalk cleaner, for we are all free and equal before the law.

I say without hesitation that we cannot get the confidence of the people in our parliamentary institutions restored while the present Administration remains in power. It may not be all true that this Government is so shackled by the big interests as the idea is abroad in the land, but the Great War Veterans, if you choose to begin with them, believe they have nothing to hope for from this Administration; the labouring classes do not believe they have anything to hope from this Administration; the farming comunities, as their representatives in this House show, do not believe in this Administration or in anything that will be initiated by it. Even the big interests themselves have no great confidence in their protege now, for they have withdrawn their representative in this House, which, diplomatically, is always a signal of war.

These, Sir, are reasons why there is no confidence in the country. The wheels of progress are not moving as rapidly as they ought to move, and, confidence being shattered, those who have money to invest will not invest it. Why?

Why? Because labour is at war with this Government; and what is the use of talking investment or progress unless labour and capital will work harmoniously together? This Government have placed themselves on the side of the capitalist. They thought that was all that was necessary, but they reckoned without their host. So far as the progress and prosperity of the country are concerned the capitalist is helpless without labour; both must work together. About two years ago we had an instance of the degree of friendship that exists between the present Prime Minister and labour in this country. When the Peace Conference was in session at Paris the then Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) was psalm-singing with the rest of them down there and telling about all the great things they were going to do for labour—what a blessed lot the labour fellows were. At the same time we had the spectacle of the present Prime Minister, with a gang of policemen, breaking into the houses of poor labouring people in Winnipeg at the silent, dark hour of midnight, and hurrying them off to the Stony Mountain Penitentiary. That is one reason why labour in this country believe they cannot expect sympathy or justice from the present Prime Minister or the present Administration.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of talk as to what our attitude is as a party, as to what we shall do if we get back to power, and what the country is to expect from the Liberal Party. We have only to point, Sir, to fifteen years of power, fifteen years of administration the like of which there has not been in Canada since Confederation. There was nothing different in the Liberal policy then from what we have now; there was nothing different from what has been in existence since this Government came in. But we left the country in a splendid condition. So excellent was the condition of business in every department of the country's activities that the then leader of the Opposition, when he went to the country in 1911, found fault with us because we were talking about trade with the United States, and said: "Let well enough alone." Everything was in such splendid condition that he wanted nothing disturbed. All that we say, Sir, to the Government, and to the people of this country; all that we say to the West and to the East and to every part of Canada, is that the great Liberal Party have their interests at heart; that they have the same policy and the same principles, the same desire for the advancement, the freedom, the contentment and the happiness of the people of this country that they had during the fifteen years they were in power. There is not the slightest difference between our policies, our beliefs and our principles then and those which we stand by now; nor is our desire any the less to rule this country faithfully and properly and well. We have nothing else to offer to the people, but that we are prepared to offer to them; and we believe that when the opportunity is given to the people the present Administration will be wiped away, horse, foot and artillery, and the place that knows them now shall know them no more forever.

Right hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that, following on the heels of custom, I had the impression that we were to meet to-day at three o'clock instead of at two; therefore I have been deprived of an opportunity to hear part of the eloquence of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. McKENZIE: On account of domestic conditions, my hon. friend will be excused.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I knew my hon. friend had a warm spot in his heart for me. However, I am pleased that I arrived in time to hear his eloquent peroration. I do not know what stronger arguments he made in the earlier part of his speech, but generally speaking I note that my hon. friend keeps his best until the last; so I suppose I have heard the strongest of his arguments.

The first argument that caught my ear was that we could not undertake to discuss tariff reform in the House until the report of the tariff commission was laid on the Table. The members of that commission have been gathering information, he says; they have been preparing that information and it has to be produced and put before the House in the form of a report, and when we get that and have plenty of time to digest it, we shall be in a position to discuss the tariff question, and not before. Now, my hon. friend has had quite a long experience in parliamentary life. What he has not himself seen, he has read of; and I am going to ask him if he ever knew of a case where information gathered by ministers of the Crown for their personal information and to serve as a basis for their calculations respecting the schedules of the tariff was presented to the House in the form of a report. I think my hon. friend will have no recollection of such a proceeding. The tariff inquiries made by the ministers are for the purpose of obtaining the necessary data upon which to prepare their schedules in the interests of the country; my hon. friend surely must have known that. Knowing this, my hon. friend has, therefore, gone even further than his leader. Not only has he postponed the discussion of the tariff question for a shorter or longer period of time; but if old practice and custom prevail in the future in this respect as they have in the past he has put it off pretty nearly until the Day of Judgment. He has cut clear from it; he has gone one better than the leader of the Opposition.

But my hon. friend did strike upon a new policy, wonderfully vague in its definitions. Suppose the request of the leader of the Opposition were complied with by the House and we were declared to be usurpers and thrown out of our seats. Various policies would be put before the country upon which the people would have to decide. The indefiniteness of the policy of the leader of the Opposition, arising from its variations, would be exceeded only by the greater indefiniteness of the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie). The policy he would lay down, if such an issue were to come suddenly before the people, would be this: My policy—he would say to the electors—is to be a happy medium "happy medium" undefined. Well, it was a happy thought, but I wonder just what the electors would expect to get if they decided upon a policy put forth by the former leader of the Opposition in the form of "a happy medium", without definition.

My hon. friend said also that we came in in 1917 backed by the big interests.

Some hon. MEMBERS: In 1911.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He never said a truer word in his life. We did come in backed by the big interests of the country; and the big interests of the country, when we came into power in 1917, were the interests which were behind the war, the interests of every man, woman and child of a loyal disposition in this country, the big interests which were in favour of defending the Empire and the liberties of the people.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I said was 1911, not 1917.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend made a lapse and said "1911," he and others have said over and over again that we are in now by the lease and power and godwill of the big interests. They are always saying that. In 1917 we were put in power by the big interests of the country such as I have stated, and it is those interests which we are pursuing at the present time. Though the war is over in one sense of active militant operations, it is far from over in the other sense of healing the wounds and making the readjustments which are necessary as a sequence of the destruction, confusion and trouble which resulted and which follow in the trail of the war.

I am not going to follow my hon. friend any further in reference to the particular subject which he has debated, and I am not going to make any apology for bringing another subject to the attention of the House. The Speech from the Throne has many sections in it and deals with a variety of subjects, and I think the House would hardly be doing justice to itself or to the situation on the whole if it confined itself to the somewhat narrow discussion of different faiths and beliefs with reference to the tariff issue alone. I am, therefore, not going to apologize to the House for introducing an entirely new subject and one which I think it is well for Parliament at this particular stage and for the the country to take somewhat into consideration. I read as one of the sections of the Speech from the Throne:

> The First Assembly of the League of Nations was recently held at Geneva. Representatives of forty-one nations, including those of Canada, met and deliberated together in a spirit of harmony that promises much for this great experiment. Much time was necessarily devoted to the work of organization, but other measures were also agreed upon which are calculated to promote stability and good will in international intercourse. Most important of these is the draft scheme for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice which will be submitted to you for approval at an early date.

I am not going to try to give a large number of details to the House. I intend to approach the subject from a different angle with the idea of giving to the House, and through that to the country, a general view of the work and purposes of the League as so far developed. The note that is struck in that paragraph of the speech is a note of great importance and of singular breadth. It is indicative of a long line of progress which has at last developed into a political situation unequalled in the history of the world. It is indicative also of the progress of Canada from her childhood to the present time and of her future progress.

With what singular interest anyone who is really interested in the development of the individual life follows the boy from early childhood to matured manhood. The playthings and the trivialities of the boy gradually are shed, and from step to step he takes on the obligations, duties and work of maturing youth and maturing manhood. He goes from obligation to obligation, from duty to duty, from strength to strength, as he develops. Long time afterwards, it happens that the boy who played with marbles and made his little constructions of mud huts and the like gets up amidst the big forces of the world and plays with those great currents of thought and enterprise which are the cardinal and principal currents of the world's history and the world's development. We do not pity the boy for that change. It is a mark of development and progress; we are delighted to see it, and none of us tries to put upon that development the bar of an exclamation like this: "Ah, well, he is undertaking greater responsibilities; he may fail."

What is interesting in the development of individual life is far more interesting when we view it with reference to the development of national life, and this about which I am speaking to-day marks one of the many stages of Canadian national life. Before Confederation there was potent, inherent, in these colonies in British North America, a unity which by and by might work out into greater distribution of power and strength and a great accession of development and progress. Confederation was one of the first steps in developing that latent potency for nationhood. After the confederation had been fairly rounded out, the relationship widened and we began to think more and more of the inter-related colonies and dependencies of the Empire, to make our acquaintance with them, to consider them as members of the same family, to consider between them and us joint interests and common ideals, and so to work from the merely national out into the broad expanse of the Empire as a community of young peoples and coming nations within the Empire itself. That broadened us; it gave us greater responsibilities; it put upon us greater obligations; but we did not regret it. After that we went still wider afield. The war in South Africa struck another note and gave another complexion and tone to the relations of Canada within the Empire itself. It was that note and tone which are given by the expenditure of blood and sacrifice and effort for a common purpose and a common ideal, and an impetus was given to that spirit, and wideness and breath to the development of that spirit within the Empire itself, by the South African war.

Then came later that hurricane of war in Europe, menaced by growing clouds for many months, maybe many years before, and in the midst of that hurricane of war Canadians found themselves, and Canada found herself, one with those who were sent forth to take their part in that war. That enlarged Canada her thought, her feeling, her ideals beyond the family, beyond the national, beyond the Imperial, and created a wider acquaintance, and a wider area of sympathy and effort with all the allied nations as against the common enemy we all were fighting.

The war over, and its sacrifices in an active way for the time being over, Canada's interest still proceeds. We entered into that war, not simply to destroy some crowned head, not simply to overthrow some military dynasty; we entered into that war to secure the liberty and the peace of the world, and every drop of blood we shed, every man that fell, and every bit of the dust of Canada's people that enriches the soil of those countries where they fought and died was a pledge for the future carrying out of the work begun and carried on by physical sacrifice in the war. We made our investment there, and every bit of treasure that we spent and every drop of blood that was shed, and every succeeding sacrifice that was made is not only a perpetual record of the work done by Canadians in the field for freedom and justice, but an undying reminder of the work that still remains to be done.

We have made an investment in the field of world peace. We have put in our treasure and our blood, and we propose to follow that investment to its completion, and to bring out of it in common with the other nations of the world, the rich rewards of enduring peace, freedom from war and all the dread burdens that follow as a consequence of war. Now in that work we are not simply related to the Empire, we are not simply related to the Allies; we are related to the world. We are a part of the world machinery now, with just that much wider sympathy, with just that much broadened, helpful feeling that binds us not merely to our own nation, not merely to the Empire, not merely to the Allies with whom we fought, but to the world itself which needs adjustment, and into which we have put our investment in order that peace and security may follow as the ripened harvest. So much then for that phase of the question.

When we sat in Paris after the conclusion of the war, and during the conferences of that long peace assembly, men from all the nations interested, their strongest and best intellects, were working on the problem of the Peace. What could be assured as a constitution of Peace, as a realization of the hopes that war would be diminished, if not entirely banished from the world. These men were working with all their power and energy along that line, and the product of their labours was the Covenant of the League of Nations and the Treaty of Versailles, followed by the other treaties which embodied that covenant and which looked forward to gain by that covenant the fruits of the victory and compensation for the sacrifices in the world war. The Treaty of Peace, read just by title, has no great distinction from the hundreds of thousands of treaties of peace which had before been signed throughout the world and which are now filling the records of the different nations of the world. But this was more than an ordinary treaty of peace. It was a pledge and a covenant for the future. It was a reversal of the policy of six thousand years. It was a negation of war and an apothesis of peace and was signed and guaranteed by the thirty-two signatories to the covenant and the treaty, and since that time has been signed by thirteen states that were neutral, and by the six others which were admitted at Geneva. It has been signed by forty-seven countries of the world. Four that signed the Treaty of Peace did not ratify it. This accounts for the ultimate figure. It is a pledge of their proposals, of their wishes, of their desires, of their convictions, of their promise to fulfil. It may not be without importance, I think, to read in a few lines just what that pledge is. It is contained in the Preamble:

> The High Contracting Parties
> In order to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security
>
> by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war,
>
> by the prescription of open, just and honourable relations between nations,
>
> by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among Governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another.
> Agree to this Covenant of the League of Nations.

Forty-seven nations of the world have signed that. There is nothing that ever equalled that in the world's history. Treaties have been made between two countries, between three and four and sometimes half a dozen countries, but no treaty with signatories to a pledge for the abrogation of war and the employment of the arts of peace for the settlement of international disputes and difficulties has ever before been witnessed by the world with the majority of the world's nations behind it.

I have said that forty-seven nations have signed that pledge. That means that about 62 per cent of the whole of the territory of the world is embraced within that pledge. It means that 75 per cent of the whole population of the world is embraced within that pledge. That is significant. To my mind, it is something wonderful. Who are outside of that pledge to-day? Germany is outside, but if Germany for a few months will give the proper attention to her international obligations, and show a spirit of goodwill, she will be admitted to the League and will be welcomed. Mexico is outside of the League, and so is Soviet Russia, but there is hope for both Soviet Russia and Mexico.

The United States is without the League; but do not ever say that without coupling with it this other thought, that the spirit, the prayer, the hope, the overwhelming conviction of the people of the United States runs even with the ideas and purposes for which the League is formed. There may be some differences as to certain non-essentials which may have to be looked after and changed. But when you count the United States as not being in the League count also, of a surety, upon the fact that the vast majority of her people, with their prayers and hopes, are marching in the direction of the League of Nations as constituted.

Let us then in the next place consider the duties and obligations of the League. They are set forth in the covenant, which assigns those duties and obligations in certain directions and to certain organs of the League which are to be created. The League itself must operate through its own organs. The Supreme Council is not intended to carry out the purposes of the covenant of the League. It is simply an organization of the four or five great Powers. The League must have officiating organs of its own.

Let me for a few moment simply sketch what are the working organs of the League of Nations. Its first working organ is the Council, which is constituted by one member from each of the five great Powers; and as the United States has not yet ratified the covenant of the League, only four representatives are on the Council from the great Powers; that is to say, representing all of the five Powers apart from the United States. The four other members of the Council are provided for by election by the Assembly, of which I shall speak a little later. Before the Assembly was called and nominated its four members to the Council, provision was made in the covenant by which four members to represent the other nations, members of the League, officiated, and their term of office closed when the Assembly took on its proper power of nominating its four members. So that you have as an organization, one of the first organs of the League, the Council, consisting at present of eight members, which may be augmented to nine if the United States becomes a member of the League. Of these, four of five represent the Great Powers, and the other four represent all the other Powers and are elected by the Assembly of the League.

Now, that Council must in the first place have unanimity in order to carry through its measures, and that condition appeared at first to be almost a block in the way of practical working. It has not been found so, however. It is better to have that as a condition of the conclusions being reached by the League than to have a mere majority trying at this particular time to force upon all the nations what it may think should be done. And in practice it has so worked out that no obstacle has appeared in the way of any line of conduct and action which the Council of the League has been carrying out during the time that it has been in existence. The ground is taken that trivial things should be allowed to go and conclusions should be reached in the spirit of the League with a unanimity that will carry conviction. And if sometimes the rough edges may perhaps be pared off of what some members of the Council might wish to see put through, thereby giving some indication of compromise, still it is a wise compromise and a wise provision, in my opinion, and it has worked out successfully so far.

The next organ of the League of Nations is the Assembly, which is constituted in this way. There are now three delegates for every nation a member of the League, whether that nation be small or large. There is one vote for every nation, and the leader of the delegation gives the vote when votes are called for. From the 41 nations which were represented by their delegations at Geneva on November 15, there were 110 delegates, some nations having two and some one; there was not the full number of three for each nation. That is the Assembly as it was constituted on November 15. As now constituted there will be a possible three delegates for every one of the 47 nations that now make up the membership of the League.

With the Assembly, just as with the Council, unanimity must prevail, unless it is otherwise designated in the covenant or in the treaties which assign obligations or duties to them. One would think that in an Assembly of 110 delegates—that is, the representatives of 41 nations—it would be found that the compulsory unanimity would work out detrimentally to practical business. Well, the proof is better than the supposition. That Assembly met and did its work for five weeks, and the question as to the condition of unanimity being a bar or block to its progress never once came to the front in any such way as to retard the real work of the Assembly. The men who represented the nations were there under the overpowering impulse and spirit of working for a League with ideals in which the selfish and the national must give place to the unselfish and the international. And however strongly opinions were held and presented and debated, in the end there was no withdrawal of any proposition on the ground that perfect unanimity was not obtainable. So much with reference to the proof of the practical, rather than to the theory which one may form as to what might be a bar or block to the working of the Assembly.

The Assembly and the Council have different duties put upon them; there is a difference of jurisdiction. There are some things which, under the covenant and in the treaties, are given to the Council alone, while there are other things that are delegated solely to the Assembly. That is to say, each has some absolute powers. They have co-ordinate powers where they work in concert one with the other in order to come to the desired result. And then the Assembly and the Council each has the right to take up anything that comes within the sphere of the League or that appertains to the peace of nations.

There are, and were, some who thought that there ought to be exact definitions, put down in black and white, of the duties of the Council and of the Assembly; but a little discussion of the matter made it plain to all concerned that that would be extremely unwise, and that it was far better to leave it to the good sense and the good spirit of co-ordinate bodies, working along the same lines and for the same objects, rather than to attempt to exactly define the arrangement of their powers. Anyway, it worked out thus to the satisfaction of the members of both Council and League.

Then, in connection with the Assembly and the Council, there is of course the Secretariat. The Secretariat is really the staff of the Council and of the Assembly. The first secretary was provided for in the Covenant of the League of Nations. He was appointed by that Covenant for five years, and was selected by the Supreme Council of the League for that period. When the term expires the Secretary-General becomes the appointee of the Assembly of the League of Nations and the work goes on, as in Parliamentary circles, under the control of the Assembly, or what you might call the popular body. The Secretariat has a staff at the present time of some one hundred and fifty officials of different grades. On this staff more than eighteen different nations, members of the League are represented, showing the spirit of distributing this work as evenly and as well as might be, so that as many of the members of the League as possible shall be personally interested and shall be able, personally, to put forward their views with reference to the practical work of the Secretariat. Now these make the three great forces of the League in its operating capacity—the Council, the Assembly, and staff of the Secretariat, with the limitations that I have mentioned.

Having gone thus far, will the House allow me to say a word or two as to the general line of the duties. I cannot take the time to put them in detail but I will present them generally: They are for the reduction of the armaments of war, provided for in articles 1 to 8 in the Covenant. The lowest point, consistent with national safety and with the international obligations of the League, is the point set out to be attained in the future. To get to that as quickly as possible is the work of the League. Ten sections, or so, are then taken up with dealing with disputes between the nations and which up to the present time have been settled in the main, if diplomatic efforts failed, by the arbitrament of brute force. These cover a variety of plans for arbitration, for courts, for notices, pledges not to go to war within a certain time and until examination has been made, and safeguards against the violation of any of these pledges that were made.

Then there comes an article with reference to the registration of Treaties which, though simple in itself, is of paramount importance. It means that every Treaty which is concluded between members of the League is to be registered and ultimately to be published. What does that mean? It cuts straight across the customs of thousands of years when secret treaties were made between powers which aroused the suspicion and massed the resources of one set of powers against others, and not only led to suspicion but to lack of faith and confidence and ultimately to broils and to war. This marks the era of open diplomacy. Henceforward you can make your treaties but they are to be registered and, under the League, to see the light of day. That is a change that is stupendous in itself and which, if carefully worked out and adhered to, means a mighty important element and factor in the peace of the world for the future.

Then there is the system of Mandatories which also marks an absolute divergence from the methods of six thousand years. The individual who, in the olden time, was stronger than his neighbour took his cattle and made them his own. The nation which otherwise was stronger than its competitor took its territory and made it its own. Under the League of Nations the derelicts of war, the colonies and the parts of empires dismantled do not go to the victors to form additional parts of their territory and to constitute the elements of their future aggrandisement. These are placed under the Mandatories allocated by the Supreme Council, the terms and conditions of the Mandate to be prescribed by the Council of the League of Nations and the supervision to be under a Commission appointed by the League of Nations to which the Mandatories are to report each year and whose work may be reviewed by the Council and by the Assembly itself.

The element in the Mandatory principle is that these parts of territory and these peoples are not to be held as the adjuncts or slaves of the nations that have conquered, but are to be held in trust and to be administered by the Mandatory for the good of the people entrusted to their care; and the checks that I have mentioned are placed upon the Mandatories by the League in order to see that this trust is properly and reasonably executed. There you have a revolution, alongside another revolution, in the ways of the world for the last six thousand years and which point strongly—with the backing of forty-seven nations at present behind them to the better era when wars and their possibilities will be reduced to the minimum and the maximum of peace and security will be ensured.

But the League of Nations was wise in another thing. There are two ways in which you may bring about good international relations. One is by the reduction of the causes of war, by the compulsory reduction of armaments and another is by this allotment of Mandatories to prevent greed from being an impelling motive for war—that is greed of territories not at present enjoyed. All these things are good in their way, and are necessary, but there is another avenue. That is to get down to the common heart, the common impulses, the common interests of the nations, and working along humanitarian and economic lines for the good of all, one nation with another, to pave the way along that avenue for those feelings of amity, of help and of sacrifice, one for the other, and of commonness in ideal and purpose and benefits which will have a very strong effect in bringing about the desired results. And so there is your social and economic propaganda. A nation, China for instance, is plagued by the opium traffic. That nation buys itself free or struggles out from it; another nation—not China—sacrifices some of her interests and agrees with China; and you have the two principal nations concerned in agreement. But you never will stop the opium trade and the deleterious traffic in it and kindred drugs until you have the co-operation of all nations, because those who do not co-operate are the go-betweens, and they destroy the effect of the sacrifices of those who are primarily interested. Therefore the League comes in as a sort of liaison between the different nations in all these great humanitarian works of which I have cited one example, and by its counsels and its technical advisers it assists the nations to do more effective work: it exerts itself to influence nations to make similar conventions; it pleads with nations for the good of all to join these conventions; and it helps by its counsel and its supervision to gather the nations gradually into one world-whole.

When that has been done and effective supervision established, you strike a death blow, as far as you can, at these ills. There is the illicit traffic in women and children; there are the epidemic diseases which scourge primarily one country and which threaten to scourge the world out of that country as a centre and hot-bed of those diseases. All these are brought under co-ordinating influences in the different nations, and by means of the League of Nations they combine for supervision and for help in carrying out the world-purpose. There are a dozen or more of those great humanitarian, economic and financial organizations—technical organizations they are called—the duties of which are defined in the Covenant and in the operation of which are being negotiated by the League of Nations. That in brief gives you some idea of the nature of the work that is being carried on by the League of Nations.

Now with reference to the Assembly. That is the newest and therefore may perhaps be less known to most of us. Any way, I feel it my duty to say something with reference to the Assembly, to the end of interesting my fellow members in the work and purposes of the League, and, if possible, of arousing in Canada that force, moral and social, which must be the foundation of the success of the League of Nations, if it ever is to succeed. It is not Lloyd George, it is not Millerand, it is not the King or the Cabinet of Italy who in the main is going to make the League of Nations a success in the world. It is the Co-ordination of the prayers and wishes and hopes, the moral and political influence of the great body of humanity the wide world through which is to make that League successful. This is my excuse for bringing that matter forward today.

On the 15th day of November one hundred and ten delegates found themselves in the City of Geneva and in convocation at the Hall of Reformation, which, taking Genevan history into account, has some associations connected with it. People were wont to ask, and there was every excuse for their scepticism: What in the world will happen when forty-one different nations, of every colour, of every creed, of every language and traditions get together in one room down in Geneva? How are they going to understand each other? How will they ever make their views known to each other? Will they ever get down to business? There was ground for thought of that kind. Well, Sir, what happened? In brief, this. I have had some experience of political conventions; so has my hon. friend. I have seen them get together from one country—yes, from one province, and I have found them take a very long while in getting their rules of procedure and all that sort of thing fixed to their liking and settling down to real work. I never saw and never read of a convention, and certainly none on the scale of this one, which so soon got down to profitable and practical work as did the first Assembly of the League of Nations.

It is true there was all that disparity, there was all that variety of tendency and thought from generations and centuries behind each of these nationalities—all those conditions were there, but when humanity is inspired by a common spirit and a common ideal, overpowering in its nature, all these differentials are soon left to take care of themselves, and the human unit is the only thing that emerges into the foreground, and the worth of the human unit is the only thing that counts. That was exemplified in the first League of Nations. It was the spirit of the mission upon which they came, it was the height of the ideal which inspired their coming, it was for the great purpose possible of achievement that they were there, and they set themselves to become acquainted with each other, to get each other's viewpoint, and they vanquished all these seeming difficulties. They came together, and in six days' time they were working just as smoothly, and, I think, much more expeditiously than the committees in our own Parliament or in other Parliaments of constitutionally governed countries are carried on. So much then with reference to that as a matter of fact.

What did they have to do? Those one hundred and ten people met there without a president or presiding officer. That difficulty was quite easily got over. The Council of Nations had appointed one of its number to be temporary chairman, and he and the head of the Swiss Confederation made congratulatory addresses, and then came the election of a permanent president. It is a courtesy amongst those peoples that the first session of a convention like that shall take as its chairman a man from the country in which it meets. That honour might have been claimed by Switzerland, but it was not, and the president of the Swiss Confederation himself moved the nomination of Mr. Hyman of Belgium as the first president. He thus put Belgium and Switzerland into the best of accord one with the other, and avoided any bitterness that otherwise might have taken place. So we had our first president.

Then came the rules of procedure. The Council had drawn up provisional rules of procedure. We adopted those rules after a very short discussion, and then appointed a committee to amend, revise and bring down a permanent set of rules. The next step was how to carry on the work of the Assembly. That was solved in this way. Six great commissions or committees were formed, each consisting of forty-one members; that is, upon each of those commissions every member-state of the League had one representative, and those six commissions took the burden of the work which was referred to them. The first committee dealt with constitutional questions, the rules of procedure, the relative competence of the Council and of the League, and the election of members of the council. The second took up the matter of the technical organizations which I have already explained to the House. The third took up the matter of a permanent Court of Justice. The fourth took up the secretariat and the finances of the League —a very important subject indeed, which engrossed a very large amount of our attention. The fifth took up the question of admissions to the League; fourteen demands for admission were made and six out of the fourteen were admitted. The sixth committee took up the questions of mandates, armaments, and economic weapons. Every resolution and everything referring to the meetings and the work of the Assembly was transferred to its appropriate committee, was threshed out in that committee, and the conclusions of the committee were reported back and discussed, amended or approved, as might be, by the Assembly. That brought forty-one different nationalities of men into each committee, and solved very quickly the question of our getting acquainted with each other. They were thrown together around a common table for a common purpose. They made their views known and practically became as well acquainted in the course of a very short time as we on different sides of the House are with one another.

French and English were the two languages in which the debates of the Assembly were conducted and discussions in the committees carried on. The question came up very early in the course of the proceedings. There happened to be seventeen states whose national language was Spanish, and the question was mooted; If we have French and if we have English, why not Spanish as well? It was debated with great vigour, but in the end the overmastering spirit of the Convention solved that difficulty; the Spanish demand was withdrawn and the solution was found along this line, backed by the practical considerations which made it impossible that every nationality should have its own language as an official language. If one wished to speak Spanish, he had the right to do it; he had the right to get an interpretation of his remarks, and that translation into either English or French was spread upon the minutes and took its place just the same as if the remarks had been made in French or in English. But a wonderful thing happened; among the delegates from those forty-seven nations there was scarcely one who was not able to express his views either in English or in French. So it was simply a process of double translation; if a man spoke in English his remarks were immediately translated into French; if he spoke in French it was immediately translated into English, and each had the advantage of the views of the other. Although it took time, the procedure was carried out with wonderful smoothness and rapidity.

May I mention one thing that particularly struck me in connection with the deliberations of the Assembly? We are a very courteous assembly here in this new hall. We try not to say anything deliberately which will wound another. We pay compliments sometimes—though not very often, I am afraid.

Mr. McMASTER: They are not always returned.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No, they are not. What struck me from beginning to end was the spirit of courtesy which characterized all the discussions of the Assembly. I did not hear a wrangle in the Committee or in the Assembly; no sharp things were said just for the purpose of wounding. Sharp arguments were used it is true, and were sharply clinched, but over all there was a universal spirit of courtesy. Is that because the dominant element in that Assembly was of the Latin race? Whatever may be the reason, it was a fact.

Another thing that struck me was this: from no country did higher or more advanced ideas emanate than from the countries of South America, nearly all of which are members of the League. Certainly in breadth and liberality—sometimes carried to the point of danger—their views and suggestions were in advance of those of the other delegations which were in attendance.

During that Assembly thirty-one plenary sessions were debated. Twenty-eight different resolutions debated and were passed in reference to important subjects sent from the Committees for discussion by the Assembly. But from first to last the discussion of that whole Assembly were characterized in an eminent degree by frankness, fulness, clearness and earnestness, directed to the sole purpose of getting at the best solutions possible.

I wish to say a word with reference to the position of the smaller nations. Every delegation has just the same rights in the Assembly and in the Committees as every other delegation. In speaking and in voting the small power has the same privileges as the large power. Much depends, of course, on the source from which the delegate speaks; in the discussion of certain questions one power may have an influence which is not present in the same degree in the case of a smaller nation. But as to discussion and voting the 5 p.m. privileges of the various nations represented in the Assembly are uniform,—an ideal the realization of which has long been sought. Indeed, that is what gives strength to the League; for the smaller nations feel that they approach the larger on a footing of equality and that they can exercise as much influence as the quality of their views entitle them to.

What has emanated from that Assembly? First, a plain proof that it is possible for a League of Nations constituting the majority of the countries of the world, and ultimately constituting all the countries of the world, to meet on a world platform and do effective, practical work. There was a forum upon which every nation could ventilate its ideals and put forward its position in a great gathering of internationals. There was a forum elevated before the world, watched by the press, the proceedings of which were telegraphed and written to every quarter of the globe; a gathering in which the foremost ideas of the foremost men of forty-seven nations of the world could find expression. There was a platform for the discussion of matters so brought up, for the formulating of views with regard to them, and for the impression of those views upon the world.

Do you mean to tell me that is not erecting in the world a method of procedure, a channel of influence, a means of propagation of the best thought of the nations of the world, a moral force and an intellectual force which will go further than armaments in righting the gross wrongs of the world and drawing the conscience and heart of the world to a contemplation of the higher, the better and the truer course? That, to my mind, if nothing else were accomplished, is a splendid accomplishment and worthy of the trouble and all that it cost.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the discussions of the League, there was some question as to the meetings being held in secret rather than in public. Would my right hon. friend speak of that?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: With reference to the Assembly, all meetings were in public. That is, the Salle de Reformation was not large enough to hold everyone, but everybody who could get in got in; representatives of the press were there and had a right to be there. The meetings of the Assembly were open to the public gaze; the world saw them; all heard and digested the discussions if they wished to. With reference to the committees, it was resolved that each committee should make its own determination whether it would hold private sessions or public sessions. But it was imperative that the proceedings of each committee should be taken down in extenso from day to day, published as they were the day after, put into the hands of every member of the Assembly and the results given to the press. In addition to that, a number of the meetings of those committees were advertised to be held publicly and the public were admitted to them, so that I do not think there is any reasonable ground for stricture in reference to that. Some things will occur in a committee where it is best that the matter should be threshed out amongst the members of the committee itself, and provision was made for that emergency. Otherwise, the light of day was shed into all the transactions of the Assembly. Let me say just here on that point, that the decisions of the Council have to be public as well.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: I would like to ask a question or two with regard to the relative positions of the Council and the Assembly. Is the Council superior to the Assembly? Does the Council derive its force from the Assembly? Is the Council elected by the Assembly?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just a word on that. I touched upon a part of it, but now that the question has been asked a little more distinctly, I will give the answer. The Council has eight members upon it. Those eight members in the Council represent the Governments of the countries from which they come. Four of those members are elected by the Assembly, those four representing the other nations outside of the four great powers. In some cases, they have co-ordinate powers, Council and Assembly. They have to work together and come to an agreement in order to carry a thing. In other respects they have absolute powers conferred upon them by the covenant and they have each the general power that they can take up whatever comes within the sphere of the League and which pertains to the peace of nations; but the agreement between them is maintained—and it is the only sensible one—that no one works without an understanding with the other.

I think I touched upon the point that one great thing that was done by the Assembly, if it did nothing else, was that it met and organized itself and was successful in organizing itself upon a practical basis and that it finished the machinery of the League of Nations. The operating organs of the League of Nations are now complete, but each man, when he comes to measure up what has been done in this last year by Council or League must take this into account, namely, that the Council itself did not begin to officiate until the 16th of January, 1920; that the Secretariat did not commence to officiate until a month later or nearly that; that fully six months was taken up in getting any kind of an organization for the League that its operations were in Paris, in Brussels, in London and in other places; it had no abiding home. It now has its abiding home, and the later part of its work was in getting to that home and in fairly settling down, preparing for the Assembly of the League of Nations, getting its officers installed and ready for practical work, so that when you come to sum up what has been done last year, you must take that into account. Take into account also that neither the League nor the Council nor the Secretariat had real life in its bones until the Assembly was constituted, and the Assembly gave to it that foundation which made it possible for the superstructure to be a vital part of the whole edifice. The League of Nations with those organs of work relies primarily upon the Assembly which meets yearly. The members of that Assembly come fresh from every nation with the mandate of their government at that particular time. That Assembly holds the sources of supply, and the budgeting system which formed a large part of the work of that Assembly is now arranged upon a plan as good as the plan of budgeting which exists in any Assembly in the world. It is now based on proper principles and under control of proper guidance. Heretofore it was but a part of an imperfect machine and it could not run smoothly nor perfectly. Now the whole machine is there with its controls and its powers of supervision, and the whole machine works together as a completed organism.

Mr. PROULX: Under article 10, if the Assembly comes to a certain decision, have the delegates from each country the power to commit their country by their votes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is for the delegates from each country to arrange with their government. If they have not done that before they have left, then they must get into communication with their government and do it. When they give their vote, they are supposed to be voicing their country's views, and not simply their own opinions; otherwise, we would not have a very strong Assembly. I think my hon. friend will see that.

I think I have covered the ground with one exception, and I am not going very deeply into that because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) has in hand some legislation in regard to that, and he will go into particulars. The one outstanding work of the Assembly has, I think, been the constitution of a permanent court of international justice. Early in the year the Council called a committee of ten of the first jurists of the world, one of the number being Mr. Elihu Root of the United States. They met at The Hague and they were in conference for six weeks. They agreed with unanimity upon a proposal for a permanent court of international justice. That report went to the Council of the League, where it was revised, examined, debated and discussed by the Council of the League and with some amendments was sent to the Assembly. The Assembly, after making some few amendments, unanimously approved the proposition, and that proposition has been already approved by twenty-three of the member States of the League, amongst them the most foremost States of the League, and there is no doubt in my mind that the forty-seven member States of the League will agree thereto.

If they approve of it and ratify it, a permanent court is called into existence, which sits continuously, consisting of eleven judges and four deputy judges with power to take into account and settle disputes between States members of the League, disputes between States members of the League and other States not members of the League, and disputes between States which are outside the League, provided certain conditions are complied with which are set out in the statute constituting the court.

For the first time in the world's history we have agreement upon a method of choosing judges. In 1907 the convention at the Hague split on the rock of the choice of judges. One proposal was that every state in the convention should nominate one judge. That would have made an unwieldly number. Another proposal was that there should be seventeen or eighteen judges, of whom the Great Powers should nominate eight and the other Powers nine. The smaller States baulked at that. Then a system of rotation was discussed. Anyway, the negotiations fell through, because it was impossible to agree upon any one method. The Hague Permanent Court is a Court of Arbitration, nothing more, and nothing less. But once this Court of Justice is settled upon and goes into operation, you have already twenty-two of the foremost Powers that have pledged themselves to submit their cases to it, and before the year is out in my opinion, you will have forty-seven of the members of the League giving the same adhesion. Think of that for a moral force. It has a binding force over those who sign it, and it has a moral force over those that are outside.

Then take this other thing into account. On that proposition of a permanent Court of Justice the United States, though without the League, is exactly on all fours as to the principles and the purposes of a permanent court. So in that one way alone the League of Nations has brought about a reversion from the method of brute force for settling international disputes, to the method of settlement by a permanent tribunal of the first judges of the world, to which tribunal they have agreed to send their disputes for hearing and settlement.

Now, Mr. Speaker and fellow-members, I am very much obliged to you for the patient hearing you have given me.

Mr. NESBITT: How are the judges chosen?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are chosen by a somewhat ingenious method. The Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague has a system of groups of judges, or members of the Court. Each Power that belongs to the convention nominates four judges of certain calibre, as laid down. These constitute the membership of that Permanent Court. A party comes up with a dispute and it and the other party to the dispute each chooses its own judge out of that panel, and the case goes before the judges so chosen for arbitration. The League of Nations has adopted that grouping system, and each nation that belongs to the League has four nominees. Each nation outside can also have its four nominees, so in that way you have a panel of possible judges. The Council and the Assembly together unite in choosing from that panel eleven permanent and four deputy judges. That is the system, and it appears to have given universal satisfaction, as being free from political influences.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: May I ask whether a dispute between South Africa and Great Britain could be referred to this court for hearing and settlement?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend has asked a very close question. South Africa is a member of the League, and as a member has the right to nominate her four judges. Canada has that same right. I am not going to enter upon the field of these very close relationships between the different parts of the Empire or upon the legal features of the matter. I will leave that to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Can the Minister answer as to a dispute, say, between Australia and Great Britain?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That would be the same as a dispute between South Africa and Great Britain.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: May I ask an easier question? Is there any truth in the report that there was some friction or differences of opinion among the Canadian delegates, or between some of the Canadian delegation and the British delegates?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I was driver of the team from Canada and I have no knowledge of any friction in the least. I can give a direct negative to that. We were like a band of brothers. Neither have I knowledge of any friction between any of the members of the British Empire delegations, and I do not believe that any existed. We did not always vote the same way, we did not always talk the same way. Each state was perfectly independent in giving its views, and in that way I think maybe a better accord and better results were obtained than if there had been any thought of acting as a unit or if there had been coercion in any way. But there was none of that.

Mr. DENIS: As the Minister is kind enough to allow questions, I should like to put one which is of some interest to us on this side of the House. He has said that there were some forty odd nations, and that the official languages were English and French. I should like to know whether the French language was made use of in that Assembly as much as the English language?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend's knowledge of history and national characteristics might have answered that for him. There was more French speaking than English speaking, and no doubt there was more good French spoken by those who spoke French than by those who were English and tried to speak French. French was the dominant language. I could make quite an interesting disquisition on the preferences of some for English and some for French, outside entirely of the question of race. It was quite odd to see some of the currents running.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY: Did the representative of China speak French?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Their delegate is a model for my hon. friend in clear, terse, and vigorous English, coupled always with the greatest courtesy, especially when he was facing his Japanese friends.

Mr. B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay a few odd compliments, but I remember the advice of a very old friend of my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster). The late Sir Charles Tupper said that he always examined his conscience when a man from the other side of the House began to compliment him.

However, I do not think, Mr Speaker, I may be permitted to say, as immediately following the right hon. minister, that we are glad to see him back with renewed vigour and renewed strength, having performed his duties at the League of Nations, completing alliances upon the other side and forming a new one to adorn the social circles of our country. I shall not try to follow the hon. minister in the very able address he gave in regard to the work of the League of Nations. I could not help thinking, however, that he was taking a rather unfair advantage of his friend the ex-President of the Privy Council, the member for Durham (Hon. Mr. Rowell), who made a statement in the newspapers and also to his electors that the only reason why he was remaining in Parliament was the fact that he desired to discuss the question of the League of Nations; and my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has simply proved today, in the masterly way in which he handled that question, that the usefulness of the hon. member for Durham no longer exists.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Wait and see.

Mr. DEVLIN: The second point which I desire immediately to take up is the reference which my right hon. friend made to the use of the English and French languages officially. The point was first introduced in this House in a different way in an excellent speech delivered by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie); and you will allow me, I hope, Mr. Speaker, to interject a remark at this juncture that both the mover and the seconder of the Address did themselves full justice in the speeches which they delivered. The member for Yale said that he was brought up amongst a French population and that he loved the French people. You will readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that we who speak English on this side of the House, and who come from the Province of Quebec, having been associated with French-Canadian friends, not only admire their language, but admire as well their judgment and their qualities. Perhaps if others in this country were equally favoured they might be able to say precisely the same thing. I simply say this in passing, however, as it has already been spoken of.

I want to refer at once to a paragraph in the speech from the Throne in which we are promised important legislation with reference to the League of Nations. I have no doubt that when that important legislation is brought down it will have the full attention of the hon. members on this side.

Now, may I say a word touching the speech delivered yesterday by the new Prime Minister of Canada (Rt. Hon. Mr. Meighen)? That right hon. gentleman did not refer to any constitutional authorities respecting the status of his Government. That, Sir, can easily be understood, for if there had been anything in the constitutional history either of England or of Canada offering a precedent for the present situation, my right hon. friend, who is a good reasoner and who is possessed of clear vision and sound judgment in addition to the fact that he is an excellent student of constitutional history, would have advanced it.

But in view of the speech which was delivered by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday, intimating to the Government that they were in office because they had usurped power, and quoting authority after authority to show that their position was contrary to every conception of responsible Government in this country—aye, and in England as well—my right hon. friend had perforce to remain mute on the subject of the constitution. Instead, that gentleman, who is so suave in manner and so calm in temper, got into a towering rage. I had never before seen him in such a rage in my life at the very suggestion that he should not be where he was, or that my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition should change places with him.

Sir, to me it is a matter of indifference whether the Government remain where they are or whether the Opposition continue in their present position. One thing, however, I have very present in my mind, and it is this: I always try to keep before me the resolve that in this country autocracy shall not reign but that the rights of the people shall be respected. There is throughout the land a voice calling upon the Government to appeal to the people in order to ascertain whether it has their confidence. But that voice is answered by silence on the part of the Government. My right hon. friend asked the question: What are we going to the country upon? Well, we appeal to the Government to go to the country upon the one question: do they enjoy the confidence of the people? My right hon. friend says: What about the tariff? Why do you not speak upon the tariff? That is very clever, but, of course, one would naturally expect clever things from my right hon. friend. The tariff, according to a ruling delivered, if I mistake not, by yourself, Mr. Speaker, can be brought up only when the budget is under consideration.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is in error. I know the ruling to which he has reference. It was merely an intimation to the House that it might be more desirable to have a budget debate upon the budget, but it by no means purported to preclude any reference to the question of the tariff.

Mr. BELAND: We shall observe your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEVLIN: If you did not give the ruling as I have stated it, Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will allow me to recall to your memory the fact that it has been the invariable practice for a great number of years in this House not to discuss tariff issues until the introduction of the budget; and that is a practice that has been observed in parliamentary procedure in Great Britain for a great number of years. The Prime Minister asks: Are the members on this side ready to stand by their tariff proposals of 1919? He knows full well that the Liberal party is ready to stand by everything that is liberal. He knows perfectly well that in intent and purpose the guiding spirit of liberalism in Canada in recent years was the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who is to-day ably followed by the present leader of the Opposition. Inspired by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and by what is best in liberalism, we upon this side intend to follow the letter and the spirit of liberal principles. The Prime Minister said nothing more that I could take note of, absolutely nothing. He wants to discuss a hundred and one questions and pleads: Do not discuss the right of the people of Canada to have a voice in the affairs of the country at the present time: we are still working on war measures and dealing with conditions in this country that have arisen from the war.

Financial, industrial, and agricultural conditions in Canada will be consequences of the war long after the Prime Minister and I have disappeared from the scene of this world's activities. There was a world revolution during the war but there was not such a revolution in parliamentary institutions in Canada as to deter the people from demanding that their sanction be obtained in order to carry on public affairs. I do not mean to speak at any great length but I wish to lay stress upon the fact that for some years back the people of Canada have been demanding a voice in the affairs of the dominion. The Government refused to give them that voice. The preceding administration deprived the people of their voice and governed Canada by Order in Council. They resorted to every possible means to stifle the popular voice; and now the present Prime Minister declares that he and his Government are going to follow in spirit and in letter the policy of their predecessors. If that be so, why did it become necessary for so many members of the Cabinet to resign, or did my right hon. friend put them out of the Cabinet? I think it is due to the people and to the members of this House that the Prime Minister should make a statement as to the position of those gentlemen who have resigned from the Cabinet.

The Prime Minister says: We are going to stand by protection in this country. Let me draw his attention to the fact that in 1918 the Government, taking advantage of the reciprocity statute had potatoes placed upon the free list. There was no protection about that measure neither in letter, word nor principle; it was absolute free trade in potatoes; and I warn my hon. friend from British Columbia that other measures of a similar character may be adopter even by the present Government, when it suits their purpose.

Following the kind references that have been made to my native province will you, Mr. Speaker, permit me to quote a few statements from an article in the supplement of the Montreal Gazette for the year 1920 with reference to the Province of Quebec. The article in question states that Mr. Marquis, the head of the Provincial Bureau of Statistics, makes the statement that the value of the crops for Quebec in 1914 was $99,279,000. In 1919 it had grown to $307,044,000, an increase of 310 per cent, whilst in the Province of Ontario the increase was simply 190 per cent. The article goes on to say:

> Still another illustration of agricultural growth in Quebec is shown in Mr. Marquis' figures. The value of land is in keeping with what is raised thereon in crops and cattle. With the exception of British Columbia, where the specially rich fruit farms, and veritable gardens, have a very high value, Quebec leads the provinces in value of farm lands. The value in British Columbia is $174 per acre; Quebec, $72; Ontario, $66; Prince Edward Island $51; Nova Scotia, $41; Manitoba, $35; Saskatchewan, $32; New Brunswick, $32; and Alberta is last with a valuation of $29 per acre.

In other words, after making allowance for land values in British Columbia the Province of Quebec heads the list. The finances of that Province are in an admirable condition—in a better condition than that of any other Province. The laws of Quebec are sane, her people are contented and the best of feeling exists between the two races that people the Province.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not follow any herring that is sought to be drawn across the trail, and permit myself to be diverted from the one question that now confronts this House—will the Government grant a general election or will they not?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know many hon. members intend continuing the debate. I believe the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Harold) follows.

Mr. McMASTER: I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I had no idea the hon. member (Mr. Devlin) who has just sat down had concluded his speech. I am not in a position to answer his question as I do not own the Government. But I was going to make some remarks on that very question. A great deal has been said throughout the country, and a great deal has been said in this House since the session opened, as to whether this Government should continue to function or not. I do not know what took place in other ridings at the time of the 1917 election, but I certainly know what took place in the riding that I have the honour to represent. There was never a word spoken that could convey the idea that this Government was not to be elected for a full term. So far as I was personally concerned, the only promise I make was that I would support the Union Coalition Government in all measures that it might consider were in the interests of the country. I have done so and purpose continuing to do so. Even if I should disagree with the Cabinet on any particular question, I see no reason why I should go over to the other side of the House. In my judgment—I may be wrong—it is our privilege when we are elected to vote on any question as we think wise. If that were not so, I would not care to be a representative in this Parliament; I would not care to be bound to follow any party or any government that introduced a measure that I thought to be not in the interests of the country, and I do not purpose doing so.

It is quite true that since the Union or Coalition Government was elected some members who were then sitting on this side of the House have gone over to the other side; that is their privilege. It is quite true that there has been a different grouping even among the Opposition. It is also quite true that the leader at that time of the then Union or Coalition Government has retired from the leadership. It is also just as true that the members and supporters of the Union Government have nominated a successor to that leader in a regular and constitutional way, as I understand—by the majority of votes of the supporters of that party or Government. I think that is the proper way. I may say quite frankly that I have never been in favour of choosing a leader at large conventions, because I think it is really the members of the House who have the best knowledge to choose their leader. I say again that the present leader of the Union Government was properly chosen, and I see no reason under our constitution the members of that Government should seek re-election until they are defeated in the House. I do not believe that because there happens to be a wave of feeling in favour of the Opposition or of the Government advantage should be taken of it to put the country to the expense of an election. There may be a popular wave on any question—and I have seen many popular waves that afterwards, with experience, became very unpopular—and therefore I do not see why the present Government should not continue to function until they bring in such legislation as the majority of the members do not agree with and they are defeated, or until their proper term expires.

A great deal has been said about the recent election in West Peterborough, particularly in reference to group government. Personally, I am opposed to group government, because I think, no matter who the leader may be, if he has to cater to groups to get support he is liable to pass legislation which is not in the interests of the country as a whole. We are all human; the leader of a party, from my experience, is just as human as any of his followers; and it is natural for him to continue in office if he reasonably can. Therefore, as far as I have been able to study them, the European countries that have group governments suffer under the disadvantage that the legislation passed is more in the particular interests of the groups than in the general interests of those countries, simply because their governments must cater to their group supporters if they are to retain power.

We had one benefit under the old two-party system, and that was that the successful candidate had at least the satisfaction of knowing that he was elected by a majority of those who voted. All the people may not have voted, but that was their own fault; they had the opportunity. He at least, let me repeat, had the satisfaction of knowing that he was elected by a majority in that constituency. The West Peterborough election shows that no matter how capable the candidate is who was elected there the other day—and I understand he is a most capable gentleman—after all he has not the satisfaction of knowing that he secured a majority of the votes that were polled. That might not make any difference to some gentlemen, because I believe the vast majority of those who have sat in this House since I have been a member feel that when elected, although as the nominees of a certain party, they become the representatives of all their constituents. And further, so far as my experience has gone since I became a member, I think the majority of hon. members who have been in the House for some time realize that it is their duty not only to represent the views of all their own constituents, but, so far as they can judge, the views of all the people.

I think that is a feeling that ought to pervade the mind of every man who is elected to this Parliament. After all, this is a Dominion, not a provincial Parliament; we have to take into consideration the interests of the whole country, not of any particular section of the people exclusively. I do not agree that this Government should go to the country on the ground, as is urged by some, that they were elected only for the war and demobilization period. The only thing I heard before or during the campaign of 1917 that would bear on that contention was that when the War-time Elections Act was passed it was distinctly stated that that Act would remain in force only during the war and during demobilization. I sat on the opposite side of the House at that time. I was opposed to the War-time Elections Act and I would still be opposed to it if it were in force. But it is not in force; it has been repealed; therefore the promise made in that respect has been carried out. But I do not think that has anything to do with the question of the term of Paliament.

Mr. ROBB: Is not the Government that was elected under the War-time Elections Act still in power or claiming to be in power by virtue of a majority elected under that Act?

Mr. NESBITT: That is quite true; there is no denying it. But that does not make any difference so far as I can see. The War-time Elections Act was passed by the House, and the members of Parliament were elected under that Act and by very large majorities. Personally, I was elected notwithstanding the War-time Elections Act, so that I have not, and never did have, anything to say in favour of it.

My hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) has referred to Quebec as being the most stable province in the Dominion. I agree with that view, because the province of Quebec has stability. Too many of our other provinces are taking up fads. There is too much "progressive" legislation in a good many of them—that is, so far as the finances of the provinces and the interests of the people are concerned. Therefore I pay all due respect and honour to the province of Quebec and compliment them upon the manner in which their political and financial affairs have been conducted in the last ten years, and upon the position they have now attained.

I am speaking this afternoon under some difficulty, because I was not here yesterday and did not hear what was said; nor did I have an opportunity to read Hansard. But in the Speech from the Throne there is a proposition—it is only a proposition; I do not know whether there is any intention to do anything in regard to it—in respect to unemployment insurance. I notice on actual reference to the Speech from the Throne that it is an investigation, not a proposition—that an investigation is being conducted by the Department of Labour into a system of unemployment insurance. I hope that the Government will not launch out into any system of unemployment insurance. I believe in giving every man an opportunity to work; I do think that the only way this country will succeed in the next few years, the only way in which it can overcome the enormous debt with which we are now burdened, is for every man to work; and I believe that if he is willing to work there is work in this country for every man to do. It may be necessary at times, as was recently the case in some of the larger cities, to assist persons who are out of work, but I cannot help thinking that a great many of these people could find work if they were really anxious to do so. I know that in our section of the country a great many of them could find work on the farms—not, perhaps, at five or six dolars a day, but at reasonable pay. Nothing is so harmful to a people as indiscriminate charity, because it helps to foster the idea that people can get along without working.

During the last two or three years the country has passed through very serious times so far as the labour question is concerned. Many industries were forced either to close down or to work on part time, and some of them made every effort to keep the work going in their factories for their employes, on the principal that half a loaf is better than no bread. After all, business is but a cycle; the consumer buys from the retailer, the retailer from the wholesaler, the wholesaler from the manufacturer. The farmer grows various commodities that sustain life, and the rest of the people who do not farm buy his products. If those people are out of work and have no money, they cannot buy those products, nor can they buy the products of the manufacturer. Last summer it was stated in the newspapers—both in Canada and in the United States, so far as I could see—that everything was going to be cheaper; that prices were coming down enormously. As a matter of fact there were a great many reductions in the prices of goods retailed; certain goods that were really luxuries were allowed to drop very materially in price. Even then I suppose a pretty fair profit was made on them, because during the war time and the period of very high wages the people lost their balance, so to speak, people bought things that their financial circumstances did not justify their buying, and indulged in extravagant expenditure which was of no particular benefit to themselves. For instance, I knew of a man who had been employed for several years, drawing fifteen dollars a day, and who, before he was not without work for three months, had nothing. That man was living beyond his means and without any care for the future, and while I do not say that everyone did that, I know hundreds of people did the same thing. In the committee that we commissioned to investigate the cost of living, we were told that people who were offered boots, say at eight dollars a pair, would not look at them, but when the same boots were produced to them for eighteen dollars a pair, then they thought the boots were all right. I am giving that only as an illustration of the craze that came over the country for living above one's means by people who should have been saving at that that time.

Then we come to this summer when the idea crept into the minds of the people that everything was going to be very much cheaper, and they ceased buying. When the consumer ceased buying, the retailer's shelves were full of goods and he had to cease buying; the wholesaler also had to cease buying, and the manufacturer went on as long as he could, as long as the banks would allow him to manufacture goods and pile them up and store them. The manufacturer had faith in the future and kept on for the purpose of keeping his men employed. But there is a limit to that; the banks would not advance any further on that sort of prospect. The consequence was that everything stopped to a certain extent. Some people may blame the Government for that, but the Government had nothing more to do with it than they have with the rain and the snow, the frost and the heat. It is true that the luxury tax was put on last year very largely for the purpose of drawing people's attention to the fact that they were buying goods at extravagant prices, and that was why the tax had to be added to the bill and not concealed in the price of the goods.

That had in a great measure the effect of drawing people's attention to their extravagance, and the consequence was that many people began to realize that the goods they were buying were altogether too high in price for their means and they commenced to curtail their expenditures to a certain degree. That tax has been done away with.

As regards unemployment insurance, I feel that our Ontario Government passed a very wise Act in their endeavour to take care of the widow by giving her a grant based upon so much for a widow alone and so much for each child so as to help her in extreme cases where she had no means. The difficulty about unemployment insurance, like the difficulty at the present time of maintaining in cities and towns many people who are out of employment, is that there is a tendency to take advantage of that aid and not seek employment. In other words, the workers keep the drones. Even the bees set us an example in that situation. In a hive of bees the workers kill the drones; and while I do not want us to do that, let me repeat that there is only one salvation for this country and that is that everybody must work and give the best there is in him. At the present time there is a tendency on the part of some people to reduce the price of labour. I understand that last year in the West, in some instances, farmers had to pay as high as eight dollars a day for farm labourers. Farmers are not likely to get a sufficient price to produce grain on the farm at that rate of wages. But that condition of things did not predominate throughout the country, neither did the very high wages that were paid for munition workers during the war prevail amongst workers in ordinary industries, at east in Ontario. Ordinary industries certainly had to double their wages, but the difficulty was that while they doubled their wages, they did not get the same production. I know of an instance where wages were trebled and the production per man was reduced by over one-half. As far as my knowledge goes, most employers of labour in ordinary business where wages were not extreme and exceptional, were not grumbling about the wages they were paying, but they were grumbling about the production. I am glad to say that during the last two months production has very materially increased in accordance with the trade, and if that be the case—that is, if the men do their duty and earn their pay—I know of no employers who are anxious to reduce wages. What the employer is after is results. I do not think there is any necessity for the large number of people that the newspapers report as being unemployed in our cities at the present time. I think that many of those men could find work at reasonable wages if they tried to. In small towns like ours, while there has been a certain amount of trouble because of slackening of work in manufacturing industries and, in one or two instances, the shutting down of factories for short periods, the bulk of the men were quite capable of carrying on until such times as their work started again. Those who were not, immediately sought other work and most of them were able to find it. That is the spirit I should like to see prevail throughout this country. Let every man,—whether he works with his head or his hands, and no matter what his occupation—not sit down and curse the Government, local or Dominion, or curse somebody else, but get busy and try and find some work to do that will provide him with a living whether he works with his head or his hands. Let every man try and assist the country to carry on, and if we all do that, there will be no necessity for unemployment insurance.

In other words, I object most strongly to any plan whereby the workers will keep the drones. There is too much of that now. It is the workers that pay the taxation of this country, no matter what form the taxation may take. That is why I am surprised to see sometimes in this House some honourable members attack very strongly what they call "the interests." Some man was talking to me very recently and blaming "the interests," as he called them. I asked him: "What interests? There is the farming interest," I said, "the manufacturing interest, the banking interest, the commercial interest; what interest are you talking about?" Well, he had only heard that "the interests" were to blame; he did not know much about it, and had nothing further to say. As a matter of fact we must all work together. We need all sorts of people in this country working together in sympathy, and doing the very best they can individually to make a success of the country, and that is why I hate to hear people who have made a success of their lives from a financial standpoint condemned because they have made a success. Personally, I have no jealousy at all of the man who makes a success of his life. Whether he comes from my section of the country or anywhere else in Canada I am proud of him. So far as the monied interests of the country are concerned, we have to have money to carry on. The successful man cannot take his money to bed with him. He has to invest it in some business in this country to make it produce. Therefore, while he may not be working with his hands, he may be working just as hard with his head to provide work for the people who work with their hands. You cannot separate the interests of the so-called labouring classes in this country,—that is, those who work with their hands,—from the interests of the capitalists, who provide the capital which furnishes the material on which the workers labour. So far as I personally am concerned, I think we members of Parliament have undertaken a serious responsibility when we come to this House, and it is our duty, at least, I think it is my duty, to investigate carefully any legislation that is proposed, no matter from what source, and if we think it is wise legislation, it is our duty to support it.

Thank Heaven, I am not so partisan that I cannot see good in the other fellow, and I see no reason at all, so far as benefit to the country is concerned, why this Government should dissolve and go to the country. On the other hand, I can see a great many reasons at the present time why they should not. In the first place, the country is still more or less in a chaotic state so far as business is concerned. Take unemployment, for instance. You could not make any of these men believe that it was not the fault of the Government that they are unemployed. So far as I am concerned I do not believe it is the fault of the Government in any shape or form.

Now as to the tariff. I believe, and always have believed before I came to this House, when I was a private citizen struggling for my existence, that a reasonable tariff that will protect the industries of this country to a reasonable extent is the only proper thing for Canada. I am interested in farming to a certain extent myself, and I want to say right here that for me the local market is much better than any foreign market, for the instant my goods get out of my sight they are out of my control, and I do not know what may be the final result. There are some items in the tariff schedules at the present time that, in my judgment, are too high; they are unnecessary for the manufacturer. I know something about manufacturing, and when I say that there are some items that are too high and unnecessary for the protection of the manufacturer, I am saying what I know to be absolutely correct. In the first place, if the manufacturer has too high a protection it gets him into a slovenly way of doing business. He does not, to use the common expression, "get down to brass tacks." That is, he does not organize and systematize his business so as to be in a position to compete successfully. Therefore, I am opposed to too high a protection on any line of goods. In days gone by, along in the 80's, it may have been necessary to maintain a rather high tariff for our then infant industries, because it is a difficult thing to start a manufacturing industry. I know of nothing more difficult, because for the first four or five years it is all costs. You can get your company organized, you can get your manager, but it is a guess whether he will make a success or not. You can get your office staff and your help together, but you have got to introduce your goods from one end of Canada to the other. Now, we have a population of only about eight millions, spread over a territory extending three thousand miles, and it is absolutely impossible to introduce your goods from one end of the country to the other under two years. You must engage at least two very capable men to cover that territory in a year, and you have to pay their salaries and expenses, which are not very light I assure you. And after you have covered the country and got your agents appointed, you will find that half of them are not satisfactory and you have to cover the same ground over again.

It is the hardest thing in the world to start a progressive manufacturing industry. You cannot possibly make any money at the outset; if you make your expenses for the first four or five years you are doing remarkably well. It then depends entirely upon the ability of your management and the economic way in which you produce your goods. The tariff may assist you to a certain extent. In my experience I have found a great fallacy to exist in the country in the claim that all manufacturers add the tariff to the cost of their goods. I know intimately several manufacturing industries, and I know of none, so far as I am personally concerned, who consider the tariff in arriving at the cost of their goods or the prices they will put on them when they are offering them to the public. There are others with whom I am not so intimately acquainted—I know them only in a general way—who do take advantage of whatever protection the customs tax may afford them; but so far as my knowledge goes, they are very much in the minority.

I do not know that there are any other clauses in the Speech from the Throne to which I am opposed, except the one I have mentioned. Let me repeat that the more you force the workers of the country to keep those who are not willing to work, the more people you will find that are not willing to work. And after all it is the workers that pay the taxes, no matter in what form they are imposed. If it is an income tax you have to have over a certain income before you are obliged to pay taxes. If it is customs, unles you are earning you certainly are not buying very many imported goods, except on credit, and there is a limit to that, because a merchant is not going to carry on very long unless you pay him. I have only this to emphasize, that we members of Parliament, elected to represent the people, have a serious duty to perform. Personally, so far as party politics are concerned, I am not prejudiced in any way, and I do not think that the people expect us to vote on any question purely and simply from a partisan standpoint. I do think, however, that they expect us to vote from a business point of view. We may have differences of opinion in our ideas of business, and it would be hard to get any dozen men gathered together who would absolutely agree on all lines of business; but we can generally come to a reasonable conclusion as to what is in the interests of the country at large and what is merely selfish interest. We members of Parliament are not here to promote selfish interests; we are elected to safeguard and further the interests of the country at large and of the people as a whole. I have seen no reason advanced in the newspapers and heard none uttered so far in this House why this Government has not a perfect right to continue functioning and why it cannot legislate for the interests of the people just as well as any other government which you could possibly elect at the present time.

Mr. ANDREW ROSS McMASTER (Brome): I wish, first, to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address, both of whom well acquitted themselves of the task imposed upon them. I should be glad to congratulate, in his personal capacity, the Prime Minister, but I hesitate to do so for two reasons: first, he has left the Chamber, and secondly, my own leader's experience in congratulating met with a shabby reception. Perhaps it might be just as well to go to the heart of the question. I am aware that hon. members have listened through all the long hours of this afternoon to addresses, and it must therefore be difficult to inject interest into the debate. But before we go further let me make a few observations concerning the remarks made by the last speaker (Mr. Nesbitt). It is true that that gentleman has been taken at a disadvantage. This Government, on this second day of the debate, had almost stopped functioning when he stepped into the breach. Is this indicative of the fact that this Government is to be maintained in power by Unionists who previously called themselves Liberals? I trust not. There were eighteen men on the other side of the House when the Prime Minister was about to move the adjournment of the debate, in order perhaps to give members a greater and larger opportunity for preparing themselves for the festivities of the evening, when my hon. friend jumped into the breach. What was his contribution to the debate? He took a text against the investigation of unemployment insurance, and then he went everywhere in a truly apostolic manner preaching the gospel of reaction. He first of all stated that he was against the War-time Elections Act, and then, by a use of a logic which I cannot understand, said: Well, the Election Act has been repealed and I do not propose to cast out the Government or help to have them cast out: that Government was elected by an Act which I denounced when it was proposed and when it was passed, and which I denounce now. That was a dishonest Act, in my opinion; and if this Government came into power through it, why should they not be turned out? Is it not the business of hon. members to turn them out? I think it is.

His next contribution, Mr. Speaker, was to denounce progressive legislation. When he did so he looked across at the Progessive party or Farmers' party—that party which the Prime Minister calls "the opposition situated angularly opposite"—but that portion of His Majesty's loyal opposition did not applaud his remarks to any great extent. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Nesbitt) is against unemployed insurance. I wonder if he ever realizes the feeling of a workman—an honest workman, perhaps an unskilled workman—who is working day by day, and week by week, and does not know whether his job is going to last over the next week. If the hon. gentleman could realize the feeling of that honest workman he would not denounce in such unsparing terms unemployment insurance. The hon. gentleman properly says that workmen should not reduce output. Neither they should, Mr. Speaker. But isn't it a temptation for a man to make the job spin out as long as he can if he feels that perhaps the next Saturday he will be paid off, and will not have the wherewithal to buy food for his wife and children? For, although, in our civilization we have enormously increased the powers of production it is a matter of fact that vast majority of mankind, in the industrial centres at least, live week by week on their weekly wages. Therefore when the Government propose the innocuous measure of examining the question, surely my hon. friend might let them do so without raising his voice in advance against the proposition. Everybody must work hard. Ah, yes! and how well that came from a member who confessed he was one, if not two, days late in coming to his job here in Ottawa.

We have the infant industry proposal or policy. Ah, these infant industries! How certain types of men cherish them to their breast. They have to cherish the infant industries to their breast because those industries have never been able to be weaned and they are always asking for some special favour, some special privilege. I presume my hon. friend is quite in accord with that part of the Speech from the Throne which said the protective principle is to be maintained. My hon. friend is not prejudiced as far as party politics are concerned. He should know because he has sat on both sides of the House. Apparently he has been just as comfortable on one side as on the other but he has no intention of moving from where he now sits. Let me, Mr. Speaker, without the slightest heat or the slightest unkindness, say that I believe he is well situated where he is, and that he would be no addition, no help, to the forces of progress and democracy in this country. A speech of a very different sort was delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). The Minister spoke at great length but he is always interesting; and the fact that the debate was almost breaking down before the hon. gentleman from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) arose, shows plainly why the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke at such great length. The Minister dealt with the League of Nations. It was a rather interesting thing to see that his remarks concerning that great attempt—and let us pray heaven that successful and hopeful attempt—was applauded as vigourously, if not more vigourously, on this side than it was on the other. Of course one reason was that—indicative of the feeling of the country—there were more members sitting on this side than there were on the other. I have nothing to say in criticism of the Minister's remarks about the League of Nations, I heartily approve of what he said in that connection. We all trust and pray that some way of settling international disputes may be brought forward, and may go into effect, different from a settlement by force of arms and by the slaying of men the majority of whom had nothing to do with the making of the quarrel—for it is men of over forty-five who make wars, and it is youths of under twenty-five who fight them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Government—for really I have said nothing very unkind about them so far—would, at this stage, consent to adjourn the debate until to-morrow. We have now reached the hour of almost a quarter to six.

An Hon. MEMBER: Is the hon. gentleman tired out?

Mr. McMASTER: As a matter of fact he is not a bit tired out. That reminds me of something I forgot to mention in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). If the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) will remember, his opposition to the way in which the votes were cast under the Soldiers' Voting Bill was almost as strong as his remarks in connection with the War Times Election Act. We all remember the vivifying moments in the Chamber when a controversy arose between the member for Brantford and the member for North Oxford as to the manner in which the soldiers' votes were counted in the last election.

On motion of Mr. McMaster, the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 17, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Statement of superannuation and retiring allowances in the Civil Service from January 1, 1920, to December 31, 1920.—Sir Henry Drayton.

Fifty-third Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.—Hon. C. C. Ballantyne.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Wednesday, February 16.

Mr. ANDREW ROSS McMASTER (Brome) (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, I must first thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), who, in the temporary absence from the Chamber yesterday of the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), was leading the House between half past five and six o'clock, for his kindness in calling it six o'clock when it was only 5.45, in order that I might have a better opportunity of connected discourse.

I think it must have struck the members of this House and the people of this country that no serious attempt has so far been made by speakers on your right, Sir, to advance any argument against the amendment to the Address proposed by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. King). We had yesterday, as I have already said, a most interesting and inspiring address upon the League of Nations, but really no attempt was made to answer the resolution which preceded from this side of the House. So I am therefore driven back to discuss the remarks made by the Prime Minister, and this to the best of my poor ability I shall endeavour to do.

The Prime Minister takes this position. He says: This House was elected by a majority of the electors some few years ago; we have a majority in the House, and as long as we have a majority in the House, elected by a majority of the constituencies in this country, I propose to carry on. That, as I understand it, is the constitutional position which he takes. Now, first of all, this vote will show, and not until the votes are counted will it be demonstrated whether the Prime Minister has a majority of the votes in this House. That is something yet to be ascertained.

Secondly, has the Prime Minister a majority of the votes in this country? Why, just before the last election there was an Election Act passed for the purpose of disfranchising all those who might be suspected of political tendencies against the Prime Minister and his party, and of doubling up all those votes that would likely be in their favour. Soldiers' wives, soldiers' mothers and soldiers' sisters were all given the vote to the exclusion of other people just as deserving, and I remember in my riding noting with some amusement that soldiers' sweethearts were not given the vote, because although a soldier under our law can have only one wife he might have, and often had, many sweethearts. But that, after all, although important, is not as important an another point which I propose to prove before the House, and which I believe will be accepted by all unbiassed minds, whether in the Chamber or outside of it.

The proposition which I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, is this: That there was at the time of the last general election an undertaking made by and on behalf of the Government that it would, if returned to power, only hold office for the time of the war and during demobilization. There was the agreement made, and I propose to prove it out of the mouths of ministers of the Crown at that time. Hon. Mr. Carvell, who now occupies the position of chairman of the Railway Board, was a Unionist minister from the province of New Brunswick. During the course of one of the sessions of 1919 the question of the formation of the Union Government came up, and this is what Mr. Carvell said:

> I can only say that when I entered this Government—I am not going over the very, very long and somewhat unpleasant conditions which existed between the month of April and October 1917, possibly another occasion may arise when they can be discussed—I did so after the most mature deliberation, which many of my good old friends know all about, and nobody knows so well as does my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's—I did so for one specific purpose and for a specified time. The purpose I am happy to say, has been achieved. The time has not yet expired. During the election in the Province of New Brunswick I issued a letter to my constituents and to the people of our Province setting forth the fact that the Government was to be of an equal number of former Conservatives and former Liberals, for the purpose of carrying on the war and finding recruits for our army, and that it would continue for the duration of the war and a reasonable time thereafter for demobilization. Demobilization has not yet been completed, and so far as I am concerned my contract has not expired.

Just as soon as demobilization was completed Mr. Carvell resigned from the Government because he regarded his contract as having expired.

Mr. P. F. MARTIN (Halifax): What followed when his contract was terminated?

Mr. McMASTER: He was given the high quasi-judicial office of chairman of the Railway Commission, and his appointment to that office emphasizes the value of the citation which I have just made. Now, we have such a thing in this country as ministerial responsibility, and that responsibility is a joint one. When a minister of the Crown makes a declaration on a question of high importance such as was the question mentioned in this letter, he binds not only himself but his colleagues as well. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) was one of the colleagues of Mr. Carvell when he made that statement, and he was bound thereby. That is the statement of the present Prime Minister as well as of Mr. Carvell, and it was a direct undertaking of the present Prime Minister that this Government—he says that the present Government is a continuation of the last; that is his contention—would, as soon as demobilization was over, cease to exist, and an appeal would, of course as a matter of consequence, be made to the people. There were others who spoke in the same language. I quote from a speech of the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) delivered at Winnipeg on October 27, 1917. Said he:

> I have not sacrificed my liberalism. My liberal principles are part of myself and will stay with me until I die. But this is not the time to quarrel over political view-points on domestic issues. The whole issue, the sole reason for the union of parties is to win the war.

Before I go further I wish to protest, as I have protested before in this House and elsewhere, against the assumption that there was any difference in the desire to win the war between people who were

Liberals and those who were Conservatives at the time of the last election. We differed as to methods but not as to aim and object. And the oft-repeated assertion, repeated at that time and, I am sorry to say, even since, that it was a question between the Union Government, to win the war, and the Liberals, to abandon the boys in the trenches, was one of the most ungenerous and wicked perversions of the truth ever perpetrated by a political party for their own political ends. Its ungenerousness was shown by the fact that among the Liberal leaders of the day was the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland), who was languishing in a German prison. Besides that, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), Mr. Graham, Mr. Oliver, all had boys at the front who then or shortly after were to fill the graves of heroes who had died for their country. The sons of our friend the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) and of Mr. E. M. McDonald, as well as those of many other Liberals, were fighting in the trenches then. The member for Maisonneuve suffered the loss of his only boy. But still we were taunted at that time that we were not in favour of winning the war. How wicked was that statement is shown also in the fact that it divided race from race, province from province, religion from religion. I remember some sessions ago that the hon. gentleman who now occupies the high position of Prime Minister, stated on the floor of the House, when the Liberals were laughing at some unconsciously amusing thing he had said, that our interest in the war was measured by our laughter. I protested then, and I protest to-day when he says that the great issue was one of winning the war. We differed in regard to methods, it is true, but I would not have this House forget that the method proposed was one of selective conscription, and that after this method had been put into force, only a few months had elapsed before the same Mr. Carvell, one of the leading members of the Government at that time, said that by a round-about, clumsy method they had been able to secure only 30,000 men.

Now, after this digression, made necessary by the repetition of what I regard as an unvenerable falsehood, I return to my argument as to the understanding between the parties. I quote again from that former champion of Western Liberalism, the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization. He spoke at Vancouver on the 31st of October, and in the Vancouver Sun he is reported as having said:

> I'm for plain speaking, and I intend so to speak. I am a Liberal, and when all is over I intend to remain a Liberal, because I believe in Liberal principles. I have been fighting Toryism all my life, and I propose after the war to take up that fight just where I left off.

We have heard of the warrior taking his rest with his martial cloak around him. It is about time that this warrior of Western Liberalism took off his cloak, and began to fight. But so far we have not seen any symptoms of his entering upon the engagement. But not only were these statements made by those men high in the councils of the Unionist party, but the people so understood. Let me read to you, Mr. Speaker, the undertaking which was signed by those members of the primaries in Vancouver, who were voting for delegates to the Unionist Convention and who nominated one of my friends at whom I am now looking, the member for one of the seats of Vancouver City:

> I, the undersigned, do hereby pledge my support and influence to the present Unionist Government and the policy enunciated by them, i. e., the immediate and continuous enforcement of the Military Service Act, 1917, the mobilization of all our resources, the taxation of wealth, and the prevention of profiteering, and I agree to support the candidate selected at the Convention.

That was the view expressed by people connected with the formation of the Union Government; they were the views held by supporters of the Union Government in British Columbia. Now, let us proceed to another province, and again let us quote from the words of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. He is reported in the Regina Leader of Dec. 17 as saying:

> Referring to his own position, Mr. Calder said that it had been suggested that he had been duped by the Tories and that he would stand as a cipher when he got down to Ottawa. I want to tell you, he said, that Calder has not been duped by the Tories. I have never stood in the position of a cipher, and I do not propose to do so now. I have a very clear conception of what I am going into the Union Government for, and what I am going to do. With reference to the suggestion that it was still the same old Borden Governement and the Government of the big interests, Mr. Calder asked his audience whether they thought it could be the same Government with F. B. Carvell in it and with Mr. Maclean as a member, and whether it could be the same Government which included Alexander Crerar and General Mewburn; and I want to tell you that you don't know Mewburn yet. He is a fine fellow.

Some Hon. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: It is a matter of interest, Mr. Speaker, to know that the member for East Hamilton, so happily characterized in that paragraph, has left the Union Government; that the member for Marquette has left the Union Government; that Mr. Carvell has left the Union Government; I am not sure whether Mr. A. K. Maclean has yet resumed his seat on our side, I know his seat is here and waiting for him. An hon. gentleman beside me states he is going to be here.

Now I know it is somewhat tiresome when a lawyer cites evidence—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not, Mr. Speaker, expect the gentlemen sitting to your right to enjoy the reading of that evidence. As a matter of fact I am not speaking for their pleasure, but I trust for the country's profit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: Sir Thomas White, speaking at Brockville, said—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the member for Leeds.

Mr. McMASTER: No, I understand he is not the member for Leeds. I understand he has accepted an office of emolument, and I am perfectly in order when I refer to him, with all the dignity that should be attached to a knight, as Sir Thomas White.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must refer to him as the member for Leeds, and I hope he will adhere to the well-established rule in that regard with respect to every hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMASTER: I understand that I am not allowed to discuss the Speaker's ruling. His Honour will admit that I am one of the most obedient of the flock over which he presides, but he will allow me to state that the constitutional authorities differ somewhat from the view which he takes. However, the gentleman who occupied some time ago the position of member for Leeds, and whose occupancy of that position is now a matter of dispute and discussion, said on the 17th November, 1917:

> Union Government is an accomplished fact today. It was born of the will of the Canadian people, the majority of whom have long and earnestly desired that party strife should cease, that National Government should be formed for the period of the war.

The Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie), speaking at Guelph on the 2nd October, 1917, said:

> I believe in an union at the present time of all political forces for the prosecution of the war, irrespective of all political parties. In the past I have been looked upon as a strong party man but since May last I have publicly and privately advocated a cessation of party strife, and I intend to continue in this course until the end of the war. It must not, however, be supposed that by pursuing this course that I have changed my Liberal principles, I have not done so.

Mr. DUFF: The war is still on.

Mr. McMASTER: Again, there was a meeting of Conscriptionist Liberals held in Hamilton, Ontario, on November 2, 1917, where the following motion was passed:

> That whereas, since the notice calling this convention was sent out a Union Government has been formed in which Liberals throughout the Dominion have joined this convention recording its belief that the formation of a Union Government for the duration of the war was highly desirable and in the best interests of Canada, and believing that thereby the share of Canada in the conduct of the present world war will be best served and the Government of the country most effectively and satisfactorily carried on during the period of the war, expresses its approval of the action of the Liberal members of the present Union Government in entering the same.

I do not think I should have to labour the point any more. It is absolutely true that the Liberals—and there were a certain number, a large number—who supported Union Government in 1917, did so under the direct promise, under the direct statement, that they were supporting a government for the duration of the war. I would not give any narrow or technical interpretation to these words "during the duration of the war." I would be prepared to extend that to cover demobilization. To be perfectly fair I would give the expression the largest interpretation. The Prime Minister's argument was that the Government elected in 1917 differed in no way from the government of 1904, let us say, which was elected on the question of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The cases are not at all similar. Had there been a sharp line of division, let us say within the Liberal party, on the question of the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and if Sir Wilfred Laurier gone to gentlemen opposite and asked their concurrence for the special purpose of putting through legislation for the building of that railway, then the conditions might have been somewhat similar. The Prime Minister is not comparing things that are the same in nature. The only political situation we have had approaching that which confronted the Canadian people at the time of the election in 1917 was the election in Canada prior to Confederation when Brown and certain Liberals of Ontario—quite a number of Liberals of Ontario—joined Macdonald and certain Tories of both Ontario and Quebec for the purpose of putting through Confederation, although Dorion and other Liberals in Quebec opposed him. That is a political situation which approximates somewhat the political situation of 1917. And what happened then? It is very, very interesting, Mr. Speaker. As soon as Confederation was an assured fact Brown resigned, but Howland and McDougall did not—they hung onto office. The name of Brown will be admired and revered in this country after generations have passed who have forgotten that there ever was a Howland or a McDougall. We have with us today some Howlands and some McDougalls, although they bear different names. The Prime Minister said yesterday that the aim and objects of his Government are the same as those of the preceding administration. Well, if I wanted to be unkind I might admit it. I might say that the aim and objects of Union government were to retain power, and the aim and objects of this Government are to retain power. But let us be kinder. What were the declared and ostensible objects of Union government? The declared and ostensible objects of the government were to carry on, in a manner which they judged efficacious, the fighting of the war which was to maintain democracy and to crush privilege and autocracy. The declared aim of this Government is to hold on to office—to maintain autocracy and to maintain the protective principle in the tariff, which is to maintain privilege and autocracy as well.

In passing let me call attention to an error of fact into which the memory of the Prime Minister led him. In his remarks he stated that the Government had had large majorities on every vote last session. I see a ray of hope there, Mr. Speaker, because if the Prime Minister thinks a majority of five large, what sort of majority is he counting upon in this vote? If my recollection is right, the Government majority last session was rarely more than twenty-five, and on one important occasion it dropped to five. But, after all, for a party which went into power with a majority of about seventy, majorities in the twenties or under were certainly small majorities.

Now, let us come to another phase of the subject. The Prime Minister has formed a Government which he describes as a National Liberal and Conservative Government—to put it in more popular phrase, a National Grit and Tory Government, which is about as wise and reasonable as "National Wet and Dry Government." I speak without the slightest personal experience, but as a matter of fact I understand it is quite possible for those who have been very dry to sometimes get very wet, and the day after the change they are very, very dry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I hear sounds of "hear, hear" from the other side. I am glad my confirmation comes from that direction rather than from my own side of the House.

The Prime Minister has arranged this Government with its long name of National Liberal and Conservative Government, and he has induced to join that Government the hon. member for Yarmouth and Clare (Mr. Spinney).

Now, what is a political party, Mr. Speaker? A political party is an association of men who have joined themselves together for the purpose of advancing the public interest of certain principles of policy which they hold in common. That is the sense of Burke's definition, and I think it is as good a definition as we have of what a political party is. What is the Cabinet? The Cabinet is the executive committee of such a party, chosen from men who have seats in this or the other House. It stands to reason that if men form a party they have to have similar views—not, of course, on all questions, that would be impossible, but on the main leading questions before the people a fortiori a Cabinet must have like similarity of views, and a Cabinet which has men in it of diverse views cannot give sound, constitutional, strong government to a country.

Now, if there is one thing that the Prime Minister has enunciated it has been the protective principle. It is true there has not been that same bold front presented in all parts of the country. When he visited the beautiful Eastern Townships—part of which I have the honour to represent—he made a speech in the thriving industrial town of Sherbrooke and emphasised the maintenance of duties,—in other words, the maintenance of protective principles. When he got out to Winnipeg, after speaking about tariff revision and the report to be made thereon by the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), he uttered a pious hope that the duties would be lowered. As far as my recollection serves me, there was no such pious hope expressed by him in the city of Sherbrooke. But, after all, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been a pretty consistent protectionist.

Now, let us hear what his Minister without portfolio from the province of Nova Scotia (Mr. Spinney) said as late as last year, within a few months of his joining the Government of the Prime Minister. He stated:

> I can only say that I regret that at this stage my hon. friend found it necessary to introduce his amendment, which comes at a very inopportune time. It has for its purpose, I assume, the downfall of the Union Government, or their return to the country to get a fresh mandate from the people. I do not wish to criticise, but as I am an honest follower of the Union party, I must point out this fact, that since they have been in power I have followed them as a free trade or rather as a revenue tariff Liberal. I am that to-day, but I do not believe that any tariff for other than revenue purposes could be satisfactorily dealt with in this country at the present time.
> Our progressive friends may declare for free trade. They have come out for free trade, but I do not see where they propose to raise the enormous revenue to carry out the heavy responsibilities resting upon this country to-day. It means raising between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000 at least. You cannot get that by direct taxation in this country. The people of Canada are not educated up to that. Neither are the financial resources of the country capable of responding to direct taxation. To my mind the idea is absolutely absurd. We have to raise a certain percentage of our necessary revenue through customs taxation, entirely aside from any question of protection. The Minister of Finance has maintained his reputation for honesty, and I believe he fully intends to give this country what he has promised in the way of tariff revision. When that revision comes in, if it should have any earmarks of protection, if this Parliament is in existence at that time, they can bank on my opposing any such tariff.

The hon. member for Yarmouth and Clare, the minister without portfolio from the province of Nova Scotia, need not wait until the Budget comes down; he has his answer in the Address from the Throne, for that address consecrates the principle of protection which he pledged himself to oppose. There is just one of two things for my hon. friend to do; he should tell us that he has honestly changed his opinion and no longer stands for the principle of tariff for revenue, but for the principle of tariff for protection, and after telling us that he should go down by the sea and ask the men in his constituency whether they approve of his change of mind.

Mr. DUFF: They would not.

Mr. McMASTER: If he does not do that, then it is for the Prime Minister to explain how, when he is nailing the colours of protection to the mast, he invites a free trader, such as the hon. member for Yarmouth and Clare, to form one of his Cabinet. I grant that the member for Yarmouth and Clare brings respectability, high business integrity and a good name to the Cabinet of which my right hon. and learned friend is Prime Minister. But I say that it is constitutionally improper, and that it is a piece of camouflage when he attempts to deceive the public by window dressing his Cabinet with the name of the minister without portfolio from the province of Nova Scotia for the purpose of justifying the sign over the door—"Liberal," as well as "National" and "Conservative."

Mr. SPINNEY: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the hon. member a question? Does he stand for the policy of the Liberal party between 1896 and 1911?

Mr. McMASTER: I stand, Mr. Speaker, for the policy of the Liberal party as laid down in the tariff plank of the Great National Liberal Convention held in August, 1919. I would say with all kindness and courtesy that what the people are most interested in at the present time in regard to this matter is not where the member for Brome stands, but where the member for Yarmouth stands.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Just tell us.

Mr. SPINNEY: In time; do not be impatient.

Mr. McMASTER: No doubt explanations will be in order and may be forthcoming. It would be interesting to know whether the member for Yarmouth has converted the Prime Minister to his fiscal views or whether the Prime Minister has converted the member for Yarmouth to his.

The next item of Cabinet reconstruction about which I would like to talk for a few moments is the entry of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Wigmore). The Prime Minister was a little facetious the other day, or attempted to be a little facetious, at the expense of the leader of the Opposition in connection with the election at St. John. I was there and I know something about it. My hon. and learned friend the Prime Minister endeavoured to draw comfort from the fact that he had been able to elect a man in the city of St. John. But there is not much comfort in that for the Prime Minister, because when the Minister of Customs went before the good people of St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert, he said, Mr. Speaker, —and oh, it burned itself into my consciousness, — "I stand not as a Liberal and not as a Conservative. I stand first in the interests of the port of St. John; next I stand in the interests of the people of St. John; then I stand in the interests of the province of New Brunswick, and after that of the Dominion of Canada." Now, this is not a free paraphrase of what the hon. gentleman said; I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is almost verbatim from the speech which he made shortly before I arrived in that city—where the river flows both ways in the short space of twenty-four hours. However, lest what I have said be regarded as unfair, let me read from one of the papers supporting the Minister, the St. John Standard of Friday, September 10. It says:

What can Dr. Emery—

Dr. Emery was the Liberal candidate.

—do for the city that Mr. Wigmore cannot? Can he do anything at all? And if he were by any chance to find himself in Parliament representing St. John, what amount of weight would his representations carry? If the electors of St. John were to turn Mr. Wigmore down, then there would be an end, once and for all, of any hopes there may be of getting any more work done on the harbour or anything else that the city is interested in, from the present Government; and as this Government is likely to be in power for several years yet,—

They are not too hopeful, those people down in St. John.

—St. John cannot afford to shut herself out in the cold indefinitely. St. John won't do it; her citizens will rally to the support of Mr. Wigmore with even more enthusiasm than they did three years ago—

As a matter of fact, they rallied to his support only to the extent of about half the enthusiasm they had demonstrated two or three years before.

—and he will see that they get what they want for their city, and that its shipping facilities shall be such as will enable it to handle the ever-increasing traffic that is coming and going through it year after year. Citizens, stand by Mr. Wigmore, and he will stand by the city.

It reminds me of the celebrated phrase in Pickwick Papers—"Pickwick and principle";—Wigmore and the harbour!

Other attempts Mr. Speaker, have been made at Cabinet reconstruction. We have had court laid to the province of Quebec.

Mr. DUFF: Fishing expeditions.

Mr. McMASTER: The Prime Minister has developed a great love for the province of Quebec, and the province of Quebec has said: "Oh, Arthur, this is so sudden." And he has answered: "I never told my love, but let concealment, like a worm in the bud, feed on my damask cheek." I am glad the Prime Minister has spoken kind words of the people of the province from which I come and of the race to which I do not belong, which I love. My only regret is that he waited until he was forty-five years of age and Prime Minister of this country before expressing, at least audibly, any such sentiments. But better late than never; So, fishing operations have begun under the control—under the initiative almost—of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. (Mr. Ballantyne). Since the House rose in July last, there has been fishing, but it has been hook-and-line fishing, because you see, Mr. Speaker, the fish can be landed only in a boat with somewhat slender rod of a by-election. The tackle is somewhat light—in fact, the rod much too frail. We hear that after great efforts, one fish has been hooked but not landed in the boat. The tackle was too weak; the rod was not strong enough, and the poor fish is in this position—we often see it; a man is fishing; he has left his landing net at home; his tackle is not strong enough to lift the fish into the boat; he is drowning the fish; the mouth of the fish is above water, but the fish is not in the boat. It is desperately hard on the fish and of little profit to the fisherman. Let me say this to my right hon. friends: situated immediately opposite it is not a very elevated thing to be trying to bribe, by portfolios, your political opponents to enter your Cabinet. It is not what should be done. It has not been successful; I hope the attempt will be given up, But—and I say it with pride for the province from which I come—although these temptations have been held out to man after man on this side of the House, as yet there is no one from our side in the Cabinet which is presided over so ably by—

An hon. MEMBER: What Cabinet?

Mr. McMASTER: Was there a remark made? If so I did not catch it. I was referring to the Cabinet presided over by the present Prime Minister. I thought there was a remark made, Mr. Speaker; I am sorry if I have made a mistake. Perhaps it was a whisper—sotto voce.

The Prime Minister has endeavoured to taunt the Liberal party on its tariff attitude. He says that it is hard for him to find where the Liberal party stands on the tariff. If he has not already a copy, he has only to apply to the National Liberal organization and he will be given, with that liberality of hand which distinguishes us, as many copies as he likes of the proceedings of the Liberal Convention of 1919. The Liberals, in convention assembled, laid down a tariff platform. That tariff platform is the policy of the Liberal party. By that platform we stand, and by that platform we shall win.

I do not purpose at this time imposing upon the House any long tariff discussion. I see the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) looking at me. Ah, how well I remember that day in the summer of 1915 at Calgary when I made a speech in which I said that the tariff could not be wiped out over night and that we must proceed with caution, how he rose and berated me as a friend of the protectionist manufacturers of the East. I did not go quickly enough for him then. What has come over the spirit of his dream that he sits where he sits now? There are five main things that have to be considered in the tariff. There is the relief of the consumer. There is the directing of the capital and labour of the country into channels where they will bring forth the greatest economic return. There is the freeing of the people from the control of trusts and combines. Those are the three great objectives of a tariff revision. Then we have to consider the fact that for many years we have had this system of protection, and care and prudence must be used in reducing the tariff; and we must also consider the question of revenue. Those are the five great things we have in mind. Those are the five great things which have been looked after, taken care of, provided for, in the tariff policy of the Liberal party.

This is an important debate because upon it may rest the fate of the Ministry. It is a matter for the Prime Minister to consider whether for his own personal political fate he should refuse to go to the country. I suppose all thoughtful men in this Chamber will admit that Parliamentary institutions are on trial; that there are in the world to-day many people who say that Parliamentary institutions have not worked out as they should have done and that recourse should be had to direct action.

The other day—when I say the other day I am referring to what really happened several months ago—there was a rumour in Great Britain that war was to be engaged in with Russia, and the labour leaders in the Old Land said: We will have no war with Russia; if you bring on war with Russia, we will down tools; we will stop the machine. With their opposition to war with Russia I am in most complete accord, but with the idea that one section of the community should, by economic force, be able to impose its will upon the rest of us, I have no sympathy whatever. But there are only two ways in which men can be governed—either by force or by their consent—and in order to have men governed by their consent, there must be an organization for giving that consent, that opinion, proper expression, there must be a maintenance of some sort of Parliament; and any one who attempts to make Parliament unresponsive to the will of the people does so at the risk of encouraging direct action. I have no dislike in my heart for the Prime Minister; I admire his good qualities; but with his political practices and policies I am at eternal war. I believe he sits there a usurper, and I would remind him that no usurper has ever for long successfully controlled the destinies of a British country. There was one great usurper—his name was Cromwell—and he did a great deal for his country. He made the name of England known and respected on land and sea; but after he disappeared, his power immediately became as naught, and we had the Restoration with all its attendant ills. I would ask the Prime Minister to read the history of leaders in all democratic countries who held on to office once their right to office had terminated. Did not every one of them suffer and suffer badly for having done so? I believe history will show that I am right.

Just in conclusion, I have a word to submit in connection with the Liberal Unionists who yet sit on the side of the Government. With us they are or have been the inheritors of a great tradition and a great name. Every man of them got vote after vote, tens of votes, hundreds of votes, thousands of votes, on the distinct understanding that his mandate was for the war and for the war alone. If they sit there, if they support this Government, then they break their pledged word to the electors of the country who supported them on that understanding. They can do that, but it will be wrong. The other day I heard a story of that great explorer, missionary, scientist, David Livingstone. He fell sick in the centre of Africa; he was carried to the coast by his African bearers, and when he reached the coast there was an English ship that would have taken him home to glory, honour, safety and health. But he had given his word to those Africans that he would take them back home again to their native village, and he left health, life and the opportunity for glory; he kept his word to those Africans, and they bore him back into mid-Africa to die because he was a man of his word, because his plighted word to him was above everything else. The fate of this Government is in the hands of those men who formerly called themselves Liberals, who sit behind the Government. It will be for them to say whether there should be an immediate appeal to the people or whether this Government should maintain itself in power after having secured power under an understanding that its mandate would cease with the war.

Mr. LOUIS JOSEPH GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, every member who rises in his seat in this House to address his fellow-members generally asks for the indulgence of those who are about to listen to his remarks. This is specially true to-day on account of the special circumstances I am in, and I shall not even wait for the indulgence of my fellow-members, I ask for it at the very outset of my remarks.

I should not like to be discourteous towards the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMaster). He has spoken in a very light manner indeed of the procedure adopted by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government to secure representation in the Cabinet. I should not like to follow him in the same vein, but I shall address a few remarks to that hon. gentleman. He concluded his address with an appeal to the Liberal members who are supporting the Government, so that dissolution of Parliament could be secured. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brome claims to be a Liberal, claims to love justice, claims to fight for fair play, and represents one of the constituencies of the province of Quebec. And yet he has the audacity to rise in this House and in the name of his constituents ask the Government to dissolve Parliament when, according to the constitution the province of Quebec is the pivot of Confederation, and when its last unit of representation was 30,080, while its unit of representation based on the next census will in view of the increase as shown by the records of our province be 40,000 dollars.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. GAUTHIER: Yes, some of my fellow members laugh when I speak of dollars. I would like those who laugh and those who smile to be able to stand where I stand to-day and fight the battle that I am fighting. Laughter and smiles won't stop me. The men who have tried to tame me know they cannot tame or break me. I was saying that our unit of representation based on the next census will be 40,000. Take simply the Island of Montreal, represented in this Parliament by twelve members, and having a population of more than 800,000. The city of Montreal will be entitled to twenty seats. And yet a member from this province asks the Liberals supporting the Government to consent to the House being dissolved.

My hon. friend has been talking of fish and bribery. I do not know what he means, and I will wait for his future explanation. But when he says that he is going to stand on the platform of the Liberal party as enacted in the National Liberal Convention held in Ottawa in the month of August 1919, I would remind the House that the only plank which was able to bear the weight of the hon. member for Brome was the plank of free trade.

But since that convention was held, the plank has been so much chopped up that now it does not carry the hon. member but he carries it, cut in pieces, in his vest pocket. May I remind the hon. gentleman who is still labouring under the misapprehensions with which he prefaced his remarks on the question of free trade and protection, that it is only last year the hon. gentleman discovered that the Liberal party in its fifteen years of power had always adhered to protection. It was a scene to be recorded in Hansard, Mr. Speaker. Many Liberal members were sitting around the table, and the hon. member for Brome was trying to commit his party to free trade. The meeting was presided over by that great old politician warrior who for fifteen years sat on the treasury benches as Minister of Finance in the Laurier Administration. My hon. friend the member for Brome was trying to induce the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) to commit himself to free trade and said "Well, does not the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's understand that the Liberal party is a party of free traders?" "Yes, yes," said the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's with his genial smile and in his highly cultured manner, "yes, yes, free trade is a nice theory." "But," said the member for Brome "we must have it." "Yes, yes," answered the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's," "In theory; but in practice, no." The hon. member for Brome was dumbfounded. He had still ringing in his ears all the speeches of the Liberal chieftain stating that the Liberals were for free trade. But he had not looked at the statute book. He did not realize until last year that when in power his party and my party adhered to the protectionist idea, as can be proven. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, I should not take up more time in discussing the hon. member for Brome. Perhaps in the course of my remarks I may have the pleasure of referring to him once more.

I come now to the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin). He issues a warning to the Government. He says: Do not talk tariff on the Address. Who is talking tariff on the Address? The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) stated that he was ready to discuss the tariff question. As a matter of fact, he said: Whenever our party comes back to power we will give this country a tariff identical with that of the fifteen years of Liberal Administration. Now what was the platform of that party if it was not protection? Mr. Speaker, when the Liberal party came into power in 1896 the platform of the National Liberal Convention of 1893 was still fresh in the minds of everybody. The Liberal leader at that time, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, called in to his assistance all the Liberal premiers of the different provinces of Canada, and we had in this country what will go down in our political history as the great Cabinet of Confederation. What happened, Sir? In spite of all the pledges for "free trade as they had it in England," and all the promises that the tariff should be a tariff for revenue only, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's had a tariff commission going around the country just as the present Government has had a commission going around the country.

And I do not understand why the member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) should ask the question, "Why a tariff question?" When the party which he supports had two commissions, one in 1897 and another in 1907. The fact is that this Government is following the same policy as the Liberals followed when they were in power. I admit that there were many articles on the free list; I do not remember the exact number, but speaking from memory I believe that there were at least 141 articles on the free list; and the duties were lower—on at least 118 articles coming from foreign countries into Canada. But there was a preferential duty accorded British industry. The first preferential duty was 25 per cent, and it was understood that it would be increased to 33 1-3 per cent. If my figures are correct the tariff of 1897 when brought down was an average tariff of 21 per cent. Now, in the devastation that follows war the countries that have suffered must import farm products from those countries that have continued to produce. The demand arising from South Africa after the war in that country arose about the same time as the preference was given by us to British industry, and these two combined caused a condition of expansion and development in Canada.

Here I desire to draw attention to a fact that tells many sad tales. In 1893 the Hon. Joseph Israel Tarte fought his Conservative friends. He threw down the gauntlet to his former associates to run in the County of L'Islet on the question of the Connolly Dry Dock Scandal. He was returned, to battle down the fortress of the Conservative party in this House, and finally brought Parliament to dissolution in 1896. Every man of my age who had the opportunity to fight in those days must remember the Hon. Mr. Tarte who, during the Campaign of 1896 had not enough money to pay his cab fare from one meeting to another. They must remember the hard work he did and I think they will recall the fact that he was rewarded in a sense, by being appointed Minister of Public Works. But the Liberals of that day, like the so-called Liberals of to-day, wanted to secure the scalp of Mr. Tarte and represented him as a Tory in a Liberal Government. In 1904—and here is the injustice of the thing—Mr. Tarte started a campaign preaching the increase of tariff duties, because in the meantime the British Preference had gone up to 33 1-3 per cent, and our industries were unable to compete. As I stand here, Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that the woollen industry of this country has been killed by the British Preference; but for the sake of the rest of the community we swallowed the Preference and the woollen industry went bankrupt. Seeing the danger with which this country was confronted, Mr. Tarte started a campaign to have the tariff raised; he preached the increase of protection. He was thrown out of the Cabinet, and in 1907, three years after his expulsion, this very party increased the tariff from 21 per cent to 29 per cent, the very thing which Mr. Tarte had been advocating. Listen to their speeches! They have saved the country! Yes, Sir, they saved the country—when they could not do otherwise. Imagine my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) speaking as he does, when he knows that for fifteen years the Liberal party had been committed to protection. Imagine his being the financial critic of the Opposition during a whole Parliament. God save that party! The Conservatives of this country have been committed to the principle of protection since 1878; and the proof that the Liberal party had a protective tariff is the fact that during the elections of 1911 the Tories said "let well enough alone." They were satisfied with the tariff at that time. What has happened since? Since 1911 the British Preference has been abolished. I do not believe that the present Government should be lauded for this. The tariff has been reduced to please the agrarian movement, and I do not believe either that the Government should be lauded on this account. Sir, let me make a declaration here and now: I have more respect for the representatives of the farmer and the labour elements because they are true to the doctrines they preach. There is a difference between this group on the cross benches and that other group, the Liberal group. The Liberals vary their declaration as they move from one parish to another, from one county to another, and from one province to another. The hon. gentleman who represents the county of Maisonneuve and at the same time the county of Gaspé has declared in the province of Quebec time and time again that he was a protectionist, that he always had been a protectionist, and that his party was one that adhered to the principle of protection. Yet he was present at the convention, where he spoke, and two rows behind him the hon. member for Brome could stand up and say: "I am a free trader; I am against protection"—this notwithstanding that his provincial leader called himself a protectionist to the core.

Well, Sir, if—as I believe and as I think will be admitted—the Liberal party when in power adhered to protection; and if the Liberal party, as has been stated by the member for North Cape Breton when brought back to power, is willing to give the country a tariff similar to that of the Liberal administration from 1896 to 1911, why should the Opposition now refuse to accept the paragraph in the speech from the Throne with respect to protection? Ah, they are trying to evade the point, they are trying to cloud the issue that is involved, they do not care about the other provinces. The Liberal party in this House numbers eighty-two members, and sixty-one of them come from the province of Quebec. In that province they control or are interested in certain newspapers, and they believe that through the influence of those journals they will be able to so mould public opinion as to ensure that the solid block of Liberal members from Quebec shall never be disintegrated. On this issue I am prepared to meet them, if not through the press on the public platform.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We will be there.

Other hon. MEMBERS: We will meet you.

Mr. GAUTHIER: To hear these hon. gentlemen one would imagine that I held the fate of the Government in my hands and that they were asking for dissolution from me. The answer I give them is that I promise to transfer their message to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government.

An hon. MEMBER: A good messenger

Mr. GAUTHIER: A messenger that the Liberal party was glad to have in its ranks for many years; a messenger who in their interest ran from one to another of the forty-five ridings in the district of Montreal and who has preached the gospel of Liberalism not only in Quebec but in New Brunswick, in Ontario and in the West; a messenger that my hon. friends can use no more; a messenger that they are willing still to be master of but who recognizes no master since his leader is dead.

Coming to the question of dissolution the leader of the Opposition wishes to know what mandate the Government has for remaining in office. Sir, I have always thought that according to sound constitutional doctrine a government was elected for the period prescribed by the law—that it was at liberty to shorten that period, but had no power to enlarge it. That is the letter of the law. What is the spirit of the law? It is that as long as a government has a majority in this Chamber it can remain in office, and many are the occasions when it should undoubtedly do so. Supposing the appeal made by the hon. member for Brome should be favourably received by Liberals who are now supporting the Government? Supposing for one moment that were to occur and that those thirty-eight Liberal members were to cross to the Opposition side? Would the leader of the Opposition when called into office be obliged to go to the country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sure.

Mr. GAUTHIER: No, he would have supporting him a majority of the members elected for this Parliament. Possibly he might take that course, but it is my firm belief that if such a thing happened he would not go to the country. He would not go to the country because if he did so in advance of the redistribution of seats following the taking of the census he would not remain in office for one single day. The West, as well as the province of Quebec, would clamour to have its rights; and no Prime Minister would be strong enough to withstand the clamour that would be raised by the province of Quebec supported by the other provinces.

But there is another consideration to be borne in mind. At the last session of Parliament the Opposition proposed an amendment to the Speech from the Throne declaring that the Government had no mandate and that it should dissolve Parliament and go to the people.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Did you support that amendment?

Mr. GAUTHIER: I did.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why have you changed your attitude then?

Mr. GAUTHIER: Do not be to precipitate. I will give my explanation and it will show the difference between the hon. members of the Opposition and myself. I will prove that I am consistent and that they are not. But inconsistency does not worry my hon. friends; they never were consistent. When the amendment declaring that the Government had no mandate had been debated and the division had disclosed beyond no doubt that it had sufficient majority to continue transacting the affairs of the country, what happened? Towards the close of the session a resolution increasing the indemnity of members was brought down and adopted. Did my hon. friends of the Opposition accept that increase? Yes, Sir, they did. Why did they accept it if the Government had no mandate? If their contention were true, they, as well as the Government and its supporters, improperly accepted money from the public treasury. But they accepted the increase of indemnity, and having done so they now say to the Government which granted it, "You have no mandate, get out." Last Session I voted in favour of the motion declaring the Government had no mandate, but I accepted the increase of indemnity because the majority decided otherwise and to that position I adhere.

Mr. LANCTOT: I did not benefit by the increase of indemnity.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I was going to make an exception with respect to my hon. friend; I should be very sorry not to do so. The only gentleman who stood up in this House and fought the increase of indemnity was the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctot). Of course, like the others, he pocketed the money, but he declared—and this is the declaration that I want to underline—that he would never profit by this increase, but would divide it equally between his two counties. I suppose that is what he intends to do. The auditors will audit the books, and they will report in due time.

Mr. LANCTOT: Mr. Speaker, will you permit me to offer an explanation?

Mr. GAUTHIER: Certainly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order in making an explanation at this stage. If he desires to submit a question to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) he may do so with the latter's consent.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The gentleman who wanted to correct stands corrected. The hon. member (Mr. McMaster) seemed to be very fond of precedents to show that this Government might remain in office. Of course, hon. members of the Opposition have stated that there is no precedent whatever for such retention of power. May I be permitted, Sir, to tell hon. members who come from my province that the only two precedents that can be quoted occurred in our own native province. In November, 1904, we had a provincial election there. The Premier at that time was the late Hon. S. N. Parent, and he had as one of his cabinet ministers Mr. Lomer Gouin. The election was fought in November, the cabinet of Mr. Parent was maintained, and the House was called upon to meet in January; but for fifteen days there were no sittings, because the members were fighting in groups, and finally Mr. Gouin got the best of it and Mr. Parent was murdered, politically. Is that a precedent? The Liberals still claim that Sir Lomer Gouin is the greatest premier we have ever had in our province, but that is the way he came into power. He had no mandate from the people; he had a mandate from the members of the House, and that was sufficient for him, and was also sufficient for the federal members, the so-called Liberals from Quebec.

But there is another precedent, Sir; it happened in 1920. In June, 1919, we had a general election for the provincial House. Sir Lomer Gouin was the premier, and was returned with seventy-six of his partisans, but later on he was appointed to the Legislative Council and Mr. Taschereau took his place. Mr. Taschereau did not go to the country. Is not that a precedent? "Oh, well," the Liberal press of Quebec will say, "he is following the same policy." He is not, and they know it. Sir Lomer Gouin had placed on the statute books a prohibition law. Mr. Taschereau is about to enact another law by which the local government at Quebec will be the absolute and sole dealer in alcohol. Is that the same policy as Sir Lomer Gouin's? No. Did Mr. Taschereau go to the country? No.

Having disposed of the arguments that have been advanced so far by those who fight this Government on the question of dissolution, to please my former friends I should like to go a ltlle deeper into politics. I asked the indulgence of the House. As there was no expression of dissent, I suppose I secure that indulgence. The Liberals of to-day, as I stated a moment ago, do not follow the path of true Liberalism. What constitutes the first principle of Liberalism? It is universal suffrage. Who gave it to this country, the Liberals or the Conservatives? I was amazed to listen to my hon. friend from Brome, a worthy scion of the sturdy Scotch race. I suppose he came originally from the Highlands, but he has always lived in the lowlands of politics. He proclaims himself a Liberal of the old school, and yet in his speech, Sir, he was complaining because during the war the Government of the day saw fit to give the right to vote to the wives and daughters of the soldiers at the front. From a Liberal standpoint it was a good move to give universal suffrage; but it came from the Government of the day, consequently my hon. friend from Brome sets aside his Liberalism and hurls his attacks against the Government.

Liberals of to-day, we will—with your permission, Mr. Speaker—look over the road. The Liberal party in days gone by fought for many years to abolish the double mandate, and it was finally abolished in 1873. Before that year the same man could be a senator, a legislative councillor, and an appointee of the Crown. This double mandate had emanated from the Family Compact, which at one time controlled this country for the advantage of the few. What do you see, Sir, even in this Chamber? You see the hon. member for St. Denis, Montreal (Mr. Verville), the untamed defender of the working man. Do you remember, Sir, his fiery speeches when he was cutting into small bits a piece of sausage to distribute to the children? He was preaching rebellion, and I remember having heard him say on the floor of the House, when we were discussing the $35,000,000 grant to the English navy, that if ever there was a war the working men would stop it by going on strike. Well, he was a very bad prophet, as he is a very bad Liberal. Actually he draws his sessional indemnity of $4,000 as a member of this House, and he draws $10,000 as a commissioner of the city of Montreal. When he is in Montreal he does not fulfil his duties in Ottawa; when he is in Ottawa he does not fulfil his duties in Montreal. But he draws the two salaries. He is for the double mandate as long as he can hold on to it.

He is not alone, Sir; he has a colleague who stands in the same position. I might say, en passant, that the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) is at the same time a member of the House and a substitute for the Attorney General at Montreal at a salary of $4,000. But when the late Government appointed Mr. Chapais to the Senate, while at the same time he held the office of Legislative Councillor, you could hear the Liberals claiming that it was an outrage. An outrage when the double mandate is for the benefit of the Tories, but a mighty good thing when it is for the benefit of one of the Liberals.

But in this House, Sir, we have better than that. We have an hon. member, who, since the beginning of this Parliament has represented two different ridings separated by a distance of three hundred and fifty miles. One is the constituency of Maisonneuve, which is an urban riding; the other is the constituency of Gaspé, mostly settled by fishermen. When the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) is asked by the fishermen of Gaspé to support a policy of free trade because they want to obtain American goods free of duty as well as enjoy the benefits of the Boston market for their fish, the hon. member has to advocate free trade. But when the electors of Maisonneuve want protection because with free trade their earning power might be diminished, the hon. gentleman votes for protection. Whether it is free trade or protection, the hon. member is sure always to have one seat at the right time. The member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé has been in public life for quite a while. He has a few friends—a few people are scared by him; and a large number of people do not care much about him. By right of seniority he is the first lieutenant of the provincial Liberal wing. The member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is at the head of the other faction. If I were to compare the leaders of the two factions, I would say that the members in the Quebec district are proud of their leader in the person of the member for Quebec East; but who among those of the Montreal district will say that he is proud of his leader? I do not think, Sir, that you could find one who would say so. Why? The hon. member was described on one occasion in a newspaper article published in French, entitled "Tout pour le mieux". If I had to translate this in English I would say: "All to the good," but in order to get at its real meaning in this case I would have to translate it: "Everything for Lemieux." That is why the hon. member has no friends, Mr. Speaker. And pretending to represent the Liberal party, though he was not the leader of the party to which I belonged, has seen fit to read me out of the ranks of the Liberal Party. I have been in the Liberal Party since 1896. I have fought the battles of my party since 1897. I never complained when I was given the worst positions to defend; I never complained when there were any bouquets or flowers to receive that were received by others. No, Sir, I never complained. I was a soldier in the Liberal army and I did my duty to the best of my ability and according to the dictates of my conscience. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that I am a traitor; that I am a renegade; that I am a Judas. He has no right, either, to ask his fellow-members who are the owners or editors of certain newspapers in my Province to hurl insults at me, after all I have done for every one of them.

I am going to try to show who is really the traitor and renegade. I stand here for the protective tariff as enacted by the Liberal administration. For what does the Liberal Opposition stand? Fifteen per cent tariff; fifty per cent Imperial preference—giving a preference of seven and a half per cent against English industries, and in favour of our own industries. Who are the traitors? Who are the renegades? Is the man a traitor who still fights for the tariff instituted by the late Sir Wilfred Laurier and the Liberal Party, which has brought wealth and happiness to the people? Or are those the traitors who went to destroy that platform; who want free trade; who want a tariff for revenue, or any kind of policy which will enable them to take the spoils of office?

I was elected as a Laurierite in 1917. On what policy, Sir? On the Laurier naval policy. For that policy I stand and will stand to the end of my political life. Am I a traitor? Am I a renegade? Am I a Judas? Whom have I betrayed? The Liberal Opposition themselves have left the platform and the policy of Laurier. I was elected by electors who knew where I stood and who know where I stand to-day. To whom am I a traitor? In what respect am I a renegade? Against whom am I a Judas? Where is the man, where is the party, where is the platform, that I have betrayed? It cannot be shown. But in order to keep the Quebec block solid, the two factions of the Liberals of the province of Quebec do not want any conferences between Quebec and the Government. They admit, though, that Quebec, being in the minority, must have an ally. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) would be willing to join hands with the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). The hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé is willing, if I can rely upon his word, to make an alliance with the Hon. Mr. Drury. Everyone admits that the isolation of Quebec must be terminated; but because I do not see eye to eye with my hon. friends, because I do not want to be a party to an alliance with the farmers, to an alliance with the labourers, because I am afraid of the communism of the agrarian movement—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Oh no, we are all right.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I have a right to my opinion even when it is contradicted by the hon. member for Red Deer. I do not want him to be ruled by my opinion, and he could not ask me to be ruled by his. It is my belief, Sir, that the agrarian movement is tending to a class movement, and I am afraid of that, and my people are afraid of it. Have we not a right to choose our ally? Are we going to choose our ally to please Mr. So-and-So or the hon. member for such-an-such riding? We are going to seek an alliance, this alliance to be made for the benefit of all parties concerned and specially for harmony amongst all classes, all groups, all provinces, all races, all creeds.

When the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) took exception to my words, I was stating that I could not advocate an alliance with the labour element. I will say why. The labour element in this country is affiliated with the American Federation of Labour, the headquarters of which are at Washington, pretty near the Capitol. I do not want our policy, our fiscal policy, our national policy, to be dominated by somebody who does not live in our land. That is quite right, and I have an absolute right to hold that opinion. I have said this, and I am willing to repeat it because I speak the truth as I understand it. I have more respect for the farmers who stand by their guns, who advocate free trade, who want to have a group of agrarian members in this House. We know where they are; we know where they will land. I can discuss matters with them, because I know what they want; I am not afraid of them; they are under their own flag, they show their colours. We know of what stamp they are made; we know what their policy is. But after all, if their principles do not agree with my belief, surely I am at liberty to say that I do not want an alliance with that group.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Sure.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Thank you. Before leaving this interesting subject of the Liberalism of the Liberals of to-day, I should like to make a few more references to my bosom friend, the hon. member who represents in this House the two constituencies of Gaspé and Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). In this life majority counts; we must have every unit when we are fighting. Here is a gentlemen who is supposed to be a Liberal, who holds in this House a double mandate with only one seat. The Liberal party has found its last refuge in the province of Quebec, because outside of Quebec, I do not believe there are more than twenty-one Liberal members. The Liberal party, when the votes are recorded, is interested in having all the votes it can poll; but through sheer eogtism the hon. gentleman has seen fit to keep the two seats, and whenever a vote is recorded, the Opposition loses one vote. But my hon. friend wants to go down to posterity as having been on the same footing as his late chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who for one Parliament held two seats also. But one of those seats was protested before the courts; actually there is no protest. How is it that a gentleman can stand in that position for the satisfaction of his own feeling against the triumph or the progressive fight of the party with which he is affiliated? It is a mystery which cannot be very easily explained. If I had any malicious feeling towards the hon. gentleman, I would say that I could give two explanations of his career, one a literary one and the other an applied science one. In reading over the fables of LaFontaine one finds the Fable of the Bat. The Bat, when flying with birds, can say: "Look at my wings, I am a bird," but when down on mother earth, she can also say: "I am a mouse; long live the rodents." When the hon. gentleman fights for free trade, he appeals to the masses of democracy to look at his wings. But when he fights for the big interests of his own constituency, when he goes with the bankers, the financiers, the industrial men; when he goes into the trust companies, into the insurance companies, dealing with all the wealthy in the land—"long live the rodents." If, passing from this literary reminiscence you go to applied science, you will remember that for many years there was a great discussion about airships. Some scientists claimed that in order to float in the atmosphere you should have something lighter than air. Then scientists came to the conclusion that it was necessary to have something heavier than air. At the time of the first theory balloons were made of silk and were filled with gas. Then the aeroplane was invented, and through the rapidity of the movements of its motor it was able to plane into the atmosphere. The hon. gentleman started his career as a balloon. He was robed with silk and filled with gas. Then he changed into an aeroplane. He had to give action to his airship through the most powerful motor there has ever been in this land, one that can never be duplicated. This motor was named Sir Wilfrid Laurier. When the motor stopped, the aeroplane came down to Mother Earth, and it is still splashing around in all the muddy spots, whence it can fly no more. He can say to those who still surround him: "Once I was a bird, look at my broken wings," but for the common people he will ever remain the most perfect political bat this country has ever known or heard of.

Mr. Speaker, it is an unsound Liberalism to preach the gospel of hatred against the majority of a country. It is unsound Liberalism to isolate a minority in a country.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Oh, never mind. This is a very serious game, and I have had to discard the hon. gentleman. There is no joker in the deck. I repeat, it is unsound Liberalism to isolate a minority, and I stand by what I have just said. It may be all right to have a solid block if you can appeal to the majority and win them to your cause, but if you cannot win them on account of your platform or on account of your theory, and if you are condemned to remain an isolated minority, I say it is bad Liberalism, and that has been proved to the hilt by the constitutional history of this country. The doctrine is so false that even the so-called Liberals are looking for allies. They are trying to induce the farmers to come in with them. They feel their utter incapacity unless they make an alliance. With whom should this alliance be made? By whom should it be made? These are the two points I should like to discuss now.

I have advocated the doctrine that isolation for Quebec should come to an end. Have I sacrificed any one of my political principles? Not one. Have I betrayed anybody? No one. If there are those in my province who are in any better position to discuss the situation with the powers that sit on the Treasury Benches, why do they not discuss it? If they believe that an alliance should be made, and if the Government of to-day is willing to make an alliance on a fair basis, with equal rights and mutual respect for everybody, who should complain? The policy of an alliance has been the policy of Quebec since the days of 1840 under the Union Act. It has been the sound policy, and it cannot be otherwise, for the good of this country, and the interests of all parties are looked after.

Sir, we have had two policies of alliances in this country. I am speaking now of my own province. The province of Quebec has had two alliances, one was when Cartier united Quebec with Ontario. The other was after 1896 when my late leader made an alliance between Quebec and the West. If you look at the records of the general elections of 1900, 1904, 1908, 1911, and 1917, you will see that, although through the alliance of the late Clarke Wallace with the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we were able to get forty-eight out of the ninety-six seats in Ontario, at every ensuing general election this majority has dwindled. It was thirty-eight in 1904, it was less than twenty in 1908, it came down to seventeen in 1911, and it finally rested at thirteen. What is the meaning of this? It is that the province of Ontario, seeing that the alliance with Quebec had been broken for the benefit of the western provinces, sought new alliances to direct the policies of this country. The alliance between Cartier and Macdonald was consummated in 1849 or 1850, about the time when the Governor General was insulted in the streets of Montreal, when the Parliament building was set on fire, when the annexation manifesto was circulated and signed by many people in this country who wanted secession from the mother country and annexation with the United States.

Cartier made an alliance with Macdonald. What has been the result so far as the country and my province are concerned? We had the opening of the Lachine canal, the construction of the Grand Trunk railway, the abolition of "tenure seigneuriale" in 1854, the organization of our municipal law in 1858. We had the codification of our French laws in 1864, and then there was Confederation, which gave to the province of Quebec the absolute control of all matters relating to education and of parochial and municipal law, making Quebec mistress in her own territory, under the guidance of the Federal Parliament.

This is what we had under the first alliance. What have we from the other one, and what can we expect? That is the point. The population of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, is atached to the soil. This is our own country; we have no other. If we left it we should be exiles. We must therefore remain here; we are rooted to the soil. It was discovered by our forefathers; it was trodden by our pioneers, and it has been reddened with the blood of our martyrs. We want to remain here; therefore, we have no desire to go onywhere else. Now, we are in the minority. With whom should we make an alliance? I have claimed all along that the natural ally of Quebec is Ontario. Since 1912, after the defeat of reciprocity in 1911, in the ranks of my own party I have advocated that theory and preached it as a gospel. I was not listened to. The Liberal party wants to retain an alliance with the West. Sir, I have no objection to the people of the West: none at all. I respect them. They came here to draw from the soil the wealth which Providence has stored there for those who are sturdy enough to work and obtain it. I have no objection to their helping us to develop the country. But, Mr. Speaker, figures are figures, and I have before me figures that show that west of the Great Lakes 63 per cent of the population are not British born. This is not my fault, but it is a fact. Am I going to preach an alliance with those who have not the same ideals as we have and who do not love our institutions? No, Sir, I cannot do that; for one, I will not consent to it. Everyone, of course, is at liberty to choose his own ally. I am choosing mine, and I shall try to make my people see as I do in this matter. If I fail I shall not bewail my failure; but I hope to win because I want to see peace and harmony restored in this country. This doctrine, in my mind, is a sound one. It is not based on prejudice; it is not based on hatred; it is not based on any sad passion of the human heart. The doctrine was so sound that my former friends, the so-called Liberals, could not attack it, and they therefore decided to murder the preacher.

Now, they have begun to take cognizance of two accusations that have been levelled at me, one since 1906, and the other since 1915. At the outset of my remarks I asked for the indulgence of the House, as it was my intention to deal once for all with those accusations; and if my former friends, so-called Liberals, have seen fit to make use of those accusations, being a public man, I have considered that the proper place in which to dispose of them is the House of Commons, the highest tribunal in the land. I shall deal with the first accusation.

It is that in 1906, when I ran as a Liberal candidate for the county of L'Assomption, I promised my support to the Conservative party in consideration of the sum of $1,500 which was to be paid to me. This accusation has been hurled against me now for fifteen years. So long as the Conservatives of my province thought fit to make use of that charge I deemed it a good strategic move to let them keep on for the time being, for they were not injuring the governments which I was supporting. As a matter of fact, Sir, this charge has never hurt me, because every time it has been made I have been in a position to give the official denial to it. Here are the facts. In 1906 there was a vacancy in the Provincial House, ocasioned by the appointment of Mr. Joseph P. Duhamel to the office of Chief Registrar of the province. The Liberal convention held at L'Assomption was presided over by the late Hon. Jean Provost, who was at the time Minister of Colonization and of Marine and Fisheries in the local Cabinet. My name was put forward as a candidate to the convention. I refused to have my name put up for nomination because I was certain—I had the proof—that some delegates had been approached with the view of inducing them to vote against me; and not wishing to be slaughtered by process of a convention organized and influenced in that way, I withdrew my name before nomination.

One Joseph Papin was chosen as the candidate. He was the President of the Agricultural Society of the County, but his choice did not meet with the approval of the farming community. Immediately after he was chosen, some farmers came to me and tendered me the nomination should I desire to run as an independent Liberal. One of those farmers offered me his personal cheque for $1,200 to defray my expenses. On the morning of nomination day the man chosen as the government candidate was so strong that he ran away and I was returned by acclamation. Now, Sir, the Conservatives since that time have spread broadcast against me, the slander that they had been prepared to bribe me.

I will explain how this legend has been created. The Provincial Government of the day was preparing a taxation law against fraternal societies. La Société des Artisans Canadiens Français, which is doing business in eight provinces of Canada and in eight states of the American Union would have been called upon, had the proposed legislation been enacted, to pay in taxation an amount equal to six or seven thousand dollars, whereas they were at the time paying but a nominal tax. In the law of every province of Canada, or state of the United States, there is a proviso that if a foreign company doing business in that province or in that state is paying in its own country a higher taxation than it is paying in the foreign country, the government of the latter country will have the privilege of increasing its taxation to an amount equal to that imposed in the native land of the association. The proposed legislation would have meant for this society a taxation of from five to six thousand dollars a year, when we were paying but $5 and $10 a year in every province and state.

The lawyer of the Society was one Alfred Labelle, who is now deceased. During the time of the L'Assomption election we discussed more than once the question of the taxation of the fraternal societies. I was interested in La Société des Artisans, and Mr. Labelle and I decided that if it were necessary we would organize a joint movement between all the fraternal societies doing business and having their headquarters in the province of Quebec so that we would be able to ask the government to refrain from putting the proposed law into effect. Well, Sir, I was returned by acclamation. Afterward I went and had dinner at the Club Lafontaine, which was a social as well as a business club. My leader, Sir Lomer Gouin, had dinner there more than once. Lately in the city of Montreal a banquet was given to a certain Conservative senator who was attended by Liberal senators, and even ministers, men who were personal friends of the host. Would it be possible to suppose for one moment that because you have a luncheon or a dinner with a man of opposite politics you are going to betray your party? That is nonsense. I did not need the money. I was returned by acclamation. If I had been opposed I had actually a certain amount of money which was more than sufficient to pay my legal expenditure. I did not need the money, I did not get the money, I never promised anything. After the election I was asked by the then Premier to propose the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. Since that day up till last fall I always fought for my party, and have defended members of the Liberal party when Conservatives were attacking them. Now so-called Liberals, my former friends, are indulging in slanderous attacks. The only thing I can say that I have nothing but contempt for them and for their actions.

Now, Mr, Speaker, let me proceed to the second acccusation. It is the one which has reference to the same Society of Artisans. The Society was founded in 1817, in the dark hour of that dark period when the civic authorities in the city of Montreal were compelled to open public kitchens at the corners of all thoroughfares to feed the starving population. A carpenter by the name of Archambault founded the Society to look after the interests of sick members and, upon their demise, the interests of their widows and orphans. As in the case of all societies of the kind funded during that century, it was based on charity and sympathy.

Orginally the Society was local in its character, but, starting in 1890, it expanded throughout all the provinces, and in 1900 it began operations in the United States. I regret to say that although in 1915 the membership was forty-three thousand and that membership international in character, its administration was provincial in the sense that all the directors to be elected must be chosen in the district of Montreal. I entered the Society in 1900. I acted as a delegate at the convention of that year and have acted in a similar capacity at every convention since. I have been in charge of the legislative committee which has entirely transformed the Society and its finances and which has put the Association—to quote the words of its actuary Mr. George Dyre Aldridge —in a position unique on the whole continent. When I left the office of president, to which I was elected in 1914, for every $100 of liability I left in the coffers of the association $125.50. The Society stands in a class by itself. After having transformed this society, I was the first professional man to be elected as first vice-president, which office consists mostly in looking after the financial affairs of the association. At the convention of 1914 I was the first professional man to be elected to the high office of president, and I am sure that office was given to me unanimously on account of the services that I had rendered to the society.

Now, Sir, on the first Saturday of September, 1915, just as I was leaving the hospital where I had been undergoing an operation, the newspaper Le Pays came out with an article stating that L. J. Gauthier had been speculating with the funds of the society, that he had taken the money in its treasury to buy bonds, which he afterwards re-sold to the society of which he was the president. This was the accusation, and it was afterwards published in the Montreal newspaper, La Patrie, by the Quebec newspaper, L'Evenement, and also by Le Courrier de St. Hyacinthe, which at the time was a Conservative organ.

A convention was called, and the membership of 43,000 sent in their delegates. The books were opened and the transactions carefully examined, and out of sixty-five votes, eleven were cast against me and fifty-four were given in my favour, the latter stating that the accusation was malicious, slanderous and unfounded. But I was not surprised. The society being international in its membership and provincial in its management, there was a certain regime and a certain routine, and the coming into office of a new man was liable to break that regime and that routine.

Those hon. members who pay me the compliment of still listening to my remarks will be astonished when I give them the contents of this official report, and they will understand. All the investments were made by the same man before I became president of the finance committee. During my term of office in that capacity and as president-general of the society, I was approached more than once and told that if I did not consent to go back to the old routine somebody would have to suffer for it. I refused to yield. The accusation came, and I am glad to see my hon. friend the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) in his place, for he was the president of the convention when this matter was threshed out.

What were the facts, Sir? The society started investing in bonds in 1901, and under the presidency of M. Joseph Thibeault, bought $25,000 worth at an average interest of 3·62 per cent; under the presidency of M. Alfred Lambert, $465,000 worth at an average interest of 4·20 per cent; under the presidency of M. J. V. Desaulniers $429,500 worth at an average interest of 4·49 per cent; under the presidency of M. Ludger Gravel—when I was president of the finance committee and responsible for the financial business of the society—$599,400 worth at an average interest of 5·30 per cent; under my presidency during fifteen months we invested $445,000 at an average interest of 5·82 per cent.

I will now give the names, Mr. Speaker, of those who sold bonds to the society. Under the presidency of M. Joseph Thibeault the Bank of Hochelaga sold bonds netting a revenue of 2·88 per cent, and Victor Morin, notary, sold bonds netting a revenue of 4·38 per cent.

Under the presidency of M. Alfred Lambert the following persons sold bonds to the society, netting the revenue set opposite their names:

[Mr. Gauthier.]

I have still another list—the names of those who sold bonds to the society under the presidency of M. J. V. Desaulniers, the percentage of interest appearing after each vendor's name:

	Per cent.
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.30
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.10
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.35
Fuller C. Smith	3.50
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.50
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.50
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	5.25
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	5.06
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.60
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.70
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.70
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.40
D. W. & A. E. Brunet	4.40

Now we come to the list of bond sales to the society made during the presidency of M. Ludger Gravel, when I was president of the finance committee:

	Per cent.
Z. Fontaine	5
Canada Investment Co.	5
Canada Investment Co.	5
J. V. Desaulniers	5
David Rochon	5.15
Hon. E. A. Deavitt	4.12
R. T. Beaudoin	5.50
G. A. Terreault	5.50
Commissionnaires Scolaire de Villeray	5.50
Alf. Lambert	6
Banque Provinciale	5.50
Société d'Administration Générale	5.75
Société d'Administration Générale	5.75
Commissionnaires Scolaire de Villeray	5.50

And, finally, Sir, I come to the presidency of L. J. Gauthier, with the following list of bond sales yielding the percentages enumerated:

	Per cent.
Eug. Poirier, N.P.	5.87
Société d'Administration Générale	5.62
Gervais Décary	6.50
J. M. A. Robitaille	5.75
Paquet & Perreault	6
Wm Murphy	5.50
Gervais Décary	5.50

Upon a simple reading of that list everybody will understand that I broke the regime; that I broke the routine and that during my term of office I asked those having the best offers to come forward, so that the society got bonds which yielded the highest possible net return.

During the special convention, which was presided over by my friend the member for Berthier (Mr. Gervais), we took cognizance of all these facts. The delegates asked our actuary, Mr. George Dyre Eldridge, to make a report from an actuarial standpoint on the financial position of the society as regards its investments. Here is the report:

I, Geo. Dyre Eldridge, Actuary, hereby certify that it has been a part of my duty as actuarial adviser of "La Société des Artisans Canadiens-Français", at all times to be fully informed as to the investments of the Society, with special regard to the question of their income-producing quality, as compared with the statutory requirement of interest to be earned for the purpose of accumulating the reserve required by law to maintain the present rates of contribution and meet all the obligations of the Society.

During the year 1914, the interest-income derived from the investments of the Society, after making proper allowance for the cancellation of any values in excess of final par value, and deducting full proportionate interest on sick benefit funds, was $40,393, greater than the interest required upon the statutory standard for the maintenance of the full life insurance reserve.

This is equivalent, when capitalized, to a further surplus over that shown by standard valuation of $445,000.00.

The investments of the past two years are above the average in income-producing value; and this is especially true of the investments made during the current year.

From personal knowledge of the care in, and results of methods of investment followed by many of the life insurance companies and large fraternal societies, I have no hesitation in certifying that "La Société des Artisans Canadiens-Français" stands among the very foremost in both particulars.

I regard the investments of the Society, in view of the care always shown in making them, and the conservative methods followed, as a strong guaranty of its ability to maintain its present rates and to continue the practice, inaugurated the present year, of waiving the payment by the members of one of the monthly contributions, a course that could not be permanently continued if the Society were not earning interest in excess of the statutory requirements.

GEORGE DYRE ELDRIDGE.

Is it possible, Sir, that in the hope of destroying a single man, members representing the province of Quebec—in which this society is one of the foremost organizations of its kind, because it has made the French-Canadian name known in all insurance circles throughout the continent of North America—is it possible that in the hope of crushing down a single man, a member should take the risk of injuring the future of an institution of that kind? This will show, Sir, what is the spirit which animates members who, to flatter their own egotism, to give a chance for the employment of their verbosity and pomposity, would like to be alone in the field; would like to let posterity know that in the year of Our Lord 1921 there was a very big man who represented at the same time the two separate constituencies of Maissonneuve and Gaspé.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was just concluding my remarks by reading a report from the actuary of the Society of Artisans on the management, from a financial standpoint, of the affairs of that society. I do not want to weary the House with that question, but I would like to put on Hansard the following remarks which will conclude the point that I had been making before six o'clock. This question of the Artisans and this question of Le Club Lafontaine were dealt with in the Courier de St. Hyacinthe, which at the time was a Conservative newspaper in my riding, and following the advice of my friends in the constituency, I instituted legal proceedings against that newspaper. The owners of the newspaper came to me asking for a settlement out of court. This I refused. The matter went to judgment, and the two questions were declared to be slanders and malicious affirmations against a public man with no good ground for them. The judgment was rendered by His Lordship the late Mr. Justice Charbonneau.

There was another judgment in the same matter of the Artisans before the Superior Court of Montreal presided over by His Lordship Mr. Justice Mercier. The whole question of the investments of the society was looked into, and the judgment declared that there was nothing in those accusations. The plaintiff was not satisfied; he inscribed his case in the Court of Review, and in the last days of 1920 judgment was rendered unanimously confirming the judgment of His Lordship Mr. Justice Mercier. When my former friends decided to take up this question, I wrote on the 29th January last to the headquarters of the society asking the Board of Directors, as much for the sake of the society as for my personal sake to re-establish the facts as they were according to the books. On the 1st February, 1921, the Board of Directors held a meeting at which were present: Mgr. G. M. LePailleur, general chaplain, Messrs. Napoléon Deschamps, 1st vice-president, General L.

G. Bertrand, Dr. J. E. Racicot, J. E. C. Daoust, Dr. E. Hurtubise, E. Desjarlais, S. Dupéré, general directors; Henri Roy, general secretary-treasurer; Louis Fontaine, assistant general secretary-treasurer; Dr. J. A. Rouleau, chief physician and Zénon Fontaine, legal counsel, under the presidency of Mr. Rudolphe Bédard, general president. This is the motion which was adopted unanimously by the Board of Directors of the society, which motion, in my mind, should do away with all the attacks to which I have been subjected:

The Executive Council, after deliberation, declare: that the administration of Mr. L. J. Gauthier has been progressive, wise, prudent and profitable; that the Society recognizes with pleasure the important services that have been rendered to it by Mr. Gauthier in his capacity of legislative adviser as well as with his ability in administrative matter. In a word, the society must congratulate itself upon having Mr. Gauthier as one of its directors and as president, as has been acknowledged by the highest tribunal of the society, the conference held in 1915.

I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House; but I believed, as long as I was a simple member of a political party and these accusations were brought against me by my opponents, I had nothing to complain of; it was their right to try to persuade the electors that I was not worthy of the confidence of my constituents. But my status has changed since last fall, and when my former friends, the Liberals, took upon themselves those accusations which have been declared futile, malicious, and slanderous, I thought it was my duty, equally for my constituents as for my family and myself, and also for the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Mr. Meighen) to get clear away from the shadow of these accusations because I have been called to public conferences with the constituted authorities of this Parliament.

What has been my stand all along? Can my former friends, the so-called Liberals of Quebec, complain because I am to-day in favour of protection, as I was in former days in favour of protection? At the last convention of the Liberal party held in the month of August, 1919, in the city of Ottawa, when the time had arrived to choose delegates for that convention, I took pains to go to the manufacturers of my city of St. Hyacinthe and I told them that I was afraid that the Liberal party, with the two factions of Montreal and Quebec, would alter, change and amend the acknowledged policy of the Liberal party. I was afraid that they would ask for a reduction of tariff duties, and I wanted the manufacturers to help me, if that were possible, to have the Liberal party adhere to this platform of protection. During the convention, the authorities of the convention on three different occasions offered to give me an opportunity of addressing it, and I refused because I was not in sympathy with the platform which was prepared at the time, and I thought it was my duty first to remain true to my electors, to my principles and to the principles for which my province has fought since 1878.

On a former occasion, I stated on the floor of this House that the hour of Quebec would strike. The Government supporters thought that there was a threat, a menace in those words. I took pains to state that it was only a declaration. It was not necessary to have the ability of a prophet. Everybody knows that it is impossible to keep in a solid block the minority of a country in public affairs. This marvellous thing has been done once by a man who stood is this country, in the Empire, and especially in his own province, as the idol of his race and the representative of all our aspirations. This has been done once. It cannot be repeated. Where is the man in the ranks of the Liberal party who could go to-day to the province of Quebec and bring back here a solid Quebec block? I should like to be shown that man; but he does not exist. And mind you, Mr. Speaker, when the Quebec population was remaining solid in its principles, awaiting its opportunity it was not necessary to be a prophet to understand that the Government, composed as it is of groups and factions united on a certain principle but divided on other questions, would split one of these days, and that one of the groups or perhaps two would separate themselves from the Government; and that would be the time for the province of Quebec, if it knew how to wait for its hour. Now, Sir, is there anything wrong in that declaration? Nothing at all. It is a simple matter of good political sense, and nothing else.

Nobody can believe that the isolation of Quebec must not be terminated. It is impossible in a country like ours to leave aside a population of pretty nearly three millions out of a total of nine millions. These people must have representation in public affairs. They cannot be ignored for all time to come. Sir, because I hold the principles I have enunciated to the House from my seat here, I have been attacked as a traitor and a renegade. What crime have I committed? To whom am I responsible? The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) this afternoon was trying to belittle the issue by talking of fish and bribery. The hon. member for Brome ought to know that the man who would be weak enough to allow himself to be bribed could not show his face any more in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Brome should understand, even if he does not respect my belief, that there are situations in this life which require resolution. The hon. member for Brome may think it is all right for himself to represent a constituency of 13,000 souls when according to the last census, the unit of representation was 30,080. The hon. member for Brome should understand that when he speaks from his seat in the House, he speaks not for his own personal benefit, but for those he represents on the floor of the House. He speaks for his province, and for the benefit of his country, and, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Brome has that high esteem of himself, can he not respect the beliefs of others who, though they may not be as bright as he, yet are as honest as he is, and who are entitled to their opinion as long as they are willing to fight for it? No, Sir. The hour of Quebec has struck, I repeat the words.

Why has it struck? Sir, it is the privilege of my province, and to the honour of my race, to have given to this country every time the darkest clouds rose over the horizon a man who was strong enough to command the respect of a majority of this country, and at the same time to command the obedience of the men of my race. In 1840, after the rebellion of 1837 and 1839 Lower and Upper Canada were united under circumstances that were more than dangerous. When, with the population in Lower Canada double that of Upper Canada, with a deposit in the chartered banks of Lower Canada and a deficit in the finances of Upper Canada, both provinces were united on an equal footing as to representation and finances, Upper Canada to have half of the money deposited by Lower Canada and Lower Canada to take half the debt of Upper Canada, the Union was looked upon by my people as an insult and they refused to submit to it. Then Louis Hypolyte Lafontaine came into the public arena. He appealed to the majority in the country and appealed to his own people, and the Union Act was passed.

That Act may not have been a success from all points of view, but at all events it created an atmosphere once more of peace, harmony and traquility in this country. Then in 1849, when the annexation memorandum was signed, and when the Parliament buildings in Montreal were burned, when this country was on the verge of disruption, Cartier arose and appealed to the majority and to my people and they united together and peace was restored once more. In 1867, when the time had come for all the provinces in British North America to weld and work together for the expansion of the country, for the prosperity of its population, and for the agrandizement of our resources, Cartier was there again fighting night and day to secure the consummation of the British North America Act.

In 1896 when one of the smallest provinces in this country saw the Federal Government threatening to encroach upon her school system, a man arose from the province of Quebec, a man of my race. This question had been taken from one tribunal to another during six years, and in the campaign of 1896 Laurier, appealing to all races, all creeds, and all provinces, made the statement "This question of the Manitoba schools has been dragging along for six years. Give me power, and in six months peace will be restored." He obtained power, and peace was restored inside of three months.

I do not pretend to be a Lafontaine, a Cartier, or a Laurier. No; my role is more humble and more modest than that, and as my so-called former friends are very fond of precedents I will turn to the world's history and cite a precedent for the stand I am now taking. In the early days of the Christian era, in the deserts of Judea, there was a man who preached the advent of a Saviour. This man was known as the Baptist, and when he was asked whether he himself was the Saviour, he answered that he was not worthy to untie the latchet of that Saviour's shoes; he was only the precursor of the Saviour, who would come to redeem humanity. The Baptist, having fulfilled his mission to the last, was beheaded, but the Saviour came and humanity was redeemed. To-day, Sir, standing in the wilderness of "no man's land," I am, like a Baptist, announcing to this House and to the country that at this time, when every race is hurling insult at the other, when every province is trying to fight every other, when every passion in men's minds is infuriated, a man will come from my province and from my race who will preach the gospel of toleration and self-respect. He will appeal to the majority of the people of this country and he will show them that though his people constitute the minority, nevertheless there is no reason why the minority and the majority should not unite so that this country will have another era of happiness, of prosperity, of contentment, of good-will to men who love peace and harmony and are proud to live under the protection of the British Crown and our national institutions. I say, this man will come. The hour of Quebec has come, and this man will save the situation.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent): I desire at the outset, in common with other members who have spoken, to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address on the excellent way in which they have acquitted themselves. I can hardly, however, concur in all that has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just concluded (Mr. Gauthier). It did appear to me that from the first to last he was saying everything he could think of in an uncomplimentary way about the Labour party and the Farmers' party and the Liberal party, which are represented in this House, in view of the portfolio which he seems so anxious to secure in the future. It comes with bad taste from the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) to ridicule all his former friends in the old Province of Quebec, and in one respect particularly I take exception to his remarks. I object to the uncomplimentary way in which he referred to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) who was formerly Postmaster General in the Laurier Administration, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that representing as I have the privilege to do, a constituency where a great number of French-Canadian citizens hold the high positions and occupy some of our best farms I was charged personally with the duty of conveying to the hon. member for Gaspé, in his hour of bereavement as a result of his great sacrifice to the cause of the country, in the loss of his son, the sincere sympathy of many of my constituents. When we hear an hon. gentleman ridiculing a citizen who has stood so high in the esteem of the people of this country in the past, I think we may safely assume that many of his words will fall on deaf ears not anly in Quebec but in every other part of the Dominion. In this respect I hope I shall be permitted to read an item or two which appeared in a newspaper in the province of Quebec and which I think will be of interest to the members of this House. I quote the following:

> Since the opening of Parliament the Hon. Mr. Lemieux occupies the seat immediately next to the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's, and that preferment is merited. A member of Parliament for the last 22 years, Mr. Lemieux by his assiduity, his industry, his correct behaviour, and his thoughtfulness in the fulfilment of his duties has well earned the reward of being officially acknowledged as Laurier's first lieutenant in the Province of Quebec.
> However, it is on the floor of the House of commmons that the Hon. Mr. Lemieux shows to best advantage. Trained in the best traditions of parliamentary life, holding the tenets of the sound English Liberal faith, in constant sympathy with the views of all the great men who have contributed by their speeches and their writings to the perfecting of parliamentary practice, he is wholly at ease when taking an active part in the various debates.

Could a greater compliment be paid to any Parliamentarian in this country than that contained in the two extracts I have just read? And they were published in one of the Quebec newspapers which was controlled by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, and were his words over his own signature. These were the words of the hon. gentleman in regard to one of our Canadian statesmen, a man who well deserved the compliment. Yet to-night he sees fit to cast aspersion upon him. I will not make any accusations against the hon. gentleman, but we have seen by the press that he had been in communication with the Government with a view to securing a position that would bring him greater benefit than he might obtain as a private member; and because greater statesmen than he might be given a preference over him he gets up in his place and takes up two hours of the time of the House in saying unkind things of his former friends from the province of Quebec in this Parliament and in the local legislature. What confidence can the people of Canada have in the utterances of the hon. gentleman? At his words the ministers of the Government might well hold their heads down, from the Minister of Justice to the least among them. There were plaudits from the back-benchers in abundance when such language was used by the hon. gentleman, but which one of those gentlemen opposite was brave enough to walk over the floor and shake hands with him and congratulate him? His only congratulations were his own handshakes, and he got a very cold reception from all friends whose cause he was pleading. I say that it comes with very bad taste from the hon. member, who recognised the ability of the member for Gaspé, —a gentleman who sat at the right hand of the late Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir, the people of Canada, irrespective of nationality, many of whom were not his political supporters, were admirers of that great British Canadian Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and to-night, on the second anniversary of his death, they mourn his loss. Under such circumstances it is pathetic to think that one who was supposed to be a supporter of Sir Wilfrid and an admirer of the great work that he accomplished in his life time, would lend himself to the task of trying to drive a wedge between the followers of that lamented statesman for the benefit of men who always did their utmost to oppose him. I say, Sir, that such conduct on the part of the hon. gentleman exhibits the worst possible taste, and I believe it will have a contemptuous reception in the old province from which that hon. gentleman comes, as well as in the English speaking provinces. To-night I am in the unique position of occupying the same seat as the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe occupied not more than a year ago when that hon. gentleman undertook to reply to a speech delivered by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat). On that occasion the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe assured the Government that the people of the province of Quebec had received bad treatment. Let me quote his actual words:

> Speaking in my own name, and for my province, I will quote the words of one of our public men who says that the province of Quebec is not in a state of mind to enter into any conference; it has been misjudged; it has been badly treated; it has been slandered; it is waiting for its hour and after that it will confer, but not before.

Waiting for the hour! In the interest of the province of Quebec? No, Sir, in the interest of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe himself. He was waiting for the hour to come that would, if possible, give him a better position. It was not the interest of his constituents or the citizens of the old province of Quebec that he was thinking of. He was waiting for an opportunity to get into the Government; but I can assure him, after studying the faces of members of the Cabinet and other hon. gentlemen opposite, that if ever a man crucified himself and sacrificed his chance of getting a high position in public life, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe has done this on the present occasion.

From the hon. gentleman's first remarks it would appear that he had been in consultation with the Prime Minister; he uttered words and used arguments almost identical with those which the Prime Minister employed. He said that there should not be a general election until after the census had been taken; and he let the cat out of the bag when he said that the city of Montreal, which now has twelve representatives in this House, would, after a redistribution of seats, have twenty. He said that the unit of population would then be forty thousand instead of thirty thousand.

An hon. MEMBER: Dollars.

Mr. McCOIG: Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the province of Quebec is the pivot of Confederation. It does not make any difference what the unit of population may be, the province of Quebec can only have sixty-five representatives in this Parliament. It is interesting to make a contrast between the remarks of the Prime Minister and those of the hon. gentleman. The Prime Minister, in his flowery and beautiful fashion, declares that we cannot have an election until we give the West its proper representation, and by way of a decoy the figures ten to twenty-five were suggested. But the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, as I have already said, let the cat out of the bag when he stated that it is to Montreal, Toronto, and the other big cities of the Dominion that the Government is anxious to give greater representation.

Let me make a suggestion in this connection. If the Government intends to hang on and not appeal to the country it should, regardless of the stipulations of the Act of Confederation, start taking the census immediately and not wait until June. In the large cities and towns of Canada there are many men out of employment. In the City of Chatham there are twenty or thirty returned men who are anxious to get work, and these are men that are well qualified to be employed in the census taking and would give every satisfaction. I repeat, let the taking of the census be started at the earliest possible date so that the men who are out of employment will be able to get work now when they need it, and not wait until June when there will be no lack of employment. I hope the Government will give some consideration to this thought.

It was also interesting to hear the Prime Minister during his speech make reference to the "ill fated National Transcontinental Railway." Of that enterprise the Prime Minister spoke in the most mournful tones. Let me ask the Government why high officials of the Canadian National Railways, at a time when fuel throughout the country was most expensive, allowed the ties to be removed from different railway tracks in Canada, piled up in cords and cords and the torch applied to them, instead of placing that fuel at the disposal of people in humble circumstances so as to enable them to keep their homes and their families warm. The Prime Minister may speak of this railway as "ill fated", but I do not think that it would be possible for any enterprise to succeed where such extravagance is practised. If a person were starting out in business he would employ the right class of men to make that business a success, and the same course should be pursued by the Government in regard to the National Railway System. It should employ men of the highest calibre and ability with the necessary knowledge to look after the important interests entrusted to them from time to time. But, Sir, what class of men has the Government been appointing in connection with the National Railway System? We find according to press announcements of July 7th, 1920, that the man who has been appointed to one of the most important positions on the National Railway System, with an elaborately furnished suite of offices in the City of Chicago, is no other person than Mr. DeWitt Foster, who was read out of the Conservative Party by the late Prime Minister, and sent back to his constituency, on account of the way he handled matters in connection with the purchase of horses for the Government during the late great war. That gentleman's management of affairs was so scandalous, it was so ridiculous and farcical, that it involved an expense of thousands and thousands of dollars to the people of Canada.

Yet, Sir, this man is sent to the city of Chicago to occupy one of the most important positions in connection with the Canadian National Railways. Is it any wonder that we hear my right hon. friend the Prime Minister speaking of the "ill-fated" National Transcontinental road when men of the type I have referred to are associated with our national railway system? How can you expect that system to be a success, how can you expect not to have deficits, when such men are on the staff? Last year the deficit amounted to $47,000,000, this year it is estimated that it will reach $65,000,000.

