Now, it is a dangerous thing for one who has occupied the time of the House longer than he intended to inflict a quotation upon hon. members, but I have in my hand the Wall Street Journal of Friday last, containing a review of topics of taxation, the tariff, and America's foreign trade relations, by Thomas W. Lamont, one of the leading members of Pierpont Morgan and Company, and one of the greatest financiers and authorities on finance in the States. I do not apologize for reading this, because the opinions of such a man about what is likely to happen in the immediate future in connection with America's trade relations must have enormous weight with every thoughtful Canadian and must have an effect, if we are wise, on the steps we take in developing our own policy. I quote from this article:

> I do not for a moment mean to suggest that this country should forthwith go to a free-trade basis. Anything approaching such a complete change is impossible. But the tendency toward freer trade is bound to become more marked. Our position before the war as a debtor nation was a far different one from what it is to-day. When in those days we sold food and raw materials for export we were able to find our pay for them in a number of different ways. The peoples abroad sold us services in the way of ocean transportation, they sold us insurance. Lastly, on a large scale, they loaned us capital, which is only another way of saying that they provided credits with which we paid our own imports.
> Now the position is reversed. From being a nation in debt to the peoples abroad, to the extent of say $5,000,000,000, as we were in 1914, we have become, on net balance, a creditor to the peoples abroad to the extent of $12,000,000,000, perhaps even $15,000,000,000. Therefore, whether we will it or not, from this time forward we must act the part of a creditor nation; we must be governed by the economic and commercial laws that govern creditor nations. We must begin to realize, if we do not already realize it, that we cannot continue to pile up these credits indefinitely without disarranging our own and the world's markets. In other words, we shall find our operations working against the old mercantile theory of trade, that same ancient theory that England, as a great creditor and commercial nation, found herself compelled to abandon a hundred and fifty years ago. We shall find ourselves ardently desiring to buy as well as to sell. If such shall prove to be the case—and I see no escape from it—we shall automatically tend toward freer trade. We shall inevitably grow to realize that the ideal status for the world is for our country to produce those things which it can product cheapest and best, and to exchange those things for the products of other countries which those countries are able to produce better and more cheaply than we.
> I shall not be surprised if the new Congress, realizing our country's enormously changed situation, will find the difficulties of thoroughgoing tariff revision so great that they may abandon any immediate attempt at it.

This quotation will go on Hansard, and I trust my hon. friends opposite will peruse it carefully and find out what the really big men of the United States are saying and thinking about these things.

Such is the fairy tale that the Prime Minister of this Dominion told the House and the country in his speech on the last Budget. It is exactly contrary to the historic facts of the case. If my right hon. friend will acquaint himself, not with the views of economists, but with the writings of standard authors, he will know that Britain, at the end of her protective period, was steeped in poverty as regards the masses of her people. Read Carlyle's "Past and Present"; read the best works of fiction relating to that period; read Macaulay; read the speech which Emerson delivered at Manchester in 1847. The year after free trade was passed, but two years before it came into operation, Mr. Emerson, speaking at Manchester, referred to conditions prevailing at the end of the protective period as conditions of "gloom and commercial crises, affliction and beggary". That is the language, not of a Britisher, but of one of the most distinguished sons of New England in the United States. Since that time, Britain, by her fiscal policy, has increased enormously in wealth, in prosperity, in the comfort of her people and in the greatness of her world-wide destiny. That is the true history of the case.

I should like to have referred to some of the other arguments which my right hon. friend has used in the country in support of the policy to which he gives his honest and open adherence. He says: "We believe in protection"—and the address repeats the fallacy—"because it keeps the workmen at home and it keeps industries in Canada." It did not do that during the first years of the protective or so-called National Policy in this country. A million French-Canadians went to find their homes in the United States, and the population of Canada, at the end of the period, was practically stationary. It was when there was some slight departure, all too slight, I admit, from that policy, that we in this country began to expand, and we would have expanded to a far greater degree if the departure had been greater. It begs the whole question.

Another argument used both by the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is the argument of antiquity. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said, I think, down in Elgin, "Why, we have had this policy in the United States for 141 years and in Canada for 42 years." My right hon. friend, showing how well he is adapted for being a leader by following his follower, took the figures from the latter and repeated them in the Eastern Townships of Quebec. Well, 141 years in the United States and 42 years in Canada—that is a very brief period in the history of a nation. It was only in 1776 that Adam Smith's work was published, and he knew so much of the difficulty of penetrating the human cranium with new ideas that he had very little expectation that his views would make much progress in his life-time. But if my right hon. friend wants to argue from antiquity, he should go further back. There was a king, who lived long ago; he was a very rich king, and he was a very wise king, wiser than my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), wiser even than the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is related of him: "And the king made silver and gold at Jerusalem as plenteous as stones, and cedar trees made he as the sycamore trees that are in the vale for abundance. And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt and linen yarn; and the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price." So that the wisest man that ever lived was not afraid of imports; he was a free trader; he would trade in Egypt or anywhere else where he could get good horses and linen, if the other people at Jerusalem would take the stuff those other countries produced and pay for it. My right hon. friend says—and in this he has also copied the argument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—"England"—I prefer the term "Britain", myself, but we use the word "England" in that way—"England is the only nation that ever has gone in for free trade." Well, that may be so, though Holland, one of the brightest little countries in Europe, has gone pretty near it. But may I say to my right hon. friend that Britain is the only country that could have cleared the seven seas of every German ship in four months, and that is what my right hon. friend called "muddling through the war?" Britain is the only country that could have won the battle of Jutland, and she won it. Britain is the only country that established constitutional government hundreds of years ago, at a time when every other nation in Europe was a tyranny and North America was a wild. Was she wrong in blazing the trail in that case? Was it to her disadvantage to have constitutional government? Was it rather not to the disadvantage of the laggards of human progress, for whom my right hon. friend becomes the apologist? I do not think the example of blazing the trail—the expression is a Canadian one—is one that we should be warned against by our leading statesmen in this fair young country. I think I have said enough to make my right hon. friend and my hon. friends opposite a little thoughtful about what Britain is likely to do, about what her free trade policy has done for her, and about what America is likely to do. They will become more thoughtful as the days go by. I gather, though, that a lot of the people of Canada are thinking a little differently now on this question from the way they used to think.

It is time I remembered that there is an amendment on the subject before the House—though I claim that every word that I have uttered is thoroughly germane to the subject and in line with the best traditions of debate. It cannot be said that I have in any way funked the main question in the Address, and I apologize for the time I have spent over it. Now, there is an amendment to the amendment. Well, that amendment to the amendment has no attractions for me, for two reasons. In the first place, when I heard it put forward, I reflected that in human life it frequently happens that people who try to sit between two stools presently find themselves occupying a more lowly posture. I do not care for the amendment from that practical point of view. But this amendment being before us, I think it is a fair thing to say that there are three possible views to be taken of it. We may vote complete confidence in the Administration; we may vote partial confidence in the Administration; or we may vote no confidence in the Administration. One of these courses we may take in the first instance, and we may follow the other afterwards. Well, as I look at things, it would be impossible to vote partial confidence in the Administration first, and then vote no confidence in it afterwards. That would not be a logical course of procedure, so as far as I am concerned I shall vote as I feel, which on the grounds I have elaborated at great length is want of confidence in the Government. Not that the amendment is free from fault. One objection to the amendment to my mind, is that it states as a fact what is not a fact. I do not think for one moment that the Prime Minister and his colleagues are guilty of usurpation. "Usurpation" is a word with a well-defined meaning. Usurpation is the seizure of Government by force against the constitution and against the law. I have not looked at the dictionary, but I have ventured on that definition myself. That being so, I think my hon. friend who proposed the amendment gave away his case when he admitted the Government were in office according to law and according to the constitution. The second objection is that it professes to wish to get a proper representation of the people. But if it were carried and an immediate election took place, that is just what it would not get. On this point I differ very, very acutely from my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), when he says there is no need for redistribution to precede the election. I think, in ordinary times, and under ordinary conditions, redistribution ought to precede the election, immediately if possible, or as nearly as possible; and if my hon. friend had been here I should have asked him what is the object of redistribution? It has only one object in the world—to get a proper representation of the people at the ensuing election. So, if the object of the amendment be to get a proper representation of the people, if it prevented redistribution it would fail in attaining that object.

There is another point in regard to representation which I would like to mention, and if the Government live long enough to deal with the subject, I hope they will give serious consideration to it also. If the elections are going to take place in this country under conditions such as have prevailed recently we are going to be face to face with conditions under which constituencies will be very generally represented by minority members. In Elgin we had an hon. gentleman elected, whom I am very proud to have as a colleague—he could not help the circumstances, he had to run under the conditions that prevailed, but he was voted for only by three-eighths of the constituents. In Peterborough only 4,000, in round numbers, voted for the successful candidate, out of 13,000 votes cast. If we are to have numerous candidates in single-member constituencies, I do not think it will make for stable conditions and the maintenance of the best kind of representation in the House, to have men elected to represent minorities, and I would ask the minister seriously to consider when they come to the question of redistribution, if they ever do, the possibility of having the single transferable vote in single-member ridings and trying out proportional representation in given areas of the country. That is a matter deserving very serious consideration. We are living in times when changes are very rapid, and may easily become too rapid, and one of the great advantages of proportional representation is that it would give you some guarantee of having in each succeeding Parliament a fair proportion of men who, like my right hon. friend, have attained their political knowledge and political position by constant service, year after year, in the House of Commons. I would seriously impress that view on my right hon. friend. Let me put it plainly in other words. I think it is desirable that men of a certain size in our public life, so far as they are willing should be retained for the public service whether they call themselves Liberals, Tories, or Progressives. Politics is the science of Government, and like any other science, it can only be learned by application, and by the practice of it. In Great Britain a politician of a certain size is never lost to the public service until he is lost through death. If he loses his seat in one part of the country, he finds a seat in some other part, and under proportional representation I think that men of a certain size would be sure of getting elected to the House—not by any gerrymandering process, but by the process of giving proper representation to minorities. May I be very personal in the application of my argument? Let me suppose a case. My right hon. friend sits for Portage La Prairie. Now it might be—on personal grounds I hope it won't be—on personal grounds, I said—that Portage La Prairie will turn its back on my right hon. friend.

Mr. HOCKEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: It is a possibility.

Mr. HOCKEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Well, of course, people who are very sanguine before elections are liable to have their eyes opened when the elections take place. There may be strange things happen in Toronto. I am only begging for a possibility. I say, that might happen. Now I venture to think this: If you had a system of proportional representation in the city of Winnipeg, and my right hon. friend were one of the candidates his size would ensure that if there were five members, he would come pretty near the head of the poll, because he would get the votes of men of size all over that great city. That is just a little illustration of how proportional representation might work out. It is a matter which the Government will have to consider very seriously if it wants to secure real representation in this House, if we are to have various groups running candidates in various parts of the country.

Mr. CURRIE: How would you re-elect newly appointed ministers?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I always thought that was an absurdity, an anachronism, better got rid of. There are many people in Great Britain, and more in Canada, who think that sending ministers back for re-election is really a thing of the past and ought to be abolished. I do not think there is much in that practice.

I have another objection to the amendment. It is contrary as far as I know, to the invariable practice of the Old Land in regard to amendments to the Address.

They nearly always hinge upon some question of principle, and I think it is well that that should be so. In this connection may I say that I think it is unfortunate that the official opposition in this House are apparently not in a position to take direct issue with my right hon. friend the Prime Minister upon the tariff question. I wish to be quite frank in this matter. My hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King), with very great courtesy, has extended an invitation to Progressives all over Canada to fight under his banner. Well, there are reasons why consideration of that proposal is impossible, and I want to give them with perfect candour. In the first place, I believe it is impossible for a great party successfully to face the electorate speaking with two voices upon what is the main issue of the day. Now, I submit that in all kindness to my hon. friend. The Prime Minister, within his perfect rights, has agreed with the Progressive party and with my hon. friend himself that the tariff is a great issue to-day. The Prime Minister says it is the greatest issue. We agree with him and join issue with him on the question. We are opposed to the principle of protection; he is in favour of it. I submit to my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he should tell his friends that it is really impossible, in the serious condition of the minds of our people, to speak with two voices upon what is the great issue of the day. I hope my hon. friends opposite will applaud the next thing I say. It is impossible for a party truly liberal to have any success linked to the medieval superstition or imposture of protection, and I may say that I borrow both these epithets from William Ewart Gladstone; he got light upon the tariff question when he was just about the age of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and he came in his old age to look upon protection as a superstition and an imposture. I put it to my hon. friends in all seriousness that it is impossible for them to turn a friendly face to a superstition and an imposture. In this connection, may I remind the House that last year I quoted from a distinguished man who for so many years represented Quebec East? That constituency is still fortunate in having a distinguished man (Mr. Lapointe) for its representative and he gave a definition of Liberalism a couple of years ago which was very simple and easy to remember, and which I believe to be absolutely correct. He said that Liberalism is freedom. Well, I hope he had in his mind besides freedom in religion and freedom in civil rights, freedom in trade also. If it is freedom it means ultimately some time freedom in trade as well as in other respects. And I want to say very seriously to my hon. friends from Quebec—I hope I shall not be charged with carrying on a courtship in that quarter, as so many of our public men have been, for if I court the people of Quebec, it is not for their votes or anything I want from them—I want to say to them that I should greatly value their intellectual and moral adhesion to my views. Let me say that in my opinion my hon. friend from Quebec East was right in his definition; Liberalism, historically as well as etymologically, means freedom. But let me carry his thought a little further. In fighting for freedom, how are the forces ranged? In fighting for freedom, from the time the word was used in 1828 and 1829 when Catholic Emancipation was carried and the Tests and Corporation Acts were repealed, and all down through the fights of Liberalism in Britain. I will tell my hon. friend how the forces were ranged. Liberalism was always fighting for the rights of the masses against the usurpation of the classes—using that word in a greatly different sense from the way it is used in the amendment. Well, how does protection stand in regard to the classes and the masses? Protection perpetuates the injustice of taxing the many for the sake of the few; it is an accentuated form of special privilege, and against special privilege, whether in Canada or in Britain, all true Liberalism has always fought. On these grounds I appeal to the people of the province of Quebec to study these questions. There may be capitalists, there are capitalists, in the city of Montreal, who are protectionists, but Jean-Baptiste est libre-échangiste—pas mon ami, le "Jean-Baptiste" de cette Chambre, mais le vrai Jean-Baptiste—; il est en faveur du libre-échange. Protection, standing as it does for special privilege, is typical Toryism. If you have any doubt look opposite and see who support it.

And that impels me to state that there is no course for us in this corner of the Chamber but to vote for the amendment in each division that will be called. In the first place, we canot vote a confidence which we do not feel, and in the next place, whether we will it or not, the Prime Minister, though he made an appeal to me—a compliment which I want to say sincerely I felt intensely—has made it impossible for me to vote for the Address. There are advantages accruing to the nailing of one's colours to the mast. My right hon. friend is being commended by his supporters because he has nailed his colours to the mast. He comes to me and says: "Nail your colours there too." But the mast is on a sinking ship from my point of view; I do not mean the ship of administration, but that battered medieval ship of protection. Now, my right hon. friend, in that speech on the last Budget which has got so much of my attention, gave me absolution beforehand for voting for the amendment. He said in that speech, when we were dealing with this same question on which the right hon. gentleman has nailed his colours to the mast:

> I can understand a man whose feet are based on free trade voting against this budget; I cannot understand those who believe in the principle of protection voting against it.

So if my hon. friend wants support from this House, according to his own showing, for this Address, which puts the principle of protection in its very heart and centre, if he can find any protectionists opposite he may fittingly make his appeal to them for help. But he cannot fittingly appeal to us. He is for protection; we do not believe in it. Having no confidence in the Administration, and having less if possible in its policy of protection, we shall vote, as I understand it, for the amendment.

My right hon. friend, in my opinion, was skating on very thin ice when he said: If you get your election by this bald amendment—and I admit the hairless condition of the amendment—what will you be fighting on them? What will you have to go to the country on? Surely my right hon. friend knows that the moment a Government takes office in this country it is on its trial. It is composed of marked men. It can be tried any time properly by vote of censure in this House, and is always tried sooner or later before a higher and a final tribunal. It is the Government and its policy that we shall vote on if we go to the country. Besides my right hon. friend must know—I do not want to refer to recent elections at too great length, I am not greatly impressed by what Mr. Gladstone once called the science of political meteorology; if we in this corner of the Chamber had got as much excited as some people seem to do every time they win an election we should all have been in hopeless hysterics long ago; we have got so used to winning by-elections that they are like water on a duck's back with us, and do not excite us at all; passing events—my right hon. friend I say, must know by even a casual glance at recent by-elections that the choice at the present moment is not purely a choice between Grit and Tory. There are third choices and the people know it.

Something has been said about the issue being confused. My hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Henders) said my leader was not clear in his enunciation of policy. Well, he stands upon a policy that was drawn up by my hon. friend the member for Macdonald, absolutely.

Mr. CRERAR: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: My leader applauds me. He has not departed from a single plank that my hon. friend put under him, he stands on it still. If my hon. friend is on it still, he is mighty near the edge waiting to jump off. There is no doubt about where we are in this matter. My hon. friend from Swift Current (Mr. Argue) very properly and very fairly asked us on the cross-bench portion of the Chamber what mandate we had to be here. Well, I can only speak for myself on that subject. One afternoon in the House, after the war was over, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) brought in some question regarding shipbuilding. I took the liberty, which I have frequently taken in this House, to try and show him in very moderate language that he would promote shipbuilding if he would promote foreign trade—a thing which appears tolerably evident to anybody who thinks out the subject—and the consequence was that within a few hours, two of the strongest protectionist speeches were delivered that I have ever heard in this House during the time I have sat in it; and I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the fumes that arose around me, to my trained nostrils were the fumes of Toryism and not Unionism. I was smoked out. I went to the cross-benches next day, I escaped for my life. Because I have breathed the air of freedom of opinion all the time I have lived, and freedom of trade as well. That is where I got my mandate. I told the people who elected me that I believed the same thing that I believed when they first elected me. When I was elected for Red Deer I was elected as a free trader. I believe in freedom. When I supported my right hon. friend in the war I believed that the greatest fight that was ever waged for freedom was being waged on the battle fields of Europe. I believed in freedom then, I believe in freedom now—freedom first and last for me. There has been no inconsistency about my position. If Liberalism means freedom then I am as good a Liberal to-day as ever I was. But for the time being we are "Progressives" because I have given reasons why I am a little doubtful about certain brands of Liberalism. Liberalism to me must be real Liberalism.

Do not let my right hon. friend have any trouble about what will go before the country. It is the Government that is always on its trial. It is on trial in this House, and the people have a second choice. Where, I think, those who want to return hon. gentlemen opposite, who want to return to the old methods of political thought, fail, is in not having a thorough appreciation of the psychology of the people at this time. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, the people of this country, and of every other country, are thinking in a way they have never thought before. There is a consciousness—which may in some cases be only a sub-consciousness—that having participated in common sacrifices, having escaped a common danger, having won a common and glorious victory, they ought to participate, to the full in the things for which the battle was fought and for which the victory was won. There is a democratic sentiment in this country, arising in all quarters of it, which cares little for old party names and less for old party shibboleths. I myself care very little for detailed programmes. Tell me the spirit and the principle of a man or a party, and I will tell you whether that man is a Tory or whether he is a Progressive. It is the spirit that counts. We read in our newspapers and we said in our speeches during the war that the world would not be the same after the war, and it is not the same. It is not the same because everywhere there is a grim determination that democratic principles shall prevail among the peoples of the earth and that special privilege shall die. There is a determination that life and meaning shall be put into that old phrase which has been used from time immemorial on this side of the Atlantic: "Special privileges to none, equal rights and opportunities for all." There never was a time when the rank and file of the people, not only in Canada but in all nations of the earth—and this is the issue that will be fought in the next election—were praying more earnestly, if not in the words in the thought of the old Corn Law rhymer, Ebenezer Elliott. During that supposed time of prosperity in Britain when protection prevailed, Ebenezer Elliott voiced the sentiments of the people themselves in regard to this matter —and he is voicing the sentiments of democratic people everywhere to-day—when he wrote:

When wilt Thou save the people, O God of Mercy, When?
The people, Lord, the people—not Crowns and Thrones, but men.
God save the people, Thine they are,
Thy children, as Thy angels fair.
From guilt, oppression, and despair,
God save the people.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Militia): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will agree that it has just had one of those very able, very learned, and very eloquent appeals to which the hon. member for Red Deer sometimes gives us an opportunity to listen. If we cannot on all occasions agree with the opinions or ideas advanced in this House by the hon. member for Red Deer, we can still join in paying this tribute to him, that he speaks with a vast amount of sincerity and a vast amount of boldness, because I believe he is one of the members of this House who is not afraid to state his actual opinion upon any occasion or upon any question.

I regret, as we on this side of the House will regret, that upon this important occasion he considers it his duty to vote for the first amendment moved, namely, the want-of-confidence motion in the Administration. He has given to the House during the course of his two and a quarter hours' address reasons which, I am satisfied, appeal to him and convince him what is the right course for him to take. But they certainly are far wide of the reasons which have been advanced by the official leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) for voting want of confidence in this Government. There is no resemblance between the reasons advanced to-day by my hon. friend from Red Deer and the reasons advanced upon the opening day of the session by the official leader of the Opposition.

While I admit that my hon. friend from Red Deer was quite within his rights to take the stand which he has taken this afternoon, and to submit as his chief reason for voting in favour of this amendment the fact that he does not approve the fiscal policy of the Government, I realize, as I am sure the House will realize, that that has been the attitude of the hon. gentleman ever since the general election of 1917. He was not a supporter of the fiscal policy of the Government then, he is not a supporter of it now. If he has no confidence to-day in this Government on account of its fiscal policy, it is no new thing whatever, it is merely the repetition of an old idea or old attitude on his part.

I confess that we on this side of the House were pleased with the somewhat genuine and generous tribute of congratulation which he sounded at the opening of his speech towards the Government and those of us who support it. He spoke of the business properity and the contentment which has been pretty general in this country since the war, as we all know, and he attributed a limited amount of credit to the Government for this satisfactory condition, although I am prepared to say he gave the chief credit to Providence. He congratulated us also on the fact that there was a certain amount of prosperity now throughout the length and breadth of Canada. We are glad of his good opinion in this respect; and we are glad that he has been manly enough and bold enough to declare that in his estimation the charge of usurpation of office which was launched against this Government by the official leader of the Opposition on the opening day of the session is entirely unfounded and unjustified.

There was this to be said in regard to the argument of my hon. friend from Red Deer upon the fiscal question. After he had enumerated what, I imagine, were in his view the shortcomings of the Administration; after he had touched on the proposal emanating from hon. members on this side of the House for the appointment of a Grain Commission; after he had made some very humorous comments upon that subject which is known in this House as Daylight Saving; after he had enlarged more or less upon the luxury taxes and declared, what he had always declared for three sessions, must eventually prevail, then he turned round and said, "For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote no confidence in the Government; but I can find other and stronger reasons for such a vote when I refer to the speech delivered in this House eight or ten months ago upon the tariff question by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government."

I am afraid that that speech of the right hon. leader of the Government made a deep impression upon the hon. member for Red Deer. I believe that last session he was not satisfied with himself in respect of that speech. I think he tried very hard to obtain an opportunity to deliver a second speech upon the subject of the Budget by way of reply to the speech of my right hon. friend, and it seems to me that for eight or ten months back my hon. friend from Red Deer has been nursing this sore question in his heart, he has been pondering over that speech, and this afternoon he has given the House his deliverance upon the question.

My hon. friend will forgive me if I do not attempt to follow him into what I think I might fairly describe as an academic discussion of the fiscal and economic policy of Great Britain. For over one hour to-day he elaborated that fiscal system and his own particular views thereon. Now, I am not greatly concerned, neither is this House, with what is the precise fiscal policy to-day in Great Britain. We are concerned, and vitally concerned, as to what is the fiscal policy to-day and for the future in the Dominion of Canada. And if I do not further allude to my hon. friend's very able and very learned discussion of the British trade policy, he must not think that I have not been thoroughly impressed by his knowledge of the whole vast subject, and that I am not fully aware that he, of all men perhaps in this House, is best able to discuss the British fiscal system; but I do not think that the time of the House is as well occupied in a discussion of that subject as it would be in a discussion of our own fiscal system.

However, my hon. friend did take huge satisfaction to himself by demonstrating to a conclusion, in his opinion, that an adverse balance of trade was a real benefit to a country, and that irrespective of whether that country were Great Britain or Canada. Now, to my mind the two cases are not parallel at all. There is a tremendous lack of similarity between them; the conditions are wide apart. My hon. friend from Red Deer justified his statement that prosperity reigned in Great Britain when there was an excess of imports over exports by reason of two facts —the immense British investments overseas from which handsome revenues were returned; and Great Britain's control of the world's shipping from which also tremendous revenues were returned. These were the two facts which justified his statement to-day that Britain prospered under what we call an "adverse balance of trade."

When he turns to the Dominion of Canada, let me point out to him, both these conditions are absent. Canada, we are forced regretfully to admit, has no foreign investments to speak of. Canada does not enjoy the world's foreign carrying trade. These two sources of revenue, which offset the effect of an adverse balance, are absent in the Dominion of Canada, and if your adverse balance piles up the day will come sooner or later when the balance must be met, and must be met in the only currency the world recognizes—that is, gold. My hon. friend says that in 1895, although our imports were valued at $100,000,000 and our exports at $102,000,000, prosperity did not reign within the Dominion of Canada. Then, he said, as our adverse trade balance began to climb up, our prosperity seemed to return. Yes, it is true our prosperity did seem to return; as our balance kept piling up it seemed that there was greater prosperity in Canada. But I think we were a little short-sighted. We do not feel the effects of the adverse balance of trade the first year, or the second year, or, perhaps, the fifth or the tenth year; but we are feeling it to-day and we shall feel it for many a year to come—until the situation in this country is righted. Let me point out this to my hon. friend: just at this moment—and I am speaking only in approximate figures—I understand that we are buying annually a billion dollars worth of goods from the United States, and we are selling to them about half that amount. We might carry that on for a few years, but the day of settlement is bound to come, and how are we going to settle? The day of settlement is at hand now, unfortunately, and we are settling by going out in the market and buying American currency, and by doing that we are depreciating our own dollar or appreciating the American dollar—and you have the exchange situation. If you continue to purchase from the United States annually and in vast amounts more than you sell to them; if you keep piling up that adverse balance, your exchange is going to get lower and lower. There are two ways that I know of, and only two, of correcting that. You can correct it by selling the United States more goods, or you can correct it by ceasing to buy so much goods from the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in touching on this question of purchasing from the United States I am touching directly upon one of the questions which is very near and dear to the heart of the Agrarian party, or to that portion of it which belongs to the United Grain Growers. I know that it has almost become a principle with that organization to deal as far as possible with the people in the United States, disregardful of whether or not injury results to the traders of Canada. I mention this matter particularly at this time on account of a statement which was made in the House last Friday night by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. J. F. Reid). Fortunately or unfortunately for me, about a month ago I had occasion to make a speech in the riding of South York, represented by my hon. friend who sits next to me (Mr. W. F. Maclean). During the course of my remarks on that occasion I was dealing with the question of the tariff policy of the party known as the United Farmers' party. I was dealing with that plank which demanded free trade in agricultural implements, and I pointed out to my audience on that occasion that it would suit the purposes of the United Grain Growers and the Farmers' party generally if they could obtain free trade in implements, and that, strange as it may seem, that organization has for a long period of years past been dealing in agricultural implements in the western part of this country almost exclusively with firms and manufacturing establishments in the United States. A report of that meeting seems to have got into the newspapers—not an accurate report, but I do not know that I have very much complaint to make with regard to it. It seems to have been published pretty generally; it was one of those telegraphic reports that do get into the papers. It was referred to and put on Hansard the other day by the hon. member for Mackenzie. The part to which I wish to draw attention at this time is reported in Hansard, unrevised edition, at page 353. It says, among other things:

> The ploughs listed in the catalogue, Mr. Guthrie said, were made in Wisconsin; harrows, cultivators, mowers, etc., in Illinois; portable engines and washing machines in Pontiac, Ill.; cream separators in Buffalo, N.Y.; and wagons in Iowa.

Then the report purports to give my exact words, because what follows is in inverted commas:

> "In the lines of goods which I have mentioned, which are called 'U. G. G. goods'," Mr. Guthrie said, "there is not a Canadian article catalogued."

I take no exception to that report of my speech save in one particular—I did not mention wagon. I mentioned the other things but made no reference to wagons. Now, that statement of mine was contradicted by Mr. Rice-Jones, general manager and vice president of the United Grain Growers. He gave a report to the press, and it is in regard to that statement that I wish to place some information before the House—particularly in view of the fact that I am in the presence of the president of the United Grain Growers, if I judge aright from the catalogue of that organization, which I have before me. Mr. Rice-Jones, in his statement, which is reported at page 353 of Hansard, says:

> The Hon. Hugh Guthrie's statement as reported in a despatch is incorrect. He states there is not a Canadian article in the machinery listed in our catalogue as United Grain Growers.

Now, I did not state that, but it is pretty nearly the truth, as I am going to prove. The statement goes on:

> Even the list of machinery which is specifically mentioned as being manufactured in the United States is incorrect.

I am subject to correction. Then he goes on:

> Mowers and rakes and wagons, for instance, are all purchased in Canada.

When I saw that contradiction published in the papers, I thought that in justice to myself I had better look the matter up again, and the first place I looked was in the sworn testimony of Mr. Rice-Jones given before the Tariff Commission. I obtained an extract from it, and I am going to read it to the House so that it will go on Hansard. Mr. Rice-Jones appeared before the Tariff Commission at Winnipeg, and after having made a statement of how much more cheaply he could sell his goods out there if there was no tariff, the chairman of the commission began to ask him some questions. Now, this is from the record; I will give the evidence:

Sir Henry Drayton: Where do you get this machinery from? From whom do you buy your plow?

Mr. Rice-Jones: It is the Lacrosse plow.

Sir Henry Drayton: From whom do you buy your cultivator?

Mr. Rice-Jones: From the Light Draft Harrow Company.

Sir Henry Drayton: Where do you get it?

Mr. Rice-Jones: It comes from Ohio.

Sir Henry Drayton: What is the name of the firm?

Mr. Rice-Jones: The Light Draft Harrow Company.

Sir Henry Drayton: What is the name of their home town?

Mr. Rice-Jones: I cannot recall the name just now; I can get it for you.

Sir Henry Drayton: It cannot be a very well known name.

Mr. Rice-Jones: It is just a small company.

Sir Henry Drayton: Is that concern just manufacturing for you?

Mr. Rice-Jones: No.

Sir Henry Drayton: Is it a concern with which you have made a special contract?

Mr. Rice-Jones: No.

Sir Henry Drayton: The next is "seed-drill 20 single disc." Where do you get that?

Mr. Rice-Jones: At Lacrosse.

Sir Henry Drayton: That is Lacrosse, Wisconsin?

Mr. Rice-Jones: Yes.

Sir Henry Drayton: Where do you get the washing-machine?

Mr. Rice-Jones: From the Meadows people.

Sir Henry Drayton: Where are they?

Mr. Rice-Jones: I cannot tell you offhand where their plant is.

Sir Henry Drayton: You do not know?

Mr. Rice-Jones: Ohio.

Sir Henry Drayton: Where do the grain grinders come from?

Mr. Rice-Jones: The Letz Company.

Sir Henry Drayton: Where do they come from?

Mr. Rice-Jones: I think their plant is in Wisconsin.

Sir Henry Drayton: You think it is in Wisconsin?

Mr. Rice-Jones: Yes. I can get you that information.

Sir Henry Drayton: I was just wondering where these places were and you do not appear to know anything about them. Where do you get the small gas engines?

Mr. Rice-Jones: From the Hercules Gas Engine Company of Evansville, Indiana.

Sir Henry Drayton: The disc harrow?

Mr. Rice-Jones: Lacrosse.

Sir Henry Drayton: The mower?

Mr. Rice-Jones: From the Acme Mowing Machine Company of Dayton, Ohio.

Sir Henry Drayton: The hay buncher?

Mr. Rice-Jones: The same; Dayton, Ohio.

Sir Henry Drayton: The road grader?

Mr. Rice-Jones: From J. D. Adams & Son, Indianapolis.

Sir Henry Drayton: The road maintainer?

Mr. Rice-Jones: The same.

I am going to emphasize that because of Mr. Rice-Jones' statement that mowers and rakes and wagons, for instance, are all purchased in Canada, and yet he swore before the Tariff Commission that he bought his mowers at Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. MAHARG: What was the date of the hearing?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the date of the Tariff Commission would be about September, October, or November of last year. I do not think I said anything about wagons at South York but I began to look through the catalogue on the subject of wagons, and if I did say anything about wagons, I do not know that I made such a terrible blunder. Mr. Rice-Jones says in regard to wagons: "In fact, we have not purchased a wagon in the United States for three years." I turn to their catalogue —this is not the most recent one, it is the one for 1919—and I read in it about a wagon called the "Abingdon" wagon. This is what the catalogue says at page 74:

The "Abingdon" is known throughout Western Canada as one of the highest grade imported farm wagons in Canadian service. For some time the importation of the finest American-made wagons has been practically impossible, but our extensive purchases, made at an early date, enable us to continue to offer them.

That is the denial of the statement of Mr. Rice-Jones, so that I do not think I was so far astray in what I said. The point I was trying to make was this—and I will make it briefly now—that in almost the whole list of farm implements and farm machinery, scarcely a single article sold by the United Grain Growers and advertised in their catalogue is of Canadian manufacture; almost exclusively this farm machinery is of American manufacture.

I am now going over the list a little more carefully. I do not find that the United Grain Growers Association sell what we call threshing machines; I do not find them advertising threshing machines or binders; but I do find them advertising the following farm machinery, and I say that according to their catalogue and the sworn statement of Mr. Rice-Jones the great bulk of it is American manufacture: Ploughs, disc harrows, common harrows, seed drills, cultivators, "Forkner" cultivators, haying machinery, including mowers, rakes, bunchers, sweep rakes, stackers, tedders, grain grinders, potato planters, sprayers, and diggers, portable elevators, gas engines, cream separators, washing machines, road machinery, manure spreaders, "Abingdon" wagons. I can not find in that long list a single article made in Canada unless it be a steel rake. I can go further; I can even identify most of the articles from the plates upon them. I can tell precisely the factories in which most of these goods were turned out, because I have made it my business to get that information, and while my hon. friend is in the humour and in his place, I should like to ask him one question that he can probably answer. If he does not want to do so, it does not matter. In this catalogue a large motor truck is advertised and greatly commended. I have been told that the Smith Form-a-truck is of American manufacture. I have not been able to verify that, but perhaps my hon. friend, who is president of the company, can tell me whether that is the case or not.

Mr. CRERAR: I regret I cannot give my hon. friend the information.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is about the only thing that could be called a farm implement that might possibly be of Canadian manufacture, except also a little grinder manufactured in Quebec, and I will give my hon. friend and his company full credit for that. But what is this organization doing? What is the party supported by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) doing to-day? Look at the millions upon millions of dollars that are going out of this country every year to buy American machinery and pile up an adverse balance of trade. Is it any wonder that one of the foremost planks in the tariff policy of the Farmers' party is the plank calling for free farm implements? They are paying now only from twelve and one-half to fifteen, indeed, I think in some cases as high as twenty per cent, in duty, but in spite of that tariff, they are succcessfully bringing into this country and selling to a tremendous number of people in the West, American farm machinery against the competition of Canadian manufacturers. If they can do this with a duty of twelve or fifteen or twenty per cent against them, what will they do should they come into power and wipe out that little bit of protection and give free trade in implements? If the free implement plank were adopted in Canada, they would increase their purchases with the United States enormously, because there would be no barrier at all to prevent them; it would be a matter of only a few weeks, or at most a few months, until they would be in a position to close up practically all the industries in this country engaged to-day in the production of that class of material.

But there is another point of view in regard to this matter. It is said that we in Canada are to-day suffering, to some extent at least, from unemployment. Is it a patriotic thing, or a sound thing economically, to take the money of the people of Canada at this critical period, to send it across to the United States to give employment in the factories there, to pay wages and keep employed citizens of the United States, while so many good Canadians during the past few months have been looking for jobs in this country? Would it not, in the first place, be a more patriotic thing, and in the second place, a sounder thing economically, if the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and his friends of the United Grain Growers, would look about them in this country to the scores, yes, even hundreds, of Canadian manufacturers who can supply the goods they require, and try to make terms with them, spend their money in this country and thus give employment to unemployed Canadians.

Mr. CRERAR: It will be—

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend can follow me, but I do not wish to be interrupted. I am going to give my hon. friend a few details in regard to the manufacture of these articles, and he can take the matter up with his people when he goes home. I will deal with the question of gas engines, which alone forms a big item. Does the House know that to-day gas engines are manufactured in 65 Canadian factories, and the only kerosene or gasoline engine that the Grain Growers advertise is the "Hercules" machine made in the United States, every variety and style of it is here advertised and not a single one the product of the 65 factories scattered throughout the provinces of the Dominion. I will supply a list of these manufacturers to my hon. friend if he will make use of it. I come now to the question of cultivators. He will not for one minute say he cannot buy just as good a cultivator in Canada as he can in the United States.

Mr. CRERAR: They will not sell them to us.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Fourteen factories in this country to-day, employing Canadian labour, are turning out cultivators just as good as can be bought anywhere in the United States, but not a single Canadian cultivator does this company sell or advertise in their catalogue.

I come next to grain grinders. Mr. Rice-Jones says that they adopt the Letz—which is made in the United States. Now there are no less than eighteen firms in Canada making grain grinders, and from all I can gather there are better grain grinders made in Canada than in the United States. There again they give the American manufacturers the preference by advertising exclusively American-made machines, and excluding all the eighteen manufacturers of grain grinders in this country.

I come now to power washing machines. Many of the machines I have mentioned are made in the riding I have the honour to represent, and I feel keenly interested in the matter. Cultivators are made in South Wellington, gas engines are made in South Wellington, power washing machines are made in South Wellington. I would like to see the factories in the riding I have the honour to represent receive some of these orders, and thereby give employment to men in the province of Ontario. Fifteen factories in the Dominion of Canada are making these power washing machines, employing Canadian labour, but with not one of them does the United Grain Growers deal. Not a single Canadian washing machine do they advertise in their catalogue. In every instance they advertise the American machine.

So it is with the cream separator. I am told they are making cream separators at Renfrew, and very good ones too. I know they are making good ones at Peterborough, I know they are making good ones at Hamilton, but in spite of this fact this patriotic organization of traders in the great West deliberately decides to advertise and sell the King separator, made in Buffalo, New York. It will not sell a single Canadian-made separator. It is all very well for the president of that company to occupy a seat in this House and try to interrupt; but I bring this matter forward in order to give the public the facts, to put the facts on Hansard, and then let the Grain Growers' Guide publish these facts broadcast if it will. My attention has been drawn very forcibly within the last month to the fact they are publishing things about me and at the same time are misquoting what I said. Now I will give them a chance to quote from Hansard what I actually do say, and see if they will publish it.

There is one statement in the press despatch reporting an alleged speech I made in South York which is certainly not correct. It is reported in that despatch that I said the Grain Growers or the Farmers' party was "a menace to Canada." I never used that word, nor anything that sounded like it, nor any word that bore its meaning. I did say this, in the course of my remarks, that the most serious opposition in this country to the present Government was to be found in the Farmers' party. I said it was a party that had its origin in the far West among a population which was not entirely British, where the farming population, I believed, of the western provinces was said to be about 60 per cent foreign-born and about 40 per cent British-born. I said I had information that the movement had its genesis among the American farmers in the great West, that they were of a class of people who desired to trade with the people back home, and evidently from this catalogue, they were determined to carry out their desires. I said the movement had started in the West, but had swept eastward. It had taken a strong hold in Ontario and had now got down to the Maritime Provinces and I paid them the compliment of saying they were the most formidable opposition which the Government had politically in Canada to-day. I made no statement that they were a menace to Canada, as I am quoted in the press despatch as saying, and to which statement such severe exceptions was taken by my hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) the other night.

I think I can also pay them this further compliment—that so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, we know pretty well where the Farmers' party stands in respect to the tariff. There is no question in the world where the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), stands on the tariff. He is a free-trader out-and-out, first, last and all the time. He proclaimed to-day as forcibly as any man could proclaim that while the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), desired protection on apples, he, the member for Red Deer, desired free trade in apples, that while the member for Yale desired to make apples dear, he, as a free trader, desired to make apples cheap. Now will he be consistent and apply that same argument to wheat? If his desire is to cheapen everything in this country, I can tell him that a cheap country is not the best country to live in for anybody. It never was, and I think it never will be. But I will say this for my hon. friend from Red Deer: he is outspoken, you know where he stands.

I can also pay that tribute to the leader of the Farmers' party in the province of Ontario; I assume that Mr. Drury is the leader of the Farmers' party in Ontario. I do not know whether he owes allegiance to, or is a follower of, my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), but he is at all events the recognized leader of the Farmers' party in Ontario. I have never yet heard a fair, candid statement from my hon. friend from Marquette as to his tariff policy. I have heard him talking in the language of free trade one minute, and not of free trade the next. I have heard him say he would not be a free trader "in one fell swoop," and I read in a speech he made somewhere in the West that he was a free trader "by easy stages." I do not know exactly what he would do if he came into power in this country, but it is not so with the Prime Minister of Ontario. He gave us a sworn statement on this question, so we cannot question his stand. He was sworn before the committee of this House on the High Cost of Living, in 1919, and in looking over the evidence I find that at page 194, he says: "I want free trade on the manufactured goods."

That is short, concise, and direct. We know where Mr. Drury stands, and the point I desire to make is that we insist upon knowing where the rest of this House stands on the question of the tariff. There is so much pussy-footing, so much camouflage, so much soft-pedalling in the East, and so much loud pedalling on the free trade doctrine in the West, that it is pretty hard to know just where the official Opposition stands to-day, with the exception of my good friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster). He is outspoken enough, I think, to satisfy most of the people of this country. To my mind, he is a very outspoken free-trader. Having said so much, I cannot say anything about the remainder of the official Liberal party in this House, and I believe it is time the House knew, and time likewise the country knew, just where they stand. I think one of the most important matters at this particular moment is that someone devise some means of having at the earliest possible moment a clear-cut declaration, by a vote, to establish where each and every member of this House stands on the tariff policies that have from time to time been proclaimed in Canada. A delicious sidelight was thrown on the situation by our good friend the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier), when in his speech in the House the other day he described in his own clear and graphic manner how the Liberal fiscal policy was framed at the Liberal convention in Ottawa in the year 1919.

He evidently was a member of the committee which was charged with the preparation of the plank in regard to the fiscal policy. He described to us how they met in their committee room, and how the presiding officer on that occasion, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), true to his—

Mr. FIELDING: Will the hon. member pardon me? He is mistaken; I was not the presiding officer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, a prominent member of the committee I should say. However, the hon. member certainly pictured to us how eloquently the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) had pointed out, in the presence of the members of that committee, his view of the matter at all events, which was that the Liberal party was the historic free trade party in this country, that it was the real free trade party in Canada, but that he was completely brushed aside by his friend, the member for Shelburne and Queen's, who interjected: "In theory, we are a free trade party, but only in theory."

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GUTHRIE (resuming): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with a brief discussion of the platform of the various parties in regard to the fiscal question, I wish to say that I omitted before the adjournment to make reference to one statement made by my hon. friend from Red Deer during the course of his remarks this afternoon. It was in reference to his argument upon the question of the balance of trade. Among other things, he mentioned that the municipalities and the provinces of this country were rapidly piling up debt in the United States. This fact, he said, had an influence upon the question of the balance of trade as between Canada and the United States, and, in some way, he seemed to charge this Government with responsibility in respect of these municipal and provincial loans.

Now, as a matter of fact, the indebtedness of this Government to the United States at the present time is in a very satisfactory position. We know that we have a net indebtedness in Canada of about two and a quarter billions, but it is a gratifying thing to know that a very large proportion of this net debt is owed within our own borders and to our own people. I suppose it goes without saying that debt cannot be considered as a good thing under any circumstances, but I think a national indebtedness is least objectionable when it is owed to your own people. Approximately, our debt as a nation in the United States to-day is about one hundred and seventy-five millions. We owe Great Britain, I think, about double that amount, but apart from these two items the whole indebtedness of this country is practically confined within our own borders. This Government has nothing to do with provincial or municipal borrowing. Provincial and municipal borrowing is not a new thing. It has been going on, I think, ever since the days of Confederation, and in pre-Confederation times also, but there is this difference to-day in regard to provincial and municipal loans. Formerly those loans were negotiated in London. To-day they are negotiated in New York, and if these loans add to the burden, or the adverse balance, of this country in respect of trade between Canada and the United States, the rebuke of my hon. friend from Red Deer should have been directed against the provinces and the municipalities of this country.

It is argued from time to time that the adverse trade balance as between Canada and the United States has no influence upon the present discount on Canadian money in the United States. It has been argued in my hearing that year after year when, as between the two countries, there was an adverse balance of trade, our money was never at a discount, our money was always at par. Consequently, it is said that an adverse balance of trade has nothing to do with the matter. But, Mr. Speaker, this must also be remembered: In those pre-war years this country, the corporations in this country, the provinces and the municipalities, were all heavy borrowers and in those days our borrowings were in Europe. Our borrowings were in London, in Holland, and in France, and by far the greatest portion of them were financed through New York, and this foreign borrowing, coming through American exchanges to a large extent, rectified the balance of trade and assisted in keeping our exchange level. But we have no foreign borrowings nowadays. We cannot raise money to-day in the London money markets. We cannot raise money to-day in European countries, we cannot avail ourselves of that source of relief in regard to the exchange. As I intimated before six o'clock, so far as I am aware there are only two ways of rectifying the adverse exchange—the one by selling more goods, and the other by ceasing our overpurchases in the United States.

I was proceeding to examine what one might call the official Opposition platform in regard to the fiscal policy in this country. I think that I had remarked that my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) had given the House a most graphic description of the manner in which that policy was formed and adopted by the Liberal Convention which assembled in the city of Ottawa in the summer of 1919. After the policy had been thought out, considered, and formally adopted, it was sent broadcast throughout the Dominion of Canada. Official copies were issued in modest pamphlets such as the one I hold in my hand, and more elaborate publications appeared, with portraits of the leading spirits in the Convention, and were sold in the bookstores at a rate as high as a dollar a piece. Naturally the resolution upon the tariff is one of the important pronouncements of the Liberal Convention. It is not a long pronouncement and it will not hurt if I place it on Hansard in connection with my remarks. It is called simply "Resolution on the Tariff" and reads as follows:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second: reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.
> That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour, and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines, and fishermen's equipments; cement and fertilizers should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.
>
> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.
>
> That the British preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.
>
> And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, Mr. Speaker, the applause from the Opposition was not very general. I noticed that in some quarters there was no applause at all; and that is my chief objection to the manner in which this tariff plank of the Liberal policy is being dealt with by the official Opposition throughout the length and breadth of Canada to-day. It only seems to apply in spots either in the country or in this House. But it will be noticed that there are four pronouncements involved in their tariff plank: the first is a general demand for substantial reductions in the customs tariff; the second is a fairly long free list; the third is another demand for substantial reductions in wearing apparel and footwear and articles of general consumption; and the fourth pronouncement is in favour of an increase in the British preference to fifty per cent.

Now, the question which, I think, is most interesting to the members of this House and to the people of this country is simply this: Do the official Opposition intend to stand upon that platform, or is it one of those platforms which are sometimes made for the purpose of subterfuge of camouflage or the like? I remember well in the old days, twenty or twenty-one years ago a favourite story which my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was fond of telling the House. It related to a coloured porter who wanted to put the passengers off the platform at the end of his sleeping car. He told them that they must not stand there. "Why not?" they demanded. "Oh," he replied, "a platform is not to stand on; a platform is to get in on." And if my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's were in the House now, I would remind him that the tariff plank of the Liberal party formulated in 1919 is entirely different from any tariff policy carried out by the Liberal party during the fifteen years they were in power. From 1900 to 1917 I was a member of that party, and for eleven years I was a supporter of the Government then in power, and I think that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's will agree with me when I say that there was no free trade talk in the Liberal party in those days—there was no such tariff plank in the policy of the Liberal party as I have read to the House to-night. The tariff policy of the Liberal party in those days was a continuance of the old fiscal policy which came into force in 1878. And what I maintain now is, that forty-two years ago Canada adopted a fiscal policy which has continued in force until the present time.

I am quite well aware that prior to 1896 it was not an uncommon thing for leaders of the Liberal party to pronounce in favour of free trade. I often heard declarations from Liberal leaders in those days to the effect that the Liberal party was in favour of free trade as they have it in England; I heard declarations by Liberal leaders that they would not be content until protection had disappeared "root and branch" from our fiscal system. I heard those declarations prior to 1896, but I think the House will agree with me that when the change took place and the Liberal party came into power no one in any quarter of the country ever heard such declarations from Liberal leaders. The Liberal Government adopted the settled fiscal policy of the country with slight alteration and they maintained it in force during their whole term of office. I call to the attention of my hon. friend from Red Deer that when he entered the House of Commons in 1908 his complaint in Parliament and out of Parliament was that he was the only free trader in the House. And it was so. He was the only one who had the courage to state a case in favour of free trade. He used to take us by the buttonhole and lead us into the corridors to instruct us in the intricacies of the doctrine of free trade. He did not find very many apt pupils, I agree, but still he was then, as he now is, an arden free trader. But his complaint in those days was that the Government was a protectionist government, not a free trade government.

The principle of protection was maintained during the whole regime of the Liberal party from 1896 to 1911, and only at this late date, during the summer of 1919, do we have a pronouncement from that party which, if not an out-and-out free trade pronouncement, is a pronouncement which involves such a mutilation of our fiscal system as to render it absolutely innocuous and worthless if put into force, but at the same time is a pronouncement behind which, I believe, the official Opposition does not stand as a body to-day. Had my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition during the recent by-election in Peterborough read to the electors of that riding the tariff pronouncement, as I have read it to-night, had my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's done the same thing, and had the present hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Gordon) said to the electors, "I stand upon the Liberal tariff policy of 1919," I think I can safely predict that the hon. gentleman would not now be the representative of that constituency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was not the issue.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do you wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the people have some curiosity to know just where the parties and members of this House stand in regard to this fiscal question? I hope that within a measurable time matters will be so adjusted in this House that we will have the acid test applied and that each hon. member will be asked to declare, by his vote, just where he stands in regard to the fiscal policy of this Dominion. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says that the tariff was not the issue in West Peterborough. I agree that he has done everything in his power to avoid that issue both in the by-elections and in this House. I agree that in the amendment which he has moved to the Address he has up to the present moment rather successfully avoided that issue. It is apparent that he has framed his amendment for the express purpose of avoiding the issue, simply because he knows that he cannot command the united support of his own party behind him upon the tariff issue.

And now just a word in regard to the first amendment. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that in his somewhat animated address in moving his amendment my hon. friend made no charge against the Government of malfeasance, of misfeasance or of non-feasance. He did not suggest that anything in the legislative record of the Government in the past was in any respect improper or lacking, nor did he offer the slightest suggestion to the House that the published platform of the present Administration which was issued last summer contained anything which did not meet his approval. In a word, he made no charge whatever against the Government from a legislative or an administrative point of view.

He contented himself solely with a highly excited and exaggerated denunciation of the Government as usurpers, as buccaneers, I think also; as a Government that would prostitute parliamentary authority, as autocrats, and I do not know what else. But his great difficulty was to find substance, to find a foundation, upon which to rest such a charge, and the more he delved into history for precedent, the more he found himself refuted in the position which he himself took. What strikes the candid observer, what strikes the diligent listener to this debate, is that every single precedent that has been brought forward has proved to be a precedent which establishes the constitutional position of the Government and refutes the statement of the amendment that the Government has nc authority to continue in office.

My hon. friend dipped deeply into British parliamentary history, from, I think, the year 1865. He occupied the time of the House in telling us just how long each Parliament had lasted in Great Britain. He reviewed the Triennial Act, the Septennial Act and the Quinquennial Act, and he did the same thing in connection with the history of this country from Confederation down to the present time—for what purpose I know not, because he established nothing as a result of it. Had he desired to examine the parliamentary history and the parliamentary records of Great Britain and of Canada he would have found those records full of instances which fit the present case. I ask him to examine any period in the last forty or fifty years in the parliamentary history of Great Britain or of Canada; if he does, he will find absolute justification of the position which the Government has taken at this time and the strongest refutation of the position which he himself has assumed.

My. hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power), also indulged in some parliamentary history and cited one or two instances, which, he thought, afforded something like constitutional precedent. I propose as we pass along to mention these two precedents, because I think that they most clearly establish the Government's right to continue in office to the close of the parliamentary term and completely refute the charge made in the amendment offered by the leader of the Opposition.

We have in the first place the precedents of Great Britain. The one best known is that of 1892 to 1894. It is well known that the Liberal party under the late Mr. Gladstone carried the elections of 1892 in Great Britain. They were established in power but the majority was not satisfactory. The combined vote of the Irish Nationalists and the Conservatives might upset them at any time. In 1894 Mr. Gladstone, becoming a very old man and being in ill-health, determined to retire. He tendered his resignation to Her Majesty the Queen, and she sent for Lord Rosebery, who formed a new government. The Gladstone Government had then been in office only two years but there were loud cries from the Conservatives of England for a dissolution. The charge was made by Mr. Balfour that there was no mandate; that the new Government should dissolve and appeal to the people. But all Liberal authority at that time supported Lord Rosebery, among them Lord Morley, Sir William Vernon Harcourt and others, and Lord Rosebery determined to carry on and refused to dissolve the House. In taking this course he maintained that he was following constitutional precedent, and I submit that he was. But his predicament was a very odd one. He met Parliament; he brought down the speech from the Throne, and on the first day of the sitting he was met by a motion from Mr. Henry Labouchere to amend the address and the motion carried in the House of Commons by a majority of two against the Government. I read from volume 2 of Herbert Paul, page 260:

> Although the majority for this irregular proposal was only two, it put the Government in a most humiliating plight, and they were compelled, with the contemptuous assistance of the Conservatives, to negative their own Address as the only feasible plan for getting rid of the amendment.

But even in this serious situation Lord Rosebery did not think of resignation; he persevered, as was his constitutional right. During that session Sir William Harcourt was only able to carry his budget by a majority of twelve. A month or two later Mr. Speaker Peel resigned, and the Government only succeeded in carrying the Speakership and elected Mr. Gully by a majority of eleven. However, in the summer of 1895, the Opposition were strong enough to carry a vote for reduction of a vote in a Finance Bill—it was carried by a majority of seven, and only then was it that the Rosebery Administration resigned. Were they right or were they wrong? They were elected in 1892. The Gladstone Government ceased to exist in 1894 for the same reason that the Borden Ministry ceased in this country in 1920. A new Government came into existence in England under Lord Rosebery. The demand was made in England by the Conservatives of those days for a dissolution. The Liberals said: No, and continued until they were defeated in the House and had to dissolve.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That Government was not a war Government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, we will come to a war government, later on because there was one in 1890. In 1895 the Salisbury administration took power. They dissolved the House, carried the election and continued in office until 1900 when the "kharki election" took place in England.

Mr. LEMIEUX: An old Tory trick.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was charged, of course, by the Liberals that the Conservative party in bringing on an election had taken advantage of the Boer War. Peace was not concluded, I think, for a year and a half afterwards, and it was alleged by Liberals that the Conservatives had taken a most unfair advantage and had held a war election. The Conservative party were returned to power on that occasion by a very substantial majority. Lord Salisbury was Prime Minister. In July, 1902, ill health and old age being given as the reasons, he retired, and Mr. Balfour was called upon to form a new administration. Then the boot was on the other foot. There are quotations from the speech of Mr. Asquith, Lord Morley and Sir William Harcourt on record in which it was urged that as a new administration had been formed which had no mandate from the people that the government should dissolve parliament. The charge was made by Mr. Asquith that this was a war government; that the party which had attained power had taken advantage of war time to secure an election for themselves which in normal times they could not have secured. But in spite of such criticism the government determined what its constitutional right was. It did not heed the taunts or the criticism of Mr. Asquith and the Liberal party but continued in office until January, 1896. Then dissolution took place and the Liberal administration went into power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I am going to give you a Liberal precedent now. The Liberal administration went into power under Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. Unfortunately, the duties of office weighed upon him, and after a period of only two years, his health became so poor that he was obliged to resign, and on the advice of his physician, on the 6th of April, 1906, he proceeded to the Continent where his Majesty then was, and tendered his resignation. His resignation was accepted and Mr. Asquith was sent for. He went to Europe and was there asked to form a new ministry. He returned to London on the 10th of April and announced that he would do so. Once more the clamour was made against the new administration, this time by the Conservatives—it looks to me Mr. Speaker, as it depended a great deal in Great Britain, and perhaps, in Canada as well, on the question of "whose ox is gored." The charge was that as Mr. Asquith had no mandate that he should dissolve parliament, but Mr. Asquith continued to carry on, and did carry on, until the expiration of the parliamentary term. Now, these are all the precedents I have been able to find in British history throughout the last twenty-five years, back to 1892 and I challenge my hon. friends opposite to find a solitary instance in which a contrary proceeding was adopted in Great Britain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite willing to accept the challenge and I will quote proceedings to-morrow.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Now, I am going to turn to the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of course, Canadian precedents, unfortunately neet with laughter on the other side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Unfortunately, they are all against my hon. friends opposite. I will go back to 1891—I started with 1892 in Great Britain and I think I covered the whole ground. Again I will issue the challenge: in every single instance in this country from 1891 down to the present time the precedents which exist establish the right of the government and refute the contentions of the Opposition.

In 1891, on the death of Sir John Macdonald, a new administration had to be formed. The House knows as well as I do that when a prime minister dies or resigns his administration comes to an end. The ministers do not need to resign; the resignation of the prime minister operates as the resignation of the whole government, and a new administration comes into being. Then came Sir John Abbot. He did not dissolve the House; he went right on. Unfortunately his health failed, and his Government came to an end by reason of resignation—a case on all fours with the present instance. Then Sir John Thompson was called on to form and did form an administration. He did not dissolve the House; he carried on. Unfortunately, in the course of a short time, he died and Sir Mackenzie Bowell was called upon to form a government. Sir Mackenzie Bowell did not dissolve Parliament; he formed a new government and carried on. I do not think that in the Dominion Parliament from 1891 until last July there was a single instance where the precedent established both in Great Britain and Canada was not precisely followed in the case of every new administration; Time after time in the various provinces of Canada the same situation has arisen. In 1896, in three provinces, three distinct administrations came to an end by reason of the fact that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who had attained power, called to his Councils three provincial premiers. In Ontario the government of Sir Oliver Mowat was in power. He resigned: his government came to an end; he came to Ottawa, and a new government was formed. This is pure Liberal doctrine. Mr. Hardy formed a new administration, but he did not dissolve the legislature. Subsequently Mr. Hardy resigned, and the late Sir George Ross came in and formed a new government, but he if I remember correctly did not dissolve the legislature. In Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was prime minister. He was called to Ottawa in 1896, while still premier of that province. He was succeeded in Nova Scotia by a new premier, Mr. Murray, who formed a new government; but there was no dissolution, no mandate from the people; the government simply carried on in accordance with constitutional practice. So in New Brunswick where Mr. Blair was prime minister, Mr. Blair came to Ottawa, a new premier came in; a new government was formed in New Brunswick but there was no dissolution. So, also, as recently as 1917, the same thing happened out in the western provinces when Mr. Sifton came to Ottawa, and, so also when through the resignation of Mr. Scott in Saskatchewan, when Mr. Martin took office, I do not think there was a dissolution, but I am not sure of that. More recently than all, within the last few months, in the province of Quebec, a Liberal premier resigned, a new government was formed in Quebec, but there was no dissolution, simply a carrying on to the end of the parliamentary term. What I maintain is this: We have a plain direction in the law of this country, section 50 of the British North America Act, which was quoted to this House by the leader of the Opposition, and which says that Parliament shall extend for a term of five years. We in this Government have followed both the letter and the spirit of that law, and our action has been in entire accord with the best parliamentary procedure. I do not know just what body of the people is clamouring for an election at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Everybody.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know the leader of the Opposition imagines that there is in this country some tremendous demand that he should be the rescuer of Canada during the present crisis; but I have been travelling throughout Canada lately, and I have not noticed any loud or prolonged or widespread cry for assistance, guidance or direction from the hands of my hon. friend. It is said by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that he does not agree with the constitutional doctrine propounded of the leader of the Opposition in his amendment but he thinks that on account of the by-elections, this Government should resign. In all fairness, I am going to put the case to the hon. member for Marquette. This Government came into being last July, since which date there have been five appeals to the people in four provinces of Canada. In three of those appeals in three separate provinces, the people have in the most decided tone commended the Government and sent us a supporter. In two instances in Ontario, the Government has not been sustained, in one constituency a supporter being sent to the leader of the Agrarian movement and in one constituency a supporter being sent to the official leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the Government platform.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There have been five by-elections since this Administration was formed. If you want to discuss the sins of omission or commission, if there were such, of the former administration, you may be able to say that there were, under a former government by-elections, that showed the temper of the people. But is it not a fair and reasonable proposition that I am making—namely, that the question should be decided on the record of the by-elections which have taken place since this Government was formed? Is that not a fair way of obtaining an expression of the opinion of the people of this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If you do so, you will have to admit that the preponderance of public opinion is in favour of the Government and of the course which it is pursuing. On the other hand, if you wish to go back to the year 1917, and take the record of the by-elections since Union Government was formed in that year, I am quite free to say that in doing so you may show that a majority of the by-elections have been against the government. But it was not this Government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This Government is answerable only since the middle of July last year—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —and this Government is prepared to stand on its record before the people and to be judged by the people on that record. Sometimes I think the official leader of the Opposition assumes unto himself, in respect of his position, a good deal of authority which he does not actually possess amongst the electors of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: That is to be proved.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Exception was taken on Friday last by the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair), to a statement made on this side of the House to the effect that the official leader of the Opposition represented merely a remnant of the Liberal party. I do not see why my hon. friend should take such grave exception to a statement of this kind. I can tell my hon. friend exactly what he knows to be the fact, namely, that in eight provinces out of the nine in this country, he represents only a remnant of the old Liberal party. My hon. friend has only to cast his eye about this Chamber to satisfy himself upon this point.

In two of those provinces my hon. friend does not represent a single elector if one may judge by his following in this House. So when my hon. friend talks of the great Liberal convention and the great Liberal party in the Dominion of Canada let me tell him—and I am only telling him what he knows already—that the old historic Liberal party in this country, save in one single province, has ceased to exist. Let me point out to him the figures. In the Maritime Provinces there are 31 representatives sitting in this Parliament, and my hon. friend can muster only 11; and one on the cross-benches will give him 12.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Just try an election.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought a few real facts would waken some of them up. Let me tell my hon. friends opposite that in the great province of Ontario there are just as many old line Liberals supporting my right hon. friend and his Government in this House as are supporting the leader of the official Opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Somebody dissents from that. It will not take very long to count them. I was fond of making the statement before the West Peterborough election that the Government had one more than the Opposition, but now I think we stand just ten-ten; that is, the Government has just as many of the old Liberal party from Ontario supporting it as has my hon. friend opposite. Then let me tell my hon. friend that from lake Superior to the Pacific ocean he as only two supporters of the old Liberal party, in a total of about fifty-seven constituencies.

All my friends around me must well remember the days when we looked to British Columbia and the Yukon, with 14 seats, as a great Liberal stronghold. But glance at it to-day in this House. How many followers does my hon. friend muster behind him of old line Liberals from British Columbia and the Yukon? Does he lead a remnant? No, not even a remnant, not a single supporter. From the old Liberal province of Alberta, one single member supports my hon. friend. From the old Liberal province of Saskatchewan with 16 seats in this House, there is not a single representative of the old Liberal party sitting behind my hon. friend. Take Manitoba. One single representative from that great province. Am I not right then, Mr. Speaker, when I say that my hon. friend the leader of the official Opposition, when he assumes in this House or in this country to speak for the old Liberal party of this Dominion, is assuming a good deal more than he is entitled to? He has only to look across the House. He has only to recognize the members of the old Liberal guard, sitting on this side of the House.

Mr. McMASTER: It is hard to recognize them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No longer Liberals, I admit—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —because when the testing time came we found that the line of cleavage was so deep, so well defined—

Mr. DUFF: So many loaves and fishes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —we found the issue which had to be determined was perhaps the greatest issue which any of us would have to determine in our public lives, and when we took the decisive step, we took it deliberately, knowing what it involved.

And now we are proud to be members supporting the present Administration, supporting a party which we ourselves helped to form in the first instance, on a platform which we ourselves helped to prepare, and in support of a Prime Minister who was the man of our own selection. That is the real situation which exists in this House to-day. There is no use trying to camouflage the facts. Those are the plain facts as they exist to-day. While it is charged in various quarters that the former supporters of this Administration are flocking back to my hon. friend's support, I can discover only two of them. I see a great many who have crossed the floor and joined the Agrarian party, but I have seen only two in all who have become out-and-out members of the official Opposition. I do not even like to call them the old Liberal party because, as I said before, they represent merely a small remnant of that old party.

Now just a word as to the sub-amendment. To my mind it raises a question of considerable difficulty and importance in the House. I do not know but what under certain circumstances the sub-amendment might have been considered well-timed and appropriate, but I think there would be great difficulty in the way of any government accepting such an amendment under present circumstances. I see great difficulties in the way of the Government accepting a sub-amendment to the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, which itself is a pronouncement of Government policy put into the hands of His Excellency the Governor General, to be presented to the House. I can, however, see force and reason in the sub-amendment, while I do not see either force, reason or propriety in the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the official Opposition.

There are a number of important considerations which must be dealt with. There is one practical consideration which is quite outstanding. It is a stock-in-trade charge of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that this Government is non-representative, is mis-representative is unrepresentative, and so forth, but let me tell him that if Parliament were dissolved and an appeal made to the people of this country with the constituencies arranged as they are to-day, we would have a Government just as mis-representative, just as unrepresentative, of the people of Canada as one could well imagine. You would have absolute non-representation in 25 or 30 seats in the West, but that is not the difficulty with which I am for the moment concerned. I heard a fiery denouncement in this House by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) a few nights ago. He thought some monstrous iniquity would be perpetrated upon the people of this country if the census were taken in June, and a redistribution of seats were to take place soon thereafter. Why, it is the natural and proper thing according to our law. The situation in Canada to-day, particularly in regard to the industrial centres, demands that there shall be no delay in regard to a redistribution of seats. The thing has become so anomalous as to be almost a public scandal. Think of it—and surely these facts will appeal to hon. members of the House—or in the city of Toronto, a riding like Parkdale sends one member to the House of Commons—

Mr. CAHILL: One too many.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —while the adjoining rural constituencies of Peel, Halton, Dufferin, South Perth and East Elgin, all put together, have not the population of Parkdale, yet they send five members to the House. I am told the situation is just as scandalous in the province of Quebec. I heard in the city of Montreal a few days ago that ten rural ridings in the province of Quebec, returning ten members to this House, did not have the population of two certain ridings in the city of Montreal.

Mr. SHEARD: Was one of them Brome?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, Brome was one of them. Now, Mr. Speaker, is not that a situation that demands a speedy remedy? Why should it take three, four or even five industrial workers in the city of Toronto to cast a vote equal only to a single vote cast in the townships adjoining the city? I have heard it said at a public meeting in the city of Toronto that the inequality is so great in Ontario that during the provincial elections of 1919 in Ontario the Conservative candidates in the city of Toronto polled more votes than the combined vote of the party now in power in Ontario under Mr. Drury.

Is it not a most glaringly unfair situation? Whatever government is in power in this country, such an unequal situation calls for a speedy remedy. You cannot impose such a disqualification, such an inequality, upon industrial workers resident in the city nor should it be allowed to continue. All men and all women are supposed to be free and equal under our law, and the theory of our constitution is that they shall have equal treatment and opportunity. We pride ourselves upon our democracy; yet we suffer to be continued in this country a system which allows four or five members to represent a rural district with a population only equal to one constituency in the city of Toronto. I do not say that any particular political party is to blame for this situation, which has simply been allowed to grow up in this country.

I have read debates in this House in the early days, long years before I became a member, when this question was under discussion. An argument was advanced that the city of Toronto should not have equal representation with the rural districts, because, as a rule, there were three or four members for other constituencies living within the city boundaries. I read another argument on the question, in which it was contended that it would be unfair to the candidate to impose upon him a large territory and a large population in the country because he would not have time to get around during elections. These are surely considerations of a most minor character. The theory of our law is equality, and the sooner we come to equality of voting and representation in this country the better.