What does it mean? It means that we must expect a continuance of deficits if such things as I am about to bring to the attention of the House are typical. I am informed that the most important train leaving the city of Toronto, instead of being filled with passengers who had paid their fares, was composed of special cars for the benefit of a few friends of the Government. The would-be passengers who were prepared to pay had to cross over to the ticket office of the competing road and buy tickets for Ottawa. Then I am advised on very reliable authority—and the Government can ascertain whether my information is correct or not—that the trains running from Vancouver to Toronto on the days before Christmas were loaded to capacity, but fifty per cent of the passengers were travelling on passes. If this be untrue, no person will be more pleased than myself, because if half of those passengers were travelling on passes, it goes to show why to some extent the people who are trying to ship their products are being held up by the higher freight rates now being charged; and the necessity of higher freight rates is no doubt because the passenger trains are not paying. In view of this condition of affairs, it seems to me incumbent upon the Government to appoint a committee of this House to deal with the statements which I have brought to their attention. If the Government have the interests of the country at heart, I am confident an investigation will be held.

The hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) may smile, but this is too important a question for him or any other leading member of the Cabinet to smile at. An investigation of the conductors' books will show whether the statement I have made is well founded or not. If it is not correct, all well and good; but if fifty per cent of the passengers at that season of the year were travelling on passes, it is important that the country should know it and that the practice should be promptly discontinued, as our National railways need all the revenue that they san possibly secure to reduce their operating deficits.

Now, Sir, let me go a step further. We have to-day advised the Government to appeal to the people, or place their resignations in the hands of the Governor General so that he may call upon other persons to form a Government which will meet with the endorsation of the country. The right hon. the Prime Minister will probably think that our advice does not count for very much, but let me assure him that the advice we are tendering him now is just as sound as the advice which we proffered when his Government were about to establish the Board of Commerce. We told them then that the appointment of such a board would be a detriment to the country and would be barren of results. What followed on the appointment of that board has confirmed the soundness of our advice. It will be remembered that the members of that board sat for months, drawing thousands of dollars in salaries and expenses, but not one profiteer was ever put in jail, nor one dollar added to the Treasury as a result of their efforts to put a stop to profiteering.

What we contended then and what we contend now is that we should have a public prosecutor appointed to take action against profiteers. We have complaints, particularly from our returned men, that profiteering still continues. For instance, notwithstanding that hides are to-day cheaper than they have been for years, those men complain that their children's shoes cost the same price as when the war was raging. We hear from the farmers that they are getting only $13.50 a hundred for their hogs, and yet to-day bacon is twenty cents a pound dearer in Canada than in England. These two cases alone are sufficient to justify an investigation.

If we are going to allow these combines to exist, we cannot expect to attract as many people to assist us in agriculture as we need to-day. I have been informed that in the case of Peterson versus the Dominion Tobacco Company, tried at Sandwich in December, 1919, before Mr. Justice Middleton, there was filed as an exhibit a telegram from the representative of the companies in the Tobacco Buyers' Association to the Macdonald company of Montreal, who were not members of the association, asking them, in effect, to come in and agree to keep the price down; and that Stewart, of the Macdonald company, swore in evidence that his company was asked to agree with the other companies not to pay more in 1919 than thirty cents per pound. This, Sir, went to show that there was an attempt to combine against the producers of tobacco in the counties of Kent and Essex, which meant that the men who returned from overseas and took up tobacco growing had their tobacco hanging in their barns with no chance of selling. it. This year there has been a tremendous tobacco crop and from the absence of buyers the farmers suspect a combine has been formed to force down prices, to the detriment of the growers. Is it not worth while for the Government to take this matter up, for it will be remembered that the men who went overseas were promised that combines would not be allowed, and those men naturally expect to have that promise redeemed.

To-day, Sir, we are trying to get men to locate upon the land. And what do we find? We find that the agricultural implement manufacturing companies, not only the Massey Harris Company, but the International Harvester Company, the Cockshutt Company and all the other big implement concerns, have raised the price of binders $30 over last year's price, which was the highest on record. How Sir, can we expect to induce men to locate upon the farms if we allow these implement concerns to extract such exorbitant prices from those who have to use these implements? Last year it took 250 bushels of oats to buy a binder; to-day it takes 700 bushels. I find that the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) is, going to follow me. If that is the case I ask him to challenge the statement that I have made. The same thing applies on other agricultural machinery all down the line. This is a matter that should receive some consideration at the hands of the Government.

In conclusion, I have only this to say, that if at the next general election the Government expect to be returned with anything like a respectable following, the matters which I have brought to the attention of the House will have to be given greater consideration than they have received in the past.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne always covers a very wide field. A number of interesting subjects are mentioned in the Speech itself, but it is not necessary that one should confine himself to those particular subjects; a general latitude is permissible on the part of one who addresses the House on this occasion.

But before taking up the matters to which I wish to refer in connection with the Address, I want to say a word with regard to our new Prime Minister. It is the first opportunity that I have had of speaking in the House since the right hon. gentleman was elevate to the high position he now occupies. I have followed his career for a number of years: He came from that part of the country in which I have the honour to live,—and that does not make him any the worse. He combines the steadfastness, carefulness and shrewdness of the East with the push and progress of the West, and that combination should go to make a man of breadth and of enterprise, a man eminently fitted to fill the high position to which my right hon. friend has been called. So far as I am concerned, though I am an independent man in some ways, I profess to give my allegiance to the Prime Minister so far as I can see my way to do it—whenever he brings forward measures that I believe to be in the general interests of the country. I do not think, from what I know of him that he will bring forward many measures, either now or at any time, that are not in the general interests of the people. I wish, therefore, that the tenure of office of the right hon. gentleman as the Prime Minister of Canada may be a long and successful one.

We have had a rather interesting exhibition this afternoon. There has been more or less of a family fight; and of course that is always "pie" to us if it occurs on the other side.

Mr. BELAND: One-sided.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I can quite imagine that some of the remarks of the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) were not very much relished by gentlemen opposite. It was really a study to sit here and watch the varrying shades of contempt and disgust that occasionally played upon the features of hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), the gentleman with the loud voice and the small constituency, came in for a fair share of the speaker's attention. I have always thought that the member for Brome, if he kept on long enough, would make a convert of some kind, and apparently he succeeded this afternoon, because his eloquent remarks on free trade and various other things so incensed the member for St. Hyacinthe that he could hold his seat no longer, and the result was the exhibition that we had of a family squabble. I am sorry that the hon. member for Brome could not see what was coming. He has been trying for this for a long time, and finally his chickens have come home to roost, and he has made a convert. However, it was a kind of backfire business that he did not expect; it has hit the preacher so that he is really in a worse position than the man who was supposed to be the sinner.

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

The member for Kent, (Ont.) (Mr. McCoig) has attempted to belittle what the member for St. Hyacinthe said. But when the papers come out to-morrow and the speeches of the two hon. gentlemen are read, it will be found that the speech of the member for St. Hyacinthe has created an impression of a very different nature, from that created by any remarks of the member for Kent. Whatever may be said with regard to the right or the wrong of the situation, as the member for St. Hyacinthe sees it, there is no doubt that he spoke from a full heart and with a conscientious desire to do what he conceived to be a very difficult, and perhaps, a somewhat dangerous duty to his fellow-men, especially with regard to the Province of Quebec. I give him all cred for having made one of the most impressive speeches from the province of Quebec that I have heard in a good many days. If a few more of our friends across the way will study questions of the day in the same light as the member for St. Hyacinthe has done we shall have a rapprochement between the old Provinces of Ontario and Quebec the like of which has not been seen for many years. That would be a very desirable consummation indeed, and for my part I hold out both hands to my hon. friend.

The member for Brome took great exception to the Prime Minister possibly opening a little seat on this side for one or two repentant gentlemen from the other side, but almost in the same breath he said he welcomed from this side the member from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) who was expected shortly to take his seat on the Opposition benches. The inconsistency of the member for Brome was certainly remarkable when he could make a bid for the member for Halifax to cross the floor and occupy a front bench—which is nearly a Cabinet position, because no doubt all the members of the new Cabinet made up from members on the other side when they came in will be named by the member for Brome. The member for Halifax, therefore, might consider himself as good as a cabinet minister. But having said this, why should the member for Brome be offended if the Prime Minister should say that he would welcome gentlemen from the other side? It has long been the desire of Ontario men to have representatives from the province of Quebec sitting on this side as they used to. We can sit here more comfortably with them alongside of us than we can simply as a number of Ontario men sitting together. In the old days the good old Conservative party had the backing of the French-Canadians to a great extent—in fact, the backbone of Sir John Macdonald's party on many occasions were the representatives from the province of Quebec, and it seems to me they had quite as much light in those days as we have in these.

There are many respects in which the provinces of Quebec and Ontario are alike. Quebec is a manufacturing centre; so is Ontario, and at such a time as this I take off my hat to Quebec as being probably the most stable labour province in Canada to-day. Quebec has shown itself during the last two or three years to be a province with a great deal of self-respect and a great deal of backbone, and one that is doing more, perhaps, in the reconstruction period following the Great War than any other province of our Dominion. While we, in Ontario, and our brethren too, in the West, are giving way to all kinds of fad legislation and calling for every conceivable kind of government, Quebec sticks to the old rule, maintains the old stand, attends to her own knitting, keeps her factories running—supplied by the labour, the brawn and the brain of the good inhabitants of that province. I give them credit, then, for playing at this time a very important part in the re-establishment of Canada after the war.

Now, having said this much I do not wish to enter into a further discussion of the family affairs of my hon. friends opposite. Before touching, however, upon some of the items specifically dealt with in the Speech from the Throne, I feel that I must pay some little attention to one or two remarks made by my friend from Kent (Mr. McCoig). I understand that he comes from a tobacco district. I do not know whether he himself smokes much of the tobacco grown there, but if he does perhaps that would be a higher recommendation of it than we would otherwise have. I understand that the tobacco growers in his constituency have recently asked that the modest duty of one dollar a pound be placed upon tobacco. What percentage that would be I must leave the hon. member for Kent to calculate. So far as I know the price of tobacco in the western section, it runs from twenty-five up to forty-five cents per pound. Therefore, a modest duty of one dollar per pound on this would sound fairly big as a percentage, being somewhere between two and three hundred per cent. My hon. friend has taken occasion, as he often does, to allude to the firm which bears my name, but with the management of which I have no connection. He informs the House and the country that we have raised the price of our binders twenty or thirty per cent. If he knows the firm as well as he ought to know it, because it is no secret that the hon. gentleman was at one time an agent for the company which he is so glad to abuse on various occasions, he knows they manufacture no mowers and no binders and never have done so.

Mr. McCOIG: You handle the Frost & Wood mowers and binders in western Ontario.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The handling of them is one thing and the manufacture is quite another. It is true we take orders for and sell those implements, but not a single one is manufactured by the firm, and the hon. gentleman knows that perfectly well; so that when he speaks of the Cockshutt firm raising the prices of those implements, he knows he is making a misrepresentation because they have nothing at all to do with the manufacture of those machines. Further, as a practical farmer, as I presume he is, he knows that during the war, during the last five years, any farmer either in eastern or western Canada going to any market in this country with a load of produce, whether it were pork, beans, wheat, oats, barley or rye or any of the products of the farm, could take back, as a result of the sale of that load, as many implements as he ever did before the war. I do not think that can be said of everything, but it can be said of the implement business, and of all industries in Canada none, perhaps, suffered more than did that same implement business. I do not, however, want to speak of that. The time will come later in the session when we can take care of that, but I do not like my hon. friend who was carried away by his feelings—and possibly he had some good excuse because he was smarting under the remarks of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier)—to make such sweeping statements as he did. But we know that as regards the products of his constituency, which are sugar beets, corn and all those items, he is very careful not to advocate any policy that would bring any less to the growers of any of those products than they have received in the past. How he can pose as a free trader—and I am not quite sure whether he does so entirely—when he has two or three sugar factories and several other large industries in his riding, I can hardly understand; nor can I understand how he can advocate that all barriers should be removed and at the same time retain those in his county. I must apologize for having spent so much time upon the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) because I am not sure that his remarks deserve it.

I want, before going further, to refer to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), who I am sorry is not in the chamber. I am not going to spend many moments upon his amendment, but I desire to point out to him one or two things in connection with it. In the first place I hold in my hand the Brantford Expositor, which is well known as one of the staunch Liberal papers of Ontario and of Canada, and this is what it has to say with regard to the point at issue:

> If the Hon. Arthur Meighen holds the reigns of power long enough to pass the new Redistribution Bill based on the census taken this year and frankly implements the obligation to secure an equitable representation by population and then appeals to the country, he will pursue a wise course of statesmanship and one hard to successfully challenge.

I recommend those remarks to my hon. friend who moved this amendment. He says that this Government has no mandate. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) pointed out several mandates which this Government had, and that the Opposition were ready to acknowledge that the Government had the mandate when they raised the indemnity last session and my hon. friends pocketed it. My hon. friends say nothing about that. This Government only about three years ago was elected by the largest majority of both members and popular vote of any Government that I have ever known of in Canada.

Mr. CAHILL: Where are they now?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: There are many of them here as my hon. friend will find out, and they are here to stay for quite a little while in spite of the efforts of the hon. member of Pontiac to dislodge them. I suppose he would carry them out on railway trains if he had the opportunity, as he is a great railway expert, but I do not want to be diverted from this matter by the hon. gentleman. This Government was elected by the largest majority of the popular vote that any Government ever received in Canada. That cannot be successfully contradicted. Therefore, they had the mandate from the people to occupy the treasury benches not only for the duration of the war, but for five years, in spite of anything that may be said to the contrary. I knew something about this fight up in our section: I had a little to do with it, and I never once heard the question raised as to the right of the Government to retain power so long as the Parliamentary term was not exceeded and, as well known, that term was to be five years.

My hon. friend complains that this mandate does not exist now, although it has run only about three years. Let me point out to him the inconsistency of himself and many of his friends in this regard. We have to-day in two of the provinces at least, in Manitoba and in Ontario, Governments sitting that have not now and never had any mandate from the people. The Ontario Government polled only about one-third of the vote. The Premier of Ontario was unheard of on the platform throughout the election; he was not even a candidate, and the Farmers' Party and the Labour Party between them polled only about one-third of the votes that were polled in the recent election in Ontario. Still, my hon. friend does not question their mandate. Oh no, they are good for it. Why? Because he considers they are his friends; he says that there is little difference between them. Well, I am sorry for the farmers if there is little difference between the leader of the Opposition and his followers and the following of the Agrarian party. But there is the fact that the Government in Ontario to-day, sitting there and legislating for this great province, are there by reason of about one-third of the provincial vote cast in the recent election. It is true they are largely farmers and they possibly do not recognize that a citizen living in a city has a right to value his vote as highly as a man on the farm, because in Ontario, in the city of Toronto for instance, it takes the vote of three men to offset the vote of one man on the farm.

Mr. MAHARG: Is the present Government responsible for that?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The present Govenrment is not responsible for that, but it proposes to continue it after the situation has been pointed out. This was given to the Ontario Government by the generosity of the cities in times past, and while on various occasions it has been pointed out that a vote in the city should be worth as much as a vote in the country, that sentiment did not prevail, and to-day my hon. friend knows that it takes the votes of 60,000 people in the city of Toronto to offset the votes of 18,000 to 20,000 who are scattered throughout Ontario on the farms. Anybody knows that to be the fact.

Why should such a situation exist and why should a mandate that was given by not more than one-third of the population be considered good by my hon. friends opposite, when a mandate for a Government such as this is should be considered to be no good?

Do not let us forget the province of Manitoba. What has happened there? My hon. friend does not find any reason for asking the Government to relinquish the sweets of office. Why? Because it is a so-called Liberal Government—liberal to itself, but certainly not liberal to the people who oppose it, because in spite of an adverse majority at the polls, it proposes remaining in office. Why does my hon. friend not challenge some of his friends in that respect instead of challenging a Government that has had a mandate for the past three years and that has two years to run? I contend that the proper course for the Prime Minister to pursue is just the course that he has laid down, that is, to have a fair census taken this year of the Dominion of Canada, have a redistribution according to the population thus found, and after that appeal to the people.

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) shouts for an election. Well, that is a piece of heroics. I have often seen a dog that was chained up appear very anxious for a fight with a big fellow across the way. Let me at him, let me at him, he seems to say, and drags at his chain and tries to break loose, but finally when his chain is unloosed and he gets half way across the road and finds the other dog does not seem afraid but shows a tendency to meet him, he decides that he does not want to fight so very much after all. That is the position my hon. friend will be in. He has had the chance of testing the feeling in the province of Ontario on two occasions not very long ago, in Waterloo and North York, and in neither of those cases was my hon. friend so successful that he might wish to repeat the test. But he says: Give us an election; an election is what we are pining for, and what the country needs and must have. Well, gentlemen, you will get an election in due time, I imagine, and it is to be hoped that those who are shouting so loudly for it will be ready for the fray when it comes, because it comes like a thief in the night, and it may be nearer than we expect.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." The chances are, if the statement of my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) is true, that my hon. friend from Brome may find that his little constituency has disappeared from the map after re-distribution, and holding the views he does, I question very much if he could get a seat in Montreal where the people have some intelligence on economic questions. My hon. friend from Brome represents, I believe the smallest body of citizens in the Dominion of Canada that are in one hive, some 13,000 people. That means that Montreal, the city of intelligence in the province of Quebec, the city of big men and big things, requires from 60,000 to 70,000 votes to offset the vote of 13,000 people in the little county of Brome. Oh, my, that is a beautiful little county. I am somewhat surprised that a gentleman coming from so small a place should develop such a pugnacious tendency as my hon. friend has. He certainly had broadened out beyond the confines of his constituency. To hear him lay down the law, not only on free trade and protection, but all the rest of it, you would think he was the oracle of the province of Quebec, but after hearing the opinion the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville holds of him I have been forced to a different conclusion. My hon. friend certainly thought he would put the Premier in a very bad hole to-day when he pointed his finger at him and dared him to offer a bait to any of the gentlemen sitting around my hon. friend. Has my hon. friend any misgivings in his heart that the Premier even of the Dominion of Canada could tempt any of those just men to cross the floor under any condition whatsoever? I cannot imagine how my hon. friend could think the Premier had sufficient to offer of the loaves and fishes. After hearing the hon. member for Brome speak you would think you could take him up to the top of the mountains here, the Laurentians that the hon. gentleman knows so well, and offer him all the Kingdom he could survey from there, all that glory, if only he would cross the floor, but never conceive of him coming across.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER: I hope not.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: No, he could not be tempted. But the hon. gentleman, apparently, having seen the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville go away from him down into No Man's land, is afraid that the offers of the Prime Minister may win over some of the gentlemen around him. I must admit that this microbe of protection is very catching. It has got into the heart of my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Rouville in spite of my hon. friend from Brome, and it is liable to break out yet in unexpected places. I imagined I saw a wave of unrest this afternoon move over the features of some of my friends the Agrarians opposite, when they found the plague of protection had got into the very next row to them. However, that will no doubt disappear. We know these gentlemen are studying economics, because they have told us so. I wonder if they could also tell us that they study economy as well. I have not found much evidence of that.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): The luxury tax has made us study economy.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is the kind of economy the farmer is practising in Ontario. He is not practising economy with the public monies. I was going to point out to my hon. friends that in the province of Ontario the so-called Agrarian Government has the biggest expenditure ever, and when you find fault they say: Wait till you see us next year. The expenditure in the province of Ontario under this new combination runs close up to $75,000,000 for the past year, a sum vastly in excess of the requirements of this House when I first came into it a few years ago.

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): How much of that expenditure was on capital account?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am quite ready to tell my hon. friend if he gives me time. I am pointing out that the total expenditure of the new Government in Ontario, which had economy as one of the planks in their platform, exceeds that of any previous government by about $25,000,000. I think it is that much greater than the expenditure in the previous year under the late government, and that is only little compared with what they intend to do. They say, like Mr. Tarte said at one time: Wait till you see us next year. The expenditure that we are confronted with in the province of Ontario at the present time under the new order of things will stagger the people of this old province, especially the tax-payers. They will have to pay pretty dearly for the experiment of a group government and a new order of things in the province of Ontario. In reply to my hon. friend from Maple Creek, whose question was a very fair one, I understand that the expenditure on current account runs between $22,000,000 and $23,000,000, and that the expenditure on capital account is pretty nearly $50,000,000. My hon. friend will probably know whether that is correct or not, but I understand that is about how the figures stand. Then new taxes are proposed, five or six in number, only one of which will slightly touch the farmer. All the rest will go to the city people. That is how the farmers are showing their favour to the cities, by giving them five times as much to pay in taxation as they pay themselves.

Now, they went in with a flourish of trumpets with regard to economy, and when our hon. friends opposite come into power, as they expect to do in the near future in this Dominion, in addition to the said economics which we have been assured they are studying, they will also have to study economy, or we shall find the expense of the Dominion jumping up in the same proportion that we in the province of Ontario are confronted with at the present time.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Is the hon. gentleman aware that he is in Ottawa and not in Toronto?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is very kind of my hon. friend to remind me of that fact. We are told by the hon. Mr. Drury that he is only occupying his position in Ontario temporarily, that he expects to give the economic situation at Ottawa his early attention, and therefore we are justified in connecting Toronto with Ottawa in that respect, because our friends, though new on the job, are very ambitious and I can tell you they are excellent spenders. They not only spend money lavishly, but they spend, according to the doctrines laid down by some of our friends from the West, a large part of the money on the other side of the line; and then we wonder why the Canadian dollar is shrinking and ever shrinking, and why it takes $1.15 or $1.20 to pay for a dollar's worth of goods. It is because of the policy that my hon. friends would thrust upon this country, by which they would increase still further what is already far too large, that is to say, purchases from the United States. One would think that the legislation now proposed at Washington, and which we are told the Senate yesterday passed, would give a little new light to my hon. friends opposite. What about the Fordney Bill? Have they heard about it? Has my hon. friend from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) realized that the Fordney tariff proposes a duty of 30 cents a bushel on wheat—

An Hon. MEMBER: Forty cents.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Yes, forty cents on wheat, 20 per cent on flour, 15 cents a bushel on barley and all along the line; on cattle 3 cents per pound, and all the rest of it. Still we find that some of our hon. friends are ready to advocate that in spite of all this treatment which we have received or are about to receive from our neighbors to the south of us, they would continue not only the present liberal policy that has been pursued towards the United States but would increase the advantage still further by a large reduction of duties. So tha to-day the minister in Toronto, Mr. Smith, I think, who brought down the budget, complains that during the past year he has lost $800,000 on the exchange situation alone. Why did he deal so much in the United States? Why did he buy to such an extent in the United States as to incur an additional debt of $800,000 in the province of Ontario on exchange alone? Let the Hon. Mr. Biggs tell him why and how. When he wants road rollers or machinery for his roads does he buy them in Canada? I live close to the neighbourhood where a good deal of money was spent, not to much advantage, I am sorry to say, and along that road you can see evidences of where he buys rollers. It is plainly marked on the implements themselves showing that they come from the United States, and our dollar is going steadily down. I am glad to know that this Government proposes, in the light of the investigation that has taken place, to try to remedy some of these difficulties by giving a tariff that will be more safe and sound for the industries of Canada, and that will restore to its rightful place the value of the Canadian dollar. I believe there is no better dollar in the world than the Canadian dollar. We have resources in Canada that make our money just as good as any in the world, and therefore it is penalizing us in a way that should not be permitted in this country that we should buy $2 worth of goods in the United States for every $1 we sell them, and that has been the fact within the last two or three years. We have bought $2 for every $1 sold them. My policy is to buy less and sell more in the United States and thus restore the balance which has so far gone against us. That is a safe and sound policy and I recommend it to my hon. friends. I do not want to be hard on my Agrarian friends over the way. I am glad to see a good body of them here, and I think it is a pity sometimes, when I see them kept here all day long and late at night, that the rosy complexions and rotund figures of some of our swarthy brethren from the soil should be depleted, so to speak, by having to attend to public business in the House of Commons. Of course, I am somewhat interested in not wishing to see the group grow too rapidly. The hon. member for Maple Creek, in spite of his heterodox notions on some matters of business and public policy, looks like a man who has a good conscience, in the ruddy complexion and youthful appearance he shows in the House of Commons. I congratulate my hon. friend that in spite of all the strenuous efforts he has put forth in the interests of the Agrarian party he is looking so very hearty as I see him to-night.

I did not intend to dwell for more than a few moments on the tariff, and I have said already more than I intended to say on that question. Before I resume my seat I wish to direct attention to two or three matters on which possibly I may not be quite in line with some of my colleagues on this side of the House. I said, in the first place, when paying my tribute of respect to the new Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen), that I intended to follow him on all possible occasions. But I must say, as I have said on previous occasions, that in so far as the much-vaunted League of Nations is concerned, I am still a doubter. I am sorry to have to make that declaration, but I am glad to know that there must be either in the mind of His Excellency or in those of some of his advisers, somewhat the same opinion as I have myself with regard to the League of Nations, because I find, in the fifth line of the clause dealing with that subject, that it is termed a "great experiment." Truly, a great experiment, Mr. Speaker. I was very much interested and very much enlightened by the address of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) yesterday in dealing with that matter. He gave us some very enlightening information with regard to the aims of this great League of Nations that has been formed. I could have hoped that he would have dwelt not only upon what appeared to be the sunny side of the League, but on a few other matters that have perplexed and bewildered us and caused us some regret. For instance, what about disarmament? I understand that that question was shelved. Again, for example, what about reparations? What about indemnities? It is true that the hon. gentleman in speaking on this subject told us that they were going to cut across the history of six thousand years and reverse the old order of things. It has always been the order of things in the past that to the victors in war belong the spoils. It may be a false doctrine, but it has always existed, and it seems to me that in making peace, if we have won the war we have lost the peace, or some of the pieces at least. It may be a false doctrine but it was always there; and it seems to me that in making the peace if we won the war we have lost the peace, or we have lost some of the pieces. What about making Germany pay?

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: We in Canada are to be bled hard for a generation to pay for the cost of this great war. Do we forgive the Germans their debt? Do we say that after bringing that terrible ruin upon this world, after bringing ruin to a large part of France and turning nine millions of people out of their homes, and after devastating Belgium, Roumania, Serbia, and all those countries of Europe, that our delegates shall come back without any proposal with regard to what we are going to make Germany pay? Because that is one of the very few arguments that a German understands. He does understand though when you tap him in the pocket; it is one of the most sensitive parts of his constitution. I would like the Minister of Justice and the late President of the Privy Council to deal still further with this matter, and I believe they will do so. I should like them to take up one or two of these knotty points, and tell us what they are going to make Germany do with regard to reparation to France, to Belgium, and to those devastated countries, and tell us whether there is any possibility of Canada receiving some slight share of the immense indemnity that should be paid by reason of her financial sacrifice. Talk about taxation! I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is being taxed in a way that we have never known before. That is the case, and yet some of our agrarian friends say, "Put on an income tax." I have had the privilege of paying two income taxes, one to the Dominion Government and one to the local municipality, within the last six months. I expect to have to pay another before the year is out, making three within a year. I tell you that many of our people are feeling this taxation and feeling it keenly, and in all fairness I say to the Ministry, and especially to the Minister of Finance, that you cannot keep the wheels of commerce going in this country if you are going to take all the profits and a good deal of the capital. Because you have got to pay whether you make money or not. They will allow you to pay on those things on which you make a profit, but if you make a loss you must not take that into consideration —that is not in the bargain. I am glad to notice, Mr. Speaker, that the Government proposes to revise the Income Tax Act. I am glad to know that, because I think it is a wise announcement which will be received with satisfaction by the country. I do not believe that this Government, or any government, desires to take wrongfully from a man anything that he possesses. As I understand it, a government sets the standard of business morality for the country in which it rules—I thing that is a fair proposition—and that no act should be done, either by a strong government or any kind of a government, that would be opposed to justice and would not bear the light of investigation as an honest transaction. I feel that in the hurry of last session there was put through in the Income Tax Bill some of the most iniquitous features that I have ever seen in any legislation. I make these remarks in order that our friends on this side may take notice and during this session rectify what I believe is a grievous wrong. The Income Tax Act makes you your own assessor. You have got to assess yourself, they are not going to give you your bill any more. Formerly the bill was sent in by the man who was going to collect it, but not now. It is going to be made up by yourself, and you are warned that if you make a mistake of ten per cent you will be fined at that rate on the mistake you made. If you make a twenty per cent mistake you will be fined half the amount of the capital concerned; and if you make a mistake of over twenty per cent woe betide you, because you will be liable to a fine of $10,000 and to six months' imprisonment. Now in all justice I say, Mr. Speaker, that such a state of things as that should be rectified in this Dominion. I am glad to know that such a proposal is on the agenda, and before the session is over we will possibly have that rectified.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two with regard to another matter. There are quite a few in Canada who are ready to pull down everything that has been built up with the greatest pains for a thousand years past. I mean in Britain, and in Canada, our laws and a large part of our constitutions are copied from Britain. These persons are prepared to sacrifice all that has been built up at such pains for some current fad that has never been tried out and which is not likely to succeed. That should not obtain with such a people as we have in this Dominion. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that it is the part of good citizenship at the present time to play safe, to advocate no change but what will be for the better; and if you are not absolutely sure that it will be for the better, stick to what you have until you know. If this country, and if civilization itself, is to be saved, there must be more care taken by public men and by those who guide public thought than has been witnessed in Canada in the past. During the past two or three years we have had every kind of heterodox preaching from every soap box that could be found in the province of Ontario. We have it in Ontario and it extends to many of the other provinces both East and West. This is a state of things that should not exist, and I rejoice that our good old friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Sir Sam Hughes) has a resolution on the Order Paper, that is to come up a little later in the session, in which he deals with Empire matters. This is no time, Mr. Speaker, to cut the old flag down, to tear apart the few remaining threads that hold Canada to the Mother land. We have but four of them remaining and yet right here in the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario and in the heart of the Dominion, we have had it recommended recently by one high in authority that the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be done away with, and that the Governor General should no longer come from overseas but should be appointed in Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend from Brome, who is ready to be carried about by every wind of doctrine and every fad that comes down the line, says "Hear, hear" to the former statement. I wonder if my hon. friend would not call for the Queen of Sheba to come back and rule if it were possible to get her here.

An Hon. MEMBER: No petticoat Government.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend is ready to call for anything rather than what he is getting. He is getting a very fair government, why not keep it? Why should we, I say, wish for a moment to cut loose these few remaining threads that bind Canada to the Motherland? Let me tell you what these threads are, as I can see them to be. There is the King—long live the King! There is the flag—long wave the flag! There is the appeal to the Privy Council—long may it continue! Because that appeal has stood between us and a great many very difficult disputes in the past. If time would permit me I could point out where, in respect to the province of Ontario in the past, Sir John Macdonald and Sir Oliver Mowat—a name that was known throughout the length and breadth of the province at that time—had a life and death struggle about an increase of territory. Sir John said "Not one acre of land, not one stick of timber will you get." Sir Oliver Mowat on the other hand said "We will have both." The dispute was carried to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and although I was against Sir Oliver and in favor of Sir John I must say that I did not shed any tears when the Privy Council said "Sir Oliver is right on this occasion and Ontario gets both the acres and the timber."

There is just one case of the value of an appeal when a difficulty arises between a province and the Dominion. What could be better than this appeal? And yet we have a man, high in authority in the province of Ontario, who has advocated in Ottawa within recent days that this right of appeal should be done away with. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is no time to tear down any of the safeguards that surround our constitution. The world is full of unrest; the Mother Country is beset with troubles and cares, both from without and within; the nation is in peril to-day —Lloyd George tells us so. Will we in Canada, who have practically no grievance, give it out to the world that we, too, are full of unrest and want to cut the painter? Are we going to have an election, as they have had in South Africa recently, to decide whether or not we will stay with the Motherland? I hope not. But, Mr. Speaker, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the enemies of the Empire are abroad, they are sowing the seeds of discord wherever they can be sown, and the attempt is being made even in some parts of Canada to raise the red flag and to call not only for the dissolution of the British Empire, but for the overthrow of constituted Government in this and other parts of the Empire.

In a time such as this none of us who wish well to our country and to our Empire can afford to experiment in any degree with any of those ties that have held us so long to that good old land over the sea. I, for one, trust that I shall not live to see the day when the few remaining threads that hold us to the Motherland from which many of us come will be cut asunder, because bad as may be the example of some Britishers, and bad as the rule may be said to be in some parts of the Empire, the world has yet to show any better constitution, any greater safeguards to our liberties, to our rights and to our religious freedom than has been brought to us by reason of the benign rule that has been handed out to the Dominions from over the seas in a very mild way; and we have had not only all, but much more liberty than is enjoyed in most of the countries of the world.

This then in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, is no time to advocate any of those changes that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) would so lightly adopt overnight and repent of on the morrow, because I am sure he would repent when he saw the evil he had done; but once he cuts the painter and casts off, he will find no place of repentance, though he should seek it in tears. I beseech him to be a little more guarded when he applauds every fad that comes down the line and is prepared to adopt almost anything in the way of legislation that will bring a change—especially a change of Government. The hon. gentleman does not recognize a good Government when he sees one.

Mr. COPP: We have not seen one for a long time.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It is the kind of glasses he wears with the result that he cannot see the qualities possessed by the Government that occupies the treasury benches at the present time.

But I hope, Mr. Speaker, whether the appeal to the people come early or whether it be delayed, that the electorate will recognize that we have about as good a form of government—I am not speaking of this particular Government—as exists in any country in the world, and that no attempt will be made in such times as these to upset the apple-cart, to change any of the vital parts of our constitution by the introduction of fads. I see my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) smiling; he has the referendum and the recall in his mind; I call those fads which we do not want to adopt in this country. I hope that when the appeal comes, whether the party opposite to me or the party on this side or the Agrarian party should succeed to power—and there is quite a possibility that my agrarian friends will be found in the majority, for elections are very uncertain—

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: They are very uncertain.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am glad that my hon. friend from Red Deer agrees with me that elections are very uncertain. I believe that if he agrees with me to that extent he is going to vote about the same way as I am on this amendment, because it is safer to hang on to a seat that you are sure of for one year than it is to take the chance of a seat for five years which may not eventuate. I think my hon. friend, who in the absence of the real leader is leading the Agrarian party, is a man on whose judgment I can rely in this respect, and I feel that my words have not been in vain when I get corroboration from the hon. member that he thinks that axiom which I have just pronounced is a true one. I hope he will act on it; and as some of his followers are comparatively new in the House, if he instructs them that he thinks the best interests of the Agrarian party would be served on the present occasion by voting against the amendment and in favour of the continuance of this Government until the census has been taken and redistribution made, I think he will carry conviction to his own constituents and to the people generally in the great provinces in the West.

I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for thus far trespassing upon the patience of the House. I feel that I have not done anything like justice to the various questions mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but at the same time I feel that I was justified in making these few remarks, and I hope that the hon. member who has moved the amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King), although he has not heard them, will read them before he casts his vote, and will realize that he will be inconsistent in pushing that amendment now after what I have pointed out is going on in the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. C. G. POWER (South Quebec): Mr. Speaker, allow me in the time-honoured fashion to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address. Though one belongs to the older generation of parliamentarians and the other to the new, they have both worthily fulfilled the task entrusted to them. It is to their credit that they discharged so well the somewhat thankless and politically unprofitable task of bolstering up a dying party. The compliments which they addressed to the ministry and to the Government I can make no objection to, for I agree fully with the old saying—de mortuis nil nisi bonum.

In reference to the other speakers, we have had two who have given us highly instructive and entertaining addresses on the League of Nations. One, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) seems to be strongly in favour of this grand institution; and the other, the hon. member who has just at down (Mr. Cockshutt), would appear to be rather violently oposed to it. I am sorry, for I hardly think that the opinions either of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or of the hon. member for Brantford will influence in the slightest degree the statesmen of the world who have founded the League.

We had another address this afternoon—or, rather, a performance—and I wish to make but a slight reference to it. I can only hope that when the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) crosses the floor of the House he will be as true and faithful to his new friendships and to his new friend as he was to the old. I can only hope and pray that he will be as worthy of the trust and confidence of hon. members opposite as he has shown himself to-day to be worthy of our trust and confidence.

I congratulate the new leader of the new party which is now facing us, but not upon the party which he has acquired, the very weakness of which must cause him many a wakeful night. I hope for his sake that he will give the people the chance to deprive him of his friends and so enable him to return to his normal state of mind. I congratulate him, but not on being the choice from such a field; I give him credit for being worthy of better rivals. Nor do I congratulate him on the colleagues whom he has inherited; were I to say too much about that I might be accused of sarcasm in vaunting his legacy. But I do congratulate him from the bottom of my heart on having attained the highest position in the gift of the Canadian people. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) corrects me—the highest position in the gift of his Tory friends. Fortune may have favoured him in eliminating from the field other more popular and, perhaps, worthier rivals. It may have favoured him too, in that those members of his Cabinet and those of his colleagues who were not quite certain that he would make the best Prime Minister were unable to put before their followers and before the Tory party one who was better fitted for the position than himself. However, we must say this for him; that his elevation is due, to a large extent, to his own untiring energy, to his own perseverance, to his own courage, and to his undoubtedly high talent. We are quite willing to acknowledge those talents. We are quite willing, from having felt them, to admit the weight and temper of his blows. We are willing to admit also that time and again he has been called upon to save the threatened citadel of Toryism and that time and again he has given unsparingly his learning, his wit and his eloquence to his party. We have only one criticism to make of him: that we consider it would have been far better for the country as a whole had this wit and energy and these high talents been devoted more to the general welfare of the country than to the welfare of a section thereof.

We consider also—and I wonder whether the hon. gentleman was not himself thinking of it yesterday—that the country expects a somewhat greater degree of dignity and of poise in its Prime Minister than is shown by the employment of the tactics of a partisan and the adoption of the policy of a guerilla leader. The day before yesterday I noticed that in his remarks there was missing the old fire, the old biting sarcasm, and the result probably was that his speech lacked that enthusiasm which he had been in the habit of communicating to the gentlemen behind him. I noticed, too, that during the course of one of his electoral campaigns this summer, at Sherbrooke, he may have thought it would be well before an audience so distinguished as that which faced him there, to put aside his fighting posture.

10 p.m. Anyway, we read in the newspapers, and it was placarded throughout the land, that this new and courageous leader had come down to the province of Quebec and freely admitted the paternity and his advocacy of the conscription measure and other measures of a similar nature. The trouble was that the right hon. gentleman, having in mind the thoughts to which I have just alluded, forgot to make the remarks ascribed to him in the press throughout the country—the very remarks for which he received encomiums throughout the West and Ontario. It was freely stated, and it has never been contradicted, that in Sherbrooke the right hon. gentleman made no reference whatever to those matters.

However, I did not intend to go at length into the question of the career of the Prime Minister and of his fitness for the post which he now occupies. I intend to-night to discuss as briefly as I can the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and the consequence of that amendment—the dissolution of Parliament and an appeal to the people.

We have in the House three different schools of thought. We have a number of hon. gentlemen to my left, who believe that in all things and in all matters the members of this House should be the mouthpieces of their constituents, and that in all things and in all matters they should represent with the fidelity of a gramophone the views which at that moment find support in the local riding, altogether irrespective, I am sorry to say, of the general good and the general welfare of the people. The adoption of this theory would make of this House nothing but an assembly of delegates whose mandate would be revocable at will, and those who hold their positions would hold them only by a very precarious tenure, depending entirely upon whatever wind, for good or for evil, was blowing in the constituency.

To the hon. member from Red Deeer (Mr. Michael Clarke) I will say this: he has been for many years, and still is, I think, the guardian in this House of the Gladstonian traditions. He has too much respect for and too much knowledge of the British constitution to share with his colleagues the views which some of them have espoused.

There is another point of view, that held by a number of hon. gentlemen oposite. They adopt a point of view which I might call, although it may offend them, an American one. They take their principles from the American Constitution which states that a government, or a ministry, or a member, or a congressman is elected for a certain term of years and may remain in office for that full term. It is true, having regard for our Constitution and for proper parliamentary practice, they hold that they depend for the length of time during which they might hold office, on their majority in the House of Commons. In our present political position and if we take into consideration almost every government which has been in power since Confederation, this would really mean nothing more nor less than that the Government could remain in power for their full term unless such purely accidental circumstances as death or appointments to lucrative offices under the Crown had so diminished the numbers of their supporters that they no longer had a majority in the House. In other words, hon. gentlemen opposite hold that their tie to office is to be assimilated to the marriage tie—only to be dissolved by death or the Senate.

There is another point of view, that held by those on this side of the House, who believe in and are followers of Liberal principles. We believe that whilst no temporary outburst of sectional feeling or passing breeze of popular fancy should affect, to the extent of requiring a dissolution, any government strong in the confidence of the saner elements of the population and recently come from the electorate, there is no doubt that a government, to remain in power, must have a steady, constant support from the majority of the people, and that such support must be inspired by the trust which the majority had in that government's programme as outlined before them in an election previously held. We contend that the dictum of Edmund Burke "that the value, spirit and essence of the House of Commons consists in its being the express image of the feeling of the nation" is the proper constitutional standpoint to take. We believe—and I do not think I shall be contradicted by any supporter of the Government—that this House of Commons is not the image of the people of this country; that it does not represent the feelings of the nation; that it represents only a distorted view of the feelings of the nation, and further, that should this House of Commons be dissolved and we be returned before the people, there will be a great and material change in its personnel and composition.

May I glance for the moment at the history of this Government? It was formed, amidst the plaudits of the whole country, by what was said to be the best and most patriotic citizens of Canada, united for one purpose alone, to win the war. I do not wish to quote at any great length from the assertions of my hon. friends opposite, but it was repeated on the platform and in the press that this was merely a temporary alliance, and that as soon as the war was over, the Unionist party would be dissolved into its constituent parts.

I do not care to say much with regard to the means taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to win the election, except that, owing to their appeal, thousands and tens of thousands of people throughout the country voted for the Unionist party and for the candidates thereof, people who, under other circumstances, have never had the slightest confidence in either. Having obtained power with a substantial majority, the Government proceeded to exercise this power with an autocracy which has seldom been surpassed in Canadian history. The most priceless, the most cherished rights of the people were trampled upon. Orders in Council were passed and put into force without consultation of Parliament and, in many cases, in direct violation of pledges made and given to the electorate. To every argument that right and justice were being violated and that public decency was being outraged, there was only one answer: "We must win the war.,'

No matter what took place, it was justified with that end in view.

As soon as the war was over, the reaction took place, and the people, who had, up to that time, been most submissive to authority were the first to demand with no uncertain voice that the privileges possessed by them and their ancestors should be returned to them. Though the administration has been growing steadily weaker and its majority in this House has been diminished at almost every division, it was considered wholly right, fair and just that the Government should carry on until such time as demobilization was complete. After demobilization was complete, when every newspaper of any standing in the community, when every man, outside of the House, of any standing admitted that the ministry of Sir Robert Borden and the Unionist party was doomed to an early end to its career, it was suddenly discovered that it might be well to form a new party and, with a new leader, to endeavour to re-establish the dwindling popularity of hon. gentlemen opposite. The new leader thus forced to take over the reins of power was faced with an onerous task. He had to reconstruct the cabinet and renovate the party. Had he been successful in accomplishing this we might have been justified in granting him our suffrages in order that he might retain power.

But what has he done? He has taken three new ministers into his Cabinet. One, I am sorry to say, was not obliged to face the electors. Had it been otherwise, I am sure that the explanations which he would have given in answer to questions such as were suggested by my hon. friend from Brome would have been highly interesting to his electorate and to the country. The other two went before the people and were elected. These gentlemen are great personal friends of mine and I have no wish to offend them. I wish to congratulate them upon their appointment to office. But may I also say that I congratulate them on their peculiarly good fortune in representing such constituencies, and upon their still greater good fortune in being supporters of a party which could not without extreme difficulty elect any one else.

Elections have been held in three other constituencies, seats traditionally Tory. In the one, the Government majority was reduced substantially, and in the other two the candidates of the Government met with ignominious defeat, with the result that there has been and is to-day throughout the country a very strong and almost unanimous demand for an election, which demand is joined in not only by the Liberals but by the most bigoted and fanatical supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite. On this question of the by-elections, may I quote a gentleman whose authority I am sure will not be questioned by hon. gentlemen opposite, the Rt. Hon. William Ewart Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone at one period of his career, whilst he was Prime Minister, suffered a number of losses in by-elections and we find that he—I am quoting from Gladstone's life—"laid before the Cabinet a pretty full outline of the case as to the weakness of the Government since the crisis of last March and the increase of that weakness, especially of late, from the unfavourable character of the local indications." I submit that at the present moment in this country there is no doubt whatever about the unfavourable character of the local indications, the local indications being the by-elections held.

But there is something more. There is the unfavourable character of the local indications when we refer to the by-elections not held, when we refer to the badly needed reconstruction of the Cabinet, and the fact that it is impossible or almost impossible for the Government to have new ministers elected. We have heard a great deal of late about reconstruction, and I am reminded of the old homely proverb that in order to skin your rabbit, you must first catch him. Similarly, to reconstruct your Cabinet, you must first elect your ministers. In studying the history of the British Constitution—and this history, when it is written, is to be found chiefly in the debates of the House of Commons—I find that a situation similar to that which exists here to-day existed in the Old Country not many years ago. In the year 1900 the Empire was engaged in a struggle in South Africa with the Boers. The struggle, though not one which would affect the integrity of the Empire, was sufficient to give cause for considerable uneasiness to the people of England. The English troops had met with some rather severe and unexpected defeats, and generally, the position was not of the happiest. In 1900 the Parliament was dissolved and the electors of England were called upon to elect a new Parliament. The Tory party, true to its principles and its best traditions, went to the country on one issue, and on one issue alone. They waved the flag. They alone were the patriots; others were the enemies of their country, and, as has happened before, the people of England, as were later on another and a better people, were deceived and the Tory party was elected. They dragged on for some considerable time, until 1905, when we find that the people of England had become rather tired of this war ministry, and that the representatives of the people in the House were making exactly the same demand on the Government as we are to-day making on this Government. In that connection may I quote, because the circumstances are so similar, from Mr. Asquith? He said:

> For let us remember that when this House was elected in 1900, Lord Salisbury was the Prime Minister.

May I say that in 1900 when the Tory party came into power in England Lord Salisbury was the Prime Minister, but he was succeeded shortly afterwards by the Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour. So the circumstances were very similar to the situation here. The hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) was in power and he was succeeded by the present Prime Minister. To continue the quotation:

> Where is the Ministry and where is the Party that Lord Salisbury left to his successor? The one, the Ministry, has disappeared. Nothing would have surprised the country more in the year 1900 than if they had been told that they were voting for installing on the Treasury Bench the gentlemen who at present occupy it.

May I say that nothing would have surprised the people of this country more than to have been told in 1917 that they were voting to install on the Treasury Bench the hon. gentlemen who now occupy it. He goes on:

> The Ministry has disappeared and you have to look and search about for most, at any rate, of its more distinguished and experienced members in all sorts of unexpected quarters.

May I call the attention of the House to the fact that exactly the same condition obtains here. The most distinguished and most important members of the ministry are scattered in all sorts of unexpected quarters. Two of them now sit on this side of the House. One of them has even had his title to sit in this House challenged. Another of them has accepted a high position in the gift of the Crown, and still another, and I am sorry for him, has announced publicly that he will support his colleagues, and save them and keep them righteous and godly only when questions of international importance are being discussed. When these questions are not being discussed he leaves his friends to pursue their own course of salvation.

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: I thought it was the other way.

Mr. POWER: My respect for the rules of the House prevented my making the suggestion made by the hon. minister. To continue the quotation:

> Where is the party? What has become of the party? The party, as every man I am addressing knows, has split and sundered beyond the salving power of any person.

With respect to the party which faced us after the election of 1917, we find a goodly number of the most respectable members sitting on this side of the House. Their independence and their courage have shown the way for them to come across the floor of the House and sit on the side where it is posible to be independent and to be honest in one's opinions on questions of public policy. I could go on quoting at considerable length, but since the hour is growing late I think it would be well to cut my remarks short.

Mr. McMASTER: Go on.

Mr. POWER: I could refer any hon. gentlemen who are interested in this matter and who wish to obtain constitutional precedents in regard to the question, to the Parliamentary Debates of the British House of Commons for February 1905, wherein they will find ample matter for discussion and for the enlightenment of their minds with reference to the true constitutional view to be supported in this debate. But in order to show my impartiality and to prove that I am moved only by highest motives in supporting my hon. friend—I will quote a gentleman whose authority may perhaps be more respected by hon. members oposite, and I will quote him in such a manner that I hardly think the advice which he gives will be ill received. The Rt. Hon. Arthur J. Balfour in February, 1895, referring to the Rosebery Ministry, which had at that time gotten itself into a situation somewhat similar to that of hon. gentlemen opposite, said:

> I have never observed in the history of this country that any party of any Government have gained credit from hanging on to office, in the vulgar sense without power and with only the insignia of office, from hanging on to their places when they were deprived of all real influence on the course of events and when the general trend of public opinion was against them. Under such circumstances the Government may possibly do good administrative work.

Possibly.

> It may possibly continue to hold its tenure of office for one month, two months, six months, or even a year or more, but you will never find in the history of this country that this has had the result of increasing the credit of a Government with those on whose favour their fortunes ultimately rest.

You will see that this advice is given in the best interests of hon. gentlemen oposite. But if this were the only result, that their credit in the country would be diminished, I confess that we should not have very much ground for complaint. But by carrying on the course which they are pursuing, the very foundation of parliamentary government is being shaken, and the principles on which this constitution has been founded are being endangered. We then have the right to protest, as we do, in the most emphatic manner possible. I submit that it is useless for hon. gentlemen to carry on any longer. They have lost the confidence of the country. They have lost the confidence of every important body and every important interest in the community. The business community looks with horror on gentlemen who are able to lose $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 every year on the management of railways. Business men stand aghast at the probable cost of that new and useless ornament which we have added to the country's burden, namely, the Mercantile Marine. They are convinced that it will not be many years before it will equal in deficits the other branch of the service, and that we shall pay as much for it as for that other ill-fated adventure in public ownership.

With reference to the farming community, I find it difficult to say anything more than what my hon. friends to my left can say. We know that the farmers have a good deal to say to the Government and the people of the country. With regard to the labouring classes, I have only this to say, that they too are convinced that hon. gentlemen opposite have not the confidence of the people. They are convinced that they are not properly represented by hand-picked gentlemen in another Chamber. They are convinced that if the Lords of the Council only go before the people labour will have that oportunity for which it has been waiting a long time.

Another class of the community about which we heard a great deal in 1917, something in 1918, something in 1919, but a gradually diminishing amount as the years go on, have been the ex-soldiers, our boys at the front, our boys in the trenches, boys for whom the election was fought and, may I say, boys with whom some of the seats were won. These same boys have a word to say. May I quote from a manifesto issued by Mr. R. B. Maxwell in his official capacity as President of the Great War Veterans' Association, the largest body of organized soldiers in the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. Maxwell says:

> Parliament has confessed inability to redeem former pledges and restore to returned soldiers and dependents in a substantial measure the economic advantages they would now enjoy but for war service. Parliament has shown reluctance to offset much failure by general measures for the improvement of living conditions throughout the country whereby returned soldiers might more easily regain a secure foothold in the national life. Parliament now requires that those who served in the war shall share in the payment of the major portion of the war debt despite the fact that war accumulated wealth remains practically unmolested.
>
> Parliament as at present constituted apparently cannot cope with distressing living conditions which affect not only the returned soldiers but the public generally. Parliament has denied to the electors of Canada any opportunity since 1911 to assert their views upon domestic questions by means of the ballot. Parliament continues to ignore the fact that the demand for a general election does not arise solely from among returned soldiers but is supported by the vast majority of those who have the interests of the country at heart and who view with alarm the increasing unrest. Parliament has outlived its mandate. The time has arrived for the people to declare themselves on the vital questions of the day. I therefore call upon you in defense of the basic principles upon which this association was founded to assemble in mass meeting with your fellow citizens and secure without delay an unmistakeable expression of the wishes of the people in regard to the necessity of a general election.

Sir, we have heard the views of the authorized representative of the returned soldiers of Canada, those returned soldiers for whom we were prepared to do so much. I ask the hon. gentleman who said to the soldiers in France, "When you return Canada is yours," to only allow the returned soldiers a chance to vote in Canada —one little chance to exercise that franchise for which they fought. If you will only give them that little chance, if they are only permitted that opportunity, hon. gentlemen opposite will have earned their gratitude. They will have shown for the first time since they came into power that they are really prepared to agree to the wishes of the returned soldiers.

There is another class, and this class I mention last, because in my mind it is the most important. By means of a series of indignities and insults, without parallel even in the days of our earlier history, some hon. gentlemen opposite have alienated the sympathy of a whole province and of a whole race. In order to win victory at the polls a campaign of hate and a propaganda of detraction was launched, which I admit was to a large extent successful, and our province was pointed to as a pariah among the other provinces of Confederation. Experience has taught us that this enforced isolation has not affected us in the slightest degree, and we have not been annihilated or destroyed by the enmity of the central government. On the contrary, since we have been so splendidly isolated we have experienced our best and our most prosperous days. We find that the enmity of our opponents has united us and their offers of friendship will not divide us. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that one of our party has been detached from us, but the day and the hour of the electors of the county of St. Hyacinthe-Rouville is at hand.

I have this much more to say with regard to that same province. We can forgive and we will do so. We will do so cheerfully as it is one of the precepts of the religion which most of us profess. But we will not forget, and we will never put it in the power of any Government to strike a blow at our prestige and our standing in the community such as has been attempted to be struck by hon. gentlemen opposite. Never again will it be possible for any Government, in order to win an election, to point to us as those who have wished to break the Confederation pact. Never again will the people of this country allow hon. gentlemen opposite or their successors to get into office by a campaign of calumny and of detraction such as has been waged. The people of the rest of the Dominion now know that in the province of Quebec there resides a population which is the sanest and most honourable in the whole Dominion, and that in spite of accusations of backwardness and of being priest-ridden, in no part of Canada are the citizens more free or more happy. We live in a province that is free and contented, but if I am to believe the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), the case is far different in our sister province. We are free, contented and happy and we have never been more so than since we have been forced into our splendid isolation.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the business community are with us with the exception perhaps of some who have been frightened by the voice of the Prime Minister and his satellites when they accused the leader of the Liberal party and his followers of Bolshevist tendencies. The Prime Minister by that accusation may have frightened some of the business community. But there are others, who realize that with the advent to power of members from this side of the House the day of the profiteer and of "special interests" is at an end. Those gentlemen and those interests will, I am sure, support to their utmost capacity when any election is held, hon. gentlemen opposite.

I have shown that the labour classes are not supporting this Government. I have shown that the agricultural classes are not supporting this Government. I have shown that the returned soldiers far from supporting it are praying only for its dissolution; I have shown that through its own fault this Government has earned the disdain and contempt of a whole race. Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is nothing further to be said on the question, that there is nobody left to support hon. gentlemen opposite, that they no longer represent and they no longer are the image of the people of this country. I would like in conclusion, if I may be permitted, to quote just two lines of poetry. It is not my habit to quote poetry, but this is so applicable to the situation that I feel I shall be doing a service by giving the quotation on the present occasion:

There is on earth a more auguster thing,
Veiled though it be, than Parliament or King.

And that, Sir, is the public conscience. On this occasion the public conscience has been outraged. The public conscience cries aloud for the hon. members opposite to resign; it cries aloud to this House to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King), an amendment which would involve a dissolution and would bring those hon. members before the bar of the public opinion of this country.

On the motion of Mr. A. Thompson (Yukon) the debate was ajourned.

On the motion of the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Friday, February 18, 1921.

The House met at three o'clock.

PRINTING—JOINT COMMITTEE

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing namely, Messrs. Bowman, Brouillard, Buchanan, Cardin, Charters, Clark (Bruce), Clarke (Wellington), Crowe, Currie, Fontaine, Hocken, Hughes (Sir Sam), Keefer, Maclean (Halifax), Michaud, Murphy, Prevost, Richardson, Shaw, Verville, White (Victoria), Wilson (Wentworth), and Wright, will act as members on the part of this House on the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY—JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. MEIGHEN MOVED:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has appointed Messrs. Andrews, Beland, Borden (Sir Robert), Boyer, Chaplin, Clark (Red Deer), Cooper, Cronyn, Crothers, Drayton (Sir Henry), Foster (Sir George) Harold, King, Lapointe, Lemieux, Meighen, Myers, Pardee, Rowell, Sheard, and Whidden, a Committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTES

On motion of Hon. Mr. Meighen the Select Standing Committees of the House were severally empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records; with the exception of the Committee on Debates and that on the Library of Parliament.

CANADIAN MERCHANT MARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WM. DUFF (Lunenburg): Is the report correct that the steamships "Canadian Mariner" and "Canadian Explorer," lately built by the Halifax shipyards on the orders of the Government, have been registered in the Port of Montreal? If so, may I ask why they were not registered in Halifax instead?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question which the hon. member asks is one that should properly be placed on the Order Paper. It is not a question of such urgency as to warrant its being asked on the Orders of the Day.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Thursday, February 17.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (Durham): Mr. Speaker, while I have not had the privilege of being in the House and listening during the past two days. to the discusion that has taken place on the motion for the adoption of the Address I judge, from a perusal of Hansard, that the procedure adopted on this occasion is to devote one day to a general political party controversy and the next to the consideration of questions of public importance upon which there is a substantial degree of unanimity in the House. I judge, from reading yesterday's debate in Hansard, that this is the day for a discussion of a matter on which there may be a substantial measure of agreement. I therefore shall be quite within the limits of the procedure so far pursued in discussing the Address. if I confine my observations to that one important paragraph in the Address dealing with the League of Nations and the work of the assembly of the League at Geneva. The House has had the benefit, if the right hon. gentleman will permit me to say so, of a very clear, comprehensive, and wholly admirable review of the work of the Assembly at Geneva and of the purposes for which the League of Nations was formed. My duty this afternoon, therefore, will be to fill in some of the details of the picture sketched in such broad and clear outline by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). Before, however, referring to some of the matters discussed at Geneva, may I say in passing that I shall not attempt to go into great detail this afternoon, for I judge that the time for a detailed discussion, if the House desires to have such a discussion, will be when the estimates for the League are before the House. At that time there will be a full opportunity to ask and to answer questions in reference to these important matters. Let me preface my remarks as to the work of the Assembly by one or two general observations in reference to the League of Nations and the great purpose which it is designed to serve in the world. Prior to the present time, so far as history preserves for us a record, each nation has looked upon every other nation as a real or potential enemy; and because each nation has regarded every other in that light it has felt compelled to protect itself against aggression by erecting works for defence, by establishing armies, by building navies, and by taking all the precautions necessary to protect it against aggressive attack, or if aggressively inclined it has taken these measures to ensure success in its attacks upon its neighbours. The same idea has compelled nations to form alliance, to associate other nations with themselves in alliances more or less close, with the object of offsetting other alliances among other nations and so preserving what has been know for a long time in diplomacy as the balance of power. The culmination of that policy, and its severest condemnation, has been the great war from which we have just emerged, and the crimes and atrocities, as well as the loss and suffering, which that war entailed, compelled humanity to try and discover some other principle which should find expression in the diplomacy and policy of the world. That other expression is, that each nation should look upon every other nation if not as a real, at least as a potential friend, and that the best safeguard of the peace of the world is not in arming for conflict but in co-operating together to prevent armed conflict; and that is the principle embodied in the Covenant of the League of Nations.

We all recognize in organized society the difference between a private wrong and a public wrong. We recognize there are certain injuries which if a private citizen sustains at the hands of another citizen his redress is through the civil courts. There are other injuries where the law steps in and says, although an injury has been done a private citizen, a public wrong has been committed, and no matter what the desire of the parties immediately concerned, justice must be vindicated and the guilty party must be punished. Therefore we have the public prosecution of public wrongs.

Too often in international affairs serious controversies between states, have been regarded as only of immediate concern to the two parties to the dispute, and each nation has claimed the right to settle its dispute with its neighbour nation in whatever way it thought best, regardless of the views or interests of the other nations of the world. The world is coming to realize the fact that there are public rights and public wrongs in international affairs, just as there are public rights and wrongs in domestic affairs in each civilized country, and it is no longer possible to permit a nation to make war upon another to redress its own grievances and so disturb the peace of the whole world, and that war, or a threat of war, in any part of the world is a matter of concern to all the nations. That is another principle which finds expression through the Covenant of the League of Nations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me make one or two observations in explanation of what the League is, and I ask pardon of the House for coming back to a matter which has been so frequently discussed. I do it, however, because wherever one goes one finds great misapprehension as to the purposes and functions of the League of Nations. Let me say, notwithstanding what has been so often suggested, the League is not a super-state. The League has no jurisdiction to undertake the government of the world or to settle all difficulties that may arise in various quarters of the world. I have heard the complaint made that the League is ineffective because wars are now going on in various parts of the world. The League was not organized for the purpose of making peace, following the recent war. That is the task of the Supreme Council, and if peace has not been established up to date in many quarters of the world it is not because of any failure on the part of the League. It is because the Supreme Council, in view of the policy of the past and the conditions of the present, has not been able to bring about peace. The question came directly before the Council of the League some months ago on the application of the King of the Hedjaz in complaint against France in connection with certain acts committed in Lebanon. The Council of the League took the position, which is justified under the Treaty and under the Covenant, that it was not their duty to make the peace. They were organized to preserve the peace once it was made, and as peace had not been established as between Turkey and the Allied Powers, the League had no jurisdiction to intervene in that dispute.

I mention these matters because another question has been asked. What is the League doing to secure reparation from Germany for the crimes she has committed and the losses occasioned by the war? The League, Mr. Speaker, has no jurisdiction over that matter; it is entirely beyond its jurisdiction. That is a matter entirely for the Supreme Council which must deal with that problem and settle it.

What then are the functions of the League? They are of three-fold character. I would call them the primary and secondary functions under the Covenant, and third, certain functions under the Treaties of Peace.

What is the primary function of the League under the Covenant? It is to preserve the peace of the world by the prevention of war, and to prevent war by providing a substitute for war as a means of settling international disputes. The secondary function of the League, as was so well pointed out in the address delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is to provide a means for international co-operation in a large number of matters of common concern to all the nations of the world. What are the duties of the League under the Treaties of Peace? I shall give two or three illustrations. Under the Treaty of Versailles the League is responsible for naming the commission and organizing the Government of the Saar Basin. On that commission is one of our Canadian citizens, Mr. Waugh of Winnipeg, and I am sure it will be a matter of gratification to you, as it was to us, to hear from the officials of the League in Geneva the strongest testimony to the splendid service that Mr. Waugh was rendering as a member of that commission. The League had also to arrange for the government of the free city of Dantzig, to negotiate a Treaty between Dantzig and Poland, and to name a commissioner as governor of that city. They are responsible for guaranteeing the carrying out of certain of the clauses of the minorities treaties entered into pursuant to the Treaties of Peace. The League is now devoting its energies to these important functions. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has dealt with the organization of the Council and the Assembly, and I shall therefore pass on to touch upon some phases of the work of the Assembly at Geneva which were not explained by my hon. friend the other day. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that in the organization of the Assembly we had to appoint a president. Modesty perhaps prevented him from explaining that we had also to elect vice-presidents. There were six vice-presidents who were chairmen of the six commissions of the Assembly, and there were six vice-presidents at large elected by the delegates present at the Assembly. I am sure it is a matter of congratulation to the House and the country that the chairman of the Canadian delegation was chosen as one of the vice-presidents at large of the first Assembly at Geneva. All matters which came before the Assembly were referred for consideration and report to one of the six commissions appointed by the Assembly. The subjects entrusted to these commissions were: First, Constitutional Questions; Second, Technical Organizations; Third, the permanent Court of International Justice; Fourth, the Secretariat and the Budget; Fifth, Admission of new States; and, Sixth, Armaments, Mandates, and the Economic Blockade. In the allotment of positions on these commissions it so happened that I was assigned to numbers one and two; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) to numbers three and six; and the Chairman of our delegation, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) to numbers four and five. As the work of the Assembly progressed it appeared that commissions one and two, and four and five would meet at the same time; therefore Sir George Foster exchanged places with me, I taking his place on number five, and he taking my place on number two. Consequently in the general work of the Assembly the Minister of Trade and Commerce sat on commissions two and four, the Minister of Justice on commissions three and six, and I on commissions one and five.

Possibly the most important work of the Assembly was laying the foundations for the future. It was not simply an international conference at which men would meet to discuss certain matters and then separate, and the work would afterwards have to be done over again. It was organizing a new body for permanent work, because any one who is interested in and believes in the future of the League looks forward to its future as not being a matter of years or decades, but a permanent organization, influencing and guiding the international life of the world. Therefore it was of the utmost importance at the first meeting of the Assembly that the foundations should be laid on sure ground, and that the Assembly in its deliberations should be kept on such secure foundations.

It followed that the questions that came before commission Number one, the commission on constitutional questions, had not only an interest for the present Assembly, but had a real bearing upon the future of the League, and I am sure you will think I shall be taking the right course this afternoon if I devote my time to questions with which I was most immediately concerned on the two commissions on which I sat. I am certain the Minister of Justice will give the House full information with reference to the work of the commissions in which he took such an important part.

Now, Sir, let me take first the rules of procedure. That sounds simple, but we had to decide in adopting these rules whether we would follow the British parliamentary practice or the continental practice; they were not the same. In the result a composite system of rules was adopted, some from the British parliamentary practice, some from the continental practice, and on the whole they were rules which appeared to the Assembly well designed to govern the deliberations of such a body.

There were two provisions in these rules to which I wish to draw the attention of the House, for they are important and significant having regard to the future work of the Assembly. They received emphasis at a later stage by the action of other committees. One of those rules required the budget to be submitted to the Assembly at its Annual meeting each year. Under the Constitution of the League both the Council and the Assembly have jurisdiction over matters of finance, but one of the first actions of the Assembly was to assert its authority in the voting of money for carrying on the work of the League. That will have a very important bearing on the development of the League in the future.

Another matter set forth and asserted in those rules was that each year the Council should report to the Assembly on the work done by the Council from the date of the preceding Assembly. While the Council is supreme in any action it takes within its own jurisdiction as outlined in the Covenant, yet the Assembly laid down the principle that the Council should report to the Assembly from time to time. The members of the Council present in the Assembly—all the States were present—accepted that statement of policy. It means that in future all acts done by the Council between the meetings of the Assembly shall be reported to the Asembly at its next annual meeting. That report will be open for discussion and review, just as the Speech from the Throne is open for discussion and review, and every action of the Council may be debated in that open forum in the presence of the nations of the world and before the press of the world. This means further that matters cannot be done in secret by the Council of the League, even though its meetings are not open to the public in the same way as are the meetings of the Assembly.

Then another matter of great interest and importance, having regard to the future of the League, was the discussion of the relations between the Council and the Assembly. There is a good deal of confusion in reference to what those relations should be; there was not a little confusion in the minds of the delegates themselves; and that was natural, because the Covenant does not draw a very clear line between the functions of one and the other. But this much is clear: In matters that are expressly committed to the Council, either under the Covenant or under any of the Treaties of Peace, the Assembly has no jurisdiction to render a decision. Similarly, where matters are expressly committed to the Assembly, either under the Covenant or under any of the Treaties of Peace, the Council has no jurisdiction to give a decision. In general matters both the Council and the Assembly are competent to deal with them as they arise.

There is a third class, and an important one as events at the Assembly showed, in regard to which neither the Council nor the Assembly has authority to take final action. I am now referring to matters included within what I have referred to as the secondary functions of the League, matters which come under Article XXIII of the Covenant. That article is prefaced with a declaration to this effect:

> That under the terms of international conventions heretofore or hereafter agreed upon, the members agree to do so and so.

In other words, in those matters coming within Article XXIII the members of the League have not committed either to the Council or to the Assembly the final authority; they have said in respect to those matters: International conventions must be submitted to us, the terms agreed upon must be approved by us, those conventions must be executed by us, and then the Council and the Assembly may proceed to deal with those matters.

Another matter that arose in discussing the relations of the Council to the Assembly, and which occasioned a good deal of discussion, was: What was the position of a member of the Council in giving his vote in reference to the Government which appointed him; did he in giving his vote record his own opinion, or did he record the opinion of the state which named him? The question was raised in the Assembly by the distinguished representative of Italy, Signor Tittoni. He took the ground that the members of the Council were not representatives of their states, but occupied the superior position of magistrates, and were to dispose of matters on the grounds of equity and justice and the broad principles of humanity. Some of the members of the Assembly could not see any good reason why a member of the Council should not at the same time represent his state and dispose of matters on the principles of equity and justice and in the broad interests of humanity.

But that issue goes to the very basis of the efficiency of the League. If members of the League are simply there as a group of public men recording their own opinions, valuable as these opinions may be, you simply have an international debating society without power to achieve anything effective.

If, on the other hand, these delegates represent their Governments so that when they cast their vote the vote is that of their Governments and binds their Governments only of course to the extent provided in the Covenant—you have a body of plenipotentiaries capable of negotiating and settling matters of very great international importance, and you give to the decisions of the Council and of the Assembly a value and a dignity otherwise quite impossible. That question was carefully considered and the Assembly came unanimously to the conclusion that on the proper interpretation of the Covenant, while a member may express such opinions as he sees fit and is responsible only to his own Government for his opinions, when the vote is cast it is the vote not of the delegate but of the State he represents. So all voting in the Council and in the Assembly is by States and those votes bind the States to the extent but only to the extent mentioned in the Covenant.

Mr. McMASTER: May I interject a question? That will mean, will it not, that the representatives must always be drawn from the party which is in control of the administration of the country which they represent?

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think so. The vote is cast by the chairman of the delegation, and he should cast the vote in accordance with the views of his Government. But that does not prevent the representation of other sections of the people, if the Government in question chooses to name them. It is for the Government of each country to name its delegates to the Assembly.

The only other important constitutional question to which I shall refer is that of amendments to the Government. There were three important groups of amendments: 1st the Scandinavian; 2nd the Argentine; 3rd the Canadian. Two important amendments were submitted by the Scandinavian group, first, to provide for compulsory arbitration or to give the new International Court of Justice, when created, compulsory jurisdiction; and second, to provide for the election of all the members of the Council. The Argentine delegation presented practically the same amendments; and Mr. Doherty on behalf of the Canadian delegation presented a proposal to strike out Article 10. The Assembly decided to refer all these proposals to the Council with the request that the Council appoint a Commission to consider these amendments and report to the next Assembly.

May I now refer to two constitutional questions which arose from out of the work of commission number two,—questions which have a very important bearing on the future development of the work of the League, and are of great interest to the people of this country. The first arose from the suggestion of Italy and Switzerland that the Assembly should take into consideration the question of monopolies in raw materials, and of the equitable distribution of the raw materials to the several countries of the world. It was not the first occasion on which the question had been raised. I understand, that before the Treaty was signed, Italy put forward proposals to the effect that the Covenant of the League should cover this question. These proposals were not accepted. When the International Labour Conference met in Washington in the fall of 1919 the representative of Italian labour brought forward a similar proposal and asked that a resolution should be adopted calling upon the League to institute an investigation into the world's supply of raw materials with a view of securing their equitable distribution. On that occasion the representatives of the Government of Canada felt compelled to state clearly the position of Canada; that while she would administer her raw materials in the way that she considered just and fair to all interests involved, she could not permit any other power to interfere with the manner in which she handled this matter of purely domestic concern. When the question came up at Geneva the representatives of Canada took exactly the same position. But that did not stop the discussion. The Minister of Trade and Commerce can tell you that during the whole period of time that commission number two was in session, proposal after proposal was made; when one was unacceptable another, in modified form, was brought forward, with a view of committing the League in some form or other to this important principle. Canada, in her resistance to this proposal, was ably supported by the other Dominions and India; the brunt of the fight against the proposal rested upon the Dominions of the British Empire and India. Great Britain as a member of the Council had already assented to an inquiry into the question of raw materials on the motion of the representative of Italy; she was therefore not in a position to oppose the resolution in the Assembly, as the Dominions were.

The objections of Canada to the proposal were on three grounds. We said that the question did not come within the scope of the Covenant; that the League of Nations was not a super State with power to take up any question it might see fit to take up; but it was an agreement among States to co-operate for certain definite purposes in the manner provided in the Covenant, and not otherwise or for other purposes. The first objection, therefore, was that the question was not within the scope of the Covenant, and that to attempt to drag it in by a side door was not fair to the nations parties to the Covenant and not fair to the League itself. Secondly, even if you assumed for the sake of argument —though I am quite convinced you cannot do so—that you could stretch Article 23 so as to bring that question within, then Article 23 is quite clear that before you could have the right to deal definitely and finally with such a matter, you must have an international convention agreed to by the nations parties to the Covenant, and you could only act in accordance with the terms of that international convention. Just let me read the introductory clause to that Article, because we have not yet reached the end of this question. It is bound to come up in the next Assembly and at future Assemblies of the League, due to the great need of raw materials in certain countries of Europe and to the acute distress which exists because of that lack of raw materials. No one can learn the facts in connection with the industrial life of many of these Central European countries without sympathizing very deeply with them in their difficulties, and without being anxious to assist in providing some remedy for them. But that does not involve one's departure from the terms of this Covenant and embarking upon an impossible enterprise. The introductory clause of Article 23 is as follows:

> Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the Members of the League:

And then I will come down to the provision they rely upon:

> (e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and of equitable treatment for the commerce of all Members of the League.

Under that head of "equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the League" they claim to bring in the question of the supply of raw material. Now, as I have said, we claim that if by any stretch of construction this question could be held to come within Article 23, then there is no right to deal with it unless and until an international convention is agreed upon among the members of the League, and then whatever action is taken must be pursuant to the terms of that Convention. If that procedure were followed, the convention when drafted, would be submitted to the Government of this country, and the Government in accordance with the precedent established in dealing with important international agreements, would submit the Convention to this House for consideration and approval.

The people of Canada would have full opportunity of discussing, of considering and reaching a conclusion on this important matter before Canada was finally committed to the policy outlined. Therefore, one can see how important it is, if we are to reserve our legitimate control over matters which do, in some respects, touch our internal or domestic affairs, that we should follow strictly the terms of the agreement embodied in the Covenant.

The third objection was the practical one. You cannot undertake to control or provide for the equitable distribution of the world's raw materials unless you undertake a measure of control of the industrial life of all the industrial nations of the world. That is utterly impracticable. Who is to say what this nation needs or what that nation shall have? Therefore, while the question is one upon which Canada feels strongly because of her position, the proposal is objectionable not only from the standpoint of Canada but equally from the standpoint of the League itself. If you hold out to the nations of Europe, who are in great industrial distress to-day because of a shortage of raw materials, that the League will provide an avenue through which they can get raw materials, and they find, as they would find, that they could not get them from the League, then you turn their anger and animosity against the League and interfere with the League carrying out its primary functions. Instead of the League being an organ for preserving the peace of the world, you make it an instrument for international friction and trouble. On the other hand if you say that the League has power to do this, you create at once on this side of the Atlantic a sentiment against any league of nations which has authority to interfere in our domestic affairs. Whether it be North or South America or the newer countries of the Eastern world, they will all be opposed to a league which has any such authority. The ground taken by Canada was constitutionally sound; it was sound from a commonsense, practical business standpoint, and it was also greatly in the interest of the League itself.

I had intended this afternoon touching on certain other questions that arose under this article 23 of the Covenant, but I shall not do so. An opportunity will arise when the Estimates are up, if members are interested, in a discussion of those questions. Those were the proposals to create new international organizations as subsidiary of the League, one relating to communications and transit and the other relating to finance and economics. These give rise to one of the most important discussions in the Assembly. I shall now refer to the other commission upon which I sat, No. V—the admission of new states. No question excited more interest in the Assembly than the question of the admission of new states to the League. This interest, of course, related particularly to the admission of former enemy states. Austria and Bulgaria had applied for admission. Germany did not apply. The conditions which must be complied with in order that a state shall be admitted to the League are set out in article 1 of the Covenant and are as follows:

> Any fully self-governing state, Dominion, or Colony, not named in the annex, may become a member of the League if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the Assembly, provided that it shall give effective guarantees of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the League in regard to its military and naval forces and armaments.

Therefore, when Austria and Bulgaria applied for admission, the question immediately arose whether they were in a position to comply with the conditions of admission. Three sub-committees of commission V were appointed to examine the applications of the fourteen states which applied for admission. The sub-committees were asked to investigate and answer these five questions:

> 1. Was the application for admission to the League of Nations in order?
> 2. Is the Government recognized de jure or de facto and by which states?
> 3. Does the country possess a stable Government and settled frontiers? What are its size and population?
> 4. Is the country fully self-governing?
> 5. What has been the conduct of the country concerning both acts and assurances with regards to: (1) her international obligations; (2) the prescriptions of the League of Nations as to armaments?

In the case of Austria and Bulgaria, the only point of difficulty was the second last question—have these two countries given effective guarantees or satisfactory evidence of a sincere intention to perform their international obligations? That question had to be answered in the affirmative before those States became qualified for admission to the League. After the most careful investigation from all available sources, the commission reached the conclusion that both of those States satisfied that requirement, and they recommended the admission of Austria and Bulgaria to the League. That recommendation was adopted by the Assembly, and those States and four others were admitted. No one who sees the situation as it exists in Europe to-day can fail to recognize the importance of this step. It is a real step towards the reconciliation of Europe and, however much we may feel the wrongs of the war, however much we may cherish the feelings that were bred of the war, no man who looks out upon Europe in its present disorganized condition, where in certain sections, the very future of our civilization is in jeopardy can do other than reach the conclusion that it is of the first importance to Europe and to humanity as a whole that this reconciliation should proceed; that Europe should get back to real peace and to the spirit of peace, and to production in order to repair the loss and wastage of the war. Therefore, the admission of those two States had more significance than simply their actual admission; it was a step towards the reconciliation of Europe.

The other States admitted were Albania, Costa Rica, Finland, and Luxemberg. The States rejected were Armenia, Azerbigan, Esthonia, Georgia, Latavia, Lichtenstein, Lithuania, and Ukraine. I will not discuss to-day the reasons for their rejection they all appear in the records of the Assembly, and if a discussion on them is desired, it can take place later.

Two or three questions of principle, however, arose before commission No. 5, and I wish to mention these questions of principle because they affect not only the present but the future. The first was —Did the admission of a State to the League amount to its recognition de jure by the powers? The opinion of the jurists of the League and of eminent jurists of the great powers who were present was asked on this question, but they could not agree. Some thought that admission involved recognition de jure; others did not so consider it. When it was proposed that we should settle this question by a vote, that is, which view we should recognize, common sense prevailed, we decided not to undertake to settle these questions of abstract principle upon which we might honestly differ; but to deal with each individual case and pass judgment upon the application of that State.

The question did arise in the case of Albania. The argument of the members of the committee who contended that admission to the League amounted to recognition de jure was that if it did amount to recognition de jure we should not admit any State not already recognized de jure. In the case of Albania the committee reported against the admission of that State until her status should be more clearly determined. The rejection of Albania's application was moved by France and seconded by Great Britain. South Africa moved that Albania be admitted, and was supported by Canada and a number of the smaller States. The majority in the commission, was against the admission of Albania. The matter was carried into the Assembly, and South Africa on the floor of the Assembly moved the admission of Albania. South Africa was supported by Canada, and in the discussion which ensued Great Britain and France withdrew the objections which they had made in the committee and Albania was admitted to the Assembly. That was the one case in which the report of the commission as to the admission of new States was changed. Why was Albania admitted? While the war was on, by the secret Treaty of London, provision had been made for the partition of Albania, without consulting her, at a time when she was occupied by the armies of the powers, and it was agreed upon by States who had guaranteed her neutrality. At a later date and in order to settle the dispute between Italy and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State it was proposed by the Supreme Council, that Albania should be partitioned. That proposition was vetoed by the action of the President of the United States, and when it was proposed that the case of Albania should stand over until her status should be more fully determined by the powers, the majority of the Assembly came to the conclusion that they could not recognize either the legality or the justice of any group of powers undertaking to provide for the partition of a smaller State which had done no wrong, and they determined to put it out of the hands of the powers to carve up Albania in the future by admitting her to the League, and by article ten all the States became guarantors of her territorial integrity. That, of course, particularly applied to her neighbours the other Balkan States, who were not particularly anxious to have her admitted.

One other question of principle came before this committee, which I wish to mention. It was proposed, in this case by South Africa, I believe, without full consideration, that hereafter no State should be admitted to the League unless that State entered into a Treaty similar to the Minorities Treaty entered into by certain of the new central European States as a condition of their recognition as sovereign States. The Minorities Treaties provided for the protection of the racial minorities that were transferred by the terms of the peace treaty from their existing sovereignty to a new sovereignty. It guaranteed them their language, their religion, their schools, and Government grants. In other words, the design was to perpetuate the racial minority in all its rights and privileges and status. The objection to that proposal, as a general proposition, was twofold. First, we should not add to the conditions of the Covenant for admission to the League a new condition. The object should be to facilitate the entrance of States into the League, rather than to impose barriers against their coming in. Secondly, although that principle under the conditions existing in Europe was probably essential for the preservation of peace in Europe, it did not apply to the conditions existing in the new world. It did not apply to the conditions existing in Canada, where apart from the two great races and the two religions the policy is not to perpetuate the various racial minorities that come to us from Europe and other parts of he world. The policy is not to have a little England, a little Ireland, a little Scotland, a little Belgium, a little Germany, and a little France all over this country. The policy is to develop a Canadian nationality. The policy is assimilation rather than perpetuation of the divers races and creeds that exist in Europe. We do not want to transplant the troubles and the prejudices of central Europe to this new world, and therefore the position taken was that you should not attempt to lay down as a general policy covering the whole world a principle that is applicable only to a section of the world; that while, if you were dealing with a European organization only it might be perfectly proper to lay down that principle, in dealing with a world organization it was wholly wrong to lay down a principle that would not apply to the whole world. The resolution was therefore amended to meet these objections, and it passed, Canada not voting on the matter.

There was a good deal of informal conversation about Russia, the United States and Germany, entering the League, but I shall not enter into that this afternoon.

Everyone recognizes that the Russian situation must be cleared up in some way before Europe can return to normal conditions. One hundred and seventy millions of people in Russia have been producing in the past great quantities of food stuffs and raw materials for the consumption of the nations of the world. That production has largely ceased, and until it is restored the other nations will want for food and raw materials. On the other hand, Russia has been a great purchaser of the world's manufactured articles. She is no longer a purchaser, and until she becomes a purchaser again, there must be tens of thousands of workmen out of employment who in the past were engaged in the manufacture of goods for Russian consumption. The world is greatly interested in clearing up the Russian situation, but I think every one at Geneva recognized that the situation could only be cleared up by the Russian people themselves, and that the less outside interference there was with Russia the more speedily she would settle her own problems. Speaking for myself, I must say that I sincerely hope that the trade agreement which Great Britain has negotiated with Russia will be ratified by the two government, so that international trade may commence to flow again between these two countries, for I believe that nothing will more quickly bring the Russian people to an appreciation of the benefits of sound constitutional democratic government than free communication with the other nations of the world. So, while the Assembly was acutely concerned in the future of Russia, and in the attitude of Russia, I am sure the Assembly felt that the least said and the freer we left Russia to work out her own destiny and settle her own problems as to her form of government, the more likely we were to promote the peace of the world.

I shall not discuss the question of Germany. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) put the case, as I believe it was viewed by the Assembly, and he also, I believe stated the situation with respect to the United States in the way it was viewed by the Assembly.

I have only this remark to make. When one ask, will the United States come in? let me remind you that we asked exactly the same question during the first two-and-a-half years of war, while the United States discussed and debated the question, and events in that country developed. The result was that the circumstances of the situation, plus the conscience and judgment of the American people, brought them into the war and we know the powerful assistance and the hearty co-operation they gave towards bringing the war to a victorious conclusion. I believe the same result will follow in the case of the League of Nations, and that after they are through their discussion and consideration, perhaps not exactly in the present form of the Covenant but in some satisfactory form, the events of the world, the compulsion that comes from world events, plus the judgment and conscience of the American people, will bring them into the League. Whether they come or not is a matter for themselves and for themselves alone to settle, but the nations of the world will give them a most cordial welcome into the League. Apparently one of the surprises of the Assembly was the independent attitude of the representatives from the Dominions of the British Empire. The representatives from the majority of the states apparently went to Geneva believing that the views of the Dominions and their votes would necessarily follow the views and votes of Great Britain; and when they found this view did not prevail, there was very great surprise. When one of the Canadian delegates incidentally mentioned, by way of illustrating a certain point, that we in Canada did not even permit the statesmen of the Mother Country, for whom we had the greatest respect and administration, to interfere with our domestic affairs, they thought it was proclaiming a revolution. They had an idea that the statesmen of Great Britain managed our affairs. The London Times correspondent remarked that the Assembly would have been worth while if for no other reason than to enable the nations of the world to see, by actual demonstration, what the British Empire really is. The representatives of the nations thought that an empire could not exist in which the various parts had freedom to express their own opinions. They failed to appreciate the fact that this is the very reason why the British Empire does exist, and that without freedom it could not exist at all. They had not realized that the self-governing Dominions have passed from the colonial status and are now free self-governing and sovereign states under a common sovereign, on an equality with the Mother Country. I am sure the experience of other delegates present at the Assembly will confirm the conclusion which I know I reached, that Canada had a larger liberty, a more real independence, and a vastly greater influence as one of the states of the British Commonwealth than she could possibly have as an independent state outside the British Empire. While we claim the fullest freedom for the individual parts of the Empire we must also keep in view the importance of maintaining the unity of the Empire as a whole. One is just as important as the other. When the forces of disintegration are at work among the various peoples and nations of the world, there is no force existing to-day with such a stabilizing influence for law and order, and peace and justice, as the British Commonwealth of free nations. I am asked if the League will succeed—

Mr. BELAND: May I say a word before my hon. friend considers that point. I thought he was going on to speak on the question of the admission of states to the League. Will he gratify the House by emphasizing somewhat the point regarding the admission of Germany, in regard to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) spoke? Is he in a position to say whether the general sentiments of the members of the League were in favour of or were opposed to the admission of Germany at the present time?

Mr. ROWELL: It is difficult to express any more than one's own personal opinion on such a matter. Germany did not apply for admission to the League, therefore the question did not come before the Assembly in any form on which it could take action. It was mentioned several times in the debates and many delegates expressed the hope that Germany would be admitted at an early date. One of the most striking incidents of the whole Assembly occurred during the discussion on the admission of Austria. M. Motta, President of Switzerland, and one of the ablest delegates in the Assembly, speaking on the admission of Austria expressed the hope that the time would not be far distant when Germany, the United States and Russia would be admitted, pressing the contention that the League would not accomplish its greatest results or perform its best service to the world until these other Great Powers were admitted. He had no sooner mentioned the word Germany than M. Viviani immediately arose and asked for the floor, and when the President of Switzerland resumed his seat, M. Viviani delivered the most eloquent and moving oration of the whole Assembly. When he resumed his seat he was given an ovation by the entire Assembly. In that very eloquent and impassioned speech M. Viviani based his argument on Article 1 of the Covenant, and his contention was that Germany had not yet given evidences of her sincere intention to perform her international obligations, and speaking on behalf of France he said: "When Germany did give evidence of such an intention they would no longer object to her admission to the League." All that is the point upon which the controversy will arise, and it is a question upon which the various states would no doubt record their opinion, as they believed in the sincerity of Germany's intentions or did not so believe. In the provisions of the Reparations Agreement which was recently submitted by the Supreme Council to Germany and which is to be discussed at the Conference to be held in London next week, it was stated in the press that one of the penalties which was to be imposed on Germany if she did not carry out the agreement was exclusion from the League of Nations. That has been stated in several press despatches. I understand that that is not the form of the clause in the agreement. The clause is to the effect that they will not sanction the admission of Germany. The Supreme Council have no right to determine whether Germany shall or shall not be admitted. That is a matter which is left exclusively to the Assembly. The Assembly is the only body who can determine the admission of new states. I take it that all that this declaration in the Reparations Agreement means is that the powers represented at the Supreme Council, say to Germany; "If you do not carry out this agreement we will not ourselves sanction your admission," and they would justify that no doubt on the ground that if she did not carry out those terms she would not have furnished evidence of her sincere intention to observe her international obligations. I hope I have answered by hon. friend's question.

Mr. BELAND: Thank you.

Mr. ROWELL: You ask, Will the League succeed? Its form may change, but the ideals for which it stands will prevail because they meet a great human need. It has been said truly: 'Humanity has struck her tents and is on the march.' She is leaving the low plains, strewn with the bodies of her dead, where the sounds of her drums are almost drowned by the cries of the wounded and the dying. She is on the march to the high uplands, which promise a new order and a better day. The way may be long and difficult; there are many obstacles to be overcome and heights to be scaled; the journey may cost much in tears, in blood and in treasure—but the bugle will never sound the retreat. Humanity is on the march and will not pitch her tents till the heights are scaled and the uplands are reached. Canada, breathing the free and invigorating air of the new world, untrammeled by either the prejudices or the traditions of the old, is in the very forefront of this advance. If our faith and our courage fail us not we will keep our place until the goal is reached.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I will frankly admit at the start that it is not my intention to join in the chorus of praise and eulogy which has been uttered with respect to the new Prime Minister by the originators of this debate. Not that I underestimate the ability of the Prime Minister, but to my mind his name is associated with some of the nefarious measures which have been put through this Parliament and from which the Canadian people are still suffering. I consider him responsible to a certain degree for the feeling of unrest and mistrust which at present prevails in the country, and in strict accordance with the terms of the amendment of the leader of the Opposition I charge him with usurping power and occupying an indefensible and unconstitutional position at the head of a Government which has not been, and never will be, given mandate by the Canadian people. I am not ignorant of the courtesy that we should certainly accord to the right hon. gentleman, but I consider the debt has been paid, and possibly overpaid, by our leader himself, whose courtesy was met in a very strange way. What did the Prime Minister, with that sardonic smile and irrepressible irony which are customary to him, say to the leader of the Opposition. Let me quote the Prime Minister's words:

> I assure him here and now that if the essential humour of his addresses is always to be so thinly covered by a veil of argument and satire our relations will never be disturbed in parliament.

Possibly, Mr. Speaker, I should not interfere, but I may be permitted to say that if weak arguments make for good friendships we should not feel so bitter towards the Prime Minister on account of his last speech.

The debate on the Address and the amendment thereto has already lasted for a week and has wandered somewhat from the main point in discussion, as is often the case under such circumstances. My intention is to restrict my observations to the main point of discussion, and to discuss the right of the present Government to retain power and to administer the affairs of the country under the prevailing circumstances. To do so it may be necessary to throw a brief glance at what has taken place in, or around, the Government since the last session. My right hon. friend became Prime Minister on a warm July day last summer. The Unionist party was dying, in fact it had become moribund, and it seemed imperative to its leaders that a new group, or the semblance of a new affiliation, should be formed; and much, Mr. Speaker, as Unionism had been formed in 1917 to cover the sins and the omissions of the war Tory party, this right hon. gentleman was entrusted with the task of forming the semblance of a new party to cover the sins and omissions of Unionism. Accordingly the right hon. gentleman was chosen—not by the people, not even by a convention representing the Conservative Party at large; he was chosen by a group of parliamentarians who formed part of the crumbling remnants of the majority of 1917. The right hon. gentleman was satisfied with the choice, and with the little authority that it conveyed, and he went to work on his programme and began his appeal to the people. Do not, Mr. Speaker, be deceived by this statement. When I say "his appeal to the people" I do not mean an appeal through the polls but an appeal through speeches. He did not tell the people "Vote and decide for yourselves." He said "Listen and see how nicely I can speak." Then my right hon. friend formed his Cabinet. He gathered around him some of the Ministers of the old Administration who were ready to serve under him and he infused new blood by choosing two of his partisans out of the majority of 1917. He was very careful to choose them in constituencies where there would be no risk in the by-election. My right hon. friend's party is bragging about these victories in St. John and Colchester; but, Mr. Speaker, it was not surprising that out of over one hundred partisans the Government was able to pick two constituencies where it could safely risk an election. I will frankly admit the personal reputation of my right hon. friend as a great debater. This it was that gave rise to the legend, very carefully spread throughout the country, that the new Saviour was born, that the old Tory Party had been rejuvenated, and that very bright days were ahead for the Ministry. By that time the magnates of the new administration had got together and had decided upon a new title for the Party. They gave it the compound and complex name of the National Liberal and Conservative Party. It is very striking, Mr. Speaker, how history repeats itself. We have read of another period in our history when something like this took place. A speech of Hon. Edward Blake has often been quoted in this House, reciting what took place when the Liberal-Conservative Party was formed in the Eighties. I do not now wish to quote from that speech more than a few of the more striking passages. Here they are:

> The Tory Party in the old world and in Canada has from time to time chosen to adopt aliases, it has chosen to adopt new names, it has designated itself by a variety of epithets which it thought from time to time would conceal its identity, and would enable it to mislead under a new and more attractive guise. It was not the Tory Party at all I had to oppose when I first came to the County of Bruce. It was the Coalition Party—the "Party of Union and Progress." They were quite insulted if you called them Tories. Then there was a No-Party Party. Then there was a Patent Combination Party. Then it became the National Policy Party. As Liberal principles grew strong they have from time to time called themselves "Liberal-Conservatives", in order that they might get weak-kneed Reformers to join them because of the name liberal.

These remarks of the Hon. Edward Blake are very striking because again to-day we have a coalition looking for a name, or rather we have a title which misrepresents as M. Blake pointed out; we have a few week-kneed reformers, trailing round behind the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government.

Anyway, the Prime Minister went on his great speaking tour, and he first staged his Barnum-like circus in Sherbrooke. We feel very grateful to him for having chosen our native province to make his initial bow as the angel of peace and harmony. What was his message to the province of Quebec? That all the misunderstandings of the past were to be forgotten, that all the slanderous posters, all the code telegrams and all the vote manipulations were to be ignored; nothing survived, Mr. Speaker, but his great love for the province of Quebec. And the host of paid supporters, who had been given free transportation from Montreal to Sherbrooke, surrounded him on the platform and applauded him so heartily that the Tory press throughout the country was enabled to report that he was winning the heart of the province of Quebec, and to spread the belief in Ontario and the West that he was winning fresh support from us. This comedy of the Sherbrooke meeting, coupled with the by-elections in the Maritime provinces, was framed, I say, to convince the people that this new party was going to be very vigorous under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman.

But alas, a series of mishaps followed, and soon dispersed to the winds the "thin humour," as my right hon. friend would say, of that comedy. The first of these mishaps was his vain effort to have the Canadian people forget his own record and that of the past Administration and to confine their attention mainly to the tariff. It is true, there had been war scandals; it is true, there had been a general state of waste and incompetency; it is true, there had been a lamentable disregard of public interests; it is true, there had been a disastrous railway policy, originated by my right hon. friend and carried out to the point of collapse; it is true, there had been electoral shifts and distortions which were due to my right hon. friend's inventive genius. But that did not count—nothing counted but the tariff; and the Prime Minister, called to the bar of public opinion, assumed the attitude of the defendant in a court of justice who asked on what ground he was first to be tried, and said: "Try me, not on what I did in the past, but on what I will do in the future."

Another mishap was that remarkable peroration delivered by the Prime Minister in Granby and other centres, when he portrayed himself as the nation's saviour and all his adversaries as nation wreckers, anarchists and bolshevists. I know that my right hon. friend has laboured very patiently to establish that he never said that, but even his own explanation retains very much of the doubtful flavour of the original declaration. Here is what the Montreal Gazette reported of his Granby speech:

> The Premier proceeded to show how the Farmer's Party was committed to free trade, and that the strength of that organization was enhanced by the undoubted fact that it had joined hands with and dragged behind it all the malcontents and restless elements of the country. "I do not say that the leaders of that party, much less their followers, want to overturn responsible government, but I do say that those with whom they have aligned themselves, as, for instance, the Winnipeg and Vancouver seditionists, had as their goal the upsetting of the system of government in Canada."

When the right hon. Prime Minister was confronted with these words this is the explanation he gave to Mr. Drury himself:

> A new party has arisen in Canada, best described as a farmers' free trade party. It has issued a platform. It demands to be placed in power in Canada. It has covered under its banner and trails behind it every class of theorist and malcontent, and to-day, beyond all doubt, it constitutes the most numerous and strongest organization opposed to the present Government. "Indeed," added the Prime Minister, "at other points I plainly stated that the farmers were not inimical to responsible government, but unfortunately had aligned with them many others who were."

In another instance when confronted with the charge of having said those words in Granby he was more concise—he flatly and emphatically declared that he had never said anything of the kind at Sherbrooke.

New mishaps came later in the shape of by-elections,—not in those safe constituencies which had been carefully chosen by the right hon. gentleman, but in by-elections in counties which were opened in the ordinary course of events. It is not my intention to analyze the vote in Yale,—that has been done before, and we all know that the majority of the Government dwindled practically to nothing. Nor is it my intention to analyze the vote which was given in East Elgin, an old Tory county, where the Farmers' candidate was elected.

But perhaps we should stop, and it is very refreshing to do so, at the result in West Peterborough. We now have the official figures of that election, and what do they show, Mr. Speaker? They show that not only the Liberal candidate had a plurality of over one thousand, but also that the Government candidate was defeated by the combined registered vote of his opponents to the extent of over four thousand. But we hear them say that the Tory vote was split between Mr. Burnham and Mr. Denne, and that the support given to Mr. Burnham would have been transferred to the Government's candidate had Mr. Burnham not been in the field. Well, let us see the kind of appeal Mr. Burnham made to the electorate in that particular instance. I have here his manifesto, but I will quote only the first two paragraphs, as they are very interesting: He states:

> Owing to my resignation a by-election will be held here on February 7th. I resigned because when Liberals and others joined in electing me to support the Union Government of Sir Robert Borden in 1917, I promised, as did Sir Robert Borden and those supporting him, to go to the people in a general election when the war was over. Without that promise it would have been useless and unfair to ask for Liberal support. Union Liberals were warned against a trap, but they could not believe that anybody would betray their trust. And who would have believed it? The Union Governement was elected for the period of the war, and no longer.
> But the war eneded and the Union Government ended,—

So states Mr. Burnham.

—and why was the promised general election not held? Because, without any mandate or mission from anybody on earth but themselves, Messrs. Meighen and Calder seized the reins of power and announced to an astonished Canada a new Government and a new party? "The National Liberal and Conservative Party." The members of the Conservative Party and of the Liberal Party were directed to hand in their submission to the new Party without delay. Was there ever such a hold-up staged before? This is the age of hold-ups, it is true, but till now no one has attempted to run off with two parties and a whole state.

It will be seen from this manifesto of Mr. Burnham that not only the Liberal vote and the Farmer vote of that constituency went against the candidate of the right hon. Prime Minister, but also at least fifty per cent of the Conservative vote polled by Mr. Burnham.

So significant was the result that the next morning an editorial appeared in the Montreal Gazette, which said:

Why not an appeal?

The Government has declared its intention to live out its term, and constitutionally has a right so to do. Its parliamentary majority may prolong its existence for nearly another two years. But, will it continue as a strong Ministry for that period? A majority somewhat perilous when Parliament prorogued has been reduced. The bye-elections won by the Government mean merely the retention of seats, and indicate no new popular confidence, while the contested seats like East Elgin and West Peterboro have swung to the Opposition, and weakened to that extent the strength of the Ministry. Governments are not constitutionally upset by loss of a bye-election or two, but no government can disregard the hand-writing; and above all no government can gain in the present, nor survive in the future, that does not owe its existence to popular support.

Further, the Gazette says:

If more time permitted, Parliament might have another session, and, after redistribution of seats, dissolve the House. In ordinary course, this would be the way of procedure, the way we have hoped would be pursued; but in the circumstance of adverse results from recent by-elections the situation is changed, and the advice we have to give to the Government is to proceed with the Supply Bill and then permit the electorate to express its preference for parties in order that stable administration and confident policy may be carried on. The situation is now uncertain; the life of the Ministry hangs by a thread; and under this circumstance strong and effective administration of affairs is impossible.

Did my hon. friend pay any attention to this advice from his friends?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. RINFRET: Did he pay any attention to the popular verdict in Peterborough? Did the Government decide to appeal to the people? A few days later we had the reply in the Gazette correspondence emanating from Ottawa, with the following headlines, which were very clear:

New Ministers have already been Selected. Problem now is to Create Necessary Vacancies. By-Elections as Test Government's Fixed Policy—

"Fixed policy."

—is to retain power for Two More Sessions.

I will not read the correspondence, but I would like to read the last paragraph:

If such an amendment was adopted, or the Government lost further by-elections, an early appeal to the country would be obligatory. Under such circumstances the Government will carefully select test constituencies, except in the Province of Quebec, where the choice is very limited. The Ontario constituencies in view are counted safe for the Government, as are the Western constituencies that will be offered representation in the Government. It is the fixed policy of the Government to retain power for two more sessions.

The Gazette had foreseen the amendment which came from the Opposition.

Quite a curious policy. That was the response to the people. But, Mr. Speaker, the verdict in Peterborough was not "Reorganize;" it was: "Clear out." But my hon. friend will not clear out; he will reorganize in choice constituencies, of which the number is "very limited" in Quebec.

My right hon. friend has been angling for months in Quebec for a fish, as the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) very aptly and very properly put it yesterday. But the fish do not seem to be in biting form just now. The hon. gentleman has come to us begging for support. In 1917 we were bad, disloyal citizens, pro-German, slackers; but now my hon. friend comes to us and begs us to aid him against another class of bad citizens—those anarchists, Bolshevists and revolutionary farmers from the West.

The action of the Ministry in my province has been very properly compared to that of the old farmer's dog which goes part of the way with every passer-by but always comes back alone. One of the passers-by has stopped at the gate—possibly I should say, sat on the fence, but in this case it seems that after looking him over the dog decided not to come back. Such was the situation when the House met a week ago.

After the Address in Reply had been moved the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) very properly offered a motion of non-confidence in the Government. By what right, asked the leader of the Opposition, does the Government hold power? If it is a new Government it should appeal to the people. If it is an old Government, its mandate ceased with the war.

He showed very clearly that the main issue in 1917 was the war, the sending of reinforcements to the Canadian Army in the trenches.

Mr. McMASTER: By conscription.

Mr. RINFRET: By conscription. The Prime Minister himself said that he based his appeal on the rock of compulsory service. Possibly he thinks he is now consistent when he seeks to impose compulsory government on an unwilling people.

The leader of the Opposition further established that in all civilized countries—in fact, in all countries except Russia—elections had taken place since the conclusion of the war. The reply of the Prime Minister to the speech of the leader of the Opposition was short, occupying less than an hour. To those who have heard him on former occasions and know what a pugnacious speaker and an astute lawyer he is, it was very easy to understand that he was labouring under a great difficulty; that he had to defend a very bad case. He went on, anyway, and offered a series of arguments which I wish to deal with very briefly before I resume my seat.

In his first argument he took exception to the form of the amendment itself. He found fault because, he said, the amendment was presented in naked form and that no reasons were stated in the amendment in support of what it called for. But, Mr. Speaker, the amendment is a motion of non-confidence in the Government, and the speech of the leader of the Opposition is full of reasons for the presentation of that amendment.

The Prime Minister went further and said that he held office by right of the confidence of the majority of Parliament elected by a majority of the people. Well, we have questioned that very often. There is the question of the war mandate, and also the question of the manner in which the elections were carried out in 1917. I shall not go over the whole field; I wish merely to remind the Prime Minister that the majority of the war Government was over seventy and that that majority had dwindled down to twenty-five or twenty-six on the occasion of the last important vote in the last session of Parliament. And you must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that fourteen of the hon. gentlemen sitting opposite were elected not by the civilian vote, not by the soldier vote, but by those bunches of soldier votes which were so freely applied to the constituencies in which they were needed. Here is a list of those constituencies: Brant, Essex South, Nipissing, Perth South, Cape Breton South and Richmond—two members—Cumberland, Hants, Pictou, Skeena, King's, P.E.I., Queen's, P.E.I., Edmonton West, and Yukon, a total of fourteen seats. If you take those fourteen votes from that side of the House across to this side, you will understand that makes a difference of twenty-eight in the counting of the votes. Therefore, even if we take the verdict of 1917, my right hon. friend to-day has actually no majority even in the House.

Then there was another argument. My right hon. friend said that the winning of the war was not the only issue in the last election. Oh, he was very careful; the way he said it was this. He admitted that the winning of the war was the great issue, the overwhelming issue, the issue that overshadowed all others; but yet not only the only issue. And he said: There are problems arising out of the war that we must deal with. If we reason in this way, when you take into account that some members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force are going to be pensioned for possibly fifteen or twenty years to come, if this Government is going to stay in power until all the problems arising out of the war are settled, we might as well go home. But he said: There have been other examples; in 1904 the election was waged on the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific; yet after the Grand Trunk Pacific had been started, the Government remained in power; in 1911 the election was waged on the reciprocity issue, and yet, after reciprocity was put aside, the Government remained in power. But really this is not a serious argument. Who does not know that in 1917 the situation was not an alignment of one party against the other, but the calling in of members from all parties around the one issue of the war and nothing else. There is no precedent in our country for an election such as the one in 1917.

Then the Prime Minister dealt with the by-elections. But the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has dealt so well with that subject that I wish to make only one remark in regard to a point which possibly has not been exemplified fully in the discussion. Since 1917, there have been, all told, sixteen by-elections, of which the Government has won five, the Liberal party has won five and the Independent Party—Farmers and Labour—has won six. That means that the Government has won less than one-third of the total. But there is one more important point. The five elections that the Government has won are elections in counties that it has itself chosen to open. The county of Kingston was opened for the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton); the county of Victoria, for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie); the counties of St. John and Colchester, for the two new ministers; and the county of Yale was laid open in order to appoint the ex-Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue to a Parliamentary Librarianship. These are the five victories the Government has won, choosing five counties out of the 232 seats in the Dominion. But if you stick to the elections in counties that have been thrown open in the ordinary course of events, the Borden Government and this Government have not won a single election.

The redistribution argument has also been dealt with. We had the same case in 1911. We all know that every ten years a census must be taken and that the year after there must be a redistribution. But is there any provision in the law that if an election is pending, say a year before the census or a year before a redistribution, there must be a delay in order to have that work done? In 1900, there was an election, and in 1901 the census was taken in the regular way. In 1911, the census was going on when there was an election on the reciprocity issue. As regards redistribution, I must altogether take exception to the statement made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) who claimed that in Quebec the people did not want an election; that they wanted to wait because their condition was to be improved by the census. Every member from the province of Quebec knows that the moment you set foot on the pavement of your county—or, if it is a rural county, on the road—your electors will flock around you asking: "When are you going to have an election?" The people of Quebec resent their isolation; or rather they do not feel that they are isolated; they feel that they are with the rest of the country against an isolated Government. There are things you must isolate yourself from—at present the province of Quebec is isolated from smallpox.

I shall take up just one more argument that the Prime Minister has used in the debate, and it relates to the tariff. Oh, the tariff! It would be such a nice thing if you would be talking of nothing but the tariff. The tariff is everywhere in his speech; it comes in here and there, and it adorns every page of the Hansard report of his speech. The Prime Minister takes exception to action of the leader of the Opposition because, while last year the latter was discussing the tariff this year he moves an amendment that the Government has no mandate to revise the tariff. This is not illogical at all. The stand taken by my hon. friend last year and again this year is that the Government has no mandate; but if this servile and easily convinced majority decides that the Government will go on, will that mean that we shall have to fold our arms, and let everything go through? Again this year. I, and certainly we all, intend to discuss the tariff if the majority will not throw the issue before the public, but there is nothing illogical about that stand. The argument goes further.

My right hon. friend says: We will not have an election because the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and the leader of the Opposition do not agree on the tariff. This is a wonderful argument. Have you ever heard a Prime Minister tell the country: We will not have an election because groups of my adversaries do not agree upon a certain matter? This is the most extraordinary argument that has ever been uttered in this House. What has this supposed or real disagreement between the hon. member for Red Deer and the leader of the Opposition to do with the right of the Prime Minister to sit in his chair? How does it affect the constitutional question? What is the argument in a discussion of this kind, whether the leader of the Opposition is inclined to a tariff for revenue or whether the hon. member for Red Deer is a free trader? It has nothing at all to do with the discussion. The Prime Minister, dealing with one argument from this side the other day, made the remark that it was verging on the absurd. My impression, if I am not too rude, is that in this case the argument is not only verging upon but diving head forward into the uttermost depths of absurdity. Such is the argument, or rather the lack of argument, of the right hon. gentleman in response to the amendment from this side of the House.

The next member of the Government to rise and speak on this matter was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and he was so much impressed with the soundness of the attitude of his Government on this point that he never spoke a word about it, but gave us a very interesting address on the League of Nations. In fact, I have heard so far only two speeches in support of the attitude of the Government, the speech of the Prime Minister himself and that of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier), the one because he does not want to get out and the other because he is very anxious to get in. But the Government and its supporters have offered no argument; they have not even attempted to justify their course of action, their usurpation of power, their desperate clinging to office in face of an unwilling and ever protesting people.

But they say they we are not sincere. They say we are moved by political considerations. They say we are bluffing. Well, if they think we are not sincere, if they really think we are bluffing, why do not they call our hand? I say Mr. Speaker, that we are animated by no such motives. We are not seeking any party advantage. We are merely conveying to the foot of your Chair the persistent and ever-growing clamour of the Canadian people for a general election. This clamour can be heard all over the Dominion. It comes from the Pacific coast, from the mavellous region of the Rockies, from the great billowy plains of the West, from the industrial centres and the farming districts of Ontario, from the ever loyal and over-slandered province of Quebec, and from the peaceful yet progressive provinces by the Atlantic. All with one voice are claiming a right dearly fought for in earlier years, and enjoyed in the past, but which is denied them to-day—the right to elect their representatives. It may be that the general elections will bring back the Liberals to power; it may be that they will return the Farmers; it may be that they will give the victory to another group or party. But that is not the question; we are not arguing for advancement, we are arguing principles and the constitution; we are not clamouring for power for ourselves, but we are asking for power for whatever party can command a majority in a proper and newly elected Parliament representing the paramount will and the indestructible rights of the Canadian people.

Mr. JOHN WESLEY EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my humble word of praise to those which have already been passed upon the mover and the seconder of the Address. I also wish to avail myself of this opportunity to convey to the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) my most hearty congratulations on his elevation to the high position which he now occupies. I think, Sir, when we lay aside our party differences, we are all agreed that the people of the Dominion of Canada, as much as the people of any other country in the world, have reason to be proud of the men who from time to time have occupied the position of Prime Minister of Canada, and it is my firm and pleasing conviction that in the present Prime Minister we have a man who will maintain the best traditions of his office, and be worthy of his distinguished predecessors.

The hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), in the course of his admirable address, made specific and special reference to the question of apples. It may be of interest to that hon. gentleman to know—and I desire to bring this up while the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is here, if he would not mind staying for a moment—that last year this question was brought up in the House in a speech made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). On that occasion the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Davidson) asked this question of the hon. member for Marquette:

> Is the hon. gentleman in favour of making apples free?

The answer given by the hon. member for Marquette was:

> Certainly, I am in favour of making apples free. My hon. friend from Annapolis is badly mistaken if he thinks he is putting a poser to me in that regard.

I commend the hon. member for Marquette for his candour in answering that question. There was no equivocation, no side-stepping, no quibbling. He was not at that time disposed to deal with that particular item of the tariff at all events, by a method which has since occurred to him—the method of easy stages. Now we know where the hon. member for Marquette, the leader of the Southeast party here, stands in regard to that particular item in the tariff. We also know the attitude of the Government. The Government stands for protection for the fruit industry. Now the question I wish to address to the hon. leader of the Opposition is the question that was put last session by the hon. member for Annapolis to the leader of the Southeast party. I wish to ask him this question: Are you in favour of making apples free? I trust my voice carried across to the hon. gentleman's desk.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. While the hon. member for Frontenac is quite within his right in submitting a question, I must point out to him that it would be a most unusual proceeding if an hon. member who had the floor were at liberty to interrogate individual members in their seats and expect a reply. It is not in order. Ia has never been done, and it may not be done. The only occasion upon which a question can properly be put and an answer be expected, is when an hon. member who is speaking is addressed by an hon. member from his seat.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. member for Frontenac is in order in defining a party by a point of the compass?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think that it would be easy to define the party to which my hon. friend belongs by anything more definite than a point of the compass. I was alluding to its location in this chamber. It remains to be seen whether the party itself will define itself any more definitely in the future. Before I sit down I shall endeavour to show that it has not definitely defined its position so far, but as a matter of fact has shifted its position on many occasions, as my hon. friend from Red Deer has done more than once.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Not on that question.

Mr. EDWARDS: I quite agree that it is within the right of an hon. member who is addressed not to answer or to answer as he sees fit. I do not think I am the first who has put a question of that kind. My object must have been very apparent. I thought it advisable to get a little definite information as to the attitude of the different parties in relation to the tariff. We know the attitude of two parties, and I thought it would be nice to get the attitude of the other party. But if the hon. leader of the Opposition does not choose to answer my question I have no right, of course, to press for an answer.

The leader of the Opposition, in the course of his speech the other day, dwelt entirely with the question of the right of the present Government to hold office. That was the burden of his song through out the whole of his lengthy and rather vociferous speech. The hon. gentleman contended that Parliament should dissolve. On what does he base that contention? Let us briefly examine his remarks and see. He gave as one of the reasons, that some of the ministers who were in the cabinet in 1917 are not in the present Government. Well, I think I am correct in saying that the Hon. A. G. Blair, who was a distinguished member of the Laurier government, at one time saw fit on a matter of Government policy to resign his portfolio, but I have never heard of anyone bringing that forward as a reason why the government of that day should dissolve parliament.

My hon. friend says that the prime minister who led the government in 1917 has resigned office, and a new Prime Minister has come in, and he gives that as a reason for dissolution. Well, that was not considered a sufficient reason for dissolution in 1896, when the late Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat resigned his position as Prime Minister of Ontario to take a seat in the Laurier Cabinet at Ottawa. A new Prime Minister was chosen for that province, but no person at that time considered, and least of all, the Liberals, that it was a reason why an election should be brought on in that province. At the same time, in the province of Nova Scotia, the present member for Shelburne and Queen's (Hon. Mr. Fielding) resigned the Premiership and a new man was appointed to take his place. No one advanced that as a reason for dissolution of the Provincial Legislature. Nor was it advanced as a reason for dissolution of Parliament when the late Rt. Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell resigned his position as Prime Minister of this country. That being one of the contentions advanced by the leader of the Opposition has nothing to back it up.

He says that the Government has no right to carry on because a number of hon. gentlemen who formerly sat on this side of the House have withdrawn their support from the Government and now occupy seats across the floor. Well, if the leader of the Opposition could say to the Government: "A number of Liberals who were elected in 1917 as Liberal-Unionists have withdrawn their support from the Government of the day, having seen the light in the window, and have crossed over to my side of the House and now give me the allegiance which they formerly gave you," —if he could say that, he could at least draw some comfort from the fact and his arguments would show some force. But if we examine the departure of gentlemen who formerly sat on this side of the House and are now opposite, we find that the very fact of their segregating themselves in a separate part of the Chamber, the very fact which is taken by the leader of the Opposition as an indication that those gentlemen no longer have confidence in this Government, or at least can no longer give it their support, is also evidence that they have no confidence in the party led by the leader of the Opposition.

But Mr. Speaker, if defections from a party are a reason for dissolution, then what is the position of the leader of the Opposition? Have there been no defections from his ranks? In this House yesterday we listened to a very vigorous speech delivered by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), and I do not think that any one who heard that speech could gather from it that that hon. member, one of the most stalwart Liberals of Quebec, has any confidence in the present leader of the Opposition or would like to see him at the head of a Government. I could not gather anything like that from his remarks. But not only in this House, but from one end of this country to the other we have ample evidence of defections from the Liberal party as at present constituted and led.

The leader of the Opposition put the question several times: By what right does the Prime Minister lead the Government? I should like to ask him a similar question. By what right does he continue to lead the Liberal party? What is a party? Is it merely an aggregation of men who blindly follow some one who has been chosen as leader? Or is an aggregation of men who subscribe to and endorse certain political platforms and policies? I could not do better, perhaps, than to quote the definition given by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) yesterday. He said that a political party is an association of men who have joined themselves together for the purpose of advancing the public interests on certain principles of policy which they hold in common. Well, if we are to judge the Liberal party by that definition, we are in the position of having no party to judge.

The Liberal party to-day in this House is a thing of shreds and patches. I doubt very much if you can find half a dozen men sitting behind the Leader of the Opposition who come under the definition given by the member for Brome, as holding views in common. In one part of the country one of them is a free trader, so he says; in another part of the country some other member of the same party is an ardent protectionist. The same convention which in August, 1919, selected the present leader of the Opposition to that position also framed a political platform. Has the leader of the Opposition lived up to the pledge he gave to carry that platform into effect?

[Mr. Edwards.]

My hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) referred to by-elections. Let us see what some of those by-elections disclosed in the way of departure from certain principles which were laid down in that convention. In the constituency of Yale we find the present leader of the Opposition supporting a candidate who declared that he stood for protection, repudiating that particular part of the Liberal platform dealing with the principal necessaries of life in the way of food. In the constituency of Peterborough we find him supporting a candidate who repudiates the platform of the Liberal party in so far as the tariff as it affects industries is concerned. The Liberal candidate in Peterborough did not say that he endorsed or stood by the Liberal platform. On the contrary, he says: "That is not my platform. My platform is contained in the word "Peterborough" and I stand for the retention of the tariff, for the retention of protection to Peterborough industries. In the constituency of East Elgin the Liberal candidate did not come out as endorsing the platform formulated in 1919 but on the contrary said that his views had not changed, that his views were the same as they were before that platform was formulated. The leader of the Liberal party went to East Elgin and in endorsing the candidature of the Liberal candidate he repudiated the whole of the Liberal platform, as he repudiated it in part in Yale and also in Peterborough.

By what right then does the present leader of the Opposition assume to lead the Liberal party? There are, I venture to say, many men in this country who gathered at the Liberal convention of 1919 and helped to formulate the platform—men who have not been trained in political acrobatics as the leader of the Opposition has and who find it impossible to follow the contortions of that gentleman in political matters. I cannot conceive and I cannot believe that the men who gathered at that convention from all parts of Canada and after careful deliberation formulated a platform, can continue to recognize as a true leader a gentleman who has sacrified them—sacrificed his party, the platform of that party, and every pledge he made—on the altar of political expediency, at one time in one constituency supporting a candidate who repudiates most emphatically one part of his platform and on another occasion supporting another candidate who repudiates another part of his platform. It seems to me, Sir, that the leader of the Opposition, in view of his record during the past year, is the last man who should ask the leader of the Government by what right he holds his present position.

The leader of the Opposition has accused the Government of being usupers. Usurpers indeed! Are we then to consider as usurpers the men who have consistently adhered to a policy which has been the recognized policy on tariff matters in this country for forty years? Are we to consider those men usurpers and to regard as bona fide a gentleman who for the sake of attaining to the position of leader of a party endorsed a platform in its entirety and broke almost every plank of that platform as soon as he assumed the office which he now holds? If any person is entitled to be called a usurper of office it is the present leader of the Opposition.

That hon. gentleman has stated that in the election of 1917 there was only one issue before the country and that issue was the war. He laboured at some length by quotations from the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side to show that that was the only issue in the election of 1917. I think he exerted himself needlessly in that regard. There was one issue in the election of 1917 and that issue was of such vast importance as to overshadow every other thought that might be in the mind of a man running for Parliament. I think, therefore, it is quite right to say that the issue, and practically the only one, in the last election was the war and the carrying of it on to a successful conclusion. There were strong reasons for doing what was done at that time; there were strong reasons why that should be the issue. In 1914 we obtained by voluntary enlistment some ninety-six thousand men in Canada. In 1915 we obtained one hundred and ten thousand. In 1916 we obtained one hundred and seventy-nine thousand. In 1917 we obtained only fifty-six thousand. No one will claim that the need for men was less in 1917 than it was in any of the preceding years—the need was greater.

In Great Britain the need was recognized by all classes of the population and by none more so than by the women. Sir, some two million eight hundred thousand women in that little island were engaged in what may properly be called war service. Two hundred and seventy thousand of them were engaged in agriculture, tilling the fields and reaping the crops. Eight hundred and nineteen thousand were engaged in the metal trades; over seven hundred thousand were engaged in making munitions, and sixteen thousand five hundred were working in the shipyards. There was strong need if we were to maintain our national honour and be true to our pledge to back up the boys who had gone overseas, for the action that was taken in 1917, and good and sufficient cause why the war should be the main and practically the only issue.

During the years up to the election of 1917 the Government of this country was burdened with such responsibility as I venture to say never fell to the lot of any previous Government in Canada. Nevertheless they carried on. During those years the present leader of the Opposition was in a foreign country in close association with the greatest and most unscrupulous profiteering plutocrat on the face of the earth. When the election came on and the issue was whether Canada was true to the boys overseas or not—that in a word was what the issue amounted to—the present leader of the Opposition returned to Canada, became a candidate in the election, and did all he possibly could to prevent reinforcements from being sent overseas.

That was his attitude at that time, and no amount of declamation, no amount of bombast and no amount of vociferous vituperation on the part of the leader of the Opposition can hide that record. It is there, the people of this country know it—and when I say "the people of this country" I mean the people of all parties in this country. I am sure I am speaking what is right when I say that thousands of Liberals from one end of Canada to the other will never follow the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, and that they would regard it as a calamity if he ever came to occupy the position of Prime Minister.

My hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) said it was striking how history repeats itself. Yes, there are some striking examples of that. Away back in 1867, when men were just as strong-willed as are the men of to-day, when they were just as partisan as are their descendants of the present day, there were men big enough and broad enough to lay aside their party differences of opinion and to unite for a great purpose. Fifty years later history repeated itself, and the descendants of those men, to the everlasting honour of Canada, were big enough and broad enough to lay aside party differences and unite for a great purpose—the purpose of keeping faith with the boys who went overseas. Everybody knows the attitude of the men who were elected in 1917 on that great issue, and everybody knows the attitude of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. No amount of eloquence on his part can cover up his attitude at that time, nor make the red-blooded people of Canada have confidence in him.

The hon. the leader of the Opposition says that this Parliament has no right to deal with the tariff issue. He asked the question: Will any one say that the tariff is an issue arising from the war? Well, I would say: Yes, most emphatically, beyond question the tariff is an issue arising from the war. Can any person question that we have changed international commercial relations to-day, and that those changed relations have been brought about and are directly due to the great conflict through which we have passed? Every country in the world has been forced to recognize the effect which that war has had upon international commercial relations, and every country is studying the problem now and taking steps to adjust its tariff to meet the changed conditions. Most certainly the tariff, as it has been forced upon us by the war, is a condition arising from the war. The hon. gentleman says that we should not deal with the tariff, that it should be dealt with only by a Parliament truly representative of the people. Well, he did not hold that view last year. What has brought about the change in his mind? In the debates of last session he thought it was all right for a tariff resolution to be brought down and debated. What makes the difference between now and this time last year with regard to this Parliament dealing with the tariff?

But let us take him at his word. The tariff is a very important matter. I could quote from a great many public men, including the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), who for fifteen years held the office of Finance Minister and had much to do with tariff matters—I could quote him and many others to the effect that the tariff can not be tinkered with every few months, but has to be dealt with periodically. While I quite appreciate the importance of dealing with the tariff, my own opinion is that this Parliament would make a mistake if it dealt drastically with it at this session. It may be advisable to make certain changes and alterations, but I do not think the present time opportune to make any very general changes, especially in view of the fact that our principal trade is with our neighbour to the south and with Great Britain. A new party has been elected to office in the United States, a party which gave very definite and positive pledges in regard to tariff revision, and it seems to me that it would be the part of wisdom for this Parliament to defer a general revision of the trtiff until our neighbours to the south have given some indication, as they are bound to give, in redemption of their recent election pledges. We are more dependent upon the United States so far as this matter is concerned than they are upon us.

But appreciating the importance, Mr. Speaker, of dealing with the tariff, if it is advisable that it should only be dealt with by a Parliament truly representative of the people, then it seems to me that the leader of the Opposition in that very circumstance has advanced a good reason why there should not be a dissolution. This Parliament cannot be taken as truly representative of the people from the standpoint of representation by population; that can only be remedied after the census is taken. A few months from now that census will be taken, and after a redistribution we will have a Parliament truly representative of the peoeple, assuming, of course, that the redistribution will take into consideration the changes in population in the various provinces and in the various centres. No one can reasonably argue that an hon. gentleman representing a constituency of fifteen or twenty thousand people should have a say which would be as strong as that of three representatives from other parts. Yet it is true that until redistribution is effected we shall have some members representing a population of 70,000 or 80,000, while others, as in the case of the hon. gentleman from Brome (Mr. McMaster) represent a population of 13,000 or 14,000. So far as the matter affects the question of a parliament truly representative of the people dealing with the tariff, I do not think it needs any argument.

The member for St. James stated that fourteen members had been elected to this side in 1917 by the soldier vote; at least, that is the way I understood him. The statement of the hon. member is absolutely incorrect. I have before me a summary of the general election returns for 1917. All but four of the 82 members who were elected to this House from Ontario were elected by the civil vote, without regard to the soldier vote at all. Of the four, three were Conservative-Unionists and one was a Liberal-Unionist. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the member elected for any constituency would have obtained at least as large a proportion of the votes of the soldiers overseas as he would of the votes of the soldiers who cast their ballots at home. If you allowed the member for Essex South only the same percentage of overseas votes as he received of the home soldier vote and gave the other votes to his opponent, he would still have a comfortable majority. That narrows it down to only three seats in Ontario which could possibly have been affected by any manipulation of the soldier vote, and there has been no charge that the slightest attempt was made to manipulate the soldier vote in Ontario.

Let us consider the province of Quebec. Out of sixty-five seats it is true that on that occasion only three supporters of the Government were elected. The hon. Minister of Marine had 1,446 of a majority of the civil vote, and 1,957 of a majority of the soldier vote, so that he could have made a present of 1,000 votes to his opponent and still have a majority of some 1,400. The member for St. Antoine had a majority of 1,583 of the civil vote; he could have given his opponent 1,000 soldier votes and still have had a majority of 1,100. In the case of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), he had a majority of 2,099 of the civil vote, and could have given his opponent 1,000 of his soldier votes and still have had a majority of 1,930. Surely the members of the Opposition who were elected by acclamation in 1917 have no grievance so far as any alleged manipulation of votes is concerned. I do not think that many hon. gentlemen on the other side were very deeply concerned or very much affected by the soldier vote. The member for Yamaska got eight soldier votes, all told. The member for St. Denis got 199 and one of his opponents got five. The member for Kamouraska received 11 soldier votes and his opponent 4. The member for Joliette received none and his opponent 3. So that for some reason the soldier vote did not seem to cut much ice down there; there did not seem to be many soldier votes in the province of Quebec.

I could give the details of the votes in all the other provinces, but I will sum it up in this statement which I have made before in the House, and which I am prepared to prove; that not one hon. member sitting in this House owes his majority to any manipulation of the soldier vote. Every hon. gentleman elected to this House in 1917 would have been elected if you accorded to him the same percentage of the overseas vote as he received of the home soldier vote and gave the balance to his opponent. I have the figures which will prove my statement to the hilt. Therefore, the remarks of the hon. member for St. James this afternoon in this connection are not borne out by the facts. The hon. member for St. James referred to several things in connection with which he considered the Government delinquent. But he did not go into details; he simply made a general, blanket statement, asserting that the Government's railway policy was wrong, that there had been extravagance, and so on. I can only assume that the reason why the hon. member did not attempt to back up his general statement with details was because he had no details with which to back them up—that is the only conclusion that I can come to.

But I should like to ask the hon. gentleman: If the Government was guilty of any of the sins or delinquencies which he charges them with, why did his leader move an amendment in such bald and naked terms? Why did his leader not move an amendment condemning the Government for some act that the Government had performed or some delinquincies on the part of the Government? It is strange that in all these by-elections, in all the speeches made from one end of the country to the other by the leader of the Opposition and those that supported him, they have unconsciously paid a tribute to the Government that, they say, should resign office because, while the Government has had a lot of work to do and has had to deal with millions and hundreds of millions of dollars, particularly during these years of the war, the Opposition, in all their speeches have made no specific charges against the Government in regard to their conduct of public business. They have not said: This Government should resign office because, during the years since 1917, it has failed to redeem its pledges to the people; it has failed to do properly the work which fell upon it to do. The only reason advanced by the leader of the Opposition is in effect: You have performed the work that you were supposed to perform and you have done it well, so well indeed that I am not finding any fault with it; but we want you to step down and out, because we want a chance to get in. Talk about holding on to office! There never was, I suppose, an hon. gentleman who took any part in the political life of this country who has manifested such a crazy eagerness and at the same time an entire unfitness for office as the leader of the Opposition.

By-elections! West Peterborough, the one to which my hon. friends like to refer! Well, the by-election in West Peterborough resulted as it did. West Peterborough at least elected a man who repudiated the platform of the leader of the Opposition and was assisted in the election by that leader himself. That is the situation so fas as West Peterborough is concerned. But the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) quotes some remarks made by the former member for Peterborough West, Mr. Burnham, in which he expresses his opinion as to what should be done, and says that Parliament should dissolve, that there should be a general election. Does the leader of the Opposition hold that view? Apparently, yes. Why does not the leader of the Opposition show by acts that he holds that view? Why is it that he permits one of his principal lieutenants to hold two seats in this House? Why does he not prevail upon him to resign one of those seats and bring that question up as a great issue? The reason why, it seems to me, is about the same as the reason why his amendment is so naked and bald as it is. We are told by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) that one of the constituencies to which I refer is a constituency which would be disposed to favour free trade and that the other constituency is just as strongly disposed towards protection. The leader of the Opposition, who is so extremely courageous in regard to wanting a general election, is afraid to open the constituency which favours free trade for fear that he would have to appear on the platform and endorse, rather more openly than he cares to do down in this part of the country, the doctrine of free trade. He is equally afraid to have the other constituency opened for fear that he would be obliged, more openly than he cares to do, to advocate a policy of protection and thus lose some of the support which he hopes to get in the West, and which he will never get. That is one of the reasons why, I think, he does not allow one of those constituencies to have representation in this House, why he does not test out his view by having the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux), who represents Gaspé and Maisonneuve, resign one of those seats and give an opportunity for an election. The leader of the Opposition has not shown any very strong disposition for an election in the past. It is true he has talked of elections, but when the elections were on in St. John and Colchester, the hon. gentleman, who was talking of elections and saying: "Oh, yes, we want to go to the country; we want to test public opinion, did not put up a man in Colchester and test public opinion. He took good care not to go down there; he went three thousand miles away. That is characteristic of the hon gentleman; he has done most of his fighting at a distance of about three thousand miles.

I could quote from remarks made, in times past, by many hon. gentlemen opposite, which, I think, would very strongly support this Government in the attitude it has taken, and support the members on this side in taking the course which they are taking. We have on this side men who, it is true, were elected as Liberal Unionists, others who were elected as Conservative Unionists, men who previously to 1917 followed one or other of the old political parties. On the other side of the House we have some hon. gentlemen saying that certain gentlemen on this side are untrue to Liberal principles in staying on this side of the House. I could quote from the utterances of a number of very prominent men to show that any Liberals who were elected in 1917 to sit on this side of the House are more consistent in sitting here and supporting this Government than they would be if they went across and sat behind the leader of the Opposition. What was the attitude of the Liberal party as regards the tariff for the fifteen years it was in power? Was its attitude for the fifteen years it was led by the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in keeping with the platform of the Liberal party as laid down in August, 1919? Not by any means. Take for instance, the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in regard to the industries of the country. I am quoting now from a speech which was sent broadcast throughout the country, a speech delivered by that right hon. gentleman on the 7th March, 1911. He says:

> I pass to a more important objection—

He was speaking of reciprocity.

> —really the only objection of any consequence that I know of. That objection is that this agreement will imperil our industries. How will it imperil our industries? This agreement is concerned chiefly with natural products. There are no manufactured products dealt with in it except agricultural implements.

He might have gone on and said there was no very serious reduction made on agricultural implements. It is true that the attitude of the Liberal party of that day, led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was in favour of taking the duties off foodstuffs, but so far as manufactured articles were concerned he made it very clear indeed that his attitude and the attitude of his party was not to interfere with the industries of this country. Therefore, I say that hon. gentlemen who are sitting on this side of the House are more consistent in their attitude on the trade policy of this country, which has been followed by all Governments for the last forty years, than are hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House, and who laid down a platform—and that is the only guide we have as to their views—which they say themselves it is not advisable to attempt to carry out. Take, for instance, the statement of the hon. member for Shelbourne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in the House last session. Discussing the tariff, he said:

> I do not think myself, as things are going now, that we can look to that party for a sound tariff policy.

He was speaking of the Farmers' party. I entirely agree with him. I do not think we can. He went on:

> What then? I do not even think we can expect to get a sound and safe tariff policy by a too rigid adherence to every line and every letter of the Liberal Tariff platform. I think myself that we will find that we are all prone in framing platforms to put things perhaps a little more strongly than is wise, and we all find when we come to the responsibly of office that we may have to modify our views.

What faith, Mr. Speaker, can you place in a party which has for one of its principal men a man who can make a statement like that? The hon. member for Shelbourne and Queen's took part recently in the election in Peterborough, and of course he was told by the Liberal candidate there that it would not do to talk free trade in Peterborough, but, on the contrary, an assurance must be given to the people of that industrial centre that their industries would not be imperilled. What was the attitude of the hon. gentleman? Did he get up and quote to them from the platform of the Liberal party framed at the convention in Ottawa in August, 1919? No, Mr. Speaker, on the contrary he gets up and says: Why be alarmed, you Liberals, for your industries? Did we not make promises previous to 1896? Did we not say from one end of Canada to the other that if we only had an opportunity we would destroy protection root and branch, obliterate it entirely,—that was our statement in 1896, but gentlemen, did we do it?—for fifteen years we went back on the pledges and promises we had made previous to 1896; for fifteen years we proved false to the pledges which we had given throughout this country in the preceding eighteen years, so, surely, you men of Peterborough need no further guarantee that we can be false to our pledges again.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr Speaker, I had just about concluded my remarks before recess when you called it 6 o'clock. I have very few words to add to what I have already said, and I shall therefore occupy only a very few minutes more. I was about to call attention to a remark by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), who referred rather slightingly to certain members on this side of the House as weak-kneed reformers, and I believe that in connection with that remark he quoted some statement made some years ago by the late Hon. Edward Blake. Well, I presume there were people, tyros in politics like the hon. member, who years ago called Edward Blake names when he saw fit to dissociate himself from his leader on a great matter of public policy. I think, therefore, hon. members on this side may pass very lightly the derogatory remarks made by the hon. member for St. James in his speech.

Now, I want to put this question in all seriousness to the members of this House: Suppose this amendment should carry, what then? Let me give the opinion of the leader of the Opposition on that point. Speaking in the Peterborough election, as reported in the press, the hon. gentleman said that if this Government did as he claimed it should do and resigned, the constitutional procedure would be for His Excellency the Governor General to call upon the leader of the Opposition to form a Government and that the leader of the Opposition—of course, there is no doubt about this—would immediately accede to the request. That would not mean a general election; it would mean that the Cabinet ministers selected by the hon. gentleman would have to go to the country for election. So that in the event of this amendment carrying, the constitutional procedure would be that the hon. gentleman, on the advice of His Excellency, would endeavour to form a Government to carry on for the rest of the life of this Parliament, another year and a half or two years. On what mandate would he carry on? Is there any doubt that this is the course he would take? He has intimated that he would not proceed with a general tariff revision until he had put his house in order, and perhaps it would be several years before the question would be submitted to the people in regard to the tariff. The whole attitude of the hon. gentleman, borne out by his own speeches, goes to show that he is not, and has not been, actuated by high motives and lofty principles in making the demand he has made upon the Government to resign, but that he has been impelled solely by the desire to obtain office with the fruits thereof for himself. That is the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure the hon. member will allow me to make a statement in correction. He is purporting to quote a speech I made at Peterborough. If he will look at that speech he will discover that it is exactly the opposite of what he has said. What I stated in Peterborough was that if the present Government were defeated on a want of confidence vote, and the leader of the Opposition were called upon to form a Government, the Government so formed would not proceed to deal with the tariff, but would dissolve Parliament and have a general election and that the issue on the tariff would be discussed at that election. Nothing would be done by this Parliament to deal with the tariff one way or the other. This is the opposite of what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, I wonder just how much nearer the people would be to relief if the hon. gentleman had his way, than if this Parliament continued for the rest of its term. The hon. gentleman says he would go ahead and form his Government. That would take some time; the year 1921 would be well on the way. I venture to say that if this motion carried and the hon. gentleman were called upon to form a Government, he would take good care that he put his fences in order as well as he possibly could. I think I am absolutely safe in saying that he would carry on until after redistribution had taken place. If he were called upon to form a Government, some time must elapse before he could get under way and the census, or at least that part of it relating to population, would have been taken. Does he mean to say that he wouid disregard that and proceed on the present distribution of constituencies and go to the people? I should like to ask him that question.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Ask him now.

Mr. EDWARDS: I have been reminded that while it is perfectly proper for an hon. member to ask me a question it is not competent for me, under the rules of the House, to ask another member any questions.

I do not intend to be called to order in that regard again. There is only one other thing to which I wish to refer. In the speech made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) and also in that of the hon. member for St. James, we find very slighting references by both gentlemen to what they term a desire on the part of the Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen) to court the favour of the province of Quebec. They declare that the Prime Minister has endeavoured to get Cabinet representation from that province; that being eager to obtain increased representation he has made overtures to the province of Quebec in that direction. Well, suppose that were true; is there anything unworthy in the supposition?

The province of Quebec is the oldest, the largest, and certainly one of the most important, of the provinces of Confederation. I am sure every person realizes and regrets —no one to a greater degree than the Prime Minister himself—the fact that Quebec has not greater representation in the Cabinet than it has to-day. Is it unworthy on the part of the Prime Minister that he should like to see that province with proper representation? Is that something to provoke sneers from hon. gentlemen opposite? It seems to me that the thinking men of the province of Quebec will view this matter in a different light from the way in which hon. gentlemen opposite regard it, if we are to judge from their remarks.

What does it disclose? We had some time ago, and from time to time we still have, little scraps in the Globe. The editorial utterances of that paper indicate the object and purpose of the whole propaganda. The Globe on the 4th August last said that the present Prime Minister had made a speech in this House bitter and stinging in its hostility and antagonism to the province of Quebec. The Prime Minister, speaking in the city of Sherbrooke, referred to this statement of the Toronto Globe and explicitly and most emphatically denied it, and he asked that paper to publish one single line or sentence that he had ever uttered at any time indicating hostility or unfriendliness to Quebec.

Up to date the Globe has made no attempt to justify the lying assertion which its columns contained on the 4th August. It was and is a part of the plan of that paper to assist gentlemen like the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), the hon. member for St. James, and others, in carrying on a propaganda the purpose and object of which is to solidify the people of that Province against this Government by appeals to race prejudice. That is the whole purpose and object of these gentlemen, and that is what is behind the sneers which they pass across the floor of the House to the Prime Minister who in exhibiting friendliness for the province of Quebec to-day as Prime Minister is exhibiting a sentiment no different from that which he has manifested throughout his public life. It is a cheap kind of political propaganda, it is an unworthy propaganda to carry on, but it is the kind of propaganda which has been and is still being carried on by certain hon. gentlemen opposite. I am glad to know that there is at least one member from the province of Quebec, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) who has disassociated himself from such unworthy attacks as those indulged in by the member for Brome and the juvenile member for St. James.

I challenge the leader of the Opposition, or any of those sitting behind him, to quote one single sentence, one single line, one single thought expressed in words by the present Prime Minister of Canada at any time, in this House or out of it, which has indicated the slightest feeling of hostility or unfriendliness to the people of the province of Quebec. I do not wonder at the member for Brome giving utterance to such statements as those referred to, but the member for St. James is a young man and being a young man he should have one of the characteristics of youth—he should have courage and he should have the courage to tell the truth. And Mr. Speaker while the Globe took a course in regard to the Prime Minister which it could not justify and has never attempted to justify, the member for St. James this afternoon was careful not to make a specific charge of such a character against the Prime Minister or any member sitting on this side. In the speech that he had prepared for circulation in the province of Quebec he arranged his words for the express purpose of conveying a thought which he had not the courage to give utterance to in this Chamber.

I, Mr. Speaker, have more confidence in the judgment and sense of fair play of the people of Quebec than have these hon. gentlemen who profess to speak for that province, and my confidence in their judgment and sense of fair play is such that I believe in the course of time they will ask the men who are making these charges and indulging in these unwarranted statements to back up their charges and assertions with facts, and back them up in a way that will leave no doubt as to their truth or falsity. Because you cannot fool the people all the time My hon. friends from Brome and St. James may think that they can make unfounded statements with impunity, statements which will be accepted by the people of Quebec, but the time will come when the people will demonstrate that they are fair minded, and that they are going to judge these questions on their merits and judge public men according to their undoubted record. On that issue, and judged in that manner, I have no doubt as to the result of the next election when it comes.

This Parliament was elected for a period of five years. It has carried on during the very trying years of the war and during the years which have succeeded the war—the years of reconstruction, perhaps even more trying than when the war was actually in progress. Because, Sir, while the war was on there was the cement of a common peril and a common danger to hold in check the making of reckless statements by certain hon. gentlemen opposite and some others throughout the country. But at the conclusion of the war unrest developed, as it always has developed after every great struggle, and the difficulties of the Government were accentuated. The problems which faced the Government, and the burden of responsibility which rested upon them, should have been such as to appeal to all patriotic Canadians to refrain from other than constructive criticism and to give a helping hand in the heavy task which confronted the Administration. As I said earlier in the day, one of the best tributes paid to the efficiency of this Government has unconsciously been paid to it by the leader of the Opposition, and those who toured with him, in the speeches they delivered in every province, because the burden of their cry in those speeches was not that there had been mal-administration or lack of efficiency by the Government or any of the departments in handling public affairs. It was merely the clap-trap in regard to a mandate such as we have heard from that leader and from some of those who have attempted to echo his words.

Extravagance and bad handling of the finances of this country! What have they brought in support of such general statements? If you compare the financial situation of Canada on the 31st March, 1920, with its position on the 31st March, 1914, you will certainly find that the national debt has been largely increased; but if you look carefully into those finances, and the records of the Finance Department will bear me out, it will be found, Mr. Speaker, that taking into consideration some $246,000,000 of capital expenditure other than investments, in the period of time I have mentioned, the Government of Canada not only carried on under their heavy burdens and responsibilities, but out of the revenues of the Dominion they paid off obligations to the extent of over $640,000,000, nearly twice as much as our net debt the year before the war.

And, Mr. Speaker, they also make charges against this Government regarding its management of the finances of the country. I ask those who make those charges to compare the financial position of the Dominion with that of other countries engaged in the war. They will find—and I make this statement believing it to be true—that the financial position of Canada is better than that of any other belligerent country, with the exception of the United States, and that the debt per capita at the conclusion of peace was less than that of any other country engaged in the war, with the exception of the United States.

Not only that, Sir, but during the war, while the Government practised the most rigid economy in regard to public expenditure, there was one class to which they gave special consideration. I refer to the agriculturists. I think the records will bear me out that during the years of the war and since, notwithstanding the financial obligations which were pressing upon us from all sides, federal assistance to agriculture was from three to four times as great as it was in the years previous to 1914. Add to that the fact, Sir, that our forests and mines and fisheries during the years I have mentioned have doubled their production, and that agriculture and manufacturing have trebled their output since 1914; and add to that the further fact that notwithstanding the generous contributions of the people to the various Victory Loans, amounting to about $2,000,000,000, on the 31st March, 1920, the savings deposits of our people were 87 per cent greater than they were on the 31st March, 1914, or 7 per cent greater than those of the people of the United States for exactly the same period of time. These figures do not indicate that the country has been going to the dogs under the Administration which has held power during the years of the war and since. These figures do not warrant the talk, unsupported by anything in the shape of detailed information, of hon. gentlemen opposite. And it is no wonder that the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) limited himself to a mere general blanket accusation against the Government.

These are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why the hon. the leader of the Opposition and his followers are asking for the resignation of this Government; but the very reasons advanced by these hon. gentlemen are an unconscious tribute to its efficiency. If the hon. the leader of the Opposition could have brought charges against this Government or against any department of it of mismanagement of our national affairs, does any person think for one moment that he would not have included them in his amendment? But no; that was not the purpose and object of the hon. gentleman. On the contrary, he presents a mere naked, bald amendment. For what purpose? To prevent an amendment being moved which might possibly divide hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, and naturally that is something he did not want to do. I commend again to the hon. leader of the Opposition, as I did this afternoon, the frank stand taken by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) when a question was put to him last year. Any public man, if he has the courage of his convictions, should not be afraid to answer a straight question candidly and say where he stands on the tariff.

But the hon. the leader of the Opposition is afraid to move an amendment to the Address in reference to the tariff, although an invitation to do so is contained in the Speech from the Throne. He is afraid to move an amendment embodying in distinctive and definite form a statement in regard to the tariff for fear he would find hon. gentlemen sitting across on my extreme right not exactly agreeing with such an amendment; he is afraid to move an amendment containing some of the views which he and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) expressed in Peterborough in order to pull the wool over the eyes of the people in that constituency who are interested in their local industries; he is afraid to move an amendment along the line of his speeches in Peterborough for fear that he would not get the votes of the hon. gentlemen to my right on the other side; he is afraid to move one along the free trade lines which he advocated when he was out in the Prairie Provinces, telling the farmers that there is really no difference between the Farmers' platform and his platform. He dare not come down to the province of Ontario or to the province of Quebec and make such statements. It would not do. He is in the position of either simply voting for the motion on the Address, or of moving this naked, bald amendment of his, because he dare not move anything more specific.

Well, I should like the people all over the Dominion to compare the wabbling, twisting, tortuous course of the leader of the Opposition with the straightforward attitude assumed by the leader of this Government, as exemplified in their speeches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Why, the twistings and turnings and contortions of the hon. the leader of the Opposition on political matters would make a snake turn green with envy. Where does he stand? He stands nowhere; he is like Mahomet's coffin—suspended between Heaven and Hell, and fit for neither place.

Mr. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the few remarks I am about to make touching the amendment submitted by the hon. the Leader of the Opposition, I wish to answer very briefly the hon. member from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I wish the hon. gentleman could understand me as well as I understood him. However, he was entitled to use his mother tongue and I shall avail myself of the same privilege.

The hon. member from Frontenac wonders how it is that the hon. Leader of the Opposition should claim the right of leading the Liberal party in this House, and throughout the whole country. The hon. member ought to know that in November, 1919, there was held in Ottawa a large convention attended by delegates from every section of Canada, to elect the leader of the Liberal party who was to succeed the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That Liberal convention was evidently a democratic one.

Consequently the hon. Leader of the Opposition can say that he is really the leader of the Canadian Liberal party and he has a perfect right to claim, before this House and before the country, that he holds in his hands the destinies of the Liberal party. Quite another thing was the choice of the present Prime Minister. He was not chosen by a great democratic convention of delegates from all parts of the country called for the purposes of choosing a leader; the hon. Prime Minister was chosen by his partisans in this House, and as the hon. members who sit at your right, Mr. Speaker, do not represent the public opinion of the whole country, he is therefore not the choice of the whole of Canada.

The hon. member for Frontenac says also that thousands of Liberals, not only from the province of Ontario, but from all the provinces of Canada, refuse to recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition as the leader of the Liberal party. Well, he forgets the result of the election which has just taken place in Peterborough West. At any rate, if he be so confident, if he is so sure of his statement, let him advise the hon. Prime Minister to dissolve the House, and he will see that the hon. Leader of the Opposition has followers everywhere in Canada.

The hon. member for Frontenac claims that not one of the members who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, owes his election to the soldiers' vote. He forgets the message which was sent, in Algonquin dialect or in gibberish, I don't know which, by the hon. Prime Minister of to-day, directing that the soldiers' votes be distributed a little everywhere in different Western constituencies. This was never denied, and moreover the hon. Prime Minister himself has claimed in this House that he was perfectly justified in this course and that the electoral law was broad enough to allow it.

In reference to the election in West Peterborough the hon. member for Frontenac said that the hon. leader of the Opposition had contradicted himself in that county. Well, Mr. Speaker, as you know, that election took place after the resignation of Mr. Burnham, given on the ground that he claimed to have been elected as a partisan of the Union Government and that this government was to cease to exist at the conclusion of the war. He showed a little more courage than his friends. True this brought on his defeat, but at any rate the electors of Peterborough had an opportunity of making their views known, not on the question of the tariff, not on the question of free trade or protection, but on the question whether the electors of Peterborough as well as those of the rest of Canada were asking the overthrow of this government. The four opposition candidates were asking for a vote of non-confidence in the present administration, and the answer was eloquent.

The hon. member for Frontenac is also one of those who have fallen in love with the province of Quebec. It will be something new for the whole country to learn that the hon. member for Frontenac is holding Quebec close to his heart—especially its population. Never since the hon. member has held a seat in this House has the province of Quebec had a more violent traducer. But the disciple is worthy of the master. He follows his leader, the present Prime Minister, who now tries to fawn upon the province of Quebec, after having been the instigator of all the insults, the cowardly outrages and accusations heaped against that province in 1917. This party, in anticipation of its defeat, is ready to fall on its knees in the hope of roping in the province of Quebec and maintaining itself in power. Of the genuflexions of these gentleman I want none, but it is a pleasure to me to see them in such posture. One thing, however, must not be forgotten. If the province of Quebec knows how to forgive, it also knows how not to forget, and when the time comes it will remember the campaign of slander and calumnies which has been carried on through the whole country, and the principal instigator of which was the present leader of the Government. It will be all very well for him to try and make love and offer kisses of dubious sincerity to the electors of the province of Quebec, they will remember that he has been the chief organizer of that campaign of slander and race hatred carried on in order to juggle away power in 1917.

The hon. member for Frontenac talks of the fair play of the province of Quebec, That was not the talk we heard in 1917. We were then a disloyal province, a band of slackers. To-day, the province of Quebec is the model province, the Mecca of Canada. It is the fount of good principles, the resort where one may breath liberty and peace.