There is opportunity to remedy this situation in the near future. I would not hesitate to say that cities like Montreal and Toronto and other cities in Quebec and Ontario, as well as the great cities in the West, are entitled to greater and more equal representation than they now have and must get it at an early date. The time is not far distant when they can be given it. Under our law the census will be taken in June. If dissolution took place now and an appeal were made to the country, the residents of these industrial centres would to a large extent be disqualified at the next election; they would not be entitled to proper representation. The greatest inequality would exist. That, Mr. Speaker, is to my mind one most substantial reason why the Government should continue to carry on, and why we should take the census.

On the contrary, there is only one possible reason which can suggest itself to any one why we should not carry on, and that reason will be definitely evidenced when the vote on the question now before the House is recorded. That question is simply this: Have we or have we not, the confidence of the House of Commons? That is the test, and the question will be settled when this vote is taken. The duty of this Government, if it is decided that it has the confidence of the Commons, is to go ahead and do its work, take the census and bring down to the House a fair redistribution Bill applicable to every part of the country.

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my first duty is to give expression to the regret that I feel because of the absence of hon. gentlemen who were in our midst last session and whom we shall see no more. I desire to pay my tribute of respect to their memory and also to the memory of that faithful servant of the State, Mr. Thomas P. Owens to whom I was personally, greatly indebted as were other members of the House.

With our deceased colleagues who sat opposite, Sir, I had little intercourse but I knew their lives, and I concur in the fitting tribute paid to them by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), my hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), and others.

I entertained for the late Mr. Gladu a feeling of the warmest friendship. With the masses in the province whence I come, I mourn the loss of this powerful and beloved tribune; with many of us who knew him intimately, I mourn the loss of a friend.

Sir, the passing of our late colleague should not be for us a cause of grief, only, but it should also teach us a fruitful lesson. Of that lesson, I could find no more adequate expression than in these beautiful words of Jouffroy:

> Qu'importe aux autres et à nous, quand nous quittons ce monde, les plaisirs et les peines que nous y avons éprouvés? Tout cela n'existe qu'au moment où il est senti. La trace du vent dans les feuilles n'est pas plus fugitive. Nous n'emportons de la vie que la perfection que nous avons donnée à notre âme—nous n'y laissons que le bien que nous avons fait.
> What matter to others and to ourselves when we leave this world, the pleasures and the sorrows that we have experienced? All that exists is but at the moment when it is felt. The trace of the wind through the leaves is not more fugitive. We carry with us from this life only the perfection given to our souls; we leave in it but the good we have accomplished.

This lesson, Sir, suggests another one. At the opening of our sessional labour, we would be derelict to our highest duties if we did not approach the problems which confront us, with a sincere desire of ascertaining the truth and giving expression to it. The truth is a thing beautiful and most powerful; so beautiful indeed that no adornment could be found for her, and painters and sculptors of all ages and of all nations had to represent her in her nude purity—"a lovely lady garmented in light," says Shelley. So powerful is it, Sir, that it is an attribute of God himself and the Bible in which you believe, and which is also the foundation of my faith, tells us that truth will make us free.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

In the year 1900—alas, 21 years ago—at the termination of our humanities, following a usage ancient in our province, the scholars of our class passed a conventum, and as is customary on such occasions, chose a motto, as a guiding principle throughout our lives: "Vitam impendere Vero,"—to spend our lives at the service of the truth.

As to my fidelity in the past to this fundamental principle I leave it to others to judge; as to my ability in future to adhere to it, that remains to be seen. But, I can now venture to state that I enter into the study of the questions raised during this debate with an absolute sincerity of purpose, a complete freedom of action, totally untrammelled.

Mr. Speaker, could we not fairly summarize this debate and the speech from the Throne in three questions?

1. Does the majority of this House represent the major consensus of opinion in the country, and has the Government supported by it, a sufficient mandate to carry on?

2. What should our fiscal policy be?

3. What is our real national status and how should we shape our future destinies?

To the study of these three vital questions I propose to limit my remarks.

In the first place: "Is the majority in this House a true image of public opinion?" And this bears itself a previous question: "Is there really a majority of duly elected members sitting behind the present Government?" In 1917 the Government was returned with a majority of seventy. Sir, I doubt very much if the vote shortly to be taken will reveal more than fifteen, but call it twenty. Since 1917, this country has come back to peace conditions. Therefore, if you want to establish a correct relation between the people and this House have you not to deduct from that majority those members who would never have sat in Parliament had they voted those legitimate electors who were disfranchised by the War Times' Election Act? Have you not to deduct further those members who were elected by "the amphibiological fracas" of the soldiers vote? Would you not also have to prune further from the list the names of those members who owe their election to foreigners who have since been disfranchised by our laws? I venture to say, Sir, that those three categories of members do not represent public opinion. In all verity, relieved of this deadweight, the Government would not be supported in this House by the one hundred and eighteen members who constitute the majority of the representatives of the people. Numerically, the true majority of the Government has vanished.

Let us examine the situation in respect of the principle which the gentlemen opposite were elected to defend. In 1917 there was only one principle involved, namely, the enforcement of the Military Service Act. The veracity of this statement cannot be questioned. The manifests of the ex-Prime Minister, the speeches of the right hon. leader of the Government, the emphatic declarations of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), and indeed of all the Liberal members of the Union Government, already cited in extenso in the debate, are conclusive on this point.

The Government came before the people under extraordinary circumstances. They begged the people to lay aside for the time being all other considerations, and not to judge them on the record of the previous Tory Administration. They asked a special mandate for a specific purpose, the successful prosecution of the war. This purpose has been accomplished. Do you not hear, Sir, the high injunction from the people that their mandate has come to an end, that their tenure of office has terminated, and that their persistency deprives the electorate of its right to exercise control over Parliament?

This question of confidence has also another aspect; it is that which concerns the personnel of the Cabinet. Who will contend that in 1917, the expression of confidence snatched from the people of this country was not mainly obtained on the credit of the Liberal members of the Cabinet? Why, Sir, the very fact that they took Liberals in amply proves my assertion. Would they have been taken in had not the Government been in that "imperious need which cannot be withstood" as Dryden would put it. The respected names and known principles of the Liberal members were a guarantee to the people that no other question than the prosecution of the war would be taken up. And yet these Liberal members could be elected only on declarations of principles like this one:

> I joined this Government as a Liberal and I am a Liberal to-day. More than that no person can make me anything else.

Therefore every Liberal defection from the Cabinet was for it a direct blow which had its repercussion in public opinion; and successively were torn away from the Ministry considerable parts of the confidence of the people with the withrawals from the Cabinet of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), Hon. Mr. Carvell. the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mewburn), the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), and the late Secretary of State, towers of strength in the Unionist structure. They were the salt of the Government. If the Government therefore has lost so much of its savour, wherewith shall it be now salted? Its remnants, Sir, could I not rightly picture with Tennyson: "Portions and parcels of a dreadful past."

Mr. Speaker, let me put again my first question; does the majority of this House truly reflect the opinion of the people? No, the electorate is not adequately represented in this House. Many of those who sit here either received their mandate from people who have no longer a vote, or did not submit it to those who have become again their judges. All of them received it for a specific purpose which has been accomplished. Their Liberal association, a vital factor in their election, has been dissolved. Their tenure of office is morally at an end and if they arrogate to themselves a right which they do not possess.

Let us examine the right hon. Prime Minister's argument on this point and see whether it is graced with any degree of accuracy. We can correctly reduce it to three points. 1st. "This Government is in office by the right of the confidence of a majority of the Parliament elected by a majority of the people." (Hansard, page 31.) "In point of character, in point of purpose, in point of aim and policy, we are all in full accord with the Government we succeeded—we are the continuation of that Government in every respect." In the platform on which they appealed to the electors in 1917, though it was set out in the plainest terms that the carrying out of the war was the main purpose of that campaign, there are no less than thirteen other duties which the Government set itself to achieve. I think,

Sir, that I have conclusively established that the majority in this House does not represent the majority of the people. But to corroborate my statement, let me call the unquestioned testimony of the most ardent supporters of the Union Government. I refer you, Sir, to the statements of the Hon. Mr. Carvell, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) and the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie), made here when they opposed the War Times' Election Act as an iniquitous measure. Forsooth, this Act was so vicious in principle that it had to be removed from our Statutes which it disgraced. It broke faith with citizens established in this country for more than ten years. It gave the franchise to foreigners who had never had any interest in our land. It unsettled our whole electoral economy and subverted the very foundation of our citizenship which we had afterwards to re-establish. This Government is not supported by the representatives of the majority of the people. Said the Prime Minister:

> In point of character, of aim and of purposes, we are the same Government. In addition to the prosecution of the war we had thirteen other specific duties.

Let us consider these two statements together. On both of them the right hon. gentleman is contradicted by his ex-leader, by his colleagues, and by his own speeches. At Milton on November 29th, 1917, the right hon. member for King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden), said:

> There is only one issue in this campaign, whether we shall keep our pledge or bond given to those men, or whether we shall abandon them when they need our help most.

This declaration the right hon. gentleman repeated a hundred times in different parts of the country. And his (Mr. Meighen's) colleagues—what did they understand? Let us listen to the hon member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar):

> That is not to say that I do not feel strongly on the tariff, but I feel the present issue is not the tariff but the winning of the war.

Listen to the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder):

> When the Government was formed in 1917 there was a tacit understanding that until the war was over, our soldiers home, and demobilization completed, we should carry on, and that is the view I take now.

And, again, the same gentleman said:

> The present Government, as originally constituted was not created for the purpose of making a general revision of the tariff. This Government was for a war purpose and to carry out a war policy.

> The members comprising the Government held strongly divergent views on the tariff question. We recognized at that time that those differences existed, and we decided to lay aside our differences for the time being.

What is true of members of the Government is equally true of members of the House on both sides: the members of this House were not elected because of their tariff leanings. Hear now, Sir, the right hon. Prime Minister himself:

> There was never a clearer issue before the people than to-day. It is simply an issue of Union Government and the vigorous prosecution of the war, or Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Canada's virtual withdrawal from the war.

It is simply an issue of Union Government and vigorous prosecution of the war. Can he now verily state, as he does, that in point of character, of aim and of purpose his Government stands where it stood in 1917? Can he contend that, in addition to the prosecution of the war, thirteen points had been put before the people? The right hon. gentleman would lead one to believe that he is a distant rival of the father of the fourteen points; but he is surely not a lover of the truth.

On the question of the tariff, to which I now come, the right hon. gentleman is armed with a double-barreled gun, one barrel loaded against the Liberal Opposition, the other against the Progressive party. Against the Liberals he shoots the idea that we are not serious in our endeavours to reduce the tariff; that we are high protectionists, as he is himself; that we avoid the issue; and he suggests to the Farmers that they had better support him because they know where he stands. Against the Farmers he fires the opinion that they are radicals allied to the worst and most subversive elements—men preaching dangerous doctrines. The inuendo is an invitation to Quebec to form an alliance with him. These rhetorical methods are typical of the right hon. gentleman. They have been described in the press as follows:

> The tactical methods upon which Mr. Meighen relies to achieve his ends upon the public platform were fully illustrated in the public addresses which he delivered during his recent western trip. It is Mr. Meighen's method to state at the outset of his speech the case as between himself and his opponents. He states it with care and deliberation and with a great appearance of fairness. After doing this he proceeds to the destruction of the Opposition by direct and vigorously delivered assault. Unreflecting observers are likely to attribute the resulting victory to the strength of Mr. Meighen's case; but more sophisticated unlookers are apt to remark that it is chiefly due to the weakness of the Opposition's case as set forth by Mr. Meighen. The Opposition's case in reality some times differs somewhat from its case as set forth by Mr. Meighen in preparation for his tilt at it; and there are times when Mr. Meighen's platform triumphs are victories, not over real opponents but over "men of straw."

Speaking in this House, the Prime Minister did not renew his attack on those radical communists who, he suggested, formed part of, or at least are allied with, the Farmers' party. Was his ammunition expended? Let not our Farmer friends believe it. For the time being both barrels of his firearm were busy discharging the ammunition compounded of his subtle sophistries against those "miserable Grits" who in their platform had dared to touch the most holy arch of tariff protection, and against their leader, who, in the judgment of the right hon. member, was intensely anxious to see that no clear issue got before the electors at all. Standing in front of the temple, ad instar the Pharisee of old, the Prime Minister says: "Oh farmer, praise the Lord with me that I am not like my contemptible opponent, non-committal and deceitful. In the speech from the Throne I have written a paragraph that defines clearly and definitely where the Government stands; a paragraph that states the principle in words that no man can fail to comprehend." Let us see whether my right hon. friend can get out of this more justified than his exemplar.

The paragraph to which he refers is as follows:

> It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained.

Will my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) lend me an expression for the purpose of defining correctly this plank of the Government's platform? Yes, Sir, I find it in his recent speech in the House. It was not intended to apply to this paragraph of the speech from the Throne, but it fits in very nicely as a description of it—"A new policy, wonderfully vague in its definitions." I say "a new policy" advisedly, because the protection of industries, including agriculture, as suggested by the speech from the Throne, is a radical departure from the well-known policy of the Tory party, which has always been the protection of industries at the expense of agriculture. But is it not also gloriously indefinite? Because I never heard of any details being given out by the Government to show how they reconcile high tariff with the interests of the agriculturalists. On the contrary, notwithstanding this paragraph in the speech from the Throne, the right hon. gentleman tells us, as reported in Hansard, page 40:

> We are not proposing any departure from the historic policy of this country pursued under this Government, under the late Government, under the Government of which the leader of the Opposition was himself a member.

"We are not proposing any departure," he says, but in the same breath he says also:

> In the speech from the Throne there is a paragraph that defines clearly and definitely where the Government stands, a paragraph that states the principle in words that no man can fail to comprehend.

"My advisers are convinced of the necessity for the revision of the customs tariff," says the speech from the Throne. "We are not proposing any departure; if we were we would not have the support of the Minister of Immigration," says the right hon. gentleman, and he concludes with a frantic appeal to the member for Red Deer to support this party whose position he knows to be consistently maintained. Let us dig a little deeper, Sir, perhaps we shall find in the Prime Minister's declaration some particle of truth. Speaking of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration, he says:

> The one man who has been consistent on this tariff issue. He is standing where he stood when the Liberal party were in power on the tariff issue.

Speaking at Winnipeg on the 13th of November, 1920, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Calder) said:

> Three years ago I did not understand the tariff question as well as I do at the present time. I was more or less a parrot, just as other people are parrots. I got up in the Legislature and advocated free fertilizers when I did not know the first thing about it.

Listen again to the Prime Minister's later declaration:

> The Minister of Immigration . . . is standing where he stood when the Liberal party were in power on the tariff issue.

Oh, truth, beautiful truth, the right hon. gentleman is no lover of thee! It is part of the political tactics of our friends opposite on the question of the tariff to throw into the eyes of the electorate the dust of two sophisms. To the big interests they say: Beware of the farmers and of their radical ally; if they attain to power they will subvert the whole economic structure. To the farmers they say: Do not trust the Liberals; they are protectionists in fact if not in principle. Neither of these statements is true, Sir. All over the world the stabler element in each country is the farming element. The farmer owns the land, he tills the soil, he has taken root. He is not transient in character, and he is not radical in principle. Is he a communist? Why should he be ready to share a hardly gained heritage with any prodigal spendthrift? Here let me borrow an expression from the Prime Minister himself: The absurdity of the argument is simply pathetic. In respect to the Liberals, could there be a more impudent statement than that the present Government stands where the Liberal party stood when it was in power? Did we not lose power on the question of reciprocity, so savagely fought by our opponents with their delusive bogey, "no truck or trade with the Yankees." The Liberal party can stand on its record. In 1893 they passed resolutions advocating tariff reduction and reciprocity. During their fifteen years on the Treasury Benches they removed the tariff on many articles; they reduced it at least twenty-five per cent, and afterwards to the extent of thirty-three per cent by the British preference, and they fell on the battlefield of freer trade espousing the cause of reciprocity.

In 1919, they reaffirmed their faith in the policy of freer trade and reciprocity, and that policy they will, if returned to power, carry out in the full measure that circumstances will permit. That they have not all at once embodied in the laws their advocated principles is not to be wondered at, it is to their credit and it is certain they will not fall into radicalism in the future. They are the doctors; the country is their patient, and a patient very sick after forty years of protection. It would be criminal to administer to him too suddenly a full ration of the healthier food of freer trade, but under their good care the patient will recover, and will gradually come to it. The farmer of today is like a man starting upon a journey and in search of a companion. Two offer themselves, both fully armed with the same weapons. One is armed to hold him up, en route, for his purse or his life. This is the protectionist, using the tariff for the enrichment of the few at the expense of the many. The other is armed to defend the farmer in case of need. This is the Liberal aiming to protect legitimate industry and to prevent dumping, but caring not for the sap-sucker, mushroom industry. His choice between the two is not doubtful. Let us hear his leader:

I would describe our position thus,

Says the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in his Winnipeg speech:

Our eyes are set on the goal of the elimination of protection as a principle in our fiscal policy. We propose to get to that goal by stages that will make it as easy as possible for our industries to readjust themselves to it. During this period revenues will, of course, come from the tariff, and there is no reason why customs duties cannot continue as in Great Britain to afford a very considerable portion of our revenue, and if need be the principle of a countervailing excise tax can be applied, in this way compelling the home manufacturer who enjoys the protection to contribute his share to the national treasury. Furthermore, there is no reason why a form of assistance cannot be given to industry without the pernicious privileges that obtain under the operation of a protective tariff. Energy to turn the wheels of our factories is one of the main essentials in the development of industry. We have that power in Canada in abundance in the unharnessed energy of our magnificent rivers. It is quite a proper function for governments to develop this, as indeed it has been developed in Winnipeg, and place it at the disposal of the manufacturer at cost.

The Liberals can stand on their record, and our farmer friends know where we stand. The Minister (Mr. Guthrie) accuses the farmers of not encouraging Canadian industries, and in the full swing of his oration, he did not allow proper explanations to come forth. I thought at the moment it was not very generous and not befitting the greatness of a minister of the Crown, but it is only human on the part of the hon. gentleman, not to allow the desired effect of his address to be spoiled. I am not the guardian of my farmer friends; they are quite capable of looking out for themselves; but it did not suit the purpose of the minister to be told that if the farmers could purchase cheaper in Canada, they would be good enough business men to find their requirements in their own country. It also did not suit the minister to be told that if the farmers did not purchase in Canada, the reason was because, owing to the co-operative character of the farmers' organization, the big industries of Canada would not sell to them. It did not suit the minister either to be told that if the Canadian manufacturer does not come up to the mark with his American competitor, the reason is that he lacks the incentive of competition, which is the life of trade and which gives to the latter this superiority over the Canadian manufacturer, who, fed with the milk of protection, is not in that healthy condition which ensures the survival of the fittest.

As to the difference between England and Canada he would have been told, had he permitted the interjection, that by a striking departure from what was done in England, our capital, energy and manpower were in Canada diverted by protection from our basic industries and the development of our natural resources that await the hand of that sturdy canadianism which stands courageously upon its own feet and regards as contemptible the tutorship of the protective tariff. But I am sorry for the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. I have a liking for the hon. gentleman, and I regret to see that he is absent from his seat to-night. "A Liberal I was, a Liberal I am, and nobody can make me anything else,"—does he say? Alas, in his duel with the Prime Minister, he was vanquished. Vae victis—to the victor the spoils. Here he stands, hands, feet and soul tied to the chariot of a Tory leader who drags him in his triumphant course to the capitol. "I was a parrot," groans the poor victim. Indeed, it is somewhat unfortunate for the Prime Minister himself. Geese once saved the capitol; parrots never did, and the capitol itself was never nearer to the Tarpeian Rock than it is to-day. Horrified at the treatment she had received at the hands of the Prime Minister, the Truth fled to London, Paris and Geneva, running after our three diplomat ministers for refuge. Suffocated by the flight, she found them at the Peace Conference, busying themselves in that nursery of their newly-born child, "Canadian Nationhood." Poor new Susanna, what vain attempts had you not to suffer from these three wicked elders!

For three years, Sir, these hon. gentlemen have assumed the mission of convincing the Canadian people that a complete evolution has taken place in our national status; that we are no longer a colony governed by Downing street, not even a self-governing dominion, but an independent nation in the sub-league of the British commonwealth.

I shall not quote all the interesting statements we have heard in this House on that subject. Let us summarize them in these words of my right hon. friend, the Minister of Justice:

> We stand to-day by common acknowledgment of the statements not only of the other dominions, but of the United Kingdom itself, nations each equal in status with every other. There is a dazzling light that shines upon this country, and shows her forth to the world as a nation standing on a footing of equality amongst the nations.

Then, using the favourite method of his leader, he proceeded to put up his man of straw. Referring to hon. gentlemen on your left, Mr. Speaker, he said:

> They have not seen this developing work of time in which their late leader had so implicit faith. They do not seem to have the aspirations that he had. They want to see their Canada always in her swaddling clothes—clamouring to be kept in the nursery. In the Egyptian darkness of their colonial condition the light appears to be too much for their unaccustomed eyes.

That stale old saw so often used, and more often abused, is completely worn out. It contains two fallacies, and was broken into pieces in 1919, by two graphic words of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). When speaking on the ratification of the treaty of peace, he said:

> I reaffirm my admiration for the theories enunciated by the members of this Government. I wish they were right, but I am afraid they are wrong.

Is it not childish, Sir, to try this make-believe on the Canadian people: "Canada stands to-day in the world on a footing of equality amongst the nations?"

Why, what other independent nation, even the most humble, is presided over by a Governor General? What other sends her law cases to the tribunal of British Islanders, in appeals of last resort? What other nation has to pass under the jurisdiction of British diplomats in her official or business relations abroad?

What other nation would allow British newspapers to discuss openly who should be the representative of His Majesty the King in this country, all booming their respective candidates? If we are a nation, Sir, let the right hon. gentleman take a step further and introduce legislation enabling this Parliament to determine who shall preside over our destinies.

Last April, when in Paris, it came to my notice that a high Canadian official was desirous of obtaining an audience from the President of France. Our provincial agent could not arrange it; Canada's High Commissioner could not arrange it. The British Ambassador alone was accredited to the French Government. But a citizen of Monte Carlo could apply to the representative of his own country.

Sir, I wish we were a nation, but we shall not allow the right hon. gentleman to pay us with words. We have lost none of the aspirations of our late beloved leader, but we want the real thing, not its shadow. His statement therefore is doubly untrue.

Mr. Speaker, there is an element of real nationhood which is sadly lacking in this country. It is the binding spirit of national unity. They have it in France. They have it in England. They have it in the United States. When a Frenchman speaks of his France, his sweet France, he has spoken his last word. The love of his native land inspired his national bard in immortal lines never truer than to-day:

O France! douce France, O ma France bénie!
Rien n'épuisera donc ta force et ton génie!
Terre du dévouement, de l'héroïsme, de la foi,
Il ne faut donc jamais désespérer de toi,
Puisque malgré tes jours de deuil et de misère,
Tu trouves un héros, dès qu'il est nécessaire.

The Englishman has said his all when he has named "Merry Old England." And full of pride he sings: "Rule Britannia! Britons never shall be slaves!" Ten million Sammies sprang to their feet at the call of the Stars and Stripes, ready to jump over the top for the defence of old U.S. During his political life, Sir Wilfrid Laurier tried to develop in Canada a sentiment akin to that, fostering lofty ideals, mutual love, moral and economic progress. He fell under the assaults of hon. gentlemen opposite, animated by prejudices that he had always combatted. A dark cloud passed over this country. Its silver lining is now more and more in sight. Let us have dissolution; let us ask the people to constitute a Parliament and a Government fully armed with its confidence, and let us sink contemptible differences and prejudices. Let us all work for the upbuilding not of a visionary but of a real and powerful nation. Then, but not till then, shall we be able all to sing from the bottom of our hearts: "O Canada, mon pays, mes amours".

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. PIUS MICHAUD (Restigouche and Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words before the question is put. I have followed with considerable interest the speeches of both my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. McIsaac), and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), and to both gentlemen I tender my hearty congratulations. I do not quite understand the language of the roaring waves of the Atlantic Ocean, nor am I inspired by the atmosphere of the deep valleys where the apple blossoms seem to delight every citizen of that part of the country. But after having heard such a description from representatives of the extreme East as well as the extreme West, I feel like asking my hon. friends this question, whether, after all, Ottawa, within sound of the Chaudiere falls, is not the proper place for the capital of the Dominion? But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Doherty), and the ex-President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell), went to Geneva with a message from this Government. What was that message? They went to represent Canada as a nation and not to undertake responsibility for all wars that may take place in the future in Europe or anywhere else. Who, in South America or even North America during the last war, made a sacrifice equal proportionately to Canada's either in life or in money? The duties of our delegates at Geneva were properly discharged when they opposed strongly section 10 of the Treaty. If we are no longer colonials we have to decide for ourselves what attitude this young country shall adopt in future in any European wars. For my part I regard this country as a democracy, and responsibility for the expenditure on our part of money or the contributing of arms and men should, I think, be entirely within the discretion of this nation.

At the great Conference, we have heard, many problems were solved, and many great questions settled. But to my mind there is one great subject which should have been thoroughly discussed and not have been left over for future consideration. In the name of humanity, in the name of the suffering orphans, in the name of small nations, Canada with great courage responded to the call and sent her bravest sons to do battle during four years of war. Canada has lost over 50,000 of her best men. Noble act on the part of this country! Our soldiers were equal to the soldiers of that "contemptible little army" that kept the Germans in check for so many days in the northern part of France; they were equal to the French soldiers who took charge of 450 miles of front during the war. Our sacrifice shall remain fruitless if the millions of orphans and thousands upon thousands of widows are not provided for with food and clothing and given ample support and maintenance.

It is true that Austria has received some help; and it is also true that during last winter very many of our people suffered greatly, being in dire need. Let the nations who profited by the war be called upon to help the survivors of these unfortunate sufferers who were driven to take part in the great struggle at the behest of their respective Kings, Emperors or Presidents. What did the nations in South America do during the war? How many of these nations, many of whom have joined the League of Nations, are ready to do something in return to relieve the widows and orphans of those who made the supreme sacrifice for the salvation of the world? What have Norway, Sweden, and Denmark done? I am informed that these countries have requested the privilege of joining the League of Nations. If this is so I would ask our delegates to get into communication with the proper authorities with a view to making these nations, which are to join the League, contribute to some extent to the debts which Canada contracted during the war.

Last session during one of my speeches I alluded to immigration into this country, and I suggested that immigrants from rural districts in foreign countries should be encouraged to come to Canada. Events which have transpired since that time have caused me to change my mind more or less. I am now convinced that for the present our effors at immigration should be directed towards the repatriation of our own people who have crossed the boundary line into the country to the south within the last few years in the hope of making a better living. I invite those former fellow citizens of ours to come back to Canada. They are the ones who at present, and at all times, should be encouraged to once more make their homes in the Dominion, because they understand the Canadian Constitution well and know how best to fulfil their duties as Canadians. I would therefore advise the Government to confine their efforts along the line of immigration to inducing former Canadians to return, and seeing that they are the only immigrants for the present admitted to Canada.

The speech from the Throne contains the statement:

> My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs Tariff.

What revision does the Prime Minister expect to make? The Minister of Finance went through the Dominion endeavouring to discover what public sentiment was on the question of the tariff. Well, while everybody was endeavouring to arrive at the best solution, the Prime Minister away down in Eastern Canada was preaching high protection. The right hon. gentleman did not have the courage to even wait until a complete report could be obtained from the Minister of Finance before giving expression to his views. Later on in the session I shall avail myself of the opportunity of stating my opinion on the tariff. I will merely say now that from what can be gathered from the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite there appears to be only one class of people in Canada who are greately interested in the tariff question, and that is the manufacturers and their representatives in this House. Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of an early appeal to the Canadian electors for many reasons which have already been discussed by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. I believe that the sooner an election takes place the better it will be for the welfare of all classes of the country. I have faith in the Canadian people, I have faith in my party, and I have faith in my leader. I believe that the amendment is a wise one and I shall gladly support it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON: (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker before the question is put, I desire to offer a few observations. Preliminary to doing so I wish to extend to the mover and seconder of the Address my hearty congratulations upon the excellent manner in which they acquitted themselves of the task entrusted to them. I also wish to offer my congratulations to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on his attainment to the high office that he now fills. When the right hon. gentleman was promoted to his present office I was asked by many of my constituents what kind of a man the new Prime Minister was. I invariably replied, Sir, that in my opinion he was one of the brainiest men in the House—a man of very keen intellect and a sharp tongue. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the keenness of the Prime Minister's intellect may remain with him for many years, but I could also hope, for his own good and I believe for the comfort of his opponents, that his tongue might lose some of its sharpness.

I wanted to take part in this debate for more than one reason, but mainly because one is sometimes misunderstood and one's motives misinterpreted if he casts a silent vote. I have reference to the interpretation that was placed upon my own actions, and that of some other members of the group with which I am associated, in connection with the resolution introduced last session by the Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) pertaining to the re-appointment of the Canada Wheat Board for the purpose of handling our 1920 crop. I had believed, Mr. Speaker, that it was pretty generally understood by hon. members on both sides that those of us on the cross-benches from the province of Saskatchewan were in favour of that resolution and in favour of the Canada Wheat Board being re-appointed to handle the wheat crop of 1920. What was my surprise to learn from a paper published in the province of Saskatchewan, known as the Regina Leader, that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, in speaking to the deputation representing the farmers of that province intimated that he had not understood our position to be as I have outlined. In order not to lay myself open to the accusation of misquoting the minister I will give you his own words as reported in the Regina Leader of October 8th, last. I will not read the whole report as it is a lengthy one. I will simply invite your attention to that part of his remarks which makes reference to those of us who occupy places in the Progressive group. The Minister said:

> This year the question of the continuation of control necessary came up for consideration. The matter was thrown into Parliament for discussion, and was debated at length. The Farmers' organizations of the West were represented by Mr. Crerar, Mr. Maharg, Mr. J. F. Reid, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Gould, Dr. Clark and others. The hon. Mr. Calder asked the deputations to read their speeches. So far as he could recall, none of these gentlemen insisted on wheat control, they would take no decided stand. As usual, they were prepared to let the Government take its own course, and if things did not turn out right they would have an opportunity to attack and criticize, and so on.

So far as he could recall, none of these gentlemen insisted on wheat control, they would take no decided stand. As usual, they were prepared to let the Government take its own course, and if things did not turn out right they would have an opportunity to attack and criticize, and so on.

As I said a few moments ago, I thought when this legislation was before the House, and I still think, it was pretty generally understood that those of us from the province of Saskatchewan occupying these cross benches were in favour of that legislation. It is true that not all of us spoke upon the matter when it was before the House. I admit, Sir, that I am a new member and do not pretend to be thoroughly familiar with parliamentary procedure, but if it is necessary that every hon. member should voice his opinion upon all matters of legislation that come before the House, I have learned something that I did not know before. But what are the facts in connection with this matter? As will be noticed from the quotation I have just read, the hon. gentleman directed the attention of this deputation to the speeches of hon. members of this group, and he named six of us. The other evening when the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) was speaking one would think that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House believed they had him cornered, so to speak, in respect to his attitude on the reappointing of the Wheat Board. But I would direct their attention and that of the House to a paragraph of the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia as it may be found on page 4113 of Vol. 5 of last year's Hansard. These are his words:

> In conclusion, let me state that I propose to vote for the re-establishment of the Wheat Board this year. I pledge myself only for this year.

It will be noticed that in the interview with the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization which I have quoted, his memory was so faulty that he could not recall any of us on these cross benches having spoken on the subject. I would also refer to the words of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), the leader of this group, to be found on page 4119 of the same volume. He stated:

> Everyone who knows anything of the European situation must realize that conditions there are very unstable, and in these circumstances, perhaps, there is justification for the Government assuming the power which they are asking for under this legislation.

That was the resolution which had been introduced by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). And, further, I will quote from the speech delivered by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), and in doing so I apologize to him, as he has not yet spoken in this debate, but I want to get these quotations together. In referring to the action taken by the Farmers' organization in Western Canada, he said:

> At their convention they went further; they asked not only enabling legislation,—

I might say that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce when introducing this resolution termed it, I think "enabling legislation." The hon. member for Maple Creek continued:

> —but that the Government continue the Wheat Board for another year. The Canadian Council of Agriculture passed a similar resolution, and recently, through their executive, they have again stated that so long as there is governmental control of buying in the European markets, we must have governmental control in Canada in regard to disposing of our wheat.

The hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization—and I am glad to see him in his seat— in speaking to the deputation of farmers in Regina last fall directed their attention to the speeches of the hon. members of this group, and said that they would not take any definite stand. I have just quoted from the speeches of three of the six hon. members that he mentioned at that time to show that they did take a very definite stand. And one would think that if a member of the Government or the Government itself were looking for advice, as the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization said they were in looking to this group, they would have turned to members on their own side of the House. It is easy to perceive that the hon. minister was trying to build up a case against those of us in this group who happen to come from the province of Saskatchewan.

Now I would direct the attention of the House to some of the remarks of hon. members of his own side of the House, and at page 2596, volume 3, of last year's Hansard, will be found a speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), during the course of which he said:

> My hon. friends opposite, everyone of them practically, have stood four square for the control of the sale and handling of wheat in this country. They have insisted on the control exercised by the Canada Wheat Board.

To me that seems to be something that the hon. minister could not have taken into consideration. And again I would ask the attention of the House to the words of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) when introducing this legislation. He said:

> So that the Bill differs from one which is to come into force immediately—

Speaking to the resolution he had introduced.

> It may not go into force at all. I hope it will not be necessary to put it into force.

The point I wish to make is, that the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization in meeting that deputation of farmers in the province of Saskatchewan—and I think it is only a fair interpretation to put upon his remarks at that time—was trying to place some of the blame for the Canada Wheat Board not being reappointed to handle the 1920 crop upon some of us from that province who sit on these cross benches. I believe the quotations that I have laid before the House will prove that we were in favour of that legislation and had nothing whatever to do with the Wheat Board not being reappointed.

In connection with this wheat control, Mr. Speaker, we have heard it said very often in this House that the farmers of Western Canada are opposed to the Wheat Board. That was in a measure correct, but when the circumstances leading up to control being assumed by the Government of handling our wheat is taken into consideration, I think there was some reason why the farmers of the western provinces were opposed to that control. As is well known, control was first taken for handling the 1917 crop, and I have in my hand a copy of the report of the operations of the Board of Grain Supervisors for Canada. This Board, as is well known, handled the crop of 1917 and 1918, and the balance of the crop of 1916 that was still in the country when they were appointed by Order in Council on the 11th of June, 1917. I wish to read from this report in order to show just how this board was appointed. It says:

> The Government created the board because the accumulating effects of the war upon international trading in general, and trading in wheat in particular, made some such step necessary. The financing of the war by the various countries involved had led to a vast extension of credit and currency in those countries, and this tended toward a general increase in price levels. This was accentuated as regards wheat by several powerful contributory causes. The wheat surpluses of Russia, Australia, India and the Argentine were either inaccessible altogether, or difficult to secure by reason of the increasing shortage of tonnage. Not only the Allied peoples in Great Britain, France, Belgium and Italy, but also the neutral countries in Northern Europe, were dependent upon North America for their necessary wheat supplies. And the methods by which the governments of those countries bought their wheat in North America in 1915 and 1916 added to the difficulty. Their agents bought wheat, for example, at Winnipeg in competition with each other, and with Canadian and American millers, and in some cases the same government had different buyers for Canadian wheat and flour. The primary object of these buyers for the European governments was to secure quantities of milling wheat; the price was a secondary consideration. And as the grain exchanges in North America were still open and unrestricted, these government buyers soon became the dominating operators.

The effect of all this was not only an increase in the price of wheat, with occasional violent fluctuations, but was in a word the disintegration of the grain exchanges both in Canada and in the United States.

This disintegration appeared dramatically in Winnipeg in the spring of 1917. During the previous winter months the agents of the Allied Governments had bought wheat freely to be delivered in May and July. They bought this wheat mainly, if not altogether, from the operators of country elevators, who as they bought wheat from the farmers from day to day sold it for May and July delivery. Neither the buyers for the Allied Governments nor the elevator operators who sold the wheat were gambling in futures. The buyers were providing to the best of their judgment for the future needs of the countries they represented, and the sellers were securing their loans from the banks by hedging their purchases in the only way known to commercial men of providing against risk. These future contracts called for grades 1, 2 and 3 Northern. It turned out that much of the wheat thus sold or hedged did not measure up to these contract grades. As a rule, and under normal conditions, this presents no great difficulty, because the buyers are willing to accept lower grades on the contracts at fair discounts. This, indeed, is a well-established commercial practice. In the spring of 1917, however, the British representatives intimated that they were unwilling or unable to accept lower grades at discounts, and that they would require the contract grades. This forced the sellers to try to buy the higher grades on the open market, with the result that the prices of these grades went skyrocketing. As prices soared the sellers were called for increasing sums of money, and the limit of their credits was soon reached. In effect the market was cornered and a disaster upon a large scale was impending.

To avert this, the Winnipeg Grain Exchange—

I wish that noted, Mr. Speaker—not the producers of Western Canada at all, but the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

—investigated the conditions, found them as above, closed the market for futures, and by the aid of the Dominion Government, secured the consent of the British authorities to a settlement along commercial lines. As a result, the British accepted the lower grades of wheat on the contracts at fair discounts, the discounts were speedily fixed and the situation cleared up.

While, however, the situation within the Grain Exchange was cleared up for the time, there remained the possibility that a similar crisis might develop at any time so long as the British and European governments continued their methods of buying in an open market at Winnipeg, and this possibility alarmed the grain trade. In the meantime, the increasing cost of living was alarming consumers in North America generally, and the United States had established its food control system. The dependence of Great Britain and her Allies and of European neutral countries upon North America for wheat meant that there was no limit to the price to which wheat might go, except ability to pay. Under these circumstances, a delegation from the Winnipeg Grain Exchange waited on the Dominion Government, and asked for government control of the grain markets during the war.

At that time Mr. Balfour was in the United States on his mission, and the vice-chairman of the British Cereal Commission, Mr. Anderson, was one of his party. Mr. Anderson came to Ottawa, bringing with him Messrs. Robson and Stewart of the Wheat Export Company, the agency of the British Royal Commission, and a series of conferences took place between the Canadian Government, the British representatives and the delegates from the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. These conferences resulted in the creation of the Board of Grain Supervisors.

I have read that long report so that it might be known that in the first instance the control of the grain and wheat market in Canada did not come about as a result of the request of, or for the benefit of, the producer, but rather at the direct request of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and those connected with it.

Again, it is claimed that the farmers objected to the Canada Wheat Board which was formed to take over the handling of the grain in 1919. That was true in some quarters; but what were the circumstances leading up to that objection? All will remember that the market was opened early in the grain season of that fall. It remained open for a few days and during that short period wheat advanced very rapidly; then the Government stepped in and appointed the Canada Wheat Board. It was only reasonable that the producers of grain in the Canadian Northwest, seeing these conditions, with the market open and advancing rapidly and the Government stepping in and taking control, should come to the conclusion that the Government did not want the producers to get all that their product would bring them. That was the reason why there was opposition to the Canada Wheat Board. But after the Wheat Board had handled the crop so successfully, the grain producers of Western Canada, who know a good thing when they see it, were perfectly satisfied; accordingly they wanted the Canada Wheat Board appointed last year to handle the 1920 crop. Speaking for myself, I was absolutely in favour of the resolution as introduced last year by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I take strong exception to the words of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization when he met that deputation in the city of Regina.

The market conditions in the part of Saskatchewan in which I live and in the constituency that I have the honour to represent in this House were very bad during this last fall. I happen to live on the old Canadian Northern branch line running from Regina to Saskatoon and on to Prince Albert. Now, the condition there was simply this: early in the grain season we were not able to get cars. As everybody in Western Canada knows, the market was not open very long when the price started to go down, and before cars were available the price had gone down to such an extent that the farmers did not feel like disposing of their wheat; the consequence was that they held on. Many of them, having taken advances against their wheat in store, were squeezed out on that advance. The peculiar feature of it was that a few days after scores of these men had been squeezed out of their wheat, lots of cars were available. We were told that the cars were needed for the coal trade and that that was why we could not have them for the purpose of moving our grain. I happen to know that in many of the towns along that line there were large numbers of orders for coal, but the coal was not being delivered. If these cars were in the coal trade, why were they not delivering the coal? If cars were not available while the wheat was still in the producers' hands, how did it happen that the moment the wheat was out of the producers' hands, and in the hands of the dealers, plenty of cars were available? That was the case and on top of that came the increase in freight rates, and I am not overdrawing the situation when I say that the inability to procure cars and the increase in freight rates have driven many of the farmers of that part of the country into insolvency. There is no doubt about that, and consequently they are not feeling very kindly disposed towards the powers that be. The other day I noticed that the chairman of the Railway Commission is reported to have made this statement in the city of Montreal:

> As long as he was chairman of the board, freight and other rates would be fixed so as to enable the railways to pay all operating expenses and allow for a reasonable profit on their investment. Mr. Carvell went a little further. Eastern Canada, he said, took the reasonable view of such matters that he did, but he "had nothing to say about the rest of the country." The people there, he said, "seem to have sentiments differing from the rest of Canada."

If the railways of this country are going to be able to charge such rates that dividends can be paid whether or not the users of those railways are put out of business, it is high time that the Government took a hand in the matter.

I wish to refer very briefly to the request made by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) for a commission or committee to investigate the grain business of this country. I noticed that some newspapers a day or two ago drew attention to the fact that no members of the Progressive group had backed the hon. member in his request. Mr. Speaker, every member of this group wants an investigation if there is anything to investigate. But, as pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) this afternoon, we already have a Grain Commission appointed by this Government, and if that Commission is not doing its work, it is the business of the Government to see that it does its work properly. If we are to have this business investigated, let it be a thorough investigation, and let the work of the Grain Commission be investigated as well.

I am reminded about another board appointed by the late Government to do service for the Canadian people. I refer to the Board of Commerce, which, if I understand the matter correctly, was appointed to enquire into and, if possible, to assist in lowering the high cost of living in Canada, and to run to ground any profiteers. What was the outcome, and what did that board accomplish? A very few weeks or months after its appointment, the chairman resigned; a little later on the vice-chairman also resigned, and after struggling along for a few weeks, the third and last commissioner, Mr. Murdock, resigned, and coupled with his resignation were certain charges. Briefly, the charges were there that when the board, in its endeavours to carry out the work that it was appointed to do, got into the position to do something effective, the protecting hand of one or more members of the Government of the day was outstretched, and the work of the board was set at naught. The leader of the official Opposition, (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked that a commission be appointed to enquire into the Murdock charges; but, so far as I know, nothing has been done in that regard, and the Canadian people will have very little confidence in any commission that this Government may appoint to investigate the grain business, or any other line of activity in this country, unless they are given to know what was in or behind the Murdock charges in connection with the workings of the Board of Commerce.

In the fall of last year, after the original members of the Board of Commerce had all resigned, and certain members of the Civil Service were appointed in their place, we had the spectacle of the sugar barons of this country, when they found themselves in a position to lose money, coming to Ottawa and appealing to the so-called Board of Commerce, which in turn placed an embargo upon the importation of sugar into Canada. Public opinion ran so high that the Government eventually had to intervene and rescind that order of the Board. The question that the people of Canada are asking themselves to-day, and that they have been asking since that time is this: Is the action, as we have it, of the sugar men of last fall similar to some things that happened and that are contained in the Murdock charges? And the people are waiting for the information.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. J F. Reid), in speaking the other evening, had something to say about the work of a Mr. Murray who is attempting to muzzle the press of Canada, and I thought it well to add something to what that hon. member had to say at that time. I shall give to the House a full introduction to Mr. Murray, so that there may be no mistake as to his identity. I am taking this from the Morning Leader, published in Saskatchewan, under date of February 19, 1921:

Gilbert Mackintosh Murray, B.A., former editor of "Industrial Canada," for many years secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and who evolved the brilliant scheme of forcing the press of Canada to support Protection and a Protectionist Government through the distribution of advertising patronage, is needless to say, persona grata with Hon. Jas. Calder, Hon. Dr. Reid, and other influential cogs in the governmental machine at Ottawa.

Prior to resigning the secretaryship of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Murray resided for the first six months of 1919 at Ottawa. During this period his services were supposed to be "loaned" to the Government; his salary, however, was paid by the C. M. A., the Government giving him at the same time a per diem living allowance of $10.

It was right following upon this Ottawa sojourn of Murray's with all the inspiration of close contact with ministers of the Crown fresh upon him, that Murray, in the role of chief propagandist for the Meighen-Protectionists, launched his great scheme for making the press of Canada solidly Protectionist by getting the manufacturers to withhold their advertising from such papers as the Toronto Globe, The Morning Leader, the Saskatoon Phoenix, etc., etc.

[Mr. Johnston.]

At a meeting of manufacturers held in Toronto, which was attended by Murray, he himself laid before them his plans as chief propagandist of the protectionist forces, including his ready-print schemes and other little ideas for spreading Protectionist propaganda and thus, as he says, "educating the voters of Canada." A special committee was appointed to look after certain phases of the propaganda campaign and a fairly substantial initial sum was raised to help the project off to a good start. Among the chief contributors to the initial campaign fund was a well known implement firm and one of the largest textile firms of Eastern Canada.

In fairness to a large number of Canadian manufacturers, it is only right to admit that they, together with at least one prominent official of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, strongly opposed the Murray plan of campaign on the ground that the C. M. A. and the cause of Protection would lose immeasurably more than they would gain should the Canadian people ever get wise to the fact that a cold-blooded plan was in operation to force public opinion to a favourable consideration of Protection by the chloroforming of editorial opinion and tampering with the Canadian press news services.

The whole-hoggers, however, were in control; Murray received orders to go ahead and accordingly the boycott against the lower tariff newspapers was started and the other branches of the propaganda campaign were put through their initial stages preparatory to the final "big drive" in the great task of "educating the voters of Canada" to say "Hurrah for Protection!"

I have two other clippings here from the same paper with reference to this matter. First, there is an explanatory note in reference to these ready-prints, which reads as follows:

"Ready-prints" or "patent insides" are partly printed newspapers supplied by certain publishing houses to the publishers of weekly newspapers, who complete the work of publication by printing the local news and advertising, etc., before issuing the finished papers to their subscribers.

Then it goes on to say:

G. M. Murray the would-be chloroformer and poisoner of the Canadian press, on December 6, 1920, issued "Confidential" circular "M-251", dealing with "Ready-prints and Patent Insides". Murray starts Circular M.-251 with the following statement:—"The situation as regards ready-print services in Canada has undergone considerable change within the last year."

The statement is absolutely true, inasmuch as during that period Gilbert Macintosh Murray became actively interested in the ready-print business—doubtless, as in the case of his proposal for tampering with the Canadian Press news service, for the purpose of "educating the voters of Canada" by getting certain propaganda published in as many Canadian weekly newspapers as possible.

Largely as the result of the activities of Murray and those identified with him in seeking to "educate the voters of Canada," two new ready-print concerns were started, one for the purpose of supplying ready prints to weekly publishers in the prairie provinces and the other for the purpose of supplying eastern publishers.

That statement is significant, Mr. Speaker, because we have heard a lot in this House about certain gentlemen having one policy for the East and one for the West, while the Government had but one policy. But here we see that Mr. Murray, their chief propagandist, with his ready-made prints, has one output for Western Canada and another for Eastern Canada. The article goes on:

> At the outset, the proposition was outlined to Murray's political friends at Ottawa, including members of the present Government, and duly approved as satisfactory, following which the necessary capital was raised by some of Murray's monied business friends, the initial sum of approximately $40,000 being subscribed to start the scheme, among the largest subscribers being a well-known Brantford firm and firms in St. Catharines and Montreal.
> A close conecting link between the two Murray ready-print concerns was supplied in the person of W. Nelson Wilkinson, who was placed on the boards of both companies.
>
> Mr. Winkinson was formerly connected with the Toronto World, was subsequently engaged in the Publicity Department of the Government at Ottawa, and has for years been on close friendly terms with Murray.
> Starting with a ready-print more or less colourless, it is Murray's intention at the proper time, a few months prior to an election, to endeavour to "educate the voters of Canada."

I want to point out in that connection that we have heard something in this House about a menace. To my mind, this is a real menace. This man Murray has started this ready-print business and he contracts with country newspapers all over the country to supply them with these "patent insides". They enter into that contract, believing they are going to get news as newspapers generally carry it, but a few weeks prior to an election, having tied themselves up with this contract, and not being able to get paper from any other source, they will be forced to publish papers, in all probability, at least so far as Western Canada is concerned, carrying a line of political doctrine to which they are absolutely opposed. The article goes on:

> The following "confidential" circular sent out by Murray December 29, 1920, to the Canadian manufacturers to further enlist their support in his nefarious campaign to undermine the freedom of the press shows the extremes that he and his Ottawa friends are prepared to go to in their desperate attempt to maintain the Meighen-Calder Government in power.

This confidential circular is rather lengthy, so I shall read only enough to give the House an idea of the kind of propaganda that Mr. Murray has undertaken.

> G. M. MURRAY,
> 709 Yonge Street,
> Toronto, Ont.
> Confidential. M-256
> STORM SIGNALS
> The ostrich is said to bury its head in the sand at the approach of danger. Don't be an ostrich! Look your danger squarely in the face and prepare as best you know how to meet it.
> To-day the free trade storm signals are set as a warning to the navigators upon the sea of business. Make no mistake about it. They are there to be seen, clear as the sun in the sky, by all except those who keep their heads in the sand. The organized farmers, under the leadership of fanatical theorists, have been worked up into a veritable frenzy of resentment against a fiscal policy that they have come to look upon as a special privilege. They are out to effect changes by a process of destruction,—a process that once initiated may go to untold lengths before it can be checked. If those who would thus be destroyed don't speedily organize for their own defence, and marshall all their resources in money and brains to meet the attack, they will almost certainly find themselves powerless to ward off a blow for which the Grain Grower arm is already bared, nerved with the last ounce of strength and determination.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I thought it well to bring this matter to the attention of the House and to place some of it on Hansard so that the people might know to what lengths those in this country who derive benefit from protection will go to retain that benefit. Mr. Murray has very able assistants in hon. members of this Government in decrying the Western Grain Growers and trying to make the people of the eastern provinces believe that many citizens of Canada out there are Bolshevik in our tendencies, have ideas of secession, and are out to wreck the nation, and I do not know what else. I would ask the people of this country, however, to size the matter up for themselves. The few of us here on the cross benches in this Parliament, endeavour to the best of our abilities to represent the views of the organized farmers in Western Canada, and possibly we may not be a fair sample of the Western Grain Growers; but it would not matter if we were displaced by others, for there are many out there who are quite competent to take our places, and I am sure that they are in no sense nation-wreckers.

Regarding the resolution before the House and the amendment thereto, I have given some consideration to this matter, and this thought has occurred to my mind: It has been said that the present Government have usurped power. This may not be correct, if you take into consideration the fact the term of this Parliament has not expired. But the people in the country are anxious to know when an election will be held. In 1917, Sir Robert Borden organized a Union ministry which appealed to the country as the Union Government. We were told that there would be a fifty-fifty split as between Liberals and Conservatives in the Cabinet. Well, that part of the contract was never lived up to. Again, the people of the country voted for Sir Robert Borden as leader of the Union Government in 1917, and I will put this proposition to the House, as the people will put it to each one of us as their representatives: If, in 1917, Sir Robert Borden had said to the electors of Canada, "I am going to carry on for the war period, and should the war terminate before the conclusion of the parliamentary term, when that time comes, I am going to resign and my colleague—now Prime Minister (Hon. Mr. Meighen)—will then form another government and carry on during the rest of the parliamentary term,"—I submit that there would have been a much different result to the election. I know this much, that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Hon. Mr. Calder), delivered Saskatchewan to Sir Robert Borden and the Union Government holus-bolus; but if the situation had been placed before the people as I suggest in this supposition, he could not have delivered one seat under those conditions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the hon. member mean to imply that Sir Robert Borden has been feigning illness?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I did not desire to interrupt the hon. member, but I think he would be well advised to adhere to the practice and not refer to an hon. member by name.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am sorry to have transgressed the rule, Mr. Speaker; it was not my intention to do so. So far as the question asked by the hon. member (Mr. Sutherland) is concerned, I cannot see that it has any bearing whatever on my remarks. I said nothing whatever in reference to Sir Robert Borden's illness.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I mean, the hon. member for King's, Nova Scotia. The right hon. gentleman's illness has nothing to do with my argument. The statement was made in this House yesterday by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), that this Government was elected in 1917. Well, now, to my mind that is not so. If I understand events correctly, this Government was not elected in 1917 but was manufactured here in July, 1920. Much stress has been laid on the argument regarding redistribution and full representation for Western Canada. Now, Western Canada wants her full representation in this House; there are no two ways about that.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am glad to hear my hon. friend opposite say, "hear, hear;" it is gratifying to know that he is sometimes in the right. I say, Western Canada wants her full representation in this House; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Possess your soul in patience.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But there are things dearer to the heart of the people of Western Canada than redistribution, and one thing of supreme importance is that the sovereign will of the people shall prevail. Redistribution is not possible at this time, but a general election is. In my opinion, a general election is past due, and should have been held in this country many months ago. In saying this I am but voicing the opinion of a vast majority of the people whom I have the honour to represent. Hon. gentlemen from Western Canada, particularly from the province of Saskatchewan, who say in this House or elsewhere that the feeling of Saskatchewan is not for a general election at this time, must keep their ears well filled. I travelled considerably over that province during the recess, and the one big question from one end of the country to the other is: When are we to have a general election?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The same thing in Quebec.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Now, Mr. Speaker, the hour is very late and I have spoken much longer than I intended. In rising to speak I said there were one or two reasons why I wished to enter this debate. One particular reason was to set the Minister of Immigration and Colonization right on the Wheat Board proposition, and the other was to refute, if I could, the opinion that seems to have got into the minds of some hon. gentlemen opposite that the people of Saskatchewan were not asking for a general election at this time. Having done that, I feel that I should no longer continue to occupy the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will not work.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmoreland): I should regret very much indeed to have to speak at any length at this hour and I should therefore be very glad to have the opportunity, if the leader of the House would permit me to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is quite early yet.

Mr. COPP: Very good. If my right hon. friend refuses to accede to the request I shall have to proceed, but the House has not so far this session sat later than this, and it is only reasonable that I should ask that the debate be adjourned. If my right hon. friend does not see fit to accede to my request, I say to him that in so far as I and the rest of the hon. gentlemen on this side are concerned we are as well prepared to remain here all night as my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want the House to be under any misapprehension. It is not our desire or our intention to ask hon. members to sit here all night, or to refuse to accept a motion to adjourn. However, we would like to continue the debate tonight for a little time longer than apparently seems to be the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have not come to the conclusion that the House should sit all night or anything of the sort, and we have not so intimated.

Mr. FIELDING: Is this not a reasonable hour to adjourn?

Mr. COPP: I am glad to hear the Prime Minister's statement. It is entirely foreign to arrangement that we should at present sit late. It is now after eleven o'clock, and if I were to begin my speech now an adjournment later would have the effect of breaping up my remarks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The House might as well sit until half-past eleven.

Mr. COPP: Very well, but it will only have the effect of breaking up my remarks. I would like, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to take a few moments in referring to the very eloquent speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie), who is not now in his seat. My hon. friend attempted to read a lecture to hon. gentlemen on this side. I would say to him, if he were in his place that he is not in the proper position—either as a retired Liberal or as a newly converted Tory—to read a lecture to what he styles "the remnant of the Liberal party." I want to say to my hon. friend also that although the Liberal party appreciated the hon. gentleman while he occcupied a seat in this House and supported Liberal policies and Liberal principles, the fact that he and his friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) have left the Liberal party does not mean the breaking up of that party by any means. I would like to know in what water my hon. friend was baptized, so as to permit of the conversion he has undergone in moving from one side of the House to the other? I give him this credit: His conversion apparently was a proper one and one that has been fully carried into effect. What it cost, or where he was baptized, I do not know. It has cost the country a considerable amount, if it has not cost my hon. friend anything.

Let me explain the position which my hon. friend took from 1911 down to 1917 and compare it with the remarks he made in the House this afternoon. Let me compare the remarks which he made on the Reciprocity Agreement in the old Parliament buildings in 1911 with the speech he has favoured us with this afternoon.

Mr. DUFF: Go ahead, let us hear it.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) apparently accused gentlemen of the Agrarian or Progressive group of being disloyal and unpatriotic because they purchased farm machinery in United States and did not make their purchase from our manufacturers in this Dominion. May I be permitted, Sir, to read a few lines in regard to what my hon. friend thought was patriotic in 1911 when the Reciprocity Agreement was under consideration and under debate in this House. Speaking of the price of hogs and beef cattle in the Chicago and Buffalo markets in comparison with the English market my hon. friend on that occasion said this:

> Let him compare Montreal and Toronto markets with Buffalo and Chicago, and he will find that the general average is higher, and markedly so, in Buffalo and Chicago during the last five year period. Now what is it we want? We want in my county the privilege of selling our cattle and hogs in Buffalo and other farm produce as well. You say: What is the use, the Buffalo market is lower. Well, if it is, are we hurt? We will then sell in the British market, and not touch Buffalo or Chicago. My hon. friend tells us that we have two markets now, the home market and the British; but when this arrangement comes into operation, we shall have three markets, and the one we have not got now, but which we want to get, is by far the largest. We will not send our products to Buffalo or Chicago unless we get better prices than we do at home or in the Mother Country. Our western people are not going to send any cattle to Chicago unless they can get better prices there than elsewhere. If they cannot, they will send them to Eastern Canada or Great Britain. What is there unpatriotic or disloyal in that proposition? How do business men conduct their business? If the prices in Buffalo are good, they send their wares there; if not they send them elsewhere. Then why should not the Government carry on the business of this country on business lines? Why should the Government stay its hand at this juncture and deprive our people of one of the great opportunities of their lives?

Mr. DUFF: Who said that?

Mr. COPP: The Minister of Militia. He was taking the stand that it did not matter in regard to the patriotism or loyalty of the people of the Dominion if they could sell their products in the great market of the United States. It was a proper thing, he said, for our people to have that market. Yet my hon. friend now says there was nothing said by the Liberal party in this House in regard to free trade or a lower tariff. Why, in 1911 my hon. friend himself occupied page after page of Hansard in trying to impress upon the people of Canada that we should have the American market and that free trade in natural products which would result from the Reciprocity Agreement. Nothing said about free trade! Why, my hon. friend was one of the most eloquent exponents of free trade in natural products with the United States at the time the Reciprocity Agreement was before the House for consideration.

The hon. gentleman also had something to say with respect to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville, (Mr. Gauthier) and he pictured an imaginary story which went back and forth at the time of the Liberal Convention in 1919. Of course that story was only a word picture of what he thought may have taken place. My hon. friend should be very well acquainted indeed, Mr. Speaker, with the tell-tale performance of going in and out from secret meetings and revealing what took place. I can say to my hon. friend that no member of the House is better acquainted with that system of carrying on than my hon. friend himself.

Now, Sir, I do not propose to follow the remarks of my hon. friend any further except to say that he was very courageous this afternoon in telling hon. gentlemen on this side that the time had arrived when they should be brought into the lime light, that their tariff planks and tariff policies should be open to inspection, that the acid test should be applied to them in order to discover what their views, and ideas and policy were on the tariff. Let me say to my hon. friend that in his speech this afternoon—which we all enjoyed—while he told us what we on this side of the House should do and what we should not do, he never uttered a single word regarding his own tariff policy, and he dared not give it to the House. Now, if he is so courageous in challenging hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as to what they should do and what they should not do, I would say to him: the opportunity is open to him and to the Government of which he is a member, by accepting our challenge, to appeal to the people and let them decide whether they prefer his particular tariff policy or ours. After listening to the debate that has taken place on the motion moved by my hon. friend from Kings P.E.I. (Mr. McIsaac), and on the amendment thereto by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), one could not help but be highly interested in following the very ingenious, if inconsistent, arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to their position in this House. My hon. friend the mover of the Address, in a carefully prepared and well delivered speech, referred to the retirement of the right hon. the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), and delivered an appreciative "obituary" oration to the political memory of the right hon. gentleman. At the same time he offered his very hearty congratulations in which I personally join—to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) who leads the House at the present time on his promotion to the high office which he now holds. It seemed to me, however, that he did not instil into his remarks regarding my right hon. friend the leader of the Government that degree of hope and confidence which has characterized his speeches in the House in the past, and I thought his references to the right hon. gentlemen might very well be treated as the foreword to a book, we will say, to be written and entitled, "The Troubles of the Tory Party in the Future," in which my right hon. friend would be the outstanding character. But considering his uninspiring theme my hon. friend performed his task well, and I congratulate him very heartily.

I was deeply impressed and interested in the remarks made by my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), who occupies a seat in this Chamber for the first time. I was more particularly interested in the hon. gentleman, because, as he told the House, he was born in the province of New Brunswick and was a resident for some years in my constituency, and members of his family are still there with whom I am very intimately acquainted. Consequently I had that much greater personal interest in my hon. friend's speech. I regret to a certain extent that he turned out to be such a very high protectionist, because that is not the teaching he received in his former county of Westmoreland, as he very well knows. But before he concluded his speech we discovered why he was such a high protectionist, for he was straightforward and frank in regard to his position. He said in so many words, "The reason I am a protectionist is because the late government of the right hon. the ex-Prime Minister put a duty of thirty cents a box on apples which is just that much protection for apple growers in the Okanagan valley." It reminded me somewhat of the story of the juryman who acquitted a man charged with sheep stealing. When asked how they reached such a conclusion they said, "We got a piece of the mutton." My hon. friend is a high protectionist because he gets a very good "piece" of protection on apples.

After the motion had been duly moved and seconded, Sir, we had an amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. That amendment, if carried would, as everyone well knows, mean a general election. My hon. friend quoted a large number of authorities, constitutional and otherwise, in reference to the requirements for a general election, feeling that the time was ripe and the people of the Dominion were demanding an opportunity to pass judgment on the Government. I am bound to admit, along with my right hon. friend, that it has always been an open question and that it is very hard to find out exactly whether a majority of the people want an election or not. But when my right hon. friend answered the arguments advanced by the hon. leader of the Opposition and said, "We were elected for five years, and I am prepared to stand by the letter of the constitution and carry on for five years," I would remind him that while he has, according to the letter of the constitution the legal right to carry on for five years, yet there are two elements in our constitutional law to be considered—there is the written law and the unwritten law. The written law is the British North America Act. The unwritten law is a system of precedents, undertakings, conventions, and understandings that are just as binding on a government or a parliament as the written law, and I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to quote one or two authorities in regard to it. First I will read what Bourinot has to say in regard to the written and the unwritten law of the constitution in his Manual of the Constitutional History of Canada, in which the following passage will be found:

> If we study the constitution of Canada we find that its principles rest both on the written and the unwritten law. In the British North America Act we have the written law, which must direct and limit the legislative functions of the Parliament and the Legislatures of the Dominion. While this Act provides for executive authority and for a division of legislative powers between the Dominion and the provinces—as we have seen in the first chapter of this work—it does not attempt to give legal effect or definition to the flexible system of precedents, conventions and understandings which so largely direct that system of administration and government which has grown up in the course of two centuries in England, and which has been gradually introduced into Canada during the past fifty years, and now forms the guiding principles of parliamentary government in the two countries.

I think every one will admit that there is just as much reason why the unwritten law—the conventions and understandings—should be observed as there is for the observance of our written constitution. There is a moral right, a moral claim, for the observance of one just as much as for the observance of the other—one is the letter of the Constitution and the other is the spirit of it. The Government that was elected in 1917 has not, in my opinion, the confidence of the people; therefore it is their moral right under the unwritten law of our Constitution to give the people an opportunity to say whom they wish to direct the country's affairs during the next number of years, or the next term of Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On the motion of Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. FIELDING: Might I suggest to the Prime Minister that the Wednesday meeting at two o'clock is a very inconvenient arrangement? I know we cannot change it immediately, but I would like my right hon. friend to consider whether, at the earliest stage when it will be proper to take the matter up, we might not make a change in that respect.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 2, 1921.

The House met at two o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. M. CLARK

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the detailed report in to-day's issue of the Citizen newspaper of this city, of the observations which I addressed to the House yesterday, I observe that I am made to state that John the Baptist was a free trader. I wish to say, Sir, that I did not make any remark which was capable of that interpretation. I did say that Solomon was a free trader, and I quoted in support of my views the first chapter of the Second Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel. But I need not tell you, Sir, who come from a God-fearing and Scripture-reading province and not from a profane newspaper office that Solomon was a very different character from John the Baptist. I am not aware that there is any record anywhere of the fiscal views of John the Baptist. I can only account for the fact that such a statement was made in what was otherwise a very accurate, and far too generous, account of my observations by the charitable supposition that my sudden incursion into the French language produced for the moment in the mind of the Citizen correspondent an absolutely chaotic condition so far as his scriptural knowledge was concerned.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the Motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the Session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Campbell, resumed from Tuesday, March 1.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmoreland): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment of the debate last night I was referring to the amendment that had been moved by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). That amendment may well be divided into two parts: first that the present Government has not the confidence of this House; and second that it has not the confidence of the country. Though the leader of the Opposition might well have had a certain degree of confidence in his statement that the Government no longer enjoys the confidence of this House, the hon. gentleman having been out of politics for a number of years, he may not have given close attention to the traditions of the Tory party in these recent days. It is the old story—"What we have we'll hold," and it is quite true of the Tory party of this Dominion. They are holding power to-day because of the election in 1917, of which election and the manner in which it was conducted much has been said during the progress of this debate. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) in reply to the leader of the Opposition said: We stand upon the letter of the constitution and will continue to hold office until the expiration of the full term of five years. I reminded my right hon. friend last night that there were two elements in our constitution—the written law and the unwritten law. I grant that my right hon. friend is justified in arguing from the letter of the constitution that he is entitled to carry on for the full term. I submit that unless the Government is convinced by reasonable evidence that it has the confidence of the people as well as the confidence of Parliament, it is their duty to appeal to the people at the very earliest opportunity. That, to my mind, is the essence of responsible Government. It is all very well for my hon. friends opposite to say that they have a majority in Parliament, and that, therefore, they are legally entitled to carry on, but having regard to the moral aspect of the situation, they must come to the conclusion that the people are not satisfied with the present Administration and that they should have an opportunity of saying so by their vote.

My right hon. friend says: We shall be guided by the letter of the constitution. If he stands only upon the letter of the constitution, he might as well have said, in the formation of his cabinet: I will select all my cabinet ministers from Ontario; I will carry on the Government of the whole country with a ministry selected from one particular province. But that would not be according to the unwritten law of our constitution; it would not be according to the moral law of our constitution, because the understanding is that each Prime Minister shall select the members of his cabinet from the different provinces of Canada, not from one province only. We must, therefore, consider both the letter and the spirit of the constitution in connection with the question which is now before the House.

My hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie), who spoke yesterday afternoon, took an attitude entirely different from that of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House: He said that this Government has nothing whatever to do with the government that went out on July last; that a new Government was formed, and that that Government is responsible only for what it does from now until such time as it appeals to the people. Apparently my hon. friend did not hear the remarks made by the Prime Minister in this debate, nor could he have done the right hon. gentleman the honour of reading his speech. The Prime Minister took exactly opposite ground. He said: We are the same old Government; we are carrying on as part of the government which existed prior to my acceptance of office. These two hon. gentlemen, therefore, are in direct disagreement in regard to the constitution and the character of the Government.

Besides being responsible to this Parliament, the Government must be responsible to the people. I am bound to say that it is not very strong evidence for a member on the other side to say: I have consulted my constituents, and I know they are not in favour of an election; or for a member on this side to say: I have consulted my constituents, and they are in favour of an election. You cannot come to any very definite conclusion in a matter of this kind if that is all the evidence that is forthcoming. But when you travel over the country from east to west and from north to south, and hear nothing else—on the trains, in the hotels, in the church yards, or elsewhere—but condemnation of the present Administration, it seems to me that the state of public feeling thus disclosed must be admitted. I have been able during the recess to interview a very large number of the electors of my constituency and of my province. I have heard a great many people speak about this matter. I have read the papers of our part of the country, and I find that whether the paper is Liberal or Conservative, the opinion is that we should have an election to clear up the situation that has been brought about by this conglomeration which is found in the seats on the other side of the House.

We should, Mr. Speaker, have a general election on any occasion when a matter of very great moment arises upon which the people should have the right to speak. We have a limited term of Parliament; at certain intervals the people must be consulted. But when any particular emergency arises —a change of policy or a change in the personnel of the Government—the people should have an opportunity to say whether or not the Government have their confidence. In 1911 an occasion of that kind arose, when the Parliament had been in existence only three years. A very important question came before the House—the reciprocity agreement that had been entered into between the Government of this country and the Government of the United States. When the agreement was brought down a debate arose and continued for many weeks and months. From the speeches delivered during that debate, which I have read, I think that no one offered stronger arguments in support of the reciprocity agreement than the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie), who addressed the House yesterday afternoon. His speech on that occasion, Sir, is worthy of the perusal of any hon. gentleman, disclosing, as it does, what his ideas were at that time with regard to a downward tread in the tariff. What has brought about the remarkable change of mind on the part of my hon. friend? Surely it has not been the conditions? Surely, Sir, it is not because he believes that the people of Canada are more opposed now to a downward trend in the tariff than they were in 1911? Surely not, because we are getting the answer day by day and week by week; the results of by-elections held during the recess have shown that the people of Canada insist upon a tariff which shall be characterized by a downward trend. My hon. friend surely must know that that is the feeling which prevails in the country at the present time.

In the elections of 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who appealed to the people on the reciprocity question, was defeated, and from that day until the present we have had no reasonable appeal to the people on the question of what government should control the destinies of this country. My hon. friends say that we had an election in 1917, and that is true. A question has arisen in regard to that election that we cannot decide here; everyone must have his own opinion in regard to it. But we have some evidence that the election which was held after the formation of the Union Government, was not an election upon the policy of the Government; it was what was known as a war election, and the Government was a war government. The formation of that government came about when the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) decided to appeal to the people.

The year 1916 was the year in which, according to our Constitution, the elections should have been held, and the Conservative party of that day, realizing then, as I believe they realize now, that they had not the slightest hope of carrying the country at that time, asked the leader of the Opposition to consent to an extension of Parliament for one year. The war was then in progress, and the situation in Canada was very serious, and not a single word was said in regard to Union Government when the Opposition permitted our Conservative friends to carry on. In 1917, a change came about. My hon. friends, then seeing more clearly than they did in 1916, that it would be impossible for them to carry this country, came with their hats in their hands, knocking at the doors of Liberal members and asking them to form a Union Government to carry on the war. A number of our friends joined them. With the same degree of assurance that has been shown by hon. gentlemen who left the Liberal party in order to join and support Union Government, I could give equally good reasons for the stand I took in not giving my support to Union Government and its successor. I did not believe Union Government was necessary at that time; I do not believe it is necessary now. I have no quarrel with our friends who left the Liberal party and joined the forces of the Government; their action is a matter for themselves to consider. While that Union Government remained in existence, it was a matter for themselves and their conscience what they should do with regard to it. Now that Union Government has absolutely gone, now that it is dissipated into thin air and a new Government has been formed, it is entirely up to them and their consciences to say what their duty is in regard to the changed situation.

I have listened with a great deal of interest and pleasure, and, I may say, with amusement, to some of the arguments adduced by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the situation. A number of speakers who have delivered addresses on this subject have told us, and, through Parliament, have told the country, why they are supporting the present Administration. For instance, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) said that he was supporting the present Administration, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) had nailed his colours to the mast and was standing for the continuation of high protection in this country. He was followed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and a number of other hon. gentlemen, whose speeches I have before me, but I do not want to take up the time of the House in quoting from them. One group of the supporters of the Administration say: "We are supporters of the present Administration, because it is the Government and party of high protection, of continuing in force in the Dominion the highest possible protection in the interest of Canadan manufacturers;" but the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), who occupied the attention of the House the other day, told us that he was supporting the present Government because it was a Government of low tariff in this country. He quoted page after page to show that the tariff of the present Administration was lower than that of the old Liberal party, and he said that he was a Liberal and was supporting this Government because it was bringing into force a Liberal tariff and platform in Canada. What is true of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River is true of a number of other hon. gentlemen who spoke in this debate. Through different courses, different arguments and different avenues, these hon. gentlemen came to the one conclusion, namely, that the best course was to keep the Government, and, therefore, themselves, in power for another year or two, whereas if they went to the country, they would not come back.

At the time Union Government was formed, a number of very estimable gentlemen joined that Government; a few of them still continue with it, and the others have retired. One of the first to retire from that Government was the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). I have no doubt that he, along with other hon. gentlemen who had formerly been allied with the Liberal party, joined that Government, according to the evidence that has been given by himself and other members who have since retired, for a certain purpose and a certain definite length of time. When that time expired, they concluded that their contract had expired, and they left the Government. Ever since that hon. gentleman conscientiously left that Government, as I believe he conscientiously entered it, the guns of criticism of my hon. friends opposite have been levelled at him because, as they say, he did not do anything and did not continue to carry on in the interest of the people while he was a member of the Government. That is a most unjust and unwarranted criticism of the hon. member for Marquette. Soon after his retirement, the then Minister of Public Works made up his mind that he could no longer remain in the Government led by the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), and he retired and took a position as chairman of the Railway Board. Another hon. gentleman, one who had taken a very prominent part in the administration of affairs of this country—and personally I want to give him credit for the great work he did as Minister of Finance in the Government at the time—worked with and remained in the Government until after the war, and then made up his mind that he would retire. He delivered an address in this House, a sort of valedictory, and he wound up that eloquent speech by saying to his friends: "In so far as I am concerned, I am going out of the Government, but I advise you, my friends, to carry on, carry on."

That expression has since become a by-word in the Dominion of Canada. My hon. friends opposite did not require any advice from the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) to carry on; it was their intention to carry on until the people, when an opportunity arose, kicked them out of office. My hon. friend, when he was advising his friends to carry on, retired himself and took no further responsibility as regards the Government. His action reminds me of the story of that eminent general who, after he had ranged his soldiers all in line when a battle was imminent, gave them this instruction: "You must face the foe and remain until your last shell is fired—and then run for your lives. I, being a little footsore and weary, will run now." My hon. friend, when he gave his advice to his friends to carry on, had not the hardihood, the courage, to face the people of this Dominion, to attempt to carry on the Government, when he knew the people of Ontario and the other provinces were absolutely opposed to the Government carrying on and that the Government did not have the confidence of the people in carrying on.

The ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Mewburn) also withdrew; so did the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), and the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell). If we can believe the interviews as reported in the press, the hon. member for Durham has withdrawn from this House entirely except that he will be here to guide my right hon. friend when international matters are before the House. I am sure my hon. friends must appreciate the assistance that is promised them by the hon. member for Durham, and I suppose that after this session the hon. member will be able to retire, having sufficient confidence in the ability of the Minister of Justice to deal with international affairs when they come up in the House. These hon. gentlemen have all retired. Now, the question at once arises: if these gentlemen were right in retiring from the Government, were right in the statements they made in regard to the situation, were right in saying they had fulfilled their contract, are not the other gentlemen who went into the Government under the same contract staying beyond their contract? Are they not overstaying tenants, and should not the people be given an opportunity of speaking on the question whether they should remain or not?

My hon. friend from Brantford used the argument that he was not going to support this amendment because he did not believe in letting old things go for something new. He did not believe in letting go of power, and letting anybody else come in to govern the affairs of this country. He did not believe in giving the people an opportunity of speaking their mind. He wanted this Government to carry on as long as possible, without giving the people an opportunity of deciding upon the very question that is before this Parliament. My hon. friend says: We are in power now, and I want the Government to hold on to power; the people should be willing for us to do so. My hon. friend must know that the people of this Dominion are simply crying for an opportunity to let this Government go. Perhaps my hon. friend has heard the story of the two Irishmen who went out to catch wildcats. One decided to go up the tree and drive the cat down, leaving the other man on the ground to catch the cat. Well, he drove the cat down, and the man below grabbed it. After a while the Irishman up in the tree says: "Do you want me to come down and help hold it?" "No," said the other, "come down and help me let it go." That is exactly what the people of this country want; they want to let this Government go, and I believe they should be given the opportunity at an early date.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have differed considerably in their reasons why they should support the Government. One says he will support it because it is a government of high tariff; another says he will support it because it is a government of low tariff; another says we should not go to the country now because owing to the very strong feeling of unrest and dissatisfaction in the country, the people would not be sufficiently sane to cast a reasonable vote in an election; another hon. gentleman says, the government should not go to the people, because it has guided the ship of state so well during its term of office that there is no unrest in this country, and therefore we do not want an election. That is how my hon. friends differ in their reasoning, but the reasoning of them all leads to the same conclusion, and that is to hold on to office.

A responsible government, as its name implies, must mean responsibility to the people, and no government is justified in carrying on the affairs of the country without having reasonable cause to believe they have the support and enjoy the confidence of the people of the country. The ministers who occupy seats in the Cabinet should represent the feelings of the people of their constituencies and the provinces they represent. Let us see for a moment whether or not the members of the present Administration can have any hope or reason to believe they enjoy the confidence of the people and the sections of the country they represent.

Let me take first my right hon. friend, who represents a western constituency, and hon. the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). Is it possible that either of these gentlemen would have the courage to say that they represent the feeling of the people of the West on the tariff question in this country? Is it possible that my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization could say he represents the present feeling of the people of Saskatchewan in regard to public affairs in this country? In view of the reception he got when going through his native province a few weeks ago, where in spite of the high positions he had occupied in that province for so many years he could not get a hearing to discuss the problems of the day, is it possible that he would have the courage to stand up in this Parliament or elsewhere and say that in the government of this country he expressed or reflected the feeling of the people of Saskatchewan? Not so, and therefore I say that if my hon. friend understood what I believe to be his moral and bounden duty under our constitution he would go back to his province and hand in his resignation saying: I served you during the war, as I promised, but now you have not confidence in the Government I am supporting, and therefore I cannot continue in office any longer. That would be the brave and courageous thing to do. But no, my hon. friend is tenaciously hanging on to office, in spite of his friends in the province of Saskatchewan or anywhere else in this Dominion.

Would my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Spinney), a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, say that in his position in the Government to-day he reflects the majority view of the people of the county of Yarmouth in the old province of Nova Scotia? Does he say, or would any one believe from his actions, that the people of the county of Yarmouth are satisfied to see my hon. friend supporting this Tory government when he for years was a part and parcel of the Liberal party in that county? While my hon. friend was elected to suport the Union Government I am very much mistaken, from the reports I hear, if he reflects the majority opinion of the old Liberal county of Yarmouth in supporting this present Tory Administration.

Let us take another example. Would any one in this Dominion or wherever the English language is used or known, say that for one moment the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) enjoyed the confidence of the people of the province of Quebec? Not a constituency in the province of Quebec would elect the hon. gentleman; yet, according to the letter of the constitution, that gentleman is forced upon the people of the province of Quebec and has to be their representative in the government of this country. It is absolutely opposed to the unwritten law of our constitution, and it should not be tolerated for one moment in a democratic country or in a free parliament.

Now I want to say a word or two about my hon. friend from the city of St. John, the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore), who, I regret, is not in his seat. It was very unfortunate for the province of New Brunswick, of which province I have the honour to represent one constituency, that it was so long without Cabinet representation. The interests of the Maritime Provinces were disregarded for many, many months by this Government until there was a very strong agitation down there for increased representation in the Government. My hon. friend from St. John was selected. Personally, I have no fault to find with the hon. gentleman, although I may say that after being elected for the great city of St. John, where, for the purpose of carrying the constituency, he promised everything in the way of harbour improvements that could possibly be thought of. He is not satisfied with that but goes down to the sister city of Halifax, and in a day or two builds a new railway station at the terminals in that city. He flits away to Cape Breton, nationalizes the Port of Sydney, and on his way back stops off for Sunday afternoon in the garden city of Moncton, where he builds a post office. Elsewhere in New Brunswick he evinces great interest in the public welfare. I sincerely wish my hon. friend every success in his endeavour to do something to further the interests of the Maritime Provinces, and in some degree to compensate for the negligence that has been shown in regard to that part of Canada during the past few years by this Government. One would naturally suppose that I should compliment my hon. friend and say that at least one member has the support and confidence of his own constituency in the province of New Brunswick. I regret, however, that the hon. gentleman is only a living example of the proverb that evil communications corrupt good manners. He has been only a few months in the company of his colleagues opposite, and we find now that the people of New Brunswick, and particularly of the City of St. John, have lost confidence even in himself. I regret that fact very much, because I had hoped that my hon. friend would make a strong minister, would bring light to bear upon the Government, and would see to it that the province of New Brunswick and the Maritime Provinces as a whole would get some reasonably decent treatment from the Government in the way of expenditure on public works.

But, Sir, I have in my hand a newspaper clipping which I shall read to the House. I have no desire to detain the House at any length reading newspaper extracts, because I have not always the highest regard for what newspapers say, particularly on political matters, for the reason that one party paper will say one thing and another something different; and if I were to quote from a Liberal newspaper, notwithstanding the truth of the statement I might cite, I should not expect it to have very great effect in this House or in the country. But I hold in my hand an article clipped from a newspaper which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) must realize has been for a great many years one of the strongest influences in the province of New Brunswick along Conservative lines and in the interests of the Conservative party. From the time my hon. friend occupied a seat in Parliament and graced it as one of the representatives of the province, that newspaper has been a Conservative advocate; and while it is under a new title it is but the same newspaper that always gave strong and hearty support to the Conservative party. It gave considerable influential assistance to my hon. friend at the by-election held in St. John a few months ago. But how quickly changes come about! How quickly the people are beginning to see that the Government no longer has the confidence of the Canadian electorate! If hon. members knew the St. John Standard as well as I know it, they would almost blush to think that it should criticise, even in the slightest degree, my hon. friend who now occupies a seat on the Treasury Benches. But it is not satisfied with criticising the Minister of Customs; it goes further and takes to task the Prime Minister himself (Hon. Mr. Meighen) for his conduct of the affairs of the country. Let me read, if I may, an editorial taken from that newspaper under date of Thursday, February 17, only three days after my hon. friend who was elected in the City of St. John took his seat in this House. This editorial is headed: "Indifference or Dishonesty?" You will note the interrogation. It proceeds:

> Individual experience is the sure foundation on which may be based any opinion of the business integrity of an individual or organization. And on such basis The Standard has tried and has found wanting those in the employ of the Federal Government, who control the business affairs of this country. Our experience may or may not be a criterion of the whole administration, but it is sufficient to create, in our case at least, a decided impression that the business principles of those now in charge are neither honest nor honourable. Possibly the circumstances leading to such a conclusion are due entirely to the apparent attitude of subordinates in the executive offices. This, however, is difficult of belief, in view of the fact that the circumstances have ben made known in detail to at least three present ministers of the Crown, and that, so far as The Standard has been able to learn, not one of these has taken any definite action toward the application of the first principles of fair play. Apparently these ministers and their subordinates are content to violate their own written contracts, to defraud a business house of payments due on such contracts, to take shelter behind obsolete legislation which can apparently be disregarded for the financial gain of the Government, and by red tape and departmental delay to prevent the transfer to the Court of matters in dispute. The Standard to-day charges the Borden-Meighen administration through its subordinates with violation of written contracts, with unfair and dishonest retention of money due for services performed, and it charges the Secretary of State and the Minister of Railways with failure to perform the duties of their respective offices in bringing to a settlement matters which have repeatedly been referred to them for attention. It asserts, too, that the Premier himself, and the Minister of Customs have been negligent in the same matter, and are, from the experience of The Standard, responsible, though in a lesser degree, for the dishonesty and dishonourable neglect of their subordinates.

If, as is suspected by many, the departmental offices at Ottawa are filled with employes who spend their time in attempting to discredit the present Government, the matter is easy of solution. This, however, is difficult of belief in view of all the circumstances. And it is increasingly hard to understand—by this paper at least—how such a Government can lay claim to popular support, when its own routine business affairs are marked by such a lack of ordinary honesty or integrity.

If the Premier or any members of his Cabinet are desirous of further information or evidence along this line, The Standard will be pleased to furnish it.

As I said, this editorial is from the leading Conservative newspaper in New Brunswick,—not merely one of the leading newspapers, but the newspaper—and that is the condition of affairs in that province at the present time. If I were so inclined I could take the same paper during the last week or two and read columns of criticism of this Government. I do not purpose to do so, because it deals with a personal matter between the Conservative party and the appointment of an hon. gentleman to the other House. I am not here to criticise the appointment in any way whatever, but I do say that the present Administration has lost the confidence of the people of New Brunswick, as is palpable on every hand and as is fully reflected in the editorial I have just read.

We have been told during this debate that there should be a general election, and many reasons have been advanced in support of this contention as well as against it. Precedents have been cited by hon. gentlemen on both sides, by those, on the one hand, who claim that an election should be held and, on the other hand, by those who argue that an election is unnecessary at the present time. Hon. members have referred for precedents to England, to Australia, to New Zealand, and to other Parliaments in their endeavour to convince this Government that they should appeal to the people. I do not intend to go far afield for precedents in this matter; I need not go further than our own Dominion, for the precedent that has been established in our own country is quite good enough for me. It impresses me and must impress hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that the time is now ripe for a general election. Let me review just for a moment the condition of affairs in the Dominion of Canada from the year 1891 to the year 1896. There we had, after the death of Sir John Macdonald, a succession of governments being formed almost every week or every month, and you did not know from day to day when a new government might be formed. But, quite in keeping with Tory doctrines and traditions, they insisted on carrying on from one year to another and in one session, I think in 1896, the very day Parliament was opened seven ministers resigned from the Cabinet simultaneously.

They decided to carry on, and to carry on at all hazards. During those years, and particularly the years 1895 and 1896—any person who remembers that period will recall the facts, and if they do not remember all they have to do is to read the history of that time—hard times prevailed, there was unrest, and dissatisfaction. And, Sir, what happened? As my hon. friend from Red Deer so well expressed it yesterday, in 1896 the Government were at last driven to the people—and having been in office fourteen years eleven months and thirty days—one day before the expiration of the term for which Parliament was elected. They were forced to the people, and on the twenty-third of June, 1896, a general election took place. Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power as a result of that general election. Immediately afterwards the people settled down and went to work, and, following 1896, we had the most prosperous times that we have ever had since Confederation.

Sir, the situation to-day in Canada is absolutely on a par with what it was in 1896 when the Tory government of that day were driven to the people. When they appealed to the electorate the people took great pains to drive them out of office and I believe the same fate will befall my hon. friends opposite when they follow that example in the very near future. Now, Sir, you do not want any stronger or any better precedent than the one I have cited. The people of that day were despondent and discouraged until the opportunity was given them of changing the administration. Irrespective of what the result would be if an election were brought on at the present time, it is principles that count. The Prime Minister says the leader of the Opposition thinks the people of Canada are pining for him to come into office and carry on the affairs of government. Let me say to my right hon. friend that Canada might get along without much pining if he were not in office. It might exist if any hon. gentlemen were not in the House at all. It is not men that count but principles, and the people of Canada at the present time are awaiting the opportunity of expressing their opinion upon principles when a general election takes place.

The Prime Minister says there is no demand for a general election. My hon. friends opposite say: We have consulted our constituents and they do not want an election. They shudder at the thought and raise their hands in holy horror of the idea of an election being brought on at the present time. Well, Sir, there is one class of people that has made no concealment of its feelings in regard to a call for a general election, a class of people whose sentiments should appeal above all others to our patriotic friends opposite—I refer to the returned soldiers. They are demanding an election at the present time. In 1917, when the soldiers in the trenches were calling for assistance, hon. gentlemen opposite placed the Military Service Act upon the statute books of Canada. Instead of the provisions of that Act being carried out as intended, the opposite was the case. A better title for it would have been the Exemptions Act, because instead of securing recruits for our military forces exemptions from service were the order of the day. However, the fact is the returned soldiers are now calling for a general election and surely hon. gentlemen opposite will heed the call. They will not turn a deaf ear to the demand of some four hundred and fifteen thousand men that they should be given an opportunity of expressing themselves at the poll. I hold in my hand, Sir, a copy of a telegram that was sent from this city on the twenty-seventh of May, 1920, by Mr. R. B. Maxwell, Dominion President of the Great War Veterans' Association. The press despatch from which the telegram is taken says:

R. B. Maxwell of Winnipeg, Dominion President of the G.W.V.A. who has been here several days investigating the political situation, tonight issued the following message to the 776 branches of the Association throughout the Dominion.

The telegram itself reads as follows:

From knowledge gained of political and economic conditions in Canada during three years' effort on the part of the Great War Veterans Association to obtain equitable reconstruction legislation, I deem it my duty to urge upon you the necessity of an early general election. The time has arrived for the people to declare themselves on the vital questions of the day. I therefore call upon you in defence of the basic principles upon which this Association was founded, to assemble in mass meeting with your fellow citizens and secure without delay an unmistakable expression of the wishes of the people in regard to the necessity of a general election.

That message, Sir, went from the President of the Great War Veterans Association who represents seven hundred and seventy-six branches of that organization. Of the five hundred thousand men who went overseas unfortunately some fifty or sixty thousand did not return but the other four hundred and forty thousand, or approximately that number, are back in Canada and they have been knocking at the door of the Government for reasonable treatment. They claim that they have not received the treatment they should have received from the Government, and as a last resort the President of the Association comes forward and sends out his telegram asking the whole of the branches of the organization to get together and demand a general election so that they may have an opportunity of expressing their views through the ballot box, a privilege they have not had for many years in Canada.

Mr. MORPHY (North Perth): Might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. COPP: I shall be delighted.

Mr. MORPHY: Will my hon. friend kindly tell the House how many public meetings were held on the request of Mr. Maxwell that public meetings be held throughout the country? I am told that none were held.

An Hon. MEMBER: Then why ask the question?

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend asked me a question and has supplied the answer himself. Let me say to him that I do not know how many meetings of branches of this organization have been held, but I would ask him if he does not give credence to the telegram sent by Mr. Maxwell, as President of the Great War Veterans Association.

Mr. MORPHY: That is not the question. I want to know what has been the effect of his appeal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COPP: Give the hon. gentleman all the rope he wants.

Mr. MORPHY: Answer my question please.

Mr. BUREAU: No cross-examination.

Mr. COPP: I have not in my possession a report of the doings of the Great War Veterans Association. However, my hon. friend need not attempt to argue that the Great War Veterans Association is not an organization that should not be given every consideration by this Government as well as by the people at large. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this organization is to-day demanding a general election and I say the Government are not doing justice to themselves or to the country when they turn a deaf ear to that demand.

Now, Sir, I had intended to say something about railway facilities in the Maritime Provinces and matters in connection therewith, but I find that I have already spoken at greater length than I intended. Before resuming my seat, however, I wish to return for a moment to the observations of the Minister of Militia last evening. That hon. gentleman took a very great deal of pains to tell the House that the Liberal Party had been broken up and that there was nothing but a remnant of it left.

He took occasion, Sir, to quote some figures to show that that was correct, and he appeared to claim a great deal of credit, and was applauded very vigorously by my hon. friends opposite, in regard to it. I have already referred to the fact that in 1917 a very large number of Liberals supported the Union Government, but in 1919 my hon. friend had the evidence before him in the report of the Liberal Convention held in Ottawa in August of that year that that support had been withdrawn. He told us that we had only two Liberal representatives west of the Great Lakes.

Mr. EDWARDS: In the House.

Mr. COPP: Let me say to my hon. friend that in spite of the fact that we have only two representatives west of the Great Lakes in the House of Commons, we have a strong and virile Liberal party in the great West —in the province from which my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization comes and in the neighbouring provinces, as was shown at the Liberal convention last August. Would my hon. friend for one moment argue that Hon. T. C. Norris, Hon. Edward Brown and Hon. Dr. R. S. Thornton, who were here representing the province of Manitoba, do not reflect Liberal sentiment in that province? Would my hon. friend say the same in regard to the Premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. George Langley, and Hon. R. J. Gordon, who were here to represent their province at that convention? And would he say that Hon. George Langley has not any following in the province of Saskatchewan at the present time? Mr. Langley was the very man who stood up in that convention and moved the tariff resolutions that became part of the Liberal platform that we are prepared to go to the country on.

Mr. CALDER: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Is the hon. minister speaking in earnest?

Mr. CALDER: Is my hon. friend aware of the fact that Hon. George Langley made the statement that the most unfortunate thing that could happen to Canada would be that the hon. the leader of the Opposition and his friends should come into power?

Mr. COPP: No, I have no knowledge of such a statement, and my hon. friend has no knowledge of it.

Mr. CALDER: Oh, yes.

Mr. COPP: He said that about my hon. friend. I want to say to him, as he presumes to speak for the province of Saskatchewan, that I do not believe he can stand in his place and give me the name of a single Liberal Unionist who supported him in his constituency of Moosejaw in 1917 who will support him to-day—not one man. If he has one name, Sir, let him be courageous enough to give it to the House. I repeat that not one Liberal Unionist who supported my hon. friend in 1917 will follow him to-day.

Mr. CALDER: That is cheap talk.

Mr. CHISHOLM: You will not find it cheap.

Mr. COPP: Will my hon. friend dare assert that Hon. John Oliver, Hon. Mr. King and Hon. Mr. Farris, who represented the province of British Columbia at the Liberal convention, did not reflect Liberal opinion in their province? But let me come down to the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do not skip Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend says, "Do not skip Ontario." My hon. friend will be busy enough in Ontario at the next general election. He will be lucky if the party of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) does not carry away so many Tory seats from my hon. friend's party in Ontario that neither he nor any of his associates will again be returned to this House.

But let me go down to the Maritime Provinces. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) took great comfort in saying that the Maritime Provinces had only eleven members here to support the Opposition. Let me say to my hon. friend that from the province of Nova Scotia alone we have to-day four representatives on this side of the House, and if it had not been for the manipulations under the Military Voters' Act we would have nine members from that province. Let me say further in regard to the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island: Look well to yourselves and never mind the Liberal party. If my hon. friends will only give the people an opportunity of expressing their views they will very soon see where the representation will come from. They will see that the Maritime Provinces, the great West, and the provinces of Quebec and Ontario will vote want of confidence in this Government with such an overwhelming majority as has never yet been recorded in the history of the Dominion. That is what will happen.

In conclusion, let me say to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, that when he speaks of the "remnants" of the Liberal party, those "remnants," as soon as an appeal is made to the country—and the sooner the better—will be back here doing business at the stand now occupied by himself and his friends.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, since the legions on the other side seem to have faded away, I will gladly resume the debate. May I at the outset extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address on the very excellent way in which they acquitted themselves of that duty? May I also extend my hearty congratulations to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on the position which he has attained, although in his case there is a certain feeling of sympathy mingled with my congratulations? Amidst some outstanding imperfections my right hon. friend possesses many good qualities, and he certainly displayed wonderful courage when he consented to be the sacrificial lamb after the right hon. gentleman (Sir Thomas White) who was elected in Leeds in 1917 refused to play the leading part in what has become a funeral procession.

Sir, we have met this session under very special circumstances—circumstances upon which I wish to briefly dwell, and which have compelled my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to move the amendment which we are now discussing. That amendment is a direct demand on this Parliament to uphold honour in public life. It is an assertion of the will of the people of Canada never to abdicate the position of master to take up the duty of servant. As that great exponent of British Liberalism, Mr. Asquith, said on a memorable occasion: "Democracy implies that the will of the people must prevail." The House of Commons must reflect the opinion of the country and the national will. Parliament and the people must be of one mind, and when they cease to agree power should revert to the force that dispensed it. We have to-day in this country a Government that pretends to govern, and a Parliament that pretends to legislate, for unmistakable signs and innumerable evidences have shown very clearly that public confidence, the mainspring, the life breath, of Government and legislation, has withdrawn equally from the one and from the other. The present Government is at this moment in the most humiliating and disgraceful position which any government has held in this country since the days of what has become known as the "nest of traitors," and when they resort to quibbling and contrivances of procedure for the purpose of clinging to office until 1922; when they resort to subterfuges, even dignified under the name of party strategy; and when they do that under the pretence that there is unrest in this country, they are delivering against themselves a judgment which the country needs only to register when the proper time comes. This government measures up to the well-known definition of Toryism: "Distrust of the people qualified by fear." The statement that it will not yield to public opinion but will go to the full limit of its time is a challenge that will be taken up.

The amendment of my hon. leader and the denial of the right of the present Parliament to legislate are justified on three main grounds. First, the election of 1917 was held and a majority obtained under the special conditions of the war, by means of a franchise which was specially framed for what was described as the only purpose of the election, and was for the duration of the war. Second, since this election a new reign has been inaugurated; a new Administration has been formed; a new Prime Minister has been appointed; a new party has been created, and new questions have arisen which were not only submitted to the electorate, but were specifically excluded from their consideration and from their verdict. Third, this Government and Parliament do not possess the confidence of the people of this country; and cogent evidence has been shown not only of the swinging of the pendulum, but of a deeply rooted national distrust in the ministerial leaders. The speakers who have preceded me have related extensively the conditions under which the last election was held. I shall not go over the ground again; I shall not quote the written and spoken pledges of the members of the Government, from the right hon. Prime Minister down to the last member of the Administration. An Election Act was passed picking the electors who were to select the Administration. The Prime Minister of that time asked the people of Canada to suspend for the time being all their political views and the consideration of all questions which were controversial between the parties, and a Union Government was formed with the distinct understanding that it was only to last for the duration of the war. Thousands of Liberals voted for the hon gentlemen opposite, believing in the sincerity of those pledges. Those who voted against the Government were branded as disloyal, as being allies of the Kaiser, as not being good Canadians—because it was pointed out that the only issue was the carrying on of the war; that all the other issues had been temporarily suspended. It was stated that no loyal Canadian, Mr. Speaker, could vote otherwise than for the Union Government, however strong, however divergent, may have been their views on ordinary political questions. My hon. friends opposite cannot deny that; there is not one of them that did not say so. The electors of Canada know that, and the continuance in office of the present Government under the circumstances, constitutes a gross and palpable injustice to Canadian democracy. That is the very reason why so many men in this country who would be inclined otherwise to support my right hon. friend are opposed to his continuance in office, because as between him and public morality and national honour, they choose the latter. Take the case of the soldiers—it is the most glaring one. Thousands of young Canadians voted for this Government because circulars were freely sent to all the military camps in France, Britain and Canada, even in the United States, and to the troops in the trenches, telling those young men that this was a war election; that the only issue was selective conscription; that the only question was the carrying on of the war; that the mandate they were called upon to give was a mandate for that purpose and no other, and that there would be another election when the war was over. In many cases the soldiers did not know who were the candidates to whom they were giving their suffrage. Indeed, in the Yukon Territory the votes of the soldiers were registered before there was any candidate in the field. Fourteen members of this House, Mr. Speaker, who had been defeated in Canada sit in this Parliament to-day by virtue of the soldiers' vote. I do not protest against the soldiers having exercised their right to vote. When I used the same argument in the city of Peterborough, I was taken to task by some newspapers, and the Montreal Gazette said that I had protested against the votes given to the soldiers, though paying me the compliment that I was generally more careful in my words. Sir, I do not and did not complain about the votes of the soldiers. The war is over; those issues are past; the only ones who want to keep them alive are the members of the present Government, who refuse to elect a peace Parliament, and who remain in office by virtue of a mandate given to a war Parliament. What I said in Peterborough and what I say in this House is that, to the soldiers of Canada who gave a vote under such unprecedented and special circumstances, on their being told that they were giving that vote for a special time and a special purpose, it is very unfair to use and abuse that mandate for the settlement of other questions, especially when those young men from one end of the country to the other are asking the Government to give them an opportunity and the right to vote on the domestic questions of Canada. I do not wish to be understood as stating that the Government has no right to legislate on anything that, at the time of the election, it did not explicitly declare that it would deal with. The Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) put up a man of straw to knock him down when he referred to that matter, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), in labouring extensively on that topic and quoting Sir Wilfrid Laurier and other constitutional authorities to that effect, was losing his time, as nobody will deny what he attempted to prove. But when a government specifically state that they will not deal with particular matters or things which are in controversy between the parties, when upon that assumption thousands of Liberals vote for that government, and when now, in spite of that pledge and declaration, they proceed to deal with and legislate upon matters which they themselves specifically excluded from the verdict they asked for from the electorate, I cannot comprehend the ethics or sense of honour of men who would do that in the face of such declarations. The question is not so much one of power or legal right, it is one of public morality, of common honesty. The action of the Government in this regard is a gross breach of faith, as gross a breach of faith as ever disgraced the political history of this country, and made all the more gross by the fact that the men who are guilty of it claim the law and the Constitution as their defence. It is a well known fact that the cleverest deceivers usually manage to keep within the four corners of the law. It is to be regretted that Canadian public men put themselves in the position of a man who will lure on a friend to make a bet and then refuse to pay, because the debt is not recoverable at law.

The second point of my argument is that we have confronting us to-day a new Administration, a new party, a new Prime Minister, and a new ministry, none of which has ever received the endorsation of the Canadian people. Immediately after the close of last session, there was announced to the Canadian public the setting of a star and the rising of a new one. It was at the same time announced to the world that the Canadian Unionist party had passed out of existence and that a new party had taken its place. The other day the Prime Minister claimed that this new party is the legitimate descendant of the former party. I quite admit that it is the descendant of the other, but I have my doubts as to its legitimacy. Legitimate children, as a rule, are proud to bear the name of their father. The new party was shy, if not ashamed, to go throughout the world retaining the name of its generator, and the hyphenated appellation of "National Liberal and Conservative," which means everything on earth and, for that reason, nothing at all, was used. I admit that there was not avery discernible solution of continuity between the Unionist party and this one. The new party, however, was cut out, drafted, painted red, white and blue, and varnished with the blessings and good wishes of the special interests which always controlled its predecessor. The former member for Peterborough West, to whom I give credit for being one man who kept his pledge to his electors, asserted that the National Liberal and Conservative party, like Topsy in Uncle Tom's Cabin, was not born, it "growed." Lord Hugh Cecil, speaking a few days ago to his constituents, intimating that he would sit on the Opposition side of the House with his distinguished brother, used these words:

> Parties, like poets, are born, not made. They arise out of circumstances, spontaneously, not out of plans and plots.

If the British statesman is right and a party cannot arise out of plans and plots, I wonder what is the real character of the aggregation that controls the Government to-day. The Government and the ministerial press proclaimed to the world that a new party had been formed. When the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie), quoted as an excuse to refuse an election, the precedent of Sir John Macdonald being replaced by Sir John Abbott, Sir John Thompson, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and Sir Charles Tupper; that of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), being replaced by Mr. Murray; that of Mr. Walter Scott being replaced by Mr. William Martin; that of Sir Lomer Gouin being replaced by Mr. Taschereau, without a general election being held; they forgot to mention, or rather took good care not to mention, that in each one of those cases there was only a change in leadership, and in no case was there a new party or a new programme.

Moreover, the ministry which is on the treasury benches is far from being the ministry to which a mandate was given in 1917. The men who were in the ministry of 1917 formed a fairly able combination. Indeed, we were told at the time that it was a combination of the best brains of the country. But surely not even the most sanguine supporter of the present ministry would make such a claim in favour of this Administration. Most of the ministers who gave prestige to the Unionist Administration have withdrawn, and their places have been taken by gentlemen whose main qualifications for office were that they occupied seats where there was less danger of losing an election than in others. The present Cabinet is notable more by the men who are not now of it than by those who are in it. It is a Cabinet of shreds and patches, and if the few additions which are mentioned in the papers as likely to be made in the near future are made, they will serve only to magnify the oddness of the complexion and the preposterous appearance of the crazy-work. The most ingenious patching will not suffice to make the old Tory-Unionist Government garment cover our large national limbs. Patching serves only to display more conspicuously the imperfections of its cut and texture.

The right hon. Prime Minister claimed the other day that this Administration is young, having been returned to office in 1917. I will point out the numerous changes that have been made in the Cabinet since that day; I will point out the striking difference between what it is to-day and what it was two years ago, and perhaps my right hon. friend will permit me to apply to his ministry these words of the great satirist Juvenal: Facies tua computat annos—"Your very face betrays your age." Before leaving this subject I have a word or two to address to the very, very few gentlemen who still describe themselves as Liberals and form an appendage to this reactionary Administration. One of these gentlemen proclaimed yesterday his articles of faith. Now—I am going to speak my mind very frankly—as between an insincere Liberal and a candid Tory, give me the Tory every time. It does not cheapen the political currency. It does not degrade the morality of our public life. Sir, Liberalism is not, and cannot be, represented in this Cabinet or elsewhere by men who in recent years have been on every side of every public question, and never loyal to any. Monsieur Foucher, a Prime Minister under Napoleon, was said to have taken at various times seven different and contradictory oaths of allegiance. I think some Canadian public men could quite easily rival that record without seriously hurting their convictions. In this connection I desire to quote the words of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) at Saskatoon. I shall quote from what hon. gentlemen opposite will regard as a very authoritative newspaper the Ottawa Journal, of November 13, 1920:

> Mr. Calder said that three years ago he did not understand the tariff question as well as he did at the present time, for the reason that he had never had occasion to study it. "I was," he said, "more or less of a parrot, just as other people are parrots. I got up in our Legislature and advocated free fertilizers when I did not know the first thing about it, and forty other members knew no more."

My hon. friend said he was a parrot, and did not know anything about the tariff. I ask you, Sir, in what light the hon. gentleman appears when his leader, the right hon. Prime Minister, said in his speech the other day that the Minister of Immigration and Colonization is and always has been consistent. The only meaning could be that he was still consistently —a parrot; he still repeats and registers his master's voice—only the master has changed. In Moosejaw, my hon. friend said that he was a Liberal, but not a Mackenzie King Liberal. Sir, Liberalism is a creed, it is a doctrine, it is a set of principles, but if my hon. friend wishes to refer to the Liberals in this House or in this country as King Liberals, and at the same time claims that he is still a Liberal, the only inference is that he is a Meighen Liberal, which is a species unknown both to zoology and common sense. Why, when my hon. friend was in the West singing a love duet with the right hon. the Prime Minister—I admit this is not in the newspapers, but it was repeated to me by many Liberals in Regina and other western cities—sitting around the dinner table he told the people there: "The Liberals in the House of Commons are not serious about an election. They do not want an election.

"There are members in the House who told me last year that if the Government was in danger of being defeated they would absent themselves when the division came." Sir, on behalf of the members of this side of the House, I ask my hon. friend as a gentleman to substantiate that slanderous statement. Let my hon. friend or any other gentleman give the name of any member who said that. Even now press correspondents are saying that we are not serious about asking for an election; yet in the very next column they stultify themselves by asserting that we on this side of the House are refusing pairs, are most unfair, and are willing to take any sort of advantage to defeat the Government. Could two statements be more contradictory? The one statement answers the other. The people of Canada will be able to judge of the sincerity of those who say these things.

The third reason in favour of the amendment is that this Government is no longer in harmony with public opinion and has utterly lost the confidence of the country. Indeed, it has not only lost the country's confidence; it has earned its contempt. No government has the moral right to pass legislation under such circumstances. The result of the by-elections cannot be misread; they are bold, definite and unequivocal. The Canadian people have made it clear that they want a new government. They will not let the country pass through two more years of dishonourable history in order to allow a group of political gentlemen to show their consistency in their vices as well as in their virtues, and to gratify the human disinclination of my hon. friend, the Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Guthrie), to become once more a private man. As my hon. friend the member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), pointed out in the course of his admirable speech, out of fifteen elections held since 1917 the Government lost ten and won only five, but in each of these five in glorious victories they had themselves selected the constituencies; and, in four of the five, Cabinet ministers were candidates. Every time an election was forced upon this Government by the natural course of events they have been overwhelmingly defeated. Yet, Heaven nows the expedients to which they resorted in order to check the threatening adverse march of events. My right hon. friend the new Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), has always been noted for the cleverness of his electoral devices and he has worked out a new scheme. He is running his elections on the instalment plan. Last year seven elections were held on the same day. In two of the constituencies members of the Government were candidates, and the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Tolmie), were elected. But on the same day there was an election in Glengarry, there was one in Assiniboia, there was one in Victoria and Carleton, and there was one in the good constituency known as Quebec East; and in every one of these the Government was snowed under by overwhelming majorities. In the County of Prince, Prince Edward Island, my hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), was elected by acclamation. In the county of North Ontario the election was postponed owing to the death of one of the candidates, but the Government was defeated when the election was held. This year, under the new business methods of the new Prime Minister, instead of having the by-elections on the same date, as has always been the custom, and as is only proper, we are having them in slices; as I say, it is the instalment plan, and it is being operated in a very irregular manner; the debt that is overdue is not given preference over the new one. The county of East Elgin became vacant by the death of the sitting member on February 14, 1920; the election was held on November 22, 1920, nine months afterwards. Yet the county of St. James Montreal had become vacant at about the same time, and the election was held immediately. The county of Peterborough became vacant by Mr. Burnham's resignation on July 15, 1920, and the election was held on February 7, 1921. Yet at the same time, in the middle of July, 1920, the county of Yale became vacant by Mr. Burrell's appointment to public office and the election was held on November 22, 1920. The two counties of St. John and Colchester became vacant on the 16th and 13th July, 1920, respectively, and the elections in these constituencies were held November 22, 1920. Why this difference in the treatment accorded East Elgin and Peterborough as compared with others. And we are now told—at least I have read in the Montreal Gazette—that an election may be held pretty soon in the county of York-Sunbury which is actually vacant; but as regards the county of Yamaska, it is said that the province of Quebec is so largely represented in Parliament that there is no need of an election in that constituency. When an election is over in one constituency the electoral machine of the Government is transferred to another place. East Elgin and Peterborough have witnessed and have withstood the tremendous and costly experiment of the new organization which my right hon. friend referred to in his speech, so much so that the honest people in these two important ridings were asking themselves with amazement the question: "Where does the money come from?" But the Government's machinery was of no avail, and public opinion asserted itself in a ringing manner against this discredited Administration. Hon. gentlemen opposite are now trying to minimize the importance of these elections. Indeed, my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), stated, amidst the cheers of his followers on the other side, that the election in Peterborough constituted a mandate to the Government to carry on, to use the stereotyped words of the former member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White). I shall not discuss this further than to express the hope that my right hon. friend was more logical and displayed more common sense when he represented our country at the League of Nations recently. The Prime Minister, the ministerial candidate in Peterborough, and all the ministerial forces, claimed that the issue of the election was the tariff policy. Am I right in stating that? We stated that the issue was the usurpation by this Government of administrative power, and that this Parliament had outlived its existence and its mandate. On this issue the member from West Peterborough, (Mr. Gordon), fought and won. Now the Prime Minister states, with great satisfaction, that the verdict was not against the tariff. The Minister of Justice follows and declares that the verdict was not against the right of the Government to continue in office. These were the two issues according to them. Who is right, the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice? Was the verdict against the tariff policy of the Government or, to use their own words, against its right to carry on. Hon. gentlemen opposite are entitled to their choice but they must, at least, reconcile their views in the matter. The only alternative would be that the verdict is against the new Prime Minister personally, and is simply a notification that the electors do not want him. Sir, the Prime Minister went to Peterborough and said that the election was most important, that the return of the Government candidate was imperative, that all eyes in Canada were cast on Peterborough. He said the same thing in East Elgin. Why should he now try to take all those Canadian eyes off Peterborough and East Elgin? The result doubtless does not substantiate the statement which my right hon. friend made in my own province in the city of Sherbrooke, that the Liberal party outside of the province of Quebec was extinct. He has to modify his tune in that respect. Still even the Minister of Militia had the temerity to make this wicked assertion. There is one party in this country to-day which is extinct. It has practically disappeared from the Provincial Administration of all the provinces of Canada, and in this Federal arena it has taken concealment under a new equivocal name. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) also went to Peterborough, and again the eyes of all Canadians were described as being cast in the direction of that now famous constituency. The right hon. gentleman even said—I read it in the press; the defeat of the Government candidate would be the first drop of poison. I gave credit to my right hon. friend that he was sincere, and he obviously showed the effect of that drop of poison on his political constitution when, instead of defending the Government in this very dangerous period, that great parliamentary fighter of so many battles used his time to advocate the League of Nations before a House which is unanimously in favour of that great organization. The electors of those various constituencies have clearly expressed the determination of the people of Canada to restore true responsible Governmment and to be ruled by men who are elected by the people in a normal and constitutional way. Yet the Prime Minister states that he will not yield to this public intimation. The Salvation Army says of all mankind that a man may be down, he is never out. But my right hon. friend is wrong when he thinks this is also true of the Government. When a Government is down it has to go out. It is important that it should be so. When it is obvious that a Government does not command the support of the majority of the people, its decisions carry no influence, it has no more authority. Individual members cannot speak here with authority when everybody knows that they no longer speak the voice of their constituents, that their tenure in this Parliament is precarious. Such a thing does not make for the dignity of parliamentary institutions. It reduces the House of Commons to the level of a mock parliament, and patriotic statesmen have no right to inflict that on a great country. It does not make either for independence or freedom of action. The member who knows that he cannot secure the renewal of his constituents' mandate is tempted to support the existing Government in everything through thick and thin, because he knows that when they cease to swim he will have to sink. Rather than swimming in a hazy obscurity he is tempted to avoid anything that may bring down the Government however divergent from theirs may be his views on the particular subject under discussion. The worse the prospects for the Government afforded by an election the surer is the pressure exercised on individual weakness. I do not hesitate to say that the votes cast by many hon. gentleman when a division comes will not mean confidence in the Government so much as confidence in themselves to retain a little longer seats which are already moving away from under them. I am sure the Minister of Militia appreciates that feeling. The Prime Minister said that his Government has the confidence of a majority in this House and that so long as he retains that majority he has a constitutional right to carry on. I shall endeavour to show that that position is unsound, and that the Government must also command the support of the majority of the people.

But, Sir, can my right hon. friend say that he has still a majority in this House which allows him to rule with honour and dignity. The majority of seventy in 1917 has dwindled to twenty, probably to fifteen to-day. And yet the hon. the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) has the gall—I do not know whether that is a good English word—to refer to us as a "remnant." Remnant! Remnant! What is the hon. gentleman himself? What is the Government that faces us in this House? Remnant! The only "remnant" that I see is this Government, which had a majority of seventy, three years ago and which is now struggling to keep a bare majority, and being unable to do it by the ordinary way of electoral victories, is adopting the rather humiliating process of trying to get recruits from the ranks of its opponents by methods which I do not care to describe, in order to postpone the shameful defeat that awaits it at the polls. I hurl back in the Minister of Militia's face this mean appellation that he applied to the Opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is exceeding the proprieties of debate when he accuses another hon. member of applying a "mean appellation." I think that upon reflection he will realize the impropriety of the expression and will withdraw it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will with pleasure withdraw the remark, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour knows that I am not an adept in the use of the English language. As I said, the majority of seventy of three years ago has dwindled to about twenty to-day. Cabinet reorganization cannot be undertaken, the best men in the party cannot be called to the Council table lest the dangerous adventure of by-elections conduces to a still greater reduction of that majority. Yet reorganization is badly needed. Friends and panegyrists of the Prime Minister in the press state that he is practically alone in the Cabinet. I would not like to say that, and I hope I have not hurt the feelings of any of the members of the Cabinet in repeating the statement. It is the ministerial press that says that my right hon. friend is the one man in this Administration, and that he is surrounded by gentlemen of whom we might say, after the manner of a former British Prime Minister, that they are all ciphers, he being the unit that gives value to them. I do not agree with that statement, far from it, and I am free to confess that if I had been given a vote—and I hope my right hon. friend will permit me to say so—when the selection of a new Prime Minister was made, there is one gentleman in the Cabinet whom I would have voted for rather than for my right hon. friend. I will not name him,—so every other minister may think that he is the man. I would make only one exception—I beseech my hon. friend the Minister of Militia not to think so. I have quoted the statement which is made by newspapers friendly to the Government. Is it in the interests of the good administration of this country that a Government should be so weak and impotent? After having stated for the last two years that we had in Ottawa a Government without a leader—that is what the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star used to say very frequently—shall we have the misfortune now to have a leader without a Government?

Other expedients are used to preserve that vanishing majority. The other day, during the speech of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) your honour ruled that he was bound to describe the right hon. gentleman who was elected in Leeds in 1917 as "the member for Leeds." Still I do not hesitate to say that this right hon. gentleman under the law has forfeited his right to his seat. What is the law on this matter? Section 15, chapter 10, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, reads, in part, as follows:

If any member of the House of Commons accepts any office or commission, or performs any service for the Government of Canada, or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is paid or to be paid . . . . the seat of such member shall thereby be vacated and his election shall thenceforth be null and void.

The preamble of the schedule to the Act which was passed last year concerning the acquisition of the Grand Trunk railway provides that one of the parties to the agreement is called the Government; and clause 6 of this schedule, which forms part of the Act provides:

That the value of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company shall be determined by a Board of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by the Government.

And the first sentence of clause 21 of the schedule reads as follows:

Each of the parties to this agreement shall pay its own costs of and in connection with the arbitration subsequent to the date of this agreement, including the remuneration of the arbitrator appointed by it.

The amount of the remuneration is not fixed in the law, but it is specifically stated that the arbitrator who shall act in the matter shall be remunerated by the Government. I say, Sir, that under the circumstances there should have been an election in Leeds and that there should be a member from that constituency voting on the amendment to the Address.

There is another matter to which I wish to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker. On July 21, 1920, the hon. member for Ste. Antoine, Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames), delivered a very eloquent address before the Empire Parliamentary Association in London on "The Dominions and the League of Nations." This address was printed, and I have a copy of it in my hand. With your permission, I will read the following words from page 5:

Now, I have just returned from a hurried visit to Canada. Mr. Balfour has alluded to the double capacity which I occupied at that time, and for the moment still occupy. For sixteen years I have been the representative of Western Montreal in the Canadian House of Commons. My resignation is in the hands of the Speaker because I have found that my new work is quite enough to occupy all the time and attention that I am capable of giving to it.

This was on July 21, 1920. Why should the electors of St. Antoine, Montreal, be disfranchised? Why has the resignation of Sir Herbert Ames been kept secret and withheld? I am sure that it must have been intercepted on its way to Your Honour, because you could not have it in your hands without acting upon it—but that is always the humiliating method of avoiding an election and evading a defeat. Shall this be permitted to continue? Will the Canadian people stand for that much longer? Sir, the Government does not own the people of Canada, body and soul, by feudal right.

My right hon. friend, in his characteristic way, discarded as ridiculous and unworthy of attention the argument that the Government must not only have the support of a majority in the House, but must also have the confidence of the people, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) followed in the same vein. I take issue with my right hon. friend and these hon. gentlemen. It is in direct violation of the spirit and traditions of the British constitution that a Parliament should continue its existence when it is clear that it no longer represents, carries the support, or enjoys the confidence of the people. Against the opinion of the Canadian Prime Minister, who struggles frantically to remain in office against the will of the country—and the Minister of Militia issued yesterday a challenge that I shall now take up—I shall oppose the opinion of a great British Prime Minister, who, placed in similar though less unfavourable circumstances, deemed it his duty to let the people rule and select a government which had their confidence. To the Meighenian—if my hon. friend will permit me to use the expression—views of the duty of a constitutional Prime Minister, I shall oppose the Gladstonian standard. Mr. Gladstone had been returned to office at the election of 1868, and in 1873, two years before the expiration of the mandate of that parliament, seeing that the by-elections were going against the government, and that he did not carry any longer the support of the majority of the people of Britain, he dissolved Parliament and Mr. Disraeli was returned by a large majority. Mr. Gladstone took his seat in the British House of Commons as the leader of the Opposition, and you will permit me to read a few words which he uttered in his speech on the Address in the next session following the election. You will find those words at page 80 of the Debates of the British Parliament of March, 1874, volume 218:

My hon. friend seems to think that there is but one important element in the position of a government, and that is the numerical amount of its majority. Now, upon that point I join issue with my hon. friend. I think he fundamentally misunderstands the constitution of this country if he supposes that the actual majority that a government may possess in an existing House of Commons is sufficient to give it more moral and political strength for the discharge of its arduous duties, after it has become apparent or when it is becoming clear that the possession of that majority is not agreeable to the sense and the convictions of the country. Now, Sir, there is the whole difference between my hon. friend and myself.

Further, on page 81, he says:

Because in this country we watch the signs and currents of public opinion. We recognize the general title of the country to be governed in conformity with its wishes and its intelligence; and the mere possession of a parliamentary majority, satisfactory as it is when it is a true indication of the actual current of feeling and opinion of the country, is no adequate support and no adequate warrant for the continuance of a government in office if it has become clear, or when there is reasonable ground for supposing that the desires of the country are in an opposite direction.

On page 84 here is what he says:

Yet, as an Englishman, as one attached to the institutions of the country, and as one who held an office which bound him to regard the principles of the constitution, I cannot regret a dissolution which has given to the people of this country an opportunity of pronouncing their opinion upon the conduct of affairs, though I think the judgment which has been passed is an erroneous one.

Gladstone spoke as an Englishman and I commend his words to both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia and Defence. They are repeated by one who is not an Englishman, who has not one drop of Anglo-Saxon blood in his veins, but who is a true lover and admirer of British principles and who wants to uphold them in this country.

Later on in that session, Mr. Gladstone was still being attacked in the British House of Commons for having so dissolved Parliament two years before the expiration of his Parliamentary term and so brought on an election in which he was defeated. I wish to quote only a very few words which the House will find on page 1126 of the same volume of the British Hansard. Mr. Gladstone said:

Therefore, my regret is, not that the dissolution took place when it did, but that it did not take place before, for I am not willing to hold office under any circumstances, with a minority either in this House or the country. It is repugnant to my feelings, and not compatible with the best interests of the country that a Government should continue to govern, even with a numerical majority, when its strength is falling away, and when there are daily increasing evidences that it no longer represents the will and opinions of the constituencies. That is the regret of which I have to make a frank expression. Had I known as well as I know now what was to take place, it would not have been upon the 24th of January or the 24th of December, nor upon any day in January or December, but at a much earlier period, that my colleagues and myself would have advised the Crown to dissolve.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) the other day, and the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) yesterday stated that the opinions which we have quoted in this debate were the opinions of men who were out and wanted to go in, in which, they said, they were like members on this side. The words of Mr. Gladstone were uttered after the election, not for the purpose of getting in, as those hon. gentlemen said, but to explain why he had advised the Crown to dissolve, namely, because it was made clear to him that the majority of the people of the country were opposed to his continuing in office. This is the first precedent.

The Minister of Militia and Defence quoted as a precedent the Government of 1892 to 1895 when Mr. Gladstone had withdrawn and had been replaced by Lord Rosebery. It is true Mr. John Redmond presented to the British House of Commons a motion asking for dissolution of Parliament in 1895, but at that time, what were the conditions? The British Parliament had three years of existence, and out of, I think, nine by-elections which had taken place, the Government had gained and had lost and the net gain to the Opposition was only three seats in the House of Commons. Is there any similarity to the position of a Government which had a majority of seventy in this House, which majority is reduced to twenty-three? Yet, this is what Mr. Balfour said in the British House of Commons on that occasion:

I have never observed in the history of this country that any party or any Government have gained credit for hanging on to office in the vulgar sense, without power, and with only the insignia of office—for hanging on to their places when they were deprived of all real influence over the course of events, and when the general trend of opinion was against them. Under such circumstances, a Government may possibly do good administrative work; it may possibly continue to hold its tenure of office for one month, two months, or even for a year or more, but you will never find, in the history of this country, that this had the result of increasing the credit of a Government with those in whose favour their fortunes must ultimately rest.

In 1895, Lord Salisbury was returned to power with a large majority, and in 1900, there was held that election which was referred to by the Minister of Militia and Defence as the "Khaki" election. This was during the latter part of the South African war. Two years afterwards, Lord Salisbury resigned and was replaced by Mr. Balfour, and then by-elections began to go against the Conservative or Unionist administration of Britain. I will quote the words of two of the leading English statesmen of that time as I find their utterances recorded in volume 150 of the British Hansard. This is what Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman said, as reported at page 71:

It is common for us to say, and it is true constitutionally, that the Minister of the Crown in this country is selected and appointed because he is the man who commands a majority in the House of Commons. But what does that mean? It means that the command of the majority of the House represents the feeling of the country. The moment the House of Commons gets out of touch and harmony with the country, then that plea for retaining office dissolves; and the right hon. gentleman has no right to entrench himself behind the confidence and support of his friends here after it is known to all mankind and to himself, as well as to any of them, that he has lost the confidence of the country. When I say it is known to himself, it is obviously so, because, if he was not aware he had lost the confidence of the country, why should he show any reluctance to appeal to the country and immensely strengthen his position by securing a favourable verdict from it?

In the same debate, at page 117, Sir Edward Gray is reported as making this statement, speaking of the right hon. Mr. Balfour:

Does he expect to get any good result in Parliament from prolonging the life of the present Government? The last election took place upon the war, and it could not have counted as an ordinary election. To all intents and purposes this House of Commons is ten years old. Does the Prime Minister suppose he can restore it to a vigorous and healthy condition now? He knows he cannot, and the House knows he cannot, because they know it is out of touch with the country as a whole. The longer the Government attempts to go on keeping the House of Commons working, the more they will damage the House of Commons as an institution, and the longer they go on, I sincerely hope and trust, the greater will be the resentment of the country when they have the courage to appeal to it.

My hon. friend the Minister of Militia slipped very quickly over this precendent, and he was in error in the last part of his statement with regard to it. These words were uttered in July 1905, and five months afterwards, on the 4th of December, 1905, two years before the expiration of the parliamentary term Mr. Balfour did not dissolve parliament but resigned his position as Prime Minister. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman was called upon to form a ministry on the 5th of December, 1905. The elections were held in January, 1906, and the government of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman was returned by a large majority. There is one feature, however, of the precendents quoted by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia with reference to the government of Lord Rosebery in 1895, and the government of Mr. Balfour in 1905 which will be followed in this country, and it is this: Both these governments were defeated and swept out of office when the electors had a chance to pronounce their opinion. I have quoted the opinion of leaders in the public life of Great Britain, and I may say that on the principle there is no difference of opinion. They may have differed as to whether the circumstances at different periods justified the application of the principle, but on the principle itself they all agreed. I shall now quote the opinion of constitutional writers. I call your attention to what Sir William Anson says in his "Law and Custom of the Constitution" at page 372:

We must not forget that the possible violation of the laws is not the only reason why a Ministry should retire when it is shown to have lost the confidence of the House or the country. Ministers are not only Ministers of the Queen, they represent the public opinion of the United Kingdom; when they cease to impersonate public opinion they become a mere group of personages who must stand or fall by the prudence of their action. They may have to deal with disorders at home or hostile manifestations abroad; they will have to meet these with the knowledge that they have not the confidence or support of the country; and their opponents at home and abroad would know this too.

Professor Dicey in his "Law of the Constitution" says:

The reason why the House can, in accordance with the constitution, be deprived of existence is that an occasion has arisen on which there is fair reason to suppose that the opinion of the House is not the opinion of the electors. A dissolution is allowable or necessary whenever the wishes of the Legislature are or may fairly be presumed to be different from the wishes of the nation . . . . The essential point to notice is the principle that the authority which ultimately determines the right of a Cabinet to retain office is the nation. The authority of the House of Commons is derived from its representing the will of the nation, and the chief object of a dissolution is to ascertain that the will of Parliament coincides with the will of the nation . . . . The precedents show that in modern times the rules as to the dissolution of Parliament are like other conventions of the Constitution, intended to secure the ultimate supremacy of the electorate as the true political authority of the State.

The constitutional historian, Mr. J. R. Green, writes as follows:

A minister availing himself of the temper of a parliament elected in some moment of popular panic, and refusing to appeal to the country would be, even if legal, a criminal.

I would advise my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, if he were here, to be more careful in issuing challenges. Of course, I cannot quote an instance which is analogous to the present, of a government changing its membership, forming a new administration, selecting a new leader, forming a new party, formulating a new platform, as was done in July, 1920, and not going to the country. There is nothing similar in British history, because it never was done. My hon. friend, if I may be allowed to call him so, though he is no longer a member of this House, the late member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), said:

> There is no precedent in history of a group of men holding up two parties and running away with the government.

Those words are not mine but they will serve to show that it is rather difficult to find a situation quite identical to the present one. I will quote another instance, a very recent one, which took place in one of the British dominions. Last year, I think it was in May or June, 1920, General Smuts, the prime minister of South Africa, was returned to office under peculiar circumstances at a general election. He was the leader of a party called the South African party.

That party elected 44 members to the House. There was the Nationalist party under General Hertzog, which also secured 44 seats in the House of Representatives. There was another party, the Unionist party, under Sir Thomas Smart, which elected 25 members. And finally there was the Labour party with a membership of 21. General Smuts had no majority over all the other parties combined, but he succeeded in enlisting the support of the Unionist party, and to a large extent of the Labour party, and managed to carry on the affairs of the Commonwealth without any great difficulty. Indeed, he had a good majority in the House. But after the session was over he considered that those conditions were rather precarious and he tried to form an alliance with the Nationalist party. A conference was held, but the extremists of the Nationalist party could not modify their views to a sufficient extent to allow General Smuts and themselves to co-operate. Then he made an appeal to Sir Thomas Smart of the Unionist party and succeeded in forming a new permanent party which has retained the name of the South African party but of which Sir Thomas Smart and his Unionist followers are members. General Smuts had a majority in the House of Representatives of South Africa. But what did General Smuts do? He had no mandate from the people of South Africa to carry on the affairs of the country with a new party formed of a combination of the South African party and the Unionist party. General Smuts is a Liberal; General Smuts is a statesman; General Smuts is a great British constitutionalist; and he found that it was his duty to secure a mandate from the people of South Africa. Yet, from his point of view, it was a dangerous course to pursue; it was a very close fight. But it is always safer to trust the people, and General Smuts to-day is Premier of South Africa, and when he proceeds to the Imperial Conference in June he will go there speaking in no unmistakable way as the representative of the South African people.

This leads me to say a word or two with regard to the Imperial Conference. The conference has been heralded, promised, postponed, and finally called. It is to be a gathering of momentous importance. The destinies of Canada, the national status of Canada, and questions of most vital and sacred interest to this nation, are to be discussed. Problems of extreme gravity, the solution of which may involve tremendous responsibility on our part, will be brought before that conference. Just to show that I am not exaggerating, I shall read the very words that are used in the calling together of this conference. Here they are:

> The Dominions are invited to attend the Imperial Conference in June on the lines of the Imperial War Cabinet Meetings which took place in 1917 and 1918, to deal with the many urgent problems of common interest which call for the co-ordination of policy and action by the different governments of the Empire.

From the speech from the Throne delivered a few days ago in the British Parliament I extract the following words:

> I hope the Prime Ministers of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Newfoundland, as well as the representatives of India, will be able to visit London during the coming summer. I am confident that discussions that will take place during their visits will be of the utmost value in bringing about co-ordination, both in the external and internal policy of the Empire.

Mr. Lloyd George, the British Premier, speaking in the House of Commons, is reported in the Montreal Star, of February 16, 1921, as follows:

> Mr. Lloyd George speaking in the House last evening declared that it was too much to ask of these small Islands that they undertake the whole burden of the defence of a gigantic Empire in every sea, and that at the forthcoming conference of Prime Ministers of the Dominions in London the whole problem of Imperial Defence must be considered. There must be, the Prime Miister went on, co-ordination not only between the various services, but between the several parts of the Empire. Mr. Lloyd George stated that the Conference of Empire Premiers to be held in London in June will be the most momentous event in the history of the Empire.

Now, Sir, after having read that extract, standing here to-day in this Canadian Parliament, fully conscious of the responsibility that attaches to my words, I emphatically state that the gentlemen who pretend to govern Canada at the present time have no right to represent our country at that conference, because they do not enjoy its confidence and are not entitled to speak the national voice; and we will not consider ourselves bound, either legally or morally, by any decision or agreement which they may reach there. It may be said that any such decision will have to be ratified by the Parliament of Canada before it can become binding. But, Sir, the deliberations and discussions that precede the decision are important, and Canadians have the right to confer, deliberate, and discuss matters with the statesmen of the various sister nations of the British Commonwealth, through representatives who carry the support and enjoy the confidence of our people. It has been stated in the press, and indeed my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice clearly suggested it in this House last year, that representatives of the Opposition might be invited to attend the conference as associates of those representing the Government. Sir, I do not hesitate to say—and I know that in this statement I voice the views of my hon. leader in this respect—that no such proposal can be entertained. It would be a mere subterfuge for the purpose of giving to the Government a semblance of authority; it would be, on the part of the Opposition, the mere lending of itself to a violation of the rights of the people. The people of Canada have the right to be represented there by a Government which has its support and confidence. It has the right to be represented by men delegated by a Parliament which has a clear mandate, and has been elected in a regular and constitutional way. What authority and influence is attached to the representatives who would propose to negotiate in the name of a country which loses no opportunity of repudiating them with all the power of which it is capable? You would not negotiate on a weak foundation, or rather on no foundation at all, and the other parties to the negotiations know the political conditions prevailing in this country. Will you let me read what the Canadian correspondent of the London Times, a Tory if I am not mistaken, sent to that paper and which appeared in the Times edition of January 7th:

Empire Peace Cabinet—Strong Canadian Opinions.

(From our Canadian correspondent.)

The Prime Minister of the Dominion will not discuss the attitude of Canada toward proposals which may be submitted to the meeting of Empire Prime Ministers in June next. Mr. Meighen succeeded to office only a few months ago. Since then there has been a re-organization of the Cabinet, and another re-organization is imminent.

It follows from all this that there is nothing very constructive in proposals from Canada for the Empire Peace Cabinet. No doubt naval defence will be considered, but for the time Canada is reluctant to shoulder new or heavy obligations. The political outlook is uncertain, the government is troubled by the difficulty and complexity of domestic problems, and ministers have still to determine their own attitude towards many questions of national as well as of Imperial concern.

I say, Sir, that it is the clear duty of the Government to let the people elect a new Parliament, select a Government which possesses its confidence, before any gentlemen undertake to proceed to the Imperial Conference and speak on behalf of Canada. Let us set our own house in order before undertaking to rebuild the British Empire or attempting to modify the constitutional structure of other nations. Let us first purify our own political atmosphere and clear away this abnormal parliament which in no way reflects the safe, sane, sober and normal opinion of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken much too long, although I would like to express now my views about some of the matters which are to come up at the Imperial Conference. I believe, however, that having by an amendment challenged the right of this Parliament to legislate under the circumstances, we must first take the sense of the House before discussing the problems of the day. I was surprised to hear some gentlemen in this House blame the leader of the Opposition for having acted as he did. I would simply advise them to consult Bourinot, page 97, and they will see that the course followed by the leader of the Opposition was the legal and constitutional course to adopt.

In bringing my remarks to a conclusion I appeal to hon. gentlemen—though I am not greatly confident that my appeal will be heeded by all—to yield to the clamour of the people and restore to the Canadian democracy full control over its political institutions. Members of the Government, especially the Minister of Immigration and Colonization, have told us on previous occasions, have painted a very deplorable picture, of the arduous duties of Ministers of the Crown, of how much work they have to do and the sacrifices they have made. Sir, the people everywhere feel that the crown of martyrdom is too heavy for my right hon. friend and his associates. They all want to give them a rest. I invite the Prime Minister to recall those words of Lincoln which would certainly apply to our present political situation:

> In this age and in this country public sentiment is everything. With it nothing can fail, against it nothing can succeed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Two references in the speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) make it highly essential, I think, that the position of the Chair should be stated clearly and beyond all question. First with respect to the ruling given by the Chair when the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) was speaking. That ruling merely had reference to the well-known rule of the House that an hon. member alluding in debate to another hon. member should do so as the member for a certain constituency, and not refer to him by name. My ruling on that occasion had no reference whatever to the point as to whether the late Minister of Finance is or is not a member of this House. In any event the ruling of the Chair would have no bearing upon that question; but inasmuch as there is no official intimation before me that the seat in question has been vacated I felt that even although the subject might be open to question it was far better to refer to the late Minister of Finance as the member for Leeds.

The second reference to which I wish to allude has to do with the statement credited to the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) that his resignation was in the Speaker's hands. The House will at once realize that it would never do for the impression to go abroad that the Speaker was a party to withholding a document of that character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: I therefore deem it my duty to make it clear to the House that I have not in my possession the resignation of the member for St. Antoine nor have I ever received a document which was, or which purported to be, the resignation of his seat in this House. I thought it undesirable to interrupt the hon. member for Quebec East while he was speaking, but I felt that at the earliest possible moment the House should be apprised of these facts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I desire to repeat what I said in the course of my speech that I knew that such resignation had not reached Your Honour's hands, and it must have been withheld on its way.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, the brilliant lawyer and parliamentarian who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lapointe) occupied many minutes of the time of the House in recalling the deeds of some of my ancestors many of whom have been dead for fifty years. It was intensely interesting to me to hear what these fine fellows did but I am more interested to-day in the question, "Where are we going from here, and what are we going to do?" than in what other men did fifty years ago. If there ever was a time when the people are asking "Where are we going from here, what is your platform?" it is to-day? They are asking these questions in a manner more intensely earnest than ever before.