For Quebec, now—we can say it with pride—holds one of the most enviable positions in the Confederation, not only in respect of the liberty enjoyed by all its citizens, but also of the wise and progressive administration which directs its destinies.

Mr. Speaker, many members have occupied the floor since the beginning of the present debate. No one, however, has spoken in the French language, which is one of the two official languages of the country. In accordance with my custom I wished to pay my tribute to Her Majesty the French language, and I wanted to be the first one to do so. Since I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House—an honour I owe to my good and faithful friends the electors of the county of Rimouski—I have always, at every session, protested against the refusal of the Government to recognize the rights of the French language in this parliament. Thus, at every session, with the exception of that of 1918, the mover and seconder of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne were English speaking members, completely ignorant of the French language and consequently incapable of making their speech in French. The Government has no valid reason to cloak their refusal for, as I have often had the opportunity of stating, they have in the ranks of their followers a member who is very well qualified to move or second the Address in quite good French, I mean my hon. friend the member for Edmonton East (Mr. Mackie).

It may perhaps be said in certain quarters, that this is after all but a question of detail, and that I attach too much importance to the matter. What might be said does not much matter; I am conscious of doing my duty by protesting as I do at this moment and as I did in the past. The saying is always true that the best, the surest way of keeping a right secure is to exercise it. That is why, every time I have had occasion to take the floor in this House, I have always used my maternal tongue—the beautiful French language—for I always attached, as I still do the greatest importance to the survival in this country of our sweet parlance from France.

Hon. Mr. BELAND: Hear, hear.

Mr. d'ANJOU: I saw with great pleasure that the mover of the Address in the Senate paid us the delicate compliment of using French in the first part of his remarks. This honourable gentleman is to be congratulated, and he may be assured of the gratitude of all the French Canadians of the Dominion. It is evident that he did not consult the members of the Government before taking this gracious course, as otherwise he would have been given the formal order not to pronounce a single French word.

The new Prime Minister—the chief of the new tri-colour party—has missed a fine occasion to prove his sincerity towards the province of Quebec, which he has wooed and so frequently complimented since the usurpation of his present office.

If the province of Quebec is now dear to his heart, why has he not recognized the rights of the majority of its inhabitants by calling upon some of his partisans to move or second the Address in French? He has not done so, because he is not sincere. Besides, nobody can believe in the sincerity of the chief of the political mountebanks who, in order to win the election of 1917, did not hesitate to defame the province of Quebec and besmirch everything that is French in Canada.

The right hon. Minister of Commerce, in the course of his address about the League of Nations, told us that the two official languages at the assembly of the League were French and English. He even added that French was the dominant language at the assembly. French is the diplomatic language, and those who plume themselves upon belonging to the superior race should be able to understand and speak that language if they really wish to show their superiority over all other races.

Again, I condemn with the utmost energy the refusal of the Government to do justice to the French element in this country, by denying to the French language the place of honour which it has a right to occupy in the deliberations of the Canadian parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as most of the hon. members who have preceded me, I will not tarry over the discussion of the more or less important questions brought forward in the speech from the Throne. The main question at this moment is whether in truth the present Government have a mandate from the people for the administration of the affairs of the country.

In the magnificent and powerful speech delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition he over abundantly proved that the present Government have usurped power and that they have consequently no authority to direct the destinies of Canada.

The Prime Minister answers the arguments of the hon. leader of the Opposition by saying that he will remain in power as long as he can command a majority in the House of Commons. His majority, however, is but one of some twenty votes, fifteen of which are of members who have no right to their seats in the House since their election was due to the soldiers' vote. Such, Mr. Speaker, is what the hon. Prime Minister calls commanding the confidence of the House of Commons and consequently of the country at large.

At any rate, either this Government is the heir of the Union Government formed in 1917 for the duration of the war, or it is a government with a new head. In either case they hold no mandate from the people to govern the country.

It must not be forgotten that in 1917 this Government was constituted for one object only: the carrying on and the ending of the war. On all the hustings of the land, it was declared that this coalition was to end with the war. As you know, the war has long since come to its end, but nevertheless these gentlemen contend that they have the right to continue to direct the affairs of the country, because, as they say, they have behind them the majority of the House. They may truly have a majority, but, as I said a moment ago, what sort of a majority? A majority composed of members elected through the manipulation of the soldiers' vote, thanks to the iniquitous War-time Elections Act, thanks to the disfranchisement of loyal Canadian citizens. And it is with a majority thus obtained that the Government mean to carry on the affairs of the country.

As I said before, the last by-elections, and particularly that of West Peterborough, are an indication of the popular will. I am convinced that they reflect the sentiment of the whole electorate of Canada. The question was clearly put by all the candidates, and the answer was a signal one—the majority of the Opposition candidates was overwhelming.

For my part, I do not believe that the Prime Minister could have the respect, much less the confidence, of the Canadian electors. It is he who has shaped, who has conceived all the iniquitous laws from which we have suffered during the war. And he himself dared to boast of it in Sherbrooke, when he asserted that he was the father of conscription, and that if the thing was to be done over he was ready to repeat his measure.

The hon. Prime Minister is the man who in all circumstances was the instrument of the Government. He it was who devised the closure, the muzzling of the members of the Opposition and of all those who were here to defend the interests of the people. He was also, probably, the one who contrived the censure of the press in order to prevent the electors of Canada from being informed as to the doings of the Government. Not only were mouths closed in parliament, but newspaper men were bought, with the result that it became impossible for the Liberal Opposition to make its contentions known to the people.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have said enough to show that the leader of the Opposition was absolutely justifiable in offering his amendment to the House. One thing is sure, it is that the gentlemen on your right, Mr. Speaker, are not anxious to go before the people, for most of them are aware that they will never come back. Most of them, I repeat it, owe their election to the soldiers' vote. To-day, as was stated by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Power), the veterans are clamouring for elections. They are against the Government, and their votes cannot be controlled as they were at the election of 1917. All sections of the people, all those who wish the welfare and advancement of the country, the farmers, the workmen, the veterans of the great war, everybody; all those who wish to see the country come out of the slough into which it has fallen, all those who want to see the country marching towards the great destiny which Providence has in store for it, all those who long for the return of those bountiful days of 1896-1911; those, in a word, who wish to see Canada great and prosperous, are demanding a general election, and I am convinced that all the members on your left, Mr. Speaker, will vote in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition. They will thus fulfil their duty not only towards their electors but towards the country as a whole.

Mr. F B. STACEY (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the motion presented by the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaacs), means, in substance, the endorsation of the record and policy of this Government, and I also understand that the amendment offered thereto by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is a vote of want of confidence in the Government—in other words, its condemnation on its record and on its policy. I have as a member of this House listened very attentively to all that has been said in support of the amendment. I have also, in common with some others on this side, been honoured with a special invitation to support that amendment, and have naturally looked for good and sufficient reasons for taking such a step.

I consider that at any time in the history of this, or indeed of any country, it is a very important and serious matter to move for the condemnation of the Government. There are times, Sir, when such action is doubtless called for and warranted, and if, in my judgment, the present circumstances, the present conditions, the present situation, called for such a vote, I should not refrain from giving it. I have not, however, been shown that the present circumstances, the present conditions, the present situation, warrant me in accepting the invitation of the gentleman on the other side of the House.

I have said that I have listened in vain for sufficient reasons to give the vote solicited. Failing to hear any advanced, I have endeavoured in my own mind to search for sufficient reason to justify that course. As I understand the situation, three reasons might possibly be urged on behalf of a vote against the Government. If any one of these three was sufficiently substantiated, the casting of the vote asked for might be justified. If two were substantiated the justification would be increased, and if all three were proven there would be no escaping the responsibility. It is my purpose to examine the three reasons which appear to me to be worthy of consideration by every member of the House when the vote is called for.

I believe, Sir, that one reason—I shall take them in order—that might justify a member's voting in favour of the amendment would be the failure of the Government of the day to implement its pre-election promises. Let us consider carefully whether or not this Government should be condemned because of any failure to implement its pre-election promises. Has the Government failed to carry out its pledges made to the people in 1917? Various statements have been made in this House as to what was promised, what was pledged, what was understood in 1917. I take the word of no individual member; I take the word of the official statement made to the country when Sir Robert Borden formed a Union Government and appealed to the people. His platform was composed of twelve planks, and in the introduction to it are the words upon which the people of my constituency and, I believe, the people of my province and the people, in the main, of this Dominion, based their judgment and their decision. These are the words upon which his platform and policy were formulated and upon which our action was based:

'The lines of policy to be followed chiefly relate to the prosecution of the war and to the consideration and solution of problems arising during its progress or which will supervene upon the conclusion of peace.

Then followed the twelve planks of the Union platform of 1917. You will note that there is virtually a division of the programme into three parts: the prosecution of the war; the consideration and solution of problems which would arise during the war; the consideration and solution of problems which would supervene upon the conclusion of peace. Let us, Sir, examine these seriatim.

First of all, did the Government redeem its pledge to prosecute the war to the utmost of its ability? I need but ask the question to secure, not simply from this House, but from the country, a most emphatic, unanimous and positive answer. Whatever the Government failed to do, whatever mistakes the Government made, this can be said: The Government did not fail to implement its pledge in its determination to prosecute the war to the very uttermost and to the very last. It did so in the face of no small opposition; it did so when it was opposed by forces that, I think, will, in after years, regret the action taken in their opposition to the purpose of the Government. I remember when this city was almost invaded by an army of men who besought the Government to let up in its efforts and grant certain exemptions; but the Government kept its pledge; there was no let up; the war was prosecuted to the end, and I am told that at the last the Canadian forces were in the van, so that the Government did certainly redeem its pledge in respect to the first portion of its programme.

I take the second section of this programme. Did it consider and solve the problems which arose during the war? I have only to refer to the records of this House during the sessions of 1918 and 1919. There can be no question whatever but that to the very utmost of its ability, the Government endeavoured to solve and did, in no small degree, succeed in solving the problems which arose during the continuance of the war.

What about the problems which have arisen since the declaration of peace? If I read the speech from the Throne correctly, the bulk of the matter contained in that speech is centered around problems which have arisen since the declaration of peace, so that while two-thirds of the programme has been virtually completed, one-third is in process of fulfilment. This is the fifth session since this Government was elected, and a most unique situation obtains. I have not heard, and I do not think any other member in this House has heard the charge preferred that the Government of the day has failed to implement its pre-election promises. In bygone days, such charges were made; they were sometimes fearlessly made and successfully proven; but I know of no Government, provincial or federal, which has so effectually and successfully redeemed every pre-election promise as the Union Government has done since 1917. What does this mean? It means simply that the Government, having undertaken two-thirds of its programme and now endeavouring to redeem the remaining one-third in the closing years of its existence, should be voted out of office and we are asked to support a motion of want of confidence in it, because it has redeemed its pre-election promises. That is the reason. Conversely, what follows? It follows, that when a Government fails to redeem its pre-election promises, when it utterly ignores its pledge to the country, then it should be continued in office indefinitely. That is a high standard of national ethics to set up before the country! That my reasoning is correct follows clearly from what I have said; that is, if you vote a government out of office because it keeps its promises, you must vote to keep a government in office because it fails to redeem its promises.

A second reason which arises in my mind as a good and sufficient reason, if sustained, why I could vote want of confidence in the Government of the day is this—the formulation of charges, and accompanying proof, of political graft or corruption, the misappropriation of public funds for private purposes or any other maladministration of public funds contrary to the will of Parliament and the known will and desire of the people. As this matter has been so thoroughly canvassed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), I shall not dwell upon it at length; but I shall only say that the country has yet to hear from any member of the Opposition one single charge of misappropriation of public funds or any other maladministration of funds contrary to the will of Parliament and to the expressed desire of the people of Canada. That is something to be proud of. If the Union Government had done nothing more than that, it would have accomplished a great deal to have set before the country an example of a Government against which, during the entire term of its administration, no single charge had been laid with regard to the misappropriation or the maladministration of public funds.

A third reason which has suggested itself to my mind as a good and sufficient one why, if sustained, I could vote against the Government, is this—the enunciation of such a policy as, in the judgment of the members of Parliament, is detrimental to the prosperity and welfare of the country. If this Government were to enunciate and set forth such a policy as, in my humble opinion, would be detrimental to the prosperity and welfare of the Dominion of Canada, I should feel bound to support the present amendment. But what are the facts of the case? They are that the policy, so far as it has been enunciated in the spoken word and the published statements of the first minister of the Crown, is such as commends itself most heartily to my mind and judgment. I believe that policy, as clearly as I can understand his words, is in the highest interest of the country from a commercial, social and national standpoint. Why then should I vote against such a policy? I endorse the spirit and also the substance of his published language and of his spoken word, because those words have been uniform. I have heard him in the province by the Pacific; I have heard him in this city; I have read what he has said on the prairies; I have read what he has said east of the Ottawa river, and in every place and in every province he has told the same story.

There has been the enunciation of the same fiscal policy, namely, proper protection for all Canadian industries. I would that I could emphasize that little word "all," because, Sir, it includes the labour of the entire Canadian population. The policy looks towards the protection, not of any one class, or of any one people, or of any one section of the community, but it is a policy which aims to foster and promote the highest development and prosperity of all our Canadian industries, and our Canadian industries are manifold. They are not restricted to the manufacturers; they are not restricted to the cities; they cover the country from ocean to ocean, and, Sir, a fiscal policy that seeks to protect and preserve and encourage all legitimate Canadian industries is a policy such as I feel disposed to endorse and support.

There is another thought in the published statements and spoken words of the Prime Minister which appeals to me very strongly. I know that it has not been very seriously emphasized in this debate, but I see in it possibilities of great things in the future. I refer to what I believe to be his honest and sincere and genuine purpose and intention to do all within his power as First Minister of the Crown to unify the Canadian people. Sir, this is no time, even by insinuation, and much less by ridicule, to throw any slur or cast any reflection upon such a high and noble purpose. It may be said by some that unification is impossible. I grant that in some respects that is true, but in other respects unification is not only possible, but in the interest of Canada it is absolutely necessary. True it is, that from ocean to ocean there are varied interests, and in some respects we cannot all be united. We may never be united in our religious convictions. There is no desire on the part of any one, I hope, to have a recognized state religion in this country. We do not wish that; the country repudiates the thought. The desire of the people of Canada is that every man shall have the right of private opinion and action with regard to his own religious views and further that there should be no official recognition by the State of any particular body, class or creed but that all should stand on a common footing before the law of the land. There canont be unity so far as a great national religion is concerned. Nobody wants it, nobody expects it.

Neither can we be united politically; I suppose that goes without saying. But there is a sense in which I believe the Prime Minister is looking towards unity on a higher, or national plane; that is to say, we can be divided in opinions, but united in aim. This may be old and oft-trodden ground, but, Sir, we cannot traverse it too often. There is in our country room for division of opinion on great national questions, on great political principles, and so long as the division is along the line of principles I have absolutely nothing to say against it. I welcome it. I believe it is a healthful sign of public thought and public sentiment. What I deplore is the existence in this great country of anything which would even appear to divide province against province, or class against class, or one section of the country against another section. We may be divided on great national issues; we should on these be divided; but in the name of our common country let us divide on lines of principle or policy and not on lines of class, not on lines of religion, not on lines of race, not even on lines of language. We cannot afford it. Our country is too big and potential, the future of this Dominion is too vast in its importance to allow anything of that character to interfere with or retard our true national prosperity.

There has been, in late years, arising a class consciousness as we are all aware. There is room for a class consciousness, and there will issue from it certain results to the advantages of the class, its progress and development, locally, and socially, but when we step into the larger realm of national affairs and national policies, I claim, Sir, that we should be first, last, and always, Canadian citizens. I sit in this Chamber by the grace of the votes of my people, a fruit grower, here to my right is a lawyer, to my left a manufacturer, behind me are two doctors, across the aisle is a grain-grower from Saskatchewan, and another from Manitoba; but we are not here as lawyers, or grain-growers, or doctors, or manufacturers: we are here as Canadian citizens.

During the last few months we have had two by-elections in the province from which I come. Considerable has been said in this House about by-elections, and I want to tell you something about these two by-elections in my province. One was in the city of Victoria, the other in the constituency of Yale and, Sir, it is a matter of history, a matter of fact, that in neither of these cases was there an Opposition candidate in the field representing the official Opposition in this House. In the city of Victoria there was a combination of opponents of the Government, but without an issue, without the semblance of a platform—they were simply against the Government. What did we find in Yale, where the second by-election took place? We had the Government candidate standing on the Government record and on the Government policy. Did my Liberal friends put a candidate in the field in Yale? No, they did not, although at one time, I am told, they intended to. What was done? It was decided by the Liberals of Yale in written resolution that in view of the situation which obtained, all the opponents of the Government candidate, should unite in order to "defeat the common enemy" and therefore they endorsed the Opposition candidate.

That was the situation in Yale—no policy, no principle, simply a combination of some Liberals, some returned soldiers, some farmers, and some extreme Labour men who united their forces in support of one man who, when he received their endorsation, turned round and said: "I repudiate the whole of you; I will be an independent." My friends the Agrarians, through their representatives, have been doing their utmost to win to their political bosom the farmers from my province. That is perfectly legitimate. I presume that courtship is always in order. Up to the present the farmers in my constituency—and I have the honour to represent one of the finest rural constituencies in the Dominion of Canada—and the farmers of my province as a whole have not responded to their solicitations. They have stretched out their hands across the Rockies and with a firm grasp have said: "We are brithers a', but first and last we are Canadian citizens and we shall not enter into any political alliance with the agrarian movement of the Prairies."

Now, I stand here to-night as a farmer, but not as a class man. I believe that it is the right and the privilege of the members of any class to unite for the advancement of their own local interests, of their own business or profession; but in the higher sphere of national deliberation, let us meet as Canadian citizens 9 p.m. to promote the interests of all classes and conditions of people in the country and of the nation as a whole, irrespective of the occupations which we as members may individually pursue. I have examined as closely as I can the three main reasons which could possibly be adduced why a man should vote against the Government of the day and in favour of the amendment as proposed by the leader of the Opposition, and by way of brief review in reply let me say that this Government has kept its pre-election pledges. It has prosecuted the war to the utmost of its ability, and history will determine, as we cannot do to-night, the measure of praise which is due to Canadian arms in the final victory that was won in 1918. Now, because this Government redeemed every one of its pledges, and is now in process of winding up the business in the closing years of its record, am I to vote want of confidence in an Administration that by redeeming those pledges has brought honour to our country and established for her no small place of influence among the nations of the world? No charge of any serious character has been made against the Government. Why then should I vote against it?

The general future policy of the Government as enunciated by the Prime Minister in his address commends itself to the people of the Dominion, I believe. It is useless for my friends on the other side to say that the country wants a change. There is no use in saying that: the mere assertion does not make it a fact. I know that in many districts of this Dominion the people are satisfied with the present Government, and it is a weakness on the part of the Opposition to simply ask the Government to resign, and to reinforce that request by calling them names. That is only the method of school-boys in the primary classes. To say: "You are usurpers, office seekers, etc." is the policy of children and not of statesmen. Who are the office seekers? Ask that question in my district and people will smile, as well they might. When the First Minister of the Crown paid a visit to the province of British Columbia he left an impression of candour, of sincerity, of ability, and of personal power and magnetism that even his enemies admitted. More than one said to me in private: "I do not see how I can vote against a man of that calibre;" and so to-night, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in answer to my hon. friend from Brome that I cannot accept his invitation. I shall vote against the amendment and in favour of the motion.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the subjects contained in the Address, I desire to pay my tribute of congratulation to the mover and seconder, both of whom discharged their duty in this respect in an admirable manner. While I do not endorse some of the sentiments expressed in the speeches of those gentlemen, I must say that my hon. friend who moved the Address has undoubtedly displayed on this occasion literary attainments which are not frequently met with in our day and that in his short address he has expressed noble thoughts in noble language which I am sure we all appreciate. All together he has given unmistakable evidence of the fact that the "Garden of the Gulf" can produce the best elements of humanity as well as of nutriment. My hon. friend from Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) who has made his debut is also well equipped as a parliamentarian; he shows great command of language and much depth of thought, and the House may well regard him as a valuable acquisition. Naturally the hon. member for Yale is interested in apples and wants this commodity protected. Were I in his place I would endeavour to have this choice fruit enjoyed not only in the neighbourhood of its culture, but would have it sent across the boundary to the South so that it might tempt the American as well as the Canadian epicures. There are thousands of Canadians who would certainly greatly appreciate the extension of the field of fruit production and such an extension would be in the best interests not only of British Columbia but of the Dominion as a whole.

We now have a Prime Minister administering the destinies of the Dominion. Were the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) present in this Chamber I think he would permit me to state that from the first day he made his appearance among us I have acknowledged his talent, his ability, his legal acumen, his subtlety and ingenuity, and, recalling the first of his speeches in Parliament, there has come to my mind this evening an incident in which there figured an old deskmate of mine, who departed this world only a few months ago, and myself. The gentleman in question enjoyed the admiration and the love of the House during the years he sat beside me—I refer to the late Mr. Leblanc, who for years sat beside me in this Parliament and who made way for the present member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Leger). We had both carefully watched the young man who was to become the future Premier of Canada, and whose health seemed to be so frail. My deskmate of that time, who could not always follow closely the utterances of members, was accustomed to ask me what they had said and what my opinion was of their speeches. One day he inquired of me "What do you think of that young gentleman?" meaning the present Premier. I replied, "If he lives, he will rise."

My prediction has been fulfilled. The young member of that day has lived and has risen to a most commanding position, and he will undoubtedly bring to the administration of public affairs in Canada that talent and that ingenuity for which he was conspicuous when he first entered Parliament. Despite his mental equipment it seemed to be the fate of this young man to be plunged into difficulties, and in the exercise of his high duties he has undoubtedly at times been placed in a position before the country and before the Empire which perhaps he has not always enjoyed. His generosity has induced him to do his utmost to preserve his party from the fate which threatened it, and perhaps it is not too much to say that but for his ability it would have gone under before the year 1917 was reached.

In spite of my opinion of his talents I am bound to say that the present learned and capable Prime Minister has done things which have aroused suspicion in the minds of the people. Many of the doings of Parliament during the last ten years, it must be admitted, do not commend themselves to the calm judgment of the electors of Canada, including old time Conservatives as well as old time Liberals. It seems to me that his party have profited by his devotion and his talents to—I will not say ruin—but to lessen his reputation, for he was called to a better destiny than has been permitted to him as the result of his choice of followers and friends.

May I recall one of the first pieces of legislation with which he was identified and which had an important effect upon the procedure of Parliament? I remember well the manner in which it was introduced and how it blocked our late lamented leader, who was so greatly beloved not only by Canadians but by the world at large. As a result of the change in the rules of the House, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier on rising to speak on an amendment was obliged to sit down and to suffer in silence. He was debarred from speaking, although he had a perfect right to. When a vote was reached, I remember as well as though it were only yesterday the desertion of some seventeen or eighteen French-Canadian members elected as Nationalists. There was one exception, the then member for Bellechasse. With him blood was thicker than water, if I may use the phrase, and he voted on the side of the Liberal leader. But each of the other members to whom I allude rose to plant a dagger in the heart of the great Liberal. The time came when every one of them disappeared from political life, with the exception of one who managed to save himself when his political ship was foundering.

Other acts of the present Prime Minister when he was Solicitor General or Minister of the Interior have not commended themselves to public approval. His coming to the front, as he has done, denotes that his talents were far above those of the rest of his colleagues in Parliament. Let me say in this connection that we have not forgotten our former great leader. As the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville said yesterday our former great leader is dead. True he is dead but his spirit survives and will live for centuries to come.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, for a long time to come.

Mr. TURGEON: He has gone to join the late William Ewart Gladstone, Daniel O'Connell, Edmund Burke, Lafontaine, and Cartier. In union with those great souls he will enjoy a glory acquired from devotion to the sacred cause of uniting people of different races and creeds and of maintaining the great constitutional principles that governed the British Parliament throughout the last century. But I wish my right hon. friend the Prime Minister every possible consolation he may derive from the almost superhuman tasks which have been placed upon his shoulders. For the present, let us as true Canadians be animated with the hope that everything will happen for the best and that the prosperity of our country will not be impaired.

The people of Canada are in a condition of mind which prompts them to regard the future from the experience of the past. The world to-day is not in a normal condition, and the public mind in the war-swept countries of Europe is not perhaps what it ought to be. And one of the reasons given by the Prime Minister in his speeches in the West for not holding a general election was that it would not be prudent under present conditions, implying, apparently, that the people under the excitement of a general election would not be animated by a spirit worthy of themselves. But I should like to remind my right hon. friend that the first paragraph of the speech from the Throne contradicts him, for there the Governor General states:

> I am glad to be able to congratulate you on the relative prosperity of the country and its comparative freedom from the feeling of unrest which has agitated countries not so fortunately situated.

My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has brought in an amendment declaring that this Government has no constitutional mandate from the people to continue in power. It is passing strange to be told by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his supporters that because our parliamentary term is limited to five years, a Government once returned to power has a constitutional right to continue in office for the full term, notwithstanding an adverse expression of opinion from the people whenever a by-election affords them that opportunity. We have to respect not only the letter of the constitution, but its spirit. Were we the United States, the government would be at liberty to continue in office for the full four years of its mandate, and the people would have to suffer or otherwise, as the case might be. We have always boasted that democratic as is the constitution of the United States our constitution is still more democratic, in that the voice of the people could be given effective expression to when the Government for the time being had forfeited the confidence of the country.

What are the circumstances to-day? I may be permitted to recall the conditions and the principles upon which Union Government was made possible in 1917. As a close personal friend and an enthusiastic admirer of the Hon. Frank B. Carvell, who became Minister of Public Works at the formation of Union Government, I had particular occasion to remember the conditions on which he became a member of that Government. The primary condition was that the Government of that day was formed for the period of the war and until demobilization, and no longer. My hon. friend the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) yesterday with his usual eloquence recited to this House the explanation given at the time by the then Minister of Public Works respecting the formation of the Union Government, and that he would retire when he thought his mission was over. I wish to emphasize his election addresses at the beginning of the campaign of 1917, when he stated to the country the conditions upon which he and his colleagues entered that Government; and it must be remembered that he was telling the people those conditions before they voted, that the Government candidates were to be elected only for the duration of the war and demobilization, and no longer.

I see my sincere friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) looking in my direction, and I am sure that his expressions at that time were similar to those voiced by the then Minister of Public Works. They told the country that they and their colleagues were joining the Union Government for one purpose only, for the carrying on of the war, and when that had been brought to a successful conclusion they would return to their party. They did not say that they were joining the Government for a term of five years; no, they were educating the electorate to the fact that as soon as the war was over they would all return to their own fold and leave the Conservative party to its own fate.

Let me quote from a speech delivered at Sarnia, Ontario, by the then Minister of Public Works, Mr. Carvell, at a convention for the selection of a Union Government candidate. I take this report from the St. John Telegraph, a publication which was most devoted to the minister during that campaign, so that the correctness of the report cannot be doubted. Among other things the report says:

> Mr. Carvell told of the great efforts made to prevent a rupture in the Liberal ranks,—but it failed.
>
> "But we men who disagreed with Sir Wilfrid are Liberals yet, and when the war is over, we will start again where we were last week."
>
> Mr. Carvell declared that the Liberals in the Government would not remain unless profiteering was stopped, and unless certain things happened which he thought ought to happen.

He was telling the members of the old Government that they had been helping profiteering, and the members of that Government assented to his profession when they accepted him and kept him in the Ministry. He said that that profiteering would have to stop. Quoting Mr. Carvell, the report goes on to say:

> "When things don't suit us, there is no reason why we should remain. I am going through this campaign as a Liberal, as a man who has joined with his opponents for a definite time and for a definite purpose. I would a thousand times rather have gone to the country with my own party, but it was not to be."

It was stated, therefore, to the electors of Canada in November, 1917, that this union was formed for war purposes and that after the war was over the Liberals who had joined the Government would return to their party.

My right hon. friend claims that he is in the same position as other Prime Ministers who were called to office during a term of Parliament. Reference has been made to Sir John A. Macdonald and even to the successor of Sir Lomer Gouin in the province of Quebec. But in these cases the Parliaments had but recently been elected; the Governments in question had the confidence of the people; nothing had happened to bring about changed conditions in the ranks of the Government party or in the public mind. The conditions were not similar to those in the present case; therefore the comparison cannot fairly be made.

Well, the war being over, demobilization being completed, and a number of Government members having withdrawn their support from the Ministry, a caucus was called of the remainder of the supporters of the Government for the selection of a leader in the place of the then Prime Minister, who was retiring. The selection of the present Prime Minister may have been a wise one, but that does not alter the fact that the right hon. gentleman holds office unconstitutionally. He has been elected not by the voice of the people, but by a remnant of supporters of the Union—a union which still remains to-day, though it has no further assistance or support from those who maintain true Liberal principles. His position, therefore, is entirely contrary to the spirit of the constitution.

Had the Prime Minister appealed to the people when he was selected for the office which he now occupies, he would have been defeated, but he would have come back with a stronger following than he will have when he does appeal to the people. I wish to tell him as a personal friend that the longer he delays his appeal to the people the smaller will be his guard when he comes back to this Parliament as leader of the Opposition. Possibly he would be more comfortable as leader of the Opposition than he now is as leader of the Government. I do not say that the people of Canada would be very badly off in having my hon. friend as leader of the Opposition; I would tell my Liberal colleagues that they would have to be careful in their administration so that they should not give him the chance to attack them with all the arms which he has at his disposal.

The people to-day are clamouring for an election. The returned soldiers in every province are clamouring for an election. We say that we have done a great deal for our soldiers, but we can never compensate them for the immense sacrifices which they have made. From the very beginning of the war I took a consistent attitude among the people of my constituency. I travelled over every part of my county and talked to boys, not merely to those on the street corners, but to those whose fathers and mothers had been friends of mine and who had by them been entrusted to my care and counsel. Many have come to my private office seeking aid and encouragement, which were freely given. Before conscription came into effect, 1,350 young men had left my constituency, impelled by the spirit of sacrifice, to serve their country, and of that number of young men who one after another responded to my call, 1,150 were French-Acadians. To-day those men who have returned want an election. They do not all approve of the way in which they have been treated. We told them that if they would go to the war Canada would be theirs when they came back, but on their return they have not been treated as they deserve. Every man in every walk of life in Canada to-day wants an election; they want an expression of their will according to the Canadian constitution, the Canadian and British spirit.

I shall not enter into a discussion of the tariff. My views on this are well known, and I may have something to say when the Budget is brought before Parliament; but I should like to mention one statement made by the leader of the Government which is not justified by the situation in the country. He repated in his speech the other day that the Government of the day had reduced the tariff by a considerable amount since the conclusion of the war and had again reduced it last year. That reduction consisted in the removal of the extra duty of 5 per cent on British imports and 7½ per cent on other imports which was introduced by the Conservative Government at the beginning of the war; it was added on to the tariff which the Liberals had left to their successors in office. It was added as a war measure and, in my estimation at the time and in my estimation still, it was a pure war measure, and when they say they have reduced the tariff by so much since the conclusion of the war, the fact is that they have only eliminated by degrees, in two sessions, that extra tariff duty of 5 and 7½ per cent which was imposed as a war measure. It was, therefore, right that they should expunge it from the tariff of Canada, and for their action in doing so they deserve no eulogy, and, indeed, no consideration.

There are others who claim that the Government of the day has not given the people of Canada justice. We know what has happened since last session as regards the increase of rates on the railways. My position is not new; I did not remain silent until a clamour arose from the Atlantic to the Pacific against that increase of 40 per cent in rates on Canadian railways granted for the benefit of the board of administration of the National Railways, the experts of Mackenzie and Mann; at the last session on more than one occasion I protested in this House to the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) against the idea of an increase in freight rates at this time, until conditions became more settled, until we saw what the board of administration of the National Railways of Canada would be able to do. On more than one occasion from my seat in this House I directly warned the Railway Commission against granting an increase at that time, and I begged the Government not to ask the Railway Commission to look into this request for an increase of rates by the railway administration. I knew that the granting of such an increase would be a death blow to many of our industries, and I said so at the time. Notwithstanding the warning which was given, the Minister of Railways or the Government called upon the Railway Commission, and a fruther increase in the rates of transportation was requested at a moment when the fate of every industry was trembling in the balance. What has been the consequence? I know the Prime Minister in his travels through the West has heard enough about the matter. He has been told, what I told him in this House at the last session, that the country could not stand an increase in freight rates; that the railway administration was not what it should be, and that, therefore, it should be left to its fate for a longer period until we could see what best should be done. Every farmer in the West has suffered as a consequence. The effect in the West has been that the grain has been routed through the United States, thus depriving our railroads of the longer haul from the West to our Canadian seaports of St. John and Halifax.

I see the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore) in his seat. No one personally wishes him better success in life than I do. At the same time, he represents the city of St. John, with its great open harbour, not the harbour only of the citizens of St. John, but the harbour of the Canadian nation. This harbour should be developed and equipped in such a way as to be able to receive more traffic than it has received so far and, indeed, to receive the traffic which in the near future we shall be able to bring to our ports, in winter more particularly. This increase in rates has been detrimental, not only to the harbour of St. John, but more particularly to the producers of grain in the West. In order to be able to meet the market prices, western grain producers have routed their products via American roads, and the farmers of Alberta have routed their grain to the Pacific coast and through the Panama canal. The farmers of Alberta have been able to effect a saving of three cents a bushel against the present rates, but at a loss, notwithstanding, of four cents a bushel as against the old rates which would have taken their grain to the open harbours of Canada, St. John and Halifax in winter and Quebec and Montreal in the summer.

What has been the consequence of this increase in rates? It has ruined the lumber industry of the Maritime Provinces and has affected that industry in Ontario and Quebec as well. Since this increase of 40 per cent has been put into effect by the Railway Commission, the lumber industry of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia has been paralyzed. Our lumber yards are at this very moment full of lumber cut and sold last summer, but unable to be delivered. It is standing in the yards waiting until conditions change, and it will be transported by water next summer, so that the railroad has lost that traffic. In reply to the argument put forward by members of the Government and their supporters that wages had to be increased, I say that by the extra raising of the rates the railroads have lost more in freight than the difference in the wages, because if the rates had been left as they were, the railways would have got the extra traffic. They could have raised the wages to their present level and left the rates where they were and then there would not have been such a large deficit. As it is, the railroads have been equipped for a larger trade, and they have not got it just because the rates compelled the producers of lumber and grain and other products to ship in other ways.

The people of this country are clamouring for an election; yet the Government wishes to retain office for two years longer. There are many more considerations which I could present in support of the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. We know that the census of Canada is to be taken this year, followed by a redistribution based on the census, and this matter of redistribution has never been so important as at the present time, particularly in view of the known intentions of the present Government, who are holding on to power in the hope that the redistribution may possibly save them. Of course, it may not have that effect, but that is their object. This is a matter of national importance to every constituency in Canada; it is of importance to the East, and of greater importance still to the West, whose people are living in anticipation of a larger representation. Just in order to give the West a few more members the Government say: We will wait, we will hold on for another two years. But will the West get many more members after redistribution? I do not think they will get as many more as some pretend to believe, for in the last decade, and more particularly in the last five or six years, the population of the western provinces has not increased very much.

Immigrants, for many reasons, have not been coming in as they used to. There was the war, for instance. Then a large number of immigrants that did come to this country have left for the United States, so the increase in population in the Prairie Provinces will not be so very great, and will not entitle them to a large number of additional representatives. The object of the Government, if not of their supporters, is to offset this additional representation in the Prairie Provinces by increasing the number of city representatives, based on a unit of representation of 40,000. That will work to the advantage of the cities and to the detriment of the rural districts. I repeat, this is a matter of national importance, for if you nullify the efforts of the representatives of the rural districts in this way, Canada is gone.

The rural districts must have their say in this Parliament. The producers of the east and of the west have the right to be fully represented here. I am not one of those who fear for the future on account of the development of the west. I have all the time been in favour of everything being done for the happiness and prosperity of the west because the prosperity of the western provinces means the prosperity of the east, and more particularly the prosperity of the ports of St. John, Halifax and Quebec. Let us give them all possible representation. But if I were a representative from one of the western provinces I would make every possible effort to avoid waiting another two years for redistribution from this Government, which has not a mandate to provide for the future of this country.

I ask my hon. friends, what will become of Canada when fifteen of twenty members are taken away from the rural districts of Quebec and given to Montreal? What will become of Ontario when twenty members are taken away from the rural districts and given to Toronto and four or five given to Hamilton, and two or three to the other cities in Ontario, from rural districts? What will become of this province and of Canada? This is an important question, It is the life of Canada and its future that is at stake. It is a question of a government by the people for the people, or of government by the interests for the interests. You must choose between. That is the situation, and for that reason, if for no other, I would vote for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, who calls for the resignation of the present Government and the dissolution of Parliament in order that the people of this country may elect a parliament that will be representative of its principles and aspirations.

The aspirations of the people of Canada to-day are for more production and more population. We must produce. It is necessary not only for the existence of our own people, but for people outside of Canada. We complain of unemployment. Why is there unemployment? It is because the other nations have not the means to buy our products and we are reduced to producing for the people of Canada alone, and therefore we cannot provide sufficient employment for our people. We must produce food to help suffering humanity in the Allied nations and in Central Europe to-day. Patriotism, as Edith Cavell has said, is not enough alone. It is not enough alone for Canada, or for the other nations of the world. We must have love and affection for other countries, and for their children who are dying to-day in thousands for lack of nourishment, and it is only by production that we can help humanity, which to-day is calling upon us for the necessities of life. Let us therefore take every possible step to increase production, and to put Canada in a position where we can face the future with courage, and help the other nations of the world. We must do that if we wish to help the League of Nations in its efforts to avoid another world war or a war in any corner of the world.

I shall vote with pleasure for the amendment. There are many other things which I should like to touch upon, Mr. Speaker, but as I have already occupied the time of the House at some length I shall conclude by expressing the hope that the Prime Minister will appreciate the trend of public opinion and, if he realizes that the people have lost confidence in this Administration, will accede to the wish of the majority of the people and lay down the reins of government.

On the motion of Mr. McGibbon (Muskoka) the debate was adjourned.

PRINTING, LIBRARY, AND RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker informed the House that a message had been received from the Senate communicating to the House the names of the senators appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the joint committees of both Houses on Printing, Library of Parliament, and Restaurant.

On the motion of the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

On the Order, First Reading of Bill No. 2 to Amend the Dominion Elections Act. (From the Senate):

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I desire that the first reading of this Bill be taken up, and in doing so I wish to make a statement to the House as to the purport of the Bill and the necessity therefor. Under the amendment to the Canada Temperance Act, passed at the session before last, various provinces of the Dominion were enabled by the process of taking a plebiscite to decide whether or not certain provisions of that Act would become applicable to the province so deciding. If it became applicable, then the prevention of the importation of, and some other transactions in, liquor, making in effect total prohibition, became the law of that province. Under the Dominion Elections Act which passed last session there was a provision that in the event of any vote in any province taking place before the end of the year 1920, that vote should be held upon the then existing lists, which were compiled a year or so before, but that should the vote take place subsequent to the 31st December, then there should be a total revision of the lists for the purpose of the vote. It was the intention that polling for this purpose in the province of Ontario should take place on the 25th October, which was the day fixed for the vote in the three western Prairie Provinces and in Nova Scotia. Representations, however, were made to the Government from various organizations, including particularly the Great War Veterans, which established that should the vote be taken on the 25th October, or any date last year, it would result in the disfranchisement of very many thousands of men, principally returned soldiers. These men would be disfranchised because of the fact that when the list was compiled they had not returned. In other words some thirty thousand had returned after the compilation of the lists and before this vote could take place. Of this number, it was represented, a very large proportion would be in the province of Ontario, possibly one-half. Many thousands of others, at the time of the compilation of the lists, were in hospitals in Toronto, or elsewhere, and these, it was stated, would have dispersed to their homes in distant parts of the province and consequently could not be on the lists and so would be disfranchised. These considerations seemed to make it imperative indeed that the vote be postponed. We could not see how we could justify allowing a vote to take place which would be so unsatisfactory as one taken on lists disfranchising so many of those who should really be entitled to have a voice. The difficulty that then confronted us was this: Should the vote be postponed to a date immediately succeeding the New Year, or any date in the New Year, it would necessitate a revision of the entire Ontario lists merely for the purposes of this vote, whereas, as a matter of fact, in the rural districts of Ontario, under the statute, a voter is enabled to swear his name on the voters' lists, and consequently the necessity for revision in those districts was very slight, if indeed it existed at all. The practical difficulty, then, in the way of the Government was that it would cost the Treasury of the country, for a complete revision of the Ontario lists, according to the figures submitted to us by the Chief Electoral Officer, Colonel Biggar, approximately $330,000 to $350,000. On being asked for an alternative plan Colonel Biggar suggested that if the vote were postponed to a date which would enable a Bill to pass this parliament designed to meet his viewpoint, there could be a revision in the cities and towns, and inasmuch as a voter could be sworn on in the rural districts, in his opinion, that would meet all the practical necessities of the case, and result in an expenditure only approximating $30,000, thereby saving the country an outlay of $300,000. That is the suggestion the Government accepted, and accordingly the vote was fixed for the 18th of April of this year. This Bill has been prepared by Colonel Biggar for the purpose of enabling that revision to take place in cities and towns in Ontario at the cost that he estimates, and of saving the country the sum of approximately $300,000 that would otherwise be entailed. I have very briefly, and I hope clearly, stated to the House the objects of the measure. In a word they are these: To enable such revision to be made as meets the situation, gets rid of the injustice of a disfranchisement, and at the same time saves that wider general revision throughout all the rural districts which, under the present state of the law is not really necessary, but which the law actually calls for; and thereby to save the Treasury a sum of approximately $300,000.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps I should point out that the motion for the first reading of a Senate Bill is not debatable, but in this instance, inasmuch as the first reading is, in effect, the introduction of the measure to this House, I felt it was due to members that a Prime Minister should have the right of making his explanation, hence the rule in that respect was relaxed. Should the leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) desire to make any remarks on the motion, I am quite sure the House will grant the same indulgence to them.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it is proper to direct your attention to the amendment to the Address that is before the House at the present time. My right hon. friend, in the first motion to be made by him as Prime Minister this session moved

> That the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Tuesday next, and that this Order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills, until disposed of.

He now comes forward with a second motion to defeat the purpose of the first. As I understand the motion which my right hon. friend has just made, it means the adjournment of the debate on the amendment expressing want of confidence in the administration, and taking up the consideration of a new measure. That raises a rather important consideration, it seems to me, to those of us on this side of the House who have taken the position that the hon. gentlemen opposite are usurping power in presuming to continue to occupy the Treasury Benches. We take the position that without the confidence of this House and of the country they are not entitled to introduce a bill or to spend a dollar; and unless my right hon. friend can show us some precedent for adjourning the debate on a motion of want of confidence in the Government to take up another matter, we would be justified I think in adhering to the position which we have taken from the outset, namely that the Government lacks the confidence of the country, and therefore is not entitled to proceed with any legislation.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the House are certainly anxious not to embarrass any section of the public in the matter of an expression of opinion on a question of public interest, and we are ready to do anything constitutionally possible to enable the people to have the benefit of such expression of opinion as may be in the public interest. It is unfortunate, however, that in our desire so to do we have to take steps to make good the limitations and defects of the Government. I might point out to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that if he had acted upon the suggestion which we on this side of the House made at the close of the last session of Parliament, and had summoned Parliament at an earlier date in the year—which I think would have made for the convenience of all hon. members—he would not now be pleading with Parliament for this opportunity to reverse his first motion and to take up other business while we are engaged in what may be perhaps the most important debate which we shall have this session.

I might also point out to my right hon. friend that when the Dominion Elections Act was before Parliament last session we on this side called attention to the fact that so far as Ontario was concerned the Government was adopting a course which would lead to great expense in the preparation of lists, and we suggested that the municipal lists should be accepted as the basis in that province. Had that suggestion been accepted, my right hon. friend would not now be obliged to come along with his request.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House unduly, Mr. Speaker, but I would point out to my right hon. friend that if our action on this side of the House in permitting the Government to proceed, even to further the public interest, were likely to be construed in any way as an evidence of lack of sincerity in the amendment which we have before the House, I would not for a moment consent to consider his request. But I would say to him that if he can cite a precedent indicating wherein it would be proper to adjourn the debate in order to take up another matter, while a vote of confidence in the Government is being considered by Parliament, we will be prepared to consider such precedent and give him an answer perhaps to-morrow as to the position which the Opposition will take. I think I am justified in asking my right hon. friend to allow me an opportunity of conferring with my colleagues before I come to a conclusion regarding his exceptional request. If he is prepared to do that, I am prepared to say that we will if possible consider sympathetically any precedent he may cite which will enable the public to give expression to its views on any question of public interest at the least possible cost and with the least possible delay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I omitted to state, when I addressed the House first, Mr. Speaker, that the will of Parliament on this Bill requires to be known within a reasonable time. There is time enough for Parliament to consider it, but there is not time for delay because the revision is called for before the 18th April; or if the will of Parliament should be that this Bill do not pass, then it is necessary to know still earlier, because in that event, should the plebiscite go on, the entire revision would take still more time.

I am not endeavouring to controvert my hon. friend, and to have the last word, as to the statement that if the municipal lists had been taken this Bill would not be necessary, for that is entirely aside from the mark. We have lists which would be a much closer basis than the municipal lists. It is the revision that takes time and expense, and it is unnecessary revision only that we are trying to avoid in order to effect a saving of $300,000.

I may say that I assume, and I think correctly, that first readings of bills do not require unanimous consent and do not come within the purview of the motion which I made: the second reading, of course, would, and there is no use having the first reading without the second.

Inasmuch as my hon. friend takes the stand which he has stated to the House—and I may say that he was good enough to advise me of it before the House met—I will ask only for the first reading to-day. Then I will give notice of such motion as may be necessary to enable the House to proceed with this Bill, notwithstanding the order which was passed, and which is the usual order at the opening of the House. In the meantime my hon. friend can come to such conclusion as he may deem advisable on the stand he should take. The matter of precedent therefore need not be discussed now. I do not apprehend that I will have much difficulty on the point.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not understand the hon. the leader of the Opposition to press his point of order as to whether it is competent to move the first reading of this Bill. But the motion which was carried is, that the Address shall be considered and that that debate shall take precedence of all other business except the introduction of Bills. I think undoubtedly the first reading of a Senate Bill may be properly regarded as the introduction of a Bill, and therefore would come within the spirit at all events, of the Order of the House; and therefore it would be quite competent to give first reading to the Bill.

I would point out further that it is not necessary to delay the debate on the Address, for the reason that the motion is not debatable; when the Bill is given first reading, not further action can be taken on the measure, unless the House changes the Order which has been already made.

Mr. MEIGHEN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2 to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS —THE LATE Mr. TOM G. WALLACE

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House is called upon to lament the loss of one of our number by the hand of death. Yesterday morning there passed away Mr. Tom G. Wallace, member of Parliament for the electoral division of West York. Mr. Wallace was taken with a very severe illness immediately prior to the opening of this session—an illness to which he succumbed.

It is well known to all that Captain Wallace was a son of a former member of this House of much distinction, Mr. N. Clarke Wallace, who in his time was a member of the government. Captain Wallace himself served his country first in the capacity of a soldier in the South African war to which he went when only in his teens. His career as a soldier was marked by sincere devotion to duty in all capacities, however humble, and by a love of country that has characterized every act of his life. Returning to Canada he contested a seat for this Parliament in the election of 1908 and was successful, and in the elections of 1911 and 1917 was again returned. His most marked characteristic as a member of this House was the degree of popularity and personal devotion which his character commanded. As a member of the House he devoted himself unstintedly to its work, with an entire thoughtlessness of self, a desire to help and advance others, and particularly a desire to advance legislation of the character that he was most interested in, such as went for the uplifting of Canadian national life. Captain Wallace enjoyed this distinction: that among all the members on this side of the House, where he was best known, no other member had a larger personal following, if I may use the term; no other could pass from us whose loss would be the subject of keener and more lasting regret. I came to Parliament with him. I myself shall very much miss his face here, and I am sure that all members of the House will share with me the unescapable and lasting regret that we shall know no more of his friendship, his companionship, and his service.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my right hon. friend in, and to associate this side of the House with, the tribute which he has paid to the memory of our late colleague and the extending of our sympathy to his relatives and friends. Like my right hon. friend, I entered Parliament at the same time as the late Mr. Wallace, and have had the privilege, therefore, of a long personal acquaintance with him. Hon. members who have shared that privilege will, I am sure, feel that the Prime Minister has expressed sentiments which will be entertained generally among the members of this House.

My right hon. friend made reference to the circumstance that the father of the late Mr. Wallace was also a distinguished member of Parliament. That, perhaps, is deserving of more than passing mention. There is a tradition with regard to public service which is stronger, perhaps, in the Old World than it is in this, which unites families in a common devotion to their country. Mr. Wallace, by succeeding his father in the service of his country in Parliament and, in addition, serving his country in the South African War, where he distinguished himself, maintained in a worthy manner this finest of family traditions. Let us hope that the example he set in this particular will prove an inspiration to the younger men of Canada. Mr. Wallace, though one of the older members of the House in point of service, was one of the youngest in point of years. I am sure we all feel that in his early death the country has lost not only a generous and chivalrous spirit, but one who, had he been spared, would have continued to render useful service to his country.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with the right hon. leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition in the remarks they have made concerning the loss this House has sustained in the death of Captain Wallace. He was a much older member of this House than I am, but I had known of him before I came here and had known of the distinguished services rendered to his country by his father. All who have been associated with the work of this House will remember the kindly greeting, the glad hand, the open spirit, that was characteristic of Captain Wallace. His taking away is an evidence of the shortness of the span of human life, but I am sure that his memory in the precincts of this building, and particularly in this Chamber, will be cherished to the end of their days by all who have been associated with him.

Let me say a word also in respect to the loss this House has sustained in another direction. Since the termination of our session last summer, the hand of Death has been heavy upon this Chamber: three other members distinguished in the House have also been called to the Great Beyond. It was not my privilege to have had a very close acquaintance with the late Mr. Gladu, who represented Yamaska, but one was struck by the diligence of his efforts in the performance of his legislative duties. And he had also—no higher testimony can any man have—the respect and esteem of those who were associated with him.

Colonel McLeod was a well known figure in this House. In more fields than one he had rendered distinguished service to his country and his taking away in the very prime of his life came as a surprise and a shock to us all.

I was better acquainted with the late Mr. Sifton than I was with any of the others who have gone. Mr. Sifton's name was a household word in Western Canada. In many ways he rendered distinguished service to his country, not only in the Legislature of the Northwest Territories, but on the Bench and in this House as well. It is not too much to say that Mr. Sifton's career on the Bench in Western Canada in the formative period of its development had a great deal to do with the establishment of law and order—and, more than that, Sir, with the respect for law and order which is inherent in British peoples. I recall very well a conversation I had with him upon one occasion. We were discussing the laws passed by our Dominion and Provincial legislative bodies, and how it not infrequently happened that laws were hastily passed, and, after the test of experience, found to be unsound. He made this observation: "Whether a law is a good law or a bad law, it should be rigidly enforced. If it is a good law, it will do good; if it is a bad law, the people will waken to the consequences of it. Above all we must have, in the development of this country with its cosmopolitan people, a respect for law and order; for only upon such a basis can we build up a true and solid society." These words struck me, Mr. Speaker, as being pregnant with wisdom. Mr. Sifton was not a "mixer," as the ordinary term is, but those more closely associated with him knew the value of his friendship. We can always look back upon his career as having been a distinguished one in the service of his country. Those who knew him best will miss him greatly; those who knew him less intimately will have the memory of the respect that he earned in all his associations in this House and in other fields of activity in Canada.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH —ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency, the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Friday, February 18.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which has been moved to the motion for an address illustrates two things: first, lack of courage on the part of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King); second, the poverty of his political equipment. It had been heralded throughout this country that the leader of the Opposition had at last found his fighting spirit and that he was coming to this House with his batteries all massed and his artillery in order so that he could lead an attack that would wipe this Government and this Parliament out of existence. After he has spoken for some two hours, what do we find? We find that he has not one word to utter in condemnation of any legislation of this Parliament and that he has absolutely no policy to offer to the people of this country. In my opinion, a vote of want of confidence is and should be and, I think, has in history been based upon one of two things: first, the exposition of some policy which the mover thought it was in the public interest to adopt: second, the condemnation of some legislative acts of the Government. What do we find in this case? After addressing the House for about two hours, the leader of the Opposition admits that he has no policy and proves that he has no case against this Government. He simply talks, crying, as it were, on the outside of the citadel in the hope that the ramparts will fall down and he may be wafted into office. Who could imagine a Gladstone, or a Salisbury, or a Disraeli, asking any Parliament for a vote of want of confidence without having some policy to offer or some condemnation of the Government? What I have said exemplifies two things: first, lack of courage on the part of the leader of the Opposition, and second, lack of political equipment on his part. Stripped of all its verbiage, what does this mean? It means simply this, that if this debate is to be carried on as it should be, we have nothing left to debate but the fitness of the leader of the Opposition to occupy the position of first minister of Canada. God forbid that this party and this Government should lead this hon. member to his political doom through a path so tortuous and rocky as that. Rather would I throw the curtain of oblivion over him and leave him in peace; for I can assure him that when he goes to the country he will find plenty to contend against without that.

But, supposing this amendment should carry and this country should be precipitated into the throes of an election, I should like the hon. member to say where he stands on the great question of taxation. What are his plans and projects for carrying and paying off the great debt which the war has placed upon this country? Has he any policy? If he has, he is entitled to place it before this Parliament. What is his policy regarding the great railway mixup which this country is in at the present time, and which is incidentally due to the party of which he is at present the leader? What is his policy as regards repatriation of Canadian soldiers? What is his policy regarding pensions for those who were wounded in the battlefields of France? These are some of the things on which the hon. member should have stated his position before this House when he asked this House to vote a want of confidence in the present Government. What also, might I ask, is his policy regarding some of the things mentioned in the speech from the Throne? He has occupied the position of Ministér of Labour in the Government of this country, and I should like to know, and the country would like to know, what his attitude is to-day on unemployment insurance. Unemployment is, to my mind, one of the great causes of unrest to-day; nothing is so conductive to unrest on the part of the labouring man as when he finds that his employment is wanting; that he has nothing laid by for his wife and family, and that poverty is more or less confronting him. In a country like Canada, where, by the nature of her climate, employment is more or less seasonal, this is one of the great problems that has been laid before Parliament during the past two years and one on which the leader of the Opposition is called upon to give an opinion. I hope the Minister of Labour may be successful in finding some solution for this problem and also for the question of old age pensions, mentioned in the speech from the Throne. Nothing is so sad in my experience than to see a man or a woman who has passed the earning point of life and who, through sickness or disaster, is faced with poverty. In Canada no man or woman has a right to be placed in that position. I do not agree with the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that this is something to which the country should pay no attention. The aged and the poor are just claims upon—I was going to say charity, but it is not that—the Government and the people of this country. Many men and women have reached that state through no fault of their own, and it is the duty of every country to look after its citizens who have become impoverished through sickness or death or accident, and to see that they are not left in want in their old days.

Let us look for a moment at the official Opposition and see where they stand. I have stated that the leader of the Opposition has no policy to offer why we should vote this Government out and them in. Some one may say that they set a platform before the people in this country in 1919. That is quite true, but where do they stand now? Shortly after that, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) through a paper which he owns, stated that platforms were made to get in on and not to stand on. Following that up he went to Peterborough where he told the people they could trust the Liberal party because they had failed for fifteen years to carry out their promises in relation to the tariff, and what they had done once they could do again. Another member of the Opposition stated that they had a platform and in that there were certain provisions for tariff revision, but he would have nothing done until he had gone once or twice before the people of Canada for their endorsation. What kind of a government would you have, if elected on issues like that? Then, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who so often amuses this House has another theory; he has gone into the subterranean passages of time and there amidst the dust and cobwebs of antiquity he has got hold of that bundle of straw called free trade, and he hands that out to the people of this country in 1921 as a means for their national sustenance. These are some of the views held by hon. members who sit opposite us and who hope to be voted into power. The hon. member for Brome may speak for the county of Brome, but I doubt if he can speak for the province of Quebec. I am quite positive he cannot speak for Ontario, a province the product of whose people last year, if converted into dollars, would be sufficient to pay off the whole national debt of Canada; a province in which are invested hundreds of millions of dollars in manufacturing plants, employing some four hundred thousand men. That is the condition of affairs in the province of Ontario. What would be the condition if the hon. member for Brome had his way? I say that free trade would mean industrial stagnation and poverty for the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. It would mean the turning out of employment of hundreds of thousands of working men, and throwing their families destitute, more or less, upon the rest of the province. I ask any man who will look over the history of this country. Are you prepared to vote for a party that takes no stand on the fiscal policy of this country? Are you willing to trust a party that does not even know its own mind or its own policy for twenty-four hours at a time. That, I think, is the great issue before this country to-day. It is a question that has affected every country in the world, and nearly every nation has been driven to the policy of protection to protect its own interests. Here, in Canada, an agitation has been started to tear down the bars and make this country practically an adjunct to the United States. Free trade in Canada would mean industrial stagnation, particularly in the East, and I think that before any hon. gentleman attempts to lead the Opposition in this country, or is entitled to seek power, he should tell the people of this country just where he stands on the fiscal question, and what he intends to do if he gets into power.

The hon. leader of the Opposition also says that we do not represent the people, and he asks Parliament to vote the Government out on that ground. I would like to ask by what right or authority he speaks for the people of the province of Ontario. Twice the people of Ontario had a chance to elect him to this House, but he was ignominiously defeated on both occasions, yet he stands up and tells the House that we do not represent the constituencies which we are here to represent at the present time. I would like to know by what right or authority a man makes such a statement who has been twice defeated for a seat in this House, and was eventually returned only through the courtesy, more or less, of this Government. I think it is an arrogant assertion for him to make, and that it is only made in desperation because he has no other case to make out.

What is the record of the present Government? Has the leader of the Opposition any fault to find with their war record? Has he any fault to find with taxation in this country, or with the way the public moneys have been spent? Does he find fault with the Government's efforts to repatriate the soldiers, or in the matter of pensions? If so, he has been beautifully silent. This Government spent $1,600,000,000 of the people's money in our war effort. Has the hon. gentleman ever challenged the expenditure of one dollar of that amount on the ground that it was being misspent? If so, he has not done it in this House. Has he challenged any of the acts of the Government? He says we are extravagant, but he produces no figures to prove his contention. I would like to ask him whether he finds fault with the great prosperity this country has enjoyed during the last five or six years, in which time almost every branch of commerce has doubled or trebled. Field crops, for example, have grown from 33,000,000 to 55,000,000 bushels in the last few years, and their value has increased from $660,000,000 to $1,500,000,000 per annum. Land has increased in value from $35 to $52 per acre. Mineral production has increased from $91,000,000 to $173,000,000. Fisheries have increased from $29,000,000 to $60,000,000. Manufacturing industries have increased from $1,000,000,000 to $3,000,000,000. Do these figures show that the country has been mismanaged, or that we are now struggling in the throes of poverty? These are a few of the questions which the hon. gentleman might ask before he attempts to turn out this Government on the ground of extravagance or carelessness.

But we are going to have an election, and it may not be so very far off. I do not speak for the Government, but I want to tell the leader of the Opposition and hon. gentlemen opposite that if he thinks we on this side of the House are afraid to go to the country, he is quite mistaken. There will be an election, and when it is over and the leader of the Opposition surveys the political battlefield, he will see many an ambulance carrying the political corpses of his friends. Could the hon. gentleman himself find a political asylum other than Elba or St. Helena? If he could, he would be very lucky indeed. I do not think he will find it in the province of Ontario.

The leader of the Opposition says the Government has made mistakes. Supposing it has. Where is the man that has not made mistakes? Has the hon. gentleman's career been so free from mistakes that he can hold up to ridicule any party or Government that may have made mistakes? Is the history of his party free from mistakes? Did they not make a mistake when they guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian Northern from Port Arthur to the East? Did they not make a mistake when they built the Grand Trunk Pacific forty or fifty years before its time? Have they not made mistakes later than that? Did Mr. Balfour not make a mistake when he opposed giving to South Africa perfect political freedom? Did Webster not make a mistake when he refused to join the Abolitionists, and Lee when he joined the Secessionists in the United States? Did Hannibal not make a mistake when he crossed the Alps? Did Mark Anthony not make a mistake when he succumbed to the bewitching wiles of the Egyptian Queen that cost him the sceptre of Rome? Who does not make mistakes? Does not even the sun suffer an occasional eclipse? It is only the leader of the Opposition who stands out on the great canvas of time and says: I am the spotless one; vote the Government out because their record has not been perfect. I ask, is that fair? Is not the fair thing to test the Government by the average working of its legislation and its effects? I ask this House to look over the Government's record during the last five or six years—trying years when the people of this country have been forced to do things they did not want to do, and pay taxes they did not want to pay, and eat things they did not want to eat, and say whether or not the Government has done well on the whole. I believe that when the time comes to appeal to the country, the people will endorse the Government's record which was made, let us remember, in the most trying times in history.

But there is more than that. This Government has duties to perform, and I think that one of them is to see that when a new Parliament is elected it will fairly represent the people. And I think that the western members are the ones who will gain most by this. Personally—and I think this applies to many in Ontario—I am of the opinion that we should be much better off going to the country before rather than after redistribution. But that is not the principle. The principle for this Government and for Parliament is that of administering justice, and only strict justice, to the people of the country, and when a Parliament is elected it should be elected on an honest and just franchise. But, Mr. Speaker, if those from the West, who have most to gain by this, think differently and vote accordingly, then I say to this Government that they can well consider their obligations in that respect fulfilled, and they might be justified in appealing to the country at any time they thought best.

Now, I would add a word by way of congratulation to the Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen), whose career I followed for many years before I entered the House. I have seen him rise from a humble member until he now occupies the highest position in the gift of the Canadian people, and I sincerely congratulate not only himself but his party and the country as well. We have in him a leader who is not afraid to nail his colours to the mast, and he may rest assured that he has behind him a party that is willing to fight, and fight until the last trench is won. I tender him my heartfelt congratulations, for I think it is a source of pride to us that a young man, without any financial assistance and without influence of any kind, can in this country rise to the greatest position which the people can offer him. It must be a source of pride to the right hon. gentleman, and no doubt it is to the people of Canada, that he has risen to that eminence. He has, in the language of Tennyson:

> Lived to clutch the golden keys,
> To mould a mighty state's decreess.
> And shape the whispers of a throne.

Hon. HENRI SEVERIN BELAND (Beauce): My hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) will not, I hope, expect me to follow him closely in the remarks which I intend to address to the House at the present time. I may, however, refer at once to his closing words, in which he asks the House and the country whether anybody can claim for himself that he has never been in his life guilty of a mistake, implying thereby that the present Government and that which immediately preceded it have been in many instances guilty of serious mistakes. Let me say that whatever the past mistakes of this Government may have been, the gravest and most serious of all is that of refusing, in such a determined manner, an appeal to the people, which is claimed by the whole country.

Although the question of the League of Nations is in the present debate only of secondary importance, two of the ministers who have seen fit to address the House have confined themselves entirely to that subject. The time for discussing the League of Nations is properly during the Budget debate. But you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, just for a few moments to say, in reference to the matter, that the expectation of the House and of the country that the representatives of Canada in Geneva would furnish the people with a report or a summary of the work accomplished there, as well as of the constitution of the League and of the part played by those representatives themselves, has not been frustrated. We have heard, first, my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) who, in a pointed, clear, and concise discourse, rich in adjectival description, outlined for us the structure of this international edifice known as the League of Nations. With his unusual power of eloquence, he has unveiled to us a part of the future. He has depicted that future to us as an earthly paradise, where all men will live like brothers.

When he sat down and I found myself back to earth, I had somewhat of the distressed feeling which was experienced by Edward Bellamy's hero in "Looking Backward", after he had awakened from his dream of the conditions of the world in the year 2000. The wars are still raging. But then the hon. the ex-President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) came to his colleague's rescue and explained it all. It was true he told us, that wars were still raging in Russia and in the Near-East countries, but he explained that the primary duty was not to restore but to maintain peace; that the duty of restoring peace amongst the nations at war did not fall to the lot of the League of Nations but was incumbent on the Supreme Council. There we have seen the judicial mind strictly applied. But I desire to congratulate the hon. member for Durham on the special position he took in Geneva on the important question of the distribution of natural resources. It was the affirmation of national autonomy and the confirmation of a policy which has been dear to the hearts of members of the Liberal party. We have now to hear further from my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty). What has been said by the two former ministers is quite clear; but may I say, with all due regard to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, that I dread his explanation of the whole issue, for I fear he will complicate it beyond repair. The interpretation of international law is full of possibilities and, as we know, even purely national law is very much involved. I hope, therefore, the Minister of Justice will not torture the text too much.

The feature of this League of Nations is the International Tribunal. We realize fully that the important step to be gained, when passion is unchained, is delay. This applies as between nations as well as between individuals; and in the application in Canada of the Industrial Disputes Act we have in many instances recognized the truth of the assertion, that when you can once obtain a delay the situation is safe. In the case of the International Tribunal though it will not have a compulsory character, we believe that by wise delaying the barriers of discord existing between two threatening nations will be removed, even barriers which at one time seemed insuperable. Who would for one moment deny that in the year 1914, in the fateful July days at the time of the Austro-Servian embroglio, if this case had been referred to an international tribunal the most terrible conflict in the history of the world would have been avoided? Let us hope that the League of Nations will be a success. There are many difficulties in the path. There is this Article 10, which has prevented an important nation from joining; and in connection with this Article may I say the attitude of the Liberal party in the session before last, and during last session, has been fully vindicated. Now that a memorandum has been published which reveals the attitude of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) who led the previous administration, we learn that he had proposed or advised the Peace Conference to do away with Article 10. When the Treaty was under consideration we on this side moved that Article 10 be accepted only with a reservation, but our motion was turned down by the then Government. Before the members of the Assembly in the month of December last the Minister of Justice moved an amendment to the Covenant of the League of Nations to strike out this famous Article 10. I would have been glad had the ministers who represented Canada at Gevena discussed clause 18 of the Covenant which refers to the registration of treaties. Not a single word however, has been uttered in regard to that, though it is a matter of public knowledge that two nations who were charter members, so to speak, of the League of Nations have signed an important treaty between themselves and have refused to register it with the Secretariat.

There is another feature, though I do not want to labour the point too far, in connection with the League of Nations, to which I would like to refer. It is the question of expenses. The League of Nations, Mr. Speaker, promises to be an expensive venture. In a report which has been published by Mr. Noblemaire, a Frenchman, the salaries of the officials are given as follows: The general secretary receives a modest salary of $40,000 a year. The under-secretaries, two of them, each receive $16,000 a year. A special under-secretary receives $20,000 a year; six directors about $10,000 each; and one head of the International Labour Bureau, a Socialist by the way, receives the modest remuneration of $24,000 a year. The monthly cost of the League of Nations is reported as being £400,000, equivalent to $1,600,000 per month. The share of Canada, it will be found, will be very large. As we are aware, it is calculated upon the fact that the nation is a member of the International Postal Union. It is difficult to find a basis on which to establish the proper proportion that each country should pay. But would you think it is fair for Canada, with its population of 8,000,000, to pay as much, as, for instance, Great Britain with a population of 45,000,000, or France with a population of 40,000,000? What should be used as a basis is difficult to find. It cannot be based on area, it cannot very well be based on population; perhaps it could be based on the annual budget of each country. However, that remains to be settled later. All I can say with regard to the League of Nations is that I wish it Godspeed. It appeals to me, and its underlying principles, its noble ideals, I think, should appeal to all men who are concerned for the peace of the world. If properly constituted and well supported it ought to avert war in the future if any machinery or any policy can do so. The main object of the League, as stated by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell) is the doing away with the balance of power and replacing this old system by the concert of nations which would bring, as it were, the nations to think of other nations as eventual friends instead of possible enemies. In this regard I would say that war teaches us that alliances call into existence counter alliances, and that in my opinion any system of political confederation of the British Empire would be looked upon with dismay by the nations inside of the League, and nations that are still outside of it which every one would wish to see coming in. Yes, I repeat, any form of Imperial federation, of parliamentary federation, of executive federation, or of administrative federation, will only increase the difficulties now in the way of the successful establishment and complete maturity of the League of Nations.

During last session it was my privilege to address the House and to mention that there existed a powerful and carefully prepared organization to prmote in the nations within the British Empire a movement in favour of centralization. My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who spoke on that occasion almost scoffed at the idea; but to-day it cannot be denied that such a movement is alive throughout the British Empire. Some sorely tormented souls think they have discovered that the British Empire has reached the turning point in its history; something appears to them to be wrong with the Empire. What is the matter with the British Empire now? The answer that would come to every man's tongue would be, in the vernacular: The British Empire is "all right!" But political heelers have sprung up from every corner bringing in their medicine chests, as it were, a panacea. What is their panacea? To centralize in London the political, the military and the naval power of the British Empire. I say the British Empire is not suffering from any incapacity. That does not mean that it is not confronted with very serious problems—and one problem in particular which we hope will be solved to the satisfaction of all concerned, but in which Canada has only a very remote interest, if any interest at all.

As I said, there exists two schools in England, in Canada and in the other British dominions: One school works for centralization; the other works for local control. Something transpired during the recess to which, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House. We had a visit of the Imperial Press Conference delegates. They landed at Sydney on the 28th July, 1920. The head of that delegation appeared to us all to be Lord Burnham. It is, I think, out of place that I should at this moment delay the House by describing who Lord Burnham is. If not the most eminent, he is at least one of the eminent newspaper men of England. Let me quote to you the words uttered by Lord Burnham at Sydney on the 28th July last in responding to an address that had been read to him:

> We have not come to lay down the law, to teach you how to run your own show, or still less to tell you how much better we would have done it if it had been at home. We do not do that because we do not believe it is true.
> We have not come as preachers or teachers. We have come to learn for ourselves the secret of the great success of the Dominion, and to learn how she has managed in so short a span of years to accomplish such immense things.

Nobody can take exception to those words. As a matter of fact, we had expected Lord Burnham to speak in that strain. A few weeks later, on the 2nd of September, 1920, in Edmonton, the same Lord Burnham expressed himself, according to a report in the Montreal Star of that date, as follows:

> The creation of a common council sitting in London, on which the Dominions would be represented by resident Ministers for the purpose of taking their proper place in Imperial affairs, was advocated by Lord Burnham, speaking at a banquet given to the Imperial Press Conference delegates by the Government of Alberta here—Edmonton—last night.

Viscount Burnham alluded to what might be the constitution of such a council given executive as well as judicial powers, but they would have to determine what was necessary and then constitute the machinery to meet the case.

Then he goes on:

I venture to propose this because I believe that you are anxious to bring into unity the various parts of the Empire and guard against any breakdown in the future.

Was there any breakdown in the past I wonder? Now my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will realize that there is an important movement on foot. But that is not all. Lord Cave on the same date expressed himself in the city of Ottawa, on the occasion of a lunch given by the Bar Association, in the following terms:

For a generation some of the ablest statesmen, of the time—Rosebery, Chamberlain, Grey, and others whose names will occur to you,—were considering how best a further link could be forged between the central and Dominion governments which should be neither so stiff as to gall, nor so weak as to break under a strain. It may be that the problem has been solved quietly and almost unconsciously, (as our habit is) by the establishment of the Imperial War Cabinet as an effective council of the Empire. That Assembly of the leading statesmen of the self-governing parts of the Empire, first called together in 1917 for the purpose of discussing the conduct of the war and some of the higher issues of Imperial policy, proved to be of so much service, both to its members and to the countries concerned that it was unanimously determined at the instance of the British Prime Minister to keep it in being. And so other meetings took place at a later crisis of the war, and again when the terms of peace were under consideration.

Now comes the crucial phrase:

The experiment,—for at first it was nothing more,—proved an unqualified success.

I believe that. It was a war measure, but, as my right hon. friend said the other day, "war is the negation of order."

And to many of us—

continues Lord Cave:

—it seems possible that the Imperial War Cabinet may, (if the Imperial Conference should so determine) drop its middle name, and while remaining wholly voluntary and consultative may become in world affairs the nerve centre of the autonomous nations of an Imperial Commonwealth.

If you drop the middle name "war," you get the title "Imperial Cabinet."

Those who believe in a greater expansion and a greater development of Canadian autonomy will read with some dismay what is being said by those important British statesmen and public men. The question is not: Shall the British dissolve, or shall the British Empire endure? There is in this country as, I think, there is in every domininon of the British Empire, only one opinion: that the British Empire should last, should endure, should persist, should continue, for the good of the world; because the British Empire can and does play an important part in the world's affairs. We on this side hold to-day the view that was held by the Liberal party at all times—the view of Alexander Mackenzie, of Sir Oliver Mowat, of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of Mr. Blake—that the British Empire will endure only through the exercise of the largest possible measure of local autonomy. Let us rebuff all attempts, patent or veiled, to sink Canada's individuality, Canda's self-consciousness, Canada's self-reliance—in a word, Canada's national pride and autonomy, in the vortex of Imperial Federation.

There are two reasons, equally important, why we should resist any such attempts. One is with regard to the League of Nations. The concentration of the political powers of the British Empire would evoke suspicion in the minds of other nations; would provoke a spirit of rivalry, and, perhaps cause another race for supremacy in armaments. Furthermore, let us oppose the scheme, from whatever source it comes, on the ground that any such attempt to centralize political power in the metropolis of the British Empire would tend to the disintegration of that Empire.

There exists in Canada at the present time a good deal of unrest and dissatisfaction. That has been confessed by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. What, Mr. Speaker, in your opinion, is the cause of this dissatisfaction? Is it the direct and immediate result of that most terrific conflict which was inflicted upon humanity? Partly, yes. The fact that fifty thousand Canadians laid down their lives in the Great War; that at least fifty thousand homes mourn the loss of dear ones; that one hundred thousand Canadians have been maimed, incapacitated, disabled, partially or totally—certainly these circumstances are sufficient to create a certain amount of restlessness. But the main and the fundamental cause of the unrest and dissatisfaction in Canada to-day is to be found in the utter disregard of public opinion on the part of the present Government. Not only is public opinion disregarded, but our parliamentary institutions have been treated cavalierly and in a high-handed manner. It was my privilege to visit all the provinces but two during the recess, and I found, from the Atlantic to the Rockies, a general opinion prevailing among the people to the effect that this Government has outlived its mandate, and concurrent with this opinion is the universal desire for an appeal to the people. It would be over-stating the case to contend that there are not a few friends who desire to see the Administration remain in office—a few personal friends, a few courtiers, a few sycophants, a few interested persons; but these exceptions only go to prove the rule.

Listening the other day to the right hon. gentleman's able address, I failed to detect any good ground upon which he could base his refusal to consult the Canadian people. The only ground upon which he could pretend to base that refusal was that the Canadian West was entitled to a larger representation in Parliament; that that larger representation could be obtained only through a redistribution of seats; that a redistribution of seats could be effected only after a census had been taken; therefore it was his duty, he thought, to postpone the general election till that redistribution had taken place. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is only a simulacrum of reason, it is a mere pretext. I am an admirer of the West; one cannot be indifferent to those immense plains which conceal in their bosom the food of nations. The immense coal deposits of Alberta, which could supply the motive power of numberless industries, cannot but appeal to the imagination. I repeat that I admire the West, and I would be very glad indeed to see their representation in Parliament increased. But what are the conditions? Since 1913 immigration in Canada has almost been at a standstill, though the pivotal province of Canada, Quebec, has very largely increased its population. It is no secret that no seats can be gained outside the province of Quebec unless there has been an increase in the population proportionate to the increase in the province of Quebec. However desirous one may be to see the West gain more representation in this House; the contention, I feel, that the West will gain substantially after the next redistribution cannot be entertained. I readily understood the right hon. gentleman when he pointed his artillery towards my friends sitting to my left. "Will you not have ten more seats?" he said. "Will you not have fifteen more seats, perhaps twenty-five, for all we know?" But I think the range was too long and that his projectile must have passed over the heads of my good friends the Agrarians. My right hon. friend claims that the West may have twenty-five new seats. Well, I will set my prophecy against his: that after the next census the increased representation to the western provinces will be nearer one than ten, and between the two. But, for the sake of argument, let us say that it will be ten, fifteen, twenty, or even twenty-five. Does anyone amongst my friends the Agrarians, who know the adroitness of the Prime Minister, for one moment think that they will get one of those seats? Everybody knows how skilful a drafter of a measure is the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government and with what immense success he was able in the past to send home those men who did not wish to share his political views. No, my friends the Agrarians will find out after the next census that if the West is entitled to five seats more, ten seats more, fifteen seats more, they will be taken away from the rural constituencies and given to the urban centres. The odds are entirely against the Agrarians in this regard. In a moment of apparent tender compassion the right hon. gentleman turned to the group which, as he says, is angularly situated, and he said: "See what confronts you. If you have dissolution now, you loose fifteen, twenty seats; whilst if you will vote against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, you will not have the elections now and then you will have fifteen more seats and your group will be so much increased." I do not know my good friend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) very well if I cannot imagine coming from the remote bottom of his heart the groaning remark "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes—I fear the Greeks even when they bear presents." There was no other reason he could invoke, on the contrary he has found very much comfort in the result of the Peterborough election. He says that the Peterborough election is a vindication of his fiscal policy. If it is possible for my right hon. friend to confine the discussion in a general election to the tariff issue, if it is possible for him to ignore or make the people of Canada ignore all the mistakes and blunders of his administration; if he thinks that all his sins and those of his predecessor are already forgotten or at least forgiven; if in a word his appreciation of the Peterborough verdict is just and correct, why not appeal to the people and he shall be supported by the country at large? He will not do that; he will cling desperately to the rudder in a frantic effort—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: To save the country.

Mr. BELAND: No, but to avoid the rock which awaits him, the rock of popular disfavour and indignation; he may not however do that indefinitely; he may postpone the evil day a week, a month, a year——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no, never.

Mr. BELAND: —but the time will come when Its Majesty, the Canadian Constitution, will send him before his natural judge, the Canadian people.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Good old judge.

Mr. BELAND: That will condemn him. He has selected his ground — the tariff issue; he will not have anything else, and he protests very much when we Liberals charge him with being the instrument of the big financial interests of this country. He asks: "Where is your ground for the assertion?" This reminds me of the story of a lover who paid a visit to his sweetheart who was a little shy. He asked her: "Do you love me?" She did not answer. "If you love me, say so; if you do not love me, say so, and if you love me and do not want to say so, squeeze my hand." In this case, I think the big interests have come to the right hon. gentleman and have asked him: "Do you love us?" He did not answer. "Do you not love us?" He did not answer. "Well, let us settle it this way; if you love us and do not want to say so, squeeze our hand," and the right hon. gentleman has squeezed the hand of the big financial interests.

The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. P. McGibbon) was asking us: "What is your policy on the tariff question? Have you a policy at all?" And all of those gentlemen on the other side to whom it has been my privilege to listen since the beginning of the debate have put the same question and have charged the leader of the Opposition with having no policy at all on the tariff question, of refusing to state his policy publicly. It has been my great advantage and pleasure to accompany the leader of the Opposition at some public meetings in Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and at every meeting the leader of the Opposition has made a clear exposition of his fiscal policy. When the time comes, on the Budget debate, to discuss the Liberal platform, I think my friends will be satisfied; but let me say that the Liberal platform has a few advantages which I will summarize as follows: The Liberal fiscal policy harmonizes the diverse interests in Canada. It avoids extreme protection and its curses. It preserves in Canada the legitimate industries, especially those industries which are based upon our natural resources. It relieves the great body of agriculturists in Canada from the burden of taxation which bears upon them, and thereby enhances production. It renders more accessible to the housewife and to the workingman the procuring of the necessaries of life. It ensures revenue which is so necessary to face the present financial obligations, and it has the stabilizing effect which is all-important in this agitated epoch and period. We are here face to face with a case of personal power. If you wish an instance of personal regime in Canada, since the right hon. gentleman has taken the reins of office, the House will remember that last session and the session before last, measures were introduced into Parliament to create what was known as the Canadian Purchasing Commission. At the session before last this Bill which was introduced was never enacted into law. At the last session, the same fate met the same proposition. The session came to an end on the first day of July, 1920, or thereabouts. The right hon. gentleman was selected as the Prime Minister of Canada, and two or three weeks had not elapsed before he convened around the council table his advisors and passed an Order in Council, in face of the refusal of Parliament in two sessions, creating the Canadian Purchasing Commission. If that is not a case of personal power and personal regime, I should like to know what is. All trace of a personal regime passed away in England with William IV, and indeed in France one has to delve back in history some two or three centuries to find an absolute monarch, Louis XIV, who when he was reproached for having ordered an iron mask on a man's face, answered, "I, I alone, I am the King." That is the language spoken to-day to the people of Canada, through the House of Commons, by the right hon. gentleman. Now that the war is over, now that the majority of the members composing the Union Government has left it, now that the leader of the Unionist party of 1917 has resigned and has almost entirely disinterested himself from the public life of Canada, the proper course for this Government to take is plainly indicated; it should dissolve Parliament and appeal to the people of Canada for a new mandate.

Mr. Speaker, I have only a few more remarks to offer, and they are on the Quebec situation. A situation has developed in Quebec which seems to have attracted a large measure of attention on the part of the press outside of Quebec, of the population in general, and of the public men of this country. It is claimed that Quebec is isolated. I have never been able to understand from what, and from whom. Has not Quebec been in as complete intercourse with the other provinces of Canada as heretofore? For my part, I have never visited more of Canada than during the last two years-and-a-half. The personal and social relations as between province and province have certainly not been altered in any way. So much for the social aspect of the case. As far as commercial intercourse is concerned, competent authorities will tell you that the trade as between the province of Quebec and the other provinces of Canada is more flourishing than ever. In an international sense also, Quebec is not any more isolated. She trades with the Mother Country and the rest of Europe, with Asia, Africa, Australia, the United States, and the countries of South America. Numberless bottoms ply down the St. Lawrence in the navigation season laden with the magnificent produce of Quebec's arduous labour in the mines, in the forest, on the land, and in the factories. What is wrong? Is there anything wrong?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: The Tories are wrong.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) has laboured the contention to the breaking point, as it were, but one could not help observing this anomaly in his comparison. St. John the Baptist, to whom he humbly compares himself, lived in a desert. Why should he seek company? And is he not aware that the very place where he seeks company is the most isolated in the world? Or perhaps I am wrong. Maybe he is looking for deeper isolation, and that is why he is going to the other side. The population of French race, Mr. Speaker, are in point of number but meagrely represented in this Government. No member of the Canadian Government belonging to that race has been returned from Quebec. I do not wish to re-hash what passed during the fateful and famous elections of 1917, and shall confine myself to giving advice to the Government. The election of 1917 was an abnormal or, at least, an extraordinary election. It was a war election.

Mr. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: Debauchery.

Mr. BELAND: We had in 1917 a war general election: what is the matter with having to-day a peace general election? Let us have the election, let us bury the old feuds. Mr. Speaker, I would be the last man to seek political advantage out of appeals to racial prejudices, and in my twenty-four years of public life one would vainly search for a line or a word or an act of mine tending to create ill-feeling between the noble races which make up the population of Canada. Yet I feel bound to-day to bring to your attention and that of the country some accomplished facts, which may be, and as a matter of consequence, are more eloquent than words. The remarks I am about to make, Mr. Speaker, apply equally to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government to-day and the right hon. gentleman, his predecessor, whose administration he claims he is responsible for, and rightly so. Therefore, he cannot have any objections to my holding him responsible for the actions of the Borden Government, and it is proper that it should be so.

Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the declarations made by the right hon. the Prime Minister himself, in Sherbrooke, in Granby, in Montreal, lately, and in Stirling, Ontario, as well as the challenge issued two or three days ago by the hon. member for the county of Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) I would not have laboured the point any further, but let me call your attention to some of the deeds of the Borden Government and some of the deeds of the Meighen Government.

We have in Canada a Board, constituted by Act of Parliament, called the Canadian National Railways Board. It comprises nine directors. Now the population of Canada is about nine millions, and the French population is in round numbers three millions.

I will read to you the names of the directors of the Canadian National Railways: Hanna, Mitchell, Wood, Riley, Hobson, Bell, Laporte, Cantley, Barnhill. One man of French race. Does my right hon. friend think that is a fair distribution of public offices? That is one example. The French race comprises one-third of the population of Canada. Now, let us take the Board of Commerce. Here is the first board: Robertson, O'Connor, Murdock; secretary, White; four men. Is any one of them of the French race? None. Take the year 1920; the re-constituted Board of Commerce consists of the following gentlemen: White, Acland, Allan; no secretary. Is there any man of French race among them? None. Take the Board of Pension Commissioners.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the Sugar Board?

Mr. BELAND: Here is a board created to deal with the big question of pensions to Canadian soldiers and their dependents. The French race, I make bold to say, furnished 35,000 men at least to the armies that went from Canada to the other side. Thirty-five thousand is my figure; of these, a few thousands have laid down their lives across the ocean for their country. Many thousands more are disabled to-day and have to deal with the Pensions Board, and it will be interesting to see of whom this board is comprised. Its personnel is as follows: Thomson, Margeson, Davis; and secretary, Ahearn. Any man of French race among those gentlemen? None. Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that when I refer to these gentlemen who happened to have been appointed to any of these boards, I do not desire to imply, in the remotest degree, that they are not qualified for their positions. Not at all. But that is not the point; it is not the question under consideration. Let us go one step further; let us take the International Joint Commission. There was at one time Mr. Casgrain, who was later called to the Government of the country, and was replaced by Mr. Mignault. The latter became a Judge of the Supreme Court during, I think, the administration of the hon. member for King's Nova Scotia, (Sir Robert Borden). What is now the composition of the International Joint Commission? Here are the names: Magrath, Powell, Hearst, and Burpee, secretary. Any man of French race there? Is the French race, the third of Canada's population, represented there? No. Let us go another step further.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Commercial agents.

Mr. BELAND: In 1918, after the armistice was signed, the question came up of selecting three men to represent Canada at the Peace Conference, in the heart of France, at Versailles, a few miles from the great French centre, Paris. Now, here is one-third of the population of Canada comprised in the French race, and although three men are selected to represent this country in Frence, not a single one of them is of the French race or tongue. They were Sir Robert Borden, the Hons. Foster and Doherty.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. BELAND: Here now is the first meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva, where three gentlemen were apointed to represent Canada. Who were they? The Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir George Foster; Mr. Rowell, the ex-President of the Privy Council; and the present Minister of Justice, Mr. Doherty. Is there any man of French tongue among them, any man of French race? Not at all. Now Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that this matter has been brought up in the House, and I bring it up not because I want to complain but because we were challenged. Were we challenged? Let me quote to you the words of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), uttered the other day:

> I, Mr. Speaker, have more confidence in the judgment and sense of fair play of the people of Quebec than have these hon. gentlemen who profess to speak for that province, and my confidence in their judgment and sense of fair play is such that I believe in the course of time they will ask the men who are making these charges and indulging in these unwarranted statements to back up their charges and assertions with facts, and back them up in a way that will leave no doubt as to their truth of falsity.

On the other hand, my right hon. friend spoke in Montreal about three weeks ago and said that you could not point to one single sentence of his or a word uttered by him in the course of his public life that could be interpreted as being hostile to the French race in Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, actions speak louder than words, and is it any wonder to my hon. friend if the heart of Quebec is somewhat wounded? Is Quebec isolated? No, Mr. Speaker: Quebec is not isolated. She has a warm place in her heart for other provinces, and I venture to say that the provinces of Canada have a warm place in their hearts for the province of Quebec. And the hands of Governments are powerless to destroy feelings and sentiments that are three-quarters of a century old. Quebec's scientists, literary men, traders, bankers, capitalists, and manufacturers are in daily contact and constant communication with the scientists, the literary men, the traders, the bankers, and the manufacturers of the other provinces; and there is not in the province of Quebec so remote a hamlet in the centres of colonization, there is not a roof in the whole province but where and under which the hard-working, the law-abiding, the liberty-loving peasant has not in his heart a warm feeling of human fraternity and christian love for his brother,—his brother the miner in the coal mines either of British Columbia or of Nova Scotia, his brother the fisherman of either the Atlantic or the Pacific coasts, his brother the working-man in the factories of Toronto or of Hamilton, London and Halifax, his brother the hardy tiller of the western plains. Isolated? Quebec does not feel isolated; it feels that the rest of Canada is with it. The average French-Canadian feels that the rest of Canada is in sympathy with him. And I have for this man boundless admiration and the profoundest respect, because he is in Canada to-day an element of stability, a factor of ponderation and a fruitful source of economic wealth. I love this man, this average French-Canadian. Trust him for he is true to his language, true to his creed, true to his traditions, true to his institutions and last but not least true to his King.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Regina): The hon. member (Mr. Béland) who has just taken his seat did what practically every opponent of the Government has done when confronted with the impossibility of successfully criticizing its actions—he complimented the members of the Cabinet upon the success that has attended their efforts. In his opening remarks the hon. gentleman complimented the representatives of the Government upon the attitude which they took upon international questions at the Geneva Conference. Let me say that if this Government had done nothing else than to appoint representatives who would so ably represent Canada at that Conference they are entitled to the gratitude of the people of this country. It was a question with a great many of us as to whether or not Canada—a nation which had never taken part in international affairs until quite recently and had been most domestic in all its politics—had representatives who could go and meet in council the great men of the world and hold their own in the deliberations which were to take place. A great many of us watched—as I am sure all intelligent and patriotic Canadians did — the proceedings of the Conference and when we saw, as my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) admits, that Canada's representative not only held their own, but that they led in some of the debates and thereby established for their native land a position throughout the world which has reflected, and continues to reflect, credit upon this country, we were exceedingly satisfied with what had been done. Personally I am glad that our representatives so ably acquitted themselves, I am glad that they showed themselves to be equal to the task that confronted them, and I am sure the result will be that Canada will, more heartily than ever, uphold that great institution which has been created, the League of Nations, and which will, in time, save the world from any such conflicts in future as we witnessed a few years ago.

The tenor of my hon. friend's remarks was as I have indicated. Towards the close of his speech he changed his attitude and said: The present Government is a war government, elected under war conditions, and we want a peace election. Would it be a peace election if there were conditions such as prevailed some time ago when the Winnipeg strike was in progress and a dangerous agitation was at its height? Had an election been ordered then would we have had a peace election throughout Canada? There was nothing that the cool-headed business men of Canada felt more anxious about than that we should not have an election at that time because they were afraid of it. We in Western Canada particularly knew what the situation was and what it meant and we realized what the result would be. To-day though that agitation has subsided it has not yet entirely disappeared. Hon. gentlemen opposite themselves still admit that there is a great deal of unrest in Canada, and that agitation still continues. While in our part of the Dominion demagoguery has practically been taken by the throat by the common sense of the common people and placed where it properly belongs, while the demagogues have been practically compelled to stop their agitation, yet that agitation in some measure is still going on in various sections, and until it is completely quelled I myself would not be desirous of holding an election. On that issue I am prepared to abide by the calm, cool judgment of the Canadian people rendered under perfectly tranquil conditions. We are very gradually but very perceptibly approaching that point, and when it comes I for one am quite prepared to abide by the consequences whatever they may be. Mr. Speaker, why should I be a party to disrupting the business of this country at this most critical period in its history, why should I subordinate my opinion to the political whims of the leader of the Opposition in order to assist him in his political aspirations? The amendment which he offers calls for an election but what would an election mean at the present time? It could not be held for a considerable period, there is no question about that. Parliament would have to vote supplies before going to the country, and consequently there would be considerable delay. But what would an election mean when it did take place? What has an election always meant, not only to the business of Canada but the business of the United States where they have four-year election periods? In the United States that fourth year is always looked upon with dread by the commercial men because they know that it paralyzes business from one end of the country to the other. In Great Britain, in Canada, and in all the other British Dominions where the system of responsible government obtains, the idea has always been to disrupt business as little as possible by having the lowest minimum of time between the announcement of the election and the election itself. Admitting then that business will be disrupted by an election, is the present a good time for having it take place? In my opinion most undoubtedly, no.

What are the business conditions in Canada to-day, and what have they been for some little time back? As we all know business for the past two years has been carried on under most abnormal conditions. It is a matter of wonder to me that Canadian business men have succeeded in carrying on as well as they have done. They were faced with tremendous uncertainties because of the high prices, the conditions brought about by agitation, all the results that have followed the war. Because of all these factors they were faced by most abnormal conditions and yet they carried on splendidly. I think nearly every one of them during the period of uncertainty knew that a slump had to come. Many of them in conversation with me admitted that it must come, and quite a number were surprised that the date of its coming was delayed so long. But the slump did come last fall, and our business men are to be congratulated upon the fact that they buckled in as well as they did and have succeeded as well as they have in carrying this country through such a trying period. The conditions of the past winter have not been anything like as bad in this country as they were in 1917, or in 1913 and 1914. Still they have been bad enough. But times are improving. Every financial report that is being issued indicates that we are gradually and surely getting on to better ground, in fact that the worst has passed. Yet at this time when our business men have succeeded in carrying us through so well, when the amount of unemployment is small in comparison with other countries, the leader of the Opposition comes along with an amendment to the Address and says: Let us have an election in order that we may further disrupt business interests as much as we possibly can during the coming summer. For in reality thtat is what the proposition means. The result will be that the business men of the country, faced with the uncertainty which an election occasions, will not carry on as they have at present arranged and that next fall unemployment will be much greater in Canada than it is to-day—much greater indeed and there may be no remedy for it. If, however, we continue as at present until business is again on a thoroughly firm foundation, then let there be an election whenever you please, because nobody in this House, Mr. Speaker, loves an election better than I do. It is the only sport, if you can call it sport, I take pleasure in.

But why does the leader of the Opposition desire to have an election immediately? If his star was in the ascendant, if he was sure of his ground, if he knew that by an appeal to the country he would gain strength, and that he would by five or six months' or even a year's delay be stronger than he is to-day, do you think he would ask for an election now? Far from it. He knows very well, as do his followers, that he is weaker in the Dominion to-day than when he was chosen leader of his party. There is not any question about that at all in Western Canada.

The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) says that he went with his leader through the western provinces. I wish he could tell you, Sir, some of the things which we see as a result of their visit to our section of the country. The hon. the leader of the Opposition held meetings in the city of Regina, as he did in other places, and the result was very, very plain to any one who cared to study the situation—in fact, it was not necessary to study it to see the effect. The hon. the leader of the Opposition, speaking the other day, said, that the spirit was far more important than the letter of the law. I said to myself: Yes, and out in Western Canada, the tariff being the chief issue, our people expected to see some tariff spirit in the various addresses which you delivered. Did we find any?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. COWAN: I never noticed any, and I was present at one of his meetings in Regina. His whole attitude was an appeal to the farmers. He said: We Liberals are hopelessly and irretrievably lost. This Government has lost the confidence of the people, but we ourselves are so much weaker than they are that unless you come and unite your forces with ours it is absolutely impossible for us to succeed. That was the sum and substance of his whole address, and he spoke most appealingly to the farmers to unite their forces with his. As I sat in the gallery and looked down at him I could not but note that when he came to the tariff his voice dropped perceptibly, and the whole audience sat quiet and expectant: He said: I am in favour of free trade in implements, and he hastened away from the subject as though he had resurrected a ghost which would pursue him. That was the sum and substance of his tariff references there—free trade in the one thing that those people were wanting. There was neither soul, nor substance, nor spirit, nor body, to his tariff utterances in Western Canada, except that at local points he appealed in that way to the people, because he knew they wanted "free" implements.

What was the result of all this? I am rather a good "listening post"—I listen a good deal better than I talk—and I wanted to know what the people thought after he had left. I could not help but note some of the things that were being said, but I am going to quote one only. This is a portion of an editorial from the leading Agrarian organ published in the province of Saskatchewan. Two organs are run by the same party, one in Saskatoon and one in Regina, and between them they have double the circulation of any other newspaper in that province. I will not repeat the abusive terms directed against the hon. the leader of the Opposition after he left, because I do not believe in applying such terms to a political opponent; but if in this case he is the subject of abuse, I cannot sympathize with him, because we must all admit that hon. gentlemen opposite have been a culture bed for abusive terms applied for many years back to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. We have been referred to as tools of the big interests, as puppets in the hands of the millionaires, as jumping-jacks that jump just as the manufacturers press the button, and so on and so forth; and even now we are called usurpers. I do not believe in such abuse, and therefore I am going to pass over those references and quote this opinion of the hon. leader of the Opposition as expressed by this paper after he had visited our part of the country. This is from an editorial in the Regina Post and the Saskatoon Star:

> Such a man excites no thrills of wonder veiled in terror; his conscience is full of scruples and returns; he stuns us neither by his inward freedom nor by his outward power.

Mr. MAHARG: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. COWAN: Certainly.

Mr. MAHARG: Did I understand him to say that there were two papers published or under the direction of the Agrarians in the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. COWAN: No, I said that these two papers were the leading papers in the province of Saskatchewan supporting the Agrarian party. They do nothing else. The Government or the Opposition do not receive their support. This is the opinion they have formed of the hon. the leader of the Opposition.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to find out the opinion of the business men of our city and district with regard to the fiscal announcements made by the hon. the leader of the Opposition while in the West, and I have yet to find a Liberal or a Conservative who is satisfied with those announcements. The question I heard on all sides was: What is his policy, what does he stand for? They have not yet been able to find out. I want to say that that kind of willy-wabbling is something that the people of Western Canada will not stand for. They admire at any time even an opponent who has the courage of his convictions and who expresses them, rather than a man who tries to play the oily game of promising this locality one thing and that locality another. The people of the West prefer courage and honour—and honour is really honestly in that case. We want men who will be honest and fair with the electors.

Then I went amongst a great many of the returned men, and I remember one of them said to a group of his comrades: "Oh yes, he wants us to come and save him. But why should we do that? Did he come and save us?" That is the attitude they take, and you will find that that is the attitude they are taking all over Western Canada towards the hon. the leader of the Opposition. So he knows full well from what he has heard from his supporters if they are at all observant, that his star is waning and that he cannot possibly come into power under normal conditions. But he thinks he has a chance when agitation is at its height, when the discontent which he and his party have manufactured has not been entirely wiped out by the improved conditions which are now rapidly coming into existence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the very fact that the hon. the leader of the Opposition has entirely ignored the tariff in his amendment proves conclusively that he himself knows that his fiscal policy is a miserable failure. I quite agree with you, Mr. Speaker, in your statement last week, that the proper time to discuss the tariff is when the Budget is before the House; but I am satisfied that had the hon. the leader of the Opposition moved an amendment dealing with the tariff issues referred to in the speech from the Throne, you would have found it very difficult indeed to rule any references thereto out of order. But instead of taking up that question, he has taken up another question altogether. If he knew that his fiscal policy was the strongest policy that he could possibly submit to this country, if he knew it was the winning card, do you think Sir, that he would have played the deuce? Not at all. He would have played the card which he knew would win, and the very fact that he has ignored it here is a confession that he knows his fiscal policy is a failure.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we had the leader of the Opposition out with us. We welcomed him; we were glad to welcome him because of his personal worth. We were glad to welcome him also because of the fact that he is the leader of a great party—we are always pleased to welcome a man into our country even if we disagree with him. Politically we welcomed him and we who are on the Government side, will welcome him again even more heartily than we did before. To him we say: Come again, if the result is going to be as it was before—come as soon as you can and as often as you may; hold as many meetings as you can—because it is quite evident that the more meetings the hon. gentleman held when he was last in our part of the country the weaker became his case and the less his strength.

It seems to me that it would be quite unfair to ask the Government to hold an election at the present time, and I for one am going to oppose the proposal of the leader of the Opposition. What has happened is this—and it has been stated so often in the House that it seems ridiculous to repeat it: for a period of two years, while demobilization was going on, the Government were so busy carrying out their duty that they had no time to attend to the political side. But did hon. gentlemen opposite play the game fairly during that time? Did they assist the Government in their demobilization work? Instead of that, they and their press all over the country were carrying on an agitation against the Government in a most demagogic way. And now, when they have created as much discontent in the country as they can, they say: The time is ripe; we have chosen our weapons; we have chosen the time; we have chosen the ground; we are going to force the Government to a fight. Well, I do not think that the members of the Government are such political fools as to agree to any such terms as that. So far as I am concerned, I am going to have something to say about the time; something to say about what the weapons shall be; something to say about what the conditions shall be. These things are not to be left entirely to the Opposition; when the fight is fought it will be in a fair manner, and each party will be given an equal opportunity. The Government will be given time to explain its policy; to lay before the country its record, and to offset the demagogic agitation which for some little time has been so dangerously carried on by the Opposition.

I wish to make a brief reference to one or two matters mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I am not going to discuss tariff to-day, but I should like to make reference to the duty on fruit, a phase of the question which was referred to the other day by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie). It has been argued that we who in past times favoured a duty upon certain articles were, by reason of that fact, the sworn enemies of the farmers of our country. In my humble opinion the duty on fruit has been of the greatest possible benefit to the farmers in the Prairie Provinces. I think all will agree that it is to the general advantage of Canada to have our fruit lands cultivated. Fruit lands abound in British Columbia; it is the natural fruit producing district of the Prairie Provinces. Is it of advantage to the farmers of the Prairie Provinces that these fruit producing areas shall be cultivated; that the orchards shall increase and the production of fruit become greater? I unhesitatingly say, yes. The member for Yale told us the other day that during his lifetime the production of fruit in one little valley had increased from one car-load to five thousand car loads, if I remember correctly. Is it an advantage to the people there to have these five thousand car-loads of fruit produced? Obviously, it means that they can get fresher fruit, because the fruit can be taken from the prairies to that district in a much shorter time than it can be brought from the states of Oregon and Washington. Besides, the fruit from our own fruit-growing districts arrives in much better condition; a much smaller amount of it is decayed and spoiled. Furthermore, the expansion of this industry creates a population tributary to the railways; the volume of traffic carried by the railways increases, and the lowering of the cost of transportation is, or will be in time, materially assisted. That is a very important consideration. The fruit does not ripen in British Columbia until a month or so later than it ripens in Washington and Oregon. That is a tremendous advantage to the foreign shipper and the foreign grower; he can and does come in and supply our market a month before our own growers can take advantage of it. If we are going to have these lands cultivated at all, is it fair to ask the fruit growers to do it under those conditions? I unhesitatingly say, no. What is the result of this condition? The result is that to-day the farmers are feeding their splendid apples to the cows—all because the Oregon and Washington producers were able to get into our market last fall and supply it before our fruit had ripened. In a letter which I received to-day, a fruit-grower in the Nelson District says: "I am feeding my apples to the cows." He says further that two things are necessary: one, that the duty on fruit should be maintained, and second, that the express rates to the prairies should be lowered. In that I absolutely agree.

I do not believe that the increase in express rates, recently put into force on our railways, is beneficial to our country. The effect is that the people cannot pay the rate; the railways do not get the traffic; the volume of business is not there; men are not required; unemployment results. It seems to me, therefore, that the proper policy to pursue is to establish the rate at such a figure as will ensure a maximum of traffic for our railways. If this is done the result will be more satisfactory. The question of transportation rates is of far greater moment to the farmers of Western Canada than any tariff question can possibly be.

I notice a reference in the Speech from the Throne to the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill with regard to scientific and industrial research. I am sure that the member for London (Mr. Cronyn) must feel very much pleased. I have been associated with him on the special committee which has been studying this question for the last couple of years. I hope that in the Bill to be brought down the Government will make most generous provision along these lines. It has been my pleasure during the recess to address some twelve to twenty meetings of business men, clubs and so on, on the subject of the establishment of a scientific and industrial research bureau in Canada. Without exception these men have unanimously passed resolutions, many of which I have with me, favouring the establishment of such a bureau. They do not believe in the agitation which has been carried on for so many years and which has led the people in Eastern Canada to believe that the prairies are a purely agricultural country. We do believe that agriculture is our basic industry, but we further believe that a great deal of manufacturing can be done in Western Canada. The agitation to which I have referred has caused our eastern people to believe that there is no opportunity for the investment of capital in our western country. We know otherwise, and we want this bureau because we wish to have an industrial life in Western Canada. That is the attitude taken by hundreds, probably thousands of men to whom I have spoken, and they are all agreed, so that I hope the Government will make very generous provision in that regard.

I am not going to vote for the amendment. Before I left the city of Regina, it was rumoured through the press that this amendment was to be moved, and I took it upon myself to consult as many as I could of the business men, Liberals as well as Conservatives, of my city. There was not one—and I did not pick them out—but said: "No, we do not want business conditions upset any more this summer; we want an opportunity to get back to solid foundation, normal times, and until then we do not want any such upheaval as an election would precipitate. For that reason, because I think the business interests of Canada are to be greatly considered in these matters, I am going to vote against the amendment.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle), (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to have in this important debate on the Address, an opportunity to offer a few considerations in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I avail myself of the occasion to offer him the tribute of my admiration for his energetic and patriotic attitude before this House and before the country.

The main argument, the essential argument put forward by the leader of the Opposition, under whose flag I am proud to serve, in his contention that the Government's duty is immediately to order general elections, is that the Government does not command the confidence of the people. If the Government does not hold the confidence of the people and governs the Dominion in spite of the people which denies them its confidence, this Administration is unconstitutional; for the constitution provides for the government of the people by the people. If this Administration is unconstitutional inasmuch as it takes no account of the national will, then this is nothing but tyranny, nothing but manifest despotism. And it seems to me that the Government cannot but be convinced that the people of Canada have withdrawn from them their confidence.

There are public facts which undeniably show that the will of the people are for a change of government. In the western provinces, for instance, it is plain that the Agrarian movement is very popular and consequently very powerful; and it is evident that this Agrarian movement wants to do away with the present Government. Indeed, the place occupied in this House by the political leader of the farmers (Hon. Mr. Crerar) clearly shows that the sentiment of the farmers is that the Unionist government should go.

Another fact, one of yesterday only, the election of West Peterborough, is a signal evidence that the Unionist block of the old province of Ontario is disintegrating, and consequently it seems evident, in view of the election of our friend Mr. Gordon, that Ontario, a prey to many opinions, is however manifestly inclined to give its confidence to the leader of the Liberal party, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King. The victory won in Peterborough West is a kind of popular ovation which bids fair for the hopes of our leader, and is, for the right hon. Prime Minister, pregnant with painful anxieties.

Finally, another fact which is not of yesterday, and is but a persistent reprobation of the present Government, is the attitude of the old province of Quebec. Indeed old Quebec remains manifestly so antagonistic, so unanimously antagonistic to the Government that the hon. Prime Minister is powerless to add to the Cabinet a single French-Canadian from the people's Chamber, understanding as he does that the man of his choice could not be elected in any county of the province of Quebec. To characterize this attitude of old Quebec the friends of the present Government speak of the "Isolation of Quebec". The phrase is a false one. Quebec is not isolated; Quebec has its place here. Its place is not by itself, its representatives are part of the powerful group made up from all the English provinces. The Quebecers are to be found in the powerful mass of citizens who are the enemies of all despotism, enemies of all tyranny, and faithful servants of the nation's will, all those who, at this time, long for a general election to overthrow a Government which are keeping themselves in power by means of an infamous campaign of fanaticism, who obstinately cling to office through an infamous tyranny, and who stand before us crowned with power but tramping under foot the groaning nation.

Thus this Government offers to our astonished eyes the lamentable spectacle of its powerlessness to represent upon the floor of this House the oldest, the most Canadian ethnic group. Does this party represent the nation? It does not. Not a single French-Canadian member of my province is to be found in the ministerial camp to represent the race of the discoverers, of the pioneers, of Canada, whose sons by the next census will show to be nearly one half of the total population of this country.

Since the disappearance of Unionism, could the new National Liberal Conservative party be acceptable to the people? Its very name is nothing but a camouflage. This party is the very reverse of what its assumed name implies—What! National, these hybrid remnants of uncompromising and persecuting Unionism? National, in its true sense, means belonging to the whole nation, suitable to the whole nation, to its ideals. Anti-national is the term which best fits this party and this Government.

Nothing therefore should interfere with a prompt election. On the contrary, circumstances imperiously require one. Have we forgotten that we are in 1921, and that since 1911, we have had but one election? The election of 1917 was not so much on a programme of local politics as on one of foreign relations. Practically we have had no election in view of Canadian affairs since 1911. This is ten years ago, the limit of duration of two parliaments under the constitution of the country. Had our would-be masters any respect for the constitution, any care for the people's interests, any anxiety for the prerogatives of the nation, they would have already appealed to the people and would not cling to office until the last day of the last month of the last possible year of the life of this Parliament.

But, the partisans of the Government will say, to have elections in 1921 is to have them on the present electoral map, when the next census might justify a new arrangement of constituencies which might entitle the western provinces to a larger representation. I will answer that it is not by changing the limits of the constituencies that you will change the sentiment of the people. The cunning of these territorial delimitations in view of elections, succeeds. I admit, in displacing majorities in many cases. Thus, by clever manipulations of boundaries, the majority in a county can be drowned by the majority to be found in a neighbouring constituency, The consequence of the census is to change the vote majorities in some constituencies, and espcially to modify the number of the members of the House, by making them, for instance, two hundred and forty instead of two hundred and thirty. But what will not be changed is public opinion, the popular sentiment of the country. This popular will, this popular sentiment will be made known quite as well by 230 members as by 240. It therfore seems to me that if the Government had no other object but to find out public opinion by a general election, they could do so just as well by appealing to the present constituencies as by waiting to consult newly redistributed electoral divisions. I therefore say: to give as a reason for justifying the putting off of a general election, the propriety of waiting for a new redistribution, is but a pure pretence, a mere put-off, under the circumstances a putting off of the coming demise of their moribund Government.

If, in compliance with the wishes of the western people, which the Prime Minister seems to want to fall in with, the general election is retarded, I am willing to concede that the West will have secured a local advantage, an increase of its prestige, but on the other hand the general good shall have been sacrificed. This general good is of constitutional import. It is a thing which makes for the happiness of the whole population of the Dominion to be governed by men enjoying its confidence, to be saved from unconstitutionality, from tyranny and manifest despotism, a crime the result of which is to put the government of the people in the hands of a party leader who does not possess the confidence of the people. Is it not criminal for a government to sacrifice the general good, that is the government of the people by the people, to the individual good of the citizens of the West? I wish my voice could compete with the powerful organ of the Prime Minister and reach the citizens of the West; I would say to them: "Gentlemen of the West, this individual good which you covet, that of coming back to the Federal Parliament with two or three more representatives, do you want, in order to obtain it, to sacrifice the general good I have mentioned, in order to obtain what is after all but a paltry increase of your prestige in Ottawa?" I would add: "Gentlemen of the West, we are living in the same country; should your wish prevail, it would mean the sacrifice of the individual good of the old provinces, the province of Ontario and the Maritime Provinces, which, contrary to your good fortune, would see their representation and prestige at Ottawa decrease by the loss of a few members in Parliament." And I would conclude: "My good friends of the West, let us first save our dear country, so proud in the enjoyment of her young liberties; let us save our dear country from the great evil of despotism, of the great evil of tyranny, of which I spoke a moment ago, by having general elections immediately."

For all these considerations, Mr. Speaker, I join my voice to that of my leader (the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King) and say: "Let us go to the polls."

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HERBERT MACDONALD MOWAT (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I had almost hoped that this debate on the Address would have been confined to the chief leaders on both sides of the House, so that by shortening it we could the sooner get down to practical business, but as this seems to be a free-for-all, I avail myself of the opportunity to make a few observations on current events.

In the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite I notice references to the continued presence on this side of the House of the class to which I belong, called Liberal Unionists, and it is interesting to note the different attitudes of our friends who differed from us in 1917, and how they have varied from time to time. To go back to 1917, when we found it was absolutely impossible for us to reconcile the policy of the party at that time with what we thought was necessary for the honour of Canada, we were looked upon with great commiseration. It looked to our friends (and to ourselves) as if we were committing political suicide suddenly to leave the party with which we had been brought up and with which we had become allied. The political skies certainly to us looked black. The statement was made that our friends opposite were bound to win, that "The Old Man," which was our affectionate way of addressing our leader at that time, was sure to get into power, because he would bring a solid block from Quebec, and because conscription was so unpopular in Ontario—I am speaking now only for Ontario—that there would be sufficient to turn the then Government out.

Well, of course, we were grateful for the commiseration, and I must say we sincerely appreciated it because it was friendly, but at the same time we could not do otherwise than stick as we did, and while it did not turn out that we were defeated, but, on the contrary, somewhat triumphantly returned, while that was very gratifying to us, yet it did look at the time we made this resolution to separate from the party that our political future was very black indeed. Later on, another pleasant overture was made to us, somewhat of the coaxing or pleading kind, that we should return, that the light was in the window, but we found that we had better stay where we were.

Then, a day or so ago, there was a change, and instead of being treated with commiseration or pity, or being coaxed with that pleading to which we had become somewhat accustomed, we were treated almost with malediction. One hon. gentleman likened us to two of those who had gone out from the Liberal party in 1864, much to the disparagement of those two, and predicted that theirs would be our fate. He compared us unfavourably with the Hon. George Brown, who went back to his party after accomplishing the work for which he joined the coalition government of that day.

As a matter of fact, the cases are completely different. In the days of 1864, there were Liberal principles, well-defined. As I understand it, and as I was brought up to believe, Liberal principles were the principles which made a party sympathize with the people of little importance, as opposed to the men of power, the nobility, rich oppressors, and persons of great importance, and our sympathies were with those we usually call the "under-dogs" in the life of the community. George Brown was of that kind. George Brown had definite ideas on certain public questions, and he felt he would be happier to go back to his party because those questions, if not then solved, had left such an indelible mark upon the party that his sympathies yet remained there. George Brown was in favour of Representation by Population. He was in favour of the ousting of privilege. He was the successor of those who had fought what was in Ontario called "The Family Compact," the people who had power to themselves. George Brown had another favourite theme on which his heavy blows were delivered, and that was his opposition to the Roman Catholic separate schools.

These were some of the things that left a mark on George Brown, so that he would feel happier with his old friends. There was also a very important element in George Brown's career—that he had a personal difference of a very distinct and vivid nature with his principal colleague in the Coalition Government. But as times have changed, it greatly perplexes us now to know what the principles of the two parties are. I know what are said to be the principles of the two parties for hustings purposes and for newspaper articles, but when you get down to practical affairs there really is little difference now between them. The principles that had to be fought for in those days, such as the ones I have mentioned and the principle of provincial rights separated the parties and made very sharp differences between them.

But we found, when we came over here and allied ourselves with our friends in these benches, that there was absolutely no difference that we could discern between us on all these points I have mentioned. As I say, times change and we change with them; and I venture to say that there is not a single person on this side of the House —at any rate, if there is such a one I have failed to discover him in conversation, and I must say that I have held very friendly converse with hon. gentlemen on this side—there is not, I repeat, a single man over here that would now support the Family Compact, or privileges to the few or anything that would interfere with the rights and the happiness of the many. If that is so, what is left in the way of principle?

Now, we have other reasons for thinking that there is not this distinction in principle which our friends proclaim even since we came into this House. Those of us who came in in 1917 have found most extraordinary events, which negative, it seems to me, the idea of principle. We on this side of the House, old Conservatives, as well as the Liberals, found ourselves on several occasions fighting for ideas and principles which were opposed by our friends on the other side. I am not disposed to speak harshly on that score, because I know that in ordinary political affairs the moment one party advocates a thing the other party as a rule opposes it. But there are some principles to which that rule cannot properly apply. It is well within the memory of us all that the majority on this side, at least, the majority for the time being, came out strongly for municipal and common rights as against the supposed rights of corporations. That would seem to me to be a fairly Liberal idea and one on which Liberals would have rallied years ago. But we had to fight for ideas such as that, and with the exception of one or two notable speeches on the other side—those of my hon. friend from Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou), my hon. friend from Waterloo North (Mr. Euler), my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), and one or two others—we were opposed in this idea and we had the greatest difficulty in stopping the passage of legislation that would have militated against the rights of the many in favour of the rights of the few.

Temperance legislation has generally been a favourite with the Liberal party; but what did we find when that question came up? There were very few friends on the other side for the measure proposed. And so with other things. On women's suffrage, too, we were opposed, although that is usually supposed to be one of the tenets of the Liberal party, and a principle which they have advocated for years. And so we became impressed with the fact that really the place for Liberals was not on that side of the House but on this. If we are found here, therefore, we are found here without apology, but claiming our right not to desert those with whom we joined in fighting a great issue; and as they have played absolutely fair by us, we—I am speaking for myself and, I think, for the others on this side—will play absolutely fair by them.

We also felt when we came here the idea that we were supporting a Government which showed most extraordinary abilities in avoiding partisan or political issues. This Government commended itself to us, because it did not matter how unpopular a measure might be or how many interests it might provoke into antagonism against the Government, it went through with everything without regard to consequences. One Liberal measure after another we found put through, and that legislation was generally opposed by our opponents, although they were nominally Liberals. We put through an electoral franchise for women, a Prevention of Fire Act, the Income War Tax, the Medicine Act, the Board of Commerce Act, the Highways Aid Act, and the Purchasing Commission we tried to get through against the opposition of the other side; besides these, we put through the Naturalization Act, and last, but not least, the agreement for the nationalization of our railway systems.

The nationalization of railways has always been a plank of Liberal platforms and has found a place in any Liberal propaganda or convention resolutions that ever I heard of, and yet while we were striving with all our might to get this through, we were strenuously opposed. Fortunately we succeeded, despite almost the unanimous opposition of our friends the Liberals; and we began to think once more that to be a Liberal was not inconsistent with sitting on the right of the Speaker for the time being. Of course, I know that people who engage in politics generally look upon it as a sort of glorified game. You don the uniform of your side and are supposed to play with that side throughout your lifetime. But is it not the experience of all of us that we can draw an analogy from the national games of the country and say that one does not always play on one side throughout his entire sporting career? I advance no argument; I simply point out that when a good man in a lacrosse or football or hockey team plays for his town he is made a hero and is regarded as the greatest man in the town during the particular season; and we know also that if this same fellow got another position in a neighbouring town he would not give up his games. He would join a team in that town and if he came back to play against his home town he would be boohed and hissed at by his own people. And so it is in politics; there is a tendency to say unpleasant things of those who have severed connections with any party. Ungracious remarks are made with regard to the Liberal-Unionists on this side by our friends opposite, although I do not assert that those remarks are prompted by bad feeling. The situation is analogous to the illustration I have given of the hockey team. But everyone knows that a man who plays hockey on one team can play just as well on another, and while he played for all he was worth for his home team he will play with equal vigour and zeal for the team he has lately joined. If he fails to play as well for the one as for the other, then he is no sportsman at all.

I now desire to make an observation or two upon the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. It is a surprising thing to us to find that instead of the main issue which agitates and will agitate the country he should have chosen nothing but the mere resolution which he presented in the form of an amendment to go before the country at this time. What is it? He simply submits the issue to an intelligent people like the Canadians that an election must take place at one part of the year instead of later in the year or even next year, that a few months between an election is to be the whole issue between the people of Canada as to whether this Government shall remain in power or not. Is there anything more in it? It is an expression of want of confidence and, if carried, the Government would be expected to go out. There is nothing but that one issue —no substance, no principle, no facts, nothing to argue before the people, but there is the hope that a vote will take place which will turn the present Government out of power and bring my hon. friends opposite into office. Is that enough to present to the country in view of the issues which have previously been raised by my hon. friends opposite? The real issue is contained in the resolution of the Liberal convention, and in the Speech from the Throne, and the clause in the speech is worth repeating:

> It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained; but that the customs duties imposed to that end should be no higher than is essential to ensure good standards of living among our working population, and to retain and make possible the normal expansion of the industries in which they find employment.

Now, one would suppose that that issue would have been taken up at once because that is the essential policy of one party as against a contrary policy of another; and yet the Address will leave the House without assertion by my hon. friends of the policy which they proclaim as their own. When the Address carries it will therefore carry without one dissenting voice on the really vital issue between the two parties. Nevertheless we are asked to blindly vote on simply the one question of power or no power, without regard to the principle it is maintained upon or the reason advanced for making the change.

Now what is the result of this, what seems to be behind it? My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition wants power too quickly. Is it likely that when he won that very notable victory in the convention of the Liberal party in 1919 they had any idea that they were boosting him at once to the position of Prime Minister of Canada? Neither in this country nor in any other has it been the practice to take a person not in public life at the time being and suddenly make him Prime Minister. That was not done in the case of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. For ten years Sir Wilfrid patiently laboured to build up his party until he got it into a position of solidity. It was only after ten years of effort of that kind that he found himself at the head of a party which was possibly stronger than had ever before been seen in Canada.

My hon. friend should take note of the examples because there are many in the world's history, of sudden ambitions coming to naught. Let me point him and his followers to one only. My hon. friend should look at Mr. Longfellow's notable poem of "Robert of Sicily, brother of Pope Urbane and Valmond Emperor of Allemaine who was divested of his magnificent attire" and placed in a humble position. He could not acclimatise himself to the surroundings and demanded that he be restored. But it was not until after three years service in a humble position that he was acclaimed again and then only after making an admission of humility which would very much become my hon. friend. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in Longfellow's poem the angel addressing this poor fellow, going about clothed in the garb of servitude instead of being dressed in regal robes said to Robert of Sicily: "Art thou the King?" And he replied:

> I am the King and come to take my own
> From an imposter who usurps my throne.

Well that was the position but it took many years to put the King of Sicily in a position where he admitted that his former conduct had been unwise and that he must humble himself before he could attempt to attain power.

My hon. friend asks for a vote of want of confidence without any reasons of policy at all, not even contradicting by resolution the policy which is opposed to him in the speech from the Throne, and he asks that those whom he is pleased to call usurpers be put out and he be put in. There is a great moral lesson to be obtained from the poem "King Robert of Sicily" that I commend to my hon. friend's attention.

With regard to the tariff it is quite true that this is not the time to discuss it, and I do not propose to do so, but there are certain political considerations connected with the tariff question which may well be considered here because there is a paragraph in the speech from the Throne at present before the House which deals with that subject. I point out that the tariff question has always been an unhappy, not to say a disastrous one, for the Liberal party. For years we had the idea that there was a large body of free traders in the country, men brought up on the old doctrines from England—where the circumstances are quite different—who had to be appeased in the matter of the tariff; and throughout the history of the Liberal party in the last forty years there have been sharp differences of opinion and well-discussed policies brought in with regard to it. It is quite true that we as Liberals never hit the right note with regard to the tariff in the whole course of our history. I was reading the other day,—the remarks made in 1882 by Mr. Collins who wrote the "Administration of Lord Lorne." At page 246 of that work he says this:

> The demon of discord—

He is now speaking of 1882 when Mr. Blake was leader and Mr. MacKenzie was still his second in command in the House of Commons:

> . . . the demon of discord had entered into the Grit party family. There were the modified free-trade Reformers and those who admired the political rectitude of Mr. Blake. . . Mr. Blake went out to Durham and told the people that "free trade is for us impossible." Mr. Mackenzie raised his voice in East York and assured the electors that any doctrine but that of free-trade was pernicious, retrogressive and a relic of commercial barbarism, and so an era of Reform speech collisions began all over the country and the enemy made the most of the clashing declarations. Thus it came to pass that the leader of the Opposition could scarcely make utterance on any question that a counter statement made somewhere else by Mr. MacKenzie, by Mr. Mills or the Toronto "Globe" did not rise like the ghost of Banquo to confront him, and vice versa.

That was the situation in 1882. For some time we Liberals were perfectly satisfied, I think with very few exceptions,—those being the theoretical free-traders,—with the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the tariff. For some time matters were settled and quiet, but there were claims made by the theoretical free-traders—chiefly, I think I may say, the editor of the Toronto Globe and others—for a greater reduction; and the heart of the old Grit Free-trader was at last satisfied, apparently beyond measure, by the declaration of the Liberal party in convention in August, 1919. Then the promised land seemed to be in sight because there was no question and no compromise there as to what should be the policy of the party on the tariff. The proceedings of the convention are contained in a very handsomely gotten up book, which, unlike the manna from heaven, which was free, can be had at any time for the price of one dollar from the organization committee of the Liberal party. I notice that this was the resolution on the tariff; I shall not read it all but merely the part that is important. It is to be found at page 204:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of Customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance.'
> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

And this is important because it gives to the old free trader who has been waiting for it for so many years a pledge that this policy will be put into legislation. The last clause of the resolution reads:

> And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

In addition to that, in an admirable speech of appreciation on his appointment as leader of the Liberal party, my hon. friend from Prince, P.E.I.—he apparently having been a party to these resolutions—said:

> That platform, ladies and gentlemen, is the chart on which is plotted the course desired by the people of the country, as expressed through the voice of the Liberals assembled here. So with this chart and this compass, forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, let us press on from this moment, a great, a united, a mighty force, making ever for new liberty, for wider freedom, for greater righteousness in the public affairs of this nation; press on, evermore zealous and united, till we have reached the goal where the principles and policies laid down on this historic occasion will have become, through legislation, part of the law of our land.

Yet despite that pledge to the old free trader, when the matter comes up squarely for decision in the House of Commons, my hon. friend, instead of moving a counter resolution defining the terms under which his party are decided to go definitely before the country, and so making those terms part of the proceedings of the House of Commons, brings in this bare, scarecrow resolution charging usurpation against those who are in power.

But there is one satisfaction—that this resolution which I have read was a deliberate resolution emanating from the Committee on Resolutions, and is contained in this book of the National Liberal Convention of August, 1919. This is a very nice little book and is apparently got out by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy). There may have been others besides the hon. member for Russell who were important figures at that convention; one would have thought that perhaps the hon. members for Gaspé and Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) would have had some influence there, or Mr. W. T. R. Preston, or some other persons who are supposed to be great in the Liberal party; but apparently this is the product of my hon. friend from Russell, because in the front of the book there is a very fine photograph of him — which hardly does him justice, although it is a very handsome one—and under his name, Hon. Charles Murphy, M.P., are these pregnant words: "Who planned, organized and directed the Convention."

It is strange that while this Convention took place on August 5th, 6th and 7th in 1919, it was not until the month of January, 1921, or a year and five months afterwards, that this book was given to the public at the price of a dollar. One wonders why this delay. It was impossible during that time to know what was the policy of the Liberal party. I asked several persons if they could give me the resolutions, as having lost my newspaper published at the time of the convention, I was in the dark as to the definite pronouncement of the Liberal party upon the tariff question. Now there is no more doubt on the point, for here is the book with these photographs and speeches and resolutions, and we all know what the policy of the Liberal party is. So it is no use for my hon. friend from Ste. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) to repeat that somebody had said that the tariff policy of the Liberal party was only "theoretical." It is a perfectly definite policy set down in black and white, and the Liberal party must stand or fall by it.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOWAT: There is one "Hear, hear" from the other side, and I am glad to hear him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOWAT: More of them! Come on, we will have a few more. The point is, we cannot distinguish which gentleman is saying "hear, hear"; if we could, I am afraid we would not hear so many.

While there is no amendment to the tariff policy so frankly declared by the Government, still we have a definite declaration in this book. The first resolution says that the Liberal party when returned to power will substantially reduce the tariff. That leads one to ask: What is the meaning of the word "substantial." As I passed the Library I went in and, as many of us lawyers sometimes have to do, I looked into the dictionary to get a definition of the term. In the last edition of Webster's International Dictionary I found the meaning of the word. I am quite sure that the framers of the resolution which I have read about a "substantial" reduction of the tariff, being educated and scholarly men, must have known the meaning of the words they were using, especially of this word "substantial," because they put it in their speeches and in their resolutions.

Well, I looked up in Webster's Dictionary —an authority my hon. friends will probably admit to be as good as any—the meaning of the word "substantially". I find that it means, first, " in a substantial manner"— no shading down, as we had it in West Peterborough, but an actual, substantial reduction. Further, it means " really, actually, solidly, essentially, materially,"—in a substantial manner. It means that and nothing else. So that if hon. gentlemen opposite introduce petty resolutions calling for reductions of ten fifteen twenty-five or even forty per cent in the tariff, we shall know that they have undergone a change of heart since August, 1919. To effect a reduction which would be something material, something in line with the definition I have given, my hon. friends would have to advocate at least a seventy-five per cent reduction. On that policy my hon. friends must go to the country, and I think that the issue would be met with the greatest alacrity and pleasure by gentlemen on this side, and by supporters of the Government generally.

For the reasons which I have given, therefore—having regard to the uncertainty which exists on the other side as to what principles we would adopt and what leader we would follow if we went to the other side—all this doubt makes it perfectly clear to those who were formerly Liberals and who have now joined in an honourable compact known as the National Liberal and Conservative party—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOWAT: that they should stay where they are. I think I heard an observation by an hon. gentlemen opposite, no doubt with regard to the name "National Liberal and Conservative party". Well, is it not true? Is this not a national party? Does it not stand for the nation as against groups, as against small interests here or small racial conflicts there or anything that is brought up to oppose this Government? Does it not mean that the party in power has really put Canada in the way of being a nation, although yet in her tottering steps?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOWAT: I accept with readiness the laughter, the forced merriment which I hear. I do not believe that my hon. friend who laughs that way and sneers about Canada being a nation can really be the good Canadian that I would have taken him to be. If there is one thing that has engendered pride of race, pride of country and a true spirit of patriotism in Canada, it is the idea that in view of Canada's contribution to the great conflict she is recognized as beginning to be a real nation. True, she is a member of the galaxy of British nations, but that does not alter the situation. We shall go on henceforth trying to make Canada great and good; trying to get rid of racial troubles which we have had. Hon. members know that I made a strong plea during the last session in this regard, and I repeat it: we can never be a nation unless we eradicate difficulties of that nature; unless a strong effort is made and the best of good feeling is exerted with the view of bringing them to an end. We are of many races, and unless we have the spirit that will get us together we shall never have the future which we all desire. So that regardless of what comment may be made on the name chosen, nothing could be better, nothing more true. We are a national party; it is a union of two parties who respect each other, and who do not in any way try to interfere with each other's former ideas. It is Liberal and it is Conservative. My friends the Conservatives have had the grace to allow the word "Liberal" to come first because we are the fewest in numbers, but the three names, "Conservative", "National", "Liberal", do seem to me to combine not only the elements of the party, but the ideals for which they will continue to strive.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve-Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, when listening to the able address delivered by my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), and particularly to the biting remarks which he made with regard to his former associates, I was reminded that the hon. gentleman, with his Liberal antecedents, was made a candidate in the county of Parkdale in 1917 and was elected under very special circumstances. I remember very well that at the time of his election the Tories of that eminently Tory division of Parkdale made a covenant with the party organizer that for one Parliament only would that circumscription be loaned to the hon. gentleman; they did not expect that Parliament would last five years, either. Sir, I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman's presidency of the Liberal Association in the province of Ontario should have occurred at a time when the Reform party in that province was at its lowest ebb.

My hon. friend says that it has been impossible for him, after reading the report of the Liberal convention held in 1919, to find therein a policy to guide, first, the destinies of the Liberal party, and then the destinies of the Canadian people. My hon. friend is so blind as not to be able to read the admirable platform laid down by the Liberal party in convention assembled in 1919 as set forth in that report. May I not refer him to another authority? He says that on the tariff the Liberal party has no policy. Let me bring forward the latest authority in the Tory party—pardon me, in the Tory-Liberal-National party—and I hope that my hon. friend will be satisfied with it. It was stated in the House that this was our battle-ground:

> Reduce the tariff and you will help to reduce the cost of living. The policy followed by this Administration has had the result of creating unrest which continues to grow every day and every week, and this policy is proved by its results to be wrong, change it; reduce the tariff, and you will reduce the cost of living.

This policy, Mr. Speaker, was laid down by the eminent member who represents the county of St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier)—the new John the Baptist prophesying the advent of a saviour for Canada. And, Mr. Speaker, that speech was delivered in this very Chamber less than a year ago.

When my hon. friend (Mr. Mowat) opened his remarks this evening he stated that he would speak on current events. I would have forgiven him had he spoken only on current events. But when he went as far back as the Middle Ages and the geography of Sicily—perhaps he meant the Scilly Islands, because I thought his speech very silly—he lost all right to be answered this evening; therefore he will pardon me if I leave him at that and if I only speak on the amendment which is before the Chair.

Before I do so, I wish to say a few words about the very degrading incident which took place the other day in the House of Commons. It is an axiom in politics as in war that it is good tactics not to do what the enemy wants you to do. For that reason, we, on this side of the House, after the spectacle presented by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) in his speech of last week, decline to gratify our hon. friends opposite by entering into an unseemly brawl such as the hon. gentleman's new-found allies hoped he would be able to provoke in this chamber. At the same time I owe it to myself and to my native province that I should emphasize the political solidity as well as the personal respectability of the people of Quebec by drawing attention to the contrast presented in regard to both by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville and his performance of a few days ago.

Appropriately enough from the hon. gentleman's point of view, he selected the second anniversary of the death of our great leader whose memory he professed to honour as the date upon which to confess his own shame, and to give to the House a long list of personal and political lapses of conduct of which neither the House nor the country, outside of the province of Quebec, would have had any knowledge, and in which credence would not have been placed by the majority of the people, were the admissions not made by the hon. gentleman himself. Where the hon. gentleman stands in public estimation after his extraordinary revelation of his own chequered and tortuous career, I need not specify; but I may observe that after his attacks on all his former comrades and political associates, Conservative, Nationalist and Liberal, because he was all that, and after his further attacks on labour and the farmers, it goes without saying that he placed himself outside the pale of all political parties, and now there is "none so poor to do him reverence."

After having made it plain to the House and to the country that he occupies a position such as no other man belonging to any party in the province of Quebec would occupy, the hon. gentleman asks the House and the country to believe him when he says that he is no Judas. Mr. Speaker, that was an unhappy phrase for the hon. gentleman to use. I will not apply it to him. I might remind him however that, after receiving his forty thousand pieces of silver, Judas, at least, had the grace to go out and hang himself. The performance of a similar act is not, however, necessary in the case of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville. The black flag is already at the top of the mast in St. Hyacinthe, and the sheriff with his posse is waiting his political execution. This performance degrading as it was, made it certain that no matter what member of the Government may have stood sponsor for him, not even his shadow will ever be cast over the place that he and his sponsor planned that he should occupy. That is all that I have to say on the subject, and I leave the hon. gentleman, his new associates and his sponsor to contemplate together and separately the mess they have made of things and the contempt in which they are held by all who esteem fair dealing, fairplay and upright conduct in the public and the private life of this country. Further than this, about this incident I shall say nought. I do not care, I never cared to play bridge with a corpse.

I now intend to address you, Sir, on the question which has been debated since the beginning of last week, and I beg to state at first that I will support the amendment moved by my honoured leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) because I believe in British Parliamentary institutions. No government is possible unless it has the consent of the governed. This is a basic principle in the British Parliamentary system, and we in Canada have accepted that system of government. My young friend, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), in his admirable address the other evening, gave a case in point which I will cite once more. I happened to be in England in 1905 and 1906 when the general elections were fought. Everyone will remember that the Balfour Government came into office in 1900 during the South African war, that government being returned by an immense majority. It was a "win the war Government" such as this Government was on the morrow of the 1917 election. They called the elections of 1900 the "khaki" election. But soon after the treaty was signed in South Africa and the people of England returned to their respective political affiliations.

Constitutionally speaking, the government was entitled to seven years' existence, and Mr. Chamberlain, who was one of the leading ministers in that government, started at once to agitate the question of Imperial preference and that of protection. There were many changes in the Cabinet at that moment, several of the ministers left the government and there was a series of by-elections. In Canada, several ministers have left the Government since 1917 for divers considerations and a series of by-elections has taken place. To continue the parallel, from 1900 to 1905 in England Mr. Balfour lost in most of the constituencies, so much so that long before the constitutional end of his government, he decided to dissolve the House. I remember his address delivered, I believe, in the city of Birmingham—he was the member for Birmingham or Manchester. He positively stated that he had dissolved Parliament because he saw that public opinion was agitated; that new questions had arisen; that the Government had been defeated in several constituencies, and that the people had a right to select a new government. His government was defeated and, mark this, Mr. Speaker, the opponents of the Government of England—here again the parallel is applicable—were at that moment of different persuasions, politically speaking. You had then the Irish Parliamentary party; you had the Radical party; you had the Labour party, and you had the old Liberal party, composed of men like the present Earl Grey, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Haldane, Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman, Lord Rosebery, and others. All the opponents of the Balfour administration, although divided amongst themselves on non-essentials, united their efforts against the government of the day, and victory for one was considered a victory for all. Whenever a Labour man was put up in a constituency, he was supported by the Liberals and the Radicals, and wherever a Liberal ran, he was supported by the Radicals and by Labour. The most important question at that time, as it is to-day, was whether or not the government had the confidence of the people. It seems to me it was exactly parellel to the present situation here. Whether we call ourselves Liberals or Farmers or Labour, when the majority opinion of the country as expressed in the various constituencies is against the government, as it has been consistently against the Government since 1917, I claim that an amendment of this nature is in order and the Government should take notice of it.

There is, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, a paramount reason why the present Parliament should dissolve. I say, Sir, in all seriousness that there has been no general election in this country since 1911—ten years ago. The last general election in Canada was held in that year, but it has not had the opportunity to do so since. That explains the unrest which exists throughout the country; it explains the revolt, the rumbles of which we hear in the various constituencies.

Let me review very briefly the circumstances under which the Canadian Parliament was dissolved in 1911. The question before the people at that time was the reciprocity pact with the United States. Reciprocity was not a new question. It was a very familiar issue to the people of Canada. It was familiar to our predecessors in 1854, in 1866 the year of the abrogation of the first treaty, in 1872, in 1875, in 1879, and in 1891, because in 1891 a general election was fought in Canada on the question of reciprocity. The Liberal party at that time advocated a full measure of reciprocity and the Conservative party a restricted offer of reciprocity with the United States. The Liberal party was practically victorious at the polls. At all events the majority of the government was not very large, and the Conservative administration could claim that they had received the support of the Canadian electorate in favor of a restricted offer of reciprocity. But be that as it may, in 1911 the question was by no means a new one.

Yet, when my hon. friend the present member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and that old friend of ours, the late Mr. William Patterson, returned from Washington and presented the reciprocity pact to Parliament immediately—no, not immediately, because at first the Conservative party in the House of Commons gave a genuine support to the measure—but afterwards, there developed opposition to the measure and the Conservative party through its official mouthpiece, the leader of the Opposition, stated that an appeal should be had to the people of Canada before the measure was voted on by Parliament. I remember that a motion was introduced in amendment by my friend the late Mr. Monk, then member for Jacques Cartier. His motion read that the question of reciprocity should not be voted on by the Canadian Parliament until the people had had a chance to pronounce upon it. His motion was supported by my hon. friend the present leader of the Government, and we know that later on there developed obstruction to the passage of that measure. It is interesting to remind the House of the frantic appeals which were made in respect to that measure brought in by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. Perfervid appeals were made to the province of Ontario in particular, by the general manager of the Conservative political campaigns of the day. Sir John Willison said:

> The future is a sealed book which only the Gods may read, but at least the country should have time and opportunity to express it self. At least the constituencies may demand the right to pronounce the final judgment. It is intolerable that two party politicians, however able and trustworthy they may be, should settle the political destiny of Canada by a secret negotiation with a foreign country. Surely no Government has the right to impose upon the country, without consultation with the people a policy which involves such momentous consequences, and surely if it persists every means of delay and obstructions should be employed to force dissolution of Parliament and to secure for Canadians the simple and incontestable right to determine their own commercial policy and their own political destiny.

So, Mr. Speaker, in order that the people might determine our policy at that time on a question which was not a new one, but dated back as far as 1854, the Conservative party, and some gentlemen who belonged to that House of 1911 are still in the House, obstructed the passage of the measure and forced the government to appeal to the country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had been returned by a considerable majority of the votes in the election of 1908. However, he dissolved Parliament in 1911—mark the contrast between him and the present Prime Minister—Sir Wilfrid Laurier dissolved Parliament and was defeated on the 21st of September of that year, on two different issues; he was defeated on the issue of reciprocity, and defeated on the naval issue, and defeated above all by the whispering campaign. Here is the contrast between the Conservative party and the Liberal party. Here we have a Government elected for war purposes, and war purposes only. In 1908 you had a Government possessing the full confidence of the electorate of Canada, presenting a measure to Parliament on a question which was not new, but was as old as the oldest amongst us could remember.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, because this measure was, in the minds of the Tory party, a measure destined to fix the commercial future of Canada, they forced the issue; they obstructed the measure and brought about a dissolution. Mark the contrast. In the elections of 1917 we had an appeal that was epitomized in a very concrete slogan: "Win the War." The only object of the elections of 1917 was that of winning the war, and from the Prime Minister down to the humblest member in the Unionist party, that slogan was heralded throughout the country. It was said that the Government should be allowed to manage the public affairs of the country until the war had been won, and then the people could pronounce on the policies of both political parties.

After the defeat of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party in 1911, the right hon. gentleman who now represents King's County, Nova Scotia (Sir Robert Borden) took office. With his Cabinet, he administered the public affairs of Canada until the year 1914, when we were suddenly awakened by news of the most stupendous war in history. That was the time, Mr. Speaker, to form a Union Government. Thus understood British statesmen; thus understood French statesmen; and so did the Premiers in Australia, in New Zealand, and in Newfoundland. Not so the Tory party in Canada.

The other day the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Hon. Mr. Meighen), taunting my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), said: "I do not understand why the leader of the Opposition is anxious to have an election to-day. In 1914 his party was most anxious that there should not be held any general election." How generous on the part of the Government not to have held an election in 1914! Sir, when the history of war events in Canada is written it will be surprising to know that at one moment the Tory Government, in the month of November, 1914, was ready to dissolve Parliament and to launch the country into a political contest, when already thousands and thousands of lives were being mowed down in Flanders' fields in Belgium.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, it was wise and patriotic on the part of the Liberal party to oppose any dissolution of Parliament. One might say that from that moment until 1917—and this is the point I wish to emphasize—from 1914 until 1917—Parliamentary, yes responsible Government was suspended in Canada. We had the War Measures Act; we had the extension of the Parliamentary term; we had the suspension of Habeas Corpus, one of the most sacred of all the liberties enjoyed by British subjects, if not, indeed, the most sacred of them. And finally we had the War Time Elections Act, the most iniquitous measure ever passed by any Parliament in any country. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that in 1917, after the War Time Elections Act was passed by closure we had only the semblance of an election.

The election of 1917 was but a sham, and all over Canada, in at least eight of the nine provinces, it was an official debauchery. It has been stated by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Copp)—and he brought affidavits to prove his assertions—that there are at least fourteen or fifteen members sitting in this House who were not regularly elected. Mr. Speaker, we know what took place. I was present at the Liberal Convention two years ago, and I heard an acquaintance of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, Mr. Adamson of Winnipeg, whose father and father-in-law both sat in this House of Commons, state to the Convention assembled, on his word of honour, that two telegrams which I shall read to you had been sent during the campaign. He had the code and the key thereto, and he decoded the telegram to the Convention. On the 30th November, 1917, the following telegram was sent from the present Prime Minister to the late Prime Minister:

> Would like one thousand soldier votes at large for Manitoba, of which 300 for Selkirk, balance divided between Provencher, Macdonald and Springfield or same proportion of division, no matter what our allotment may be.

He read another telegram sent from Senator Sharpe to Senator Tanner, dated Winnipeg, December 4, 1917:

> W. J. TUPPER,
> Halifax, N. S.
>
> W. J. Tupper received a telegram from your assistant secretary and in reply would say: please allot all unattached votes equally among the following constituencies; Provencher, Springfield, and Selkirk, for the province of Manitoba, and in Saskatchewan, Saltcoats, North Battleford, Prince Albert, Swift Current and Humboldt. This will assist us greatly.
> W. H. SHARPE.

I know—I want to be fair—that the Prime Minister has mildly denied the paternity of his telegram addressed to Sir Robert Borden, the ex-Premier, but Senator Sharp never denied the authorship of the telegram which was addressed to Senator Tanner. All of us of the Liberal party who hail from the province of Quebec do not know what took place in the other provinces except from what slips through the press or through the quarrels which occur to-day between the officials who were identified with that election, but we know what happened in our province. We know that for the county of Chambly-Verchères 700 soldiers voted at St. John's. We know that Colonel Melville who was commanding at St. John's declared that he did not know where his domicile was, and for that reason voted himself in Chambly-Verchères. You have only to present facts such as these and you have completely proven your case. Yes, Mr. Speaker, having sat in this House for a quarter of a century, having passed through several general elections, knowing the rough and tumble of a political contest, having read the history of the British Parliament and of British institutions, I have no hesitation in saying there were no elections really held in 1917, but that the elections of that year were nothing short of an official debauchery.

The salient fact through all the elections of 1917, or, if I may so speak, the raison d'être of the Union Government, was the objective which I mentioned a moment ago—that is to say, winning the war was the only purpose. Is it necessary to prove that? Why, we have the evidence from the lips of one of the most astute members of the present Government. We have the evidence from the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). On June 11, 1919, he said:

> The present Government as originally constituted was not created for the purpose of making a general revision of the tariff. This Government was formed for war purposes and to carry out a war policy.

I find exactly the contrary in the speech from the Throne. There I read:

> My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs Tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry, and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every province.

Yet the Minister of Immigration stated two years ago:

> The present Government as originally constituted was not created for the purpose of making a general revision of the Tariff. This Government was formed for war purposes and to carry out a war policy.

Shall we believe the minister who uttered those words in 1919 or must we believe the minister who drafted the speech from the Throne? But my hon. friend said this further:

> When the Government was constituted it was composed of Liberals and Conservatives and the members composing the Government held strongly divergent views on the tariff question. What is true of members of the Government is equally true of members of the House on both sides. The members of this House were not elected because of their tariff leanings. I do not wish to be personal but let me take one or two illustrations.

Then he takes the case of our esteemed friend the member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders):

> The hon. member for Macdonald was supported by all sections of the people in his constituency regardless of any opinions he held on the tariff because, I say again, the tariff was not an issue when he was elected a member of the House.

Then speaking of my genial friend the member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) he said:

> Will any person say that the people of that constituency were at that time thinking of the tariff or of a general revision of the Tariff? They were not. At that time the people were thinking of and voting on the issue that was before the country.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that this evidence coming from a member of the Government and knowing the circumstances that surrounded the last election, is sufficient to justify any fair-minded member in this House in voting in favour of the amendment, and to ask that in all sincerity, in all justice, the people of the country be called upon to pronounce between the Opposition and the Government.

I will admit, as I stated a moment ago that a union of both parties was a logical sequence of the declaration of the war; but what was logical during the war, and immediately after the war, is illogical to-day, and we must strip of its disguises the Government which continues under a war agreement when we have reached peace. The master of the English language in the British Parliament is Mr. Asquith. It has been my privilege to listen to that great statesman on many occasions and I do not know in the English world a Parliamentarian who can marshal his phrases in such beautiful order as the present leader of the Liberal party in England, Mr. Asquith. He made such an apt description of the coalition in England that I feel inclined to apply his burning sentences to the existing coalition in Canada. Here is what he said in the month of January last:

> Now, let us turn for a very few moments nearer home. We see the same necessity for cleancut ideas and policies. The native atmosphere of the coalition is fog—fog which blears outlines and destroys perspectives. A combination of this kind, no longer justified by the supreme necessities of war, is driven to the task which, as the government of this country, is imposed upon it, or which it has imposed itself—it is driven, by the necessities of its being, to cater for at least two sets of opinions at the same time, and the inevitable result is a policy, if policy it can be properly called, of aviguities and compromises, or, of I may say so, of zigzag and see-saw.

That is an apt description of the present coalition of interests and appetites in this country, Mr. Speaker. It makes for ambiguities and compromises with two sets of opinions, as you saw last week. It makes also for a policy of zigzag and see-saw.

The supreme issue of the war has come to an end. The Government, of course, did not win the war, although they claim to have done so; the boys in the trenches won the war. There have been radical changes in the Cabinet; the Prime Minister selected by the people of Canada in 1911 has resigned; the Cabinet has been re-cast three or four times at least since 1911; the name of the party has been changed—and public opinion has also changed. Are we to be told Mr. Speaker, that a caucus which selects a Prime Minister, a leader of the party, shall be substituted for the will of the people and of Parliament? Are we to be told that bureaucracy shall take the place of free government in this young democracy?

Ah, I say to my hon. friends, the Progressives, the Farmers who sit alongside of me; This is the old, old issue between reaction and progress, between Liberalism and Toryism, because whatever be their name—Liberal, Conservative, National, we know that it is the same old Tory party. And this brings me to the distinction made by a famous English writer as between the Tory and the Liberal. Commenting on Gladstone's definition of the Liberal as the man who trusts the people, this writer said:

> The Tory looks down from the institution to the man; the Liberal up from the man to the institution. The Liberal says, "The state is made for man, and not man for the state"; the Tory reverses the dogma. Democratic government to the Liberal is an essential condition of the free growth of the individual soul; to the Tory, if he believes in it at all, it is a piece of efficient political machinery. The Tory theory, in other words, is expessed in terms of duties, the Liberal in terms of rights.

And, Sir, it is a right that we are asserting to-day in moving this amendment. We assume the right of calling upon the Government to dissolve Parliament in order to give the people of Canada an opportunity of pronouncing as between the two political doctrines—an opportunity which has been denied since 1911.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is not only this question involved in the present amendment; there is, in my judgment, another paramount issue which justifies an appeal to the people. We are informed from all quarters that an Imperial Conference is to be convened for the month of June, that ministers from the various Dominions are to gather in London, and that they will be called upon to pronounce on the question of sharing the naval defence of the Empire. That is the declaration made by the Prime Minister of England. And we have also a declaration made, it is said, by Lord Milner, that the question of Home Rule for Egypt should also bring the Dominions together in order that they may be consulted on that most important policy. I leave aside this last question, because I cannot believe that we shall be involved in it, as we have nothing to do with Egypt. But the other declaration made by the Prime Minister of England, that the burden of naval defence had become too heavy for Great Britain, and that the Dominions should be called upon to share in that defence, creates at once, a most important issue.