Following the time honoured custom, Sir, permit me to offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. They did their work ably, conscientiously and effectively, I should like to say to my hon. friend the mover of the Address (Mr. McIsaac) that from the first day he appeared in this House he always seemed to know his own mind, always knew the way he was going to vote, and loyally followed his leader. Perhaps being more of a pathfinder myself, I can appreciate what loyalty and service of this kind mean better than some others; therefore I congratulate the hon. gentleman and his constituents, and I hope that he will be long spared to represent them and to support his leader loyally in this House.

To my hon. friend the seconder of the Address (Mr. MacKelvie) I wish to convey my opinion that his speech was the most eloquent maiden effort that I have yet heard; and that I was not alone in thinking this is apparent from the words of the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) who twitted my hon. friend slightly on falling under the influence of the apple. It is well known,

I think, to all hon. members who have long been in this House that the hon. member from Cape Breton has himself for many years been under the subtle influence of iron and steel in his own province, and apparently that was his Scotch way of complimenting the hon. member for Yale.

To my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) I would say that he has reached his high office through no assistance of mine—not wittingly at least. But, on the other hand, I am very glad to be able to congratulate him and Canada and myself on his becoming Prime Minister. If ever there was a time when the people were looking for clean-cut, open-hearted talking so that they can get at the facts, in my judgment, Sir, it is now. From the first day that my right hon. friend became leader of this Government there was no doubt in my mind where he stood on the tariff question, and I do not think there was any doubt in the minds of any other Canadians. I believe that his unequivocal stand has had a good effect all over the country, because the people are looking for the truth. And at least his definite announcement of where he stood on the tariff question cleared away any doubts in my own mind on the subject, and I stand before you to-day, Sir, transformed, so far as Canada is concerned, from the nebulous free trader of a year ago, into as clean-cut and as unequivocal a protectionist on principle as the right hon. the leader of the Government himself.

It might not be without interest to some hon. members to follow the steps by which I reached this conclusion. It was quite unexpected in my own mind. In fact, the statement of the right hon. the leader of the Government came to me as a direct challenge, which I accepted as such, and I started out to collect a bundle of facts with which to bombard the right hon. gentleman this session, but I had not got very far in my search before I discovered that I was collecting two sets of facts. I found, almost without exception, that it was hard to discover a first class political economist who did not, at least in theory, agree with the principles of free trade. On the other hand, I found, with one notable exception —my native land—that practically the whole civilized world was protectionist. That, to my mind, was just as much a fact as the other, and had to be dealt with as such. I started in to find the reasons for that condition of affairs, and for a while I put it down to original sin and went on building up my platform. I got quite a bundle of facts bolstering up my free trade platform, but when I turned them over I found original sin there, and something told me that if I came to this House with such a theory I would get punctured. So I had to find some better reason, and the conclusion I came to was that men do not accept free trade principles for about the same reason that they do not practice religion. But it is the fact, that they are afraid to do so, and the reasons of their fear are so real and so apparent that to refuse to acknowledge them is to be irrational. People still lock their doors when they go away. There is a reason for it—there are thugs in the world. But it took me some time to reach that conclusion—and after the most eloquent speech of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) yesterday, I think hon. members will understand what I was up against, because free trade, whatever else it has been, whether it is right or whether it is wrong, has undoubtedly been a great success in England.

But I had to find out why all other countries had not adopted something which has been such a great success in England, and for a while I was stuck, but eventually I played that old children's game which my grandchildren are now starting to play —I pretended. I pretended first I was a Frenchman—I stepped across the Atlantic and I looked at the world from the other side; then I pretended I was a German; later on I pretended I was an American; later than that I pretended I was a Canadian; later even than that I pretended I was a Canadian farmer; later even than that I pretended I was a Canadian manufacturer; later even than that, Mr. Speaker, I imagined I was a Canadian statesman; and, last of all, I stepped out of those shoes and got into the shoes of a man of the world—I tried to look at the world from the shoes of a man of the world in a world of men, and the results were extraordinary.

The first great discovery I made was that for thirty long years I had been looking at the question of free trade, thinking the group thoughts of the men with whom I was raised in my early days, and whose interest, I can now clearly see, it was to be free traders. For thirty years I had been thinking on this subject as an Englishman rather than as a Canadian. And the next great discovery I made was that while free trade was undoubtedly to the best interests of the British people themselves, it by no means followed that it was in the best interests of the people of other countries differently situated.

Another point of view was brought to my attention during my plan of campaign. It did not come in a day, it did not come in a week, it did not come in a month; it took time to reach my present conclusions. I wondered where we were going from here, because my constituents are going to ask that question. I will have to answer it, and every hon. gentleman in this House will have to answer it. I thought, now, looking back over the ages, what has been the progress of men as men. We are undoubtedly better off to-day than our cave-dwelling ancestors were; no sane men in this age would like to exchange places with them. It is a long step from Stonehenge to Westminster; it is a long step from the trade and commerce of Lower Canada, where rum was the chief article of barter, to this honourable House, with its stringent dry laws. We have passed over a very hard road, but we have made very real progress. I do not know whether I ever told you the story before, Mr. Speaker, but once on leave I was invited to Scotland. Almost the first thing, my host, being a Scotchman, pointed out to me, with some considerable detail—more than I thought was necessary at the time—was the battlefield of Bannockburn. He said: "This is where my ancestors whaled the stuffing out of yours." But I had just come from the other side, where Scotchmen and Englishmen and Canadians and Frenchmen and Australians and New Zealanders were standing shoulder to shoulder. The English and the Scotch had had their fight and had shaken hands, and now they were fighting in a common cause.

That, Mr. Speaker, has been the history of the progress of the world. What is the lesson of the war? It is absolutely this, that no country, no matter how big or how well organized, can to-day stand alone. Every soldier who left Canada knows deep down in his heart that Canada alone could not have won the war. Great Britain alone could not have won the war; every soldier who fought over there knows it, just as he knows that no country can to-day stand alone. We passed that stage years ago.

It is here, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to make a reference to a remark made by the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), who, I regret to say, is not at the moment in his seat. The hon. gentleman says that Canada never will do this and never will do that, but the time has long since passed when he or any other member can say what Canada never will do or never shall do. The member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who is not now in his seat, I regret to say, asked the right hon. leader of the Government the other day what certain words of Lloyd George meant. I say to him that the words of Lloyd George mean exactly what they say, and the sooner he or other hon. gentlemen who have aspirations to leadership in this country find that out, the better—it is their job. There is no excuse for ignorance in this matter; you can find it out for a five cent stamp, and they will be glad to tell you.

Now, with the permission of the House, I wish to read a short extract from an article which is entitled "The Yellow Peril." The writer says:

> Let us take the broadest possible view of the racial map of the globe as it existed before the recent war. Out of a total number of human beings amounting to 1,700,000,000, 550,000,000 were white, 1,150,000,000 were coloured. Thus the coloured races out-numbered the whites more than two to one. The white world consists of Europe, North America, the southern part of South America, the Siberian portion of Asia, and Australasia. The coloured world consists of the bulk of Asia, virtually the whole of Africa, and most of Central and South America.

This is the point to which I wish to direct attention:

> The great bulk of the white race is concentrated in the European continent, and in 1914, before the war, the population of Europe was approximately 450,000,000. Four-fifths of the entire white race lives on less than one-fifth of the white world's territorial area. The remaining one-fifth is scattered to the ends of the earth, doing their best to hold the tide of colour. A century ago the impulse of the white race rolled aggressively eastward; precisely the opposite condition now prevails. The white races are more or less in an attitude of defence against the tremendous wave that is beating on their shores, a wave that is likely to become more tremendous now that the yellow races have learned so much in the course of our lamentable war.

I leave to the imagination of hon. gentlemen what will happen to this continent of America if the powerful white races of Europe are permitted to disintegrate. Four hundred and fifty millions live there; one hundred millions, odd, live here. What will happen? Millions of these colored men to-day are on the move. At least sixty millions of them are among the most efficient and modern fighters in the world. Mr. Speaker, I claim no great superiority for the white race. For the existence of every one of the great religions, including the Christian, under whose flag I have the honour to stand to-night, the white man is indebted to men of colour—and it owes them much besides. On the other hand, the white race can give much to the coloured races. I could not help thinking when my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) was speaking on the League of Nations, that if we could only have with us to-day that learned and distinguished Chinaman to whom he referred, he would agree that it would be far better if we could bring his people up to our standard rather than that they should bring ours down to theirs.

There is not the slightest doubt in my mind—and I believe there is not the slightest doubt in the mind of any thinking man—that one more war like the last, or one more fight between the white races, will settle this civilization and settle it for good. While I am quite sure that the interests of Canada, of the United States, of England, of Europe, are absolutely one, it does not matter what I believe or what I think; it is what the other fellow thinks and believes that counts. So far as we are concerned, Canada is to-day a nation. The time is coming, and it is not in the far distant future, when Canada will have to make up her mind whether she will take the white man's road, with or without the assistance of America, just as she did in the war.

This brings me to the question of the markets of the world, about which we have heard so much during this debate. My hon. friend from Marquette looks with longing eyes to the big market to the south of us. So do I, and God grant that he will be able to build up a good big trade down there; it is a thing we all want to do. He says they have 120,000,000 people down there and hope to have 200,000,000 in so many years. But let us have a look at Europe. There is a market there, too, for she has 400,000,000 people to-day—not to-morrow or at some distant time in the future—400,000,000 people who need everything that this country produces in order that they may be brought back to normal conditions. If we permit them to disintegrate, we are ruined; the white race is ruined. Is not that a market worth cultivating, too? Is not the cultivation of that market a job worthy of any man or of any nation? I think so. Let me tell the House about that little island across the sea whose success was so ably presented yesterday by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark). That little island to-day produces for export practically nothing but coal; the reason why she can send her ships to all parts of the world and bring back produce is that she can load her ships both ways, and she is the only country on earth that can do that. That is what ruined Germany. Germany tried to grow wheat and to force her manufactured goods on other countries. She gave three years' credit to niggers because she could not afford to take their products back. What would become of our wheat if England were to produce wheat? As I have said, England produces for export practically nothing but coal; she sacrificed the development of her agricultural industry because she wanted to become a manufacturing nation with world-wide markets. It is or has been in her interest to have free trade. Let us take a look at this big market to the south of us. It is not a little island twenty-one miles away from a market of 400,000,000 white men, but it is a large continent producing almost everything that modern man requires, with the exception of tea and coffee. I can think of no other product that man wants that she does not produce in quantities. Which of these countries is likely, in the ordinary course of events, to be the best market for this country, and which country has been the best in the past? Without bothering the House with a lot of figures which I obtained from the statistical office and which, with the permission of the House, I will place on Hansard, I will briefly state that the exports in the last twenty years from Canada to Great Britain exceeded the exports from Canada to the United States by $1,807,604,367. That is the history of the past.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. gentleman that it is only with the unanimous consent of the House that a set of figures can be placed on Hansard if they are not read in the House. I will, therefore, ask the House if the hon. member may have leave to place the figures on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

There should be no difference of opinion as to which would be likely to become the best market—200,000,000 people against 400,000,000—and there would be no difference of opinion, except for two things. The first is the will of our people—we cannot do anything without their will—and the second is Canada's enthusiastic desire to remain a nation. I have endeavoured, as best I know how, to come to a sane conclusion, but I must at this point absolutely disagree with my hon. friends to my left. This pamphlet which I hold in my hand is called the "New National Policy as adopted by the Organized Farmers of Canada in the Farmers' platform drafted and issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture at Winnipeg on November 29, 1918," and in it, at page 13, I find the following:

> By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

That is their platform, and while a year ago I would have jumped at it, today, I am not in favour of free trade in one year or five years with Great Britain or any other country on earth, without a quid pro quo. My reasons are briefly these. The whole foundation of our present society in Canada rests upon the tariff, and if we take away the tariff, the whole structure will fall down. I will support that contention by recounting one solitary statement of fact, given in sworn evidence before the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) this summer. If my memory serves me right, the subject under discussion was Yale locks, and the manager told the Minister of Finance that it cost him 40 per cent more to manufacture these locks in Canada than it did in the plant of the parent company in the United States. The Minister of Finance was apparently astonished and he asked: "How do you account for that?" Like a flash came the answer: "We have in the parent company in the United States one machine that cost $60,000 and which performs one function. It will perform that function for all the keys in Canada in one week and it will stand idle here for fifty-one weeks in the year." In other words, while you can have a $100,000 machine in a country with a population of 100,000,000, you cannot have a $100,000 machine in a country with a population of 8,000,000.

It has been said that the tariff has been abused, but that is no argument against the principle of protection. Even if the tariff has been abused, I have just this to say on that subject: We are still a nation of men; we are not absolutely at the mercy of all the organizations that like to put up prices. Like myself all the other members of the House have thought this matter out and I will, therefore, not take up a minute of the time of the House in discussing it; but I have just this to say, that while protection may not always protect and while it may have sometimes been abused, as I believe it has, we are still a democratic people; we are self-contained, and when we make up our minds to get after these people, such a movement cannot be withstood and these people will stand at the bar of outraged public opinion. If any man is taking advantage of my patriotism or the patriotism of other Canadian men who desire to be self-reliant, then some day he will answer for his action.

In conclusion, free trade as practised in England has proved to be no panacea for unrest, no panacea for profiteering, and no panacea for war. In fact, I believe the fierce competition for foreign markets, which was so ably described yesterday, had a great deal to do with bringing about the war. Until a few years ago, it was almost universally believed that to maintain peace you had to prepare for war and to have big armaments. Some people believe it to-day, but millions of people know that it is a lie. Millions of women know that it is a lie; millions of soldiers know that it is a lie. We have had the biggest preparation for peace in the shape of war material, the world has ever seen, yet we have had the bloodiest war, and in the knowledge that it is no guarantee of peace, no panacea, lies, to my mind, the hope of the world. If you once get enough people making up their minds that a certain thing is desirable, they are going to get it; they always have got it, and when there are two roads, one leading to destruction and absolute annihilation—that is war—and some other road, if you can get enough people looking for that other road they will find it. Here is a ray of hope. Already there has been published in the last year a book by a Major Douglas. I have not the time nor the ability to review his book, but I have read it, and can commend it to every hon. gentleman in this House, and to every banker and every labouring man in this country. It is not Bolshevism; it is not Socialism; it does not pull down, but it does show a way whereby we can build up and avoid war.

I think the members of our Government who attended the Peace Conference have caught the spirit of this new day too. I listened with great joy to the eloquent words of the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) when he told us that at this meeting of the League of Nations, Canada was there as a nation in reality and in truth, and that she was a stronger nation for her connection with the British Empire. I also listened to the words of the hon. member for Durham, the ex-President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), who in no uncertain words said: "The world is on the march and Canada is in the van." Thank God for that. We are not hanging back and letting George do it.

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the amendment. I want to point out to hon. members that while we have hopes of a better day Douglas's plan is not yet in existence, and I am quite sure the millennium is not here; but we have got the amendment. That, I think, will bring almost any man out of the clouds. It did not take me very long to make up my mind what I was going to do with respect to it, but it did make me think a little bit just the same. I asked myself the questions: What are you here for? Who sent you? What is your job? And I came to the conclusion that I had been sent here under very definite instructions to carry out what was the real issue—the Conscription Act. I do not know what all my constituents thought on all the planks that have been carried out by the Government since, but on that one issue there is no doubt in the world where they stood, because it was the sole topic in my election. I came down here to help push that thing through with all my force, and I did it. I believed in it, and I have this to say about that Act. If we have another war, we will have conscription not only of the men from 18 to 25, but of every man in this country, and in saying that I have not the faintest doubt that I represent the overwhelming opinion among the men who fought in the war. This idea of letting a few men do it—"letting George do it"—is played out. The next thing that I came down to do, in my opinion, at least, was to see that the men who were crippled and the widows and orphans of the war got all this country could afford to pay them. I made up my mind to fight for them. The next thing—well, perhaps the less said about that the better.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that if ever there was a time when the people wanted to know what they were up against, it is now. The first requisite of an appeal to the country at the present time is a definite, clear-cut issue, and on the fiscal policy, if possible, so far as I am concerned. This the leader of the Opposition is apparently determined we shall not have. The next requisite to my mind, is a fair redistribution of seats. This the leader of the Opposition also firmly declines to have. If we do not have redistribution before the election we will have, in effect, more people disfranchised five times over than were disfranchised in 1917. We should certainly have at least one or the other of these requisites, if not both, namely, a clear-cut issue and representation by population. I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM ASBURY BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I usually speak briefly, but I question very much whether I can conclude my remarks in the short space of time remaining before the House will adjourn for this sitting, but I do not object to making a start and then adjourning the debate. In the effort to condense my remarks I cannot avoid saying what has been said by other speakers in the debate, and that is a word of congratulation to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen), I am going to say that I thought so highly of the Prime Minister at the time, not because I agreed with his policy or his past course, but of the man personally, that I sent him my congratulations while I was travelling west on the train. I want to say this of the Prime Minister, and it is something that has not been mentioned. He has demonstrated during the time I have been in parliament real industry, and in that respect he is an example especially to the younger men who come into this House, because if we do not display industry we will not get very far. The Prime Minister has been a remarkable example of tireless industry.

What I have arisen for is largely to explain my position. Still, I question very much whether there is any reason why I should explain it, because last year when sitting on the Government side of the House, I expressed my own views on public questions. In order to have more freedom, and especially since a new government, with a new leader, had been formed—I would not say a new policy had been announced—I felt I would be much freer in what has been termed No Man's Land. First of all, I want to say that from the beginning, and for months prior to the formation of the Union Government, I was an advocate of a Union Government, and when the Union Government was formed I supported it for the purposes for which it was formed, and that was for the conduct of the war. I agree entirely with the position that has been taken by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). I went back from this city in 1917 to my constituency, and my old party friends supported me because I told them I was supporting conscription, and supporting Union Government, to carry out that policy and all other necessary war measures, but that in every other respect I was adhering to the principles I had always advocated in this House.

That is my position to-day, and for that reason I am not prepared to support the Government that has been constituted since the last session of Parliament. The people returned to power in 1917 a Government headed by the late Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). The Prime Minister who led that Government has resigned, and a new Prime Minister with a new policy and a new name for his party has assumed office. Now, holding the views I do, I cannot accept the policy of that party, though I have the very highest admiration for its leader. My judgment is that the people in 1917, when they voted for the candidates in that election, voted with a war mind. The war was the foremost question in their minds, and consequently their decision was based upon their desire to win the war, and with no thought whatever about the domestic problems that might develop as a result of the war. That being the case, the people should have an opportunity of expressing themselves on the policies that are uppermost at the present moment, the domestic questions that are engaging their attention just now. A Government that satisfied the people on war issues may not satisfy them on peace issues; they may differ entirely in their views in these two respects. As I said, I did not abandon the views I held in peace times; I consider that we have again reached the peace stage and I therefore, stand by the principles which I advocated in the past.

Another thing that we should keep in mind is the fact that spart from the selection of a new leader, the constitution of a new party, and the outlining of what has been called a new platform, there are other reasons, why the people should have an opportunity to express their views at the present time. The official Opposition has a new leader, and there has come into existence an entirely new party with a platform. Why should not the people be given an opportunity to express their opinion on the merits of the respective parties that exist to-day? May I say, at this juncture, that we have not had an election in Canada on purely domestic problems since 1911? Ten years have elapsed since we have had an election in which the issues of ordinary times could be discussed and decided. The only election we have had between 1911 and the present date was the election of 1917, which was fought out entirely on a war issue, and it is very important at the present time that an election should be held. My attitude last session, to which I still adhere, was that it was possible to have a census and redistribution, and to have an election in 1921. I maintained that it was possible to do so if an effort had been made to expedite the census. We could have had early returns of the population of this country and could have had redistribution and an election. My statement at that time was to this effect:

> I believe it would be only necessary to have one session of Parliament following the present session before we could have redistribution and before an appeal could be made to the country on the basis of representation in accordance with the census of 1921.

I am going to be quite frank and say that if the Government give to me and to this House an assurance that they will carry out the purpose of the amendment to the amendment I shall be satisfied for the present. But I go further and say that no contentious questions should be brought up in this House until a redistribution bill has been drafted and we are ready to go to the country. I am put in this position: If I vote for the amendment to the amendment, I am practically saying, and I do say, that it is possible to have a redistribution this year, to have the census taken, and to have an election. But I know that the Government we have here at the present time must exist to formulate that redistribution, and they may come back and say: "We cannot guarantee that we can carry out what is asked for in the amendment to the amendment; it depends upon whether we have the support of the members."

Naturally, too, it depends upon whether they have my individual support; and I am not prepared to pledge my support to the Government or any party in this House on any question until I know what it is and exactly what is going to be discussed. The Budget debate will come up later if the Government decide to carry out their programme, and if they are going to carry out the policy they have outlined in the address, I am bound to differ from them and, therefore, to vote against them. But I know what will be said. It will be stated that if I want this redistribution before an election I must support the Government in order to get it. Now, I cannot go so far. The Government should give us an assurance of a real desire on their part to provide redistribution this year, to expedite the census, to have an election immediately, and to avoid during this session the discussion of all controversial questions, or give me freedom to act as I think best in the interests of the country.

I believe that Western Canada is entitled to increased representation at this time; but if I must support the Government on other questions in order to keep it in existence so that that representation may be provided, I am placed in a position in which I do not wish to remain. I am not going to tie myself up to any party on any question in order to have something done which I think is necessary at this particular time. I feel that the West would be deprived of its proper representation in this House for probably four or five years if we had not a redistribution, but I do not want to be tongue-tied or to be held down by any promise to support the Government until it decides to have a redistribution and go to the country. If it accepts the proposal that it should go to the country this year under the terms of the amendment to the amendment and along the lines I have mentioned, I shall be satisfied. I am going to try to conclude before the House rises, although I had intended to speak at greater length. However, I can place my views on other matters briefly before the House. I came into this House in 1911 and during all the time I have been a member, I have been an advocate of a clear-cut policy which is in entire contradiction to the views expressed in the address in regard to the tariff. Now, if I accepted the views put forward by the Government in the Address I should be contradicting the position I have taken in this House from 1911 up to the present time. It is not a question of consistency on the part of those who have advocated tariff reduction in the past. The question that concerns me, is: what attitude have I taken; have I been consistent; and do I intend to remain consistent? I am not looking forward to the future, but I intend to remain if I possibly can a consistent advocate of policies which I believe are in the best interests of the country. I know that the Prime Minister has attempted to put all those who believe in a low tariff, or people who believe in freedom of trade, into a certain category, the free trade class. I refuse to be placed there. But I am an advocate of free trade wherever it is in the best interests of the majority of the people. I am in favour of low tariff where it is in the interests of the bulk of the people. I am not prepared to destroy industry and capital, and that is the bugaboo that has always been raised. But I am satisfied that in the budget that will be brought down by the Government the outstanding principles of the national policy will be maintained.

Because we find those men in the country who have long been advocates of high protection loyally supporting the Prime Minister. Well, I cannot join in the support of the Prime Minister along with individuals who agitate high protection; they would not be proper company for me with the views I hold.

Now, having promised the people who returned me in 1917 that I would not abandon the principles that I supported in the past, and having reached the stage where there is a definite declaration on the part of the Government that it is going to adhere entirely to the principle of protection as it has been in existence in this country for forty years, I have come to the parting of the ways. If it is impossible for the Government to concede the point that I have mentioned in connection with redistribution, I cannot possibly vote confidence in a government that expresses opinions of that sort, because I would be declaring confidence in a government in whose principles I did not believe. That would not be fair to the Government, it would not be fair to me, and it would not be fair to the people who have elected me in the past.

And so my position is this: Now that we have passed the war stage and are reaching what we hope are normal times I am still in the position that the Prime Minister was always in and adhering to the views that he advocated prior to the war. That is all. I am there and that is where I intend to remain until I am convinced that I am wrong. Up to the present I have not been so convinced. It was my intention to speak on other questions this afternoon but I shall have an opportunity of doing so later. I shall therefore close my remarks, feeling that I have placed before the House in condensed form my views on the amendments and on the main motion.

Upon Mr. F. F. Pardee (West Lambton) and Mr. F. L. Davis (Neepawa) rising to speak.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for West Lambton has the floor.

Mr. PARDEE: I move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 3, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LAPOINTE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, for the first time in my parliamentary life I rise to a question of privilege. The Ottawa Journal of this morning has, among others, the following headline over a report of the remarks I had the privilege to make in the House yesterday:

> Says Quebec Will Not Abide by Imperial Conference attended by Mr. Meighen.

Mr. Speaker, that is a vicious, misleading statement. I do not think I used the word "Quebec" once during my speech yesterday. I spoke as one of the Canadian representatives, not as one of the Quebec representatives, and if the Ottawa Journal bases its activities on sectionalism, I do not.

THE MEMBER FOR LEEDS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if in the opinion of the Government the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) has not forfeited his right to a seat in this House by virtue of his having accepted a position as one of the arbitrators on the board which is to value the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I do not know that the Government gives legal opinions, especially on the floor of Parliament. If the hon. gentleman will submit his question in the usual way on the Order Paper, he will receive an answer.

RELEASE OF PRISONERS FROM STONY MOUNTAIN PENITENTIARY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): In view of the release of three prisoners from Stony Mountain Penitentiary, may I ask the Minister of Justice if he will lay on the table of the House at the earliest moment the papers in connection with that release?

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I am not aware what prisoners the hon. gentleman refers to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I refer to the three gentlemen who were sent to jail in connection with the Winnipeg strikes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not aware that these gentlemen were released; I shall make inquiry. I understand that they served their time. I may say that the immediate dealing with these matters is at present in the hands of the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie). I may add also that it is a well established practice of this House that papers with regard to releases under the Ticket-of-Leave Act should not be brought down to the House, except, perhaps, in some exceptional cases. The practice has had the sanction of numerous Ministers of Justice, and in particular had the sanction and approval, on an occasion which I remember, of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I do not think it is neecssary now to go into the reasons for that practice—reasons which Parliament has accepted on numerous occasions. However, if there be any papers relating to these cases, I will examine them and see whether there are any which should be brought down.

THE MEMBER FOR ST. ANTOINE, MONTREAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Is the Prime Minister aware of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) having made any public declaration to the effect that he had tendered his resignation as a member of this Parliament? Has the Prime Minister or any other member of the Government received an intimation from that hon. gentleman of his desire or intention to tender his resignation?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I have seen no public declaration made by or on behalf of the hon. member for St. Antoine, nor have I received any communication that I can give to the House.

BY-ELECTIONS TO FILL VACANCIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if he can inform Parliament when the writs will be issued for by-elections to fill the vacancies that exist in the constituencies of Yamaska, Quebec; York-Sunbury, New Brunswick; Medicine Hat, Alberta; and West York, Ontario?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: I am able fully to conform to precedent in that regard, and to tell my hon. friend that the writs will be issued in due course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if the writs will be issued simultaneously, or at different times?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will appear when the writs are issued.

CANADIAN LOAN TO ROUMANIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT: (Chambly and Vercheres): I would like to direct the attention of the Government to an item which appeared in the Montreal Star yesterday regarding the Canadian loan to Roumania. A despatch which purports to come from Ottawa states that the interest due on April 1st, amounting to $1,475,234 has not been paid by Roumania, and that the Government were trying to make a settlement with that country. I would like to know if it is true that the interest has not been paid, and on what basis the new settlement is to be made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I do not know that that is a question of sufficient urgency to justify our taking up the time of the House in discussing it at the moment. But one thing I can tell my hon. friend at once is that as yet the Roumania interest has not been paid.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: If I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker—Surely if the interest has not been paid and if a new basis is being determined for a settlement, the House is entitled to be informed as to the nature of that settlement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House is, no doubt, entitled to know, but not at this stage unless the Government chooses to give the information.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The House is entitled to know before the settlement is decided upon.

Mr. SPEAKER: Not upon the Orders of the Day:

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Campbell, resumed from Wednesday, March 2.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I shall, if it will not be too much for the right hon. leader of the Government to bear, open remarks by offering him my sincere congratulations upon his attainment of the high position which he now occupies. He has brought dignity to the office; he fills it with dignity, and the worst wish that any hon. member on this side has for him is that he will not be permitted to bear that dignity too long.

It was of great interest to me to listen the other night to the speech delivered in this House by the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie). One reason why I listened to his speech with such interest is that we have sat in this House a long time together, and the other and principal reason if his absolutely chameleon-like change of policy. It appears to be customary that the moment a man, no matter what his former political views may have been, attains office, and perhaps, in order that he may retain office, the old faith and the old shibboleths go and he seems to cut his coat according to his cloth in the way of politics; a strange virus seems to get into his blood, something that was not there before, something that, I may say, does not seem to suit him very well.

My hon. friend launched into an argument on the tariff, and he stated that the Opposition had done everything in its power to avoid the issue. He said further: What we want to know is just where they stand. If I know anything of the members of the Opposition, they are not attempting to avoid any issue as regards the tariff. When the tariff is brought down and when the proper time comes to discuss the tariff, every hon. member on this side will be found amply prepared to state his position. There is before the people to-day only one issue and it is not the tariff. What my hon. friends opposite would like, and what they are endeavouring to do on every available occasion, is to draw the tariff herring across the track so as to keep the people from thinking of the real issue, which is whether my hon. friends opposite should resign or not. It has been proved in the by-elections that that is the issue to-day, and on that issue I purpose speaking.

As I have already stated, a most chameleon-like change has come over the Minister of Militia and Defence in regard to his fiscal ideas. It is not so long ago that members on this side of the House introduced certain resolutions in regard to the tariff, the first one that I remember being in 1914, and another one in 1917. The first resolution was introduced in 1914 by Mr. Knowles of Moose Jaw, who was then a member of this House. This is Mr. Knowles' resolution:

> That in the opinion of this House the time has arrived when, in the interest of the farmers, and consequently in the interest of the whole of Canada, the duties on agricultural implements should be forthwith removed.

The present Minister of Militia and Defence had some words to say upon that subject and they were no uncertain utterances; they were as clear-cut as they possibly could be. This is what he said, in speaking in this House on the 11th March, 1914, as reported at page 1566 of Hansard:

> Mr. Hugh Guthrie (South Wellington): I desire, before the motion is put, to offer a few remarks upon what I consider to be one of the most important questions with which this House has had to deal during the present session. We on this side of the House, and, I fancy, some members on the other side of the House, are not quite satisfied with the wave of the hand by which the right hon. the Prime Minister sought to relegate this important matter to the ash heap, or, at all events, to some place outside the precincts of this Chamber. The question is too big and too far-reaching in its consequences to be dealt with by the Prime Minister in a ten-minute speech, and by the silence of the members of a party numbering 130 or 140 in this Chamber. I have no doubt that there are many hon. members, supporters of the Government, who are very keenly interested in this matter—many of them representing rural ridings; many of them representing, as I do, both rural and urban populations—and who desire to give free expression to their thought and opinion upon this grave question.

And so on. I read that simply as an introduction to the speech which he delivered. Later in his speech the hon. gentleman referred to the Prime Minister of that day and said of that right hon. gentleman:

> He had not heard the case very fully argued; he said the Government would consider the question, but he stated, as deliberately as a man could state it in the House, that on account of the trusts and combines of the United States it would not be possible to give free agricultural implements to the people of Canada. There is only one thing left for him to do, and that is to reduce the tariff on agricultural implements to a minimum. In my view, that will not be as satisfactory as the complete abolition of the duties upon agricultural implements.

Further on he said:

If these trusts cannot take possession of the British market, which is a free market, how could they take possession of the Canadian market if it were made a free market? To my mind, there is nothing in the argument of the Prime Minister. It was not a reason for refusing to abolish the duty; it was the merest kind of an excuse.

Then he went on:

I rose on this occasion chiefly because I think that some member from the province of Ontario should interject some remarks into this debate to show that the demand for agricultural implements is by no means limited to the western provinces of Canada. The riding which I have the honour to represent in this House is about equally made up of urban and of rural inhabitants. I am satisfied that, irrespective of party, the people engaged in agriculture in the county of Wellington, north or south, would hold up both hands for the boon of free agricultural implements.

Then he continued:

So I believe it is in the great province of Quebec and in the Maritime Provinces; certainly it is in the great western provinces of Canada. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, the demand is as broad as is the country. I then ask the Government: Why not accede to a demand of that kind when your revenue is going to suffer so little and when no Canadian industry is going to be injured?

He said further:

I desire in a few words to show that the removal, the entire abolition of the Canadian duties on agricultural implements, would not do an injustice to a single manufacturing establishment in Canada.

Therefore, in 1914, the present Minister of Militia and Defence was absolutely certain that free agricultural implements would be a great boon to the people of the Dominion; that it would help in cheapening food, and that it would not do one iota of injury to Canadian industries. Those are three very good reasons, and I submit that they still hold good to-day. Just one more quotation from my hon. friend's address:

I, for one, believe that of all the industries in Canada the agricultural implement industry is the one now best able to stand without the support of any customs tariff at all.

That was on the motion of Mr. Knowles. In 1917, this motion was moved by the Hon. Frank Oliver, then member for Edmonton:

[Mr. Pardee.]

That in the opinion of this House it would be in the public interset if the Customs Tariff Act were so amended as to provide:

1. That wheat, wheat flour, and all other products of wheat be placed upon the free list.

2. That farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery, and repairs for same, rough and partly-dressed lumber, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, cement and fertilizers be added to the free list.

What did the Minister of Militia say at that time with respect to clause 2 of the resolution? He said this:

I therefore favour that portion of the amendment which provides that agricultural machinery shall be upon the free list. I favour the whole of the free list as set out in paragraph 2 of the amendment.

He further says:

And when I look at the trade returns and find that in item after item which it is now proposed to put upon the free list the revenue collected is so small as to be negligible, it seems to me clear that the time has come when the relief asked for in this clause of the amendment should be granted.

The Minister of Militia the other night directed his attention principally to the Farmers' party. He produced a catalogue and declaimed loudly against it. Well, that is quite within his privilege, so far as I am concerned, but I want to ask this: If the Farmers' party go on advocating, as they do advocate, and as we on this side of the House have advocated, that certain articles should be put upon the free list, does it lie in the mouth of any hon. member of this House, even the Minister of Militia himself, to find such fault with the Farmers' party that one would think they were doing some great national harm in expressing their views? Even if the farmers do not buy their agricultural machinery at home, but in the United States, there is this much to be said: the duty goes into the treasury of the people of Canada, and not to the manufacturers. Why, Sir, the Minister of Militia talked as if it was a matter of absolute disloyalty to buy anything outside of one's own country. Sir, until the millennium comes I think the people are going to buy where they can buy cheapest. It struck me as I heard that portion of the Minister's remarks, that I could see the beginning of the old flag waving again. Disloyalty for the farmers to buy in the cheapest market? Who has the right to accuse of disloyalty any class that acted so well as the farmers have done during the past few years? I say that such language comes not well from the Minister, and that that sort of argument should not be made.

In passing, I noticed the other day the report of a speech by an hon. member of the Senate, expressing the opinion that in view of the Fordney Bill which has just passed both houses in the United States there should be reprisals by the Dominion of Canada. Now I do not believe that that is a proper policy, or ever will be a proper policy, to pursue, either for the nation or for the individual. You will never get far down the road by adopting reprisals as a nation along these particular lines. The thing for the people of this country to do, so far as that question is concerned, is to keep their heads level and to attend to their own business along fiscal lines as it should be attended to, and let the other nations look out for themselves.

I desire now to take up what to my mind is the real issue before the people of this country. The Minister of Militia the other evening quoted many precedents to show that so far as the Government was concerned it was carrying out the will of the people in retaining office. Well, if precedents are to count, all I can say is this, that my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), in the excellent speech he made yesterday, with the precedents that he quoted absolutely swept the ground from under the feet of the Minister of Militia. I do not believe there is any judge who, hearing the matter argued legally, would not say that the precedents quoted by the hon. member for Quebec East outweighed the precedents quoted by the Minister of Militia. But, Sir, I am not concerned with precedents in this case. They do not appeal to me here, and for this reason: precedents ought not to weigh in the case before us because there was an absolute promise by this Government that on the conclusion of the war they would go to the country. It was plainly and distinctly understood, if ever anything in this world was understood, that that Government was formed for war purposes, and war purposes only; that it would endure only during the life of the war; and that when the war was concluded the people would be consulted. Why should the Government not have consulted them before now? The people of Canada have realized in the last year more than they ever realized before—because up to last year they had not taken the matter into their serious consideration—that since 1911 they have not had one single iota of a chance to pass upon questions affecting the Dominion of Canada. There has been no discussion upon public platforms; there has been no dissemination of opinion; there has been no attempt so far as our own political questions are concerned to educate the people. Therefore, I say that in view of that promise, which the people of Canada absolutely believed would be carried out, there is one thing, and one thing only for this Government to do, and that is to dissolve Parliament and appeal to the people.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to the by-elections. Let us take the last five by-elections. The Government won three out of five. Now three of those elections were absolutely hand-picked, and in two of them ministers of the Crown were running. Can that be considered an expression of public opinion? Does anybody mean to say that because a few thousands of the millions of voters in Canada have expressed their opinion, that is a mandate for the Government to continue in office? I distinctly say it is not, and I believe the people of this country take the same view.

The Minister of Militia seemed to feel rather badly—perhaps his were only crocodile tears—about the "remnant" of Liberalism in Ontario. Let us admit for argument's sake that there are not many in this House, but what they are makes up for any lack of numbers. I want to tell the Government this: There is the healthiest "remnant" of Liberalism in the province of Ontario that there has been for many years, and it just wants a chance to act. There is Liberalism in the province of Ontario, the same old Liberalism it has always been, standing for freedom of thought and freedom of speech, well-settled theories and policies; and the Liberals of Ontario are quite content that these theories and these policies and these doctrines shall be tested out at the earliest possible moment. If the minister is so confident that there is only a remnant of it left, and that that remnant cannot accomplish much, one would at least suppose that under such circumstances the Government would have sufficient courage to go to the country and stand by the result. But the great trouble is that they lack any courage. This Government is like the clinging vine; it shoots out its tendrils in the direction of little by-elections which they calculate upon winning. Sometimes the tendrils do not find any purchase, they break, and down comes the vine; although occasionally the tendril succeeds in hanging on. But in each case in which it has hung on, the success has been of no credit to the Government, because the constituency has been hand-picked. But while, in my opinion, at any rate, no Government knowing, as this Government knows, the attitude and the frame of mind of the people of Canada, should continue in office. Nevertheless this Administration persists in hanging on, it still clings tenaciously to its position. It will not be responsible to the people of Canada, whose opinions and desires it absolutely disregards. Why, under these circumstances, the Government continues to carry on, is a state of mentality on its part which I cannot grasp. I would at least say, in their position: Come on and we will have a fight; it will not be bloody; there will be a good deal of gas but that will not matter so long as we fight it out and see who is the winner: let us find out whom the people want as their servants, and when they have made their choice we are ready to obey their commands. Surely that is only logical and right, and I ask the Government to take this course. But, to my mind, the milk in the cocoanut was spilled by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) before he sat down. It is quite evident why they do not want to go to the country. We got a little inkling of it from the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), but we got it all from the Minister of Militia; and that was that on the grounds of equality there would be many times greater representation in the cities than in the rural districts. The Government know that their policy appeals to the big interests, and the big interests live in the cities. So that with a redistribution such as they propose to give them, the cities shall send such representatives as will vote in their interests. The rural representation, they expect, will be cut down to as great a degree as possible, while the urban they will build up, and build up, as I have no doubt they will do if they last long enough to make a redistribution—and make it in such a way that only their own supporters shall come from the cities. That is the reason there is no election and no appeal to the people; that is the reason why public opinion is being flouted day by day and the public are being told by this Government, who forget that they are the servants of the people: You attend to your own business and let us alone and we will attend to ours, and when we are ready we will ask for your advice. That is the whole kernel of that portion of their propaganda. The Minister of Militia the other night, by sort of process of elimination, finally figured out that although the Government did not deserve the confidence of many portions of the Dominion of Canada, still they had the confidence of some, and then at length he got down to the supposed fact, which he stated with great vehemence: "At least we have the confidence of the House of Commons." Well, it would appear to me when I arrived here about two weeks ago that possibly they had and possibly they had not. But I thought that if there was one thing which they did not have it was the confidence of the Commons; and I have no doubt to-day that if hon. members sitting on the other side of the House voted as their hearts dictate and not as the glory of office impels, they would vote in such a way as to show quite plainly that this Government has not the confidence either of the people or of the House of Commons.

Sir, I say again that precedents matter not. There was a promise and that promise should be absolutely carried out. We have the strange spectacle of two ex-ministers of the Administration sitting on this side of the House, both having resigned for the same reason and both of them now antagonistic to the Government. Is not that palpably an evidence that the Government has not the confidence of the House and certainly not of the pepole? When any Government, as this has done, has seen its followers leave it day by day, month by month, and year by year, it surely can come to one conclusion only, and that is that it is not wanted and that another is wanted in its stead. The great bête noir to hon. gentlemen opposite is the Farmers' party. Well, I hold no brief for that party, but I do say, as a Liberal, that if the farmers want a party of their own and desire to express certain views, they should be at perfect liberty to carry out that idea. This is an absolutely free country. Why, therefore, should there be any bitter feelings against any section of the people who desire to give expression to their views? Surely it has not come to such a pass in Canada that none can get together and express views or advance theories. It it has, then it is a sorry plight for this Dominion. But I do not believe that such is the case.

Now, I have only this to ask the Government, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that they trust the people. The people are not often wrong. In this strong, virile young country the people know pretty well what they want, and if they do go wrong they will very quickly get right again. I say, therefore, that the Government ought to trust the people and give them an opportunity to say what Government they want at the present time. In other words, I commend to the members of the Government, in all fairness to the people of Canada, this exhortation: "Play up, play up, and play the game!"

Mr. FRED LANGDON DAVIS (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, before I deal with the subject matter of the Address, may I express regret that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden), who led the Government previously to the present Prime Minister, is in such a state of health that he is unable now to take any large share in the affairs of the country. I should like also to extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address and to express my appreciation of the manner in which they discharged their duties in this respect.

In 1908, when the present Prime Minister first sought election, I was a constituent in his riding and ineffectually did my best to keep him from coming here. I can now congratulate him on his brilliant and rapid rise to the position of Prime Minister. He is to my certain knowledge a true Conservative, tenacious of principles, and able in the advocacy of them, and the times are going to demand a man of such characteristics as their champion. These opinions are all going into the crucible, and they will have to undergo considerable refining and much change. While Union Government lasted, under the former Prime Minister, I endeavoured to give it my full support, and did so support it in all matters for which it was primarily formed. But it was inevitable that, in view of the procedure followed in the formation of this Government and the new issues, I must seek new alignments. Hence I find myself in "No Man's Land."

There is no political terminology apt in description of Union Government: It was not one party, it was not a coalition, it was not a fusion. When we first met in joint caucus I was surprised. During the war I said nothing, but in the second session I advocated a change to a coalition basis. I discussed this with some of the ministers. In the third session there was a caucus of Liberal Unionists to consider the future course. The decision was, to go on for the present as we had been doing. With that decision began the disintegration of the Liberal Unionist group and the present difficulties of the Government.

Because of lack of clear political definitions no political action in the constituencies was possible. When the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Calder) recently told the West that the Government had been too busy for political activity he talked bunkum. If we had been a coalition each member could have organized; but as the case stood we could do nothing. For a Conservative Unionist to organize, looked like throwing the Liberal Unionists overboard; and for a Liberal Unionist to organize was to seek a separate career and throw the Conservative Unionists overboard. We could not appeal to both until the future course was in some measure determined. The consequence was that as time went on confusion grew in the ridings; and as elections must be faced the confusion must be ended. As no preparation had been made in the ridings it only remained for the Government party in the House to attempt a fusion. This fusion is no wider than the House. If the Peterborough election demonstrates anything it is that the fusion has not included the electorate. Many Conservatives deprecated but they will finally accept it. Many Liberal Unionists doubted it and will finally reject it.

There were two opportunities for a coalition—one when the Government was formed and one after the war. Both were lost. The result is that the Government finds itself to-day out of touch with the electorate and generally unprepared for an election; and it needs time, desperately needs time.

Though forseeing the present position for myself, I supported the Government last session because it proposed to balance its expenditure with taxation. As the whole is greater than any part, so it seemed to me that to get a balance of taxation over expenditure was more important than an exact justice in any of the items making up that taxation. I had differed with the Government in its 1919 Budget, and last year re-stated some of my objections to its tariff policy. The member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has said he was smoked out. He and some of his associates think I stayed until I bear on my garments the odor of the smoke that expelled him. I assure him that the fire never touched me.

In 1919, in association with a distinct group of Liberals in coalition, I could have continued in support of the Government, for issues had arisen which seemed to me important enough to justify such a course could I have had assurance such as a coalition of that sort could give. Without such assurance, in complete surrender to the fiscal opinions held by four-fifths of the Government supporters, I found myself, on other issues, in fundamental disagreement, and so departed.

In the main I agree with the Progressive platform—at least as interpreted by the leaders of that party. The recall I would never accept, as it is not consonant with our system of representative government and degrades a member no matter what may be his service. I agree also with the leaders of the party that it must extend its membership with all classes of the community and free itself of any class organization or control.

With regard to the Liberal party, the presence in their ranks of many strong protectionists hampered Sir Wilfrid Laurier throughout his career, and forced him to opportunism on this question. At this stage in our affairs, despite the fact that this fiscal question is not of the essence of Liberalism, it is desirable that a government should come in unanimous as to protection or decided tariff reductions. The Liberal leader has not spoken with the same voice in the East as in the West; this opportunism is inopportune now. If he could tell the West his sympathy with its desires for reductions, he should be able to say to Montreal something thereon beyond this—that it is overshadowed by the larger question of restoring representative government. If the Liberal party had in 1911 to suffer the loss of its Toronto protectionists, 1921 may be the time to lose its Montreal protectionists; the omens forecast it.

The foregoing sufficiently discloses the attitude I shall take on the tariff. Let this be added. In examining the tariff it should be borne in mind that we have had practically the same policy for over forty years. No country will accept protection but on the principle that eventually competition among the encouraged industries will bring prices to the general world level. Canada before the war was one of the dearest countries of the world to live in. Have we got the competition expected? If not, why? Have combines defeated it? Has our tariff become an Old Age Pension instead of a Mother's Allowance?

This nation is now the upholder of Statism in its operation of a combined system of transportation by railways and steamships. The freight rates decision and policy thereon of the Government, have not been fully satisfactory to the country and I trust there may be laid before us some plan of getting better results. The operation of the railways calls for large improvement and possibly this will be effected when the Grand Trunk is finally taken over. If the Government would appoint a committee of the House to report thereon, I believe the country would approve.

In the past I have urged the attention of the House and the Government to consideration of a committee on Estimates as a great improvement in means of retrenchment. In other respects as well, this would have important results. The Minister of Finance led me to expect that a committee to consider and report thereon would be favoured by the Government and I take the earliest opportunity to refer to it. Discussion of it will be possible when a resolution now on the Order Paper is reached.

On the question of Imperial Relations, I have been pleased to see that the last two Prime Ministers of Canada have been in agreement in policy. This is a subject that should not come into party politics, and I regretted yesterday to hear the utterance of the member for East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe) thereon. Not a regard for the public interest, but party acrimony spoke them. I trust an opportunity to discuss on the floor of the House, the policy Canada shall pursue may be afforded.

The excess profits tax has long been marked for extinction as an unjust system in peace and directly making for inflation. As the British Government has announced that there it will be discontinued, it is to be hoped that it may be reformed out of existence here.

The natural resources are more strongly than ever being demanded by the Western Provinces. The position of those provinces as inferior members of Confederation must be reformed so that the same principles shall prevail in all, that no grievance as to status may mark our full stature of nationhood.

Finally, with regard to the sub-amendment which I have seconded, its first consideration is the country's interest, and not the tactics of party strife. The Government's supporters who demand redistribution, as I did last year, must recognize that without a miracle the Government must disappoint them. As it cannot recognize, and may very probably be defeated, any Budget adopted this year cannot settle business conditions. If the Government can carry its Budget, and as obviously it seeks to make the tariff the next issue, it cannot let that issue stale by postponing its appeal to 1922. Add the three components —inability to organize until the eve of an election, unsettled business, and an issue shaped to its liking, and the result is undoubtedly an election this fall. If the interests of the country are consulted, a redistribution will be made before this session closes and a House properly representative will be returned to deal with all the many great and disputed questions.

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I wish to associate myself with all that has been already said in a complimentary way of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and also of the mover and seconder of the Address. I particularly desire to associate myself with what was said by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid). I think in the few words he contributed he gave excellent advice to the Prime Minister.

Now, coming to the particular questions before the House, it is not my intention to devote very much time to the resolution, for I think the ground has been almost entirely covered; there may be one or two phases of it which I may touch upon if time will permit. In the meantime I wish particularly to direct my remarks to some of the matters discussed by the right hon. the Prime Minister during his tour of Canada shortly after his elevation to the chief citizenship of the Dominion. Some of those statements reflect specifically on the people whom he describes as being particularly represented by this group. In justice to myself, to our organization and to the people referred to, I deem it my duty to deal with some of those statements.

The Prime Minister directed his attention to the farmers first, I believe, during the by-election in Colchester, when he described them as being in alliance with, I think he termed them, seditionists, wreckers, Bolshevists and other people whose doctrines were preached only in one country in the world at the present time. To this statement, Sir, I take the strongest exception.

4 p.m. I do not think that a grosser misrepresentation was ever made of any class or group of people. I shall therefore give a few illustrations to show to hon. members and to the people just the position that the farmers assumed during the crucial period in the history of our country. It is not pleasant for me to have to deal with this matter, and up to the present time I have refrained from referring to it in this House, but my duty now compels me to demonstrate the absolute baselessness of the statement of the Prime Minister. I will be as brief as I can and will commence at a point shortly after the war broke out.

In the month of February, 1915, we held a convention of the Saskatchewan Farmers' Association and a movement was started, known as the Patriotic Acre Movement. At that time a plan was undertaken whereby every member in our organization who possibly could would make a contribution towards a fund by donating a certain number of bushels of wheat produced on his land. The net result of that movement was that during the following summer an entire trainload of wheat, consisting of forty cars, was delivered at the port of Montreal free on board a transport to the order of the British Government. My hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) corrects me—it was a trainload of flour consisting of forty 80,000-pound cars. This meant quite a large contribution. But in addition to that trainload of flour an additional $20,000 remained in the fund, and that sum has been invested in Government bonds, the interest on which, amounting to $1,000 each year, is paid over to the Children's Pavilion in connection with the sanitarium on the Qu'Appelle lakes in the province of Saskatchewan. So it will be seen from this example alone that we have not got very many Bolshevik tendencies in our organization.

Mr. EDWARDS: Nobody said you had.

Mr. MAHARG: However, I will proceed to show that we at least attempted to do our part in that time of national crisis. The House may not remember, but the farmers of Western Canada remember very well the first action the Government took in dealing with the wheat of the West. They commandeered several million bushels in fact all of the standard grades of wheat then in store at the head of the Lakes. That wheat was paid for at a price $1.20 per bushel or which approximated two-thirds of the subsequent value of the wheat of that particular crop. The farmers made no particular outcry. They took the view that if it was absolutely necessary for the Government to pursue this course, well and good. But I will have a little more to say in connection with that if I get time to touch on the appointment of the proposed commission to inquire into the grain trade. Then further action was taken subsequent to the appointment of the Board of Grain Supervisors. Reprentatives of the agriculturists of Western Canada were called into conference in the city of Winnipeg, and were asked to name a price that they thought would be fair for their wheat. That conference was held and a price was submitted. The minimum price was $1.50, the maximum price was $1.90, but a flat rate of $1.70 per bushel was considered preferable. As a matter of fact the actual price which the farmers of Western Canada were paid for their wheat under the Board of Grain Supervisors' recommendation was $2.20 per bushel. So you will see that even from a mercenary point of view they offered to take fifty cents less for their wheat than what the Board of Grain Supervisors thought was a fair price.

Now, we will go on a little further and relate another instance. In that peaceful province of British Columbia where the people are so peaceful that they raised no objection to accepting all the products of the Western farmer, on which their is no duty, or to letting us, in turn, have the products of their orchards in the form of apples and other fruits, in connection with which there is a nice little profit to them by way of duty. Nevertheless, peaceful as they are, trouble started in Vancouver. It gradually filtered through until it got into Alberta; it went from there to Manitoba, and a serious situation was arising. At the height of that trouble the one man in Canada more particularly charged with the maintenance of law and order in Western Canada than any other man came to the executive of the Saskatchewan Farmers' Organization, which was in session in the city of Regina, and, in confidence, laid the whole matter before them and asked their hearty co-operation should the worst come to the worst. In fact, he told us he was convinced that the agriculturists of the West—our organization—was the only organization that he believed could successfully cope with the situation if the worst came to the worst. Now, this man, who knows the West, I believe, better than any other man, has no thought in his mind of any Bolshevists, seditionists, or anything else of that kind being in that organization. I am citing the case of the Saskatchewan organization simply because I am quite familiar with what was done there. But I have alsolutely no reason to believe, and do not believe that any different spirit existed in the other provincial organizations.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

SITTING SUSPENDED FOR ROYAL ASSENT TO BILL

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentlemen Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, his Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

The Speaker informed the House that His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following Bill:

An Act to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the Motion of Mr. James McIsaac for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Campbell, resumed.

Mr. MAHARG: Mr. Speaker, when the sitting was suspended, I was dwelling on the actions and attitude of the farmers of the West during the war period, and I want to go just a little further in that respect and say a word or two regarding their actions and contributions towards patriotic efforts during the war. The one great patriotic movement was, I believe, the Red Cross, and as regards provincial contributions towards the Red Cross, the province of Saskatchewan came second in the Dominion of Canada. A further contribution which I have in mind at the present time was that undertaken by Dr. Robertson on behalf of the relief of the devastated areas in France, and the contributions from Saskatchewan towards that fund took first place in the Dominion of Canada.

I come to the election of 1917, the crucial test of the entire Dominion as to just what action and attitude our people were going to take as regards the steps necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. What was the result in Saskatchewan? We have in that province sixteen constituencies, and every one of them returned to this House a man instructed by the vote behind him to give his fullest support to everything necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. There were no vacancies whatever; the front was a solid one, and I think I can go further and say that in proportion to the vote taken, the majorities given in that province exceeded those given in any other province in Canada. I want to go just a little further to show what was the attitude of even this group, although it was referred to by the Prime Minister himself as not representing the farmers; indeed, his words as quoted, were that "the Crerar bunch did not represent the farmers." I am not going to argue the point as regards representing the farmers; evidently, the idea that he was trying to impress upon the people by his words was that we were more or less of a Bolshevik class. To disprove any such idea as that, I think I have in sight sufficient evidence, namely, the fact that 50 per cent of the total group of cross-benchers had sons in khaki during the war. That should prove that they are not too bad a kind of "Bolsheviks," even if some people should try to tag them with that name.

I come to the last feature, the final proof of their attitude and their sincerity. A couple of months or so ago at our convention in Saskatchewan, we unveiled an honour roll which, I think, for a provincial organization, cannot be exceeded in numbers by any other organization in Canada. We had a scroll in the neighourhood of four feet square, and it was covered with names as closely written by a pen as it was possible to write them. I have not the exact number, but I should say that it contained the names of close to one thousand men who had made the last and supreme sacrifice for their country. It seems, indeed, rather strange that, while the heart-wounds were still bleeding, the Prime Minister of this country should endeavour to hold up the fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters and others closely connected to them, as a group of people seeking an alliance with those who had not the best interest of our country at heart. Such action comes with very bad grace from him; further, it very ill becomes the Prime Minister of this country, or even anyone supporting his Government, to talk of "alliances." Most of us have a very vivid remembrance of an alliance made, I think, in 1911, by the then Conservative party. We may be accused of a number of things, but I do not think anyone can accuse us of forming an alliance with those who were prepared to shoot holes in the Union Jack as did the Conservative party at that time.

The Prime Minister started on his Western tour, and he was met in Winnipeg by a committee representing citizens of the province of Saskatchewan. The primary cause of the appointment of this committee was the discontinuance of the Wheat Board. There was held in a town in Saskatchewan a public meeting to which representatives of the different boards of trade of the towns along the line, municipal officers and the public generally were invited, and were present at that meeting. A committee of three was appointed, one of them being the mayor of the town in which the meeting was held and the other two being representative farmers of the districts represented at that meeting. This committee proceeded to Winnipeg to endeavour to impress the Prime Minister with the importance of re-establishing the Wheat Board. They had an interview with him, and, amongst other things, he told them that the re-establishment of the Wheat Board had never been asked for, either inside the House of Commons or out of it. I think most hon. members who were here last year know very well whether the re-establishment of the Wheat Board for another year was asked for or not. I will take the liberty of quoting from Hansard one or two things that I said myself in respect of the Wheat Board. I will be as brief as I can. Speaking on this subject in the House of Commons I said (Hansard 1920, p. 2636):

> Just so long as the pooling arrangement exists on the other side where our wheat is marketed, we must have a similar arrangement here; if Governments are going to buy, the Governments will have to sell.

So that the Prime Minister will not be of the opinion that he was not in the House at the time I was speaking, I will quote from my remarks in connection with the Wheat Board at the time when the enabling legislation was before the House, and the Prime Minister was in his seat just across the floor from where I was speaking. The gentleman who had preceded me had been trying to convince the House that the farmers themselves were not satisfied with the Wheat Board, and in reply to that, and speaking on behalf of the farmers, I said (Hansard 1920, p. 4131):

We are perfectly satisfied, and we have been satisfied, with the method that had been adopted in handling the grain. I should have been pleased had the hon. gentleman furnished some proof in support of his statement. If it is not satisfactory to them (the farmers), why are they, as a body, from one end of the country to the other, asking that this enabling power be given . . . . At their convention they went further; they asked not only enabling legislation, but that the Government continue the Wheat Board for another year. The Canadian Council of Agriculture passed a similar resolution, and recently, through their executive they have again stated that as long as there is Governmental control of buying in European markets, we must have Governmental control in Canada in regard to disposing of our wheat.

There are several other quotations I could give. Here is one (Hansard 1920, p. 4133):

We have been told that this is paternalism. In what way is it paternalism? We have been told that we are asking for protection. I have stated in this House more than once that we never asked for protection; never asked for a fixed price to the producers. We never asked for that at all; all that we are asking for now is: Since you have forced it on us; since you have disorganized conditions, and since the price was fixed for one purpose or two purposes at the utmost, you must continue this so long as conditions remain as they are in European countries.

There are several other passages I could quote from different pages, but my time is limited. I think I have quoted enough to show that the Wheat Board had been asked for both in this House and outside.

The Prime Minister on his tour visited several western cities. I heard him speak in the city of Moosejaw on his way west, and on his return he spoke in the city of Saskatoon. When speaking of the Wheat Board there after being persistently questioned as to why the Wheat Board was discontinued, and he is reported in the Saskatoon Star of November 13, 1920, as follows:

Stand on Wheat Board Question.

He reviewed the circumstances which led to the organization last year of the Wheat Board. Immediately after the passing of the Act he was attacked in the West on its account, and up to the time control was dropped the government had no word of commendation. In the House they were criticized by those supposed to represent peculiarly the farmers' views.

Now, I have absolutely no recollection, and I do not think Hansard will show, that one word of criticism was offered from those supposed specially to represent the farmers. The report continues:

This year the board was discontinued because careful investigations showed, he said, that further control was not in the public interest. He gave as reasons the absence of wheat control in the United States and the absence of controled buying in Britain.

[Mr. Maharg.]

Now I state, and I defy contradiction, that at the time this enabling legislation was passed there was control in the buying of wheat in Great Britain—full government control. At the time the Minister made this statement in Saskatoon, exactly the same control existed, and it exists today. I think my right hon. friend, as First Minister of this country, should be a little more conversant with the facts before he undertakes to discredit the representatives of agriculture in Western Canada.

I want to say a word or two as to the results of the discontinuation of the Wheat Board. In the first place, at the time the market was thrown open, things were going along very nicely in Western Canada. We had in sight, as we supposed, good and substantial reasons for continued prosperity throughout the West. While we did not have a heavy yield, we had a fair average yield, and the price at that time was such as to allow a fair return to the producer over and above the cost of production. But immediately the market was thrown open, or shortly after, the prices started to slump, and the result was that business so far as the West was concerned became stagnant. For the sake of illustration, I might quote a conversation I had with a merchant in one of the towns. He told me how business had been going on, and to mark the contrast he instanced several articles, among them fruit. He said that previously to the slump in the price of grain his customers were taking out apples by the box, two or three boxes at a time, but, he said, within a week after the price of grain slumped, his customers instead of buying apples by the box, were buying twenty-five and fifty cents' worth at a time and taking them home in paper parcels. He said the same was true of sugar, tea, and in fact, all the staple commodities. His customers instead of taking supplies sufficient to last two or three months were taking just enough to keep them living from hand to mouth. It was only a matter of time for the stagnation to spread, and soon the wholesalers were hit, then the jobbers and manufacturers, and eventually the labourers when the manufacturers ceased to produce. I think you can trace the general stagnation in business very largely to the fact that the Wheat Board was discontinued.

We have heard a lot about the adverse balance of trade with the United States. In my opinion, the discontinuance of the Wheat Board will be responsible, before the entire crop is marketed, to the extent of at least $100,000,000 of our adverse balance of trade with the United States. I do not think I am exaggerating one bit when I say that the amount of grain purchased from Western Canada by the United States at the reduced price consequent on the discontinuance of the Wheat Board will amount to at least $100,000,000 before the season is over. That is one hundred million less will be paid by the United States on account of the drop in price.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend contend that the price of wheat is fixed by the Wheat Board, or was when the Wheat Board was in existence, or by the European market—the Liverpool market, as it is known.

Mr. MAHARG: I am quite prepared to admit that it was the European market, and I think the European market would have been very satisfactory this year if the Wheat Board had been continued, but it was not. I might ask the hon. gentleman a question. Why is it that wheat went away down to $1.25 a bushel and then rose close to $2.00 a bushel? Had there been any change in the European conditions? I am speaking of the price paid to the farmer at the initial point. Large quantities of our grain were sold for $1.25 at the initial point. Was there anything in the conditions of the European market or anywhere else to justify that. I might go a little further on that point. We all remember that the Winnipeg grain exchange representatives came here during last session and how the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) assisted them very materially and how caustic he was in his remarks about the Wheat Board. We have a vivid recollection of these things. They, the Winnipeg grain exchange representatives, told us that if the market were thrown open, we would get $4 or $5 a bushel for our wheat. Of course, we took that with a grain of salt, but we were prepared to continue the Wheat Board and let them secure the world's market for us. That price, however, never materialized.

Last fall, in order to be in some degree consistent with their previous statements, the Winnipeg Grain Exchange undertook to give reasons why the market had slumped, or why these prices had not been paid, and they had to take the prospective crops of the large producing countries, such as Australia, New Zealand, Argentina, and India, in order to make anything like the showing there was the previous year, and even then they were some 60,000,000 bushels short. But what was the actual result? The market went away down while the harvests of these countries were merely in prospect, but when these crops were assured definitely and some of them harvested, that is, when the prospects had become a reality, the price started going up again until it reached 50 cents, 60 cents, and even 75 cents a bushel higher than it had been on the prospective results. Will my hon. friend say that the European market or world conditions had anything to do with that? I do not think so. We shall have to look elsewhere to find out why that happened. It happened simply because of the non-existence of the Wheat Board to steady the market in order that there might not be five, ten, or twenty thousand sellers to one or two buyers. No one was expecting big prices from the buyers, but we were expecting the stabilization of prices so that those who were unable to get their wheat out early would receive at least a fair proportion of return from the whole crop.

Now, another statement which the Prime Minister made in the West was that we never had the courage to move the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture as an amendment to the Budget. Well, he might have gone a little further, if he wanted to be fair, and told them that why we did not move it as an amendment for the reason, as this House knows very well, that a second amendment to the Budget is not permissible, owing to some old custom whose origin I do not know but which I think must have been conceived in medieval ages, for it is as far behind the times as anything can possibly be, and why it should continue I cannot say. Had it been in order, the platform would have been moved as an amendment. However, the next best thing was done and the Prime Minister must know that it was placed on Hansard by myself, I think in either the first or the second session I attended Parliament. It is on Hansard as public property and every one is free to scrutinize it to his heart's content, and the more that is done the better we shall like it, for we have nothing to fear.

I want to touch upon one or two remarks of the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie), who, I am sorry, is not in his seat at the present moment. One of the strangest attitudes which any person could adopt was the critical view which the minister took of the speech of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He criticised that hon. member rather severely because he ventured to take up some of the time of the House in dealing with the fiscal policy of Great Britain. He thought he might have been better engaged discussing the fiscal policy of Canada. Well, I am not going to say that I disagree with him there, but there were certain conditions that led up to the hon. member for Red Deer discussing the fiscal policy of Britain. During the last session of Parliament no less a personage than the present Prime Minister himself spent considerable time discussing Britain's trade policy, and drawing attention to the results of that policy as he saw them; and, among other things, Great Britain was represented as a land of paupers and incompetents, all on account of its fiscal policy. Now, I wonder if there are any Canadians small enough to deny a gentleman, especially one who hails from the Old Land, the privilege of stating to this House the exact position of Great Britain in relation to pauperism and incompetency. I think this House will agree with me that the hon. member for Red Deer very ably answered the arguments of the Prime Minister and demonstrated to him that far from pauperism and incompetency being the condition of Great Britain, matters had gone in the other direction continuously for years and years and that a change had come very shortly after she had adopted the free trade policy. I think it very unfair for any one to try to deny any member of this House the privilege of defending not only the land of his birth but the particular part of a country in which he might have resided at a particular time.

The Minister of Militia went a little further in his defence of the Government and said that the Government must be judged on its record since last July. That is all very well, but it should work both ways. While the Prime Minister was out West speaking to the electorate there, I think he took credit for almost everything that the Conservative party had accomplished since away back in 1878. Now, if he is going to take credit for the good things which the Government preceding his own Administration achieved, then, logically, he must assume responsibility for some of the other things that do not look so well. The member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) instanced the five by-elections that have taken place since July last, asserting that the Government had won three seats out of the five. I do not need to dwell on this point, as it has been touched on by some of the speakers who have addressed the House since the minister made his speech.

But there are one or two of the elections which we might refer to briefly, such, for instance, as the contests in East Elgin and West Peterborough. These seats were not selected by the Government; the other three, or at least two of them, were, and, Sir, I think we are safe in concluding that the Yale seat was very carefully considered before it was thrown open. Had there been any fear so far as that constituency is concerned, I think the present representative would have been expounding the gospel of protection through the columns of his paper rather than from a place on the floor of this House. But, Mr. Speaker, they deemed it a perfectly safe seat, and I will say that we are very glad indeed to have the present representative (Mr. McKelvie) with us. Now, what about West Peterborough? I do not know whether it is true or not, but word has trickled through to Western Canada that there was some promise or other in connection with a dam that was to be built there. I have not heard the rumour contradicted, and I take it for granted that there must have been something to substantiate it. Well, dams are, of course, supposed to be built to stop flows. It is quite evident that that dam did not stop the flow of voters in West Peterborough. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I think that instead of damming the flow of votes it had the result of damning the Government to a certain extent, and I think it would have been wise on the part of the Government to have been more circumspect in their promises. Of course, whether the dam will be built remains to be seen.

Now, I come to another part of the speech of the Minister of Militia, a part which I think was uncalled for. I think that I can prove to this House before I conclude that instead of the United Grain Growers' Company being the chief sinner there are others equally as bad, although their professions would lead you to think that they were almost sprouting wings so far as this matter is concerned. The hon. gentleman maintained that the United Grain Growers' Company were dealing solely, or practically so, in American implements. Reasons were given a year ago by myself on the floor of the House why farmers' companies were dealing in American implements, the prime reason being that the Canadian manufacturers absolutely refused to sell any kind of implement to the Farmers' Co-operative Companies. Now, Sir, I know whereof I speak, for about fifteen or sixteen years ago we formed a Co-operative Farmers'

Company locally in our own district. Among other things we decided that we would handle the large implements and carload requirements of the district, and we undertook to see if we could secure implements. Sir, we could not obtain even a wheelbarrow or a hand cultivator, let alone the big implements for the farm. We had to go to the United States to get every single one of them.

An hon. MEMBER: They would not even sell to the returned soldiers.

Mr. MAHARG: Sir, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) a few nights ago illustrated what the Drury Government were doing in the purchase of their graders. He said they were using American road graders. I venture to make the assertion that it is quite possible the same principle extended even to the matter of supplying a Farmers government with the necessary implements for taking care of the roads. It is just possible something of the same spirit may have been manifested there; and it would be well if the member for Brantford would look into the question. It might also be well for him to inquire into the matter as regards previous governments. Are we to understand that the Whitney government never had occasion to use a road grading machine during their term of office? Or is it a fact that the Canadian machine was of such a character that it would not do the work, and when a progressive government came in they had to obtain a grader of a suitable type? There are several features in connection with this matter that are well worth looking into.

Now, while the hon. member for Brantford is in my mind I want to thank him for the kind compliment he paid to our little Group here. I am sorry, Sir, that in some respects I cannot return the favour; I wish very much I could. He spoke of the rotund figures, the ruddy countenances, and the youthful appearance of gentlemen on this side. I think I can return the compliment only to this extent that the hon. gentleman is very sprightly in appearance. I want to consider further for a time the matter of the purchase of American implements. I was about to express my sorrow that the member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) was not in the House, but I now observe him sitting opposite me, and I am very glad of the fact. About the time that the war was on—I just mention this fact so that the House may make allowance for some of the utterances of the hon. member for Regina —the hon. member undertook to write a war pamphlet and gave it a very striking title. When I mention the title the House will be good enough to understand that the choice of the words is not mine, they were the selection of the hon. member. The title of the pamphlet is:
"After Hell—What?"

An hon. MEMBER: That is awful. What does it mean.

Mr. MAHARG: I am merely giving the title of the pamphlet, I am not going to undertake to answer the question. I now hold in my hand an extract from that pamphlet and the peculiar thing is that it only came into my possession to-day. It really would appear as though it were an act of Providence. The extract came in by mail this morning. I knew nothing about its coming here, I made no inquiry about it; the fact is that when I opened my mail I found this extract and I am going to read it to the House. My hon. friend says in the extract:

> And if our manufacturers would do business according to the foundation spirit of the protective tariff which they enjoy, instead of the least possible production with the largest possible profit, we would to-day have cities with millions and employment for hundreds of thousands more than we have.

The hon. gentleman further says:

> No need then to write about getting profitable work for returned soldiers. How well the writer recalls the spirit in which Sir John Macdonald laid the National Policy: "Tall chimneys for every hamlet and work for every man." But he conceived a body of manufacturers who would be content with enlarged markets—not enlarged profits in the same old restricted market. He conceived manufacturers who would supply the need, thus employing multitudes of men. There are two ways a tariff can affect a manufacturer. He can be content with a small profit and thus hold the whole market, or he can raise his price to the level of the tariff, sell a little here and there at enormous profits and enjoy the results while the country damns him.

Now this is the significant part—and that is why I introduce it in connection with the purchase of American machinery by the United Grain Growers—this is the significant part of the whole thing. He goes on to say:

> Go over to the North side of Regina and in half an hour you will see what a wrong conception the Canadian manufacturer has of the Canadian tariff. Acre after acre with foreign made goods; here and there a Canadian made machine—that exception amply testifying to the small soul and narrow vision of the manufacturer who made it.

Mr. CRERAR: Who wrote that?

Mr. MAHARG: This is a quotation from the pamphlet to which I have referred written by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan). I think that in itself goes to prove there must surely be others than the United Farmers who are buying American implements. Let me quote a little further:

Can we give employment to our returned men when that condition prevails? Can we be considered industrially alive when that is the established order? We Canadians have time after time declared our faith in a protective tariff, and I am a protectionist yet, but I would be darned well ashamed of myself were I a manufacturer enjoying 35 per cent tariff and still see foreigners running off with most of my preserve. There is something wrong with the Canadian manufacturer; he wants a jolt; a head-on collision, as a matter of fact something that will knock him clean out of his state room into the day coach where he can get some idea of what surrounds him. Grit or Tory or Unionist has no objection to being decent to him as long as he is alive; but we are tired carrying a corpse. These dead men who imagine they are going to feed returned men on tariff are a menace to our country to-day. If they will but shut up and get busy and make goods, selling them at a reasonable profit, so that they will sell them, and thereby make more goods, thus employing returned and other men, we could forgive them. But if they start any more of this doling out tariff from their measly little shops where tariff and profit are the chief things they manufacture (except nerve), then they had better quit, for our country is in no mood to tolerate their unprogressiveness and lack of enterprise. Western Canada at least will tolerate a tariff more willingly than they will manufacturing sloth. If the tariff is designed to increase manufacture, and thus give employment, then it must do what it is designed to do, or cease to exist. A market big enough to keep every returned soldier employed exists and it is not proposed that the tariff beneficiaries shall by means of that interpretation of the tariff which yields big profits on a small output rather than small profits on a big output, prevent our returned men from engaging in the supply of that market. The contracted conception of his duty as a manufacturer enjoying exceptional privileges, which our manufacturers have, is the biggest stumbling block to-day in the way of getting employment for our returned men. If our manufacturers are to get the profits of a protective tariff then they must at least make an attempt to supply the goods that the tariff protects. Otherwise the tariff has no virtue. Who in Canada will say that our manufacturers have been equal to our Canadian market? Go into our stores and buy Canadian goods if you can, and there get your answer. Our warehouses the same. Wake up manufacturers, and make your factories Canadian size. If you don't the Government will be justified in wiping out every vestige of protection you have."

Mr. DUFF: Where is the title to come in?

Mr. MAHARG: I will leave that to the imagination of the hon. member. As I said before, I will not attempt to answer the question. But I wish to compliment the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) on his ability in writing a pamphlet that I consider deals directly and specifically with what we are troubled with to-day in so far as unemployment is concerned.

[Mr. Maharg.]

Mr. BELAND: Will my hon. friend say when this pamphlet was published?

Mr. MAHARG: It would be perhaps two years ago.

Mr. BELAND: By whom?

Mr. MAHARG: By the hon. member for Regina.

Mr. COWAN: And the hon. member for Regina stands by every word he wrote.

Mr. MAHARG: Certainly.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Cross the floor and take a seat over here.

Mr. MAHARG: I just wish to compliment the hon. gentleman on having written the one thing that we need to consider at the present time if we are to get rid of unemployment.

Mr. COWAN: That is what I want done.

Mr. MAHARG: Now, Sir, I shall go a little further with these great patriots who cry "Buy in Canada," and who were talking to us the other night. When we come here for the session we usually send down to the Distribution office to get a few supplies. After the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) I thought I would examine these supplies to see where they were purchased. Among the dozen or so articles there is a pair of scissors, which I found were made in Newark, New Jersey.

An hon MEMBER: Where is that?

Mr. MAHARG: I think the House knows very well where New Jersey is. It is just across the river from the city of New York. I found the lead pencils that carried a mark were of British make; I found the rubber eraser was made in the United States by the Goodyear company; the pyramid of desk pins were made in the state of Connecticut; the little thumb clips were also of British make; of the three pen points, two were made in the United States and one in Great Britain; the pen holder was also made in Great Britain; and, Sir, the one redeeming feature of the whole outfit that the maker had thought fit to mark was a bottle of mucilage, which was inscribed thus—"Boston, Montreal, New York, Chicago."

Mr. BELAND: Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. MAHARG: Certainly.

Mr. BELAND: A statement was made to me that a large part of the implements used at the Brandon Experimental farm are of American make. Is the hon. gentleman in a position to give the House some information in that regard?

Mr. MAHARG: Mr. Speaker, I would not care to make a statement as to that. I do know that at the Experimental farms I have visited there are American implements. Of course there may be a reason for it, and we are prepared to be lenient. But we do object to hon. members of the Government and their supporters continually accusing us over here of buying American-made goods when we are absolutely helpless in securing them from Canadian manufacturers because of their refusal to sell to us. This great Government institution can compel Canadian firms to sell to them, and yet in the little equipment I have in my desk upstairs there is not a single article that can be guaranteed as being of Canadian manufacture.

Mr. ETHIER: Not even the matches distributed to the rooms.

Mr. MAHARG: I am not a smoker, consequently I have not had an opportunity of examining the matches, but I am prepared to take the hon. gentleman's word for it. I am going to extend my inquiries and see how far this system of buying non-Canadian goods extends in the Government's purchases; it may go much further.

Now, Sir, a matter which is apparently uppermost in the minds of some of the hon. members across the floor is the appointment of a commission to inquire into the grain trade. So far as I am concerned if anything can be accomplished by appointing a commission of inquiry I will be only too glad to support them in every way, and so far as our particular company is concerned, we will give them every assistance, as we have absolutely nothing to conceal.

But, Sir, I wonder why there is
5 p.m. all this solicitude on the Government benches at this time for an inquiry into the grain trade. Of course the reason is the discontinuance of the Wheat Board. But I make this assertion, that had there been one-half the enthusiasm on the other side of the House in favour of the re-establishment of the Wheat Board that there is now for an inquiry into the grain trade, the Wheat Board would have been continued without a doubt.

And, Sir, from the way this matter is being advanced it does not look very reassuring. If the statements that we hear as to the personnel of the commission have any foundation whatever, then I doubt very much whether the farmers of Western Canada will be at all satisfied. But if the Government are going to appoint a commission, I want that commission clothed with the fullest authority to make an inquiry into every transaction in the grain trade, particularly the transactions in connection with the commandeering of our wheat, the sales of wheat by the Trade Commission overseas, and such like matters. We would like to know what happened. For instance, when that wheat was commandeered in Western Canada the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) said it was absolutely necessary to get the wheat right away, that they could not wait to buy it on the market. I should like the proposed commission to inquire into and find out just why such a length of time was given to the people who were supposed to have this wheat in their elevators at Fort William to make delivery of it. I am informed, I think on the best authority, that months elapsed before this wheat was delivered. We have a very good idea why there was that interval, but we would like this commission to say why. We would also like to know why at a certain time this year, when the terminal elevators contained 17,000,000 bushels, one company handling about one-tenth of the grain had one-quarter of the grain in the terminals in its possession held for orders from the farmers. On this basis there should have been forty million bushels in the terminal elevators. Where was it? This is something for the proposed commission to inquire into. We would like to know if the Government officials permitted this wheat to be moved without the surrender of the documents calling for that wheat. Where did it go? Those are some of the things we would like to know. If there is any laxity there among the Government officials, and if any inquiry is needed, it is only because the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, which is the servant of this Government, is not living up to its duties. It has got every last power in its hands to inquire into everything mentioned by hon. members opposite, except the matter of the street price; everything else is entirely in the hands of that Commission, and at any time it can make the fullest inquiry it may see fit, and nothing in the world can prevent it taking action if it desires to do so.

Why do we need another commission? Are the Government going to appoint a commission to inquire into its own servant, the Canadian Grain Commission? Unless the proposed commission is appointed with full authority to inquire into everything connected with the grain trade, then, Sir, the Government might just as well not appoint it at all. I welcome the appointment of a commission that will go the length I have outlined. It might even make a little inquiry into the workings of the Canada Wheat Board. Not that I think the actions of the Board in any particular needs inquiring into, but I should like to know, for my own satisfaction, if any individuals attempted to get in between that Board and some of the starving European countries that needed our wheat.

The member for Kindersley (Mr. Myers) tried to leave the impression upon the House the other night that I was opposed to the Canada Wheat Board, and to Government control of our wheat crop. Well, Sir, everyone who has attended the sessions of this House or has read Hansard, must know that ever since the Government took control of the marketing of our wheat I have been a consistent supporter of continued Government control in some form or other. The hon. member for Kindersley and the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), who introduced this question, know very well that in the session of 1919 I, with them, had many interviews with the then Minister of Finance and the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, the member for Halifax, with a view to persuading them not to throw the market open again. They know very well that I was many times their chief spokesman in this respect. But, Sir, I want to go just a little further. At the meeting of the Canadian Council of Agriculture shortly before the market was thrown open, a committee was appointed. The member for Kindersley said he did not think that the directors of the two companies gave to the continuance of the Canada Wheat Board the support that they should. But who were the members of that committee? The general manager of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, the assistant manager of United Grain Growers, Limited, and myself. I was not in attendance at the committee meetings, but this committee drafted the proposal that was placed in the hands of the committee appointed by the Government at the conference held here; its report was furnished in detail and was acted on and carried out under the management of the Canada Wheat Board. It ill becomes any hon. member to try to show to the House that the directors of this Company or myself or anyone else connected with it was not in favour of the continuance of the Wheat Board or of the control of the marketing of our wheat. However, the circumstances surrounding the whole thing go to show that the two companies themselves formulated a scheme and placed it in the hands of the committee on the very day that the conference was held here in Ottawa—a conference attended by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Who knows very well that the facts are as I have stated them.

There are several other things that this proposed commission, if it is appointed, might inquire into, but time will not permit my going into them. But there is another matter to which I wish to refer while the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) is seated opposite me. During the course of his remarks the other day, the hon. member said something to the effect that the apple growers of British Columbia were feeding their best apples to their cows. Well, Sir, it is most peculiar how things happen. A document, of the existence of which I was unaware, was placed in my hands to-day—evidently the people are watching us. This document comes from British Columbia, it is directed to the editor of the Regina Leader.

Mr. COWAN: And telegraphed to you yesterday.

Mr. MAHARG: It does not matter where it comes from or how it came here; it is the meat of the article that is of interest to this House. It is a genuine document; it is in my hands, and that is what counts. It states:

Dear Sir:

You quote Dr. Cowan in your issue of February 22 as having read on the floor of the House on the 21st instant a quotation from a letter received by him from a British Columbia correspondent, stating that the British Columbia growers were feeding their best apples to their cows. I would suggest that Dr. Cowan's correspondent was trying to put one over on the Doctor. Best grades of apples are quoted in the stores here in Penticton to-day at $3.25 per box. If there is such a thing as a slack market for apples, the abominable express rates, not the tariff, are responsible for it. Two days ago a friend of mine who was on a visit here secured four boxes of apples from a grower, got a dray and took them to the express office to ship to Chaplin, Sask., but when he asked the express he found it would cost him $10.50 to send the four boxes to Chaplin, so he decided rather than pay such extortionate rates to try and re-sell the apples here, which he did. You also quote the Doctor as saying that he had yet to find one Liberal in Regina who was satisfied with Mr. King's definition of the tariff, all of which reminds me of a certain sportsman travelling in a train who, in conversation with a fellow traveller, said he had lived for many years in India. His companion asked him if he had ever seen any Christians in India. He said, "No," he had never seen one. His companion then asked him if he had ever seen a tiger there. "Oh, yes," he said, "I have shot many of them." A missionary who was sitting near spoke up and said, "I have lived forty years in India and I have never seen a tiger, but I have seen thousands of Christians. Each saw what they looked for.

Well, Sir, I am afraid that the hon. member for Regina—

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Did not see any tigers.

Mr. MAHARG: —did not see many tigers in the city of Regina, especially in the form of Liberals; they do not go round in that guise. But I think if he will make careful inquiry he will find one or two in the city of Regina; I have more than once heard them express themselves in that city.

In conclusion I wish to say just a word about the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. I have no hesitation in saying that the amendment does not suit me by any means—that is, the wording of the amendment, and it does not suit the people of Western Canada. Nevertheless its effect, if carried, would suit me and the people of Western Canada very nicely; consequently, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing left for me to do but to vote for the amendment.

Mr. J. P. MOLLOY (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I desire in the first place to tender my most sincere and kind congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister of this country. I do so as a member of this House and as a Manitoban. He and I came to this House as a result of the elections held in 1908. Ten of us came to the House together on that occasion. To-day I am on this side, and my right hon. friend is on the wrong side; one sleeps in an honoured grave in France; others are enjoying positions as a result of the power of this Government to appoint them to such positions; and the remainder are in that place where the dead still speak, the Canadian Senate. I have great regard for my friend the Prime Minister of Canada. My friends out West at different times have asked me what manner of man he was, and I said then what I say now—that I believed he was the best Tory in Canada. He thinks as a Tory; he acts like a Tory, and, if I may say so without being personal, he looks like a Tory—he is a Tory. I give him credit for ability, for industry, and for courage. I am sorry that as a Manitoban I am unable to follow him; further than that I cannot go. He is a partisan, and so am I, but in our partisanship we differ. He has done all he could in the past, particularly in 1917, when he opened his campaign in the town of Morris, backed up by the premier of that province, to do what he could toward bringing about my defeat. He did not quite succeed. Perhaps he will be more successful next time, but in the meantime he may be kept very busy trying to save himself from defeat. For the reasons that I have given, I congratulate his party on having selected him. That he will live up to the traditions of the Conservative party, there is no doubt, as he is a reactionary; but whether he will be able, so to speak, to sway the multitude, we on this side are anxious to find out, more especially because the people of Canada are very anxious that this test should be made.

This debate has resolved itself into this. There has been some talk of the tariff; but in the meantime the tariff can very well stand; so can the freight rates, and from a western point of view and also from an eastern point of view, so can the question of the natural resources of this country. What we are dealing with especially, in following the amendment to the motion for an Address, is the question whether the people of Canada and the members of this House desire or do not desire a general election. A sub-amendment has also been moved, but, for my part, I cannot understand it; at least I could not understand it until I read the language of the hon. member who moved it. What did he say? Amongst other things he made this statement:

> It may possibly not have escaped your attention, Sir, that since last session I have crossed the green carpet and now occupy a position on the side opposite the Government. I do not know that that fact is of any particular significance.

I agree with my hon. friend that it is of no particular significance, because his language used further on endorses the statement that I make. He said further:

> This does not mean that I differ from the Government now any more than I did in the past.

And further on:

> I have no desire to see a change in government just at the present moment that would produce unnecessarily chaotic conditions.

The situation in regard to the sub-amendment, if I understand it aright, is this. It was moved by one who might be charged as acting in the capacity of sub rosa agent of the Government. That hon. member crosses the floor of the House, but he says that he agrees with the Government. He does not want an election. He knew that the amendment of my hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) was on record many days before he submitted his sub-amendment. As regards his statement that his crossing of the green carpet or the floor of this House might have no particular significance, I agree with him—there is none. He could have stayed where he had been for the three sessions which have passed since the general election of 1917, and still have moved his sub-amendment. I want to say this in passing: If I had so far forgotten myself as to have supported Union Government, and I was offered my constituency by acclamation guaranteed; if I had accepted and had gone to that side of the House, being elected as a member of the House at that time, and if I had remained there until the present moment, I ask you, Sir, to accept my word as a member of this House, I would have stayed with the ship; I would not desert it in its hour of dire distress. My hon. friends opposite need men such as my hon. friend who comes as a Liberal from the province from which I come. There are Liberals and Liberals. The true Liberals are on this side of the House; they are not on the other side.

The only argument that can be advanced in favour of the sub-amendment—and there is some weight in it—is the question whether it would be in the interest of the Canadian people to have a general election following the redistribution of seats which must necessarily take place after the census which, we hope, will be completed some time this coming summer. I was a member of this House before the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Campbell). I was a member of this House in 1911 when the very gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury Benches sat, as I sit now, in the cold shades of Opposition, and they demanded an election on the reciprocity pact as put forward by the Government of that day. I challenge them, all or any of them, to produce from the records of Hansard anything to show that they asked that that election be not held in 1911 on the ground that the West, from which many of them came, would be unfairly dealt with. Did they ask that the election that took place in 1911, and that resulted in the defeat of the Laurier administration, the best this country ever had, be postponed until the following year, until the then Government could take the census, redistribute the seats and give the people justice? No, they did not do that, and not doing it, if they are sincere now, they were most insincere in 1911. For this reason: The census as taken in that year gave to my province five additional members, to Saskatchewan, six additional members, to Alberta, five additional members, and if I remember rightly, to British Columbia, including the Yukon, five or six, I think six, additional members. Does any man think for a moment that by a redistribution now the West stands to gain that number of seats? Not at all. The other night this argument was advanced in this House—and I admit there is something to back it up. But will Manitoba or the other western provinces really gain? If we do, the number will be very small. There is in this country one province in which race suicide is not fashionable; that is Quebec, and I hope there are others. If the unit of representation in Quebec, which is represented in this House by sixty-five members, goes up from 30,000 odd to 40,000, how many seats will we gain in Manitoba? Perhaps one or two; and if the Government follows the line as indicated by the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) the other evening, where will those seats go?—if you will allow me to put it in that way. They will go to the city of Winnipeg, which represents practically one-half of the population of that province. The redistribution will take away from the rural districts, not only in Western Canada, but in Ontario and Quebec, the rural members that they now have. The Government expects, by so doing, by using such political strategy, that they can appeal to the people in the large towns, cities and centres of industry in this country, and that the Government will be the gainer thereby. They do not want to be too sure of that. I am not a prophet, but I think I can say that in the next House there will be from ten to twelve Labour members, who will come from the large industrial centres, not from the agricultural districts.

So far as the election is concerned, whether we should have it now or later, I do not propose, as the representative of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, to assume the responsibility of stating that there should not be an election. My reason is very simple. I have endeavoured, no matter how feebly, no matter how I may have failed—if I have failed—in some instances, to represent the people that I know best and that best know me. I have lived in the county of Provencher since 1879. I passed through it before there was a railway in Western Canada, and I believe that I know the political situation in the province of Manitoba as well as any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. I do know this: I know the wishes and the opinions of those who live within the boundaries of the county which I represent. Not only do they ask for a general election now, but a year ago, before the last session commenced, they pressed for it just as strongly as we are doing now. There is only one thing for me to do as their representative, and that is to comply with their wishes or to be honourable enough to resign my seat in this House. I have not been asked to resign my seat; I believe these people still have faith in me. Believing that, and knowing their wishes, apart altogether from what my personal wishes or desires might be in the matter, I am going to support the amendment. I certainly, under no conditions whatsoever, will support the sub-amendment.

There are others besides the people of my county who have expressed themselves as desiring an election. There are the returned soldiers of this country. There are the farmers of this country, from Charlottetown to Victoria, who are represented in this House by an intelligent, and by no means a small body of men. They constitute a recognized party in this House, and have their leader, who will take his chances with us and hon. gentlemen opposite whenever election day may come—and may it come soon. The farmers of this country are asking for an election. The business men of this country are asking for an election.

There is somebody else who is asking for an election, although perhaps not much attention will be paid to this statement by hon. gentlemen opposite. I have some idea of how to conduct an election. My methods may be crude, perhaps not as polished as others, but they are effective. Mr. Speaker, I get my information, I have got it in the past, and I get it now and in the future from the children in the schoolyards. When I am in doubt as to what a certain section is going to do, I make it my business to find out—I do it myself, or some one does it for me—what the children in that particular district may happen to say. If they are against me, I know I am up against it; if they are for me, I know I am all right. I got many reports from the schoolyard in 1917 that were, I am sorry to say, unfavourable. I would not like to repeat on the floor of this House what even a clergyman said on a public platform in the county from which I come, where we run elections red-hot from the time they start until long after they are over. I know what the children said then in certain districts, and the poll pretty nearly went that way.

Now I pass from the school-children, the business men, the farmers, and the soldiers, and take another large class that has not been mentioned, that is, the enfranchised women of this country who did not vote in 1917. In the district in which I live, the majority of the women in the county of Provencher—and I make this statement believing it to be true—who voted for my opponent in 1917 are going to vote against this Government at the first opportunity. They have fully made up their minds to vote against this Government. Now miracles are not going to happen between now and election day, although somebody on the other side will doubtless try and work them. I say that the women of my county are against this Government, and they have good reasons for being so.

When I ask for an election now, some one may say, you are playing a selfish game, you are afraid of a redistribution of seats. I am not afraid of a redistribution of seats, nor am I playing a selfish game. It happens that my county is in the southeastern portion of the province, and from a military point of view, so to speak, I am protected on the east by the province of Ontario, on the south by the state of Minnesota, and on the west by the Red river. I have, therefore, only one line of trenches to watch, and so far as I am concerned they can either take away from or add to my constituency—I care not which. Although I do not care, at the same time I may be defeated, for elections are uncertain, but take my word for this—that if I am, the fellow who gets in won't need a Turkish bath for the next six months anyway.

I say there should be an election for this reason if for no other, that in the year 1917 the Canadian people were in what might be termed an abnormal state of mind. Men said things and did things, and women said things and did things, that they would not do to-day. They have come down to terra firma, so to speak. There is unrest, but happily the unrest is not gaining ground, at least, we hope not. It is unthinkable to me that men who have had long service as members of this House, for instance, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) or others associated with him much younger than him, can argue for a moment that the people of Canada are the same to-day as they were in 1917, or that they think in any one respect as they did in 1917, when men's passions and prejudices were inflamed, and the people generally were in an abnormal state of mind. I maintain that it is not fair to the people, no matter how the 1917 election was carried—and it was anything but fair to me, and we condemn that—now there is an opportunity for the Government to appeal to the people and get an expression of opinion on the questions of the day, that that opportunity should be denied. The right time to appeal is now, but the Government are hanging on to office, for what? They are hoping against hope, and what they are doing to-day other governments in this country have done before them. The Tupper Government of 1896 held on to the last minute of the day. It was bad business from a party point of view. This Government expect they will be stronger two years from now than they are to-day.

They will be just that much weaker. How can they be stronger? They cannot possibly hold a majority in this House, and they will be mighty fortunate if they do it this session. They are in great doubt themselves; they are in a blue funk at the present moment. We are not crowding the Government, if I may say so. The Opposition have been absolutely fair. They say to the Government: Hurry on the necessary business before Parliament and before the country; take your Supply; be manly about it; get up and get out just as quickly as you can, and go to the country for the approval or disapproval of the people. They will have to go sooner or later, and the longer they delay the worse it will be for them. The other night I listened carefully, as I always do, to the eloquent Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie). I may say that there is a personal political interest for me in the hon. gentleman. The first political meeting I ever attended in my life was held in December, 1886, in the county of Wellington. The main actor was the father of the present Minister of Militia, Mr. Donald Guthrie, and when it came to attacking the Tory party and making a speech that was incisive and telling, and one that would be long remembered, well, he was one of the best I have ever heard. That was quite a while ago. I went to the meeting a Grit and when I came away I was a confirmed Grit; and I wish to say this—and I shall speak of the "acid test" a little later on—that to-day I prefer to be a Donald Guthrie Grit rather than a Hugh Guthrie Tory. Our hon. friend promised us the acid test. Well, I fancy pretty nearly every man on this side of the House has had the acid test applied to him at sometime or other. I got all the acid test I wanted in 1917. I stood up and survived it, and I am prepared to try it again. What is the acid test? Of course, we all know there are many acids, and I guess the acid test which they will apply, if they ever do apply any, will be something in the nature of boracic acid, which is a mild antiseptic that may be applied to wounds. My hon. friends opposite admit that wounds exist; there are wounds on this side of the House, they admit, they say, and they admit that there are wounds in certain sections of the country. And now they want to alleviate those wounds and are repentant. However, their apologies and their repentance will not be accepted by the majority of hon. members of this House, and certainly not by the majority of the people whom those members on this side represent. In the first place, hon. gentlemen opposite think they are very smart. They are going to put on the acid test, they say. In my estimation that is nothing but a bluff. They say: We will put forward the Liberal platform. Well, that will not faze me. They then threaten to bring forward the Farmers' platform. Well, you will not faze me there either, except in so far as one thing is concerned, and that is the Recall. I would not vote for the Recall if it were in the Liberal platform, and I am mighty sure I will not vote for it when it is in the Agrarian platform. I will come here elected to stick, or stay at home defeated; but no little committee back in the old county of Provencher is going to tell me some day, if they have some personal or other grievance, that the best thing I can do is to pack my trunk and go home. If they do I will tell them to mind their own business, for I am here to stay. Why, the thing is foolish; it is not Canadian; and there is not a man in the Agrarian party to-day who can stand up and defend the principle of Recall, eloquent as some of them are. No, Sir; I will not countenance any Recall, —Well, yes, there is one recall that I might favour. When I cross the river I might find myself dissatisfied with my habitation, and if I were recalled it is likely I should come back. But I will have no Recall while I am a living man.

The acid test, Mr. Speaker, is being applied every minute, every hour, and every day as time goes on; while we are sitting in this House it is being applied. Who is applying the acid test, though? The manufacturers of Canada are applying it at least hourly to this Government. They say: Boys, come across before election, or we forget you. If you don't hurry you will find yourself in the wilderness of No Man's Land, as described by the high protectionist the other day, the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier). The Government know that they must satisfy the manufacturers or else land in No Man's Land. But whether they satisfy the manufacturers or not is of no consequence, for No Man's Land is exactly where they are going to find themselves, anyway. Some one else can apply the acid test just as well as those on the side of the Government. Their numbers may be greater; numerically they may be stronger; but that is not the whole thing. We may be a remnant, as we have been described. Well, we allow them to say so. But there was a remnant at the Battle of Waterloo, in the Old Guard; there was a remnant in the shape of the Light Brigade at Balaklava; and there were remnants among our own sons and brothers in the fields of Flanders during the war. But they all came back. A remnant is not so bad after all as something upon which to build a political party that will rule the country in which they belong. There have been many remnants, but we are a much stronger remnant in this country than they imagine. Hon. members opposite may say we are a remnant, but that will not hurt us. We know, as everybody else knows, that they are the remnant. They are a remnant that is afraid to hold an election. They are afraid to reorganize the Government. The Prime Minister is anxious to reorganize, and he shows his good sense in the desire to do so; but he is afraid to open seats for Cabinet Ministers, because he knows that there is not a constituency where a Cabinet Minister has a chance of being elected. There is not one from Charlottetown to Victoria.

We have been taunted by the statement that in certain provinces the representation on this side of the House is very small. On the face of it that statement is true. I do not know how it was in Eastern Canada at the time of the general election; but I do know what went on in Western Canada, at least in some parts; and I want to say that the tyranny and the terrorism that prevailed in that section, backed up by every newspaper in the three western provinces so far as my knowledge goes, except two, were such, that it is no wonder that there are two men on this side from Western Canada. How so many came from the eastern provinces I do not understand. But we shall find out what went on, and we will prove that tyranny and terrorism did exist in this country in 1917. I believe it had the backing of the Government, although I would not say it had the backing of all its followers in this Chamber or out of it. I believe it was winked at by the Government, the idea being "Put this man out of business by any means, pretty much, that you desire." That day is over. They will not on the eve of the next election be able to promise the farmers of the country "You vote for us and your sons shall be exempt from Military Service." I say such a proceeding as that was a contemptible piece of business on the part of any man or any government. Although I represent a farming constituency I opposed that procedure. I maintained that the son of a farmer had as much right to go to war as anybody else when conscription was the law. Then what did the Government do? After making that promise to the farmers of Canada they immediately turned around and, as in the case of the signing of the Treaty of Limerick, they broke that pledge, before the ink was dry, to suit their own convenience.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am about to conclude. I want to go on record, as a western man, as in favour of an election before re-distribution although by re-distribution I should gain. I am in favour of an election because the people whom I represent and the people are generally calling for it.

Not that all the electors are going to vote for the candidates of the Liberal party; their votes will be divided, there is no question about that. The representatives of three or four parties will be before the people and each will get some support. But I believe that the ballots of the great majority of electors will be cast in favour of those who have urged an immediate appeal to the people. For our part we welcome that appeal and we have no fear as to the outcome. We shall stand where we have always stood, maintaining true Liberal principles. As a representative of the Liberal party I shall be found standing where I have stood in the past. Every man in my constituency knows my attitude and what my views are upon all questions that have been debated in this House. If my constituency sees fit to reject me, I shall have no complaint to make and neither should hon. gentleman across the way who to-day are in the position of usurpers. The best proof of that is the fact that they are afraid to go back to the very people who sent them here but a few short years ago. I maintain that the people desire a general election and wish it to take place at the earliest possible moment. Such being the case the amendment of the leader of the Opposition will have my hearty support.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROBERT H. HALBERT (North Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne and the amendments thereto at this late hour in the debate—and I know the Government is anxious to bring the debate to a close—I am sure, Sir, you will permit me to dispense with the time-honoured custom of throwing bouquets.

First, I want to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) for his warning to us in his speech. He seemed to be worried that we of this little group were being courted by the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). I also want to thank him for informing us that our wooer is insincere and is trying to deceive us. The information did not cause any serious heart throbbings among the members of our group. But for the peace of mind and comfort of the right hon. Prime Minister, I would hasten to remind him that all courtships do not end in marriage—as he no doubt is well aware after his somewhat fruitless wooing in the province of Quebec, although there are symptoms that he has secured one convert, as it is generally understood that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) is making go-goo eyes across the floor and longing for the flesh pots of a Cabinet position. But there are always jealousies between wooers, especially if they are both wooing for a purpose. The old saying tells us that "faint heart ne'er won fair lady," but I am sure, Sir, no one would ever accuse the right hon. the Prime Minister of being faint-hearted. However, the wooing which he and his supporters are indulging in will never win for them the support of the intelligent, democratic-thinking people of Canada. Even the wooing of his tariff policy is losing its chloroforming effect.

I would like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, and, through you, the attention of hon. members to the words of the right hon. Prime Minister as recorded on page 37 of Unrevised Hansard. He was speaking of the Colchester by-election and he said:

> There was a candidate of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) who is represented to-day by the distinguished member for Red Deer. There was a candidate of that party in the county of Colchester and they had some rather questionable support—support from men who advocated very strange doctrines, very strange doctrines indeed, doctrines put into practice in only one country in the world that I know of. But that party had a candidate and its candidate was buried under a majority of some 1,500 votes.

I wonder what very strange doctrine the right hon. Prime Minister was referring to. Perhaps, Sir, if we would read some of the big headlines in the Colchester papers that were supporting the Government candidate we might get a little information on the point. You wil find in the Truro Citizen of Saturday, September 18, 1920—and it was in all the local Conservative papers—this heading in large letters—so large that you can probably read it, Sir, when I hold it up in my hand:

> Will the Farmers and Working Men of Colchester Stand for Deviltries of Bolshevism?

I will not take up the time of the House in reading the whole advertisement, but I will quote one or two items, which I think will be sufficient for my purpose. This is all about the Bolshevik doctrine in Russia; I do not know what that had to do with the Colchester by-election, but it was given great prominence in this paper. I will quote some paragraphs:

> Women are reduced to the level of chattels. Free love is the Bolshevik doctrine. No longer is woman regarded as a human creature to be loved and protected. The Bolshevick treat her as a beast, to be bought, sold, and raped as their cruel passions dictate.
> Will the farmers and working men of Colchester stand for such deviltries; and approve of being linked up in this campaign with canvassers who openly espouse the cause of Bolshevism?

Now, Mr. Speaker, in connection with that I am going to read a report of the proceedings at the Conservative nomination convention in East Elgin. The heading of this news item is:

Foster Puts U. F. O. With Bolsheviki

Aylmer, Sept. 11.—At the Conservative Nomination Convention in East Elgin yesterday, Sir George Foster made a slashing attack on the U. F. O., ranking that organization with the Bolsheviki and the British miners who would oust responsible Government.

This is what the right hon. gentleman said:

Be careful before you arise and from the top of the soap box or anywhere else propound that it shall be swept aside,—

He was speaking about the past history of Conservatism.

—smashed to pieces, that you shall put some class interest in its place—Soviet, Bolsheviki, miners' or farmers' party, I care not what it is—one is almost as bad as the other—

Thank goodness for that little word "almost." Now I want to read from the Mail and Empire. Speaking of the right hon. the Prime Minister it says:

At the Granby meeting Premier Meighen had something to say about Winnipeg Labour extremists uniting themselves to what appeared to them as the most formidable opposition to the Government. This was the Crerar party, or the Western Grain Growers' Organization.

Premier Meighen's reference to this was well warranted and appropriate and does not, in the least, carry the inference that he deemed the Canadian farmer in general to be Bolshevist.

The Crerar group and the Canadian "farmers" are by no means the same.

I happen to be one of the Crerar group, and I am proud to have as my leader a man of the standing, integrity, ability and honesty of the hon. member for Marquette.

Now then, who was the farmers' candidate in Colchester? His name was Captain Dickson, a young farmer who owned a farm near Truro, and who when the war broke out turned his farm over to strangers to work, enlisted and went overseas, did his bit in France, was wounded, and came back when the war was over as a captain and I am told decorated with a Victoria or a Military Cross—a very creditable candidate I am sure you will admit, Mr. Speaker, a candidate you would not think of accusing of being a Bolshevik or linked up with humbugs, fakirs, or nation-wreckers. Did those who are making those insinuations do as much for their country as Captain Dickson did in its hour of peril?

I would like to draw your attention, Sir, to another article in the same paper headed in big type:

A Carnival of Corruption Charged. How the U. F. O. Did It in Ontario. Some Light on Farmers' election in Dufferin County, Ontario.

The truth of the matter is that there were no corrupt practices, and none were proven, and the judges who sat on the election protest ordered the party who filed the charges —and who was of course backed up by the Conservative Government of the province— to pay all costs in connection with the case, as they stated that everything in connection with the election was honest and above board. But, Sir, those insinuations and charges had done their work in Colchester in assisting to defeat Captain Dickson and in electing the hon. member for Colchester, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy). We in this group, and Captain Dickson as well, would sooner be defeated than elected and hold office by such high-handed misrepresentation and stooping to such low degrading deceptions and questionable methods. When men or governments will stoop to such practices to be elected, what can you expect of them, Sir, when they get in office? Is there not a grave danger of their continuing those same methods? There is only one safe course to pursue for all who want to maintain self-respect and public confidence, and that is to play fair in everything. The structure of society and government is built upon the basis of respect and confidence, and when that fails society or government becomes but a rope of sand; and any government holding office that has not that confidence weakens the respect that people have in government and in public men.

I will have to vote for the amendment, Mr. Speaker, because I believe this Government has not that confidence, and that the people are anxious for an election at as early a date as possible. In support of that, I will only refer you to the by-elections in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) claimed to speak for that province, but, Mr. Speaker, Ontario has spoken with no uncertain voice. We have had five by-elections in Ontario— Tory Ontario; did the Government win any of them? You, Sir, well know that a Government which has the confidence of the people seldom loses a by-election, but this Government has lost them all. In Glengarry, in Temiskaming, in East Elgin, in North Ontario, the candidates who ran on the Farmers' platform were elected and now sit in this group; in West Peterborough a Liberal candidate was elected. I would not then, be doing my duty to my riding, to my province or to this Dominion were I to vote to support a government which, as the by-elections go to prove beyond the shadow of a doubt, has not the confidence of the people.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) said during the course of his speech on the Address that it would be better to hold on to the seat he had, than to take chances in an election. This sentiment was endorsed also by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard). I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that they were speaking not only their own opinion but the opinion of a good many of the men who sit around them.

We have heard a good deal about redistribution; it is one of the main arguments that is being put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite as an excuse for their hanging on to office. It is contended that it is not fair to disfranchise the West, which should have increased representation. But, Sir, not only the West but a large part of the Dominion is not represented now—or perhaps I should say, is misrepresented— and the Government seems determined to disfranchise these people until they get good and ready and get the constituencies changed so that they will be able at least to re-elect a corporal's guard from those on the opposite side of the House.

We in this little group feel that great issues are at stake to-day, and that the next few years will determine the future of Canada. All who have the interests of Canada at heart feel that we have ahead of us many years of steady, patient, earnest and perhaps sometimes heartrending toil, but along this way lies the only road to satisfaction and success. It will test our metal, the sincerity of our purpose and the purity and strength of our ideals. It will find the weak spot in our moral make-up—but at the end lies the goal, the making of Canada and the well-being of her people. Have we, Mr. Speaker, the courage to face the future with the inspiration of a great purpose and find a joy and an honour in the doing of it, or are we going to let past and present conditions continue to break our hearts, mar our morals, and destroy the birthright which is the inheritance of all those who were born in and love this great Canada?

We hear great criticism of the farmer's organization and the farmers' group. The hon. member for Brantford took some measure of comfort, I have no doubt, from his criticism of the Ontario Government. But the farmers have never shown that they were at all dangerous, except in the minds, perhaps, of members on the opposite side. Why are the supporters of the farmers' platform branded as Bolshevik? Because they refused to be influenced by the backwoods ranting of politicians who trade on partyism and bigotry and we say that henceforth the standard of Canadian citizenship is to be measured by a man's worth and not according to the length of his ancestry of party heelers. The farmers are bound to Canada with an intensity of attachment. They are rooted in its soil; as native sons they love Canada with the passionate love of children for their mothers. Their fathers and forefathers cleared the land and railed the highways. France is finding her hope today not in her cities and large industrial centres, but in the industry and thrift of her rural people. It was this same industry and thrift that paid France's indemnity to Germany after 1870. It is the peasants of Belgium who are re-creating that country and making it again the garden of Europe. It was the farmers of Denmark who in 1880 created the organization out of which has grown, perhaps, the biggest national business success of modern times. Only by the same grit, determination and steady, plucky labour can Canada ever hope to become great or can her place among the nations be assured. If Canada in the years to come is to make any lasting contribution to civilization, it will be because her people have breathed the spirit of true democracy and feel the responsibility of the great task which they have inherited. With a task so great before us, Canada can well afford to take stock of her resources and of the spirit of her people. It is a significant fact that the people of Canada to-day are learning their own power, are doing their own thinking, and are prepared to accept and discharge the responsibilities that all this implies. Were it otherwise, Canada would be unworthy of her inheritance, of the sacrifice of her bravest sons, and of the great future which awaits her.

We have, Mr. Speaker, another very important task; we must cement our common citizenship. Our flag is made up of different colours of silk or wool, but taken together they make up the Union Jack of which we are all so proud. This magnificent building in which we meet is built of stone, brick and marble, but what unites these elements in a building which will endure forever? Cement, is it not? We have in Canada people of different races and creeds. What is needed to unite them? The gospel of Canadian citizenship. Between these different races and creeds there must be agreement as to the national ideals, and this agreement will be brought about not by force but by education and goodwill and friendly co-operation. We should aim to make Canada and Canadianism so dear to the hearts of all who live within our borders that they will seek this citizenship of their own accord, and cherish it as a privilege and a source of pride. Build up Canada and true Canadian citizenship, and the rest will take care of itself. This is the work of a united people, and must find its inspiration in a great national need. If we fail in this task, we shall suffer loss; if we succeed, our children will rise up and call us blessed and civilization will learn to pay tribute to the greatness of the spirit of the Canadian people.

There has been considerable discussion, Mr. Speaker, about who should be on the Government benches; several hon. members intimate that the leader of the Opposition turns a longing eye in that direction, and that he is angling for the Prime Ministership. But, Sir, that is not the issue to-day; that is not what is being discussed outside this House. The issue is not the right hon. Prime Minister and the National Liberal and Conservative Party; not the leader of the Opposition and the Liberal Party; not the hon. member for Marquette and the National Progressive Party; the issue to-day is whether Canada is going to have its destinies controlled by a greedy plutocracy or whether we are going to be allowed to establish a real economic democracy without which political democracy is farcical. There must be a change, Mr. Speaker, or our civilization will be hopelessly brutalized. The horn and hoof of the protected interests have been long enough upon the doorstep of Canadian homes and Canada's House of Parliament. The fight for freedom from this vulgar and oppressive domination has only begun, but, Sir, it will never let up until the common people, the wealth-producing people of Canada, are liberated from the thraldom of the financial barons who own this country financially and control it politically, and until we have a condition of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. No matter how fertile the soil of a country may be; no matter how frugal and industrious its people, it will remain poor and backward and its people will be lacking in the highest comforts of life if its trade laws and its fiscal policies are unsound.

Protection in any country creates a class, bound together by self-interest alone, armed at all points and ready for action against any one or any party that would dare to curtail its privileges. Such a class is without private or public honour and actuated solely by greed for financial gain. Protection has been called slavery of the same kind as American slavery, but not in the same degree; but the day is not far distant when we shall see embodied in active legislation the ideals and aspirations of the plain folk of Canada. Though the ship may swing with the tide, while the anchor holds firm to democracy, we are safe.

Sixty thousand of the brightest, best and bravest of Canada's sons lie buried on the fields of France and Flanders, for what? Because they were willing to die for the economic and political emancipation of the world.

Mr. SMITH: Because you would not help them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HALBERT: That is too small to reply to. We all know that since Confederation, Canada and the Canadian people have been owned and controlled, economically and politically, by a few manufacturers, a few railwaymen and a few big lumbermen. But, Sir, the war has changed things and the army of emancipation is on the march to-day. When the representatives of that army arrive at Ottawa, they will say to all and sundry, no matter by what name they are called: "We have come here to upset the tables of the money changers; we have come here to unseat autocracy and to establish democracy; we have come here to enter into the heritage that our sons and brothers have died to purchase; we have come here to rescue our beloved Canada from economic and political bondage; we have come here to place Canada where she belongs, in the forefront of the battle of a free and democratic people."

Since I have come into this House, I have listened attentively to every hon. member who has spoken, and that is more than members on the other side can say.

Mr. SAMUEL WILLIAM JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on the question now before the Chamber, I feel very much like the young Swede who, on a moonlight evening in a public park, was induced to propose to a lady to whom he had been paying attention for some considerable time. After he had been accepted, a sudden silence fell upon the young man. This silence after a while became almost unbearable to the young lady, and she said:

"Why don't you say something? Why don't you talk?" And he replied: "I think there has been too much blank talking done already." I have listened in this House for nearly three weeks to addresses of various kinds, and I feel that it is almost impossible to add anything to what has already been said. Some speeches, in my humble opinion, were wise; others were otherwise.

It has been the custom with every hon. gentleman who has risen from his seat to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address. I gladly do so, although I am free to confess that I have almost forgotten what they said; but in that respect, I do not think I differ from any other hon. gentleman who congratulated them, and the only difference is that, perhaps, I am a little franker than they are. One thing, however, I am assured of, and that is that the remarks of those two gentlemen will not bring them within the purview of the Seditious Offenders' Act which was put on the statute books by this Parliament a year or two ago. Their speeches were safe, sane, if somewhat innocuous, and I extend to them my full meed of praise. My only regret is that the Government did not see fit to observe the time-honoured custom of seeing that one of the two addresses was delivered in the French language, a custom which, with, perhaps, one or two exceptions, we have observed in this Parliament for fifty years. I suppose the Government felt that by having the Atlantic speak to the Pacific, they were observing the dual rule. We have one gentleman from Prince Edward Island answered by a gentleman from the Pacific ocean. Deep called unto deep. We have one gentleman from British Columbia, representing the British race, and from Prince Edward Island we have what I suppose should be called Cape Race.

When my hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) closed his admirable address in this House, he referred to the Government as those who occupy high seats in the synagogue and who make broad their phylacteries, and he warned us that for that reason we ought to have nothing to do with them. For my part, being an observing Jew, if I thought they did occupy high places in the synagogue and make broad their phylacteries, I would at once cross to their side; but I feel that my hon. leader was entirely too kind to them; he probably wished to refer to them as the ordinary, common, garden variety of hypocrites. Perhaps it was the beautiful picture he painted of the loaves and fishes and the full platters and so on which, has induced my co-religionist, John the Baptist, to cross the floor. You have heard, Sir, the old saying: "Every country has the Jew it deserves," and perhaps I can extend that by saying that "Every party has the Jew it deserves."

I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on the high and important office to which he has been called. He was not elected in open convention, as we consider ought to be the custom in a democratic country; he was elected by caucus. But I venture to say that, had a convention been called, the party to which he belongs could not have secured a more able and astute leader than he has turned out to be. You will remember, Sir, in Paradise Lost, when the fallen angels were looking around for a leader, they chose Satan. Why did they choose Satan? They did so because they said that Satan was the ablest one in their party, and he was raised to that "bad eminence" of leadership by those fallen angels. I remember, after reading in the newspapers one morning that my right hon. friend had been selected from among all others at the party caucus, I sat down and wrote him a letter of congratulation. I told him that while I and many others had doubts whether he would make a good Prime Minister, we were all assured of one thing, and that was that he would make an admirable leader of the Opposition a position to which I hope he will soon be called.

When the Peterborough election was on, we had reason to believe that the Prime Minister was going to follow precedent and that if the election in Peterborough went against him, he would dissolve Parliament. In an extract from La Patrie about that time, reproduced in the Montreal Gazette, the Prime Minsiter is reported to have made this statement:

> Mr. Meighen has already said that if the people wanted a general election, they had only to manifest their desire at a by-election. He considered no clear indication was to be obtained from previous by-elections. It will be interesting, therefore, to hear what significance he proposes to attach to the verdict of Peterborough.

I do not know whether the Prime Minister actually made that statement; but taking into consideration this extract from La Patrie, which is not by any means unfriendly to the Government, this extract being reproduced in the Montreal Gazette, I take it that that statement is correct.

What has happened which has caused the Prime Minister and his Government to change their view? Why is it that a change has come over the spirit of their dream? On the morning following the election in West Peterborough, the Montreal Gazette, the Ottawa Journal, and other newspapers favourable to the Government, declared that now was the time for an election. Everybody was prepared for the funeral, except the corpse. Surely, Mr. Speaker, no better evidence could be found in the whole world than the election in Peterborough. The issue, and the only issue, in that election was: Have the Government a mandate from the people? Are they ursurping power? Ten thousand voters in Peterborough, out of about thirteen thousand, declared that the Government had no mandate, but notwithstanding the voice of the people, the Prime Minister is still hanging on to office. It is apparent to every person that the Government is disintegrating. Mortification has set in. In the elections of 1917 they had, I believe, one of the largest majorities ever given to a party in the Dominion of Canada. To-day what have they? They are counting heads. They are robbing hospitals. They are dragging from sick beds poor hon. members who are not permitted to rest in peace—

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Shame.

Mr. JACOBS: —and for what? To maintain this Government in power. It is a shame, and I am glad the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) admits it. He represents a division which adjoins mine, and that is probably why we agree sometimes on some things.

I do not need to traverse all the questions that have been debated in this House. The main question as to whether this Government was formed for a specific purpose or not has been so well debated on this side of the House that the argument, I submit, is irrefutable, and I challenge any member on the other side of the House to answer the charge made which has been backed up by the most telling precedents ever put before this House, by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) in his admirable address yesterday. A strange silence has fallen on the Government for the past two days. At the beginning of this debate we were tilting against men whom we thought worthy of our steel. Later, they were not so worthy, and finally, we found that we were obliged to tilt against mere windmills, until now, Mr. Speaker, we are tilting against nothing. There is no answer; we are whipping a dead horse, and I submit that all that it is necessary for us to do is to take our seats and see that the vote is forthwith cast. The gentlemen on the other side of the House in their mentality are very much like Sir George Etienne Cartier.

It is said that when opposition developed in the House to any of his measures his cry was "Call in the members." He would dispose of the question at once by a vote—no discussion, no argument,—just call in the members. I see that Tory tradition still prevails in this House. The right hon. the Prime Minister has a party which is called the National Liberal Conservative party.

Mr. LALOR: You left out the word "and".

Mr. JACOBS: The National Liberal and Conservative party. Let us take the national part of the name first. The National party is a party that deserves well at the hands of the Government. Had it not been for the National party in 1911 the Government would not be in their places to-day. It was Mr. Bourassa who acted as Cyrano de Bergerac to the then leader of the Opposition, and got him into power. He reached My Lady's Chamber with the assistance of Mr. Bourassa, and no person else, and we know how Mr. Bourassa was treated a few weeks afterwards. Still, it appears the Government have some kindly feelings for their old friend, and when they came to give the child a name, he was given for a first name "National," in remembrance of the kindly act of Mr. Bourassa and his National followers. Then we have the name "Liberal." What does that mean? Is it worth calling a party by a name simply to salve the conscience of three hon. gentlemen who have left this side of the House and crossed to the other? I do not think it is. It is the custom in our synagogue, Mr. Speaker, to call our children after the names of our dead relatives. These three Liberals certainly are dead ones, and my friends on the other side have evidently adopted some of our Jewish customs. I am glad they are doing so, and I hope before I am here very much longer they will follow others. Then comes the word "Conservative." I suppose they are entitled to call themselves the Conservative party, because after all these Nationalists and these Liberals are really Conservatives. They have been swallowed by the Conservative party. They have "returned from their ride with the lady inside and the smile on the face of the tiger." A motto which I would suggest to the Government would be the one Mr. Vanderbilt used on one occasion when he was asked "What will the public say?" He replied "The public be hanged." That is a motto which I suggest should be adopted by this new Government. A famous French general in the Crimean War, I think it was Marshal MacMahon, in a communique to headquarters stated that he had taken the Malakoff redoubt. He explained the situation in a very few words, "J'y suis, j'y reste"—"I am here, and I intend to remain here." That is good tactics in war, Mr. Speaker, and I suppose, this being a war government, they feel they can righteously adopt tactics of that kind and say "J'y suis, j'y reste."

Evil communications corrupt good manners. The Conservative party is not the Conservative party it was before it became contaminated by these elements. I would ask my hon. friends on the other side if they have Mr. R. B. Bennett's opinion of them. He is a gentleman who practically used to sleep with the former Prime Minister, who could not go anywhere without Mr. Bennett. Whether he was afraid to leave him in Canada when he went abroad I do not know, but Mr. Bennett used to travel with the Prime Minister when he went abroad, and he was the recipient of many favours from the Conservative party. It would be interesting to know what Mr. Bennett's views on this party are, and also those of the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, the former Minister of Militia, (Sir Sam Hughes). It would also be interesting to know what the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) thinks of this once great party. A story is told of a student of zoology who was asked by the professor of his college to define what a lobster was. He said: "A lobster is a fish, is red in colour, and walks backwards." The professor said: "That definition is perfect except for the fact that the lobster is not a fish, is not red in colour, and does not walk backwards"; and it might be said adopting the student's definition with a slight variation that this Government is the greatest lobster we have ever had in this country.

I do not know why it is that the Government was not satisfied to revert to the old name of "Conservative" when the so-called "Union" label was discarded from the title of the present party. The Conservative party stood for a great deal in this country. It was the party of Sir John A Macdonald, and my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) was instrumental in forming that party into an important fighting force in Canada. Why is it that they have cast aside that name and now seek something which they think is just as good? The new name indicates the hybrid origin of this Government; but like everything hybrid, I am afraid it is not destined to come to much. A definition was given recently of this National Liberal Conservative party, in which it was likened to the mule, in that it had no pride of ancestry and no hope of posterity. Our chief objection to this Government is that it was formed during war time and consequently is saturated with the war spirit; and you never can do anything in the matter of re-establishment on a civil basis unless you get rid of the war spirit and everything it implies. And I propose to show in the few minutes at my disposal that this war spirit still permeates and impregnates in its entirety every Department of the Government. I have only to refer to the Department of Marine, which is presided over by my good friend the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Ballantyne). In passing, I may say that I am glad to think that a member from the city of Montreal should be appointed to this high and important office. This department started building ships during the war. It may have been necessary that we should have ships during the war. No one could tell how long the war would last; it was practically an impossibility to predict its duration; and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and Naval Service cast about him to see that we should have as many ships as possible for the purposes of the war. But the hon. gentleman has evidently forgotten that the war is over, because he is still going on with the building of ships, or at any rate is completing ships which were started after the war. Is not that an indication of the war spirit which permeates the Department of Marine? We want these ships no more than a man wants a third leg; they are useless to us. Shipping in every part of the world is at a standstill. I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a couple of telegraphic despatches which appeared in the newspapers only a few weeks ago touching the situation with regard to ships throughout the world. I shall quote from the Montreal Star, a newspaper by no means hostile to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Rotterdam, January 7.—Forty-nine ocean steamers, mostly Dutch, are laid up at the present time at Rotterdam because of lack of cargoes and the low freight rates according to Burgomaster Zimmerman. He also announces that while more ships entered Rotterdam last year than previously the actual tonnage was only 58 per cent of that of 1913.

Side by side, in a parallel column, I find the following:

Vancouver, January 7.—The keels of two new Government steamers, the Canadian "Transporter" and the Canadian "Trader" were laid at the Coughlan shipyards here yesterday. Seven hundred men are engaged in the yards.

Then on January 7th, the same day—I am still quoting from the Montreal Star—there appears this item:

Prince Rupert, January 7.—A meeting of the creditors of the Prince Rupert Dry Docks and Shipbuilding Company was held here yesterday. W. E. Hodges, who presided, read a statement showing approximate total liabilities exceeding $800,000.

A few weeks earlier in the newspapers, the following appeared:

The Canadian Engineer reports that the Mexican Government has placed orders with the Prince Rupert Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company for thirty-seven vessels. A form of the proposed contract is now before the Marine Department, Ottawa, for approval.

How is it possible, if this contract for 37 vessels was placed with the Prince Rupert Dry Dock Company in November, that in January this company should have gone into liquidation? That is something which I cannot understand, unless it be that when the creditors of the Prince Rupert Company found that Mexico was seeking to buy 37 vessels from Canada they felt it was high time to close up the works. This only goes to show—and I could cite numerous instances—the moribund condition of shipping and shipbuilding throughout the whole world. And yet the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has committed us to nearly $100,000,000 in the matter of the building of ships. We are, and have been for some time, groaning under the railway incumbus, but the Minister of Marine and Fisheries evidently is not aware of the fact, because, notwithstanding that burden, he is still putting on our shoulders a policy that will mean to this country, before the eyes of the Government are opened to the situation, a loss not of $100,000,000 but perhaps of $200,000,000. How long are the Canadian people going to stand this? Are we not quite right in demanding an immediate election in order to test the feeling of the people as to whether they want shipbuilding started, when the country is almost on the verge of bankruptcy? Now, that is an indication of the war spirit which, as I have said, still permeates the members of the Government.

May I take another Department, about which I know something, the Immigration Department? We have on the statute books and in Orders in Council certain laws respecting immigration, which are the most extraordinary and grotesque that it is possible to imagine sane people would enact. I make this statement advisedly, and shall show you what some of these laws are. For instance, we have an Order in Council respecting immigration which declares that any immigrant who wishes to come to this country must come direct from the country of his birth, be it the Balkans, be it Ukrainia, be it Poland, or be it any of the countries of Central Europe. If he comes direct from the country of his birth he will be permitted, under certain conditions, to land in this country; but should that man and his family have left the country of his birth and gone to England and have lived in England say for fifteen or twenty years, brought up his family there under English customs, and taught them English ideals and the language of the country—if that man attempted to land in Canada with his wife and family he would be debarred from entering the Dominion. Now, I am not saying this as a jest, Mr. Speaker. It is not something from a libretto of Gilbert and Sullivan, or something from Alice in Wonderland—it is an Order in Council of the Department of Immigration. Now here is another thing:

No person will be permitted to land in this country unless he is possessed of $250 in cash on his person at the time he presents himself for examination before the Immigration officer at the port of entry.

He must have in his possession $250 so that he can keep himself alive until he obtains works. But if the man is coming to relatives who are worth say half a million of dollars and who are prepared to give bonds to the Government that he will not become a public charge it is not sufficient. This man may use his $250 for living expenses and he may then become a public charge but that is of no consequence to the Government. If he lands with $250 that is sufficient; but no matter what bonds another person is prepared to give, or what bonds his relatives are prepared to give he is not permitted to land without $250.

Now there is another rule. In times when there is little work people are permitted to land in Canada but under what conditions do you think, by an Order in Council? The party landing must give security that he won't work, and if he is caught working he is taken by the scruff of the neck and sent out of the country. This in a country of seven millions of people and capable of maintaining within its borders at least one hundred millions. We are now paying interest on a debt of two and a quarter billions of dollars—seven millions of people are paying that interest? If there were fourteen millions of people in this country they would be paying the same amount, and the burden upon those who are now in Canada would only be one half of what it is at the present time. So that we are not doing these people such a great favour when we permit them to come into this country, we are simply giving them an opportunity of paying part of our debts, and I say that this policy of the Government in keeping out the strangers from entering the country is the policy, the war policy, which was inculcated into us during the time of war. We are afraid of strangers. We are told: Keep this country for the Anglo-Saxon people. Well if the country is to be kept for Anglo-Saxons why don't they come? I venture to say that when we are paying our debts we do not ask ourselves the question where the money has been collected—whether collected from Anglo-Saxons, or from Poles, or from French, we pay our debts with their money; and I submit that this policy of keeping out desirable people on such trifling, trivial, pettifogging grounds is not worthy of the Government. It is the policy of "He is a stranger; heave half a brick at him." We have an idea that because a man does not come from England, or Scotland, or Ireland he is thereby not fit for a good Anglo-Saxon to associate with. I want to tell this Government that in adopting such a policy they are making a very serious mistake; they should not select people because of their origin; they should select people for what they are. If a man and his

9 p.m. family, present themselves for entry into Canada, if a man selects this country from among all others in which to bring up his family and to live and die here, it is the duty of the Immigration officer to see whether such people are likely to make true and proper citizens, and if they are they should be allowed to come in and the Government should not apply the yard stick rule to which I referred a few moments ago.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

As to the railway policy of the Government. I am not going to discuss it, I merely wish to say that the railways were practically managed by public control in every part of the world during war times. That is, in the countries which had entered the war—in the United States, in England, and elsewhere—all these railways were taken over by the Government. Railways were taken over by the Government in Canada, but the Minister of Railways seems to have forgotten that the war is over. We are still on a war basis, although it is now nearly three years since the war terminated. Is not that a sample of the war spirit of the Government, and do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that it is the bounden duty of the people of Canada to get rid of this Government as soon as possible and place this country on a peace basis where it ought to have been placed long ago?

Now, let me say a word or two with regard to the Department of Trade and Commerce—and I notice that my right hon. friend the minister at the head of that department (Sir George Foster) is looking me squarely in the eye. I have kindly sentiments for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I feel that he has not received proper treatment at the hands of the Government. The right hon. gentleman ought to be able to sing his Nunc Dimittis. He has given forty years of his valuable life to the various departments of the Government. There was nothing he touched that he did not adorn. He is the old man eloquent of this House. It is a pleasure for me to listen to him whenever he rises in his seat. I feel that he ought now to ask for his demit. We all know, it is an open secret that he has been seeking, or his friends have been seeking for him, the High Commissionrship in London, which has been kept vacant for a considerable time. He has all the qualifications intellectual and social which fit him for that position. Why not send him to his reward? The trouble with the Department of Trade and Commerce was that during the war it was not expected to function very much. It was more or less somnolent, because we were then doing no trade or commerce. But now that peace has come the department ought to drop that somnolent attitude and become active. This is a department where there ought to be activity, but unfortunately, for reasons which I do not know, that department is still asleep. It ought to wake up; the sooner it does the better for the country at large. I have spoken as I have in no spirit of antagonism to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On the contrary I feel that it is my duty to say a good word for him in this House when his own party and his own Government are not doing it.

May I say something, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the tendency which has been apparent for some time to take from this Chamber the important popular departments and place them in another Chamber? It seems to me that if there are any departments which should be presided over by ministers sitting in this House these are the Post Office Department, the Labour Department and the Department of the Interior. Now where are these departments? They are in the other Chamber. Is that right and is it proper? The hon. gentlemen opposite should realize the importance of having the Post Office Department represented in the popular Chamber. The Post Office Department is one which touches every single man, woman and child in the Dominion. Questions are arising every day with regard to the post office, with regard to the many functions which have to be performed by that department in its tens of thousands of offices throughout the country. A question with respect to that department may be asked of the Government and the Government answers by proxy in one, two, or three weeks, if it remembers the question which has been put. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we owe a duty to the people of this country and that is, to see to it that the administration of this important department is brought back to this Chamber with as little delay as possible. Of course, I understand that the gentleman who presides over that department had to be provided for in some way; but for Heaven's sake get him some other department and not leave him in charge of the Post Office Department, which is of such vital importance to every person in this country. The Labour Department is one which deals with the people, with the working men, in this country, else why a Department of Labour? Well, for some reason known only to the Government the head of that great popular department is in the other House. It was claimed, I remember, that the former Minister of Labour who sat in this House was not as active as he should have been. The result was that the administration of that department was moved out of the House of Commons and placed in the other Chamber. It is another case where "My father whipped you with whips, but I will whip you with scorpions." "You say that this gentleman is not giving his attention to the department, as he should, in the House of Commons? Well, we will send the department to the Senate." And there it is.

Now the Department of the Interior. That is a department, it seems to me, which vitally affects new arrivals, intending settlers, farmers who are coming into this country to develop our—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Natural resources.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes. Why is that department not represented by a minister in this House? I am aware that the Government is in such a position that they dare not open any constituencies, and that is one of the reasons, we say, why we ought to have a general election and put affairs on a proper basis. We cannot accommodate this Government very much longer. We are willing to do what we can, but in the name of public decency we owe it to ourselves to see that the Government is dug out of its hole and driven to the country.

The Department of Militia is another department that indicates the permeation of the war spirit. We have a new Minister of Militia who is not a military man, he is not a Son of Mars. The only "fighting" he ever does is to make a "fighting" speech in the House, and he follows that rule of fighting in which discretion is the better part of valour, because he finds it is well to fight and run away so he may live to fight another day. This gentleman, in order to show that he was in sympathy with the war spirit, promptly jumped our expenditure in the Militia Department from something like $8,000,000, which I think it was before the war, to about $20,000,000, if we include the Northwest Mounted Police.

Here we have the League of Nations, and we have my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the former President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) going across the Atlantic ocean to settle all the ills to which flesh is heir—to bring peace into the world and not a sword. But on the other hand, we have the Minister of Militia and Defence, who is left at home, jumping the estimates from $8,000,000 to $20,000,000. I understand that our share of the cost of the League of Nations is about $200,000 a year. Does my right hon. friend not think that it would be better for us to spend $20,000,000 towards the upkeep of the League of Nations and $100,000 or $200,000 for our militia? Perhaps it would do more good.

I could go on and show how in every branch of the Government service we have the war spirit. The Naturalization Act, the Franchise Act, and other Acts which we passed last session had the war spirit breathed into them.

But I find that I have already taken up more time than I intended, and I shall resume my seat in a moment or two. Before doing so, however, I should like to say a word or two about the threatened Royal Commission to investigate the grain trade. I know nothing about the grain trade, I cannot talk in terms of wheat, and it goes against the grain for me to talk about it. But I was rather astonished to find that this important question should have been relegated to the gentlemen who occupy seats in the rear of this chamber. It came on rather suddenly. One day the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) threatened the Agrarian group with a Royal Commission of inquiry into the grain trade; next day another hon. gentleman took it up; next day still another hon. gentleman took it up; and finally all along the line we found a wonderful similarity in the addresses of these hon. gentlemen, until one could not but conclude that some person higher in authority than these gentlemen was giving them their cue; they spoke in such parrot tones that one might very well come to the conclusion that they were under the tuition of the professor of parrotology in the Government; but of course that is one of the mysteries into which we are not permitted to delve. I am inclined to think that if a Royal Commission is to be appointed the gentlemen from the Agrarian group will be able to give a pretty good account of themselves. They look to me as rather decent, honourable and respectable citizens.

Mr. LALOR: Coax them along.

Mr. JACOBS: If they are not, so much the worse for them. It is a matter with which we on this side of the House are not concerned. But, as I said before, I believe they are well able to take care of themselves.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, may I refer to the talk of conciliation towards the province of Quebec? I come from that province. I represent a division which is largely French Canadian, and I think I understand the mentality of those people. They were sufficiently tolerant and wide in their views to elect me to be their representative in this House—an example which I have yet to see from other parts of the Dominion. From time to time we read in the government press articles of a conciliatory character with regard to Quebec. We are told that the people of that province are safe, that they are sane, that they are progressive, that they are conservative and that they have all the virtues which it is possible for a race to possess. A great change has come over this people since 1917, evidently. But, Sir, do you think that the province of Quebec is going to be won by mere lip service such as is indulged in by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House? When you find positions to which French-speaking Canadians are rightly entitled taken from them and given to English-speaking Canadians, when you find them ignored in the filling of public appointments, do you think those people have for the rest of the country, and particularly for the Government, those "Christian" feelings which you would like to inculcate in their breasts? Let me take, for instance, the appointment recently to the International Joint Commission. One of the three positions occupied by representatives of this country had been held by a French Canadian ever since the Commission was established, the first gentleman appointed being Mr. Aime Geoffrion, of Montreal, the second hon. Thomas Chase-Casgrain, and the third hon. P. B. Mignault, who is now a judge of the Supreme Court. The vacancy caused by his accepting a judgeship was filled by this Government appointing Sir William Hearst. A poor Tory politician out of a job—a discredited Tory politician with nothing to do, is appointed as French representative on the International Joint Commission. That is a sample of the attempt at the conciliation of Quebec. Is it at all surprising, Mr. Speaker, when hon. gentlemen on the other side invite Quebec to give them support, that, as my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) said, the poor fish from St. Hyacinthe is the only one that they landed.

Then, let me take the case of the appointment to the Senate last year of a gentleman to take the place of the late Senator Landry. Senator Landry typified a certain element who are very strong in their views with regard to certain questions—the Catholic school question particularly. He was a gentleman of very high intellect and of considerable ability. He died in due course of time and was gathered unto his fathers, and the French Canadian who took his place was a gentleman named Lorne C. Webster. Then, there was the case of the ill-fated Board of Commerce, which was born with the seeds of death in it. No French Canadian was appointed to that Board; perhaps that is why it died so early, because French Canadians are long-lived people. That ought to be a lesson to my hon. friends on the other side; it should cause them to see to it that they appoint to positions of that sort men who are noted for vitality. The failure of the Government to appoint a French Canadian on the Board of Commerce was keenly resented throughout the whole province of Quebec. I could go on naming other instances in which traditions have been broken down by this Government—traditions which had been consecrated by fifty years of custom. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite ask us of the province of Quebec to come in, and lend them a hand when they are in dire straits. It is expecting too much of flesh and blood to ask Quebec to do anything for this Government under the circumstances, and so long as such treatment is meted out to them, just so long shall we have on this side a solid block from that province opposing the Government tooth and nail, until we have them on the run—which I think, Mr. Speaker, we have succeeded in doing at last. The Government, Mr. Speaker, is tottering to its fall. No power on earth can now save it; it is moribund. It is said that of the dead we should say nothing but good. All I can say of the Government is, in the words of Shakespeare:

Vex not his ghost; O, let him pass; he hates him,
That would upon the rack of this tough world
Stretch him out longer.