On many occasions the ex-Prime Minister, the right hon. gentleman from King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden) has declared, in England and in Canada, that our country should have a voice in the affairs of the Empire—that Canada should be consulted on the policy of the foreign office. It is true that, at the Imperial Conference, in 1911, Mr. Asquith, who was then Prime Minister of England, said that all this was a sham, that the Dominions could not share in framing the foreign policy of Great Britain.

Sir, if we should have a voice, if Canada should be called upon with British statesmen to decide the foreign policy of the Empire, you could see at once in what old world troubles we might be embroiled. As my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) stated so eloquently this afternoon, if Canada was called upon to pronounce on such a foreign policy, it would mean that there would be some sort of central authority in London where the Dominions would be represented according to population. Well, although I belong to the minority, and although I know that quite often we are denied the right and the privilege to speak on Imperial affairs because forsooth, we are supposed to be born rebels, yet I know, and I have enough regard for public opinion in Canada, for public opinion in English-speaking Canada, to say that never, never, never shall Canada surrender her rights as a free self-governing commonwealth.

Canada is a self-governing dominion, will take part in the defence of the Empire or in the defence of Great Britain whenever Great Britain is on her trial; but Canada will do so of her own free will; there will never be any central authority in London to dictate a policy to Ottawa in that regard. If it is true that an Imperial Conference is to convene in the month of June to discuss the problem of the part Canada shall take in the naval defence of the Empire, I say that the question transcends all other issues and that the Government clearly has no mandate—to even discuss it! They have no mandate even to approach the issue; to take it up with Imperial statesmen and commit this House to a policy. I say that the Government should dissolve Parliament and ask the people by way of a referendum what is their will with regard to this grave question.

Any organic change in our constitution would be a serious departure, which should be specifically authorized by the people. This is a most vital issue, yet we are kept in the dark with regard to it. I suppose we shall be told in a few moments by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) that, as he said the other day in Montreal, "Canada is a nation." True, Mr. Speaker, we have a territory and we have a population, but as I understand the elements of international law there lacks an essential attribute: Canada has no sovereignty. But we are told by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) that Canada is "a nation within the Empire" yet our status is not the same as that of Scotland, Wales, or Britain. I am eliminating poor old Ireland, but I hope that the day is not far distant when Ireland shall have her share in the Government of Great Britain. Is our status equal to that of Britain, Scotland, Wales, even the Isle of Man? Mr. Speaker, if we are a nation within the Empire, what about the requisition of our ships during the war? Our ships were commandeered, I understand, owing to the emergency of the occasion, but what about the returning of those ships to Canada when the shipping interests of this country were clamouring after the armistice: "Give us back our ships. Do not send them from Liverpool to the extreme sections of the British Empire to help the merchants of Liverpool and of Glasgow. Return them to Canada."

We are "a nation within the Empire", and we pride ourselves upon that distinction; yet there is an embargo on our Canadian cattle, an embargo which rests on what Sir Charles Tupper stated was a lie. It is not true that Canadian cattle suffer from pleuro-pneumonia, but it is true that free-trade England wishes to protect the cattlemen and breeders of Scotland and the North of Ireland. We are "a nation within the Empire," but I remember that in 1911 when the Rainbow and the Niobe came to Halifax the Canadian Government received word from the British Admiralty that Canadian ships flying the King's colours and the Canadian ensign might not go beyond the three-mile limit lest they should create complications with some other power. I am sorry that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) is not in his seat, but some time during the session I should like to know from him how it is that the present so-called Canadian navy is going round the world flying the British flag and the Canadian ensign at the same time. By what process, through what channels, did we obtain in this year of Our Lord 1921 the privilege which was denied to the late Government in 1911?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce waxed eloquent the other day when he said that before Confederation Canada was bound first to the provinces, then to the other Dominions; and, as things progressed, as events emerged, Canada became bound to the Empire, and in a glorious peroration the Minister added: "Now, Canada is bound to the world." Noble words, Mr. Speaker; yet I read in the Gazette of February 4 that Canada was denied the right to conclude a commercial pact even with Nigeria and the Gold Coast. Here is what I read in the London correspondence of the Montreal Gazette of that date:

> On inquiry at the Colonial Office by your correspondent, the information was vouchsafed that negotiations had taken place directly between Canada and the Governments of the Gold Coast and Nigeria for preferential agreements somewhat similar to that now existing between Canada and the West Indies. It was soon discovered, however, that the granting of such a preference was forbidden, in the case of the two African Governments, by the Anglo-French Convention referred to, and there the matter ended.
>
> It appears that not only West Africa, but also East Africa, is thus bound, the bar in the latter case being the Berlin Convention, which prevented a proposed arrangement between a British colony there and Australia.
> The statement of the Colonial Office, when asked whether the Anglo-French Convention could not be terminated, was that it would take about five years, in the event of the British Government being willing to make the effort, which would doubtless require a considerable amount of persuation. Canada and the other Dominions have outgrown entanglements of this kind, but other parts of the Empire still find themselves in the leading strings in which Britain's foreign policy of former days has placed them.

I hope that if this matter is followed up by the Department of Trade and Commerce the right hon. gentleman who presides with such distinction over the affairs of that department will take a leaf out of the late Government's book so far as its trade policy is concerned. When British preference was voted by this Parliament in 1897, there were obstacles in the way, there were the German and Belgian treaties with Great Britain; but the Prime Minister of Canada went to England, where he pleaded the cause of Canada and the cause of the Mother Country, and the two treaties were denounced forthwith. To-day we are attempting to trade with Nigeria and the Gold Coast, and I hope the precedent of Belgium and of Germany will help the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Canada is a nation; but will the right Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) at least give us a hint as to when we shall have a right to appoint consular agents, or consuls, in the various countries of the world?

Mr. DOHERTY: When we shall need them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My right hon. friend has travelled of late. He went to Geneva; he went to Paris; and I have no doubt that he went to the various capitals of western Europe. He knows that, in every city of importance, the smallest country in the world, is represented by at least a consular agent who looks after the trade interests of that country. Where are the consular agents of Canada? And yet my right hon. friend will say: "Canada is a nation." My right hon. friend says that we shall appoint consular agents when we shall need them. He will pardon me if I follow that expression. A few months ago the present Government was nearly defeated on the vote taken on the question of representation at Washington, the Government escaping defeat by five of a majority. The question was whether or not Canada should be represented at Washington by an ambassador or a semi-ambassador who, jointly with the British ambassador, would look after the interests of Canada, and in the case of the absence of the British ambassador would look after the affairs of the embassy at large. I make bold to say that the ink which signed the approval of Parliament was not dry when loud protests were made by the British ambassador at Washington and when louder protests were made by the colonial office and the foreign office in London, because a nation we may be, but still under the ægis of Downing Street. The Canadian ambassador has not yet been appointed, and I dare say that he will not be appointed. Will my right hon. friend state to-night if that ambassador will be appointed? He will not be appointed.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will state this, that it is no loud protest from anybody outside of Canada that has anything to do with the question whether he will be appointed or not. My hon. friend said that he would make bold to make the statement. He certainly carried the boldness to the extreme of making a statement entirely devoid of foundation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My right hon. friend evades the issue. He will not say if the ambassador will be named, and I make bold to say once more that he will not be appointed.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will also say, as I am accused of evasion, that he will be named just as soon as Canada decides who is to be named.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This question was mooted, not last year, but three years ago, and I think this is the third time we have voted the money necessary to maintain a Canadian ambassador at Washington. It is very easy for my right hon. friend, in answer to my question, to say that he will be appointed just as soon as we decide who shall be appointed; but if you never decide, no one will ever be appointed. I have no warrant to say that, but my knowledge of British traditions and my common sense dictate the answer I gave a moment ago to my right hon. friend. I say that Great Britain, through the foreign office in London, will never allow the Canadian Government to appoint a dual ambassador at Washington, and why should the foreign office give Canada, which has no sovereignty, the right to discuss with the United States the interests of Great Britain at large? Aye, if you were to appoint a High Commissioner like the one you have in London or the one you have in Paris, the case would be quite different, and I have already stated in the House and several others on this side also stated that they would see with pleasure, indeed, the appointment of a Canadian, of a man of substance who knows Canada, who is familiar with her trade interests and Canadian affairs generally, to Washington, where we have so many problems to discuss and to settle. That, I would approve most heartily but again I repeat to my right hon. friend that it is no more necessary to have two ambassadors in the British Embassy at Washington than it is necessary to have two ministers sitting in the Department of Justice. What would my right hon. friend say if, for instance, the province of Quebec or the province of Manitoba were to insist on the Government having alongside my right hon. friend in the department over which he presides, I must say, with grace and ability, a jurist, a lawyer from either of their respective provinces to assist him in his task? My right hon. friend would protest. Would he resign? I think he would.

10 p.m.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The case is as absurd as that. More than that, it would be a very strange position for Canada to be in. When the British Ambassador was in Washington discussing highly confidential questions with the American Secretary of State, how would he like to have a third party intervene? It would lead to endless embroilments and endless quarrels between Canada and the Mother Country. I say that in the best interests of Canada and the Mother Country the appointment of a Canadian ambassador to Washington is not to be desired. But, really, we need waste no time in discussing the desirability of having one, for he will never be appointed.

The object of Mr. Amery's visit last summer was very easy to divine, and there has appeared enough in the press of Great Britain and enough has been hinted on the floor of the House at Westminster to dispose of the question forever. But I say again, it is about time Canada should have a High Commissioner in Washington, not attached to the British Embassy, but speaking for himself, and surveying always Canadian conditions there. Mr. Speaker, there are obvious reasons why we should have such an official in Washington.

I am glad to see my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) in his seat. He has heard, no doubt, from the shipping interests about the Chicago drainage canal. The trustees of the Chicago Sanitary District years ago were authorized to divert from lake Michigan 4,167 cubic feet of water per second. They actually divert, I am told, 9,000 feet, under the pretence of feeding what was to be a sewage canal in Chicago, but really, as a matter of fact, it is the beginning of a canal to unite the waters of the Great Lakes with the Mississippi river with a view to diverting western trade to the south. Now, Sir, these same trustees who have exceeded their permit to divert 4,000 cubic feet of water per second by 5,000 feet, are applying to Congress for permission to divert 10,000 feet, instead of 4,000 feet. There are fears expressed—I do not know what is the information of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries— that Congress may grant this permit, and if it does, what will be the consequences? They will be most serious for Canada, for this diversion of the waters of lake Michigan into the Mississippi will lower the level of the St. Lawrence river. My hon. friend knows that during the summer months especially, in the harbour of Montreal, and below, the water level is low and has been getting lower every year for the last ten or fifteen years in spite of all the work that has been done on the St. Lawrence. A very able engineer, Mr. Shenehan, in the last issue of the Canadian Engineer, writes as follows:

> The diversion of 10,000 cubic feet of water per second at Chicago will lessen the cargo-carrying capacity of each of the big vessels about 400 tons on each trip. This is a substantial damage. The loss in water-power at Niagara approximates 300,000 electric horse-power; and on the St. Lawrence, perhaps 200,000 electric horse-power. Very little of this loss is made up, as the water goes towards the Mississippi river. This power loss means not so much at the present time as it will 25 or 50 years from now.

It is true there is not as much glamour for a Canadian ambassador in dealing with a question of this kind as there would be if he were invited to sit alongside the British ambassador at the opening of Congress, let us say, or if he were admitted to the secrets of British-American diplomacy, but it is far more important for Canada that she should have a gentleman at Washington to watch over the legislation of Congress, to safe-guard the interests, for instance, of the St. Lawrence navigation, of Niagara's electric power, and those of the great harbour of Montreal. There is less glamour in dealing with these questions, but the results are more practical and more vital to Canada.

Canada has taken part in the first deliberations of the League of Nations. Our part, no doubt, has been interesting and has developed in Canada a national pride. Yet, Mr. Speaker, let us come to solid facts; let us come down from dreamland to realities. Our interests in world affairs are such that we are much more concerned as a people, as a nation, if you please, with America than with the old world. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that legislation, or let us say, an event like the adoption of the Fordney Bill by the United States Congress is of much more importance to Canada than any delegation to discuss the affairs of Mesopotamia, or even Egypt? I was painfully surprised the other day to read the speech which my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) delivered in the city of New York. Addressing his audience he used the following language:

> We are pretty good neighbours to you. We came over from Canada in 1920 and bought $921,000,000 worth of stuff from you in the United States. This means that every man, woman and child in Canada spent on an average $115 in purchasing from the United States last year. United States, by the same statistics, came into Canada and bought $560,000,000 worth only, exactly five dollars for every man, woman and child in the United States.
> Let us be neighbours, buy as much from us as we have done from you, and when we come down here with our good-will security, Canadian dollars, be above offering us 88 cents.

And my hon. friend added the following words:

> Well, there are but two things for us to do, one is not to buy the extra $400,000,000 worth from the people of the United States. That is my appeal to the commercial portion of the United States; it may be a good thing to think of these things before we legislate too far.

Mr. Speaker, I was painfully surprised, not to say shocked, when I read that report of the speech delivered by my hon. friend to the American guests who were present on that occasion. Why! I recall a certain campaign that took place in the year of Our Lord 1911, and I recall at the same time that the chief speaker of that campaign on behalf of the Anti-Reciprocity League was the right hon. gentleman himself. I recall the fact that he addressed vast meetings in Toronto and throughout Ontario, always speaking under the aegis of a banner whereon was inscribed the slogan of the day: "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." This was the same gentleman who, as a pilgrim, went back to the United States and, hat in hand before Uncle Sam, begged him in the name of Canada, in the name of the Canadian Government, to truck and to trade with Canada. Painful spectacle! Shocking view of the right hon. gentleman!

The League of Nations, at whose deliberations Canada was represented by my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice, by my friend the hon. member for Durham (Hon. Mr. Rowell), and by the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is a noble institution. It will make, as it was intended to make, for the peace of the world. No doubt the peace of the world may be promoted by a league of nations, but the expansion of trade between nation and nation, the opening of markets between two neighbourly peoples, and the disappearance of high tariffs, which only breed armaments first and war afterwards—all that, Mr. Speaker, will make for better feeling between our great neighbour the United States and Canada. Yes; expansion of trade, wide markets, and still wider markets, will make for peace and good government in Canada; and, as well, a return to constitutional methods and the development of a more brotherly spirit between races and creeds will help to promote the peace of Canada and that of the world. A full and overflowing measure of justice to minorities will also make for the peace of Canada and the peace of the world. But, Mr. Speaker, before assuming too much in the society of nations, let us begin by agreeing on a society of Canadians.

Before I close I wish to address to my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) my sincere congratulations for his very eloquent speech, and I wish especially to thank him for his kindly reference to the French-Canadian minority. It is evident that there is growing more and more in Canada amongst the English-speaking, as amongst the French-speaking Canadians, a desire for a restoration of national unity. Let me say this to my hon. friends opposite. As Quebec was adament to abuse two or three years ago, so to-day she is also adament to too much flattery; and above all, I serve notice to the sponsor for the member for Ste. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) that Quebec is particularly adamant to corruption. Both races, Mr. Speaker, have their qualities as well as their failings: they are only human. To govern them without any trouble you have only to apply the golden rule, or rather the old British rule; trust them! Trust the minority as you trust the majority; make them feel that they are your equals before the law, and there will be then no French-Canadian question in Canada. I say that the question of national unity is one of supreme importance; and the Government, whatever it may be, can solve it only by respecting the qualities and even the prejudices of both the English and the French. It is futile to attempt to ignore the national characteristics of a people; you cannot eradicate them from the heart. As a great Irish orator once said, all the belfrys of London cannot peel as sweet to the Celts as the bells of Shandon,—

> Whose sounds so wild would in days of childhood
> Fling round his cradle their magic spell.

The art of government consists in producing harmony and unity out of our Canadian diversities. That was the objective of Sir John A. Macdonald; that was the objective of the forbears of my hon. friend from Parkdale; that was the objective of Sir Oliver Mowat; that was above all the objective in life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Yes. That was above all the guiding star of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. From the beginning of his career to the very last he unceasingly preached unity, harmony and amity between the various elements composing this Confederation of ours. I have still ringing in my ears those words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in a very eventful debate which took place at the time of the South African war, and which find their application to-day as they did in those distant days:

> If there is anything to which I have devoted my political life, it is to try to promote unity, harmony and amity between the diverse elements of this country. My friends can desert me, they can remove their confidence from me, they can withdraw the trust they have placed in my hands, but never shall I deviate from that line of policy. Whatever may be the consequences, whether loss of power, I feel that I am in the right, and I know that a time will come when every man will render me full justice on that score.

Mr. Speaker, I feel confident that these noble words represent in a concrete form the policy of every true Canadian statesman, and I hope they will be adopted by the leader of the Government. At all events I know that they will ever be the watchwords of the Liberal party.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker at this hour of the evening I hardly feel that I can fairly undertake to follow the hon. gentleman over the vast extent of territory that he has covered in treating the numerous questions with which he has dealt. I very much regret that I shall not be able to take the matter up at this moment, and I must necessarily, in consequence, leave him to be haunted through this night by those terrible nightmares in which he sees with terrible dread, a centralized authority grasping Canada and also sees this country standing out as a nation. The hon. gentleman has a most awful dread of Canada being a nation. I am sorry for that, but I feel I will be able to do something, at all events, to carry conviction to him that that is the fact, and perhaps something to modify the terrors that, in his mind, surround that position. I hope to be able to do that, but I fear that at this hour I shall have to postpone the task until to-morrow, and so I can only wish him the pleasantest dreams a man so obsessed may have, and beg to move, Mr. Speaker, the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion agreed to.

On the Motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FIELDING: Before the House adjourns I have a suggestion or a request to make to the Minister of Justice. In view of the several important speeches that have been made, and the immediate prospect of the making of others, touching the League of Nations, I think it is most desirable that the House should be in possession of further information with regard to the appointment of the delegates who attended the Geneva Conference. My suggestion, therefore, is that without waiting for a formal motion, which could only come at a later stage, my right hon. friend should bring down immediately the Orders in Council and instructions respecting the appointment of the delegates. We would then have a clear conception of the matter. I think it would be better that my right hon. friend should do that now and not wait until a motion for these papers is placed on the Order Paper. I hope that my rt. hon. friend will be able to do as I suggest.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. DOHERTY: At the present moment I see no objection to its being done, and I will bear the request in mind.

Motion agreed to and House adjourned at 10.30. p.m.

Tuesday, February 22, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency, the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Monday February 21.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) who entertained us last evening with an address that, no doubt, from many points of view was very interesting—although I think it must be confessed that it was in many respects hardly relevant to the motion and the amendment before the House—covered, as I took occasion to say, when moving the adjournment of the debate last night, a very considerable extent of ground. It is not my purpose or intention to take up in detail all the different matters, more or less relevant, which he introduced into that discourse. I shall content myself with dealing with what seemed, in the mind of the hon. gentleman at all events, to be the outstanding points which he sought to make, limiting myself, if I may use the expression, to "touching the high spots". That will necessarily reduce the length of my observations, because so far as I was able to appreciate his discourse the high spots were rather conspicuous by their absence.

The hon. gentleman, I suppose in view of what had preceded in this debate, by way of finding something that might perhaps constitute a reason why this motion should be made, and a reason that might at least call for some discussion as to why we should have an election, suggested that we should have an election because there is going to be an Imperial Conference, as he described it, in the month of June. And when he mentioned "Imperial Conference", there immediately crept into his discourse a subject that he seems as incapable of keeping out of his speeches as was the famous Mr. Dick, of Dickens' creation, incapable of keeping out of his literary productions the head of King Charles.

He gave us a dissertation upon his conception of Canada's national position, and in that he gave us another evidence of his settled determination to thwart every endeavour that may be made to assure to Canada the national status to which she has so long aspired, and to create the impression that her achievement in the direction of that full national status amounted practically to nothing. He clings—with all the determination which the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) attributes to us in what he calls our clinging to office—to the colonial garments with which he sees Canada still robed.

Mr. BELAND: I did that.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) says that he was the gentleman who did that. I missed the pleasure of hearing his address—

Mr. BELAND: You missed a lot.

Mr. DOHERTY: —and I quite realize the loss was entirely mine. The hon. gentleman in his speech did refer to the hon. member for Rouville as having taken the position which he took himself.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not call me the hon. member for Rouville, please.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I appreciate his modesty which seeks so promptly to repudiate the honours unconsciously attached to him. However that may be from the point of view of the hon. gentleman, perhaps I should apologize for the error; it is always proper to apologize in such a case.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And sin no more.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman, in his frantic endeavour to establish that Canada is, after all, nothing but a mere colony, carries us back to 1911. Incidentally, I may suggest that in seeking to establish that position he is seeking to establish that a large part of the life-work of his late distinguished leader, for whom he professes so great admiration, went absolutely for naught. But the hon. gentleman is still living in 1911. May I say to him that since 1911 a great deal of water has passed under the bridges? And may I add that a great deal of blood has been spilled on the battlefields of a ravaged and devastated Europe? And may I further add—but it is not needful to remind the hon. gentleman of that—that much of that blood was the blood of Canada's youthful sons who, if nothing else had proved it, proved to the world that Canada had bought, at a price that is beyond all prices, the right to recognition of that nationhood to which she had grown? The hon. gentleman, going back to 1911, cites a declaration of the then Prime Minister of Great Britain, Right Hon. Mr. Asquith, that it was impossible that the dominion nations of this Empire should ever have any share in the control of the Empire's foreign affairs. Having cited this, the hon. gentleman says: The case is ended; that is conclusive; there is nothing more to be said. I would ask the hon. gentleman: Since when have the people of Canada decided that their destinies are to be settled by the ipse dixit of any British Prime Minister, no matter how distinguished he may be? Time out of mind and times without number there has been hurled across the floor from the other side—we have heard it from the hon. gentleman himself—the imputation that upon this side of the House there was some desire to be governed from Downing Street. What more absolute evidence of the readiness to be governed from Downing Street can be found than the abject submission of the hon. gentleman and his friends to a declaration, which he attributes to one Prime Minister, as settling forever the national status of Canada? In that day what that Prime Minister said was unsound and untrue. He slammed the door in the face of Sir Joseph Ward, who had made the suggestion—which, I am sure, found a response in the hearts of the people of all these dominions—that the time had come when as sister nations we were entitled to have our say as to what the Empire of which we are an essential part should do in connection with her foreign affairs as well as in connection with other affairs of general interest. We have to admit that the then representative of this Dominion stood silently by, and so far as silence could give acquiescence he gave his acquiescence. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) is not satisfied with that silent acquiescence; he comes to us now, ten years afterwards, to proclaim that the question was then and there settled once for all. May I remind him that there were people in Canada at that time who were not prepared to give that silent acquiescence? May I remind him that within one year after that incident other representatives of Canada were in England speaking the real voice of Canada? May I remind him that among those gentleman was the right hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden)? May I recall to his mind also the fact that that right hon. gentleman went from gathering to gathering in England proclaiming in terms that permitted of no misunderstanding that Canada did not accept the dictum that she never could and never would have a voice in the control and direction of those important affairs touching so closely her vital interests? Has he forgotten—or, perchance, did he never know—that that same Mr. Asquith (who in the presence of the acquiescing representatives of Canada had slammed the door in Sir Joseph Ward's face) after these pronouncements of the right hon. member for King's and after the response that he saw they evoked in the British hearers of that right hon. gentleman, reopened that door? What Mr. Asquith said in 1911 he abandoned in 1912, the hon. member clings to it still. Let me read to him what the hon. Mr. Asquith said in 1912 after he had heard the real voice of Canada as spoken by the right hon. member for King's. It may be found in the British Hansard for the 22nd of July, 1912. In what he acknowledged there Mr. Asquith did not stand alone; there was a veritable chorus of leaders and leading statesmen on both sides of the British House declaring their recognition of the soundness of the doctrine that the right hon. gentleman was laying down, and Mr. Asquith's statement came as the crowning of what they had all said. And what did Mr. Asquith say? I quote from the British Hansard:

> I will add, although I will not make any detailed statement upon that point at this moment—that side by side with this growing participation in the active burdens of the Empire, on the part of our Dominions there rests with us undoubtedly the duty of making such response as we can to their obviously reasonable appeal that they should be entitled to be heard in the determination of the policy and in the direction of Imperial affairs. I do not say it would be wrong to state—of course Mr. Borden and his colleagues would be the first to disclaim any desire for any such declaration, but I do not say in what shape or by what machinery that great purpose is to be obtained. Arrangements like that cannot be made in a day. They must be the result of mature deliberation and thought; they will probably have to develop from time to time—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will show the hon. gentleman how they have developed from time to time. There was a period of time filled with great events between 1912 and 1921. Mr. Asquith continues:

> — but without committing ourselves in any degree to particular forms in the matter, we share with our great Dominions the feeling which has become more and more conscious and articulate as years have gone on throughout the Empire, that we have a common heritage and interests, and that in the enjoyment of that heritage, and in the discharge of the duties which those interests involve, we ought more and more to be conscious partners with one another.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear. Fine words.

Mr. DOHERTY: As the then Prime Minister of Great Britain foresaw, time has done its developing work. The hon. gentleman—I should say the hon. gentlemen, for the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) insists upon being included—seem to be singularly blind to what is going on around them. They have not seen this developing work of time in which their late leader had so implicit a faith. They do not seem to have the aspirations that he had. They want to see their Canada always, shall I say, in her swaddling clothes?—Perhaps that would be carrying things too far; but however she may grow, whatever years she may attain, whatever achievements may be to her credit, however perfectly she may have fitted herself for her role amongst her sister nations, they want to see her with her fingers grasping close her mother's apron strings and clamouring to be kept in the nursery. High ambition, lofty ideal, for Canadians to hold! Surely the hon. gentlemen, who after all, I know have good Canadian hearts, will some day wake up, will some day escape from their Egyptian darkness which seems to surround them and precludes their seeing their country's growth. I spoke of their being in Egyptian darkness. Is this blindness of theirs perhaps not more attributable to the very dazzling nature of the light that shines upon this country and shows her forth to the world's nations as a nation standing on a footing of equality amongst the nations of the British Commonwealth? Is is not rather that, on account of their having accustomed themselves to live in the darkness of that colonial condition, the light appears to be too much for their unaccustomed eyes, and just because the evidence is too conclusive, because the light shines too brilliantly, they seem incapable of seeing?

I have said that through those years there have been developments. Certainly a great change operated from the day of the British Prime Minister's declaration cited by the hon. gentlemen in which he pooh-poohed the possibility of the Dominions standing recognized as sister nations, to the day when another Prime Minister of Great Britain, introducing the representatives of those sister nations into the society of nations, first at the Paris conference and in the League that was subsequently constituted, said, mincing no words: "Why, Sir, these are practically independent nations." There is a long gap between those two declarations, and evidently the moving hand of time of which Mr. Asquith spoke in 1912 had not stopped but had continued to move during that period. What is the evidence that has satisfied the world of Canada's national status and that has left unconvinced no one but a few—I sincerely believe they are becoming fewer—people in Canada who persist in turning their eyes away from the light? It is not my habit, nor my practice, to try to search out men's motives; I am satisfied to judge their actions, and as I have said, I believe that these hon. gentlemen have good Canadian hearts. I can only wish them a better intellectual eyesight.

What is the position to-day? Every statesman of the United Kingdom recognizes that this Empire is made up of different, distinct, self-governing nations, and that it takes all of them to make the great commonwealth which is called the Empire; that there belongs to no one of those nations the right of domination over the other; that there belongs not even to a majority of those nations the right to dominate over any one or more of them. We have found a better method for binding together those nations of the great British Commonwealth, because, bear in mind that I have made no suggestion that Canada or any one of the other Dominions is a nation outside of the British Empire. I have heard the hon. gentleman many and many a time in eloquent periods protest his devotion to the maintenance of that great commonwealth, and so far as those expressions go, I have no desire to differ with him. There is in what I am saying no suggestion of any separation from the great Empire which really would be dislocated if one of these members should abandon it, and I am not talking of that; but I am trying to bring to the mind of the hon. gentleman just what that Empire is, and it is that partnership to which the Hon. Mr. Asquith aspired in the words that I have quoted. Surely we stand to-day, by common acknowledgment of the statesmen not only of the other Dominions, but of the United Kingdom itself, nations each equal in status with every other.

I do not think I need labour that further. Why did His Majesty, when he was called upon to sign the peace treaty and wanted to bind his entire Empire, sign that Treaty distinctly on behalf of Canada, distinctly on behalf of Australia, distinctly on behalf of South Africa, distinctly on behalf of New Zealand? Why did he consider that he should not impose that signature until he had the advice of his ministers of those respective countries? Simply because what was needed was the Empire's signature, and you would not have the Empire's signature when you had the signature of but one of the nations if you had not the signatures of all the nations that went to make up that Empire. Can there be any more outstanding act that His Majesty is ever called upon to do on behalf of this Empire than the signing of a treaty of that import? Why, too, when the nations proceeded to form their Assembly of Nations, did they welcome Canada as one amongst them? Why, when they convened their Assembly of the League of Nations, did they summon Canada to be present? Why did they receive her delegates on a footing of equality with the delegates of the greatest States of this world? Why did they, whatever may have been the value of what those delegates had to say, listen with respect to the voice of Canada? The answer is obvious. Nothing of that kind could have happened if they at all events had not differed from my hon. friend as to Canada's status. And now the hon. gentleman finds a reason why we are not a nation. It is because we are not performing all the actions of nations. He says—just listen, because it is so conclusive and so convincing! Why, he says, you have not got any consular offices. A new addition to the essentials of national existence! Because Canada has not felt the need of consular offices, because, having this big sister nation, which, by reason of its manifold interests, requires such offices all over the world and is willing to give Canada the service of those offices whenever she may have an interest calling for representation in those countries—because under those circumstances Canada does not seek to provide herself with consular offices, then, forsooth, Canada has gone back to her colonial status! Having given us this conclusive reason, what is the next thing the hon. gentleman proceeds to do? He directs an attack upon this Government for having sought to provide for diplomatic representation at Washington. Very consistent! We are not a nation because we have not got consular offices; the one thing he is able to point out as lacking to our national status is that we should have consular offices; but so determined is he that we should not complete the national status that he makes an onslaught upon us for having had the ambition to provide for a diplomatic representative at Washington, the country where we have the greatest occasion for representation, the country with whom our relationships are such that we may be said, without exaggeration, to be in constant communication with regard to matters of a kind that, where we have no diplomatic representative, have to be communicated through the office in Great Britain and communicated back through that office, and through the British Ambassador to us. The hon. gentleman waxes indignant because we sought to remedy that state of affairs. Is it that he is afraid that he may be deprived of the last shred of argument that he could invoke to deny the status of his own country, to humiliate her and keep her back among the growing children who have not yet reached the status of manhood or womanhood and are not yet qualified to take their place among their adult companions in the great body of the world's nations?

Then, my hon. friend and the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) raised the ghost that we thought had long since been laid, the ghost with which they seek to terrorize the people of Canada, the ghost of some central organization that must necessarily be brought into existence and have conferred upon it a power to dominate Canada if Canada ventures to assert her national status. Outside of the imagination of these hon. gentlemen, where can we find evidence of any such danger as that? Who is preaching to-day the creation of a central organization to dominate this Dominion?

[Mr. Doherty.]

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Lord Burnham and Lord Cave.

Mr. DOHERTY: If Lord Burnham and Lord Cave are preaching such a doctrine, let me again point out that we on this side of the House are not like my hon. friend. We do not say: Lord Burnham and Lord Cave have said so; therefore, Canada, bow down.

Mr. BELAND: We do not say that either.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have our say. Let me just read to the hon. gentleman what somebody who has more to say about the matter than Lord Burnham or Lord Cave, so far as Canada is concerned, had to say the other day in our good city of Montreal. Speaking on this question of Imperial relations, he said:

> Let us keep on the way we are going and let brotherly love continue. I have never been a believer in abrupt constitutional change. The elevation of our status as a British nation has through all the years been a matter of growth rather than of change, and so it will always be.
> There are those who are continually seeing trouble in our Imperial relations, and who pretend to be in terror lest we lose our autonomy. There is no more danger of the loss of our autonomy than there is of the loss of our atmosphere. Don't let us be frightened by ghosts, especially homemade ghosts, born and re-born, exhibited and re-exhibited wholly for political purposes. One political leader of the present time—he does not live in Montreal—puts a declamation into every speech against what he calls Imperial Centralization. I don't konw anyone with the slightest influence either here or anywhere else who wants Imperial Centralization.

He was apparently not as intimate with the noble lords as my two distinguished friends. He went on:

> It is a long, long time since, any such system was even seriously talked of, and no one has done more to make anything like centralized control forever impossible and to point a more excellent way to the British family of nations than has the man who led this country through the war, whose principle of full autonomy I adhered to then and sanction now. Perhaps the necessity of an issue is father to the thought, but there are some whose fear of centralization is the greater the farther we get from it.

Those are the words of the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country, speaking the unanimous opinion of the men who sit behind him. Will the hon. gentlemen now stop being afraid of ghosts?

They tell us they do not want Imperial centralization. Here is the declaration from the authorized voice which speaks for this side of the House. Why are gentlemen so afraid? But perhaps before proceeding further I might remark that when one insists on remaining in the nursery one is likely to lack confidence in what oneself may do by way of protection from dangers real or apprehended. But those of us who have been proud to step out into the open field of Canada's nationhood trust to ourselves for our own protection from any threatened interference with our autonomy, if there be any such threat. And let me add that I am not aware of the statements of Lord Cave or Lord Burnham, but I have heard statesmen occupying,—with all respect to those particular gentlemen—much more prominent and much more influential positions in the Government of the British Empire, and I have heard them, not once but time and time again—and you may find their declarations in the newspapers — repudiating the idea of any such ambition. Let hon. gentlemen not be afraid; let them gather their courage together.

Mr. BELAND: We do not lack that.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then what is it that you lack?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The facts.

Mr. BELAND: Nothing else.

Mr. DOHERTY: The facts? We have not a Consular office at Washington; we did try to have a minister there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You won't have it; you cannot get it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that we cannot get it. (Let me say in parenthesis that that last statement I know to be unfounded; but let us suppose it to be true). The hon. gentleman will have no nationhood because we have not that thing which he denounces as something disastrous for Canada to have. The logic, of course, is absolutely conclusive.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Don't twist.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, if the hon. gentleman is not afraid, then we may take it that the ghost has disappeared and the central organization has no terrors for him; and there is nothing left now but the fact that we might have a representative at Washington. I am not sure whether he is afraid of our having one, or of the possibility that we might not; there is some doubt on that score.

Now, to pass from this matter, which I must apologize for having given so much time to; my excuse is that I have regard for the hon. gentleman and would be glad to see him come out from the ways of darkness and walk with us in the paths of light; I feel he could do a valuable service to this young nation if he only would have the faith to believe in it. The measure of Canada's nationhood is just the measure of the determination of her children to see that she has that nationhood; and if we fail in that respect it will be because the adversaries of Canada's nationhood, who are to be found only in Canada, will have succeeded, will have triumphed, will have overturned the facts by their misinterpretation of them. Canada's nationhood has no enemies outside of Canada; it is not questioned abroad; we have to come to Canada to find the thing put in question. Why, if I wanted to refer to past things, I might just mention that when in the United States Congress men were looking round for arguments against Canada's right to stand among the nations, and to have her vote cast in the assembly of those nations, having sought the world over, one of them at all events was able to find but one argument, and it was in the speech of an hon. member of this House. If hon. gentlemen are proud of that role I do not envy them their conception of what is a proper subject of pride.

And now, to come to this proposition upon which the hon. gentleman hung his observations about Canada's nationhood and of which he profited as an opportunity to add his further little effort to defeat Canada's nationhood, that is, the proposition that because there is to be what he terms an Imperial Conference in June of this year therefore we ought to have a general election. I appreciate the value of the argument in so far as it is evidence that the hon. gentleman recognizes that what had been, until he made his speech, put forward as an argument, was in fact so utterly insufficient that he must go out looking for an additional reason. But it will not take a great deal of time to show that this second argument that has been brought up as a reinforcement of the failing argument advanced in support of this motion is weaker even than the beaten reason to whose reinforcement it has been called. The hon. gentleman says that because there is going to be what he describes as an Imperial Conference we must have a general election. There have been Imperial Conferences in the past; they were attended not only by the leader of our most recent Government, the right hon. member for King's, (Sir Robert Borden), but during a series of years in different sessions they were attended by the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the former leader of my hon. friends opposite, and a great Canadian whose memory we all of us respect. Did he go to the country every time he was going to attend an Imperial Conference? I do not think hon. gentlemen would be able to point to one instance in which he did. The last occasion I remember was during the sesion of 1911 when the House adjourned in order that the then Prime Minister might attend an Imperial Conference. Was any voice raised then to suggest that there was need of going to the country before the right hon. gentleman proceeded to the Imperial Conference? It is true—and I shall have something to say on this later on—that at that very time members of this House were arguing that there was reason to go to the country. But they stopped that very argument and suspended discussion of the matter in order to allow the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier to go and attend the Imperial Conference. And that was not the only Imperial Conference which the right hon. gentleman attended. If I remember rightly, he attended three; at all events he attended more than one, and he never went to the country before going to any Conference. The reason was obvious. In that, as in many other things, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right and the Parliament of that day was absolutely right. Why should his going to an Imperial Conference involve his having a general election first? In the first place, let me say to the hon. gentleman that what is going to take place in June is not an Imperial Conference, although I am quite willing, for the purpose of this argument, that he should regard it as such. As a matter of fact, it will be a meeting of Prime Ministers to talk over and discuss matters. It is not, nor would an Imperial Conference be, a body whose decisions would bind any country represented at it.

Everybody who knows what the Imperial Conference is—and this, as I have said, is not even an Imperial Conference—knows that no country was ever bound by anything that transpired at it; that if the parties attending that conference did, as between themselves, come to a mutual agreement that a certain course would be desirable, all that could follow from it could be that the representative of each country would go back home and report—submit his report first to the government of his country, and that government, if it approved, would submit to the national Parliament the suggested plans or projects that may have been considered and may have been agreed to at such conference. Why, we have an outstanding instance of that in the conference of 1912 where the Prime Minister of that day came back from the conference and laid before this House a project, and that project failed entirely of effect because the other Chamber of this Parliament declined to approve of it. Why then the need of going to the country before the Prime Minister can talk over with these other Prime Ministers things that may be proposed, not things that shall be done? I think the hon. gentleman himself will appreciate that if out of that conference there should grow anything that would call for a decision by the people of this country, the only proper time to go to the people upon questions of that sort would be when the Prime Minister had taken the responsibility of asking the Canadian Parliament to take some action with regard to it. I am not now going to discuss whether it would or would not, under those circumstances be necessary or desirable to go to the country. That would depend almost entirely—very largely at all events —upon what the nature of the proposition would be; but to suggest that, contrary to all precedent, this House should now declare that the Prime Minister cannot go to England to talk over and discuss with the other prime ministers of the different nations of this Empire what might be in their mutual interest and what would be a desirable course for each of them to adopt, without first dissolving this House and going to the country, is, I think, carrying the search for reasons to bolster up an unsustainable proposition to the extreme limit to which such a search can be carried. It seems to me it would not be unfair to speak of my hon. friend's position, in so far as he grasps at that contention, as the desperate grasping at a straw by the drowning man who finds that the plank to which he had entrusted himself has failed.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend will, I am sure, allow me to ask a question?

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am sure that my hon. friend does not want to give a different interpretation from what I said about the next conference. I said that if the Prime Minister of Canada was going to a conference, where he is to discuss—according to despatches which have been published of late—the share that Canada must take in the naval defence of the Empire, surely that was such an important question that he should get a mandate from the people. That is what I suggested.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. and learned friend when he does not rely upon his imagination for establishing the facts upon which he bases his conclusions falls back upon that substantial basis, "what the newspapers say about current events." As I have already stated, whatever the newspapers may say, this meeting of Prime Ministers is not going to decide anything which will bind any country. Whether they will talk about Imperial defence I am not in a position to say; but whatever may be talked about there, let the hon. gentleman possess his soul in calm—nothing will be done there that will bind Canada. From the very nature of things nothing can be done there that will bind Canada; the whole thing is purely consultative.

During the hon. gentleman's references to our providing for a minister at Washington—I do not know whether he fears we shall or shall not take that course—he went on to make some allusion to the question of water being taken from the Great Lakes for the Chicago ship canal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: From Lake Michigan.

Mr. DOHERTY: Very well, from Lake Michigan for the Chicago Ship Canal. My hon. friend seemed to think that if we had a minister at Washington the water would be taken away, but that if it were not a minister but a commissioner, then the water would not be taken away. Let us be serious.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Oh yes, let us be serious.

Mr. DOHERTY: I can only pray in the interests of my own seriousness that I may not so often be led into temptation as I have been by the speech of the hon. gentleman, to turn the other way. If we had a minister it would be part of his duties to watch what was going on at Washington; and, just as, no doubt, the British ambassador in fulfilling his function watches in the general interest of the Empire what is going on in the United States, so our minister would watch those things in the general interest of Canada. Let the hon. gentleman possess his soul in patience. On a previous occasion when there was a question of the taking of part of the flow from international waters, the government that was then in power of which the right hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) was leader, saw to it that the interests of Canada were protected and defended; and since then those interests have been defended before the proper tribunal charged with dealing with the matter. If danger comes again whether we have a minister at Washington or whether we have not, we will find a method, of protecting the interests of Canada.

The hon. gentleman went on to refer—but the bearing was never quite clear to me—to the Geneva Assembly and to the League of Nations, and uttered something in the nature of a protest about Canada taking her part in that Assembly. He said that we should look after domestic interests and concern ourselves with our relations with the country that is immediately adjacent to us. Of course we should and of course we shall. Does the hon. gentleman think that because we perform one duty we are paralyzed from performing any other? Does the hon. gentleman suggest that we have not an idea of the relative importance of things? Who on this side of the House has ever suggested that we should abandon the interests of Canada in order, through the operation of the League of Nations, to look after the interests of the world? We believe that it is possible to carry out our first duties—duties that have to do with our own country at home—and also to attend to those duties which our relations to our immediate neighbour may impose upon us and which may be more important than our share in the work of the League and still to do that share. The Government of Canada—prides itself—no it does not pride itself; but it does believe that Canadians, and Canadian public men from whatever party they come who may be charged with the responsibility of the protection of Canada's interests, will be able to take care of those interests in their entirety, and at the same time fulfil every duty that may rightly be incumbent on her. Let not the hon. gentleman fear that we are going to sacrifice the interests of our nation because we are interested in the affairs of other nations; let him not suggest that we should fail to do our reasonable part to contribute to the preservation of the world's peace, and to make successfully workable this great instrument upon whose success so much depends for humanity in general and for ourselves as forming a part of that humanity; let him not suggest we should abstain from doing our reasonable part to keep Canada in a position in which she may not suffer the reproach that she alone among the nations did not interest herself in that which makes for the common good of the world; let him not be afraid that because we are prepared to do our duty in that regard we are therefore going to expose the interests of this our own nation of which we are so proud.

Now, let me come to what the hon. gentleman attempted to say in support of the general proposition that this amendment was called for because the continued existence of this Parliament and of this Government was a violation of every constitutional principle. It is a very long time since I have had the pleasure—we will call it pleasure—of listening to so much variegated and strong language and so many rash assertions, made and repeated as though the makers and repeaters of them had an absolute conviction of the efficacy of the rule lately laid down by a distinguished American politician—that the one way to get a statement accepted is to make no effort to prove it, but to just throw it out and keep repeating it and getting it repeated, until finally you say: well, of course, nobody argues anything against that; it is obvious.

Our distinguished friends on the other side, starting with their leader, have told us that the war being over the remaining in office of this Government is a breach of the British constitution, and that if we do not hurry up and go to the people to-morrow that breach would hardly be reparable. They advanced reasons in support of this, citing the fact that one gentleman in Great Britain went to the country because the by-elections had been going against him; and that another gentleman who argued against the proposition at that time, had argued in favour of it when he happened to be in Opposition at another time. And, faithful to the colonial aspirations which distinguish my hon. friends on the other side, they threw at us those isolated facts as conclusive evidence that that was the spirit of the British constitution; some of them even waxed eloquent about a government " of the people, by the people, and for the people "; and, of course, as we all know, they were quoting Abraham Lincoln; and then they concluded that this House ought to dissolve to-morrow.

I wonder if the hon. gentlemen have forgotten that the very essence of the British constitution is parliamentary government. In the sense which the hon. gentlemen are clamouring for, the British constitution does not provide for government by the people; it provides for government by the people's representatives, and it determines, according to the laws of the different countries, for what period of time the mandate shall be conferred upon the members of Parliament. Because, mind you, we have heard a great deal of talk about the mandate of this Government and the mandate of that Government coming directly from the people. That is an expression used at different times, but people who understand know that it is purely figurative. The mandate that the elector gives is a mandate to the member of Parliament. And my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition seemed to think it necessary to carry us back to very ancient times for the purpose of telling us that there existed a legal remedy known as quo warranto—a remedy that exists to-day just as it has always existed —and he went on to say that by that great writ a man holding office was called upon to say by what warrant he held his office. My hon. friend then suggested that if a writ of quo warranto went to this Government it would be powerless to make a conclusive answer.

Why, if any such writ came demanding, just as the hon. gentleman with eloquent reiteration demands, by what right we are sitting here, we at once tell him: By the authority of those two bodies—if I may apply the expression to both of them—by whose authority alone any Government can hold power; we sit here by right of the fact that the Prime Minister of this country to-day, being called upon by the representative of the Sovereign to form a Government, that is to say, enjoying the confidence of the Sovereign, found that selection ratified by an expression of confidence of the majority of the Parliament of this country. There is no other warrant by which any man can hold the office of Prime Minister, there is no other warrant by which any man can be justified in occupying a position as a member of the Cabinet in any Government. All this elaboration and discussion about a mandate to the Government led by the right hon. member for Kings, (Sir Robert Borden), as distinguished from a mandate to the Government led by the right hon. gentleman who now leads it, is all built upon theories elaborated in the imaginations of the hon. gentlemen who set them forth.

I shall not go into any examination of authorities on a question of that kind. Anybody, I venture to say, who knows anything about—I do not say the letter, but the spirit of the British constitution, "the spirit that giveth life", as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition knows—is aware that the great distinctive feature of the British constitution which differentiates it from all those constitutions which have not directly and without distinction followed it, is the fact that its centre is the principle of parliamentary government, and that under it the great power is the Parliament of the country.

Now, there is no doubt that the parliament of the country takes its authority from the people, but it takes the authority that the people give it, and when the people vote for a member of parliament they vote for a man whom they are willing to charge with the function of governing during the period for which the law and the constitution provide; whom they are willing to trust in regard to what may arise during that period and charge with the responsibility of dealing with it. They give him a mandate—a mandate that has to run during a fixed period, unless in the interval a Government having the confidence of the majority of parliament comes to the conclusion that by reason of some great and new question that has arisen, or possibly, by reason of some crisis that the country is facing, it is desirable and necessary that there shall be a dissolution. But a Government that is to pronounce upon that is a Government that has the confidence of a majority of this Parliament. So long, therefore, as a majority of this Parliament stands in agreement to give its confidence to a Government the leader of which the Crown has reposed its confidence in by calling upon him to form a ministry, you have the government contemplated by the British constitution. And there are reasons for that which have no connection with a desire to cling to power and all the other sordid motives which the hon. gentleman attributed to us the other evening and poured out in the series of more or less meaningless invectives with which he closed his speech. One of the great benefits, one of the great advantages, of the British constitution, is the stability that it gives to the country. The British constitution never contemplated that the electors were going to select representatives so unfit to cope with the problems that might arise that as each particular question came up they would have to run back to the people to find out what the people wanted. The people elected men in whom they had confidence and charged them with the responsibility of dealing with the situations that might present themselves. We would afford a sorry spectacle if we should accept and act upon the doctrine of unconstitutionality which has been preached, with the result that we should have a series of powerless, spineless, irresponsible parliaments—parliaments composed of men who, though seeing before them clearly the course which their duty called upon them to follow, would not have had the courage to form their own decision and courageously follow that course, but would say "Oh, no, I had not thought of that at the last election and I did not talk about it; let me run back to the people and find out whether or not, perchance, there is at this moment some wave of public feeling that may run counter to that: to me the course is clear as to what is best for the country, but I do not care for that. I am the man who was charged with the duty of doing what I conscientiously believed to be best for the country, but that is nothing to me; perhaps there is some current of public opinion running counter; it may turn and run in the other direction to-morrow; let me hurry and get there before the current changes." That is not the British conception of government; that is not the British conception of parliament.

The hon. leader of the Opposition went over a whole list of countries that had had elections since the conclusion of the war and wanted to know whether the people of Canada were so inferior to the people of those countries that they should not be gratified with having an election. Well, in the first place, in the case of most of these countries the election was held because the parliamentary term had expired. In the case of the United States, the election was held because the constitution said that they should have an election at that particular time. Let me, in parenthesis, referring to this country where there is government "of the people, by the people and for the people." point to the fact that the people in November declared their absolute want of confidence in the existing government of the United States and that that government is carrying on still. That is according to their constitution; ours is a vast improvement on that, no doubt. I mention it only as showing how figurative all these words are.

I had said that I would not cite authorities. Let me make one exception. I shall not delve into the past; anyone who will study the works of the men who were the real authors of this Constitution may see for themselves. In that connection I would ask my hon. friend, who shares with me, if I may judge from the citations he so frequently makes from his writings and speeches, a high admiration for that eminent statesman who had much to do with the building up of the British Constitution, Edmund Burke — I would ask him to read his work and see what the constitutional system of government is under the British Constitution. Last session someone did say that Burke had gone out of fashion; that his ideas were, as John P. Robinson said, "exploded idees." I shall not go back to that, but I will read the statements of one gentleman, a statesman of our own country, who said, referring to this very question:

I take issue with my hon. friend from North Toronto and my hon. friend from Brandon when they tell us that the Parliament of Canada is debarred from dealing with any question which has not been discussed at the previous general election.

Just note the contention that is made here.

That is not in accord with the constitutional history of Great Britain or of Canada either, as I have read it. Let me ask my hon. friends what mandate had the Government of Lord Elgin in 1853, when it went to Washington to obtain Reciprocity? Had that question ever been put before the people? Had it been an issue the last time the people's representatives had gone before them? Not at all. Let me ask, further, what mandate had the Government in 1864 to put through Parliament the resolution which proposed Confederation? Had the question of Confederation ever been put before the people of United Canada? No, not a word about it had ever been heard. The only question then raised was that of representation by population.

Just as we are told now that the only question in the last election was the carrying on of the war.

Yet the Government of Sir John Macdonald and the Hon. George Brown—because the two were united on that occasion—brought in a resolution which was nothing more nor less than a complete transformation of our then condition. When Canada assented in 1871 to the Fishery stipulation in the Washington Treaty of that year, had that question ever been put before the people? No, it was unknown to them. It never had been debated before.

I am sorry that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not here; it might do him good to hear this.

In the face, therefore, of these precedents, it is childish for any man to challenge the right of this Government to follow the course it is doing.

If my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition were here he would sit back scandalized—scandalized as he is at this Government to-day. He would sit back, no doubt, and say to us: What office-holders; what men among those who love the loaves and the fishes, who make broad their phylacteries, who enlarge the borders of their garments, who love the uppermost rooms at feasts and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the marketplace, — who make clean the outside of the cup and platter and within are full of extortions and excess; — what man of this description is it that uttered the words I have just been listening to?—Tell me that I may pour out upon his devoted head the vials of my indignation, that I may search the Scriptures to find, if possible, even additional expressions of Scriptural vituperation with which I may forever confound the name and memory of that unworthy man, that officeholder, that clinger-on to office, that lover of the loaves and fishes and all the rest of it. And, of course, I would give him a little time so that he might, in some degree regain his calm, his selfcontrol, and be able to restrain himself, and then I would tell him that the man who pronounced those words, the man who followed that doctrine consistently throughout his life, was that great Canadian statesman, the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. whose successor the leader of the Opposition of to-day is; the man of whom I fancy the proudest thing that the present Opposition leader has to say for himself is that he was this man's devoted follower through many years; the man with regard to whom we are all prepared to say that, whatever may have been our differences with him, we respected and admired him and we especially recognized in him a distinguished authority upon constitutional questions of this kind.

I do not think I need go further to make the justification from the constitutional point of view of the position of the present Prime Minister and of this Government in refusing to be stampeded into a general election. We have a duty to do. The public of this country gave us a mandate and imposed a duty upon us, and that mandate was and that duty was to protect the interests of Canada to the best of our judgment and our capacity, until the time should come when our mandate expired under the law or when in our honest conviction the interests of the country called for a change, not merely in the Government, but in the Parliament of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite have cast insult and slur upon this Government. Do they realise that they are casting insult and slur upon every member of this Parliament? This Government is not here of its own volition; it is here because it possesses the confidence of the majority of this Parliament, and because the majority of this Parliament is convinced that the moment has not come when they would be justified in surrendering the mandate that the people gave them, when they would be justified in departing from the performance of the duty that the people, when they gave their representatives the mandate, imposed upon them.

"But," we are told, "there have been by-elections, and the by-elections are going against you and they show that the public has no confidence in you." And we were referred to a list of by-elections as establishing conclusively a complete overturn in public opinion in this country. Just let us look at those by-elections for a moment. We were told that there were seventeen by-elections, in which five Liberals, and five supporters of this or the preceding Government, were re-elected. As regards those constituencies, surely we have conclusive evidence that there is absolutely no change of opinion in those constituencies from the opinion that prevailed in 1917. As regards them we are asked to say that we have lost the confidence of the public because the people who always voted against this Government are voting against it still. As regards those constituencies, the position is absolutely identical with what it was when this House was elected. What is left? With regard to constituencies in which there has been a change, let me in the first place point out that there has been no change in the direction of the party led by the leader of the Opposition, save in one case where he succeeded in getting a minority, a small minority comparatively, of the total vote of the constituency, placed in such a favourable position that it was able to say who should be the member. As regards the other constituencies they all went to gentlemen desirious of securing special representation for a special class in this Parliament. We have yet to have any evidence that the electors who elected them elected them because they wanted a dissolution of this Parliament. All that the election of those gentlemen established is that the electors of those constituencies thought it was desirable that there should be in this House greater representation of the particular class to which they belonged. I have not heard it said that in any of those elections—Certainly it has not been said that in all those elections, the dissolution of this House was made an issue.

So, what is the proposition? Because there are six constituencies in this country which have pronounced their adherence to a party that was not in existence in 1917, you have to asume that there is so violent and widespread a change in the opinions of the electorate of this country that this House, having barely completed its third year, should immediately dissolve. Can any proposition be more utterly without of foundation?

Then, there is the one constituency to which I have referred, which had not supported the Opposition party in 1917, a constituency which has returned, by a minority vote, an adherent of the Liberal party. I would just like to call attention to that election, in the first place from the point of view of its bearing upon this vote which we are about to take, and in the second place from the point of view of the light it throws upon the sincerity of those who are here professing to want an election. In the first place, what is the lesson of that election? The one clear lesson that results from that election is that the overwhelming majority of the people of Peterborough, whatever else they do or do not want, do not want an election. Let me explain why. Who precipitated that election and upon what issue? There was in this House a man to whom we must pay the tribute that he sincerely wanted an election, and he gave his proof,—he took his political life in his hands. He went out to the people of Peterborough and he asked them for an endorsement of the proposition that we ought to have an election now. How many votes did he get and how many people voted against that man who had made the issue, thus making it clear that they did not want an election? There were altogether something like 12,800 votes cast, and how many of them said they wanted an election? The figures show that: 2,595 electors in Peterborough wanted an election; 4,093 said: We do not want an election, we are out to fight the man who raised the standard of a new election, we want him defeated, what we want is a Liberal member in this existing House; 2,811 said we do not want an election, we want a member in this existing House to support the present Government; 2,319 said: We do not want an election, get out and beat that man Burnham, we want a Farmer member in this existing house; 1,103 said the same thing, we do not want an election; we will not follow the standard of the man who made this election necessary; we want a Labour member in this House. The result was that you had 8,828 voters in Peterborough who upon the issue: Election or no election, said: We do not want an election; there is something else we want more. You had only 2,595 who said they wanted an election.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very strong.

Mr. DOHERTY: And then hon. gentlemen opposite come here and say: Here is the evidence that the people of Canada are clamouring for an election. Why, two-thirds of the people of Peterborough would rather have something else than an election.

Mr. BELAND: What about the supporters of Mr. Gordon?

Mr. DOOHERTY: They have been voiceless on the subject of whether they wanted an election. All I know is that they wanted elected, at the risk of defeating the man who raised the standard of an election or no election, a Liberal member to sit in this House.

Mr. BELAND: He will tell us when he comes.

Mr. DOHERTY: Probably he will. When he gets here, he will probably be anxious to forget the platform upon which he stood, and the speeches which he made. Probably he will be anxious to have us all forget how very far away he has got from the platform of 1919 which my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) showed us—with the book closed—last night; he was very careful to make no reference to that platform, which all hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have got so far away from and of which the hon. leader of the Opposition is so thoroughly ashamed that when he comes to meet this House, not being able to reconcile the speeches for and the speeches against that platform which he has made on his tour, swaying from one side to the other as he passed from one constituency to another, that he simply takes refuge behind his amendment as if he were saying to himself: Well, as a result of all these things I have said, I have got the cards so hopelessly muddled that I do not think there is anything for it but to call for a new deal.

[Mr. Doherty.]

The Peterborough election also throws a light on the sincerity of this present clamour among hon. gentlemen opposite for an election. The hon. leader of the Opposition has said: The one thing necessary to the salvation of this country to-day is an election; I am here to turn out the Government for the sake of getting an election to-day. But what did he do when he learned that somebody with that doctrine as his sole doctrine, somebody willing to put aside all questions of party differences had nailed to the mast the standard of an immediate election, and had gone out and asked the Peterborough electors to endorse his stand? Of course, this hon. gentleman, sincere believer in an immediate election as the one salvation of Canada, rallied to the support of that man. Of course he said: Shame on the man who talks party politics, shame on the man who would divide the people in the face of this supreme issue,—the one great object is to have an election to-day; gather your forces together, and let us, all who want a general election, vote together so that our votes may be effective. That is what you would expect if you did not know the leader of His Majesty's Opposition; but knowing the leader of His Majesty's Opposition, you were not disappointed when you saw him call for his horses and call for his men, and organize his party to go out and make war on the man who had ventured to say we ought to have an election. What a light that election throws on the sincerity of this clamour for an election! This House is asked to say that the great paramount issue is an election or no election, that on its decision the salvation of this country, nay, perhaps more than that, the integrity of the British constitution depends. We on this side of the House who may in the past have belonged to different parties are appealed to to sink every consideration other than that, and vote in order that the country may be saved by a new election; and we are so asked by men fresh from the fray, glorying in their success over the man who preached the doctrine of an immediate election. I ask you now, how much faith can you put in the sincerity of this amendment?

I should hardly perhaps go back to them, because they are so insignificant, but the hon. member for Maisonneuve gave some considerations about the requisitioning of our ships during the war, about the cattle embargo, about the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine carrying the Canadian ensign, and about some difficulty with respect the the Gold Coast and Nigeria, all bearing upon our not being a nation.

As to the ships requisitioned in the war, the Canadian nation requisitioned her ships and put them at the service of the Allied nations, just as the Canadian nation sent her boys to fight for the common cause. I ask you in what respect that derogates from our national independence. As to the cattle embargo, I give that up. That you can find in the cattle embargo—that is, in one nation of this Empire, for its own protection, even as against other nations of the Empire putting on an embargo—any evidence that we are not distinct nations rather puzzles me. If anything, I should think it was evidence that we are distinct nations. Then we are asked, why do the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine now carry the Canadian ensign when the Niobe was not allowed to do so two years ago. I do not know it to be a fact, but I would say it is only a further evidence of the development to which I have pointed. We have privileges to-day that we did not have nine or ten years ago, and surely this only goes to show the development of our recognition as a nation. As to the Gold Coast and Nigeria, had the hon. gentleman paid attention he would have seen that in the item referring to the difficulty of our directly negotiating with them, it was pointed out that Canada had outgrown these limitations which rest on the other parts of the Empire, but that Nigeria and the Gold Coast find themselves tied up, so it was not for any want of right on the part of Canada that we could not have gone on. It was, unfortunately, because the Gold Coast and Nigeria, being still Crown colonies, had no right to act on their own behalf. And the very item which the hon. gentleman read pointed out that fact. I have read to the House what Sir Wilfrid Laurier thought on this doctrine of mandates and the power of Parliament to deal with matters that had not been discussed at the general election. I may say that he made these observations in the course of a debate upon Reciprocity during which it did appear to hon. gentlemen then sitting on the other side of the House that there was need for a new election, because there was the proposal of a great new project in which was bound up not only the commercial but the national future of this country. It is true that Sir Wilfrid Laurier ultimately gave an election, but he was careful to tell us in the speech he made, when the motion of closure was before the House, that he did not do so because our doctrine was right. He was very clear on that. He never flinched from the doctrine he laid down, but he told us that we should have the election because we had been naughty boys and had obstructed him. I do not want to express anything of a critical character on this point, but it did look a little like the case of the unjust judge of the Scriptures who yielded to the widow's insistence—not because she was right but because of her importunity. I merely wish to point this out in order that I may not be told that after all he did dissolve Parliament.

Now, in the course of his observations, the hon. member for Maisonneuve gave us several examples of what he considered to be deadly parallels, one of which was that of the Reciprocity debate and another, a parallel with some English election that occurred after the South African war. There, he pointed out, all of the contending parties opposed to the government came together—so differently from the way they did in Peterborough; if the parties here had taken the same course we might have begun to believe in the sincerity of those who are clamouring for a general election. In the meantime I only desire to call attention to the disparity between the two cases. We had another parallel, in which Mr. Asquith made a speech and talked about the policy of his adversaries as being one of zig-zag and—Oh, I have forgotten what else.

Mr. LEMIEUX: See-saw.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell me some of the others. Well, I listened to the hon. gentleman's remarks and then I thought of their application, and I could not help thinking of the clear-cut position taken in the speech from the Throne, and of the variegated policies of the leader of the Opposition and of the fact that, challenged to do it, he absolutely declines to tell us what definite policy, if any, he has. And then I wondered to whom the see-saw and the zig-zag applied. I am like the friend of Antonio in the play, who felt called upon to thank the Jew who had furnished him with the words which he wanted to use: "A very Daniel come to judgment" —a very see-saw and a very zig-zag! I wish the hon. gentleman would tell me the other adjectives, because they are so thoroughly applicable to the line of conduct of his own leader, a line of conduct in which the hon. gentleman apparently so complacently follows him. Mr. Speaker, I feel I should apologize for having devoted so much time in dealing with so small material. However, I have at last finished.

It is a gratification to me to be able, in my closing remarks, to join in one expression of opinion that fell from the lips of the hon. gentleman. He expressed the aspiration for unity among the people of this country. Let me say that in that hope I most heartily and most sincerely join; and I should be taking no risks in saying that all hon. members on this side of the House endorse my sentiments. While we have duties with regard to the peace of the world, duties which we shall be able to perform, and while we have the duty of looking after the material interests of the people of this country, which come before any interests connected with the outside world, I am prepared to agree that we, all of us on both sides of the House, have one first great duty, and that is the duty of each trying to do his part to bring about and increase and preserve a feeling of unity between the different peoples of Canada. In making the eloquent appeal on this subject which he did, the hon. member for Maisonneuve did little more than re-echo the words of the Prime Minister of this Country as he uttered them first at Portage-la-Prairie, then in our good city of Sherbrooke, and also in our better city of Montreal, and as he has tried to send them broadcast throughout this country, extending his voice and hand to greet every man, of whatever class, creed or political party, who is willing to join earnestly in the work of bringing about unity—observe, I do not say uniformity—among the people of this country I need not add anything to the eloquence of the hon. member for Maisonneuve further than to say that I join heartily in the hope he expressed in this respect. I might suggest to him, however, that he be good enough to have a heart to heart talk with some of the gentlemen who sit on the same side of the House with him. I say this in no spirit of criticism, but perhaps to those hon. members he might point out acceptably, if I cannot, that it is not the best way of reaching unity to maintain the determination not to forget things that have happened in the past which largely, through misapprehension on one part or the other, have conduced to destroy the spirit of unity. One hon. gentleman the other evening said he was prepared to forgive but not to forget. I would ask him to think over a little what is the practical value of forgiveness on the part of one who continues to treasure up the memory of what he believes to be a wrong, and who, treasuring up that memory, seeks to keep alive the determination to have satisfaction for the wrong which he believes to have been inflicted. I am not here to plead in condonation of things that may have been wrong from one direction or another and which may have contributed to separate our people. But I am here in all honestly and sincerity to plead for a spirit all round of readiness to forget, asking only to be convinced that there is sincerity to-day in the desire to heal old wounds and to close up the gaps that have been created and that divide our people into different camps.

I appeal to gentlemen on this side as well as to gentlemen opposite to give thought to the necessity of the performance of that great duty of gathering together the Canadian people, and to give thought to what each of one of them may do, even if it involves the forgetting of some things, to bring about that most desirable end. As I have already said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) in making an appeal for unity only re-echoed the words of the right hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) pronounced on different occasions and in different parts of this country. I have before me just a citation from his words on one occasion which I would like to give the House and with which I shall close these altogether too-prolonged observations. Speaking in the City of Montreal on the subjects to which the hon. gentleman referred, the Prime Minister said:

> All I want is a fair field to show, in the practical task of government, that my desire to do something useful in the work of reconciliation is an honest desire, and that what I have already said I mean. Once more I repeat that on this subject I am secure in one regard: In all the years of my public life I have uttered no words that now need to be recalled; nor have I ever been a party to a statute that in a single line was unfair to English or to French. All those who persist in attributing to me the language of prejudice or hostility have for seven months failed to produce a sentence from the record of twelve years to support the calumny and stand today as convicted perverters of the facts.
> I am anxious for a fair distribution of the duties of Government. There is not such a fair distribution today, and my great anxiety is to be certain from week to week that I am not in the smallest degree responsible for a continuance of the unfairness that now exists. I believe also in the fair distribution of public offices of every kind, and I think that both the great races should recognize that a careful adherence to that principle is essential if we are ever going to get along. Such was the conviction and the practice of the best statesmen of the past, and we cannot forget their precepts now.

Here I leave the subject. Recalling the eloquent words of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and calling attention to the equally eloquent words of my leader, I conclude with this appeal: That these words, this seed which they were intending to sow, may not fall upon barren ground but may produce four-fold and four times four-fold.

Let me in conclusion say that there will be one advantage at all events in the defeat of this amendment which I have no doubt will be reached within a few days, that it will afford the right hon. gentleman who leads the House the opportunity of proving the irrefutable truth that the words that he uttered were sincerely and absolutely meant. Let me further appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to be fair, not to lend themselves to the keeping up of enmities and hostilities between our different races, our different peoples, and our different provinces, by attributing to the Prime Minister statements and sentiments which, at all events up to the present, nobody has been able to prove the existence of. I am confident that the people of the province of Quebec—whether they support him politically or are opposed to him—ere long will have the opportunity of realizing that in the present leader of this Government they have no enemy. I have known him since he first came into this House, and he has administered different offices always very closely under my eye. I remember with pride that he was my Solicitor-General and that for years—for some years at all events—I was his chief. I remember with pride now that he occupies to-day the position of my chief, and that I have the privilege and honour of following him. And let me pay him this testimony, as a mere measuring out of simple justice, that throughout my years of intimate relationship with him, I have never been able to discover any small feeling of bigotry, or prejudice, hostility or antipathy, to any class or creed within this Dominion; and above all I have never been able to discern the slightest indication of anything but the most friendly feeling and disposition to my old province of Quebec. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I fancy, will be fair enough to recognize that while they constitute the majority of the representatives from Quebec and while they represent the majority of people of that province, that I too, and my colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), have a claim upon the same province. In our hearts there beats as strong an affection for that old province as exists in the heart of any hon. gentleman sitting opposite, and let me say that imbued with that feeling I would be in the government of no man that was inspired in the slightest degree by any spirit of hostility to the people and the province that I love.

Mr. C. A. FOURNIER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, you will be glad to know that it is not my intention to detain the House beyond a few minutes. The 5 p.m. speech from the Throne with which the session was opened is a beautiful negligible document. And that was to be expected. A Government which has outstayed its mandate and forfeited the confidence of the people, and which continues to cling to office in direct defiance of recognized public sentiment, is not likely to be one to originate or to initiate progressive and vigorous legislation. It is marking time; it is frightened to march forward, it is unwilling to make way. But, Sir, Canada is facing great questions of re-adjustment. There are big and pressing issues to be dealt with; yet if ever in the annals of government there has been an era of ineffective leadership it is at this present juncture. The speech from the Throne makes it abundantly clear that effective leadership cannot be expected from this disintegrated Unionist ministry. The Government has no policy to lay before the people in order to provide for the serious problem of increasing unemployment. The fulfilment of dismal prophecies made during the war has come with the icy blast of winter, and the problem of unemployment finds Canada unprepared. After the last two years of reconstruction the Government throws up its hands in despair, and appeals to the Provincial Governments and local municipalities to find a way out of the difficulty. What has become Mr. Speaker, of all these Commissions, of all these Boards of all sizes, complexions and descriptions that were so much in evidence? The Government has only been feeding parasites to make believe that they were taking steps and precautions in anticipation of the period of economic readjustment. Where are these gentlemen who personally conducted in this House excursions, unfolding to us the beautiful panorama of flaming furnaces, belching smoke-stacks, and happy men at work with full dinner pails? Instead we read the sad story that the dreaded spectre of the soup kitchen has made its appearance. Where is the distinguished gentleman whom we had the pleasure of seeing only twice in this House last session when he had been hurriedly despatched from Toronto headquarters to enrapture us with the delightful strain that, Liberalism meant panic and that Unionism meant prosperity? Why, Mr. Speaker, the last time that hon. gentleman was seen upon the floor of this House—and you remember the occasion?—he was trying to induce us to continue to remain bondsmen of Sir Joseph Flavelle and of Mackenzie and Mann. "Carry on! Carry on!" he said. those were his last words to the Government. That harp has since ceased its strain; and the Government has changed its name. Why, the truth is that—

The harp that once through Parliament's halls,
The soul of prosperity music shed,
Now hangs as mute on Parliament's walls
As if the nightingale from Leeds was dead.

But you have soup kitchens, and the burden is upon the hon. gentlemen opposite to explain the condition of thousands of men begging for work and of reduced wages to those fortunate enough to have employment. This is the melancholy of the acme of the "Carry on" administration.

This debate, Mr. Speaker, has been proceeding for a little time and charming things have been said. We have also witnessed the grotesque performance of a new self-constituted John the Baptist creeping into the National Liberal Conservative desert in search of grasshoppers to alleviate his treacherous hunger. Beautiful addresses also were delivered on the League of nations, or rather the League of Empires. To this subject, I desire to make a slight reference.

I understand very well that the League which we were forced to approve of in this House could not leap full-grown into life, and I became convinced, after reading the speeches of our Canadian representatives which they recently delivered at Geneva, that the League must revise the Treaty or the Treaty will destroy the League. After hearing the addresses of the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and of the hon. gentleman from Durham (Mr. Rowell), although they eloquently stated that the League is to be the greatest forward movement in the world's history, yet it is plain to me that it contains the germ of future wars; and after hearing this afternoon the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), with his habitually lucid explanation, allow me to say, Sir, that the whole subject is darker than ever. The world is offered only an ideal. No word has been so misapplied in recent years as idealism. There is something splendid I grant you, in aspiring to the remote and the unattainable, providing it does not make us contemptuous of the slow steps towards better things that are attainable. But there are many kinds of idealists. Some like Darius Green, make themselves wings and mount to the ridgepole in a glow of aspiration, and leap out quick in the pleasant sunshiny air. But there are other idealists also, and they are of the kind I should like to see at Geneva, idealists more practical, who fashion their wings with due regard for the law of strains and stresses, who have a wholesome respect for the law of gravitation, and who will not mix trading stamps with moral issues. What is the use of sending men to Gevena to talk disarmament when on their return in their own Parliament by their votes they cheer the hearts of munition makers? Just so long as the big Powers who control the Supreme Council of the League retain all the important offices within the constructive programme of the League, and just so long as they will not agree to disarmament, just so long as they will keep on mistrusting one another, just so long as they will refuse to forego national selfishness, the whole thing is—pardon me the expression, Mr. Speaker—"eye-wash." Our representatives will only be enjoying a delightful trip at the expense of the Canadian people, just to have the pleasure of signing their names for Canada on the dotted lines already prepared for them, and the privilege of making speeches, which after all, to my mind, amounts to nothing. Sixty thousand Canadians walked their way to Golgotha and are now sleeping their last sleep on the fields of Flanders, and their actions, Sir, speak louder than all the speeches that can be delivered at Geneva by our representatives. They gave up their lives to end all wars, and what I should like to see, Sir, would be our representatives going to Geneva with a message from the Canadian people to the Supreme Council, which is the mouthpiece of the Great Powers, that they must agree to disarmament in order that Canada may remain true to her pledge to those who fought to end all war. War-making has been the sport of kings and of sporty statesmen, not of the people. It has cost the sportiest kings their jobs, and the world is sick of sporty statesmen.

Sir, we have heard hon. gentlemen opposite offer a defence for their remaining in power. It has been plainly stated from this side of the House that the Government are carrying on without a mandate, and British practices and precedents have been quoted pro and con. I have this to say, Mr. Speaker: This Tory Government and its recent converts profess to find great merit in the so-called Unionist party, comparing it with the British coalition. But let us not forget that in the Mother Country men of all parties formed a real union for the purposes of prosecuting the war. Here, where a different sense of political honour obtains, the combination has been made for the purpose of winning an election. In England no one party accused the other of disloyalty; they did not make a pretence of friendly overtures in order to unite one section of the country against the other. They did not pass a Franchise Act by which they could control the elections. After the armistice there was an election in England; in Canada some of our Unionist gentlemen refuse to go to the people, keeping only their own selfish ends in view. I cannot make references to all these hon. gentlemen one after the other, but you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to pay a little tribute to a gentleman from the prairies, that great Colossus of immigration. I well remember that on the first of May, 1917, the hon. gentleman gave an interview to a Saskatchewan paper with regard to the provision which has been made for free wheat. He said: "Yes, it is great news, and we have to see to it that in the next Parliament we have free everything." At that time everything looked dark and gloomy for the Allied cause. I am not questioning the hon. gentleman's entry into the Cabinet in 1917, but he is the same gentleman who denounced the financial ring of Toronto, denounced the Borden Government as incompetent and retroactive, and denounced in no measured terms the government of "big business." I have said that I shall not comment upon the hon. gentleman's entry into the Cabinet in 1917. But, Sir, in his address in the House on the 11th of June, 1919, he said: "I say if I wanted to make a hero of myself, the road is quite clear to me." But he preferred to remain where he was. You remember, Sir, how tears ran down the cheeks of hon. gentleman when he deliberately sentenced himself to bread crumbs and cold tea in the portfolio of Immigration. In his recent political tour of the West with the right hon. leader of the Government he said, as quoted from the prairies, that he had changed morally and mentally and that he had decided to spend eternity with the monopolists whom he had denounced all his life. Well, what idea can you have of the patriotism of a gentleman who can perform such a somersault? I will not be as severe to him as he was to himself, but allow me to say of him that he was like Hosea Biglow's politician:

A marciful Providence fashioned him holler
O' purpose that he might his principles smaller.

If that is a little too strong, Mr. Speaker, I can give a better one. He at least believes, as Hosea did:

A genuine statesman must be on his guard.
If he must have beliefs, not to believe 'em too hard.

Bismarck used to say that Salisbury was a lath painted to look like iron. The hon. member from Moosejaw (Mr. Calder) is a Tory painted to look like a Liberal—he never was a Liberal; he posed as one. Like the coalitionists under Sir John A. Macdonald who refused to follow George Brown when he withdrew from the coalition, these hon. gentlemen have become reactionaries —makers of franchise Acts and gerrymander Acts.

Some hon. gentlemen have talked of apples and of the tariff, but, Sir, the issue before the House is the preservation of our constitutional treasures, our national heritage, which the Government is unscrupulously pawning every day without authority and without mandate. The issue is the disrespect of our laws, such as is involved in the building of a mercantile marine at a cost of $75,000,000, in connection with which contracts were awarded without tenders. The issue is the vicious railway policy of the Government, which is not established on a business foundation, and which makes the country responsible for the interest on millions of dollars' worth of obligations and deficiency in earnings. The issue is the lavish expenditures for militia purposes, amounting to eighteen or twenty millions of dollars, and the miserable pittance for eighteen small experimental farms. The issue is that the Government has created a paradise for its bosom friends, the profiteers, so that readjustment on a sane basis is practically impossible. The issue is that conscienceless rascals were permitted to accumulate outrageous profits and slip away with the spoils, leaving the business man behind holding the bag. The most discouraging feature of the situation is that a spineless Department of Justice has made it impossible for the irresponsible shoe-string worker to be placed in such a position that he could be made to disgorge. The issue is the Government's scheme to deprive the people of their right to make any gradual political readjustment with due regard to economic conditions between 1911 and such time as they may choose.

Sir, a general election now would bring into Parliament no more representatives than at present, but it would open the door to the election of representatives who more closely reflect the vision of men who love freedom and hate autocracy.

The Prime Minister's extremist policy is calculated to dam the gradual flow of Canadian opinion and to interfere with the gradual process of parliamentary government. The last redistribution followed the census of 1911, and there was only one election on this redistribution, the war-time election of 1917. Enough has been said of this election that we need talk no more about it. No coalition candidate can pretend that he was elected on domestic issues, so that, excepting the 1917 election, no general election was held on this redistribution. Therefore, anyone voting against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is only a party to the Prime Minister's scheme to thwart the will of the people, to carry parliament through 1911 to 1922, and such men should be known to their constituents as men who refuse to face an election because they know they have lost the confidence of the electorate. I am not afraid to go before my constituents, to meet my judges.

I heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) say, during his long address this afternoon, that the Government had a moral issue, Moral issue! Eternal issue! Give us an opportunity to meet the Knights of Morality. Speaking for my constituents and myself, we have had to endure many things during the last years. Dr. Crane used to say that, in this world one cannot get what he wants, without getting a whole lot of truck he does not want. Desires may be pure and unmixed, but the gratification thereof is spotted. We have thrown on the shores of time all the truck we do not want. We forgive everything; but we do not forget and will never forget the rampant super-loyalty, pathetically stupid, of the junkers of the last election, whose delight it was to pillory the French Canadians as a body, and who have committed the worst political crime in Canada's history. We will not put on the shelves of oblivion the malignity with which the loyalty and patriotism of that great Canadian and Empire builder, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the rank and file of the Liberal party, were openly and maliciously assailed in such terms as "traitor," "disloyal," "yellow-back," "quitter," "pro-German," —all that to win a party triumph. To us this crime and sin against the nation has struck deep and far, and every true patriot to-day, now that the storm of rancour and abuse is over, contemplates with dismay and horror the national wreckage wrought by fire-eaters and reactionaries. We will remember the mischief that those impudent junkers have done by their uncalled-for, and unreasoning and unreasonable "name-calling" of men and women whose character, citizenship, loyalty and patriotism ring as true as steel, and whose only offence was that of differing with those super-heated patriots in regard to the way in which Canada should have taken her part in the war. We hope now that when the junkers' temperature goes down to normal, they will have the saving grace and the redeeming quality of commonsense that will make plain to them the assinine exhibition that they have made of themselves and what a terrible wound they have inflicted on our national unity. Laurier's life-work of Canadian unification has been demolished, and to heal the wound, to mend the breach that has been produced by stupidity stampeded by bigotry and fanaticism, there is only one remedy—an immediate appeal to the people. This is the humble prayer of the electors of Bellechasse, which I, their humble representative, wish to lay at the foot of your Throne.

Mr. FREDERICK JOHN FULTON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate my hon. friend, who has just spoken, on having had delegated to him the important task of informing this House what the issues are which the Opposition propose to lay before the people at the next general election, in the near future, if they succeed —as is very unlikely—in securing a favourable vote on this amendment? We have had a debate lasting now for one week, and this is the first time that the House has heard any of the issues which the Opposition party proposes to lay before the electors of the country. I have not hitherto obtruded myself to any great extent upon the time of this House; but I feel that the amendment now before you, with its result one way or the other, is so important that I shall depart from my usual custom of registering a silent vote; and I am impelled to give some reasons why I oppose the amendment.

Before doing so, I should like to add my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address. It is generally conceded that the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply are of a very high order, and it will be admitted that the speeches made this session have not fallen below the standard which is usually expected on such occasions. More particularly would I like to congratulate, and I am pleased to be able to do so, the seconder, not because I would wish to make any comparison between the two speeches, but because he is a gentleman whom I have known for many years and because he represents a constituency adjoining mine, which he and I have seen develop from almost nothing to its present wonderful state of production. It was his maiden effort in this House, on the second day of his membership, and I think that the majority of the members will agree with me in concluding that his constituents have made no error of judgment in selecting him as their representative, and that he is one of whom they have reason to be proud.

Mr. Speaker, I have read over the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition, and I find that it contains three assertions. With these I should like to deal. His first assertion is that the present Government does not possess the confidence of this House. I do not think it is necessary for me to take up any time with regard to that assertion because it is one that can only be tested by the vote which will be taken at the close of this debate. The vote will show whether or not the present Government possesses the confidence of this House.

His second assertion is that the Government does not possess the confidence of the country, and his third assertion that the retention of office by the Government constitutes a usurpation of the powers of popular Government. Dealing with the second assertion, the leader of the Opposition tried to prove it by two arguments. His first point was that he made that statement on the strength of the results of the by-elections which have taken place since December 1917. That point has already been dealt with fully by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Justice, and I do not propose to add anything to what they have said, except this: Out of the six seats which the leader of the Opposition states the Government has lost, there is only one in which a candidate running as one of the Liberal Opposition party has been returned, and in his case it would appear that the platform on which he presented himself to the electors of his constituency was not the platform of the Liberal party, but one of his own. The second point which the leader of the Opposition endeavoured to make was that he made that assertion as a result of his personal observation. Now I have not had the opportunity which he has had of observing the feeling of the people or this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, for he has made a tour of the country, but I must say that I think I can better judge the feelings of the people of my own constituency than can the leader of the Opposition, and so far as my constituency is concerned, so far as my observation goes, I do not think his assertion is correct. If that is so, I think his assertion cannot be relied upon with respect to the whole country. I have yet to have a single Liberal who supported me in the general election of 1917, and there were many of them, come to me and intimate that he thought after the termination of the war I should resign my seat, or that he thought the Government should resign. Again, as in the case of the first assertion, the truth can only be tested by a general election itself. When we get that, we shall know whether or not the assertion is true and not until then.

The third assertion is that the Government has usurped the powers of popular government. That, to my mind, Mr. Speaker, is the most important assertion of the three and probably the only one which contains any element of danger for the Government. I say it contains an element of danger for this reason. The people of any democratic country will resent most strongly anything of that kind, any attempt on the part of the Government of the country to usurp the powers of popular government. They will stand for almost anything rather than that. But, as the Minister of Justice has said, if a statement is made frequently enough, in the end it will probably come to be believed, not only by the person who makes it, but by some of those who hear it; and there is the danger. This is an assertion which has been made on every platform on which the leader of the Opposition has spoken during the last two months. It is an insidious statement because it is one which, if believed in, will be most strongly resented by the electors of the country. What grounds has the leader of the Opposition or any hon. gentleman opposite for making any such assertion? What are the facts? What are the arguments which they bring forward in support of their fact?

Their premises are that the Union Government was elected solely for the purpose of dealing with the war, that that was the only issue in the election of 1917. I grant, Mr. Speaker, that it was the main issue, but I do not grant that it was the only issue. We have in every general election some main issue, some issue that is singled out and on which as a matter of fact the whole election is really fought. It is certainly true that in the election of 1917 the main issue, the one outstanding and overshadowing issue, was that of the prosecution of the war, and in comparison with that all other questions faded into insignificance. But when the statement is made that that was the only issue, I think I need only refer to the manifesto which was published, containing the line of policy which would be followed by the Union Government if returned to power. That manifesto contained twelve planks. I have a copy before me and I find that of those twelve not more than two or possibly three are confined to matters relating to the war. The others are all matters that apply equally to times of peace as to the period of the war. Many of them do not even refer to problems that arise out of the war. For example, take the second, Civil Service Reform. That has nothing to do with the war or the prosecution of the war; the third, the Extension of the Franchise to Women; the fifth, A Strong Progressive Policy of Immigration and Colonization; the seventh, Development of Transportation Facilities; eighth, Reduction of Public Expenditure; tenth, Encouragement of Co-operation among those engaged in Agricultural Production; eleventh, General Development of all the Varied Resources of Canada; and twelfth, Adequate Consideration of the Needs of the Industrial Population. The great majority of these planks are matters that have no reference to the war. I contend that when this platform was before the electors of Canada, every one of its planks was submitted to their consideration and approval; and while under the circumstances existing at that time every person's mind and attention was directed almost solely to the great issue of the war and these other planks may have been temporarily forgotten in the larger importance of the other, nevertheless they were all there as a part of the policy of the Union Government. And if any mandate was given to that Government it was, as the Minister of Justice has pointed out, given by the people of Canada to their representatives for the purpose of being acted upon; each representative elected in support of the Unionist Government was given a mandate to support the carrying out of every plank of that platform. The war has terminated successfully; I do not think many of us expected that it would end as quickly as it did when the election was in progress. But there are still problems arising out of the war, some of which were mentioned in that platform and which are still being dealt with. There are many other planks which, as I have said, have no reference to the war or to after-war problems and which are not yet fully dealt with. Therefore, I say that the mandate of the Government is not exhausted.

The point is made that the personnel of the Government is different; and the leader of the Opposition named twelve out of the original members of the Government who are no longer in that Government. I have looked over the list and find that of the twelve one was defeated in the general election, two are dead, two have been appointed to office, and seven are still in the House; and so far as ocular evidence goes, only two of those are on the other side of the House, the other five still giving strong support to this Government.

What about the constitutional right of the Government to carry on? I do not think that point need be laboured. The leader of the Opposition and the Opposition members must, I think, concede that as a matter of right this Government is entitled to carry on. But they say that they have no moral right to do so. As to the constitutional right, so far as I am aware, no question could be raised if, in the event of the Government being defeated and the leader of the Opposition being called upon, he should carry on in this House for the term of this Parliament, if he chose to do so and could find sufficient support in the House. That has been done in the British Parliament on several occasions, the last occasion, if I remember rightly, being in the year 1885 when the Government of Mr. Gladstone was defeated. Although he had a large majority in the House he was defeated on a chance vote, and Lord Salisbury took office after considerable hesitation and carried on for some months before asking for dissolution.

It was done in our own country in the province of British Columbia. In 1903 when the Prior Government was defeated and Mr. McBride was called upon to form a Government, he completed the work of the House and passed the Estimates before dissolving. Precedents have been quoted, and it is said that this is not the same Government. Well, was the Government in Great Britain the same in 1915 as the one which took office in 1911 or 1910? In that election, if my memory serves me rightly, Campbell-Bannerman was returned, succeeded by Mr. Asquith. At the outbreak of the war a Coalition Government was formed entirely different from that which was returned to power at the general election; but there was no special mandate from the people to that Government to continue. In 1915 Mr. Lloyd George succeeded Mr. Asquith and made further changes, and that Government which carried on there until 1918 was as different as it possibly could be from the Government returned to power in 1910.

I should like to state a supposititous case—one very difficult, indeed, to suppose. But let us assume for the purpose of argument that the election in 1917 had resulted differently and that the Union Government had been defeated and the Liberal party returned to power. Their argument is that the people in that election had only in contemplation the question of the war, and had only in contemplation that whatever Government was returned to power should only carry on until the termination of the war. In that supposititous case, had the Liberal party been returned, I wonder would they have admitted at the termination of the war that their mandate was exhausted, and that they should dissolve and go to the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. FULTON: Can you, Mr. Speaker, by any stretch of imagination conceive of the Liberal party admitting what they are now arguing against this Government? The argument surely cuts both ways, and if it holds good against the present Government it certainly ought to hold good in the case which I have just mentioned.

To my mind, an unfortunate allusion was made by both the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), the allusion to the conduct of the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1911, which was referred to by both these speakers but in a very different manner. The leader of the Opposition in dealing with the point would rather lead one to infer that in the session of 1911 no mention was made of the reciprocity question. He stated in his speech that Sir Wilfrid Laurier recognized the rights of the people as superior to those afforded his Government under the Constitution; he believed that governments should be carried on only with the consent of the governed. He dissolved Parliament and appealed to the people to pass upon an issue other than which was involved in the elections of 1908. My hon. friend made no reference whatever to the fact that the reciprocity resolution was introduced into the House in 1911? The member for Maisonneuve dealt with the matter in a different manner. He stated the facts. He stated that the resolutions were introduced, but that the Opposition strenuously opposed them, and as a result of that opposition the Government went to the country. I believe those are the facts. But the member for Maisonneuve, I submit, was wrong in his argument in this respect. He said that reciprocity was no new issue and that it had been before the country on previous occasions. So it had been. But what was the result when the issue was before the country on those occasions? Did the country accept the principle? The country had rejected on all previous occasions any attempt at reciprocity. Now it was no issue in 1908 at the general election, and yet the leader of the Government in 1911 introduced no new principle, as the member for Maisonneuve says, but brought in the reciprocity resolutions against all previous decisions of the electors of this country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FULTON (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose I was referring to the reciprocity resolutions introduced in the session of 1911. Perhaps I may be pardoned if, for the sake of picking up the thread of my argument, I am guilty of a little repetition. I stated that this question was referred to, both by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), and I stated further that each dealt with it in an entirely different manner.

If we are to accept the argument of the hon. member for Maisonneuve, a Government has the right to introduce and to endeavour to pass any proposal that is not entirely new, whether it was an issue at the previous general election or not. If that is the case, that argument is in favour of the present Government, because they are not bringing in any new issue, they are simply carrying on with what was before the country in the general election of 1917. The hon. the leader of the Opposition deals with the matter in a very different way. As I stated, any one reading what he said would infer that the reciprocity question had not been brought before the House, but that it had been under consideration by the Government, and that not having been an issue in the general election of 1908, the late Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier took the constitutional course of submitting the question to the electorate,—an entirely different argument from that advanced by the hon. member for Maisonneuve. If we are to accept the argument of the leader of the Opposition, then Sir Wilfrid Laurier had no right to introduce that subject before Parliament, because, according to my hon. friend, his late leader had no mandate from the people to do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when a case is presented in this House or elsewhere, and a conclusion is endeavoured to be reached on it, we must have two requisites. In the first place, we must have correct premises on which to base our conclusion; and then the reasoning on those premises must be sound. To my mind, the premises submitted by the speakers on the Opposition side of the House in support of the amendment are not correct; and the argument which they hase upon those premises is not sound. Therefore, I submit, Sir, that they cannot logically sustain the amendment which they ask this House to accept.

To sum up briefly, as I said at the outset, the amendment contains three assertions. The first is, that this House has no longer any confidence in the present Government. That can be left to be decided by the vote which will be taken in a few days.

The second assertion is that the present Government has lost the confidence of the country. I should like to ask, by what warrant does the leader of the Opposition make such a statement? If he bases it on the result of the by-elections, does he do so because one election, and one only, was won by a so-called Liberal candidate, but who, as has been shown, stood, not on the official Liberal platform but on a platform of his own? It would be interesting to learn from that successful candidate whether he is now prepared to kick away that platform on which he stood in the West Peterborough election, and to accept the official Liberal platform. Or, does the leader of the Opposition claim the right so to speak with regard to the feelings of the people because of the result of the other six by-elections which were lost by the Government, five to the Farmers' party, and one to the Labour party? If he bases his contention on the fact that five of those by-elections went in favour of the Farmers' party, it seems to me the argument would come with much greater force from the leader of that party. If he claims that those gains support his contention, I should like to ask him, whether it is any indication of the truth of the idea which prevails very generally that there is in contemplation, an alliance, or that it evidences a desire for an alliance, between the Liberal party and the Farmers' party?

With regard to the third assertion, I have not yet heard any argument which convinces me that the present Administration has usurped the powers of popular government. In fact, Mr. Speaker, while there exists, and has existed, a great deal of unrest in the country, my own personal opinion is that the feeling among the thinking people is every day becoming far more strongly in favour of the present Government. Thoughtful people are coming to the conclusion that, to use a slang phrase, the present Government is "the best bet" for Canada.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull), (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in answer to the Speech from the Throne for the able manner in which they have accomplished their task. It needs indeed much talent and especially much imagination to extol a government administering the affairs of the country without a mandate. All in Canada had hoped, when Sir Robert Borden decided to give up his office of Prime Minister, that his successor would have the decency to appeal to the people and bring on general elections. It seemed that it was not possible that a government elected for war time only, consequently holding no longer a mandate, should cling to power and persist in governing the country despite the will of the people. However, it is the very thing that happened.

More than that, the Hon. Mr. Meighen, called to the office of the Prime Minister, and anxious to cover up all the scandals and misdeeds of the Unionist party, for which he was mainly responsible, decided to change the name of that party, and that is why we have to-day the National-Liberal-Conservative party.

Is it not in order, Mr. Speaker, that a party with such a name should reach high destinies, provided its members were sincere men? But this is but a farce and a camouflage.

What! You assume for your party the name of Liberal, Mr. Prime Minister; but do you not know that the first article of the Liberal programme is government by the people and for the people? Why! you govern in spite of the people and for the big interests only. The policy of the Liberal party is to favour the farmer and the workman; your policy is to protect the manufacturers and the millionaires. No, the fact that you still have in your administration a few former Liberals who betrayed their party for a minister's portfolio or for any favour, that fact does not give you the right to call yourself a Liberal! Neither are you entitled to call your party National. A national policy is one, the object of which is primarily the interest of the country. But your political creed, Mr. Prime Minister, is Imperialism. You are the man who said during the election of 1917, that you were ready to spend the last dollar of the public treasury, and to have the last Canadian killed, to save the Empire.

Nor are you worthy to call yourself Conservative, for it is a long time since you gave up the Conservative principles, such as proclaimed by Sir John A. Macdonald and Cartier.

No sir, the Government may change its name and its Prime Minister as it pleases; this would not better its position. It is for the people to make those changes when election time comes.

Now, what is brought out in the Speech from the Throne? Nothing new, nothing definite. It speaks of a revision of the tariff. We already know what that revision is to be. For the last six months, the Government organs have been proclaiming the Prime Minister as the champion of protection, that is of a policy in the interest of the manufacturers of a privileged class, to the detriment of the consumer. Nothing for the agricultural class. And yet it is mainly from the cultivation of the soil that are derived our national riches. We are an essentially agricultural country; and as long as the Government continues to neglect the interest of the farmer, unrest and uncertainty will continue, the land will be deserted and the young men will rush to the cities.

The Government should establish experimental farms; they should improve the roads and render life more agreeable to the farmer. Why not at once remove the duty on agricultural implements? It is not fair to force the farmer to pay a duty of 30 or 35 per cent on the agricultural implements which he needs to cultivate his fields, for the sake of a score of manufacturers perhaps who in a few years will have become millionaires, while the farmer will have to work all his life to pay for his land and establish his family. It is not to be wondered that the farmers group themselves for their own protection, when they see themselves exploited by the Government in the interest of their political friends.

And what about the working class, which, for the last few years particularly, have had so much to suffer from the high cost of living? It is this class that was called upon to make the greatest sacrifice during the war, and it is the workman who still has to bear the heaviest burden of taxes. Indeed, Sir, do not believe that all the taxes imposed by the Government upon the manufacturers, the merchants, the professional men, are finally paid by them, for it is ultimately the workman who settles the bill. The manufacturer raises the cost of his product, the merchant raises the price of his goods, and ultimately it is the consumer, the workman who foots the bill. And now unfortunately wages are going down. In my constituency, in Hull, essentially a workingmen's community, the salaries have some down 25 and even 50 per cent, and yet the cost of living remains high. I say that the Government is not doing its duty towards the labouring class. If work were plentiful there would be something to fall back on. But one would think that all the industries have connived to reduce the output, and the number of the unemployed is steadily increasing.

Meanwhile, I ask, Mr. Speaker, what is the Government doing to better the situation.

Nothing! or rather, they are investigating. One would think that they are seeking such means as may dispense them from reducing the cost of living. Ministers are travelling to and fro, so that they may find out whether the tariff should be lowered. But, Sir, there is no need for investigations, and that is as clear as day. All that needs to be done is to remove duties on all articles which are of first necessity, so that the labourer may pay less for his clothes, for his food, and for all the necessities of life. Find work for them. Why not start immediately and build the Georgian Bay canal? This is a national undertaking, one which would be of advantage to the country, while workmen would earn fair wages. All important public bodies are clamouring for the building of this canal. The Boards of Trade of Montreal and of Hull have both passed resolutions requesting the Government to have this work carried out immediately, but they have only met with refusals, the Minister of Finance stating that he was without funds for such an undertaking, the public revenue having been absorbed in paying interest on the war debt.

I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that our national debt exceeds two billions; nevertheless, millions have been found for the purchase of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk; the operations of the first year have left a deficit of $60,000,000. The expenses of the militia have been increased by six millions yearly, though the war is over and we do not need a militia. The hon. Minister of Marine intends spending millions on a navy which is not necessary in peace time. This reply that there is no money is but an excuse, Mr. Speaker. Money can always be found to help large firms, or to enrich political friends; yet, there is none for an undertaking which would further the development of the country, while the farmer would be afforded greater facilities for the shipment of his products and the labourer would be supplied with work.

I also note, in the speech from the Throne, that the Government intends considering the opportunity of paying old age pensions and protect the labourer from unemployment. I would be tempted to rejoice, Mr. Speaker, because, at every session, since I have the honour of sitting in this House, I have requested that such legislation be passed in favour of the workmen. My only fear is that it is but a false hope, that the Government will content themselves with an investigation, without legislating on the matter. As I have said in previous years, when a man has spent all his life in enriching his master,—the man, very often having but insufficient wages to support his own family,—it is not fair that he should be compelled, when too old to work, either to go to the poorhouse, or be left a charge to his children. The Government should, I think, establish a pension fund for these old employees.

I would also mention, Mr. Speaker, the compliments and the loud praise given to the Province of Quebec by my hon. friend who seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I quite realize that this is a serious moment for the Government, that their only chance of remaining in power is by making friends in the province of Quebec. But, Sir, allow me to say that it requires more than mere words to make us forget all the abuse and the insults that were heaped on us during the war. I remember that, in 1917, the press and the Tories, headed by Mr. Meighen, endeavoured to rouse the English provinces against Quebec; now that Quebec may be of help, compliments are being bestowed upon her. In so far as I am concerned, and quite contrary to my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe (Mr. L. J. Gauthier), I am as indifferent to their compliments as I am to their insults, and will have no faith in those fine words until our share of patronage has, in all justice, been given us, either in the Cabinet, or in the several commissions, or yet in the public appointments that may be made, and until the French language has been given the place of honour to which it is entitled in Parliament and throughout the country.

Before concluding these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I am in favour of the amendment moved by the honourable leader of the Opposition, and I shall ask all the members of this House, especially those who are sitting on your right, Sir, to act independently; let them heed the voice of their conscience which tells them that the Government's mandate has expired, that they are only usurpers, that they should vote in favour of the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, so that we may have elections immediately.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is customary on the occasion of the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne for this House to pass in review the programme that the Government submits in that speech through the lips of His Excellency the Governor General and the record and activities of the Government during the preceding months or years. But in this case, Sir, it would appear that the ancient custom has been almost wholly departed from. Immediately following upon the two excellent speeches delivered by the mover (Mr. McIsaac) and the seconder (Mr. MacKelvie) of the Address, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) introduces an amendment which, I think, in the eyes of all thoughtful members of this House can be construed as nothing less than a straight negative of the resolution.

This amendment, which has been characterized as a bald amendment—and I think it is properly so named—has been very largely the subject of debate. Were we called upon to deal with the amendment in itself we could very well afford to dismiss it with but a few observations. But my hon. friends opposite, more particularly the leader of the Opposition, have, during the course of their arguments, made a great many statements and assertions and offered certain condemnations in regard to the Government, which, I think, call for some attention on the part of members on this side. It is because of this that I propose to deal with the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite rather than specifically and solely with the subject matter contained in the resolution and in the amendment.

We find the Government faced with two oppositions, two groups of hon. gentlemen in this House representing certain policies. At least, these two groups have given to the public two distinct policies, though in one sense we find them apparently united. I have been waiting for a week to hear from the hon. gentleman sitting at the end of the Chamber and to obtain a lead as to their views, but judging from reports I think I am not mis-stating it when I say that they are apparently united in opposition to the Government in regard to this question.

Now, I wish to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to certain facts, and in doing so I desire also to appeal to them, because I am quite certain that the majority of them, while they may appear on the surface to be more or less blindly following their leaders, are most anxious to weigh matters carefully and to give due consideration to arguments that may be advanced. My hon. friends who represent the Liberal party in this House present a certain view. I do not see the leader of the Opposition in his seat; if he were here I would ask him to correct me if I mis-state the position they take. In his absence I will ask my hon. and genial friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) to do so. Their position, I think, may be summed up in this way: they assert that the Government has lost the confidence of this House.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I am happy, Sir, to know that I have not mis-stated their position; I will come to that a little later. I will make a further statement now, in which I shall endeavour to interpret the arguments they have advanced and the position they have assumed. They assert in most violent language that the Government has lost the confidence of the country.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I am again most happy in having correctly stated their position. Indeed, Sir, I have before me the words of the leader of the Opposition in which he says that we should have an election at once. I do not wish to quote his remarks at any length, but this was his statement in support of his amendment a few days ago. I turn to my hon. friends, and I do not wish to characterize them as the North-East Party: I will characterize them in the term that they prefer, the Agrarian party, and I do that for the purpose of distinguishing them from my hon. friends immediately opposite. They have a slightly different position. So far as I have been able to gather from the published statements of their leaders, they assert that they do not want an election forthwith; but they say: "Inasmuch as last year or on a previous occasion we joined in a vote of want of confidence, we think it would be desirable for us to join in this vote of want of confidence, because we have no apprehension that the Government will be defeated or that an election will be brought on, but we shall be in this safe position of having said that we have no confidence in the Government." I hear no objection to that, and I once again assume that I am not misstating the fact or the case. I want to invite my hon. friends to consider this matter. In his most recent public utterances, utterances made under conditions under which we are warranted at least in assuming that he was expressing his innermost thoughts—and that was in the late by-election in Peterborough—the leader of the Opposition had this to say, and I invite most careful consideration to these words:

> From now until the day of a general election only one of two things can possibly happen. Either the Meighen Administration will continue to hold power or it will be defeated on a vote of want of confidence—> in which event it would be the duty—

That is a plain statement. Then he added these significant words:

Mark you.

> —of His Excellency the Governor General to call upon the leader of the Opposition to form an administration.

In this House the leader of the Opposition has been thundering in the interest of the people. In his statement which I have quoted, he says this: "It is not a general election that I want; it is simply that the Meighen Government"—I am using his own words, and in doing so I am not violating the rules of the House—"shall be defeated, and I, as leader of the Opposition, shall be called upon to form a Government." In other words, he has let the cat out of the bag. The sole incentive, objective, on the part of the hon. gentleman leading the Opposition is accession to office. My hon. friends will have great difficulty in escaping from that position because, before I get through, I am going to offer them a way out which I am quite certain they will not accept. I turn to my hon. friends of the Agrarian party, composed very largely of hon. gentlemen from the three Prairie Provinces—

Mr. M. CLARK: From all over the place.

Mr. STEVENS: I said "very largely;" I will very willingly include hon. gentlemen from other parts of Canada. I say the group very largely composed of hon. gentlemen from the Prairie Provinces, and great credit to them. This is the position in which they will find themselves. In supporting this amendment and admitting that they are sincere in that support, if they succeed in defeating the Government, they can have no redistribution before a general election. I am a member from the province furthest west, and I claim in this House, on behalf of and in the name of my province, this right, that there should be a redistribution before a general election so that my province may have its proper representation in this House. That is a very important point in this matter.

Indeed, were it not for the fact of a redistribution coming on, or that a redistribution should occur before a general election, I would not have any very great objection to the demands of my hon. friends opposite for an election. I would welcome it; but as a representative of a British Columbia constituency which has grown very largely, and from a province which I believe will have a larger representation in the new House than in this, I claim that as a right, and I say that right is of very great importance. I say to my hon. friends from the three Prairie Provinces—and I invite their attention to this with all seriousness and earnestness, that there are peculiar to Western Canada problems apart from politics, apart from our party or their party, which will never be solved until the West has a very much larger representation than it has now, and it is our duty, if we are true to the interests of our particular section of the country, that that increase of representation in this House should be brought about at the earliest possible date.

I will give one illustration, and I will not labour the point, because this is not the time to do so. I will bring it to the remembrance of my hon. friends that for ten years I have on frequent occasions brought to the attention of the House, as it has been brought to the attention of the proper legal authorities, namely, the Railway Commission, the inequality in freight rates in this country. This is an important problem to which I have given exhaustive study. When I state that in my province and in some parts of the prairies we are paying a freight rate, in most cases, approximately three times the charge in Eastern Canada, it will be recognized that we have a grievance. That is a grievance that has no political aspect, that can be solved, as my hon. friends know, only by proper and weighty representation in this House, and there are many other problems of equal importance. What I wish to say to them is this—and I am not now talking for the sake of argument of a political character—British Columbia and the three Prairie Provinces are the only provinces in Canada that stand to gain by a Redistribution Bill, and I stand here to claim for British Columbia—and I hope my hon. friends from the Prairie Provinces will claim the same for their provinces— the fulfilment of that right of representation in this House.

I wish to deal with one other phase of that question before I leave it, because it will be advanced no doubt by those who seek excuses for a position opposite to the one I am suggesting. It has already been intimated in the press that hon. gentlemen will argue that any increased representation will accrue to the cities; that it will not accrue to the rural districts. Be that as it may, in the first place, I am not going to argue vainly that the Prime Minister and his Government and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will deal fairly and honestly with the Redistribution Bill, because if hon. gentlemen opposite have made up their minds to the contrary, nothing I say will convince them. But assuming for the sake of argument that the cities will gain, have not the cities a right to gain if they have the necessary population?

Take my own city, for instance. We have heard throughout the length and breadth of this land as one of the basic cries backing up the Red interests in this country, that the labour interests have not got fair representation. Now, if you give increased representation to the cities, does not labour get a larger opportunity? Undoubtedly it does, because labour controls the vote in the cities, absolutely controls it. So I invite my hon. friends to the consideration of this point: If it does turn out that the cities will gain under the Redistribution Bill, is it not right that they should gain, providing they have the necessary population? I say to my hon. friends, that before they commit themselves irrevocably to this vote of want of confidence demanding, as it does, in the words of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, an immediate election, they must give it careful consideration and be prepared to face the western section of this country and explain why they voted against the proper representation of the West in this House.

Let me turn now to another phase of this question. Has there been any general demand in this country for a general election? Outside of the pilgrimage undertaken by the leader of the Opposition, who at every place he spoke dwelt on this subject of improper representation in this House, and sought to disseminate throughout the country mistrust of Parliament—not of the Government, but of Parliament—there has been no utterance on the subject by any outstanding citizen, or any groups of citizens, so far as I know, with the exception of one group.

You know, Mr. Speaker, as do all hon. gentlemen who have been in this House some years, that one of the readiest ways of presenting a demand to this House is by means of telegrams, letters, petitions, and so forth. How often, Sir, we have sat in this House and seen hon. gentlemen rise in their place when the Orders of the Day were called, and proceed to read telegrams about this, that and the other thing in condemnation of the Government. Do you think that if such a demand existed, if it had been expressed by any large body of citizens, we would not have heard of it? Have you seen anything of it in the press? Has there been a single board of trade from one end of Canada to the other that has made such a demand? Have we had any such demand from labour organizations? Have we had any such demand from municipal or civic governments in this country, or from Provincial Legislatures? You might ask why I cite them. I do so for this reason: We have been told here, not once, but scores of times, that we are usurping the people's rights.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends opposite say "hear, hear." I would ask them how can we usurp the people's rights without infringing upon the inherent and constitutional rights of municipal and provincial governments, and the activities of commercial bodies? Can we do so? And has there been a single representation from any of these bodies to this House or to the public? Absolutely none. Again I repeat, the only demand for a general election originates with and comes from my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, whose sole object is the attainment of office in this country.

Mr. DUFF: What about the War Veterans?

Mr. STEVENS: I forgot to mention them. I intended to say that I did hear of a demand from one quarter, and it was this. Mr. Harry Flynn, a gentleman whom I think nearly everybody in this House knows, and who requires no introductory remarks from me, held a meeting in Vancouver, a portion of which city I represent, and under the influence of his eloquence a resolution was passed demanding that this Government immediately go to the country. Outside of that, Sir, I have seen nothing, and I know of nothing, in the way of a demand for a general election.

Mr. JACOBS: What about the Peterborough by-election?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is going to hear something about the Peterborough by-election in a minute. What about the Peterborough by-election? We might as well talk about it now as later. The Peterborough by-election showed this that there was a Liberal candidate in the field, the first and only one in the five by-elections since the right hon. the leader of the Government took office. That Liberal Candidate got a minority vote of the electorate of Peterborough by virtue of the fact that the Government support was divided into two, although it polled a larger vote than was accorded the Liberal candidate. There was two other candidates in the field, one representing the Farmers, and one representing Labour. My hon. friend's candidate will enter this House in a few days, and will no doubt be received with roars of applause by hon. gentlemen opposite, although representing but a very small minority of the people of Peterborough. I have no objection to that, because he is constitutionally elected and entitled to his seat. If my hon. friends opposite can get any comfort out of that, they are entitled to it, but there is mighty little comfort in it.

Why did they not run a candidate in Yale? Why did they not run a candidate in Colchester? What about St. John? They abandoned their poor candidate down there. What about the splendid run made by my hon. friend's candidate in Elgin? Why, not long ago the leader of the Opposition made a speech in Peterborough in which he pointed to the drubbing the Government's candidate got in Elgin. As a matter of fact, Sir, we lost by about 200 votes. My hon. friend did not say anything about the drubbing his candidate got. He lost by about 2,000 votes. My hon. friend asks me what about Peterborough? I ask him, what about these other four ridings? If he can get any consolation out of having a minority candidate squeezed in, out of five candidates, in Peterborough he is welcome to it.

I was proceeding to ask: have not all the reasons that have been advanced here in support of this amendment existed since the armistice was signed? There have been three sessions prior to this since the armistice was signed—the spring of 1919, the fall of 1919, and the 1920 session, and yet this is the first occasion since the armistice was signed that my hon. friends have raised the question of a direct want of confidence vote. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) and my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) did, it is true, introduce resolutions which I shall deal with a little later on in connection with another subject. They were resolutions dealing with a specific and stated reason why there should be a want of confidence—an amendment to the Budget—but there was not a word in them such as is contained in the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, there was.

Mr. STEVENS: Not a word, and I defy the hon. gentleman to produce it.

As a matter of fact, their attitude to-day vindicates the Government up to this time in their own eyes. By their attitude to-day they virtually give the Government a clean bill of health for the last three years. Now, I have another statement which I desire to make, and I am going to quote very briefly from the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King). He says that the will of the people has been ignored. I observe that my hon. friends are not applauding now. They applauded pretty vigorously a while ago, but it seems that they are becoming rather dubious of the wisdom of the stand taken by their leader. That hon. gentleman also said that the rights of the people were usurped.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: They got it this time. The rights of the people, says the hon. gentleman, have been usurped—by whom? By this parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, by the government.

Mr. STEVENS: Were hon. members opposite not elected on exactly the same franchise as hon. members on this side?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: No? Do I hear hon. members say "no"? My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) does not invite me, surely, to analyze the election in Lunenburg?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I have already said, that hon. gentlemen opposite were elected to this parliament on the same basis as that on which hon. gentlemen on this side were returned. They were elected under the same franchise. Now, they tell us that the rights of the people have been usurped by parliament, for that is the logical inference.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I am glad to get confirmation from my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), an hon. member who, I think, understands constitutional law very well, and who can speak with authority on the subject. It has been stated here that the Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen) has lost the confidence of this House; and that even if he has not lost the confidence of the House he has no right to hold office, because he has usurped the rights of the people.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I am stating their argument fairly. Now, I say this to everyone of them, that if they are convinced that they are accurate and true in that statement; if they are behind the leader of the Opposition in his various assertions, of which I shall give samples in a moment, then there is a very easy and simple way of remedying the trouble. What is it? A very short time ago—last session, I think, or the session before—through the initative of my hon. friend from Montreal—I have forgotten the exact riding—a Bill was passed in this House making it imperative that a by-election should be held within six months. Am I not right? I certainly am. My hon. friends last July, when the House prorogued, knew that it was improperly constituted, as they say; well, knowing now that the government has usurped the rights of the people; knowing that the franchise was, to use their own language, a piece of public debauchery; knowing all these things and being convinced, as they say they are, why do not they not resign their seats and appeal to the people?

Mr. CAHILL: Because the Government would rob the treasury.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends laugh but I challenge them to consider this point. Do they mean to say, believing that, that if hon. gentlemen vacated their seats the Government would dare to carry on? In any case, if they had taken this step before the House was called together we would have had a miniature general election even if the Government had continued to hold office, for we would have had to run a by-election in every seat. But in order to safeguard the treasury, which some hon. gentleman evidently fears might suffer, why could they not divide their forces, leaving one valiant band in this House to watch the Government, and allowing the other noble band of patriots to appeal to the country? Then we should have a pretty good test of public opinion. But my hon. friends know that if a large number of their members—not all, but a large number—thought for one moment that there was any danger of the Government being defeated and a general election being brought on immediately they would not support the amendment but would rather support the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Try it.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends cannot escape the position in which they have placed themselves. They have reiterated time and time again in this House that this Parliament is improperly constituted. If, however, it is properly constituted and the Government have the confidence of Parliament the constitutional argument of my hon. friends is gone to the winds; there is no argument. My hon. friends cannot escape the position in which they find themselves. By their own admission, and by the statements of their own leader, the case is proved against them.

But they do not rest there. They take care to go further and insinuate into the minds of the people that in some way or other Parliament is not properly constituted. I purpose for a moment to meet them frankly on one of their charges. My hon. friends have used the word "debauchery" pretty freely in this debate in referring to the War-time Elections Act and the election of hon. members to this House. It is a rather serious charge, and if it is made with any degree of sincerity it is one that challenges the attention of Parliament. Let me say to my hon. friends that so far as I am concerned I am prepared to discuss the War-time Elections Act as it was applied to the elections that I know anything about anywhere in the country. I know how it was applied in British Columbia and in the West. I do not think there is an hon. gentleman sitting in this House, either of the Agrarian party elected under that Act or any of my friends from the western provinces sitting on this side, who was elected in any way except with the clearest expression of public opinion which any parliamentarian has ever received since Confederation.

What were the iniquitious features of the Act? Here they are: We gave the soldiers overseas the vote; that was one. We enlarged the franchise by giving the vote to women who had relatives overseas. Why did we not go further? I am going to state frankly, on my own responsibility entirely, one of the reasons which appeal to me, and it is this: While we were in the throes of war it was not common sense, it was not wise, in deed it would have been exceedingly ill-advised had we given the franchise to persons of alien enemy origin in this country. There is no use closing our eyes to that fact. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in speeches he has made all over this country, says that a large section of the community were disfranchised. Now, whom did we disfranchise? We disfranchised only that section of the community to which I have just referred, and I say that were a similar condition to face us again to-day we could not do otherwise. And so I say to my hon. friends, when they use the word "debauchery" in connection with the 1917 elections, I think they are exceeding the bounds of reason and ordinary consideration for the interests of the country.

Now let me proceed to another phase of this question. I want to say a few words in connection with the tariff. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the tariff should not be introduced in this discussion, that we should not obtrude upon this debate the question of the fiscal policy of the country. Sir, I was in the West Peterborough election. That constituency was my old home. I spent my boyhood years there, and I witnessed the recent campaign. I can quote the platform of the candidates —the candidate of my hon. friends opposite and the Agrarian candidate—and a very large portion of their platform was taken up with utterances on the tariff—a very large portion of it.

The leader of the Opposition, in his speeches there, made a very definite statement, and I invite the attention of the House not only to the statement he made in Peterborough, but to the statement he made in Kamloops on his western trip, and to the platform which he no doubt had a considerable part in drawing. Then I invite the House to the consideration of this: After viewing these various statements made by the leader of the Opposition it is easy to understand why he does not want the subject discussed in this House. The one thing my hon. friend wants to escape is the tariff, or a fiscal policy, as an issue in this country. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), who is not now in his seat, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), and other hon. gentlemen from the great industrial provinces of Quebec and Ontario—imagine these hon. gentlemen forced to get in behind a platform such as we have here in The message from Liberalism in the records of the 1919 convention in this city. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) nods his head in approval when I mention it. I give him credit at least for being consistent. He stands by this policy. My hon. friend would move the adoption of this policy, if his colleagues would allow him to move it and if he had the opportunity, to-morrow. Before this session is over my hon. friend will tell the House that he stands by every item in that tariff platform. He certainly will. On the other hand, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens, the hon. member for North Cape Breton, the hon. member for Maisonneuve, and a score of others, will advocate something that is absolutely contrary to the principle. I challenge them to make this question an issue in the next election. They will not do it, they dare not do it.

Mr. CAHILL: The record of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, the record of the Government will go along with it very nicely and we will welcome that as well. Let me, Mr. Speaker, briefly read some portion of the resolution on the tariff contained in "A message from Liberalism," including the resolution adopted at the National Liberal Convention in August, 1919, and carrying the imprimature of Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Liberal leader; Andrew Haydon, National Organization General Secretary, and John Lewis, editor and publisher. Now this is what they say:

> First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; Second: reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.
>
> That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cement and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

9 p.m.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: That was a pretty faint "hear, hear," Mr. Speaker; they are not very enthusiastic about this. Let me continue with the quotation:

> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: A very earnest "hear, hear," from the Agrarian party but a very sporadic expression from the Liberal Opposition. But, Mr. Speaker, having read what I have I invite you to listen to this:

> And the Liberal Party hereby pledges itself—

You can just imagine the solemnity of the occasion when this was read and affirmed by those at the convention with their hands raised to heaven.

> And the Liberal Party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Why do not my hon. friends make a decent parliamentary, constitutional attempt to implement their pledges by moving that as an amendment? I challenge them, Mr. Speaker, as I did a moment ago on another subject, to do it either now or at any other time during the present session.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I now, Mr. Speaker, invite you to listen as you have, Sir, with great attention, to this latter clause.

> The Liberal Party hereby pledges itself—

Commits itself, pledges itself by its signs and seals! They are pledged to implement by legislation. Now here is what my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had to say. After stating the constitutional position in which we now are, not under some conditions that might arise, he says it will be the duty of His Excellency to call upon him (Mr. King) to form a government. Then he said to the electors of West Peterborough, a protectionist riding:

> Nothing will be done in the way of altering or amending the tariff in the smallest particular.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: Finish the quotation.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from Brome by his expression questions the accuracy of the statement.

Mr. McMASTER: No, no; I say finish the quotation.

Mr. STEVENS: I will finish it. Let me read the first quotation again. There is a little danger of our getting away from the position I was trying to emphasize a minute ago:

> And the Liberal Party pledges itself—

No, I am wrong it should be "hereby pledges itself." What to do? To quit and go to the country? No. "Hereby pledges itself" to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution that I have read. When? When returned to power.

Mr. McMASTER: When returned to power.

Mr. STEVENS: Wait a moment, let me, Sir, read again what the leader of the Opposition said.

Mr. JACOBS: Read it in full.

Mr. STEVENS: If the Meighen Administration is defeated "it would be the duty of His Excellency"—no option in the matter at all—"the Governor General to call upon the leader of the Opposition to form an administration." In other words he is going to accede to office by the defeat of this Government no matter how he can accomplish that defeat. My hon. friend knew when he was speaking to the electors of Peterborough that that platform would defeat him. He knew he could not carry Peterborough with that. He knows, and other hon. gentlemen that I see before me know, that they dare not go to the country on that platform. How was he to get around that difficulty? Having shown that he was likely to get into office by defeating this Meighen Administration, which he said had not the confidence of the House — persuading them to that—how was he to still their fears about this tariff proposal to which the Liberals in a grave convention had committed themselves?

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in the same strain said:

> Do not worry about the tariff. Remember that in 1896 and 1911 we broke all our past pledges and kept the National Policy in force.

And the hon. the leader of the Opposition said:

> You are perfectly safe; nothing will be done in the way of altering or amending the tariff in the smallest particular.

Mr. DUFF: He said that nothing would be done before a general election. Finish the quotation; be fair.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has not seen the point yet. I do not like to so characterize him, Mr. Speaker, but I am forced to by his frequent interruptions—my hon. friend's mind is so constituted that he cannot keep in it two propositions at the same time.

Mr. DUFF: That is very smart.

Mr. STEVENS: We can easily understand, Mr. Speaker, how at Peterborough the hon. leader of the Opposition said he would take one course, and in his speech at Kamloops—which I am about to read to the House—he said he would take another course.

Mr. DUFF: Finish the first quotation; be fair.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I think it will become any hon. member to reiterate at the peril of tiring the House for the benefit of one hon. gentleman who does not understand the point. My hon. friend does not want me to read this platform again, does he?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I do.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I am not going to do so. We have got that platform, Mr. Speaker, and every hon. member, except my hon. friend from Lunenburg, knows to what I refer. That platform contains this paragraph:

> And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Now, the hon. the leader of the Opposition told the people in Peterborough in the same speech and in almost the same paragraph that the Meighen Administration would be defeated, and that His Excellency the Governor General would then call upon him to form an administration. Having got his hearers into a state of mind where presumably they accepted that probability, he proceeded:

> Nothing will be done in the way of altering or amending the tariff in the smallest particular.

Now, my point is this—

Mr. DUFF: Go on.

Mr. STEVENS: My point is quite clear, Mr. Speaker—

An Hon. MEMBER: Are you afraid of it?

Mr. STEVENS: My point is very clear.

Mr. DUFF: No, no.

Mr. STEVENS: It is so clear—

Some Hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. Hon. members will please bear in mind that the hon. member for Centre Vancouver has the floor.

Mr. STEVENS: My point is so clear, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman does not like the explanation nor the revelation of it. But in case it should be considered that I am making a play on words in connection with the various utterances of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, let me read a portion from a verbatim report of a speech made by him in the city of Kamloops in company with my hon. friend from Lunenburg. If he was not present that night I think he was ill.

Mr. DUFF: No, I was on the platform.

Mr. STEVENS: Then the hon. member will remember and be able to verify what I am about to say. In this speech the hon. the leader of the Opposition, speaking of the general policy of the Liberal party, went on to say that they wanted a party that represented all political opinions, and classes, and so forth, and then he described how in this great convention in Ottawa there were extremists, that there were free traders and high and low protectionists—the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), for example—and that there was a great body in between, neither high protectionists nor low, nor free traders, but he said they all got together and were able to form a platform in the interests of all the people. Then he proceeded in this strain:

> We say the time has come in Canada when the tariff should be reduced.

That is a straight statement.

Mr. DUFF: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Very good. Then take the following:

> We will start on it at once.

When is that? Is that after a general election? My hon. friends cannot escape this, because it is too serious a matter to play ducks and drakes with, and again, I invite them to consider these statements. The hon. the leader of the Opposition stated clearly the constitutional practice, that if this resolution or amendment of his carried he would go into office, and he told the people of Kamloops that it was the intention of his party to start on the revision of the tariff at once.

Mr. DUFF: At Kamloops he said he was going to reduce the tariff.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has at last shown to this House that either he is not sincere or not sensible in the remarks that he has made.

Mr. DUFF: I must ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that remark.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend asks me to withdraw my remark where I referred to him as being not sensible. Well, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, he is sensible of what I am saying, but he refuses to admit it. I do not know which is worse—to be ignorant of a thing, or to refuse to admit when he does understand it. The point I am seeking, and it is certainly as clear as type can make it, is that the hon. the leader of the Opposition—whom I am glad to see in his seat at the present moment, he having just arrived—makes a declaration before a protectionist constituency assuring the people that the protective principles of the tariff were perfectly safe, and that the bye-election had no bearing upon the tariff whatever; but in the West, in Kamloops, he makes the statement:

> Let me tell you what that policy is. We say the time has come in Canada when the tariff should be reduced. We will start on it at once.

Then I draw the attention of the House to this as well, that in the city of Peterborough the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and also his first lieutenant the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, assured that manufacturing centre that there was no danger of tariff revision, the latter using these words:

> Be not worried about the tariff. You can rest assured that there will be nothing done to disturb it.

Let me point out, Sir, that they were addressing the people of a city where they manufacture mining, flour milling, saw mill, electrical and other machinery. Listen to this. In the city of Kamloops the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, knowing there were men in his audience who were interested in mining, saw mill and other industries, held out this bait. I quote his exact words which were taken down verbatim:

> As to the reduction of duties on the necessaries of life-food, clothing, shelter, warmth, this can be done.

Then he goes on:

> It seems to me that you here in British Columbia need a reduction of the duties on the instruments of production more than any other part of the country.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that in Peterborough they manufacture machinery, and there the people were assured there would be nothing done in the way of tariff reduction. At Kamloops, where they use this machinery and where they are handicapped by the long freight haul that I referred to a moment ago, which is one of our problems, and where a great deal of similar machinery is purchased in the United States, the hon. the leader of the Opposition told the people:

> You have your forests, you have your fisheries, you have your mines. You need machinery to develop them, and if this machinery can be procured at a lower cost, it will be followed by a lower cost of production.

Then he continues:

> You need a reduction of duties on the instruments of production.

Now, what I am driving at in my argument is simply this, that my hon. friend who leads the Opposition—and in his absence I challenged his followers, and I challenge him now that he is in his seat—dare not bring forward the Liberal platform of 1919 as an issue in this House or in the country. He went through British Columbia appealing to the people—to the selfish instincts of the people, if I may say so—with regard to certain things that they used. He went to the Prairie Provinces and met my friends opposite of the Agrarian party and told them that there was no difference between his policy and theirs; then he came down to Peterborough, a manufacturing town, and told the people that there was no danger; that the tariff would not be tampered with—that the bye-election then impending would not result in any interference with the tariff.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. gentleman left out the words "until after an election."

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) is still worrying.

Mr. DUFF: Not nearly as much as the hon. members from Vancouver Centre.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to direct the attention of the House very briefly to another point. My hon. friends state that we have no right to bring the tariff into this discussion; that it is not of interest at the present time. I submit to you, Sir, that the matter is of vital interest. In the speech from the Throne His Excellency, on the advice of the Government, makes a clear statement of the position of the Government on the tariff. Now, I have here two motions, one moved on June 9, 1919, by the hon. member for Brome and the other on May 18, 1920, by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. I shall not weary the House by reading the resolutions, but I wish to point out that in 1919, two years ago, the member for Brome had been alotted the high position of financial critic of the Opposition. But he held that position only for a very short time; in fact, after he introduced this resolution he was relegated to the back benches, I might say, and replaced by another gentleman who had less dangerous views on the tariff. In the 1919 resolution a substantial reduction was asked for, "as speedily as may be expedient," and so on; then the member for Brome added this:

> Also, the reciprocal offer of trade with the United States should be accepted.

If my hon. friends opposite are in earnest about their tariff position, all they have to do is to make a motion in the House setting forth exactly where they stand. Almost every public utterance of the leader of the Opposition has been a different utterance on the tariff question. If my hon. friends do not desire to stand by the platform of 1919, which has been sent all over this country as their official declaration; if they do not wish to stand by the resolution of the hon. member for Brome or that of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's to which I have referred, let them frame some platform or some resolution which they are prepared to stand by and introduce it into this House, and we shall be prepared to meet them.

Hon. members on this side will welcome a campaign in this country on the fiscal policy. The leader of the Opposition is seeking to hold the manufacturing interests of Eastern Canada behind him and at the same time to bewitch my hon. friends from the Prairie Provinces as well into supporting him. Why should that be? There is much more in it, perhaps, than would appear on the surface. One would think that the hon. member for Prince, the leader of the Opposition, would not take that somewhat questionable position unless there was really sound reason for his doing so. I shall now give to you, Sir, and to the House what I consider to be the exact reasons for that position. I do not expect my hon. friends immediately opposite to agree with me. but I invite the attention of every thinking member of this House to the argument that I shall make.

It is this: assuming that an election should be brought about, it is absolutely certain that the party whose destinies are now in the hands of the hon. member for Prince could not come into power. That is certain, for the simple reason that there is not a single Liberal in the Prairie Provinces; we have the Agrarian party replacing the Liberal party in that part of the country. If this Government, or the party represented by this side of the House, should not have a majority, the only possible solution would be the formation of a coalition by hon. gentlemen immediately opposite and the Agrarian party. That is the only possible hope for the accession to power of hon. gentlemen immediately opposite. The leader of the Opposition knows that; therefore, he is seeking to hold the allegiance of my hon. friends from the Prairie Provinces with a view to their supporting him in case such an emergency should arise.

Let me briefly, Mr. Speaker, sum up the points I wish to make. As the leader of the Opposition is in his seat, I invite him to consider the challenge that I threw out earlier in my remarks. If the statements of my hon. friend are true; if the "will of the people has been ignored"—I am quoting his own words; if the "rights of the people have been usurped" by this Parliament; if "hundreds of thousands of citizens were deprived of the franchise;" if the franchise of 1917 was the "worst betrayal of the rights of the people this country has ever known;" if "persons are taxed without representation;" if we are witnessing "open defiance"—still quoting my hon. friend's own words—"of the most fundamental of all principles of government;" if "these halls of Parliament"—again quoting—"are within a charnel house of disillusionment full of intrigue and deceptions" —if, Sir, all this is true; if this Parliament is properly and correctly described by the hon. gentleman in these terms, then I say he can remedy that very quickly by resigning his seat, in company with those who sit behind him. I say to him, with the utmost conviction of the accuracy of my statements, that this Government and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would not dare to remain in office if any such contingency arose. The leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well that he cannot get the backing of his followers sufficiently to do that; he knows that a very large proportion of his followers would desert him if there was any possibility of the Government being defeated at this time. I cannot, Sir, come to any other conclusion than that my hon. friend lacks sincerity in moving this amendment.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I am perfectly in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: I repeat it, Mr. Speaker, there is every evidence in the words and actions of my hon. friend and in the resolution itself that he lacks sincerity in proposing it and that his sole object is to secure office, thinking that, perchance, with a large number of hon. gentlemen on this side away ill, he should be able to secure the reigns of office with the assistance of my hon. friends from the prairies—whose interests, I may say, are diametrically opposed to his on this occasion.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat, I would like to inquire whether he is authorized to state on behalf of the Government that if the Opposition members will resign, the Government will resign and go to the country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

Mr. STEVENS: Am I permitted to answer?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: I will simply repeat what I have said—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

Mr. STEVENS: I will answer my hon. friends. I uttered the challenge to my hon. friends that if they felt the accuracy of the statements of their leader, then it was their duty to resign the seats so obtained; that in so far as this side of the House was concerned, I was convinced, speaking for myself—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: —and as far as I am concerned I will act as I speak. I was convinced that hon. gentlemen on this side would not dare to continue to hold office if hon. gentlemen opposite were to act as I have suggested.

Mr. ARTHUR TRAHAN (Nicolet): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, my first remarks must be words of protest. I hold in my hand the invitation sent to the members of my family asking them to assist at the opening of Parliament as well as an attached memorandum. These documents are exclusively written out in English. To say the least, such a proceeding implies towards the members of this House belonging to the French race, a lack of courtesy which cannot be condoned and which for my part I strongly resent. Indeed, I hold, Mr. Speaker, that invitations of that kind should be couched in the two official languages recognized in this country and that the opposite practice cannot be tolerated. Consequently, I beg of the competent authorities to put an end to that wretched practice, tending to set aside the rights of the French language, in such matters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. TRAHAN: During the month of September 1920, I had some business to transact, on behalf of a French-Canadian, with the officials of the Canadian National Railways system. The negotiations involved the signing of a deed. We had requested that the deed should be written in French. But here is the answer that we received:

Lévis, 28th September, 1920.

Mr. Arthur Trahan, M.P., Nicolet.

Dear Sir,

In answer to yours of the 18th instant, I hereby send you a form of application re the laying through of telephone wires over our property at Lemieux.

I am sorry that I am unable to send you a form in French, but we have none printed in this language at this time.

And the form in question, Mr. Speaker, contains two printed pages bearing especially on the construction of sidings. We are always met by the same old excuse which indicates, as far as the Government and its officials are concerned, that they are intent on making difficulties when it is a question of respecting the rights of the French language in this country. I wish to say that we have refused to sign that deed written in English and we do not intend doing so as long as they will not supply us with a French form. These few cases, chosen among thousands of others, show clearly to what extent the rights of the French language are disregarded in governmental spheres. I most strongly protest against that scandalous policy, and I wish to proclaim before all, that Canada is a bilingual country and both official languages, in practice, and the constitution as well, must be respected. When I demand from the Government that they do not illegally restrict the use of the French language, not only I exercise a right which is inscribed in the constitution but I fulfil a sacred duty.

Indeed, there is something more, something better than the commercial and industrial wealth of a race: it is the thought and the language which expresses it. It is through the diffusion of its language that a nation shows its external vitality, it is through the radiation of its ideals that it preserves and expands its influence. Mr. Speaker, we all wish to see Canada a united country. Let us see that French and English have an equal share in this magnificient Parliament, let us treat both languages with the same respect and deference.

It is generally admitted to-day that a knowledge of French is necessary not only in this country but also with reference to foreign intercourse; even the hon. member for Durham (Hon Mr. Rowell) who is not friendly to our language, lately proclaimed the necessity of a bilingual education.

People praise the beauty of our mother tongue, and rightly so. May I quote on the subject a few beautiful thoughts uttered by Mr. Etienne Lamy at the sitting of the French Academy held on the 20th of December, 1917:

"When Cardinal de Richelieu founded our Academy, he had these words engraved upon the seal: To immortality. It was to the French language that Richelieu wished that future. It inherited that power of universality which the Greek and afterwards the Latin languages had obtained. But nowadays this supremacy of yore needs being upheld. Outside, it still commands the admiration of the high cultured, though these at times, are repelled by the works of some of our writers. We must admit that those delinquencies are diseases of but a few and of short duration; that the clearness, order, grace and harmony of the French language are the elements of its primitive, unalterable and unequalled character; that these attainments find their usefulness beyond its native land; that it is not only an idiom for the use of a particular people, but an instrument of preciseness at the service of the human mind and the purest crystal through which light filters without deviating."

I wish that every one of my colleagues would meditate over these great truths and they will understand why I protest against those who ignore the rights of the French language and that I intend to uphold, to safeguard and to spread it through Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. TRAHAN: (Translation) The Government is not merely satisfied with putting obstacles in our way concerning the use of the Franch language; but it really seems firmly resolved to encroach as often as possible upon the legitimate right of the Catholic people to adhere to the practice of their religion. Probably for the first time since Confederation the Catholic public employees have been compelled to work on holy days, observed by them like Sundays, and this occurred not only in Ottawa, but also in the city of Quebec.

Yet, last session when we opposed the Senate's amendment to do away with several legal holidays, which coincided with Catholic holy days, the then Prime Minister the hon. member from King's, Nova Scotia (Sir Robert Borden), stated that the Catholic employees had no reason whatever to be alarmed, since leave of absence would be granted to them on those days. Notwithstanding that specific pledge, an official notice from the Postmaster General's Department, presided over by the amazing Mr. Blondin, ordered that the post office employees of the city of Quebec should work on All Saints' Day as on all other days; and if I am correctly informed, Catholic public servants in Ottawa were placed under the same obligation. The same thing occurred here on Conception Day and on Epiphany Day.

Why has not the present Prime Minister kept the pledge given by his predecessor and why has he permitted such spiteful measures to be enacted against the Catholics of this country? I hold him responsible for this outrage against our Catholic convictions and for this attack against our dignity and our religious liberty. We hope that such a thing will not occur again and we hope the Government will take such steps that Catholic holy days will be recognized both by this Government and this Parliament.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. TRAHAN (Translation): When the Government, as I have just mentioned fails to keep the promises made before this House, it is no longer worthy of the confidence of the people. Therefore, the leader of the Opposition is justified in moving his amendment and we, the representatives of the province of Quebec, have ample grounds to question the good faith of the Prime Minister who professes friendship for us. His deeds are fewer than his words and these vary according to his audience whether he addresses a French or an English audience.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister came to the Province of Quebec during the course of last summer; he spoke both at Sherbrooke and at Granby; there he told us that he always had a tender spot for the Province of Quebec, that never had he wished to do it the least injustice, nor had a thought of insinuation against the character of its people ever entered his head. It is well; we take note of it. However, later on, a partial election took place in British Columbia, which brought to this House the hon. member (Mr. MacKelvie) who seconded the address and who is deserving of our congratulations on the manner with which he has performed his delicate task. The Prime Minister took part in this contest of Yale-Cariboo, went around the country and more particularly spoke in such places as Penticton and Summerland. What views did he express at those meetings? I have before me the account given to a number of newspapers by the associated press. The Vancouver Sun of November the 4th, 1920, tells us that the Prime Minister discussed before the electors of Penticton and Summerland the question of conscription and the Military Service Act, and took advantage of this occasion to accuse the Leader of the Opposition of having left this country at a critical moment to obtain a large prebend in a foreign country and in the employ of the world's most powerful organization. The Prime Minister knew that he was far from the truth when he brought forward this accusation, knowing fully well that at the last session, the Leader of the Opposition had explained his position clearly and explicitly, which allowed of no contradiction. Following up this attack he turned against the Leader of the Opposition's supporters whom you all know; three quarters hail from the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, let us not forget that in this modern world, military imperialism is but the mail fist of commerce and industry — the open field which remains to imperialism is its economical conquest of the world. These are the underlying reasons why industrial expansion is pressed to its utmost. The Government, faithful servant to the powerful financial interests, has been induced into this prodigious error: they wish to establish an "industrial Holy Empire" in Canada. While they give supremacy to industrial and military matters, they neglect the agricultural interests. Yet rural population is dwindling, the cities are overcrowded, the cost of living is high and the world is starving.

Is excessive industrialism a remedy for these evils? I will answer—No. I certainly do not wish to replace the factory by the farm nor the labourer by the farmer, but I maintain that a just equilibrium must be upheld between the agricultural and industrial interests. On the other hand I assert together with the best known economists that nothing durable, economically, socially and morally, can be built that has not agriculture as its base.

Furthermore, it is my humble opinion, that the systematic industrialization of Canada would entail the complete upheaval of this country's organization, a radical change in all our customs as well as in our ways of thinking; the future of Canada would thus be imperilled. It is pertinent to the general interest, to remain faithful to our traditions and uphold our natural inclination for agriculture. An immense territory capable of sustaining a population of tens of millions is ours; yet we are obliged to import agricultural products. Is this not a national calamity? In a great measure, is the reason not to be found in the Government's bad policy? This Government which today presides over the destinies of our country instead of creating amongst the people a love for agriculture, has tried to inculcate in these populations the germ of militarism. That is why instead of having experimental farms in large numbers, they established here and there over the whole country, one for each county, if I am not mistaken, military halls and armouries. I maintain that it is more important to change the trend of thought of our people than to increase our armaments. We have to resist plutocratic barbarity represented by the powerful financial concerns who wish to place before all their commercial and industrial interests, that is to say economical imperialism: we have to struggle against social barbarity represented by these bolshevick tendencies who aim at destroying the foundation of property owhership in our country; lastly we have to fight against this barbarity under the disguise of science and learning that wish by all means possible to do away with religious teachings in our schools. What are the means at our disposal to enable us to destroy these three plagues, if it is not to turn to our most steadfast population, that one which is most attached to its native soil, the most patriotic, that is the agricultural population, is it not also to encourage farming and return to mother earth.

Such is the right principle; oppose agricultural and economic nationalism to economic imperialism, and that is the reason why the Liberal party, in framing its programme, included the interests of the farming class, and advocated the proper means to improve their condition.

Sir, "the crisis of all crises is that of moral sense", said a French writer. The Government have done nothing to check it. On the contrary, they countenance it. That was lately demonstrated to us in a pitiful manner. We had a further proof of it when in the soldiers' pensions' Act they caused to be inserted a section by which for the first time in the history of Canada our legislators granted a premium to concubinage and adultery. When it was moved that a pension be given to the "unmarried wives and mothers" according to the expression coined by Mr. Nickle, the then representative for Kingston, we of the Liberal party protested against such a disgrace; not only we protested, but we voted against such a motion.

My right hon. friend said that we were among those who would have others fight for them and that such is our conception of liberty. For the enlightenment of my English-speaking friends, I shall quote from the Gazette:

> "Again at Summerland he referred to the leader and opponents of the Government as those "whose idea of liberty was to let other people fight for them."

I need not repeat it, Sir, the large majority, 75 per cent of the followers of the leader of the Opposition came from the province of Quebec, and it is the Prime Minister himself who goes into an English speaking province and states that the followers of the leader of the Opposition are people who would have others fight for them, that is, people who are not brave enough to defend their liberty. That is tantamount to repeating in a different form the charges uttered against the province of Quebec, to wit, that the inhabitants of that province were cowards and defaulters. Our Prime Minister is still what he was in 1917, that is a downright imperialist always fighting vigourously those who do not sanction his policy of sacrificing our last man and our last dollar for the benefit of the Empire to the detriment of Canada.

Having discussed for some time with the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. C. C. Ballantyne) the setting forward of the hands of the clock in Quebec, the hon. member from St. Hyancinthe came to an understanding, so he says, with the Postmaster touching the questions of imperialism and protection. Well, so much the worse for the hon. member if he wishes to disown his past "to curse the spirit of his race" and to set up treason as a state of policy.

As for us, we shall forever assert as in the past that above financial and monetary matters, there is our honesty of conscience to be consulted and our national pride to be safeguarded. We shall show a persistent tenacity and united stubborness in demanding an apology from those who have abused and despised us in 1917 and who now deluge us with hypocritical compliments and adulations with the sole end of dividing us upon an economic question. We shall safely keep stored in our minds, the bottom of our hearts, the rememberance of the momentous days of 1917-1918 when, under the leadership of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we felt that we were banded together by our common trials and our anxiety for the public safety. We shall not graciously lower our prestige by joining the ranks of the moneyed interests but true to our motto, we shall still form an invincible alliance of true hearts, of upright thoughts and strong will power so as to maintain in their entirety our religious ideal and the purest of our national traditions.

We cannot trust those who, by the unfair war time elections Act have usurped power in 1917 and secured their ends by stirring hatred, awakening distrust and using false pretences. They have scandolously deceived the farmers of this country when after the election they set aside the exemptions they had solemnly promised to their sons by an Order in Council passed before the election. They deceived our clergy concerning the exemptions to clergymen and to-day they give us but the shadow of a responsible government. How? First of all, the government declines to hand over to the representatives of the people documents and information concerning the other nations.

When, in several instances, we asked for copies of the correspondence concerning the establishment of an embassy in Washington, he refused to bring down these papers, thus trampling upon the purogatives of Parliament—Moreover, at the time of the debate on the Peace Treaty, during the second session of 1919, he ignominously treated the members of this House and the people of this country. When I asked if our delegates to the conference had or had not opposed clause 10 of the covenant, it was not thought proper to answer and frankly admit the truth, the whole truth of the matter. Is this not, Mr. Speaker, a contempt of the rights of the people, this systematically hiding the truth from its representatives? We were treated in this unceremonious way because at that time, the treaty had to be ratified without reserve and above all without delay—England, it appears, wanted it so—whatever be the consequences for Canada, and the Government, slaves to Downing street, disregarded their partisans, parliamentary institutions and the popular rights, by rushing the hasty and ill considered ratification of a treaty in connection with which they now ask for the repeal of one most important clause.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the Government involves the country's credit and sets up new administrative machinery without the consent of Parliament. I do not need to refer again to the instance mentioned by the hon. member for Benuce (Mr. Béland) in the matter of the purchasing commission. The project of such a commission had been keenly opposed on the floor of this House by the members of both sides of the House, and the Borden government had thought best not to insist upon the adoption of such a project. But the hon. Prime Minister had no sooner taken hold of the reins of power than, without consulting Parliament, notwithstanding the clearly expressed will of the representatives of the people on both sides of the House, he created by a simple Order in Council, this purchasing commission which no one had consented to.

MEMBERS: Shame, shame!

Mr. TRAHAN (Translation): And there is another matter to which I wish to draw the attention of the House: The Government involves the credit of the country without consulting Parliament.

One day the hon. Minister of Marine got it into his head that a navy was necessary for Canada, and thereupon he entered into negotiations with the Imperial authorities to obtain warships. We have asked for the correspondence on the subject. The hon. Minister of Marine never brought it down; and it is only when he needed money for the upkeep and equipment of these warships that he put the matter before Parliament. Is this the act of a responsible government? I respectfully claim that it is not. And in regard to this question of a navy, I mean to repeat what I said last year, that the time is exceedingly ill chosen in which to launch such a project, owing to the lamentable situation of our finances, the country being on the verge of bankruptcy. There are numberless reasons for which we should oppose this project, and I ask, why create a navy at the present hour? Is not the League of Nations a safeguard against the recurrence of wars? Is not the limitation of armaments throughout the world the main object of the league? Large amounts are expended by us to send delegates to the meetings of the League of Nations, and with what result? What country is expected to wage war on us? I shall here take the liberty of quoting from an article of the Farmers Sun dated December 31, 1920:

"What, then are we to prepare for? To take part in another European war for which the seeds have already been sown. If the nations of Europe cannot after the awful experiences that have occured since 1914, agree to live in peace with each other, then let European nations themselves pay the penalty. In fighting one war to end war Canada has done her share and more than her share in that sort of experiment to ensure world peace."

These sentiments I agree with, and I claim that the time is ill chosen for the establishment of a navy in this country, especially when in all the countries of the world is mooted the question of disarmament.

The newspapers tell us that an Imperial Conference is to take place in June next, and that the Prime Ministers of the different Dominions are to be requested to take part in that conference—evidently the questions to be taken up at that conference will be of capital importance, not only for the Empire, but also for Canada.

These questions may be of two kinds: Those bearing upon our constitutional relations with the Empire, with England, and others relating to the scheme for Imperial defence announced by the Prime Minister of Great Britain in an interview in which he declared that Great Britain cannot afford to meet alone the cost of Imperial defence, and that the different dominions and colonies must contribute their share of the expense. If it is a matter of determining the constitutional relations of Canada with England, I mean to reiterate the policy adopted by the Liberal party at the national conference of August, 1919, when they opposed all centralized Imperial control, and claimed that no change in our constitutional relations with Great Britain should come into force before having been submitted to the approbation of the Canadian Parliament and ratified by the people by means of a referendum.

I share entirely, on this point, the opinion expressed by a newspaper of Toronto, the World, which is edited, if I am not mistaken, by one of the hon. members of this House (Mr. W. F. McLean):

Canada must remain master of its own destinies, free to govern itself and to do her own wishes. The Canadian people will not tolerate to be led nor domineered by Downing Street.

We intend to preserve the supremacy we have acquired and we shall not permit any council or conference, or the imperial parliament, or any outside tribunal, to dictate to Canada. Our legislators must be of our own choice. They must not transfer their power to any one not designated by the people. They are not the masters but the servants of the State. This authority conferred upon them cannot be transferred to other delegates such as to any imperial government. Let the Knights of the Round Table understand once for all that the Prime Minister Meighen or any other prime minister cannot alter by an iota the absolute right the people of Canada possess to govern this country. This country belongs to Canadians and they intend—to govern it as they please.

When we shall need an advice from the Lords or their equals living outside of Canada, we shall ask for it. If in the past the Government of the Dominion has pledged its word in any way, let it render an account to Parliament and the people.

As to the question of Imperial defence, I ask: Why this military imperialism at a time when general disarmament is the main talk everywhere?

To-day much is said about divorce in our country. The newspapers are discussing the question, and there is talk of legalizing in Canada this social cancer which is eating the heart of other countries. According to the unanimous opinion of the most distinguished jurists, the indissolubility of marriage is the rule, at least as regards the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Those who obtain a divorce by means of a Private Bill have their marriage dissolved, but that does not change the general rule, which is the indissolubility of marriage. This principle conforms with the natural law, while the divorce, which dissolves marriage during the lifetime of the united parties is contrary to natural order.

I am not discussing this question from a religious point of view, I only look at it from a social and a national standpoint; and as such I may quote a few thoughts from a writer, which I submit to the serious consideration of the hon. members of this House:

"The indissolubility of marriage is not a religious superstition, an invention of adherents to a by-gone cult, an unreasonable enactment of wild troglodytes. Nature is at the bottom of this iron law."

And further on the author shows that divorce is not only against nature but anti-national and immoral:

"Divorce, encouraged, vulgarized by a regime which confounds cowardly sentimentality with courageous and sane humaneness, divorce at will is the greatest of our crimes and the most baneful of our errors.

If we do not apply the hot iron to this ulcer, our blood will continue to ooze from it in corruption.

But, it will be said, what of the rights of man and the rights of woman... the right to live...

What! what rights?... You have children, you belong to them! you made a mistake, so much the worse! You are already of the past. The child is the future, he is the race. Remain bound together by the child."

And farther on—

"It takes twenty years to make a human being capable of facing life. It is not the work of a day or of a month, it is a considerable labour which is the whole raison d'être of parents and shows the importance which Nature attaches to manhood and what responsibilities it entails. You aim at shunning these responsibilities, eschewing the family and its duties by the selfishness of celibacy or the shame of divorce. Flee! but in your flight you drag all with you to the abyss, and the country perishes through your desertion of the hearth."

Mr. BELAND: Who is the author?

Mr. TRAHAN: Henri de Noussanne. A little farther on he says:

"Marriage is worth what we are worth. From money calculations, vanities, lies, lewdness, can happiness be expected? The intoxication of pride once over, The veil once fallen from folly, one finds oneself in a hell. One then believes that the way out of it is divorce, and in this plight, pledges and children are forgotten. The coward and perjurer, imagines that it matters not; there will be no consequences, no morrow. Marriage is thought to be a transitory, an occasional adventure, dependent only upon one's calculations, one's mood.

"As well believe that birth and death are also dependent upon our whim, and renewable at our caprice. As well imagine that we can fool Nature, as we can fool men, and that God is not the name of the Spirit in Nature, and that justice is not the name of reason in the spirit."

And in another place the author again says:

"We can only expect our salvation from social peace made of family peace, which can only come from the purification and the consolidation of marriage restored by its essential function, which is the creation and education of the child."

Well, Mr. Speaker, we complain at present of unrest, in certain parts of Canada. This unrest can be attributed to the dire ravages caused by divorce and the reduction of the birth-rate. We hope that the Government will not propose so iniquitous a measure as one for the establishment of a divorce court. We hope that directly or indirectly they will not favour such a measure, and I for one, should it be brought, will hold it my duty to most vigourously oppose it.

Nowadays compliments are freely lavished upon the province of Quebec. It is called the pivot of Confederation. We hear that her people are sane, are stable and do not allow themselves to be blinded by socialistic or other passions; and it is true. Why is this the case in our province? It is because we have remained attached to the native soil, to peaceful country life, we have sought before all to develop our agricultural lands, to throw them open to colonization. Why have the people of Quebec acquired such a good reputation in the other provinces? Because in the humble school in which they are formed they are taught their duties towards God and towards their neighbours. On this point let me quote from a speech delivered by the new Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Taschereau), on November 4th, 1920, on the occasion of the meeting of the deputy-ministers of education of the different provinces.

However behind the times, did he say, our primary schools may have seemed to you some twenty-five years ago, I can say this much to their credit. They taught the children their religious duties, and they taught them to remain on the land with their parents; they warded off that modern evil which draws the farmers' sons from their natural sphere; they did not seek to lead them towards a commercial or industrial life which has no right to claim them, nor to take them away from the pursuit of agriculture.

I have said enough and perhaps too much, Mr. Speaker, to show that the Government is undeserving of the confidence of this House and of the country, as the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition shows. The Government ignores, notwithstanding our constitution, the rights of the French language; they do violence to our Catholic conscience in forcing the civil employees to work on religious holidays; they continue their tactic of insulting the province of Quebec while seeming to court it; they give us a caricature of responsible government by refusing to furnish the people's representatives with the public documents to which they are entitled; they pledge the credit of the country without consulting Parliament; they work for the triumph of economic and military imperialism to the detriment of agricultural and economic nationalism; they, in a word, tend, by means of divers laws which they have passed and others of which they underhandedly favour the adoption, they tend, I say, towards the crisis of all crises, that of moral sense. We oppose such a policy. We of the province of Quebec wish to live in the tranquility of work and order, by which may be insured the harmonious development of our country under the moral aegis of a religion which connects Heaven overhead with Mother Earth.

On the motion of Mr. C. R. Harrison (Nipissing) the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Wednesday, February 23, 1921.

The House met at Two o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Resolution adopted by the Assembly of the League of Nations during its first session, November 15 to December 18 last: Report by the Secretary-General to the first Assembly of the League on the work of the Council—Right Hon. Mr. Meighen.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING

Bill No. 3, to incorporate The Canadian Bar Association—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 4, respecting The Dominion Life Assurance Company—Mr. Euler.

Bill No. 5, to incorporate Fidelity Company of Canada—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 6, to incorporate The General Synod of the Church of England in Canada—Mr. Cronyn.

Bill No. 7, respecting The Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 8, respecting The James MacLaren Company, Limited—Mr. Fontaine.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer notification of the election and return of George Newcombe Gordon, Esq., for the Electoral District of Peterborough, West Riding.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

On the Order, "Motions":

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to move at this, the correct time, the motion of which I gave notice on Monday last relative to the amendment to the Dominion Elections Act. I have, however, conferred with my friend the leader of the Opposition, who is unable to be present just at the moment, and it has been agreed that, provided the House concurs, the motion be not gone on with now but that it be taken up later in the afternoon when the leader of the Opposition is present. I hope this is acceptable to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and to the House generally.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I beg to move, seconded by Right Hon. Sir George Foster:

That the name of Mr. McDermand be added to the Select Standing Committees on Agriculture and Colonization, Miscellaneous Private Bills, and Standing Orders.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE MARK AND DESIGN ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The object of this Bill is to make in the present Act a slight amendement which will make it possible for Canada to adhere to the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property which was instituted in 1883 and which has so for been adopted by most of the nations of the world.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. ARCHAMBAULT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to an inaccuracy in Hansard. On February 17, at page 89 I find in the report of the speech made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) these words:

> The accusation came, and I am glad to see my hon. friend the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) in his place, for he was the president of the convention when this matter was threshed out.

I was in the House when the speech was made, and I do not believe my hon. friend referred to me, because a little later on he refers to the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Gervais) in these words:

> During the special convention, which was presided over by my friend the member for Berthier (Mr. Gervais), we took congnizance of all these facts.

I rise simply to correct this statement and to state that I never was at any convention of the Artisans, especially at the convention that whitewashed my hon. friend.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Tuesday, February 22.

Mr. CHARLES ROBERT HARRISON (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much of the time of the House, for I do not feel that I can add anything that would be of material benefit to what has already been so ably said by hon. members on this side of the House in connection with the important matters that have been placed before us in the speech from the Throne.

First, I want to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address upon the very able manner in which they performed that duty. I would also like to say a few words in connection with the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). In listening to the speeches of hon. members opposite, and especially the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) when he spoke of the wonderful leadership of the leader of the Opposition, who is going to blaze the way to greater things, as I am a labour man and one who was very closely associated with the Grand Trunk railway employees who went out on strike in 1910, my mind naturally went back to that time, and also to the famous resolution which was presented to the House last year by the leader of the Opposition, which is almost the same as the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition at this session, and now before the House for discussion. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the leader of the Opposition was just as insincere last year when he moved that famous resolution as he is this year in moving the amendment, and as he was when he promised the Grand Trunk Railway employees their positions back in 1910. The leader of the Opposition was Minister of Labour when the Grand Trunk strike occurred and as Minister of Labour he attempted to arbitrate between the company and the men, and after the strike had lasted for several days, on the assurance of the then Minister of Labour that the men would receive their positions back, or in other words, be reinstated in good standing, the strike was called off. And what were the results? We all know too well. Many of the men were never taken back, and many that were taken back did not receive their seniority standing. Apparently the now leader of the Opposition either betrayed the men or he did not have the ability to negotiate a proper settlement. In any event, he did not live up to his promises that if the men called off the strike he would accept the responsibility of seeing that the men got their positions back, as was the basis of the negotiations and settlement. I am informed that one of his party has been heard to remark that when the Opposition defeats the Government and the now leader of the Opposition becomes the leader of the Government, the Grand Trunk men will receive their pensions. As a matter of fact, the only Grand Trunk employees who are not now receiving their pensions are those who failed in obtaining reinstatement by reason of the breaking of the promise given by the present leader of the Opposition. Had he at that time kept faith the pension dispute would never have arisen.

It is to be observed that the present Administration has done everything to facilitate a prompt and proper adjustment of the claims of these ex-employees, by placing in the hands of their solicitor all the information available in the files of the Department of Labour, and it has agreed that they shall have the opportunity to present their case as a claim against the Grand Trunk before the Board of Arbitration now sitting, and I have every confidence that justice will be done and that the men will receive their pensions.

Mr. Speaker, how do the issues now standing before the country affect the working man? The present Government stands for just such a measure of protection in our tariff system as will enable Canadian industries—agriculture, mining, lumbering and manufacturing—to continue to carry on to the greatest possible degree. The tariff proposals of the Opposition to the Government are that the protective principle must be eliminated; that industries that cannot meet the competition of the surplus products from the industries of the United States and the cheap labour of foreign countries must be sacrificed without any regard to what happens to the thousands of men that these industries employ. That, Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree, is a fair statement of the issue as it is presented to us.

Well, Sir, how is that going to affect the wage-earner? The industries of the province of Ontario employ around around four hundred thousand men. They use large quantities of raw material produced by other Canadian workingmen. They furnish traffic to our railways and employment to our railwaymen. They provide markets for our farmers and business for our business men. Every industry added to those we now have widens the opportunity and improves the conditions of our people. Every industry forced to close by unfair competition has just the opposite effect. How would it affect the workmen if in Ontario, for instance, the Westinghouse Company, the Ford Motor Company, the United Typewriter Company, the Simonds Saw Company, the Yates Machine Company, and scores of other American companies with branch factories in Canada, closed their doors and furnished the Canadian market from their American plants? Yet, Mr. Speaker, the only thing that is keeping these industries in Canada is a moderate protective tariff. Every time the output from a Canadian industry is reduced or curtailed by the competition of imported goods, workingmen suffer. Every dollar's worth of goods imported into this country that could be legitimately produced here means taking the bread and butter from some Canadian working man's child. And yet we have public men going about this country preaching the doctrines of class warfare, with one object, and one object alone—the hope that they may enlist the support of workingmen in a movement destined to destroy their chances of earning a decent livlihood.

There is another question that has not been touched upon by many of the previous speakers, and it is one in which I am deeply interested. It is the investigation that is being conducted by the Department of Labour into a system of unemployment insurance and old age pensions. On account of being a labour man, I perhaps know a great deal more of the actual conditions of the workingman than the majority of the members of the House, and I also feel I am in a better position to know just about how much the labourer can save out of his earnings after he properly cares for his family. Unemployment may arise from other causes than the loss of position. A man may become unemployed through sickness, invalidity or old age. Very few labourers are able to make provision for these contingencies and the question of making some provision by a system of state social insurance for those who through no fault of their own are unable to work whether the inability arises from lack of opportunity, sickness, invalidity, or old age is of very great importance. Such insurance would remove the spectre of fear which now haunts the wage earner, and would make him a more contented and better citizen. I have in mind at this time, labouring men who were strong and robust when the war broke out. They were too old to go to the front, but I know for a fact that they contributed every dollar they could spare to help along the good work. Sickness has overtaken them, and they are to-day down and out, through no fault of their own. These men might have saved money had they not been so generous, but they felt that as true Canadians they had a duty; not being able to fight themselves, they helped in every way possible the men who were fighting for them. I hope that the department's investigation will be carried on, and that we may be successful in having legislation placed upon the statute books at this session of Parliament, providing insurance of this character.

Mr. Speaker, what has made this possible, and what has this Government done for labour? The Minister of Labour, who himself was a labour man, was appointed by this Government, and he has shown to the people of Canada that he is worthy of the honourable position he now holds. In 1919 the Government of Canada established a Royal Commission presided over by Chief Justice Mathers of Winnipeg, whose duty it was to inquire into and take evidence respecting industrial conditions in Canada. Following their report, the Department of Labour invited to a conference a substantial number of representative employers and of organized labour throughout Canada, with representatives from each of the Provincial Governments. This body after going fully into the report of the Mathers Commission, appointed a committee composed of representatives of employers and of labour. This committee endorsed the recommendation of the Mathers Commission and suggested that a careful investigation of the whole subject should be undertaken. This was done, and I am informed that our Department of Labour has been making a careful investigation and has gathered a large amount of useful information from all countries in the world that have adopted, or contemplate adopting, legislation on unemployment insurance. I am further informed that the information so gathered is being submitted to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and to the Trades and Labor Congress of Canada, which organizations are the principal representatives of employers and employees in this country. I therefore think the Government of Canada is to be complimented upon the sane, careful methods which it has adopted in co-operation with those most intimately concerned, and that this House, may without hesitation, give hearty approval and endorsement to that portion of the speech from the Throne which indicates the policy of the Government in connection with these two most important questions, which, if solved, will tend more to stabilize industry, promote peace, and make happy citizens than anything else that could be done.

[Mr. Harrison.]

Mr. MARIE JOSEPH DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville): Mr. Speaker, according to my judgment, the political atmosphere in which we live at present does not make very long speeches desirable, and I do not feel disposed to take up very much time in the remarks I have to make this afternoon. I intend to confine myself to one or two salient observations. Following an old and very appropriate custom, and emulating the example of these who have spoken before me, may I be permitted to add my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address on the able speches they delivered, which were in accordance with the best traditions of this House. It is hardly necessary, I fancy, to say that although I appreciate the oratorical ability of those two gentlemen I am very far from sharing in their appreciation of, and admiration for this Government.

If the newspapers are to be believed, the result of the election in Peterborough has thrown disorder, discomfort, and even confusion into the ranks of the Government to such an extent that we can expect anything at any time. This session may last three weeks, perhaps a month, perhaps longer; no one knows. Uncertainty is the state of mind of everybody at the present time, and I want to ask you this question, Mr. Speaker: Under present circumstances do you believe that the members of this House should have been summoned to meet here? Is this a proper time to begin session, and can we expect anything substantial as a result of our deliberations? This government apparently ignores the lessons of history. I am pretty sure that history will repeat itself, and it seems to me that it is unnecessary for one to have a very long political experience in order to foresee the general election which is inevitable in the near future. The Government say "No" to this, but to my mind their negative assertions have no signifance whatever. Laws of nature, if I may say so, are above the will and the desire of any government. There is, in the situation with which we are confronted, something that is unprecedented, and that is the unanimity of the newspapers friendly to the Government in admitting the weakness of this Administration and advising it to give up without further ado. I think that the attitude of the newspapers friendly to the Government, after the election in Peterborough, was something unique, and the weakness of this Government must be very apparent since it is freely admitted even by its best friends. Under such circumstances, therefore, I cannot believe that this Government will not understand at last that its duty is undoubtedly indicated. Everyone is looking for a general election, even its best friends. Let us, therefore, have an election. Let the government give up that old bluff which they have paraded on so many occasions and which certain newspapers are meanly repeating, to the effect that even the Liberal Opposition does not favour a general election at the present time.

I do not believe that there is another example in the history of this country of a government so much discredited and disliked as the present administration. But there is a reason for that. We should keep in mind the fact that this is the first time that we have had in this country a government of usurpers. This expression, I know, has frequently been used lately, but I think it is very appropriate. The Administration, so far as I can see, will go down with humiliation and it will deserve—to use the expressive popular phrase—" what is coming to it."

Let us remember under what circumstances the Unionist Government was formed. A certain group of Liberal members decided to sever their connections with their leader on account of the war because they differed with him as to the nature of the contribution that Canada should make to the conduct of the war. They joined the Government of the day. But although they retired from their party, they solemnly declared that their retirement was but temporary, and they asserted emphatically that Liberals they were and Liberals they would remain, and that as soon as the war was over they would return to their party and stand by its principles and ideals. Some of them were men of conviction and sincerity; they fulfilled their promise and came back to their party. But, Mr. Speaker, what can we say of those who concluded a permanent alliance with their new friends on the strength of nothing better or more plausible than the motto: "What we have we hold?" Are the attractions of power then so strong? The election of 1917 was held under exceptional circumstances and under abnormal conditions. It was a war-time election conducted under a war-time electoral law. The platform of the Unionist party contained only one plank, "Win the War," and that war-cry was intended to appeal to every one irrespective of political affiliations. Some special and most extraordinary laws were passed in order to give the right to vote even to foreigners and to deprive some citizens of this country of the same right. There was a special selection of electors, and the law was so framed as to permit the manipulation of ballots, and naturally that law was put into practice by means of cipher and other devices, with this result, that many of the hon. members sitting in this House are not the choice of the residents of the ridings they are supposed to represent. And I cannot give a better example, a more palpable and striking example, than the hon. gentleman who spoke before me. I have here the Canadian Parliamentary Guide and according to it these were the votes cast in the constituency of Nipissing at the last election: Harrison, 4,879 Lapierre, 6,218. About thirteen hundred votes for the hon. gentleman were found outside of the riding and he was declared elected by a majority of forty-four.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. DEMERS: Proceeding, Mr. Speaker, to consider the circumstances under which the election of 1917 was conducted, let me say that a large number of votes, especially in Ontario, were obtained under false pretences, and it seems to me that under such circumstances it is impossible for a man of ordinary intelligence not to perceive the exceptional character of such an election, its temporary character, and the necessity for another general election at the earliest possible date after the war. The Government have failed to appreciate that fact, and that is the principal reason for the unrest which exists in this country and which manifests itself at every opportunity. Mr. Speaker, there can be no relief from the situation until constitutional government is restored—that is to say as long as the people of Canada are not satisfied that they have a government which has their confidence and which is supported by a majority of regularly chosen representatives. This satisfaction the people naturally cannot obtain except through a general election.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, during his political journey throughout the country, was naturally very generous and very charitable. He described his opponents of all classes as Bolsheviki, disturbers, dangerous and disloyal elements, and indulged in other similar moderate epithets, but, Mr. Speaker, I am very sure that all those who are listening to the Prime Minister—the House with a quotation establishing what he has stated.

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. member will be kind enough to favour

Mr. DEMERS: I have the quotation but I think the Prime Minister will admit that I have stated just about what he said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Quote from the record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We will give the proof.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is just a repetition of misrepresentation already made about a thousand times.

Mr. DEMERS: I think the Prime Minister should address his reproach to the newspapers. I am pretty sure, Mr. Speaker, that when the Prime Minister was speaking about Bolsheviki, disturbers, and all such elements, the great majority of his hearers thought he was trying to give an adequate description of the group over which he presides. Because all those who were listening to the Prime Minister knew that throughout its whole life his administration has evidenced a continued contempt for order and for constitutional rule. His administration has been, and still is, the reign of arbitrary authority. Why should we recapitulate what is well known? When I speak about the Government I am referring to the administrations from 1914 to date, without any distinction between them, because even if it is true that the visible head of the previous government has disappeared we feel that the spirit is still there and more formidable than ever since it is more intimately associated than ever with the visible head of the present Administration. Let me say in passing that nothing was less surprising to me than the appointment of the right hon. gentleman to the position of Prime Minister of Canada. It was only what we might have expected. This nomination is absolutely in accordance with the evidence of the last seven years. Nevertheless I must say that it is a nomination which is keenly resented by a large section of the people of the Dominion. Personally, when everybody is urging the necessity of unity and harmony in this country I think there could not be a worse move than the appointment to the office of Prime Minister of a man who will always be an element of division and dissension. Do not ask me why. The Prime Minister speaking about Quebec said somewhere that he had never uttered a word against that province. Would he swear to that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He would not dare to do it.

Mr. DEMERS: Let me tell the Prime Minister that in Quebec, as in other provinces, words have less importance than facts and doings; the first minister must deem us very credulous when he comes and asks the question "Who can say that I ever uttered a word against Quebec?" The Prime Minister says he never said a word against Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEMERS: Sir, the right hon. gentleman knows that Quebec does not like him. He said so when in the province last year. How does he know that, since, according to his own conscience, there is no justification at all for the attitude of hostility towards him on the part of Quebec? Did anybody tell him that, or is it only an impression of his? Let me inform the Prime Minister that his psychological appreciation of the attitude of Quebec against him is correct, and he should be the last man to come and ask why? In my opinion such an attitude on his part is an aggravation of the offence. Let me tell him that in Quebec, while we can easily forgive and forget words, we forgive but never forget facts. At all events I am sure that I represent the sentiments of the people of that province when I say that we are waiting for an election and when the time comes the people of Quebec will do their share, in conjunction with the people of the other provinces of Canada, in overthrowing this Government.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I should restrict myself to the question of the necessity of a general election, for that is the only question of interest to our people, and undoubtedly they all desire a general election.

Mr. McMASTER: Except the Government.

Mr. DEMERS: No one class of the population is satisfied with this Administration. Look at the farmers, the returned soldiers, the working men, the consumers—among one and all of them you will find the same dissatisfaction. On the restoration of peace there was necessity in this country, as in the other belligerent countries, for rigid economy and a ruthless cutting down of the expenses of administration. What happened. We entered into the policy of public ownership—proved to be disastrous everywhere else; we became shipbuilders; we increased our military expenditure by two-thirds over what it had been under pre-war conditions; we organized a very expensive navy, without any occasion for it; and as far as the expenses of the

3 p.m. League of Nations are concerned, we are told to-day that Canada is considered one of the greatest powers of the world, and the Government is satisfied with its work. But, Mr. Speaker, what could we expect of a Government which has been acustomed to uncontrolled extravagance and waste during a period of four years and a half of warfare? This is one of the obvious reasons why the Government should have understood that it was its duty to limit its activity strictly to the purposes for which it had been chosen.

We are told that there will be an Imperial Conference in London this year. In that connection I want to ask this question: Who ever received a mandate from the people to go to that Conference and speak for Canada? And who will have the audacity to go there and speak for us?

To my mind, Sir, the Government by its continuance in office is assuming a terrible and dangerous responsibility, and I am pretty sure that when the time comes it will realize the extent of the anger of the people.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the hon. member who has just sat down, I could not help but feel that he was reiterating the arguments which have already been so often repeated in this debate, and if I do not follow him carefully through his speech and reply to his arguments seriatim, I hope he will excuse me, because I must content myself with dealing with them generally in answering the main arguments of the Opposition. There are a few remarks, however, made by the hon. member to which I may as well reply now. He claims that the Government should resign because the Opposition have asked them to do so. In 1918, shortly after the termination of the war, many members on the Government side of the House—and probably as many on the Opposition side—were asked by dissatisfied persons in their constituencies to resign, not because they had violated the mandate given to them by the people, but because those dissatisfied persons who had voted against them in their particular constituencies wanted them to resign. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the Government would be recreant to the trust placed in them by the people if they should at this or any other time pay heed to such demands made by the Opposition. The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell) on a previous occasion, when he was taunted with leaving his party, made the statement that hon. gentlemen opposite were not the Liberal party but that the Liberal party had crossed the floor and were then supporting the Government; on account of the attitude of the Opposition during the war certain members of the Liberal party were unable to stay with them; they therefore crossed the floor and supported the Government, because the Government was pursuing a policy in relation to the war which appealed to them. And when the hon. member (Mr. Demers) says that the Liberal party is at the present time on his side of the House, he is decidedly mistaken, according to the views of the hon. gentleman who crossed over to this side in the early days of the war and supported the Government. The hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers) also said that the Government was actuated by a war spirit. Mr. Speaker, the members of the Opposition have never been actuated by that war spirit. All through the war the spirit which animated the people of this country and the people of the allied nations did not appeal to them. The motion under discussion gives a wide latitude to hon. members to express their views on many questions of great interest to the people, and I think it is desirable that they should take advantage of the opportunity. At a time when a definite political alignment is emerging from the disruption occasioned by the war. This debate is a sort of rough and tumble political scrap in which hon. members may discuss almost any question under the sun so long as it has not any connection with the speech from the Throne—that, at least, appears to be the attitude taken by hon. members opposite. The amendment introduced by the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is merely the negation of the motion and introduces no new issue. It is a blind alley down which hon. members of the Opposition may wander at their pleasure and forget all about the important questions mentioned in His Excellency's speech. Hon. members of the Opposition are expected to disport themselves with abandonment in the political sea, giving an occasional punch beneath the belt just for friendship's sake, and stirring up the mud from the slimy depths in order to befog the issue as much as possible.

Before applying myself to the important questions mentioned in His Excellency's speech, I should like to offer my congratulations to the hon. gentleman who so acceptably moved the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I congratulate the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaac) on the very eloquent literary contribution he made to the pages of Hansard. It does him credit, and it reflects honour upon his constituents who are responsible for his presence in this House. I trust that the hon. gentleman may survive the vicissitudes of the next election in order to come back here and tell hon. members more about the sounding sea and the thunder of its surf. I would also compliment the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) on the very excellent maiden speech which he delivered in seconding the motion. He well merits the very many complimentary remarks showered upon him by hon. members from both sides of the House. He has a clear, resonant voice and an ability to marshal his facts so that they carry conviction. He bears the impress of a polished speaker, and we welcome him here as a decided addition to the debating powers of this assembly.

I would be remiss in my duty as a member of Parliament and a Canadian did I not give some expression of my deep appreciation of the great services rendered to Canada and to the Empire by the illustrious gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) who so recently relinquished the office of Prime Minister. I am one of those—and the number is large—who believe that men are raised up by Providence to guide the destinies of a people in the hour of their dire distress and danger. It was by no mere accident or blind chance that our ex-Prime Minister was returned as leader of the Government in the election of 1911. It was by no mere accident or through no blind chance that the ministry of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier appealed to the country in the mid-period of their parliamentary term in the expectation of getting a snatch victory at the polls. Hon. gentlemen opposite may not agree with me in seeing the hand of Providence in that event; they will probably say that it was an instance of the great statesmanlike powers and political foresight of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). But the ex-Prime Minister was the one man in Canada possessed of the intellectual attainments, the prophetic vision, the determination of purpose necessary to the guiding of this country through the intricacies of international diplomacy during the war. He was the one man in Canada possessed of the qualities of head and heart and body to enable him to withstand the great mental and physical strain during that conflict, to bear up under the tremendously increased burdens of state, and to stay in harness until the victory was won. I regret as much as any man can regret the disability which compelled him to retire. The Canadian people may not be willing to accord to him that measure of honour to which his great services justly entitle him, but I have confidence that the future historian, in summing up the achievements of the war, will accord to Sir Robert Borden a foremost place amongst the great statesmen of the British Empire.

Prime Ministers come and Prime Ministers go; long live our Prime Minister. I offer my heartiest congratulations to the present leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) on his elevation to the highest position in the gift of the Canadian people. He was selected on account of his personal charm and his commanding ability as a Parliamentarian. He is a real statesman and will give a good account of his stewardship to the people of this country. Since Confederation we have been blessed with good Prime Ministers. I am speaking now without regard to politics; a man's politics have nothing more to do with his attributes as a man than his religious creed has to do with his qualities as a Christian—the qualities are inherent in the man himself. The hon. Alexander Mackenzie, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John Thompson and Sir Wilfrid Laurier were all men of high ideals, of great executive ability, and of unimpeachable charater. Our present Prime Minister will rank high when compared with these men; he will do honour to the Canadian people while receiving honour at their hands.

In considering the speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, I was struck by the many important issues mentioned there as the basis of proposed legislation at this session of Parliament. In that connection I would like to make a few remarks with regard to the speech made by the leader of the Opposition. I must say that I was disappointed in that speech; it was not worthy of the leader of a great party aspiring to the Premiership of this great country. He failed, in his two hours' fusillade delivered with the speed of a quick-firing maxim gun, to touch upon one of the subjects mentioned in His Excellency's speech. He had no criticism to offer of the record of the Government and of the policy as laid down. Assuming that silence gives assent, we must say that the hon. leader of the Opposition is in accord with the policies and with the record of the Government.

On the first page of the speech from the Throne I find a reference to the prosperity of the Canadian people, the general unrest throughout the country and the world and the contraction of business, and also a reference to taxes. These questions are apparently of no importance to the leader of the Opposition; they sink into insignificance when compared with his own ambition to be leader of the Government. On the second page we find mention of the unemployment situation—that it is world-wide. Mr. Speaker, the unemployment at the present time—and I am speaking now with regard to my own section of the country—is no greater than it was in the winter of 1914 and in preceding winters. On account of the material prosperity which the people enjoyed during the war, most of the labour sections were able to take care of themselves out of the savings which they had laid by during that period. I am willing to admit that there are men who, through circumstances over which they had no control, have found it difficult to obtain the necessaries of life for themselves and for their families. There are others, however, who live up to all they can make, no matter how much it is; who have no idea of thrift, and who are always in want if they are not at work. A system has been instituted under which, through the assistance of local governments and municipalities, these people can get relief.

Reference is made in the speech from the Throne to the matter of unemployment insurance. I compliment the Government on its courage in bringing this question up. I look upon it as a rather dangerous question and one that must be carefully looked into. Any action taken in that regard must be surrounded by every possible safeguard. A system of unemployment insurance might be easily abused; if a good Act is not brought in, the result might be the discouragement of thrift and the encouragement of indolence. I would have thought that the leader of the Opposition, who has studied labour questions and who poses as an expert in these matters, would be able to give some useful and constructive suggestions to the Government with regard to this important question, particularly in view of the fact that he must have gained some useful information while in the United States during the period of the war, at a time when our Government was sweating blood, one might say, in an effort to save this country for future generations. But did the hon. gentleman even mention the subject? No. Mr. Speaker, it was of no importance; he brushed it aside as he would the dust from his desk. He has no interest whatever in the trials of the working people, in their efforts to gain a livelihood and to keep their wives and children in comfort during the time of unemployment.

The next question, which is a very important subject and one that must be handled with gloves, is that of Old Age Pensions, and I again compliment the Government on its courage in bringing this matter before Parliament. It must be handled carefully, as it is a subject that may be very easily abused if legislation should be enacted. There are many people who are not able to take care of themselves and who have not sufficient saved from their earnings to take care of them in their old age, so that such legislation is probably necessary, although there are other countries in which it is more necessary than in this great country of Canada where everyone has an equal chance and there is every opportunity for people to make a living and save. This question, however, is an important one; the Government is investigating it, and it will be brought before Parliament at this session.

Yet it also is brushed aside by the leader of the Opposition as a matter of no importance; it pales into insignificance when compared with his ambition to be Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada. In his speech, he said that the question of the mandate of the Government transcended in importance all other questions; that until it was settled, questions of lesser importance would need be delayed, and all the subjects mentioned in the Speech from the Throne are regarded by him as being of less importance than his personal interests. Was there ever such a statement made by a leader of the Opposition in any Parliament of the world, that he placed his personal interests above the interests of the people and the State?

Another question of great interest to the people of this country is in regard to the League of Nations. The representatives sent by Canada to the Assembly of the League have already spoken on that question, and I wish to compliment those gentlemen upon the very excellent way in which they looked after the interests of Canada and, indeed, of the American continent. They deserve the praiseworthy remarks made of their actions by the people of the United States. They were, one might say, the spokesmen of the whole American continent; they held the name of Canada high in the councils of the world, and they gained for themselves a very enviable international reputation.

We come to the consideration of the tariff, the revision of the tariff, that question which was of so much importance last year, but which, according to my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King), is of no importance now. The leader of the Opposition, at a meeting held in Milton in August of last year, made an appeal to the people and particularly to the farmers. He mentioned on that occasion that his fiscal policy was a tariff for the producer and the consumer. I wonder if any gentleman on either side of the House can tell us what that really means. I am quite satisfied that the audience to which he was speaking in the county of Halton did not understand it. It was a statement made purposely to mislead. He had with him, in order to convey two impressions to the people, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), and everybody knows what the hon. member stands for with regard to a fiscal policy. The leader of the Opposition said:

> It is not a question of free trade or protection. It is a tariff for consumers and producers.

The leader of the Opposition intended to convey two ideas to the people of that county. Like Santa Claus at Christmas, he had something for everybody. The leader of the Opposition is the greatest political Santa Claus this country has ever had. To those people who were inclined to favour protection or low tariff, he said: "Here, you can have protection; you can have a moderate tariff; this is a tariff for consumers and producers." The hon. member for Brome could give the impression to the free traders that this meant free trade, and consequently everybody should be pleased and should vote for the hon. member for Brome and his leader. That did not quite satisfy the audience, because he was speaking to hard-headed Scotchmen, Englishmen and Irishmen by whom that county is settled, the descendants of men who came from the old land many generations ago. They were not easily carried away by the piffle which the leader of the Opposition gave them—it did not go down and it was not long afterwards that the hon. member for Brome was asked to return and explain the conditions and the position. He went to the town of Oakville, a short distance from Milton and made a speech there. That speech was not reported in the press so that I did not hear what he said; but I heard that the hon. member travelled something like 400 miles to address an audience of fifty people. My hon. friend can corroborate that, as he is in a better position than I to know whether it is true or not. I might say that the speech delivered at Milton by the leader of the Opposition was practically the same as the speeches he delivered at Newmarket and Toronto; he has it off by heart; he can stand up in this House and it will go off of its own volition. He said, speaking in Toronto on the 16th of August last:

> We have in Ottawa, as we had in this province, a Government which has undertaken to perpetuate itself in office without any reference whatever to the wishes of the people, or without permitting any expression of the popular will.

He means to say that the Government of Sir William Hearst was perpetuating itself in office without asking the will of the people. We know that he did stay a little longer in office on account of the conditions of the war, but that was by unanimous consent of both parties in the legislature. He was not using autocratic power any more than we are in Ottawa. But the leader of the Opposition continued:

> We have neither a representative Parliament nor a responsible Government. We have an autocratic executive usurping authority, exercising political control, regardless alike of constitutional procedure and the first principles of Government in a free and self-governing country.

I think few men in the Dominion of Canada will deny that Canada is a free and self-governing country, and there are in the Dominion not many men who will say to-day that the present Government is exercising autocratic power. That is something that exists only in the mind of the leader of the Opposition and his followers, and they have reiterated it so often that they have commenced to believe it. The leader of the Opposition, in stating his position with regard to the resignation of the Government, did so with such vehemence and show of indignation that I was almost persuaded that he meant what he said, but in listening to his followers afterwards I came to the conclusion that he was not sincere in his demand.

Why should he be? At Milton he made an appeal to the farmers and frankly stated: We, myself and the Liberal party, cannot possibly defeat this Government, and we ask an alliance with the farmers, the labour men and the returned soldiers to assist us in turning out this Government. Mr. Speaker, what would an alliance with the Agrarian party mean? The leader of the Opposition has a tariff for the producer and the consumer, and if he goes to the country he has no hope of returning here with a majority sufficient to enable him to carry on without the support of the Agrarian party to his left. What would that mean? Would it mean that if the leader of the Opposition became the leader of the Government we would have a tariff for the producer and the consumer? If he has the assistance of the Agrarian group in forming a government in order to carry on, it will mean free trade, nothing more or less. He would be compelled to accede to the wishes of the leader of the Agrarian party, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who is frankly an out-and-out free trader.

I do not think the hon. gentleman will deny it. I do not see him in the House at this moment, but I have here a couple of clippings from speeches he made in the West, which I think will be quite conclusive that he is a free trader. Speaking at a convention of the United Farmers of Alberta on January 26, 1920, he is reported by the Grain Growers' Guide of February 11, 1920, to have said (pp. 56-59):

> Now the farmers of this country, by pronouncing upon the questions, have stated their belief that the principle of protection is not only economically unsound but morally indefensible, is it not time we were considering a change in regard to it?

Then in his speech of November 19, 1919, as reported in the issue of the Regina Leader of November 20, Mr. Crerar said:

> If people want to wear diamonds and silks and have the money for it, at this stage of our country's advancement, I have no objection to it, but I do say this: that if we tax them with a customs tariff we must levy an excise tax on the home manufacturers. I would absolutely root out the principle of protection in our customs tariff.

Surely the leader of the Agrarian party will not deny what he said on those two occasions. He is frankly a free trader, and if the leader of the Opposition is returned without sufficient majority to carry on, and must depend upon the support given him by the Agrarian group to form a government, we must have free trade. The hon. member for Marquette could not possibly deny the western provinces what they have been asking for, and the policy upon which they have returned him to this House. If he did, he would betray the farmers of the West, he would lose his position in the Grain Growers Grain Company, and would have to withdraw himself from the political life of Canada forever. So he would stand firmly by the principle of free trade, and the leader of the Opposition is paving the way by which he can grant free trade to this country if such a condition should arise. He wants to be able to say to the people of Canada: I have carried out my pre-election promises. Did I not tell you it would be a tariff for the consumer and the producer? Of course, that is a free trade tariff.

The leader of the Opposition has taken a good deal of comfort out of the results of the by-election in West Peterborough. I might say he has been cackling over that one victory like a chicken over its first egg. Was there ever such an egg. Was there ever such a victory? The hon. gentleman's supporter who was elected in West Peterborough is not yet in this House, but he will come here as a minority candidate. He was elected by about one-third of the vote of that constituency. If that election tells us anything, it tells us of the futility of the multiplicity of candidates and of what I might call the group system of government. Otherwise it tells us practically nothing. The Government had a majority of the votes cast in endorsation of their fiscal policy, but the leader of the Opposition says that that was not an issue in that election or in any other by-election. He says that the only issue is the mandate of the Government.

At nearly all the meetings the leader of the Opposition has addressed throughout the Dominion, he has dwelt very much upon what you might call his Liberalism. It is almost a religious faith with the hon. gentleman. He harps back to the old days of Liberalism many years ago, when Liberalism really meant something, when it really had some principles behind it; but it has no principles behind it to-day under the leadership of the hon. gentleman. He has evidently forgotten that the principles of Liberalism which he announces to-day in this House are nothing else but a moth-eaten bunch of contradictions, inconsistencies, and deceit. The hon. gentleman has really missed his calling. He might pose as a first-class actor in a dime museum. He could pose with a wig and beard as Ananias, and if he poses as well as he acts the part, he will be a success.

The Liberals on this side of the House did not leave their party; they took their party with them when they crossed the floor. On more than one occasion the Liberals on this side of the House have been invited to recross the floor and take up their old allegiance. We had an invitation a few days ago from the hon. member for Brome, handed out in a fine manner. That versatile gentleman can do it very well indeed. Then, in 1918, we had an invitation from the leader of the Opposition of that day (Mr. McKenzie), when he announced to this House and to the followers who had wandered away from the camp that the light was in the window and the latch string on the outside of the door. That light, Mr. Speaker, may be designated the light that failed.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): A good many came back.

Mr. ANDERSON: One or two political moths were attracted by the light, but the great majority of the Liberal Unionists who seceded from this side of the House have camped upon the trail uncertain whether to proceed or build a shack of their own. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) now looks very critically at the meagre fare spread in the Liberal kitchen, and has decided along with his followers to stay where they are until their own provisions are exhausted. They may then gradually go on into the Liberal camp.

The "mandate of the Government." It was the great theme of the address of the leader of the Opposition. What is a mandate anyway? Is it something you can eat that it should be exhausted so soon? The members of the Opposition must be famishing for something from the Government benches or they would not ask the question so often and reiterate it over and over again. There is constitutional authority for the conduct of this Government. If you consult the British North America Act of 1867 you will find, in section 50, ample constitutional authority for this or any other Government of this Dominion of Canada to take charge of the affairs of the country for a period of five years unless previously dissolved by the Governor-General. That is the only clause with regard to the constitutional authority of Parliament to sit for five years. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned in his speech in Toronto that if there was constitutional authority for the Government of 1911 to proceed to the country, the same authority could now be invoked by this Government. Any one will admit that; but there was no necessity for the Government of 1911 to go to the country; they were not compelled to do so. They went of their own volition, thinking they would secure a record vote from the people. But the people did not support them in their contention; they voted strongly against them at the time, showing clearly that they did not look favourably upon the policy which the government was then advocating.

In section 51, sub-section 5, it is provided that every ten years a census shall be taken and a redistribution made every decade after the year 1871, which redistribution shall be made by the Parliament then constituted and shall take effect when the term of that Parliament expires. If the leader of the Government should accede to the demand of the Opposition and go to the country at this time, redistribution could not take place before the expiration of the term of the Parliament then elected and would consequently be delayed for five years. As the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has so well pointed out, representation would then be denied the people in Western Canada and in such other territories where they are entitled to greater representation than they have at present.

Any Government that could be guilty of such an act and return here in violation of the principles of the British North America Act would, in very truth, be usurpers. It would be an autocratic act to prevent the people of Western and Eastern Canada from securing until the expiration of five years, after the date of the following election, the greater representation to which they are entitled. I do not believe that the leader of the Opposition can be sincere in his declarations; otherwise he would not take such a stand. If it should happen that the Government were forced to the country by the Opposition, the papers in Canada would not care to print what the Western people would say, for it would not be printable.

Now, with regard to the question of mandates. If the Government has a mandate, then the individual members of parliament have mandates also. In 1917 every member elected to support the Government had a mandate from the people to support the Unionist Administration not only during the war but until the termination of the parliamentary period. Undoubtedly, the war was the main issue. There is no denying that fact. But it is news to me to hear the leader of the Opposition state that when the war was over it was incumbent on the Government to go to the country. I fought in that election, and I never heard the statement made, nor did it ever occur to me, that I was elected only for the period of the war. No one knew how long the war would last; no one knew how soon it would be concluded victoriously to the allies; and it was therefore absolutely impossible to say that the people of the country intended that the Government should hold office only for the period of the war. Nothing was further from their minds than such a supposition.

A mandate from the people is a command to do something; it is an order from the people for the Government to carry out its platform submitted to them. This Government has proceeded to do so, and to bring to fruition all the aims and objectives outlined in their platform; and I doubt whether there ever was a Government at Ottawa that more faithfully performed its duty in that respect. As I have said, every individual member elected to support the Unionist party had a mandate from his constituency to support the Government so long as it remained in office.

Hon. gentlemen who have seceded from this side and gone across the floor could take only one honourable stand. When they did not see eye to eye with their constituents, when they decided to abandon their allegiance to the present Government and cross to the side benches, they should have resigned their seats and obtained a new mandate from the people. They are the ones that are betraying the people, and not the Government. The hon. member for Marquette (Hon. Mr. Crerar) was the greatest sinner in this respect. He practically started a trek across the road, and it was his duty, as leader of the Agrarian party, to go back to his constituents and ask them for a new mandate, and confirmation of the position he has taken as leader of that party across the floor.

What does the Liberal party care for mandates? Let us go back to the election of 1896. The late Laurier administration, on the issue of tariff for revenue only, appealed to the people of Canada from one end of the country to the other and circularized them continuously throughout the election for support on that issue, promising that if they were returned to power they would abolish the protective policy and give to the people a tariff for revenue purposes only. They were elected on that issue; they received a mandate from the people to put that policy into effect. Did they do so? Mr. Speaker, history tells us that they did not; nevertheless they did not resign. Did they receive any mandate from the people of Canada to keep a protective policy in force in this country? They did not; yet in spite of that they remained in office for fifteen years, violating the first principles, according to their own views, of democratic institutions. And now they have the temerity to charge this Government, which is carrying out faithfully and fully its mandate received from the people, with usurpation of democratic power.

The hon. members of the Opposition have a great respect for the memory of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier; so have I. I regarded him as a great Canadian, a great statesman, and a man of unimpeachable character; and I think that what he said should have had some influence on the opinions of Opposition members with regard to the attitude they took in 1896. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Hon. Mr. Fielding), who is in his seat to-day, was Finance Minister of that Government and received a mandate from the people to wipe out the protective principle from the statute books and instead to institute a tariff for revenue only. But he refused to carry out the pledge of his party; he denied to the people the right they claimed and kept the protective policy in force.

Why did the hon. gentleman do so? With other members of the Government who were in office at that time he sounded the manufacturing interests, what are called the "big interests," and found that they would not stand for a reduction of the tariff. The then leader of the Government, with whom was associated the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) accordingly capitulated to those "big interests." And yet these hon. gentlemen have the audacity to say to-day that the present Government is controlled by the same big interests. Mr. Speaker, it is the greatest piffle that has ever been uttered in this House, and I am surprised at hon. gentlemen opposite occupying so much time in dilating upon such petty issues. They have been raising a clamour all through the country and during the present debate on this question. Of course, we have always had clamourers but we should not take them too seriously. In 1833 there were such clamourers and, speaking in the Senate of the United States, Daniel Webster referred to them as follows:

> There are persons who constantly clamor. They complain of oppression, and pernicious influence of accumulated wealth. They cry out loudly against all banks and corporations and all means by which small capitalists become united in order to produce important and beneficial results. They carry on a mad hostility against all established institutions. They would choke the fountain of industry and dry all streams. In a country of unbounded liberty they clamor against oppression. In a country of perfect equality, they would move heaven and earth against privilege and monopoly. In a country where property is more evenly divided than anywhere else, they rend the air shouting agrarian doctrines. In a country where wages are high beyond parallel, they would teach the laborer that he is but an oppressed slave.

That was the dictum of Daniel Webster in 1833. We have such clamourers in the Dominion to-day and we will have them so long as Canada is in existence. In the course of time we shall have forgotten the clamourers of 1920 and 1921, but we will always remember those sane Canadians who stood firm in support of constituted authority and of a progressive administration of public affairs in the Dominion. The leader of the Opposition has the audacity to ask the Prime Minister by what right and by what warrant he intends to rule this country. I tell him that the Prime Minister and his Cabinet are ruling Canada by the warrant of the loyal Canadian citizens who stood faithfully by their country and fought for it day and night throughout four and a half years of the most stupendous conflict in the history of the world. By virtue of that right and that warrant they are entitled to the support of every man in this House, and they are entitled to the support of Canadians who stood shoulder to shoulder with the Government in conserving Canada to Canadians in order that the leader of the Opposition might have a country to come back to and that he might have the opportunity to assist in advancing the progress of this country throughout the years of peace which we hope are ahead of us.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker—

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Would the hon. gentleman permit me, please, for a moment? If the present time would be agreeable to the leader of the Opposition, I would like now to return to the order of Motions, with the consent of the House, so that we might take up the motion of which I gave notice on Tuesday. It occurred to me that possibly my hon. friend would otherwise take up the time between now and six o'clock.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think it would be proper for the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion agree to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg to move the Motion of which I gave notice on Tuesday, to the effect that the Order of the House making the debate on the Address the exclusive duty of the House until disposed of be varied to the extent of permitting Bill No. 2 to be proceeded with by this House to a conclusion. I have already given the House the reasons why I make this motion. The necessity for this Bill being proceeded with is to enable its provisions to take effect in time to be put into operation so that it may be possible for the referendum to be held in Ontario on the date fixed, and obviate any further necessity of its postponement. I want to explain, so that there will be no misunderstanding, that this could only be gone on with, under the rules, by unanimous consent, but the leader of the Opposition not having seen his way, when I spoke to him last Friday to assure unanimous consent, I took the precaution to move to vary the rule. Consequently, I simply appear before the House asking that the Rule be varied by the will of the majority.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend has said, the purpose of his motion is to enable the Government to proceed with the Bill which has come to this House from the Senate providing for an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act, 1919, so as to permit a referendum to be taken in the province of Ontario in the course of the next month or two at a less cost than would be involved if the vote were to be taken under the Elections Act as it stands at present. I think I am right in saying that if this Bill, which has come to us from the Senate, were not carried, its failure to pass would not prevent the referendum being taken; it would not lead, as my right hon. friend intimated on Monday, to the disfranchisement of any person in the matter of that referendum, nor would it necessarily involve any delay in the taking of the referendum. All that it would involve would be an additional expense of some $300,000 in the cost of the preparation of the necessary lists.

As I interpret the circumstance it means that, through the lack of foresight on the part of the Government last session in anticipating a possibility of this kind, if the Bill does not pass the country will have to suffer an additional expense of $300,000. Now it is certainly not the desire of any of us on this side of the House to cause the public to suffer any additional burden of taxation through neglect on the part of the Administration, and, as I see it, that would be the only effect of our refusing to permit the Government to make the change desired in a matter of procedure.

There might be one other consequence. Our action in refusing to make the change suggested would be deliberately misinterpreted throughout the country; the people would be led to believe that in some way the Opposition were averse to allowing an expression of opinion within a certain time on a matter of public interest. We certainly desire to give every opportunity for an expression of opinion to any part of the community on a matter of public interest. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is not our intention to oppose this resolution.

One point that I wish to make perfectly clear, however, is this: We would not for one moment consent to the motion of my right hon. friend if in any way our action in so doing were likely to be interpreted as being prejudicial to the force of the amendment that is before the House at the present time, and which declares want of confidence in the Government as the view held by hon. gentlemen sitting on this side. With the distinct understanding, therefore, that our action in consenting to allow my right hon. friend to proceed will not in any way be construed, either in the House or out of it, as prejudicing the force of the motion of want of confidence in the Government which is now before the Chamber I am quite agreeable that my right hon. friend's motion shall pass.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to say a word anent the remarks of the hon. the leader of the Opposition before the motion carries, Mr. Speaker. I thought I had made it very clear when I first moved the motion that the reason the motion intervenes and that this Bill is necessary is not because the previous Act was insufficient in the circumstances, but that until at the very eve of the passing of the Act or just afterwards it had not been called to the attention of the Government that were a plebiscite to be held in the year 1920 there would be this extensive disfranchisement of the soldiers. It is because that circumstance was brought to the attention of the Government, and for that reason alone, that the postponement took place, and it is in order to save expense in providing a new list that this Bill is introduced. There is nothing extraordinary about it at all.

I understand that the leader of the Opposition asks from me a covenant that his acceding to this motion—which, by the way is not necessary, unless his acceding to it would be required to obtain a majority of Parliament, which I think far from likely—shall not be construed as detracting from the force of the amendment now being pressed by the Opposition. I have never been able to see how his acceding to this motion could affect the force of the amendment—if it has any force. Certainly I do not intend to use it as detracting from the force of the amendment because I do not think it does detract, and, in fact, I never thought the amendment had very much force to begin with. We all know why the amendment was moved, and I do not think the country is going to be misled because we now interrupt the proceedings to take care of some useful matter of legislation. The country is not going to be misled by that consideration from fully grasping what the entire idea of the amendment before the House is, namely, to try to group a body of different opinions which cannot be grouped except under an amendment that calls for their being in power instead of us.

Hon. W. S. FEILDING (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, the intimation of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) that the Government rushed the Franchise Bill through last session without knowing what they were doing is one which we should all be ready to accept. There is a point, however, to which I would like to draw attention. If this is a purely formal, non-contentious matter, I do not see any reason why we should not allow the motion to be made, although it is a very unusual departure from the customary procedure. But I notice in the morning papers a telegram from Toronto—and I may say that I have no interest in the Bill one way or the other—that the Bill which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Guthrie) is introducing, is objected to by the temperance people of the country. If we are going to set aside the debate on the address to start a wrangle on this Bill, I question the wisdom of such a course; but if the Bill is purely non-contentious, I quite see the reason for making good the blunders of my right hon. friend, and we are ready to do so.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Hon. Hugh Guthrie (Solicitor General) Bill No. 2 to amend the Dominion Elections Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Ontario: Canada Temperance Act vote:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think, Mr. Chairman, before you take up the sub-sections I will ask that the Committee do now rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again to-morrow, I take this course because an amendment will have to be made to the Bill as it has passed the Senate, this amendment being requested by the various parties interested, and I think they are all agreed upon it.

Mr. BUREAU: By whom?

Mr. GUTHRIE: By the parties who are asking that the amendment should be made.

Mr. BUREAU: What parties?

Mr. GUTHRIE: One is the Ontario Referendum Committee, the other is the Liberty League; I think those are the only two. I believe the amendment that they propose is merely one which goes to the appointment of scrutineers, and there will be agreement on it; but the amendment has not yet been received by me, and I would therefore ask that the Committee now report progress and ask leave to sit again to-morrow.

Progress reported.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH ADDRESS IN REPLY

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. McIsaac, for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): Mr. Speaker, a regretful occurrence, whereby the courteous words uttered by the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) last Thursday were met by something akin to an impertinence on the part of the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) precludes me from congratulating him on his attainment to high offices lest I should be willing to take the risk of being the subject of a similar sharpness.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I am happy, however, to offer my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address for the most interesting speeches they have delivered. Indeed, it is a pleasure for me to congratulate the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) upon the lofty remarks he made regarding unity and harmony in this country. The hon. gentleman evidently felt that it was the least he was bound to say, since the Prime Minister, who declares on every platform that he has a new love for Quebec and the French speaking people, had seen fit to deviate this year from the usual custom of having the reply to the Address seconded in the French language. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that time will not permit me to answer the funeral oration that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) has delivered on the already cold body of the Government, but I should like to correct a remark made by my hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. Harrison) regarding the pensions of the Grand Trunk employees. My hon. friend, if I understood him aright, tried to cast an aspersion on the sincerity of the hon. the leader of the Opposition regarding those employees. My hon. friend is to-day much more deeply concerned about the welfare of the Grand Trunk employees than he was when the Grand Trunk legislation was passed and when the hon. the leader of the Opposition presented a motion with regard to the Grand Trunk bill in the following terms:

> That this Bill be not now read a third time but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same by adding the following section:
> Any right or interest of any employee of the Grand Trunk Railway Company existing in the pensions fund prior to the strike of the Company's employees which occurred in July, 1910, is hereby declared not to have been affected by such strike or any circumstance or condition arising out of or in connection therewith.

This motion was presented to the House on Friday, April 23, 1920. In looking over the list of members who voted I fail to see the name of the hon. member for Nipissing. If I remember well, instead of voting for the employees of the Grand Trunk on that occasion, he did the aeroplane act and flew out of the room.

The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, sins by omission. True it contains a somewhat clumsy attempt on the part of the adviser to His Excellency to draw into this debate the question of the tariff, which should be discussed when the Budget speech is brought down. But it is so clear a repetition of the campaign of the Prime Minister last fall in an effort to becloud the real issue before the people—that is, whether or not this Government has the right to remain in office—it is so clear an attempt to prevent discussion on most momentous questions that I was not surprised to see in the Speech from the Throne a reference to the tariff. The word is: "Shut off all discussion on perilous questions, and becloud the issue as was done in 1911 and in 1917." But, as we say in French, the hon. Prime Minister "a compté sans ses hôtes."

The amendment to the Address calls for a dissolution of the House. I should only be repeating arguments that have already been brought before the House by previous speakers were I to read articles which were written or cite speeches which were made during the election of 1917 to prove that at that time there was only one issue before the people, the question of the conduct of the war, that all other important questions were put aside for the moment, and that whenever we tried to discuss them with the electors in our different constituencies, this same answer came every time: "This is not the time to discuss these questions. This is a war election, and when the war is over the Government will resign and go to the country and we will then discuss all these important questions in the interests of the people.' I may be permitted however, Mr. Speaker, to quote a brief extract from an article published in that now famous paper known as "Knots and Lashings," supervised by the Government, in its issue of December 15, 1917. I read:

> There is one and only one election issue to be considered: shall we send reinforcements to the Front? If we shall aid our comrades, vote Union. If we shall desert our comrades, vote another way. The coming election is unique in two respects. It is being fought upon one issue, and one only,—that of compulsory service by the selective draft system. There are no other issues, because no other issue is big enough to intrude itself or be forced upon the consideration of men who are called upon to determine whether Canada is to hold her share of the line or drop out.

Sir, this was published in that most famous paper, which gave precise instructions to the men as to how they could perjure themselves and at the same time escape, through the good offices of a benevolent commissioner, the gaol penalty.

I will also deal, after referring to the omissions in the Speech from the Throne, with the—what shall I call it?—"please come-to-my-rescue" attitude of the Government towards Quebec, and I shall apply lightly—oh, very lightly, Mr. Speaker—the sterilized tweezers to the abscess which last Thursday came to a head in this House, burst, spurted out, and splashed the high ethics of parliamentary decency and the victim himself.

What are the issues which are not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne but which are of momentous interest to the House and to the country, and on which the Government never had any mandate to decide policies? First, there is the railway problem. Then there is the question of the government-owned merchant marine. Then there is the Imperial Conference which is to be held in London next June. There is also the question of loans to bankrupt countries. These are momentous questions, which every one will admit were not discussed during the elections of 1917 and on which the Government has policies which were not determined, were not even presented or discussed with the people at that time. The Government has inaugurated most definite and novel policies on most of these questions, for the determination of which they have no mandate; nevertheless there is not a line about these matters in the speech from the Throne.

Take the railway policy for example. No one will deny that the railway question in this country is a most important one. No one will deny that prior to 1917, when the Canadian Northern Railway deal was being put through, and in 1919, when the Grand Trunk deal was put through, the policy of the Canadian people with regard to railways was private ownership. Can any hon. gentleman say that this question was discussed before the electorate? Can any hon. gentleman say that this Government went before the people in 1917, with the statement that they had decided to change from the time-immemorial Canadian Railway policy of private ownership to nationalization? Simply to ask the question is to get the answer that the Government had no mandate to determine such a policy.

I remember attempting to discuss this question of the Canadian Northern with a Liberal of my riding who expressed his regret that, for the first time in his life, he had to give a vote against Sir Wilfrid Laurier: He said to me, "I am against this Government on practically every measure that they have brought into the House; I do not accept their policy; I blame them for many things; I blame them, for instance, in connection with the question of nationalization of railways. But," he said, "there is only one question, the question of conscription"—and I wish you, Sir, to consider this remark—"and do you think that men like Mr. Carvell, Mr. Maclean and Mr. Guthrie who in Parliament have been bitterly opposed to nationalization of railways, would have entered the Union Government if this question could have been settled by the Union Government? "No," he told me, "these men entered the Union Government for the purpose of winning the war because they thought conscription was the best policy; but they are going to resign as soon as the war is over, because we have the promise from the Government that the Union Government was formed only during the time of the war; they will go to the people; they will discuss all these questions, and I shall be very happy to join again the ranks of the Liberal party."

Practically every country in the world has tried the policy of nationalization of railways and has discarded it. It would be tedious to the House if I were to read articles coming from different countries showing the utter failure of nationalization of railways; but may I be permitted to read just a few lines from the annual report of the president of our greatest financial institution, the Bank of Montreal? I quote the words of Sir Vincent Meredith:

> Canada to-day has a very large national railway system which is being operated at a heavy loss, thereby increasing the load on an already heavily taxburdened country. Sooner or later some means must be found to relieve this situation. Some confidently believe that by proper public administration of the lines, deficits can be cut down. My own view is that the proper solution will be found if the Government at the earliest feasible time, divests itself of ownership and operation of the roads and places them under corporate control upon terms fair to the country and upon conditions that will ensure the service for which the construction of the lines was undertaken.

Then there is the question of the Government-owned merchant marine. Can the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) state to the House that in 1917 when he ran in St. Lawrence, he discussed the question of a government-owned merchant marine with his electors? Can he say that he was elected on a policy of a government-owned merchant marine? I know that he cannot and he will admit that it was an entirely new departure from the usual and time-immemorial policy of the Canadian Government. Private ownership of merchant marine was the ordinary policy, and this is a new and novel policy. Has the Government then any mandate to go on and spend, as they did last year, $70,000,000 and to give contracts without tenders? Can any hon. member say that the Government has a mandate for such a policy? I will cite the opinion of the same gentleman, Sir Vincent Meredith, in the same annual report of the 7th December, 1920, regarding this policy:

> In the same connection, and speaking for myself alone, it would apepar desirable that no more national expenditure should be made for the building of ships. While a programme of shipbuilding during the war was commendable, subsequent developments dictate a modified policy. In June, 1914, the world tonnage totalled 49,000,000 tons; in June, 1920, it had risen to 57,300,000 tons, and, in addition, at the end of September this year there were 7,565,000 tons under construction. Tonnage at present exceeds requirements and in expectation of rate reduction and shrinkage in earnings, construction abroad has already been arrested, and empty tonnage is now laid up in many ports. There is no ground for the belief that this condition will quickly pass. The United States recently failed to secure bids for standard ships; Japan has cancelled orders for 1,000,000 tons in her own shipyards, and Norway is cancelling orders in Great Britain. These factors constitute, in my opinion, a danger signal that Canada might well heed and stop all further new construction.

Still, we read in the press that not later than a month or two months ago new Government ships were launched.

I come to another question which, in my opinion, is of paramount interest and of which also not a word was said in the speech from the Throne. There is to be held in London next June an Imperial Conference to which all the Prime Ministers of the Dominions have been invited and at which the internal as well as the external policy of the Empire is going to be discussed and decided. In the speech from the Throne at the opening of the British Parliament, His Majesty the King hoped that the conference would be "of the utmost value in bringing about co-ordination both in the external and the internal policy of the Empire." In a recent speech before the English-speaking union, Mr. Winston Churchill, the new minister for the colonies, referring to that conference, stated "that an effective policy regarding Ireland, Egypt, and India will be discussed."

Why, Sir, not later than the 16th of February, this present month, the Prime Minister of England in his opening speech in Parliament, spoke of the intended conference and about the Dominions taking a share in the defence of the Empire. He also announced a far-reaching change in Imperial relations. Only last summer, a distinguished visitor from Great Britain inquired of some newspaper men whether in the case of a rebellion in India, Canada would be ready to send troops. What is the policy of the Government on these matters? What is that far-reaching change that is foreshadowed in Imperial relations? Is it possible that when His Majesty the King deems it important enough to be referred to in the speech from the Throne, when the Prime Minister of England thinks it important enough to mention in his opening speech in Parliament, and when a high official coming to this country from England speaks of this conference, and the possibility of Canada sending troops to India, that the Prime Minister of this country thinks it so negligible a matter as not to interest the people of Canada.

What is the mandate that was given to the members of the Government on this question? We would like to know the policy of our delegates. We have had very commendable delegates, it is true, men of talent who have done honour to Canada, but they went to these conferences in Europe without telling the representatives of the people in Parliament what would be their policy, and without even asking the members of Parliament to determine a policy upon which they would stand. We had a very significant example of this state of affairs only recently when the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), before the League of Nations, proposed as an amendment to the League of Nations exactly what the Opposition proposed in the House, and which was voted down by the Government supporters. Then, Sir, I ask is it not fair to dissolve the House and formulate a policy on this most important question and let the people decide whether or not this policy is incompatible with Canadian interests.

I may be asked where I stand on this matter. I will be very frank and brief. I want the delegates not to deviate from the principle that under all circumstances no matter that they may be, Canada's interests shall be first and foremost at all times.

Sir, through the will of Providence, we descendants of France became British subjects. Nature itself forbids us to deny the blood which flows in our veins. We have preserved for our old motherland a filial love, a deep affection that will only die with the race itself. It is the same love which I find amongst my English-speaking compatriots for the country of their origin. As I said before, through circumstances we became British subjects, and as such we enjoy important privileges and liberties. It is our duty and our interest to have for Great Britain a loyal and devoted respect, but although we have that respect and that loyalty nobody can reasonably expect from us towards Great Britain and the Empire the same love born of the ties of kinship that is embedded in the hearts of our English-speaking compatriots; although we piously preserve for old France a deep affection, although we have a great respect and loyalty and devotion for England, there is another country which we love more, nay, a hundred times more than England or France, a country which deserves to occupy first place in the hearts of every true Canadian. It is my only country; it is the country in whose sacred soil seven generations of my ancestors are sleeping their last slumber; it is that vast half continent bordered by three oceans, broad enough for every race and every creed, sprinkled with silver lakes and rivers, containing in its bossom inexhaustible wealth, covered by verdant mountains and golden prairies, and draping itself in winter with a vast ermine cloak. I love that country more than France or England, and you, Mr. Speaker, like me, must notice a deep feeling grip hold of your throat when its blessed name flows from your lips—it is le Canada, mon pays, mes amours.

Sir, there is another question on which this Government has no mandate, a question which was never discussed during the elections of 1917. It is the question of the Purchasing Commission. Sir, in olden days ministers were courageous enough to take the responsibility of the management of their departments, but now, purchasing has been turned over to an irresponsible commission. It was created during the war, I understand, and probably was very useful during the war, but, of course, this policy was not discussed in the election of 1917. Was it ever approved by the people?

Was it even approved by the members of this House? If I remember well, the Bill, as my hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) stated the other day, was introduced in the House in 1919, and it was killed, the hon. member who made the most aggressive attack on the Bill being a supporter of the Government, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Stewart). It was reintroduced by another minister last year, but in face of impending disaster the sponge was thrown into the ring, and the Bill died a peaceful death. But the new Prime Minister, who claims to be a democratic Prime Minister, willing to submit to the will of the people and of the members of Parliament, if I am not mistaken, passed an order-in-council reviving the Commission, in utter disregard of the will of the people and the members of Parliament. Surely, the Government will not contend that they have a mandate to follow this new policy of shifting the responsibility for purchasing from the shoulders of the ministers of the different departments on to the shoulders of an irresponsible commission.

I could enumerate many other things of which there was no discussion in 1917 and for which the Government has no mandate. But let me come immediately to a matter in regard to which everyone will admit without the slightest hesitation that the Government has not even the semblance of a mandate. I refer to the love-making to Quebec. Anyone familiar with the appeals that were made in 1917 at the last general election will readily admit that not only was the Government not given a mandate to make love to Quebec, but that, on the contrary, those who voted for the Government gave them a specific mandate to ostracise Quebec; and now they are changing their policy and, I must say, are proving wholly false to their trust when they court Quebec.

Why, Sir, the rallying cry of 1917 was this: "Shall Quebec rule? Down with Quebec!" and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and even in the trenches in France and at social teas in London, wherever a large vote was gathered, this was the slogan: "A vote for Laurier and for the Liberal party is a vote for Quebec and domination by Quebec." Impartial history will one day record that that same slanderous slogan had as much effect upon the electors as the other slogan with which it was coupled, namely, of winning the war. The Government has no mandate, I say, to make love to Quebec.

But it may be interesting to note and to speak for a while about the sudden affection, this newly-born love for my old province. In 1917 Quebec was a hindrance to Confederation: it was the contaminated black sheep of the family of this Dominion, which every other child was admonished and warned to shun; it was the backward, the ignorant, the outcast, the prejudiced, the priest-ridden province: I do not dare repeat the insults that were hurled at Quebec at that time, because if I did so I should be unparliamentary. Anyone who dared at that time to have intercourse with the Province of Quebec was banned from loyal and decent society. Quebec had to be isolated. But now, Sir, what do we see? The same papers that published these insults—I might say the same political stars who uttered these insults, and all these newspapers and public men that united in villifying her, cannot now find eulogies enough to extol Quebec's sane morals and institutions, and her sane love for law and order; and they even go so far as to concede that Quebec will be the last refuge of civilization in America, praying that she do not remain isolated from the rest of Canada.

What has happened? Has Quebec changed? Is she not the same province, the same law-abiding province, the same in heart and mentality, the same in her institutions as well as in her modus vivendi? No, Sir, Quebec has not changed: She is the same Quebec of 1917, of 1867, of 1840, of 1759, and of 1642. She has the same habits, the same institutions, the same religious love for law and order, the same respect for her devoted clergy. And she goes along topping the other provinces in agriculture, in industry, in social advancement, in increase in population, in absence of unrest, following the destiny God has laid down for her, and undisturbed by the social unrest around her. And as Quebec believes in the principle that insults and compliments are alike always exaggerated, she is not any more over-joyed now by the incense of flattery of which she is the recipient, than she was over-awed or over-excited by the mud that was slung at her in 1917.

Then, Mr. Speaker, you will probably ask me, if Quebec has not changed, whether the Government has changed. No, Sir. It is the same Tory administration with the same policy, and with the same friends, many of them still living, and with the same slanderers as in 1917. The bottom of their hearts, or what they have in the place where their hearts should be, is still the same. Well, how is the situation to be explained if the Government has not changed and if Quebec is the same as she always was? Sir, the circumstances have changed. A new party has arisen in the country. That new party is not very friendly to the Government, and in order to retain power an alliance must be made with Quebec. So the orders have been given—tactical orders, I must say—to the slanderer and the fire-brand not to put any more coal on the fire, to close the dampers, to open the doors of the furnace and cover the fire with ashes for a while. But, Mr. Speaker, you can believe me, the fire is not altogether out, and if the Government found it necessary to stir it again in order to win an election, there is not an hon. member who would say that they would hesitate for a moment to open the dampers, to shut the doors again, to shake the furnace anew and to feed the fire with more coal. But, Sir, my province's motto is "Je me souviens"—I remember. Quebec will forgive; her religion obliges her to do so; but Quebec will not easily forget. On the contrary, she will remember. She will remember those who have slandered and insulted her as well as she will remember the stalwart English-speaking Liberals of the other provinces who stood by her in her hour of trial.

Some people say that we are isolated. From whom are we isolated? We are isolated from the Government. It surprised me the other day on reading an address from the Prime Minister to see that he had deplored the isolation of Quebec. If the Prime Minister were now in his seat I would simply ask him this: If he is in earnest in his desire to stop the isolation of Quebec, let him dissolve the House and bring on a general election. He would then find out that it is not Quebec but the Government that is isolated. Why, Sir, if we were to respond to the appeal of the Government, if we were to make an alliance with them, we would be isolated for the rest of our lives; we would be isolated as soon as the next election took place. The journals and public men of my province do not admit that we are isolated but in this connection it may be of interest to read an extract from an editorial published in the Toronto Globe of 11th September, 1920. The caption is "Office is not the true bond," and it goes on to say:

> It is the Government that is isolated from Canada. It has lost touch, not only with Quebec, but with the greater part of Canada. The temporary isolation of Quebec, due to causes which need not here be considered, is coming to an end and may almost be said to have disappeared. There is no fear of permanent isolation. French-Canadians can very well afford to wait.

The young French-Canadian when he goes to school reads a little book. It is a very interesting little book and very easy for a young mind to read, but at the same time very literary. The work has already been cited in this House this session. I refer to the Fables of Lafontaine. That work contains more philosophy than other books written by the great philosophers of all time. There are two fables in it which are particularly interesting. There is first the fable of the goat and the fox, and then there is the fable of the wolf and the stork. If I might give a resume in a few words, of the fable of the goat and the fox it is this: A goat and a fox were travelling in company. They had walked for quite a while and had developed a very strong thirst. Of course they were not in Ontario. When they came to a well they looked down into it and found that it was very deep. Nevertheless they were so thirsty they went down the well and after having satisfied their thirst they looked up and noticed its height. The fox saw that he could not reach the top without assistance, so turning to the goat he said, "You are a pretty big fellow, and with your front legs you can probably reach the top of the well. Why don't you put your front legs on the top of the well? Then I will run up your back, and when I am at the top I will pull you up;" and the goat believed him. The fox ran up the back of the goat and when he was up of course he could not pull the goat out but he made a speech. He made a speech to the goat on isolation. He said he was very, very sorry that the poor goat had got isolated at the bottom of the well and he spoke about the virtue of patience and resignation. Well, Sir, Quebec will not be the goat that will enable the foxy Prime Minister to run up its back to get out of the well he is in now.

There is also, as I said before, another fable—the fable of the stork and the wolf. There was a wolf which was very fond of birds; he used to play havoc with flocks of birds whenever he encountered them. He was very partial to storks and one day, after having made an onslaught on a flock of storks and having eaten three or four of them, a large bone stuck in his throat and he was in danger of choking to death. At that moment he saw a big stork and said to him, "Come to my help. Come and pick this bone out of my throat so that I shall not choke. In return for that I will pay you well, I will be good to you." The stork was a little bit suspicious at first but finally, out of charity, extracted the bone from the wolf's throat and then asked for his salary. The wolf said "Salary! You are very lucky that I did not eat you while your head was in my mouth," and the stork became wise. I may say to the Government and the Prime Minister that the province of Quebec is a wise stork that will keep away from the wolf that will not pick the bone out of its throat; and besides the stork is a pretty popular bird in my province.

Now, Sir, I come to the disagreeable part of my address. Last Thursday we witnessed an unprecedented spectacle in our political annals, in fact a spectacle unprecedented in the annals of British Parliamentary history. In the past, Sir, men have severed relations with their party but they have always expressed regret in doing so. When the late Hon. Mr. Blair resigned from the Laurier Administration on the question of the construction of the Transcontinental railway he expressed his regret at having to leave his former friends. Also when the hon. Mr. Patenaude resigned from the Borden Government on the question of conscription he likewise expressed regret at having to leave his former associates. When the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) left the Union Government he also parted company on a question of principle, and he expressed his regret at having to leave his former friends. What happened last Thursday? Did the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), who then publicly left the Liberal party and his former friends, regret that he had to do so on a question of principle? He did not. To my mind, Sir, he was following orders. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, I repeat, was following orders. He was playing the third act of a four-act performance.

The first act was the preliminary conversation which the Prime Minister about his entering the Cabinet, and we had notice of it in the newspapers during the fall. The second act was the wholesale protestation of the Conservative heads of the district of Montreal, and so strong was their protestation that the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) hesitated. The third act was the carrying out of the orders of the Prime Minister to the hon. gentleman—orders which unfortunately were executed publicly last Thursday. Those orders were to publicly sever his connection not only with the Federal Liberal party, but the Provincial Liberal party—with all his friends of the Liberal party—and to clear himself of two grave accusations that had been levelled against him a few years ago. The fourth act was to be his entrance into the Cabinet. Will it ever be performed? I have my doubts, Sir, because the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe and Rouville overdid the third act.

Why, sir, who will believe for one moment that a man who had been connected with the Liberal party for over a quarter of a century, who had assisted at every caucus, who had always voted with us, who had attacked the Government violently every time occasion arose, who even last summer in his own constituency attacked the Government, and who had never protested against our policy, should come to the point like he did last Thursday and viciously attack all his former friends without exception? Who could believe that a man who six months ago in his own paper wrote a laudatory article about the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspe (Mr. Lemieux), could have made the vulgar, coarse and uncalled for attack on the hon. member as he did last Thursday?

Well, the hon. gentleman must have brought comfort to his new friends, if they thought of inviting him to their caucus, when he related to the House what purported to be a discussion in a caucus of the Liberal party between the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster) and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). An expression of apprehension passed over the face of the Prime Minister when this incident was related. May I surmise, sir, that the Prime Minister had a vision of the possibility of a future similar incident happening in his own party?

But the hon. gentleman did not last Thursday say that he accepted the views of the hon. member for Brome or the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. On the contrary he ridiculed what he described as the different attitudes of the two hon. members. But I remember well, not later than last session, my hon. friend answered the hon. member for Centre Van-
5 p.m. couver (Mr. Stevens who had been attacking the Liberal party on this question. That hon. member had then said:

Now, I should like to proceed to review briefly the attitude of my hon. friends opposite as given to the House and to the country in speeches delivered by the leading critics of the Opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the hon. member for Brome.

After stating what free trade was, the hon. member for Centre Vancouver added:

But it is quite possible that the best of principles may be carried too far.

He was referring to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. Referring to the hon. member for Brome, he said that that gentleman had thus expressed himself:

That is the policy—referring to free trade—which the Liberal party aim at in the future; that is the policy which I wish to see adopted in this country.

In answering the hon. member for Centre Vancouver the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe and Rouville then said, and his words will be found at page 2606 of volume 3 of Hansard of last session:

My hon. friend has taken a great deal of pains to show to the House and to the country that there was a contradiction between the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Any man belonging to a party and speaking in his individual name has a right to give his individual opinion; but if he belongs to a party and if he wishes to remain in that party, he must adhere to the platform of that party. The Liberal party held a convention in August of last year; they propounded their policy, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the hon. member for Brome, when they speak for the Liberal party, must adhere to that party's platform as propounded at that convention. But it is strange to me that my hon. friends would go to such pains to find contradictions in the policy propounded by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, when he himself declared to the House and to the country that he is going to support this Government which has no policy at all.

As I have to go rapidly over a few extracts, I will not make any comments, but will leave the House to judge the difference between the statements made by my hon. friend on Thursday and the statements he made in the House last session.

My hon. friend says that he is for protection, and that the protection issue is the lofty reason why he severs his connection with the Liberal party. He does not want a reduction of the tariff. But in the same volume, at page 2610, we find a speech of the hon. member and in it occurs a remarkable utterance regarding the tariff. He who is now for protection and who does not want any reduction in the tariff said on that occasion:

I would say to the Government: Stop the profiteers and you will strike at the root of the high cost of living; there is no other way. You cannot instantly delate your currency because it would mean ruin to the country; but strike at the very root of the evil and you will cure the unrest which that evil engenders. I say again: Reduce the tariff and you will help to reduce the cost of living.

The policy followed by this Administration has had the result of creating an unrest which continues to grow every day and every week, and this policy is proved by its results to be wrong. Change it; reduce the tariff and you will reduce the cost of living.

The hon. gentleman stated last Thursday that we were not consistent. Let us see how consistent he himself is. Last year he voted for an amendment similar to the one which is now before the House, against which he declared himself last Thursday. Not only did he vote for that amendment; he spoke in favour of it. Every hon. gentleman will remember that that was the occasion on which he said that the hour of Quebec had struck. Now, what did the hon. member say? I find his words at page 65 of Hansard, Volume I, of last session The hon. member said with regard to the amendment:

Whatever the Government may say or do, nobody believes that they represent the people or that they were elected through a franchise which represented public opinion. Nobody believes it. They may say we have a sound and well balanced Government. But they are alone to say so and I think they do not even believe what they say.

Then he goes on:

In the public interest, gentlemen—

The hon. member evidently thought he was on the hustings.

In the public interest, gentlemen, do not hesitate to sink your personal ambitions to make up your mind to renounce the sweets of office, go to the country apeal to the people, and should the people through means I do not wish to qualify here, wish to give you another lease of power, you shall at least have public confidence behind you, you shall at least have the support of public opinion. Beware you do not tarry and wait till class feeling has reached such a pitch that you can no longer stem the tide. And that is why I cannot understand the position taken by the Government in refusing to accept the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

The hon. member said the other day that the natural alliance for the province of Quebec was an alliance with Ontario. He said, as reported on page 86 of Unrevised Hansard of this year:

I have claimed all along that the natural ally of Quebec is Ontario. Since 1912, after the defeat of reciprocity in 1911, in the ranks of my own party I have advocated that theory and preached it as a gospel.

This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that such a doctrine from the hon. member has reached my ears. But I did hear my hon. friend preach a doctrine with regard to an alliance with Ontario. Let us see what he said in 1918, as reported on page 1434 of Hansard, Volume 2, of that year, about an alliance with Ontario:

I said in my opening remarks that it was necessary to the welfare of the country that trade should not be disturbed and that peace and harmony should be restored. Some people contend—

The following words are very significant, Mr. Speaker.

Some people contend that this country is threatened with a yellow menace which is coming from the Asiatic continent. I believe that there is a yellow menace, but it is not coming from Asia; it is coming from Ontario It springs from Orange lodges and it sows hatred in order to reap votes at the polls.

Mr. DUFF: Who said that?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville. He also said in his speech the other day that he believed in the minority making an alliance with majorities when they cannot win them to their cause. Sir, I believe that a minority should fight for a principle, even if its fights without hope of success. But contrary to the opinion of my hon. friend, I believe not only that we have appealed to the majority, but that our appeal has been successful. Let the Government dissolve the House, and my hon. friend will find out whether or not I am right.

The hon. member also said in his speech that no one from the district of Montreal is proud of his leader, the hon. member from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). I may say that I for one am proud of him—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: —and if I can judge from the applause which greets my remarks, there are other hon. members from the district of Montreal who are proud of him. I am not only proud of him; I am proud of his patriotism, proud of his services to the country, proud of the honour which he has brought to the name of the province of Quebec.

I wish now, Sir, to correct an historical error which occurs in the hon. member's speech. With his usual modesty, the hon. member compared himself to Lafontaine and Cartier—Lafontaine in 1840 and Cartier in 1849. The hon. member, as reported on page 92 of Unrevised Hansard, speaking of the Act of Union and the unrest that the Act had created in Upper and Lower Canada at the time, said:

Then Louis Hypolyte Lafontaine came into the public arena.

He appealed to the majority in the country and appealed to his own people, and the Union Act was passed.

Why, Sir, I was under the impression—and every man who knows the history of Canada can support my contention—that Lafontaine fought bitterly against the Act of Union, that a Tory Government at that time headed by Draper and aided by Lord Sydenham, did what this Government did in 1917—disfranchised numbers of the people. They even went so far as to go to the county of Terrebonne, where Lafontaine was running, with loaded revolvers to prevent the electors from registering their votes.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I do not know how I was reported, but any scholar must know that what I meant was, according to history, that Lafontaine came to have the Act of Union of Upper and Lower Canada accepted by the province of Ontario as in the province of Quebec. That is what I meant.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Of course, we have to accept my hon. friend's statement. But let me read again what my hon. friend said as reported on page 92 of Hansard:

Then Louis Hypolyte Lafontaine came into the public arena. He appealed to the majority in the country and appealed to his own people, and the Union Act was passed.

Nobody will infer from those remarks that Lafontaine came in only after the Act had been passed. Lafontaine, in a most famous speech which he made at the time, said:

Another question of no less importance is the Act of Union of the two provinces. It is an act of injustice and despotism because it was imposed on us without our consent; because it deprives Lower Canada of her legitimate representation, because it deprives us of the use of our language in the legislative proceedings, notwithstanding the treaties and the word of the Governor, because it forces us to pay without our consent a debt which we have not contracted, because it allows the executive to take possession illegally, under the name of the Civil List, without the vote of the representatives of the people of an enormous part of the revenues of the country.

My hon. friend may have been badly reported, but I hope when I repeat the words, reported in Hansard, of what he said about Cartier, he will not find again the same excuse. As regards Cartier, my hon. friend said:

Then in 1849, when the annexation memorandum was signed, and when the Parliament Buildings in Montreal were burned, when this country was on the verge of disruption, Cartier arose and appealed to the majority and to my people and they united together and peace was restored once more.

Cartier became a minister of the Crown only in 1855 and had nothing to do with the restoration of peace in 1849—peace which had been destroyed, together with the Parliament Buildings, by the loyal Tories of the time, who also assailed the representative of the Crown, His Excellency the Governor General, Lord Elgin.

I am very sorry that the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) is not in his seat, as it might be very encouraging to him to listen again to some remarks made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville regarding the Government. Speaking on conscription on the 21st June, 1917, as reported in Hansard, volume 3, page 2553, the hon. member said:

In order that everybody should be satisfied, the Solicitor General this afternoon, in his most suave manner, assured the people of Quebec not to worry, because the Bill would bear more lightly upon Quebec than upon the other provinces. . . . . We resent the insult whether direct or indirect. . . . . I will not allow any hon. gentleman to cast a slur upon us. I am not a minister of the Crown in this Government, thank Heaven!

This reminds me, Sir, of the other day when the hon. gentleman threw up his hands and said: "God save the Liberal party!"

Mr. TRAHAN: Who was the Solicitor General at that time?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Meighen). There is something I might say that is even more edifying, and we find it in Hansard of 1917, volume 6, page 5824. I might tell the House that the discussion was on the War-time Elections Act which had been introduced by the Solicitor General, now the Prime Minister, and this is what the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville said about this Act:

It has been said that the franchise legislation laid before this Parliament would be worthy of the German Kaiser. I think it is doing an injustice to the Kaiser, to compare him to this Government. . . . . Now, what do we see in this House? The most iniquitous measures, the most unjust and the most outrageous to the liberty of the citizens, are introduced into Parliament, and in what way? As the sponsor for such a Bill—

And the hon. member was referring to the then Solicitor General, now the Prime Minister.

—they pick out the man with the softest, the mellowest voice, a real eunuch's voice, might I say to express its full justness and sweetness.

This epithet attached to the quality of the voice of the Prime Minister might be the interesting subject of further conferences between the two hon. gentlemen. I will not speak of the grotesque and sacrilegious comparison the hon. gentleman has made between himself and St. John the Baptist, nor of the whole hour he took in trying to repulse accusations made against him a few years ago; but I will leave to his meditation words that he has spoken himself regarding the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), and that can be found at pages 76 and 77 of Volume 1 of Hansard of the session of 1919. I will leave the hon. gentleman to meditate over these words in an endeavour to find out if they do not apply to another member of this House apart from the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. The hon. member said:

The hon. minister also told us that "he was still a Liberal and that nobody could put him out." . . . The hon. gentleman announces that he is still a Liberal, that he was a Liberal when he entered the Cabinet, and that he will remain one. I shall not enter into any discussion with him on that point. I shall not discuss his motives for leaving the party, it is no business of mine. But speaking for myself, I tell the hon. gentleman I do not regret his exit from our ranks. When the fruit becomes too ripe, Mr. Speaker, it falls from the tree which has given it life and which has brought it to maturity. The tree still continues to grow and to give its own life to other fruit, but the fruit which has fallen to the ground is destined for destruction.

I will simply add—and that will be my last word—that my advice to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville is: Discuss these words with the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, and ponder upon them seriously, because "birds of a feather flock together."

Mr. CHARLES SHEARD (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to give a silent vote on this issue as is often my custom and I crave the indulgence of the House for a moment or two while I make a few remarks. I have endeavoured to follow the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) who has just taken his seat, and have tried to fix my attention on the little family quarrel there has been among hon. gentlemen opposite. Personally, I am not particularly concerned in that. The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) claims to be the John the Baptist of Quebec. Whether he is or not it is not for me to say, but certainly his colleagues seem to pay some regard to that claim. Personally, I cannot see on what ground the claim is made, but we do know that John the Baptist lost his head, and further we know why he lost it. It was demanded by a danseuse of questionable virtue, as the price of King Herod's pleasure. I do not know who represents that maiden who demanded the head, or who represents Herod, in the case before us. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat had some questions to ask regarding the policy of the Government, and one which appeared to my mind to be important was as to what the policy of this Government would be at the Imperial Council. Has my hon. friend forgotten that this party has embodied the national policy of the old Conservative party? It is the same policy for which the Conservative governments in the motherland and in all the Dominions have ever stood. It is the Imperial policy. I want to read a clearer and better explanation than I could give of the Imperial complexion of that policy. I was tempted to give this quotation as I listened to the question which was put by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères, and which, if I remember correctly, was this: "What will be the policy of this Government at the Imperial Council?" Then he went on to say "I stand for Canadian interests first, foremost and at all times." Well, I venture to say there is no Imperial or national policy in that. There is not a Canadian in this House but who stands for the same thing according to his light. There is not a Canadian who has ever attained a place in this House who would presume to stand in Canada for anything else. I want to read to the House a statement made by Lord Beaconsfield in Manchester in the month of April, 1872, when this question was under discussion. Yes, that is some time ago. This great Conservative fraught with all the knowledge of the past, and almost prescient of the future, gave utterance to this statement which I will read in the hope that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) may profit thereby. This is Lord Beaconsfield's statement, not mine:

> If you look to the history of this country since the advent of Liberalism forty years ago, you will find there has been no effort so continuous, so subtle, supported by so much energy and carried on with so much ability and acumen, as the attempts of Liberalism to affect the disintegration of the Empire of England and of all its efforts, this is the one which has been the nearest to success; statesmen of the highest character, writers of the most distinguished ability, the most organized and efficient means have been employed in this endeavour. It has been proved by all of us that we have lost money by our colonies; it has been shown with precise and mathematical demonstration that there never was a jewel in the crown of England that was so truely costly as the possession of India. How often has it been suggested that we should at once emancipate ourselves from this incubus? Well, that result was nearly accomplished when those subtle views were adopted by the country under the plausible plea of granting self government to the colonies. Not that I for one object to self government but self government in my opinion when it was conceded, ought to have been conceded as part of the great policy of Imperial consolidation. It ought to have been accompanied with an Imperial tariff. It ought further to have been accompanied by some representative council in the metropolis which would have brought the colony into constant and continuous relations with the home government. All this, however, was omitted because those who advised that policy (and I believe their convictions were sincere) looked upon the colonies of England, looked even upon our connection with India, as a burden on this country, viewing the financial aspect by those moral and political considerations which make nations great and by the influence of which alone men are distinguished from the animals. Well, what has been the result of this attempt during the reign of Liberalism for the disintegration of the Empire. It has entirely failed but how has it failed; through the sympathies of the colonies with the mother country. They have decided that the Empire shall not be destroyed and in my opinion no minister in this country will do his duty who neglects any opportunity of reconstructing as much as possible our Colonial Empire and of responding to those distinct sympathies which may become the source of incalculable strength and happiness to this land.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): May I ask the hon. member whether these views, expressed so eloquently by Lord Beaconsfield, are the views which he thinks his party stands for to-day?

Mr. SHEARD: Those were the views of Lord Beaconsfield, the leader of the old Conservative party in England in 1872 and I say that those views prepared the public mind for an Imperial Council, and a union of the colonies through colonial representation in England. That is going to be effected, I understand, in the coming year. The colonies will meet to discuss their fiscal and other relations with the Empire.

Mr. BUREAU: There are no colonies now. We are sister nations.

Mr. SHEARD: Yes, we have got a group of nations, and all the better if we have, if we are going to work in harmony together. The trouble with hon. members opposite is that they are out of step with the great national ideals and aspirations; they are out of step with Canada, and want to claim that it is the fault of the Government. They isolated themselves; no one on this side of the House, no one representing any constituency on this side, has ever isolated Quebec. Quebec took her stand on the issue of conscription. The then leader of the Liberal party had a policy and he had the courage to announce that policy; all honour to him. He said that he opposed conscription because he did not believe in the principle of coercion; that the people of the province of Quebec would not submit to coercion. That, as I understand it, was the issue; it was a proper issue for him to take. No one found fault with him for taking that issue, but we did not agree with him, and as a consequence he put the province of Quebec where it is; as a result of his policy it was isolated. It was not the Prime Minister; it was not the Government; it was Quebec's own determination.

Mr. BUREAU: Do not cry over our isolation; cry over your own.

Mr. SHEARD: I am not advising you as to what you are to do, nor am I inviting you.

Mr. BUREAU: I hope not.

Mr. SHEARD: But members opposite are contending that their isolation is due to some iniquity on the part of the Government. They are oblivious to everything else but their own lack of force and power. Well, since then they have a new leader and they claim that we ought to get out because we were elected simply and solely to win the war. As I have often heard it repeated that we were elected as a war government and for no other purpose than to win the war, I have often wondered what was the function of the Opposition? Were they here in the Dominion of Canada's Parliament to oppose winning the war? I cannot understand the consistency of their attitude at all.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh, that joke is exploded.

Mr. SHEARD: Yes, and there will be something else exploded in the province of Quebec before long, and the autocrats who are at the head and throttle of every effort to strangle free speech and other expressions of independence of character the very moment they are manifest will perhaps realize that even in Quebec the people rule.

Mr. BUREAU: In Toronto too.

Mr. SHEARD: Yes, there is free speech in Toronto, and we shall be glad to have an address from the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). Any time he wants to come we will give him a hall.

Mr. DUFF: Admission by ticket?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SHEARD: No, sir; we will have the doors wide open and will let the hon. gentleman hear, for once before he dies, the true echo of the voice of Canada; and there will be no free trade in it and no material reduction in the tariff.

Now, a good deal has been said of what the Union Government projected in the year 1917. I was one of those who had the privilege and pleasure of hearing the then Prime Minister's speech in that campaign; and I remember quite clearly certain points which he put forward as embodying the policy of the Government. The main one was the pledging of the country to conscription. The next was the abolition of patronage, and there was considerable talk in the city of Toronto regarding that issue, and some discontent, I will admit, was manifest. It required considerable explanation and it was made a very prominent feature in the speech delivered there by the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman then took up somewhat in detail the conditions that would arise out of the war, and we are still dealing with them now.

It has been stated in this debate that there is general discontent in the country; that the soldiers are discontented; that the labour unions are discontented; that the aliens are discontented; that the province of Quebec is discontented. Well, I come from one of the largest manufacturing centres in this Dominion and I have heard no discontent expressed regarding this Government. I have heard, however, decided and emphatic expressions from the organized labour parties of the city of Toronto that they want proper representation by population, and they have instructed me, as one of their representatives, to see that this Government gives it to them and sits in office till the lawful time arrives when we can have a new census and can have all votes equal. Now we have in Toronto about one vote to three votes in the rural districts. We have a population of about 550,000, and, I think, some six representatives. We want that changed, and we are going to sit here if we can until it is changed. We are going to give to those centres the representation to which they are entitled; and if the cities and towns in the West, which our Agrarian friends represent, have the increased representation which they ought to have, are they not entitled to it? Is not that the spirit and idea of representation by population? After all, I take it that there is some force in the justice of the demand.

But we know perfectly well under the present conditions that the tariff policy is going to be a very important one. It is going to be the issue, whether hon. gentlemen wish it or not, and they know it. They are fully aware of that, and they think they will have a better chance, if there is not the full representation given to the mercantile and the manufacturing and industrial centres, which they will get under the redistribution, and where there has been shown the geratest increase in population.

The leader of the Opposition made a great flowery and educational speech in which he seemed to have adopted as his policy, so far as I could discern any policy —and I read his speech over a couple of times—a new slogan: "Quo warranto." There is one matter, he says, which transcends all others in importance, and that is the present position of the Government and of this Parliament in relation to the will of the people. The Government has no right to office because such is not the will of the people; it is the Government that is defective. Well, I entered this Parliament a comparatively new member to learn parliamentary procedure. I found members who were definitely pledged, and elected on their pledge, to support this Government and to assist them in all measures which they considered necessary and essential to succour and support our troops at the front, and I was somewhat surprised to find that before six weeks had elapsed they were crawling to the cross benches to fight hammer and tongs to beat the Government.

Some of these gentlemen sit on the opposite benches now. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) is one. He is one of those who are now fighting strenuously against the present Government, and I ask what, in his case, became of the will of the people? Did he go back to get the opinion of his constituents on his attitude? Not a bit of it. He took the matter into his own hands. He said, "I am not going to sit there and support the Government although I was elected to do so. I am going to cross the floor of the House and sit with the Opposition and I am going to hammer the Government;" and he and others have been hammering the Government ever since. Do my hon. friends imagine that the public are going to take any great stock or pay much attention to the cry that this Government does not represent the people in the face of such actions on the part of hon. gentlemen sitting in opposition? I fancy these questions will be raised when we do have a general election.

Then the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères discussed the railway policy and the nationalization of railways. I well remember when the legislation for that purpose was introduced and the debate which took place upon it. I well recall the Minister of Railways asking the leader of the Opposition what his policy was on the nationalization of railways, and if I remember correctly the latter replied that he was quite prepared to announce a policy when he should be called upon to assume the responsibility of framing it. Well, that is on all fours with his attitude on the tariff. He does not want to announce his policy on the tariff. He has not got any policy. He has an association with the Agrarian members of this House who are sincere in wanting free-trade.

I acquit our Agrarian friends of any insincerity. They are demanding free-trade and they are going to work to get it, and they are going to have a large section of the West behind them in trying to get it if I understand the situation. But do not imagine for one moment that they are going to compromise themselves by taking any office under, or associating with, the befogged leader of the Opposition. They are going to frame the fiscal policy of the country if they have the power to do it and have the necessary number of votes behind them, and they are going to make the Government in office dance to the tune which they will play. Then my hon. friends opposite will have to declare what their fiscal policy is under their present leader.

Will the leader of the Opposition, or any living man, be able to frame or carry out a policy which will suit the province of Quebec and also suit our Agrarian friends who are demanding with all sincerity the adoption of free-trade in Canada? The people of Quebec know, just as well as I do, that their interests are the same as those of many of the other provinces. What they want is a policy of reasonable protection to maintain the industries and maintain the use of the native products of Canada to be worked by our own workmen into finished articles; and no Government that adopts any other policy can long endure in the province of Quebec.

The leader of the Opposition does not know what his policy is on the nationalization of railways, and cannot declare it to-day. We know that the province of Quebec is in favour of the private ownership of railways. We know that the province of Ontario is crying out for the nationalization of railways. There you have the two sets of conditions, and we have to harmonize them and bring them into accord so as to secure the greatest good for the greatest number. As for us in the large centres of Ontario, we stand for nationalization of railways and we are going to work out the experiment as we now have it, although it is not of our seeking. It originated from a number of blunders and from mal-administration of railway problems in the whole Dominion on the part of a previous government. Still we are going to try and work the problem out to its ultimate end for the good of the great majority of the people. No doubt the province of Quebec will watch with interest the working out of the experiment.

We have been told a great deal about the influence of the by-elections, and the result in West Peterborough, Peterborough has been brought up as an example to terrify the Government. Well, the only one who carried out the idea announced by the leader of the Opposition was the former member for West Peterborough who sat in the House last year. Apparently the Opposition converted him into thinking that the best thing he could do was to have an election in his constituency. He tried the experiment on himself, he had an election, and where is he to-day? He is at home, and it will be a long time before we will follow any such leader as that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: You will take no chance.

Mr. SHEARD: As to what has been said about the ostracism of Quebec I regret it because I am earnestly desirous of seeing a united Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: Do not brag; we are all right.

Mr. SHEARD: I return the compliment. I have great admiration for many of the representatives of the province of Quebec. I think they are very fine Canadians, so much so that in my opinion Canada would lose by not having them. With their polish, their graciousness of manner, their cordiality, and a great many more fine attributes—inherent to the race from which they spring—which have descended to them, we want them in the national life of Canada. We want union and harmony. We want the development of a large, free and progressive nation. We want a united people, we want to have Canadians united and animated by a love for Canada, and we do not want these petty differences that we have seen manifested so pointedly here this afternoon, and which we on this side regret.

We extend to hon. gentlemen opposite our commiseration on the quarrels in their ranks. We do not like the leadership which hon. gentlemen opposite appear to have. We take issue with hon. gentlemen opposite on their policy. Nay, we deplore their lack of policy. We deplore the condition that was so well illustrated last night by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) when he showed us that hon. gentlemen opposite have one policy apparently in Peterborough, Ontario and another policy in Kamloops, British Columbia. They have a policy for every day in the year and a policy to suit the weather, whether the sun shines or whether there is a down-pour of rain.

Listening to the efforts of the leader of the Opposition I was reminded of what occurred to me once when I was a boy. I was out with others working on a farm. It was in the spring of the year and the wheat was just sprouting in the field. In Ontario, you know, the farmers are very careful about their wheat, because a great deal of labour is required to produce it and to get it to grow, and the farmers have to fallow their ground. Well a number of us boys were going out one day and we were crossing a wheat field. "Hey" shouted the farmer who owned the field, "Get out of that wheat field, that is not the road." One of our numbers said "Mister, do you know where we are going?" "No," said the farmer, "I do not." "How then do you know," asked our companion "That this is not the road?" It appears to me that this story illustrates the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. We ask them "Where are you going?" But they do not know the road, and the leader at their head does not know either. How can a man lead when he does not know where he is going. For my part I like to follow a leader who knows the road. We know that disasters often befall men who do not know where they are going —do not know whether they are going north or going south, and I honestly gather from the speeches of the hon. leader of the Opposition that that is about his position on this question.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and discuss some points about the tariff, but as I may possibly have a word or two to say when the Budget is uppermost, and as I want to make my points as clearly applicable as I can to the debate as it has occurred from day to day, I will leave it at that now. I hope the gentlemen opposite will consider carefully their ultimate decision regarding the disposal of John the Baptist, that they will read anew the parable in the Scriptures and give it careful consideration, and that they will remember that history may draw its own interpretation as to the character of the men who took part in the debate and action upon that issue.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crerar the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 24, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED.

George Newcombe Gordon, Esq., member for the Electoral District of Peterborough West, introduced by Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Charles Murphy.

REPORT TABLED.

General Rules and Orders of the Exchequer Court, in accordance with the provisions of section 88 of the Exchequer Court Act, chapter 140., R.S.C., 1906.—Sir Henry Drayton.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. McMASTER: The object of this Bill is to make it incumbent upon members who accept portfolios to resign all directorships in incorporated companies.

[Mr. Sheard.]

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE LATE THOMAS P. OWENS.

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE EDITOR OF DEBATES.

On the orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have learned this morning the sad news of the death of a long-standing servant of this House, the Editor of Debates, Mr. Thomas P. Owens. Mr. Owens was first associated with the work of Parliament as Hansard reporter not less than thirty-three years ago, and on account of his very long and excellent service, I think an exception might be made to refer very briefly to him now. Previously to that, indeed, he occupied a place above your Chair, Sir, as representative of a leading Canadian newspaper. He, therefore, was virtually during the whole of his life in association with the Canadian House of Commons. He was appointed associate Editor of Debates in 1913; he became Editor of Debates in 1916; and the worth, indeed, the expertness of his services, is known and admitted by all who knew anything of his work. The warmth and geniality of his Irish character are also qualities that we shall one and all miss from this time forth, and many an hon. member of this House on either side will feel the loss of a kindly and attractive friend.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is eminently appropriate that reference should be made to the passing of one who for many years has been a highly valued and much trusted officer of the House of Commons staff: As my right hon. friend has said, Mr. T. P. Owens was associated with the staff of the House of Commons for a period of something like thirty-three years, first as a journalist, later as a reporter on the Hansard staff and for some years past as the chief of the Hansard staff and Editor of Debates. All hon. members of the House who knew him will feel at this time a deep sense of personal loss. They will miss one who at all times was the most kindly, courteous, open-hearted and affable of men. Mr. Owens held a position of great trust and responsibility. He took much pride in his work, and it was recognized, I think, by all that he brought to that important position qualities of judgment, of efficiency, of industry and of impartiality, which have helped to place the Canadian Hansard in the fore-front of the records of debates of any of the Parliaments or legislative assemblies in the world. We all deeply mourn his loss.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I was unaware, until I had taken my seat, that the late Editor of Debates of this House had passed to the Great Beyond. His death came as a shock to me. There is, I am sure, no member in this house who has not at some time experienced the kindness of our friend who has gone. I am, comparatively speaking, a young member in the House; I have not had the years of experience of either my right hon. friend who leads the Government (Mr. Meighen) or my hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King); but I know, as a comparatively new member of this House, one of the memories I shall always have with me is the uniform kindness of the treatment given to young members by Mr. Owens. At all times he was geniality itself. He was a faithful servant of this House; he often gave valuable assistance to young members who were getting acquainted for the first time with the work of this House. I am sure we shall all miss him, and his passing away is a loss not only to the House but to the country.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Order, "Orders of the Day."

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I rather expected to find, at least the Government Order with regard to a motion which was passed yesterday, under the heading of "Orders of the Day." That not being the case, with the permission of the House, I desire to move, pursuant to the motion passed yesterday, that we pass to Government Orders now, for the sake of taking up Government Order No. 1, that is to say, Bill No. 2, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite competent for the right hon. gentleman, without leave of the House, to move to proceed to Government Orders.

Motion agreed to, and the House thereupon proceeded to Government Orders.

House again in commitee on Bill No. 2. to amend the Dominion Elections Act.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1. Canada Temperance Act Vote in Ontario.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The committee will notice that there is in this Bill only one substantive clause which is divided into sections numbered (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e). Since we met yesterday the Bill has received further consideration, and certain parties who are very much interested in the promotion of the Bill and others who are not so much interested have agreed to certain amendments for the purpose of bringing the proposed amendment more into harmony with the Franchise Act. The amendments proposed are as subclause (c) of clause 1 and a new subclause to be known as "(g)." Perhaps if I place those before the committee now, we can consider the clause as a whole. Subclause (c), which I will move, applies merely to the town of Aylmer and to the city of Peterborough. Voters' lists were prepared for the town of Aylmer last summer and for the city of Peterborough this spring, and it is proposed to adopt those lists subject to the ordinary right of adding names. The amendment is for the purpose of saving expense, and I think the committee will agree that, as the lists in those particular cases are of such recent preparation, nothing would be gained by having a full revision of those lists. The last amendment which I will move deals with the question of scrutineers or agents attending the polls. The two bodies in Ontario who are anxious to appoint scrutineers in support of prohibition are the Dominion Alliance and the Ontario Referendum Committee. They both desire power to appoint scrutineers but it has been deemed fitting that we should give them a joint power; that is, let them jointly name a scrutineer for each poll. On the other hand, the same privilege has been asked by the Citizens' Liberty League of Ontario, and it has been deemed proper to give them a similar right. These scrutineers will have the ordinary rights of the agents of candidates under the Franchise Act of Canada. The amendment is somewhat long, but that is practically the only point it deals with, namely, the appointment of scrutineers.

Mr. EULER: May I ask the minister whether these proposed amendments meet with the approval of both bodies that he mentions?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The suggestion is the joint suggestion of the three bodies I have mentioned. The meeting was held this morning.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved to amend section 1 by inserting after clause (b) of the present Bill the following as clause (c) clauses (c), (d) and (e) thereafter becoming (d), (e) and (f):

(c) In the Town of Aylmer and in the City of Peterborough the voters' lists shall be the lists of voters as finally revised and completed for the last election of a member to serve in the House of Commons of Canada in the electoral districts of East Elgin and West Peterborough respectively; four copies of each of the said lists shall be furnished by the Chief Electoral Officer to the returning officer for the electoral districts in which the said town and city are respectively situate, and the said returning officers shall respectively furnish two copies thereof to the revising officers for the said city and town. The said copies shall be corrected by the revising officers, who shall deliver or send to each deputy returning officer, as required by Rule 20 of Schedule A to Section 32, one corrected copy of the lists for his polling division, and send the other corrected copy to the returning officer not later than the twelfth day before polling day.

The minister also moves to amend the said clause by adding at the end thereof the following sub-clause, to be known as sub-clause (g):

(g) in lieu of the provisions of Section 52 of the Dominion Elections Act, the following provisions shall apply:

(1) The Deputy Returning Officer, the Poll Clerk, one or other, alternately, of the two agents or electors representing the persons interested in promoting an affirmative, and one or other alternately, of the agents or electors representing those interested in promoting a negative answer to the question submitted, and no others, shall be permitted to remain in the room where the votes are given during the time the poll remains open.

(ii) On behalf of the persons interested in promoting an affirmative answer to the question submitted the Dominion Alliance (Ontario Branch) and the Ontario Referendum Committee jointly shall be entitled to appoint the agents aforesaid, and every such appointment shall be made in writing by such person in each electoral district as may be notified to the Returning Officer jointly by Ben. H. Spence and Andrew S. Grant, the secretaries of the Dominion Alliance (Ontario Branch) and the Ontario Referendum Committees respectively; on behalf of the persons interested in promoting a negative answer to the question submitted, the Citizens' Liberty League shall be entitled to appoint the agents aforesaid, and every such appointment shall be made in writing by such person in each electoral district as may be notified to the Returning Officer by C. D. Boyce, the secretary of the Citizens' Liberty League aforesaid.

(iii) If the Dominion Alliance (Ontario Branch) or the Ontario Referendum Committee, or the Citizens' Liberty League hereafter changes its secretary, such changes may be notified to the chief electoral officer, who shall advise the returning officers thereof, and notifications of the persons in each electoral district authorized to appoint agents may thereafter be given by the secretaries so substituted.

(iv) If only one agent is appointed under the provisions of the preceding subsections to act at any poll on behalf either of the persons interested in promoting an affirmative or of those interested in promoting a negative answer to the question submitted, such agent may select an elector to act and alternate with him, and if no agents are so appointed to act at any poll, any two electors may act as agents at such poll on behalf of those interested in promoting either an affirmative or a negative answer to such question, as the case may be, provided that an agent appointed as hereinbefore mentioned may at any time during the poll substitute himself for either or both of the electors, who have, in the absence of any agent, undertaken to act.

(v) Every agent or elector acting under the provisions hereinbefore contained shall, on being admitted to the polling station, take an oath to keep secret the answer made to the questions submitted by any voter who has marked his ballot paper in his presence.

Mr. DEVLIN: I just want to call the attention of the minister to the fact that whilst this is a Bill, I understand, to amend certain sections of the Dominion Elections Act so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, the town of Aylmer is really in the county of Wright in the province of Quebec. I believe, however, there is a place called Aylmer in the province of Ontario, and so as to avoid confusion, and as the people of the town of Aylmer in the province in Quebec have always been a temperate people and would not require any such legislation, the minister might in future in speaking of the town of Aylmer, refer to it as the town of Aylmer in the province of Quebec, and if he wishes to allude to the other place, which is named after the town of Aylmer in the province of Quebec, refer to it as Aylmer, Ontario.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am sure we all know the very excellent reputation of the town of Aylmer in the province of Quebec, but this Bill has reference at the present time only to the province of Ontario, so therefore I do not see the necessity of making the distinction.

Mr. BUREAU: Yesterday we were asked by the minister to adjourn the committee because of two bodies who were asking for amendments to the Bill. To-day the amendments are brought down, and they are so lengthy it takes the chairman ten or fifteen minutes to read them. We have never seen these amendments and know nothing about them, although from the chairman's reading, I understand, that some powers are delegated to men nominatively—one was named Mr. Boyce. I do not know whether provision is made for replacing him in case of death or other eventuality. I do not think it is right for the Acting Solicitor General to try and make us swallow an amendment of two or three pages without a chance of reading it. If we simply say "yes," and let the amendments pass the House, without ever reading them, if anything happens afterwards, we would be told: "You do not attend to your duties; you just shut your eyes and let these things go through." I for one will not consent to these amendments being passed until I have had an opportunity of reading them in Hansard to-morrow morning and comparing them with the Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to supplement what has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) by pointing out to the minister that on this occasion he seems to have forgotten, or deliberately overlooked, the courtesy which is customary in cases of this kind of furnishing the Opposition, a little in advance of the meeting of the House, with a copy of proposed amendments. My hon. friend asked us, as a matter of courtesy, if we would permit the Government to go on with this measure and we gave our consent. He might, I think, have shown a little appreciation of the spirit in which we met him by furnishing us with a copy of these amendments before he asked us to vote upon them in this committee. The amendment is three times as long as the Bill itself, and unless this Parliament is to lose altogether its character as a deliberative assembly, we should have time to deliberate upon the amendments which the minister proposes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There can be no objection to the taking of a reasonable time to deliberate on the amendments. The only thing is, the time is limited, because the Bill will have to be assented to next week if it is to be operative at all. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition should not impute any discourtesy in this matter. He has endeavoured to do so, and I think the charge is rather small.

Mr. BUREAU: It is on a par with the answers of the Prime Minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The amendment is one appertaining only to the appointment of scrutineers. It was prepared at exactly three o'clock to-day and handed to my hon. friend immediately after prayers.

Mr. BUREAU: Too short a time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The charge of discourtesy is entirely uncalled for. However, if my hon. friends want reasonable time in which to consider the Bill, or the clauses submitted, why, the House will be quite willing, I have no doubt, to grant that time; and for that purpose I move that the further consideration in Committee be postponed, and that the Committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again to-morrow. But hon. members will have to bear this in mind, that if the Bill is to go through and become operative in order that the vote may be taken on April 18th, it will have to receive the Royal Assent next week; otherwise it will be futile.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not our fault if the amendments are not ready. The acting Solicitor General says that he got the amendment only at three o'clock. He knew yesterday that these people would ask for amendments, and it was not incumbent on the leader of the Opposition or of any hon. members on this side to get after those gentlemen, the Liberty League and all others interested in temperance work. It was the duty of the man or of the member handling the Bill, and if there is any delay in this matter we are not to blame. The only person to blame is he who has charge of the Bill, and those interested in it; and for my part I absolutely disclaim any share of blame which might accrue in respect of delay. On the other hand, I will not consent to the passage of any legislation, emanating especially from my hon. friend or from any other member on that side of the House, with my eyes closed or until I have had an opportunity to look into the matter carefully.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There would be a good deal of force in the remarks of my hon. friend if there were any radical change proposed. If there were any real substance in the amendments his statements would have some weight, but they deal almost exclusively with matters of form,—one affecting voters' lists prepared very recently—

Mr. BUREAU: Allow me a question.

Mr. GUTHRIE—in Peterborough, and the other appertaining merely to the appointment of scrutineers. I say they are not substantial changes and should not delay the Committee. But if hon. gentlemen desire time we will give it, provided, however, it be understood that this is not with any view to delaying the passage of the Bill.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend says there is no departure from the law as it stands.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say that; I said there was no substantial change.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, will my hon. friends show me a clause in the election law where a third party not interested in the election is entitled to have representatives at the poll?—people filling a quasi-judicial role in the election. Is not that a departure from the principle of the Elections Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say there was no departure.

Mr. BUREAU: You said there was nothing substantial. Of course, different people may interpret the word "principle" differently, but I say that these changes constitute a substantial departure from the principle of the Elections Act.

Motion agreed to. Progress reported.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Wednesday, February 23.

Hon. THOMAS ALEXANDER CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of my contribution to this debate, I wish to say a word of congratulation to my right hon. friend who leads the Government (Mr. Meighen) on his accession to the important office of Prime Minister of this country. It is not too much to say that my right hon. friend has won his place by hard work and strict attention to the business of his party. It is particularly gratifying to myself, coming as I do from Western Canada, that one who has been identified with the life of Western Canada for many years should be chosen for this high office. It is perhaps an evidence of the growing importance of that portion of Canada in the councils of the whole Dominion. I do not know that I can extend my congratulations to my right hon. friend on the difficulties of the tasks that lie ahead of him; nevertheless whatever paths our fortunes in the future may lead us into, I am sure that he will give the best that is in him to the service of his country.

I desire also to offer my felicitations to the mover and seconder of the motion which we are considering. The mover (Mr. McIsaac) has been in this House for a considerable period. His speech was happily phrased and, of course, contained, as is customary on such occasions, the necessary laudation of the Government of which he is a supporter. That was to be expected. My hon. friend took a timely opportunity, for I am very much afraid, Mr. Speaker, from what I hear from his little province down by the sea, that he will not again have the opportunity of repeating the address which he delivered the other day on the occasion of this motion. That being the case, I am, shall I say, all the happier in offering him my felicitations. My hon. friend (Mr. MacKelvie), who seconded the motion, comes from a far western province; he is a new member in this House. I had not the pleasure of listening to his address, but from reading it and hearing what my hon. friends on both sides of the House have said in respect to it, I wish to offer him my congratulations on the success he made of a rather difficult job.

It perhaps might be in order now for me to say a word or two about the speech from the Throne and about the addresses given by my right hon. friend who leads the Government and by the leader of the Opposition in the opening discussion upon it. It seemed to me that their speeches might be paraphrased very briefly as follows:

The leader of the Opposition says: "I want you to get out; you are a usurper; your time has expired;" my right hon. friend the leader of the Government replies: "I am going to stay here just as long as I can." And that is about the sum-total of what was contained in the speeches of my two hon. friends. Now, I would offer this criticism, that the difficulties of the times we are in call for something a little more constructive from the leaders of the two majority parties in this Chamber.

I come now to a consideration of the speech itself, and I may say at the outset that it is rather a meagre bill of fare. In fact it reminds me somewhat of the statement of assets and liabilities that is put out by a concern when it is going into bankruptcy—

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: —and that is about the position, I am afraid, that my hon. friends opposite are in with respect to the present Government.

The speech, of course, contains the customary congratulations on the opening of Parliament, and the necessary admonitions to members to pay strict attention to their duties, which of course was to be expected. But the speech goes on and makes a reference to the freedom from unrest in this country at the present time. That I think is a true statement. There is no country in the world to-day that is so free from unrest, or that has been so free from unrest for several years past, as this fair Dominion of Canada. I am particularly glad to see this statement in the speech from the Throne because a few months ago from a very careful reading of the speeches of the leader of the Government—speeches that he delivered in various parts of the Dominion, speeches delivered in the province of Ontario and also in the province of Quebec—I really was afraid, Sir, that we were in imminent danger of a red revolution in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: I think that perhaps now, in his sober moments, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister regrets the extravagance of his language on some of those occasions. At any rate, I am glad to know that there is an entire absence from his recent speeches of that note of criticism. My right hon. friend was playing at politics when he was engaged in making those speeches. He was endeavouring to raise the old prejudices and the old passions in this country—the prejudices of one section against another, the prejudices of one class in a community against another class.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Bolshevism.

Mr. CRERAR: And for what reason, Mr. Speaker? In order that he might reap some political advantage. Why did my right hon. friend take the occasion to make these speeches down in the province of Quebec? He knows that that province is one of the most cautious and conservative provinces in the Dominion as far as change is concerned. He goes to the province of Quebec and he raises this bogey. Why did he do that? To arouse prejudices. I do not wish to make my language too strong, but he did it, at any rate, to create a feeling in that province against the new political movement that has had its birth in Western Canada; and I am bound to say that he was not performing a very notable service to his country when he was doing that work. Mr. Speaker, the fishing in the province of Quebec has not beeen very successful. That is not because of any lack of effort on the part of my right hon. friend, because I have noticed a very enticing note in the speeches delivered by him there. Well, he has been successful in getting one recruit. That recruit is not yet seated on the far side of the Chamber, but he is working his way round and perhaps, eventually will land there.

In the speech from the Throne there is also a reference to the fact that the Department of Labour is carrying on an investigation into the matter of unemployment insurance and old age pensions. The speech simply contains the bald announcement. There is no statement of Government policy in the matter. The Government might just as well have inserted in the speech that the Minister of Finance was thinking of undertaking another tariff investigation. The bald statement means nothing. Has the Government any policy in the matter? Do they contemplate any policy with respect to these questions? If so, the House is entitled to know what that policy is. Is there anything behind this announcement in the speech from the Throne? Is it the purpose of the Government to introduce a measure dealing with these matters later on? I have just this to say in that connection: I have every sympathy with any movement that is designed or intended to alleviate distress in our country, or for that matter in any other country; but I assert, and I offer the suggestion to the leader of the Government, that this Canada of ours provides opportunity enough for labour to those who are willing to work so that they can make their way well and decently in the world, if they are given a fair opportunity to do so. For unemployment insurance and old age pensions, while they may, some time in the future, give concern to this country, there exists no very great need at present, provided we have fair and equitable laws and give every person in this Dominion a chance to make their living in decency and comfort. However, it might be, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friends opposite, and the Government in particular, are contemplating an early appeal to the country and possibly they have in mind that some little advantage may be derived from holding out the proposition to the labouring people of Canada that they are considering their interests in the matter of old age pensions and unemployment insurance.

The speech also contains the announcement, which every one expected, that the Government are going to undertake tariff revision at the present session. The Minister of Finance did very strenuous work in the journeys he made back and forth in Canada a few months ago, collecting evidence with respect to the character his new tariff proposals shall take when they are submitted to the House. I cannot say, Mr. Speaker, that it was a labour of love as far as my hon. friend is concerned. I had the opportunity of attending the sitting of the Tariff Commission on one or two occasions and I extended my sympathy to my hon. friend because of the difficulty of the task he had. After all, was there very much need of all this show about the tariff inquiry? The Government had announced its policy a year ago, it was to be the old policy of protection in Canada—"adequate protection to Canadian industries." This tariff inquiry, conducted at considerable cost to the country, was, Mr. Speaker, just so much play in order to influence public opinion; and I venture this assertion—and I am sure the Minister of Finance if he were free to do so would endorse it—that in his whole investigation from Vancouver to Halifax, in all the mass of evidence he listened to and collected, in all the representations made to him, he really got very little that was of practical value in the framing of his tariff proposals. However, the work went on, and I will say this for the Minister of Finance, he discharged his duty in that regard very faithfully and energetically. The pronouncement in the speech from the Throne, in regard to the tariff, merely confirms what we already knew, or what any person familiar with the recent history of this country knew, as to what the policy of the Government is in the matter.

I wish in passing to make a few references to this subject. The speech from the Throne states:

> It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained;

Assistance to agriculture! I have been wondering if my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) got that little clause slipped into this declaration to leave the impression that a system of protection was of assistance to agriculture in this Dominion. Why, Sir, the thing is ridiculous. What are our chief argicultural products? They are wheat, live stock, dairy products, potatoes, fruits; and in every one of these products this country produces away and beyond what we can possibly consume at home. Therefore it follows, as night follows day, that the value we get for all these commodities is fixed in the markets of the world, and not in the home market. Consequently when my hon. friends in the Government make the pious declaration in this pronouncement, that they are maintaining this policy to protect argiculture in Canada, they are simply "beating up against the wind." It may be that some of my hon. friends opposite have in their constituencies market gardeners close to cities who will benefit temporarily by the exclusion of certain vegetables at particular seasons of the year, but to claim that protection is an aid to Canadian agriculture as a whole is to make a ridiculous assertion that has no warrant in fact.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to one other declaration in this respect. It states, that this policy of protection will be followed in order to secure revenue and to obtain the necessary protection of our industries. My right hon. friend who leads the Government (Mr. Meighen) placed the issue very fairly in his speeches throughout Canada in respect to tariff matters, and I commend him for it. I am among those who believe in clear declarations on questions of public policy, and my right hon. friend left the country in no doubt as to where he stands upon this question of protection. But he did not always support his conclusions by sound arguments. My right hon. friend stated at various places, as indeed is contained in this declaration here, that this tariff will be a tariff to produce revenue and to maintain protection. Now, I ask: How can that be done? If your tariff is a protective tariff, what is it based upon? It is based upon the principle of protection of your own home industries, and to the extent that it protects your home industries, it excludes foreign goods; and if it does, where does your revenue come in?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRERAR: Surely my hon. friends opposite must realize the truth of this simple statement. Of course, it may be that their study of the question has been very limited, and that in the enjoyment of the privilege which has come to them under protection they have neglected to analyze the situation as far as its general effect upon the country is concerned. But, nevertheless, that is the plain fact of the case.

If your purpose is to get revenue from your tariff, you cannot get that revenue if your tariff is based on the principle of protection in the expectation of excluding goods from the country to encourage the development of industries at home.

Mr. CURRIE: Where did we get revenue in the past?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie) will have his opportunity later. Now, I submit that there is a distinct difference between a tariff based on the principle of protection and a tariff based on the principle of revenue, and when my hon. friends opposite endeavour to link the two together they are simply endeavouring to mislead the people of this country; I commend my hon. friends opposite for the frankness with which they have placed the question before the country. But let them go a little bit further, let them make this statement to the country: Our protective tariff is a tariff to encourage industry at home and is not designed to raise revenue. If they will do that, I will agree that they are consistent throughout, but to the degree they endeavour to mix up the raising of revenue with the maintainence of protection they are upon inconsistent ground.

I stated a little while ago that the speech from the Throne was a very meagre document. One would think that we were living in the period fifteen or twenty years before the war. There is no reference in that speech to the most vital matters that are pressing upon this country at the present time; and if I may do so, I would express my regret that there was very little reference in the speeches either of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government or of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in respect to these matters.

I should like for a moment to deal with the financial position of this country. We have the statement in the speech from the Throne that we find in all such speeches, that the Estimates will be prepared with due regard for economy and the public interest. Now, it is a fact patent to everyone who is following with any degree of interest at all the business of this country, that our revenues at the present time are shrinking, and shrinking very seriously. The buoyancy in revenues that resulted from the buoyancy in business during the period of the war and immediately following it is disappearing, and I dare say that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) is spending sleepless nights wondering how he is going to provide the needed revenue in face of the falling income. That shrinkage, Sir, I think is bound to continue. I am not a pessimist, but I believe in facing facts squarely. If you speak to business men, if you discuss the matter with the travellers of business firms throughout this country, you will find that business is dull if not indeed stagnant. I am afraid that is not a merely passing phase, because we have to study this thing in respect to our relationship with the whole world, and consequently in view of the fact that we will have difficulty in getting our revenues in future, the need of economy in our public administration is more pressing than ever before in our history.

And what are the facts in respect to that, Sir? I believe it was the tendency in this country, as it was the tendency in every other country engaged in the war, to spend freely during the war. War conditions developed spending habits not only in governments, but in individuals as well, and that was the experience in this country. And I offer a word of criticism of the Government, in that they have not given due regard to the needs of economy. Our total expenditure for the present fiscal year will be close to $400,000,000, if indeed it does not exceed that figure. Our total expenditure before the war was around $130,000,000 a year. My hon. friends will say: Oh, but we have had great increases to our national debt, and consequently in the amount of interest we have to pay upon it, all due to the war. I grant that. But if we take the total increase in expenditure due to causes arising out of the war, that in my judgment will not amount to more than $175,000,000. Now, if we take $175,000,000 from our $400,000,000, we still have $225,000,000 as the average expenditure of this country under normal conditions, whereas before the war that expenditure was $130,000,000 a year.

I can give further evidences of the lack of economy on the part of the Government. The Government to-day are building a dry dock in the city of Victoria. I believe that is to redeem a pledge made by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) when he was contesting the by-election in that constituency. According to reports, this dry dock will cost $4,500,000. At the same time we see reports in the press—and I believe they are true—that shipbuilding companies, and I believe as well a dry dock company in Prince Rupert, have gone into the hands of receivers. Then we have the report which appeared in the press a few days ago—synchronizing, curiously enough, with the period of the by-election in the constituency of West Peterborough—to the effect that a dam was being built in Peterborough constituency at a cost of $250,000. This report has not been denied; indeed, I believe it had official authority. I merely refer in passing to a few of these expenditures, in order to emphasize the fact that this is not the policy this country should be following at the present time. What is needed in Canada is a programme of rigid economy in every department of the public service. That applies not only to our federal activities, but also to all our provincial governments and to individual citizens. Only by adopting such a policy can we retrieve our position and escape the dangers and difficulties that are ahead of us.

We could very wisely effect economy in another direction. We hear a good deal in these days, Sir, about a naval holiday among the nations of the world. Well, I think we in Canada might take a naval holiday. My hon. friend who has the distinction of being the first Sea Lord of our Canadian Admiralty may not agree with me.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not at all.

Mr. CRERAR: But I do think, Sir, that for the next five years we might very well forget about naval expenditures in this country. One of the greatest mistakes this Government has made, in my judgment, was the acceptance of several war vessels from the British government, resulting in our having to incur the additional expenditure, inevitably attendant upon it.

Then, we have the expenditure in connection with our militia. We are rapidly developing a ministry of war in Canada. Last year this Parliament voted over $22,000,000 for naval and military and police purposes in Canada. Is that economy? I suggest—and I do it in the best of temper and, I believe, in the interests of the country—to my hon. friends opposite, I suggest to the members of the Government, that in framing their Estimates for the present year they take into consideration the fact that we must get our country back into a solid financial condition, and that one of the agencies through which we must work to achieve that is the agency of economy in public administration.

And this brings me to another matter, and that is the condition of trade in Canada. It is a notable fact that our trade with Europe is falling off. The figures, Mr. Speaker, are illuminating and a little alarming. In 1918 we exported to Great Britain $568,000,000 worth of goods. In 1919 that had fallen to $528,000,000 worth and in 1920 to $341,000,000 worth. I venture to say that the coming year will show an even further decline in those figures. Our exports to France in 1918 were valued at $97,000,000; in 1919 at $65,000,000 and in 1920 at $47,000,000. Now, a very patent reason for this is found in the condition of international exchanges as between Europe and North America. The British pound to-day is at a heavy discount both in Canada and in the United States. That applies with even greater force to the French franc, to the Italian lire, and to all the currencies of Europe. And, as is natural and to be expected, European countries are doing business with other countries of the world where the exchange is more on a parity with their own than is the case in Canada and the United States. I am afraid, Sir, that this condition will continue for several years. One of the surest guarantees we can have of the revival of prosperity in America is the bringing about of a settled condition in Europe. But when we look over the European field to-day; when we see the consequences of the war in the disruption and the strife that still prevail as between nations; when we see European countries spending on armaments, and equipment for war the money that should be spent to feed and clothe their peoples—we are offered but a very dull prospect for any speedy revival of business and industry on that continent. Whether we wish it or not, therefore, these facts are patent and cannot be thrust aside. Where, then, are we to develop our trade? I submit, Sir, that the country with which we can best trade for the next number of years is the country immediately to the south of us, although some of my hon. friends opposite may not agree with me in this.

4 p.m.

Mr. CURRIE: I guess you can't.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend cannot trade with Europe. He cannot trade with Australia, because Australia cannot pay him. Where is he going to trade? Or is he going to surround this country with a high board fence and neither climb out nor permit anybody else to climb in? If he does so, I venture the opinion that that course will not get him very far.

What are the figures of our growing trade with the United States? In 1910 we exported $110,000,000 worth of goods to that country. In 1912 that figure had grown to $112,000,000; in 1914 to $176,000,000; in 1918 to $440,000,000, and in 1920, the year that has passed, our exports to our southern neighbour had grown to $560,000,000. Is not that a desirable market to cultivate—the one to which your exports are growing, and which promises to take more and more still as time goes on? It is the eminently sensible thing to do.

I should like to say a word also in criticism of some of my hon. friends opposite who rather hold up the bogey of adverse exchange with the United States as a reason why we should cease trading with that country. The argument has been advanced that we should cease buying from the United States because they will not pay the full value of our Canadian dollar. Well, you might as well have the argument from an importer in the United States that he will not buy from Canada because we charge him a premium on his dollar when we sell to him. But as a matter of fact this condition, as was pointed out in this House a year ago, is not due alone to an adverse balance of trade with the United States. If my hon. friend opposite think that it is how do they account for this fact; that while in January a year ago the adverse balance of trade as between Canada and the United States was over $31,000,000, and our dollar was at a discount of a little less than nine per cent, in the month of December last, when the adverse balance of trade as between Canada and the United States was only $4,000,000, the discount on our dollar had grown to 19 per cent. If the discount on our dollar is due to the adverse balance of trade, why does it not tend to correct itself as the balance of trade tends to right itself. As a matter of fact, if we examine the trade figures as between Canada and the United States for past years, we shall find that ten years ago, fifteen years ago, the adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States was relatively much greater than it is to-day. There can be no doubt that this market is a very valuable one for Canada. Moreover, I am commencing to note, amongst the business interests of Canada, a recognition of the need for extending our markets. A few weeks ago, Mr. John Galt, President of the Union Bank of Canada, made this statement at the annual meeting of that institution:

> It is clearly now the critical hour and the commercial flag of Canada should be carried into every available market abroad.

The policy of my hon. friends opposite is to keep goods out of the country and to prevent goods from going out of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friends have a very dim and misty understanding of the elementary principles of trade. Mr. Galt stated further:

> A larger vision and determination of this kind is necessary. We must either go forward or go back, and it cannot be thought that we are to recede into the position of a country that merely produces for home consumption, when we have demonstrated that we have the means and capacity for world competition in almost any avenue of trade.

That is a note I like to hear sounded by our business men throughout Canada—a note of optimism and courage.

A short time afterwards, Sir Herbert Holt, at the annual meeting of the Royal Bank, made a similar statement, as follows:

> Only by increasing the sale of Canadian commodities can we avoid increasing our foreign indebtedness. Never, even in war time, was it so essential to increase our exports. A duty falls on manufacturers to produce articles of a quality and a price that will compare favourably with foreign makes and on our agricultural interests to increase production.

I agree with every word of these declarations. They are wise and sound and courageous words. Ten years ago we had an offer of reciprocity with the United States in natural products, and to the great misfortune of Canada that proposition was turned down at that time. I was sincerely glad to know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), in a recent address delivered in New York, spoke of the need of neighbourliness as between these two countries. I cordially agreed with every word he uttered. We should avoid anything that will tend to create animosities. But while the Minister of Trade and Commerce was pleading in New York for neighbourliness, some of his colleagues were denouncing our neighbours to the south because they were giving us only eighty or ninety cents for our Canadian dollar. My hon. friends should endeavour to be consistent in their policy in respect to this matter.

I am satisfied our Canadian manufacturers can hold their own in the American field. One of the strongest arguments used in Canada against the adoption of reciprocity was that if in return for the free entry of our wheat into the United States we permitted the free entry of United States flour and wheat into Canada, our Canadian millers would go by the board and their business would cease to exist. Is that borne out by the facts? We have had this condition in this country for the last several years, and what are the facts to-day? In the last four months our Canadian mills have exported on an average over 175,000 barrels of flour a month to the United States market, and that market is now becoming one of the most important markets for our Canadian millers. The fact is that we produce in this country things that are essential to the United States, and we should cultivate, in the most friendly way, the possibilities of developing that market for our products. Canada is a country of illimitable natural resources, we have one of the finest agricultural countries in the world; we have vast areas of timber and mineral wealth, and vast fisheries. What are we going to do with these? Let us develop these industries that are natural to the country, seek markets abroad, and as you seek markets abroad and your commerce expands, the wealth and prosperity of your country will expand as well. Our manufacturers are too timid; they are like timid children, afraid of the dark. You know, when a child goes into the dark, how timid it is, and after all there are no dangers there. But if our Canadian manufacturers will develop initiative and resourcefulness, and the capacity to stand on their feet without favour from the Government, they can hold their own in any market in the world, because they have in this country the natural conditions that will support them in doing so.

Mr. EDWARDS: Did the reciprocity agreement recognize the fact which my hon. friend has stated?

Mr. CRERAR: The reciprocity agreement went only a short step in the right direction. There is, however, one other criticism that I have to make, in the most friendly way, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and that is that the Department of Trade and Commerce is not at the present time discharging its duty in respect to the development of trade with our great neighbour to the South. What are the conditions? The United States Government has to-day in Canada over one hundred consuls, the great majority of these being in reality trade agents. You find them scattered over this country from the Pacific to the Atlantic. What are they doing? They are, in their way, quite properly, placing with prospective Canadian customers the advantages of trading with and buying from firms in the United States. We have agents abroad, but where do we find them? We have a trade agent in the Argentine Republic; we have one in Australia; we have one in Brazil; we have trade representatives in China; we have them in New Zealand, in Italy, in France, in Holland and in South Africa; but we have not one in the United States. I would suggest, I hope in a spirit of constructiveness, the need, the advisability of the department over which my right hon. friend presides, getting busy in this direction. We have our greatest customers to the South. More than one-half of the trade of Canada is done with the United States, and in that direction lies the best opportunity we have in the near years approaching for the development and extension of our trade. The United States is changing. We hear at present a good deal of talk in the newspapers of the Fordney Bill, and of what the Republican party may do when it comes into office a few weeks hence. Any business man who is familiar with the present condition of public opinion in the United States is aware of this fact that there is not in the Republican party that strength of support for a protective tariff that there was a number of years ago. I have noticed that very prominent men in the Republican party are doubting the wisdom of the application of the principle of protection to American industries. And they are wise.

What is the position of the United States? The last census revealed the fact that in the United States proper there is a population of 106,000,000 people. Almost two-thirds of those live in incorporated towns and cities; one-third live in hamlets and unincorporated villages and in the rural districts. In the United States there are to-day two people eating food for every one that produces. What will be the condition twenty years from now—thirty years from now? Possibly many present here will live to see that country with a population of 200,000,000 people, and is it not the part of wisdom to develop our resources, to develop our agriculture, so that we will be in a position to supply them with the foodstuffs they will inevitably need? They are buying foodstuffs from us to-day. Last year they took $150,000,000 of the foodstuffs we produced, and among this $30,000,000 worth of live stock. One of the best markets the western farmer has had for his wheat for the past five months has been the country to the south of us and a good many are looking with doubt and some trepidation as to what may happen the great industry of agriculture in this country should the United States again raise the barriers against Canada that existed prior to 1912. That emphasizes once more the unfortunate consequences that may flow from the rejection of reciprocity in 1911.

And now I come to another important matter, our national railways;—one would have thought there would be some reference in the speech from the Throne to their state of financial health. Last year this House was informed that our railways had a deficit of $48,000,000 and I saw recently a newspaper item stating that the deficit this year would run between $60,000,000 and $70,000,000. Since that statement was not denied, I take it that when the official figures are supplied some time hence they will be somewhere around that mark. Now that is a very serious state of affairs. There is no need here to go into the question of government ownership in Canada, and how we came to acquire these roads. We have to deal with the situation as it exists, but we have no suggestion from the Government in the speech from the Throne as to what shall be done in connection with this difficulty. We have even less from my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, either in the speech he delivered in this House on the Address, or in any of the speeches he has made throughout the country. Now it does seem to me that there are certain facts standing out in respect to this difficulty to which we should give consideration. I am convinced of this, that if our railway problem is made a matter of party controversy, nothing but harm can come to the country from it. I would offer this suggestion: that there should be appointed a special committee of this House to deal alone with this question, and reporting of course to Parliament. I think the Government might very well welcome that assistance. It is a difficult matter to discuss the problem here in this Chamber as a body of shareholders would discuss a similar proposition at a meeting, and it is idle now to discuss the causes that lead up to the present unsatisfactory state of affairs. We have to face the situation as it exists. But it does seem to me that if we had a special committee constituted from among the members of this House, who would go into this thing as business men, and not as partisans, we might possibly render some service in finding a solution for this difficulty. I am convinced that sooner or later, and I believe the sooner the better, we must have a revaluation of the whole system of Government railways in Canada. There is no doubt of the fact that there has been a duplication of lines owing to the method of building in the past, and much loss has arisen from that cause, not only in capital outlay but in operating as well. You can travel to-day west of Edmonton for several hundred miles and find this duplication. In some cases—I have travelled over the road myself—the rails are as close together as the two sides of this Chamber. The rails have been lifted off one road, but yet there are outstanding against it issues for which the country is responsible, running up to probably $100,000 a mile. If we get this thing down to a definite business basis, we can start afresh.

I would also offer this suggestion. The Board of Directors of the National Railways might well be reorganized. I believe the Government had that in contemplation a year ago. I would go even further and offer the suggestion that was made, I believe, when this matter was first under discussion by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), that it would be a wise step to give the employees of the Government roads one or two representatives on the directorate. To come through this difficulty successfully the roads must have behind them the loyalty and the interest of the employees in the system as regards its operation and management generally.

Then we must go a step further. We must develop business for the road, and in that connection I wish to make reference to the matter of immigration. That is a pressing question for this country, and yet no reference was made to it in the speech delivered by His Excellency the other day. Our national railways have this advantage, that in the greater part of Canada they pass through a territory that is fertile and productive. I know that is true of the Prairie Provinces, and I believe it is true in a large measure of Eastern Canada. Part of the solution of this question, I am convinced, will lie in the adoption of a vigorous policy of immigration, to get immigrants who will go on the land. The immigrants when they come here should be settled—and the whole force and power of the Government should be exerted to that end—in the districts adjacent to our national railways. If that is done, they will at any rate create business for the roads in the future. The way is dark in connection with this matter, but I have confidence enough in our country and in the people of Canada to believe that if we set ourselves energetically to the solution of this problem before many years we shall emerge from the present difficulty, and in another decade or two our national railways will be an asset of which the country may justly be proud.

I had thought also that we might have in the speech from the Throne a reference to the proposed visit that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will make to attend the Premiers' conference in London, which I understand takes place in June. So far, we have had no declaration from the Government as to what will happen at that conference. I did notice, however, the other day a cable despatch from London, containing a statement made by Mr. Lloyd George in the British House of Commons, which assembled, I believe, the day after this House met. I want to read that statement to this House because I think it has some real significance for us:

> Mr. Lloyd George stated that the conference of Empire Premiers to be held in London in June will be the most momentous event in the history of the Empire.
>
> He declared that it was too much to ask of these small islands that they undertake the whole burden of the defence of a gigantic empire in every sea, and that at the forthcoming conference of Prime Ministers of the Dominions in London the whole problem of Imperial defence must be considered.
> There must be, the Prime Minister went on, co-ordination not only between the various services, but between the several parts of the Empire.

Now this is a very definite and very significant declaration that has come from the British Prime Minister within the last week or ten days. I wonder what the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government has in mind in respect to this matter. Is it too much to ask that we should have a declaration from the Government in respect to all these matters that may come up? I hold this view, which I have expressed before in this House, that before this country is committed to any scheme of joint Imperial defence, or to anything else in the way of Imperial arrangements the sanction of this Parliament should be obtained, and I offer this word of admonition or, shall I say, of advice to my right hon. friend, should he have the responsibility in the matter—that when he meets the British Prime Minister and the other members of the conference he will jealously guard Canada's rights and interests in these matters. I am sure it is his intention to do so, but I was a little bit diconcerted when I heard a month or so ago that my right hon. friend contemplated taking with him, as his colleagues on this mission, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ballantyne) who heads the navy of Canada and my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) who is the Minister of War for Canada. If this should happen to be the case I would all the more strongly urge upon my right hon. friend to step warily in his negotiations in this matter.

I come now to another matter, and that is the amendment moved by my hon. friend who leads the official Opposition in the House (Mr. Mackenzie King). My hon. friend has based his amendment, as I read it, upon this principle, if you wish—that my right hon. friend who leads the Government is a usurper and that consequently the Government has usurped authority in this country. Now, if that is the position taken by the leader of the Opposition I am bound to say that I cannot agree with him. The right hon. the leader of the Government comes to his office in a perfectly proper way. There are plenty of precedents, not only in this country but in Great Britain as well, to support his position; and if he had evidences that the country was behind him to-day, if he had a growing majority, or at least a standing majority that supported him, then he could on good grounds claim that he was entitled to continue as head of the Government in this country. But while I do not agree with my hon. friend who leads the Opposition as to the ground of his attack upon the Government, I agree entirely with his declaration that the Government has lost the confidence of the country; and conclusive evidence of that fact is found in the reverses the Government has suffered in the elections that have taken place within the last two years. It is true that the Government won two seats in the Maritime Provinces,—seats which they had carefully selected and very carefully handled when the election was on. They won one seat in British Columbia which my hon. friend (Mr. MacKelvie) who has recently taken his place in this House represents. But that was with a greatly reduced majority. I would, however, point out the significant fact that the Government has lost every by-election held in the old province of Ontario; and I venture to say to-day that if my right hon. friend were to open up any seat in Western Canada and the great majority of seats in Ontario he would have the verdict that has been rendered by these other constituencies substantiated by the results. There is further evidence in the character of the appeal made, in the character of the tests that have taken place in these by-elections. Take any one of them: Were the real policies of the Government, the real questions before the country, discussed? I will give my right hon. friend the leader of the Government credit for this, that in most of his speeches he did come out frankly on the question of the tariff. But what of his supporters. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who I am sorry to say is not in his seat, took an active part in the East Elgin election; and what was the great national question that absorbed his attention? It was the salaries that were paid the officials in the Grain Growers' organization in Western Canada! That was the thing of paramount importance to my hon. friend from Frontenac. And then my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) was also there, and the great national question that absorbed that gentleman's attention was the amount of weed seed in screenings at Fort William.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I beg to take exception to the remarks of my hon. friend. He made that reference in an address in Aylmer. I reached that constituency the very day that he arrived there and consequently did not have an opportunity to make any such statement when he spoke there on that occasion.

Mr. CRERAR: I should be very sorry to do my hon. friend any injustice, but I read the newspaper reports, and I must give that as my evidence.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: You did not read that in the reports.

Mr. CRERAR: I think I can produce evidence to that fact, but we will not bother with that just now. Now, let us come to the Maritime Provinces. What was the great question there? The great issue in the Colchester election, which returned the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy), was the combine of the Grain Growers in Western Canada. Protection? Why, the thing was scarcely ever discussed. But there was a promise of a post office, I believe, in the town of Truro, and there was a dim hope held out that a railway might be built through a certain section of that constituency. And then we come to the constituency of St. John, represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Wigmore), who now presides over the Department of Customs. That hon. gentleman assured the good people of St. John that if he were only returned he would see that the Government did its duty by St. John. These were the issues discussed there. But were they the great issues that are before the people of this country? Why do not my hon. friends, when they are engaged in an election, discuss the real issues before the country, their administration, their economical management of the affairs of the country, what they will do with the railways, and what my hon. friend will do when he goes to London? But we do not hear anything of these questions; we have all these other issues discussed.

But, Sir, the strongest reason there is why the amendment of the leader of the Opposition should be supported lies in this fact, that my right hon. friend who leads the Government desires to reorganize his Government and cannot do so. Now, I do not think I am betraying any secret when I say that supporters of the Government in the country have stated that fact, that my right hon. friend desires to reorganize his Government and is waiting for an opportune moment to do so; and the opportune moment is the time when by-elections can be carried. I do not know to what extent my right hon. friend is going to reorganize his Government but I should like to know, for I have more than a passing interest in the matter. I should like to know who of the colleagues of my right hon. friend will be compelled to drink the hemlock! Who will walk the plank? I do not wish to make comparisons, but it is undoubtedly the desire of my right hon. friend to reorganize his Government. Now, Sir, a Government that is constituted in such a manner, where some are hoping to stay in and others are expecting to go out, cannot be a Government that will bring strength and courage to the management of the affairs of Canada at the present time. That constitutes the strongest possible reason why this unsettled and unsettling condition of affairs should terminate at the earliest possible moment; and for this and the various other reasons I have enumerated, I am going to support the amendment offered by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. Mr. Speaker, there never was a time when this country required a stronger Government; there never was a time when it required courage and vigour in Government so much as at this moment; and I see no prospect of such a condition in the present regime. My hon. friend is going along hoping against hope. He is hoping that the clouds may disperse and the sun come out, and that circumstances may arise whereby his difficulties will be solved. I am afraid he will find no consolation in that; it is a vain hope; and I am sorry to tender this opinion to my right hon. friend, but I am afraid that as the days pass the clouds will become thicker and the difficulties grow greater. Hon. gentlemen opposite urge a reason with a good deal of weight when they say that there should be a redistribution of seats before an election takes place. However, I have no very great confidence in the redistribution that my hon. friends will carry out. It is an open secret that the redistribution will bring about very considerable changes, and I am sure that the political engineers of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite have been very carefully surveying the ground to see where the proper lines should be placed in order to get the most effective results when the election comes on.

Mr. Speaker, we are now facing serious problems and I have endeavoured, I am afraid in a very imperfect way, to outline a number of them. They call for a policy of vigour, of courage, of determination of efficiency in the public administration of this country's business. My hon. friends opposite cannot hope in the present state of affairs to give that, consequently, believing as I do that we should have a new administration, that the people of Canada should have an opportunity to pronounce upon these questions, that the country needs vigour, efficiency and courage in its administration and that that cannot be secured until an election is held—for these reasons and these alone I shall support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. R. C. HENDERS (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House this afternoon on the questions that are before us, it is not my intention—

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Louder.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If hon. gentlemen will refrain from conversation there will be no difficulty in hearing the hon. member who at present has the floor.

Mr. HENDERS: It is not my intention to offer more than a few passing remarks on the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. leader of the Agrarian party (Mr. Crerar), but there are a few points in connection with his address to which I would invite the attention of the House. Those matters of importance to which he has referred and which should receive attention at the present time may be grouped under two or three headings. The hon. gentleman referred to the address delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in the city of New York a short time ago, when he pleaded for neighbourliness. It appears to me that some reason exists why at the present moment the thought and attention of the American people might be turned toward the attitude of those who are shortly to be entrusted with the government of that country, and that doubtless was the reason why the Minister of Trade and Commerce offered the suggestion which he did. Certain tariff proposals are being put forward on the other side of the line which it is hoped to put into operation in the not distant future, and in these proposals, some of us think, Canadian agriculture, our great basic industry, is receiving scant attention.

The hon. gentleman who preceded me expressed the opinion that we have little to expect, as agriculturists, in the shape of protection that would be of material advantage to us. But as I survey the proposed tariff changes of our American friends, I am fully convinced that our agricultural industry will suffer very seriously if these tariff changes are put into effect. The great wheat industry, for example, one of the main props of agriculture, will be hit very hard. The beef and live stock industry will also be subjected to a very serious handicap. Other Canadian industries will suffer; in fact, five or six at least of the contemplated duties will seriously affect agriculture in Canada. I can therefore readily understand why the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce should feel some anxiety, and why it would be advisable to urge that favourable consideration be given to Canadian representations on this most important matter.

I can also understand that should our American friends deem it to be in the interest of their country to put into effect the proposed tariff changes, it would be very necessary for us to consider what our tariff arrangements should be in that regard. It would be necessary that we should consider whether we will allow all the citrous fruits and vegetables which our American friends grow to enter our country free of duty, while they propose to tax to the very limit very important agricultural products, the market for which we depend so largely upon the country to the south to furnish.

The next point in the speech of my hon. friend to which I wish to refer is his statement with regard to the tariff. There was one important sentence in his statement on the tariff that I was pleased to hear him give utterance to; he congratulated the leader of this House on having made a clear-cut statement as to where the Government stood on the tariff question. I am sorry that I cannot return the compliment, for the leader of the Farmer's party (Mr. Crerar) in all his addresses delivered throughout the country, and in his remarkable speech this afternoon, failed to give to this House and to the people a clear-cut statement as to where he stands on the tariff question. But I am confident that both the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the Farmers' party will need to amend their statements along this line and tell the people definitely where they stand.

The leader of the Farmers' party states that of course there is a marked difference between a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection, and that he stands for a tariff for revenue, while the Government stands for a tariff for protection. Well, if we are to judge these statements on their merits, that is in the light of experience, we can only reach the conclusion that a tariff for revenue must be a higher tariff than a tariff for protection. The Laurier Government went into power on a tariff for revenue, they proclaimed that that was their policy, and that they did not want any protection. And the statement is made that this Government is a protective tariff Government. Now, let us look at the results. The tariff for revenue purposes only, which the Laurier Government during the lengthy period of years that they were in office, exhausted their skill in framing required 20.18 per cent of revenue to be taken from the people on farm implements and other machinery. Turning now to the Government that is slated by the Opposition and by the Farmers' party as a high protectionist Government, I find that it has reduced the tariff on these articles to 14.61 per cent.

The previous speaker has stated that a tariff for protection cannot be a tariff for revenue, that revenue and protection are clear-cut and separate policies. If that be so, then, according to their practice, a tariff for revenue must always of necessity be a higher tariff than a tariff for protection. We do not believe in that sort of argument. We believe that it is possible to have a tariff for revenue, and at the same time to have the elements of protection in connection with that tariff, and to have that tariff brought to such a level that it will serve the best interests of our industries while giving to us a reasonable revenue for carrying on the government of the country. This does not necessarily mean a high tariff.

I will not attempt to follow the arguments of the previous speaker at any greater length at the present time, because I believe the proper occasion for the discussion of the tariff—will be when the Budget is brought down and we have before us the fiscal policy of the Government. But, Sir, I cannot refrain from giving expression to this one thought in passing. I cannot understand by what process of reasoning the previous speaker reached the conclusion he did reach from the line of argument he advanced, that he would vote for the amendment, when the leader of the Opposition, by an entirely opposite line of argument, reached the same conclusion.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of the House for a short time to a statement made by the leader of the Opposition with regard to practically refusing to allow the business of the country to be transacted because of what he asserts to be a fact, viz.: that the Government have no mandate from the people to carry on. In connection with that I have only this to say, that as far as I am able to follow him, there is very little in his argument to commend it to the judgment and intelligence of this House. This amendment is a challenge to the Government that they have no legal right to continue administering the affairs of state, that they have no mandate from the people, but that when elected their mandate was for a specific purpose and for a certain time, which purpose has been served and which time has elapsed. This is a somewhat new interpretation of the mandate given to the Government in 1917, and many of us on this side of the House believe that that mandate is capable of an entirely different interpretation.

There is no diversity of opinion as to the place the winning of the war occupied in connection with the affairs of Canada at the time this Government was elected. Viewed in the light of then important events the war was looked upon as the overmastering question that demanded our consideration; hence, due emphasis was given to it. A great issue was being fought out among the nations of the earth. A new doctrine had been proclaimed, a doctrine at entire variance with all our pre-conceived ideas of national life. That proud autocrat the German Emperor had asserted that he was a superman and that the German race was a super-race. Instead of the old belief that right is might, there was a revision of that order and the new adage was coined, "might is right." With that as their motto Germany had gone forth to assert herself and to propagate this new doctrine. The great issue was whether the influence of this new doctrine was to be the dominating influence in the world. The nations of the world grappled with this new issue. Many of them felt very keen the stress and strain to which they were subjected. The inroads which were being made upon our peace and harmony and good will by this new doctrine became such a menance to the world that life itself at the expense of the advancement of this doctrine became a matter of secondary consideration. Little wonder then that emphasis was placed on the question of the winning of the war, and that the government felt constrained to give it the highest and most prominent place in connection with governmental affairs.