Mr. H. O. WRIGHT (Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in rising at so late a period to make a few observations in this debate, I am sure it will not be possible for me to offer much that is new. However, I feel it my duty to occupy a few moments of the time of the House before the vote is finally recorded.

Before proceeding, let me offer my congratulations to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) who has since last session been elevated to the high position of Prime Minister of this country. I do not hesitate for one moment in saying that as a new member I have admired the great efforts he put forth during the period of the war in his desire to serve our country and the Empire. Since assuming the high office he now holds, his courage and resourcefulness have been greatly admired, even by those who do not agree with his policies or with the pretensions of the multi-named party which he leads.

Lest I should be accused of violating a time-honoured custom in this debate, allow me, Mr. Speaker, to extend to the mover (Mr. McIssac) and the seconder (Mr. MacKelvie) of this motion, my felicitations. I would be remiss in my duty if I did not extend my congratulations also in another direction. Since this Parliament last met an incident has occured which is of far reaching national importance: I refer to the fact that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has been selected by a very large portion of the people of this country as leader of the new National Progressive Party. In my opinion their selection of a leader has been a wise one, for in the member for Marquette we have a man of very wide business experience in Canada, a man who has risen from the ranks of the people, who is thoroughly conversant with their problems through knowledge gained from personal experience, and, most important of all, a man whose integrity and honesty of purpose is beyond reproach.

Lest I should forget it later, I wish to express my appreciation of the kind references made in regard to this group by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. (Mr. Jacobs): I trust that we shall not disappoint him. I merely wish to thank him for his kind words.

I shall not attempt to follow along the by-roads into which this debate has led us; I will endeavour to confine myself for the most part to one or two items of national importance. The country has been very considerably agitated by the introduction into the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States of a measure which, in its effect, aims at the vitals of one of our chief industries. I refer to the Fordney Bill. Too much importance cannot be placed upon the effect that that legislation may have upon the agricultural industry of this country should it become law. I am informed that three quarters of the wheat exported from this country last fall found its way into the United States. Had a measure been in force such as is contemplated in the Fordney Bill it is my opinion that the result would have created a financial panic in a great portion of this country. The effect upon the grain-growing industry would have been disastrous; it would have shut out practically the only market we had for our grain. The surprising feature of this situation, Sir, is that during the time this most important legislation was before Congress, Canada, which, we are told, has assumed the status of nationhood—and I sincerely hope it is true—was without official representation in that country. Not only that, but even the good offices of the British Ambassador were not available owing to his absence overseas. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) has informed the House that it has been decided to appoint an ambassador at Washington, but the delay is in the selection of a man suitable for the position. It did not seem very difficult to secure suitable men to represent us at the Peace Congress and at the Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva; surely it cannot be so difficult to find a suitable representative to go to Washington to protect our interests there.

I am quite sure it is not generally known in the country to the south of us that Canada is her second best customer. But that condition is easily understood when we realize that our Canadian interests have not been properly represented in the United States and that therefore the importance of the Canadian market is not appreciated.

I would urge upon the Government the necessity of the immediate appointment of a capable ambassador at Washington. Further delay may mean the placing of agriculture and of the myriad industries that depend upon it in a very precarious condition, which otherwise could in all probability be avoided. We should also have trade representatives in all the large cities of the United States.

The Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie), in his speech the other day, told us that there were two ways in correcting the adverse trade balance: one was to buy less from the United States and the other was to sell more. The latter process appeals to me very strongly. Surely such trade representatives would be of inestimable value in procuring outlets for manufactured goods of Canadian origin. It must be a source of great inspiration to Canadian manufacturers to look to the south and see the great market that exists there for their goods. There is nothing wrong with the goods they manufacture; those goods will compete favourably with any they may meet on the world's markets. What our manufacturers need is a broader vision and, as has been so well expressed by the hon. leader of this party (Mr. Crerar), courage to go out and fight the commercial battle with those who, in most cases, are not any better armed than they. These trade representatives would be of great assistance in guiding their efforts and would act as a searchlight to guide them in securing new outlets for their goods.

There is another matter to which I should like to direct attention. During the period last fall when grain was being shipped to the market from the farmers in western Canada, very great difficulty was experienced in obtaining cars, more particularly along the lines now operated by the Canadian National system. At practically every shipping point along the Grand Trunk Pacific, which is now under the control of the Canadian National system, and which runs through the constituency which I have the honour to represent, grain buyers were instructed to purchase only one car of grain and no more until that car had been finally disposed of. The grain was taken into the elevator for storage, but no purchases could be made beyond the limitation I have mentioned. The result was that in a very short time the elevators were filled, and the farmer who needed money to meet his financial obligations found himself in a position where he had the value in grain to meet those obligations, but he could not find any market for it. In the meantime, the market value of wheat was going down at an alarming rate, and the loss sustained by those men was very serious. The cause of this condition seems to have been the great shortage on the Canadian National system of cars suitable for shipping grain. In many districts that I visited last fall, the farmers were hauling their grain many miles beyond Grand Trunk Pacific points in order to get to the Canadian Pacific where cars were available.

I am pointing this out more to acquaint the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) with the facts, than for the sake of offering criticism, in the hope that this condition may be remedied before another crop is placed on the market.

Besides the serious loss that has been suffered by the farmers on account of the shortage of grain cars on the Canadian National system, there is another important feature. A very substantial increase in freight rates was granted to the railway companies last year, but owing to the shortage of cars in the early part of the wheat shipping season, our National system was not in a position to take full advantage of this increase. As a result, we have been called upon to pay a greatly increased freight rate, largely to the Canadian Pacific railway, and on top of that, we shall have to get down into our pockets and pay the deficit on the Canadian National system, thus paying twice, whereas, had there been sufficient cars to earn the additional revenue mentioned, we would have had to pay only once, to some degree at least.

I now come to a subject which, up to a day or two ago, seemed to be a rather dangerous one for a member sitting in this group to approach. I refer to the Canada Wheat Board. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been patting themselves on the back for the success of the Wheat Board, and they have tried to make it appear that every member in this group was diametrically opposed to it. That is not the fact, as I am sure they are convinced now after the proofs that have been placed on Hansard by previous speakers. Every member of this group was in favour of the continuance of the Wheat Board for another year, and if my hon. friends opposite pat themselves on the back because of the success of the board, what have they to say about its discontinuance? Nothing. As soon as it was seen in the West that the board was a success and a great boon to the farmers, we asked for its continuance for another year; but the Government, supported by those hon. gentlemen said: "No; we will not allow it to continue," this, notwithstanding the fact that the same or practically the same system of buying by Government commission, axisted in 1920 as existed in 1919. Even in the statement read by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Blair), there is no proof that Mr. H. W. Woods, President of the United Farmers of Alberta, was opposed to the Wheat Board if it were kept clear of politics. Mr. Woods, at the Moosejaw convention of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, stated that, in his opinion, if the Canada Wheat Board had been continued for another year, that is the year 1920, it would have saved the farmers of western Canada at least $50,000,000. That is the statement also made by the hon. member for Battle River. I do not know whether he obtained his statistics from Mr. Woods or not. I see he shakes his head, but he will agree with Mr. Woods on that one point at least. I well remember in the debate which took place upon the Wheat Board last year, that the hon. leader of this party hesitated to commit himself to the endorsation of the Canada Wheat Board as a permanent institution, but he made a strong plea for its continuance during 1920 until selling conditions became more normal. Compare his attitude with that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and what do we find? The leader of this party asked for the continuation of the Board for another year; but the Minister of Trade and Commerce absolutely refused, no doubt on the strength of representations made to him by parties interested in the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and in other lines of commercial endeavour, who draw their incomes from the grain produced on the farm on its way to the ultimate consumer.

The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) appears to have made a great discovery. In his speech the other day, amid the tremendous applause of those who sit around him, more particularly those from Western Canada, be announced that there were abuses in the grain trade in Western Canada. Well, that was not at all surprising to those sitting in this group, and I would remind the hon. gentleman that in the very first remarks I made in this House on the Budget of 1918, I drew the attention of the Government to that very fact. It is now suggested, with a blare of trumpets, that a commission is to be appointed to investigate the grain trade in Western Canada, I have this to say to the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders), who seems to be heading this agitation on the Government side and also to the Government: that if this Commission is appointed, and if it is composed of practical men capable of investigating the grain trade, men of integrity, men free from political influence, it will have my entire support; but I would remind the hon. member for Macdonald and the Government, that the people of this country are becoming somewhat tired of the continual procession of commissions that have been appointed since 1917 and before, and which have professed a very great deal, but, in the estimation of the people have accomplished very little. The only real accomplishment, Mr. Speaker, that I can call to mind has been from a commission which is not precisely a Government commission; I refer to the Board of Railway Commissioners. They have succeeded in raising the freight rates. I do not think under the circumstances that hon. gentlemen sitting in this group can be accused of being overly suspicious if they suggest that the appointment of this commission to investigate the grain trade in Western Canada is being urged more for political purposes than for any real good that may come to the farmers as a result of its investigations.

The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), in what seemed to me to be a very able address this afternoon, pointed out a very patent fact, and I think the same fact was pointed out by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), namely, that the commission under whose jurisdiction the grain trade of Western Canada is at the present time, is a Government commission entirely under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). Therefore, if this new commission finds anything wrong with the grain trade, I fear that the censure will fall on the heads of hon. gentlemen opposite.

A few days ago we had a speech from the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier). I am sure we all thoroughly enjoyed that speech as an oratorical effort. With regard to the main portion of his speech I have nothing to say, because it had to do with what is more or less a family quarrel in the official Opposition party; but I find on page 86 of Hansard a reference which he made to so-called foreign-born living in Western Canada, and I think it is my duty as a representative of some of those foreign-born, and as a citizen of Western Canada, to draw attention to the hon. gentleman's remarks. He said:

> Sir, I have no objection to the people of the West; none at all. I respect them. They came her to draw from the soil the wealth which Providence has stored there for those who are sturdy enough to work and obtain it. I have no objection to their helping us to develop the country. But, Mr. Speaker, figures are figures, and I have before me figures that show that west of the Great Lakes 63 per cent of the population are not British born. This is not my fault, but it is a fact. Am I going to preach an alliance with those who have not the same ideals as we have and who do not love our institutions? No, Sir, I cannot do that; for one, I will not consent to it. Everyone, of course, is at liberty to choose his own ally. I am choosing mine, and I shall try to make my people see as I do in this matter.

Taking into consideration the fact that from year to year the various governments have spent a considerable amount of the people's money in an effort to bring immigration to this country, and have been very successful in obtaining a great number of foreign-born settlers in Western Canada, I think such references are unfortunate, to say the least. We in Western Canada fully realize that before we can have a thoroughly united people, these people of foreign birth must be assimilated into our population, and must be taught our Canadian ideals. I have travelled among these people to whom my hon. friend makes reference, and from my own personal experience I wish to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have none of his apprehension. I would remind him of the fact that a great many of these so-called foreign-born have come into this country to escape oppression in their native land, and thoroughly appreciate the freedom and the privileges which they enjoy in Canada, and they are true and loyal to our institutions.

I wondered when I heard the hon. gentleman's remarks if he referred to the American-born in Western Canada. We have thousands and thousands of American-born citizens in Western Canada, and we have no finer settlers there. These people have practically the same ideals that we have. They are industrious and they are making splendid citizens of this country. I call to mind an instance which will go to prove the statement that these people are rapidly becoming true Canadian citizens. A few years ago a family came to Western Canada from the State of Indiana. There was a young girl in that family. She completed her education in the province of Saskatchewan, and later was employed as a school teacher in the district in which I reside. I have had occasion to go many times to that school house. I have taken a particular interest in it, as I do in most of the schools in my constituency, and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no school teacher in this country who is more zealous in teaching the love of Canada and true Canadian ideals to her pupils than that little girl from Indiana.

There comes to my mind another instance. Another family came from the United States to Saskatchewan. The head of this family had been at one time President of the Senate in one of the States of the American Union. He brought with him two sons. The father took up a considerable tract of land, and is one of the largest farmers in the district where he resides. He is a respected citizen, a man who takes a keen interest in all our local institutions. He is keenly interested in all the political affairs of this country, and has given every evidence of loyalty to our institutions. His sons publish a weekly paper in a town in Saskatchewan. I am a subscriber to that little country paper, and I want to say that in its editorial columns I have read just as strong a defence of Canadian and British institutions as I ever read in any periodical published anywhere in Canada by men who are British or Canadian-born.

I happened to come across one of these editorials to-day, and I shall endeavour to read without mentioning the names which appear in it. I merely quote this article to show the class of editorials that appear in this paper, published by sons of a man president of the Senate in a certain state in the American Union and who has come to Canada and settled here. The occasion that brought forth this editorial was the dedication of a community hall in the town where these people reside. A certain gentleman was asked to make an address at the meeting and he made the statement that he found himself in a district in which the majority were of foreign origin. A letter was published later in this paper commenting on the address of this gentleman and the editorial comment was as follows:

> But there is one reference in Mr. Griffin's letter that the Despatch takes exception to, and that is where he states that Mr ——— found himself in the midst of a foreign majority. Mr. ——— was not in any such place at the hall He was visiting a Canadian town and was surrounded by Canadians. And we venture the opinion that Mr. ——— knows that he could travel the length of Great Britain and her possessions and nowhere would he find a community living more in harmony, more loyal to Canadian institutions, or more proud of British freedom. The fact that we are not natives is, strictly speaking, something that we all have in common. But our people are naturalized in law and in heart and would resent by an overwhelming majority at the poll any candidate who sought to curry favour by introducing sectionalism.

That is the sentiment expressed by some of the so-called foreign born. It has often occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, that the difficulty we encounter in Western Canada in assimilating the foreign-born, lies not with those people themselves but with our own Canadian-born and British-born subjects. It appears to me that what we need is a broader and stronger Canadian national spirit. When you find men who are always vaunting their birth-place and proclaiming from the house-tops the fact that they are descended from fathers born in England, Scotland, or Ireland, as the case may be—when you find Canadian-born men walking around and calling themselves Englishmen, Scotchmen and Irishmen, what can you expect those who come from Germany to do? Why, the German-born settler in western Canada will say "I am German;" and why should he not? What we want in this country, Mr. Speaker, is more people who will boldly declare, when asked concerning their nationality, that they are Canadians.

In connection with this subject I should like to cite a personal incident that occurred when the last census was being taken in Canada. It may be of interest to those who have charge of the present work in connection with the forthcoming census. I was in the town of Unity, Saskatchewan, when the Census Commissioner came and requested the necessary information in order to compile his statistics. We came to the point of nationality and the commissioner asked me, of course, what my nationality was. I told him I was Canadian. "Yes," he said, "I understand that; we are all Canadians. But you must be descended from people of extraneous origin. "Well," I replied, "I am not descended from any other nationality at all; I am just a Canadian." "What was your father's nationality?"—he then demanded. I said: "My father is a Canadian." The next question was: "Was he born in Canada?" I said "yes." "Well then," he said becoming rather annoyed, "Where was your grandfather born?" I replied: "He was born in Canada and you may go back one of two generations more and I will give you the same answer." Then he said: "Well, we have no column in this return for Canadian nationality." And my answer was: "If I am not a Canadian, I am nothing, and you may call me a Negro or a Chinaman or anything else you choose. My answer is simply, I am a Canadian."

Mr. HAY: Was that in 1911?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much having occupied so much time, but I desire for a moment to refer to a paragraph in the speech delivered the other day by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). I had not the privilege of hearing the hon. gentleman's speech, but on looking over the report of his address in Hansard, I find that it was more or less an attack of a rather violent nature against this party and particularly against our leader (Mr. Crerar). I should like to read one paragraph of the hon. gentleman's speech. On page 306 of Hansard, the hon. member for East Algoma is reported as follows:

> What has been the attiude of the hon. member for Marquette, their leader, towards the farmers of this country? The hon. gentleman was Minister of Agriculture for at least a year and a half at a period when every Government in Canada, provincial and federal, backed by the whole body of public opinion, was bending its energies to increase production, when the Dominion Treasury one might say, was wide open for the hon. gentleman to use its funds in any way that would stimulate our agricultural production. Can he point to one single Act that passed through this House at his suggestion to improve the condition of our farmers? Not one single Act or suggestion.

We see expressed in that paragraph the opinion of the hon. member for East Algoma of the hon. leader of this party. Without further comment, let me read the opinion of another hon. gentleman of this House, the right hon. member for Kings, Nova Scotia, (Sir Robert Borden), the late Prime Minister, of whom the leader of this party was at one time a colleague. On June 4th 1919, on the occasion of the resignation of the hon. member for Marquette, the right hon. member for Kings wrote as follows:

My dear Mr. Crerar, I have received with deep and unfeigned regret your resignation as a member of the Government but I entirely appreciate and respect the sincerity of the convictions which have impelled you to take that course. It will be my immediate duty to acquaint His Excellency the Governor General with your decision and to request his authority for the acceptance of your resignation. During the period of nearly two years in which you have been one of my colleagues your high sense of public duty, your fine ability and indefatigable energy have made your service to the country especially valuable. Within that period problems of an exceptionally difficult character have continually presented themselves, and I am most grateful to you, and to all my colleagues for the loyal assistance and earnest effort which on all such occasions have been of invaluable assistance to me in the consideration of such questions.

My association with you as one of my colleagues will always be to me a happy memory and I know that I may express this to you on behalf of all the members of the Government.

I am very grateful for your kind words in respect to my own part in public affairs since it has been my privilege to have you as one of my colleagues.

With every good wish

Believe me,

Dear Mr. Crerar,

Yours faithfully,

R. L. BORDEN.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here the opinion of two members of the House with respect to the leader of the Progressive party. The first is the opinion of the member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). It is quite possible that he may hold his opinion in higher esteem than he does that of the hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) but I reserve the right to use my own judgment in the matter, and for my part I prefer the judgment of the former leader of the Government.

I would like to refer for a moment to the speech delivered a short time ago by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie). It will be remembered that the Minister of Militia followed the hon. member for Red Deer in this debate. The remarks of the Minister of Militia in reference to the splendid speech delivered by the hon. member for Red Deer were very scant indeed. He had no answer to make to the criticisms offered by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clark) and I think there was a very good reason for it—he could not find any arguments against them. He brushed aside the splendid effort, the magnificent speech of the hon. member for Red Deer, with the statement that this country was not very much interested in British politics, that it was much more concerned with Canadian politics. Well, we all agree with that statement, but did the minister not realize that in speaking as he did he was passing censure upon the Prime Minister. Practically the whole of the recent speech of the hon. member for Red Deer was a reply to a speech delivered by the Prime Minister at the last session of Parliament, when the latter made a comparison between British and Canadian politics and drew his own inference therefrom, and in the opinion of a good many, the premier's conclusions were not very well founded.

I would like to pass on to a paragraph in the speech of the Minister of Militia in which he referred to the commercial activities of the organized farmers of Western Canada. On page 43 of Hansard we find that the minister made the following statement:

But there is another point of view in regard to this matter. It is said that we in Canada are to-day suffering, to some extent at least, from unemployment. Is it a patriotic thing, or a sound thing economically, to take the money of the people of Canada at this critical period, to send it across to the United States to give employment in the factories there, to pay wages and keep employed citizens of the United States, while so many good Canadians during the past few months have been looking for jobs in this country? Would it not, in the first place, be a more patriotic thing, and in the second place, a sounder thing economically, if the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and his friends of the United Grain Growers would look about them in this country to the scores, yes, even hundreds, of Canadian manufacturers who can supply the goods they require, and try to make terms with them, spend their money in this country and thus give employment to unemployed Canadians.

That sentiment meets with the approval of all. I do not need to go into any details as to why the United Grain Growers' Company did not handle Cana-

10 p.m. dian goods. That question was very thoroughly dealt with by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) this afternoon. He stated that on the organization of the commercial activities of the United Farmers' they went to the Canadian manufacturers and tried to obtain Canadian goods. They could not do so because the Canadian manufacturers would not sell to them. Now, in all fairness I would say this: There may be a good reason why the Canadian manufacturers could not supply them, but they have never considered it worth while to make that explanation. When the Minister of Militia was reading us this lecture across the floor of the House perhaps it would have been more to the point for him to have turned about and addressed his remarks to the manufacturer members who sit behind him. If anybody is to blame for the condition that exists, for the quantity of American goods that is being handled by the Grain Growers' Organization in Western Canada, it is those very manufacturers who refuse to supply Canadian goods. I wonder if the Government are so keen and so anxious as they profess to keep their money in Canada and in all cases to purchase Canadian goods. We had a short time ago the case of the Government wishing to re-organize the Civil Service. Did they employ a Canadian firm to do that work? I think not. It appears to me that I heard a faint whisper somewhere that they went to Chicago and obtained the services of the Griffenhagen Company to carry out this work of reorganization, or disorganization, or whatever it may be. In this connection I would like to refer to another case. I am told that there is a garage maintained in the city of Ottawa in which are housed a number of automobiles for the use of Cabinet Ministers, Government cars paid for by Government money. I am not criticising that. It may be all right to buy these cars for the ministers; they may be perfectly entitled to use them. That is not the point I want to bring out. It is well known to you, Sir, and to hon. members that quite a number of splendid automobiles are manufactured in Canada by Canadian labour. Did the Government purchase cars of Canadian manufacture for the ministers' use? I think not. It strikes me that one of the makes that they run is called the "Cadillac," and I never heard of a "Cadillac" car being manufactured in Canada.

Another example comes to my mind. I remember very well a year or two ago when the Department of the Interior—which was then presided over by the present Prime Minister—decided to plough certain wild prairie land held by the Department of Indian Affairs and it was necessary to purchase machinery for the purpose. Did the hon. Minister of the Interior of that day, who is now the Prime Minister, insist on the purchase of Canadian made machinery for that purpose? Oh, no. He purchased Rumely traction engines, six of them, manufactured in Laporte, Indiana, notwithstanding the fact, which is very well known, that good traction engines are manufactured in the province of Ontario by Canadian labour, using, I presume, Canadian materials.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have already taken up more time than I intended. I just wish to make a few remarks in regard to my stand on the vote which will shortly be taken. I was elected in the general election of 1917 to support—not the present Government but the preceding government for the period of the war. I wish to emphasize that point, it was for the period of the war that I was elected to support the Government then under the leadership of the right hon. member for King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden). We met in Battleford constituency—the executives of the two old political parties—and we came to an understanding to form a union of forces for a specific purpose—for the purpose of electing a member to come to Ottawa and support a Union Government for the period of the war, the specific purpose being the winning of the war; no other issue whatsoever entered into the arrangement. I remember on one or two platforms the tariff issue was mentioned, and the answer was given that we were not concerned about the tariff at all; the point in our minds was whether the money derived from the tariff would be spent in the Dominion of Canada or in Germany. That was the sentiment all through the campaign. I believe that I am properly expressing the sentiments of the vast majority not only in the constituency I have the honour to represent, but in all of Western Canada, and, I think, in a good deal of Eastern Canada as well, when I say that, regardless of any constitutional aspect of the case, the people of this country believe that the Government has outlived its mandate and that there should be a general election.

I differ from the Government on their tariff policy, and I take it that that is the chief issue in the speech of His Excellency. Therefore it will be my duty to vote want of confidence in the Government.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I desire to take to myself and to offer to the House and to the country a comforting thought. I think that in the strife of party politics men sometimes magnify the evil which is to be wrought upon their beloved country if their own particular notion of public affairs should not happen to prevail. It is as well perhaps that we should guard against an error of that sort, and while each of us may press as earnestly as be likes his particular line of thought, it will be better, I think, if we keep in mind the fact that even if our view shall not prevail the sun will still rise and the King's Government will be carried on.

Naturally, from my point of view, I think the best kind of Government that this country can have is a Liberal Government. I think the traditions and history of the past show that. And if we may have a Liberal Government at no distant day, I trust that it may be as successful in the future as it has been in the days that have gone by. But perhaps that admirable condition of affairs is not attainable; it may be that we cannot have the blessing of a Liberal Government at an early day, and we may have to be content with a Farmer Government. It is quite conceivable, it is quite possible. Now, the prospect, if you so regard it, of a Farmer Government sitting in the seats of the mighty here, does not alarm me in any way as it does hon. gentlemen opposite. I cannot subscribe to the Farmers' view on all things, but I decline to regard the farmers of this country as Bolshevists, or Anarchists, or Communists, or any other kind of 'ists except good Canadianists. I have an abiding faith that if in the movement of events our Farmer friends should be entrusted with power the sense of responsibility which will then come to them will lead them to pursue a moderate course, and that though we may not agree with it on one side or the other, I cannot conceive that from that course there will flow any particular disaster to this Dominion. So a Liberal Government is the first choice; and a Farmer Government would not be too bad; and I will go so far as to say that if the worst comes to the worst—and that means if we have a Tory Government—the country could survive event that. The truth is, it is a case in which the patient, that is, the Dominion, is so strong that it can stand the doctoring schemes of any one of these parties and still survive.

I join most heartily in what has been said in congratulation of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government (Mr. Meighen) upon his attaining at a comparatively early age the high position which he now occupies. It has been my misfortune often to differ with the right hon. gentleman, and I am very much afraid that our conceptions of public affairs are such that our difference will continue; but that should not prevent me recognizing, as I do in all sincerity, that he will bring to the duties of his high office great qualities—first, the quality, the superb and highest of all qualities, high personal character; he will bring to it marked ability, of which we all have had evidence; and he will bring to it untiring industry. These are great qualities. May I not say too—and that is where the comforting thought comes in—that we have similar qualities in the two hon. gentlemen who lead the other parties? In my hon. friend who sits at my side, the leader of the Liberal party (Mr. Mackenzie King), and in my hon. friend the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), the leader of the Farmers' party, we have men who have also youth on their side, who have character, who have talent, who have industry. And from that I draw this thought, that no matter what may occur, this country cannot go so very far wrong when it comes under the leadership of any one of these three gentlemen. These qualities that I have mentioned—personal character, great ability and great industry—are indeed splendid qualities in mankind; they are qualities which each of these gentlemen brings as an asset to the Party which he leads: they are qualities which they all bring as assets in the common service of our country.

Among the subjects that have been discussed in this debate on the Address, not the least interesting has been the question of the League of Nations. It is true, as my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) said yesterday, that our representatives at the League of Nations have valiantly defended in this House that which nobody is attacking. This House is unanimous in its belief in the League of Nations. I myself am most cordially in favour of the League. I am not only in favour of it in principle, but I am in the main in favour of the machinery whereby the League of Nations is created. It may be within the recollection of the House that when the question of the Treaty of Versailles was before Parliament I gave expression to some views concerning Canada's participation in the League of Nations, in which I was careful to say that I spoke for myself only. I differed from the hon.

gentlemen opposite and I differed from many of the hon. gentlemen surrounding me. I want to be permitted again to state briefly my position in that respect.

I have said that I warmly favoured the League of Nations. It has not accomplished all that was hoped for; it has disappointed some people, and many look upon it to-day with very great gloom. I do not take that view. I regard the League of Nations as a noble scheme for a noble end, and even though it may not accomplish all that was intended, I regard it as a case, indeed, in which it is better to have tried and failed than not to have tried at all. Although the League of Nations has disappointed me in some respects, and although it is particularly disappointing in the failure of the United States to join—I can hardly conceive of its being a success if that nation stays out—nevertheless, with all the criticism that is offered, I still desire to be counted as a warm admirer and supporter of the League of Nations.

My difference was with regard to the manner in which Canada was participating in that League. Again let me remind the House that I am speaking entirely for myself on that particular point. My view of the matter was this: in all that makes for our Imperial relations; in all that concerns the relations between Canada and the Mother Country and other portions of the British Empire, in what I may call the inner circle of our Imperial family, I want Canada to occupy, as she has occupied for many years, a position of ever-increasing weight and influence. When we come to deal with foreign affairs, I am not desirous that Canada shall play a part of her own, separate and apart from the British Empire. I want the British Empire, when we come to deal with foreign affairs, to enter every conference as a unit, not as representing several places. Even in matters concerning Canada alone; even in Imperial matters in which Canada is particularly interested, my desire would naturally be that Canada should be, as she has been, represented by Canadians, but I would have them go into the conference not merely as Canadians, but as representatives of the British Empire. I expressed the fear—and I am not going to withdraw that expression to-day—that with the best of intentions—and I do not for a moment question the good intentions of the gentlemen concerned—this declaration on the part of the Dominions that they must have a separate existence in all these conferences, and a separate existence in the League of Nations, was not making for that Imperial unity that we should desire, but was paving the way towards separation. I have seen no reason to change my view in that respect.

There is a small party in Canada which desires the separation of this country from the British Empire; which desires the independence of Canada; which desires Canada to withdraw from the Empire and set up as an independent sovereign nation. I have spoken of it as a small party; it may be larger than we know. I speak of it as a small party because only a few gentlemen have identified themselves publicly with that movement. They are gentlemen of high standing, gentlemen of ability, gentlemen whose sincerity we can respect, even though we may not agree with their conclusions. But I want to call the attention of the House to this significant fact: I find that so far as I have come in contact with or learned the views of these gentlemen, every advocate of the independence of Canada looks with approval upon Canada's position in the League of Nations because he regards it as the beginning of a movement for the separation of Canada from the Empire.

That view is not held by me alone. There are several things occurring in relation to the proceedings of the League of Nations, to some of which I will draw attention. The speeches of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), of the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), our three representatives at the League of Nations, were very interesting. They gave us some information and presented their case as gentlemen of ability always do. But there were some things going on in the League of Nations about which they did not tell us; and it is a pity that we have to look to outside sources for some of the information that we ought to get here. I think that as the consequences of our action unfold themselves, there will be a revision of some of the judgments hastily formed a year or two ago—I think I see evidence already that on both sides of the House light is breaking.

There is a financial side to the question which some members will regard as important. The League of Nations is a rather expensive luxury. I hold in my hand an article which describes what is called by responsible men the "great extravagance" of that body. I will trouble the House only with the headlines:

Fat Sinecures on Paid Personnel of Commissions. Allied captains receive much more than Marshal Foch, state French. Flagrant Injustice. Most Scandalous of Anomalies Inaugurated by Versailles Treaty. Princely Chauffeurs.

Now, of all that extravagance Canada pays her share. I am not presenting that as a serious side of the matter; by-and-by some members of the House who feel more keenly interested in that class of question than I do may draw attention to it. I only mention it in passing; I do not regard it as the gravest situation. The gravest position arising out of our action with respect to the League of Nations is that we are having the unfortunate spectacle—the word is not too strong—of the representatives of Canada and the representatives of the Empire quarrelling in the eyes of the public at the Peace Conference and at the League of Nations. There is evidence of that, and as the hon. gentleman did not give us a full report of all these things, we have to resort to the press. I find the following report from Geneva, dated December, 1920:

During yesterday's voting the British Empire was divided on nearly every question, Canada and South Africa voting against Great Britain regarding Armenia, and Australia abstaining from voting when the question of Bulgaria was before the Assembly.

Canada and the Empire voting against one another, quarrelling before the wide world, and showing that there is not that unity of the Empire which all should desire to bring about. Well, there is further information along the same line. I have before me a quotation from a New York journal. Careful observers in the public press are noticing what is happening in these proceedings; they are noticing the quarrels between the representatives of the Mother Country and those of the Dominions, and every enemy of Great Britain and the Empire is getting aid and comfort from these quarrels—which, I say, are not creditable to Canada, not creditable to the dominions generally. Here is an article from the New York World:

The Dominions disagree not only with the Mother Country, but with one another. England wants the Council to be supreme; Canada, South Africa and India claim equal rights for the Assembly. Canada is supporting the compulsory adjudication of international disputes, as urged by Elihu Root, which England opposes. On the questions of admitting Germany to the League and disarmament, as to which England has expressed no final opinion, the dominions are sharply in conflict.

Again we have evidence that the differences and quarrels between the representatives of the Mother Country and the representatives of Canada and the other dominions are attracting the notice of the outside world; and who shall say that conditions of that kind are making for Imperial unity? Let me quote another passage. We are all acquainted with that venerable labour leader, whose eloquent voice we heard down in the Museum two or three years ago, Mr. Samuel Gompers. There is much in his record that I admire; but in this particular instance, I regret what he had to say. He said:

"It was my experience," continued Mr. Gompers, "and I look upon it as something of a dependable guide, that the votes of the representatives of these Dominions and Commonwealths were more often with the United States than with Britain."

That is the fruit of Canada's participation in the matter—insisting on having an opportunity to play her own game. I know every hon. member in this House feels as I do in regard to the need for Imperial unity. I do not ascribe anything but the best motives to any hon. gentleman who differs from me, but I ask my hon. friends to think seriously over the situation as presented where, instead of having an Empire with a united front to promote peace, we have the representatives of the different sections of the Empire quarrelling in the eyes of the foreign world. It may be remembered that in discussing the League of Nations in this House, some of us took exception to one particular clause. In the particular point that I have been speaking of for the last few minutes, I have been speaking for myself, and I do not wish anybody now to endorse what I say. There came a moment in that discussion, when in the name of the Liberal party in this House, I made a motion in the House concerning the League of Nations. There was in that League one section known as Article X, which, if I may be permitted, I will read. It reads:

The members of the League undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

We did not undertake, although we did not like that clause, to move an amendment to it. We recognized the fact that a treaty, a bargain signed by a number of nations, could not be amended by the will of one. We did not even adopt the Washington practice, the method adopted there, of making reservations. All that we proposed to do was to say that there was a vagueness about that clause, and that it would be the part of wisdom if, while adopting the Treaty, while confirming it without any qualifications, we should place on record our understanding of what that clause should mean. Therefore, with the consent of my friends around me, I moved the following motion:

That in giving such approval—

That was the approval to the Treaty—

—this House in no way assents to any impairment of the existing autonomous authority of the Dominion, but declares that the question of what part, if any, the forces of Canada shall take in any war, actual or threatened, is to be determined at all times as occasion may require by the people of Canada through their representatives in Parliament.

That seemed a reasonable proposal. How were we met? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) denounced the motion. He declared that Article X and the Covenant generally were all right; that the instrument was a perfect one; that he would not have any interference; that it was a Holy of Holies; that it must not be touched, and so we were voted down and the League of Nations, including Article X, was approved. What do we find now? The right hon. gentleman, who would not listen to our representations in this House, went across the seas and deliberately proposed to strike out Article X altogether. The House may remember that when the question first came before the House, when the Prime Minister of that day, the hon. member for King's, N.S. (Sir Robert Borden), delivered a speech in explanation of the Treaty which he was submitting to the House, I ventured to ask him the question what would happen if the House should neglect or refuse to endorse the Treaty. My right hon. friend said that in that case there would have to be a change of Government, and he would have to go out. So this was such a sacred document that interference with it in any degree would have brought on us that dissolution which some people seem to be so much alarmed about to-day. No words seemed to be too strong for my right hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) to utter in denouncing our proposition, which was not an amendment, not a reservation, but merely a declaration which we thought would make clear what should be the attitude of this Parliament in relation to any question of war. At that time, the Minister of Justice gave us his views as to how the matter should be dealt with. He said that it was highly improper that we should attempt to make any reservation or amendment or declaration of any form. He said that the treaty must go as it was; that it was all right. There was no word of doubt on his part. Then he went on to say that if it turned out by experience that there was something wrong about the treaty, if it needed change or amendment, there was a way in which that could be done. I quote from his speech:

I think that with what I have pointed out with regard to a better opportunity that will come for dealing with this Covenant, if it requires improvement as soon as the League of Nations has been brought into existence—with that present in our minds, and with this further fact present to our minds, that if any of us consider modification essential or of great importance, or if this House upon further consideration—

Observe that——should come to the conclusion that modification in connection with Article X or any other provision is necessary, it will be perfectly open and competent to this House, when it sends its representative to the League of Nations, to send him there with instruction as to the amendment, whether it be this or any other that, in the opinion of this House, is essential or necessary or desirable in the interests of Canada.

So the Minister of Justice pointed out that the proper, and the only proper, course for an amendment was that instruction should be given by the Parliament of Canada. What instruction did this Parliament ever give to the minister to go overseas and demand that Article X be stricken out? Article X and the whole treaty constituted a solemn compact to which this House became a party, and I deny the right of the Minister of Justice or anybody else, without the authority of this House, to go to Geneva and undertake, in the name of Canada, to move to amend that contract. The Minister of Justice did not even have instructions from his Government. I asked the question: What instructions were given? I asked the Government to bring down the Order in Council. They brought it down, and it simply set forth that a meeting of the League of Nations was to be held, and that the right hon. Minister of Justice, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), should be chosen as representatives of Canada. Not a line of instruction. By the very method that the Minister of Justice himself laid down, he should have come to this House for instructions, and he should not have tampered with that Covenant in a single line. His action in that regard was a specimen of the autocracy which this Government is manifesting all the time. It was an exhibition of the contempt that the Government has for Parliament, and it is one of the reasons why every man who respects the rights of Parliament will be justified to-day in voting no confidence in this Administration.

I have heard no effective answer, Mr. Speaker, to the contention advanced by the hon. leader of the Opposition at the beginning of this debate, that this Government no longer had a mandate to conduct public affairs, and that they were carrying on public affairs without any good reason to believe that they had the confidence of the country. I said I have heard no effective answer. Of course there has been one answer. It has come from many quarters, and has always been the same. They tell us that our right to sit here is within the law. They point to the British North America Act which says that Parliament "may" sit for five years, and they in effect translate that "may" into "shall," and make it appear it is our duty to sit here for the full term of five years. Sir, that is not the spirit of the British constitution. It is not enough in these days to say that a thing is within the law. That which is within the law is not always expedient. That which is within the law is not always honourable. I think it was the right hon. the Minister of Justice who pointed us to what was occurring at Washington. There, he said, was a government which was defeated four months ago, and is still in power. Well, the American system has its merits, or they would not have it, for they are a pretty intelligent people, and it is a fair assumption that for everything that exists in their system there is some good reason. But their system in that respect is not ours. There is a rigidity in the American system which no doubt has its purpose. They provide that their election shall take place on a given day, and you cannot change that at all. I do not say it is wrong; it is their method, and as I have said, it must have some merit or they would not have it. But our system is just the reverse. There is an elasticity in the British system which has its purpose and the purpose is not that we shall sit out for the full term of five years, but that as there become evidences of change of public opinion in the country Parliament may be dissolved in order that the Government of the day may ascertain whether or not Parliament possesses the confidence of the country. The argument advanced by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was fortified by many others, and particularly in the very able speech of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) yesterday. What thoughtful man could have listened to that speech without seeing that the whole spirit of the British constitution was against hon. gentlemen who hold office at the present time?

The Prime Minister and one or two other gentlemen speaking on that side made allusion to my own experience in Nova Scotia as having some bearing on this question. Why, they said, when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was Premier of Nova Scotia and resigned, there was no election necessary. That is true, but the conditions were not the same. I was for twelve years the premier of that province. I had made a record. The people thought it remarkable. I remember one kind friend, who was willing to pay me a compliment, although we differed on political questions, said the Government was all right so long as I stayed, but when I left, it would go to pieces. Well, I left it, and turned over the affairs to Mr. Murray, and he has been there for 25 years. Here in the changing scenes of this Ottawa climate, men may come and men may go, but down in Nova Scotia a good Liberal Government apparently may go on forever.

None of us on this side have contended that a change of leadership necessarily calls for an election. There is no such argument. When Sir John Macdonald died in 1891, nobody claimed that dissolution of Parliament was necessary. There had been an election only a few weeks before. When, at a later stage, Sir John Abbott passed off the stage, and Sir John Thompson succeeded him, nobody thought that an election was necessary. There was no change of policy, merely a change of the individual. And in later years, in every case of the kind where change in leadership takes place not involving any change in policy, there was no reason for having an election. Nobody contends that the mere fact of a change of leader creates the necessity for an election.

But what is the situation here? We have a new leader of the Government; there is no dispute about that. We have a new name; we have a new policy. Now it appears to me that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister is on the horns of a dilemma: either we have a new policy, or we have not. If we have a new policy, if it is a new Government, with a new leader, and a new policy, then no argument is needed to show that you must go to the country and obtain a mandate to support that leader and his policy. Oh, but, some say, it is not new, it is the same old business, there is no change, so you do not need an election. Well, there is a change of name. Mr. Speaker, a change of name to an individual or to a corporation is a grave and serious matter. The man who undertakes without lawful authority to change his name, the man who travels under an assumed name without lawful authority, the man who travels under a false name, furnishes presumptive evidence that he has fraudulent intent. If this is the same old policy, what justification have they for calling the party by a new name? Is it not presumptive evidence of camouflage, or something described by a stronger word? If the right hon. the Prime Minister says it is the same policy, the same Government, the same group of men, the same old thing, he cannot say that and at the same time justify the change of name. There is no escape from that. Either this is the old policy under a false name, or a new policy on which they are afraid to appeal to the country.

Several hon. gentlemen have expressed their personal opinions as to the understanding at the time of their election. A, B and C say: There was no bargaining with me. I was elected for the term of five years; no conditions were imposed, and therefore I assume it is right for the Government to go on. Many of us can probably say that, but what was the experience of any individual, where the matter was not discussed at all, is not important. What is important is, what was the general understanding in the country everywhere, and surely it does not admit of debate that the general understanding in the country was that the Government was chosen for the purpose of the war. Necessarily there had to be a laying aside of controverted questions in order that the Unionist Government might be formed. For what period were those controverted questions laid aside? I can imagine the interview of the Prime Minister of that day with one of my Liberal friends. "We must come together, gentlemen," he says, "for the winning of the war." "Certainly," says my Liberal friend. "Well then," says the Prime Minister "we will hang together till the war is over." "Yes, that is all right. We will lay aside controverted questions for that period." "Hold on," says the Prime Minister, "I want you to agree to put aside these matters for four years after the war." I do not believe that even my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) would have accepted the condition if laid down in that way.

It is perfectly evident that the Unionist Government was formed for a period during which reasonable request could be made for laying aside controverted questions, but the war being over, the moment events so shaped themselves that these controverted questions were thrusting themselves up for consideration, that moment the mandate of the Government to conduct public affairs ceased. I do not see how that can be a matter of dispute at all. Oh, some may say, it is a very foolish thing, this proposal that the Government's mandate has ended. Well, if we are foolish people in contending that, we are foolish in pretty good company. The Hon. Mr. Carvell, the former member for Carleton, New Brunswick, was a very active member of the Union Government, but Mr. Carvell felt that the mandate of the Government had ceased, and he retired. He is not a foolish man. He has received one of the highest offices in the gift of the Government. That, at all events, is a testimony to his sagacity and his capacity. There are others. My hon. friend the member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn), who so ably and so satisfactorily, I may say, discharged the duties of Minister of Militia and Defence, must have felt that the mandate of the Government had ended, for he resigned.

The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) also felt that the mandate of the Government had expired, that now questions having arisen, it was incumbent upon him to resign. Similarly, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), the moment they attempted to deal with the troublesome question of the tariff, found that he could not agree with them and therefore resigned; and he is not a fool. And the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), a very active and prominent member of the Union Government, evidently took the same view. He is not here to-night, but I should be doing him no injustice to say that the action he has taken proves that he regarded the Government as having exhausted its mandate, for which reason he has resigned. Now, in the face of the general understanding which cannot be disputed, in the face of the action of all these members of the Liberal party who were in the Government, it is evident that we on this side of the House are justified in saying that the Government has exhausted its mandate and should appeal to the country.

These things are so patent that when the new Leader of the Government was called to his high position, it would have been, it seems to me, the part of wisdom for the right hon. gentleman to have said at once to his colleagues: "Gentlemen, I must appeal to the country, for I do not feel that I ought to carry on in this way." However, some of them apparently persuaded him to keep on, at a time when conditions were not at all propitious for such a course, He would have been well advised, I think, and it would have been far better for all concerned, had he, at the time the change was made, declared that the conditions were such as to compel him to appeal to the country.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite try to comfort themselves with the belief that all is going well. A dozen members have spoken and have said that all is well. They ask: "What is the need of a change? The Government is all right; everything is going well; why make a change at all?" Well, they might comfort themselves with that belief, but they will not comfort any unbiased friends outside. Let me read an example of the opinions that are expressed by those outside of this House. This is what a good Conservative newspaper says:

> Cabinet reorganization, so essential and so long deferred, must be faced by the new administration without much further delay.

Mark you, "essential and long deferred"; and that was in November last. At that time it had long been necessary, and now it is immediate and pressing.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the paper?

Mr. FIELDING: I am reading from the Montreal Gazette, through its Ottawa correspondent. After some complimentary remarks to the Prime Minister, indicating that his visit to the West has strengthened him, and so forth, this correspondent goes on to say:

> He can now devote himself to organization of his Cabinet and the initiation of constructive measures. It cannot be denied that reorganization is essential for the further success of the new administration. Some members of the Government, through age or ill-health, desire to retire; others should be retired; and others again must give way to men in whom the party and the country have greater confidence. There should be at least five changes in the Government. There is a long stern fight ahead of the administration, and in that fight success can only be attained by men of strong physique and mentality who have confidence in themselves, and in whom the people have confidence.

That was four months ago. At that time reorganization was overdue; it had long been needed. And now it is absolutely necessary. This newspaper tells us that five changes were necessary. How many ministers do I see present? Let me see, —one, two, three—I believe there are just five ministers sitting on the benches tonight! Now, I should not like to have the task of selecting the five whom this correspondent thinks should go. I am perfectly willing to vote them all out en masse, bag and baggage; I should not like to have to choose from among these genial and estimable gentlemen and to determine whose heads should go upon the block. But when they console themselves with this soothing delusion that all is going well; when they see such unmistakable evidence before them day by day, in the by-elections, of the trend of public opinion and public desire; when they see public opinion reflected in the utterances of their candid friends everywhere, telling them that they have outlived their usefulness, I cannot for the life of me understand why the Prime Minister of the day can complacently hang on to the last moment. Someone remarked today that the Tupper Government had held on to the last moment. Yes, and the result was a catastrophe; and if this Government should hang on to the bitter end, depend upon it the catastrophe will be greater. I think, therefore, every argument that has been advanced in support of the contention that the Government should obtain a mandate from the people is absolutely well-founded and well-supported.

But we are told that we ought to support the Government for all the good things it has done. Well, we have a little difficulty in determining the time at which we should begin the accounting. One minister has said that the Government is only responsible for what has happened since July last, while other hon. members have contended that this Government is the successor of all governments that have been in power since 1911; and that is the sounder view. My good friend, the Prime Minister, may to-day properly be held responsible for the policy of the Conservative party from the year 1911 down to the present time. He was associated with the late Prime Minister and was always ready to defend that hon. gentleman's government. I think, therefore, we shall be doing him no injustice if we hold him responsible for that government's conduct. But, hon. members say: Look at the noble and patriotic action of this Government in regard to the war! Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a great thing, if you want praise, to shout about the war. But I want to remind my hon. friends that the war did not begin with the general election of 1917. The war had already been in progress before that and we have to go back earlier.

I pass over the manner in which the Government obtained power in 1911; I pass over the unholy alliance which they made with the Nationalists of Quebec which was the foundation of all the trouble that has occurred in that province since; I pass over the slogan of "No truck nor trade with the Yankees" which so aptly expressed their policy at that date; I pass over the breach of faith they committed when, after being elected to prevent free wheat, they put free wheat on the list; I pass over the breach of faith which they committed also in regard to potatoes—I pass over all these things and come to the war. The war began in 1914 and lasted for four years and a quarter, and for three-fourths of that time the Government led by the right hon. member for King's, Nova Scotia, the late Prime Minister, carried on a partizan Administration with all the evils attendant upon partizan patronage. For three years out of the four they made no attempt to form a Union Government, and they made overtures in that direction only when they were in extremities and were likely to be beaten.

That is the whole story—four years of war and only one year of Union Government. For three years they took the money which the people of Canada voted through this Parliament so liberally and patriotically for the purposes of the war and expended it with the help of every patronage committee of Canada. And that is patriotism! That is the record of this Government in wartime, Mr. Speaker, and when the people of Canada some day look into it they will see what a sorry record my hon. friends opposite have made. If we are going to have in this debate the history of the Government's action in the war, let us have the truth, and let us not be told that the Government is a patriotic body, when for three years out of four it carried on partizanship in all its extremes.

Now, I have no desire to detract from anything that has been accomplished by my right hon. friend from King's, Nova Scotia, in his capacity as Prime Minister. He occupied that high position for a long period in the midst of exciting scenes, and it is but reasonable to believe, as I believe and willingly admit, that he has much good legislation to his credit. On the great question upon which the parties broke, on the great question which was the basis of the formation of the Union Government, I agreed with him and I supported him, and I have no regrets to express for that course. But when we are told that he and the hon. gentlemen associated with him pursued a patriotic course throughout the war, I join issue on that assertion and reply that for three-fourths of the time the Government played the game of partizans and not of patriots.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that I am occupying more time than I intended, but there are two or three other questions that I should like to refer to.

With regard to the Washington representation I am not going to offer any criticism, but in all sincerity and respect I desire to offer a word of advice. The Minister of Justice, I think rather smarting under some chaff that came from this side of the House, said that the Government would appoint an Ambassador to Washington whenever they found the right man. Well, I suppose he was obliged to say something like that, but my hope and belief is that the Government have revised their judgment in that matter and that they have concluded not to send an Ambassador to Washington. I am not criticising their action, I am merely venturing, in all sincerity, to offer a word of respectful advice. I know something of how work is done at Washington. Have commercial agents, as many as you like, where there is business to be done,—I offer no objection, —but I affirm that if Canada sends an Ambassador to Washington he will degenerate into nothing better than a clerk under the British Ambassador—that is all he can become.

I submit that the arrangement which exists to-day is a far better one. If there is a real question between Canada and the United States the Ministers-in-Council deal with the question, they thresh it out; and a minister leaving Ottawa this afternoon will be in Washington tomorrow afternoon and able to present the Governments views to the American government, or to whomsoever he may be dealing with. A minister of the Crown coming in that way fresh from Council, fresh from consultation with his colleagues, is more useful and more likely to be an efficient representative than any clerk dawdling around Washington, and half the time doing nothing at all. I am not finding fault with anything the Government have done. I am in all earnestness and all sincerity, in the light of my experience, advising them to drop the Washington business.

Then there is the Imperial Conference. Now I think the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was not quite fair to the Government. He asked the Government to bring down to this House a statement of the policy which they intend to pursue at the Imperial Conference. Mr. Speaker, you cannot take the Breeks off a Hielan man.

You cannot get from anybody that which he does not possess. I do not say it offensively, I do not say it by way of censure, but I believe this Government does not know about any policy with which to go to the Imperial Conference. There is nothing to confer about. There is a great deal of rubbish talked about these Imperial Conferences—a great deal of rubbish. I agree that conferences between Imperial ministers and overseas statesmen, the meeting together of these men and the exchange by them of opinions, each one learning how the science of government is worked out in other countries, all make for a good purpose, and I do not for a moment wish to be regarded as opposing a conference. On the contrary, I say that, from time to time, such conferences are exceedingly proper.

I do not hesitate to say, however, that from the point of view of Canada there is no question to-day which requires to be submitted to an Imperial Conference. Mr. Lloyd George may have some schemes over there which are referred to in recent press cablegrams. Mr. Lloyd George makes picturesque speeches, but they are not always followed up by anything practical. A good able man he undoubtedly is; but if Mr. Lloyd George has something to-day to propose over there, we want somebody to watch him. If Mr. Hughes, of Australia, if that gallant soldier-statesman from South Africa, General Smuts, has anything to propose, of course it is our duty to listen; but I take the responsibility of saying now that there is no question to-day before the Parliament of Canada which needs to be referred to any Imperial Conference.

Why, it sometimes happens when these conferences are held, when the members come together, that they wonder what in the world they are there for; and if you look over some of their proceedings you will be surprised how many resolutions have been passed which never amounted to anything. They were academic resolutions; they never came to anything. The truth is that there is a body of people over in England, not a very numerous one, that I might describe as the "Grand Order of Fussers." They are talking about a new constitution to come before the Imperial Conference. They are always talking about what Canada wants, and about what Australia wants. Sir, Canada does not want anything. I say again there is no question pending to-day that this Parliament knows of—and we have a right to know if there is any question—there is no question which needs an Imperial Conference at all—absolutely there is none.

We have one little question of importance in its way in regard to the cattle embargo. We think that the British Government are wrong in their attitude. We believe they are wrong, but we may as well let it go because, if we are maintaining the right to regulate our own trade and commerce, we are not going to claim the right to dictate to the British Government how to regulate their trade and commerce in their own way even if it does not happen to please us. But, apart from that question, no man in this House could tell us to-day what there is that requires an Imperial Conference so far as Canada is concerned.

Of course, if the conference is to be held, and if my right hon. friend the Prime Minister should still be in office in June, I think it is quite right that he should go; but he is not going to have a very happy time. If I am not mistaken, my right hon. friend will find himself in a curious position. Every other government representative at that conference will represent people who have expressed their views in recent years and since the war—I think that is correct. If that be the case, what will be the position of my right hon. friend? He is in the position that he does not represent the people of Canada. It is a weak position. He will be a lonely sparrow on the housetop, a solitary pelican in the wilderness. I should think it would be a humiliating position for my right hon. friend to occupy, and—one of my colleagues says—humiliating to the country. I do not mean for a moment to be understood as opposing a conference. I say again, conferences are needed from time to time. Conferences of men on trade and commerce are good things, and as a result of them men understand each other better. I would have Canada from time to time represented at a conference. But I do not hesitate to say that for my right hon. friend to go over to England in June, with things as they now stand, and to undertake to represent Canada with the full knowledge that he possesses—because he is too intelligent a man to doubt the fact that he does not represent the people of Canada—is to place himself in a position that he ought not to occupy, a position that he will always regret.

We were told that we should support this Government because of the things they have done. I have spoken briefly of their general war record. I heard one hon. gentleman—I forget now who it was—speaking of the wonderful record of this Government—say, "Look, they have given votes to women." They did not. Looking back in my mind's eye to the elections of 1917, there are two households that I recall. One was a family of ladies who had votes. They had a son and a brother who had gone to the war, and it was right that they should have votes. But, close by, there was another home where there were three ladies who had no brother to send to the war, but who were giving their days and their nights, and their money and their energy, to all the good works that the women of Canada were doing. They had no votes because the Government did not put them on the voters' list. Was that patriotism? Was that statesmanship? Ah! but it is said, they have given the votes now to women generally. No, they have only pretended to give them votes. They have put a provision in the statutes giving them the votes, but they will have to wait until 1922 before they get a chance to vote. No, the things which my hon. friends opposite describe as tributes to the Government's wonderful policy will not stand examination. The Government has outlived its usefulness, as has been contended by many hon. members.

There is only one point more I think I will speak upon, because I believe there are other hon. gentlemen who desire to express their views to-night. One of the things we are told this Government has done for which we should give them great honour is the abolition of patronage. Well, I am not going to deny the Government some share of credit for that matter. If any hon. gentlemen in this House are anxious to have the control of patronage again, I am not one of them. I am not complaining if I have not any patronage. I do not want it. It is better to be without it for many reasons. If the Government has abolished patronage, I want to give them credit for it, but I must say this: No sooner do they agree to do these things than they begin to try and evade their own laws. I think it was the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who described them of being guilty of infanticide—they were always killing their own babies.

Well, with all the cry they have made about abolishing patronage, what is the situation? The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is to-day claiming the right to exercise patronage to the extent of 15,000 officials in this Dominion. I had a letter from a man down in my county who had heard somewhere that the census officials were going to be appointed on the nomination of the members. I wrote him that I thought he was mistaken, but that I would inquire. So I inquired of the proper department. I thought: If this is going to be done by the Civil Service Commission I am not going to complain; but if it is not going to be done by the Civil Service Commission, perhaps it will be well for me to ask if the members irrespective of politics are to make the recommendations. The assurance I got from the official authority is that they have gone back to the old patronage game; they are going to appoint the census officials on the nomination and recommendation of members supporting the Government. That is patronage. Why, Sir, in almost every claim the Government set up we discover that while they are making great professions of virtuous policy they do not live up to them.

For all these reasons I say the position taken by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this amendment is the correct one. This Government have no longer a mandate to conduct the affairs of the country; they have no longer any right to believe that they have the confidence of the people of Canada.

Mr. THOMAS MACNUTT (Saltcoats): Mr. Speaker, I intend to follow the very good example set by a number of the preceding speakers and extend my sincere congratulations to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on his accession to the very high office that he now occupies. I can remember in 1909, I think it was, when I first heard him speak as a young man, at that time a private member, I predicted that he would go far; that prediction has been realized. I further predict that if he desires to remain in public life he will always fill a very prominent position.

We have now a brand new Government with a brand new name and—I say it with all respect—a brand new Prime Minister. But, Sir, we find that they have a very old policy. I would have thought that a new government in such a new country as this, where conditions are changing, might to some extent modernize their policy. However, I will quote a passage from the speech of His Excellency, delivered as the mouthpiece of this Government. He said:

It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision—

Speaking of the tariff.

—regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. There is so much conversation on the floor of this Chamber as well as in other parts thereof that it is absolutely impossible for the Speaker even to follow the hon. member who is now addressing the House. I must ask hon. members and others to refrain from talking.

Mr. MACNUTT: I was quoting a part of the speech of His Excellency regarding the tariff. It reads:

It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained:

That is a very old policy—as old as the country. I am afraid that I cannot support it. At the same time I commend the Government for their frankness in stating exactly where they stand on the tariff. It is another story with regard to what we call the official Opposition. It is very difficult to say where they do stand with regard to the tariff. Liberalism, as I have always understood it, meant "no special favours," which are conveyed, of course, under protection. But from the expressions of prominent Liberals in public and private and their attitude generally, we have come to the conclusion that a majority of them do not stand upon their own fiscal platform. And it is a very good platform in some respects.

It has been claimed that this little group here, which I believe sincerely stands for free trade in many respects, for instance, in regard to tools and implements that are used in developing natural resources, free food, and so on, and a low tariff in other respects—it has been claimed, I say, that this little group should affiliate politically with the present Liberal party; but as long as there is that distrust amongst our group —I can speak for myself and, I think, for the rest of my colleagues—there is not very much chance that there will be any such fusion. Recent by-elections have shown that we are not very likely to fuse. And, besides, a great deal of evidence has been brought forward to show that there is more than a doubt as to where the Liberal party as a whole stands on the tariff. In support of this assertion I wish to quote some newspaper reports of statements claimed to have been made by prominent Liberals. This is the first report:

The recent speech by the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux at Ste. Martine, Chateauguay county, has attracted considerable attention in the East. In this address Mr. Lemieux said: "It is possible that in the West Liberals think that we should have a policy of free trade. It may be that in the West and in other provinces it is said that all duties should be abolished. It is necessary to have commonsense. Protection is necessary, moderate protection,—

I have never been able to find out what is meant by "moderate" protection. It occurs to me that this word is in the same class as the word "adequate" which was formerly used in the old Halifax platform of the Conservative party. It is altogether a matter of opinion that constitutes moderate protection.

—and equitably distributed with justice for the producer and consumer."

La Patrie, of Montreal, makes this comment on Mr. Lemieux's deliverance:

Following the example of other members of his party, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, at a public meeting at Chateauguay set himself out to destroy the impression that the Liberal party supports free trade. Briefly, but clearly, he formulated his policy as being one for moderate protection. One of the principal questions which the electors will be called upon to decide by their vote in the next general election will be that of tariff reform. It is true that on that question the Agrarian element, especially in the West, holds extreme views in favour of a radical reduction of the tariff, as a preliminary to its complete abolition. But in the speeches of the party leaders, ministerial and Liberal alike, nobody can discern exactly where their policy differs on this question. The Liberals who are responsible for the direction of their party evidently will not compromise themselves. They are obliged to acknowledge the imperiousness of the motives which compel the Federal administration to maintain a protective tariff.

At a dinner in Quebec addressed by the Hon. J. A. Caron, Minister of Agriculture in the Quebec Government the principal guests were the right hon. the Prime Minister, and the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) The following is a summary of some of the remarks made by Mr. Caron who is a pronounced Liberal and leader in the province:

Mr. Caron had at his right throughout the luncheon Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, leader of the Liberal Opposition, and on his left, separated from him only by C. A. Magrath, the chairman, Premier Meighen. The address was refreshingly frank, the speaker declaring in preface of his political observations that the best thing for him to do was "to tell the truth." He opened his address by referring to the importance of agriculture in the Dominion and by outlining the means taken by his province to further that basic industry. He intimated, however, that manufacturing was rapidly increasing in his province, declared flatly that there were no free traders in Quebec."

An extract from a report of the meeting of the Tariff Commission at Three Rivers, Quebec, is as follows:—

The local Board of Trade, represented by Mr. Burrill, its president, registered in favor of a protective tariff as the best means to protect Canadian industries. Eugene Tremblay, in the name of the employees of the Wabasco Cotton Company, of Three Rivers, said that any reduction of the tariff would be prejudicial to their company and consequently prejudicial to the employees of this company. He favours the maintenance of the present tariff law. The directors of the Shawinigan Cotton Company said that the textile industry had no actual protection on account of the depreciation of the pound sterling, and they ask for a more severe tariff.

Well, Sir, I was wondering what the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) a very prominent Liberal sitting on this side of the House, thinks of the views of a number of his prominent constituents.

There is no use, Sir, in going over the ground that has been travelled so much. I simply wish to give a few reasons for voting as I shall to-night, I wish also to say a few words with regard to a matter in which we are all interested, the welfare of the returned soldiers. This is a matter which we cannot allow to become stale. I am going to say a few words in connection with the settlement of soldiers on the land in the West—in fact, all over Canada. I believed in that plan; I believe in it yet, although I have sometimes criticised its local administration. Conditions have changed very much lately and I think there should be a review of the situation to some extent. The report of the Board is a very favourable one; it goes to show that to a large extent the plan has been successful. I wish to read the following summary of it:

The loans granted to date total $80,302,649; the amount of land taken up, 3,371,000 acres; estimated saving to the soldiers on the purchase of land, $2,700,000; and the area of new land broken in the West, 202,730 acres.

A summary of the operations of the Soldier Settlement Board up to November 30, 1920, is given as follows:

Number of veterans in communication with Board, 100,000; number applied for privileges of Act, 58,811; number accepted as qualified to farm, 41,906; number qualified but not yet located, 21,975; number in training under supervision of Board, 916; number completed training, 1,144. Total number of loans, 19,931; total amount, $80,302,649.

These loans were distributed over the different provinces as follows: Prince Edward Island, 302; Nova Scotia, 397; New Brunswick, 511; Quebec, 455; Ontario, 1,405; Manitoba, 3,297; Saskatchewan, 4,893; Alberta, 5,727; British Columbia, 2,944. The amount of loans disbursed was $70,281,872; initial payments on land purchased, $3,672,638; number liable for repayments November first, 12,507; number who made repayments, 7,470, or 59 per cent; amount due, $2,334,174; amount repaid, $1,369,256, or 58 per cent. Now that was a very fair showing. I do not know to what particular provinces this percentage relates, but I want you to notice that 41 per cent did not make even the small payment required under the Act. Further, it is not stated whether the repayments were made in full or not. In fact, I know that a number of them were not made in full. The following are some further figures with regard to this land settlement plan.

Number who have repaid loans in full, 291; number of failures and changes of ownership adjusted, 166; amount invested in these farms, $620,869; amount realized in re-sale of farm and equipment (showing average loss of $38 per farm), $614,548. Stock and equipment purchased for soldier settlers, $22,619,759; saving to settlers through special arrangements with dealers, $742,568.

A great number of these settlers have so far appeared to have done well. All will congratulate the Board upon handling the matter as well as possible, and the men themselves are also to be congratulated. But, I keep pretty much in touch with these matters and I know that a great many of the returned men have not done very well, through no fault of their own. I will mention some of the reasons. All that they purchased was bought at a time when prices were at the peak. In my locality, on account of the spring being late, a great many of the men did not put in much wheat. They sowed principally oats and barley for which they had to pay one dollar or $1.10 a bushel. In some cases they got it from the Board; in some cases they used their own money and on other occasions they got it on time. They even had to pay one dollar a bushel for oats for feed. This fall, as soon as threshing was well advanced, they could not get more than thirty to forty-five cents a bushel or thereabouts for their oats and from sixty to seventy-five cents for their barley, although they had to pay up to two dollars a bushel for the seed. The same applied to other items; cows that cost $100 a year ago, and were considered good value at that, could now be purchased for $35 to $40. Expenses, however, went on as usual. Many settlers had no capital of their own; they did not get all that they required from the Board and had to borrow privately to pay their ten per cent deposits. Some of them had to run into debt in the purchase of implements and supplies.

I do not want to make a poor mouth on behalf of the soldiers; I do not think they would want me to do that, but I want to set some of these matters before the House. I feel quite satisfied that some consideration should be given to them, not simply by way of deferring payments and allowing them to be heaped up so that one crop has to pay for two or three years' payments, but by way of advancing the total payment, in cases where necessary, a couple of years without interest. I think the country can well afford to pay the interest on the amounts advanced to soldiers in this position, just as well or a little better than they can to pay large deficits for the Canadian National Railway. We cannot afford to neglect our men. Had prices been maintained, there would have been no complaints about the matter. I know, however, of as little as 15 cents a bushel having been paid for oats raised by soldier settlers. Those oats, when they were threshed, had probably got a little snow in them and would have been called tough, but they should have been worth more than that. The previous spring oats could not have been bought, snow and all, for less than 80 or 90 cents a bushel. It must be remembered that the soldiers have to maintain their families. They must also get good stock, and many of those who have settled on the land have not good stock, although that is not the fault of the Government and it is not their fault. Some of the conditions, however, could have been controlled. I do not think the condition of the soldiers was improved very much by the Railway Commission raising the freight rates for the railway companies, and had the Wheat Board been kept in existence, I think the soldier settlers might have done a little better. I do not, however, want to dwell on that; I just want to speak of things as I find them.

[Mr. MacNutt.[

At a meeting of returned men held in my constituency about a month ago, I was present, and I was asked to make a few suggestions to the House. The first one was to post-date the contracts from two to three years including stock and implements, that is, in cases where such action was necessary, the supervisor, in all cases, to use his own judgment. Another suggestion was that the soldier settlers be allowed a refund of the 10 per cent deposit, if suitable improvements were made to cover, the supervisor in all cases to advise. It will be understood that the soldier settler must put up 10 per cent of the money required to pay for his land. For example, if the land costs $4,000, he is required to put up $400 and he is charged for $3,600. The Government, having received this $400 from him might, when required, advance it to him again providing that the loan is covered by increased value by way of improvements in the land. An additional loan was also asked to cover the erection of a machine shed. I was further asked to bring before the House the advisability of making loans for housing in towns and villages to returned men, who were not farmers, and I can see no reason why this matter should not be handled in the same way as in the case of men going on the land. It was also considered only just that a man who voluntarily enlisted, and who, although discharged as unfit, was otherwise qualified, should be eligible for land settlement.

One case amongst others was cited, and I will use this as an example. A returned man enlisted on April 4, 1916, at Winnipeg, and he was discharged medically unfit on May 30, 1917, at Winnipeg, over a year afterwards. He does not receive a pension, but if he desires to take up land under the system, I think he should be more eligible than a drafted man with a pension. Conditions are entirely different from what they were a year ago; men can be outfitted for one-half the price and the chances are that they could make the thing go.

Amongst other things, many soldiers have to contend with the matter of exchange, inasmuch as the land that they occupy was acquired from owners in the United States. In some cases the loans would not stand the exchange and the deal was called off. In other cases, the settlers have had to pay the additional amount of perhaps $400 or $500 in order to close the transaction, and it is matters like these that militate against the success of the soldier. I am sure the House will be as pleased to know as I was that, at the meeting that I spoke of and at others, I was told that those present utterly repudiated the arrangements proposed by Sergeant Harry Flynn and would have nothing to do with them. They are not anxious to endorse anything that he has endeavoured to do, supposedly in their interest.