But, Mr. Speaker, while that was the over-shadowing thought in connection with our national life at that time, that does not mean that it was the only thought; while that was the important work, the all important work, that does not mean that there was no other important work to be done. While many of us viewed that question as one, the satisfactory solution of which made the solution of all other questions possible, it did not by any means follow that we did not place value on the solution of these other questions.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I rightly interpret the spirit and intention of the Union Government when they made their appeal to the country when I say that they received their mandate to carry on all the legitimate functions of Government, making them, of course, in every respect subservient to the great work of winning the war, but at the same time none the less important, none the less to be attended to, with perhaps one single exception. There was one question that was to be held in abeyance, one question that was not to be made an issue with the Government at this time, and the very fact that that question was particularized, was singled out and referred to as in a special class by itself, leaves us to the inference—and there is no other inference—that all other questions within the realm of governmental work were to receive fair and proper consideration.

My statement is borne out by the fact that while that one question, the tariff, was not referred to in the manifesto issued by the then leader of the Government, the supporters of the Union Government, upon appearing before the people, stated clearly and distinctly on the public platform that this question must be made an exception. I remember very well a meeting which was held in the city of Winnipeg, addressed by the present Prime Minister, by the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) and by the leader of the Agrarian party (Mr. Crerar). According to the report published in the press of the addresses delivered on that occasion, these gentlemen spoke of the work of the Government, of the magnitude of the war effort, of the necessity of getting people to unite their forces in this great work. And they referred to one exception, and only one. Now, if there were other exceptions; if other matters of government were not to be dealt with, would not occasions of this kind, and the manifesto which was issued, be the times and the places where such statements should be made? But in the manifesto there is not a word about it; there is just the one statement that the tariff should not be an issue during that administration, and as I say that statement was made, not in the manifesto, but in the press and on the public platforms where important addresses were delivered.

5 p.m.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HENDERS: I hear the hon. member for Red Deer say "Hear, hear."

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Mr. Speaker, I did not even whisper.

Mr. HENDERS: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I forgive the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HENDERS: I thought it was my hon. friend's voice that I heard. Not only did gentlemen who represented the Government on public platforms refer to the matter in that light; other members who were selected and gentlemen who expected or hoped to be the supporters of the Government felt it necessary to refer to the question in that light. We have the statement published over the signature of members from the West in which they concurred in that view. Dealing with the matter of the tariff, they said:

> We have now in Canada a Union Government, formed under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden and embracing Liberal and Independent and Labour representatives as well as Conservatives.

Then it proceeds to state that the Government's policy goes farther than the raising of money for the carrying on of the war. It says further, referring to the Government's policy:

> It stands for carrying out the Military Service Act, to secure the necessary reinforcements for our soldiers, for adequate taxation of war profits and for increased taxation of incomes as necessitated by the continuance of the war. In addition to this it is pledged by the enactment of effective measures to prevent excessive profits, to the encouragement of co-operation with a view to the reduction of the cost of producing and marketing, and to the abolition of patronage by the extension of the principle of the Civil Service Act to the Outside Service. This goes far in the direction set forth in the Farmers' Platform and as a war measure, I believe, sufficiently covers the ground.

Then follows this further statement:

> In regard to the tariff permit me to quote from the statement recently issued in common with other Independent candidates in Western Canada. I am "prepared to forego the immediate discussion of the tariff as being, in the opinion of some, a contentious matter, if given full assurance that an adequate measure of excess profits and income taxation would be put in operation at the earliest moment and that thus a genuine mobilization of wealth would accompany conscription of men." The Government's policy meets this condition and on the basis stated I am prepared to give it my support.

The point I want to make is this, that there was only one exception made to the whole administration and operation of Government in connection with the policy and platform laid down by the Union Government at that time, and that exception was made by those men who declared that the tariff was not to be an issue during the administration of the Government in carrying on the war. Yet, within fifteen months, immediately after the first session of this House took place, lines of action were laid down and put into effect, and the result of that has been and is that the men who pledged themselves at that time that the tariff was not to be an issue, took exception to the policy of the Government on the tariff, and finally separated themselves from the Government and took positions on the other side. Why? Because they broke their pledge to the Government that they would not make the tariff an issue while the Government was carrying on the war.

Furthermore let us look at the record of the Government, and judge it from its record along the lines of legislation and splendid achievement. During the early days of its history, and even down to the very last session of the House, even the Opposition never seriously entertained the idea that the Government had not a mandate to function along ordinary lines. If it be true, as the leader of the Opposition recently has asserted, that the Government has no mandate now to carry on, since when did the leader of the Opposition arrive at this conclusion? If, as the leader of the Opposition says, this Government is functioning under usurped authority, when did that usurpation take place? If he concurs that the mandate was for the winning of the war and until demobilization ceased, then what about the legislation of the last session of this House? The leader of the Opposition, supported by all his followers, made no objection to the legislation of last session; that is, no more than the ordinary opposition that would be made by members in opposition. They put forward no contention that the legislation was not proper legislation because the Government had no right to function.

The many important measures that came before this House and were crystallized into legislation, received careful consideration by all the members of this House, the Opposition amongst them. That most important Bill, the Franchise Bill, which occupied the attention of the House for weeks, which was discussed, clause by clause, and the greatest care possible given to it, in order that the Franchise Bill might be one that would be a credit to us as Canadians—that Bill, with all the labour consequent thereto, was the work, according to the theory set forth by the leader of the Opposition, of a Government which had usurped authority and had no right to function at that time. I would like to understand by what process of reasoning the leader of the Opposition reached the exact point where, he said, the mandate ceased and this Government usurped power.

Let us turn to another phase of this question. We have listened to speaker after speaker who has attempted to cite precedent after precedent in support of the position he has taken that this Government has no right to function, should resign and should receive a fresh mandate from the people. In all the cases cited there has been, to my mind, one important factor which has been kept distinctly in the back ground, and that important factor is; Who, is the responsible party, who has the right to decide, when the right time has arrived for the Government to make an appeal to the people for endorsation or otherwise?

I may not have studied history and parliamentary procedure as carefully as many other members of this House; but as far as I have been able to make investigation along these lines, I have been led to the opinion that there were certain specific causes or reasons, and that these specific causes or reasons narrowed themselves down to a very small point when that decision was required to be made. The Prime Minister, who had been called to form a Government, was elected to these responsible duties for not longer than a certain period of time; but, at any time that he felt either that he lacked the confidence or the support of the people behind him, or that there was a great issue which, he felt, was of such magnitude that the people had a right to make a pronouncement on it, he had a right to call for an election and to make an appeal to the people.

There is another reason why an election must be held. If the Opposition in the House are able, not merely to assert that there is lack of confidence in the Government but are able to show cause by educating the representatives of the people in the House on that point; if they are able to introduce a want of confidence motion that will command a majority vote of the sitting members in the House, then they have established a reason why an election should be held. It is not sufficient for the leader of the Opposition and his supporters to keep crying continually " The Government has not the confidence of the people." Such petty whining may be carried to the point where those who are carrying on the propaganda may imagine they themselves believe it, but it will have no influence when considered by an intelligent electorate.

A few representative members of the Opposition in this House have gone up and down the country crying want of confidence in the Government. They have earnestly and seriously tried to raise that cry amongst the people, and in their vain imaginings they may have come to the conclusion that they have succeeded in doing so, as they have convinced themselves by the frequent repetition of the statement that there is lack of confidence in the Govment amongst the people of the country. But that does not prove anything.

I would be the last one in this House to support the Government in hanging on to office if I felt there was any truth in these statements. I have gone carefully through a large portion of my constituency; I have conversed with electors, those who were formerly Liberal, and those who now support the Union Government, and I make this statement to-day, that I have not found two per cent of the electors in my constituency who have expressed any desire for an election. The great preponderance of opinion expressed among my people is that this Government should carry on; that we should get further away from the unrest which is a natural outcome of the times through which we have passed in connection with the war and war conditions; that the country should have time to get back to normal conditions, and when we have done that then it will be the proper time for this Government to make an appeal to the people.

There is another point to which I wish to call attention Mr. Speaker, and that is that in all the discussion that has taken place in this House during the past few days there has not been one charge made against this Government of maladministration or of corrupt practices in any form.

If there is want of confidence there must be some cause for it. That cause would show itself in the work that is done by the Government. There would be either lack of efficiency in administration, lack of progressive legislation, or corruption in administration. Have we heard anything of this? Not one word, not one sentence, not one accusation that would place a stigma upon the Government in connection with its administration.

There is the further point of progressive legislation that is worthy of consideration by the members of this House. Has there ever been a Government in Canada that in the same period of time has put on the statute books of the country as much sane, progressive, and uniformly good legislation as the present Government. It might be well to call the attention to a few of the important measures that have received favourable consideration, but as my time is passing, and I have spoken much longer than I had intended, I will leave that for some other time.

The Government, I take it, is challenged, and that challenge will have to be settled one way or the other. My reasoning leads me to only one conclusion, viz; that I must vote against the amendment. May I call attention to a particular matter that I think should have the thought and attention of the Government at the present time. If there is one question that is agitating the minds of Western farmers at the present time more than any other, it is that of the handling of their wheat products. Scarcely a day passes that we do not see in some paper an item regarding the handling of the wheat crop, the Canada Wheat Board, wheat pools, or a reference to some similar phase of the grain question. I believe it can be said without exaggeration that this is the question of paramount importance in Western Canada to-day. Rumours are rife, charges and counter-charges of wrong-doing are in the air, and the result is that the minds of the Western producers are agitated abnormally on this question.

The dismissal of the Canada Wheat Board meant that the business of handling our wheat reverted back to the Grain Exchange, to the old system of grain handling. Some of us were seriously disappointed when that reversion took place. In the appointment of the Wheat Board we felt that the Government had gone a long way towards solving this, one of the most important and intricate problems affecting the greatest industry of Canada. Of course, there were those who favoured the old system, and they were not slow in making their influence felt. Representatives of the Exchange found their way to this House purporting to give out information as to the difficulty that must accrue from this new system of handling our grain. They spoke of the general shortage of world supply and assured us that there was nothing to fear, that in any case the producers of grain were bound to receive a remunerative price for their product. It was stated that an abnormal price might be expected, and the people were led to believe that they might look for even $4 of $5 per bushel wheat.

What took place? The Grain Exchange began to function. In a very short time the price of wheat began to drop. I do not know whether it is necessary for me to point out why these prices dropped. I know that large bodies of responsible farmers considered that the grain exchanges were to blame. I do know that numbers of producers think that the short selling on the grain exchanges resulted in the lowering of prices. This lowering of price was instrumental in inducing a great many farmers to hold their wheat. They believed if they kept that wheat in the elevators they would eventually secure a higher price.

Under the rules and regulations of the Grain Act, when grain is stored in the elevators, it is well known to producers that the elevator companies are nothing more or less than storage companies. They have no right to dispose of that grain without the consent of the producer. It was therefore reasonable for them to expect that by their holding this grain out of the market they would create a demand for wheat which would at least have the effect of raising the price or of increasing its market value. But what did we find? We found that the producers by holding this grain did not secure the object they had in view, did not succeed in keeping it off the market and therefore that the purpose they had in view, by which they hoped to stabilize the price was entirely thwarted by the manipulation of the grain exchanges.

I am led to this belief by the statements made by a responsible minister of the Crown in Saskatchewan. This minister ought to know what he is talking about. He is closely indentified with both country and terminal elevators. His statement is that a lot of this grain to which I have referred was shipped from the company elevators and also from the public terminal elevators without the permission of the producers. This grain was thrown on the market and sold, and this act was the means of depressing the market and bringing about the conditions to which I have just now referred.

A statement of this kind made by such a responsible party ought to be sufficient in itself to call forth from this Government a very careful investigation as to its truth or falsity. If it is true that we have country elevators taking the wheat of the farmer, selling it without permission, utilizing the money, and then when the farmer does sell, possibly charging him storage and interest right up to date, it is a serious state of affairs and I can only repeat that this statement was made by a responsible minister of the Crown in Saskatchewan. It should be investigated very thoroughly by the Government.

Another point I should like to bring to your attention is this. I am credibly informed that the North West Grain Dealers' Association sends out daily statements of prices to be paid at country points by country elevators; that all the elevators—and I emphasize that little word "all" operating at a country point receive their statement of prices through this channel, and that this fixed price must be the price at that point from the time the market closes until the opening of the market the following day, and must be adhered to by all the members of the Association, on pain of being expelled. Is that a just or equitable way of dealing with the farmers in the handling of their grain? Is it possible that there is only one source from which prices can go out, that all the members of the Exchange are so bound that they cannot vary to the extent of a fraction of a cent from this price so sent out, on penalty of expulsion from the Association? Where does the element of justice come in there? Surely it is reasonable to suppose that there will be prices for grain coming from different sources, and from different quarters of the world, to different members on the Grain Exchange, and all these prices will not be fixed definitely.

Would it not be reasonable to expect that buyers of grain soliciting these orders, securing these prices, might be in a position to allow the element of competition to enter in, and that the producer might reasonably expect to get some consideration along these lines. But all this is eliminated. The closing market price for the grain is taken, the freight rate is deducted among other charges, and then a spread is also taken for street wheat. This spread for a time last fall varied from 5 to 40 cents per bushel. The price sent out by the North West Grain Dealers' Association is invariably based on the closing option prices. No cognizance is taken of premiums of cash wheat. For instance, when there was a shortage of wheat last fall, dealers were paying as high as 30 cents per bushel premium over the prevailing price for No. 1 wheat. Do the farmers secure this? By no means. This premium of 30 cents per bushel on all wheat purchased between the closing and opening of the market went into the pockets of the people who operated country elevators, and it will be shown if investigated that very large sums of money accrued to these operators through this system.

With reference to the grain exchanges, while I do not make any charges against their operation, nevertheless suspicion has been aroused. Suspicion is rampant in the country that the operation of the grain exchanges is not strictly above board, and this Government will do well to see that a thorough investigation is made into the handling of the grain from the time it leaves the producer at the farm until it reaches the consumer.

Rumour has it that iniquity abounds—I can use no milder term—in connection with the sale of futures. Figures for the markets on the other side are available, and investigation would no doubt show that the practices on the other side can be corroborated by the practices on this side. What do they show where investigation has taken place? They show that the number of bushels of wheat bought and sold in Chicago averages per year three times as much as the total production of wheat in the entire world. There were fifty-one times as many bushels of grain sold on the Exchange at Chicago as grain shipped to Chicago. The actual grain available for delivery at Chicago averaged less than .28 of one per cent of the number of bushels sold. In other words, over 99½ per cent of the sales of futures are not followed by the actual delivery of grain. What may the condition of affairs be in Winnipeg?

Now let us have a look at the terminal elevators. The honourable member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), has, on numerous occasions, brought to the attention of the members that famous document, "the Price-Waterhouse Report." If any of the members have not seen this, I strongly advise them to secure a copy from the Minister of Trade and Commerce immediately. It is interesting reading. To think that any company could make as much money as some of these elevator companies, especially when they are supposed to be regulated by the Board of Grain Commissioners, is beyond me. Some of the large industrial companies have been damned for making excessive profits, but they are little tin gods compared with some of our grain companies.

Here are some particulars from the report and from the letter of Mr. Christie in the Farmer's Advocate: I say, Sir, is it not time that the Government listened to the members in regard to these overages and sale screening and scalpings? This report, Sir, has only to do with public terminal elevators. No investigation has been made of the private terminal elevators. These are the elevators that are permitted to mix grain to their heart's content, and being allowed, they take full advantage of the right. I have before me figures for one of these elevators at the head of the lakes. They show that this elevator received 323,930 bushels of No. 1

Northern, and shipped out 331,529 bushels. They received 382,822 bushels of No. 2 Northern, and shipped out 55,864 bushels, just 160,000 bushels more. And listen to this: They received 1,251,411 bushels of No. 3 Northern, and shipped out 2,619,391 bushels—just double as much shipped out as was received. In other words, this elevator received 1,960,729 bushels of wheat grading No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3 Northern, and they shipped out 3,486,786 bushels, or a surplus of 1,536,057 bushels. Just figure this out for yourselves, bearing in mind that the price of wheat last year was fixed at a comparatively high figure by the Canada Wheat Board.

Where did they get this surplus? This is a perfect legitimate question. I notice that they took in a lot of smutty, and tough wheat but they shipped very little of this low grade wheat out. In other words they bought the low grade wheat at a low price from the producer, and then by a process of mixing with higher grade wheat got it past the inspector. This is called promotion of grades, and is practised by all the private elevator companies at the head of the lakes. I do not think that in treating this tough wheat they use the drier very much because coal is too expensive. They probably just elevated the tough wheat once or twice and then were able to mix it with the straight grade wheat and ship it out.

I have only mentioned wheat. They do the same in regard to barley and flax. Talk about John D. Rockefeller making money; he is not in it with some of these private elevator operators. They are the real profiteers. You have no doubt been surprised at the figures of the overages in the public terminal elevators, but I venture to say, that every member in this House would gasp if figures were produced showing the earnings of these private elevators for the last five or six years. It is up to the Government to get these figures.

If you look up the records of what went through the drying process you will find that only a very small proportion ever reached the dryer. By elevating it once or twice they got it into such condition that by mixing it with dry wheat it went through very nicely. But the producer did not get the benefit of it. I would like to know what right has this association, and what right have the elevators to load grain out without the proper surrender of the documents by its owner. It appears to me that great laxity has been shown by its owner.

All these things added together make it necessary that steps be taken to see how many of these statements are true and how many are false. If they are true, I submit that it is the duty of this Government to see that regulatory steps are taken to cleanse the present system, and put it on an honest business basis.

All the evidence goes to show that a most important duty expected from the Government, is that of enquiring into the handling of our wheat crop. I think it wise to call attention to the matter now, in view of the fact that in a very short time it will be necessary for us to make preparation for the handling of our crop for next year. Upon the provision that is made by the Government for safely guarding the interest of the producer much will depend as to the quantity of wheat that we may expect will be seeded next spring. It is up to us therefore to leave nothing undone to give assurances to the producers that in connection with the handling of their wheat crop there will be no serious shrinkage or loss to them. We believe the time has come to appoint a commission with full power to investigate in every direction so as to bring out all the information possible in order that we may have the facts before us.

In saying this I do not wish to speak disrespectfully, or to in anyway disparage, the operations of any company or any method of handling wheat. I am merely calling attention to the fact that the people are agitated over the question, that there is a feeling of unrest with respect to it all through the country, and that the suspicion exists among the farmers that they are not being fairly treated. This unrest will not be quieted until the lid is taken off and the whole of the facts brought out. If the allegations to which I have alluded are not borne out after inquiry has been made, it will be to the interests of the Grain Exchange, and everybody concerned, that the facts should be known. The Exchange will then stand higher in the estimation of the people and confidence will be restored to all those engaged in the industry. If the allegations made are sustained it will be evident that the time has come when we must resort to other methods for the handling of our grain.

In my remarks I am entirely uninfluenced by any desire to interfere with the investigation which is being carried on by the Grain Growers' themselves in connection with this matter. What I am asking for will materially help them in reaching a proper finding on the problem they themselves are attempting to solve. They will have my co-operation and support if they can propose a method which will bring about the desired result. I am sorry to have occupied so much of the time of the House, Mr. Speaker, but I really could not deal with the subject within any shorter space.

Mr. HENRI E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec County): Mr. Speaker, I think it is imperative on every member of this House to clearly express his views on the important amendment which has been presented by the hon. leader of the Oppotion (Mr. Mackenzie King). But before doing so I wish to extend my congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) upon his elevation to his present high position, surely an evidence of the confidence which the supporters of the Government must have had in him. This promotion is undoubtedly due to his great ability, his great talents, and his great energy. I also wish to tender my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. Both these gentlemen certainly fulfilled the important duty entrusted to them with great ability and acquitted themselves in a manner that is a credit to themselves and their constituents.

It was a matter of great regret that the Government saw fit to depart from the old and well-established custom of having the Address moved and seconded in both the official languages of the country. It is certainly to be deplored, Mr. Speaker, that among the supporters of the Government there could not be found at least one hon. gentleman capable of moving or seconding the Address in the French language.

As I have already said, the amendment before us is of great importance and should receive the approbation of the majority of the members in this House, as it certainly has the approbation of the great majority of the Canadian electors. With the exception of the members of the Cabinet and their supporters, the amendment without doubt has the support of the country at large. Throughout the country the demand is everywhere heard for a general election. All classes and communities are calling for it. The consumers, the labouring classes, the returned soldiers, the farmers—and I can speak for the farmers because I represent one of the largest agricultural counties in the province of Quebec—are all urging a general election. The members of the Opposition are ready for a general election. We are not afraid to face our electors, we are not afraid to discuss the Government's policies; we are ready to meet the members of the Government, or their supporters in the province of Quebec or anywhere else. That is the reason, Mr. Speaker, why I shall with great pleasure support the amendment which is now before the House.

Lately a great many compliments have been bestowed on the province of Quebec. The feeling which has existed largely since the general election of 1917 seems to have changed, if we are to judge by the kind words and bouquets which are being lavished on my province. We are delighted to see this change of heart, but we would appreciate it much more if it were supplemented by sincerity of purpose on the part of the Government. I refer more particularly to the capital of my province, the city of Quebec, which has been so unjustly treated. I was delighted to read in the newspapers a few months ago the speeches made by the Prime Minister in the province of Quebec in which he expressed his desire to see her united with the other provinces. I was also very much pleased to hear the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), one of the most aggressive members on the Government side against the province of Quebec, throw us some bouquets a few days ago. But, as I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec and the city of Quebec are not looking for bouquets or kind words; they are looking for the fulfilment of the solemn written obligations of the Government towards the city of Quebec.

I do not doubt the sincerity of the Prime Minister's frequently expressed desire to treat the province of Quebec on an equal footing with the other provinces, but it would be more to the purpose if he would at once give instructions to the proper departments of his Government to render justice to the city of Quebec, for then we would have an earnest of his solicitude for our so-called isolation. We are not asking for special favours. The eve of a general election is not the time for the citizens of Quebec to get down on their knees. We are only asking for the performance of what has been promised to the city of Quebec under solemn written contracts. We are asking the Government to fulfil their pledge to give us proper equipment for the Transcontinental railway; we are asking the Government to construct the long-promised and long-deferred docks and grain elevators; we are asking the Government to resume the works on the St. Charles river, on which nearly $2,000,000 have already been expended, and which works are now lying idle and useless. The late Minister of Public Works, Mr. Carvell, stated in 1919 that the work would be proceeded with, and he admitted that unless it were carried to completion the $1,750,000 already expended would be simply wasted. That work was suspended without any reason whatever, as I can prove to this House at any time by official documents. If it is really the intention of the Prime Minister to treat my province on an equal footing with any other part of the Dominion, I will ask him to order those works to be procedeed with immediately, for the money has been already voted for them, and they have been interrupted unjustly and without any reason whatever.

I would also ask the Government to fulfil their contract to complete workshops and put up the main building which has been agreed upon for the Transcontinental railway. The city sacrificed the Champlain market property, valued at over $3,000,000, on the strength of a written contract signed by the Federal Government and the city, under which the Government agreed to build workshops of the same size and type as those erected in Winnipeg—shops equipped for building cars and locomotives and giving employment to four or five thousand workmen, whereas the present shops are only employing about seven hundred. I would ask the right hon. the Prime Minister to see that this part of the contract is fulfilled without further delay.

I would also ask the Prime Minister, now that he has so much love for the citizens of Quebec, to see that justice is done to those people of that province who subscribed to stocks in the Great Northern and Lake St. John Railways and who have not been able to settle their claims with the Government, although numbers of petitions and demands have been made during the last few years upon the Government with a view to reimbursing those citizens who subscribed over $650,000 in connection with those two railways. When the majority shareholders are paid the full amount of their shares, the minority shareholders also should be reimbursed.

Let me mention one or two of the chief reasons why the citizens of Quebec subscribed to stocks in these companies. In respect of $200,000 worth of stock subscribed to the Great Northern Company, that company agreed to erect their repair shops in Limoilou. But what has happened, Mr. Speaker? The men employed at Limoilou have been transferred to the St. Malo shops. If it is the intention of the Government to dispense with the shops at Limoilou, why do they not—and I am pleased to see the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in his seat—reimburse the city of Quebec for the $200,000 subscribed by its citizens in order that they might have the shops at Limoilou? Certainly this should be done if the contract in respect to these shops is to be cancelled by the Government.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Mr. Speaker, in the course of my remarks this afternoon, I stated that the work on the St. Charles river was interrupted without any valid reasons being offered. I wish, with your permission, Sir, to give to the House a certain declaration made in the House of Commons by Mr. Carvell, then Minister of Public Works, as reported in Hansard of May 13, 1919. Mr. Carvell's declaration was made in reply to this interpellation of the hon. member for Lotbinière:

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister tell us if it is his intention to finish up the damming of the St. Charles river at Quebec?

Mr. CARVELL: There is no vote in the Estimates for that. The trouble with the St. Charles river proposition at Quebec is a very simple one. The scheme is to construct a dam across the mouth of the river where it empties into the St. Lawrence. There were to be two entrances from the St. Lawrence up into the basins of the St. Charles river. That was to create practically a lake 12 or 14 feet higher than the ordinary level of the river at low tide and, to some extent, higher than the level would be at high tide. The sewage of at least three-quarters of the city of Quebec enters into the St. Charles river above the location of this dam and before the work was started an agreement was made with the city of Quebec by which they were to provide for the sewage. There was to be a big trunk sewer constructed by which the sewage would be emptied into the St. Lawrence river around and below the dam at the mouth of the St. Charles. It will cost probably $2,000,000. I suppose they had some trouble about financing it during the war but no attempt has been made to take care of that sewage. They have refused to go on with the work until something is done about the sewage. If you build a dam across the St. Charles river and dump the sewage of 75,000 or 80,000 people into the river for a year you will have a pest house; you could not live alongside of it.

I would not take the responsibility of consenting to go on with the work until something was done about the sewage. With this, I take the same ground that I have taken in regard to St. John and other places. We have about $1,750,000 invested in the St. Charles river work at the present time and it will take another $1,000,000 to finish it. The money we have expended is absolutely lost until the work is completed but I cannot go on and complete it until something is done to protect the health of the city of Quebec.

It will be of interest to the members of this House to know the exact terms of the contract entered into between the city of Quebec and the Federal Government in regard to the work on the St. Charles river, regarding which work Mr. Carvell stated that the city had not fulfilled its obligations and that, therefore, the Government had not gone on with the work. With your permission, Sir, I will read the contract which was entered into between the Government and the city of Quebec:

Before Charles Juge Baillairgeon, Public Notary for the Province of Quebec, residing and practising in the said City of Quebec

Came and appeared:

His Majesty King George V, represented by the Honourable Frederick Debartzch Monk, Minister of the Public Works of the Dominion of Canada, the said Honourable F. D. Monk hereto represented by Mr. A. R. Decary, Engineer of the Department of Public Works, for the district of Quebec, according to a procuration signed by the Honourable F. D. Monk, in Ottawa, dated May 2nd, 1919, annexed to the minute of these presents after having been recognized and signed by the said Mr. A. R. Decary in the presence of the undersigned Notary.

And the City of Quebec, represented by His Worship Mayor Napoleon Drouin, duly authorized for the purpose hereof by a resolution of the City Council of Quebec, at a meeting held on April 19th, 1912; of which a certified copy is annexed to the minutes of the present contract after having been signed by Mr. Napoleon Drouin, in the presence of the undersigned Notary, part of the second part,—

Which said parties have agreed and covenanted as follows: to wit;

Whereas the party of the first part proposes to execute certain works of damming and dredging in the river St. Charles,

Whereas part of the actual sewerage system of the City of Quebec actually discharges in the said river St. Charles,

Whereas the works of dredging and damming in the river St. Charles, if executed, will consequently interfere with the proper discharge of sewers actually deversing in the said river;

Whereas it has been agreed between the parties that a contract would be signed in virtue whereof the said city of Quebec will save the Government of the Dominion of Canada harmless against any claims that may be made with regard to the said sewers.

In consequence, it is by these presents agreed and covenanted as follows:—

1. The party of the second part will, if the party of the first part executes the proposed damming and dredging works in the city of Quebec, save the Government harmless against any claim whatever that may be made in connection with the sewerage system actually deversing in the river St. Charles, or which may deverse in the said river, which sewers are under control of the said City of Quebec.

2. The Government of the Dominion of Canada on the other part will allow the city of Quebec, if said works are carried out in the river St. Charles, permission to discharge the sewers outside, through and at large of the proposed damming works on the said river, towards the St. Lawrence river, permission extending on all sewers which the city will have to construct to regulate the said sewerage system.

Done and Executed in Quebec, under the notarial number six hundred and twenty-nine of the minutes of the undersigned Notary.

In Testimony Whereof the appearers have signed on the fourth day of June of the year nineteen hundred and twelve in the presence of the said Notary, after due reading.

(Signed)

NAP. DROUIN,
ALBERT DECARY,
CHARLES J. BAILLAIRGEON, N.P.

I have read this contract so that there will be no misunderstanding regarding what was agreed to between the Dominion Government and the city of Quebec. The contract is nothing more and nothing less than that if the Government does the work, the city of Quebec will not hold the Government responsible for any damage which may be caused to the sewers. Therefore, when I state that the work on the St. Charles river at Quebes has been interrupted without any valid reason, I think you will admit, Sir, that my contention, which is that of the citizens of Quebec, is perfectly right. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) really has, as is stated, a special place in his heart for the citizens of Quebec, he should prove his good faith, not by throwing bouquets to the people of Quebec but by prompt action in doing justice to the citizens of the province and more particularly of the city of Quebec, who seem to have been boycotted by this Government in the past few years.

Besides the claims I enumerated this afternoon, the citizens of the city of Quebec have made another very important claim on the Government. During the riots in the city of Quebec, four most peaceable citizens were killed by the soldiers, who had taken control of the city by order of the Government, issued through the Militia Department. The Riot Act had never been read in the city before the shooting took place, and the mayor of Quebec, which position I had the honour of occupying at that time, had never asked the military powers to take control of the city, but we asked them to protect their own buildings in case the city police were not able to do so.

You, Mr. Speaker, and the citizens of Canada, are familiar with what occurred during the riots, and the unfortunate consequences. I repeat, four perfectly innocent citizens were killed by the soldiers, and a few others were badly injured for life. The parents of the slain, as well as the injured, have made claims on the Government, but their demands have received no consideration. If the Prime Minister really has so warm a spot in his heart for the citizens of Quebec, is not this a good time to prove his sincerity by settling these claims of the victims, and all the other claims which I have set forth this afternoon and evening in my remarks.

Mr. GEORGE BRECKEN NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset associate myself with the remarks that have been made by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House in commendation of the speeches delivered by the mover and the seconder of the resolution now before the House. May I at the same time extend my personal congratulations to my right hon. leader, the Prime Minister, on his elevation to the highest office in the gift and service of the Canadian people. I should like to be permitted to go a little further and say that I think the House and the country are to be congratulated on the fact that when our great Prime Minister and leader, Sir Robert Borden, who piloted the affairs of this country during the whole period of the war, found that owing to a physical breakdown it was necessary for him to resign, there was found within the Government itself a man whose qualities of heart and mind so eminently fitted him to take up the reins of office and carry on from the point where Sir Robert left off.

I do not think the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lavigueur) will feel that I am at all discourteous if I do not attempt to follow him in the remarks he has made to the House this afternoon and evening. The first part of his remarks followed the general line that has been taken by members on the Opposition side of the House during the whole debate, while the latter part dealt with a subject apparently in dispute betwen the city of Quebec and the Government, of which I have no knowledge and am consequently unable to speak.

Coming to the debate itself, I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that in its course it has blazed out for itself a trail that makes it take a unique place in the annals of Parliamentary debate of a similar character in this country. The House has been in session almost two weeks. We have had placed in our hands by His Excellency the Governor General a legislative programme of some importance, notwithstanding the remarks made by my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) this afternoon. We were charged also with the responsibility of scrutinizing the record of the Government in the past and their programme for the future. In a word, we had before us in review the whole record of the Government, both in its administrative and legislative capacities. In such a review I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that it is usually the practice of the Opposition to take some part. As a matter of fact, I will go further and say that the debate on the Address is looked upon as the opportunity of the Opposition to scrutinize every act of the Government, administrative and legislative. It is looked upon as their opportunity to dig into and pry up, if they can, any weak spot in the administrative or legislative record of the Government.

But what has happened in this debate? It is now well on in its second week, and we have seen one hon. member after another on the opposite side of the House, from the leader of the Opposition down, rise in his place and talk about every purely academic subject under the sun rather than the Address of His Excellency the Governor General. There are two reasons for that. In the first place—and I think this is a matter upon which the House and the country can legitimately congratulate itself—the record of the Government has been such that the Opposition cannot, dig and delve as they may, put their finger on one single act of the Government and say: This is something you should not have done. Nor can they put their finger on one single proposal of the Government and say: This is something you should not do.

Mr. JACOBS: What about the marine policy of the Government?

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend has any fault to find with the marine policy of the Government, it will be in order for him when he speaks in this debate to deal with that subject, but so far, his colleagues who have spoken have avoided anything in the nature of criticism of any part of the Government's policy.

There is another reason. You know, Sir, it is not a difficult matter for any demagogue to indulge in destructive criticism, and to utter all sorts of declamations; but when it comes to a question of offering constructive criticism or helpful suggestions there requires to be something in the nature of unanimity of opinion amongst those who offer such criticism and suggestions. And for the leader of the Opposition to undertake to secure unanimity of opinion amongst his followers on any subject of public importance in this country at the present time, would create a situation that would find a fitting parallel only in the chaotic circumstances surrounding the tower of Babel. He simply could not unite his followers on any single subject of prime importance before the country, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

There is one other reason why the speech from the Throne and matters of a similar character have been studiously avoided. The leader of the Opposition and his followers do not want to discuss anything in the nature of a real and vital issue to-day. It is not in keeping with the arrangement that has been so studiously worked up between my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Notwithstanding all this, however, the debate has served some useful purpose. In the first place, it has shown both to this House and to the country the opposition to this Government in all its naked impotence.

Just analyze the situation for a moment. We heard the hon. member for Marquette this afternoon say that this country was faced with problems of supreme importance, problems that would require the attention of all thinking men if they were to be properly solved. Well, then, what has been the contribution of the Opposition? They have offered nothing but lifeless, meaningless opposition, the still-born product of the leader of the Opposition's political councils, capable of nothing but complete bankruptcy in statesmanship. He leads what is only an apology for what was once a great political party. Mr. Speaker, the debate has served another purpose: it has given an opportunity to the leader of the Opposition—I regret exceedingly he is not in his place——

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Well, before I sit down it is my intention to address some definitely pointed remarks to the hon. gentleman's position and record. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that the debate has given to the leader of the Opposition an opportunity to occupy in the centre of the stage what would seem to be his favourite position, that of perhaps the greatest example of bloodless neutrality that this generation has produced.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let us just for a moment review the programme of legislation submitted to the House. The first item deals with unemployment in this country. Now, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Marquette said this afternoon, and notwithstanding the indifference with which that subject has been treated in the House the question of unemployment, I conceive, is of some importance; and every right-thinking man in this country must realize that our social conditions are not going to be what they should be until measures are found to cope with the unemployment situation. The leader of the Opposition, theoretically, when he is in his study writing books, is supposed to know something about the workingman's problems. But when he comes on the floor of the House of Commons and a great proposition is before him, where does he stand?

An hon. MEMBER: He stands right.

Mr. NICHOLSON: He says, Mr. Speaker, in so many words: "I wash my hands entirely of the question of unemployment. I am not interested in whether the workingman is employed or not; I am neutral." That is the position he takes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Now, the next question submitted to the House in the speech from the Throne is unemployment insurance and old age pensions. This is a subject of prime importance notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary. It is a difficult problem. Every English-speaking country in the world is grappling with the problem of unemployment insurance and old age pensions, and every English-speaking country in the world will continue to grapple with it until it is properly solved. This Parliament has been charged with the responsibility of taking hold of that problem and dealing with it.

My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), for whose opinion I have the very highest regard, said in his speech that he hoped this Government and this Parliament would not press the matter of unemployment insurance and old age pensions. I take exactly the reverse position. I hope that this Government and this House will press the question. Because it is very difficult is one reason why we should take hold of it and try to find a proper solution for it. And, Sir, I will go so far as to say that unless some system can be devised that will remove from the honest workingmen the spectre of the possibility that their families may suffer because they cannot obtain work, then our whole social system will go to pieces. I say again that this is a difficult problem, and it will require the attention of earnest, virile men.

Where does the leader of the Opposition stand with regard to this matter? Again, he virtually says, "I am neutral when it comes to a question of unemployment insurance and old age pensions."

The next item in the speech from the Throne is the question of Canada's position in the League of Nations and of a Court of International Justice. But surely. says the leader of the Opposition, this is going too far. Now, the whole question of the League of Nations and the setting up of a Court of International Justice has arisen out of the war, and it is because the steel has gone to the hearts and souls of millions of people all over the civilized world that there is a suggestion that we might possibly set up a work of League of Nations and should have a Court of International Justice. But the hon. gentleman says: "Have I not made it absolutely manifest that I have no interest in the war? Why should I have anything to do with a League of Nations or a Court of International Justice?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: He says again: "I am a neutral."

An hon. MEMBER: Clever.

An hon. MEMBER: You do not like that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The next point is the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Now, hon. gentlemen need not get excited; it is not my intention to discuss the tariff in detail.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will say, however, that the tariff is the most vital problem of domestic policy before the country today.

Mr. M. CLARK: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: "Hear, hear," says my hon. friend from Red Deer. Well, I appreciate his "hear, hear," because there is not a man in this House or out of it who knows the hon. member but knows that he is absolutely sincere in the position he takes on the tariff; and whether we agree with him, or disagree, we are ready and willing to accord him what is due to every honest man in the way of credit for a definite stand on any question.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain the Government's position on the tariff.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I say, Mr. Speaker, that until this country knows definitely what its future will be with regard to the tariff we shall not have stable business conditions. I heard my hon. friend from Marquette say this afternoon, in discussing the present commercial and business situation that there is uneasiness amongst the business men. Well, there will be uneasiness until they know once for all whether their busnesses will be subjected to the undue and unfair competition of the great industries to the south of us and the cheap labour of the whole outside world. But where does the leader of the Opposition stand with regard to the tariff? If I asked you, Mr. Speaker, where he stood you might answer the question perhaps by saying it depended upon where he happened to be at a particular time—because he has stood at every point of the compass on the question of the tariff in the last twelve months, and his party has occupied exactly the same position. The thing they are determined to avoid, if avoid they can, is the discussion of the concrete issue of the tariff either in this House or out of it. But side step it as they may they will be brought face to face with the straight issue of the tariff before this session comes to an end. The one thing that the leader of the Opposition and his followers have discussed during the present debate is the question of mandates.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear." Well I am going to discuss that question purely from my own standpoint. I take it that each member can speak for himself, and for himself alone, when it comes to the question of mandates. I got my mandate from the people of East Algoma, the people amongst whom I have had the privilege of living and working during the last thirty-five years.

An hon. MEMBER: You have had it too long.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am answerable to the people of East Algoma, and I am not going to be dictated to by the leader of the Opposition, or anyone else as to how I am going to exercise that mandate. But the leader of the Opposition sets himself up in this House as the supreme arbiter of the mandate of every other member. Where did the hon. gentleman get that right? You will recall, Sir, that in 1917 he went up into the riding of North York, his native county, and made a moving appeal to the people there to give him a mandate, but they literally kicked him out of the county. In 1919 he thought he saw an opportunity of being elected in another county in his own province. There was a door standing partly open and he made an effort to get in through that door but the people of the county, knowing his record as they did, slammed the door in his face and he could not get a mandate there. Then along towards the autumn of 1919 the people of Prince, P.E.I., woke up one morning and found a basket on their door-step, and with that generosity characteristic of the people of my native province they said "We will take the poor foundling in and give it shelter until it can be determined whether it has any legitimate political parentage or not." That, Mr. Speaker, is where the leader of the Opposition got his mandate and yet he comes into this House and says to me and every other member who came here by virtue—

An hon. MEMBER: By virtue of the War Times Election Act.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —of the mandate of our constituents. You have no right to be where you are."

An hon. MEMBER: The people are getting uneasy.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As I said a moment ago, with that charity that all decent men should accord to a poor outcast, I am ready to accord the leader of the Opposition the right and the privilege of speaking for his foster political parents the people of Prince Edward Island, but I am not willing to accord to him the right to speak for the people of Algoma. The leader of the Opposition said in his speech that there was unrest throughout the country—and the statement was repeated by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar)— unrest amongst the business men, unrest amongst returned soldiers. What has been the contribution of the leader of the Opposition and his friend towards the allaying of the unrest? Let us get down to one concrete case. What suggestion has the leader of the Opposition put forward that will have for its effect the allaying of the unrest amongst returned soldiers?

Mr. JACOBS: Turning the Government out.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I anticipated that reply. Hon. members opposite say, "Turn the Government out."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that I have struck a responsive chord in the hearts of my friends opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just listen to them cheer in a minute or two. What happens when the Government is turned out?

An hon. MEMBER: We will be in power.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The leader of the Opposition made this statement up in Peterborough a short time ago:

> Turn the Meighen Government out and then it will be the duty of His Excellency the Governor General to send for the Leader of the Opposition to form a Government.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If you will pardon me a slang phrase, can you beat that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: We can beat you.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —as a means of allaying unrest amongst the returned soldiers in this country, to bring about a situation that would make it necessary for His Excellency the Governor General to send for the leader of the Opposition to form a Government? Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be unduly severe—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Hon. gentlemen may laugh but I will tell them this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must appeal to hon. gentlemen to observe some semblance of decorum in debate. Doubtless the hon. member for East Algoma would be willing to concede the privilege to any hon. gentleman who so desires, of rising in his place and asking a question in proper form, but I submit that debate cannot be conducted with a running fire of comment such as has occurred during the last few moments.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, your desire to maintain the decorum of the House, but I can assure you that the hilarity of hon. gentlemen opposite gives me very great pleasure. I am glad to see the leader of the Opposition now taking his seat and, with your permission, Sir, I will repeat in his presence what I said a few moments ago.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Say it in French.

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The leader of the Opposition has suggested that as a means of allaying unrest amongst the returned soldiers in this country, a situation should be brought about that would make it necessary for His Excellency the Governor General to send for him (Mr. King) to form a Government and become Prime Minister in Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me repeat what I said a few moments ago. I do not wish to be unduly severe, but I say this—and I say it looking straight in the eye of the leader of the Opposition and I ask his supporters to take it to heart—the mere suggestion that the hon. the leader of the Opposition should ever be called upon to occupy the position of Prime Minister or any other office of a public character that would bring him into contact with the interests of the returned soldiers is a flagrant insult to every man who put the uniform on during the war and fought for his country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame, shame.

Mr. PELLETIER: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am certain that the hon. member for East Algoma will, on reflection, realize that his last remark could not properly be made having regard to the proper conduct of debate, and that he should withdraw it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have very great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in withdrawing the remark if it is unparliamentary. I appreciate the fact that, faced with such a situation, any red blooded man in this country who stood behind and beside the men who fought for us overseas would have very great difficulty in finding parliamentary language in which to express himself.

Mr. FAFARD: You would not stand very long beside me, anyway.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Coward.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish the House to realize that to the best of its ability the Chair will endeavour to preserve the proper decorum of debate; by no means can the debate be conducted from the seats.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that it is not pleasant for hon. gentlemen opposite to hear these things. But I will just say this in conclusion in regard to this matter: They may squirm as they like—

Mr. DUFF: Order, order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —but the fathers and mothers of the boys who fought overseas and the great mass of the public who stood behind those boys will not forget these things, whether hon. members do or not.

Mr. DUFF: Bunkum, rot.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Now, Mr. Speaker, I will leave the matter right there.

An hon. MEMBER: You have gone too far.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We have heard during this debate that we should have an election. I do not know if there is anything we need worry about in that regard, for we are going to have an election.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: You will never come back.

Mr. NICHOLSON: All right; as I said a moment ago I am in the hands of my constituents, and I am perfectly willing—

An hon. MEMBER: They will choke you.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —and I am perfectly willing to abide by their verdict. But, Mr. Speaker, I have the right that every hon. member has, and that the people have—the right to know what is going to be decided at the election. What are the issues that will be laid before the people? I have heard it stated in this debate that hon. gentlemen directly opposite have no policy. But that is a mistake; they have a policy for every parish, for every constituency, and for every province; and above and beyond all that they have one main policy: to make such an appeal to the people in the various parts of the Dominion that they may come back here with just sufficient following to join up with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and his party and thus control the destinies of this country.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a good combination.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is the policy. Now, under those circumstances where should we look for the policy that is likely to dominate if that situation eventuates? Is it to be expected that the vacillating group of men who cannot agree among themselves five minutes at a time on anything are going to be the dominant partner in the combination that is to govern this country? Not for one moment. It is that group led by the hon. member for Marquette and supported by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that will dominate the policy of the holy alliance which is to be consummated after the next general election.

Now, we come to this point—what is their policy, and whom do they represent? Sometimes they are styled the Agrarian party, sometimes they are styled the Farmers' party, and sometimes they style themselves the Progressive party. A greater misuse of terms could not possibly be suggested than any one of the three. What are they and who are they? They are here as the accredited representatives of the greatest corporation that ever came into existence in this country—the United Grain Growers' Company. That is who they are and that is what they are here for. I have proof of it under my hand.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: File the proof.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is what the vice president of the United Grain Growers' Company has to say on the subject:

> Under the system we propose, men are not elected as representatives in the sense heretofore understood. They will go to Parliament as our delegates—

These are not my words, they are the words of the vice president of the United Grain Growers' Company. He says:

> They will go to Parliament as our delegates, to carry out our instructions.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend who made that statement?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Woods, vice president of the United Grain Growers' Company.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say that Mr. Woods has no connection whatever with the United Grain Growers' company.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I am ready to admit, that it would be exceedingly difficult for any man to say just who is associated with the United Grain Growers' Company and who is not. But I may just as well give this to the House right here since my hon. friend has raised the question. In 1918 the general manager of the United Grain Growers' Company, Mr. Rice Jones—am I right?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON:—came before a committee of this House, brought here by gentlemen associated with the United Grain Growers. He was asked the question, whether this corporation had any subsidiaries. He sat back in his chair in blank amazement. Any subsidiaries! Can it be expected that any ordinary man would carry around under his cranial bones sufficient information to say offhand what the subsidiaries of the United Grain Growers' company were? Mr. Woods, if not the vice President of the United Grain Growers' Company, is president of the Alberta Grain Growers' company which is closely identified and affiliated with the United Grain Growers' company. These are Mr. Woods' words, and let me repeat them:

> They will go to Parliament as our delegates to carry out our instructions. We will retain complete control by means of the recall, or advance resignation, &c.

That is just exactly what this party is that sometimes calls itself the Farmers' party, sometimes the Agrarian party, and sometimes the Progressive party; and that is why it is here.

An hon. MEMBER: National, Liberal Conservative.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I said a moment ago that you could not suggest a more violent misuse of terms than those titles. What has been their attitude towards the farmers of this country? What has been the attitude of the hon. member for Marquette, their leader, towards the farmers of this country? The hon. gentleman was Minister of Agriculture for at least a year and a half at a period when every government in Canada, provincial and federal, backed by the whole body of public opinion was bending its energies to increase production, when the Dominion treasury, one might say, was wide open for the hon. gentleman to use its funds in any way that would stimulate our agricultural production. Can he point to one single Act that passed through this House at his suggestion to improve the condition of our farmers? Not one single act or suggestion. We are told that the hon. gentleman did have something to do with a plan by which the elevators at the head of the Lakes were permitted to use poisonous seeds in the manufacture of stock food for Ontario farmers.

Now, let us go one step further with regard to the position of this particular party concerning the farming industry of this country. Anyone who has given the question thought will agree that you cannot have stable agricultural conditions if you produce grain and nothing else; you must have mixed farming. How are you going to bring that about? By making it possible for farmers who are real farmers to get an abundant supply of stock foods—the by-products of the milling industry—at reasonable prices. What is the attitude of this organization towards the milling industry? Members of the House will recall that when this close corporation agreement was entered into between the two wings of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition the Toronto Globe had something to do with it; they put an asset into the pool by turning over to this organization in Western Canada their western correspondent, Mr. Norman Lambert, to act as secretary and general publicity manager for the group. Anyone who has had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Lambert and discussing economic problems with him will agree that he is a clear-headed man of outstanding ability. Mr. Lambert is managing with a very considerable degree of skill the publicity campaign for the hon. gentlemen who call themselves the Agrarian party. Let me quote from an article contributed by Mr. Lambert to an Eastern paper on the subject of the tariff. I will not read the whole of it; I will deal with only one vital point. Mr. Lambert, discussing the question of the manufacture of macaroni in this country and whether it should be imported, says:

> Prior to 1910 there was one macaroni factory in Quebec and one in Manitoba and Canada imported a major portion of the macaroni consumed. Since that time there has been established an additional factory in Alberta and a third factory in Ontario—

It was bad enough that we should establish factories in Manitoba, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec to employ Canadian workmen in the manufacture of a food product for this country; but here is the pinch:

> —using as their raw material for the manufacture of macaroni, flour produced from Canadian wheat.

"Flour produced from Canadian wheat;" that is the sting in the thing so far as the United Grain Growers are concerned. Why should there be any opposition on the part of men who profess to be the friends of the farmers to the milling of wheat in Canada? Well, there is just this reason for it; the milling industry in Canada is the most serious competitor that the United Grain Growers of Alberta have. They buy a lot of wheat and they manufacture it into flour and mill feeds. Every bushel of wheat they buy is a bushel of wheat which the Grain Growers cannot buy and upon which they cannot make fat overages at the head of the Lakes; a bushel of wheat that they cannot ship out of the country through one of their subsidiaries, the Export Company of New York or the Export Company of Canada, and thus secure fat profits. That is why they are opposed to the milling industry; yet they 9 p.m. have the presumption to go before the people and say that they are the friends of the farming industry.

"But," they say, "look at the commercial business we are doing amongst the farmers; look at what we are doing for these men in Western Canada by getting them all the things they require—feed, clothing, machinery, fuel, and everything else." Well, just let us look at it. The manager of United Grain Growers, Limited, gave valuable evidence before a Committee of this House,—evidence which it is worth any hon. gentleman's while to read. I will not delay the House by going over very much of it, but here the question of flour comes in again: My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and other hon. gentlemen, going up and down the country in their campaign of abuse against other business men, have held up the millers as an institution that was bleeding the people white by the profits they were taking. In the year for which I am going to give you some figures, the Ogilvie Milling Company, the Western Canada Flour Milling Company, the Lake of the Woods Milling Company and the Maple Leaf Milling Company made profits ranging from 9 to 11½ cents a barrel on the flour they produced, and they did all the work of manufacturing that product. The United Grain Growers, Limited, carry on a sort of letter order business. They write a letter to some milling company and ask them to forward a car of flour to some farmer or group of farmers with draft attached to bill of lading. In this way they handled, without the cost to them of a single cent, something over a million dollars' worth of flour, and they collected from the farmer between eighty cents and one dollar a barrel as their rake-off for doing it.

I shall not go over the whole list, but let me come down to the question of agricultural implements. The whole farming community, particularly in Western Canada, is suffering because of the high cost of their farming implements. The United Grain Growers, Limited, handle a lot of farming implements, and in the year for which Mr. Rice-Jones gave the figures, on every $100 worth of farming implements they sold to the western grain growers, they collected a profit for themselves of $21.06. Mr. Rice-Jones was asked: Do they give the farmers any service by way of time within which to pay for these goods? The reply was, in effect: "Nothing in the world—cash on the spot. We send in the order; the machinery goes forward, the farmer pays for it, and we collect $21.06 per cent."

At the moment I will not pursue that point any further. There is one other matter to which I wish to refer briefly. In the campaign that these hon. gentlemen carry on to divide this country along class lines, the Eastern newspapers are a constant object of attack. They are referred to as the "capitalistic press," a "hired press," and all that kind of thing. I am not speaking in defence of the Canadian newspapers; they are amply able to take care of themselves. But the House will recall that during last session the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. J. F. Reid) stood up in his place and occupied over half an hour of the time of the House in the reading of a pamphlet issued by a man by the name of Murray, one time secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The House will recall my hon. friend's peroration; he stood with his hands clasped across his breast and his eyes rolled towards Heaven in such a way as to cause one to wonder whether he was practising for an experience meeting of United Grain Growers or taking his part as end-man in a minstrel troupe that was going to stage a worn-out political farce.

What did Mr. Murray say to cause all this? He said that in his judgment the time had come when Canadian manufacturers should cease financing newspapers, the avowed object of which was to destroy the manufacturers' business. I am not going to say that Mr. Murray was right from the standpoint of those who say: "When thine enemy strikes thee on one side of the face, just turn the other." I am not sure whether that is a correct quotation.

Mr. DUFF: You have got that all wrong. You should study your Bible.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I am not here to defend Mr. Murray, however, when he says that Canadian manufacturers should cease financing newspapers, the avowed object of which is to destroy the manufacturers' business Perhaps he was wholly wrong. But just let us turn the camera in another direction and see what picture it will produce. The same Mr. Rice Jones to whom I referred a few moments ago appearing before this committee of the House of Commons of which the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. J. F. Reid) was a member—and I think my hon. friend had something to do with Mr. Rice Jones coming here; my information is that my hon. friend is a director of the company of which Mr. Rice Jones is general manager—on this question of financing newspapers, said what? He said, in answer to a question by the counsel for the committee: "The Grain Growers Limited paid one political organ in western Canada $100,000 in one year." What for? For advertising purposes? No, for educational and propaganda purposes.

Mr. CRERAR: They did good work.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I have no doubt that it is quite true that, as a political organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, they did good work and the Western Grain Growers, out of the profits they extracted from the producers and consumers in this country, paid that political organ $108,000 for purposes of political propaganda. Yet these same hon. gentlemen will declaim in this House against eastern newspapers as being a hired press, paid political organs.

These statements are on all fours with the whole campaign these hon. gentlemen carry on. I said in this House last year, and I repeat to-night, that no honest man has any right in the world to criticize in the least degree the business that the Western Grain Growers are doing. So far as I am able to discern, they are carrying on an honest business; they are the largest commercial organization that ever came into existence in this country; but when they are doing that, what right have they to come down into eastern Canada or to go any other place in their efforts to set class against class in this country or to tell me that I am not carrying on an honest business: that I am extracting undue profits from the people; that I am oppressing the workingman; that the farmers are not getting their rights? I say that the whole thing is a campaign of blatant hypocrisy.

Mr. DUFF: A guilty conscience needs no accuser.

Mr. EDWARDS: This must be hurting you.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: During this debate a good many things have been said regarding the declarations of the Prime Minister in favour of giving to the province of Quebec more adequate representation in the government of this country, and hon. gentlemen opposite have become cynically sarcastic with regard to that. I must confess I was amazed to hear utterances of this kind fall from the lips of some hon. gentlemen opposite. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland), and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), join in that kind of criticism of the efforts which the Prime Minister was honestly making. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), join with them in voicing the same cynical criticism of the Prime Minister's efforts.

Is there anything wrong with the declaration of the Prime Minister that he believes the province of Quebec and the French-Canadian minority of this country should have more representation in the government? Is there anything wrong with the suggestion by any public man that it would be wise and well to bring about a better understanding between the two races that are living and growing up side by side in Canada? The Prime Minister would be unworthy of the position he holds if he did not exert every ounce of influence that he has to break down misunderstandings that admittedly have existed.

Mr. CANNON: That he brought on himself.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: I do not wish to enter into a discussion with my hon. friend regarding that, because that is not my purpose in this debate. I prefer that, if possible, anything I may say with regard to that subject shall tend to create a better understanding and not a worse. We are never going to arrive at a right understanding by hurling insults across the floor of this House, one against the other.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The chief organ at least in this province of hon. gentlemen opposite undertook to fasten on the Prime Minister the charge that he had at some time in his life made a statement uncomplimentary to the French-Canadian minority in Canada. The Toronto Globe had to admit that they were not telling the truth. No hon. gentleman in this House has pointed to a single utterance derogatory in the least degree to the French-Canadian population of the province of Quebec or of any other part of Canada. It is the duty of every public man, whether his position be obscure or whether he occupies a more prominent position, to do what he can to create harmony and not discord amongst our people. Let me illustrate that if I can out of an experience I have had within the past six or seven months. It was my privilege last summer to visit the battle area in France.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It was a very great privilege, whether an hon. gentleman says "Oh," or not; it was a very great privilege to meet the people in France, to see what is being done by these people who have suffered infinitely during the whole period of the war; to discuss with them the problems with which they were confronted, to see the devastated country and to get a glimpse of the spirit of the people in reconstructing that devastated area. During that period, it was our privilege to cover the whole battle area from the North sea to Paris, to travel the road that our Canadian boys travellel as they drove the Germans out of France during the last hundred days of the war, to go through that wonderful cemetery in the city of Mons where 80,000 refugees, women and children and men, were slaughtered by the Germans in the first onrush in 1914. It was our privilege to visit more than 100 cemeteries, to look upon hundreds of thousands of silent crosses, everyone typical of the sacrifice that sent the cold steel to the soul of some father or mother. On the 12th August when we arrived in the city of Lille on our way home, we got a copy of the Paris edition of the New York Herald and we saw, splashed across the front page, the announcement that a Soviet had been set up in Great Britain; that they had issued an ultimatum to the British Government that they must allow Poland to go under before the Bolshevists, and that they must clasp the blood-stained hands of Lenine and Trotzky in a commercial treaty. The same Soveit sent delegates to France, and that is where they slipped a cog. That great Prime Minister, Millerand, called in the Prefect of Police and instructed him in words something like this: Do not take these men out and stand them against the wall to-morrow morning and shoot them, as you have a right to do, but just give them twelve hours to leave the country. And they left the country. Mr. Speaker, this is the thought that came into my mind. If all the sacrifice typified by what we have seen in the past three weeks means nothing more or less than that this world is to be submerged under Bolshevism, then in Heaven's name would it not have been better to accept our humiliation in the first place and save all the sacirfice? I ask this House and this country, if the sacrifice of 60,000 Canadians on the battlefields of France and Flanders means nothing else than that we are to be divided along racial class lines, then in Heaven's name would it not have been better to accept our humiliation and save the sacrifice? But, Sir, I have sufficient faith in the inherent common sense of the Canadian people to feel that that will not be permitted, and my final word to the Prime Minister is this: Go right ahead; follow the course you have blazed out for yourself; spend your energies in building up a united Canada, and Canada will stand behind you and achieve it.

Mr. DAVID A. LAFORTUNE (Jacques-Cartier): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have read and reread the speech from the Throne, and I have listened to the honourable members of this House, the mover and the seconder of the Address, and I hasten to congratulate them very sincerely upon the elegant form of their speeches, but with reservations as to their substance.

Since last session many most important men have disappeared from the political stage, but there is one whom I will never forget, I mean, the late member for Yamaska, Mr. Oscar Gladu, with whom I have lived, by the side of whom I have fought so many political battles; and I hasten to say that I shall keep of him a pious remembrance. This lamented gentleman rendered great services to his country, unforgetable services to his friends, and both sides of this House recognized his great eloquence and his unfailing loyalty.

To my mind the speech of the honourable Leader of the Opposition was truly a success. He spoke with ponderation, with dignity, with warmth and eloquence. His speech carried conviction to the minds of all unprejudiced hearers.

The honorable Prime Minister answered it with his usual cleverness, but he did not succeed in destroying the deep impression it had produced on impartial minds.

The speech of the honourable member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) was a most interesting one. He reviewed the principal political questions. He corroborated what had been said by his leader. He showed the inconsistency of the right honourable Prime Minister. He demonstrated the lack of sincerity of the Administration, that the Liberal conservative party is anxious for an immediate election, and that only the interested parties, those fearing the popular verdict, are opposed to it.

The right honourable Minister of Commerce (Sir George Foster) has greatly interested me in relating what has been done at the Geneva meeting of the League of Nations, and the House did the right thing in the ovation accorded him.

The right honourable minister has shown us the importance and the great necessity there is for all of us to learn to speak the two official languages of Canada, and therein lies a great lesson of tolerance and constitutionality for those who are denying to the minority the rights and privileges which we are claiming and which we will continue to claim.

The hon. member for Wright (M. Devlin) made a short speech, but, as usual, he has talked common sense and to the point, and he has strengthened the arguments of those of his friends who have preceded him.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has protested his independence. He says he is ready to vote for anything which might benefit his constituents. I believe in the sincerity of the hon. member. Those are also my principles with this difference that I remain with my friends and my party, and that I remain faithful to the Liberal flag. But I trust that the hon. member should give us a good vote, because the liberal principles in which he has been brought up cannot have been entirely obliterated. He has left us but I will not say never to return.

I shall continue to support the men who have brought so much prosperity to my country and who have managed our affairs with such great success, from 1896 to 1911.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) spoke for three hours; one hour was spent in making compliments to his old and former friends, to those who have helped, supported and defended him, who have fought for him during the critical days; the two other hours were employed in explaining and confuting the charges made against him. But we are not to blame if the hon. member has been under a cloud of reprehension. That the hon. member has been forced to appear before the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal in order to protect his name, his character and his reputation, and in order to defend his conduct, there is nothing there that should concern us. Have we ever brought any accusations against him? No. Has he been successful in getting a certificate of good conduct? I do not know and I have no wish to know. But what I do know is that the hon. member, elected for a term of four years was only fourteen months in office, and that the parties concerned will never forget his memorable presidency of that society.

The hon. member has seen fit to speak of the member for Jacques-Cartier, your humble servant, because I am, he says, Crown Attorney while being also a member of this House. But how is it, then, that the hon. member came to Montcalm and Jacques-Cartier in order to induce my constituents to support me, as he well knew my position. What surprises me is that the hon. gentleman should take exception to that he himself having been employed by the Commission of the Municipal Code, in Quebec, during three years, at a salary of $2,000 a year.

I am not finding fault with him on that account; I only wish to point out the hon. gentleman's inconsistency, lack of sincerity and of memory. The hon. member has the right to abandon his party; he has the right to return to his old-time associates and to keep up family traditions; but has he the right to throw mud in our faces, and should he insult a whole party because they hold different opinions? Mr. Speaker, what is most precious to any man is his good name, his word of honour and his reputation. The hon. member is at liberty to leave our ranks, but he must not be indignant if we decide to remain faithful to our past. As far as I am concerned, I would feel dishonored if I should betray the liberal cause.

The hon. member, in the course of his vagaries, has certainly not sinned through an excess of modesty. It might even be said that there was in his speech food for scandal. In a very irreverent manner, he has compared himself to Saint John the Baptist, and in no way, Mr. Speaker, is such a comparison exact. Saint John the Baptist fed in the desert on grasshoppers and wild honey, and he has certainly not been drawn towards the other side of the House by a feast of grasshoppers and wild honey. Indeed, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe does not recall to my mind, in any way, the life of the Precursor. Instead of Saint John the Baptist I am rather inclined to be reminded in the present instance of the old-time processions of Saint John the Baptist day. To-day, in those processions, the little Saint John the Baptist and the little lamb which is his companion are driven like real aristocrats in a luxurious coach drawn by four horses. In the olden time, the little Saint John the Baptist and his little lamb were more in touch with the people, and used to march with the rank and file. The little lamb came first, followed by the little Saint John. As the lamb was not tamed, the practice was to prevent his pranks by means of a wide blue ribbon tied around its neck, and some one in front held tight the end of the ribbon.

As that was not sufficient to make sure of the tractability of the little lamb, the gentleman who held the blue ribbon in one hand also held a sack full of clover in the other. Mr. Speaker, the sack of clover was constantly kept under the nose of the little lamb which stretched its neck to snap up and eat the clover. However, as the intention of the guide leading the lamb was not to let it eat the clover, but only intended it as a bait which the lamb was following without ever snapping it, so when the procession was over, the little lamb had lost nothing of his appetite.

In that venture of the hon. member, I see a lamb having a blue ribbon tied to its neck enticed by a gentleman, the hon. prime minister, who holds in the one hand the blue ribbon and in the other the sack of clover ardently coveted by the lamb but held aloof by the prime minister. When the procession is over, the lamb will have as strong a craving as at the start and the prime minister will still have all his clover in store.

Mr. Speaker, as one thought recalls another, I have in mind a certain John Baptiste who was somewhat popular in his part of the country. He was an Indian from Caughnawaga whose full name was Baptiste Canadien. His main occupation consisted in shooting the Lachine rapids in a canoe, sometimes in company with tourists and sometimes alone. During the summer season, he followed another route to reach the city, but, Sir, the trip was venturesome, even perilous, and in the long run that Baptiste Canadien, notwithstanding his experience and his great ability, gave a wrong stroke with the paddle, his canoe was smashed on the rocks and Baptiste Canadien, forced to swim, was cast on the shore of Crane island. Before long, our new John the Baptiste will find that his stroke was miscalculated and, being wrecked, he will not even have Crane island as a refuge.

Mr. Speaker, I remember when I was young, which is long ago, I happened to be at the court house in Arthabasca when a very young man, a lawyer, showed a lack of professional courtesy towards Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The latter walked toward his young fellow advocate and putting his hand upon his shoulder said: "Sir, take this for a slap in the face". If it be true that great men do not die, Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George-Etienne Cartier, Sir Louis-Hippolyte Lafontaine and Sir Wilfrid Laurier see and hear what is going on here below. When the latter meets the hon. member from St. Hyacinthe, he will say to him: "You have insulted my best friends, those who have helped me, backed me, fought by my side and followed me through thick and thin," and laying his hand on his shoulder he will say: "Sir, take this for a slap in the face".

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the amendment submitted by the hon. leader of the Opposition asking for an immediate dissolution of Parliament, and I shall do so for the following reasons.

The new unionist party made this appeal to the Dominion electorate: Forget to-day that you are Liberals and Conservatives; put aside your political convictions, because the war must be won first of all; we are not the representatives of a party; we have an object in view. But now, war is over, the aim has been realized, the special mandate has been executed, make way.

In June next, the prime ministers of all the Dominions will go to England in order to discuss matters in the interests of the Empire. Mr. Lloyd George has just announced to the whole world that the meeting will be one of the most momentous events within the Empire. He also stated that Great Britain alone was unable to bear any longer the burden of expenditure entailed by the maintenance of its navy and army, and that the colonies should understand the necessity of sharing that expenditure.

You, Sir, the Prime Minister, will go to London during the month of June. What will be your answer to Mr. Lloyd George? What is your policy concerning this contribution which the Empire requests from her colonies? Have you asked the Canadian people in what measure they are prepared to make new sacrifices for the maintenance of the navy and army of England, or whether they are prepared to make any sacrifice?

Mr. Speaker, should Mr. Lloyd George invite him to give a pledge on behalf of Canada as to her taking part in every war of England, what will be the answer of the right hon. Prime Minister? Are not the people of Canada entitled to know, before his departure, what he is going to do there? Mr. the Prime Minister, it is your duty to consult them and to get the endorsation of your policy through a general election.

The future of Canada is at stake, and before engaging in a new course, find out the country's views and the policy it favours.

The Government must be in danger, in great peril, when we see them obliged to seek to seduce members of the Opposition. Do not the ranks of the Government's friends contain many most distinguished and qualified men? I might mention Sir L. O. Taillon, Hon. Mr. Patenaude, Mr. Bisaillon, Mr. Cressé—who is longing to enter the Government—Mr. Monty, Mr. Duranteau, Mr. de Lorimier, Mr. Lacoste, Mr. Godin, my cousin Mr. de Boucherville, Mr. Bonin, Mr. Morin, Mr. Bruchési, Mr. Curran, Mr. Morrison, Mr. Dussault, Mr. Millette, Mr. Bernard, Mr. Chatelle, Mr. Sauvé; in Quebec, Three-Rivers, Sorel, Joliette, Sherbrooke and even in St. Hyacinthe and St. Jerome, there are a number of good supporters of the Conservative party, honourable men, well qualified men, who made great sacrifices for their party, and who would be only too glad to have their reward. Why try and draw away members of the Opposition? Why invade our ranks?

Mr. McMASTER: (Translation.) Because we are better qualified.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) No, but we do not display the same craving. Mr. Speaker, let everybody remain on his own side and all will go well.

The new party is baptized. It has three names: National alias Liberal alias Conservative.

Why three names? Why so many aliases? Why, Mr. Speaker, when I am given a brief in a criminal court, and find several aliases to the party's name, I feel uneasy. I am sure of finding in the evidence that the accused has tried to conceal his identity; I am sure that he has tried to arrange for an alibi, in order to be able to say, "No, sir, I was not there, I am not the man you are looking for." The Government is now seeking to deny its identity. Well, Mr. Speaker, let the honourable gentlemen change names as often as they please, they will be recognized. As the old woman said, the more they change, the less they vary.

The honourable member has spoken not only of your humble servant, but he thought well to strike a little blow by the way at the honourable member for Gaspé (Hon. Mr. Lemieux), at Sir Lomer Gouin, at the honourable member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Verville), at the honourable member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), because these honourable gentlemen have occupations outside their functions as members of this House. But it seems to me that instead of blaming them, we, the French Canadians ought to be proud to see these gentlemen fill posts of confidence, most important financial posts, posts of great responsibility, posts of honour. When we see Sir Lomer Gouin become a Director of the Bank of Montreal, the first French Canadian who was ever given that position; when we see the honourable member for Gaspé in highly sought posts, directing our Canadian and even English finances; why do they occupy such posts of honour, these posts of responsibility? It is because they are worthy of them, because they have deserved the confidence of their fellow citizens. These posts are not given to every Tom, Dick and Harry. I would say to the honorable member: But why is he not in one of them? Why is he not given one of them. I will not abuse the honourable member; he is one of my old friends; we have long fought side by side and always respected each other; if he feels the necessity of dragging us in this debate, it is his right, it is his business, I will not treat the honourable member with abuse. I pay him my compliments. When one receives compliments, it is proper to return them.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the remarks I had to make on what the honourable members said. You will allow me now to pass to something else. I have fought the battles of my party for a great number of years, and I remember what took place in 1893. It is not a matter of yesterday. In 1893, Honourable Mr. Blake, wishing to withdraw from the Canadian politics, bid adieu to the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: 1887.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) No matter; it was a little earlier than I surmised. He gave up the leadership of the Liberal party, and was replaced by the honourable sir Wilfrid Laurier. A great convention took place in Ottawa—I remember it as if it were yesterday; I was there, at the threshold of Parliament. It was a grand convention of the Liberal forces. A programme was prepared; the programme which the Liberals would follow if they came to power. There was unrest in the country at that time. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that things were in a sad plight. The situation had to be remedied. We meant to offer the electors a new programme, and secure their confidence. What was the programme of the Liberal party at that time? Two important by-elections had just taken place, the one in Montreal Centre, wherein Sir William Hingston and the honourable Mr. McShane were opponents; and the other wherein Napoléon Charbonneau, who later became a judge, and was opposing our old friend J. A. Descarries, of Lachine. Honourable Désiré Girouard had just been made a Justice of the Supreme Court. The election took place on December 30th, 1895, in the County of Jacques-Cartier where I was living at the time and where I still live. They were two fierce fights. The honourable James McShane was victorious and so was our friend Charbonneau, both with rather large majorities. These two by-elections rang the knell of the Conservative party. It was in the month of December, 1895. The honourable Mackenzie Bowell dissolved the Houses in April, 1896, and the general election took place on June 23rd of the same year. Now, there was a programme to be prepared for the general election. The then Government thought well to remain in office to the very end, to prolong its life to the extreme limits, to the month of April, 1896. There had then to be a general election. What was the programme of the Liberal party? What promises did it offer to the electors? First and above all, there was the settlement of the school question. This settlement of the school question was not so complete as we French-Canadians and the Catholics would have desired. We had wished for something more than Sir Wilfrid Laurier obtained; but His Holiness Leo XIII said, "Children of my Church, the settlement which is offered to you is not complete, but acept it and pray to God for the rest." This was done. The wish of His Holiness Leo XIII was accomplished; the settlement was accepted; the school question was put aside, and the agitation ended. What Sir Wilfrid Laurier said was not that he would settle the question, but that he would do all in his power to settle it, so as to satisfy the superior authority. And thereby he removed from the political field a burning question.

The second question brought before the electors was the deepening of the St. Lawrence river in order to make Montreal the national port of the Dominion. The programme promised that should the Liberal party come to power, the insufficiently deep part of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec would be deepened so as to afford perfect, or at least as perfect as possible, facilities for navigation. We kept our pledge. The Government made enormous sacrifices to better the navigation bettween Quebec and Montreal. The late Hon. Mr. Tarte, who was then a member of the Government, made superhuman efforts to render this route navigable and safe.

What was the third promise made to the people? The abolition of the revisors, which the present Government wish to restore in this country—the famous revisors of the former government. When we reached the polls, we would look over the electoral lists; we would find that Paul's name was not there, that Baptiste's had gone, that André's had been forgotten, that Jacques' had disappeared. And they were all our Liberal friends that were missing. The Liberals promised to put an end to this system; that if they came to power their first move would be to abolish it, and to entrust the municipal councils with the electoral lists which had been very improperly taken out of their hands. And we did so.

The fourth promise to the electors was, that the public contracts would be given to the lowest tenderers, be they Liberal or Conservative. And the thing was done. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's Administration was all devotion to the rights of the people, and has never consented to the granting of contracts otherwise; the lowest tenderers were those who obtained them. There were a few exceptions in unimportant matters; but as a general rule public contracts were always granted to the lowest tenderer. That is what we had promised.

We had also promised, Mr. Speaker, to insert in public contracts a clause by which the salaries of workmen, of all the employees in large public works, would be made secure; that the contractor, the subcontractor would be responsible for the salaries of the workmen—a security which did not exist hitherto. Until then, a contractor was given a contract, he handed it over to a subcontractor, the lattter turned it over to another one, and three times out of four the workman ran the risk of losing his salary. We put an end to that.

Now, we had also promised to put an end to deficits. Heretofore every accounting period ended with a deficit. Deficits, alway deficits, we had nothing else. Sir Wilfrid Laurier came to power in 1896. He did not succeed the first year in making both ends meet, on account of the deplorable state in which his predecessors had left the finances of the country; he failed, I say, to obtain a surplus on the first year, but all the subsequent accounting periods ended with considerable surpluses. And yet we had taken these gentlemen's tariff; we had stolen their tariff, as they were pleased to repeat it on every husting. "These bad Liberals have stolen our programme; they had promised a revision of the tariff, and when they came to office, they used the same tariff as hitherto". There was a little truth in this. But what did it mean? With the same tariff we obtained surpluses when they could show nothing but deficits. What did it mean? It meant that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had an iron hand under a silk glove; that he kept the taps, the locks and padlocks tightly closed. It was not in vain that they were locked, bolted and riveted. He held the reins of power with a firm hand, and if any rebelled, their affair was soon settled. You remember, Mr. Speaker, that a former minister, an eminent man (Hon. Mr. Blair) wanted to kick over the traces. Sir Wilfrid told him: "Sir, if my policy does not suit you, we can part company". You remember another man, by whose side I have fought, with whom I have worked, a business man (the late Hon. Mr. Tarte); so long as he abided by the unwavering direction of Sir Wilfrid, all went well; but the day that hon. gentleman wanted to do a little bossing of his own, he was told to withdraw, and he withdrew. He tried to kick, but with no avail. He was an honourable man, I have nothing to say against him; he was only a little headstrong, having overdone that peculiarity he was invited to step out.

How is it, Mr. Speaker, that this tariff of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Hon. Mr. Fielding) gave so much prosperity to the people of the Dominion? How is it that this tariff, which the Conservatives accused us of having stolen from them, suited so well the interests of everybody? The reason is that these hon. gentlemen knew how to apply it, as we will know still how to apply it when the member for Queen's and Shelburne comes back to power.

We had promised the revision of the tariff, and the tariff was revised, perhaps not quite as the hon. gentlemen now at your right would have liked to be, which would have suited them better, but the tariff was revised so as to do justice to all classes of society. We had promised a partial reciprocity treaty, and before 1911, before Sir Wilfrid Laurier tried to bring about such a treaty, what did our opponents say when we met them upon the hustings? "You had promised us a treaty of reciprocity with the United States; where is your treaty?" They accused us of having failed to keep our word. They accused us of having failed to carry out that part of Sir Wilfrid's programme. And later, when Sir Wilfrid intended to bring about this partial treaty with the United States, these hon. gentlemen began by applauding. I remember when the late Mr. Patterson and the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne came back from the United States and announced their success in that country, that they had succeeded in obtaining from our neighbours what the former Administrations of Sir John Macdonald, of Sir John Thompson, of Sir J. J. Abbott, of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had failed to obtain. The United States were willing to have a reciprocity treaty, but they wanted the lion's share. Once somebody was talking to a farmer of the lion's share—allow me this digression, Mr. Speaker—and he said: "What does that mean, a lion's share?" The other answered: "I am going to tell you. The lion begins by making a small heap, and he makes a large one, then he eats both." The United States wanted the lion's share. We had wanted to make a treaty, but the Americans would give nothing. The Americans are no givers. Well, they may be willing to give, but they want two to one, sometimes three. On the last attempt made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Wilfrid said: "You do not want to grant us a just share of the privileges and the rights we claim; so, there will not be any treaty. Farewell. When you need us, let us know."

Sir Wilfrid Laurier came back to this country, no treaty having been signed. Later on, what a surprise it was to receive news from those gentlemen, to hear that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and some of his friends were invited to go to the White House for the purpose of negotiating a treaty of reciprocity; Well and good, the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne was sent there, together with the hon. Mr. Paterson. They went to the White House and came back having obtained most advantageous privileges. Conservatives applauded; Conservatives would not believe what they saw or what they heard so pleased were they to know that the offer from the White House was so large and so favourable. That occured during the evening, but they took counsel with their pillow and the next morning these hon. gentlemen said to themselves: "We are foolish; we are raving; if we let that treaty pass; we shall never be able to regain power; let us oppose it". They changed their tactics and said: "We shall state that this means annexation". They started the cry against annexation; they defeated us with that cry. The said the treaty was tantamount to annexation to the United States. Oh! how dishonest they were, Mr. Speaker! Having shown reassuring dispositions, having said that the treaty was a splendid one, they altered their mind during night. The next day, it was althogether different. They overran the country, exclaiming: "Well the reciprocity treaty which you intend to make with the United States is nothing short of annexation." They succeeded in defeating us. Thus the reciprocity treaty fell to the ground and vanished. But, Sir, had it been a question of unlimited reciprocity, your humble servant would have been the first to vote against it, but the restricted treaty which was offered us was so advantageous, specially for the farming class, for the agriculturists, that we could have seen halcyon days had we succeeded in putting it through. But they did not consent; they killed the chicken in the shell and now we grieve about those conditions.

From 1896 to 1911, has not the tariff which was put in force by our friends been most advantageous? Have not manufacturing and industrial establishments of every kind wonderfully increased in number? There are in my constituency a large number of factories and many industries of all kinds. In 1896, there were but a few, however, from 1896 to 1911, their number increased in a wonderful manner; factories sprung up as if by enchantement and all sorts of industries were established in large numbers. The labouring classes, mechanics, workingmen found employment and earned a decent livelihood for themselves and their families. Nobody complained of the tariff; on the contrary, every one was happy. The present tariff is not altogether the same as when we were in power. The right hon. gentleman tells us: "You are free traders; you are not Liberals, you are not protectionists". I shall tell him that I am neither the one nor the other, but I am for a reasonable protection, for a moderate protection as Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have it. This is my protectionist view: Give the manufacturers a fair and reasonable protection in order that capital may get a legitimate return, but stop at that so that the consumer, the mechanic, the labourer and above all the farming class, may have their share of the sun's rays, of liberty and protection. The industrial, manufacturing, commercial and farming classes became very prosperous at that time.

Mr. Speaker, we shall be called to power before long.

Hre Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) Many are called but few are chosen.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) I am in earnest when I say that the Liberal party will soon get into power. What will the Liberals have to do? They will have to attend to the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. The boards of trade, the great corporations, the higher branches of commerce, the railway companies are clamoring for it. I am for the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, which is a necessary undertaking asked for by every administration, whether conservative or liberal. The Government has so far made enormous sacrifices in order to lay out the route, to have soundings taken so as to know what was the obstruction in the way, what would be the probable cost; in short, to ascertain whether that route would be advantageous to the country.

What did they find? They found that the Northern route would cost about $110,000,000, while the Southern route would entail an expenditure of only $95,000,000. It might be a little more to-day. The figures I have given out might not be the exact amount, but we shall take it as the approximate cost of the building of the canal.

The canal would shorten considerably the distance from Georgian Bay to London; some say it would make it about 400 miles shorter, which means a saving of from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000. If the money were spent carefully, it would be of a great benefit to the country, for it would keep at least 15,000 people at work during ten years. Is it not worth undertaking the building of that canal and should we not consider carefully the advisability of starting the work? The Chambre de Commerce and the Board of Trade of Montreal, the largest companies, the banks and the leading financial firms of the country are crying out for the construction of the Georgian Bay Canal.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen are not much concerned with the interest of the people since they do not listen to the advice of our leading citizens. We must build that canal. I was anxious to visit Georgian Bay; I went there and I saw the place. I realize that it would be a great mistake, and even more, to postpone any longer the building of the canal. Connecting Georgian Bay with lake Nipissing, there is Trent river, then Turtle river, the Mattawa and Ottawa rivers to the island of Montreal, and then you may go right through to Europe without transhipment, and reduce the cost of transportation by about one or two cents for every bushel of wheat. Then why should we not build that canal instead of spending millions as we are doing now? The liberal party which will be called to replace the present government will undertake it. Hon. gentlemen may say:

Why did you not undertake the construction of the canal during the fifteen years you remained in power? The answer is very simple: the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had undertaken considerable works, such as the Quebec Bridge, the Hudson Bay Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific; he wanted to have them completed before starting on the Georgian Bay Canal. That is what I would answer to hon. gentlemen. Instead of spending our money here and there without any necessity and without any advantage to the country, they should have undertaken that work. I say that the present government is not worthy of the confidence of the people and should not remain in office any longer. Before long we shall have to build the canal.

There is another thing to do and I have asked for it many times: I am referring to the building of a bridge between Vaudreuil and Ste. Anne. I have asked the government for assistance in order that we may build that bridge. What did they answer? They said they had no money. No money for bridges at Ste. Anne and Vaudreuil; they are in the province of Quebec, they are not international bridges and there are no funds available for works of that kind. Did the millions spent in Vancouver apply to an international undertaking? And what about the money given to St. John and Halifax? They gave us that answer like a man who does not wish to answer at all. When you do not wish to help you always have a good answer to give. But I say that it is a shame to delay the construction of Vaudreuil-St. Anne bridge any longer. Think of an important city like Montreal, with a population of 600,000, whose people to pass from the island, have to use canoes, and the same lack of facilities is felt as regards vehicles.

People have been drowned, lives have been lost, because of this condition of things. And when we ask the hon. ministers who represent the Province of Quebec to help us in building the bridges, we are told: "It cannot be done, sir, there is no money, The time will come when you will discover that the people are getting restless; the hon. mambers will realize that the people are irritated, that they are getting angry; the time will come when hon. gentlemen will have to account for their doings, and the more grasping will have been the administration, the more severe will we be with these gentlemen.

What is the next plank of our platform? We have already stated what the liberals will do: We shall exact an account from those who govern us. We shalll ask for an account of the millions which they have had in hand since 1911. We shall enquire what has become of those millions. Where are those millions which have been given you in the people's interest? We shall have a great, national investigation, there will be no cuts and thrusts, but we will investigate everywhere, we will make a thorough search of all the public departements, asking the hon. gentlemen to produce vouchers for the money which has been entrusted to them. Then will they find the time long, then will they find that the people are severe, then will they find it difficult to produce an account with vouchers. Yet, that is what we shall ask them to do. We shall ask them how it happens that public offices are filled with employees of all nationalities, except French-Canadians. We will demand from those who represent the Province of Quebec the reason why they have tolerated such discrimination. You have but to visit the Publics Works and all the large departments, and take a list of those who are there, to realize how unfairly our compatriots have been treated. The liberal party will see that all be reinstated who have been dismissed, turned out, without an investigation being made, or with but a semblance of investigation, and this, because their only sin, their only fault, was that they were liberals. Our friends who have been turned out of power will be returned to their respective positions. We shall investigate and find out why these gentlemen have been driven out of power. We shall have no difficulty, I assure you, in proving the flagrant injustice which has beeen done them.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that Quebec is isolated. My hon. friends on the other side of the House will forgive me, but, the Province of Quebec is not isolated. Have we not three ministers in the Cabinet? Have we not the hon. minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) who represents the Catholics, those who speak French as well as those who speak English? Is he not an honourable man? Does he not represent us in the Cabinet? Have we not the hon. minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) in the Cabinet? Have we not the hon. Mr. Blondin in the Senate? It is true that he was beaten twice, but he has been given a seat in the Senate as a compensation for these two defeats: "Go, take a seat in the Senate, sir, you will be given a portfolio, you shall represent the Montreal electors". We have three ministers in the Cabinet. We are told that Quebec is isolated? Not at all, though we may not have all that should be coming to us, notwithstanding our three representatives. They are honourable, distinguished men, who represent us as well as they can.

There is another thing which astonishes me, Mr. Speaker, that is, that, the liberal unionists should have such little influence in the Union Cabinet which is formed of liberal and conservative unionists. Have not four judges been appointed lately? Is there a "rouge-bleu" amongst them? Is there a liberal judge amongst the four who have been apointed? Where then are the unionists? What influence have these gentlemen that they should have been silent in the face of those appointments? What is the influence of the Liberal-Unionists, of the so-called Liberals who are Conservatives? What is the influence of these gentlemen? I would have thought that the unionist ministers would have had something to do with the Government, but, judging from evidence, they are doing absolutely nothing, they let everything go, swallow every new appointment, without a protest.

We are not isolated, but we are badly represented.

They shall have to face those from whom they have withdrawn the right to vote: the people who had comme to settle in this country at the cost of great sacrifices; they who have been disfranchised for fear that they would vote against the Government. That is an injustice.

They will get a square deal at the hands of the Liberals who will be called upon to form a government in place of this unfortunate administration; they will be given back their franchise of which — I shall not use too harsh a word because I might be called to order by the chair — they were so unscrupulously deprived.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: (Translation.) Fradulently.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: (Translation.) I dislike to so characterize it, but that is the actual fact.

I remember a contest which gave me much trouble; I had to work day and night. It was the election in Châteauguay and Hon. Sydney Fisher was the candidate. The distinguished and elderly gentleman had accepted to contest the seat in Châteauguay. His opponent was Mr. Morris who, along with his good conservative friends of Ottawa, had caused the people to believe that a bridge would be built from Châteauguay towards Lachine as well as a dam at Caughnawaga. Vainly did we keep telling them that it was merely an electoral scheme, that there was no sincerity in such promises, that it was a subterfuge and they should not rely on such promises. Hon. Mr. Sévigny was there, going through the country and promising the construction of the Châteauguay bridge, and so the people of Beauharnois, Châteauguay and Huntingdon actually believed that a bridge would be built. In vain did we assure them: "It is all nonsense, you know very well that the government will not build that bridge". They replied: "We are sure to get our bridge". Well, it turned out that the bridge never was built and the thing was not even mentioned after the election. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: Before Hon. Mr. Fisher leaves this world, will you be gentlemanly enough to go and apologize to him? Will you go to the man who is at death's door and say that you have not been fair towards him, that you have deprived him of his mandate under false pretences and by means of false statements? Hon. Mr. Fisher would at last have the satisfaction of knowing before he dies that hon. gentlemen have not been fair to him. I hope they will do so. I would be putting it rather strongly to say that they robbed us; but I contend that they secured the election of Châteauguay by means of that bridge scheme which they never had any intention to carry out. It was merely a mean electoral trick on their part. I charge you, gentlemen, with having secured the votes in that constituency under false pretences and let me assure you that in our part of the country we know how to deal with men who resort to such tactics. They may change names and go under various alliases, but we know where to find them and how to inflict the punishment they deserve.

There is another thing which the Liberal party will recommend when it gets into power. I refer to the widening of the Victoria bridge where a most painful accident occurred. The bridge is too narrow for pedestrians and vehicles. Last summer there was a collision between two motor cars and the result was that a young man, 25 years of age, fell over the parapet and was drowned. It is absolutely necessary that the bridge should be widened. We have granted millions upon millions to the Victoria Bridge Company with a view to securing a good and safe throughfare. The road must be improved in order to avoid a repetition of the accident which occurred last summer. The man who caused the accident was arrested and he is to be tried in March next. I hope he will come out of it all right. But, unfortunately we had to deplore the death of a citizen of St. Constant.

A bridge must also be built at Longueuil. The necessity of such a bridge was evidenced, last summer, when the Victoria Bridge was damaged by fire. The latter remainded closed for a long time causing much inconvenience to the public. I say to the hon. member of Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault): "You will have to make superhuman efforts, sir, to secure for your constituency the bridge which it needs so badly, and if you require my help as I need your own for the construction of a bridge between Vaudreuil and St. Anne, I shall give it to you. We shall reciprocate.

Before taking my seat, there is one question of vital importance for me that I would like to discuss.

I mean the protection we owe to the farmers, to the tobacco growers. There is in this country a considerable industry in the hands of the farmers, the tobacco industry. I have had the honour of representing the county of Montcalm for two sessions, and I know what takes place there. I told these good electors in leaving that county to represent the county of Jacques-Cartier, that they would not lose me; that any aid, protection and work which your humble servant could do, should be forthcoming on behalf of those to whom I owe so much. The hon. member from Montcalm (Mr. Séguin) who succeeded me has done all that was possible for him to do, and has fulfilled his duty thoroughly. I have nothing that I could reproach him, but he has not yet succeeded in obtaining from the Government the aid and protection which we owe to these good electors. We have an important industry, that of tobacco growing. Lately there have been delagations, steps have been taken, associations have been formed, to promote the interest of tobacco raising in the country, and I am sure that the Westerners, the men of Kent and Essex, the hon. members who represent these electoral districts, will not forget this industry. They will insist, I am sure, in asking that the Government do justice to these tobacco growers. What must be done, Mr. Speaker? When Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power, when I entered this House for the first time, I began to agitate to better the condition of the tobacco growers and we succeeded very well. From a tax of ten cents a pound which existed then upon the importation of foreign tobacco, by virtue of many solicitations, of untiring insistence, of repeatedly renewing the attack, we succeeded in having the tax upon foreign tobacco fixed at 28 cents per pound. It was a great improvement that helped the electors of Montcalm, Kent, Essex, Berthier, L'Assomption, Farnham, Joliette and Terrebonne. It enabled these electors to succeed in their work, to better their social positions and the condition of their families, and, thank God, the men who laboured for the tobacco interest from 1896 to 1911 have done meritorious work. The duty on foreign tobacco should be considerably increased by the Government; I mean by the Liberal Government when it comes to power. For I have not much confidence in the present Government, I have not much confidence that it will do anything to better the condition of the planters; we must wait for the Liberals. Foreign tobacco still comes into our country in altogether too large a proportion. We still import about 20 million pounds of foreign tobacco, while in fact this importation should be kept down to a dozen million pounds at most. The consequence would be that our growers would produce more tobacco, would improve its quality, would make greater sacrifices to make it more desirable, more marketable, and a higher duty would insure enormous profits to the planter. The rate of duty which we should ask is immaterial but it must be sufficiently high to hamper in a due measure the coming in of the foreign tobacco which is competing with our Canadian product. This, Sir, is what should be done for the growers who have done us the honour of electing us in our respective counties, and to whom it would only be doing justice.

There is an industry, Sir, which does not exist in this country, but which should. Our farmers should be given the protection necessary to encourage them to grow beets. None but the farmers understand the importance and the necessity of Government protection for this industry, which is non-existent in Quebec. How is it that beet-growing is a successful industry in Ontario and that we do not have it in Quebec? How can this be explained? It is because the ministers who represent us do not take the trouble to study these agricultural questions, and abandon the farmers in their difficulties. How is it that the hon. member from St. Anns (the Right Hon. Mr. Doherty) who has to represent us in the cabinet does not take the necessary measures to protect the beet industry in this country? The hon. minister will say: "That does not concern me."

The hon. Minister of Justice will say: "It is none of my business, why should I bother about beets? Is it worth my while?" If the hon. minister knew how important and necessary it is, for the farmers of the province of Quebec to establish the beet industry, he would give a premium to farmers to encourage them to make preparations for this new industry. In doing this he would render a very great service to the electors, especially to those from the country.

The minister is bound to help us—he is appointed for that special purpose, to safeguard the interests of the people. Let me therefore tell the minister, that if he only devoted a fraction of his time to this industry, we should be very grateful to him, and when the time for his retirement comes, which by the way is near at hand, he would have the satisfaction of saying: "When I was in office, I did something for my electors." We, therefore await with confidence his answer, trusting he will give this matter his serious consideration, in our behalf, we, the people of the farming community—I made mention of "we" with a purpose, as I am in need of this industry at home in order to improve my farm and help to defray the expenses of the cattle that are in my stables. The beetroot industry would prove very advantageous in order to enable us to further improve our farms.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to a matter which is of mutual interest to both of us. This is the request I addressed to him during the past years: Do construct a viaduct or a tunnel under the canal so that the people of the cities of Emard, Côte Saint Paul and Saint Gabriel may circulate to and fro with ease, without apprehension and loss of time between their home and Montreal. I have shown the minister in what sad plight these people are. One would imagine he was deaf. Yet he seems to be all attention when I make a request, but I must add that he very seldom gratifies my wishes. I insisted on the importance and necessity of having this tunnel built. Can you imagine a population of 15,000 to 20,000 and even more, perhaps 30,000 souls waiting patiently for boats to pass through the canal so that the bridge may be opened to traffic again and allow them to return to work? Yes, a hard-working class of the people, where fathers, boys and girls are to be found awaiting patiently and wondering when the bridge will open so that they may proceed to their daily work. If they arrive half an hour late, the employer who checks them will deduct so much an hour, so much a day for the lost time. To think that the honourable minister is responsible for all this! I further charge him with turning a deaf ear to all these legitimate requests of my electors. His home is there in the neighbourhood and if he does not know the facts of the case, he should go and see for himself and verify the facts. These poor people are constantly writing to me as follows: "Mr. Lafortune, for God's sake when shall we have a tunnel?" I can only answer: When it will please the Minister of Justice who is your representative, to build one—sorry to say he is not often willing."A flood occurred and a number of people barely escaped being drowned; the bridge was carried away and no means, absolutely no means was left to cross over. This does not concern the minister for he lives in his palace, his family is free from cares, he has no anxiety,

If he only felt the pangs of anxiety, if he but knew what transpires in the life of these poor people, perhaps he would stop to think. But the honourable minister will come before the people, perhaps he will soon be seeking from these good people a renewal of their confidence. They will say to him: Sir, that tunnel that Mr. Lafortune so often begged of you, what has become of it? Where is it? It is still to be built. It is not important, no, of no importance whatever—it will open his eyes!

These are things that the Liberal party will have to do when they return to office. All our pledges to the people between the years 1896 and 1911, such as assistance, help and protection we have fulfilled.

Mr. Speaker, I have enumerated a number of things which the Liberal party will be called to do when they ascend to power. We shall ask these gentlemen who sit across the floor of this House to render a strict account of the things they have done, those they have left undone and the good deeds they might have done. Far in the distant past these words were flashed across a wall: "Counted, weighed and found wanting." Well, we shall weigh these honourable gentlemen's actions and shall ascertain whether they come up to the mark and have fulfilled the requirements. As for myself, your humble servant, I am a Liberal and will continue to be one as long as my confidence rests with my leaders.

I am not the slave of any one; I have no need of the favours of any political party in order to live; I will remain in the ranks of the Liberal party as long as I have confidence in the leaders who are an honour to the party.

At the time of the 1911 election, in Montcalm, a young man offered himself and was selected a candidate by a substantial majority of his fellow citizens. Your humble servant refused to have his name go to the convention. I said: "No, sir, I have no time to bother with that kind of conventions. I will put my name before the great convention, before the general convention of all the electors of the county of Montcalm, and if a gentleman of the opposite party comes forward hoping to succeed through a division of the Liberal vote, I have signed my declaration and have had it published in the newspapers, I will retire, will shake hands with the candidate chosen at the convention, and we shall crush the opponent". That is what I said in my declaration of principles, my declaration of faith. I am a Liberal, but I do not bend my knee before men; before God, yes, but not before men. So long as I have confidence I will remain with my leader, I will remain with my party, I will remain the Liberal I am. Meanwhile, I pledge my loyalty to England, my heart to my country. Above all, I remain a faithful lover of Liberty.

On the motion of Mr. Blake, the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Right Hon. C. J. Doherty, the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

On the motion of Right Hon. Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce) Bill No. 11 was introduced and read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I move to proceed to Bill No. 2, to amend The Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to.

House again in committee on Bill No. 2, to amend The Dominion Elections Act.—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was before the committee yesterday, clause I was read, and an amendment thereto had been moved by the Hon. Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie). The amendment will be found printed, au long, at page 277 of Unrevised Hansard. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BUREAU: I see by the Bill that it is brought down to amend Dominion Elections Act.

For the purpose of the vote on a question submitted under the Canada Temperance Act directed by His Majesty's Proclamation dated the fourth day of June, 1920, to be taken in the province of Ontario on the eighteenth day of April, 1921.

Now the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), in his explanation the other day, said (Unrevised Hansard, p. 253):

I thought I had made it very clear when I first moved the motion that the reason the motion intervenes and that this Bill is necessary is not because the previous Act was insufficient in the circumstances, but that until at the very eve of the passing of the Act or just afterwards it had not been called to the attention of the Government that were a plebiscite to be held in the year 1920 there would be this extensive disfranchisement of the soldiers.

I understood that when the Franchise Act was passed, provision was made to cover the case of a vote being taken in Ontario, and that the lists of 1919 were to be used. The Franchise Act was assented to on July 1, 1920. By the present Bill I see that the proclamation was dated June 4, 1920, and that it fixed April 18, 1921, as the date for taking the referendum. Therefore, the Government were fully aware on July 1, 1920, that this referendum was to be taken on April 18, 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There must be some mistake.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a mistake in the printing or somewhere else. Evidently something is wrong, and I should like to have that point cleared up before I vote on the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I can explain the apparent discrepency. The matter was in the Department of the Secretary of State, and the proclamation was dated back to June 4, to coincide with the date of the Order in Council, though, as a matter of fact, is was issued much later.

Mr. BUREAU: If I understand aright, the proclamation simply recites what the Order in Council contains, and if an Order in Council was passed providing for a referendum in the province of Ontario, it must have set the date, and if the date was set, it was the 18th day of April, 1921.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Order in Council does not fix the date. The date is fixed by the proclamation.

Mr. BUREAU: Does not the Order in Council decide that a plebiscite shall be held? Certainly, it is their duty to determine the date. The Secretary of State could not decide that without the knowledge and approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am informed by the Chief Electoral Officer that the Order in Council merely states that the request of the province of Ontario shall be granted, and the questions submitted to the electors at a date to be fixed by proclamation. When the proclamation was subsequently issued it was thought by the then Secretary of State that it should bear the same date as the Order in council, and that was the reason why, although subsequently issued, it bears on its face the same date as the Order in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: That is rather a lame explanation. Here is an Order in Council passed by the Government to authorize a certain thing. The Government by this Order in Council does not delegate its power to any man or minister to fill in what he thinks necesary, and then antedate it, for some reason or other which I cannot understand. When we say that a law shall take effect upon proclamation, surely my hon. friend does not pretend that he can antedate the proclamation. The proclamation is evidence of the date at which the law is to take effect. Now, either the Government knew or did not know on the 4th of June, when they issued the Order in Council and decided on the 21st of April, or whatever is the date, that a number of people had been disfranchised in the lists of 1919. If they knew, then I think they were derelict in their duty at the time we passed the law in not putting into the statute in the first instance what ought to have been embodied in it, that the latest lists, or whatever else they thought fit, should be used. I do not object to any of the provisions of the bill, because I am not particularly interested except in the amendment. I do not see why we should leave to posterity the name of Mr. Spence or anybody else, officials of these organizations, who seek to legislate us into becoming good people in spite of ourselves. I would therefore suggest that this amendment be amended by striking out, as it appears in Hansard—I have not a copy of the bill before me—the following words in lines nine and ten of sub-section 2: "Ben H. Spence and Andrew S. Grant." I think the statute will be fully effective and operative without the insertion of those two names. The clause would then read this way:

> (ii) On behalf of the persons interested in promoting an affirmative answer to the question submitted the Dominion Alliance (Ontario Branch) and the Ontario Referendum Committee jointly shall be entitled to appoint the agents aforesaid, and every such appointment shall be made in writing by such person in each electoral district as may be notified to the Returning Officer jointly by the secretaries—

And so on. Then in the second part of the clause I would similarly deal with the gentlemen who bears the name of Boyce. The words "Secretary of the Citizens' Liberty League" are, I think, ample. Further on in the third paragraph I would say that the Chief Electoral Officer shall be notified of the names of the secretaries of these organizations, and then the people who are appointed by the secretaries shall have the right to appoint the agents.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the committee will agree with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. I may say that I did not draft the clause. The Chief Electoral Officer who drafted it quite concurs in the opinion that names are unnecessary, and if the committee agrees I have no objection to the suggestion to strike them out in both cases.

Mr. BUREAU: My motion, then, is to strike out in the second paragraph, in the ninth and tenth lines, as the amendment appears in Hansard at page 277, the words "Ben H. Spence and Andrew S. Grant," and to strike out in the last but one line of the same clause the name "C. D. Boyce."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. POWER: Will the effect of this clause be to exclude any other organizations from having representatives at the polls? Suppose the Women's Christian Temperance Union wished to have a representative at the poll, would they be excluded by reason of the fact that the Referendum League and the Dominion Alliance were already represented, or would it be only a question of precedence?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They would have no right to be represented at the poll.

Mr. JACOBS. Shame.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If we do not pass this legislation I doubt whether any one would have the right to be represented at the poll. The Franchise Act, upon which this legislation is based, provides of course for the presence at the poll of candidates or their agnets. There will be no candidates in this vote, and unless we specially appoint some one to attend in the interests of those who affirm and those who oppose the legislation, I doubt whether any one would have the right to be present at the polls. Those persons in Ontario who feel directly interested in the matter have met and have among themselves agreed as to what would be the best scrutiny to have at the polls, and they brought their joint suggestion, which is set out in the paragraph I have submitted as an amendment. For my part, I think it offers a fairly reasonable solution of the difficulty.

Mr. POWER: I do not wish to criticize the views of these organizations in Ontario, but under the Scott Act, if I remember rightly, when elections were held any elector was entitled to appear at the poll and, on being sworn, to act as representative for one side or the other. My point is that I do not think it is fair to deprive any elector of that privilege and to allow only certain organizations to appear in the poll. It might very well happen that in certain constituencies, or in certain localities, the representative either of the Alliance or of the Referendum League might not be competent, or might not be thought to be competent by those most interested.

Mr. JACOBS: Might not be sober.

Mr. POWER: I would not like to go so far as to say that; but it might be better for the conduct of the polling if some other party were represented in the poll, and I do not think we should deprive any citizen of the right to appear in a poll even in the province of Ontario.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: It might be a wet day.

Mr. CANNON: In the event of the Dominion Alliance, or whatever it is called, appointing representatives in every polling division in Ontario how will they be paid for their services?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no knowledge on that question, I assume their services will be given free.

Mr. CANNON: As I understand, referenda were held in other provinces and after the vote had been taken the accounts were sent in to the Ottawa Government I would ask were these accounts settled by the respective associations or by the country?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not aware that the Government has received any accounts for services of that kind. The Chief Electoral Officer informs me that he is not aware of any either.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. POWER: Before the amendment carries I wonder whether the minister would guarantee to the committee that, once Ontario goes dry—and we all piously hope it will—it will remain in that happy and satisfactory state for some time, and that the country will not be called upon to pay for any more plebiscites. I would like to know from the Government how many referanda can be taken under this legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: One might be held under the present law each three years by any province that asks for it in the way prescribed by the Act.

Mr. BUREAU: It will be necessary to make a change in sub-section 3. I move to strike out the words in the third and fourth lines "hereafter changes its Secretary, such changes" and the word "If" at the beginning of the paragraph, and insert in lieu of the word "If" the words "the names of the Secretaries of".

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just before that motion is put let me say that another draft has been handed to me by Colonel Biggar, the Chief Electoral Officer. He proposes that sub-section 3 be made to read as follows:

> The names of the Secretaries of the Dominion Alliance (Ontario Branch) the Ontario Referendum Committee, and The Citizens' Liberty League shall be notified to the Chief Electoral Officer who shall advise the Returning Officer thereof, and notification of the persons in each electoral district authorized to appoint agents may thereafter be given by such Secretaries.

The language sounds to me as if it covered the point.

Mr. POWER: I want to ask one question which may or may not have a direct bearing upon the point. In elections held under the Canada Temperance Act how are the lists to be made? My reason for asking the question is, that in the city of Quebec there is a probability of our having an election under the Canada Temperance Act within the next month or so. Will the minister therefore state how the lists are to be made up?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In future, at all elections to be held under the Canada Temperance Act, the machinery provided under the Dominion Elections Act will have to be adopted.

Mr. POWER: Even though it is the cumbersome and expensive machinery provided under the Act of last session for this purpose?

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend may call the machinery cumbersome but the Toronto Globe paid it a high compliment.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. STEELE: Before the clause is carried I wish to propose another amendment. Under paragraph (c) of section 29 of the Elections Act a residence of two months in the electoral district is required of any voter. In paragraph (d) of section 1 of this Bill, instead of two months residence in the electoral district two months residence in the province of Ontario is required. There may be legal objections to doing so but I think it is very desirable that for the vote to be taken in April we should adhere to the residence in the electoral district for all voters. I would therefore move that:

Paragraph (d) of subsection 1, of section 29 be amended by striking out the words "Province of Ontario for" in line 24 thereof and substituting therefor the words "Electoral district wherever such person seeks to vote for at least"

Then the clause will read:

Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 29, every person otherwise qualified to vote and not disqualified from voting shall be entitled to vote if he has ordinarily resided in Canada for twelve months and in the electoral district where such voter seeks to vote for at least two months before the first day of February, 1921.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This proposal raises a question upon which the Government would be glad of the opinion of the committee; it opens a fair field for argument. The section as it appears in the Bill provides for a residence qualification of twelve months in Canada and two months in the province of Ontario. The amendment proposes two months residence in the particular electoral district striking out the words "Province of Ontario." It is argued, and has been argued before the Cabinet committee who heard a deputation, that under the Dominion Elections Act the residential qualification is two months in the electoral district, irrespective of residence in the province The change here is to two months' residence in the province. The distinction is broadly this: The constituency in a referendum of this kind is a provincial constituency; the constituency under the Dominion Elections Act is an electoral district for the purpose of returning a member to this House. In the one case residence within the electoral district is required where you are only voting for a member to represent that particular district. But this is a question which will involve the whole province of Ontario, the whole province is the constituency, and in the drafting of this proposal the Chief Electoral Officer adopted that plan and provided for two months' residence in Ontario, as well, of course, as twelve months' residence in the Dominion.

I am told by the Chief Electoral Officer that experience in the West, where a similar vote was taken last October, would justify retaining the clause as it is in the Bill now before this committee. It is said that in many cases people move from one district to another within a province, and that those people are deprived of their votes; and the argument is made, that so long as a man resides within the province itself he should be entitled to cast his vote. These are the two phases of the question. I do not know that the Government has any particular view either way, neither do I know just what view the committee will take of it. In the meantime it is open for discussion.

Mr. NESBITT: What strikes me is that if the residential qualification embraced the whole province the deputy returning officer might have no knowledge of the voters. In the rural districts they can be introduced by an elector, and he can state that they have a right to vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He has to swear to it.

Mr. NESBITT: He can swear to it probably. I do not care which way it is put, but during this discussion it struck me that the proposed change might open the door to fraud a great deal more if the residential qualification applied to the province of Ontario rather than to the electoral district, because in the latter ordinarily those who are going to vote are well known.

Mr. CRERAR: I quite concur in the remarks made by my hon. friend (Mr.

Nesbitt). I see no reason why the same provision should not be made to apply in this House as ordinarily applies in the election for the House of Commons. I can quite understand the possibility of a great deal of wrongful voting if the clause stands as presented in the amendment by my hon. friend who is handling it for the Government. We all know it is a regrettable thing, but nevertheless it is the fact that in cities particularly those can be found who will swear to anything if there is any financial gain to accrue to them. Fortunately they comprise a very small portion of our people. It would be quite a simple matter to get together a number of such unscrupulous persons and simply have them vote at every polling division they could visit in a day. On the other hand, as my hon. friend from North Oxford points out, if the residence qualification is confined to the electoral division, the people in that division are acquainted with those who are going to vote, and consequently there is not the possibility of fraud that exists in the amendment as introduced by the Government. I remember that a number of years ago a referendum similar to the one in contemplation was taken in the province of Manitoba. The way was open for fraud and impersonation, and in one polling division more people voted than there were men, women and children in it. It is better to avoid the possibility of such an undesirable condition of affairs, and I therefore very heartily support the proposal of my hon. friend from North Oxford.

Mr. LALOR: Mr. Chairman, I remember when the Ontario election law provided that the voter must be a resident of the municipality. I always thought that was a very unfair method. I have known many instances where farmers sold out and moved to the next district, thus losing their votes. I think very great objection will be raised by people in the rural districts when they find that because they have changed their residence they are not permitted to vote.

Mr. CRERAR: They are in the same position as if they were voting for the election of members of Parliament.

Mr. LALOR: I do not care. I believe that any man who is a bona fide resident of the province of Ontario has a right to vote, even though he may move from one county or township to another. I think it is only just and fair to any citizen that he should not be deprived of his vote on account of change of residence.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Will the regular voters' list be compiled for the purposes of the referendum under the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, and will it be completed within a reasonable time before the actual voting?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In urban municipalities, the list which will be complied and completed within twelve days before the election. But my hon. friend will recollect that a different rule applies in regard to rural municipalities. There, notwithstanding whether a man is off the list or on, he has the right on election day to go to the polls and demand a ballot, but he has to provide himself with somebody who will vouch for him, and the person so vouching must be a resident of the electoral district and on the voter's list. He takes an oath that the man applying for a ballot is a qualified elector. Then it is the duty of the returning officer to hand the applicant a ballot, even though his name is not on the list. It is not so in cities, towns and villages. I think that reasonably safeguards the rural vote. Of course, you might find some scalliwags who would go from poll to poll and try to vote, but I think we have provided a sufficient safeguard, inasmuch as a resident who is on the voters' list for that particular division must take an oath in order to qualify an applicant for a ballot. In the Act as originally drawn we had a provision that two must vouch for an applicant, but at the instance of the committee who considered the clause we limited the requirement to one.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It seems to me that there is a difference between this vote and the vote for members of Parliament. You elect members of Parliament for one particular district; the man who is elected is supposed to be the choice of those who are electors resident in that district. In this case the whole of Ontario is one electoral district. It is not that prohibition shall or shall not prevail in an electoral district, it is as to whether it shall or shall not prevail in the whole province of Ontario. What is wanted is to get the vote of every qualified voter in the whole province in order to ascertain the opinion of the province, and I think you would cut off a great many people from voting if you made it obligatory that they should have resided in the electoral district itself for the time specified. The injustice which would be done in that case would be far greater than any that might arise through double voting or personation, penalties for which are prescribed in the Act. Having regard to the fact that it is one constituency which is voting and in which every voter votes for the whole of the province, I should be in favour of leaving the clause as it is and not introducing the condition of residence in the locality itself.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): If this amendment carries, the effect will be the disfranchisement of a large number of voters. For instance, just about that time of the year the lumbermen in the northern country are breaking up their camps and moving out, and would not have two months' residence in any district at the time of the voting. It seems to me that by this provision an injustice might be done to large numbers of the working population who migrate from place to place.

Mr. STEELE: There is, no doubt, a good deal in what has been said in opposition to the proposed amendment. But in the guarding of the ballot box and in the taking of the vote we should endeavour to be consistent. Two months' residence in the electoral district is specially provided for in the Elections Act. I do not think that any member of Parliament would desire the removal of that restriction. In the coming referendum, I am sure, no one desires anything but a fair and honest vote of the electors of Ontario. But in providing machinery for the taking of that vote, at least the necessary precautions should be taken to protect the ballot box from any irregularity. We have thrown the door wide open by allowing any person whose name is not on the list in the rural districts to come up on election day, and, by taking the oath and being certified to by another elector, to vote. Personally I doubt whether even that is a wise provision in the Elections Act. However, apart from that, we have thrown the door pretty wide open, and while some people may be disfranchised if the local residence clause is inserted, we can under no condition, in no franchise Act, prevent the disfranchisement of some people. In the urban districts many persons will be disfranchised when the lists are revised. If we seek to allow every resident of Ontario to vote, then we are inconsistent in saying that in the urban districts any person whose name is not on the list shall not be allowed to vote. It seems to me that the proposed amendment is a wise precaution. It will, perhaps, save Parliament from a good deal of criticism afterward, and not very much objection would be made my those people who, under the amendment, would be disfranchised.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It seems to me that the weight of the argument rests with the hon. member (Mr. Steele) who has moved the amendment. It is a safeguard to provide that a man who votes shall have resided in the constituency for a certain length of time; if you take away that safeguard I do not see who is going to testify to the voter's residence in Ontario. The provision has always been in the Elections Act, and few are disfranchised under it. I was sorry to hear my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) say that some men were words cut out. Coming from the hon. prepared to swear to anything, particularly in the cities. Now, I would like those member, they have more significance than they otherwise would have. But I do not believe that he wished to insinuate that the man in the city will, because he lives in the city, take an oath that he would not take if he were in the country. I believe that those who live in the cities of Ontario are just as likely to swear to the truth as they would be if they lived in rural ridings. So far as the amendment is concerned, two months' residence surely cannot be considered as too much. I do not live in Toronto, but I would not be surprised if Toronto voted wet. If, however, you allow Toronto to be flooded with men from the rural districts and smaller cities and towns of Ontario, the vote for Toronto might be dry—something which Toronto did not intend or desire. I believe that Winnipeg voted wet and the rest of Manitoba dry in the last referendum on this question. Perhaps Winnipeg thinks it did the right thing; that is not for me to say, but Winnipeg would not like to have its vote submerged, even if it were a minority, by the transference of votes from other districts where they were not so badly needed. Without the proposed amendment, therefore, I foresee a condition under which men might move from one district in Ontario to another where their votes would count for the most. The question is, perhaps, difficult to decide, and no doubt whichever way you decide it a few will be disfranchised. But our law has been a good one in the past, and it seems to me that no hardship will be imposed on anybody by providing that the voter must have resided a certain length of time in the riding in which he votes.

Mr. ARTHURS: In Northern Ontario many voters quite frequently change their residence from one constituency to another. This particular vote will be taken on lists, so far as the rural parts are concerned, prepared prior to December, 1919, and since that time many men have changed their residence. If this amendment carries these men will be deprived of the right to vote.

Mr. NESBITT: They can swear in their votes.

Mr. ARTHURS: Not unless they have been resident two months in the district in which they desire to vote. The proposed amendment would deprive many lumbermen and miners of their votes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the real purpose of this amendment is to obviate the necessity of revising the lists and thereby save some $300,000. Has my hon. friend formed any estimate of the number of names that will likely be left off the lists as the result of our not having the full revision? As I understand it, any persons whose names are not on the lists will have to be sworn. Has the minister any idea how many persons will have to go to the polls and swear on their names in order that they may have the right to vote?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It would be very hard to form an estimate. The man who could form the nearest estimate would be the Chief Electoral Officer, and he says that in some polls there will be very few names to add while in others there may be twenty-five, fifty, or even more. No estimate has been made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon. friend directed the attention of the Dominion Alliance and the Ontario Referendum Committee to this effect of the amendment? Has he considered the possible effect that it will have upon the number of votes cast? I assume that many of those who would like to vote will be women who have never voted before; they may hesitate to take an oath in order that they may be entitled to vote. Then, there are many classes who might take exception to swearing their names at all. Has my hon. friend considered that aspect, and has he discussed it with parties that are likely to be interested?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The parties most interested have certainly brought that aspect of the matter to the attention of the Government, and we have discussed and considered it. There are two opinions on it. Those who are least familiar with elections and election laws seem to think there may be some crowding at the polls, some blocking, on account of the great number of people who intend to vote; but under the Act there is power to open such additional polls as may be necessary to accommodate the voters. That having been pointed out, I think in every case the objection has been withdrawn. I do not see any likelihood of any blocking of the polls even if fifty or a hundred voters have to be sworn, unless somebody deliberately occupies the time of the clerks, and a constable is on hand for the purpose of putting a man of that kind out of the polling booth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is directed, not to the blocking of the polls, but to the effect of certain persons being obliged to take an oath before they register their votes. I understand, in this referendum, there will be a number of women voting who, perhaps, have not voted before. The point I want to bring out, is this, that if the law as originally drafted had been complied with, the names of all those persons would be on the lists, so that there would be no need for any group of people taking an oath; but in consequence of the change that is now being made, hundreds of prospective voters will go to the polls and will find that their names are not on the lists, and so they will be obliged to take an oath before they can be entitled to vote. I just want to make perfectly sure that the Government feels that the electors are satisfied as regards the possibility of large numbers of voters requiring to be sworn.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only complaint I know of on that score is one from a man who stated that his wife objected to the taking of an oath. The law, as originally drafted, adopted the Ontario lists, and closing the door in that way would constitute a far greater hardship than asking the people to take the oath. We have now opened the door, but we have prescribed one safeguard, that an oath shall be taken.

Mr. CURRIE: As regards this clause, the only attitude for the committee to take is that of fairness to all parties concerned. If the effect of the proposed amendment will deprive anybody of a vote, I for one will not support it. By passing this amendment, we shall certainly deprive a number of people of their votes, and for that reason I do not think the amendment should carry. Whilst an amendment similar to this would work all right in a case where there were constituencies and we desired to prevent what is known as "colonization"—that is, having a lot of people moving over night from one constituency to another to carry it—but as this is a vote to be taken throughout the province we should take the broadest view of the whole matter and adopt a course which will ensure to everybody the freedom of the ballot. I speak feelingly on this matter, because by dodges and bars of this kind placed in the statute, I was twenty-eight years of age before I was able to cast a vote, although, under the law of the day, I was entitled to cast a vote at twenty-one. The whole history of the ballot is filled with restrictions placed upon the exercise of the franchise, and we should look at the matter from a judicial standpoint and say: We will not prevent anybody from the right of exercising the franchise, on account of residence, on account of age—that is, granted that we give them the full age of twenty-one years —on account of colour, religion or anything else. If we do that, I think we are doing what is proper. For that reason I do not see the need for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Perth South (Mr. Steele). If this were a case where a vote was to be taken by constituencies, there might be some argument in favour of this proposition; but I think the minister and the Chief Electoral Officer have taken the right course, and the ballot will be amply safeguarded, and no one can come forward and say: By some trick of legislation this House has deprived certain people of their vote, and the verdict of the people of the province would have been reversed if those people had been able to vote. For that reason I am in favour of the utmost liberality in the taking of that vote, and I trust the committee will hold the same view.

Mr. GUTHRIE: One point that has just come to my mind is that the experience in Alberta and Saskatchewan has justified the Chief Electoral Officer in making the change. In those two provinces the law under the Franchise Act requires residence for two months in the electoral district, and he received quite a number of protests from judges and temperance organs in each province pointing out the hardship of the provision. He received no protests from any one in the province opposed to it. In consequence of, and recognizing those protests, he drew up the present amendment. I do not want the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Currie) to suppose that I have any particular side or view on this question. I am not particularly concerned with it. Whatever is the view of the committee, that I am willing to accept.

Mr. POWER: Was this amendment suggested by any of the interested parties, and if so, by whom? Was this amendment approved by any of those seeking the referendum?

Mr. STEELE: I drafted the amendment myself and submitted it to the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Solicitor General said that there had been a deputation asking for this amendment.

Mr. CURRIE: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not addressing the hon. member for Simcoe North. I heard the minister say that there had been a deputation asking for this amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I never saw this amendment until my hon. friend (Mr. Steele) read it to the committee a minute or so ago.

Mr. STEELE: Might I point out that about eight months ago this House adopted the Franchise Act in which appeared section 101, and I make this argument just to show that I am not guilty of any inconsistency or departure from principle; I am endeavouring to be consistent with what the House did eight months ago. That section as adopted provided for the use, in the vote to be taken under the Canada Temperance Act in 1920, of the lists as prepared for the provincial elections in 1919. That vote was not taken in 1920. Had it been taken, this very restriction which I propose now, requiring two months residence in electoral districts, would be in the Act. I did not hear any objection to that then, and I do not think any could have been made. Why the objection should be made now, I do not understand. I am sure the amendment which I have moved is not going to assist the temperance cause in any way, because the great majority of the voters in the rural districts are, I believe, in favour of prohibition and have always so voted, and if electors in the rural districts are disfranchised, the tendency will be to reduce the vote for prohibition. That is not the point I have in mind in moving this amendment. The provision requiring local residence is a good one in any election Act, and for that reason we should preserve it for this vote which it is proposed to take.

Mr. EULER: As regards the referendum, the main object is to ascertain the wish of the people as a whole, not with any special reference to any particular locality as is the case in the 4 p.m. election of members of Parliament. That being so, the law should provide for as complete an expression of opinion as is possible, and for minimizing as much as possible the disfranchisement of any of the citizens. For that reason alone, I am going to vote against the amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the vote should be taken under the Franchise Act itself. I think the idea was, when the Government proposed that the different provinces should take a plebiscite, that the vote should be taken under the Elections Act as it existed at that time. If that is so, I think we should stand by that idea and whatever the Franchise Act of the Dominion was at the time, it should be used in connection with the taking of this vote. If the amendment of the Minister is carried, the vote will not be taken under the original Franchise Act, but under a special Act, with special provisions in it, and that was not the idea. I venture to say that the Minister of Justice had in mind at the time that the vote would be taken in the different provinces under the Dominion Franchise Act without any amendment whatever. I understand that the effect of the amendment of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), is to bring us back to the original Franchise Act, and I think that is the proper thing to do. The machinery there provided should be sufficiently broad to enable everybody to vote who has the right to vote. A great deal has been said in favour of that Act as giving everybody who is qualified the right to exercise the franchise. If that be the case, I think it should be good enough to enable the people of Ontario to express their views in a plebiscite without any amendment whatever. If the amendment of my hon. friend from South Perth brings us back to the Franchise Act which we passed only last year—it is not an old Act—I will support it.

Mr. MOWAT: The reason given for making a change from the original Act is the lack of experience, and if it is a fact that in Alberta and Saskatchewan the requirement as to residence in the locality has had a restrictive effeet, I think, in view of their experience, it would be a pity for us to stick to what we originally enacted. We must remember that this is the Scott Act (which used to apply only to a county) now being made to apply to the province as a whole. I am also much moved by the fact that the Minister's amendment has been discussed by the different representatives who came here, and if they are satisfied with the amendment proposed by the Government I think we would be making a mistake to change it, because they have the idea that what they approved is going to be adopted by the Government. If it is a fact, as my hon. friend from South Perth says, that it may deprive people who are living in the country of their votes, because of their moving about, that is all the more reason why we should stick to the amendment proposed by the Government after conference with these people representing both sides of the question. For these reasons, I think the amendment of my hon. friend from South Perth should not prevail.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that the deputation which waited on the Government asked that this change be made, so the statement of my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) is entirely beside the mark.

Mr. MOWAT: I understood the minister to say otherwise.

Mr. NESBITT: In the old Scott Act as applied to a county the residence qualification and reference, not to the whole county but to the electoral district or polling sub-division. In the future, as the minister pointed out, they will go on the Franchise Act.

Amendment (Mr. Steele) negatived.

Mr. BUREAU: Before the amendment of the minister carries I should like the point I raised at the outset to be settled, as to the proclamation being dated June 4. The minister stated that that was to coincide with the date of the Order in Council. Am I to understand that the date of the plebiscite was not fixed by the Order in Council? If it was not, what officer, or what minister, or what department, fixed the date for the holding of the plebiscite?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that the Order in Council declared that the question would be submitted. The date for taking the vote was subsequently fixed by the proclamation, which named October 25. The date of the proclamation was made to coincide with the date of the Order in Council. The Chief Electoral Officer has given me that information, which he obtained from the late Secretary of State.

Mr. BUREAU: Therefore, the Order in Council simply recognized the fact that an application had been made by the province for a referendum. What was the necessity for an Order in Council to do that? We are left in the dark, and this whole legislation turns upon that point. I do not think it is satisfactory. I do not wish to come in conflict with my hon. friend, but I think the Order in Council was perfectly useless if it did not state that the referendum would be taken on the 18th of April, 1921. If the proclamation is based on an Order in Council that does not state the facts, it has no authority either by statute or otherwise. I think this proclamation is not worth anything, and I do not believe there is any authority in the Secretary of State to sign any such proclamation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am also informed that by the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, it is enacted that the date shall be fixed by the proclamation.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask, then, what the date of the proclamation is?

Mr. GUTHRIE: June 4, to accord with the Order in Council. I do not know what turns upon this point, but those are the facts.

Mr. BUREAU: This is what turns upon it. The Government comes to the House with this legislation and says: We did not know at the time the Elections Act was before Parliament that it would be unfair to Ontario to have a referendum in 1920, as it would disfranchise a lot of people. The date of the referendum was postponed. I say that if the proclamation was issued on the day it is dated, all the facts contained in the proclamation must have been known on that date which is the 4th of June. Now the Elections Act was assented on the 18th of July. On the 4th of June we had not passed the clause which relates to the Temperance Act. That being the case, the statement that the Act was passed not well founded, and if there was anybody to blame it was the Government, who were derelict in their duty in not passing at that time the legislation that is before us now. But I will not censure them for they have been censured enough already.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On what authority does the Government give to a proclamation a date other than that of its actual proclamation? My hon. friend, I understand, says that the proclamation was issued some time in July, but that as a matter of fact it was given out to the public as though it had been issued on the 20th June. By what authority does the Government act in this manner? What right have they to alter the date of a proclamation and to antedate it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Order in Council of the 4th June was not issued under the Franchise Act; it was issued under the Canada Temperance Amendment Act, under which it is provided that the date shall be fixed by proclamation. The Order in Council—this is my information, I have never seen it—merely provided that the question would be submitted in the province of Ontario and the western provinces according to the demand therefor. The proclamation subsequently fixed the date. I understand that the proclamation was actually issued in July, but in its date it related back to the Order in Council and bore the same date. That was the view of the late Hon. Mr. Sifton, as to the proper date which the proclamation should bear. I am stating the facts as they are related to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) contend that that is a proper procedure? What right has the Government to date back a proclamation to a time that suits its own convenience? Will the hon. gentleman seek to defend such a position?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the proclamation was regularly issued.

Mr. BUREAU: According to the principle laid down by my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie), a law becoming effective from the date of proclamation would be antedated a year before it was enacted at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The date of the proclamation is the immaterial part in this case; the time for the taking of the vote is the material thing. That is what is proclaimed; it is what is vital, and I think the proclamation is regular in this instance.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend is shifting his ground. The leader of the Opposi- (Mr. Mackenzie King) asks by what right the Government can antedate a proclamation as they please. I say it is immoral for them to do so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say "as we please" or anything of that kind. I have only given my own opinion.

Bill as amended reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the Bill be read a third time? If there is no objection, it may now be read the third time; otherwise it will have to stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the Government requests that the Bill be now read the third time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, Mr. Speaker, we will not offer any objection to its being read the third time at the present moment. I think, however, that the moment is appropriate again to protest against this system of rushing legislation. The rules of the House provide that every Bill should have at least three readings on three separate days. We protested last session over and over again against the habit into which the Government had fallen of introducing legislation at the eleventh hour and then rushing it through without giving hon. members of this House of Commons opportunity to deliberate thereon. This is the first piece of legislation brought forward this session, and lest the present procedure is to be construed as a precedent we might as well point out at once that strong exception will be taken to a repetition of anything of the kind.

Perhaps this may be an opportune moment to direct the attention of the Government to the fact that the amendments which we to-day have been called upon to pass are amendments to a section of the Elections Act which was considered at the very close of last session, when members of Parliament were obliged to sit far into the night and on into the morning, and when there was very little opportunity afforded for mature consideration of any legislation before the House. Had there been time for mature consideration, this neglect or oversight of the Government might not have occurred. May I further point out that at the end of last session we urged strongly that Parliament should be called at an early date this year. If Parliament had been summoned at an early date, which would have suited the convenience of all hon. members, it would not have been necessary to alter the regular procedure as has been done in this case and to rush legislation in this manner. In a few weeks' time the present fiscal year will have come to a close and we shall then be confronted, I presume, with a request from the Government that we consider granting some measure of supply without the House having any opportunity of looking at the Estimates. Let me inform the Government at once that it will be to their own interests to bring down the Estimates as speedily as possible, because we on this side of the House will not consent to the passing of estimates without having an opportunity carefully to consider what we are called upon to vote in that connection.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We shall take careful note of all that my hon. friend has said. It is hard to break off old habits all at once, and if he will allow this to go through we will reform so far as succeeding ones are concerned.

Mr. BUREAU: You promise anything at all.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the Bill be now read the third time.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Thursday, February 24.

Mr. MATTHEW ROBERT BLAKE (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to offer my contribution to the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion on the excellent speeches delivered by them on this occasion. I wish also to congratulate our Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on his elevation to the high office which he now holds. As he is an honest man and one who is not fishing for compliments, I do not think he will suffer in any way by reason of the lack of deference shown by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) in his failure to congratulate him as other hon. members of the Opposition have done. I am satisfied that when history records the present period the work of the right hon. gentleman who now fills the office of Prime Minister will rank equal with the best achievements of his predecessors. This Government has been subjected to undue, unjust, and unwarranted criticism by many in this country during its term of office; but while that criticism is subsiding in the country in the light of the work of the Government, we cannot say that material help in alleviating the present unrest has been contributed by the Opposition. The Opposition, as they did all summer, are still indulging in criticism and stirring up unrest in the country. In the old days, when over half of the population elected a Government, the majority stood behind that Government through thick and thin; and it did not matter what the Government might do or what measure might be brought forward, that majority supported the Administration unflinchingly. The shaking-up that took place in the forming of a new party in 1917 left every person free, independent, and unfettered to any party, and that being the case every one felt at liberty to criticise the Government. Hence a great deal of the present criticism. Fortunately the people of Canada are now settling down again. They thoroughly appreciate the good work which the Government has done and are beginning to applaud with much enthusiasm the splendid deeds which it has wrought. One outstanding issue, as has frequently been stated on the floor of this House, was presented in the pre-election platform of the Government—the vigorous waging of the war and the reinforcement of Canadian troops at the front. No one can deny that the efforts of the Government along these lines were most successful, for at the conclusion of the war the Canadian division stood at the very spearhead of the Allied armies. That division was undoubtedly the finest fighting corps in the Allied armies at that time and made the best record of any division. The Government deserves the highest praise for keeping the Canadian army at the top notch of efficiency, and for prosecuting its work in that direction so effectively. The achievements of the Government were, in fact, so notable that at the end of the war Canada could easily have laid claim to the full status of nationhood. I think it was the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who said in one of his speeches when Parliament was meeting in the Museum building that no previous Government in Canada could lay claim to have fulfilled so many of its pre-election pledges within six months after the contest. The fulfillment of its pledges is one thing that must certainly be put down to the credit of the Government.

I believe it was the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne who made the point that the trade of Canada per capita had expanded to a greater extent than that of any other country in the world. The expansion of Canadian commerce has not been slow and steady; year by year it has advanced by leaps and bounds. The conditions in the country over which the Government have control must be excellent or such an unparalleled expansion of commerce would not have taken place as has taken place during the regime of the present administration. I think it can be truly stated that we have better industrial conditions in Canada than in any other country on the face of the globe. There is far less unemployment in this country and better relationship and a better understanding between capital and labour. We can only attain the progress that we should achieve in the next few years by continuing to maintain such good relations betweeen the two; labour realizing that capital is as necessary to its wellbeing as labour is as necessary to the wellbeing of capital. In the matter of industrial relationships this country is a model for the world at large. Our mercantile marine which has been so severely criticized made money last year, the hardest year it will ever have to encounter. This too despite the war conditions which shook up the trade routes and brought about the disorganization in the traffic that has been going on during the past few years. Our ships now sail the seven seas and sail them successfully. Our mercantile marine is a credit tc Canada.

In the re-establishment of the returned men no one can deny that Canada leads the world. In the Soldiers' Land Settlement we have trained, are giving loans to or have in training, some 64,706 men. Up to November 30, 1920, the number of veterans in communication with the Soldiers' Settlement Board was 100,000, and the number who applied for the privileges of the Settlement Act was 58,811. The number of veterans qualified but not yet located was 21,975, whilst 916 were in training under supervision of the Board, and 1,444 had completed training. To those who were in training the sum of $165,150 has been paid out as pay allowances during the time they were taking the course. Under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment some 50,788 men were under training up to February 19, 1921. A careful record is kept as to the disposition of graduates. These are followed up by department officers for a period of at least four months after discharge from training, and where employment has been constant for a period of four months after being placed in employment, the same is considered permanent and the cases are closed. Up to January 31, 1921, the following information was available with respect to cases considered closed. The total number at that time was 26,891. Of this number 19,137 or 71.6 per cent were in employment along the lines for which they were trained; 5,604 or 28.84 per cent were in employment along other lines. The total graduates in employment represented 92 per cent. Of the remainder 205 or 1.76 per cent were out of employment; 844, or 3.15 per cent, could not be traced; 749, or 2.78 per cent, had left Canada; 233, or 1.94 per cent, were ill; and 99 or .37 per cent had died. The number of ex-soldiers on the strength of the department for treatment on February 5th, 1921, was 6,231.

I shall not bother to give the figures with respect to the disabled men who have been looked after. That information is available at the Department of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment at any time. But I am satisfied that in the matter of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Canada has led the world. She started her methods before any of the other Allied countries and progressed in these respects, with such rapidity and effected such excellent organization that men were sent from the United States and Great Britain to Canada to study the methods employed by the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Some 29,084 men have found employment in the Civil Service, making a total of 144,578 that have been looked after by the Government. It thus appears that nearly one-third of our army have been provided for in some way or other under the plans of re-establishment.

The provision of Soldiers' Insurance should not pass unnoticed. Under it soldiers can take out insurance without examination within a limited time. Canada leads the world too in the matter of payment of pensions. She is paying higher pensions than any of the Allied countries.

If the administration of this Government had not been so successful there might be some ground for the demand for an election. Hon. gentlemen opposite insist that the people are calling for an election but I have not heard anything whatever with respect to any such call.

The leader of the Opposition sought to make out a case against the Government where in reality no case exists. The tariff question has been made a political football for years and invariably at election time it is surrounded by a lot of camouflage. But really all are agreed on it. The speeches delivered during the West Peterborough election show the members of the Opposition to be in favour of reasonable protection. Even the leader of the Agrarian party is reported in one of his speeches to have pronounced in favour of reasonable and adequate protection. Although other issues have been raised at successive general elections the real big issue presented on every occasion has been the tariff question.

When the Liberals were elected in 1886 they reduced the tariff by .74 per cent. I find that when protection was taken off barbed wire and binder twine our Canadian manufacturers of those commodities went to the wall; and the only reason that cream separators, which were also made free, continued to be manufactured in this country was because they were being manufactured by Canadian branches of American institutions. If we had free trade to-morrow on all commodities, and two thirds of our industries went to the wall, Canada would soon regret having adopted the policy that has been put forward by the Opposition. However, I do not think the people have any fear of the Opposition ever putting their expressed policy into practice, because it is merely a platform to get in on but not to live by.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said yesterday that the prices of agricultural products were fixed in the markets of the world. Of course, and that is why Reciprocity failed, because the people appreciated the fact that Liverpool set the price of wheat irrespective of our fiscal relations with the United States. Therefore the chief plank of the hon. member for Marquette falls down, for it would be of no benefit to the Western farmer in disposing of his produce.

The hon. member also mentioned that both provincial and Federal economy was a pressing necessity if we were to improve our financial condition. Well, probably we all remember the talk that the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Allan) would give in the corridors along this line. I wonder whether the hon. member for Marquette has recommended administrative economy to the Government of Ontario. Although the chief platform of the members of that Government when appealing to the province for support was Greater Economy, the increase in the debt of Ontario since they came into power has been alarming. For example, although $6,000,000 was spent on their roads last year, I am told my hon. members from Ontario that there is practically nothing to show for that enormous expenditure. But that Government seems to be going ahead with the same lavish expenditure, probably accelerated over last year's, and I think my hon. friend from Marquette would be well advised to visit Toronto now the Legislature is in session and advocate greater economy to his friends there.

He also stated that we should do more trade with the United States. But I do not see where we would benefit by that increase. At the present time we are buying very largely from the States; for example, for the ten months ended January 31, 1921, we imported goods to the value of $743,707,196, or 69 per cent of our imports and on that huge business I am told we were fined on the average 15 per cent, representing the difference in exchange. One of the prominent officials of the provincial government in Manitoba said to me after hearing the Premier speak in Winnipeg a year ago that if we had free trade the Canadian dollar would have fallen to fifty cents in a week. The more trade we do with the States the more is our dollar held at a discount, so the less trade we do with them the better. I would advocate doing less with them. I think an embargo on all manufactured articles from the States until exchange rights itself would be a very profitable thing, for then we could not be fined as we are when we do business with them, although they admit that we are the best customers they have. A greater buying of home products would make for a better condition in the Dominion. If a farmer sells $1,000 worth of products off his farm, and in return buys $1,000 worth of material, he is not getting his debt paid off. The sooner we appreciate the fact that we must buy less abroad the sooner we would be in a position to pay off our debts.

I have the figures of our imports for the ten months ended January 31, 1921. We imported from the United States $743,707,196, or 69 per cent of our total imports; in the year 1919-20 we imported 75 per cent from the United States, so we are working along the right line, having already dropped down 6 per cent. From the United Kingdom we imported $185,817,499, or 17 per cent; in the year 1919-20 we imported 11 per cent, which is an improvement on our Empire trade. From other British possessions we imported $43,029,240, or four per cent; it was four per cent the year before. From other foreign countries we imported $103,034,785, or nine per cent; it was eight per cent the year before, so there is not any improvement there. The total imports amounted to $1,075,587,720. Our exports for the ten months ended January 31, 1921, were as follows: To the United States, $491,075,856, or 45 per cent, against 39 per cent the year before, which indicates an expansion of trade along the right line; to the United Kingdom, $281,275,105, or 26 per cent—the year before the figures was 38 per cent, and the reduction is largely attributable to British exchange, which militated against our export trade with her; to other British possessions, $80,334,417, or seven per cent, as against five per cent the year before; to other foreign countries $221,959,676, or 22 per cent, against 16 per cent the year before. Our total exports amounted to $1,074,645,054, or almost balancing our imports. I do not see how the hon. member for Marquette can urge further trade with the United States in view of the exchange rate and the resultant disadvantage against us, especially when he admitted that the prices of farm products are fixed in the markets of the world and not in the States.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) stated that he would appreciate a flat declaration of policy from the Government. Why did he not make one himself? Last year when the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition were touring Western Canada I remember reading an illustrated article in Maclean's magazine by J. K. Munro, and one of the illustrations showed the leader of the Farmers sitting at home calmly smoking a big cigar with a wide brimmed straw hat on his head; and that is where he sat most of the summer, instead of coming out and giving us a flat declaration of policy. I think he has changed his policy two or three times since he became the leader of the Agrarian party, and still he is not prepared to give to the people that clear expression of policy which he demanded from the Government, I do not see how he could read the previous speeches from this side of the House without gathering from them a flat declaration by the Government in favour of reasonable and adequate protection—the same as he is willing to offer himself, and the same as the Opposition at Peterborough were willing to offer. The trouble is there is only one platform and everybody is struggling to get on it.

I join with the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) in pressing for an investigation into the grain dealing of the West. The report of Price, Waterhouse & Co., and the other reports we have got since on the elevators of there being something over 1,000,000 bushels of overages calls for investigation. It is admitted that the United Grain Growers and the various grain companies in the Farmers' organization handled about 25 per cent of the grain of the West, and therefore they must have shared to a great extent in the overages which came from the pockets of the farmers. I know they are allowed a certain percentage of overages, but those percentages could not have amounted to anything like the amounts that were found in the elevators. Whether these are the total overages or not, God only knows; they might have shipped out a great deal of it beforehand. When the leader of the Agrarian party organized the grain growers, it was for the ostensible purpose of giving the farmers the full benefit of the sale of their produce—to give them a better price than they had ever received before and to make sure that there would be no thefts from them in the matter of shortages of wheat at the elevator. It was recognized that in the country elevator in the old days the man who could steal the most was the most valuable employee. I would like to know, and I think the country would like to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the grain business in the West is being run as accurately and as honestly and as properly as it should be. I want to press most strongly for an investigation. If the leader of the Agrarian party and his various lieutenants have nothing to hide, they will welcome an investigation and support the Government until that investigation is held. If, on the other hand, they have any fears in the matter, of course it will be their policy to turn the Government out with the utmost rapidity—that is, if they are able. I doubt very much their ability to do that.

The people are looking for performances, not for promises only. This Government has handed out performances along the lines I have indicated; they have not hesitated to do what they considered best for the country. I think it was Lord Randolph Churchill who, speaking to Viscount Morley, said: "You and Balfour believe in the solution of political questions." This Government believes in the solution of political questions; the Opposition believes in beclouding them—in pretending that the country needs an election, although there is no cry for an election at all. That cry is dying down, and everybody who has kept his ear to the ground, who has kept in close touch with his constituents, must know that—every member of the Opposition must know it.

The leader of the Opposition said that he heard everywhere in the West a call for a general election. I can speak for Winnipeg, Mr. Speaker, and I can tell you where he heard the call for a general election in Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman issued a broadcast invitation through the press to all those opposed to the Government to meet him in Winnipeg, and then held a drawing-room in the Fort Garry Hotel. I suppose those whom he invited—that is, all those opposed to the Government—would include the O.B.U., all the agitators who might be found in the land, and a few disgruntled Liberals. One can imagine his lining them up against the wall, as a schoolmaster would his pupils, and saying to them: "Now, boys, what does the country need most? Say, 'A general election' ", and with one accord they cry out, "A general election". The leader of the Opposition did not hear from Premier Norris or his cabinet a cry for a general election. He did not hear from Mr. Edward Parnell, mayor of the city of Winnipeg, a cry for a general election. He did not hear from Frank Fowler, Isaac Pitblado or Isaac Campbell a cry for an election. All these were stalwarts of the Liberal party in Manitoba—from not one of them did he hear a cry for a general election. The only persons from whom he heard it were those opposed to the Government, which he picked up from every direction and invited to his drawing-room.

The leader of the Opposition has for nearly two years been obsessed with this idea of holding a general election and his becoming Prime Minister of this country, and that idea has become so thoroughly soaked into his cranium and into his system generally that he reminds me of some of the things which I have read in the Confessions of an Opium Eater. The Opium Eater says: "How came any reasonable being to subject himself to such a yoke of misery voluntarily, to incur a captivity so servile, and knowingly to fetter himself with a sevenfold chain?" The hon. leader of the Opposition, obsessed with the idea of obtaining power, feels that he should fetter himself with the sevenfold chain and that he should call for a general election. The Opium Eater boasts himself to be a philosopher. The leader of the Opposition puts me in mind of the old chap in the Taming of the Shrew who, when he found himself in bed, surrounded by luxury, and was assured that he was a lord, said: "And so I am a lord indeed." It is the same with the leader of the opposition; he thinks that he is a lord indeed, or is going to be as soon as he can get a general election. Last year many of his followers told me they did not want a general election, and I do not think any of them want it this year. The Opium Eater also speaks about "creating an artificial state of pleasurable excitement." I suppose it is pleasant to the hon. leader of the Opposition to exist in a great state of excitement in connection with the idea with which he is obsessed, and to make big speeches in the House and throughout the country calling for an election. The Opium Eater also says "I do talk nonsense, not upon principle, but solely and simply because I am drunk with opium." The leader of the Opposition must surely be intoxicated with the idea of power and with the vision of himself on the pedestal as the leader of the country, or he would not talk the nonsense of a general election in the face of the general unrest in the country and the other conditions which at present exist. The Opium Eater also speaks in his dreams of foundations that were never to support a superstructure. That describes accurately the platform of the Liberal Party of 1919. He speaks also of getting into "An exalted state of irritability." Having regard to the last page or two of the hon. gentleman's speech as reported in Hansard, he must surely on that occasion have been in an exalted state of irritability. The Opium Eater also makes reference to his efforts to cut down the opium, and says that when the effect passed away he had terrible pains in his stomach. After the next general election the leader of the Opposition will find that many of his ideas have evaporated, and he will have these pains, too.

It has been said that the crucial defect in a politician is lack of fibre. Neither the leader of the Agrarian party nor the leader of the Opposition has had sufficient fibre to come out with a motion supporting his platform and laying down his policy. We on this side, during this session or at any time, would welcome any such motion on the part of the hon. gentlemen. If they have the fibre of politicians or statesmen, let them come forward and show the country what they stand for. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, go from one constituency to another with a new story for each place; as the member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) has said, they were a veritable political Santa Claus—handing out something new in every constituency they came to. Mr. Gladstone called faint-heartedness the master vice. I think that faint-heartedness is a characteristic of both of these leaders, for neither has come forward with a motion laying down the platform of his party.

Mr. McMASTER: We will have to get Dutch courage.

Mr. BLAKE: Hon. gentlemen can get that in Quebec over the week-end. By Monday we may expect them to have it.

Canada stands to-day on the verge of the greatest era of prosperity that she has yet witnessed, but she can only progress by showing to the world a united front. We cannot go forward if we stir up class hatred and class prejudices. But I am satisfied that the people are willing to forget these things and to settle down to sound and stable government which make for the building up of the Canada that should be. We shall have that, not by our dealing with or trusting to vague and indefinite theories and promises, but by a united, happy and prosperous Canada pursuing, with slight modifications, the same path which, during the last forty years, has built up out of the forest a virile and energetic young nation.

Hon. A. K MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, not desiring to cast a silent vote on the question now before the House, I wish to engage the attention of hon. gentlemen for, I trust, but a very short time. I rise particularly for the purpose of discussing briefly the question of the tenure of this Parliament, a subject which has already been very ably and comprehensively discussed by preceding speakers. I realize fully that I must traverse a road that is now well worn, but that is unavoidable.

I trust the House will pardon a slight digression from the discourse which I have outlined for myself. Since the close of the last session of Parliament the right hon. gentleman who leads this House (Mr. Meighen) became Prime Minister of this country, and it is only natural that I should seize the first opportunity of extending to him my sincere and hearty congratulations. In 1868, when Disraeli succeeded for the first time to the office of Prime Minister in England, upon being congratulated, he said: "Yes, I have reached the top of the greasy pole." His most recent biographers have stated that no one more than he realized the difficulties of maintaining himself in that precarious elevation. It is in the loftiest peaks that we find the clouds and the snows. My right hon. friend arrives at his exalted position at a time when the political atmosphere gives a very low visibility, and I am sure that none more than he realizes the difficulties attaching to his position. Nevertheless,

I suppose many of his friends and admirers —and I concede he has many—will hope he has a reasonably secure hold of his high position, and on the other hand I suppose it is quite true that there are in this country many others who trust and hope his downfall is imminent and sudden. 'Twas ever thus and ever shall be, I suppose, in the politics of this and every other country.

As is well known to hon. gentlemen in this House, in 1917 I became a member of the Ministry of that day which was known as the Union Government. I do not in the slightest degree regret the action which I then took, and I only trust that, in the judgment of those who were associated with me, I honourably lived up to the obligations which the acceptance of that position implied. I cannot forget that, during two years or more, at an important time in the history of this country, I was associated very intimately with the Prime Minister as a colleague in the public service, and I feel I would, perhaps, be failing to perform a simple duty if I did not say, as an old colleague of the Prime Minister, that, in my observation and experience, he always carried to the discharge of his public duties, industry, capacity, talent, and, I believe, a sincere desire to render service to the State.

The amendment to the address is in the nature of a motion of want of confidence. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) may have had many reasons for moving this amendment other than those which were contained in his remarks at the opening of the session. I have read, with some little care, his speech in support of his amendment, and I perceive in it but one basic reason upon which 5 p.m. he asks for the support of hon. gentlemen, and that is that, under the Parliamentary system obtaining in this country and under the peculiar circumstances under which the election in 1917 took place, a dissolution of Parliament should take place at an early and appropriate time in the future. Whether I apprehend correctly or not his reason for moving the amendment, that, at least, is my position, and upon that ground I desire to support the amendment. I should have preferred, possibly, that the amendment had expressed definitely, but in general terms, the reasons which the leader of the Opposition gave in his remarks supporting his amendment. I suppose that is not, after all, very important.

I am not particularly interested in demonstrating one way or the other whether the Government at the present moment holds the confidence of Parliament or of the Canadian electorate. If it could be demonstrated to me with some reasonable degree of conclusiveness that the Government did possess the confidence of the electorate, I still would adhere to the position which I have just stated, namely, that a dissolution of Parliament in the early future is desirable. I am not interested either in deciding whether the occupancy of office by the Government at the present moment is properly or accurately described as being a usurpation of office. I have heard it described as being analogous to the position of an overholding tenant, but I am not very much interested in deciding whether that aptly describes the situation. The precise view I wish to give utterance to is that there was an express or implied understanding with the electorate that the present Government was to be a war Government; that the present Parliament was a war Parliament, and that its life was to be measured by the period of the war, supplemented by such further period as reasonable men should accord it, or by such further period after the conclusion of the war, as the exigencies of time and circumstance demanded. Personally I feel obligated to that position; because at the time of the election of 1917, I committed myself in that direction. I, therefore, feel I must at this stage implement the position which I then took upon this important question. I do not care what other members of Government may have said at the same time or what it has been alleged they have said. I speak merely for myself in this matter, and I rest my position absolutely upon what I said myself, and upon the obligations to which I committed myself. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, under the system of Parliamentary and responsible Government obtaining in this country, and under the practice as we know it and have known it for many years, and in view of the unusual circumstances attending the last Federal election, it is eminently proper and desirable, in the interests of the country, that a dissolution of this Parliament should take place at an early date and at an appropriate time. At the last session of Parliament the leader of the Opposition proposed an amendment intended to have the same result as the amendment now before the House for consideration. At least, it involved the principle of the dissolution of Parliament. On that occasion I voted against the amendment. I did so with deliberation. I believe I had good cause to support the position that I then took. I feel I am quite competent to give, anywhere, and at any time, ample reasons justifying my vote on that occasion. Involved in that, however, would be matters more or less personal, which at this time would not interest the House in the slightest degree. Therefore, I do not intend offering to the House any defence for the position which I took last year. I think I was perfectly justified in voting as I did, and what others may think of it is of little interest to me.

Mr. Speaker, I admit quite frankly that it is quite a difficult task to induce members of any parliament to consent to a dissolution before the end of the constitutional term. Discussing a similar question on one occasion, Mr. Cobden used the following words:

> I have never been able to discover what was the proper moment according to members of Parliament for a dissolution. I have heard them say they were ready to vote for everything else, but I have never heard them say they were ready to vote for that.

I realize the force of that statement, and I suppose to a greater or less degree the difficulty exists to-day, and confronts any one who attempts to argue for the dissolution of a parliament before the end of its constitutional term. In discussing this matter and supporting this amendment, I must revert to past political events, as my reasons for supporting the amendment had their source in political events of three or four years ago. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the year 1917 the Military Service Act was passed, and that was the primary cause of the organization later on, of a coalition ministry. Without that legislation, I fancy, there would have been no unusual movement in this country away from the ordinary political and party alignments. That coalition ministry was composed of members of both political parties. Many members of Parliament and many citizens of this country were of the opinion that after the adoption of the compulsory Military Service Act it was quite natural and proper there should be a coalition ministry, and that the carrying out of legislation of that character should be in the hands of a ministry that was not composed solely of members of one political party. There is a great deal to say in support of that view. The very fact, however, that in consequence of the passage of the Military Service Act there did come into existence a coalition ministry gave the impression to a large body of the people of this country that its life should be circumscribed by the period of the war, and for perhaps a reasonable time thereafter. That impression was very prevalent at that time, and, to a very large degree, it has since continued. I do believe that in the minds of a great many of the most intelligent and respected electors of this country there rests the belief that upon this ground, if upon no other, an early dissolution of Parliament might well be contemplated by the Government.

Another section of the Canadian electorate believed then, and still believe, that in an exhausting and protracted war the administrative affairs of this or any other country should be committed to a coalition ministry. There is much to say in favour of that view. In fact, I believe it was the dominant view in this country. In the abstract, I believe, it was the universal view of the electors of Canada, and the only criticism that was made of that suggestion was that it came too late and should have been adopted at the beginning of the war, so that from the beginning to the end of that awful struggle we should not have had any evidence of extreme partisanship in the administration of our public affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I do say that when the election of 1917 came, statements were made by newspapers, by candidates, by public men, and by private citizens, to the effect that the election was in the nature of a war election, and that the Parliament to be elected was to have certain limitations, and I submit it as my judgment, that it was not unnatural that the people of this country generally accepted that impression so given by the persons and individuals I have mentioned. It is not therefore unreasonable or unexpected, I say, to find in Canada to-day a large body of public opinion supporting a dissolution of Parliament in the early future. I do not think it is very important whether the Prime Minister made an express declaration on that point or not. I do not think it is very important what ministers of the Crown said or did not say. The important question is, what was the general impression left on the public mind from all sources, what was the general belief and understanding of the public in respect to this matter and if there was any real and substantial foundation for this belief or understanding. What was the understanding of the electorate? I submit that that is the important question, and if we can reasonably ascertain what that understanding was, I say it should be respected, and our course of action should present no very practical difficulties. It is, of course, difficult to present to Parliament concrete evidence upon this one way or the other. I merely wish to express what my own view of the matter is, namely—and I feel strongly and clearly in that view—that it was the belief of the Canadian electorate in 1917 that the Government elected at that time should have limitations and that the life of this present Parliament should also have distinct limitations altogether determinable by the period of the war. I have already stated that the fact that the Military Service Act was introduced in 1917 alone affords some justification for my reaching that conclusion. As a matter of fact, it was the only issue in that election. The members of the Administration of that day, I remember well, said repeatedly in Parliament that it would be the only issue. Indeed, there was no other issue; it was so entirely personal in its effect and application that in its very nature it precluded any other issue appearing in that election. And no other issue did come before the electorate on that occasion. The mere fact, I submit, of an election being confined to one issue, which issue could only exist so long as the war lasted, is a tremendous argument in favour of the placing of limitations upon the life of this particular Parliament. I cannot see how one can escape that conclusion, and I repeat again that I believe that this was the conviction of the Canadian people at that time, a conviction that still exists and that should, I think, be respected. There is another circumstance which, I think, justifies the position I now take and which affords further evidence in support of the statement I made some time ago that it was the belief of our Canadian people that the life of the Parliament elected in 1917 should have defined limitations. I refer to the War-time Elections Act. In 1917 I opposed that legislation, and a portion of my remarks upon the same have since been frequently quoted in Parliament, particularly while I was a member of the Ministry. I do not know whether these quotations from my remarks were made for the purpose of confirming my wisdom in respect of this Bill, or whether they were made with a view to demonstrating some inconsistency on my part. I might say, although it is altogether irrelevant at the moment, that I have not changed my mind in the slightest degree in respect of the War-time Elections Act. I am utterly incapable of apostacy upon that point. I think to-day exactly as I thought then. While I considered that this legislation was mischievous and possibly dangerous, yet late in 1917 when I became a member of the Ministry, I believed that I was justified in the circumstances in subordinating my views upon this matter to a more important principle. I do not regret the views which I expressed in relation to the War-time Elections Act. I do not refer to it now for the purpose of discussing the merits of the Bill; no good purpose whatever would be served by that. I refer to it only to demonstrate the position which I seek to establish, namely, that it was a circumstance creating and determining in the minds of the people of this country the conviction that the Parliament to be elected partially under this Franchise Act was to have limitations. Now, there are certain sections of this Act which I wish to recall to the minds of hon. gentlemen. First it will be remembered that certain citizens of Canada—naturalized citizens—were disfranchised. I am merely, I say again, referring to the effect of certain provisions of the Act, and not by any means for the purpose of raising any discussion as to their merits. That was one of the provisions of the Bill. Another provision was that of temporary and arbitrarily enfranchising another section of the community. It is also to be remembered that under that Act certain classes of women were enfranchised; and I assume that every hon. gentleman who listens to me is perfectly aware of the class of women who were so enfranchised. Now, I say, these provisions of the War Time Elections Act to which I have referred by themselves alone afford a powerful and almost unanswerable argument for the view that the Parliament which enacted this legislation, contemplated limitations to the life of the next Parliament, and that its term of tenure was not to be left to the constitution nor to the determined will of the Executive of the country. For what purpose was the War Time Elections Act enacted. There need be no doubt about this. If one refers to Hansard it will there be found stated very clearly and explicitly, I think by the present Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen), and by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), that the purpose of the additional enfranchisement afforded by that Act was to secure the adoption and enforcement of the Military Service Act. The war has ended; the Military Service Act has been repealed and has been taken root and branch from the substantive law of this country. The War Time Elections Act has been repealed utterly, and the special enfranchisements granted under that Act have been removed. I think the disfranchising provisions of that legislation have also been repealed. Almost every condition which one could imagine as dominant in that election has been removed; every possible issue that could have prevailed in that election contest has ceased to exist. I do submit, therefore, that it is my sincere judgment that, all these things having transpired, it is but a fair and just conclusion to reach that this Parliament was intended to have and should have limitations. That, I believe, was the intention of the preceding Parliament, and I believe it to be the judgment of the people of this country. Only a great emergency could justify such legislation as the War-time Election Act and the provisions contained in that measure. I remember that the members of the Government of that day in charge of the Bill declared openly and frankly that only a war condition could justify the legislation and they openly and frankly, as I have already said, declared the purpose of it. That purpose having been accomplished; the Military Service Act having accomplished what it was intended to accomplish, or partially; the war itself having ended, there is but one conclusion, for me at least, to reach—namely that the life of Parliament should have limitations. I wish to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I do not quite accept the theory that the termination of the life of this Parliament is a matter solely resting with the Government. In my opinion it rests just as much with every member of Parliament; I think every member must settle between himself and his electors the question whether or not, under the circumstances to which I have referred, he is entitled to vote either for the early ending of this Parliament or for its further continuance.

An argument I believe has been advanced, in this House, although I have not heard any of the speeches myself—certainly it has been raised in the press and outside of Parliament—that a re-distribution of seats should precede a general election. I quite understand how a contention of the kind might arise, particularly in certain sections of the country. My own view about it is that if there are good grounds for the early dissolution of Parliament, then the re-distribution of the seats of Parliament is not an important or relevant matter. I think the contention, or suggestion, lacks every element of conclusiveness, and in the circumstances I cannot conceive it a sound reason for delaying dissolution.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Would the hon. gentleman tell Frank Oliver in Edmonton to sing that song, so that we will not be held responsible for tricking the public if we have an election this fall?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend may have an early opportunity of conveying that message himself and probably it would be accepted with as much grace from him as from myself. The Constitution, Mr. Speaker, makes provision for the redistribution of seats after the coming census, and we have always abided by the Constitution in this respect. Therefore I say, that when the Constitution provides for the condition we might well leave the Constitution to operate as it was intended to operate, and as it has operated in the past. The Constitution, providing for the redistribution of seats, there cannot possibly be any injustice done to any province or any section of this country. If as a general principle an election should take place before the end of the Constitutional term of this Parliament there can be no sound reason for postponing that until after a redistribution, because, as I say, the Constitution of the country makes ample provision for the event. Further, it was never intended by the Constitution that an election should absolutely take place immediately following redistribution. As a matter of fact, and as a matter of principle as well, the makers of our Constitution abstained deliberately from making any such provision. It is not a part of our political system to have fixed periods for elections; the very opposite is the case. True, the Constitution fixes a maximum period for the existence of any Parliament, but that is an altogether different thing from having fixed election periods. There is a great deal to be said in favour of having a fixed election period such as they have in the United States. It may be, that political parties in this country shall become so rigid, inflexible and autocratic that the only way to safeguard the due and proper protection of public interests, and to ensure some independence on the part of members of Parliament will be to have fixed periods of election. That, however, is beside the matter I am discussing for the reason that under the British system fixed election periods have been deliberately abstained from, and have not been incorporated into our Constitution. I remember further the fact that in 1891, in 1900, and in 1911 elections immediately preceded redistribution. There was no protest on the part of the Canadian electorate against such dissolution; no serious protest was heard subsequent to the election so far as I can recall; and therefore I say that it seems rather unusual to introduce the argument that redistribution should precede dissolution at the present time, particularly when there are outstanding so many strong and powerful reasons, such as I have tried to indicate, for the dissolution of Parliament within a reasonably short time. If redistribution of the parliamentary seats was within sight, I admit the contention would have force, but it is quite a distance forward.

Further, Mr. Speaker, if in now seeking to postpone an election until the redistribution we were seeking to establish and to place in the Constitution a principle that would remain there to guide us in the future and that should be enduring, perhaps there might be some force in the contention that redistribution should precede a dissolution of this Parliament. But the suggestion does not invoke any such principle. This Parliament, or the Government, might decide that redistribution should precede an election, but it would not follow that in 1931, or in 1941, or in any of the decades following thereafter, the same principle would prevail. Therefore I submit, Mr. Speaker, that little could be gained by adopting this contention as a principle at this time, unless there was some certainty that the practice would be followed by succeeding governments after following census taking and redistribution. Consequently, there being no enduring principle in the suggestion, I question the soundness of the idea that dissolution should be postponed in order to follow the next redistribution measure.

Again, we might ask: Are there any practical advantages or disadvantages in accelerating or retarding the election so that it may precede or follow redistribution? I think not. It is suggested that the Western provinces would in the event of redistribution obtain a greater representation than they now have. If that is correct, it follows that some of the other provinces will lose a certain amount of representation, for one section of the country cannot gain without the other losing. If it is sound for Western representatives to say that dissolution is to be determinable by the fact that they are to obtain greater representation under the next redistribution and that this election should be postponed on that ground, it would be equally sound for the losing provinces to say that dissolution should precede the application of the next Redistribution Bill. If one is right the other would be right; but I say they are both wrong.

Mr. EDWARDS: Carry that out and you would not have any redistribution at all.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): No. I say that redistribution will come at the proper time and according to the period fixed by the constitution, and that shall afford ample protection for Parliament and for the people. Whether there should come dissolution earlier than redistribution is determinable on other grounds and principles.

Now the statement that the next redistribution should absolutely precede a dissolution disregards other factors, and is suggestive of territorial predominance or strength which is hardly desirable. It is suggestive of the theory that only through might is right obtainable. I make bold to say, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding the expressed views of some hon. gentlemen from the Western provinces, that this view does not convey the real opinion of the Western country. It would be strange if at this particular period there should be manifested so strong and inflexible a view in the Western provinces for redistribution that they would forego the early acceptance of a principle which seems to be strongly asserted there by all classes, namely, that there should be an early election. It would seem strange that they would forego the early application of that principle for an advantage in electoral representation which after all would not amount to so much, and which in any event will soon come.

I think it also might be said in very truth, that no western interests, nor the interests of any other section of Canada, will suffer by reason of the fact that an election might possibly take place before dissolution. I am sure no province really suffers from under-representation. I do not think any hon. member would have the hardihood to say that the representatives from the Western provinces are so unduly modest that they refrain from giving expression to western thought, western aspirations, and western wants. I think they are as aggressive and as insistent as representatives from the other provinces in placing before Parliament what they conceive to be the interests of their particular section of Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I do wish to emphasise once more that if upon any possible principle there should be a dissolution of Parliament considerably ahead of the end of the constitutional period, then the contention that we should await a redistribution after the census which is about to take place, is one which has no firm or sure foundation and should not be invoked as an answer to the demand for an early dissolution.

I shall not detain the House any longer upon the amendment or upon the motion. I think I have said substantially what I intended to say when I arose to my feet. I have necessarily been covering ground which has been stated and restated several times during the course of the debate. My only purpose in engaging the attention of hon. gentlemen for a little time this afternoon was to enable me to place before them the reasons which move me to support the amendment, and having done this, my remarks are concluded.

Mr. FRANK S. SCOTT (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I desire to join with others who have preceded me in this debate in extending my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for the excellent speeches which they delivered. So much has been already bestowed upon them in the way of eulogy that I feel it is unnecessary for me to go further in this direction.

I wish also to join with the other speakers in extending to the Prime Minister my congratulations upon his being called to the high office which he now occupies. I feel that the people of Canada already know that he has splendid qualifications for the position, and I believe that in the fulfilment of his duties he will live up to the best traditions of Canadian statesmanship.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to say a word or two with regard to the speech delivered yesterday afternoon by the hon. member for Marquete (Mr. Crerar). In his opening remarks he stated that he saw no constructive ideas in the speeches of the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. If I were to endeavour to sum up the speech which he himself delivered, it seems to me that I could with almost equal force say that after all it contains very little that might be described as constructive. It is true that he alluded during the course of his remarks to quite a number of questions that are attracting attention throughout the country at this time, but I fail to see where he introduced anything into the discussion of these questions that was at all constructive. If I were to pass an opinion upon his speech in a general way I should say that it was most pessimistic in its tone and that it was given over almost entirely to fault-finding.

The hon. gentleman made some reference to the railway situation, but he did not offer anything in the way of constructive suggestion or express any particular view as to how the present situation should be met. It is true that he did say that at no very distant date we should have a revaluation of our railways. But I think that in one of the first speeches delivered in this House by the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) he said that that was one of the things that might in the future require the attention of the House. But a revaluation of our railways at the present time would not alter the present situation one iota. Our national railways are not earning sufficient to pay operating costs, and it makes no difference whether the capital cost of our railway system is $200,000,000 or whether it is a one dollar bill. There is not a great deal, therefore, in a contention of that kind.

The hon. gentleman also tried to bring it home to the House that there had been a lack of economy in the administration of the public affairs. With that suggestion I do not at all agree. I am satisfied that the Government has in every way tried to practise economy in the administration of the different departments. But I should like to offer one suggestion to my hon. friend, the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) made an allusion to it. The member for Marquette was one of those who were instrumental in bringing into power a Farmers' Government in Ontario. I join with the member for North Winnipeg in suggesting that the member for Marquette get in touch with the Premier and the leaders of the Ontario Government and that he have a heart-to-heart talk with them regarding the financial situation. I know that political opponents very often attempt to take advantage of a situation like this, but I do not speak of the matter from the political standpoint. I want to assure the hon. member that financial men are to-day very deeply concerned about the manner in which the Farmers' Government in Ontario have been administering the financial affairs of that province. This problem is one of the most serious ones that at present confront the people of Ontario.

The hon. member also said that what we required in Canada at the present time on the part of the Administration was a policy of vigour, determination, efficiency and courage. I am sure that we all join in that sentiment, but these words, coming from the lips of the member for Marquette, mean more than would seem on the surface. They mean, in the first place, that the present Government are lacking in these very desirable attributes and that if the leader of the Agrarian party were called upon to administer the public affairs he would be able to supply that deficiency. Now, I have no desire to detract from the ability of the member for Marquette. He at one time held the portfolio of Agriculture in the Government, and I have no reason to suppose that he was anything else than a very capable administrator. But I am not prepared to say that among the hon. gentlemen who were with him at that time in the Government he was such an outstanding figure or was a man of such superior ability that he can now offer to this country an administration such as it requires. I admit his capability, but great as it may be, I do not think there was anything in the administration of his department while he was a member of the Government that would justify the people in thinking that he is the man who should in the future take charge of the administration of the country's affairs.

As I listened to the hon. member's remarks it occurred to me that the situation which confronts us at present is similar to that which existed in Ontario just prior to the last election. Hon. gentlemen will remember that there was a great deal of class feeling and class consciousness; that we heard a great deal about the grievances of the farmers and were told that when the farmers came into power they would remedy those grievances. Now, a Farmer Government was returned in Ontario, and for a considerable length of time has been carrying on the affairs of that province. They have had one session of the legislature and they are now having a second. But notwithstanding the fact that they represented themselves as a class suffering under great disabilities and having many grievances awaiting only the opportunity for their adjustment, up to the present not a single Act has been passed in the legislature, much less any measure introduced, having for its object the amelioration or lessening of any grievances under which the farmers were alleged to have been suffering. For myself, I have no sympathy with the idea that everything is bad in the two old political parties. But I am confident that if the hon. member for Marquette and the Agrarian party were by any chance called upon to carry on the affairs of this country they would not, as was the case with our friends in Ontario, when faced with the responsibilities of office, be able to carry things on very differently.

During the course of this debate we have heard a great deal about the Government's mandate to carry on the affairs of the country. This afternoon we heard from the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who is a lawyer and who arrived at one conclusion. We heard this same question discussed by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who was, like the hon. member for Halifax, at one time a member of this Administration, and we find these two gentlemen, both no doubt well posted and thoroughly conversant with public affairs, arriving at two entirely different conclusions. The hon. member for Marquette says that the Government has a mandate, while the hon. member for Halifax says that the Government has no mandate. I am not a lawyer; but I have my idea regarding this question, and if I were to sum it up briefly, it would be this. I was a candidate for Parliament in 1917, and there was absolutely no conditions or reservations in that candidature. I was elected for a Parliament, and I consider it my duty to continue in my seat in this House until the Government of the day sees fit to dissolve this Parliament. Having heard the opinions of legal men on both sides of the House, I may say that this debate might be continued throughout the entire session, but I am convinced as regards my position and that is all I need satisfy myself about at this time.

For some time past we have been hearing about the necessity for a general election. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) says that there has been and is a widespread demand for an election. Speaking once again only for myself, I must disagree with him; my experience has been that the people with whom I have come into contact in my part of Ontario, and more particularly the business people of that province, are strongly opposed to a dissolution of Parliament at the present time, and for a very good reason. We all know that business conditions in this country during the past year have not been what we would like them to be. Business has been bad, very much disorganized. Canada, like all other countries in the world, is now passing through that period of reconstruction that we all expected. Unemployment exists; in many places our industries are idle, and the feeling in Ontario is this, that it would be nothing short of a national crime for the Government of this country to precipitate a general election at this time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SCOTT (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was giving certain reasons why I believed it was inadvisable for the Government to make an appeal to the country during the past year. There is one other point that I might perhaps make in that connection, and I make it more particularly for the benefit of the leader of the Opposition. I wish to tell him that in my own constituency Liberals, men engaged in business, and prominent in their various walks of life, who in days gone by gave their allegiance to the party which he to-day leads, have been the most outspoken in expressing a desire that there should be no appeal to the country at the present time.

I pass on now to deal with the amendment which was introduced by the leader of the Opposition. His amendment is to the effect that the Government does not possess the confidence of the House, or the confidence of the country. With regard to the first point, the question whether the Government possesses the confidence of the House will be finally decided when the vote is taken, in a few days, no doubt. That will provide a proper answer to that question. As to whether the Government enjoys the confidence of the people of this country that, after all, as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. MacLean) stated this afternoon, is, and can be at best, only a matter of opinion, and in that connection I must say that there is a very great difference of opinion.

If I were looking for an opinion upon a question of that kind it does not seem to me that I would be likely to go to gentlemen situated as are the Opposition. I submit that you could go into any legislature in Canada, and perhaps into any parliament in the world, and not find it a difficult task to persuade those who were sitting in opposition, partisans, that the government to which they were opposed did not enjoy the confidence of the people of the country. But I do not take a great deal of stock in opinions on that question from such a source. While there may be a difference of opinion as to whether the Government of this country enjoys the confidence of the people, I think there is small room for doubt whether the leader of the Opposition and the party which he leads enjoy the confidence of the people. It seems to me that the most superficial observer of the present political situation must be impressed with the fact that, aside from the province of Quebec, the Opposition are not in very high favour at the present time.

We have heard a very great deal from the leader of the Opposition about the defections that have taken place from the Government side of the House, and in that no doubt he is in a measure correct. But I do not see how it can afford him much consolation, because, if one looks across the floor of the House and among the members who sit under his leadership, one cannot see that he has made any very substantial gains duing the last few years. While there have been defections for certain reasons, the men who have seen fit to cross the floor of the House have been loath, indeed, to place themselves under his leadership.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I have been much impressed by his speeches both in this House and outside. One would think to hear his speeches that recruits, not only in this House, but from one end of the country to the other were flocking to his banner. It is difficult to understand how he can think so. His attitude reminds me of the days when as a boy I used to spend my vacations on the farm. One of the most enjoyable things I remember doing in these days was to go out and gather the eggs. Sometimes, when we were looking for eggs, we would come across a clucking hen. We would take hold of her and toss her out into the barnyard. She would ruffle up her feathers, spread her wings, and make a great fuss. It is a most peculiar thing, but do you know, Mr. Speaker, that if there were a thousand small chickens in that yard, she would imagine that she owned every one of them. And so it is with the leader of the Opposition. He looks over this House and over the whole country and seems obsessed with the idea that all the political chickens that are passing to and fro are ready to join him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are getting fewer on the other side, at all events.

Mr. SCOTT: Before six o'clock I gave a few reasons why I did not believe it was desirable, or in the interests of this country, that there should have been a general election during the past year. So far as I personally am concerned, I think that is a matter which should properly be decided by the Government of this country, and again, so far as I am concerned, if the Government should decide to dissolve Parliament and make an immediate appeal to the country, I shall be perfectly satisfied, but I believe that dissolution should come about in a proper and constitutional way, and should not be dictated by the leader of the Opposition. I have no doubt that the constitutional course will be followed.

I feel, however, that before we have an appeal to the country there are a few things which should receive attention, and I should like to point out in that connection that there are certain things which should receive the attention of the leader of the Opposition before the electors are called upon to make a decision between the two political parties. One of the points I have in mind is this: I would like to ask the leader of the Opposition if he has entered into any alliance or understanding with the Agrarian party. I would like to go a little further and ask him this question: If not, does he propose to do so either before or after the election? I ask that because I believe it is going to have a most important bearing upon the result of this election, and it is only fair that the people of the country should understand perfectly not only where the Government stands but just where the Opposition is at this time.

The leader of the Opposition has said that the policy of the Agrarian party and that of his own party are practically identical. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if the two parties opposite stand for the same principles there is no necessity for their separate and individual existence. If their principles are identical, why should we not have one Opposition party and let the people of Canada make their decision between that party and the party represented on this side? The answer which the leader of the Opposition will give to the questions I have submitted would, I claim, make a vast difference in the situation in the province of Quebec. I listened with a great deal of interest the other day to the speech delivered to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) because, while I confess that I do not have very much opportunity of coming in contact with the public men in the neighbouring province of Quebec, I have during the last two years been brought very closely into touch with a large number of business men in that province; and I want to say that in my conversations with those men from time to time I have found that they give candid expression to practically the same sentiments as those uttered the other day by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe.

Now, the hon. gentleman in his speech covered a great deal of ground, and if I were asked to summarize that speech in a few words I would say that the message he brought to this House was that he was not prepared, in the name of Liberalism, to be led into an alliance with the Agrarian party for the reason that he did not believe in their policy and in their principles. I want to emphasize once again that the sentiments that have been expressed to me on very many occasions, not by men who had any political purpose to serve but by unbiased men of prominence and weight in the province of Quebec, who were only interested in the welfare of this country, are in keeping with the whole trend of the speech delivered by my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House following that hon. member endeavoured to reply to him, but I submit that while there have been interchanges of personalities there has been no serious attempt on the part of hon. members opposite to review the statements made by the member for St. Hyacinthe. I venture to say that, if an issue of that kind were faced fairly and squarely before the people and were decided on its merits, the leader of the Opposition would find after the next general election that he would not have the bulwark of which he boasts at the present time—a solid province of Quebec. I confess that I have my doubts at this time as to whether that issue is going to be fairly and squarely placed before, and decided upon its merits by, the people of the province of Quebec. We have only to listen to the speeches that are delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite to discover the effort that is being made and the well defined plan that is being followed in order to becloud the issue.

What is the situation? One gentleman after another has risen in his place and has represented to the people of his constituency—for their speeches are intended for distribution there, and it is there that they will have their effect—that the Prime Minister of this country (Hon. Mr. Meighen) is a man who is an enemy to the province of Quebec and has missed no opportunity of casting scorn and discredit upon them; and hon. members opposite try in that way to becloud the issue and cover up the true issue which should be placed before the people of Quebec in the next election.

Now, one of the things which I have learned since becoming a member of this House is that a public man must needs be very careful in any statements that he makes. There are acute minds on both sides of the House, and I have found that very often a word or a sentence uttered in some long-forgotten debate is at the appropriate time recalled by men of retentative memory in order to destroy an argument or confuse political opponents. The right hon. gentleman who to-day fills the position of Prime Minister of this country has been for a number of years in public life, and from the time he entered the House of Commons, I think in the year 1908, he has been a marked man. Political friends and political foes alike said, from the day he first entered Parliament, that he would travel far; and they have not proven false prophets, because the hon. gentleman to-day occupies the highest and most distinguished position in the gift of the Canadian people. Mr. Speaker, the point in that connection which I want to make is that when hon. gentlemen opposite make insinuations and try to represent the Prime Minister of this country as one who has slandered the French race and the province of Quebec, it is no wonder that we, his friends, challenge them to produce the evidence. Is there any hon. gentlemen who, if he believed that one single sentence could be found that would bear out this contention, would not produce it and quote it on the floor of the House? Now, Sir, that method of warfare, I am sorry to say, is not confined within the precincts of this House, nor is it confined to the province of Quebec. A great national newspaper in Ontario, the Toronto "Globe," made a similar reference to the Prime Minister some months ago. That newspaper was invited to produce the proof to substantiate its statements at that time, but up to the present it has failed to do so.

Now Mr. Speaker I pass from that subject. There is one other matter to which I would like to refer at this time. I would like to direct one more question at my good friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I have always held that hon. gentleman, and I assure him I do so still, in the very highest esteem. I always listen with a great deal of interest to his speeches, and never miss an opportunity of hearing him, because he is such a master of parliamentary eloquence. I remember well the speech which he delivered in the Budget debate of 1918, which speech suggests the question that I would now like in all kindness to put to him. The question is this: I would like to know how the member for Red Deer views the prospect—perhaps at the present time more than a prospect—of an alliance with the party led by the leader of the Opposition. I ask this because of statements made by the hon. member in the speech in question. I re-read the speech the other day and I will just quote a few sentences from it. I think that all the members of the House might well read that speech with interest, but at present I wish only to quote a few sentences for their consideration. At that time the hon. gentleman was speaking as a supporter of this Government and from this side of the House. Addressing himself to hon. gentlemen opposite he said:

> I conducted a missionary enterprise of persistency and consistency for years in the ranks of gentlemen opposite. When they were in power I sat in the colony and made attempts at their education,—the moment I mentioned the rights of the farmers or anything relating to low tariff I want it recorded as my distinct impression that I saw nothing but frowns upon their faces. And the reason was this—they came into power practically a professing free-trade party. They certainly did take the duty off cream separators. I worked that free cream separator on Western platforms until my arm was actually aching. They took the duty off binder twine. Sir, I threaded binder twine until there was not a fibre between my fingers. They introduced the British preference, and as long as I could I kept trying to defend my own constituency for sitting in such a Liberal party by praising the British preference, turning the free trade cream separator and fraying binder twine. That having been done, what is their subsequent record? After early attempts at tariff reduction, hon. gentlemen sat back, enjoying luxurious office, drawing their salaries with promptitude and basking in the smiles of those gentlemen whom I would never describe as bucaneers, basking in the smiles of these bucaneers and companies that my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) denounced this afternoon in a voice which reared itself to the sky.

A little further on, Mr. Speaker, I find this sentence in the same speech:

> I do not think I need to say any more to explain to my hon. friends where they are so far as Western Canada is concerned. Western Canada did not quite believe in their sincerity because Western Canada knew their record.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to say. I believed, and I still believe, in the consistency, the earnestness, and the sincerity of my good friend the member for Red Deer. I cannot think that he is altogether satisfied with the way things are drifting in public life in this country, and while I am prepared to believe that the hon. gentleman has played an important part in bringing the Agrarian party into the position which it occupies to-day, I do not think that his counsels are given very serious consideration by the men who are directing the destinies of that party.

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in rising at this late period of the debate it will be very hard indeed for me to avoid making reference to subjects which have already been dealt with. I shall not attempt to present any more bouquets to the mover and seconder of the Address but will simply say that I agree with all the good things that have been uttered with respect to them. I extend, however, my hearty congratulations to the Prime Minister, for more reasons than one, on the very rapid rise which he has made in the public life of Canada. The right hon. gentleman told me himself, not so very long ago, that he was born on a small farm in the province of Ontario.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is the place.

Mr. REID: True, that is the place where the boys that climb the ladder of fame are born. The right hon. gentleman said of this little farm where he was born, that the trees were so thick between the house and the concession road in the days of his youth that he could not see the teams as they passed up and down. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that on that farm the right hon. gentleman who to-day leads the Government learned the lessons of stick-to-itiveness that have helped him to climb to his present high position.

The old province of Ontario has good reason, Mr. Speaker, to be proud to-day not only because our worthy Prime Minister was born within its precincts, not only because of the great success that he has achieved in public life and the character which he has maintained, which has been referred to by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, but it also has reason to be proud of the fact that another Prime Minister was born on one of its farms. I refer to the hon. Mr. Drury, the Premier of the province. Mr. Speaker, there is yet another farmer's boy. I refer to the hon. T. A. Crerar, leader of our party, who was born on a farm in the province of Ontario, and who can tell but that in a very near future he may be the leader of this House. The present Prime Minister has climed to his high position in a little less, I understand, than thirteen years. Someone found him in a little town in the province of Manitoba, because then Portage la Prairie was not a very large community. At that time the right hon. gentleman was a budding young lawyer in Western Canada; and I want to say to young members of the House that he has set the pace; he has set an example, for young men throughout the Dominion, and what he has done they also may do. But Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that if they would follow in his footsteps and climb the ladder of fame as speedily as he has done they will not sleep on a bed of roses, neither will they spend much time in slumber, but rather they will have to burn the midnight oil. I wish him long life, happiness and prosperity. But, Sir, I hope that he will forsake the big interests and come back to the common, plain people whence he sprung and apply the same energies which he now brings to bear in discharging the duties of his high office.

I notice that when the right hon. the Prime Minister was choosing a new name for his old party he took the word "National" from the platform of the National Progressive party, and I have often wondered why he did not also include the word "Progressive." Then he would have the National Progressives, the Liberals and the Tories all in one fold. How nice that would be! But on second thoughts—which are very often the best—I believe my worthy friend decided to say to his nearest followers: "No, gentlemen, it will not do; water and oil will not mix; leave them out."

I am going to endeavour to show to the House that this Government is allied with the big interests, because the first act of the right hon. the Prime Minister was to nail his protectionist flag to the masthead of his party ship, and that, to my mind, was a friendly signal to the big interests. His banner of protection is also their banner, and he says to them in effect: "Come with us. This is the ship of protection that will protect you and your industries. Come with us. We need you, and you need us. We need your millions of money for our campaign fund to fight the Liberals and the Progressives." And he also says to Labour: "Come with us in this ship. It is big enough for us all, and we will take you in and protect you." But he forgets to tell labour when he is flirting with them that for the protection which he offers he will exact an equivalent by making them pay more for their boots and shoes and for their clothing, and for all the comforts of life which they now enjoy. I do not know —he may get the labour vote, but I hope not. I hope that labour will keep their eyes open and see the folly of going in my good friend's protectionist ship.

I am going to continue along that line of thought, Mr. Speaker, and try to show to this House that the big interests are behind this Government and allied with it. I shall endeavour to demonstrate that the intermediary of the big interests, Mr. Murray, of the city of Toronto, is conducting a well-organized boycott in an attempt to muzzle the press of this country, and so keep from the people all the facts both pro and con which should be honestly presented to them that they may give an intelligent vote on the public questions of the day. But will the people be able to pass an intelligent verdict if the press is to be dictated to by Mr. Murray? I think not. This attempt by Mr. Murray to control our press is being made on behalf of the manufacturers, who, as I have said before, are allied with this Government; but the attempt, in my opinion, will prove a boomerang to those who are conducting and supporting it.

The people of Canada will not stand for such dictation. They know that this boycott which Mr. Murray is carrying on with a well-organized and expensive staff, is simply along these lines; in effect, he says to the manufacturers by circular letters: "Send in to me your estimates of what you are going to spend for advertising, and I will name the newspapers which shall get your advertising." Then he says to the press: "Unless you will submit to me the control of your editorial pages, you cannot have any of these advertisements." That, in substance, is the system employed, and I defy contradiction of my statement.

I will pass over the subject of protection mentioned in the speech from the Throne and deal with vital matters—matters in my opinion equally as important as protection—which are not mentioned therein. We have had before us for a number of years a project especially dear to Western Canada—the Hudson's Bay railway.

Not one word is in the Address about this project—a project on which we have spent about $20,000,000. There all this material lies to-day, going to waste, and the Government, heedless of the pleadings of the people from the West, do not say one word in regard to what is to be done with the Hudson Bay railway. I shall not tarry on this question; the people of the West will speak for themselves in regard to it when they get the opportunity.

Another matter of very great importance, Mr. Speaker, is our Canadian National Railway system. In this case also not one word appears in the Address as to what is to be done in the direction of an attempt to reduce our railway deficit or even to see that it does not climb higher year after year. And while our railway deficit is piling up, it is a well known fact that, in Western Canada at any rate, the traffic which rightly belongs to the Canadian National Railway system is being hauled away from that railway and being handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why? Well, I will try to explain as briefly as possible.

Last fall in Western Canada we had only about a thirty per cent crop, but in spite of that, our threshing machines, especially in the northern districts of the three Prairie Provinces, had not been in operation more than two weeks until every country elevator was full of grain—and not a box-car in sight to haul the grain out. Now, this is what happened—and what I say here is simply the sentiment of the people in my constituency and in the other three Prairie Provinces, the northern part of which is served by the Canadian National system. The reason was simply the lack of sufficient box-cars to carry the grain out to the market.

Last fall the grain market was dropping very rapidly and the farmers were naturally anxious to get their grain out to market. But they could not get the cars and, therefore, could not sell their product at that time, so that they could not pay their indebtedness and, consequently, the business man could not pay his. When the farmers did get the box-cars to take the grain out, the price had dropped to such an extent that it was impossible for them to pay their debts and come through, and on that account the farmers in Western Canada to-day are in a state of semi-bankruptcy. How long, Mr. Speaker, is this state of things to continue?

I asked the Minister of Railways last year and the previous year about box-cars, and he said that he had ordered two thousand of them. I thought that was a fairly good order, but when I began to think it over quietly I realized that these two thousand box-cars would have to be strung out over 22,000 miles of railway—a pretty thin sprinkling. I called at the office of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in Winnipeg and had a chat with one of the Canadian Pacific officials. I said to him: "Will you tell me how many box-cars you have ordered for the Canadian Pacific Railway in the last two years?" To my astonishment he told me they had ordered six thousand new box-cars—not replacements—to be used on 14,000 miles of railway; and my good friend the Minister of Railways orders two thousand box-cars to be spread out over 22,000 miles of railway.

Mr. J. D. REID: As a member of this House my hon. friend should know, from the explanations I have given each year, that the Government ordered 18,000 box-cars during the last three or four years, while the Canadian Pacific has not ordered any more than my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): I am very much pleased to hear that. But where, oh where, Sir, are the 18,000 box-cars? They are not in the West.

Mr. J. D. REID: Well, they are on the road.

Mr. J. F. REID: Evidently the road is a very long one; they are taking a long time to get there. But if my hon. friend says that that many have been ordered, I take his word for it, and I hope he will speed them up and get them out there. I am told by railway experts that it is the freight train that pays, not the passenger train, so that if we are to reduce our deficit we must increase our freight traffic. That is the opinion of a prominent railway official; it is not merely my own personal view.

The grain blockade of which I speak has had a very serious effect upon the country. It affects not only the farmers, but also the business men, the wholesale men, the retail men, the banks, and the manufacturers. The manufacturer cannot sell his products unless the wholesale man can pay his debts; the wholesale man must go to the retail man, and the retail man to the consumer—who out West is very largely the farmer. If, then, the farmer cannot get his products to the market, he cannot pay his debts; the wheels of business are simply at a standstill; all business is stagnant. I am glad to be informed by the Minister of Railways that he has ordered 18,000 box-cars. I shall be pleased if he will inform me just how soon they are going to reach the West.

I wish now to make a few corrections of statements made last night by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. G. B. Nicholson). The hon. gentleman made a rather bitter and unwarranted attack upon the United Grain Growers, Limited. He was very much mixed up. Some one had informed him that a certain gentleman by the name of Mr. Wood was the vice-president of the company. I do not need to dwell on that; the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) put him right in that regard. But this is what the hon. gentleman says:

> Mr. Speaker, I am ready to admit, that it would be exceedingly difficult for any man to say just who is associated with the United Grain Growers' Company and who is not.

Well, it will not be difficult at all if the hon. gentleman will seek the information in the proper place. I would invite him to go west with me to the headquarters of the company in Winnipeg. I believe, Sir, I can show the hon. gentleman the name of every shareholder of the company, as well as a statement of the moneys which they have put into it. I want to tell my hon. friend that there is not one dollar of watered stock credited to our shareholders—and perhaps from that my hon. friend might learn a lesson. He will, however, have to be very patient, because we have over 36,000 shareholders, and if he also wishes to know the names of the customers who deal with the company, it will take him a very long time to look over all the records of the company. But we have nothing to hide, and my invitation to my hon. friend to accompany me to the West stands good.

The hon. gentleman spoke about the different names which this Progressive party is called; in fact, he tried to make out that we call ourselves the Agrarian party and the Progressive party; we do not; we call ourselves the National Progressive party, and I think that name is very applicable. My hon. friend goes on to say:

> I said a moment ago that you could not suggest a more violent misuse of terms than those titles. What has been their attitude towards the farmers of this country?

I should like to inquire just what the hon. gentleman means by this strong language. As I said before, we do not apply those titles to ourselves, and if hon. members or any other persons apply those terms to us, we cannot help that; we prosper under it; it is cheap advertising to us, and our people rally all the more to the cause.

My hon. friend was entirely misinformed as to the class of goods which the company handles. These are the words he uses in connection with that:

> Feed, clothing, machinery, fuel, and everything else.

That is a very wide order, is it not? We handle many commodities, but we do not handle such a wide range as the hon. member for Algoma East would have people believe. He says:

> The United Grain Growers' Limited—

And he is getting nearer the name all the time. That is the proper name.

> —carry on a sort of letter order business.

I will take it for granted that by "letter order business" he means, perhaps, a mail order business. Then he says:

> They write a letter to some milling company and ask them to forward a car of flour to some farmer or group of farmers with draft attached to bill of lading. In this way they handled, without the cost to them of a single cent, something over a million dollars' worth of flour, and they collected from the farmer between eighty cents and one dollar a barrel as their rake-off for doing it.

I ask hon. members who are business men, who know something about business: Is it possible to have an office with a staff of clerks and stenographers to receive orders from 36,000 shareholders, with a very large number of patrons who are not shareholders, to collect those orders, to attend to the mails, to send the orders on to a large milling company—we deal with more than one milling company—and to conduct all this business without one cent of cost to the company? I am surprised that my hon. friend should make such a statement as that. The other year I had the pleasure of working on a committee of this House with him, and I had a very high estimation of my hon. friend, but, I am afraid I must revise that estimate.

As regards the commission charged on the flour, out West we do not handle flour by the barrel, nor do we speak of it by the barrel. It is handled in bags of 9 p.m. 100 pounds and we speak of it as such. My hon. friend, before making this attack, would have been well advised, knowing me so well, to have come to myself, and I could have supplied him with this information. I have in my room upstairs several annual reports of the company, showing everything in detail, and my hon. friend is welcome to have those reports at any time. I should like him to be properly informed.

Mr. GAUVREAU: He does not want to know.

[Mr. J. F. Reid.]

Mr. J. F. REID: It would seem to me that he is imbued with the faculty of believing without a reason and the faculty of hating without a cause. If he would divest himself of all those passions which cloud his intellect and warp his understanding, he would see things from a higher plane; his perspective would be clearer, and his troubled soul would rest and live in peace.

My hon. friend goes on to befriend Mr. Murray who is conducting this boycott of the press. Again I must say I am sorry my good friend will even for one moment try to defend such an action as the muzzling of the press, which is the medium through which the people in the distant parts of Canada must be informed as to what is being carried on here. That my good friend will support such an action, I am astonished.

Towards the last, my hon. friend changes his mind, and I am very glad for that. He says:

> I said in this House last year, and I repeat to-night, that no honest man has any right in the world to criticize in the least degree the business that the Western Grain Growers are doing. So far as I am able to discern, they are carrying on an honest business; they are the largest commercial organization that ever came into existence in this country; but when they are doing that, what right have they to come down into eastern Canada or to go any other place in their efforts to set class against class in this country or to tell me that I am not carrying on an honest business; that I am extracting undue profits from the people; that I am oppressing the workingman; that the farmers are not getting their rights? I say that the whole thing is a campaign of blatant hypocrisy.

That is very strong language. My hon. friend is very parochial; he thinks the people of Canada must remain within; and not travel beyond the bounds of their respective provinces. Out West we are not as narrow-minded as that; we welcome our friends from theh eastern provinces to come West and hold meetings and talk with us in order to explain to us their point of view on the public questions of to-day. Surely my hon. friend would not deny us a similar privilege to come down East. I do not think he would insist in his objection. I trust therefore, he will not forget my invitation.

I have rather an unpleasant duty to perform. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) appeared before an audience in the city of Toronto. I have here a clipping from the Manitoba Free Press. It is headed:

> Says Farmer Party menace to Canada.
> Guthrie charges it was started in the West by American settlers. Only party the Federal Government need fear, he declares.

The clipping, which is dated Toronto, February 6, reads:

Declaring that free trade would ruin Canada, and intimating that it was not the Liberal party the Federal Government need fear at the next Dominion election, but the Farmer party, Hon. Hugh Guthrie, Minister of Militia and Defence, in the Meighen Government at Ottawa, addressed the South York Conservatives at their annual meeting here Saturday.

On the tariff question Mr. Guthrie said that under no circumstances could Canada afford to have free trade with the U. S. Canada as a nation, and Canadians as a people, would become bankrupt under free trade, he declared, and the next general election would be fought out on the question of protective tariff.

Menace to Canada is Charge.

Mr. Guthrie asserted that the farmer party in the west was started by American settlers, and the organizers of the western farmers were American sympathizers. He produced a catalogue published by the Western Grain Growers to substantiate this charge. In this catalogue, he said, were numerous lines of farm implements listed as "U. G. G. (United Grain Growers) goods" but which were really American-made.

The ploughs listed in the catalogue, Mr. Guthrie said, were made in Wisconsin; harrows, cultivators, mowers, etc., in Illinois; portable engines and washing machines in Pontiac, Ills.; cream separators in Buffalo, N.Y.; and wagons in Iowa. "In the lines of goods which I have mentioned, which are called "U. G. G. goods," Mr. Guthrie said, "there is not a Canadian article catalogued."

Mr. Guthrie declared that the farmer party in western Canada was not only a menace to the present Government at Ottawa, but also to the future of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to read an interview given by Mr. Rice-Jones, General Manager of the United Grain Growers, to the Winnipeg Tribune of February 7th, 1921:

The Hon. Hugh Guthrie's statement as reported in a dispatch is incorrect. He states there is not a Canadian article in the machinery litsed in our catalogue as United Grain Growers. Even the list of machinery which he specifically mentions as being manufactured in the United States is incorrect. Mowers and rakes and wagons, for instance, are all purchased in Canada. In fact, we have not purchased a wagon in the United States for three years.

We were forced to buy in the United States in the first place because Canadian manufacturers refused to sell us, and there are still some Canadian manufacturers who absolutely refuse to deal with us.

Of 101 pages in our catalogue only slightly over one-third cover American-made goods. We have always aimed to purchase everything we could purchase in Canada, taking into consideration price and quality. The unfortunate feature from a Canadian standpoint is that even after adding the tariff, some of the American goods we purchase are cheaper than the Canadian and more serviceable.

Mr. Guthrie's statement that the western farmer organizations are controlled by Americans and imbued with American sympathies and ideals is hardly worth referring to, but I may say that of the twelve directors of the United Grain Growers, Ltd., whose purchases of machinery Mr. Guthrie refers to, ten are British or Canadian born, and two American.

I had hoped that the day of the cheap appeal to racial prejudice by party politicians of the old type was past, but apparently it is not; so I might add that we have here in the West some American born citizens, than whom we have no better Canadians in Canada to-day.

To make the matter clearer still, I will now give the names and the places of birth of the twelve directors who guide the affairs of the United Grain Growers' Limited: Hon. T. A. Crerar, President, born in the Province of Ontario; Cecil Rice-Jones, born in England (Wales); John Kennedy, known to many men in Ontario, and born in that province; Roderick McKenzie, born in the province of Ontario; F. Collyer, born in England; John Morrison, born in Ontario; R. A. Parker, born in Winnipeg, Manitoba; J. J. McLellan born in Nova Scotia; Mr. Wingate, born in the United States; Mr. Austin, born in the United States; and myself, born in the Orkney Islands, Scotland.

Now if the Minister of Militia, who wears the gold lace and the ribbon and the sparkling sword, thinks for one minute that these two Yankees, and I say that with all respect can twist the other ten men around their fingers he has another guess coming.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Especially the Scotchman.

Mr. J. F. REID: My good friend the Minister of Militia makes three distinct charges: first, that the Farmers' party in the West was started by American settlers, and that the organizers of the western Farmers are American sympathizers; second, that all the goods branded "U.G.G." in the catalogue are made in the United States and that not a Canadian-made article is catalogued. That is absolutely incorrect. Thirdly, he charges that the Farmers' party in Western Canada is a menance to the present Government.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That is true.

Mr. J. F. REID: Yes, I have not much to say against that, because my hon. friend the Minister of the Militia says that we are the party which the Government must fear. We will let that charge pass, but he goes on to say that the Farmers party in Wectern Canada is a menace to the future of Canada, and that all this is brought about by American settlers who are American sympathizers. If that is the case, it is time for us to stop encouraging immigration from the United States, and we should bring home our immigration officers over there. You cannot ride both horses. They are either good or bad, and I want to tell this House, as Mr. Rice-Jones said in his interview in the press, that we have American settlers in Western Canada who are just as good citizens as myself or the Minister of Militia. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, it is time that this cheap talk was stopped.

Mr. MAHARG: Just clap-trap.

Mr. J. F. REID: And cheap clap-trap at that. What is behind it all? It is an endeavour to drive a wedge of distrust between the East and the West. The aim is to set the East and the West against each other and, if possible, to breed suspicion in the minds of our eastern people against the western Progressives. I want to tell the House that this Progressive movement is not confined to Western Canada; it is spreading all over the Dominion, and neither the Minister of Militia nor this Government, nor all this House, can stop that movement. It is a popular movement. It is the movement of the great common people, and it is going to succeed.

Mr. Speaker, I deplore that a Minister of the Crown, one of Canada's foremost statesmen, an adviser to the King's representative in Canada, the Governor General, and therefore an adviser to His Majesty King George, should stoop to such low political tactics for the purpose of causing distrust between the East and the West. It is beneath the dignity of the hon. gentleman's position. It is beneath the dignity of any member of this House.

Mr. HOWARD H. HALLADAY (Bow River): I want to add my congratulations to what has been said regarding the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), and the mover and seconder of the Address. We have before us an amendment which will in a short time precipitate a division in the House. At that time every hon. member who votes on the amendment must have some good and sufficient reason for the way in which he votes. I propose to vote against that amendment, and my first reason is that I have no confidence in the party from which it emanates.

Mr. GAUVREAU: That will not worry us much.

Mr. HALLADAY: Two reasons have been given why we should support the amendment; one is that the Government has no mandate, and the other, that there is a demand in this country for an election.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

[Mr. J. F. Reid.]

Mr. HALLADAY: I endorse the hon. gentleman's "hear, hear." There is a demand for an election, Mr. Speaker, but it comes from your left and from the people who supported the Opposition in the last election. I believe that the men who are crying for an election in this country to-day, if they had had the nerve, would have made the same cry on the 18th day of December, 1917. Why? I had a resolution sent to me two months after the first session of this Parliament by an organization which strenuously opposed me in that election and which asked for my resignation, the reason given being that I had supported a certain Bill in this House, which Bill, Mr. Speaker, did not at that session and has not at any subsequent session, appeared on the Order Paper.

It is simply a cry of the ins and the outs; and so far as the question of mandate is concerned, I can only speak for my own constituency. During my campaign in the fall of 1917 I took particular pains to say on every platform on which I appeared that I would support this Government on every war measure. I have done so. I also told them that after the war was over I reserved the right to use my own judgment, and that judgment in this instance is to vote against the amendment.

The same party from which this amendment comes is the party that was in power in 1910 and 1911, when they brought about a snap verdict from the people as a result of which western Canada was robbed of thirteen representatives in this House, and we went along for six years short of representation to that extent. They come to us again to-day clamouring for an election. If they had their way we would be robbed of from thirteen to twenty seats on this occasion. But I want to warn the leader of the semi-official Opposition that the people of western Canada will not gracefully heed this cry. I want to warn him that there are a number of people in Canada who are quite convinced that this Parliament can give us as honest a redistribution as any other Parliament that may follow. This redistribution will not be made by the Cabinet themselves; it will have to come before this House, at which time every hon. member will have something to say.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Government have been very well advised by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) when he suggests a commission to look into the wheat business of western Canada. We had in the corridors of this House last year for two long months a representative from the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. He flirted with the members of the Opposition, he flirted with the members sitting behind the Government on this side, and he flirted particularly with the members of the semi-official Opposition. He told us that the United States would practically consume their total crop of last year; he told us that Australia was short from seven to eleven million acres in wheat; he told us that Central Europe would not produce any wheat, and as a consequence if we would allow the wheat to revert back to the old system of handling we would receive not less than $3 and possibly $5 per bushel. We know what happened; and I think that the Government would be wise, in appointing a commission. But for goodness sake do not appoint a committee from the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

I believe that one of the finest reports that have been placed on the table of this House was that tabled this week, wherein we are told that the farmers of Canada received a great deal more per bushel for wheat than did the farmers of the United States; and at the same time that the working-men of this country bought flour at a smaller price than the working-men of the United States. That was done through Government handling. I would therefore heartily second the proposal of my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Henders) that the Government appoint a committee to investigate the whole wheat condition of Western Canada and see if it is not possible to go back to Government control in the handling of wheat.

We have another industry in Western Canada which is going down hill, and I am afraid that unless something definite is done by this Government in the near future that industry will cease to exist. I refer to the cattle business. We have in Saskatchewan something like 4,000,000 acres, in the province of Alberta about 4,000,000. and in British Columbia, I believe, some 400,000 acres of land leased to cattle raisers. This land is not farm land; it has been surveyed and re-surveyed and the farming land taken out. It is keeping above water to-day on industry which is our second in importance in Western Canada. Our meat has found its way to the best tables of the world; and is in demand in the best of the world's markets. This is probably due to our climatic conditions, but it is no doubt attributable mostly to the food the cattle get. Our prairie grass grows up until the middle of July as a rule and then starts to ripen and as it stands on the stubble ripened it is really hay. In each blade is found meat similar to that of the oat, and on this the cattle feed and fatten. Now, all that our ranchers ask is that they be given something definite as to what is to be done with these leases. They are to expire in two, three, four and five years, and if the ranchers do not know within a short time what is to be done, they will start to spay their heifers. That will deplete the cattle business.

It has been suggested that these grazing lands be turned over to community grazing. That sounds feasible; but in southern Alberta and Saskatchewan when the grass is eaten off to the first of July it does not grow again, and as in community grazing our cattle do not leave the land, therefore have no crop except in the Spring of the year and no hay at all. Your hay can only be cut once every two years.

What these gentlemen ask is that they should be informed as to what is going to be done and that the information should be definite. It is said that these natural resources may be handed over to the provinces. This may or may not be contemplated. If it is I believe the provinces would prefer to have an industry handed over with those resources, than that they should receive them without that industry.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House for any great length of time to-night but while the thought is still fresh in my mind I will comment for a moment or two on the speech of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Scott). He quoted from an address made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I could not exactly gather the reason for making the quotation because I am sure all of us will agree that the expressions used by the member for Red Deer constitute the best compliment that could be paid to him; they show his absolute consistency from the date of the delivery of the speech in question up to the present time.

The statement that the Premier of Ontario had not given any preferential legislation to agriculture is a compliment to Hon. Mr. Drury also. Does it not demonstrate beyond all question that the members of our party, put our professions into practice when such evidence as this of adherence to principle comes from those diametrically opposed to us? My hon. friend from South Waterloo expressed the opinion that there was no demand in the country that the Government should dissolve Far-liament and hold an election. It is a well known adage Sir, that a man will frequently know more about the immediate business of his neighbour than he does about his own. I wonder whether the hon. member for South Waterloo has received information from a point very close to his own constituency? To my mind circumstances point to the fact that he has. I understand the hon. gentleman was elected by a majority of some two thousand, not counting the soldiers' vote. I am also advised that in the provincial elections in Ontario a Liberal and Labour member was returned for that constituency by a majority of some four thousand. Does my hon. friend interpret that turnover as an expression of feeling favourable to the retention in office of the present administration? If he does my hon. friend must have an imagination of an unusual kind. I cannot understand why he should express such sentiments as uttered here to-night in view of the feeling with respect to the Government which seems to prevail in his own riding.

I have heard it said many times that when the first dozen speeches upon any subject have been made in this Chamber everything has been said that it is possible to say. That, doubtless, is frequently true but we must admit that there are exceptions. The fine address that was given by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) yesterday, for example, was evidence to the contrary. It was a compliment to the hon. gentleman himself, it was a compliment to our party, it was a compliment to the House, that while the hon. gentleman occupied the floor there was a larger attendance of members than has been customary during the present session and the public galleries were crowded. Throughout his speech the hon. gentleman held the interest of his entire audience until he resumed his seat. That I regard as a well merited compliment. I interpret it to mean that the people, even our legislators, are very anxious to hear the pronouncements of our policy as they are delivered from time to time, and as they were very specifically delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Marquette.

I wish to associate myself with those who have extended their congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) upon his elevation to his present high office. I cannot but admire the man who through sheer business ability and devotion to work and to a conception of what he believes to be right has exacted recognition from his party to the extent that they have proclaimed him to be their leader and have advanced him to his present exalted state. His promotion is undoubtedly a compliment to the right hon. gentleman and I recognize that he is to-day a mighty man, but I believe that he will be a still mightier man when he sits in the cold shades of Opposition and feels the pulse of the people —the people who are asking for things from him although their appeals seem to fall upon deaf ears. In saying that I am not uttering anything derogatory to the Prime Minister. I am only expressing my honest desire that he may become a mightier man in the future than he is at the present time.

I also wish to compliment those members of the Government who have been raised to Cabinet rank since last session. I do not suppose there is any member in the House but is pleased when some of our fellows are advanced to higher rank. If newspaper reports are to be believed one of these gentlemen, the hon. Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore) speaking in the city of St. John during the contest which followed his entrance to the Cabinet, said that the city of St. John came first in his estimation, the province of New Brunswick next, and Canada third. I do not agree with such a sentiment as that, and when we bear in mind the laudatory flag-waving speeches which are indulged in by hon. gentlemen opposite one would imagine that they ought to have a stronger sense of national pride and a broader outlook on public affairs. That is my idea at any rate.. We all profess to be speaking for Canada, and when a man's interests become narrowed down as they seem to have become with my hon. friend, that is not big Canadianism. If we are ever going to become Canadians in the best and broadest sense of the term we have to get rid of sectionalism and not strive to advance merely local interests. The welfare of the country as a whole should be kept in mind and advanced, even if it sometimes involves the sacrifice of local and petty interests.

When the name of the mover of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne was announced we all realized that the House would be favoured with a great literary treat, and the anticipation was realized. I must also say that the seconder performed his duty well. He really merited the compliments which were paid to him, and yet perhaps he may pardon me for addressing to him a word of caution. I advise the hon. gentleman not to pay too much attention to the compliments he has received. It does not necessarily follow that because he was given the honour of seconding the Address, a portfolio is lying around loose awaiting his acceptance.

Then I wish to refer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey), who spoke of extending the hand of good fellowship across the Rocky Mountains and grasping the hands of the Prairie farmers at the same time asserting that the farmers of the province by the western sea would not have anything to do with the policies of the people of the western plains, as enunicated in the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, but that they wished to retain their thirty cents a box or ninety cents a barrel duty on their apples. Is that big Canadianism? I would say that while the British Columbia farmer has the one hand engaged he might extend the other across to the Atlantic seaboard to grasp the hand of the hon. Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore). If his interpretation of things political is what we are to understand as being things national, I am here to-night to say that the conception of the people who advocate and stand upon the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture is bigger and broader and greater than the sentiments expressed by this hon. gentleman.

In the speech from the Throne, likewise in the many addresses that were delivered throughout the length and breadth of our land by the right hon. the Prime Minister, the gauntlet was thrown down in regard to the tariff policy as proposed to be carried out by his party. In that respect, Sir, we know exactly where they are. Likewise by the admission of hon. gentlemen on the Government side who have spoken repeatedly and have directed their remarks to our Progressive group here, they confess that they know also where we stand. Therefore, the issue is clearly defined as between the Government and our party. We accept battle upon that issue as laid down by our Prime Minister in his addresses and also in the speech from the Throne. We will and do accept battle upon these terms, let it come sooner or later, and I honestly believe that the sentiment of the people who are governed by our laws will respond to the appeal, the newer and stronger appeal, that is being made at this time on the great national issue on the tariff.

We believe, Sir, that our cause is just, and we believe that to-day the people are studying economic questions more and more. The question of economics has been very pertinent to our people during the war period. The people are becoming enlightened, and they really believe that more enlightenment should be given to them by those who, they believe, are the beneficiaries of the system. Until evidence has been produced and the people are satisfied that they have not been mulcted in the deal, they will not be content, and upon every occasion they will vote to have the tariff further reduced.

The Commission that was appointed by the Government travelled throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion taking evidence regarding the tariff. I did not have an opportunity of appearing before that Commission, but I watched very closely the newspaper reports of the evidence that was adduced, and I came to the conclusion long ago that if the desire was to procure real evidence and pass final judgment on that evidence, instead of being a Government Commission, it should have been a Commission appointed from Parliament. We have three groups in this House, and it was easy and would have struck a reassuring note in the minds of the people had a parliamentary committee been appointed to take that evidence rather than a committee composed entirely of Government members.

Why, Sir, it seems to me that the case is prejudiced before it starts by the Government, which, while the Tariff Commission is taking evidence, nails its protection flag to the masthead. The people of Canada cannot have faith that the findings of that Commission are going to be wholly in their favour. I do not quote this as a positive fact, but I was told that even while the Commission was taking evidence the sittings were suspended to enable one of the commissioners to proceed to East Elgin, and there proclaim the beauties of protection. To me, Mr. Speaker, such action does prejudice the case, and I am not prepared to admit that new evidence was necessary along the lines that the Commission sought. It does appear to me that the evidence should have been started lower down than that. I believe that our Canadian interests that claim a continuance of protection should show just how much it is costing the people for that protection. It seems to me that if there are a million dollars of watered stock in our companies we should not be mulcted in tariff duties to pay dividends on it. It would be easy for the Commission to ascertain how matters stand and to find out which of our companies, if any, are worthy of protection. Until that evidence is produced I do not think the people need expect or can believe that such evidence as was taken by the Commission last fall will be satisfactory, nor will it end in remedying the evils which we believe to exist now.

In the amendment tendered by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and in all the addresses that have been made thereon, the constitutional aspect of the case has been presented by the various speakers. It is not my wish or intention to delay the House to-night with any feeble endeavour to enter into the constitutional question, but I have in my own mind some reasons which I will adduce in a few minutes as to why this Government should appeal to the electorate. There is, Sir, not much to be said in my estimation about the want of confidence sentiment. There is the human element, and it seems to me that that element has entered into the appeal which has emanated from the official Liberal party. There is a question as to whether if they were in power, for instance, they would do any better. Human nature is very much the same wherever you find it, and I do not think our people are much concerned as to whether the Government as constituted to-day is less capable perhaps than would be the hon. members who sit on this side of the House if they were in power. I can quite belive, Sir, that precedents could be cited to prove that likewise those who call themselves Liberals have sometimes in the past been in a similar position and acted very much the same as the hon. members who occupy the treasury benches to-day. So I say that any vote of want of confidence in the Government does not enter very largely into the decision which I have arrived at as to why the Government should go to the country.

There is, however, particularly in our western country, Sir, a feeling that faith has been broken with the people. I know for a fact, speaking as an individual who has taken more or less interest in political affairs for a number of years in our western country and who attended the Liberal conventions and took a more or less active part in the nominations, that when the appeals were being made all over the country to 'back Unionists, I, as an Englishman born in the Mother Country, feeling that English blood animating my veins, and knowing that my Mother Country was in danger, threw up my political party allegiance and gave all the support I was capable of to the cause of Unionism to win the war, as we all thought. But I believed, along with millions of other electors, that after the war was won there would be an immediate appeal to the country upon the war record of the Government. We feel, Sir, that that sentiment is abroad in the land, and that the people are waiting for the opportunity, whether it comes sooner or later, to charge this Government with what they believe at least to be broken faith. The people really believe that faith was broken with them.

If I may use a Scriptural phrase, I would say that false prophets have arisen who prophesy that there will be a fusion of this party and the Liberal party, and the assertion has been made that the probability is not denied. Standing here in my place to-night, Sir, I will make at least a feeble effort to explain to the House why such fusion has not been and is not being considered, and why I do not anticipate that it will be considered. Incidentally I hope that hon. gentlemen will appreciate the effort I am putting forth to offer a little enlightenment upon this question, and that they will in the future treat the question as if they had received an answer.

In 1916 the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture was drafted, not with the object of forming a new political party, but for presentation to the Government of the day as a platform the working out of which would be in the best interests of the people of Canada as a whole. That is why my platform was framed. In August, 1919, when our Liberal friends met in Ottawa and commenced to build the Liberal platform, our Canadian Council of Agriculture forwarded to the men in Ottawa at that time a memorandum along the lines of the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. It is quite evident when you compare the two platforms, that the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture was the guiding principle that actuated the minds of those men who met in convention in August, 1919, with the object of building a platform for the Liberal party. I do not need to reiterate the statement that it has been frequently alleged in the House, and that speakers of the Liberal party have proclaimed throughout many parts of this country that the two platforms are identical. I know the statement has been made, though I am not going to say it has been made with any real authority from the Liberal party. So far as our group is concerned, and so far as the Canadian Council of Agriculture is concerned, it has never been recognized as having been made with authority. However, it is my purpose to cite a few special instances to-night in order to show that a difference does exist between the two platforms.

The memorandum, then, forwarded by the Canadian Council of Agriculture to those who gathered in the City of Ottawa at that time pointed out why this platform upon which we stood should be a national platform and should be adopted by them, as it had been refused by the party then in power. I might say here that the "Farmers' platform" about which some people talk so glibly is a misnomer; it is the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, a platform that has been recognized by great statesmen of this country as the best ever offered the people. That, of course, is a tribute to those who framed the platform—and the platform itself is the result of thousands of meetings that had been held all over the country, during the course of which the facts and conditions had been boiled down in an effort to find the kernels, the real essence of things as essential to the welfare and prosperity of the people of Canada.

We find, then, that the platform which I advocate and stand upon asked for free wheat, wheat flour, agricultural implements, fertilizers, cement, illuminating, fuel and lubricating oils. In that respect the Liberals followed absolutely and entirely the suggestion of our memorandum and our platform. They added, fishermen's equipment, such as nets, etc. So far the platforms are quite identical. The sentiment seemed to pervade that convention that they had satisfied the full demands of agriculture and that from that time on they could proceed to satisfy all the other interests of the Dominion of Canada. Let us see, for a moment, how they proceeded to do it. The platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture asked for free soft coal for the industries of Canada, for the home of the artisan and the hearth of the workingman and the home of the man upon the prairie. The Liberals did not ask for that. I have myself, Sir, not once but winter after winter, driven thirty-seven miles in one direction to get a load of wood and to bring it back—two long days in the cold, biting frost, trying to get wood with which to keep my house warm. We in the West know the value of coal, and know how to appreciate wood when we have it. But I maintain that the Liberal party could not have done a better service, politically or economically, than to have included in their platform free soft coal, in the interests, as I say, of the industries of Canada, of the artisan, of the workingman, of the man on the prairie who is miles and miles from anything in the shape of fuel.

We asked for free lumber so that the workingman could build his home, and for the benefit of the artisan, again, and the man on the prairie. The Liberals in their platform, asked only for free rough and partly dressed lumber. There is a discrepancy there.

Mr. HENDERS: It is already free.

Mr. GOULD: I am dealing with the principles of the platform laid down in the Liberal Convention in August, 1919. Our platform called for free food; the Liberal platform asked that the principal articles of food be made duty free. We asked for an immediate all-round reduction in the tariff; the Liberals asked that the duties on clothing and footwear be cut in two. There is another vast and very vital difference, because these things deal directly with the necessaries of life in the cold western winter climate of the West. That is one of the principles that guided those who built the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture—the desirability of making the necessities of life, the needs of the people in this country, as inexpensive and as free from duty as possible. I am sure that all men will recognize that that was a good, guiding national principle that actuated those people when they framed that platform. As I studied and compared these platforms, it seemed to me that after the needs of agriculture had apparently been satisfied by those who comprised the convention, possibly some of our Liberal friends who live in the peninsula down by the Atlantic ocean, where large coal deposits are to be found, intervened and perhaps persuaded the convention that free coal was not necessary nor needful. I heard an hon. gentleman once make this remark, which illustrates the point very well: "They were quite satisfied to sacrifice their wives' relations, but not any of their own." The people of Western Canada in particular, after studying and comparing these platforms, do not believe the claim that the platforms are the same. I tell the House to-night that there is in the West no sentiment looking towards fusion. To the Government I would say: the statements I am giving you here to-night I want you to accept, because the country has already accepted them. Do not be alarmed any longer concerning that idea. I do not wish to labour the point any further.

At the outset of my remarks I mentioned other things in regard to which the people were going to be concerned whether the Government should go to the country or not. When this House prorogued last July enabling legislation had been passed whereby the Wheat Board would again function. Shortly after I reached my home, I was dumfounded to read in the newspapers that the Government had taken away those powers, and that the Wheat Board had been disbanded. One of the reasons why we in our group voted unanimously for the re-establishment of the Wheat Board was that we recognized that purchasing agencies were going to continue in the markets of the old country and on the continent of Europe and we believed that if organized purchasing agencies existed we should have organized selling agencies to meet that condition. That is, however, not so much the point.

In our organizations in the West we passed thousands and thousands of resolutions, of which I believe hundreds were forwarded to Ottawa. The press was filled with reasons why we wanted the re-establishment of our Wheat Board, and to each and every request the Government turned a deaf ear. Nothing apparently could be done for the plain people and we went forth selling our grain on street or on track and a difference of twenty to twenty-six cents a bushel existed all through the early part of the fall in our country between street and track prices, on account of the difference between the unit under which we are selling now and the one under which we have been accustomed to sell, under the Wheat Board. The country holds this Government responsible for the fact that they did not hearken to the pleadings of the people whose whole and sole support was wheat, who watched the markets, decline, decline, decline, with all the human vultures that could possibly gather, picking upon the product of the Western farmer, while not one finger was raised by the Government in support of the farmer in his pleadings and requests.

Mr. MYERS: Will the hon. member kindly inform the House if the leader of the Progressive party was in favour of the Wheat Board?

Mr. GOULD: If the hon. gentleman will look up the vote of last year, he will find that we all voted in favour of it.

Mr. MYERS: There was no vote.

Mr. COWAN: Is it not true that at the election in which the hon. member was elected, he and every part of his constituency were opposed to the existence of a Wheat Board: that he fought it from beginning to end and that he was elected as an opponent of the Wheat Board?

Mr. GOULD: That is another bugaboo. I do not think the hon. gentleman can find in Assiniboia any sentiment whatever in that direction. I will give to the House this evidence—

Mr. COWAN: That is not the point at all. The point is that my hon. friend was elected straight on that platform and nothing else.

Mr. MAHARG: There was no Wheat Board in existence then.

Mr. COWAN: Yes there was.

Mr. MAHARG: Not on your life.

Mr. GOULD: The hon. gentleman is mixed as to his facts. I might tell the House that not on any of the many platforms on which I stood during my whole election was the Wheat Board mentioned. I say that to-night as an hon. member of this House.

Mr. SHAW: Did my hon. friend not censure the Wheat Board in the first speech which he made in this House?

Mr. GOULD: I will say to the hon. gentleman that he can call that a censure of the Wheat Board, but an hon. gentleman who immediately followed me said that I was very impartial in my remarks regarding the Wheat Board. I think if my hon. friend will look up the address that immediately followed mine, he will find that to be the case. His own side has made that statement.

Referring further to the Wheat Board, we wanted the Wheat Board in the West and to show that we did want it and that I supported the Wheat Board in every place where I had an opportunity to do so, not because I knew any more than hon. gentlemen opposite, but because I believed it would work out all right, I have this evidence to offer and I could give the names of many men in the West who did not have the same faith in the Wheat Board and who applied to me time and time again, offering me their participation certificates at three, five, seven cents and more per bushel. In my office upstairs I could show hon. gentlemen carbon copies of letters that I sent back to men who wrote me asking me what participation certificates were worth. I gave them my belief that they should be worth at least twenty-five cents a bushel.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Did the hon. gentleman in the speech which he made last session not tell the House that he threw his participation certificates in the waste paper basket? I certainly understood so.

Mr. GOULD: I did not. I suppose copies of Hansard of that session are available, and the evidence can be produced.

Mr. COWAN: We will get the evidence. We are not through with the hon. gentleman yet.

Mr. GOULD: I am too good a business man to do such a foolish thing, and I should like the hon. gentleman to have that conception of me also, because while I did see in the West one man who might have applied his participation certificates in that way none that I possessed were used in that manner. In fact I collected my full forty-eight cents a bushel on every one of them. I was very pleased and I was very surprised because I did not ask——

Mr. COWAN: How did the hon. member have those participation certificates if the Wheat Board was not in existence at the last election?

Mr. M. CLARK: He got them at a later date.

Mr. COWAN: Oh, no.

Mr. GOULD: That is beside the point.

Mr. COWAN: The hon. gentleman is all tied up.

Mr. GOULD: I am producing evidence to prove that I was consistent; that I told those people, a good many of whom were Conservatives, in my electoral district, who did not believe the participation certificates would be any good, that they would be worth something—I was unable to say what. As I got more information, I kept every one of my own. That shows the faith which I had in them. I always advised those Conservatives who wanted to get rid of their certificates that they would be worth something if they kept them long enough. The point I want to bring out is this: We wanted the Wheat Board last year, and we appealed to the Government to give us the Wheat Board. Enabling legislation had been passed, but no attention was paid to our cry.

Then in connection with freight rates, particularly as they effect the West, and this is the question that was raised the other day by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), the three men comprising the Railway Commission seemed to have the power to bring an indictment against the country that was more important at that time than our whole tariff inquiry. Inside of a week they imposed upon this country a heavy burden, and it rested more heavily on Western Canada than on any other part, because at that time thousands and thousands of tons of freight, representing our export of wheat were moving along the railways. We said that it was inequitable and unfair to us. The question was raised in our associations and we passed resolutions, and pleaded with the powers that be to suspend the order, but no attention was paid to our appeals. The result was that the West paid approximately a million dollars a day extra in freight rates because of that order. The people of the West were fined that amount, and our Government stood by and let the Railway Commission take this money from us. No excuse can be offered by the Government for allowing the commission to issue that order. It is no use for the Government to say that the commission has vested powers and rights, because I remember when the Board of Commerce proposed to place an embargo on sugar they were quickly advised by the Government that the embargo must not go into effect and sugar was allowed to come down in price.

I repeat, these are particularly western questions, and the West will call this Government to account because of these things. The hon. member for Centre Vancouver stated the absolute truth very distinctly the other day when he said that an injustice was done to the West in that respect, and I say, Sir, that the West, not in any spirit of revenge, but in the belief that justice should prevail in this country, will record its dissatisfaction with the apathy shown by the Government on these two questions so vitally affecting that part of the country.

I believe, Sir, that the Advisory Council of Scientific Research can do a greater work possibly than it is doing at the present time. It is a well-known fact that on our western plains we have been afflicted with rust for a very long time, and it occurred to me that perhaps the Scientific Research Council, if money were voted for the purpose, could bend their energies towards finding a remedy for this rust evil, because all who come from the West know that in areas where rust prevails, inside of a week crop can be cut down from a twenty-bushel to a ten-bushel crop by this disease. That is a national loss, and I would be most willing to support a vote of money to the council for the purpose of investigating this disease and trying to find a remedy for it.

I should like to say a few words with regard to the address which was made in the House the other day by the hon. member for St. Hyancinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier). He said he could not join the Progressive group, because he feared there was communism in our platform. There might be some excuse for the hon. gentleman arriving at that conclusion if he had not studied our platform, but if he had studied it he could not possibly have arrived at that conclusion. He speaks of there being 63 per cent of alien population in the West. Why should he charge the West with that? Did he not support a Government that for fifteen years was largely responsible for the influx of immigration to the West? Why did he wait till this hour to proclaim this fact? I believe, Sir, that the people of Canada are big enough to assimilate the immigrants that have come in there, and I think hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House will bear me out in saying that Western Canada does not feel that there is any evil in having these alien immigrants within her borders. On the contrary, we feel we are making good citizens out of them. Even if it were true that we had 63 per cent of alien population, we of the West did formulate and build the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, which constituted the guiding principle of the great Liberal party at their convention here in August, 1919.

Mr. NORMAN LANG (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, before discussing any of the more important matters, I should like to refer briefly to the amendment that is now before the House. I can well remember that on many occasions when legislation has been brought down in the House, the people of Canada have disapproved. For instance, at the time the Drug Act was being amended, I recall, although it seemed a minor matter compared with a general election, how the telegraph boys were going about here with armfuls of telegrams. The same thing has happened on many occasions, both when the House was in session and during the recess. When the price of sugar was liable to be affected, I believe the Government was bombarded with telegrams from every nook and corner of Canada, although I would think a few cents a pound on sugar a minor affair compared with a general election in this country.

We know that the people of this country express their views in this way, but although we have been discussing this amendment for nearly two weeks, I have failed to see any evidence that the supporters of this amendment have received much encouragement from outside the House of Commons. As a matter of fact, I think the desire for a general election at this time is pretty well confined to one side of the House. I believe the people of this country are not very much concerned about it, or they would have availed themselves of the opportunity to advise us as to their views. I would like to assure the right hon. Prime Minister, the Chief Whip, and all the other whips, that so far as I am concerned they need not worry about me for I shall try and be in my seat when the bell rings, ready to vote against the amendment that is now before the House.

I want to mention briefly a few things that, very properly, I think, interest the people of the West particularly. I think the members from the eastern part of Canada are quite capable of looking after the interests of the East, so I shall try and confine my remarks to matters that affect our western country, and affect it very, very seriously. In the first place, I want to endorse most strongly the remarks of my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Henders) in regard to the necessity of the Government's appointing a commission to thoroughly investigate the wheat trade.

I think that it is the most important question that has been discussed in this House this session. It has been a subject of complaint in the West to my knowledge for over thirty years. I think the investigation has been delayed too long now and that the Government should take means at once to enquire thoroughly into the entire grain trade, from the time the grain leaves the farmers' wagon until it arrives on the markets of Europe or elsewhere.

I do not wish to convey the idea that I am a pessimist. I have great faith in the West, and I do not think that there is a place in the world where development has been so rapid as it has been in the province of Saskatchewan during the last fifteen years. In the summer of 1903 you could travel from Saskatoon to Yorkton and see nothing but foxes and antelopes, but now the country is entirely settled and the virgin prairie has been converted into productive farms. Thousands upon thousands of farmers have done well out there. They arrived in this country with very little capital and now have comfortable homes, very good buildings, farms well cultivated and fenced; but they would have been much better off if the conditions for the marketing of their grain had been such as to give them a fair return for their product.

As in every other country in the world, it is not all sunshine on the prairies. Some districts have wonderful luck for several years, and then comes a series of bad years. In a great many districts in Saskatchewan we have bad luck now for five years. I can briefly describe what actually occurred. In 1915 we had a bumper crop in all the three provinces. In 1916, however, we had a tremendous amount of hail. Indeed, the hail storms were so severe that the Municipal Hail Insurance Company were only able to pay 40 cents on the dollar; the balance has never been paid and never will be. The following year was somewhat better but there was not a heavy crop. In 1918 we had an unusually severe frost on the morning of July 24th, and it destroyed the grain in patches which meant that the whole field had to be cut, stooked and threshed at a very great expense and many farmers operated at a loss that year. In 1919 the season was very dry, with the result that there was crop failure in a great many places. Last year there was a similar condition in a number of districts. Therefore, I think it is very necessary that the Government should do everything they possibly can to improve marketing conditions.

Possibly some hon. gentlemen will think that a great deal of this trouble has been due to poor farming. I will admit that there is still room for improvement, and there always will be; but I must say that there has been a wonderful advance in the last few years. The land has been much better cultivated; in fact, some of the farmers have over-cultivated, with the result that the soil has drifted badly. However, considering the shortage of suitable help and all the adverse conditions, the people have struggled manfully to meet their obligations and to develop the country.

But the prospects are not good at present. Spring is rapidly approaching, and what is the outlook? We are told by the implement dealers that prices are going to be higher. We do not know what wages are going to be, and with the exchange situation as it is, we do not feel that there is very much prospect of a market for our 1921 crop in Europe. With the German mark at about one cent and a half, only the millionaire classes can possibly buy grain from us. The United States farmers complain that their markets are flooded. Now, I always try to look on the bright side of things, and while I do not desire to be charged with being pessimistic, really at present conditions are not very good, and I think that the Government should get busy at once and try to improve the situation.

There is no room for gamblers between the producer and the consumer. We have far too many middlemen in all lines of trade as well as the gamblers on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. We all know that the Wheat Board was not appreciated at the start. However, every one realizes now that it was the best method of disposing of our surplus wheat, and I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) corroborate my statement that the Wheat Board is very much appreciated at the present time. Indeed, it has been appreciated ever since it became known that it was going to be a success. I feel that the best solution of the difficulty is to re-appoint the Wheat Board on a slightly different basis. The organized farmers are trying to decide on a wheat pool. I do not want to discourage them in any way, but I doubt if any scheme could be a succes that was not endorsed by the Federal Government and the banks. If a wheat pool is the best scheme, let us all get behind it; but if it is not workable, then I should like the Canadian Council of Agriculture and the organized farmers to announce that they are not able to go ahead with it, so that we might have time to formulate some other plan to take care of the 1921 crop. I have had very little news recently regarding what has been done by the organized farmers and the Canadian Council of Agriculture, but I noticed a paragraph touching this matter in the press this morning which is of some interest, and I would like to read it to the House:

Delay Obtaining Wheat Pool Charter.

Winnipeg, Man., Feb. 24.—No application will be made this session to the Manitoba legislature for a charter in connection with the formation of the Wheat Pool Association, according to George Langley, minister of municipal affairs for Saskatchewan, who is in the city to-day.

In explaining the delay, Mr. Langley said the formation of such an association, to which thousands of farmers belong, constituted an undertaking of gigantic magnitude meriting mature consideration. Another matter which would have to be dealt with at some length was the question of determining the status of farmers in the association, who, though possessing no financial interest in the organization were entitled to consideration in its direction.

I must say that this does not look very promising. For my part I would like to see the Government appoint what I would call an "Improved Wheat Board" on a voluntary basis. We all object to compulsory legislation but I think if the Wheat Board were re-appointed and authorized to handle not only wheat but oats, barley and flax as well, and if it were optional whether a man shipped his wheat through the Board, got his advance and waited for the balance, or sold it to the elevators, it would be to the advantage of the farmer. It is not easy at the present time for the Government to do anything until the organized farmers agree on what they are going to do. As I have already said I do not want to do anything myself to discourage them. If their plan appears to be the best, let us all get behind them. If it is not, then we want the Government to take immediate action, in order to see what can be done in regard to the 1921 crop.

Mr. Speaker, I have great confidence in the West. The West is all right. The people of the West are all right. What is needed is a better understanding between the East and the West. You in the East need us as much as we need you. I blame the newspapers a great deal for the mistaken impressions existing, caused by the misleading reports published every day. A great many eastern people have an idea that western people spend the summer riding about in automobiles and spend the winter in California, and many western people imagine that the Federal Government and eastern people are not at all concerned as to whether they sink or swim. If anything can be done to improve conditions for any class of people in Canada it is our duty to do it. If nothing can be done, the facts should be made known. Most of our people are reasonable and will be perfectly satisfied if this course is adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor I should like to mention, briefly, one or two other matters which affect my constituency as well as other parts of the prairie. We realize more and more, as the years go by, the necessity of raising more stock and the importance of good stock, but at present a large proportion of the cattle thrown on the market are in poor condition. This is partly due to the fact that the farmers have not had sufficient experience in stall feeding steers before the stock is marketed. Very often they are sold for a trifle simply because it is imperative that the owner should get a few dollars and the manager of the local bank refuses to lend him any money. I do not know if removing the embargo in England would help matters or not. I would certainly like to see the embargo removed, but I have more faith in refrigerator cars and ships than I have in shipping live cattle. If the steers are properly finished on grain and roots before they are slaughtered in Canada the beef will be in first class condition when it arrives on the market in London or Paris. Prices are low at present, but raising good beef and pork is going to be profitable in the future.

I would also like to mention the fact that we will need extra help in harvest, and I think we should encourage people to put in their winter supply of coal in summer. In that way we might get a great many of the miners to help with the harvest. This would also increase the number of cars available for wheat. We have the same experience each year; there is a great rush to haul coal, lumber and everything else just when the cars are needed for wheat, with the result that many of the farmers are forced to be on the road hauling wheat when it is not fit for a dog to be out.

Just while I am on this subject I wish to address a word to my friend the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid). I do not want to say anything unkind, because I realize that both he and the contractors have had difficulty in getting any construction work done during the last few years. Nevertheless, I want to remind him that we have some short pieces of line the construction of which has been dragging for the last fifteen years, and which must be completed this year. I think it would do a lot of good if the Minister would come out to Saskatchewan with me and make one trip in winter on a load of wheat, from Kelvington to Wadena. He would then realize that such a trip is not only hard on the men but hard on the horses as well. I certainly hope the Minister will make a desperate effort this year to complete some of these branch lines. If we cannot secure men in Canada to do this work, we will have to import a few ship loads of labourers from China, or some other country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must again point out to the Government the absolute necessity of doing everything possible to improve marketing conditions in both grain and stock. What we want is some action. With us actions speak louder than words, and if the Government get busy and prove that they are anxious and willing to help us, they will find that they have more friends out on the prairies than they think, especially if they carry on and maintain a stable Government until after the census has been taken and the redistribution Bill, which will entitle the West to about twenty more members, has been passed.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, if I do not take the same time in congratulating the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) upon his accession to office at so early a period in life as other speakers have, I trust he will not consider it any reflection upon him. I hope he will permit me to say that the remarks that have been made with respect to him by gentlemen of the group angularly opposite, as he calls it, are very heartily reciprocated by me. We are very pleased indeed that the right hon. gentleman has scored such a success in public life, and we wish him a happy future whether it be as leader of the Government or leader of the Opposition. It is customary in this debate to refer to various subjects, and I trust I may be excused if I make reference very briefly to a few matters that have not been dwelt upon by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. I want to refer first to a subject that has been frequently discussed in this House in the past and which will undoubtedly be frequently discussed in the future until it is settled in a different way from what we have attempted so far; that is the question of our obligations to our citizen soldiers who served so well in the great war. No other body of Canadians at any time in our history have done so much to bring honour to Canada or to raise her name so high in the esteem of the world. We paid our privates in the trenches considerably less than we paid inexperienced labourers at home. This cannot be allowed to be the final disposition of this matter, and it will never be settled until it is settled in the right way.

In discussing this matter with one man and another, I find that the financial position of the country is always raised as an objection to doing anything further for our returned men. Well, I am glad to say that Canada is able to pay her debts, and there is at least a moral debt due in this case, and we will have to settle it some time or other, the sooner the better. I noticed that when hon. members asked for an increased indemnity last session the financial situation of the country was not allowed to stand in the way of granting their request. I think there was an obligation on the country to increase the sessional indemnity, but I think there was and still is a greater moral obligation to give something further to our returned men than they have yet received.

Fortunately they have a strong and active organization in the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada. The sanity and reasonableness of our returned men generally—I do not speak of a few exceptional cases—is well exemplified by the style of men that they send here as central officers. I believe that some settlement must be made with our returned men that will be satisfactory to the Great War Veterans' Association, and it seems to me that in any settlement the association should be consulted, and an arrangement concluded which will be final and satisfactory.

I am sorry that my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) when he speaks on this question, seems to think it necessary to make some very offensive remarks to those hon. members who looked on the question of conscription in a different way from what he and I regarded it. I had as much interest as my hon. friend from East Algoma in the conscription issue and I sacrificed quite as much, I thought as he did in my desire to see that the men at the front were supported to the utmost. But I cannot forget that many others who took a different view of the question were just as conscientious and just as much interested as I was. For instance, the hon. gentleman who used to represent a constituency in Quebec—I refer to Mr. Power—opposed conscription as strongly as I supported it. But he had three sons fighting in the battle line. I have no right to say that he was not as sincere in his desire to help the men in the trenches as I was, and neither has the hon. member for East Algoma any right to pass such reflections. The sooner we drop that sort of talk the better it will be for the credit and honour of this House and the country at large.

The hon. member dealt generally with another matter which was more particularly discussed by the hon. member for Centre

Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). It seems that some hon. gentlemen deem it their duty to sling all the mud they can at the United Grain Growers, Limited; but if he and other hon. gentlemen would stop to consider what is influencing certain people to urge hon. members to make these ridiculous charges they would soon drop them unless they were the paid agents of the big interests which have been interfered with by that organization.

Mr. BLAKE: I would like to know what charges the hon. member refers to.

Mr. THOMSON: We are hearing them all the time, and my hon. friend cannot fail to have heard them. I refer to the slurs that have been cast at the United Grain Growers, Limited. Now, what is the offence of that organization? Its offence is that it stepped in when conditions were all wrong, when we believed that we were being robbed on all sides in connection with the marketing of our grain. That organization stepped in and handled the grain business so well and so economically that to-day it has secured a very large portion of the business. No new organization can get the business of the country unless it does that business better than the older organizations did. That is the reason for the success of the United Grain Growers, Limited. I have grown grain long enough to know what the conditions were before we had that organization, and even before we had the Manitoba Grain Act. I have sold first class wheat at 35 cents a bushel, and I have no doubt the middlemen got more out of the transaction than I did. Those conditions have been changed, and the people who used to get those big profits do not get them now, and consequently they are stirring up this terrible row. That is the reason why they are so anxious to get as many hon. members as possible to cast some slurs at the United Grain Growers, Limited. And why do they find fault with the buying and retailing of different kinds of goods by that organization? Simply because the United Grain Growers, Limited are doing that work more cheaply than it was ever done before, and have cut down the profits of the older concerns. The United Grain Growers, Limited, handle farm implements, and some time ago a very good supporter of the present Government, who has been in the implement business for some years, assured me that since the United Grain Growers, Limited, started into the business they have sold implements on less than half the commission that was previously charged. That is where all the trouble comes in, that is the reason of the noise we hear and of the mud we see slung at the United Grain Growers, Limited. Those other people have had to cut down their profits, and naturally they are very much aggrieved.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have in the past in this House and in the provincial legislature adhered pretty closely to the two party system, in fact, our whole election machinery and procedure is framed to suit the two party system. That we are getting away from that system is plainly seen in the late elections, not only the by-elections for this House but the recent provincial elections. Whether the group system is right or wrong I shall not discuss at the present time, but we have to face the fact that we are departing from the two party system and getting into the group system Therefore, we should frame our election machinery and our procedure for the conduct of the business of this House with a view to the altered conditions, for it would be folly to attempt to ignore the change that is taking place.

I wish to say a word in this connection with regard to proportional representation. It seems to me that we should arrange at as early a day as possible to have the principle of proportional representation adopted in our cities and other congested areas where its application is practicable and desirable. I agree that in the more scattered settlements the adoption of the principle might be difficult, perhaps unsatisfactory, but there is no reason why in our cities and in our more densely populated agricultural areas the principle of proportional representation should not be put into effect. I think that with the adoption of proportional representation the results of contests in cities would undoubtedly be much fairer. We know that our labouring people are becoming very much alive to the political situation; whether we like it or not, it is the fact. We have extremists among our labourers, although they are a very small proportion of the mass, and it seems to me that for our own safety we should see that every opportunity is given to the labouring classes to be properly represented in this House.

Let me take as an illustration the city of Ottawa. It is quite probable that after the next redistribution the city of Ottawa will have three members. I do not know how the city is divided on party lines, but it is quite possible that Government supporters, supporters of the Liberal party, and supporters of the Labour party may be nearly equal in numbers. Let us suppose that in Ottawa, entitled to three representatives, there should be 38 per cent of one party, 34 of another, and 28 of another. The most reasonable thing would be that each party should have one representative; that would be the only possible way in which you could have the city fairly represented. But it would be quite possible to cut up the city in such a way that instead of one representative being elected for each of the parties, the party 38 per cent strong would get the whole three representatives. That would be quite likely to happen; but would it be fair that 38 per cent of the electors of the city should have three representatives while the other 62 per cent should have no representative at all? I do not propose to deal with that any further at present.

Another question which might very well be taken up in this connection is that of the transferable vote in single constituencies where there are three-cornered contests, or five-cornered contests, as was the case in West Peterborough. It seems to me that the idea of adopting some such principle is worthy of our consideration if we are to legislate in the best interests of the country. It is not well that we should have minority representation to any greater extent than is absolutely necessary.

There is another thing in connection with this change from the two-party system to the group system that has been referred to on different occasions in this House. Under the present system the Government feel that if there is an adverse vote they are, in most cases at any rate, bound to resign. I think it is in the interests of the country that we should make such arrangements for carrying on the business of the House that every member may feel that he is at all times in a position to vote on any question that comes before the House, on its merits. If the majority in the House, voting on a question on its merits, are obliged to vote in opposition to the Government, and at the same time do not wish to defeat the Government, there is no reason why they should not so vote and the Government still remain in office. I merely refer to these things by way of making suggestions; I shall not dwell upon them to any great extent.

With reference to the amendment, I agree with the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), my leader in this group, when he says that the present ministry are not usurpers in the position they take and that their course is constitutional. I cannot agree, however, with my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Henders), when he intimates that it is inconsistent on the part of the leader of this group to start out with different premises from those adopted by the leader of the Opposition and still arrive at the same conclusion. I do not think my hon. friend was very logical when he made that suggestion; nor do I think he will be logical if he says that I may not start from different premises than those adopted by the leader of the Opposition and still arrive at the same conclusion.

If my hon. friend reviews his own conduct he will find that he has sometimes started from different premises from those upon which some others with whom he was associated were working, and yet arrived at the same conclusion. If my recollection serves me rightly, when we were discussing the amendment to last year's Budget resolutions, my hon. friend, who has very different fiscal ideas, I think, from those held by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), and the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), started from very different premises in considering those questions, yet landed in the same place. When you, Mr. Speaker, uttered those magic words: "Call in the members," and my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) went out to rustle his flock, my hon. friend from Macdonald was rustled in along with the hon. member for North Simcoe and the hon. member for Brantford. They came in together and they all slipped down into the same berth. The "bairnies all cuddled doon thagither;" there was no kicking at all, no trouble. They started from very different premises; they had very different views as to what the tariff should really be, but they landed in the same place. I do not see, therefore, why my hon. friend should not accord to the hon. member from Marquette and to myself the privilege that he extends to himself. What is fair for one is fair for another.

While I do not look upon the present Administration as usurpers, and while I agree that they may have the confidence of this House—or, at least, it is quite possible that a majority of this House may feel that they are bound to express confidence in them—and I would not question their sincerity in doing so—it seems to me that when any one in this House says that he believes the present Administration enjoys the confidence of the country, he must intend it as a joke. It would be a reflection on the intelligence of any member of this House to say that he believed anything of the kind, and I do not like to reflect on the intelligence of hon. members. Anyway, the thing is too absurd; it is utterly impossible.

We have heard a good deal about the by-elections. Apparently some supporters of the Government are able to get some rays of comfort out of those by-elections. Well, I have heard of the time when there was a company formed to extract sunbeams from cucumbers, and it seems to me that that would be a more reasonable task and one more likely of accomplishment than for any supporter of the Government to endeavour to get any comfort from any of the by-elections, even the best of them.

Before I deal further with the question of the by-elections, I wish to remark that some of the hon. gentlemen following the lead of the Prime Minister seem to think the Opposition is just as much on trial as the Government is. I never heard of such a doctrine. If we in this group support the amendment, it does not mean that we are voting confidence in the regular Opposition—not for one moment; we are not doing so. The only question before us is whether we have confidence in this Government or not. That is undoubtedly what this amendment means. By voting for or against this amendment we are voting either want of confidence or confidence in the Government; we have no other course open to us. The supporters of the Government seem very anxious to becloud the issue by reference to what has happened to the opposition in the by-elections. That is not the issue; but if it were, I think they will get very little comfort from that, because the odds are tremendously in favour of the Opposition in comparison with the Government. Since the war there have been sixteen by-elections. Four of these seats were formerly held by the Opposition and they still hold them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What constitutionally must happen if the amendment carries?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I have nothing to do with what happens. My duty is to vote on the question before the House in the way in which I believe I should vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Without regard to the consequences?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: My right hon. friend is endeavouring to lead me away from what I was at. I have sometimes preached in this House the doctrine which I have preached amongst the people at home and which has been favourably received there, namely, that when any question comes before this House, we must use our best judgment and vote on that question in the way we believe to be right, and let the consequences take care of themselves. When I voted with my right hon. friend on the question of conscription, I had not the slightest idea what the consequences might be. I believed my right hon. friend was right, and I voted with him regardless of the consequences.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend does not object to my interrupting, I should like to follow this out a little further. Does he not think that he and I were agreed as to the consequences then? Does he not think the consequences of a vote enter into the question whether it is right or wrong?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: To a certain extent they do, but not in all cases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think they do in all cases.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: The consequences of this may be that the Prime Minister may resign.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What happens then?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: The consequence then may be that we may have a general election which, I think, will be a God-send to the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There must be a Government.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: True.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Therefore, does not a vote for the amendment mean voting that the Opposition should be in instead of this Government?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There must be a Government whether there is an election or not.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: My right hon. friend could, I presume, advise the Governor General to dissolve Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there must be a Government.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: My right hon. friend would look after that. I do not think he is so very touchy, so thin-skinned, that he would not be willing to continue in office for a little while in order to get things straightened up and until the people could pronounce on the question whether he was to continue or not. Governments, even after they are defeated in the country, always continue to hold office for a short time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a case of being thin-skinned or thick-skinned; it is a case of proper practice. Will the hon. gentleman undertake to support me in a course of that sort?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I am not supporting my right hon. friend anyway, and I do not purpose allowing him to coax me into supporting him unless he changes his views very much on the financial question, the question of the tariff. Many things might happen. It would be the duty of my right hon. friend, not mine, to decide what the consequences would be. He might, if he saw fit, ask for a dissolution of Parliament and carry on the Government, as he should, until after an election took place. He might, if he saw fit, resign. In that event, the Governor General would, I understand, call on some one else whom the right hon. gentleman would suggest. I think the usual practice is for the Governor General to ask the Prime Minister for a suggestion. My right hon. friend understands these things all right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I do, but I was trying to lead the hon. gentleman to understand them too, and not to vote heedless of the consequences, and not to say that he is not voting confidence in someone else when he votes want of confidence in this Government.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I am not voting confidence in anyone else when I vote want of confidence in this Government. The course which I have mentioned is open to my right hon: friend, and he knows it is open to him. He might resign and undoubtedly he would be asked to name his successor. He might name anybody he likes, but that is not of my business. The question then would be whether the man he names would undertake to form a Government, and indeed the matter might again come back to my right hon. friend. So many things might happen that I purpose doing my duty and letting the consequences take care of themselves. My right hon. friend drew me off the track, and I will try to get back to it although I do not think he wants me to deal with the subject.

In the four by-elections in constituencies formerly held by the Opposition, the seats are still held by the Opposition, and I think I am right in saying that the Government had so little confidence in themselves and in their popularity 11 p.m. that they did not dare to put up a candidate in any one of those four constituencies. Twelve other seats were vacated which were formerly held by the Government, having been carried in 1917 by most tremendous majorities. Indeed, if providence had hand-picked them for my right hon. friend, he could not have done better. In four of those twelve constituencies newly-appointed ministers were candidates, and any of us who know anything about election matters know that such by-elections are not real tests of public feeling. There is always a disposition to support a newly-appointed Cabinet minister, and that is a very hard thing to overcome. It is very seldom that a newly-appointed Cabinet minister going back to the country for re-election has been defeated. Another thing that hardly ever happens is that the majority by which such a man was elected in the previous election is reduced, and, indeed, I cannot think of many cases where that has happened. I am sure there is no case on record in any civilized country where the majority has been so tremendously reduced as it has in this case.

As regards these four seats, in the 1917 election, one went to the Government by acclamation and the other three were carried by the Government by a gross majority of between 20,000 and 21,000. This is worth considering for a little while, and I invite my right hon. friend to pay attention to it if he wants to know something about consequences, because it is of a very great consequence. In the by-elections, one of those four seats went by acclamation to the Government. I have not been able to get the official figures, but so far as I can gather, the total majority received in the other three by-elections was somewhere around 7,000 or 8,000, so that the majority in those constituencies, where they were electing newly appointed Cabinet ministers, was reduced by about 12,000 or 13,000. Such a thing has never been heard of before in any civilized country in the world. There never has been so clear an indication to any ministry that ever existed that it was not wanted any longer.

But that is not all. Outside of those, there were eight other by-elections in constituencies formerly held by the Government, formerly carried by tremendous majorities or by acclamation. Of these eight, three were carried in 1917 by the Government by acclamation, in two others the opposition candidate lost his deposit, and in another he came about as near as he could to losing it without actually doing so. He was saved by only a few votes. In another election the constituency was carried by a majority of 2,157. In only one of these constituencies was there anything in the nature of a normal majority, and in that case the Government candidate had a majority of 308. To sum up, in the by-elections the Government won just one solitary seat out of eight, and in that constituency the Government candidate won by acclamation in 1917 and in the by-election the Government candidate only had a moderate majority. What about the others? In one of them the official Opposition candidate won. What about the other six? Why, the other six candidates are sitting right around me here.

Who has the confidence of the country now? How anyone can deceive himself to the extent of making himself imagine that the present Administration has the confidence of the country is something I cannot comprehend. It must be remembered that in three of these by-elections the Government had the advantage of entering a three or five-cornered fight. That meant that the opposition was divided. In West Peterborough, for instance, there was not a candidate in the field, so far as I know, except the Government candidate, who did not pronounce himself on this question of the Government's mandate. All, except the Government candidate, declared that the Government had exhausted its mandate and should go to the country. In that constituency the Government got about one-fourth or one-fifth of the vote, and 75 or 80 per cent of the people pronounced on the very question we are dealing with here, and declared that the Government should go to the country. I apply the same language to this election that I used in the case of constituencies that ministers were contesting, and say that in this whole civilized world there has never been a case where the people showed so clearly and conclusively that they had no confidence in the Government. I challenge any member on the Government side to quote a single case.

Mr. M. R. BLAKE: What about Ireland?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: My hon. friend can go to Ireland if he wants to. I am not going there just now. I prefer Canada.

Mr. BLAKE: They have declared want of confidence in the Government there?

Mr. THOMSON: I believe that what I have said would fully justify anyone in voting for this amendment, but I am not voting on these grounds alone. So far as I am concerned, the pronouncement on the tariff in the speech from the Throne is such that I, with my views, whether they be right or wrong, could not consistently vote for the Government on the question before us. In fairness to myself, and to what I believe to be the views of the majority of my constituents, I could not possibly vote with the Government on this occasion as, to my mind, it would be a vote in support of the fiscal policy of the present Government. Whether I like it or not, I feel that I am compelled to vote for the amendment. I am not satisfied with it in some particulars, but I had nothing to do with its drafting; none of our group had a word to say with regard to it. We have to take the question as it stands, and in view of what I have said I cannot do otherwise than support the amendment.

On the motion of Mr. G. C. Wilson the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the House adjourned at 11.12 p.m.

Monday, February 28, 1921.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS TABLED

Report of the Department of Militia and Defence for the year 1920, and Regulations of the Canadian Air Force under the provisions of section 5 of the Air Board Act.—Hon. Mr. Guthrie.

COPYRIGHT ACT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12 respecting copyright. He said:

This is a Bill that has been before the House during the last two session and its object is substantialy to make our law conform to the provisions of the Berne Convention and similar existing laws in other countries.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

INSPECTION OF GAS AND GAS METERS

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13 respecting the inspection of gas and gas meters.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, resumed from Friday, February 25.

Mr. ROBERT JAMES MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to join with other speakers in offering congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. Secondly, I desire also, in common with other hon. gentlemen, to congratulate the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen) on his elevation to the highest office in the gift of the Canadian people at an age when most men are only entering public life. I do not intend to take up any time in extolling the great abilities or the unrivalled debating powers of the right hon. gentleman. If I desired to do so, if it were my purpose to sing him a pæan of praise, I should need but to take some of the words uttered in the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite who, in their courtesy, were practically all of them kind enough to say very flattering things to the leader of the Government. I admit that there was one speaker on the other side, the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), who publicly declined to congratulate the Prime Minister. I am glad, however, looking at the Prime Minister, to observe that so far he has survived that calamity.

Sir, it had not been originally my intention to participate in this debate when it began, but a number of speakers on the other side,—friends of mine at one time, but at the present moment political opponents,—made remarks about some of the Liberal-Unionists which, I felt, required some reply from us. For example, the hon. member for St. James Division of Montreal (Mr. Rinfret) made the statement that we were a group of weak-kneed reformers trailing behind the leader of the Government; and on other occasions other speakers opposite variously designated us as being servile and subservient. Well, Sir, I think that the aspersion of being weak in the knees or of lacking in courage can easily be proven to be not only discourteous but also untrue; for it will be admitted by any fairminded gentlemen that any man who, for a principle, whether that principle be right or wrong, leaves a political party and its leader and joins forces with another party cannot easily be accused of being weak-kneed or of lacking in courage. We all remember that at the beginning of the late war the right hon. John Morley and Mr. John Burns retired from the British Ministry because they did not agree with the Liberal Ministry then in power on the principle that Britain should assist the French in repelling the aggression of the Germans. I do not think that there is any hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who would endorse the motive that actuated them; but at the same time I do not think there is any gentleman on the other side who will assert that those men lacked the courage of their conviction in doing what they did. Well, Sir, the Liberal-Unionists in Canada who took the step they took in 1917 acted on exactly the same principle. They left political friends with whom they had been associated throughout their public careers; they parted company with a leader whom they all respected and admired, and in many cases, my own included, loved; they left that party and that leader on a certain principle. Now, whether that principle was right or wrong may be open to dispute, according to one's views; but certainly the remark that the Liberal-Unionists were weak-kneed in their action cannot be truthfully made. As to being subservient or servile, Mr. Speaker, I may say that since my advent into this House you have occupied the Chair, and I think you will remember that on many occasions hon. gentlemen on this side attacked the Government, and their attacks were of such frequent occurrence that my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) dubbed them family quarrels; and I remember quite well that some sections of the press described them as sniping from behind. On many occasions that occurred, and it can truthfully be said that a very large proportion of hon. members on this side of the House have at one time or another attacked the Government and voted against their leaders, myself included in the latter category of conduct. Even that gentleman who is reputed to be the High Priest of Protection in this party, my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) on one occasion voted against his leader. Mr. Speaker, if you will look back I do not think you can find any occasion on which my hon. friends on the other side attacked their leader, either the present incumbent of the office or his predecessor. I do not remember an occasion on which the hon. members on the other side voted against their leader, with the exception of that occasion on which the late member for St. James (Mr. L. A. Lapointe) and the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) voted against their leader on the Budget. Of course, last year the indemnity question was the occasion of a free-for-all; and the leader of the opposition took whatever stand he deemed best and his followers voted differently from him. We on this side, Mr. Speaker, have been neither servile nor subservient. On the contrary,— and I say this with no ill intent— if you will look back a little and view fairly the past conduct of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, I think you will conclude that subservience and servility have never been characteristic of hon. gentlemen on this side.

On another occasion in this debate one hon. member—I will not give his name—a gentleman whom I respect highly, but whose views I do not endorse, made the statement that the Liberal-Unionists here at the present time had none of the attributes of Liberalism. Well, Sir, there was a time fifty or seventy-five or a hundred years ago, when the terms: 'Liberal" and "Conservative" in Great Britain, whence they came, did signify a great deal of difference in their outlook upon the life of the nation. The word "Tory" for example, was supposed to mean—and I believe did mean perhaps a hundred years ago—that that party was fighting for the interest of the king and the aristocracy, or the classes as they were dubbed; and the Liberal was fighting for the masses. But, Sir, to-day the questions that divide political parties in England are such questions as the tariff, the treatment of Ireland, and Imperialism —those are the questions that the two political parties in England divide upon to-day. I do not think those differences ever did exist in Canada for though an aristocracy exists in England we never had one in this country. We are all working, so far as we can, for the good of the country as a whole; and while the Liberals and the Conservatives in this country take their names from the British political parties they have paid very little attention to the question of fighting for the divine right of kings, or the rights of the aristocracy, so far as my historical reading permits me to say. The other day I read a speech by the Right Hon. Henry Campbell-Bannerman who was Liberal premier of Great Britain from, I think, 1904 to 1908, and may say I had the pleasure of being in Scotland when he was elected. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman having been Prime Minister and the leader of Liberalism in the British Parliament is an authority on Liberalism that can hardly be disputed. The speech to which I have reference was delivered nearly twenty years ago but I presume traditions and principles continue in effect. In making what he called a declaration of Liberal principles he dealt with the Irish question, with Imperialism, with Egypt and the Sudan, and with relations with Russia. These were questions which our political parties in Canada were not arguing very much about. Then Sir Henry spoke about matters of domestic policy, and the three subjects to which he paid special attention were old age pensions, better housing, and extending the suffrage. These are three policies which our party on this side have either dealt with or are supporting in the speech from the Trone, and on practically none of the policies he spoke of are we at variance.

Then, Sir, I was reading the other day Winston Churchill's life of his father. At the time of writing Winston Churchill was a Liberal. He had never even crossed the floor of the House to support any other party, he was a bona fide Liberal. Speaking of the Liberal split on the Irish question in 1887 he says:

> The Liberal Unionists denied that they had severed themselves from the principles and traditions of Liberalism,—and there is no doubt that they were perfectly honest. They were not conscious of any abandonment of principle. They remained in political opinion on all great questions exactly where they had been. . . . But in fact, one change had taken place of more practical importance than all the symbols of party, and counting more in political warfare than any change of principles, however sudden or sweeping,—they had changed sides.

Ah, Sir, that is the political crime par excellence. But one is forced to ask if political principles are a matter of House of Commons geography.

Well, Sir, in Canada the same conditions to my mind have prevailed. I am perfectly honest in this statement and open to the correction of other hon. gentlemen, but I have failed to get that correction on many different occasions. I believe that in regard to most principles it is a matter of tradition, something of the past rather than something of the present. I believe in the past it has been pretty much the case of the "ins" and the "outs". The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) said the other day that the Tories look down on the people and the Liberals look up to them. I presume my hon. friend would himself admit that is pretty much of a platitude. It may have been true fifty years ago but I doubt whether there is very much truth in his statement to-day.

Hon. gentlemen opposite claim for themselves that they are a low-tariff party. This question has been sifted and debated to a certain extent in this House, but I have a few figures here—I will be very brief in their recital—which may help to settle their claim in that regard. The figures were given to me by the Chief Statistical Officer of the Customs Department, and I do not think there is any question about them. They are taken from the Trade and Commerce Report showing the average ad valorem rate of duty on total imports from 1878 up to 1919, and he has brought them up to date.

Between 1878 and 1896, before Sir Wilfrid Laurier's party came into power, the average ad valorem rate of duty from 18 per cent up to 22 per cent. From 1896 to 1911, the average ad valorem rate of duty ran from 16 per cent to 19 per cent. For the calendar year 1920—that is from January 1, 1920, to January 1 following—they were only from 15 per cent to 19 per cent. What is still more striking, the war tax was taken off May 19, 1920, and from June 1, 1920, to January 31, of this year, which forms the past eight months, the rate was 13.16 per cent, or nearly three points lower than it was during any year of the Liberal regime from 1896 to 1911. If the low tariff party is the Liberal party these figures would indicate that my friends here are the Liberals and the Conservatives are opposite. But, Sir, I believe that both parties, Liberal and Conservative, have been worshiping merely names. To illustrate how little it takes to make a plank of a political platform I am going to quote from a book entitled Public Men and Public Life in Canada, by Hon. James Young, published in 1912. Mr. Young in his work discusses the reasons why the two political parties of that time came to take their positions on the tariff in 1876. He says that Hon. R. J. Cartwright on February 25, delivered the Budget speech. It was expected he would advise a moderate increase in the tariff, but he did not. The author of this book says:

> Sir John Macdonald and the Honourable Charles Tupper did not disguise their surprise at the Government's action. The latter had to reply to the Finance Minister, but Sir John at a later stage admitted his own surprise. "I came, I confess it, to hear his (Mr. Cartwright's) speech, impressed with the idea that he was going to bring down an alteration of the tariff." According to current report, the Honourable Charles Tupper came to the House loaded up to denounce an increase of the tariff, and to dilate—as he had done before—on the danger of permitting an entrance to the thin end of the protectionist wedge. Such an unexpected change in the situation would have appalled many another man. But in debate, nothing could appal Sir Charles. As usual he rose equal to the occasion. With surprising coolness he turned his guns, took up the opposite line of attack, and probably made a more forcible and effective criticism of the Government's course than if he had been able to use the mental ammunition which he had specially prepared for the occasion.

And he goes on to tell the following incident:—

> When Dr. Tupper concluded his speech about half-past ten o'clock, and shortly before the House adjourned, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie went across the Chamber to the front of the doctor's desk and the two doughty antagonists—the heroes of so many political battles—indulged in what seemed to the onlookers a very friendly and amusing conversation, which at times seemed to verge a little too near the hilarious for a legislative body with the Speaker still in the Chair.

Mackenzie returned, and stopping in front of hon. Mr. Young's chair, he said:

> "What do you think Tupper has just told me?"
>
> "I have no idea," I replied.
>
> "Well," continued Mr. Mackenzie, "I went over to banter him a little on his speech, which I jokingly alleged was a capital one considering he had been loaded up on the other side. He regarded this as a good joke, and frankly admitted to me that he had entered the House under the belief that the Government intended to raise the tariff, and fully prepared to take up the opposite line of attack."

And Mr. Young concludes:

> What the Liberal and Conservative parties did that night, however, was pregnant with importance. They were making history. Had Mr. Mackenzie increased the tariff, the Conservatives would probably have become, as already suggested—the Free Traders instead of the Protectionists of Canada, and our political history would have been quite different during the ensuing twenty years.

Sir Richard Cartwright in his reminiscences confirms this incident, and at page 156, says that up to 1876 it was more than doubtful what policy the Conservatives would adopt with regard to protection, and apparently the same was true of the Liberals. It may be worth while reminding the House again that it was Sir Robert Peel, a Conservative Premier, and the Conservative party, that brought free-trade into England in 1846. In this House there is a low-tariff party, or a no-tariff party, at the other end of the Chamber, the Farmer or Agrarian party. I must admit that on the other side of the House among the Liberals there are two hon. members who have been out-and-out free traders, my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster), and my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon). Both are equally strong free traders but I notice that my hon. friend from Brome has lately been soft-pedalling his utterances. I found myself wondering if the hon. member was changing his viewpoint, or whether it was the same sort of subserviency to party with which he is so fond of twitting us.

Then, in his recently delivered speech, the hon. member for Brome repeated Edmund Burke's definition of what he considered was a political party, namely, a group of men banded together to forward the same principles or policies which they hold in common. The hon. member continued commenting on that and said that any man who did not agree with the party with which he was allied had no right to belong to that party. I absolutely agree with him. But I thought, Sir, of asking him, what about himself? The other day he was rather prone to gibe the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Spinney) upon exactly this lack of agreement with his party which applies so well to the hon. member for Brome, and I could not help thinking that no humour is so funny as unconscious humour. Listening to the hon. member one might easily conclude that the stream of Liberalism had its source in the county of Brome, but, if so, his party has not followed him along the banks of that stream. And, as far as the other traditions of both the old parties go, to my mind they could be spoken of in very much the same manner as I have spoken of those which I have discussed. Therefore it seems to me—and I say it with all sincerity—that the logical and proper course for my hon. friends on the other side would be to follow the same leader as I am following in carrying out the policy which is for the benefit of the industrial and agricultural interests of Canada as a whole, but more particularly for the industrial and agricultural interests of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Sir, no one will disagree with me when I say that the agricultural and industrial interests of these two provinces are absolutely similar. I admit that in the past there have been some cries of race and creed, perhaps from both sides of the House, but I do not think that any hon. gentleman on the other side will ever accuse me of having fostered by action or word any cry of race or creed. On that point I believe sincerely that the proper course for the province of Quebec to take would be to support the right hon. the leader of this Government and to co-operate in carrying out those policies and principles which are to the advantage of the agricultural and industrial interests of the Dominion.

I see my hon. friend from East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe) smiling. Well, I do not suppose that any words of mine will have the effect of making my hon. friends on the other side rush across to this side of the House; but at the same time I am saying what I sincerely believe to be correct, and what I think in their hearts a great many of my hon. friends on the other side also believe to be correct.

The usual reason given for an hon. member crossing the floor of the House is that he differs from his party in regard to some great principle or policy. That being so, will my hon. friend from Brome tell me, on what great principle or policy do I differ from my associates on this side of the House? I do not know, and, if I may judge by a great deal of criticisms levelled at the right hon. the Prime Minister, I do not think that most of my hon. friends on the other side of the House really differ with him on any great principle or policy. As a matter of fact, Sir, the majority of the Liberal Unionists still support the party they were elected to support in 1917, because, after all, while the leaders have changed, I admit frankly that there is a continuation of the same party.

My hon. friends on the other side of the House have a habit of saying that the Government and the members behind the Government have no mandate to remain in this House. I will admit that possibly there may be some truth in that; but when they argue that we should cross the floor of the House, I would like to ask, who gave me a mandate to get behind the hon. the leader of the Opposition? He was defeated—I say this with the utmost respect, for I do not wish to offend him—he was defeated in 1917, this Government was elected in the general election of that year, and I was elected behind it. What excuse could I offer to the Liberals and the Conservatives who stood behind me in my constituency if I went before them after crossing the floor of the House? I can understand an hon. member doing as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) did, because he, I believe sincerely, stated that he obligated himself to withdraw. Well, Sir, I do not admit that I obligated myself to withdraw, and I wish to state that never in the election in my constituency was the question of how long I was being elected for discussed; and I venture to say further that I believe that in ninety per cent of the constituencies that question was not brought up. Another point that is worth considering is that this Government or its predecessor was elected by the most overwhelming majority ever given a Government in this country. Supposing that all the allegations regarding the overseas vote are true, the Government was elected in this country. I was elected by something like 2,500 majority, and I got another thousand votes from overseas which I did not need. My old friend the late James Conmee, who sat on the Liberal side for many years, was satisfied with a majority of 300 or 400. It is charged that we were elected only for the duration of the war, but, I repeat, Sir, that on no occasion in my constituency was that question brought up. I believe that the vast majority of the Liberals, Conservatives, Farmers and Laborites and soldiers who were behind me in 1917 are behind me still.

In discussing last year the amendment proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, that the Government should go to the country, I said that if after the session the Government should look into the question and find that a majority of the people wanted an election, they should go to the country. I think that still, Sir. But, apparently the Government have looked into the question and have come to the conclusion that while the demand for an election may be widely spread it is rather thinly spread, and personally I agree with them in that conclusion. In pointing that out I would like to direct the attention of my hon. friends of the Opposition that the prejudices of the right hon. the leader of the Government are no greater against an election than are the prejudices of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition for an election. So far as I am personally concerned, I do not fear an election now or at any other time, but I do not see why any noisy declarations from any group should have any undue weight with those who do not agree with them. It is only the man who has no strength of character of his own who permits all the changing breezes of public sentiment to sway him to and fro like a weather-cock.

In the speeches of my hon. friends opposite there have been practically no criticisms of the right hon. the Prime Minister and his Government or his policies, principles or legislation. That appears to me to be quite a compliment to him and to his Government. I admit that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has claimed that the Government are usurpers. Well, I will admit they are usurpers in the mind of the Opposition, because any Government that ever occupied the treasury benches of this House were usurpers in the minds of the Opposition. Every Opposition knows that, and every Opposition knows that if fair play had been used in the election only the Opposition would have been returned to power. So there is nothing particularly strange in that point of view.

There were some personal criticisms of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, and the reason I take them up is not because he needs my help, because I have noticed that he is always quite capable of defending himself, but a spirit of fair play prompts me to refer to them. My hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Beland) is a man whom I admire very much and for whose breadth of view I have a great deal of respect. Like myself my hon. friend usually boasts that he does not raise the cry of race or creed, and I think he is sincere in that boast. I do not wish to be unfair in my criticism, but I think my hon. friend was not quite fair as he went on. He said that the right hon. the leader of the Government had denied that he had spoken against the people or the province of Quebec, and had defied any member of the Opposition to quote any speeches of his which will warrant that description. My hon. friend from Beauce said that actions speak louder than words, and he proceeded to name a number of commissions upon which he said there were no French members: The Canadian National Railway Board, the International Joint Waterways Commission, the Pensions Board, Board of Commerce, and the three gentlemen who represented Canada at the Peace Conference, and those later who attended the first meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations. He failed to mention the Dominion Railway Commission and Civil Service Commission, upon which there are French members, but, of course, to make a reference to those would not agree with his argument. However, of the six commissions or bodies which my hon. friend from Beauce mentioned, only one was appointed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, so that my hon. friend, in proving that actions speak louder than words, uses somebody else's actions as the basis for the laying of a charge against the Prime Minister. The representatives that were appointed by my right hon. friend, were the representatives to the Assembly of the League of Nations, held lately, and while I admit—and I am sorry for it—that there were no French Canadians on that representation, the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty), who was a member of the delegation, is a gentleman from Montreal who speaks French and can claim, I think, to be a good friend of the French Canadian people.

Another point I would like to mention is this: my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) recently appointed a new judge to the Supreme Court of Canada. For some years, I believe, there had been only one French-Canadian judge on that body, but my right hon. friend very recently appointed Mr. Mignault to a vacant judgeship there. I understand that it is some years since two French Canadian judges sat on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada. I simply point this out as a small matter, but one which, after all, shows no such hatred of the French Canadian people as has been charged against the Prime Minister by some hon. gentlemen opposite.

Then, the member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault), made the charge against the right hon. leader of the Government that he was making love to the province of Quebec without a mandate. Well, Sir, making love is an old and much respected custom. I have known our French Canadian friends for many years, and if I may judge by that knowledge and by the natural increase in the population down there I should think that love-making is not such an unpopular pastime as might be inferred from the remarks of my hon. friend. However, Sir, what is the crime? Even supposing my right hon. friend is making love to the province of Quebec, in what respect is it a crime to attempt to bring about a better feeling of friendship between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario and the rest of Canada? The old charge was that my right hon. friend and his associates were trying to isolate the province of Quebec; now it is the reverse, so that one is forced to the conclusion that politics plays ducks and drakes with consistency and logic.

Why, Sir, are these vicious attacks being made on the Prime Minister on the ground of his alleged hatred for Quebec? What has the Prime Minister done? Is it because he, on behalf of the Government of which he was a member, piloted through this House a certain amount of unpopular legislation? In this connection it is worth remembering that, after all, he was only a member of that Government; he was not the Government itself. I am sincere in this; I would like to know what it is that my right hon. friend has done. In what respect has he showed that hatred for the province of Quebec which is attributed to him? Was it the Military Service Act? I do not know, but I sometimes have a suspicion that perhaps it was the Military Service Act. Well, if that is the case, I have only this to say: the Military Service Act did not particularly specify French Canadians as against English-speaking Canadians; it was an Act for the whole of Canada. That being the case, and if the suspicion is correct that it is the Military Service Act which the Opposition hold against my hon. friend, then why do hon. gentlemen opposite not hold it also against the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding); against the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar); against the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), and against all the other gentlemen who have joined my hon. friends on the other side of the House—against, indeed, all those Liberals who came in in 1917 and supported that Act? Sir, I find it difficult to understand the attitude that repels friendly advances and is angered by them; that fosters antagonism and strife; that prefers the gauntlet of battle to the hand of friendship and co-operation in a common cause.

I believe that the sane element in this country to-day do not desire an election, having regard to the unsettled conditions which it would cause, and to the turmoil, uncertainty, and business disturbances which would prevail. And why should they desire an election? This Government and its predecessor brought in a great deal of legislation, which, to my mind, was of a wise and sane character. Let us look at it for a moment—and these are only a few instances which have occurred to me in jotting down these notes. The Government carried on Canada's part in the war. There may be some criticism of details in that regard, but on the whole I think the people of Canada feel that our part in the war was carried on creditably and courageously. Then, Sir, after that they brought about demobilization in a very able manner. They adopted measures of soldiers' civil re-establishment, and a soldier land settlement scheme that was looked upon by many people as a standard for adoption by many other countries. They have brought in a life insurance scheme for soldiers and a pension system which involves a higher pension scale than that of any other country. They established a Department of Health, and in the speech from the Throne this year they mention the establishment of a Department of Scientific Research. They gave the franchise to women and brought in a Franchise Act which fair-minded people look upon as a very high type of law. They brought Canada through the war from a financial standpoint in such a capable manner that Canada, with the possible exception of the United States, is to-day in a better financial position than any other country that took part in the war. They put on an income tax something which had been talked of on both sides of politics for a long time, but upon which action was never taken until an income tax system was established by the preceding Government. Finally, Sir, they insist and have insisted on Canada taking its place as a nation in the galaxy of the nations of the empire. That, Sir, is laughed at by some of my friends opposite. Well, as a man who is the same type of Canadian as they are, I am proud of the things which have been done to show that Canada is really taking the part of a nation within the Empire. I confess that even as a young boy I used to experience a feeling of disgust when I read of international conferences where Canada did not even have the status of the little negro republics of Central America. I am proud of the fact that at the Peace Conference there were representatives to speak for Canada. The member for Shelburne and Queen's—I say it with the utmost respect, for I have a very great respect for the hon. gentleman—rather made fun of that, and was cheered by his friends on the other side when he did so. Personally I do not understand that attitude.

Then, the appointment of an ambassador from Canada to the United States is certainly a lead towards a high class of Canadianism. Then, there is the matter of the appointment of Canada's representatives at the League of Nations. Should we have been represented by gentlemen from across the water, even if they did come from England? I do not believe so; I like to have the Canadian people speak for themselves. I was proud to read in the press the statement,—I think it was made by Mr. Rowell, one of the representatives at the recent Conference—that the Canadian people handled their own affairs and did not permit any country, even England, to interfere with their domestic policies. I think everybody should be proud of that. All these things —which have been laughed at by hon. gentlemen opposite, largely, I suppose, from the political standpoint—tend to the building up of the right type of Canadianism,—a type of Canadianism which looks after itself.

The member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault) got a great round of applause because he said he stood out for Canada and was always thinking of Canada first. Why, Sir, that is what this Government and its predecessor have been doing all the time. I venture to say that every hon. gentleman on this side agrees with the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères that Canada should come first in Canada's policy. Well, looking over that line of legislation, I ask hon. gentlemen whether it is a type of legislation in respect of which the Government need blush? Is that the type of legislation that this Government should be punished for having put into force in this country? I do not think so.

I was asking why the people should ask for an election. Why should the people of this country demand an election? I gave the first answer—because of wise and sane legislation. The second is that there have been no charges of graft against the ministers of this Government. And the third is that the country generally is prosperous. It is true that there is a certain amount of unemployment, but I made it my business the other day to make inquiries of officials of the Labour Department and I was informed by them that Canada is in no worse position from the unemployment standpoint than it has been in at other times when there have been depressions throughout the country. Indeed, it was pointed out—and I would like to give the Minister of Labour credit for this on the floor of the House—that it had not been the practice to keep any statistics relating to unemployment, but as soon as the Minister of Labour came in he started to keep such statistics; and it is the opinion of the department that conditions are no worse now than they had been at other times of depression throughout the country. I wish to give all credit to the Minister of Labour, because, after all, this is another piece of work which is to his credit and to that of the Government.

Finally, I wish to point out that social conditions in Canada are better than social conditions in any other country in the world, with the possible exception of the United States. Let us look at the situation throughout the world. China, although she took no part in the Great War, has 30,000,000 people starving. In Russia Bolshevism reigns supreme. Germany is in a chaotic condition. The Republics of southern Europe are either at war or talking of war. Great Britain has the Irish question, and also unemployment, which is so severe that the British Prime Minister proposed that the unemployed of Great Britain should emigrate to the colonies. Therefore, conditions in all these countries are very much worse than in Canada, because we have little unemployment as compared with unemployment in those other countries, and general conditions in Canada are good.

There is nothing unusual in the Opposition demanding an election; indeed, that is a normal condition; it would not be an Opposition unless it was demanding an election. But the sane voice of Canada is satisfied that there is no particular hurry for an election. Honest men may differ about that, but that is my opinion.

What problem of Canada would be helped by an election at the present time? What are Canada's problems? Let me name a few of them. There is the problem of finance, of raising $400,000,000 annually to pay the vast interest charges upon our national debt, to run the Government, and to pay pension charges. Will a general election help to pay those charges? I do not think so. Second there is the great railway problem. We have in this country 40,000 miles of railway, over one-half of which is owned by the Government. Some people say that Canada is fifty years ahead of its time in railway building, but I will say twenty years. Will a general election solve that problem? I do not know that it will. Then, we have the problem of the need of selected immigration to cut down our debt and to people the millions of fertile acres we possess. Will a general election help to bring these people into the country? The next problem is that of unemployment. Will a general election lessen unemployment? I think any business man in this country will admit that a general election will increase unemployment. Then there is the question of unrest. Will a general election relieve that? I can almost hear my hon. friends say that it will, and, indeed, a number of them have so stated. But Great Britain has had a general election, and the British Prime Minister has suggested that the unemployed emigrate to the colonies. Germany, France, Italy, Greece have had elections, and there are conditions of unrest in those countries. Are the conditions of unrest there better or less marked than in Canada? They are worse. As I have said, social conditions in Canada are better than social conditions in any other country in the world. There is finally the question of the cost of living. Will a general election lower that cost? I see no reason why it will have any effect on the cost of living. In conclusion, taking all these circumstances into account, I have no hesitation in supporting my right hon. leader and in opposing the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, permit me to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address on the admirable way in which they have discharged their duties. I did not have the privilege of listening to the speeches of those hon. gentleman, but I have read them with a great deal of interest. I wish especially, on this occasion, to be permitted to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on his promotion as head of the Government and leader of the party. My right hon. friend, if I remember rightly, came to this House in 1908, and for the last thirteen years I have had the honour of being one of his colleagues in this House. While there have been occasions on which we differed on questions of policy, I have great respect for him personally and great admiration for his ability as a parliamentarian. My right hon. friend has always been courteous to members of His Majesty's loyal Opposition and willing to listen to what they have to say. Let us hope that these good relations will continue. The necessity of reaching a wise conclusion on all questions that come before us should inspire all parties in this House to work together and to be tolerant of one another's views. I take it to be the duty of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to assist the Government whenever they are satisfied that the Government is right. You know, Mr. Speaker, how satisfactory it is to us on this side, when the Government does anything of which we can cordially approve. That does not, however, mean that the Opposition is to abandon criticism, because an Opposition that abandons criticism abandons its duty. Parliament is a place for plain speaking. A vigilant and efficient parliamentary critic is, a man who will not knowingly say anything that is false and who will not fear to say anything that is true. If an opening appears in the armour of the Government, a good soldier on this side would be expected to strike, provided always that the opening is above the belt. The selection of my right hon. friend as leader has rallied the old Liberal-Conservative party under a new name, and has revived the old battle cry of "Protection". Unionism is dead, and there are very few mourners going about the streets. The old Liberal-Conservative party is on deck again under a new name. During my life-time this party has changed its name about as often as Henry VIII changed his wives—first Tory, then Conservative, next Confederation, then Liberal-Conservative, then Unionist, and now National Liberal and Conservative. But it is the same old party and the policy is substantially the same old policy. The Ethiopian has not changed his skin and the spots of the leopard are easily detected. The old Liberal-Conservative party stood for a high protective tariff; this party does the same. The old party stood for a partisan franchise; this party does likewise. The old party spent in excess of its income; there is no evidence of a change of heart in that respect. The old party promised ports and drydocks and dredging in order to elect Cabinet ministers; it took the promise of port improvements to pave the way for the election of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton); it required the construction of a drydock costing millions to elect the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie), and the largest and most powerful suction dredge in the world had to be imported from the United States and actually put to work, pumping mud in Courtenay bay under full steam, to elect the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore). There is now no pretense that any man of Liberal views can any longer support this administration. Shakespeare says that "Misery makes strange bedfellows." So does politics. One would have thought, a few years ago, that a proposal to fuse together permanently the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) and the hon. member for Yarmouth and Clare (Mr. Spinney) in the same political party with the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) would be nothing short of flying in the face of the Scriptures by putting new wine into old bottles. But this has actually taken place and nothing serious has happened. The wine may be weak, I do not profess to know, but all I can say is that so far the bottles have not burst. There have been numerous changes in the Cabinet, to which reference has already been made, but that has become the custom. Ever since 1917 the Cabinet has continued to change like a kaleidoscope. It has evidently ceased to have any elements of stability and has become a place where men go in and out to find pasture. Some years ago there was a celebrated cabinet change in these provinces, known as the "double shuffle," but since 1917 we have had what will be known in the future political history of this country as the perpetual Cabinet shuffle.

The financial condition of the country will be discussed when the Budget is brought down, and I trust that the Budget may not be too long delayed. May I also express the hope that detailed information will be given regarding the expenditure of $121,000,000 for which no vouchers were available last year, and further, that the Government will this year respect the provisions of the Audit Act which they violated last year and the year before, and see that the Auditor General's report in complete form is laid on the table of the House within fifteen days of the opening of the session. The sooner Parliament is made acquainted with the facts, the better.

There are rumours of another enormous railway deficit, there are also rumours of new methods of taxation to be proposed; but from no Government source have we any concrete proposal looking towards retrenchment or economy. I would like to hear that the Minister of Finance is doing some concentrated thinking on this question of economy, but economy seems to be a lost art with this Government. I want to say to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who I am sorry is not now in his seat, that the people of this country are wide awake. They are not ignorant of the waste that is going on. They are not ignorant of the lack of efficiency and business ability on the part of this Government. They have known what it has cost in good money and bad service for this Government to assume control of 20,000 miles of railway. The high freights and the big deficits tell their own story. The people have been taking notice. They have seen the civil servants increase like the army worm, and the public debt grow like rolling up a snowball.

If you would like me to make some practical suggestions in the direction of economy I am willing to do so. Here are a few modest proposals. Reduce the force of the Northwest Mounted Police and confine their operations to the unorganized territories and the Yukon, and thereby save a very large sum of money every year. Cut down the army and navy expenditure. Reduce the cost of administration. Reduce the number of portfolios. Practice economy in every department of Government. Stop squandering money on ships that are not required. Make economy the watchward. Establish a blacklist in which the names of all the wasters in the public service will be recorded. Reduce the present army of civil servants and stop making further appointments except where absolutely necessary. No more dredging in Courtenay bay. No more play grounds in Toronto harbour. No more elevators at Halifax until the grain trade of the port will warrant the expenditure. No more drill halls anywhere. No more political dry docks in British Columbia. No more News Bureau in New York or anywhere else, costing $30,000 a year to puff the Government and write headlines about eminent mediocrities. No more Griffinhagens at $10,000 a month to struggle with the hopeless task of reforming the Civil Service for a Government that does not seem to want reformation. Give the farmers, fishermen and other producers a chance. Do not spend too much time listening to the clamour of the Manufacturers' Association. Be vigilant in the collection of the income tax and see that no wealthy shirker escapes. Let the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance adopt these suggestions and they will earn the gratitude of the people of this country, and it will not be necessary for them to come before Parliament with deficits or with new methods of taxation to harass the people.

Mr. Speaker, if we could bargain with the Government to pay them by results, we would save an enormous sum of money.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

One proposal, and to my mind a practical one, is that we should ration this Government. Their late leader when in Opposition stated that an expenditure of $85,000,000 on all ordinary services was so enormous a sum as to be in itself evidence of corruption. When he made that statement he was loudly cheered by his supporters, many of whom are still in the house supporting the present Administration. The expenditure arising out of the war must, of course, be provided for; I am not now referring to war expenditure; but instead of voting $230,000,000 for ordinary expenditure on Consolidated Revenue account apart from the war, suppose we take hon. gentlemen opposite at their word and confine them strictly to the $85,000,000 that their late leader said was altogether too much, and then let them cut their coat according to their cloth.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister during the recess had been making speeches in Ontario and the West. One speech in particular has been brought to my attention. It was delivered in the county of Hastings, and in that speech he undertook to divide the people of this country into two classes. He is reported as follows:

> I see only two classes, only two divisions, in the country. On the one side are those who hold their heads steady and walk firmly and erectly in the midle of the road, who learn from experience, who believe in industry, order and liberty, who still have faith in British institutions and principles, that have made us what we are to-day. And on the other side I see those who have surrendered to prejudice and class consciousness, to passion for change and experiment, whose minds are occupied in nurturing suspicion and hostility against other classes of the State. On the one side I see the builders of this country's foundations tried and true. On the other side those engaged in the cheerful occupation of tearing down. I put the question to you. Are you going to be a nation-builder, or a nation-wrecker?

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was certainly complimentary to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Our minds "occupied in nurturing suspicion and hostility against other classes in the States." Surely we are not so bad as that. I fear my right hon. friend has been looking at us through such distorted party spectacles that he has failed to see our good points. He divides the people into two classes: the nation-builders and the nation-wreckers. The nation-builders, I suppose, are the men who follow him and do his bidding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Those who do, and those who ought to.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are very few of the latter.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): And the wreckers, I suppose, are those who venture to oppose him. The "wreckers" are the men who stand for freeing the necessaries of life and the implements of production from their present burdens, who stand for a 50 per cent preference to Great Britain, reciprocity on natural products with the United States, honest government, a free Parliament, economy in administration, a decent franchise, and recognition of the rights of labour.

Mr. Speaker, there was once a King in England, by the name of Charles the First, who believed in the high Tory principles of my right hon. friend. He would tolerate no change and no reform. He, too, held his head high, and he occupied so much space in the middle of the road that the common people were crowded into the gutter. In the end, the people of England found it necessary, in order to save themselves and to save the State, to chop off his head.

Now, Sir, I hope nothing of that kind, except in a figurative sense, will ever happen to my right hon. friend. These "wreckers," the Cromwells and the Hampdens and the Pyms and the Elliotts at once were transformed into nation builders; and, history now asserts that they were the genuine nation builders. Mr. Speaker, you cannot build a nation out of sugar magnates and pork barons and profiteers, or even out of the Manufacturers' Association. Nor can you build a nation by substituting secret Orders in Council for Acts of Parliament and ignoring the rights of the common people and elevating protection into a dogma. Just think of a man talking about British principles of justice who was the author of the War-time Elections Act! Our representative system in this country is based on the franchise. If the franchise can be manipulated for partisan purposes, then the system is rotten at its very core. This proposition will be accepted by every honest man, that absolute fairness in the use of the ballot is the only safety and the first requisite of a decent democracy. When we think of the flagrant injustice of the Franchise Act of last session, by which tens of thousands of partisan enumerators at every election are to be selected by the Government, under the vicious methods of the old partisan system, to strike the jury to try themselves, the less said about principles of justice the better. We had examples of this brand of justice in the by-elections during the recess, in which the dice were so heavily loaded that resistance was futile. The mode of procedure is something like this: His Honour the Speaker issues a writ for a by-election, and the minister of elections then gets busy. The general returning officer is instructed to select his deputy, whose chief qualification is that he must be a partisan of the Government. The sheriff is passed over, because, being a responsible public official, he cannot be depended upon to serve the ends of the party. The result is that the general returning officer, not being acquainted in the riding, is practically forced to accept the recommendation of the Government candidate. The deputy returning Officer, himself a partisan, forthwith appoints one hundred additional partisans, one for each polling sub-division in the riding, and they in turn call in scores of other partisan heelers to assist; and among the whole force there is not a single representative of the Opposition. The result is a partisan list of the most approved type. Patronage, we are told, has been abolished; but this system is built from top to bottom of patronage and partisanship. It begins at the top and works downwards. It reminds one of the method in the old nursery rhyme in which the cat began to kill the rat, and the rat began to gnaw the rope, the rope began to beat the dog, and the dog began to bite the pig, so with the help of them all the old woman and her pig got safely over the stile. The strange thing about it is that the men who invented this system and made it a law of the country pose as champions of British justice and British fair-play. Hon. gentlemen in their speeches during the recess, have persisted in calling us on this side the remnant of a once great party. May I suggest that they look for a moment at their own decimated ranks? The holders of Cabinet positions in the present Administration do not claim to represent the once powerful Union party nor even the old Liberal-Conservative party. As a matter of fact, they have no mandate from any party, but, if I may be permitted to use the language of our mutual friend, Mr. Hampden Burnham, they are simply Mexican buccaneers who have seized the treasury and are clinging to office on the record of the old Union government. It will not be denied that the men of standing and influence have withdrawn themselves from this Government—in Nova Scotia, the men that gave respectability to the Government, were the late Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), and Hon. A. K. Maclean; in New Brunswick, Hon. Frank Carvell; in Ontario, the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr.

Mewburn), the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White), the hon. and gallant member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), and the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell); in the Prairie Provinces, the present leader of the Farmers' party (Mr. Crerar); and in British Columbia (Mr. Burrell). These gentlemen have all withdrawn from the Government. By far the strongest and most influential half of the Union Cabinet has deserted the bridge and refused any longer to be responsible for steering the ship. The remnant, to use the expression hon. gentlemen opposite apply to us, still remain. They never had the confidence of the country and appear to have lost the confidence of a great many of their own associates. Still, hon. gentlemen opposite persist in describing us on this side as a "remnant."

I have said that the tariff issue is again being forced to the front: It is quite obvious, if we are to judge by the Government press, that a determined effort is to be made to confuse and becloud that issue. It is not at the present time an issue between free trade on the one hand and protection on the other; there is no such conflict. The speeches of my right hon. friend were directed against a situation that does not exist. The issue is between a tariff framed with a special eye to the demands, or rather the commands, of powerful special interests and a tariff whose object will be to secure the required amount of revenue with the least possible burden on the tax-bearer. I am well aware that this question of the tariff is one of difficulty on which honest men differ. The principles underlying the doctrine of a tariff for revenue are right principles. The right does not always win, but I have an abiding faith that the right will win in the end. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right in his naval policy, as he was also right in reciprocity. In both cases, however, he lost; but he has already been vindicated, and time has proven that he saw further into the future than the noisy flag-flappers and demagogues who opposed him. The flag, Mr. Speaker, is a powerful political weapon when men are prosperous as they were in 1911; but when the flour barrel is empty and the snow is on the ground, and the head of the house is out of work, there is not much comfort in hoisting the old flag on the school-house. The purpose of a tariff should be to secure revenue for the state, and not to put money into the pockets of special interests. Public opinion will demand that our taxation policy be framed with an eye to its effect on the great mass of the people. There can be no doubt about the policy of the Liberal party. It was cleverly defined at the great Liberal convention of 1919. But, let me ask, what is the policy of the Government on this vital question? As no popular convention of its party has been held, we have to look for the policy in the speeches of Government leaders. According to a report which appeared in the Montreal Gazette, my right hon. friend, at his meeting at Sherbrooke, Quebec, declared with great force that he had fought and would fight the free trade movement to the end of his political life. He is represented by the Gazette as saying that he believes in the principle of protection and will maintain that principle to the end of his political life. Now, I submit, with all due deference, that that language is reactionary. Progress means that civilization is moving in a desirable direction, and it is not desirable that the nations of this world should always be at war in matters relating to trade. With my right hon. friend it is not a question of securing revenue for the State, that is a mere incident. I have known public men who supported protection because they considered it necessary to temporarily assist weak industries, and also to raise a revenue. Sir John Macdonald was of that class. But we have produced very few public men who have regarded protection an an ideal and permanent condition. So far as I know, no country has ever yet placed all articles on the free list. Great Britain has always maintained a tariff, but it has been a tariff for revenue. The Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) repudiates that idea and declares his adherance to a tariff not for revenue but for protection. If my right hon. friend's ideals prevail, then the future is without hope for the consumer: protection of special interests will go on from age to age world without end. In other words when Macaulay's New Zealander, in the midst of vast solitude, takes his stand on a broken arch of London bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's, even then the special interests will be gathering in the shekels that they have not earned and digging deep into the pockets of the helpless consumer.

But probably the men who have made the strongest statements on this tariff question are the new converts. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) spoke at Montreal on November 15, and a report of his speech appeared in the Montreal Gazette. The item is headed "Closed Factories."

Let me point out to you what disastrous results would happen to our flourishing and great industrial province if the Liberals came into power, notwithstanding that when some of their prominent members are speaking in this province they talk strongly for protection. The Liberals are pledged, as I have pointed out to you, to increase the British preference to 50 per cent. I ask you what would happen to our great cotton and woollen mills, and many of our other industries, if we were thrown into competition to this extent with the cheap labour of the United Kingdom, and their old established industries that are dong a world-wide trade?

My hon. friend, who is accustomed to waving the Old Flag vigorously, when it does not affect his dividends, draws the line at the proposal to give a fifty per cent preference to Great Britain. He employs the same old scarecrow that did duty in 1911. He asks: what would happen to our industries? Let me remind my hon. friend that in 1897 he supported a party that gave a twenty-five per cent preference to Great Britain and nothing serious happened—our industries never were so prosperous as they were after that preference had been granted. At that time Sir Charles Tupper, the then leader of the Opposition, raised the same cry that my hon. friend is raising now. He said that the Fielding preference would ruin the industries of Canada. But Sir Charles was mistaken; the wolf did not come. It looks foolish to drag this aged and imaginary wolf out from its hiding place a second time after our experience after 1897.

The Minister of Marine did us the honour to visit Nova Scotia during the last parliamentary recess. On that occasion he called a meeting of the faithful in Halifax, and delivered one of his sounding-brass speeches. Here is an extract taken from his own special organ, the Montreal Gazette:

Mr. Ballantyne presented Premier Meighen's personal congratulations to the Liberal-Conservative Club, together with the Premier's promise to visit it personally in January. He brought a "word of cheer to Unionists" regarding the next election, declaring that the party was sound in wind and limb. He criticised the tariff policy of the Liberals, "the remnant of a once great party," he called them, and believed that, even were the Government defeated it would be by the Free Trade radicals. He prophesied that Mackenzie King would never be Premier of Canada.

"Sound in wind and limb." My hon. friend was probably quite right about the wind. "The remnant of a once great party." Now that characterization is easily explained. The party was great when my hon. friend belonged to it, and when he left it was a mere remnant. I might be permitted to point out to my hon. friend that at the last general election this "remnant" elected to this House, if I remember rightly, sixty-two out of sixty-five members from his own province, and I am told that there is a fair chance that the "remnant" may elect the whole sixty-five the next time.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most extraordinary and, I might say, ludicrous things in the whole history of public life in this country has been the spectacle of the late Prime Minister and the present Prime Minister travelling like itinerant pedlars over the province of Quebec looking among two millions of people for some one who would accept a portfolio in the Government, and failing to find a single man willing to undertake the risk involved in the venture. Still we are told "the party is sound in wind and limb." Let me read the last sentence from the paragraph which I just quoted:

He prophesied that Mackenzie King would never be Premier of Canada.

No doubt the wish was father to the prophecy. The trouble with my hon. friend is that he assumes to practise the gift of prophecy without being possessed of the infallibility necessary for a prophet. When a man resorts to prophecy all discussion has to stop. You can argue with an ordinary man but you cannot argue with a prophet.

One of the most startling incidents of the recess was the public admission of a change of heart on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of Colonization and Immigration (Mr. Calder). At Medicine Hat, according to the Montreal Gazette, he struck right out from the shoulder. Let me quote a short extract from his speech on that occasion:

Mr. Calder in opening his remarks told the audience that for years past he had been fooling the West and fooling himself with free-trade talk, but that more mature reflection had brought him to the fiscal views of his new leader.

Well, Mr. Speaker, all that I can say is that a public man, holding a position of trust as a representative of the people, should not attempt to fool anybody. This is a sorry admission on the part of the hon. gentleman. This trade question is no joke; it is a matter of grave concern, especially to the man who has to provide the necessaries of life for his family. Again, at Moosejaw, on October 26, my hon. friend occupied the same platform with the Prime Minister. The report of his speech states:

During his speech Mr. Calder said: It has been claimed that I have become a Tory. Well, I have not, and don't intend to.

What are you? shouted someone in the audience. There is one thing I am not, and that is a Mackenzie-King Liberal. I am a Liberal and as good a Liberal as I ever was.

Mr. Speaker, when Artemus Ward was asked about his principles he frankly admitted that he hadn't any—to use his own language—"nary a principle." Now that is peculiar, but it is not as peculiar as a man claiming to have two kinds of principles at the same time, and those two kinds diametrically opposed to one another. My hon. friend for many years was closely identified with the Liberal party in Western Canada. He was one of the apostles of free trade in that country. He was a sort of political Gamaliel. The people of the West sat at his feet and they thought they were learning the lessons of commercial freedom. They looked upon him as a thorough low-tariff man, and I understand that he made many converts. Now we are told he was fooling the West and fooling himself.

The extraordinary thing about the attitude of my hon. friend is that he still claims to be a Liberal, and he tells us at the same time that he has adopted the fiscal views of his new leader—and everybody knows that there is nothing Liberal about the fiscal views of the Prime Minister. There is a character, Mr. Speaker, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, with which you will be familiar, called Mr. Facing-Both-Ways. When any question came up for decision during his pilgrimage, Mr. Facing-Both-Ways tried to be on both sides. The extraordinary thing about my hon. friend is that he is trying to face both ways at the same time. He is posing as a sort of political contortionist who can perform the extraordinary acrobatic trick of planting his feet firmly in one direction and turning his face just as firmly in the opposite direction. If I may be permitted to do I would like to warn my hon. friend. If I remember Bunyan's story correctly, Mr. Facing-Both-Ways never reached the Celestial City. Take another extract from the hon. gentleman's speeches:

When I entered the Government I found that men in the Cabinet whom I had looked upon as Liberals, were what we had called Tories, and I found men whom we had thought were old crusted Tories were as Liberal in their sentiment as I was.