I presume a committee will be appointed as heretofore to deal with the problems of the returned soldiers, and I trust that they will consider the suggestions I have placed on Hansard. I have other suggestions which I could give in detail before that committee, and I have no doubt that consideration will be given to them, because I am satisfied that every hon. member of this House is anxious to see the returned men properly dealt with. The returned soldiers do not want anything in the way of charity or over-paternalism, but they want conditions to be taken into consideration and they ask that, as a matter of business they should be assisted by being granted a further extension of time without interest, say for the first couple of years, in cases where that is found to be absolutely essential Otherwise they will simply lose heart and throw up the game. If they do so, the country will lose a great deal more financially, and the calculations previously made will be upset.

Something is to be said in favour of the amendment to the amendment, but I do not think it is practicable. The amendment itself is, I think, rather unfortunately worded, but it is my intention to support it. I do not like to speak in such harsh terms, namely, that I have no confidence whatever in the Government; but speaking politically, I have no confidence in their policy, especially in that policy which was set forth in the speech from the Throne, and consequently, I propose voting against the sub-amendment and for the amendment.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne and on the amendment and sub-amendment has now lasted since the 15th of February. In the first days of the debate the Government supporters would get up and answer in succession the speeches delivered from this side of the House, but for reasons which I do not know for the last three days the Government has been practically silent, and the only speech which has been heard from your right, Sir, has been the one delivered by the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie), who also holds in this Government the position of Solicitor General for Canada. The Solicitor General for Canada, as a rule, and according to law, is a lawyer, and a lawyer of some eminence. The Minister of Militia and Defence, according to custom, if not according to law, is a soldier. Now it was peculiar—it was extraordinary—that, when the hon. gentleman who represents South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stood up in this House to explain the position taken by the Government on this question, instead of speaking as a lawyer, and as the Solicitor General, when the question before us is a question of law, and solely of law, he should put aside his gown, and don a uniform and speak as a soldier. He rode rough-shod over our constitution, and he did not forget, in the course of his remarks, to put his spurs through certain parts of it. Such a speech coming from a lawyer was so surprising that it struck the Government dumb, and since then nobody has stood up on that side of the House.

The hon. gentleman made a statement that, I humbly submit, is not according to the facts. He declared that the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) was the choice of his party. I do not intend to reflect in any way upon the character of the Prime Minister of this country, but I wish to discuss the choice of the leader of the Government simply and solely from the political viewpoint. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the choice of the leader of the Government was not the choice of his party. When the right hon. gentleman, who was Premier of Canada from 1911 to 1920, resigned, the party which he had left turned their eyes not towards the present leader but towards Toronto, towards the former member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White). The member for Leeds, or the former member for Leeds, came to Ottawa, but with his shrewdness and ability apprehended the situation aright and declined the position. When the first choice could not be made, the second choice of the party was my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). I have nothing but complimentary things to say of this gentleman. The part he has taken in the debates in this House has shown that he wishes always to do his best for his country. The hon. gentleman is not a politician. He is a business man, and being a business man, and having lots of capacity as such, he also declined to become the leader of a moribund party. But the party was not discouraged. They turned to one of the old war horses who had led the party many a time on the battlefield. They turned their eyes to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) but as you know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman had very wisely taken other responsibilities, and he also declined. Then something extraordinary happened. The party turned, I understand, to the province of Quebec for a Prime Minister, to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), but if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was offered the position for some reason which is unknown to me, he also declined the post of leader, but readily accepted the honour of being the first man sworn into the new cabinet. The papers then, but for a very brief time, rightly or wrongly reported that in despair there was a possibility of putting the responsibilities of leadership upon the shoulders of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder). But the very moment the matter was mentioned in the papers, the party had to change their choice, and direct their efforts to secure a new leader into another channel. Finally, the country heard that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government to-day was the choice of the new party.

The right hon. gentleman has great ability. Nobody denies that, but his choice, from a political and national standpoint, is a real danger to our country. This gentleman, Mr. Speaker, represents a policy of ultra-partisanship. Many years ago, in the year 1912 if I am not mistaken, when the late leader of our party, the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier rose in this House to defend the rights of Canada and safeguard our autonomy, the man who rose in his place to take away the word from the dying lips of our leader was the hon. member for Portage La Prairie, the present Prime Minister. Not only does the Prime Minister of Canada represent ultra partisanship, but he represents ultra-Imperialism. He has always been the mouthpiece in this House of those who wish to put aside the interests of Canada whenever the interests of the Empire are at stake. He is the gentleman who declared in this House and also throughout the country that Canada, whenever England was at war, should spend her last dollar and give her last man.

The Prime Minister of to-day is not only a partizan, but he is an ultra-Imperialist; I go further and say that he is the greatest Tory of all the Tories in Canada. He is the author of those laws that stand on our Statute Book as a blot on the constitutional liberties which we enjoy in this country. Who is the author of the War Measures Act? Who is the author of the War-time Elections Act? Who is the author of the Military Service Act? In a word, Mr. Speaker, since the hon. gentleman has entered the political field in Canada, he has always shown himself to be the representative of the most Tory traditions which we have in this country. But if his leadership is dangerous from a national viewpoint, in view of his antecedents in this House, it is more dangerous even in view of what this Government intend to do if the present Prime Minister retains office.

The right hon. gentleman has inaugurated a railway policy which is absolutely nefarious in the interest of Canada. He became the sponsor of the Canadian Northern Bill; he was the father of the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill; and he was the defender of the Grand Trunk Bill. To-day, not satisfied with having been the representative of MacKenzie and Mann in this House and in the country as well, the Prime Minister and his Government wish to become the representatives of the Big interests and to inaugurate a policy of high protection. I say, Sir, that I am not judging the Prime Minister from a personal viewpoint, but solely from his political antecedents; I am judging him also from his present political declarations. His leadership is dangerous, and the sooner it is terminated the better, in the interests of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question which is before the House is after all a very simple one. It is this: Has this Government a mandate to further govern Canada? And, secondly, has this Government the confidence of the people of Canada? I intend briefly to discuss these two questions. As to the first—has the Government a mandate to further govern Canada?—that question is one of great importance and moment. It is important for us to know whether responsible government in Canada shall be maintained. Any student of constitutional history is aware of the struggle, the long and bitter struggle, that was fought in England in order to obtain responsible government, and before the principle of constitutional and responsible government was recognized, the head of Charles I had to fall. In Canada, we have also had a struggle. That struggle lasted from 1828 to 1847, and the names of the leading actors in it who led the fight to secure for us liberties and the freedom which we enjoy are the names of those most held in honour by every patriot in our country. Is this government to be permitted to rob us of those privileges? Is it to be permitted to abolish the prerogatives won after such a hard struggle? That is really the question which is before the House.

The Liberal principle, as expounded by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), has always been the same; it has never varied, and that principle is that the Government should remain in power not merely so long as it is supported by a majority of the House of Commons, but so long, and only so long, as that majority in the Commons is an exact reflection of the opinion in the country at large. The Tory theory is altogether different. That theory in substance is that a government has the right to remain in power, notwithstanding the will and the desire of the people, so long as it can manage to muster on a division sufficient votes to secure a majority, no matter how slim that majority may be. That Tory principle has been put into practice not only by this Government but by the Administration of the late Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) since 1911. Since 1911, has the Government conducted affairs in accordance with the mandate given by the electorate of Canada? I answer that question unhesitatingly, Mr. Speaker. I say that the Government of 1911, the Government of 1917, and the Government of 1920, have none of them ever conducted the affairs of this country according to the mandate given by the people.

In 1911 an appeal was made to the electors of Canada by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and it was met in Ontario and in other provinces by the allegation that the Laurier administration was endangering the British Empire and that it was time for Canada to save itself from dismemberment from the Empire. In our province of Quebec it was stated by the Nationalists that Canada had no obligation towards the Mother Country, and that it was time she should secede from the Empire if remaining in it meant further obligations. The appeal to the prejudices of the people carried the other provinces; the appeal to sectarian nationalism carried to a certain extent the province of Quebec; and the party led by the late Prime Minister, who had received a mandate from the English Provinces never to forget our obligations towards the British Empire, the day after the election was over, turned round and made an alliance with the Nationalists of Quebec. Since that alliance was formed, never has the Government which was originally elected in 1911, carried on any policy in keeping with the promises made to the electorate of the English provinces nor, on the other hand, in fulfillment of the pledges given to the electors of Quebec.

In 1916, the Government applied for an extension of the parliamentary term, and that extension was granted provided that during the additional period no legislation of a controversial character should be introduced. A mandate was given by Parliament to the then Government. How was that mandate respected? The Government respected it by first introducing conscription when the Prime Minister had expressly promised that there would not be conscription in Canada. Secondly, the Government respected it by bringing in the War-times Election Act; and thirdly, the Government respected it by taking advantage of this opportunity to form a Union Government. In 1917 the Union Government was formed and an appeal made to the country. This appeal was based solely and exclusively on one question, the carrying on of the war. The Prime Minister declared to the electors of Canada, and his ministers made the same declaration, that the Government was for one purpose, the carrying on of the war, and that the moment the war was over the Government would consider that its mandate had expired. The elections were won by means and by methods which are well known to the people of Canada. The Government carried the day, but what did it do? In 1918 the war was over but did the Government resign? Not only did the Government not resign but despite a promise to the electors not to bring in during the war period, or during the period of its existence, any domestic question which could be controverted, it introduced the railway policy upon which the people of Canada had never been consulted. Further, the Government now wishes to introduce redistribution, although it has absolutely no mandate. Nay, it wishes to proceed further by sending representatives to attend the Imperial Conference in London and make decisions binding Canada, when the representatives who are to sit in London have absolutely no mandate from Canada, and absolutely no authority to speak for this country.

As to whether this Government has a mandate or not I will only say this: In 1917 the Administration called the Union Government was elected. Where is that Government to-day? It has disappeared. In 1917, during the war, the then Prime Minister led the Government forces in the electoral struggle, and the Union Government carried the elections. Where is that leader to-day? He has resigned. In 1917 a programme was submitted to the electorate of Canada. Where is that programme to-day? Mr. Speaker, that programme has been cast aside and a new programme has been propounded. In 1917, Mr. Speaker, a special franchise was passed, and nearly every member in this House sits as a member elected under the provisions of that franchise. Where is that franchise to-day? That franchise which gives life and existence and legal authority to this Parliament to sit has been taken out of our statutes, and the reasons why are well known to the people of this country. Not only has the Government disappeared, not only has the programme disappeared, not only has the leader disappeared, not only has the franchise disappeared, but even the issues have disappeared out of our public life.

To-day there remains absolutely nothing in this Praliament connected with the elections of 1917, but the fourteen members who were elected by the provisions of the War-time Elections Act when they were defeated by the electors of their constituencies. Mr. Speaker, this is true. There is not one man on the Government side that can deny the truth of what I have just affirmed. Nevertheless, this Government clings to office; this Government refuses to go before the people; this Government refuses to give to the electors of Canada the chance to decide who shall have the direction of public affairs. I have studied the history of England, I have studied the history of my own country, I have studied the history of the United States—nowhere in any of these countries do I find a single example of action on the part of a government which is to be compared with the action of the Government of Canada to-day. Only one precedent, Mr. Speaker, may be found and that precedent is to be found in the most unhappy and unfortunate period in English history—I refer to the period in England from 1640 to 1660. In those days there was a Parliament, a Parliament which was elected at first in a moment of public enthusiasm, as was the present Parliament. But it had outlived its usefulness. Although the people of England did not want that Parliament, it nevertheless persisted in remaining. It was called the "Rump Parliament" and I think the only proper appellation for the present Parliament would be the same title. The Rump Parliament had to be thrown out by a Cromwell. Will this Government wait until a Cromwell throws it out? I think the Government should be careful; the people of Canada have been patient. The people have displayed lots of forbearance, but the patience of the public like the patience of the individual has its limits. The Government has overstayed its usefulness, the Government should disappear.

Another question is as to whether this Government has the confidence of the people of Canada. I do not wish to discuss this point at great length, former speakers have discussed it much more ably than I can do; but I desire to recall to your memory, Mr. Speaker, that since 1918, if I am not mistaken, fourteen elections have been held and out of that number ten have gone against the Government. I do not wish to further discuss the meaning or the significance of the result in Peterborough. I simply wish to say that the electors of Peterborough voted in such a way as to give to this Government an imperative order to quit office. Peterborough has spoken in a most emphatic and unambiguous manner, and I hope the Government will at least understand the desires of the people as expressed by the electors of that constituency. It has been said that this Government is too weak. The Government knows that it has not the confidence of the people, and although its weakness is known to its own members, although the Prime Minister knows and acknowledges that his Cabinet should be reconstructed, he does not dare to do it. Why does he not? Because the Prime Minister knows that should the new ministers go to the country they probably would not be returned.

The situation is most unfair. I see opposite to me the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid). This hon. gentleman has been working very hard for his country; he has been in office since 1911. Very often during our prolonged debates I see the hon. gentleman turning yearning eyes towards the Senate Chamber. Is it not time, Mr. Speaker, that he should have his rest? On the Government benches I also see my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), for whom

I have great respect. He, too, has worked arduously for his country. Very often, I am sure, he thinks what a beautiful and restful place the Supreme Court would be in the evening of his life. Why should not the Prime Minister send him to the Supreme Court? And behind these hon. gentlemen I see the younger members who are eager to supplant their elders. I see, for instance, my hon. friend the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). He is full of energy, he is full of activity, he is full of zeal. Why should not the Prime Minister give the hon. gentleman a chance to exert himself even more than he is doing now in the public interest? And, Mr. Speaker, what about the devoted Chief Whip (Mr. Middleboro) on the Government side? Many a night has he worked mustering the Government forces, many a time has he stood at the door to see that the stragglers came in and that those who were in did not go out. The time has come for his reward. If these old servants of the public do not get their reward, and if the young bloods like the member for Fort William and the very devoted Chief Whip do not get Cabinet portfolios in these days, it is because the Government knows its own weaknesses and does not dare to face a by-election anywhere.

For the last year there has been discussion in this House and in the press as to the situation of the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec in 1917 was a traitor. The province of Quebec in 1917 was compared to a province where open rebellion existed. No appeal to prejudice was strong enough against our province and against our people. These appeals to prejudice had their results—the Government carried the general election in that year. But if the Government carried the election, it lost any sympathy that it might have possessed in my native province. The war is now over. The big interests are appealing to this Government for high protection. The Government knows that the rest of Canada is opposed to protection. The Government knows that sentiment in Ontario is antagonistic to that policy. The Government wished to have new allies, and although, Mr. Speaker, you will be surprised, the Government turned their eyes upon this very province, inhabited by traitors, to find these new allies, to find this new blood which will give them new life. The press of Canada, which is heavily subsidized by the Government, as we all know, has published articles declaring that nothing is too good for Quebec, that Quebec is the sanest province in the Dominion. Quebec is being cajoled. We are told every day that we represent the best traditions of Canada and the highest Canadian aspirations. But the frantic efforts of the Government have had as yet no results but one, and that result has been very meagre for such great efforts—it has been the speech delivered in this House by my hon. friend the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier). It is with great regret that I have mentioned my hon. friend. In my native province we have fought many a battle side by side in favour of the principles which the Liberal party represent. My associations with the hon. member have always been of a very friendly character, and when I saw him rising to his feet, and when I heard the speech which he delivered, I can say that the feeling I had, Mr. Speaker, was a feeling of heartfelt sympathy and sadness.

In 1917 when I waged in my province a fight for Canadian autonomy, for Canadian spirit, for Canadian nationhood, when I ran against the former Minister of Inland Revenue, the Hon. Mr. Sevigny, one of the speakers during that campaign who enunciated the most Canadian of Canadian sentiments was the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe. The days have passed; I have remained what I was then, he has chosen to change. I am sorry for him, and, as a friend, I regret, and sincerely regret, the attitude which he has taken. Putting aside my personal sentiments and feelings towards the hon. member, I may say that when in this House he delivered his speech, we witnessed what is called in Japan harikari, or self execution. The hon. gentleman has chosen to hang himself publicly in this new Chamber. His corpse is now swinging. It is swinging on Parliament Hill, and may that swinging political corpse and the stench which it exhales be a lesson to anybody, the Prime Minister or any one else, who has an inclination to follow his example.

The attitude of my hon. friends towards our province is an attitude of promise, an attitude of flattery. But the papers of Montreal, particularly the Montreal Gazette, have announced that the Government, unless Quebec yields to their demands, will assume another attitude. That attitude would be a threatening one; to use their own expression, the Government would open a "barrage fire" upon Quebec. Their fire we are awaiting without fear. Mr. Speaker. Unyielding to promises, we shall not bend to fear. We represent in this House an indignant province which has been insulted, and never will our province give in to the Government until a fitting apology is forthcoming from public men in this country for the crime committed against Quebec.

Their barrage fire has already been opened, by a gentleman, who claims to represent his province in the Cabinet, the hon. Mr. Blondin, Postmaster General of Canada. Represents the province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker? He no more represents Quebec than I could claim to represent New Zealand in this House; he no more represents Quebec than I represent or claim or wish to represent the city of Toronto. Mr. Blondin is an outcast from our province. In 1917, having betrayed the most sacred interests of our province, he has come amongst his own people and to use the words of the gospel, he has "passed amongst them and has not been recognized." In some place the hon. gentleman has chosen to declare that never has he uttered disloyal words in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman has a very short memory. In 1910 during the election in Drummond and Arthabaska, on the same platform where I was discussing public affairs with him, in the parishes of Maddington Falls and St. Louis de Blandford, the present Postmaster General of Canada shot holes through the British flag. In the election of 1917 in my own constituency the hon. gentleman said to the people of St. Rose de Watford: "What does conscription matter to you gentlemen? You are close to the American border; should conscription be enacted you can escape over tne border to the United States." If the Government wishes to retain the Postmaster General as one of its members it is free to do so, but I ask the leader of the Government, if he lets Mr. Blondin remain in the Cabinet, not to let him call himself the representative of Quebec. Another gentleman has opened a barrage fire on our province, and that gentleman is the hon. Mr. Robertson. The hon. gentleman in another place—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot escape the well-known rule by making a veiled reference to a debate in the Upper Chamber by saying that it occurred in "another place." I think he would be well advised to adhere to old parliamentary traditions and not refer to hon. gentlemen in the other Chamber in terms of disrespect.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to refer to any other hon. gentleman in terms of disrespect. I simply wish to direct the attention of the House to certain statements by ministers or members of the Government, bearing on questions before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman would not be in order in doing so if the statements to which he refers were made in the other House of Parliament. That rule is well known.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker, but I was under the impression that the rule was to the effect that we had no right in the House of Commons to quote from speeches delivered in the other Chamber, but that hon. members were perfectly free to discuss declarations of members of the Government as connected with Government responsibility and as connected with the attitude of the Government on public matters.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman would be perfectly in order in doing so if they were matters of record, but if he starts to traverse a speech made by an hon. member of the other House, he is not in order.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, I have read in the press that hon. members of this Government have started an attack upon our province, describing the condition of Quebec in 1917 as having been worse than that which exists in Russia. Any member of the Government who so represents the conditions in my native province in 1917 is not stating the real condition of things. When the Military Service Act was being put into force in 1917 the greatest agitation existed in the province of Quebec. The then Minister of Militia came to the city of Quebec, and the reception accorded to him at that time showed that if the people of that province were firm and solid in their principles and convictions, they also knew how to respect the laws of their country. It was represented by members of the Government that houses were burned and that dynamite was used. I say that the only dynamite used in Quebec in 1917 was dynamite bought with Government money and used by Government agents as was done in Montreal.

The hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) during the course of his speech in this debate, referred to the Liberal party on this side as being the remnant of a party. So far as we in this House from Quebec are concerned, we represent those who in the greatest struggle ever fought by Sir Wilfrid Laurier remained firm, solid and loyal to Liberal principles. In this political fight of 1917, young and old members from Quebec were like the soldiers who had fought many battles under the guidance and direction of the great Napoleon. When the time and the hour of defeat came on the field of Waterloo, although the old guard was not numerous, in the face of obvious defeat those soldiers remembered the glories of former victories through their leader and protected him. When an English general, addressing those soldiers, and assuming the same attitude as the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) did the other day, called on the old guard to surrender, that English general was answered by the sublime word which has immortalized Cambronne, and I say that the province of Quebec, answering the request of the Government, uses that same sublime and immortal word.

The province of Quebec will hold in Canada the balance of power at the next election. No government can carry on the business of this country without the support of the province of Quebec, and the members from Quebec will see to it that never again in the history of Canada, if we can prevent it, will a government be given the power of the strength to try to crucify a whole race and a whole province. Our forefathers came to Canada as the pioneers of civilization; we love our province as we love our mother; we love the vastness of its forests; we love the romance and the grandeur of its rivers; we love the beauty and the picturesqueness of its landscape; Quebec is our mother; Quebec has been insulted, and it is useless for any member in this House to ask us to forget. We shall not forget.

Any man who states that Quebec can be disregarded in Canada's affairs is a man who shows his ignorance of Canadian history. Canada has been built up by the combined efforts of the great men of the other provinces, and of the great men of Quebec. No matter how far you go back in history, always amongst the most prominent workers for the grandeur and advancement of Canada, you will find French Canadian statesmen and politicians from Quebec. Who wanted constitutional government for Canada? The French Canadian statesmen who sat in the Legislative Assembly in 1791. Who carried to the battlefield the cry of responsible government? Who shed their blood for that principle? The French Canadian heroes of 1837, who, under the Union government obtained from England a full acknowledgment of responsible government—Lafontaine and Baldwin. Who rendered possible Confederation in Canada? Sir George Etienne Cartier. Who consummated Confederation and made of the nine provinces in Canada a nation united? Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It is needless to try to cast aside the French Canadian race in this country. We are the pioneer race and we intend to remain so. We have done things in the past; we are doing things in the present; we expect to achieve even greater things in the future, and intelligent statesmen, instead of trying to threaten Quebec, should try to conciliate Quebec.

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in making my contribution to this debate, I wish to follow the time-honoured custom of congratulating the mover and the seconder of the Address on the able manner in which they have acquitted themselves, and I also wish to join with them in extending congratulations to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) who has attained to the high position of Prime Minister of our country.

I intend that my remarks shall be brief. Since becoming a member of this House, the thought has often occurred to me that a large portion of many of the speeches, which are devoted to calling down the opposing party or parties, might very well be either cut out altogether, or the same effort applied to something constructive for the country's weal. It has been said that one of man's greatest advantages over the brute creation is the gift of language with which to conceal his thoughts, and, Sir, one is sometimes forced to wonder what the real thought behind some of the statements made in this debate might be. Consequently, Sir, I will be as concise as possible and as plain as possible.

In congratulating the leader of the Government, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not agree with some of the policies laid down by his party, and that I emphatically disagree with the policy of protection as outlined by that party and embodied in the speech from the Throne. This being the case, I could hardly be expected to vote for the motion unless I swallowed my convictions, which I have no intention of doing, and yet the amendment as it stands does not comply with the thought uppermost in my mind in regard to the present situation. But I feel forced to follow the old advice that of two evils, or possibly, I might say in this case, of three evils, choose the least. Consequently, I will support the amendment. In doing so, I am fully aware of what the consequences may be, but I have no hesitation in telling the members of the Government that the situation has been created by them, and on them the verdict will fall.

In all fairness there is one thing I wish to give my right hon. friend the leader of the Government credit for, while he filled the portfolio of Minister of the Interior, and that is the establishment of the Soldiers' Settlement Board, and the placing of thousands of returned men on the land. The hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt) has given the figures relating to the whole Dominion, and has made a plea for generous treatment of the returned men. I heartily endorse his sentiments in that respect, and I should like to give some figures particularly of the work done by the Board through the office at Prince Albert. The constituency of Prince Albert to-day has many soldier settlers who are making good in comfortable homes, and who are owners of fertile farms. These men are located not only in the district tributary to the city of Prince Albert, but you will find them all the way through the famous Carrot River valley right to the Manitoba boundary. Undoubtedly some are heavily encumbered, but taken broadly, the scheme has been a success both from the point of view of the re-establishment of the returned soldier, and that of land settlement and increased production. The office at Prince Albert reports 1,200 established settlers, with only some fifty adjustments, leaving 1,150 soldier settlers in actual residence, occupying in all 265,000 acres, and producing last season over 450,000 bushels of grain. Of these settlers 538 are married men; 164 of the wives are overseas brides, and there were at that time 1,002 children. So, Mr. Speaker, you will readily see that the element of increased production has not been overlooked.

Education has been handicapped in the settlement which was formed in that portion of the Porcupine Forest Reserve which was opened for soldier entry. Owing to the fact that the Government retained title to the land, debentures for the purpose of erecting schools could not be sold, and a condition exists there which should not be allowed. There are over one hundred children in this settlement, over sixty of whom are of school age but there is no school. Let me say in passing that in my opinion there is nothing the Government or this House can do for the returned man that would repay him for the sacrifices he made during the war, and when we find men who, after all the turmoil and upsetting experiences which they have undergone, are ready and willing to settle down on the land, or willing to qualify for the benefits of the Act, surely it is up to us to give them all the assistance and encouragement in our power.

But the one big want most keenly felt is the lack of transportation facilities. Some of these settlers are tremendously handicapped for lack of railways, but no worse than the civilian settlers who surround them. An extract from the report reads as follows:

> Transportation facilities north of Tisdale and north of Prince Albert are poor, and a railway operated at an early date would be of untold benefit to these areas. A line from Turtleford to Shellbrook would open up a very fine tract of country. The centre of this district is fifty miles from railway facilities, yet settlers are favourably reported upon.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I most strongly urge upon the Government and upon this House the support of any scheme whereby these people may get the necessary assistance in connecting them up with the outside market. I believe the whole West has a grievance in regard to the heavy freight rates, but the high rates of transportation, individually, sinks into insignificance in comparison with the situation of those people who have no transportation at all.

I would like to say a word about the freight rates. In the West our lines of railway are much more easily and cheaply constructed, and with long unbroken hauls in bulk lots, much more easily and cheaply operated than similar lines in the East. You will easily see that both the producer who has to ship his products over thousands of miles to eastern markets, or what is more likely, eastern ports, and the consumer, who in most cases is also a producer and has to ship his supplies in over the same long route, is heavily handicapped by the situation—handicapped to such an extent that if there is any possible way of surmounting the difficulty, the West demands to-day that it be surmounted.

There is a way to overcome the difficulty. The natural outlet for the Prairie Provinces was provided by an all wise Creator in the shape of the Hudson Bay, and it only remains for the hand of man to supply the necessary transportation facilities, the funds for which have already been largely provided by the sale of western lands set aside for that purpose. The work on this was proceeding fairly satisfactorily, even through most of the war period, but was finally stopped in 1918, and the present Government declines, or neglects, to complete the project, even though the West has, in season and out of season, been pressing for it. The Senate Committee which took evidence in connection therewith last year decided in favour of the scheme. I would impress upon the leaders of the Government that the West demands that the Hudson Bay route be completed.

In the matter of the investigation of the grain trade, I am sure that this group will gladly join in giving all the assistance in its power, and in that direction I wish to inform this House that it was the iniquities of the grain trade in the first place that forced the farmers of the West to organize in self defence, and I can assure you, Sir, from personal experience, that the fight in those days was an up-hill one. Where were the champions of the farmers' cause then who have lately come forward on the Government side, asking for an investigation of the grain trade? I venture to say that, with one or two exceptions, none of them knew or cared what the outcome would be at that time, but if the Government can make any improvement in the conduct of the grain business, the milling business, the shipping business, the textile business, the agricultural implement business, the packing house business, the sugar business, or any other business that affects the common good, it will get all the assistance possible from this group.

I wish to speak of another matter. Two days ago the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie) referred to his speech in South York and made this statement, which will be found in Hansard on page 445:

> I said that the movement had its Genesis among the American farmers in the great west.

He was referring to the origin of the Farmers' movement. I want to tell the minister that his information is absolutely false. I have been intimately connected with the Farmers' movement since its inception in 1902. It originated first in the province of Saskatchewan. I have myself been for eleven years a director on the Board and I had the high honour of working in conjunction with the men who originated and organized the movement. I think it might be interesting to the House to learn the nationality of some of these men. As I look backward over the years and try to recall the outstanding men connected with the movement, it is possible that some of them may escape my memory; but I shall give the names of those who occur to my mind at the moment. Of the Canadian-born directors whom I can remember on the board some have been presidents and some vice-presidents. Of the Canadian-born, there are: Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Mr. E. A. Partridge and his brother Mr. H. O. Partridge, Mr. John Miller, Mr. Peter Dayman, Mr. Levi Thomson, Mr. E. N. Hopkins, Mr. David Railton, and, last but by no means least, Mr. John A. Maharg. The British-born are: Sir Richard Lake, Lieutenant-Governor of Saskatchewan, Mr. Allan Hawkes, Mr. F. W. Green, Mr. F. M. Gates, Mr. Matthew Snow, Mr. J. A. Murray, Hon, C. A. Dunning, Provincial Treasurer in the Saskatchewan Government, Hon. George Langley, Minister of Municipal Affairs in the same government, and, in this category, last also, but not by any means least, the hon. member for Mackenzie who sits on my left (Mr. J. F. Reid). In all these years there was not a single American on the board, so far as I can remember, not that there is any reason why they should not have been there. The fact remains, however, that at that time very few Americans had come into the Canadian West. Many have entered the country since and some are on the boards, but they are in the minority, and the American idea has never influenced the movement at any time. I make this statement for the benefit of the minister who made the accusation. It has been stated by the hon. member for Last Mountain, (Mr. Johnston) that had the present situation and the present fiscal policy of the Government been predicted in 1917 in Western Canada, a very different result would have been recorded. And I quite agree with him. But no such policy and no such situation were in sight, nor were they considered in any way at that time. The Minister of Militia admits that the old Unionist party has passed out of existence and that a new party with an attenuated name has taken its place. This being so, and having no confidence in that party, I will support the amendment.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as this is the first occasion on which I address the House in French, I feel that I should offer a word of explanation, if not of apology, to those who, no doubt, believe in all sincerity, that the French Canadians are in the wrong every time they do not address this House in their mother tongue. I understand and still more appreciate, such feelings on their part, for I do not forget that I once felt as they do, and that, until I had the honour of being elected to Parliament. Until then, I was one of those who believed that French Canadians should fully avail themselves of their right to speak their own language in the House of Commons at Ottawa, whatever the outcome. However, I must say that, as soon as I had acquired some experience in Parliament I soon had to alter my views; this I did at the very first session. It was then that I realized that, whatever our rights to the use of French in this House, if we wish to take a prominent part in the debates of this House, we are thereby under the necessity to speak, not our own tongue, which is ever dear to us, but one that is not our own. And it is for that reason, and at the expense of great sacrifices, as well as great efforts on my part, that, until the present time, I have spoken English in this House. Yet, as I believe that it is my duty to pay a modest tribute to the French language, I am taking the liberty to impose a French speech upon hon. members within these precincts.

Were it necessary to quote authorities in support of my assertion that, notwithstanding our right to the use of the French language, we are compelled for purposes of discussion to speak another language, I would but quote the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, our lamented leader, who, though he spoke one language as fluently as the other, used the English language almost exclusively during the time that he was a member of Parliament, that is to say, for nearly half a century. We could find only a few instances in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's political life when he spoke in French in this House.

What I have just said of our regretted leader might apply equally well to all the great and illustrious French Canadians of the House of Commons of Canada. I might say the same of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland); of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau); and of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe); I might also mention that Mr. Bourassa, who has made it his business to champion the French language in the province of Quebec—for which I am grateful to him—very seldom, if I am rightly informed, spoke French in Parliament.

At any rate, the question is settled; whoever wishes to take part in the debates of the House of Commons must use the English language; once more I say that if I have to offer any apology, I am quite ready to do so; my only excuse is the necessity which exists and will continue to exist in the future for all French Canadians to use a language which is not their own, however much they may regret having to do so, if they wish to join in parliamentary debates.

Mr. Speaker, were I to neglect to congratulate the right hon. minister on his accession to the high position he now occupies, I would be unfair both to him and to myself. Whatever be our opinions, whatever be our likes and dislikes—as far as I am concerned, I do not dislike any one—we are bound to admire and acknowledge talent at all times and wherever it may be found, particularly in our country.

It is an undisputed fact, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. Prime Minister is a man of great ability, and that this great ability has won for him the high rank he now enjoys, and, saying this of one who is yet a young man is giving him the greatest praise that his fellow citizens can bestow upon him.

Mr. Speaker, I have read very carefully the speech from the Throne. Must I repeat what has already been said so often in this House, that this speech is quite insufficient and incomplete? During this period of reconstruction, at a time when Canada needs all her vital strength and an effective legislation, must it be said that the speech from the Throne has failed altogether to reach the object in view? The great problems of the hour have not been provided for.

The speech from the Throne is a dry document which was presented to us as a simple matter of course; it is a food which has no fragrancy, flavour or taste. The Government, in presenting it, confessed their inability and weakness as well as the instability of their policies.

We are told that this is a new Administration which has been in existence only a few months and that our criticism, if we have any to offer, should not apply to the actions of its predecessors, because the present Government would not be responsible for the blunders committed by the previous administrations.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I hold a different view, and, moreover, it was not the attitude taken by the right hon. Prime Minister throughout the country and in this debate before the House. It is one of two things: The present Government is either a new government or the continuation of preceding administrations. If it is a new government, then the question which the House has been discussing for the last three weeks, namely, that such a government must submit their new platform to the people, ought to be considered as being a fair proposal since the Government admit themselves that they are a new administration. Such is not, however, the stand taken by the Government.

The hon. Prime Minister says that this Government is nothing but the continuation of the preceding administrations, therefore, if we take him to his word and supposing, for the sake of argument, that this Government is nothing but the continuation of previous administrations, they are responsible for whatever their predecessors have done and they must bear the consequences thereof.

The right hon. Prime Minister has travelled throughout the country to state his policy or rather, as it is commonly said, to talk politics. The hon. gentleman knew that the preceding government was no longer in touch with the people, in other words had lost their confidence. Upon being called suddenly to lead the Government, the hon. gentleman, possessed as we know he is, of youth, ability, initiative and courage, started on a journey throughout the Dominion.

What was the result of that campaign? Have the arguments of the hon. Prime Minister convinced the people of Canada? Has public opinion changed? Has confidence been restored? Have the people of Canada any more faith in this Government than they had in the previous administration five or six months or twelve months ago? The question answers itself; you will find it in every tongue and in every heart. The people throughout the country, are asking just for one thing; that is a general election in which they will have the opportunity to express their sentiments. Hon. gentlemen opposite answering the leader of the Opposition in a somewhat ironical mood absolutely lacking in sincerity said: "You are asking us to vacate our seats for your own benefit."

To put the question in that way, Mr. Speaker, is to distort the truth. That is not the question. The question we are putting before the House and which we shall submit to the people of Canada in due time, is the following: Fellow citizens, you are called to elect the men who will form a new government. If they should be taken from the ranks of the Conservative or Unionist party, it is all very well. The moment the people have declared themselves, we shall be satisfied with the verdict, because they are the supreme masters of our destiny and they are to decide in last resort as to who shall rule the country. It is often said that the people get the government they deserve. I do not think it would be fair to make the same assertion now, because the people, for ten years at least, as I shall explain it later, have not had any opportunity to select their government.

All that we ask from the Government is to enable the people to select their representatives.

Once the people have voted, if they choose our friends opposite, those amongst us who are returned will be glad to come back and to work as we have done heretofore for the good of the people. Then our friends opposite will not have to submit to such humiliations as they must necessarily feel over a debate like the present one. I for one should not like to occupy a seat on the other side and listen to all that is said from this quarter. It is true that it can be claimed that this is politics and that what is said from this side is said for political objects. One may perhaps find a certain consolation in that, but if one wishes to go to the bottom of things, to examine the question sincerely, one is forced to admit that the position of our friends on the other side of the House is not only precarious, but also humiliating.

I remember that, about twelve years ago, when the British House of Commons was moved into Supply, Mr. Lloyd George insisted on elections taking place and thus taunted his opponents: "What! You are afraid to submit your Budget to the electors of Great Britain! Is it then so precarious that you, the Government in power, have neither the strength, nor the courage, nor the self-reliance that could induce you to submit this Budget to the electors of the country?"

Mr. Speaker, the same argument might apply at the present time, to our friends on the other side of the House. We might say to them, "You, gentlemen, who have been called to power barely three years ago, with a majority of more than 70, you who have won the war and covered yourselves with glory, you who claim to count in your midst the best informed and most capable politicians in the country, you who receive almost with derision the arguments of the members of the Opposition, why then, is your policy so tottering, have you become so weak, that you fear to present yourselves to the electors and ask for a new mandate?

Hon. Mr. BELAND (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after all that has been said during this debate; after all the challenges, more or less to the point if you like; after all the invectives which have been hurled from one side or the other; suppose that the right hon. Prime Minister would now rise and say to this House, speaking at the same time to all Canada, "Gentlemen, I have had enough of your taunts, I have had enough of your challenges; I have the right to remain at my post for two years more since I have behind me a majority in this House; notwithstanding this, I renounce the right, the privilege, not my own but that of this House, that of the Canadian people. Taking for granted that there may be some truth in all that you have said, I give you the benefit of the doubt, and I ask you to assume the responsibility of the stand you have taken. You summon me to go before the people; very well, I consent to do so, I am ready to go forth and give battle before the people and prove that the party of which I am the leader still has the confidence of Canada."

And suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. Prime Minister should ask for the dissolution of Parliament, should go to the people and find he had a majority; what a humiliating situation for us of the Opposition, the Liberals and the Farmers' party! Cannot you imagine, Mr. Speaker, the return to this House, in two or three months, of the member who would be re-elected? Cannot you see those of us who for the last three weeks have been talking against the Government, returning, crest-fallen to salute the new Government, recognizing that they had the confidence of the people?—recognizing at the same time that we had wrongly accused them in clamouring, for three weeks, or a year, or two, that they did not represent the opinion of the people! I vow that if such an event took place, the Government that would return to power would be the strongest since Confederation. They would have the right to impose their will, for they would have given the people, in a period of tranquility, their chance to vote for or against them.

There would then be no ambiguity and no evasion. It would be useless to say: "You have stolen the election during the war or otherwise. It would not be an election on the platform of reciprocity, it would resolve itself into a question of confidence. And if the hon. minister, after having advocated his policy all over the country, as he has been doing for several months, could get it endorsed by the electors, he would be one of the strongest men we have ever had at the head of the destinies of this country, since Confederation, and this while being still in the prime of life, while we, ourselves, on this side of the House, would be astounded and absolutely helpless for a long while to come.

One must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the challenge emanating from this side of the House is of as much consequence to the challenger as to the challenged. One must not imagine, for one moment, that the Liberals who are daring the Government to go before the people, "are not taking as great a risk as the Government would in accepting the challenge. Theoretically, the chances are even; but the Government does not wish to go before the people, because it knows beforehand, and has the intuition born of its deep knowledge of things, and of men, that it is impossible for it to come back to power, and that is precisely the reason why the Government does not pick up the gauntlet which has been thrown.

I have said that the right hon. Prime Minister had toured the country. I must remind you here that he came to the province of Quebec, and I extend my congratulations to him for the courage he has shown in paying a visit to our province.

The hon. Prime Minister knows that he has very few followers or partisans in the province of Quebec, and yet he came; he stated his policy, and, I must say, with great courage. On the other hand, the right hon. Prime Minister should not deceive himself as to the feelings of the province of Quebec. Our feelings are not those of spite, still less of hatred.

Hon. Mr. BELAND: (Translation.) Hear, Hear.

Mr. DENIS: (Translation.) The province of Quebec is the pivot on which revolves Confederation. Not only is the province of Quebec the pivot of Confederation, but it is also—I would have preferred that the compliment came from an outsider however I say it is the pivot of common and good sense in the Dominion.

When a year ago, or more, the Government was in fear of bolshevism; when strikes and disorders spread from city to city, in certain parts of Canada; when excitement was high and hearts were low, we saw our friends on the other side of the House turn and place their hopes in the province of Quebec and recognize that our province was as I have just said: The pivot of Confederation, of stability and of good common sense.

The province of Quebec is essentially conservative, if you consider that word in its broadest sense, which means the conservation of what we have, the esteem of what we possess, the belief in our traditions, and the attachment for our past. Such is the meaning of conservative, as applied to the province of Quebec.

Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that in the present circumstances, and on a particularly burning issue which I most certainly have no desire to discuss at the present moment, is it any wonder that the province of Quebec should have been of a different opinion from that held by the other provinces? Is it, forsooth such an extraordinary thing for a province, to differ on certain matters from the other provinces?

Since the beginning of the session, and more particularly since the beginning of the present discussion, we have heard many of our friends on both sides of the House declare, and that very rightly, that the opinion of every one must be respected, and that there is no harm in entertaining a different opinion from that of the majority; such is precisely the argument of our friends of the Agrarian party, when they start to discuss in this House problems which, evidently are not in accordance with the opinion of the great majority of this House, either on this side or the other.

The province of Quebec has its own ideas; it has its traditions, its inclinations, its affections. Unfortunately, the hon. Prime Minister has never understood what are the ideas, the affections, the inclinations and the traditions of the province of Quebec, and that is precisely the reason why he has always remained a stranger to our province.

That is also the reason why the province of Quebec has always stood aloof from him. I mean so far as politics are concerned. Outside of politics, we have all due regard for him and we acknowledge him as a capable and worthy man. But between that statement and political allegiance there exists quite a chasm and many things will happen before that chasm is bridged.

Mr. Speaker, since the last session of Parliament there has been an assembly of the League of Nations at which the Canadian Government was represented by three ministers, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the hon. member from Durham (Mr. Rowell), then president of the privy council. I am pleased to see the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in his seat, the more so because I know that, having learned the beautiful French language, he will no doubt be able to hear and understand the compliments which I am about to shower upon him. It has been said on both sides of the House that Canada had been worthily represented at that meeting. Speaking with that moderation and fairness which I intend to maintain at all times, I would be doing an injustice to these hon. gentlemen who were our representatives on that occasion were I to neglect offering them heartfelt congratulations for the manner in which they represented us.

The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is endowed with an eloquence which younger members of the House should always emulate, and it was sufficient for us to hear him, a few days ago, reporting what had been going on at that meeting to understand how brilliantly and creditably he represented us. I must add that what I just said of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is equally applicable to the hon. gentlemen who accompanied him. Yet, was it not unfortunate that Canada should not have been represented by a French Canadian at that meeting? In this country French Canadians make up a third of the population in round numbers. This meeting of the League of Nations was held in Geneva. French and English were the official languages. I say French and English and I designedly put French in the first place because that language was chiefly resorted to. We had that admission from the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech, an admission willingly made. With his usual frankness and outspokenness, when answering a question which I put, he said in a very candid manner that French was in much more common use than English at that meeting. However, this was already known to me, having myself had the privilege of attending for a week or over, sittings of the international labour conference, which was held at Washington in the month of November, 1919, and seeing that the international labour conference was composed of the same nations represented at the meeting of the League of Nations, I had noticed that French was resorted to much oftener than any other language. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, French Canadians accounting for a third of the population and seeing that two thirds, at least, of forty odd nations assembled, spoke French, would it not have been reasonable, and I shall say proper, to have a French-speaking representative there? At that meeting which was held quite near Paris, at the intellectual centre of Europe, largely made up of peoples speaking the French language, would it not have been proper to make it known that there is in Canada another race than the Anglo-Saxon race—notwithstanding all the respect for this race, I shall go further —that there are men of high attainments and of great ability among that race forming a third of the Canadian population? Would it have been impossible to the Government to select as a third representative a French-speaking man who could have been a credit not only to the Government, but also to the French tongue and the French Canadian race? No, Mr. Speaker, such a step would have been two upright in the eyes of the Government, they did not think fit to select a French-Canadian representative and thus they led Europeans, at least those who do not know any better, to believe, that Canada is a country inhabited only by Anglo-Saxons and people who cannot speak any other language than English.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order. The hon. member is reading his speech and I believe that this is against the rules of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: (Text) I understand that the hon. member (Mr. Mackie) raises the point that the hon member for Joliette is reading his speech.

Mr. DENNIS: (Translation) Mr. Speaker, never has a point of order been raised with so little justification. If there ever was an occasion in my life when I did not read my speech that is the present time, when I have barely a few notes before me. I would not like to leave the House under the impression for an instant that I am reading my speech. I would rather believe that my hon. friend (Mr. Mackie) is of my opinion when I claim that a French-speaking representative should have been sent to that meeting of the League of Nations.

Mr. MACKIE: (Translation) Yes, I agree with you.

Mr. DENNIS: (Translation) Being aware that my hon. friend knows French well, I think he is not forgetful of himself perhaps and believes that he should have been sent to that meeting. This is why, I surmise, he interrupted me, but I shall take no notice of his interruption and shall continue—I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been proper, eminently proper, for the Government, if the right hon. Prime Minister had wished to prove that he had some consideration and friednship for the province of Quebec, to have had a representative of the French Canadian element at this meeting of the League of Nations. At the International Conference of Labour, much less important, no doubt, which took place in a city nearer than Geneva, Washington, the Canadian Government was represented by two ministers, the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) and the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Robertson.) I do not know whether any of these gentlemen were qualified to represent either the French element or the French language, and as I said just now the predominant language at the International Conference of Labour was French. The delegates of the forty-one nations represented there met daily, continually exchanging views, at banquets and elsewhere—and we had there only two representatives, very worthy ones, but who knew not a word of French. Mr. Speaker, I know for instance, of a banquet at which were present the South American delegates and at which French was almost exclusively spoken—Canada's two representatives were present, and did not understand what was being said—I do not reproach these gentlemen with not knowing French—it is hard to learn a foreign language—but I reproach the Government. Each time that an important occasion presents itself they try to give the impression to foreign nations that Canada is an English country in which there are only English-speaking people, and that the French-Canadians are a negligible quantity unworthy of representation.

Hon. Mr. BELAND: (Translation) Hear, hear.

Mr. DENIS: (Translation) If it were for no other reasons than these, I would say that the right hon. Prime Minister could not expect much sympathy from the province of Quebec. When the right hon. Prime Minister will have proved to the province of Quebec that he is ready to do it justice, not only by words but by acts, then perhaps that province may in part turn to him, because Quebec is not prejudiced, but is sincere, and the opinions it holds are not those of a day, but fundamental, based upon its traditions and its history. And if one looks back one finds that the province of Quebec was for many years Conservative. How does it happen that these old Conservative traditions have been abandoned and the province of Quebec has become what it is to-day? It is because, with the same reasoning and the same good sense, the province of Quebec at this time has no confidence in this Government. It feels that it has had enough of the Conservative party, and slowly but surely it has broken away from it.

As it has taken a generation and even more for the province of Quebec to detach itself from the Conservative party, so will it be before Quebec places its confidence in another party than the Liberal one, unless, and this we cannot foresee, the Liberal party by misdeeds should prove unworthy of its confidence.

I mentioned just now that the speech from the Throne was a very meagre document. If ever there was a question which should have been submitted or at least discussed in this speech, specially as it has been brought up in this debate, it is surely the financial standing of the country.

Mr. Speaker, we do not realize to the full extent the financial state of our country. The hon. members of this House must bear in mind that for the last twelve months our public debt has been about two billion and a quarter and while our revenues are daily decreasing, the debt is steadily on the increase.

Mr. Speaker, if such is our financial situation, with revenues steadily going down, where will this lead us to? The Government has both the responsibility and the duty to balance the finances of this country and from the moment it acknowledges its inability to do so it should make way for another Government. The present mismanagement conducing the ruin of the country would suffice to warrant us in demanding the dissolution of Parliament. Mr. Speaker, has it ever entered the head of the hon. members of this House that we are at present, and are becoming daily more and more dependent economically out of the United States. Probably this utterance displeases my hon. friends on the opposite side of this House. These hon. gentlemen are ultra loyal to England and when we say that we are becoming an economical dependency, the expression naturally wounds and shocks them. It is not a pleasure for me to use these words; however, one must admit the evidence of facts. We are at present and are becoming more and more an economical dependency of the United States. At present, in order to maintain our commerce, our industries, to meet our daily requirements and support our family we are forced to import to the extent of nearly one billion dollars a year. On the other hand our exports hardly amount to a little over half a billion. We buy from the United States in round figures for a billion and in return sell to the amount of five or six hundred million dollars.

Mr. Speaker, where will this state of affairs lead us to? We are simply drifting to bankruptcy or probably I may be more correct in saying, we are drifting towards annexation, that is we are becoming every day more and more an economical dependency of the United States. At the present time in order to trade with the United States we are losers to the extent of one hundred million dollars per year. For the products we purchase from them by paying the difference of the rate of exchange which has varied between 8 and a fraction, 19 and a fraction since 1912, we make them a present of one hundred million dollars per year. In other words when buying one billion dollars worth of goods, we pay naturally the billion dollars, but over and above that amount, we make them a present of over one hundred millions.

Mr. JACOBS: (Translation.) It is extortion, not a present.

Mr. DENIS: (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, that is the situation we have to face at present. How will we stand in three, six or twelve months? No one knows. There are astute observers amongst the financiers of this country who contend that it is possible that the rate of exchange which was 19 and a fraction three months ago, might again attain that figure and perhaps reach 20 and 25 per cent. Should this happen, we should be absolutely at the mercy of the United States, for the simple reason that we are at present compelled to purchase from them products which are absolutely indispensable to us. Amongst these products might I mention coal which we purchase to the amount of $70,000,000 per year. Has the Government done anything to remedy this depressed state of things? Has it made any efforts? With the exception of the tariff issue, is not this question as important as those of a secondary nature which were submitted in the speech from the Throne.

All that the Government wish now is to tell the people of Canada: We want to have a revision of the tariff and upon this revision we want to have elections. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Government have not understood the situation in which we find ourselves, and that with the speech from the Throne they have proved their unfitness and their inefficiency. I heard a few days ago the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) make in a speech the following statement which I quote to the House:

> One of the greatest mistakes this Government has made, in my judgment, was the acceptance of several were vessels from the British Government, resulting in our having to incur the additional expenditure, inevitably attendant upon it.

This is to be found on p. 283 of the unrevised Hansard.

The Government, although knowing that they are bound to the strictest economy, are embarking in all kinds of adventures. One day we are told of a naval programme and of the building of ships for Canada. Another day we are told of a gift from England, which is repudiated, as I have just shown, by the hon. member for Marquette—a prominent member for this House, since he is the leader of a party. Another day the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) submits Estimates double the amount of those last year. At the present time, when there is such a need for economy, do the Government show any foresight, any wisdom by indulging in such expenditures? I say, no. In thus quoting the hon. member for Marquette, it is not the opinion of the province of Quebec which I voice. If that came from Quebec, it would probably be taken as a proof of lack of patriotism. I quote the opinion of a former minister, of a man who has shared the ministerial responsibility, the opinion of a man who was not opposed to conscription, but in favour of conscription, the opinion not of a French Canadian but of a loyal Englishman—loyal just as we are ourselves. And it is this hon. member who says that the Government made a mistake in accepting this gift from England and they had no valid reason for doing so.

Mr. Speaker, as I look at the clock, I find that I have spoken much longer than I intended to. I will therefore hasten and confine my remarks to the question directly before the House, that is to say the speech from the Throne, the amendment to the Address in answer thereto, and the sub-amendment. The whole matter comes to this, that the Government offers us a speech from the Throne which contains practically nothing. They ask purely and simply to be left in office till the expiration of their term. The hon. leader of the Opposition says, "Your mandate has expired, and I want you to go to the people and have it renewed." An hon. member offers an amendment saying, "Your mandate has expired, it is true, but I am willing to give you delay in order to have a census taken and a redistribution made of constituencies before new elections." On the whole, Mr. Speaker, I see no difference in principle between the amendment and the sub-amendment. Both say to the Government, "Your time has expired, and you have lost the confidence of the people." Only, the amendment says, "We want you to withdraw right now," and the sub-amendment, "We ask that you withdraw a little later, when you have accomplished what we consider an imperative duty."

I for one, Mr. Speaker, speaking in all candour and fairness, do not believe that I am doing an injustice in saying that I will support the amendment, and that I am strongly of the opinion that the mandate of the Government has long expired. There is an argument which has been offered several times in this House, and which I cannot refrain from repeating. It is that we have not had elections since 1911. I may go further perhaps and say that we have had no elections since 1908. In that year we had general elections on the policy of the then administration, that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier presented to the House a Treaty of Reciprocity. The Opposition offered obstruction, asked for general elections, and as Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a very different man from those at the head of the Government to-day, instead of resisting the attacks of the Opposition as he might perfectly well have done, said to the then Opposition, "You want to have an election as you claim that I do not command the confidence of the people."

I am willing to let the country pass judgment upon my policy; I am ready to appeal to the people on the reciprocity issue. What a difference, Sir, between Liberal principles and Tory, Unionist or Conservative principles! Sir Wilfrid Laurier said to the House and country: You are undecided; a doubt exists; I am willing to resign. I am not the master here; I am but a representative of the people, and as soon as a large number of the members of this House state that my policy is not the policy of the people, I am willing to submit it to them. The policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was submitted to the electorate and we are aware of the result. The elections of 1911 were held upon a single issue, that of reciprocity. But, let us admit for the sake of my argument that in the elections of 1911 the issue was based on the merits of the administration and that the Liberal Administration was defeated in that year. What remains? Their still remains an interval of ten years, from 1911 to 1921, during which no elections were held. Nobody can reasonably contend that the elections of 1917 were true elections. A single issue was then put before the electorate: conscription. I do not wish to bring up that subject again because it is a burning one, and the least said about it the better for the people of this country, for the harmony which should prevail among us. I do not want to discuss the opinions of those who took part in the elections of 1917 upon the issue of conscription; yet it is true that conscription was the sole issue submitted to the electorate in 1917. At that time, there were two parties in this country. They were both willing to exert themselves so as to win the war; but each had a different way of securing that end, and it was upon the best way to win the war that the people of Canada gave their verdict. Our opponents were saying—I heard it everywhere from one end of the country to the other; I read their speeches and everybody knows it—our opponents were saying: There is at present but one issue: shall we do our best in order to protect our soldiers and to win the war by means of conscription, following out the policy of our Prime Minister; or shall we stand idle—as Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have us? That is exactly the issue which was put forth in every Canadian province. I do not say it was put in the right light, far from it; but such was the issue brought forward at the time to the people of Canada and passed upon by them.

Prejudiced in that way the electors of every province in Canada except Quebec voted against Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his policy, not upon general lines, but only as to the manner in which the war was to be prosecuted.

Mr. McMASTER: (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. DENIS: (Translation.) And our opponents were proclaiming everywhere: "The government we have is a coalition one composed of Liberals and Conservatives; it is not a government which is expected to last long." Everybody knew at that time that it was a government which would not last forever, that it was a provisional government, a coalition in order to "win the war" as the saying was at that time. I have the greatest respect for the views of those who then formed themselves into a group to promote a policy which prevailed, but it must be admitted that the means they took were far from being legitimate.

To-day, that question having been settled and the war being over, we have to decide whether or not in 1917 the elections were held upon the general policy of the government. The following answer cannot be gainsaid: In 1917 the elections were not held upon the general policy of the government, but upon a single issue—then a burning one which is not so now, that is, in what manner were we to endeavour to win the war. That is precisely the ground upon which the elections were fought in 1917.

Now, events having taken another turn; the war being won, we may justly say that there have been no elections since 1911 because the people of this country were not called upon to give their verdict since then. However there is something more forcible and I would say more amusing, if I may use that term: it is that during this session we shall have to decide upon the fiscal policy of this country. Now, I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite whether or not Canadian electors ever thought that the representatives they were electing in 1917 would be called upon to decide the fiscal policy of Canada?

I remember that on many occasions when we came to this House in 1918 certain members on the opposite side raised fiscal issues and each time when questions of this nature were brought forward, interested friends, no doubt of those who made these enquiries, would rise and appeal to the whole House for support—each time such an issue was raised in 1918, immediately a minister of the Crown, or an hon. member would exclaim: We are not here to discuss fiscal issues, we are here to win the war, this Government was elected to win the war and when this is done, we shall settle our accounts.

Is it not a fact that what I have just mentioned not only was said once, but twenty-five times in this House?

In 1918, our friends on the opposite side admitted that they were not here to discuss fiscal issues, but to carry on the war. Well, so far the war was concerned, the hon. members on the right were in perfect agreement because they were elected on a definite programme and they acted accordingly. They followed their programme as long as the war lasted, and I have no fault to find, they were consistent with their former stand. However, hardly was the war over that we witnessed their disaggregation. Hon. members followed one another declaring that, the purpose of the election was to win the war, but as the war was over, parties should return to their old lines; that those at present holding office had not been elected to govern the country in time of peace or to settle the fiscal issues, or to decide on questions which cropped up presently—it was a war government whose existence depended upon the war and the problems involved with it. Mr. Speaker, I beg to be excused for having taken up so much time. I might bring forth further arguments, but I am not so conceited as to hope that I could alter the views of my hon. friends opposite. I crave the indulgence of those I may have somewhat tired by this lengthy speech. I hope that when the vote is taken in a few minutes the Government will realize, that an Administration returned with seventy of a majority in 1917 and reduced to what it is at present, should examine their conscience, consider the necessity of returning before their masters and seeking a new mandate to present themselves before this House. But, Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much if this mandate will ever be granted to them.

Mr. WILLIAM HENRY WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this debate, but as the hour is early—we have the whole day before us!—I would like to offer a few remarks in reply to some of the suggestions that have been made by several hon. members on the other side of the House.

In the first place I think it is my duty to offer my congratulations to the Prime Minister, as the right hon. gentleman came into this House at the same election as I did. I had the pleasure of journeying with him to Ottawa. At that time we had about the same ideals, the same aspirations, and we did believe that perhaps we might in some way work for the benefit of that great western country whence we came. For the first session or two we got along very well together. At that time I was interested in the stock business in the West, and as conditions were not very favourable I put a resolution on the Order Paper in favour of a cold storage system to be operated by the Government. I received the support of every hon. member from the western provinces, but the best support came from the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government. As I say, at that time we shared the same ideals, but since then we have been drifting apart. I have watched my right hon. friend climbing upwards on a different path, and he has now reached the peak.

Mr. JACOBS: And is going down again.

Mr. WHITE: Yes. He has got to the peak of the greatest autocracy that ever controlled the destinies of this country. I suppose in the opinion of the masses he has travelled faster than I have and has become a much greater man.

Mr. JACOBS: No, no.

Mr. WHITE: But I stayed where I was, believing in the common people, still retaining the beliefs that I held when I came here, and which he also held at that time. I have stood where I was; he has advanced. Perhaps he imbibed a different spirit after coming down here. Believing, as I did, that certain things were in the interests of my country, I have been satisfied to stay where I still am, rather than attempt to follow my right hon. friend to the high position which he now holds. However, in all fairness to my right hon. friend I will say that only by his energy and his industry has he attained the highest honour Canada can give him, and if that position is to be held by any hon. member on the opposite side of the House, I do not believe there is anybody more deserving or more fitted to hold it than my right hon. friend.

I also wish to extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address. In my observation extending over fifteen sessions I have never seen that duty performed in a more creditable and able manner. But my reason for rising to-night, Mr. Speaker, is not particularly to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address, but rather to offer some observations on certain features of the debate.

The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) discussed some grievances from which the western farmer suffered and dealt with the matter of the car shortage in that country, The hon. member pointed out that there was a shortage of equipment on the Canadian National railways and that the farmers suffered a great deal in consequence. I agree with every statement he made in that regard. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Blair) followed the hon. member for Mackenzie, but he seemed to think that the disadvantages the western producers laboured under were due to the operations in grain. The hon. gentleman delivered a splendid speech. It was his maiden effort and I congratulate him upon it. But he must know better than to advance such an argument as he did. He and I were on two delegations that met the Prime Minister when he visited the city of Edmonton last fall.

The great grievance complained of then was not the spread in prices, or the matter in which the grain business was handled, but the car shortage. Had there been in the proper sense of the term adequate railway equipment, the spread of prices which the hon. gentleman mentioned would not have cut any figure at all. The producers were in the independent position that they would not have needed to deal with the line elevators, and might have ignored the street prices; they could have shipped their grain independently if they could have got the cars they needed. Had sufficient cars been available they would not have been affected by the spread in prices; they could have shipped their grain to the terminal elevators and sold it there. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) has made the statement that he ordered about double the number of cars contracted for by the Canadian Pacific Railway and had done twice as much as that company to relieve the congestion. Well, if that were the case, and if the cars were available, they certainly did not reach our part of the country. Every western member knows that the congestion of cars was felt all along the line of the Canadian National Railways. We were told by the General Superintendent at Edmonton that with the equipment possessed by the Canadian National Railways it would take three years to move the crop according to the estimates he had received. My hon. friend from Battle River was present at the meeting and heard Mr. Brown make the statement.

A demand has been made for a new Grain Commission to be appointed to deal with the existing difficulties. As my hon. friend from Red Deer pointed out, we already have a Grain Commission composed of men of ten or twelve years' experience. Surely another commission is not needed to deal with the matter. However, the point upon which I wish to lay stress is that had sufficient cars been available the spread of prices complained of would not have bothered the producers and they could have sold their grain in the open market. I raised considerable grain myself last year, in fact I come from a section where their was a bumper crop. We are holding that grain to-day because we could not dispose of it by reason of the lack of adequate equipment on the Canadian National railways.

The real grievance of the West to-day along the Canadian National Railway lines is lack of equipment. The member for Battle River (Mr. Blair) knows well that the prices are from seven to ten cents higher in the districts covered by the Canadian Pacific than they are along the Canadian National railways, because it is recognized that along the Canadian Pacific, where proper equipment is available, the grain will be brought out in the early part of the season, so that advantage can be taken of lake transportation. The suggestion on the part of my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Henders) and other hon. gentlemen opposite that the great detriment to the producers in the West has been the spread of prices and that kind of thing is only a bugaboo; the real difficulty arises from car shortage. The hon. member for Battleford (Mr. Wright) was present at the meeting when Mr. Brown stated that if the estimate of this year's crop was correct, the Canadian National could not move it out with their equipment in less than three years. I would like to know how many farmers will go very far in the matter of production next year under circumstances such as these. Let hon. gentlemen who represent the western districts forget their party affiliations and truly represent the sections of the country from which they come; it is a simple matter.

There may be a great deal that is wrong about the grain business, and if a commission can be appointed that will make things better for the producer, why, I am willing to support anything that could be done along that line. But I take the same view as that expressed by the member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), when he suggests that there is no reason why we should appoint one commission to investigate the doings of another. We already have a commission on the job; why appoint another to find out some imaginary wrongs, particularly when every producer knows what the real cause of the trouble is. We can get away from grain commissions altogether if we have proper transportation facilities for the shipment of our grain to the open market. The Minister of Railways says he has put into commission double the number of cars that the Canadian Pacific have put on their road. Well, if he has, they are not in evidence.

Some hon. members have spoken of redistribution. I want to make an honest statement in regard to this. Everybody will agree that the West is not bothering very much about redistribution. In fact, the West believe that they are not properly represented in the House to-day. There are very few members here to-day who represent the actual sentiment of the West. Who believes that hon. gentlemen from the West on the Government side represent the views of the people of the West? Nobody believes it. The real sentiment of the West to-day is represented on this side, not only by the two Liberal members from the West, but by what is called the Progressive group. They represent western opinion; there is no doubt about that—and the Government know it; let them test it and find out. The views of the West to-day are very well expressed by the Calgary Albertan, which says: We would like to have more representation in the West, but we would rather take a chance right now than wait to see how many more representatives we might have. No one will have the audacity to stand up and say that hon. gentlemen sitting behind the Treasury Benches represent the voice of the West.

What is this Agrarian group to my left? Do you not think, Sir, that this is a body of intelligent men who, when they found that they were not representing public opinion, left their party and crossed over to this side? No better evidence than that could be offered of their intelligence. I do not contend that I, as a Liberal, represent the whole sentiment of the West; there is no doubt that others were wise enough to know what public sentiment was, and when they found out that the people were not satisfied with the Government, they crossed over to this side. They did not cross over to this side to defy the electors of their constituencies; they crossed over because they considered they were the servants of the people. When they found that the people had no confidence in the Government, as honest, sincere representatives of the people, they followed public opinion and cut thmselves free from hon. gentlemen opposite. Nobody can believe anything else to be the case.

In conclusion, I want to say that, perhaps not in a very eloquent manner, but in the simple language that comes easy to me, I have tried to make an honest statement to both sides of the House. Although I know hon. gentlemen opposite are looking for their support to other sections of the country than that from which I come, I am trying as honestly as I can to represent the views and sentiments of the people who sent me here.

Mr. ADOLPHE STEIN (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, which has already lasted over two weeks, and especially at this stage it would be impossible for the humble member that I am to throw any light on the matters under discussion. But after reading in the Montreal Gazette of February 28 that the Opposition had failed in this debate to point to any wrong-doing on the part of the Government, I decided to endeavour to show, in as few words as possible, some of the innumerable pieces of mischief that have disgraced the record of this Government, elected in 1911 and re-elected, by accident, in 1917. The Gazette challenges the Opposition in the following words:

> The debate on the address, as have all debates for three years, has been remarkable in that there has been no suggestion of wrong-doing or maladministration on the part of the Government. Either the Opposition is too dense to perceive errors, or the Government has given Canada a wonderful example of administrative capacity and probity. The old charges of scandal no longer obtain. Nor are there likely to be any charges. The Government may have made mistakes, but no one has the courage to say that its members permitted the treasury to be plundered by themselves or party friends.

We on this side of the House were profoundly amazed when we read those words. We would never have imagined that the Government's friends would be bold enough to challenge the Opposition to reiterate the many scandals and numerous feats of maladministration that stained the Borden Government, and for which the present Administration rightly admits responsibility. For the sake of Canadian pride, we of the Opposition would have very much preferred to avoid publishing those terrible national misdemeanors, more especially when it is a well-known fact that in other countries during the war those who dared to indulge in similar mischievous acts were either very severely punished with penalties or imprisonment or very often shot as traitors to their country, while in this country of ours the guilty remained undisturbed, when they were not held in favour for Canadian or Imperial positions of trust. But we accept the challenge and I will, therefore, give a list, though incomplete on account of the late hour at which I am speaking, of some of the very numerous scandals that we have already charged and that we claim to have proved against the Government.

There is a first group, known to the country as "war contract scandals," as investigated by the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons in 1915. It was proved before that committee that war contracts were let without any tenders, or any kind of competition whatever, and that the Government's purchasing system was loose, irregular and illegal. The Auditor General, before the committee on March 17, 1915, speaking of purchases, said:

> It was worse than that; they were not made in compliance with the Act.

Indeed, war goods amounting to over $1,000,000,000 had been bought without Orders-in-Council, as required by law. It was also brought out in evidence that the Tory patronage system then existing compelled the use of middlemen in all contracts. I shall give a very brief nomenclature of those scandals that the Gazette claims not to exist or to have been forgiven or forgotten: The horse scandal, which brought about the resignation of a Tory member of this House; the drug scandal which caused the resignation of another Tory member of this House; the binocular scandal and many others that will pass over without mentioning; the nickel scandal, which raised in this House a debate in which several members and especially one on the Government side laid considerable blame on the Government; the shell scandal and the fuse scandal, which alone meant a million dollar rake-off.

In another group not connected with the war, I might mention several other deeds of maladministration, such as, for instance, the padlock scandal, in the Post Office Department; the Carslake scandal in the same department; the Dorval military camp scandal in the Department of Militia, and the extravagant payment of several hundred thousand dollars to foreigners, Arthur Young and Company, and the Griffenhagen and associates, to perform a so-called civil service re-organization which could only have been properly performed by the heads of departments together with our Civil Service Commission.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the Montreal Gazette reporter has already forgotten all these wrong-doings! Is it not in this very same paper that I read, in an editorial of June 14, 1920, under the title "a condemnable contract," the following charge against the Cabinet in connection with the above expenditures:

> The whole episode reflects ministerial incompetency in a most unusual way, and the Government cannot too soon repair its mistake by terminating a contract repugnant to National pride.

And again, what about the creation, by Order-in-Council, on July 15, 1920, fourteen days after prorogation, of a Central Purchasing Board, a scheme which had encountered during a debate last session, the hostility of the great majority of this House? How many other scandals have there been, Sir, the mention of which would be much too long for my purpose? The gentleman who represents the Montreal Gazette in the press gallery is at liberty now to send again to his home office a despatch stating that we on this side of the House are "too dense to perceive errors."

It has been stated by previous speakers in the course of this debate that the people of Quebec would forgive, but could not forget, the treatment that they received from the Government. Well, I venture to say that the people of Canada at large will neither forget nor forgive those numerous scandals which have been detected and proved against the Government, whether they have been perpetrated with the connivance or through the gross negligence of the Government. In closing my remarks on this point, I wish to give credit to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) for his frankness in admitting, in a speech delivered in Winnipeg, on October 22, 1917, that he, as a member of the Conservative Government, was bound to share all the responsibilities assumed by the former Government, replaced, in the fall of 1917, by the Union Government.