This was a startling discovery. He found that the Tories in the Union cabinet were Liberals, and the Liberals were Tories. During twenty years of association with these gentlemen he had never suspected this; he thought that the Liberals were Liberals, and that the Tories were Tories. It was only when he took his seat at the Council board and saw the inside of his colleagues, so to speak, that the actual truth dawned upon him. He then found for the first time that the real Simon-pure hidebound Tories were such men as the hon. leader of the Farmers' party (Mr. Crerar), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), and the ex-Minister of Public Works, Hon. Mr. Carvell; these hon. gentlemen were real old crusted Tories. They had been masquerading in sheep's clothing for the last twenty years until my hon. friend's discovery and exposure. On the other hand, the men of advanced Liberal views were my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid). These, Mr. Speaker, are the shining lights of Liberalism who are now to stand shoulder to shoulder with my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization in his gallant fight for the triumph of Liberal principles. My hon. friend says that he has changed his views on this vital question of the tariff. He is an honourable man and I accept his word. At the same time there are two distinct ideals; one is tariff for revenue, and the other tariff for protection. I can understand how a man can modify his views to suit the circumstances of trade and the needs of revenue, but I find it difficult to understand how a man sincerely searching for the right course can, without any new evidence, change his ideals.

The Government press is now claiming that the Government has a fighting chance at the next election on this tariff issue. Much depends on the attitude of those opposed to the present administration. Among the rank and file of the voters the Government at this moment is in a hopeless minority. The recent election in West Peterborough is an indication of the state of public feeling. If the Government has a fighting chance it is by dividing its opponents into two or three camps. If the Liberal party and the Farmers' party can reach a working agreement, I venture to make the forecast that the days of this Government are numbered. The Liberal party and the Farmers' party working together would be invicible; and, after all, the farmer is only a liberal in a hurry. Why should they not work together? Both stand for a large measure of commercial freedom; both stand for reciprocity with the United States in natural products; both stand for increasing the British preference. While there are differences in the platforms of the two parties, there are sufficient similarities to raise a strong presumption that those parties might pull together.

Mr. DAVIDSON: May I ask my hon. friend a question? He intimates that the policies of the two parties are the same. Does he agree with the Farmers' policy in regard to free coal?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): What is that policy?

Mr. DAVIDSON: May I inform my hon. friend that it was explained by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) last week when he plainly stated that one of the planks of the Farmers' party was free coal. Will my hon. friend's party go that far?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): My hon. friend will note that I said there were differences between the two platforms, but that they were not so material but what the two parties might form a working agreement. The question raised by my hon. friend is one of the matters to be adjusted. I was just about to say that in 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier risked everything to give the farmers wider and better markets for their produce and lost. What the Liberal party did in 1911 it is ready to do again in 1921. I question if there is a single thing that the Farmers' party can do for themselves that the Liberal party would not do for them.

There are certain political farmers in my own province, I am told, who have gone so far as to say that if they had control of the Government they could regulate the price of farm products so that the farmer would not be subject to losses by fluctuations of the market. No class deserves more consideration at the hands of a Government than the farmers. The farmer's business is regarded by many people as a safe and profitable business, but every man who has had actual experience, as I have had for I was brought up on a farm, knows that there is a large element of hazard in farming. The late spring frosts, the early frosts in the autumn, the drought of summer, the hail storms, the rust, the weeds, the weevil, the blight, the potato bug, the army worm, and the tax collector, including the custom house officer, have all to be reckoned with, and if the farmer can come out at the end of the year with a whole skin and something to spare he is a lucky man. During the last few years when prices were good, the average farmer had a margin over, and no man ever deserved a margin better. If it was within the power of the Government to regulate the prices of produce so that the farmer would always get a fair reward for his hard work, no fairminded man could object. I submit, however, that in so far as the exportable surplus is concerned, no Government has ever yet been successful in fixing prices by legislation, and any attempt to do so has not only been futile but mischievous. There are certain laws of commerce with which an experienced law maker will not attempt to interfere. When less of an article is produced than is consumed, the very scarcity will make the price high enough and no legislation will be necessary. When a country produces more than is consumed at home, and there is a surplus for export, the price at home is controlled by the price abroad, and legislation can have no effect whatever on prices. When the price of hides went down last year directly affecting the profits of Canadian farmers, the cause arose not in Canada, but in countries outside of Canada, such as the United States and the Argentine Republic. When the price of wool tumbled, you had to go to Australia to seek the cause. How, let me ask, could the business of these countries be controlled by legislation in Canada? The case only needs to be mentioned to show that the proposal to fix the prices of our exportable surplus by legislation is absurd. We have a recent example of an attempt at price-fixing in the neighbouring colony of Newfoundland. The price of fish was falling, and the people appealed to the Government to avert the impending calamity. The Government stepped in and fixed the price at $8 per quintal and forbade all purchases or sales below that price. The merchants bought the fish from the fisherman at the price fixed by the Government, and for a few months all went well. But the fish had to be sold abroad, and customers in the West Indies, Europe and the United States refused to pay the price fixed by the Newfoundland Government. The consequence was that the merchants could not dispose of the fish. The warehouses were soon filled. The merchants kept on buying as long as they could. They used up all their own capital and then borrowed from the banks. But they could not dispose of their fish, the banks then demanded payment, the result was a financial crash involving the fishermen as well as the merchants, so that the attempt of the Newfoundland Government to fix the price of fish really did more harm than good. What happened in Newfoundland is bound to happen anywhere else should a similar attempt be made. In the commerce of the world the law of supply and demand is just as inexorable as the tides or gravitation, and the public man who tells the people that he can successfully fix the price of our exportable surplus by legislation is either not well informed or is trying to work a green goods game on the farmer.

The suggestion has been made that the Government, through a commission, might purchase the crop and stabilize the price. But in buying and selling, risks must be taken and losses are inevitable. If the Government is to be responsible for the farmers' losses, then it must do the same for the fisherman, the lumberman, the miner, and the manufacturer. It would not in the end be to the advantage of the farmer if the Government were to assume a share of all the business risks of the nation. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the Government can do nothing to promote agriculture. I am only throwing out a word of warning against the nostrums of certain political agitators who are promising more than they can perform. The Government can do much by education; by improving transportation facilities; by regulating immigration so as to furnish a supply of farm labour; by lightening the farmers' burdens; by opening up wider and better markets for farm produce; by encouraging co-operation, and in many other ways. But the farmer, if he gets a fair chance, can always do more for himself than the Government can do for him—and, after all, the most important thing the Government can do for the farmer at the present time is to get off his back.

Too much cannot be said in favour of co-operation, but co-operation has nothing to do with politics. Marketing produce is business, and the experience is that the most expensive and inefficient concern in the world to do business is the Government. Mr. Speaker, if there is any proposal by which the interests of our great basic industry can be advanced, it is bound to meet with a sympathetic response from the great Liberal party. But as I have said, the forces of progress, if they are to succeed, must show a united front. Our opponents are united. They have the prestige of the old Liberal-Conservative party. They have the patronage, and in these days of hard times and lavish expenditure the patronage in the hands of unscrupulous men counts for much. They have a Franchise Act which will be run on strictly party lines and administered by partisan officers. The Government party is composed of men entrenched in special privileges who will fight desperately to maintain those privileges. They have also the sinews of war. Where do you find the wealth of the country? Do you find it in the Liberal party? Do you find it among the farmers, or in the ranks of labour? Who are the railway magnates in this country? Are they Liberals? The manufacturers of Canada, according to the last Year Book, are said to control a capital investment of $2,786,649,727. Some of these are Liberals, but the great mass of them are the old type of high-tariff Conservatives, and some of those who were once Liberals are falling, I am sorry to say, into the procession. Who are the great bankers and the heads of the big trust companies? Do you find them crowding into the Liberal party and endorsing the platform built at Ottawa in 1919? Take the House of Commons itself. Glance among the supporters of the Government, and I supose you can count a dozen millionaires grouped around and behind the Prime Minister. Look along the benches to your left, Mr. Speaker. Do you find wealthy men? There may be one or two, but they are as scarce as the righteous men were in Sodom in the olden days. My point is this: that with the big business and the wealth and the Franchise Act and the patronage all ranged on one side, it is absolutely essential that the common people should stand together and show a united front. The Allies smashed the Germans because they stood firmly together. Each had special questions to be dealt with, but they kept these in the background until they broke the power of the common enemy. Here is a lesson for the forces of Liberalism in Canada. Let us all unite for the coming struggle, and after we break down the oligarchy that is now in control it will be time enough to adjust any differences that may exist between the two great wings of progressive thought in this country. It is very desirable, of course, that in a great agricultural country like Canada we should have as many farmers as possible in Parliament, but they should come here as representatives of all the people, and not of one class. It is even more desirable that the forces of progress should show a united front. The ordinary man does not care one jot from what class his representative comes; he demands only that he represent his views and that he be fearless, honest and efficient—and it will not be contended that fearlessness, honest and efficiency are the exclusive possession of any one class.

Permit me to say Mr. Speaker, that we on this side are not downhearted. We have a captain on the bridge whom we all admire and trust. We have a policy that commends itself to the common people; all that we require to do is to put up a determined and energetic campaign, standing firmly on the platform of 1919. If we can win a Tory stronghold like West Peterborough against the combined force of the Government machine in a by-election, why should we not win scores of similar seats at the general election? The amendment of my leader is a challenge that the Government cannot afford to ignore, and I submit that no speaker on the Government side has met the challenge fairly. It is not denied that the members of this House supporting the Administration were elected in 1917 by the votes of both the old political parties. Tens of thousands of Liberals voted for candidates of the Government in 1917 on the distinct understanding that it was to be a war Administration and that faith would be kept in regard to other matters. The question before us is a moral question rather than a question of policy. The amendment of my leader may be voted down here but that will not settle anything. The decision that does count will be the decision that will be given by the men and the women of Canada at the polls when the boxes are opened and the ballots counted. That decision, hon. gentlemen opposite will be bound to respect. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. IRA E. ARGUE (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister on his elevation to the highest position in the gift of the people of this nation. Secondly, I want to congratulate him on the impression that he left in Western Canada on the occasion of his late tour. We always expect members on the Government side to gather round the right hon. gentleman and support him in the addresses which they make on an occasion such as this. But it is very gratifying when you find the Opposition, men who are opposed politically to my right hon. friend, stating frankly that, although they cannot agree with his political views, they must admire the frank and fearless manner in which he discusses the political issues before the country to-day. I did not intend to take part in this debate at the present time, but hon. members opposite have been rather strong in their criticism of the attitude of some of the supporters of this Government. We have been told that the Government has no mandate to carry on; that we are usurpers; some hon. members have gone even so far as to say that some of us have betrayed the trust placed in us by our constituents. I want to make my position plain in this House. Ever since I have taken any part whatever in politics, I have been a Liberal. I was nominated as a Liberal supporter of the Union Government in the election campaign of 1917. On every platform on which I appeared in my constituency, I told my constituents my position; I told them that if I were elected to support them in the House at Ottawa, I would support the Union Government in seeing that men, munitions and money were supplied to our soldiers until the last gun was fired, and after that I proposed to take my own course and use my judgment with reference to what I would support in this House; but that if the day ever came when I could not follow this Government, I would come back and hand my resignation to my electors. I was elected that day; I got my mandate that day from my constituents, backed by a majority of 3,700, and to those people alone am I responsible for my actions. When the time comes I am prepared to go back to them and to abide by their decision.

I want to look into the position of some other hon. members who tell us that we have no mandate, and that they are going to vote for a motion of want of confidence in this Government because it has no mandate. When Sir Robert Borden went to the country in 1917, he issued a manifesto in which, if my memory serves me aright, there were twelve planks. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was chosen as one of the supporters of that Government and he was elected on that platform. He stood in Winnipeg side by side with the present Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), and he never made any reservation as to any plank or any time; he supported that manifesto. When he came to Ottawa he took a Cabinet position with this Government, and for a year and a half he carried on as Minister of Agriculture. Then he resigned his portfolio and crossed the floor of the House, seven or eight of his friends from Western Canada crossing with him. With the exception of two, every one of those hon. members, who sit around him, was elected on that manifesto. One of those two is the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. J. F. Reid), who was elected as an Independent and who, therefore, has a perfect right to choose where he will sit in this House, and the other is the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), who was elected at a by-election in October, 1919, and who, as admitted by himself, sits in this House today as an instructed delegate of fifteen men who hold his signed resignation. I want to know where these hon. gentlemen, who are going to vote on this amendment, got their mandate. Has ever one of them gone back to his constituents and asked for an endorsation of the position he holds in this House? Not one of them, not even their leader, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), has done so. They have no mandate for the position they hold; yet, they expect to vote for this amendment, to vote a want of confidence in this Government and to say, that we who are supporting this Government have no mandate from our constituents to do so.

During the last two years we in Western Canada have been looking for redistribution. If we get redistribution, the four western provinces will likely be represented in this House by twenty more members. Saskatchewan should have five new members, and I know the people in my constituency want redistribution. I do not know what the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), whose constituency is next to mine, thinks on the subject, but I know a very large number of the people in his constituency want redistribution, because his constituency is very large and unwieldy. I was surprised the other day when the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), speaking about redistribution, said that he would be afraid to leave that matter to this Government to handle; that there would be gerrymandering. That is an old political party cry that we have heard for years and years, and I thought this new party was above all that; that it was blazing a new trail in this country and dropping all the old party cries, and that we would hear no more of them. I believe this Government is quite as capable of giving us redistribution as any other Government that could be elected in Canada.

The other night the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) discussed the question of freight rates. The people of the West have no objection to paying their way, of paying their fair share of whatever it costs to run our railways, but we object to paying more than our share. I believe the sooner we can have a readjustment of those rates, the better it will be for the whole country and much better for the western provinces.

Let me now take up the question of the much-abused Wheat Board, and let me say right here that if any Government in Canada has ever passed a piece of legislation that has been of benefit to the farmers of Western Canada, it is the legislation constituting the Wheat Board. But when the Wheat Board was appointed, it was not accepted in that way. I will not say that our papers in Western Canada were unanimous in condemning, but the great majority of them condemned this Government from Monday morning until Saturday night for constituting the Wheat Board. They even went so far as to say that, in regard to those participation certificates—"anticipation certificates" they called them—they advised the farmer to get rid of them, dispose of them, sell them at anything he could get for them; that after this Government got rid of the Wheat Board, all the money that went into the farmers' pockets would never enrich them. The sad part of the matter is that many farmers disposed of their participation certificates at five, seven, ten cents a bushel to speculators, who reaped fortunes by buying them out. The other night, when the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) was speaking, he was asked what his attitude was during his election campaign with reference to the Wheat Board. He said that the Wheat Board was not in existence during his campaign, and he was supported in that by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg).

Mr. GOULD: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I did not make the statement the hon. gentleman alleges.

Mr. ARGUE: All I have to do is to turn up Hansard. Here it is:

> Mr. Cowan: Is it not true that at the election in which the hon. member was elected he and every part of his constituency were opposed to the existence of a Wheat Board; that he fought it from beginning to end and that he was elected as an opponent of the Wheat Board?
>
> Mr. Gould: That is another bugaboo. I do not think the hon. gentleman can find in Assiniboia any sentiment whatever in that direction. I will give to the House this evidence—

Mr. Cowan: That is not the point at all. The point is that my hon. friend was elected straight on that platform and nothing else.

Mr. Maharg: There was no Wheat Board in existence then.

Mr. Cowan: Yes, there was.

Mr. Maharg: Not on your life.

Mr. GOULD: My point of order was that the hon. gentleman alleged I said there was no Wheat Board in existence. I made no such statement, and Hansard proves it.

Mr. ARGUE: I will continue the quotation:

Mr. Gould: The hon. gentleman is mixed as to his facts. I might tell the House that not on any of the many platforms on which I stood during my whole election was the Wheat Board mentioned—

Mr. GOULD: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARGUE (reading):

I say that to-night as an hon. member of this House.

Mr. ARGUE: When we look up the records of that election we find that the Wheat Board was one of the burning questions before the people of that constituency. They were told that this Government had appointed the Wheat Board and that the farmers were losing in consequence anywhere from ten to forty cents a bushel on their wheat. That was in October, 1919. What were they saying in 1920 about the Wheat Board? All hands were up for a Wheat Board in 1920, after the Board had gone out of existence. As my hon. friend from Springfield (Mr. Richardson) used to say, it was a case of "You're damned if you do, and damned if you don't."

Mr. GOULD: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he can produce any evidence to support his statement that the Wheat Board was made an election issue in my campaign? I absolutely deny it.

Mr. ARGUE: I am not prepared to say whether, had the Wheat Board been in existence this year, it would have made any difference in the price of wheat at the terminal elevators. But one thing I do know, and that is it would have stabilized the price at the country elevators. When the Wheat Board was in existence, after the farmer had done this threshing he knew how many bushels of wheat he had, knew what grade it was, and knew to a cent what it was worth at his station. He could go to his banker and say: I have so many bushels of wheat out on my farm, and I want so much money to carry it till the ground freezes, so that I can get on with my fall work; when I market my wheat I will pay you off. But how could that be done this year? There was no Wheat Board in existence this year. Take my own little city of Swift Current. Nine miles west of us is Beverley with two elevators. Now I have seen farmers haul their wheat past Beverley into Swift Current and make fifteen cents a bushel. Then nine miles south is Dunelm on the Vanguard line. I have seen farmers haul their wheat past Dunelm into Swift Current, and make eighteen cents a bushel on the same grade of wheat.

Then, there is the question of trackage price and street price. When I sold my wheat there was eleven cents difference between the trackage price and the street price. Now all the elevator man had to do when a man came in with a load of wheat was to pay eleven cents less for it than it was worth on the track. The farmer must sell his wheat, because he must have money to buy coal and provisions for his family. The elevator man would pay him eleven cents less than it was worth on the track, and the next day he would put it through the elevator and load it on the car and sell it for eleven cents more than he paid for it. These are the things which are disturbing the farmers of the West. We are not satisfied with our grain handling system, and we are asking that the Government appoint a commission to investigate the whole matter and take control not only of the terminal elevators but of all the individual elevators up and down the line. We want to know how many hundreds of thousands of bushels of No. 1 Northern the elevators buy, and how many they sell. We want to know that with respect also to No. 2, No. 3, No. 4 and No. 5. We want to know how much they make out of what they call the promotion of grade. We want to know how many thousands of bushels they have left in their elevators at the end of the season, and what becomes of it. If you take up any of the reports of the elevator companies, you will not find the overages mentioned, and there is nothing to show what they have made by the promotion of grade. What we are asking the Government to do is to appoint a commission to make a thorough investigation of the wheat handling system, and ascertain the best system of handling wheat from the time it leaves the producer until it gets to the consumer.

Mr. JOHN A. CAMPBELL (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my remarks on the Address I wish to extend, as others have done before me, my very sincere personal congratulations to the Prime Minister in having attained the highest office in the gift of the people. In some respects I may differ from him in matters of policy, but personally I sincerely congratulate him and wish him every success. I also wish to extend my felicitations to the mover and the seconder of the Address. I had not the pleasure of listening to their remarks, but according to statements made regarding them their speeches were not only a credit to themselves, but did honour to their constituencies.

I have listened to a number of the speeches on both sides of the House in this debate, and have read some others, and I have been struck by the fact that there has been very little in the way of enunciation of party policies in any of the speeches so far delivered. That applies not only to the speeches of the leaders, but to those of their followers. The speech from the Throne contained a clause, outlining the Government's policy on the tariff question. For what purpose that was inserted I do not know. However, I do not think it was a bad idea. Probably the Government thought they might get some idea of where the members of the House stood on this question before they brought down their policy in connection with the Budget. If that was the idea, they must have been disappointed for there has been very little definite statement of tariff views so far. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. King), followed the seconder of the Address, and ignored the tariff problem, in fact, ignored practically everything that was in the speech from the Throne. He raised the question of a great constitutional crisis, and claimed the Government had no mandate to continue in office. The Prime Minister, in reply, devoted his attention entirely to rebutting and refuting, in his opinion at any rate, the statements made by his opponent. Shortly afterwards, the leader of the Progressive party discussed the points already raised, and to some extent outlined his policy and that of his party. Up to that time his speech was the only one in which the policy of any of the parties had been outlined to any extent. The followers of the different parties naturally took their cue from their leaders, and the result is that the definite laying down of party policies has hitherto been notable by its absence.

I gather from the speeches already delivered that there were in the main two questions raised; first, the question of confidence or otherwise in the Government, and secondly, the tariff question. Before discussing these questions, I should like to direct attention of the House for a moment or two to my position in this House.

It may possibly not have escaped your attention, Sir, that since last session I have crossed the green carpet and now occupy a position on the side opposite the Government. I do not know that that fact is of any particular significance. I have not changed my policy nor my ideas politically by doing so. It may be simply a question of expediency or form. For the first year of the term I occupied a position directly in front of you, Sir. I chose what subsequently became known as the cross benches, in the first instance, for physical reasons, because it was a position from which I could both see and hear better than I could from any other part of the floor available, for neither my sight nor my hearing is particularly good. During that session the work of the Government was entirely or almost entirely concerned with carrying on the war, and I supported it throughout. Before the second year commenced the war had fortunately ended, and during that year not only was the Government concerned with questions arising out of the war, but it took up some matters which might be considered as having no direct connection with the war. That may be a matter of opinion. However, one such matter was the tariff and another the question of taking over certain railways. In this connection I found that it was necessary for me to differ from the Government, because I did not approve of their policy so far as the tariff was concerned. And subsequently, in the second session when the matter of railway legislation came up and we were considering the taking over of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, while I approved of the policy—there seemed to be nothing else to do under the circumstances—still I felt compelled to differ from the Government in one respect, namely, as to certain of the terms of the agreement, in which connection I moved an amendment. I am satisfied that my atitude was right, and I have every reason to believe that some at least of the members of the Government were thoroughly in accord with me. It was during that time that the cross benches began to take on political significance. Some of those who held similar views to mine were there, and others of like mind joined us, while some of those who did not share our opinions moved away. Then we came to this Chamber, where the seats are differently arranged and last year I occupied a seat on the other side. So far as I can recollect the only question of moment on which I really differed from the Government was the question of policy involved in the Budget; I found that I was not in accord and had to vote against them. So this year, on coming to the House I decided that it was but fair not only to myself but to the Government that I should take up a position somewhat apart and act in such a way as I thought would be advisable in the interests of the country.

This does not mean that I differ from the Government now any more than I did in the past. It is quite probable however that my ideas will be found to be at variance with those of the Government in connection with the tariff. It may be that in the Budget to be brought down certain amendments may be made which will enable me to vote for the proposals. I can only say that I shall give them the benefit of any doubt. I am quite unrepentant so far as votes I have given are concerned. I am satisfied that they were right, and in some cases my stand will be shown to have been right. In other instances there is and always will be room for debate. I have no desire to see a change in government just at the present moment that would produce unnecessarily chaotic conditions.

As I mentioned before, the question of the tariff has been introduced in a clause in the Address. This, I understand, is somewhat unusual. It was intended, presumably, that the matter should thereby be open for discussion and it was a case of the Government's nailing its colours to the mast. I am not in favour of the principle of protection; I do not mind making that statement strongly and emphatically. It might be argued from that assertion that it would be necessary for me to oppose the Government and support the amendment to the motion which is now before the House. What I shall do remains to be seen; but I do not think that such is a necessary inference from my statement. At this particular time it is proper for us all to get away as far as possible from terminology and technicalities and try to get at the heart of things; and so far as I can make out the terms in connection with the tariff are not well defined, and people may and do think alike who are under different banners and call themselves by different names. The principle of protection, is not the main question before the House at this time; I make that statement, although I may be misunderstood in doing so. I had almost said it was not an issue; I am not prepared to go so far, but it is not an issue of immediate concern. I do not wish to be misunderstood and I shall therefore try to make my position perfectly clear. When the debate on the railway question was in progress, I had the temerity to state that the question of public ownership was not an issue at that time. I thought so then and I think so now. I am satisfied that there were members on the Government side who all supported the Government's stand in that respect who were absolutely opposed to the principle of public ownership. That was a case where of necessity the Government had to do something; they had to become public owners whether they wished to do so or not; and therefore I say that the fundamental principle was not really at stake. I was satisfied at that time that if members of the Government had had placed before them any kind of reasonable offer from any private concern to take over those railways, that offer would have been accepted with celerity. And I think so yet.

In this case I am not prepared to go so far; but I say that the main business of the House at the present time is not to decide the principle of protection, but to deal with the tariff as it stands with a view to simplifying it, removing certain irregularities and passing upon certain matters in connection therewith regarding which, I think, not only those opposed to the principal of protection but those who are in favor of it are agreed. There are on the other side of the House and on the Opposition side to my right, members who, I think, have policies in this connection ranging all the way from free trade to moderate protection if that is a proper term. I do not know that there are any absolute free traders in the House, though theoretically there may be; but there are some who come pretty near it; so, eliminating the high protectionists, of whom there are some on both sides of the House, the remainder go all the way from free trade to moderate protection. I have been talking to some recently who have been known as strong protectionists all their days, and I was surprised to learn that they thoroughly agree with me, or I with them as the case may be, as to what is necessary and advisable, in the interests of the country, to do with the tariff at the present time; and there are many things upon which this House can agree in regard to the tariff before we come to the question of disposing of the absolute principle. For instance, we might direct our attention to the elimination of the duties in connection with industries that do not really need the benefit of any tariff at the present time; and there are such in Canada.

There are other industries which, even from their own standpoint, do not need as much protection as they are receiving at the present time, a fact that is well known.

Then comes the question of reducing the tariff on necessities and on the instruments of production to the minimum and, in some cases, the elimination altogether of the existing duties. This involves the question of giving the most encouragement to those industries which are indigenous to Canada, as against those of an adventitious nature, thus helping to develop the natural resources of which we hear so much.

The question, Mr. Speaker, is where does the House stand in respect to these matters? The position of the Prime Minister is clear and distinct—he is emphatically out for protection presumably similar to what we now have. The leader of the Opposition has not, this year, stated what his policy is; but one of his followers this afternoon announced that the Liberal party was standing on the platform of 1919. It is pretty clear what that platform is, but there is sometimes a question in my mind whether all the members of the Opposition to my right are supporting it in its entirety. The leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) has enunciated his platform on the tariff and I think that it is also clear and distinct. In connection with the statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) on the tariff, the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) took the ground that the leader of the Progressive party had not clearly stated his position. Well, that is a matter of opinion. Personally, I am inclined to think that my hon. friend from Marquette made a very clear-cut statement. At any rate, I am satisfied that I know where he stands, just as well as I know what the policy of the Prime Minister is on this question. But I must say that my hon. friend from Macdonald did not state his own views on this particular problem. Now I have been informed that the hon. member for Macdonald had some part to play in the formation of the platform on which the leader of the Progressive party now stands. That being so, I presumed that my hon. friend was thoroughly familiar with the Progressive platform; in fact that he supported it himself; but that appears not to be the case. If I am mistaken in this assumption, my hon. friend from Macdonald will correct me.

As I stated previously, some of the members of this House who are pronounced protectionists have intimated to me that the tariff is running amuck; that the present schedules are not really operating in the interest of those Canadian industries which it is intended to protect and foster. I am inclined to agree with these hon. gentlemen in that respect.

In connection with amendments proposed consideration should first be given to duties on the necessities of life. As already pointed out, there is not much difference of opinion as to the desirability of doing this, and there should be none. The duties on these necessities should be reduced to a minimum and in many respects eliminated altogether. The duties on textiles have often been discussed in this Chamber. I will not do more, at the present time, than refer to the enormous profits which the Dominion Textile Company has been able to make during the last few years. That company should need no assistance from the people.

A couple of days ago a memorandum was given to me with respect to an industry in Canada, the product of which might properly be classed as a necessity. I refer to the paint industry. The memo in question was given to me by a strong protectionist, a Conservative. I will only read part of it:

Sherwin-Williams Co. Optimistic about Paint Industry.

The sales of Sherwin-Williams Co. for the fiscal year ended Aug. 31 show a total of $75,952,000 which is a gain of $22,000,000 over the banner year of 1919. Comparison of the sales of $51,817,000 for the American Companies alone with the $36,992,000 of the previous year shows a gain of 40 per cent.

According to the balance sheet the company has current assets of $27,679,859 compared with current liabilities of $6,636,738. It has $992,855 in the cash account, and inventory of $15,814,260. During the year a stock dividend of 50 per cent was declared so that the surplus account shows $4,481,667 this year compared with $7,175,311 a year ago.

Attached to the memo is a clipping from a newspaper. It contains a New York despatch intimating that there is a combine between the white lead men in connection with the output of paint.

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: Is the hon. gentleman quoting the figures of the Sherwin-Williams Paint Company of United States, or the Sherwin-Williams Paint Company of Canada? They are of course two different companies.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The figures I have given from the quotation seem to include both companies. The point I wish to make——

Mr. BALLANTYNE: My hon. friend must know that the two companies are quite different, and I hope he will have the justice to say, when he is quoting such figures, whether they relate to the American or the Canadian company. As my hon. friend quoted the figures, the House would be led to believe that they had reference to the Canadian company.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I did not know, Mr. Speaker, that the two companies are entirely and distinctly separate. I understood they were affiliated companies, and that one was merely a branch of the other.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Oh, no.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understood in quoting the figures of the business done that they related not only to the American but also to the Canadian company. However, the point I wish to make is this: The paint industry seems to be very prosperous both in the United States and in Canada, and this particular company is doing a very large and extensive business, and realizing excellent profits, in both fields of activity. In my opinion, as well as in the opinion of the well informed gentleman who handed me this memo, the protection which is afforded to this company is beyond all bounds and a great deal more than what is necessary to fully protect the industry even if such protection were advisable.

There remains for me to deal with the question of the removal of the duties, or at any rate a very material reduction in the duties, on the instruments of production. I shall confine my attention at the present time merely to those required for the agricultural and mining industries. It was mentioned in a speech the other day that the average tariff on agricultural implements is very low. Again in this House this afternoon it was stated that generally speaking the average tariff is very much lower than it has been.

I am not concerned very much, Mr. Speaker, regarding average tariffs; I do not think that is a fair way of arriving at their incidence. To my mind the better way is to take specific instances, and then we know exactly where we are at. Regarding agriculture, notwithstanding the statement that the average tariff is very low—I forget the figures quoted—I find that some implements used in connection with agriculture are taxed as follows: Harvesters, partly complete, 12½ per cent; ploughs, cultivators and drills, 20 per cent; grain crushers and fanning mills, 25 per cent; gasoline engines, 27 or 30 per cent—I am not quite sure which; the humble wheel-barrow pays a duty of about 30 per cent; Ford cars and carriages are subject to a duty of 35 per cent. With respect to the Ford car, I do not think any hon. member will say that it is a luxury; at any rate, it has not hitherto been looked upon as such; but the duty of 35 per cent is certainly excessive and should be materially reduced, if not eliminated altogether. Agricultural producers have the above handicaps to contend with.

Contrary to what has been ferquently stated, mining machinery and utensils intimately connected with mining are not free. It is true that mining machinery and such utensils as I have mentioned are free when they are used in connection with iron and steel and associated industries. But why they should be admitted free when used by any particular industry and be subject to duty when not so used passes my comprehension. This is a matter which I simply wish to draw to the attention of the Government. In some cases machinery is admitted free. For instance, machinery for dredging gold is on the free list, as are also briquetting machinery, machinery for the manufacture of rifles, machinery for the manufacture of ship plates, and other kinds of machinery; but when we come down to the tools of the prospectors who make the original discoveries of our natural resources, we find there is a duty ranging from 22½ to 30 per cent. This duty, it is true, is not exacted when machinery and tools in connection with mining are imported for universities, endowed or otherwise, but when the ordinary prospector, who is not by any means a man of means, desires to buy tools for his work he has to pay the duties I have mentioned. Then I wish to draw the attention of the Government to the rates of duty on complicated and newly invented machinery, and I will mention only two or three varieties: Gyrating crushers, 27½ per cent; machinery for removing the overburden in connection with mineral deposits, very important in mining, 27½ per cent; gasoline locomotives, also very important instruments in mining development, 35 per cent. I submit to the Government that if they are anxious to relieve the burdens on the people at the present time, and to encourage that development of our natural resources about which we hear so much, such duties as I have named should be either removed altogether or reduced to the very minimum.

The other question to which the attention of this House has been directed for some time is that of the confidence or otherwise which this Parliament and the country have in the Government. I may not be a constitutional authority, but so far as I can see this Government, constitutionally, cannot be called usurpers; they are not in the position of overholding tenants by any means. Constitutionally, they are entitled to hold office just as long as they have a majority in this House, which will be put to the test shortly. However, there are two other points involved; one is as to the agreement or understanding reached by the members of the Government at the time the Coalition Government was formed in 1917, and the other is the present attitude and feeling of the people towards the Government.

I agree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean)—a former member of this Government—who spoke a few days ago. The hon. gentleman was on the inside in connection with the formation of the Coalition Government; I was very much on the outside. He knew exactly what transpired, and he has given his report in respect to that, and his opinion as to what should be done, and I see no reason why I should take issue with him thereon. As to my position, there was no contest in the constituency of Nelson, and with the exception of a few speeches of a semi-political nature at the time of nomination we heard none in the constituency during the period of the campaign, and I did not take part in the campaign in any other constituencies. However, I gained the impression at that time that the Government was formed for the period of the war and for such time thereafter as would be necessary to clear up matters particularly pertaining to the war, and I think my constituents had the same idea. It is true that, technically, the Coalition Government did come to an end when the new Government headed by the right. hon. the new Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) was formed, but I can only consider his Government as the direct successor of the Coalition Government.

However, in my opinion, the question is larger than that presented by speakers who have preceded me. I am inclined to think that it is not simply a question of whether the Government should give up office at the present time or not, but whether the whole Parliament should come to an end. We see statements in the papers that this Parliament—I do not refer to one side or the other, but to both sides of the House—is unrepresentative, unresponsive, moribund and stale. These expressions may be somewhat exaggerated, but nevertheless there is an element of truth in them. Any election within the near future would mean a great change not only on the Government side, but on this side of the House. Many hon. members who were elected in 1917 were urged to give their services solely on account of the fact that a peculiar situation had arisen, and that it was necessary to get a certain type of men to take office. These hon. members now think their mandate has expired. Certain other hon. members who were then elected have been referred to as "compromise" candidates and were placed in the position which they now occupy by their electors with the distinct idea that when the term mentioned had elapsed political conditions would revert to normal.

In another respect, however, I differ very materially with the argument and statements made by my hon. friend from Halifax, in that I contend that redistribution is a very important matter to be considered at the present time. While I am of opinion that there should be an election, not immediately, but before another session of the House, this should not be held until redistribution has taken place. There should be an election soon, but there should be redistribution sooner. The hon. member for Halifax gave his case away—perhaps inadvertently—when he said that the question of redistribution involved an increase of representation in certain parts of the country, and it necessarily followed that the representation would decrease in other parts of the country. I do not know that that necessarily follows, but in all probability it will be the result of increased representation in any one part of the country.

Without redistribution there will not be proper representation. For instance, let us assume that there are two constituencies of equal population, and that within ten years one half of one of those constituencies should move into another: If there were no redistribution, it would necessarily follow that the votes of the electors left in the first constituency would have three times the value of the votes of the electors in the second constituency. Of course, that may be a far-fetched case, but there are instances where such results obtain in Canada. I know constituencies which have fifty thousand or sixty thousand electors and others with only twenty thousand or thirty thousand.

It is generally the case, Mr. Speaker, that when changes are suggested, hon. members look for precedents. If we are to look for precedents for the holding of an election on or about the time of the taking of the census —the decennial period—we find that during the last three decades elections have taken place without such redistribution, very close to the times at which the census returns were made. I refer to the following elections: March 5, 1891; November 7, 1900; September 21, 1911. These precedents, perhaps, are against my contention, but the fact is they are such that we do not wish to follow them at the present time or at any time in the future. They are precedents that it is a good thing to get away from; I cite them merely to point out that they should not be followed. In these instances a great injustice was perpetrated on certain parts of the country by the holding of elections at these particular times.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is a local reason why I think there should be redistribution before an election. The constituency of Nelson is very large. It is approximately 200,000 miles in extent, being about four times as large as all the rest of Manitoba put together. It is in two separate and distinct parts: the southern part, by far the smaller portion, namely, the Swan River Valley, is composed almost entirely of fertile agricultural lands and settled by prosperous farmers, and the northern part, the great stretch of the northland, where almost every industry but farming is carried on. I might say here that this district has capabilities for farming, but these have not yet been brought into operation. Between the centre of the Swan River District and the southern edge or gateway to the great north, between the town of Swan River and The Pas, there is a stretch of railway of two hundred miles—we have to go out into Saskatchewan and back into Manitoba. The electors in the different ends of the constituency think they have no community of interest; they think that in the interests of the whole constituency they should be placed in different ridings. I am here to represent the views, as far as possible, of those who sent me here. I simply place this matter before the House, not as the main reason, but as an incidental and important reason why I think as I do in this connection.

Now, I propose to place before this House a concrete proposal. I think there is a way whereby we can have both a redistribution and an election. The last speaker intimated that the electors in his district were very strong for redistribution. I think that is a feeling which prevails throughout the whole of the West, also, that the West is pretty strongly in favour of an election; I can come to no other conclusion, notwithstanding statements made here to the contrary, and I am now inclined to think that the East largely entertains the same view. What I suggest, then, is that this House proceed with the necessary business of the session; that it pass whatever legislation may be in the interests of the country at this time; that an adjournment be then made until early fall, and that in the meantime the census be expedited, especially in respect to such returns as are absolutely necessary for the Redistribution Bill. When the House meets in the fall the Redistribution Bill could then be put through, and, as soon as might be thereafter, an election should be held. This would cover the objections raised by various parties to an election without redistribution. With this whole scheme in view, I shall take up the different suggestions in a little more detail.

I say that the House should proceed with the business of the session; by this I mean not only the extremely urgent business, but such business as may be necessary at this time in the interests of the country. I would not exclude the amendments to the tariff which the Government, I understand, intend to bring down. In fact, I think that it is very important that these tariff proposals should be submitted. If they are brought down—and that is another reason why I wish things to continue as they are for the time being, at any rate—we shall have something definite and concrete in the way of a tariff placed before the House; we shall get a definite idea as to where the different members on both sides really stand. I am not afraid of the issue, and I do not know that any other hon. member is afraid of it. It has been suggested that some are not travelling exactly under the right colours. However, if certain definite proposals are placed before us we shall know absolutely where the different parties stand; the House and the country will know the policy of the Government, of the Opposition, and of the Progressive party.

I have suggested that after the necessary legislation is put through there should be an adjournment until early fall, not another session. There are precedents for that also. Long adjournments of the Canadian House are mentioned in Bourinot as follows: 1867 to 1868, from the 21st December to the 12th of March, to enable the Government to consider and complete measures. No more important issues were at stake then than are before us at the present time. There was an adjournment in 1873, from the 23rd of May to the 13th of August, to receive the report of the Royal Commission on the Canadian Pacific Railway scandal. The fact is that the House prorogued on the 13th of August without receiving the report; but that does not alter the precedent in any way. The House adjourned from the 23rd of December, 1880, to the 4th of January, 1881, in connection with certain issues relating to the Canadian Pacific contract. In 1911 there was an adjournment from the 19th of May to the 18th of July to enable Sir Wilfrid Laurier to attend the Imperial Conference and the coronation. Notwithstanding the fact that the question of reciprocity was very strongly before the people at that time, the House adjourned for two months. These precedents are very much to the point, and I think it is fair to say that the issue before the House at present is fully as important as the issues which gave occasion for any of these adjournments. There is in connection with the last adjournment mentioned another degree of similarity, namely, that the Prime Minister and his associates wish to attend the Imperial Conference very shortly. In order that this session may continue at the time I have mentioned, it may be necessary to expedite to some extent the compiling of such portions of the census returns as are necessary for the purpose of bringing down a Redistribution Bill, not generally speaking to quicken up the returns. I am advised by the census authorities that by September sufficient data can be gathered to allow of a Redistribution Bill being drafted, and by the time that this House will need to meet all the returns will be ready. At a reasonable time after the redistribution Bill has been dealt with and passed, a dissolution of Parliament may take place and an election be held before another session. In his speech the other day the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) accepted the challenge of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) saying in effect: "We are not afraid of an election we desire it as much as you, but we want redistribution first." In fact, I think the general tenor of the remarks of hon. gentlement opposite was that they would be glad to have an election, to meet the party to my right or my left, at any time provided redistribution comes first. My proposition would thus appear to be a solution of the difficulties of hon. members on all sides of the House; it is sound, sane, feasible, and, if I may use a word which is somewhat overworked, constructive, and also it is what the country is looking for just now. In order, therefore, to put the matter into definite shape before this House, so that the House will have an opportunity to pass upon it, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis), an amendment to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition as follows:

That all words after "that" in the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Existing political conditions call for redistribution, and a general election at an early date thereafter, and that this Parliament should proceed forthwith to pass such legislation as may be necessary, at this time, in the interests of the country and then be adjourned to the earliest date at which the census returns will be available, for the purpose of making the necessary changes in the Representation Act; and that a general election be held as soon thereafter as possible; and, further, that the work of taking the census and completing such returns as may be necessary for the redistribution for the representation be expedited so far as practicable.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not call in question the form of the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member (Mr. Campbell), but put it to the House subject to more careful inquiry during the dinner hour.

Mr. WILLIAM JOHN BLAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it is necessary for me to take up the time of the House in further congratulating the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on his elevation to that high office. I have already done that personally. I would, however, like to add my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Address on the able manner in which they performed their duty.

My intention in taking part in this debate is to touch upon two matters, both of which are of political importance to Western Canada. The first to which I wish to refer is the matter of bringing on a general election at this time. In the year 1911 an election was sprung upon us just as the census figures were being completed, and for six years, from 1911 to 1917, the province from which I come was represented in this House by seven members instead of twelve, and a similar condition would no doubt arise again if an election were held before redistribution took place. The mover of the amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been recently through the West, and I think he will agree with me when I say that, as leader of his party, he has very little to hope for from the West. To bring on an election at this time would be taking an unfair advantage of particularly the four western provinces. Of recent months, I have been through my constituency a number of times, and I must admit there has been a demand for an election, but only from those who were opposed to this Government in the first place, and particularly from those who were opposed to this Government's war policy. I have not heard of a demand for an election from the Liberals who supported me and who were many; I have not heard of it from the Conservatives who supported me, and there were many of them too. The fact of the matter is that the people in the province of Alberta are not wasting very much time in thinking about party politics; they are attending to their business and going ahead as best they may.

The question which I want to deal with particularly and which seems to me of greater importance to the three Prairie Provinces than anything that has as yet been discussed in this House, is the matter of handling the farmer's grain. I need not state that agriculture is now and probably always will be the great industry of those three provinces, and grain growing is the most important branch of agriculture. At the outset I want to say that I agree with the remarks and the suggestions made by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) in the latter part of the speech which he made in this House the other day. Everything he said in connection with that subject is the truth, but I want to remind the hon. member that he did not, by any means, tell the whole truth. Indeed, I do not know that there is in this House a member who is fully and well-enough informed upon the subject of handling grain and the disabilities under which the farmers operate to be capable of telling the whole story. We get small threads of it here and there; we hear rumours, many of which are no doubt true; but they have not been established, and they have not been referred to particularly in this House. Of course, any disability under which the farmer suffers pertains somewhat also to the consumer; but, as is most other lines, the man who is at the primary point of production is the first man to suffer from those injustices. I regret many of those who represent constituencies in the eastern provinces are not more fully acquainted with the methods by which grain is handled in Western Canada.

I would like to speak particularly on how completely the farmer is at the mercy of the grain dealer. When you consider that his grain is threshed and harvested and marketed, sometimes as far east as Fort William, in the course of a very few weeks, you can see that a good deal of the work that is done cannot be closely supervised, and the first opportunity the grain dealer has to "get" the farmer is the minute he drives his wagon load of wheat upon the scales of the country elevator. These scales are owned and controlled by the grain dealer, and are operated by one of his employees. A few days before I left my home, my nearest neighbour drove off the scales of a well-known elevator company in our town to the scales of another elevator company, and found there was a difference of eight bushels between the time he left the one company and got to the other. Now that eight-bushel loss means that the farmer was losing from ten to twenty per cent of his wheat, and at this point there will probably be marketed this year $1,500,000 of grain. So if all the companies are as dishonest as the one to which I refer attempted to be, there will be a loss of anywhere from $100,000 to $300,000 for the farmers in that way alone, at that one point; and that is only one of thirty-five shipping points in the constituency I represent.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR (resuming): When the House rose at six o'clock I was referring to the methods of some of the grain companies that are operating at country points in the Prairie Provinces. I had mentioned the fact that it had been reported to me that a farmer had driven his load of grain from one elevator to another and found in doing so that it had increased some eight bushels in weight. That meant probably from 10 to 20 per cent of the value of the whole load of grain, and at the point where I live and market my grain it would mean from $100,000 to $300,000 per year that would be taken out of the farmers of that immediate district. There are in the riding in which I represent some 35 shipping points on the different lines of railway; so that it will be seen that if the Government proposes to do anything towards investigating this condition, the place at which to begin is the beginning, at the country elevators.

It would seem to me that a method could be easily devised to take the weighing away from the elevator companies and place the handling of it under the control and direction of Government officials. In addition to the weighing of the grain at the country elevators, the operator of the local elevator is also charged with the grading of grain under certain conditions, and this is where the small farmer particularly is squeezed. The small farmer who has less than a car-load of grain to ship drives up to the country elevator and is at the mercy of the operator, not only as regards the weighing of the grain, but so far as the grading as well is concerned. Grain sold in this way is refered to as street wheat, and as stated by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Argue), there is no reason why there should be much difference between street wheat and track wheat offered on the market at Fort William. But at one point on one of the lines of railway in my riding there was a difference of as much as 47 cents a bushel between the street wheat and track wheat on one particular day this fall, and at a point within 35 miles of this very place on another line of railway some of the same companies were operating and paying for street wheat only about 20 or 22 cents less than track wheat. There was a combine undoubtedly amongst the elevators operating at the first point—there can be no question in the world about that—and that combine existed for the purpose of killing competitive buying. At the other point the ordinary methods of competitive buying were practised, and the farmers there were coming from greater distances, delivering their wheat and getting a square deal.

There is another phase of the question to which I want to refer, and that is the position in which the operator of the country elevator finds himself. He is an employee of these large companies, some of them very large indeed, and he is engaged on a salary and put under heavy bonds. He is charged with the responsibility of taking in the grain, weighing it out and grading it, and in many instances paying for it. If there is a bank, payment is made by cheque, and if there is not he has to pay in currency. He loads his wheat or other grain into the cars; it is delivered at Fort William and weighed from the cars into the terminal elevators. It is never made known to him during the whole operating season how the cars weigh out. They may be short or over, but the facts are never made known to him, and frequently at the end of the year, after everything is closed up, a representative of the elevator company comes along and without giving particulars, without telling him how these things happened, informs him that he is short, two, or three, or five hundred bushels, as the case may be, and the operator is ordered to make good the shortage. You can see the temptation that is placed in the way of an operator of a country elevator. If he desires to be honest he has the knowledge that this club may be continuously swung over his head.

I might remind the House that during past sessions we have heard about screenings or dockage, and we got some rather interesting information a session or two ago before a special committee of this House known as the Cost of Living Committee. I would like to explain that if these screenings are under three per cent at Fort William they become the absolute property of the terminal elevator. If they are over three per cent they become the property of the farmer. Now the farmer pays for the threshing of the wheat that he delivers to the country elevator and he pays there a cent and three quarters a bushel for handling it. He also pays the elevator a commission and he pays the freight. Yet at Fort William, when the screenings are three per cent or under the terminal elevator gobbles the whole thing without having paid one cent in the matter of production, transportation or anything else.

Mr. J. F. REID: Who pays for the cleaning of the screenings?

Mr. BLAIR: The terminal elevator, but I would be very glad to go into the terminal elevator business myself if I could get such a concession as I have described. As I say, the farmer pays every other charge, and in two crop years during the war the.

price at the terminal elevator of these screenings was $35 a ton. That is a higher price than is being paid on the market to-day for No. 2 C.W. oats.

Mr. MAHARG: Who regulates the screenings; who makes the recommendations in connection with that matter?

Mr. BLAIR: It is perfectly legal, as I understand, for the terminal elevator to take the three per cent.

Mr. MAHARG: My question was, who makes the recommendation?

Mr. BLAIR: I do not know that that matters. The point is that we want the whole thing investigated in order to bring out the facts. Now as to the matter of overages. That has been fully dealt with by the member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), and I do not propose to say much upon the subject. I have heard it argued that the terminal elevator should get the overages because it must pay for the shortages. Now I do not know of any more convincing way to answer that argument than to say that such a contention amounts to this: Because the terminal elevators pay for what they are caught stealing they should be allowed to get away with what they are not detected in stealing.

A great deal has been said with respect to the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. Properly and honestly conducted, a grain exchange cannot be objected to. It is a legitimate place for buyers and for sellers, just as in the case of other commodities. But the Winnipeg Grain Exchange has become practically the whole channel through which our western wheat reaches the eastern miller and the buyer overseas. One rule that I believe exists with the Winnipeg Grain Exchange is objectionable. The member for Macdonald explained how the prices are fixed at country places. These prices are sent out by the North West Grain Dealers' Association each day, after having been fixed by an officer of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, and the rule to which I refer declares that any member of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange who is found paying a higher price than that authorized by its officer is doomed to expulsion from the organization.

I have had personal experience in this matter. On one occasion I sold three carloads of oats to a member of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. He signed a contract on a certain date and I had the privilege of shipping these oats later on. When I was ready to ship the oats the price had dropped. They were loaded through the elevator of a well-known grain company and immediately these oats were shipped they wrote and asked me why I had not sold my oats to them. I replied that I had been able to get a higher price than they were willing to pay me. I immediately got a request for all papers and documents in connection with this transaction, but I refused to comply with the request and, so far as I know, the matter was dropped. But the point I want to make is that if these people are able to penalize the man who goes out into the open competitive market and buys from the farmer at a higher price than the price authorized at Winnipeg, they will do so if they can find a way.

I now want to say a word or two with reference to the Wheat Board. Like every other public institution that Board at one stage of its existence was extremely unpopular, and at another stage it became extremely popular. I am quite sure that if I had been in the hands of fifteen committee men in my riding in the year 1919 they would have enforced my resignation from this House. I am just as sure that if my resignation had then taken place, my successor would also have been re-called last fall because the Wheat Board was not re-established. The fact of the matter is that the unpopularity of the Wheat Board was the result of the persistent and systematic agitation carried out by men who wanted to knock this Government by any means they could employ for the purpose. These men went about the country and told the people that the participation certificates or the "anticipation" certificates were next to valueless, and I know one man in my own neighbourhood who, as a result of the agitation, took his certificates home and threw them into the stove. Other men sold them in great numbers for a price not greater than twenty-one cents a bushel. Eventually these certificates were redeemed by the Wheat Board at forty-eight cents a bushel. These agitators—and some of them were paid agitators—who went through the country working up this agitation for the sole purpose of knocking the present Government, through the Wheat Board, caused a loss to the farmers which aggregated hundreds and thousands and perhaps millions of dollars. They told the farmers that this Government was their enemy, but they awakened one day to find out that their real enemy was to be found right in their own organization. The Wheat Board rendered efficient and valuable service to the farmers of Western Canada, and I have here a testimonial which I think ought to bear some weight with the members of this House. This testimonial was given by a member of the Wheat Board, it was given by the man who is the President of the United Farmers of Alberta, Mr. H. W. Wood; it was given at a public meeting attended by some two thousand farmers and the report of the proceedings appeared in a paper which is not always friendly to the present Government, the Edmonton Bulletin. This is a verbatim report from the Edmonton Morning Bulletin:

> The Canadian Wheat Board during its existence saved the Canadian farmer 50 millions of dollars and I am certain that if it continues to sell their grain along the same lines as before its abolition by the Government that it would save the farmers of this country several millions more.
> The Wheat Board in the past has rendered efficient service and there is no reason why it cannot be continued along efficient operative lines providing you get the right kind of men on the Board. But let me tell you this, just as soon as you get politics and inefficiency mixed up with it then give me the open market.

Now, I want hon. members to note the significance of Mr. Woods' statement. He stated that in handling the wheat crop alone $50,000,000 was saved to the farmers of Western Canada in one year. If the same efficiency and the same good results had been secured from handling all the other grain, that is, the oats, flax, barley and rye, another $50,000,000 would have been saved; that would be $100,000,000, according to the testimony of Mr. H. W. Wood, who is not politically a friend of this Government. I want to emphasize that the ordinary charges made by the Wheat Board for commission, handling, freight, storage and insurance were not less than those under ordinary conditions. So it follows that, if the statement is correct, the farmers of Western Canada this year might have been saved an equal amount, and that in other years they were deprived of this amount of money by the grain dealers.

I think it would be well for the Government to investigate the means of marketing the Western grain when the saving may be so great as $100,000,000 a year. We have got into the habit of thinking in big figures, but let us consider for one minute what $100,000,000 would do. It would pay almost the interest on the national debt; it would build 400,000 miles of rural telephone line—that is worth considering—it would build 2,000 miles of railway; it would put under cultivation 10,000,000 acres of raw prairie land; it is more money than has already been loaned by the Soldiers Settlement Board and it would pay the duty on all the agricultural implements imported into the Dominion in a period of sixty years.

I have referred to the spread between the street and track wheat and other grain. I have talked to some of those who are of the type I referred to at the beginning of my remarks, and who want an election. They will say that there was not much spread at points on the Canadian Pacific Railway—and they are not altogether wrong in saying so—but that generally speaking the spread was greater on the Grand Trunk Pacific and at Canadian Northern points. But I have the word of the president of one of the largest grain firms in Winnipeg to the effect that both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National handled the western grain this last year better than it had ever been handled before, considering the volume of wheat that was going out. And again I am afraid that there is a little touch of politics in this criticism. It is a curious thing that the men who are to-day damning the Canadian National system are the men who damned the Canadian Pacific for forty years. They have at last come to the conclusion that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a pretty good institution and that the Canadian National is all wrong.

I want to urge most strongly on the Government that they investigate every phase of the marketing of wheat and other grains from the time the farmer drives his wagon on the scales at the country elevator point to the time the grain reaches Liverpool or until it is handed into the mills in Eastern Canada. I have heard more complaint about the way our grain has been handled this last year, and especially since the farmers got acquainted with the efficiency of the Wheat Board, than I have heard concerning any other phase of the economic life of Western Canada, and I feel sure that if the Government conducts a thorough investigation to find out where the abuses are, and the remedy for those abuses, it will do a greater service to the grain growers of Western Canada than any other action that this Government has taken or can take or that any Government in the past has taken. Certainly the Government will render a greater service to the farmers of these three provinces than anything that has been suggested by our friends in either Opposition party. I hope that such an investigation as was proposed by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) will be proceeded with and that it will have concluded its labours in time to have the results formulated before the next season's crop is harvested and ready for the market.

Mr. FRANCOIS JEAN PELLETIER (Matane): Mr. Speaker, this being the eleventh day of the debate on the motion for the adoption of the Address and the amendment offered by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), I feel that so much has been said in support of the amendment that there remains but very little for me to add unless I repeat the arguments already advocated. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition asked by what authority my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and the members of his Ministry presumed to carry on the Government. No reason has as yet been given by the Government and its supporters. It is unnecessary for me to repeat certain points at issue, they having been so well put before this House by my hon. friends the leader of the Opposition and the hon. members for Beauce (Mr. Béland), Gaspé and Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), Brome (Mr. McMaster), St. James (Mr. Rinfret), Wright (Mr. Devlin), Rimouski, (Mr. D'Anjou), Bellechasse (Mr. Fournier), and Halifax (Mr. Maclean), who have thoroughly explained every phase of the situation. I merely wish to state that I fully endorse all that these gentlemen have said, and I will therefore direct my remarks to other questions.

For a number of years past we have been told by social agitators from their soap boxes and even by so-called statesmen from their places in Parliament or on the public platforms that public ownership of utilities was the panacea for all the ills that affect the body politic. This theory was held up to us as being the greatest advance made in generations by a democratic government towards the full enjoyment by the people of their rights and privileges under the constitution. It may be, Sir, that public ownership in certain countries has increased the control of the people over their natural heritage, but I submit that in this country we have found that the taking over of the railways by the Government has had the contrary effect. In practice, instead of being for the benefit of democracy, public ownership has immeasurably increased the powers of autocracy. We have had a board appointed by the Government, without consultation of the people, and clothed with powers higher and more formidable than those enjoyed by the ministers themselves, answerable to no one, and in the present instance not only incapable of understanding the public mind but of taking part in the progressive ideas of the people. We cannot insist that one of its members be removed for incompetency; we cannot urge upon it that large sections of the country are being badly served by the national railway; we are not permitted to show that it is inefficient in organization and extravagant in operation. It can be proven beyond a shadow of a doubt that contracts are given to favorites of the directors, to the detriment of the railway; that certain sections of the country are granted privileges denied to other sections where the traffic receipts are higher; that in the only province wherein, as a matter of fact, the Government railroads can and do earn more than the cost of maintenance, we are treated with a total disregard of the convenience of the population with respect to returns and service. I shall touch upon this point a little later, Mr. Speaker.

I say that a Government controlled by a body such as this is not democratic, because we have placed ourselves in the hands of a body of men who are not now answerable and, if the intention of the Government is to be followed, never will be answerable to the people,—who may if they will, and do as a matter of fact, carry on the administration of this most important of our national undertakings with inefficiency, incompetency, extravagance and neglect, and that even though the people be groaning under the weight of repeated deficits. It is impossible for us to remove these gentlemen and so in some degree alleviate our financial embarrassment.

May I refer to Mr. Hanna's order preventing railway employees from becoming candidates in elections or taking any part in politics? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that order is absolutely unfair to the railway employees. These men were compelled by the Government to become its employees when it took over the different railways; therefore it is through no fault of theirs if they are now in the employ of the Government, or of the Canadian National Railways. I fail to see why they should be now disfranchised by the Government or its creatures—and you will admit, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Hanna and other officials of the National Railways are the Government's own creatures.

I said a few moments ago that certain sections of this country were granted privileges denied to other sections where the income is great. I shall refer to one division in particular, take the Montreal and Mont Joli division of the Intercolonial Railway; that division is showing a surplus while the other divisions on the same road are showing deficits. I may say that I repeatedly asked the construction of three subways under railway crossings at very dangerous places in my riding, and was refused all three—one at St. Octave, at a sharp curve; one at Little Metis Station, and one at Ste. Florence. If the officials would only take the trouble to have these places inspected, they would immediately see the justice of my requests.

Further, I asked certain officials of the Intercolonial Railway to prevent certain lumber merchants from piling lumber in the railway yards immediately east of the railway station at Amqui. My reason for making the request was because there were quite a number of residences in the immediate vicinity, the owners of which had to pay premiums for the insurance on their buildings at the same rate as that applicable to the lumber yards. That request also, was refused. Then, on the Montreal and Mont Joli division, why should we not have some men on the dining cars who can speak the French language? We are being asked repeatedly by travelling salesmen and others why we as members of the House cannot have this condition remedied.

The taking over of the railways was forced through this House by the Unionist Government and against the will of the Liberals comprising His Majesty's loyal Opposition. We contended that Canada was practically bankrupt as a result of our participation in the Great War—and I will say, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's participation in the war did not create such a great national financial liability as did the railway policy involved in the creation of a national railway system. The war cost Canada about $1,800,000,000, while the outstanding indebtedness of the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific is admitted to be $1,000,000,000, but is really much more. To this must be added $300,000,000 for the National Transcontinental, and $150,000,000 for the Intercolonial, and then there are such other systems as the Hudson Bay Railway and the smaller non-paying roads. If interest on investment was computed and added, the total cost of the National system to Canada would equal Canada's expenditure in the Great War. Canada has certainly paid for its railway debauch, but the worst is yet to come. Within three years the capital expenditure necessary for connecting links, replacements and equipment will absorb another hundred million dollars, adding six million more to the annual sixty million dollar deficit which the country must pay for its Government ownership fad. It is costing more to pay railway deficits than it did to run the whole government twenty-five years ago. No one has suggested a feasible solution. The Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk and Intercolonial as one system with a capital not exceeding $250,000,000 might, under efficient management, be made a self-sustaining organization, but load them with the Grand Trunk Pacific and other roads, and the result would be immediate bankruptcy.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, if the truth was known, I believe it would be found that the Government is seeking to unload its pet system of public ownership of railways which was imposed on the Canadian people through the exercise of closure in the House of Commons, as I predicted on the floor of this House in 1919. Such a government is not giving the public justice, particularly a government which refuses to dissolve Parliament and give the country an opportunity to select a government of the people, by the people and for the people.

In figurative language we say that we liquidate a situation when we set things back in order, when all is arranged for the best and we come back to normal conditions. The war, which had brought about a disorganization of the economic, social and national life of the nation, is over. The treaties have been signed, and even though peace has not altogether been restored, the nations are all doing their best towards effecting a reconstruction of the political as well as the general domestic conditions. We have thus seen England, France, Italy and the United States renew their Parliaments and governments. Peace brought on a new state of affairs and new men were called upon to establish it .

Let us consider what is going on in the economic world and in the social domain. Industry liquidates; commerce liquidates; groupes replace one another and take their pre-war positions; and while, of course, all this does not take place without some contradiction and friction, this reconstruction is for the best, because it is only in this way that in those domains normal conditions will reappear. Why should conditions be different in the political domain? In Canada, the political situation will not be improved until after liquidation, that is to say, when things and men shall have taken their pre-war places, and, Mr. Speaker, it is only by a dissolution of Parliament and a general election that the necessary liquidation will be accomplished. It is known throughout the world to-day, except by a few non-believers, that the Prime Minister is in the position of what "Le Maître de la Theologie Catholique" calls a usurper, "qui per ambitionem et proceumque illicito modo potestatem adipiscitur"—"a man who came into power through ambition and by illicit means."

My right hon. friend does not hold his "would-be" mandate from any national group or from any political party except his own self-constituted party, namely, the "National-Liberal Conservative Party," if I may call it such. Therefore, it behooves my right hon. friend, in order to do justice to the people of this country, to dissolve Parliament and to give the electors an opportunity of either ratifying or rejecting his self appropriated mandate.

Mr. HUGH MURRAY SHAW (MacLeod): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make any lengthy remarks in this debate; but since the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) has brought forward a request asking that the Government appoint a commission to make a thorough investigation into the handling of grain from the time it leaves the farmers' hands until it reaches its final destination, I feel that I would be negligent in my duty to my constituents if I did not say something regarding it. I am not going to relate any incidents that have come to my knowledge whereby the farmers have not been getting a fair deal. We have heard several incidents cited by former speakers, and what is common at one point occurs throughout the West.

We have heard a great deal, Mr. Speaker, in this chamber about the discontent and unrest that exists among the farmers of Canada. I believe the key to this unrest and discontent which at present exists, will, if an investigation is made, be found in large measure within the operations of the Canada Grain Act. I know the farmers of my constituency, and they are, in my opinion, reasonable; they are willing to live and let live; all they want is a square deal; but under the conditions under which the grain is at present handled, they know, if I may be pardoned for using a slang expression, that they are being "trimmed at every turn."

We have also heard in this chamber statements made as to the money paid in duties to this Government by farmers of the West. I believe the money paid in duties by the farmers of the West, in comparison with the money lost through the present method of handling grain, is a mere bagatelle. I would strongly endorse the request of the hon. member for Macdonald, that this Government appoint a commission to investigate the grain trade, and do it at the earliest possible moment, so that the farmers of the West may be able to take advantage of it during the coming year.

There is another matter that I wish to bring to the attention of the Government, Mr. Speaker, and that is winter grazing on the forest reserves. At the present time ranchers living in the vicinity of these reserves have the privilege of getting a permit to graze cattles or horses on them, these permits being good for six months, from May 1 to October 31. I believe the rate charged is seven cents per head per month, and is charged for the six months. In the past this six months' regulation was not rigidly enforced, and ranchers who lived on the edge of the reserve and those who were surrounded by it and who had secured their land before the reserve was set aside, let their cattle graze on these lands later than October 31. Last summer the department issued strict instructions that winter grazing was not to be permitted, with the result that these ranchers who lived on land adjoining the reserve or within its boundaries found themselves in the position that they had nowhere to run their cattle during the winter months. I believe the regulations were changed in the early months of the winter, allowing ranchers who were in this position to obtain special permits to run their cattle as in former years, but they were informed that in future these special winter permits would not be continued.

What I ask is that the Government allow winter grazing on these forest reserves. The ranchers are willing to pay the additional fees, if any, and I am sure that the Government will find use for the money so collected. If there was a lack of grass on these reserves, I could see the wisdom of not allowing winter grazing, but there is plenty of grass at present; in fact, I do not think there are fifty per cent of the cattle in this district that there were two years ago. On account of the dry year and the high prices for cattle in 1919, the ranchers sold everything that was salable; the winter of 1919-20 was very severe, and the loss to the ranchers was from 10 to 30 per cent. I am not speaking from hearsay; I was over parts of the reserve last fall, and I may say that I never saw more grass on it, at that time of the year, than I did then. I have received from the ranchers several letters regarding winter grazing, one of which contains certain statements that I would like to put on Hansard. It is from George Porter, of Maycroft, Alberta:

In taking up this question of winter grazing upon the Forest Reserves you will understand that we are not discussing the reserves as a whole, but just that section in which ourselves and a few other ranchers are interested, namely the Porcupine Hills and part of the Rocky Mountain Reserves.

Ourselves and a few others have been running stock in this district for close on to twenty years, some much longer. We realize other reserves have different conditions. Some have no ranchers located within their boundaries, others are only used as summer grazing ground, as, for instance, the Gap Country behind the Livingstone range. On account of the depth of snow and the different quality of the grass, all the average winter cattle would perish if left there. With us in the foothills conditions are entirely different, as, on account of the grass curing and open water, cattle and horses do well in the winter.

We, along with a few others, are located in practically the middle of the reserve, and in our case we have leaseholds scattered throughout the reserve which were acquired before there was any reserve. Since the reserve was formed we have been surrounded, and if you deprive us of winter grazing you force us to discontinue as we have no place else to run our stock, our leases being so mixed up with the grazing on the reserve that it is impossible to use one without the other. Considering the state of the stock industry to-day, we feel sure once you are aware of the facts in connection with our case it would not be the policy of the Government to close us out.

Unlike the farmer and the man residing on the outside of the reserve who have other lands upon which to run their stock in the winter, and other interests, such as grain farming, our sole business is the raising of live stock.

We settled here many years ago when very few people would think of living this far away from civilization; in fact, it is still considered about the jumping off place.

This part of the reserve is an exceedingly rough country, broken up by high ridges and deep ravines; also a big percentage is not available for grazing on account of being covered with poplar and willow brush, as the topographical map of this district will show. The coulees running up towards the ridges have numerous poisonous plants growing in them, such as larkspur, water hemlock, wild parsnip, etc., etc., so the stock has to be kept out of these places in the spring, but as the plants are harmless in the fall and winter we use that grass then, also the high ridges up toward the timber, for in the summer the bull-dog and black flies are so bad there that it is impossible to keep stock there, and they stay on the flats. From this you will see that there are only parts of the country available for summer use. It is a kind of law of nature where she reserves certain parts for fresh grass during the fall and winter. A peculiar thing about these poisonous plants is that they are not found to any extent further west of us in the Gap Country behind the Livingstone Range but seem confined to the foothills. Some years the poison is much worse than others, but any stock that are not kept out of these places in the spring and early summer have a big percentage of their number die.

The grass is there, and we are willing to pay for it; so why deprive the rancher within the reserve and who has leaseholds upon the same of the right to use it? On account of the preceding summer being so dry that no feed would grow, and the very severe winter last year, most of us lost about fifty per cent of our cattle. Why cripple the industry further? It looks to most of us like the proverbial last straw. We run about two hundred horses here, and have spent a lot of time and money in buying pure bred stallions, and otherwise improving the herd. If this regulation goes into effect it is all time and money wasted, as we have no place else to run them, and with the state the horse market is in at present it is impossible to sell them. Another thing; we have invested here in ranch equipment, etc., several thousand dollars, also have spent a lot of money in fencing the boundaries of the reserve and putting up different drift fences to handle the stock better. You will realize that we are in a much different position from the man outside the reserve who has not a cent invested and no interest at all within the reserve.

Do not be under the impression that the rancher runs his cattle out all winter without any feed. We put up all the green feed we can raise and what wild hay is available; as the cattle go down in flesh they are taken in and fed, and as the spring draws close a rancher is feeding everything except horses and big steers. If he had to take his stock in off these grazing areas all at once they would soon eat up his supply of feed, also it would be a useless waste of feed as stock stay in good shape until spring. At the present time we have cattle that are in beef condition running on the range.

The letter in which the above was enclosed was dated January 28, 1921. I have known the writer since he came to Alberta some twenty years ago, and I know that the statements he makes there are correct.

We have heard a great deal from the other side of the House on the question of the Government's mandate. Hon. gentlemen opposite contend that this Government has no mandate from the people to continue in office, and that they should resign and go to the country. In this connection I wish to say that during my campaign there was nothing said about the Government, if returned, remaining in power only for the duration of the war; in fact, the late Secretary of State, the Rt. Hon. A. L. Sifton, when speaking in behalf of the Government at Macleod and High River, in my constituency, said that if the Government was returned it would, in all probabilty, remain until after redistribution, and that at the next election, instead of the West having, as at present, fifty-five members representing them, they would have seventy or seventy-five. This will show, Mr. Speaker, that it was expected that Parliament would run its full term. These statements of Mr. Sifton's will be found in the Calgary and other papers that quoted his speeches at different points in Alberta.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have the interests of the farmers of the West just as much at heart as any of the hon. members who belong to the Agrarian party. I have never been asked to resign, nor have I ever heard that it was even intimated that I should resign. But, Mr. Speaker, if I had crossed the floor of the House, I would have expected those of my constituents who voted for me to ask me for my resignation.

In conclusion, I wish to thank the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) for bringing to the attention of the Government and the members of this House the necessity of having an investigation into the grain trade.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is proper that now and then a French speech be heard in this House, if only to recall to those who forget, that the two languages have equal rights, not only in the House of Commons and in the Senate, but in all the departments and in all the other administrative services in Canada. Therefore, I purpose after the example set by my hon. colleagues from Nicolet (Mr. Trahan), from Hull (Mr. Fontaine), from Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou) and others, to say in my maternal tongue, so beautiful, so expressive and so sweet to the ears of whoever can understand and appreciate it, what I think of the present Governement, of its policy in general, and of the amendment proposed by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. MacKenzie King).

Before going over the three points I have first mentioned, I protest in the name of the province of Quebec and of the county which I have represented in this House for the last twenty-four years, against the intended and premeditated insult offered us in not having the Address in response to the Speech from the Throne moved or seconded in the French language. Let it not be said that it is the fault of the Province of Quebec, because we have sent to this House no member of the party in office. This answer does not hold good. The member for Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) speaks French as we all do, and I am sure that if he had been asked to second the Address in French, he would have considered this request as an honour to him, and the old custom would not have been disregarded. It would have been the same thing if the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot) had been chosen. I accuse the hon. minister of Justice with not having done his duty as representative of Montreal in the French province of Quebec, in neglecting to take the means of preserving the traditions of this House in the choise of the mover and seconder of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. He, especially, who represents the Irish Catholic minority of this country in the Cabinet, should have thought of the other minority which comprises one third of the whole population of the country, and seen to it that equal justice be rendered on this occasion.

This being said for the satisfaction of my conscience and of my legitimate pride in the rights of the French language in this House, I now ask myself: Does the Government really possess the confidence of the country? I hasten to reply, No; and I am going to try and furnish as to that the best possible evidence. How is the voice of the people to be heard if not through the medium of the press and through the by-elections which circumstances bring about either in one province or another.

Let us take the great newspapers of the different provinces. Is there not to be found in them every day the evidence that the Government have ceased to command a majority in the country? Is not the Toronto "Globe" which for several years supported the Government, the first now to declare that the time has come for the Cabinet to go before the people? Did not the Montreal "Gazette", the pillar of Conservatism in this country, advise the Government, after the by-election in Peterborough, to have a general election immediately, and not wait till the vote of the Chambers compel them to go and face the electors? What is to be said now of the "Standard" of St. John, New Brunswick? There is not in the whole country a single newspaper more devoted to tory principles, more subservient to the interests of the Conservative party; and yet when you read this paper nowadays you ask yourself how can such a metamorphosis have taken place? There we have three Conservative newspapers, in the three great provinces of Confederation. And we could continue the list indefinitely; but this much is enough to show that the Canadian press has withdrawn its confidence in the present Government.

What is now to be said of the by-elections? Are they not the most eloquent voices to proclaim the truth of our contentions? Apart from two ministers returned in constituencies carefully selected all the by-elections save one have been humiliating defeats for the Government.

And even in the election of St John, N.B., and of Colchester, has the result been of such a nature that the Government should feel reassured about what it may expect at the polls. The hon. minister of Customs (Mr. Wigmore) has seen his majority of 1917 considerably reduced, and, as an hon. member was saying this afternoon, it was necessary to order from the United States an immense dredge to be kept at work in the Bay of Courtenay during the election. With regard to the hon. minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy), he has been returned, not by the county of Colchester, but by the manufacturing town of Truro. And if you ask me why the town of Truro has given such a compact vote to the hon. minister, I will say: Go and ask the hon. Mr. Stanfield, formerly divorced from the Government, and now seated on the senatorial benches. That was, no doubt, the reward of his devotion to the new minister.

But we have not only the newspapers and the by-elections to prove that this Government has lost the confidence of the country. There are also the Veterans of the Great War, whose voice has been heard in the resolutions which the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), has been forced to admit as existing and as having been sent to the prime minister of this country.

Mr. Speaker, in order to understand the degree of unpopularity which the present Government brought upon itself, all there is to do is to walk out of this House and go through some of the parishes, towns and cities of this country. The workmen in the cities, the farmers on their lands, the returned soldiers, the servants in the civil service, the women organized into associations, all have only one voice to exclaim: When will we have elections, so that we may return to the years of peace, of concord, of prosperity of the liberal reign of Sir Wilfrid Laurier? But there is a discordant voice crying out in the desert: it is the voice of the big financial interests who are in holy terror of finding themselves orphaned on the day that this Government will have the courage to face the country in order to receive the adverse verdict which is in store for them.

The hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville (Mr. Demers) was saying the other day in this House that the present Government had unsurped power, and was the first Government of the kind since Confederation and, with that great eloquence which we all know of has proven his say with uncontrovertible proofs. But, Mr. Speaker, if any doubts could still remain on that subject, after the speech of the hon. member for St. Johns and Iberville, every vestige of doubt disappears after the speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), who was formerly a colleague of those honourable gentlemen of the cabinet.

Having got into power under false pretenses, although under well known colours, those so-called unionist, to maintain themselves in office by the most scandalous debauch of soldiers' votes ever resorted to in Europe or Canada; having associated only for the duration of the war, the time has arrived to put an end to that comedy of unionism, disguised under new colours: national-liberal-conservative, and that is what is asked by the amendement of the hon. leader of the opposition.

The hon. prime minister, whose brilliant qualities of leader of men I am not here to discuss, has seen fit to change his views and to tender the olive branch to the province of Quebec. But is he sincere in his declaration of love, now that he has attained the supreme honour of being the prime minister of this Country? He is accused, in this House and outside of this House, of having insulted the province of Quebec. He has energetically protested that such was not the case, and has asked for proofs of those accusations. He has not, then, had the courage to read the speech of the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Trahan), delivered on the 22nd of the present month. If he had read that speech, he would have seen there the proof that, not very long ago, when an election was held, he had seen his way to insult in this House the whole French deputation, which follows in the steps of the hon. leader of the opposition. Could he have believed that because he was on the other side of the Rocky Mountains no echo of his words could have reached us? He reckoned without the newspapers, as the Vancouver Sun and the Montreal Gazette have reported as follows:

Again, at Summerland, he has spoken of the leader of the opposition and the opponents of the Government as being "those whose idea of liberty was to let others go to fight for them".

Some hon. MEMBERS: (Translation.) Shame!

Mr. GAUVREAU (Translation): Now, those who know the promoter of the War Time Elections Act, and of the other nefarious act of conscription, those who know that the sordid idea which was at the base of the elaboration of that last act, had not so much for object to send reinforcements to our soldiers in the trenches as hopes to see the province of Quebec rise in revolt against its application, and then raise the English provinces against us: all those who know the promoter of the famous Closure Act, of which our poor and revered chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was the first victim, will understand what he had in mind when he was so discoursing at the time of the elections of Yale.

That was the old and vile insult hurled anew against us, citizens of the province of Quebec; under another form, it was a new edition of the story about the slackers, the cowards and the traitors of Quebec.

Confronted with those statements, the Prime Minister cannot answer that we are unable to prove our contention, and it ill becomes him to hold out his hand to us when there is nothing in his bosom but disguised hostility. If his fondness for Quebec was such why did he turn to this side of the House in search of some one for his cabinet when there are in Montreal and elsewhere in the province so many Conservatives who would be only too willing to take the chance? He hoped to disintegrate the liberal block in Quebec. He failed in his attempt or rather he only succeeded in rendering it more compact than ever by withdrawing from our midst a unit which was already loosened. I think the honourable member from St. Hyacinthe and Rouville will long regret that mistaken stroke of the oar of which the honourable member from Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Lafortune) spoke, and the remarks he made in this House about his former friends, far from enhancing his reputation will be considered as the song of the swan leaving the sunny shores where he led a happy life for the cold regions whence there is no coming back.

If the honourable Prime Minister intended to prove his sympathy for the province of Quebec and its religious convictions, why did he not oblige the Civil Service Commission to keep the pledge given by the former Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Sir R. L. Borden, who had stated in this House that Catholic public servants would not have to work on holidays which according to our creed must be kept as Sundays, the Lord's days. He refused to do so and for that he is still open to censure for this lack of sympathy toward us, citizens of the province of Quebec.

I would like to refer in passing to the policy as ruinous as it is blamable concerning the national railway. In two years, a magnificent policy, that of state railways, has been turned into an utter failure to which is added a deficit of over $100,000,000. And what is the treatment meted out to the old pension employees of the Intercolonial? During the war and the most acute period of the high cost of living, they were, together with their wives and children, left to suffer greatly, only receiving a meagre minimum pension of $15 a month. Have they acted fairly and decently toward these old and faithful servants of the country? I pleaded for them to the best of my ability. I entreated the Minister of Railways to have mercy upon those men who have given thirty or forty years of their lives to the service of their country. The honourable Minister—I must praise him for it—was well intentioned, but the officers in charge of the pension fund were not as well intentioned and were guarding the treasury as if it were their own. I again beseech the Government to have mercy upon those old servants and I ask for an increase of their pensions so that they may enjoy in their old age a certain amount of comfort which is not denied even by the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that this Government does not enjoy any more the confidence of the country, because they have usurped power by treading under foot its constitutional liberties; that the time has come for an appeal to the people who are eager to pass judgment upon those who have bungled what we hold most dear: our democratic system.

There is but one way to carry out the designs of the people who are clamouring for a general election; it is to vote for the amendment of my leader—the authorised, avowed and admired leader of the liberal party.

I know beforehand those who will vote against this amendment. First, the whole Government, because they do not want to get out, then Liberals who disowned their leader and their party and who are not courageous enough to let go such a fat portfolio. Then, again, those who will never be returned to this House and who are over anxious to lay hold of their $4,000 indemnity for a session or two longer; also, those craving for power or sponging upon the government, who are counting on senator—or judgeships and—the last but not the least—the high priests of protection, the pillars of the big interests who well know that, on the day when the Government vanishes, they will no longer be the masters of the new administration.

The Government may have a majority, but it will be neither real nor disinterested and, consequently, it will be impossible for it to last long, for the day is not far distant when Canada will witness in the place of honourable gentlemen opposite a new administration truly liberal and national, and anxious to put an end to the great crisis we are going through at the present time.

Mr. EDWARD THOMAS WORDON MYERS (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gauvreau) are correct, and from the intelligence of the gentleman and the able manner in which he seemed to deliver his speech I take it for granted that he was supporting the Government.

Mr. JACOBS: You should take a few lessons in French.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: You had better carry a dictionary around with you.

Mr. MYERS: I desire to say just a few words in regard to the amendment to the amendment introduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell.) From what I could glean, its import is that redistribution in his mind, is of such importance that it is the duty of this Government to adjourn the House after supply is voted and certain urgent business is concluded, let the census be taken in the month of June, let the statistics be compiled by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and after the data are ready let us again meet here and pass a redistribution bill and then go to the country and get the verdict of the people as to who should govern this nation at the present time. Well, I do not agree with the amendment, because I do not think that, if we adjourned the House in May or June it would be possible to meet again, as suggested by the hon. member, before December or January; and this would make it absolutely infeasible. Therefore, on that ground I cannot support the amendment to the amendment.

It was not my intention to participate in this debate, but a very important question indeed has been interjected, a question that is agitating the minds of the western farmers, and that is the grain trade. I shall not deal with the various irrelevant arguments that have been put forward in regard to the want of confidence amendment introduced by the leader of the Opposition. I should not like to pass, however, without concurring in the many expressions of congratulation and words of commendation already uttered in reference to the hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaac), who moved the address, and the newly elected Government supporter from Yale in British Columbia (Mr. MacKelvie). Nor can I let this opportunity pass without extending my congratulations to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen). To my mind, a man of his intellect, ability, sagacity and honesty of purpose well merits the high honour which has been bestowed upon him, and I have no doubt if he is given an opportunity he will guide Canada's destinies in safe, sane and successful channels. I do not want to be accused of any lack of courtesy towards the leaders of the dual Opposition, and I will say that they have my very best wishes. They are both very estimable gentlemen, and though, in my opinion, they are mistaken in their firm conviction of what is right and wrong so far as certain policies are concerned, yet I believe they have a duty to perform, and in that duty as leaders of the Opposition they have my best wishes that they may remain in that capacity for years to come.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a chestnut.

Mr. MYERS: I will not touch the tariff. When the Budget proposals are brought down there will be ample opportunity to deal with matter affecting the tariff. The country has been put to a great expense in connection with tariff revision, a commission having travelled from coast to coast to obtain information regarding the fiscal needs of Canada, and when the Budget proposals of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) are brought down, based upon his findings, there will be ample opportunity for every hon. member to voice his sentiments and record his vote according to his views on the fiscal necessities of the country.

Owing to the great strain and strenuous endeavours occasioned by the war, this is the first opportunity since the cessation of the activities of the late struggle that the Government, or any member of it, has had of putting before the people of Canada its policy. The Prime Minister has been travelling from coast to coast outlining, where ever he has spoken, the policy of the Government, which is uniformly the same. The leader of the Opposition also has been making a tour of Canada, but we find him most inconsistent. As he travels through territories different from a geographical standpoint, where interests are not identical, we see that he has a policy to suit every individual district. And so far as the leader of the National Progressives, as they style themselves, is concerned, I am sure that hon. members, as they listened to his statement of his policy, could hear the echoes from afar of such men in the past as the late Sir Richard Cartwright and others who shared his views on fiscal matters. However, I do not think that one need have very much mental aptitude to realize, despite the rambling and the vaporizing to the contrary of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), that there is a collusion between those two great leaders.

An hon. MEMBER: A collision?

Mr. MYERS: No, a collusion: an alliance if you prefer; or, if I may put it in other language, a confusion of harmony, the confusion being for the sole purpose of misleading the people. They are out and they want to get in, and if I have an opportunity of discussing in this House the Budget proposals of the Minister of Finance, I hope to be able to deal more thoroughly with what the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) described as the political foot-ball of Canada. Now, I think I have given one reason why the amendment of the leader of the Opposition should not be accepted, and that is the fact that the Tariff Commission is about to revise the artiff, which will mean stability for Canada. That is what we need. If the Government were to take the advice of the leader of the Opposition and resign, and if the Governor General called upon him to form a Government, it would mean possibly a year of unrest and instability so far as fiscal matters are concerned; and that is one good reason for postponing an election until the constitutional period has expired.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Self-preservation.

Mr. MYERS: I believe there is an alliance between the leaders of the dual Opposition for a purpose. You have heard, Mr. Speaker, the well-known expression: "Two minds with but a single thought; two hearts that beat as one". Well, I believe that these words are eminently applicable to these hon. leaders. I have the platform which was adopted by the Organized Farmers of Canada. I see that in one of their planks they advocate the reform of the Federal Senate. I do not know what they propose in the way of reform, but I hope it will not be along the line recommended by a certain Senator from Manitoba. I certainly believe there are ways in which the Senate can be reformed. At the present time the representation in the Senate of various provinces is not on a fair basis according to territory. At the present time the province of Saskatchewan is entitled to six senators. We have four now and there are two vacancies. The present senators are: Hon. Messrs. Ross and Willoughby of Moosejaw, Laird of Regina, and Turriff, who at present, I believe, is domiciled in the city of Ottawa, I would point out that the present senatorial representation is grouped around Regina, within a radius of forty or fifty miles, and all central and northern Saskatchewan is unrepresented in the Senate.

Now I believe that instead of having appointments to the Senate made on the prerogative of the Prime Minister, who nominates whom he sees fit, every province should be divided into senatorial districts and senators should be elected for those districts and be compelled to reside in the district which they represent. Further, I believe that the election to fill any Senate vacancy should be according to the rules which now govern elections to the House of Commons. The right of sitting in the Senate should also be accorded to women. This Government, and I am glad of it, has extended the suffrage to women and they are now entitled to sit in this Chamber as well as in the Provincial Legislatures I see no reason why they should not be enabled to sit in the Upper Chamber of this Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal of talk with respect to matters which may possibly be termed parochial. But the question of freight rates is not a parochial one. In the West we feel that, under the judgments rendered by the Board of Railway Commissioners, we are particularly discriminated against. It was especially hard, Sir, to have an increased rate go into effect about October 1, last year, when we were starting to ship our grain. I believe it to be the duty of this Government—and I give the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) credit for advocating the same thing—to ask for the resignation of the Board of Railway Commissioners if they will not do justice to Western Canada. Now, interlocked with the subject of freight rates is the matter of the operation of the Canadian National Railway which unfortunately has a large deficit every year. In my opinion the Government should plan out a re-organization of the directorate and general management of that system. As long as deficits continue in the operation of the Canadian National System of Railways, there will be a demand for the enforcement of the existing, and possibly higher, freight rates; and therefore this Government should ask for the resignation of the present management in order that a thorough re-organization may be brought about and experts appointed to efficiently operate the system.

I believe, Sir, that Canada, as far as possible, should live on its own resources. In saying that I have reference to the large amount of money that is spent in importing coal from United States. Now in Eastern Canada as well as in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, we have vast coal fields; and I believe it would be a good policy on the part of the Government if they could so arrange railway freight rates, and the rates of our own merchant marine, as to bring western coal at a reasonable price from the head of the Great Lakes to the consumers of the East. I notice that the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) has a resolution on the Order Paper dealing with the matter of the coal supply of Canada, and I am very pleased indeed that the hon. member is bringing this important subject to the attention of the House.

This leads me to the grain situation, a very important matter from my point of view as a Western member. I was very much gratified when the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) brought this matter forward. During the war the grain trade channels were very much disrupted. In 1917, owing to price fluctuations, the Government in their wisdom thought it better to fix the price for our wheat. The same course was adopted in 1918. In 1919 there was great uncertainty. The then Minister of Agriculture, now the leader of the National Progressive Party (Mr. Crerar), in many communications to me, stated that the Government could not do anything, that owing to the grain trade being in such an unstable condition it was not possible to make any provision from the public treasury. That hon. gentleman later burned his bridges behind him and left the Government. We have heard it stated that there was opposition to the establishment of the Wheat Board. I do not wish to lay myself open to the charge of making unfair accusations, but as a western member I feel that some of us on this side who represent constituencies in Saskatchewan are not being fairly dealt with as far as the Wheat Board is concerned. I am not going to eulogize the work of the Wheat Board because other hon. gentlemen who have already spoken have done so effectively. But there was opposition to the creation of the Wheat Board. The Government organized that Board in the face of direct opposition from the farmers. The member from Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), a very estimable gentleman, speaking on May 21st, 1920, as reported at page 2365 of Hansard, expressed himself as follows:

> The hon. gentleman who has preceded me touched on one of these (statements) and that is the Wheat Board. We did not ask for the Wheat Board. The inference, if not the statement, is to the effect that the farmers asked for the Wheat Board. One hon. member described it as the pooling of our wheat. While the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) stated that the Government appointed the Wheat Board I want to go further and say that the Government did it against the strong opposition of the farmers of this country. The farmers did not want it and they did not ask for it.

Now, I think that settles the point beyond all question.

Mr. MAHARG: If the hon. member wishes to be fair, will he please continue and read further from that speech?

Mr. MYERS: I will do so, I do not want to be unfair. It says:

> The farmers did not want it, and they did not ask for it. But if the Government stepped in, took possession and broke down the lines which had been built up, financially and otherwise, and if there is pooling in the buying of wheat overseas—

I suppose that is what the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) refers to.

> —we have no hesitation in saying that we consider it the proper course for our Government to carry out pooling in the selling of wheat, just so long at least as there was pooling in buying from us.

Nevertheless, there is the plain statement, Sir, that they were in opposition to the formation of the Wheat Board. However, as I say, I am not going to refer to the workings of the Wheat Board. We all know that it was a success in spite of what the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) said on Friday night, that he was not personally opposed to the formation of the Wheat Board. Yet in his maiden speech in this House he said that he had visited many elevators in North Dakota and they were paying $3.05 a bushel there; that the American farmer was pocketing $1.11 more than the Canadian farmer; that the farmers in his constituency were receiving 70 cents to $1 less a bushel for their wheat; that his participation certificates were in a box at home, and he was quite convinced in his own mind that he would get less for his wheat than was paid to the American farmer. Well, it was very interesting when the report of the Wheat Board was tabled, which showed that the Canadian farmer received about 25 cents a bushel more on the average for his wheat than the American farmer did, owing to the working of the Wheat Board.

Then, Sir, we come to the enabling resolution which would have enabled this Government, if they saw fit, to re-establish the Canada Wheat Board. I will give my hon. friend from Maple Creek due credit for very heartily supporting that resolution, merely to show that I do not want to be unfair to him. But the member for Assiniboia in speaking on that enabling resolution was not quite so certain about what he wanted as the hon. member for Maple Creek. At page 4112, volume 5, of Hansard, I find the member for Assiniboia is reported as saying:

> I do not wish my remarks to be interpreted as indicating that I am diametrically opposed to this legislation or entirely in sympathy with it.

Mr. BEST: He was climbing the fence.

Mr. MYERS: I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member for Assiniboia. He said just at the conclusion of his speech:

> I propose to vote for the re-establishment of the Wheat Board this year. I pledge myself only for this year.

I think that kind of support was not likely to give this Government very much backbone towards re-establishing the Wheat Board. We know that the leader of the National Progressive party was not in sympathy with it; he was honest in his conviction, but he was opposed to it. He stated in Hansard:

> Personally, I am opposed entirely to any permanent policy which means control of the marketing of the grain of this country.

I suppose there was a reason why he was opposed to such a policy. But when we consider that the Grain Growers' Grain Company and the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company handled about one-third of the total wheat crop of the Prairie Provinces, I believe they should have given the Government a more sympathetic support towards the re-establishment of the Wheat Board.

Mr. MAHARG: May I ask what my hon. friend means by the word "they?" He was speaking of two companies and said that they should have given more enthusiastic support.

Mr. MYERS: I mean the directors of both companies and all concerned with their operation, because, Mr. Speaker, they are supposed to be the champions of the farmers of Saskatchewan.

Mr. MAHARG: May I ask my hon. friend if he is aware that at the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, about two months after the Wheat Board came into existence, they passed a unanimous resolution asking for a continuance of the national marketing of our grain?

Mr. MYERS: I think I saw that in the press. But what I am getting at is the fact that there was not the enthusiastic support of the organized grain companies in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta that there should have been. The situation is this, that the member for Assiniboia last week delivered a tirade of abuse against the Government, and yet when this enabling resolution was being discussed in the House he did not seem to know his own mind.

Throughout the West there has been an agitation for the formation of a wheat pool. This is a copy of the questionnaire which has been sent out from the Grain Growers' Guide Limited. It says:

> Enclose one dollar and answer questions contained hereon.

I do not know whether the Grain Growers' Guide is more concerned about its subscription list, or about the farmers' dilemma in connection with the marketing of their grain. However, I have been hoping that the organizations of the farmers would formulate some feasible scheme. I would heartily support a wheat pool or any other scheme which would enable us to handle our grain in a more efficient manner than we are able to do it under the present system. We see nothing in the press that anything has been formulated. I would certainly urge them to formulate a wheat pool or some other stabilizing agency which will enable us in Western Canada to get rid of many of the grievances with which we are hampered to-day.

I was very glad indeed that the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) urged the Government to appoint a Royal Commission to look into the many grievances, major and minor, affecting the grain trade of Canada. I would not like to see this left to the Board of Grain Commissioners; I would rather see an independent Royal Commission appointed, clothed with proper authority to investigate every phase of the grain trade. As the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Blair) said, "Start at the country elevator and continue to the mills in Europe if necessary." I am going to read a tabulated statement which covers the ground very thoroughly:

That a commission be appointed to investigate: the grading and weighing of grain; the receiving, handling and shipping of grain through country elevators and from country points; the operation of grain exchanges by the members thereof; the work of grain exchanges; the handling of grain at terminal points; the holding of grain at terminal points; the operation of public and private terminal elevators and eastern public elevators; the operation of the Lake Shippers' Clearance Association; the operation of the North-west Grain Dealers' Association; the trimming of grain at the upper and lower lake ports and ocean ports; lake shipments; the shipment of grain to Atlantic and Pacific ports; the operation of Canadian flour and feed mills.

Another thing, Sir, is, I think, of great importance. We have a report from the Quebec Board of Trade which says that in the six years from 1912 to 1918, 1,096 million bushels of grain were shipped from Fort William by water. Of this vast quantity, there were sent to Port McNicoll, Port Colborne, Midland and other Georgian Bay ports, for the suuply of all the flour mills in Eastern Canada—some of which was subsequently shipped by rail to New York, Portland, etc., for export, and a small quantity to Montreal and St. John—578 million bushels. To Buffalo—the greater part afterwards sent to New York and other United States seaports for export—there were sent 518 million bushels.

I believe the condition here revealed is a mistake from a Canadian national viewpoint. We have three great transcontinental lines of railway. We have the ports of Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, St. John, and I do not see why one bushel of our wheat should reach New York. We have the Transcontinental Railway going into Quebec with a shorter mileage between Quebec and the West than either of the two transcontinental railways. We have an excellent natural harbour at that port, and for the life of me I cannot see why we do not use it. This is another matter which, in my judgment, should be taken into consideration by this Royal Commission—the facilities for marketing our grain and shipping it to Liverpool by Canadian ports only, thus preventing the loss of the identity of our hard wheat through the American practice of mixing it with their soft wheat.

I think there are three main reasons why this Government should carry on at the present time. I cannot see that there has been any really urgent demand for an election from the majority of the people. No matter what Government is in power, there will always be demands from certain quarters for their resignation. As many speakers have reiterated during the course of this debate, not one charge of scandal or graft or corruption can be brought against this Government—a wonderful record. I believe it is the only Government of this country that has been free from taint of graft or corruption, and that consideration should commend itself to the electors. The second reason I referred to a few moments ago—that we want tariff revision and that we want Budget proposals brought down based on the tariff revision with a view to creating that degree of stability in our industries on which the employment of labour depends.

The hon. member for Nelson said that it was very important that we should have redistribution. Why, Sir, we in Western Canada will gain from fifteen to twenty seats after redistribution, and any person in that part of the country who votes for an election before redistribution is not acting in accordance with the wishes of the people out there. Personally I have received more requests that dissolution of this Parliament should not take place until after redistribution than requests to go to the country immediately. In the election campaign of 1917 the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in his manifesto to the electors, stated that Canada would gain twenty-two seats by redistribution and that there were twenty-four vacancies in the House of Commons. Well, Sir, in war time, when the very existence of our people was at stake, the leader of the Opposition of that day thought it of sufficient importance to go to the country on account of having possibly twenty-two additional representatives from the West. It is even more advisable that we should now wait until redistribution takes place, after the census in June, before holding an election.

The leader of the National Progressive party seemed to be very much alarmed over what might happen when the redistribution Bill was brought down. He seemed to fear that almost a crime would be committed in the way the country would be gerrymandered. Well, Sir, if we are spared we will be in the House when the redistribution bill is being discussed, and I will stand shoulder to shoulder with the member for Marquette and vote against the Government if they attempt to do anything of that nature. I think, however, that his fears are groundless, because we have an honest Prime Minister, a man who would not permit the perpetration of such a crime.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) said, with regard to redistribution, that it was a matter of principle; that hon. gentlemen from the West were capable of looking after the interests of the West—members who will be returned at the next election, and members who are here now. That created a suspicion in my mind, because it is well known that the province from which he comes will probably lose some members when redistribution takes place. I believe that the hon. member was speaking purely from a selfish point of view when he spoke that way.

I have tried during the course of my rambling remarks to make it quite plain that it is my intention to vote against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. I believe it is my duty, particularly as a western member, to carry on here until we get proper representation for Western Canada.

Mr. THOMAS HAY (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, before touching upon any of the matters which are of interest to the country at this time, I wish to join with those who have preceded me in congratulating the mover (Mr. McIsaac), and the seconder (Mr. MacKelvie), of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, whose addresses contained very much information of interest to the House and to the country. Coming, as they do, one from each extreme end of Canada, these hon. members have given us information regarding their particular parts of the country which should be helpful to the members of the House and to the people generally.

I wish also, before going further, to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), upon his elevation to the position which he now occupies. It is truly an exalted position and one which carries with it very great responsibilities indeed. I feel sure that the right hon. gentleman, with his ability and his sincerity, will bring to the duties of his office the very best that is in him, and will do all he can to further the interests of the great Dominion and administration of whose affairs has been committed to his charge. I believe that the people of Canada generally are satisfied with the choice. I am sure that when it was announced that the right hon. gentleman was selected to lead the Government of this country a sigh of relief was breathed by the citizens generally upon realizing that such an able man had been selected to look after the destinies of Canada. Of course, our friends across the floor will, perhaps, not agree with what I have to say, but I am satisfied that the great majority of the Canadian people think as I do on the subject of an election. I know throughout the western part of this Dominion, at any rate, and, I believe in the province of Ontario and the other provinces, there is really no great demand for an election at this time; in fact, I am satisfied that the very opposite is the desire of the people, that is, they are quite content that the Prime Minister and the present Government should carry on.

Last session the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in speaking on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, seemed to be very much worried because no hint of policy was contained in that speech. He said that it was empty and barren and dealt more with matters of a foreign nature than with domestic matters. This year, when a definite policy was laid down and a number of very important matters were dealt with in the speech from the Throne, he refused entirely to deal with them. He sidestepped the issue, and ever since this debate opened his supporters, following his example, sidestepped the issue also. It is perhaps policy on their part to do that; but we know and the people know and hon. gentlemen occupying benches across this Chamber know that my hon. friends opposite will not be in a position to do that when they come face to face with the electors of this Dominion; they will then be compelled to face the issue and to deal with the facts. I am satisfied that the great issue that will be brought before the people at the next general election will be the tariff issue, and my hon. friends opposite will be compelled to deal with that on every platform throughout the Dominion. The leader of the Opposition, instead of meeting the issue fairly and squarely, endeavoured to draw, as it were, a red herring across his trail; he endeavoured to divert the minds of the people and the members to some other issue which is really not an issue at the present time. Through the medium of Parliament he told the people that the great issue at this time was that of a general election, but there is really no such demand. He referred to the Government and its supporters as usurpers of office and office seekers. To my mind, that charge, particularly the one referring to members as office seekers, rebounds like a boomerang on the head of the hon. gentleman, because a charge like that cannot be sustained. We know members occupying the treasury benches are in office at present and are likely to be in office for some time, and consequently, the men who are office seekers at the present moment are hon. gentlemen opposite. I think that is quite clear. Their object in trying to bring about a general election at this time is to get a snap verdict from the people. It has been stated in this House by many speakers—and we know it to be a fact—that the members of the Government during the past three years were so busy with problems arising out of the war and after-war problems, which were many, difficult and knotty, problems such as the statesmen of this Dominion have never before been called upon to wrestle with, that they were not in a position to inform the country as to what had been done and what they intended to do. In the meantime, the Opposition to a man—and I include both branches of that Opposition—were busy throughout the country trying to create a sentiment unfavourable to this Government. To some extent they have succeeded in doing that, and they believe, after they have succeeded in creating a sentiment largely unfavourable to the Government, they may be in a position to win a snap verdict from the people and consequently be returned to office, but I do not think there is much chance of that. If the Prime Minister and his ministers carry on and complete the work that they have been engaged in, the people, after the case has been fully explained to them, will realize that they have had, during the troublesome times through which we have passed, a Government that has been capable, honest, and sincere in purpose.

I should like to say a word regarding the matter of our home market, which I consider would be jeopardized if hon. gentlemen who occupy seats at the extreme end of the Chamber on your left, Sir, were returned to power. Of course, they will say that this is a matter which the old political parties, particularly the Conservative party, have held up for years as a bogey before the people of this Dominion, and have succeeded in obtaining their votes in that way. But I am satisfied that if their policy was put into force in this country, it would be a real menace, not only to the manufacturing interests but to the farming interests as well, because they are dependent to some extent on each other. The farming industry alone never made a country great and wealthy; to bring that about manufacturing industries are required as well; in fact, I believe the success of the farming industry of any country lies largely with the manufacturing interests. Their interests are indissolubly bound up together and the one cannot be separated from the other. I have heard it stated on many occasions, and I think I have heard the statement made in the House, that 85 per cent of the products of Canada are consumed and used in the Dominion. I do not know whether that is correct or not, but I am sure, Sir, you will agree with me when I say that if that be the fact, that means a great deal to the farming interests of this Dominion, because it certainly means that the home market is a valuable market to our farmers. Anything that would help to reduce that market or to curtail its purchasing power in any way would certainly not be in the interests of the farmers. I am satisfied that the most valuable market that a country can have is its home market. We have had evidences of that every day, and particularly during the last few years. We know that Great Britain at the present time has an embargo against Canadian cattle. In 1919, I believe it was, we had the spectacle of the United States placing an embargo against Canadian wheat and at present they are raising the duties against Canadian grain and other products of the farm. Consequently, we must look to our own markets to take the produce of our farms, if we wish to be an independent people as far as agriculture is concerned. The Fordney Bill, which passed the Senate quite recently, aims at protecting the farmers and producers of the United States. I think there is a lesson in that for the Canadian people. If in a country like the United States, where they have a better climate than ours for producing certain lines of produce, it has been found necessary to protect their farming interests, surely it is necessary for the Canadian people living adjacent to that great republic to do something to protect our interests along the same line.

I want to join hands with the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) in his request for a commission to investigate the Canadian wheat trade from the time the grain leaves the farmer's wagon till it arrives at its destination, wherever that may be. I am satisfied that many of the elevator companies and others handling the farmer's grain are making immense profits on their handling, through overages, and in many other ways. Some hon. member has already dealt this evening with the difference between the track price and the price on the street. The spread there is, in my opinion, unwarrantable, and I think it is unwarrantable in the opinion of any member who has given any study to this question at all. I strongly support my hon. friend's request for a commission to investigate the grain trade in all its phases and aspects, to ascertain wherein conditions can be bettered in the handling of the grain, and see that the profits shall accrue to the farmer and not to the elevator companies or the men engaged in the handling of the crop.

The leader of the Opposition, in his great hurry to introduce a motion of want of confidence in this Government, overlooked another very important matter which was mentioned in the speech from the Throne. I refer to old age pensions and unemployment insurance. This did not seem to strike the leader of the Opposition or any of his followers as being worthy of any notice whatever. I do not know what the labour representatives sitting behind the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) thought, when not only the leader of the Opposition overlooked this very important question, but their own leader practically said there was no need of old age pensions or unemployment insurance at this particular time. I believe the labour interests of this country are keenly alive to the necessity of some kind of unemployment insurance, and I should like to quote from a little pamphlet issued by the Labour Congress of Canada, dated February 1921, and entitled "Legislative Programme of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada." Dealing with this question of unemployment insurance, they say:

> If any argument were needed as to its necessity it has been fully furnished during the past few months when thousands of good Canadian citizens have suffered through lack of employment and through fear of its consequences. We recommend the enactment of unemployment insurance embodying certain principles.

Then they go on to state what those principles should be. I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member for Marquette state that unemployment insurance was not necessary at the present time. I think the matter of unemployment insurance and old age pensions is one of the vital questions confronting the Canadian people at this time, and it is one that will have to be solved by the statesmen of this country in the near future. Unemployment has always existed in this country, and it will always continue to exist, because we are largely an agricultural people, and agriculture employs men for only six or eight months in the year. After that, they have to look elsewhere for employment. Now, if the greatest and basic industry of this Dominion can afford employment to men only for a portion of the year, unemployment will naturally continue to exist in this country, and this question of unemployment is one of the big problems with which we are face to face at the present time. I repeat, I was surprised to hear the leader of the Agrarian party treat this subject of vital importance so lightly. I do not know what the feelings of the labour people of this country will be when they know that both leaders of the two parties aspiring to come into power in this country and take charge of the destinies of Canada did not see fit to devote more than a minute of their time to this question of supreme importance to the labour men of this country. It is a question that will have to be grappled with sooner or later, and personally I would support any system of old age pensions and unemployment insurance that would not throw the burden on the Federal Government or even on the Provincial Governments. I would support a system of old age pensions and unemployment insurance that would compel the men who would get assistance from that fund to contribute something towards it. I feel that is the only reasonable way of bringing into force a system that would be of assistance to the labouring men during periods of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, this debate has covered a very wide range, and the ground has been pretty well covered, I think, since the opening of the debate two weeks ago. Anything I might add would simply be a re-hash of arguments that have been made before, but in closing I just wish to give this little bit of advice to the Prime Minister. It is this: that he carry on. I believe that the people of this Dominion expect him to carry on.

They are struck with his sincerity and his honesty of purpose in endeavouring to give the country a good Government. They were struck with his sincerity as he went through the country a few months ago laying down the same policy in different parts of the country and not varying his policy to suit the different districts in which he spoke. There was no vaciliation about his policy; there was no trying to shift matters to other shoulders or to get away from the issue in any way. His policy was clear-cut, straight and above board. That is what the people are looking for and I am satisfied that after they have been enlightened as to what the Government has accomplished during the past year, and what their policy is with respect to the future, there will be no danger of this Government's being voted out of office. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the interest and attention which have been accorded me.

Mr. FERRIS BOLTON (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House at any great length, nor is it my purpose to hand out any more bouquets to the Prime Minister or to the mover and seconder of the Address. I think that that phase of the debate has been amply attended to, and with all the best sentiments expressed I am in hearty accord. I simply rise to endorse the request made by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), to have a commission appointed to look into the grain trade. There is no more vital question before the farmers of the West than the handling and transportation of the products of the farm. Years ago our grain came from the machines in a rather clean state and was fit for shipment. Very soon, however, the advent of noxious weeds made it necessary for the elevators to put in cleaners to clean the grain before shipment; but this was soon discarded and at the present time nearly all grain is shipped in a very unclean state, and in this way the farmers do not know what they are getting or how much they will be docked. They have to pay freight charges on the screenings as well as giving it away for nothing and I think it would be the very best thing for the farmers to have a commission appointed to investigate the handling of grain from start to finish.

When the hon. member for Macdonald brought this question up, I thought that, as it was a suggestion of a progressive character, the Progressive party opposite would join in the discussion. But strange to say, up to the present time nothing has been said from that quarter on the subject. I suppose time will tell whether the proposal is too progressive or not progressive enough.

I desire to bring another question to the attention of the Government, especially of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. McCurdy) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Ballantyne), and that is the drying up of our lakes in the Prairie Provinces. A great many lakes out there have no inlet or outlet and have simply dried up, first turning into hay meadow and then wheat fields. But there are other lakes situated on the river courses and they are drying up with the result that the fish, a great source of food to the farmers, have been practically destroyed. The lakes have become so low in many cases that they have frozen to the bottom that the fish have died and become a great nuisance to the surrounding country in the spring, lying dead along the beach. There has been an improvement made on Killarney and Pelican lakes in the Southwestern portion of the province, which is a credit to the Government; but there is a lake situated entirely in my constituency that has been used considerably as a summer resort. There are a great many cottages built along the beach, and there is a beautiful piece of ground used for a summer school and by picnic parties. But this lake has dried down about three feet and the weeds grow up to the top of the water, which becomes stagnant. I am informed that from three to five thousand dollars would dam the lake up and raise it about three feet. In this way the nuisance would be avoided and we should have a pleasant summer resort.

As to the main question before the House, I must say that I have never had an intimation from my constituency to the effect that I was not doing my duty because I was supporting the present Government. When I was elected there was not a word said about the duration of Parliament, the understanding being that it would run its full term. And I might say that supporters of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), who voted against me and who would support any candidate running in the interests of the hon. gentleman, if he could find one in the constituency, have informed me that it is advisable for us to continue, because the people do not want an election. These people have told me that they expect us to continue until our time has expired. I therefore think that I have a mandate to support the present Government while it exists. If the leader of the Opposition did not get a mandate in 1917, I do not think we are to blame for that. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I beg to say that I shall vote against the amendments submitted and in support of the motion before the House.

On motion of Mr. Michael Clark (Red Deer) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Right Hon. C. J. Doherty the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, to define Canadian Nationals. He said: The purpose of the Bill is to define what constitutes a Canadian national. The necessity for such a definition results, in a large measure at all events, from the fact that under different measures adopted in connection with the carrying out of the operations of the League of Nations, there are provisions made defining certain rights and privileges which may be enjoyed by the nationals of the different members of the League. Under those circumstances it is necessary, I think, that we should make a definition by statute so that the world may know who is, and is recognized as a Canadian national. The Bill contains one section which defines as being Canadian nationals, British subjects, domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada.

Motion agreed to and Bill read a first time.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the Motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the Session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Campbell, resumed from Monday, February 28.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I was immediately preceded in this debate late last evening by my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Bolton). My friend is of so modest and unostentatious a disposition, that I am quite sure there are a number, of the members of this House even, who are not aware of the fact that he lost three sons in the great war, and has since passed through terrible family afflictions. I want to take the opportunity afforded me, Sir, by following in this debate to say that I observed with the very greatest satisfaction from the manly, firm and modest way in which he voiced his opinions that his sons came by their grit honourably, and that he himself has come through his troubles in the way that a true Canadian man should do. I am sure that the House, in regard to these circumstances, will join with me in at once offering to my friend our sympathy and our congratulations. My hon. friend himself was preceded by another stalwart and manly friend of mine on the other side of the House who, like the member for Lisgar, might well speak more frequently. My friend from Selkirk (Mr. Hay) appears to me, though I have never gone particularly into his political lineage, to have been brought up in the true old Tory school because he was much concerned last night about the "home market". Well, I do not want to refer in extenso to what he said, but perhaps it may throw light upon argument which I have to offer later in this debate if I tell him a story which seems to me to illustrate the weakness of the home market if a nation has to depend upon that exclusively. There was a man once who undertook to breed carp and to breed cats. He established his cat ranch on the banks of a lake. In the lake he bred the carp. When the carp had some young he caught some of them and fed them to the cats. The cats eating the carp in their turn propagated their species, and he fed the young cats to the carp. So he went on changing cats for carp and carp for cats. He had a splendid home market but he never got any richer and he never exported anything. We in this part of the House believe in a larger market than that story illustrates.

I am conscious, Sir, of no mental reservation whatsoever when I join with many of my fellow members in offering to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr Meighen) my most sincere and hearty congratulations, on personal grounds, on his accession at a comparatively early period of life to the Prime Ministership of this great Dominion, a position which his character, his ability, and his record alike make him eminently fitted to occupy.

I want to say that I congratulate also my hon. friends the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from His Excellency. The mover's speech was a model for such an occasion, couched in virile and good English, scarcely at all partisan, commendably brief. The speech of my hon. friend the seconder was an exceedingly able one considering that it was a maiden speech, and I am sure it has engendered in us all friendly anticipation of the times when we shall hear him again. He was not quite so non-partisan as the mover of the Address however, because coming from the county of Yale he could not refrain from reminding us that in that county they raise apples. We had learned that from several speeches of the Prime Minister during the election in that county. My hon. friend's anxiety about apples is a splendid illustration of the real nature of protection. The outlook of protection is always local, always sectional, always narrow, never national. The difference between my hon. friend and myself is this: he is concerned about the comparatively few Canadians who produce apples in Yale; I am concerned about Canadians all over the country who eat apples. His interest is in making apples dear; mine is in making them cheap. That is the outlook of protection not only in Yale, but in any part of the country in which the heresy prevails. When a protectionist comes from Nova Scotia—and I am afraid they have protectionists in that province, Sir—he says: You want free wheat in the West? Why, certainly. You want free implements? Why, have them by all means. You want free coal? Ah! that is a different matter. And he turns away sorrowfully, because they produce coal in Nova Scotia. In Peterborough the protectionist says: Peterborough and Progress. Well, I say, Canada and Progress. The outlook is narrow and sectional in the one case; it is really national in the other. My hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Denis)—I hope he was only an advocate on the occasion—goes before the Tariff Commission and asks for an outrageous duty upon tobacco, because they grow tobacco in Joliette. What do I care about where they grow tobacco? When I want to smoke it I want to get it good, and cheap, and I do not care where it comes from. That is the difference of outlook. So we claim for our views that we have the true national policy, and that the term "National Policy" as applied to protection is a total misnomer.

Let me press the point a little further. There is no duty so urgent upon Canadians of thoughtful and noble mind—and I believe they are all thoughtful and noble, or nearly so—as the duty of paying our national debt, principal and interest. Does this House think that that debt can be discharged, Mr. Speaker, by the export of excess tomatoes, or excess apples, or excess tobacco, or even excess manufactures? Our exports of manufactures are a mere bagatelle. If we are to discharge that debt, principal and interest, we must do it by the tremendous surplus, which, we are well able to produce, of the great unprotected and unprotectable natural products of the country; and we are prepared to do it if you will get off our backs and give us a chance. That is the true national policy: Support the industries that will make your nation great, honourable, and prosperous.

I quite agree with my hon. friend from East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) that the debate on this Address has taken rather a peculiar form. I agree with him that it has been customary, both in our Parliament and in the Mother of Parliaments, in a debate on the Address to discuss the subjects raised in the Address and the past and present proceedings of the Administration. I shall follow my leader in endeavouring to keep up this old tradition.

I am glad to be able to agree with the Administration that in this country we are freer from unrest and external signs of the aftermath of the war than perhaps in any of the other billigerent nations. I agree with the Administration also in what they state in the same paragraph of the Speech from the Throne as to the harvest having been on the whole fairly good. I am sure that Administration would not claim an undue amount of credit for the fairly good harvest; and I think that the credit is only a limited one in regard to that other matter upon which the nation is congratulated. I do not deny them all credit, far from it. This country has on the whole done very well for her returned soldiers, but, Mr. Speaker, I think the fact that we are free from unrest is due, perhaps, in the first place, to the very high character of the men we sent to the front, most of whom have settled down in splendid shape and are bringing to their civil occupations the same grit and the same force of character which put them in the war at the beginning and kept them there until victory crowned our banners. It is due, in the second place, to many efforts which have been made on the part of our employers of labour—I know some of them in this city, Sir Henry Egan and others—who from the middle of the war busied themselves to keep positions open for the returned soldiers, and in this I am glad to say they have been well supported by the Administration. But it is due, in the third place, to this consideration, which we can be all proud of as Canadians, that this country to-day presents perhaps better opportunities than are presented by any other country in the world for a man who wants to live his life in a bracing and delightful climate and by his own endeavours to work out his temporal and material prosperity.

Now, I have just referred to the fact that this bebate has taken a peculiar course. For the first nine days, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House were engaged very largely in taunting my hon. friends of the official Opposition—I do not use the term offensively; it is the only one that occurs to me for the moment—with the fact that they did not refer extensively to the tariff. Well, the Government's supporters are not easy to please, because on Thursday last the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) referred pretty extensively to the tariff. But the moment he did so what happened on the Government side? They have not up to the present paid any particular attention to what my leader said about the tariff, but member after member has talked about a subject that is not metioned in the Speech from the Throne at all. An investigation is promised in the speech by His Excellency into the questions of Old Age Pensions and Insurance against Unemployment. But, I repeat, a request has come from member after member for an investigation that is not mentioned in the speech, and that request is a very peculiar one. It is a request for a grain commission—a commission to inquire into and investigate the grain business of Canada. Well, at first sight I thought this was an unrehearsed, and therefore unprinted, portion of the speech by His Excellency; but on second thought it occurred to me that it would have been a much more fit theme to place in the motion of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, calling for censure upon the Government. If the grain business is wrong, who is responsible for it? This Government, or a government very much like this, has been in power in this country since 1911. During this time we have had grain legislation before the House; the Nestor of the Tory party and of the Administration, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), is absolutely responsible for the grain laws that prevail in this country at the present time. And they have a Grain Commission; so this proposal that has been adumbrated, that emanated first from the member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) and has been supported all over that side of the House, is that we should have a Government commission to inquire into why another Government commission is not doing its duty. Well, I would like to know if we are going to pyramid commissions upon commissions? If the first Government commission, which is the creature of a member of the Administration, the Nestor of the Tory party and the Administration, is not doing its duty, how do we know that the second commission will do its duty? I think we had better prod the commission that we have in the meantime. All that I would like to say about these promised investigations, whether in the speech or out of it, is that I venture a prophecy that they will be pretty much protracted, and as they will be pretty much protracted their well-considered findings will not come before Parliament until the successors of this present House are doing business here. And when I mention the successors I am afflicted by my friendly feelings for fellow-members and certain anxieties about myself, to such an extent that I think we had better leave the findings and investigations to our successors. The coming House certainly will differ very materially in personnel from that which at present occupies the Chamber.

I heard with very great pleasure the magnificent speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon the League of Nations, and as he poured forth those rounded periods containing noble ideals couched in lofty language, as a Canadian I felt proud that we had an "old man eloquent" in Canada whom we need not be afraid to send to Geneva or anywhere else. With regard to the League of Nations, Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say this: that the sentiments of the Canadian people from the Atlantic to the Pacific are thoroughly peaceful sentiments as regards our fellow men and that the Administration may be sure that behind any effort they may make to maintain the peace of the world they have the unanimous strength and support of the whole Canadian people. I should just like to say further in regard to the League that I think if there is a danger attaching to its operations it is to be found in a tendency too greatly to multiply its machinery and to increase too much its international obligations. There are a great many obligations that are in their very nature national, and to endeavour to get a Parliament of the World at the present stage of human development is, perhaps, to anticipate the millennium a little too rapidly. While I say that, I feel certain that the League is a tremendous step in the direction of making it sure that in the future history of this world, if any nation should venture to break international law flagrantly as Germany did, and confess their doing it while they do it, there is almost a certainty that the civilized peoples of the world will rise and say: You are the common enemy of the race, and you must be prepared for being handled by the rest of mankind.

While touching on this topic may I say that I am sincerely pained from time to time to hear the jibes that are sometimes thrown across the border at our friends in the United States. I am equally pained by the jibes that come from certain sections of the population—a very small part of it, I am glad to think—of the United States towards Canada. Mr. Speaker, I can conceive of no greater destiny in the immediate future, of no higher duty, of no more sacred privilege for Canada, than to stand the nearest of the dominions to the Old Land, between that Old Land and the other portions of the Empire, and close, on the other hand, to the great American people; and to bend her influence, as she is well able to do, from her geographical position and from the sentiments of her people, to the production of a perfect understanding between all those who speak the British tongue and value British institutions, whether they be in the Republic or in the Empire. If we could have such a perfect understanding between these peoples, we should indeed have taken the first and the greatest step towards a most effective League of Nations.

Now, I think I have touched upon all the subsidiary portions of the speech of His Excellency. The Government recognize, as any responsible government must at this time, that the main considerations of Government and Parliament for some time must gather around questions of finance, questions of trade, questions of the national financial obligations—and questions of tariff, if you like. So the Government have frankly and very honestly and courageously told us their views upon tariff, and that the tariff will be the main business of the session. I have no sympathy with the contention that there is any limit to the rights of this Parliament to deal with tariff questions in this session or in any other session so long as Parliament lasts. Why, Mr. Speaker, the tariff is and has been during all the time we have been a nation one of our methods of taxation, and to talk about any question of taxation being out of the purview of Parliament for a single moment is to talk what I conceive to be parliamentary nonsense. Neither, as I shall show when I come to deal with the amendment, have I any sympathy with many other views that have been expressed from this side of the House. I shall be glad if anything that falls from my lips this afternoon shall be of assistance to the Government in their investigations of tariff questions and in arriving at right conclusions before we reach the Budget, if we ever do reach it.

In entering upon this subject, I thought I could not do better than devote a little attention to a speech delivered in this Parliament by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) during the last Budget debate. I do so because that speech is of importance, having regard to the source from which it came, and also because it enables me to refer to some of the matters raised in the Governor General's speech. Indeed, the speech derived a fictitious importance from the source from which it came, because it was delivered by a minister of the Crown who has since become Prime Minister of Canada. It was so important in the view of the party managers of my hon. friends opposite that, I understand, they printed 40,000 copies of it and sent it broadcast throughout Canada. The first part of it consisted of an almost impassioned defence of certain taxes which, I think, when the Budget was before us, were called "excise taxes." Like a good many other things, or people anyhow, that want to disappear, they adopted an alias and became "luxury taxes." The fate of those taxes is really the only comment that is necessary, the only answer that needs to be made to my right hon. friend as to his defence of those taxes at the time. A consideration of the fate of those taxes reminds me that this Government is very prone to political infanticide. I think, in the last two speeches from the Throne, the farmers from the West and producers generally throughout Canada were specially admonished to great efforts of production. In any case, I know members of the Government and many other hon. gentlemen opposite, before the war terminated and until last summer, took the opportunity, from platform and even from pulpit on Sunday evenings, and in Parliament, to urge upon the people efforts at increased production. I had, on principle, no objection to those efforts, but I said always that they needed to be supplemented by efforts on the part of the Administration to make arrangements whereby you could sell your product. The only way you will ever increase production is to make a ready sale for what is produced, and that was always my comment. But, referring to this matter of political infanticide, I notice that the question of production has disappeared from the speech from the Throne; it has disappeared from the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, and they are now concerned about sales. During the war there was almost no need to urge production, because we had the necessary inducement to produce; we had the inducement of the greatest markets we ever enjoyed, opened to us by the exigencies of the war, and our customers were foreign peoples and foreign governments. But perhaps the principal offender, or the principal worker as regards preaching this principle of production, was the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who previously to last summer missed no opportunity, for at least two and a half years of preaching this doctrine, when suddenly the bottom fell out of prices, and he turned on his heel and he said: The trouble with this country is that the farmers have produced more than they can sell, and then he hopped off to Geneva. That was a nice thing for men in the West who, in obedience to the Government's injunction, had hired men at $6 a day and had lying on their hands stuff in abundance which they could not sell.

Another offspring of the Government that we do not hear much of in Parliament these days is called daylight saving. The Minister of Trade and Commerce dandled that interesting nursling on his knee for two sickly seasons, and then he handed it over to the chief nurse, the Prime Minister, who, at the bidding of forces, I do not know where, suffocated the infant with a pillow behind the Speaker's chair late one Friday evening.

I do not know what is the precise condition in which the Board of Commerce is now. It had a mixed parentage; it was not entirely the child of this Administration. I am afraid that with diabolical ingenuity the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) had something to do with leading the Government on to thin ice in that matter. I know, when they constituted the Board of Commerce, he said: We have been asking for this all the time. Well, he got it. But what is its precise condition now, I do not know. If it is alive, it is not functioning; we do not hear anything about it, and indeed, the only thing that we have seen of it lately has been the incursion of its late chairman into a by-election down in West Peterborough.

The Prime Minister, with numbers of others in the Government, came into power in this House with a pledge against free wheat. I took part, as my right hon. friend did, in the debates which preceded the election of 1911, and we were told that if ever free wheat was given, the keystone of the protectionist arch was gone. Well, it is gone, and it was taken away by the gentlemen who came in promising that they would never take it away.

The Prime Minister, when he came into power, was rather an enthusiastic advocate of indirect taxation. I am not at all sure if he did not make a speech doubting if the Federal Government had power—that was in his green and salad days—to put on an income tax. He shakes his head. Well, I have known lawyers to do that about things that were very doubtful. I remember the speech; but not being a lawyer and being a modest man, I am quite willing to admit that I may have misinterpreted it—especially a speech by my right hon friend. But for three years of the war he sat behind a Minister of Finance who said that an income tax was a bad tax for the country; that it could not be thought of. I am glad the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who, by the way, is free from all those doings, states that this year he expects to collect $40,000,000 by income tax, and if he gets $80,000,000 next year, I shall not blame him; I am quite willing to have mine doubled. But the point is, the views of the Government on both these things went by the board. Now I was quite prepared when the Budget came down, for the luxury taxes to meet the same fate that so many of the infants of the Government had already met, but I must confess that I scarcely expected that we should see in this country or in any other British country a Budget introduced by Order in Council, because that is what happened. My hon. friend, for a good-natured man, nearly got angry with me when I told him he ought to think out his taxation proposals and bring them down in the Budget, and stand upon them for a year. I have been looking up in the recess some authorities on this question, although I did not need to, because I happened to know what I was talking about; but I looked up a speech of Mr. Gladstone's in which he laid down in Midlothian at seventy years of age certain elementary principles of finance. The principles which he claimed in that particular speech were also and equally subscribed to, by Mr. Goulbourn and Sir Robert Peel, on opposite sides of politics in the early days of Mr. Gladstone's political career. The first principle was one that this Government might very well practise: "Never be afraid of economy in detail." In that very speech the great Gladstone held up his hands in horror at the thought that somewhere in the Empire something of a (job) had been perpetrated by the creation of an office carrying with it the modest sum of £2,000, or $10,000, a year. If he had lived in our present day he would have seen almost any one of our provincial administrations, of whatever stripe, equal to creating one of these jobs over-night. Economy in detail; I pass that by, and come to his second great principle of finance, which was: "You ought to have one financial statement, and only one financial statement in the year." The reasons are obvious. My. hon. friend knows them now. He has had them brought under his notice by the people dealing in automobiles, and other of the manufacturers and traders of this country. When a Budget statement is brought down, a Government is prepared to stand or fall upon it, and must be, because while it is kept secret until actually brought down, immediately it is brought down tradesmen and dealers must be prepared to deal upon that Budget with the reasonably certain knowledge that the arrangements made in it will prevail until the next Budget statement. I do not want to spend too much of the time of the House in whipping a dead horse. The taxes are gone; but I take the liberty of inculcating this lesson in regard to them. It is melancholy to reflect, in regard to this question of political infanticide, that this House was kept up until seven in the morning to pass those taxes. We passed that Budget at seven o'clock in the morning, and in two minutes the Minister of Finance destroyed the whole thing by an Order in Council. Then they talk about constitutionalism and the proper treatment of Parliament. Why, Sir, it is the most horrible treatment that ever was handed out to Parliament.

There is another lesson I would like to draw from these taxes. I called them at the time an internal tariff, and I told the minister exactly what he has since found out. I told him—indeed, I was too moderate—that he would find these taxes difficult to collect. Well, it was far worse than that; they were impossible to collect. What happened was that the honest man paid the taxes and gathered them from his customers, and was troubled with all kinds of red tape because he did not send in proper statements, but men not so particular told the Government to go to the bow-wows, and did not collect the taxes at all. My hon. friend knows that happened all over the country. He knows now that the taxes are bad, and if he had only listened to me he would have known they were bad when they were brought down in the Budget. Well, the Prime Minister with his usual courage, which frequently amounts to daring, when asked in Peterborough about these taxes was ready with his answer,—he is always ready with his answer when anybody interrupts. He said: The taxes were right when the Government put them on, and the Government is right in taking them off.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: And my hon. friends opposite applaud. What can you do with reasoners of that description? The most slippery eel that ever slid through the waters was easily caught compared with men who will applaud a statement like that. My right hon. friend, as I said, gave rather an impassioned defence of the taxes in their original form. He sat behind the Minister, and voted for them in their altered form, and he sits there to-day just as docilely now that the Minister has passed them into the condition of the world before creation, that is, the condition of being without form and void.

I should like to ask the Administration at this point, do they really think they are justified in asking this House for a vote of confidence? I do not want to go into the details that have been offered so profusely from this side of the House, but it is true, however, that probably no Administration ever ruled as they have done during the last two-and-a-half years and had to apologize for so many discarded policies—and with each discarded policy they have parted with a piece of their personnel. Then they come to this House with all the assurance in the world and say: We are the men to govern you, we want a vote of confidence. I should like to know if they really think they are deserving of it. If they do, then I must proceed to other reasons why I do not think so.

I noticed this in the second part of my right hon. friend's speech last summer. That second part of his speech was a performance in which he showed much more than his usual courage, but much less than his usual discretion. Mr. Morley—Lord Morley, as he is now—said on a somewhat famous occasion that the economist who is not a politician gets into very serious scrapes; but, he said, they are nothing to the scrapes which the politician gets into who is not an economist. I could not help thinking of those words as I heard and read, as I have done several times, the speech in question of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen). There was abundant internal evidence, if I am a judge, of the speech having been prepared from a brief; and if my diagnosis is a correct one, there never was able barrister so befooled by ill-informed solicitors. I know from the Prime Minister himself that it was prepared from a brief because he practically told us in the speech that he had not studied these questions. That may be a surprise to him, but I am going to demonstrate that he practically told us he had not studied these questions. Fluency sometimes degenerates into flippancy, and I think it did so on this occasion. My hon. friend and leader (Mr. Crerar), had produced some figures in the House proving what I thought was admitted by all and deplored, in Canada, that there was a great deal of rural depopulation in Ontario. Those figures have been supplemented in very careful examinations by Mr. J. J. Morrison, the Secretary of the United Farmers of Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I do not ask hon. gentlemen opposite to have the least respect for Mr. Morrison; but if he were the least respectable man in the world, if his figures are according to Cocker, my friends have got to respect him for that. I thought we all knew there was rural depopulation. Well, what does my right hon. friend say on this subject? He says:

> I never saw a farm abandoned that appeared, at all events from the road, to be fit for anybody to farm.

My hon. friend studied the values of farms from the road, possibly when driving past in an automobile. His language admits it. Well now, my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is on the whole a very faithful supporter of my right hon. friend; so is the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best). They both know something about farming, and they know that no man in his senses will try to study whether or not a farm is really worth anything merely from a survey from the road. He will want to go on the land and look at it. But we are blessed with a Prime Minister who can tell you all about these things from the road; that is where he studied his political economy. Have not I gone far to prove that he had not looked into these matters as closely as he should have done? He has been far too busy hunting Bolsheviks. But he went further. He said: The figures are all against my hon. friend anyhow, because the prices of agricultural land are going up. Well, that is very much the same as if absolute ocular demonstration were brought to him that a certain tenant had left a certain house and he were to reply: But he cannot have left the house because the rent has been raised! Why, the raising of the rent might be the cause of his leaving.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: You will notice, Mr. Speaker, I waited for the laughter of my right hon. friend and his supporters. A great deal of the rise in value of agricultural land is not due to the fact that the land is used; it is because of speculation in land. But what amount of rise in prices will prove or disprove facts that are gathered by an examination into the population of the various areas of locality? —every such examination proving to the hilt that people are leaving the country districts and that many country districts in Ontario now have fewer people than before? But my right hon. friend could not ascertain these things from the road; he would need to go into the figures carefully and to study these matters zealously. Well, ill-prepared as he evidently was according to his own statement for dealing with this project, he nevertheless undertakes to show that the fiscal policy of Great Britain for seventy years has been a failure. His first step in the progression of fallacies by which he attempted to prove that contention was to state that since the year 1850 Great Britain had had what he calls an adverse balance of trade. Now, I want to tell my right hon. friend—and on this point I am not going to reason with him; I am going to tell him what is so—that he is absolutely wrong in assuming, at the beginning of his thinking upon this subject, that an excess of imports over exports is necessarily an "adverse" balance of trade. It is not so. Adam Smith, the father of political economy, in his great book which is still the highest authority on political economy that ever was published, characterizes my right hon. friend's views as absurd,—too strong language, possibly, for Parliament, but not too strong for the old Scotch economist and philosopher, who goes on to say—and here he is not giving an opinion but history—that almost every nation in Europe had had its ruin prophesied because of this so-called adverse balance of trade, but that they had gone on to prosper. That is history, Sir; not opinion. Let me give two simple illustrations of the way in which the so-called adverse balance of trade of Britain was constituted, of what her excess of imports consisted. Suppose I go to a bank, Mr. Speaker, and borrow $1,000 at 8 per cent. At the end of twelve months I have to pay into the bank $1,080. Now, the bank takes in $1,080 where it only paid out $1,000; its imports exceed its exports. My right hon. friend says that that is an adverse balance of trade. Well, the bank never thought so, so far as its own interests were concerned; and certainly the borrower does not. But that is exactly how half of Britain's excess of imports before the war was constituted. She accumulated so much wealth by her free trade that she had investments all over the world drawing interest, and the interest on these investments went into Britain in the shape of imports bought by individuals within the nation out of their wealth, but constituting an excess of imports in the nation's trade balance. And just at this point, may I say to my right hon. friend, if he had studied these questions, if he had thought out these points, he would have known that people do not go on buying profusely year after year for seventy years out of poverty but out of prosperity. Let any hon. gentleman in this House try to conduct the business of buying, without the wherewithal to pay, in any store in Ottawa, and see if he can keep it up for seventy days, never mind seventy years. Now, I want to illustrate in another way another portion of what constituted Britain's excess of imports. Suppose I traded a yearling steer for 20 bushels of wheat with a neighbouring farmer. That would have been about a fair exchange a year and a half ago; a yearling steer, at prices then prevailing, would have been worth somewhere in the neighbourhood of twenty bushels of wheat. And suppose I arranged with my neighbour that I would take my steer over in my wagon and bring back the wheat. Clearly, so far as the carrying part of the business was concerned, that would not be a fair deal, and I would naturally, if I were a Canadian anyhow, say to my farmer neighbour; now, I want a couple of bushels extra for carrying both the steer and the wheat. And if the other man were at all reasonable he would give me twenty-two bushels of wheat instead of the twenty that bought the steer; that is to say, I should earn two bushels by doing the carrying both ways. My right hon. friend would call that an adverse balance of trade. Well, I would not; I would call it favourable to me to the extent of two bushels. And that is exactly what constituted the other half of the adverse balance of Britain's trade. Why, at the present moment she is building fifty-one per cent of the entire ships constructed in the world. Before the war she did the carrying trade of the world; and she earned by her carrying trade the other half of her excess imports. But that was not adverse to Britain. The merest tyro in political economy knows that it provided her with that wealth which saved the fortunes of the world when she had to go to war and was able to realize on that wealth.

But I do not wonder that hon. members on the other side seem to get somewhat tired at my referring to Britain. I did not do so in the debate in which my right hon. friend spoke, and I do not wish to restrict my considerations to Britain now. This argument was introduced by himself in a way he felt to be rather peculiar at the time, because he admitted that the hon. member for Red Deer preceding him had not said quite so much about Britain as in former speeches. I shall show my hon. friend from the history of our own country that excess of imports is not necessarily an adverse balance of trade. We had what my hon. friend would call a favourable balance of trade in the year 1895. A Tory Government had been in power for seventeen years and they produced a "favourable" balance of trade, all right. We had a total trade of $202,000,000; we exported $102,000,000 and imported $100,000,000. Was the country prosperous then? If it was, why did they part with the Administration which had been running the National Policy for seventeen years? There is the fact. The total trade was a bagatelle; the nation was stagnant; at least I have always heard so, if I am not rightly informed upon the subject my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) and my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) can repeat some of the speeches which were heard in such profusion about the lack of prosperity before 1896. And when I first came into this House—nobody pretended to tell me that the nation was prosperous at that time. What happened afterwards? Immediately after 1896 this country became prosperous. I do not want to argue this from the party point of view, but for some reason or other the people were prosperous. As the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to say, some of his opponents proved the prosperity of the country from books, but, said he, "I do not do it in that way, I do not need to. Everyone in my audience knows the country is prosperous because you have the evidence of it in your pockets." It was growing time of Canada. What was our balance of trade at that time? Why we imported hundreds of millions of dollars worth more every year than we exported; it was the expanding time in Canada's history as a great nation. Now these are the facts and I am exceedingly anxious to convince my right hon. friend. I trust he will be a big figure in the public life of Canada long after this tongue is silent and these eyes are closed, and I take with a grain of salt his statement when he goes down to the eastern provinces saying that he has nailed the protectionist flag to the mast for life. A right hon. gentleman who can take three different views on the luxury taxes in six months is quite equal to changing his views on the tariff.

My right hon. friend said that Canada began to catch up in its business, by the way, in 1916. Now he is such a good friend of mine that I do not like to prefer a charge of want of generosity even against his arguments, but I do think that was an ungenerous argument. Why, does not everybody know that the nations of Europe were glad to import anything we could send to them in the way of food, and in the way of munitions, while the war was on? It was no trick, as we say on this side of the Atlantic, to do business in war time. They had to have the food, they had to have the munitions. The twenty millions of men fighting had to be fed and the food and the munitions were imported, of course, and we exported them from this side. But if we began to "catch up" in 1916 all I have got to say is we began to "catch down" very soon after my right hon. friend became Prime Minster, because the exports of Canada are not nearly as favourable now as they were at the time he spoke only last June—there has been a change in the scene since then. It is a remarkable fact, however, if it be a fact, that in 1850 Britain began to have what he calls an adverse balance of trade, and in 1896 Canada began to have what he calls an adverse balance of trade, and at the moment they had it they began to prosper and to increase their total volume of trade and to become rich and a considerable people. That is how I read history on this question of balance of trade.

Now I am going to tell my right hon. friend when an excess of imports may become adverse. It is not so when it represents interest on capital invested abroad. It is not so when it represent the payment for carrying services done for all the nations of the globe. But it easily becomes so when it represents borrowings if those borrowings are carried too far. At the present moment we hear a great deal about the excess of our imports from the United States. Well, I do not think there is any mystery about those. I remember when the ex-Minister of Finance raised a seventy million loan in the States during the war. I said I did not object to the loan, we had to get money somehow to carry on the war, but I told him year after year that a better way to get it would be by direct taxation. I said: Let the House understand what you are doing; when you are borrowing all this money you are employing the factories and workmen of the country from which you borrow, because your borrowings come in here in goods; and while a young country may go a certain distance in borrowing capital for its development it is very easy to go too far. I want to say here and now, Mr. Speaker, that with the magnificent asset of property which we have in our great territory, with its varied riches, what we want in this country is not so much capital as people. Bring people in of the right kind who will work up our resources. The wealth is there if you will enable them to work it up and produce by taking obstacles out of the way of the sale of the product. I do not think there is any doubt that Sir Edmund Walker was absolutely right in the last sentence he uttered in his recent statement to his shareholders, when he said: This country is all right but we need to go cautiously, for the outstanding sin of our people is extravagance and a readiness to contract debts. If that is true of the people, it is vastly more true not only of our Federal Government but of our municipal and our various provincial governments. We have got to work more for our country and borrow less. Why, Sir, municipal and provincial bonds were issued in this country last year to the tune of $324,000,000; debts contracted upon our territory, that is what they were. Two hundred and twenty-three millions of this $324,000,000 are held in the United States and, as I say, the example was set to these municipal and provincial governments by the Federal Government, at least during the war. We have got, as my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) has said again and again, to borrow less. We have got to economize more. We have got to work harder and we have got to trade more freely. Well, I have laboured that point at considerable length; I could not avoid it. I have gone far to prove to the House that an excess of imports is not necessarily an adverse balance of trade. I have laboured the argument fully because if you grant the first point, of course the second is easy. My right hon. friend's next position in his progression of fallacies was that Britain having followed for seventy years a wrong method of trading, her people were poor in large sections and they were poor because of free trade. He says it must be so, Bannerman said so. Now it is true that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman made a statement in a certain speech that there were twelve millions of British people near the poverty line. But what was he talking about when he made that statement? He was talking about the iniquitous land laws of Great Britain, and he was attributing the poverty to a wrong handling of the land of Britain and the need of different methods of taxation. But of all the men in the world, Sir Henry Bannerman was the last man to attribute any of the poverty of Britain to free trade; he was one of the greatest free trade supporters England ever had. But my right hon. friend comes along and says: Sir Henry Bannerman makes the statement. I do not know whether my right hon. friend knew where he made it, or what he was talking about. If he did know, then he said in effect: "The statement is true but Sir Henry's conclusion is all wrong; it is not the land laws of Britain that are wrong but the fiscal policy of Britain. Sir Henry did not know what he was talking about! He was only a member for thirty-nine years for one constituency and he had not had time to study this question." Then Mr. Rowntree said that Britain was poor. Well, Mr. Rowntree attributed a large amount of the poverty of Britain to intemperance, to the drinking of strong drink, and I think that the commonsense of every hon. gentleman will force him to admit that if a man works hard enough on Scotch whiskey with a limited income he will become poor whether he is living under free trade or under protection. That was Mr. Rowntree's view. But the Prime Minister says: "No, Mr. Rowntree does not know anything about it. It is free trade that makes the people poor."

Well, there is a method of testing this, apart from Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's opinions or Mr. Rowntree's opinions or the opinions of my right hon. friend. If he will read Macaulay's History of England he will find in the third chapter that in the time of Charles II, when there were only a few million people in Britain, there were 250 paupers in the thousand.

He mentions his authorities—statisticians, not the politicians whom my right hon. friend quotes. At the time when Macaulay wrote the third chapter of his History there were 80 paupers in the thousand; in 1872 there were only 40 paupers in the thousand—that was after free trade had been in operation a little over twenty years; and in 1907, a few years before the war broke out, pauperism had been reduced to 25 in the thousand. And from the time of free trade Britain's population had nearly doubled. That is the condition of poverty as far as it can be learned from the Board of Trade figures of the British Government. So that the second contention of my right hon. friend is just as baseless as the first. If it had been true that they had been following a wrong system of trading, of course it might have led to the poverty that there is in Britain and that there is in every big country—and that there has been for two thousand years, anyhow, because we were told then by an undisputed authority, that the poor we have always with us. If it had been true that Britain traded wrong, then it might be true that povery was the result of that wrong method of trading. But neither statement has one particle of support in the solid facts of the case.

The next step in my right hon friend's progress of fallacy is that he made a favourable comparison as regards United States labour in contrast with British labour. I had not had time to go fully into the conditions of labour in the United States, but I had quoted—and I think my right hon. friend was referring to that quotation—an article which appeared in a paper of the highest repute in the Old Country, written by Ernest Hodder Williams, a publicist in Britain of high standing, who had visited the United States almost every year. But he found his article upon the investigations of a journalist of the highest standing who is well known to the statesmen who attended the Peace Conference; his name is R. Stannard Baker. I am going to quote a single paragraph from that article, for the double reason that I think it is wise that we should know something at any rate about conditions of labour in the United States before we compare them unfavourably with conditions of labour in Britain; and if my right hon. friend is really an admirer of labour conditions in the United States, then the labour men of Canada should know it, because I think in that way they would avoid the policy which has produced this condition. Mr. Williams, gathering his information from Mr. Baker, wrote:

> One of the causes of the recent steel strike in America was the fact that the twelve-hour day and the seven-day week were so common in industry. Many men in the steel works lived at least four miles from the mill. They got up at four-thirty in the morning, at six o'clock they began work, going steadily until five in the afternoon, with no regular stop for luncheon hour, though during waiting periods they had time for something to eat; home at six o'clock, then after supper bed. They made big money, but they did not live—they existed, worked and slept. According to Judge Gary's own testimony, there are over 69,000 men in the United States Steel Corporation working twelve hours a day.

I defy my right hon. friend or any other man in this world to go into Britain to-day and find conditions of labour that will for one moment compare with what is brought out in that paragraph as prevailing in the great Steel Corporation, which is one of the glories of protection according to my right hon. friend.

The next step in the fallacy is perfectly natural. "Ireland has participated in the general ruin." I always thought that my right hon. friend's friends attributed the difficulties and troubles of Ireland to a very different cause. But it is all free trade, it appears, because my right hon. friend tells us, in almost his first incursion into economics, that free trade dwarfed the nascent industries of Ireland. Four million people inhabit Ireland. Its agriculture is one of the finest in the world. Before the war Ireland was producing the largest number of bushels of wheat to the acre of any country in Europe. That is an important industry. Who said it was dwarfed? They supply every year a large amount of Britain's need of store cattle. Has my right hon. friend ever heard of the tobacco industry of Ireland?—one of the greatest in Europe. He has heard of Irish linen? —the finest that is made anywhere. He has heard of Irish lace? If he has not, and his boat calls at Queenstown, he will see some of it in going over to England next May or June, for the Irish women come on board ship to sell their lace —beautiful stuff. Has he heard of Ireland's shipbuilding? I venture the prophesy that in the next twelve months the Irish people who live in Belfast will build more ships than will be built in all Canada with the Canadian Government behind our shipbuilding industry. But my right hon. friend says in his review of history, that free trade has dwarfed the nascent industries of Ireland. Well, naturally where people have been following the wrong system of trade they get poor, they have horrible conditions of labour, and they have been fleeing the country as they would a pest house. They must have been doing it for this reason—because my right hon. friend says so. He says that free trade has filled the emigrant ships with fugitives from their native land. Well, that is of all the causes of emigration from the British Isles the most recent cause that I have heard or read expounded. Why, Sir, in the early fifties of the last century a thousand people were leaving the British Isles every day, and then they were wondering whether those old lands would stand the drain on their blood and the strain of time and circumstance. The Old Land was struggling then up towards thirty million of people, and she sent out her thousand a day, and she has kept on sending them out all over the world. To-day in spite of that steady stream of emigration, she has neared the fifty million mark in population, and last year—good luck to her and God bless her?—she had the largest number of births in her history. Yet free trade has 'filled the British emigrant ships with fugitives from their native land!" Well, in Britain, they take a different view of this subject, as my hon. friend himself will in time. They say there, with pride:

> We sailed wherever ship could sail;
> We founded many a mighty state;
> Heaven grant our greatness may not fail
> Through craven fear of being great.

"Fugitives from their native land!" Why, my right hon. friend must be something of a "fugitive" himself. Where did his ancestors come from? His policies are a little medieval, but I never took him for an aboriginal. My right hon. friend has the reputation of being a fighter, and he deserves it. It is true, in a sense, that free trade was the cause of this expansion, and I submit to my right hon. friend the reason; you cannot travel abroad unless you have the price. They had to stay in Britain under protection because they had not enough money to enable them to get out, but the moment they got free trade they expanded. It is true in a glorious sense, and if free trade has built the British Empire I want to say that that is the greatest of free trade's glories. My right hon. friend carries his fighting propensities too far when he fights with Providence for having built the British Empire; he must really restrain his terrible animosities a little. It is a fact that people do emigrate most when they are most prosperous. As I say, they have the price and they also have the ambition, having done so well, to get out and try to do a little better. Of course, having had the "unfavourable balance of trade" and being "impoverished," and having had her industries "ruined" and having been obliged to "flee their native land," the people of Britain, my right hon. friend is persuaded, are about to desert a wrong policy, and he bases himself on the reports of certain committees. Well, I will concede this: that there are selfish men in Britain as well as in protectionist countries, and if they could persuade the government to change a fiscal policy by reports of committees so as to put illegal gains into their pockets, I am sorry to confess, there are Britishers who would take the gains. So they report that their trade would be helped—their particular trade—by the abandonment of free trade. My right hon. friend mentioned—and I take only one of his cases as an illustration—the matter of the iron and steel trade in Great Britain. He read the report of a committee asking for duties on iron and steel. But my hon. friend from Maisoneuve (Mr. Lemieux), punctured his argument on that point by putting one simple question: "Have the Government acted upon this report?" My right hon. friend was bound to answer that they had not, and I venture to prophesy that they will never dream of acting on it. I will tell my hon. friend why: iron and steel are the basic or building materials of the very greatest of Britain's industries. If Britain were to put a duty on iron and steel and make those things dearer, what would become of the cutlery trade of Sheffield; and what would become—which is vastly more important—of the shipbuilding of Great Britain, which is the glory of the country and of the Empire and which won the war? That is my answer to my right hon. friend upon this question: they will not tax iron and steel; do not let my right hon. friend, in trying to form an opinion about what is going to happen in Britain, attach too much importance to what the journeymen in politics say; I advise him to keep his eye upon the big figures in British public life, and that he listen to what they say. What are the Cecils saying about free trade? The moment there is a question of an anti-dumping law to keep out a few chemicals and a few tungsten burners, which bulk to a tremendous extent, I need not say, in the trade of Britain, the Cecils get restive and show an inclination to leave the Unionist Coalition over there, because they know this question and they know that Britain's commercial greatness has depended upon her fiscal policy. Lord Derby is in the same boat—a man of enormous wealth and enormous responsibility and of great connections in Lancashire—he shows restiveness and an inclination to leave the Government. And what did Mr. Lloyd George himself say only a week ago? I draw particular attention to this, because Mr. Lloyd George is the head of the administration in Britain:

> If international trade fails, I do not care what you do, you will have nothing but starvation and ruin.

That being the opinion of the Prime Minister of Britain he is a very sanguine protectionist who would base the policy of this country upon any expectation that Britain is going to change her fiscal policy.

What about America in this connection? My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) the other night asked us how we would feel if the Fordney Bill passed. Who is Fordney? I never heard of him until this Bill was brought in. He is a politician, of course, trying to implement his pledges to the farmers in the last election. That is not the place to go for American opinion. If you want to form an intelligent forecast of what America is likely to do on trade, go to her captains of industry; go to her great financiers; go to the New York journals, most of them. There are two supreme needs of America at the present moment; one is imports and one is exports—strange as that may appear. The financial magnates and the really instructed men who know about America's position in the world of trade and commerce know this; she must have imports, in the first place, because at Washington there are treasury bills variously estimated at from ten to fifteen billion dollars representing the debts of various foreign nations to America contracted during the war. These debts can only be discharged if America imports goods to pay for them, so that she must arrange her fiscal policy so as to go on importing. But these men that I speak of are equally clear in the view that America must develop a great export trade. They say, in so many words: she must follow the example of Britain in seeking outlets for the capital she accumulated during the war by helping foreign development through her investments abroad. They are under no misapprehension as to how Britain's so-called adverse balance of trade was caused; they want to send out their capital, and they say they must do it.