During the recess and in the course of this debate, much has been said of the feelings of the province of Quebec towards the present Ministry, and of the very affectionate and touching friendship entertained by the same ministry not only for the province of Quebec, but towards the three million French-speaking citizens of this country.

The very eloquent member for Beauce (Mr. Béland), in beautiful and forcible, though mild and courteous language, has laid before the House undeniable evidence, showing to what a great extent the friendly words uttered by the right hon. the Prime Minister and by his colleagues are flatly contradicted by their own acts and deeds, when it is up to these same gentlemen to give concrete form to their flirtations with our French-speaking people.

The hon. member for Beauce mentioned several instances of recent injustice done to the French-speaking people by the Government. He particularly inquired from the ministry why not a single representative of the French Canadians had been invited to join in with the ministers who represented, or at least assumed that they held a mandate to represent, Canada at the Peace Conference and at the Assembly of the League of Nations.

I would go one step further, and ask the Government the reason why, if any, the only French-speaking member of the Cabinet was not invited, and even induced to attend those conferences as the representative of one-third of our population? If the hon. gentleman, who occupies the position of Postmaster General, was not then available, why did they not invite the very distinguished French Canadian who is the present Speaker of the Senate, and who is also, I am told, a member of the Privy Council? Has he not the confidence of the present ministry?—and what about the hon. Senators Beaubien, and Chapais? These also are two very brilliant French Canadian supporters of the present ministry. And, Mr. Speaker, a like courtesy to one-third of our Canadians would not have necessitated an election in Quebec!

May I be permitted to add a few more instances as a sequel to those brought forward by my hon. friend, the member for Beauce? When the late lamented Hon. S. N. Parent, the father of the hon. member for Quebec West, resigned from the National Transcontinental Railway Commission, in October, 1911, he was replaced by Major Leonard, an English Canadian, and the French Canadians were left without representation on this board, which was managing a railroad traversing the province of Quebec for several hundred miles. When the French Canadian head of the Government workshops at Sorel, in the county of Richelieu, Quebec, was compelled to go out of office, he was replaced by one Mr. Jackson, an English Canadian. When the late Thomas Côte was asked to resign, after September 21, 1911, as secretary of the International Waterways Joint Commission, he was replaced by one Mr. Burpee. Mr. Justice McDougall succeeded the late Judge Champagne in the French judicial district of Hull. Chief Justice Landry, in New Brunswick, was replaced by Mr. Justice Chandly. Mr. Blount succeeded Major Chapleau as clerk of the Senate, although a French Canadian was there available, in the person of the deputy clerk, who had been holding office for many years. Senator Webster succeeded the late Senator Landry in the Senate.

Who sat, may I ask, as a representative of the French Canadians, on the Public Records Commission; on the Board of Grain Commissioners; in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; on the War Trade Board; on the Canada Food Board; on the Canada Registration Board; on the Pensions Board?

Is it not a well-known fact that out of thirty "Trade Agents" that we have in foreign countries, the French Canadians are given but one representative? The hon. the Postmaster General recently stated elsewhere that he is representing in the ministry the hundreds of thousands of French Canadians, who, according to him, voted for the Government in 1917. I beg to submit that it would seem obvious, from the statements which I have made that this hon. gentleman is satisfied with holding a public office for his own self and sake, and that he lacks influence with his colleagues whenever an opportunity arises for him to exact the appointment of a French compatriot to an office of public trust. This failure in the hon. the Postmaster General's duty of procuring for his French fellow-citizens their just share in the public trusteeships reminds me of a statement made in October, 1917, by Sir John Willison, in a letter of appreciation of the Coalition Government to "The New York Tribune." This writer, a stalwart Union supporter, alluding to the present Postmaster General and to his former colleague from Quebec, now politically deceased, wrote as follows:

> In the new Cabinet there are only two French ministers, and these are among the least weighty of its members.

Is this statement a reply to our inquiry as to why this French minister was not invited to the Peace Conference or to the League of Nations with his English colleagues?

And, by the way, Mr. Speaker, while I am taking the liberty of dealing with the hon. the Postmaster General, who holds this office as a member of the Senate, I would very respectfully suggest to the right hon. the leader of this House that the present vacancy in the county of Yamaska, Quebec, affords a unique and splendid opportunity for the Postmaster General to secure for himself a comfortable seat in this beautiful chamber. Indeed, this constituency of Yamaska happens to be the hon. gentleman's native county; he has even been residing therein as recently as a few months ago. Then why not try his chance there just now?

I will go still further in this connection. I assume, from the wording of the Electoral Act, as it now stands, and also from the amendment made to the House of Commons Act in the second session of 1919, that it would seem to be your own duty, Mr. Speaker, immediately to issue your warrant for this election. Let me explain myself.

Section 9 of the House of Commons Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, Chapter 11, reads in part as follows:

> If any vacancy happens in the House of Commons by the death of any member . . . . the Speaker, on being informed of such vacancy by any member of the House in his place . . . . shall forthwith address his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member to fill the vacancy; and a new writ shall issue accordingly.

Now, under the new law, as drafted last year, the Clerk of the House of Commons holds the office of the former Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. On the second day of this session, as shown on pages 7 and 8 of Hansard, it was stated by the right hon. the Prime Minister and by my hon. leader, who were both addressing you, Mr. Speaker, that our regretted colleague, the late member for Yamaska, had passed away during the recess. Hence, I take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that you have been sufficiently informed, under the Act, as to this vacancy, and I very respectfully submit that it is your duty to issue your warrant accordingly.

At all events, in order to remove any possible misunderstanding I, myself, now from my place in this House, beg leave officially to inform you, Mr. Speaker, that the former member for Yamaska, Mr. Oscar Gladu, died over two months ago, and that, therefore, a vacancy has occurred in that electoral district.

It is true that a delay of six months is mentioned in section 11-A of the House of Commons Act. But this is a maximum limit; it was intended to mean that six months' delay might be allowed during recess. But I humbly submit that, when Parliament is called to meet in session, all the vacancies should have been filled before the opening of the session, in order to give to every constituency the representatives to whom it is entitled. I assume that this is a sound interpretation of this new law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, following again and further the argument made by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) in reply to the statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) in this House, on the 18th of last month, I will quote from the remarks of the member for Frontenac the following, as they appear in Hansard at page 141:

> I challenge the leader of the Opposition, or any of those sitting behind him, to quote one single sentence, one single line, one single thought expressed in words by the present Prime Minister of Canada at any time, in this House or out of it, which has indicated the slightest feeling of hostility or unfriendliness to the people of the province of Quebec.

I will make a compromise with the hon. member for Frontenac; I will agree, but only for the sake of argument, that his honourable leader is, towards French-Canadians and in connection with the treatment that he has afforded to them, a sinner more by way of omission than by commission. But we feel the injustice just the same, whatever may be the artful mode of procedure adopted by the hon. member's leader when dealing with the Quebec people, or with French-Canadians in other provinces.

Before closing, I would call to my aid in this connection,—to prove that my remarks are accurate on this very important subject, which is a vital one for one-third of the people of this country,—a very remarkable editorial of the Montreal Gazette of May 17, 1920. This editorial, which was headed "French and the Franchise," had regard to the then pending debate in this House on the new electoral law. I will omit a few sentences, unfortunately, to save time, but I hope that the hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues will read this editorial in its entirety and that, in the future, when boasting that they are giving equal and equitable treatment to all races and creeds in Canada, they will sincerely meditate upon the sound and sane principles of justice, as so thoroughly expounded in this article, which reads, in part:

> Several hours were devoted in the Commons last week to the discussion of a subject upon which we think there is no room for controversy, namely, the desirability of having the Proclamation of an election printed in the French language in electoral districts in which there are a considerable number of electors who understand that tongue, but are not familiar with the English language. The matter was brought up by Mr. Turgeon, of Gloucester, New Brunswick, who, in a temperate speech urged the desirability of giving to the French population communication in their own language of proceedings relating to the very foundation of popular government, the election of members, and, with customary exceptions, the debate was conducted in admirable mood, though not upon a lofty plane. There was much citation of the Constitution to prove where begin the rights of the French people in respect of official use of their language, and where those rights end, and a disposition to place rigid and narrow construction upon the Confederation Act in a matter that fairly transcends the strict letter of the law. Constantly are we reminded that harmony and cordiality between the two great races, which inhabit Canada rest more upon sentiment and generous feeling than upon the text of a statute.

The editorial in another place says:

Mr. Turgeon told the House that "French people are sentimental; they appreciate anything that is done in their behalf; "but while sentiment must always receive recognition, there is a yet higher motive to move man, that of justice and of regard for the general good.

Finally it says:

It may not be a great matter that in French districts electoral proclamations should be issued in the French language; but it is of consequence that French-Canadians be not irritated by a sense of injustice, that they be not pin-pricked, and that their great part in forming and fostering Confederation should find expression in equitable legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. the Prime Minister appeared before the French-speaking people of this country some months ago, did he offer any explanation why he and his colleagues remained mute during the debate in question last year? Did he tender an apology for their refusal to grant, when it was most opportune to do so to the French-speaking minority, "Equitable Legislation," as their organ calls it, and thus to prove in good faith that their legislative acts, if not their administrative deeds, accord with their political performances?

No, Mr. Speaker, the law remained as it was. The Prime Minister did not utter one single word of ill-feeling towards the French-speaking people, but he committed another sin of omission.

I believe that I have already spoken too long, and I shall close with the following words: I shall vote for the amendment offered by our distinguished leader. I am sure that if the Hon. Robert Rogers were in this House, he who, as a true Conservative, organized the 1911 elections for the benefit of a number of our friends opposite, he, too, would vote for an election. Indeed, he stated very recently that the Government are only anxious for one thing, namely, to maintain themselves in office. What the people mostly need at present to obtain from the Government is not apologies nor promises, but elections.

An election at the present time would have—I dare say, with all due respect—the sanitary effect of a most complete whitewash in Government premises. It would clear the political atmosphere. It would afford every Canadian elector a proper means of expressing his views on the actual political situation.

Mr. EDMOND SAVARD (Chicoutimi-Saguenay): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night, I think it only right to let my hon. friends know that I shall be very brief. After the numerous speeches we have listened to, it would seem that I should refrain from raising my voice, being satisfied that I could not add anything new to the remarks made upon the address and the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

But on the other hand, I believe that the electors whom I have the honour to represent, may rightly expect that I take part in this important debate, one of the most important perhaps, of this Parliament, since it involves the life or death of the Government.

I do not hesitate to declare that my fellow-citizens will readily pardon me, especially at this late hour, if I do not linger over the speech from the throne. The dish which was served to us amidst extraordinary pomp at the opening of the session, was so very meagre that it seems to me it was long ago digested.

As to the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition, (the hon. Mr. King) I say with the greatest sincerity, that from my point of view, never in our parliamentary history has a non-confidence motion been more justifiable than that one now submitted to the consideration of the country's representatives.

I shall content myself with approving what has been said of the mover and seconder of the address. These hon. members acquitted themselves of an arduous duty with honour to themselves and the counties they represent. We would have liked, no doubt, to have heard one of these speeches in French, and the right hon. Prime Minister had on that occasion an opportunity to prove the sincerity of the advances he has been making to the province of Quebec for some months. But one must admit what is evident, everything French is as repugnant to the right hon. Prime Minister as to his colleagues. I do not believe that one could find outside these falls an intelligent man, honest and disinterested, who would dare to affirm on his honour that the Government has the confidence of the majority of the electors or even of the members of this House. How many are there in the House itself who would make such a statement. The right hon. Prime Minister has declared to us that he would carry on as long as he had the confidence of a majority of the people's representatives, but he knows as well as we do, and perhaps better than most of us, since he has been touring the country, that the people are certainly against him. The high position that he occupies, his undeniable worth, should induce him to refrain from making absurd statements and covering himself with ridicule, as certain of his partisans have done, in saying that the country is satisfied with its Government, and that in going before the people he would be returned to power. The hon. Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Guthrie) admitted the other day that the majority of by-elections since 1917 had gone against the Borden Government, but he said that the election had taken place since the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen) held his present office justified him in stating that the people are in favour of of the Government. It is impossible to believe that the hon. Minister of Militia was serious in making such a statement. And, Mr. Speaker, you must have remarked the satisfaction on this side of the House when the hon. minister declared that he was no longer a Liberal. Let us hope that this statement is more sincere than the other.

All the hon. members of the loyal opposition who have taken part in this debate have proved most clearly that the result of the last elections condemns the new Government, as the hon. Minister of Militia calls it. No, Mr. Speaker, there is not a sensible man, but is convinced that, in the event of immediate dissolution, the greater number of the hon. members sitting at your right, would not dare present themselves again to their electors, and would therefore be forced to say goodbye to those around them now. This, as has been shown by many hon. members of the Opposition, is the sole reason why the Government does not want an election. Redistribution is only a pretext. Never before has such a reason been invoked to delay the date of an election. Whatever may be the differences of opinion on the subject of the usurpation of power by the Government, it can not be denied that the last elections were fought over conscription, with the voting done according to the war-time election Act; therefore, as stated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McLean) former minister in the Union cabinet, the alliance of Liberals and Conservatives was to end with the war. The war ended over two years ago; if the Government does not hold the power unconstitutionally they have had no mandate to continue to administer the affairs of the country after the war. The right hon. Prime Minister, the Hon. Minister of the Militia as well as several other members, have cited a certain number of cases in England and Canada where there has been a change of Prime Minister without general elections.

I shall not discuss these precedents, for I should not do justice to them after the ability with which a number of my hon. friends on this side of the House have taken them up. The proof was very clearly brought out specially by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who made one of the most admirable speeches ever made in this House. These examples do not apply at present to the Government. It gives me much pleasure to congratulate the hon. member for Quebec East on the great success he obtained. It did not come entirely as a suprise as we expected it, but let me add that his success surpassed our highest expectations. His eloquence and the force of his arguments were to all his friends a matter of great satisfaction. No further doubt can be entertained that the mandate given the Government of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden in 1917, or perhaps I should say the mandate which was extorted by the Union Government, was for war aims only. You may argue as you please, once the war was over, the mandate ceased. Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Militia has argued like many others that the hon. leader of the Opposition has no right to speak for the whole Liberal party since he only represents portions of it. Let me say once for all that this declaration on the part of a minister of the Crown or rather a member of a broken up and moribund government can only be termed despicable for he knows but too well that he was selected as leader of the Liberal party by their representatives from all the provinces of Canada. Moreover the party is proud of its leader. We recognize him as the worthy successor of our lamented chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In addition to the arguments brought forward by our leader we have an unlimited number of reasons which induce us to vote in favour of his motion. We have not forgotten the Borden Government. The hon. member (Mr. Stein) who has just taken his seat enumerated in detail the numerous scandals which croped up under his Administration and I therefore do not intend to review them again. However I shall draw your attention to the fact which is so well known that in 1911, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier went out of power, he left the country in a most prosperous state. It is equally well known that only a few years were necessary for the Borden Government to bring it on the verge of bankruptcy. No one can forget the innumerable misdemeanours that this Administration was guilty of. Under the guise of economy this Government dismissed hundreds of civil employees with the premeditated intention of replacing them, as we know, by thousands of their friends who to-day fill the departments to overflow. We have not forgotten the most out-crying scandal: the purchase of the Canadian Northern Railway. How shall we ever forget that most unjust enactment of the closure and of the Conscription Act, the sudden descent upon our peaceful country of regiments with machine guns to ferret with like wild beasts the sons of our farmers who had dared to think that they were not obliged to sacrifice their all for the cause of the Empire. Mr. Speaker, were I to enumerate all the misdeeds of this Government I should take up too much time and since I have promised to be brief I shall close my remarks by saying that it will give me great satisfaction to vote for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. DONALD NICHOLSON: (Queen's, P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I have not been requested to speak and I do not know in what political character I am to be recognized, whether as a Liberal, a Progressive, or a Tory. But I want to speak to-night especially from the Tory standpoint. First of all I heartily join in the congratulations which have been extended to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) who now ably leads the Government upon his elevation to the high position of Prime Minister. I also wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne on the excellent speeches which they made.

An hon. MEMBER—Louder.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend will be patient I will speak in tones loud enough for him to hear. The speech of the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) who is one of the first lieutenants, I presume, of the Opposition leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) interested me. The hon. gentleman stated that the Prime Minister was a Tory. I am glad of that. In my opinion the Tories have done a good deal for Canada. My hon. friend also stated that the Prime Minister was in favour of contributing men and money in order to carry on Canada's share in the war. The statement was heartily applauded by hon. gentlemen opposite, even by the small group of Progressives. If there is one thing of which we on this side cordially approve, it is standing by Great Britain when she is in trouble. The adoption of that policy by the Government accounts for the large majority which they obtained at the election in 1917.

The leader of the Opposition had the temerity to demand by what right the Government continues in office. My answer to that is that the Government continues to administer public affairs by virtue of the mandate of the people, a mandate such as enables my hon. friend himself to sit in this House for the County of Prince, for the balance of the present term of Parliament which ends in 1922. In the course of his speech, my hon. friend also referred to the elections of 1917 and stated that the men overseas were coerced into supporting the Government. That statement is my chief reason for rising to speak to-night.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I received ninety-five per cent of the votes of the young men who went to the front from my constituency and I feel that the statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition cruelly misrepresents them. I also wish to say that of that ninety-five per cent a large number were the sons of Liberals who had supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier during the fifteen years of his administration. I can further state that these young men at that time wrote home to their parents to support the Union Government. It therefore ill becomes the leader of the Opposition to indulge in such aspersions. I am surprised that a young gentleman who aspires to become the leader of a Government in Canada should misrepresent these young men who, without reward, valiantly went to the front and patiently stood the hardships of such a terrible campaign by alleging that they were coerced into casting their votes as they did.

Coerced! That is a very improper word to my mind. How were they coerced? Did the Commander-in-Chief of the Canadian troops threaten those young men to compel them to vote for the Union candidates? That is what my hon. friend would imply. And I notice, Sir, that his hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) to-night repeated that slander, for it is nothing less than a slander on the free, independent young men who went from my county and who voted for me. Not only that, Sir, but the hon. gentleman comes down to Charlottetown and on a public platform states, by implication, that I have no right to represent my constituency, because his friend who was on the platform with him lost the seat by some wrongdoing on my part. As a matter of fact, so many men from Prince Edward Island went overseas that the Government was generous enough to send representatives from each party to conduct the polling, and I never heard from one of those representatives that there was any wrongdoing. I met hundreds of young men on their return from the front and I asked them the question: Were you influenced to vote for the Government candidates; were you threatened in any way in the event of your voting against the Government candidates? Not one answered in the affirmative. I have had hundreds of letters from young men who were ardent supporters of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier saying: Here, we knew it was a critical time, it looked as though we were going to be defeated, and we wanted help from home. It ill becomes the leader of the Opposition to stand up here and say that those young men were coerced, and I take it that when an appeal is made to the people they will resent that slander. I am sorry for him, because he is a young man and will, I presume, perhaps sometime hold a prominent position in the public life of Canada.

He also in his speech in Charlottetown proclaimed, to my mind, a political heresy. He stated that the hon. Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue (Mr. Wigmore) and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy) had not sufficient majorities to show that they had the confidence of the people. Well, that is a most extraordinary statement. The hon. Minister of Public Works had a 2,500 majority, and the hon. Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue had a 4,000 majority. What size majority does he want? I consider that they both had good substantial majorities on a straight clearcut issue.

I heard in this debate the hon. leader of the Opposition mention that the right hon. Prime Minister had stated at a meting in Truro that our friends on the other side were connected with the Bolsheviks. I was at that meeting, and I can affirm that I never heard a statement of that kind from the right hon. leader of the Government.

The election in Peterborough was a misunderstanding between our own friends. Mr. Burnham is a Conservative, and I am inclined to think that he was not treated right. As a matter of fact if he had been elected I am sure he would be standing on this side for what is right in the fiscal arrangement anyhow.

The right hon. leader of the Government made a tour of the West last fall, and the hon. leader of the Opposition also made a tour of the West. One of the latter's colleagues represents a riding which under the present fiscal system enjoys more protection than any other manufacturing centre in Canada. He did not tell his friends that in the West. What would those friends think of that? The same statement applies to the hon. members for Kent, Ont. (Mr. McCoig), for Nicolet (Mr. Trahan), for Joliette (Mr. Denis), and other hon. members. I should like to know if they would support the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) without the protection which they enjoy.

Reference was made in this debate to the Canadian Mercantile Marine. Our hon. friends from the West have had their say, and our hon. friends from Quebec have had their say, so I think it is time that I said something on behalf of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Go to it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me call the attention of the Government to the Pictou-Charlottetown-Magdalen Islands route. The Government should take this service over and build a suitable steamer to be operated in connection with the National Railways. There are some 8,000 people on the Magdalene Islands, hardy fishermen; yet the service now is not as good as it was forty years ago under the old Tory government. It is a crying shame that those people are so grossly neglected.

There should also be an additional boat for the Prince Edward Island route. I have it on the authority of the management of the Canadian National Railway system that they recognize the necessity for, and are in favour of providing an additional boat at an early date. My opinion is that the Government had better give a contract this year for the building of such a boat. The present boat is taken off the route for nearly two months each year, and the service provided is not satisfactory to our people. I know that some hon. gentlemen will state: We are used to that kind of talk from Prince Edward Island, and that province has cost the Dominion a large sum. Why, one of the hon. ministers is an absolute political paranoiac; he thinks that we have too good a boat service.

When Prince Edward joined the Canadian Federation in 1873 we were free from debt. Nearly fifty years ago we built a railroad—when you gentlemen in Saskatchewan were only in your swaddling clothes—at a cost of $3,400,000, and subsequently handed it over to the Dominion Government. One year after we entered Confederation Canada obtained an award of $5,500,000 from the United States, $1,000,000 of which was handed over to Newfoundland. I hope the Government will give heed to the earnest representations I have made with reference to the two steamers I have mentioned and gave a contract arranged for at an early day.

I want to say this with regard to the Magdalen Islands; the Magdalen Islands were settled before there was any settlement at all on the site of what is now the city of Winnipeg. The people there are fishermen, and they have not been treated properly by any Government of Canada. I have made representations on their behalf; forty years ago I was a member of the delegation that came to Ottawa to make certain requests with regard to that matter. We had a good old Tory government at that time, and they listened to our representations and subsequently put on a service, which was maintained for years. On account of the war and other considerations, there has not been in recent years as satisfactory a service as we ought to have for these people.

Let us indulge in a little retrospect, Mr. Speaker. The first Parliament of Canada under the Confederation was held in 1867. The total revenue of Canada at that time was $13,000,000. In 1878 it was $24,000,000; in 1896 it was $40,000,000; in 1910 it was $140,000,000, under the administration of the late Liberal Government—it had come up very well. But, Sir, last year, 1920, the total revenue of Canada was $380,000,000. Besides Canadians subscribed to war bonds $1,500,000,000. In 1895 the total assets of the banks were $316,000 000; in 1919 they were $2,754,000,000. The question that we are now up against is the raising of $400,000,000 yearly for the carrying on of the country's affairs. What does that mean? It means that every man, woman and child in Canada will have to contribute fifty dollars toward the running of the country. We have had a lot of talk during the last few weeks, but I have not heard anyone suggest how that money was going to be raised. It is a serious question, and one that ought to be actively taken up.

I notice that the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) is in his right place—No Man's Land. He could not have been elected in Nova Scotia, so he is now in line with the Government of that province. I might say that in connection with the appropriation to aid the provinces in the building of roads, a contract was let by the Government of Nova Scotia under that highway scheme for St. Margaret's road and $280,000 was supposed to do the road work, but $780,000 was spent by the local government. Gentlemen down there say they are Liberals, but they are anything. That work cost the province $780,000—and that is characteristic of the history of Nova Scotia Liberalism.

The party on this side has adopted the name National Liberal and Conservative. I do not care about the name—it is too long. But I suggest that the name of the party opposite, judging from the speeches that have been made by some hon. gentlemen on that side, should be "Snatcher" instead of "Liberal," because they snatch at everything; they snatch at every policy imaginable.

The hon. senior member for Halifax opposed the Military Service Act. In his opinion it was an awful Act. He was against the party in power—the Tory party at that time. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) had to get in with the Tory party then, and he renounces it now. Toryism, he says, is not for freedom—but it is to be remembered that the member for Halifax and other hon. gentlemen have been enabled to hold seats in the House by virtue of legislation passed by this Parliament. If they are consistent they will do what has been done in Great Britain in cases of this kind. They call it the Chiltern Hundreds. If a gentleman disagrees with the policy of the Government over there he says: "I am not satisfied with the Government; I am going back to the people." But not one of the gentlemen opposite did that, and we on this side stand here defending the policy that was inaugurated for the benefit of Canada.

Now, I want to take hon. gentlemen back a little; and I can take you back further than some of you gentlemen think. I will take you back to the days before the National Policy was inaugurated in this country, when the people of the lower provinces were leaving by the hundreds and thousands—and why? They were going to the New England States in order to obtain employment. Last year I heard, I think it was the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) say that there were at least 2,000,000 French Canadians in the United States. Does the same condition prevail now? No, they do not go to the United States to find employment. When our people went to the factories of New Hampshire and New England to obtain employment, what did they do there? They were manufacturing boots, caps, clocks, everything in the United States for use down in the lower provinces, and French Canadians and people from the lower provinces were migrating in thousands to the United States. The reason why they left this country was that they could not get employment in Halifax, Charlottetown or any other city in the lower provinces because goods were allowed to come in free from the United States. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite say: "Oh, let us have free trade." The hon. member for Red Deer says: "I believe in freedom;" but there is a freedom that is not right, and some kinds of freedom are very wrong. We want to protect our industries, and I am not quite satisfied with the Government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is a little comfort to my hon. friends opposite. I maintain that the Government ought to impose a high enough rate of duty to prevent United States goods from coming in here as much as they do. At the present time, too many articles of United States manufacture are being imported into this country, and I would impose a higher duty. I claim that this Government made a mistake when they took $31,000,000 off customs duties. I would not have taken off a dollar. Did they gain any support by their action? Not at all, and I contend that if they had taken off $150,000,000, they would not have gained any support. I ask my hon. friends to consider the situation in all seriousness. We have to raise $400,000,000 and the question is: How is that amount going to be raised? A prominent member of the Agrarian party suggested the imposition of a land tax; but when he got down into Ontario, Quebec and the lower provinces, he found that the people did not want that; that they wanted to preserve the fiscal policy that is at present in force. When the people of the lower provinces and the people of the West consider the situation, they will ask: "How are you going to raise the revenue?" At the present time we get $160,000,000 from customs, so much from excise duties and so much from income tax, and I hope more will be raised next year from the income tax. To take the duty only off agricultural implements would be selfish on the part of loyal Canadians, and if you take off the $100,000,000, give us your alternative and then we shall know where we are. I listened carefully to all hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate to find what alternative there was for raising the revenue that must be raised, but not a suggestion did I hear.

The other evening I listened with great interest to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier), who has weighed this matter carefully and who has been a responsible public man for a number of years. He cannot see eye to eye with the Opposition in their policy, with the "snatcher" party, the Liberal party. He boldly stands up here and takes his political life in his hands, acting in the interest of this country, and I am sorry to say that one of his former confrères designated him a traitor. The hon. gentleman who made that remark is a student of history, a great admirer of Liberalism. The great Gladstone, when he first came into public life, was recognized as the fond hope of the unbending Tories, and surely my hon. friends opposite will not say that he was a traitor. It is time to cut out that sort of thing, and I may say that I consider the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, in the stand that he took, was a Daniel; he stood alone; he "dared to be a Daniel," and I believe the people of his province will eventually realize that he has taken a proper course in that regard.

I do not want to speak with regard to any particular province at all; I am a Canadian; but I just want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that they have been playing the political baby and crying that the Tories have ben insulting them. I have been in this House for ten years, and I have never heard an hon. gentleman on this side use an improper word towards a French Canadian; that is, for political purposes. I might go further and tell something which has happened, but perhaps it is better to leave such matters alone. From the Atlantic to the Pacific we are, and should be, Canadians in our endeavour to build up this great country, and I regret it very much if in this chamber things have been said that should not have been said. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) in his recent speech, told us what the people of Saskatchewan had done in connection with the war, and I know that they have been loyal and good Canadians.

I have travelled in the West, and I do not fear but that there will be an overwhelming majority against the fiscal policy announced by the present Opposition. I have been in the constituency represented by the Secretary of State, the Hon. Mr. Sifton, and I know there are opportunities there for manufacturing that are not to be found in any other part of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the excessive prices paid for farm machinery. Why, you can make farm machinery right there; the rates are in your favour, and farm machinery will be made there some day. It is all very well for men to complain of hardships, but every province has hardships. The province of Nova Scotia has hardships. She has not enough protection. I am sure my hon. friend from Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) thinks we have not enough protection. Coal, for instance, is not protected nearly as much as it ought to be.

With hon. gentlemen opposite it is the same old story. They have one story for Nova Scotia, another for Saskatchewan, and another for Alberta.

Mr. DUFF: Who is that?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The "Snatcher" party. They have a different speech for every province. We on this side stand on solid ground. We stand by the policy of 1878, the National Policy that was inaugurated by Sir John A. Macdonald. There may be modifications in the tariff; I hope there will be, but that is the policy we stand by in every part of the country, and I am confident that when there is an election the party now in power will be returned on that policy. Hon. gentlemen may sneer at the Tory party, but I can tell them that if it were not for the Tory party they would not have a Winnipeg or a Calgary to-day. Hon. gentlemen may laugh at that, but I am old enough to remember the time when the Liberals bitterly opposed the building of a railroad out there. Everything that was done for the west was initiated by the Liberal-Conservative party of this country, although in saying that I do not wish to belittle what was done in the fifteen years of Liberal administration under the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Things went along those fifteen years until in 1911, he proposed a change in the fiscal policy of this country, and I think but for that he would have been returned to power.

I come from a farming county, the best county in Canada. We produce more mixed farm produce than any other county. We are not raisers of wheat, but we go in for mixed farming, and the farmers in our county work fifteen hours a day; there is no eight-hour day for them. I am pleased to say that we have in the home market the greatest market. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not like that, but it is true. The home market has done a lot for the people of this country. I have travelled from one end of Canada to the other, and know something about the conditions, and what the National Policy has done for us, and I know that the people in the Southern States of America would give a lot to have the privileges that we have, that is, a national policy of their own. I know there are a lot of Tories in the province of Quebec who think as I do on this question. In fact, they were the missionaries that started this propaganda for protection. They have benefitted by it, and they are not going to turn it down. I believe my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe, will have the backing of thousands of people who loyally supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because, as my hon. friend says he retained the old policy and protection.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we are all Canadians. Let us tolerate one another, and cut out all this sectarianism and everything of that sort. I am somewhat older than most of the members here and I say that my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) will regret making the speech he did to-night. It is a very improper speech to make to a mixed audience. However, he is young, and may learn. He may be a minister of the Crown some day but before that time comes he must moderate his views very considerably, and he must not think so badly of our friends from Ontario as he does at the present time. I thank the members of this House and you Mr. Speaker for your patient hearing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps I should say before submitting the amendment to the amendment that it is a well recognized rule that an amendment must amend; in other words, it shall not be a negative of the motion sought to be amended. The authorities are quite clear that if the word "that" in the original motion is left, this leaves sufficient of such motion to make the amending motion technically in order. The amendment to the amendment as submitted, while perhaps technically in order, does not convey the meaning which undoubtedly the mover had in mind, inasmuch as if it were construed to apply to the first word "that" it would hardly be intelligent. It seems to me that under the circumstances it would be far wiser if it were understood that the motion had reference to the second "that" of the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Campbell) negatived.

The House divided on the proposed amendment of Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, which was negatived on the following division:

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to amend the Exchequer Court Act. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to provide that, in cases of appeals from the decision of the Commissioner of Patents, in which case the Commissioner is entitled to appeal and to defend his decision, there shall be on the part of the Commisioner a right to appeal to the Supreme Court. There is presently on the part of the other party a right to appeal to the Supreme Court, and as the Commissioner figures in the proceedings as a representative of the public interest, it seemed only right that he should have the same right of appeal that the private party has.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CANADA-WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT, 1920

On motion of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, (Prime Minister), it was ordered that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider a resolution aproving the agreement dated the 18th day of June, 1920, between the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of certain of His Majesty's colonies in the West Indies, which agreement is termed, "The Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement, 1920."

Mr. BUREAU: Is there anything in the statutes making it plain that in this case 'to-morrow" means "Monday"?

PAIRS

CORRECTION BY GOVERNMENT WHIP

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, in looking over the list of pairs in Hansard this morning, I find that the name of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Molloy) has not been entered as being paired with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie). There was a distinct understanding that they should be paired until 9.45 last evening, and as the hon. member for Provencher was good enough to extend that, they should have been entered as paired accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: The correction will appear in consequence of the statement just made by the hon. member. There is in the Votes and Proceedings no formal record of pairs.

THE ESTIMATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): When may the House expect to receive the Estimates for the coming year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): Next week.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. Motion agreed to, and the House proceeded to questions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 1, 2, 3, and 4. Greece has paid to June 30, 1920, as follows: To Decmeber 1, 1919, $7,834.79; to June 30, 1920, $53,160.61, being in full to that date. Interest account to December 31, 1920, amounting to $153,916.63, was rendered in due course and the Overseas Branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, London, has now been able to present same to the Representative of the recently established Greek Government in London for payment. Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: No date has yet been fixed for the next Imperial Conference and there is no intention that it shall be held this year. It is anticipated, however, that a meeting of the Prime Ministers of the different parts of the Empire will be held in June next.

2. The agenda for this meeting of Prime Ministers has not yet been settled, but it is expected that among the subjects for discussion will be the question of the renewal of the Treaty of Alliance with Japan of the thirteenth July, 1911, and the question of naval policy based upon the principle of co-operation; while there will doubtless be a review and consultation upon the general course of the foreign policy of the Empire.

3. Correspondence is proceeding upon the subject for discussion at the June meeting of Prime Ministers.

4. Should there be an indication of a general desire on the part of the House of Commons for a discussion, the Government would be prepared to arrange facilities and would welcome expressions of opinion from all quarters; but in view of the fact that the meeting is of the nature of a conference, the Government could not depart from the invariable practice by making commitments in advance of the meeting. 2. By Order in Council dated the 22nd January, 1921, P.C. 146. The Regulations prior to that date were specially designed to encourage and assist a vigorous search for oil on lands the property of the Crown, and were not well adapted to the conditions which had arisen as a result of the discovery reported to have been made of oil in quantity near Fort Norman in the Provisional District of Mackenzie, which discovery appeared to be of national significance. Such conditions were, therefore, made the subject of careful enquiry.

3. New Regulations were duly established by Order in Council dated the 11th instant, P.C. 331.

IMMIGRATION—INFECTION DANGER.

Mr. POWER:

In view of the quarantine measures placed upon certain ports in the United States with regard to immigrants arriving thereat, and in view of the fact that a large number of infected immigrants are arriving in the United States, have any precautions been taken by the Dominion of Canada to prevent these immigrants from being diverted to Canadian ports?

Hon. Mr. CALDER: It is true that typhus cases have arrived at New York and the Federal Health Service of the United States have established rigid quarantine measures to prevent this disease entering the United States. Any immigrants allowed to land in the United States will have passed so effective a cordon as to be assuredly free from danger and may safely be accepted by us should they cross our border.

The department, in anticipation of possible danger of this kind, some three months ago, sent Dr. H. B. Jeffs of the Immigration Medical Staff, to New York to look into and familiarize himself with the American system and report on any possible avenues of danger to Canada. On his return to Canada Dr. Laurin of Quebec followed him to New York for the same purpose, and Dr. G. E. Martineau, Superintendent at Gross Isle Quarantine Station, Quebec, is proceeding to New York in a few days to continue the observations.

Our own quarantine stations on the Atlantic coast, namely, at Halifax and St. John, have been warned and are on the alert for any possible source of danger.

Hon. Mr. REID:

There have been two trains daily except Sunday, in each direction, providing accommodation between Quebec and Shawinigan Falls and the parishes referred to; the numbers of the trains being Nos. 9-10, 19-20. Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

Representations were made to the Department of External Affairs in August last regarding danger to Dr. Burnham's mission in Montenegro, in consequence of which the matter was taken up with the Fereign Office and it was learned that a protest had been addressed by His Majesty's Minister at Belgrade to the Serb-Croat-Slovene Government against threats said to have been made against Colonel Burnham and that it had been intimated to the Serbian Government that it would be held responsible for the protection of Dr. Burnham's mission. His Majesty's Minister was further instructed, if a report of Dr. Burnham's arrest should be confirmed, to demand his immediate release.

A reply was received from the Serb-Croat-Slovene Government that the local authorities charged with having made the threats referred to denied having done so, and that Colonel Burnham had never been for a single moment under arrest.

2. The charges of harsh treatment as received in the Department were couched in general terms indicating rather friction with the local authorities during a period of disturbed conditions due to war with Albania, than any serious denial of right, and they have been denied by the Serbian Government which asserts that Colonel Burnham was not threatened nor subjected to discourteous treatment.

3. As Colonel Burnham has withdrawn his mission from Montenegro and it is not apparent either that he wishes to return or that the return of the mission is desired by the authorities in control of that country, the Government sees no reason to intervene further in the matter now.

OIL IN THE PRAIRIE PROVINCES.

MR. GRIESBACH MOVES A RESOLUTION WITH RESPECT TO OWNERS OF SURFACE RIGHTS.

Mr. WILLIAM ANTROBUS GRIESBACH (West Edmonton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, should oil be found and produced in or under any lands in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba, in which ownership to the sub-surface is in the Crown, the owner of the surface right shall be entitled to one-sixteenth of such oil, provided that such owner shall have made a homestead entry, or other entry, for the said land prior to the date of the application for the oil lease in the sub-surface. And whereas, all existing leases contain a provision that they are subject to the provisions of the regulations in force at the time of the granting of the same and also any regulations subsequently adopted. Therefore alteration should be made in the regulations to give the owner of the surface rights a similar interest in the oil produced under leases heretofore granted in which no development work has been done upon the said lands under the said leases.

He said: The House may not be aware that a somewhat different system of land tenure prevails in the prairie provinces from that which obtains in the other parts of Canada. My information is that in the remaining provinces of Canada the old common law title exists, that is to say that the owner owns from the centre of the earth to the sky. That was the situation in the prairie provinces prior to October 31, 1887. Up to that time the Crown grant gave a title from the centre of the earth to the sky, and the owner of the land owned all that there was to own. On the 31st October, 1887, the Crown began the policy of granting titles to the surface rights only, and reserving to the Crown the ownership in all mines and minerals which might underly the surface. During the past two or three years there has been much information to suggest that oil in large quantities would be discovered in the prairie provinces. During the last six months the evidence has accumulated to such an extent that it may now be reasonably assumed that the oil resources of Western Canada will prove to be in tremendous volume and ultimately of tremendous value to the Dominion. The State is interested, and this House is interested, having regard for this discovery and for its potential value. The House is interested in seeing that the State shall be safeguarded in this great discovery. It ought likewise to be interested in seeing that those persons more nearly and more directly concerned are equally protected in this great discovery. The situation now is that the Crown owns the oil and the landowner owns the surface, and the titles that exist in Western Canada are largely, if not almost entirely, of this class. It is true that the railway companies and the Hudson's Bay Company hold their land grants under the old common law title without reservation, but the vast bulk of land titles in Western Canada are as I have described. If oil is discovered, the Crown may upon application issue oil leases to any persons who apply in respect to lands which are owned by hundreds of thousands of homesteaders throughout the Prairie Provinces. It is quite true that the owner of the surface rights may himself apply for an oil lease, but whatever the theory may be, and whatever the policy of the law may be—and the policy is that all men shall be equal before the law—the actual fact is that the real owner of land in the western provinces, the homesteader, the farmer, the pioneer, is completely out of touch with this oil development. The man who files is the capitalist, the investor, the speculator, the man who has access to many newspapers and scientific works and who is in touch with geologists and other technical experts. The result is that the farmer, the homesteader, the pioneer, who has developed the country, who is paying taxes to build roads and bridges, and who has made it possible for people to come in and exploit the country will find that some day the Government has given a lease to drill for oil upon his property, and should oil be discovered he has to sit by with his hands folded while the oil lessee walks off with all the profits there may be in that discovery.

In the United States, where the old common law titles prevails, and where the owner of the surface owns the subsurface as well, the practice has grown up and has almost come to have the force of law, that if the owner leases his land for oil drilling purposes it is on terms that he shall receive one-eighth of the oil discovered. So that the owner of land throughout the United States almost entirely should oil be discovered on his property, is sure to receive one-eighth of all the oil discovered should he so provide in his lease.

In the western country the regulations provide that an oil lease may be granted without the knowledge of the owner of the land. True, the owner of the surface rights is entitled to be indemnified for any damage that may be done to his holding, but that is all he gets out of it. Any person can apply for an oil lease upon oil being discovered; pays a royalty of five per cent, subsequently rising to ten per cent on the oil which may be gained.

I propose by this resolution that while the interests of the state are safeguarded, and the state may continue to receive the revenues which it has legislated that it shall receive, nevertheless the owner of the land—who in our case is the farmer, the homesteader, the pioneer, the man who has made settlement and development possible, without which development it would be absolutely impossible for drilling machinery to be taken into the country—shall participate in the benefit accruing from the discovery of oil on his property, to the extent of one-sixteenth of the oil gained.

I pointed out a moment ago that in the United States the land owner is entitled by custom and as a matter of his own contract to receive one-eighth of the oil. Here I allow one-sixteenth, for two reasons. First in this country the owner does not own the subsurface rights, which remain in the Crown, and for which the Crown claims a royalty. Under my proposal the man who drills for oil under a lease from the Government would be required to pay to the owner of the land one-sixteenth of the oil gained and to the Crown five per cent, rising to ten per cent. If you equalise the royalty and the percentage, you will find that on the basis of a royalty of one-eighth the equivalent is 12½ per cent, and that five per cent is equal to one-twentieth.

If the House agrees to this proposal and allows the owner to receive one-sixteenth for the oil taken under his property, which is equal to 6¾ per cent, the man who has the oil lease will have to pay the 6¾ per cent to the owner of the land and five per cent to the Government, or 11¾ per cent; whereas were he to make his private arrangement with the owner of the land in the United States the oil lease would have to pay 12½ per cent. Therefore my proposal so far as the oil driller is concerned is better than the arrangement that exists in the oil fields of the United States. And the advantage is this, that whereas under our system of titles ownership of the subsurface rights is in the Crown we have growing out of this discovery the possibility of the state participating in the value of the discovery, and we have at the same time given to the surface owner the opportunity of participating in the oil discovery.

I attach great importance to this matter, and I think the time to deal with it is now, instead of waiting until the whole country is upset with excitement should big oil discoveries take place. I venture to say that if the matter is not dealt with until then, and drilling begins everywhere, followed by oil discoveries in many places, the people of the West will wake up to the fact that they have had this great wealth under their feet and that now the full benefit is being reaped by those coming in from the outside and who have not borne the heat and burden of the day incident to pioneering in the West.

It may be that I should continue to read the resolution further to show how no principle of equity or justice is violated by the proposal. I go on to state:

—provided that such owner shall have made a homestead entry, or other, for the said land prior to the date of the application for the oil lease in the subsurface.

In the case of vacant land where an applicant for an oil lease has made application prior to any homestead right being granted, then the man who subsequently took the homestead would be doing so with his eyes open and would have no grievance. I provide that where the homesteader has his entry first, and somebody files an oil lease subsequently, then the discoverer of oil shall pay one-sixteenth per cent.

It is desirable, since the country is largely plastered at this moment with oil leases, that some attempt be made to deal with the situation where a homesteader has his homestead filed upon by the holder of an oil lease. The provision I would make in that respect is this: that the power which the Government have to alter these oil regulations from time to time—a power which they do exercise when they feel like it—be used to provide that the royalty of one-sixteenth of the owners shall be made effective in cases where, notwithstanding the fact that a lease has been issued, no development work has been done by the leaseholder. In cases where the leaseholder has done development work it might not be fair to interfere with the terms of his lease, but where he has done no development work under his lease his position is precisely the same, to all intents and purposes, as it would have been before he made his application, and in that case the regulations should be altered as I have suggested.

In this eastern country, from which the majority of the members of the House come, this may appear to be a very small matter, and my action on it might seem to be premature. It may occur to hon. members that as oil is not actually being produced there is no reason why the House should busy itself with a matter of this kind in anticipation of the production. But I believe it would be wisdom on the part of this House to deal with the matter now; to deal with it before a greater number of applications for oil leases are filed and before the people of the prairie provinces wake up to the fact that this great wealth which they believe to be theirs really belongs to somebody else; that the benefit and advantage of the discovery and the tremendous profits that accrue commence to go elsewhere, there will be grave dissatisfaction and grave unrest, 4 p.m. and ultimately the matter will have to be dealt with.

I do not propose to raise in this connection the question of the ownership of the natural resources of the West—a question which might properly be discussed under this head. But I do think that now is the time to go into this matter and to introduce such legislation as will ensure to the state its just and fair participation in the valuable discoveries that are about to be made, and at the same time to ensure fair and reasonable participation also to the private individual, the farmer, the homesteader, the pioneer of these western countries, to whose efforts are attributable the development of this vast and immensely valuable discovery.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this motion, had it been moved a year ago, would have been under the department over which I then presided. Now it is under the department of the hon. leader of the Senate, but I am more or less familiar with the history of oil regulations so far as the Dominion Government has control of oil, and I will endeavor to state to the House some considerations which bear upon the desire of the hon. member as expressed in this resolution.

The history of oil production in Canada has shown as yet a very meagre total output. I am not sure that my percentages are right—the hon. member for Lambton would be familiar with the figures—but I think that we in Canada as yet produce only about two per cent of the oil consumed in this country; consequently the record to date is rather a record of search and exploitation—of hope deferred, rather than hope fulfilled. So much has this been the case that for many years, in place of seeking to obtain a revenue by royalty from oil production, the Government of Canada has placed a premium upon oil production, and very considerable sums have, over a period of many years, gone from the treasury as a bonus on the production of oil in this country. Indeed, I question whether the oil industry of Ontario would have survived in any substantial degree had such a system of bonus not prevailed. There have of late years been very hopeful indications of oil discovery on a large scale in Western Canada. There has, of course, been oil production there already, but the record of the whole mater so far as the West is concerned up to date is rather a record of rentals paid and the administration of leases sold by speculators than a record of actual oil production by men who seriously intended to produce. The treasury has come off much better than the investor in relation to oil in Western Canada up to now. While it was the case that a bonus was being paid to encourage oil exploration and oil production about twelve years ago, it was deemed expedient by the then Government that this degree of encouragement should be given: that leases might issue up to 1931, which would contain a clause exempting the lessee from all royalty whatsoever. Many leases of that character were issued. About a year and a half ago that regulation was rescinded, as it then appeared that there might at any time be oil discoveries on a large scale. Not only was that regulation rescinded, but efforts were made to ascertain what leases were in arrears to such a degree as would justify cancellation, in order that as many as possible of the dead leases outstanding under the old regulations could be made to lapse, and provision was made that at any time thereafter oil royalties might be imposed. After I ceased to hold that office, the present Minister of the Interior introduced regulations, which were adopted, providing that in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta a royalty should be imposed grading upwards from 2½ to 10 per cent on leases thereafter issued and on leases issued since the date when the old regulations were rescinded, and it was possible to impose royalties on oils found under those leases. Such are the regulations today in relation to the three provinces, the royalty grading from 2½ to 10 per cent, I think the 2½ per cent being for five years, the 5 per cent for a little longer period, and the 10 per cent after that, and an entrant may enter for 1920 acres of land and obtain a lease therefor.

The prospect of oil appears, however, to be mostly in territory north of the three provinces, and some weeks ago regulations as to the Northwest Territories were put into effect, those regulations being of a character radically different from any yet imposed in Canada. They provided that the explorer or prospector may take out a permit for four sections; but until there is oil production, this is a permit and nothing more. He may get a lease upon actually discovering oil, but he can get a lease only for one section out of the four, the other three reverting then and there to the Crown. He thus becomes entitled to a lease for 640 acres only, and he becomes liable to a royalty of from 5 to 10 per cent, that is to say, 5 per cent until 1st April, 1926, and thereafter 10 per cent. The regulations comprise a series of 22 pages, but those are, broadly speaking, their outstanding features.

My hon. friend's proposal is to impose on all lessees who take out leases hereafter, as well upon those who have leases which make them subject to regulations imposed subsequent to the issue of the lease, the obligation of contributing one-sixteenth of the output to the owner of the surface rights, in cases where the Crown is the owner of only the sub-surface and where the surface itself is held by a homestead entrant who entered prior to the taking out of the lease, or where it is otherwise held. It will be apparent to the House at once that, in addition to the regulations that now prevail, providing so substantial a return to the entire country in the event of oil being discovered in any quantity, to seek now to place another imposition of one-sixteenth upon the prospector might be a very serious deterrent to oil explorers in the North. I understand from my hon. friend that in the United States a share is provided to be paid to the owner of the surface rights, but I am not sure that the entrant there would labour under the other obligations which are imposed by the new regulations in Canada. I could not speak positively as to that, but I would doubt it. I understand the owner of a lease at the present time, the outright owner of the lease, cannot hope to secure and does not in practice secure, more than one-eighth himself for his entire right in the sale to the man who thereafter actually hopes to produce; and imposition upon him of one-sixteenth would, of course, take away the half of that. The whole question, however, resolves itself to this: Is there any special claim on the part of the man who happens to be owner of the surface rights? He undoubtedly has a claim to any damage he may suffer for anything done to the surface rights, or for access to the well over the surface rights; but it seems rather difficult to establish that he, as distinct from the rest of the community, has any further claim. For example, if there is an owner of surface rights on one side of the road where oil happens to be discovered, and another owner of surface rights on the other side of the road where oil does not happen to be, while the man who owns the surface rights on the side of the road where oil is discovered is undoubtedly entitled to be compensated for damage done to his property, after he is compensated for that, is there any difference in claim between him and the other man on the other side of the road where oil does not happen to be? Both have contributed equally to opening up the country and both have equal claim on account of the fact that they have made it easier for the explorer to come in.

Mr. GRIESBACH: In oil discoveries, the oil does not lie within the four corners of the quarter section, the oil lies in a pool or a field. If oil is discovered on a quarter section, the owner of that quarter section ought to have an interest in that oil. But what follows? The man across the road, who, the Prime Minister says, should be in the same position, is in fact in the same position, because now someone will come to him and lease from him his land with reasonable assurance that he too will strike the same field.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend is right, and if one man who happens to own the surface rights where the first oil well is sunk is in just the same position as the man across the road—because the oil will be under him too—let us proceed with that further: the oil will be under the whole country and all will be equally entitled.

Mr. GRIESBACH: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it will not. Therefore, my hon. friend's reasoning is wrong.

Mr. GRIESBACH: I am half wrong as you are wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps that is so, but there is a limit to the area which the oil traverses and the owners of the surface rights in that area seem to me to be entitled to compensation for what they suffer in relation to their property rights; but as between them and the owner of an adjoining area under which there is no oil at all, I am not yet convinced that they have any special claim. I am not convinced there is any difference in claim between the one set of owners and the other, but I am not giving that as a final determination. I am sure the hon. member would not at this time ask that, with the consideration that is possible to be given to a subject of this kind and importance in a discussion in the House, oil regulations should be here and now passed. They must naturally be the subject of scrutiny by the experts of the department, assisted by the best possible advice they can get, and I assure my hon. friend that the suggestion he makes will have consideration by the Government. If he would prefer, there would be no objection at all to the adjournment of the debate in order that others may take part in it at a later date to better advantage, or he might withdraw his motion, whichever he chooses. If it is his desire that the debate be adjourned, I, being on the floor, will so move.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DESTRUCTION OF DOCUMENTS AT PRINTING BUREAU

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a drastic investigation should be held in connection with the wanton destruction of most valuable documents alleged to have taken place during recess at the Printing Bureau.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay the House with this motion. It was drafted merely to call the attention of the House and the Government to the very serious—accident, shall I say—which took place a few months ago at the Printing Bureau. From the press reports it appears that several tons of most valuable documents were destroyed. I understand that a firm was appointed by the Government not very long ago to investigate various departments, and especially the Printing Bureau, and we were informed by the press—I do not know whether it is a fact, but such was the report—that whilst this firm was proceeding with its investigation many very valuable documents which had accumulated in the Government buildings since Confederation, and even prior to that, were ordered to be destroyed. I remember reading in the papers at the time of this destruction, that some of the blue books which were destroyed or sold would have been most valuable to the public archives of Canada; in fact, one of the archivists told me that some of these documents could not be found elsewhere in the world to-day, and their value could not be estimated in terms of dollars and cents. I am told that on different occasions from different countries of the world, especially from Great Britain, requests have come for some of these documents, which dated very far back in the history of the Confederation. Now the object of my motion is to ascertain who was responsible for this destruction, what documents have been destroyed, and whether the Government intends to make a drastic investigation so that punishment will be meted out to the parties who are found to be responsible. I cannot for one moment believe that the gentlemen who were engaged in the investigation of the Printing Bureau were authorized by anyone in the Government to destroy these documents. Blue books are published from year to year, and sometimes a great many of them remain on the shelves; they may not be wanted presently, but they may be wanted later on, and we must always provide for future needs. I remember reading the history of the Parliament Buildings' fire in Montreal in 1849. The story of that fire, which occurred under circumstances with which we are all familiar, was told by a gentleman who occupies a very enviable position in the world of letters, and he gives a list of the public documents and blue books which were destroyed and cannot be found anywhere else in the libraries of Canada. What a national loss such a fire was for the writers on the history of Canada! With regard to the destruction that has taken place recently, an archivist in the employ of the Government told me that to his own personal knowledge some of the blue books which have disappeared were invaluable and could not be replaced.

I shall not delay the House further, but I should like to know from the right hon. the Prime Minister if an investigation is being held, and if so, the nature of that investigation, and whether the Government intends to take the necessary steps to punish the guilty parties?

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The question raised by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) is also referred to in one, if not more, questions that appear on the Order Paper to-day. The first time this matter came to my attention, speaking from memory, was about four months ago, perhaps only three. I made such inquiry as I was able to make of other members of the Government and elsewhere. The complaints that were raised were very much of the same nature as those expressed to-day by the hon. member to the effect that valuable books had been destroyed, or rather, it seems to me the way it was put was this—that they had been turned over to the contractor who had the contract for the waste paper that gathers around the Parliament Buildings. Valuable documents that had been stowed away were, either by mistake or design, turned over to him. I think that is the way it was put to me. At all events, these documents had been put out of the road and were no longer the property of the Government. I am glad to be able to say to the hon member that the Government took action in this matter some time ago. I cannot recall the exact date, but it must be now a matter of some months. The inquiry was ordered under the Inquiries' Act, and his Honour, Judge Snider, of the County Court of Wentworth, was appointed a Commissioner under that Act with the fullest possible powers, because the Act itself gives the powers. The wording of the Order in Council was in the amplest language, to investigate and ascertain who was responsible for the destruction and removal of these books and documents.

There has been no report from that commission as yet. I know they have held sittings, but I do not know whether they have concluded their investigation. The Government requested Col. O. M. Biggar to act as Government Counsel on the enquiry to assist Judge Snider in the investigation. The House will remeber that under the terms of the Dominion Elections Act which passed last session Col. Biggar was appointed Chief Electoral Officer, and to him was also assigned the duty of assisting as Counsel for the Government in investigations of this character. Consequently he was the appropriate Counsel to select in this instance, and I know that he has been engaged with Judge Snider in the investigation. I made enquiries a moment ago of the Minister of Justice to ascertain whether he had any word as to reports from the investigation, and he tells me he has not. I am therefore of opinion that His Honour Judge Snider has not yet reported, but I can assure the hon. member that I am awaiting the report with interest, and if it shows that there are parties guilty of crime in any degree they ought to be punished, and it is the intention of the Government not to refrain from proceeding with their punishment.

Mr. VIEN: Can the Prime Minister tell us whether any steps were taken to recover any property that was possible of recovery?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understood the complaints, the property was gone past recovery. If that turns out not to be the fact, of course we shall take every step to recover what has not been lost.

Mr. VIEN: No investigation was held to see whether the property was recoverable?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, that is the part of the investigation.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no need of the motion being adopted. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it should not be adopted because the enquiry has already been under way.

Mr. BELAND: My desk mate, the hon. member for Russell, (Mr. Murphy), intended to say something on this subject and I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

STANDARDIZATION OF PARTS OF AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY.

Mr. ARCHIBALD BLAKE McCOIG (Kent) moved that to-morrow the House do go into Committee of the Whole on the following proposed resolution:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the standardization of parts of agricultural machinery, and to enact,—

1. That from and after the first day of November, 1922, all agricultural implements and farm wagons manufactured in Canada for use within Canada, shall with respect to the following parts, namely:—Grain Binder Knife Sections, Knife Heads and Pitman's, Mowing Machine Knife Sections, Mowing Machine Knife Heads, Mowing Machine Pitman's Clamps, Mowing Machine Guards and Guard Ledger Plates, Hay Rake Teeth, Land Cultivator Teeth and Cultivator Points, Sprocket Chains —different sizes, Plough Points, Plough Sole Plates, Plough Clevises, Ensilage Blower Pipes, Nuts for Waggon Arms, Machine Bolts and Nuts; be made to conform to the standards prescribed by regulations to be made by the Minister of Agriculture prior to the first day of November, 1921, and approved by the Governor General in Council; and that further and other regulations may be made by the Minister from time to time.

2. That from and after the first day of November, 1922, no agricultural implement or farm waggon shall be manufactured in Canada for use within Canada which with respect to the said parts fails to comply with the regulations then in force, and any manufacturer of agricultural implements or farm waggons for use within Canada violating these provisions or regulations shall incur a penalty of not less than $200, and not more than $1,000.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will you be good enough, Mr. Speaker, to inform the House what action was taken in respect to the resolution just read?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This resolution, Order No. 30, is a resolution which precedes the introduction of a Public Bill relating to trade. The action taken was a decision that the House be moved into Committee of the Whole to-morrow on the said proposed resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only point that arises in my mind is whether or not the passing of the motion to go into Committee in respect of a resolution preceding a public Bill involves the acceptance by the House of the principles of the resolution. I should not like to take that responsibility without further study of the resolution.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The action taken by the House cannot involve the acceptance of the principle of the resolution. The rules provide that such resolutions shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole House before any decision or vote of the House is passed thereupon. The motion was not debatable and is in effect only a notice that the resolution will be considered at the next sitting of the House, that is to say, the first time that Public Bills and Orders may be reached.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is satisfactory.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill number 17 to define Canadian Nationals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Minister please explain the purpose of this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not contemplate to-day going further than getting the Bill into the committee stage. The purpose of the Bill is to define Canadian Nationals, and it would seem to me that the discussion of the definition might very properly he held in Committee. It seems to me highly probable that I may feel desirous of amending the Bill so as to make more complete the definition that is therein contained. I would suggest to the House that the Bill have its second reading, and when we get into committee stage I would move that the committee rise. We could then deal with the question later.

Mr. McMASTER: On the understanding that we can discuss the principle?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, there would be no objection to a discussion of the principle in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that one or two members on this side of the House desire to speak on this Bill and possibly to refer more particularly to the principle involved. Under the circumstances, I would suggest that the minister do not press his motion.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, in the event I will not press my motion at the present time. It does seem to me that for the purpose of the discussion of a principle it would be desirable that we should have before us a complete definition. Therefore, there is a desire for discussion upon the motion, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to point out to my right hon. friend that we were not expecting to go on with this Bill to-day, and that a good many members are absent.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that, and I was rather impressed with the idea that that might very probably be the case. I realize that there is room for a very interesting discussion, and I would therefore move that the debate on the motion for second reading be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

MINISTERS AND DIRECTORSHIPS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. ANDREW ROSS McMASTER (Brome) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10 to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the atmosphere of the Chamber this afternoon lends itself to the observations which I have to bring before the House, as the matter is of an essentially non-partisan and, I trust, of a non-contentious character. The atmosphere, the member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) suggests sub-rosa, is of a chilly nature and certainly the Speaker or the Deputy-Speaker might endeavour to prevent the draughts which circulate in the Chamber from affecting members from time to time. However, that is not the subject of my remarks this afternoon. The object of this Bill is to make it incumbent upon ministers of the Crown to resign all directorships which they hold in incorporated companies when they accept their portfolios. The first argument I wish to make in favour of the principle of the Bill is that it is in consonance with the best Canadian practice. My information is, Mr. Speaker, that when the member for King's (Sir Robert Borden) the former Premier, accepted office in 1911 he resigned all directorships which he held, and encouraged all his colleagues to do so. Had that wholesome practice been followed, there would have been no necessity for the debate which is going to take place this afternoon.

My next point, Mr. Speaker, is that the abandonment of directorships by ministers of the Crown is in line with the best British practice. It is not always the case in Great Britain that men who occupy the positions of ministers of the Crown resign their directorships, but my opinion is, and I believe it is correct, that it is the best British practice to resign directorships when accepting a portfolio. I read from the British Hansard, Fourth Series, Vol. 93, Page 216, a citation which I take from a discussion of a similar character to the one we are now entering upon, held in the British House some years ago. The precedent of Lord Rathmore had been alluded to. He was a very honourable man, but his case formed a very bad precedent for his was a most striking case of a minister of the Crown uniting with that position the directorship of innumerable companies. According to the directory of directors that gentleman was a director in no less than ten companies. Now, I think that at least the ministers of the Crown will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, when I lay down as one of the premises of my argument that the life of a minister of the Crown in this country is one of arduous and unremitting toil.

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I have rarely thought, Mr. Speaker, that I would have the pleasure of hearing the Prime Minister of this country say "hear, hear," to anything that I said. I welcome his concurrence with great gratitude, and I know that what I have said applies most fully in his case. Now that is what I believe should be the life of a minister of the Crown. He has not only, under our practice, heavy departmental or administrative duties to perform, but he should be at the same time a student of the current events which are passing in the world, and he should do his share in forming public opinion by the holding of meetings and by the discussion of public questions both inside and outside the House of Commons. Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, that such a life will leave no leisure, or no more leisure than is required for reasonable recreation and recuperation. That is my first point.

What is the duty of the director of a company? The duty of the director of a company is first of all to give thought and attention to the policy, the business policy of the company, and to see that the details are carried out along proper business lines. He is not expected to attend to details, but he must see that provision is made for details being carried out on proper business lines. I say that no man who is a minister of the Crown in this country has any time left to fulfil the duties of a director. That is my first proposition, and I think it is a proposition which will appeal as a reasonable one to members of this House. We have the best of authority for the statement that no man can serve two masters. Either he will have to neglect his duty as a minister or he will have to neglect his duty as a director, if he holds both positions at one and the same time. It may be stated —well a director may merely give his name; he may take no real active part in the administration of companies' affected. That, I say, is open to objection. I say it is open to objection because it is possible that the business to which the minister has given his name may not be a successful business. It may be that those who have been induced to place their money in the stock or bonds of a company, relying on the fact that the name of a minister of the Crown appeared among its directors may be disappointed, may find that their investment is not as safe as they thought it was, and they may be deceived, they may be disappointed by the fact that they thought the man of ability and prestige was giving his attention to the affairs of the company. They find he has not done so, a loss is incurred, and the prestige and reputation of the minister suffers.

I am not talking as an opponent of the Government—I generally do—but I am talking now as a Member of the House of Commons, to whom the reputation and usefulness of this House and the Cabinet, which, after all, is the committee of this House, is a matter of importance and of interest. Then, of course, Mr. Speaker, I am not making charges, I am not dealing with the matter on any assumption that there has been wrong doing; but I say that there is always a possibility for undesirable things to happen when a man is put in two conflicting positions. It may be argued that ministers of the Crown when they come to deal with matters which have a personal interest for them will always set aside their personal interest and prefer the interest of the state. But where ministers of the Crown are directors of companies there is one fiduciary interest set up in opposition to another fiduciary interest: as ministers they are trustees for the whole people; and as directors they are trustees for the shareholders of the company.

That argument had appealed to me in my consideration of this matter, and I was interested in reading some debates of a committee of the British House of Commons to find that the present Prime Minister of Great Britain had come to the same conclusion. It was perhaps somewhat like the Anglican curate who said, "I say so, and the Apostle Paul agrees with me." In British Hansard, fourth series, volume 93, page 232, this passage will be found:

> He did not think that any man ought to put himself in a position where his private interests conflicted with his public duties. He would put it higher. He did not think a man ought to put himself in a position where his duty as trustee for a corporation conflicted with his duty as trustee for his constituents.

I think it is rather harder for a man to decide between fiduciary allegiances, if I may use the expression, than between his duty as a trustee, and his own personal interest. I am speaking, I know, to a number of men who now follow or who have followed in years past the legal profession. How careful we of the legal profession all are when the possibility of conflict of interests between clients whom we have represented arises to ask that one or the other, or perhaps both, confide their business to other members of the profession for the time being. It is always hard to deal justly when you have two fiduciary interests.

Now, we should be, and I trust we all are, jealous for the good name of this House. We are told by authority, almost as great as the authority I have just quoted, that we are to "abstain from the very appearance of evil." Years ago Tennyson wrote about "the fierce light that beats upon the Throne." Well, I do not think that light is comparable to the fierce light that beats upon men who enter Parliament at this time of the world's history. I do not think that I am using the language of extravagance when I say that all governmental institutions are on trial and are being subjected to criticism which is not only strong but often bitter and often unjust. Last Sunday I listened to an address by the late Commander-in-Chief of the Canadian army in the course of which he said:

I suppose it is within the knowledge of every man within sound of my voice that it is generally regarded that political life has got something unclean in it.

I did not like to hear that, but I am afraid in making that statement he expressed a common, and, I trust, erroneous, view of public life. Suppose these things happen —and I say in advance, Mr. Speaker, that I am putting purely hypothetical illustrations,—suppose the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy) has a contract of under $5,000 to let for the building of a wharf largely composed of cement, and suppose at the same time he is a director of the Canada Cement Company,—I do not believe he is, I am only supposing that for the purpose of my argument—and suppose that contract goes to the Canada Cement Company. Will there not be a great number of people in this country who will say: The reason why the Canada Cement Company got that contract was because the minister who had the letting of it was also a director of that company.

Let me give another illustration. Let us suppose that the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) has got to appoint a financial agent for Canada in, say, the city of New York from among the Bank of Montreal, the Merchants Bank, the Royal Bank, Molson's Bank—

Mr. LEMIEUX: La Banque d'Hochelaga.

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, La Banque d'Hochelaga, La Banque Provinciale—in my hypothetical case we will give the province of Quebec and the French institutions full and ample representation. Now, suppose at the same time the Minister of Finance—and this is a hypothetical proposition, absurd on its face—was a director of the Bank of Montreal, and suppose he gave this position to the Bank of Montreal, what an outcry there would be, and how the people would think that something was wrong. How easily the public would think he had been influenced in making his choice by the fact that he was a director of that bank. Those are merely hypothetical illustrations, but I say they show the advisability of making it impossible for such things to happen by providing that when ministers of the Crown accept office they should cease being directors of companies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the possible objections to my proposal? They are, I imagine, certain possible objections. It may be said that laying down the proposition as I have done in the Bill which I have introduced I have been too wide and sweeping. We can imagine a case of this sort, a minister of the Crown being a director of a mutual life insurance company. Such a company is of a quasi-benevolent nature. I suppose there is no truer philanthropy that a man of moderate means can practice than to insure his life for the benefit of his wife and children. It may be that our insurance laws are so carefully administered that loss in such a company is practically impossible, and that the minister in giving the influence of his name to a mutual life insurance company is merely encouraging people to do what is right. The same sort of argument might apply in large measure to a director of a savings bank. I can quite imagine that hon. members may bring to the consideration of this question arguments which may tend to show that the proposal is too wide. Why have I brought it in this wide form? Because I believe that if you try to draw the line you will meet with more trouble than if you do not admit the wisdom of directorships of any sort or kind being held by ministers of the Crown. Suppose a man has built up a business and subsequently turns it into a one-man company. It may be said: Well, it is unfair to ask that man to give up the directorship of that company if he joins the Government. There may be something in that, but the answer I would make to this: that if he is going to do his duty as a minister of the Crown he really will not have time to attend to his business.

Mr. DOHERTY: Will my hon. friend permit a question here?

Mr. McMASTER: Certainly.

Mr. DOHERTY: Would the hon. member carry it this step further: that if a man was engaged in business—had not formed his one-man company, but was in a firm or was carrying on business—he should abandon or liquidate his business upon becoming a member of the Government?

Mr. McMASTER: No, I would not say that. I grant, Mr. Speaker, that the line is pretty narrow. It is much the same as in the case of the age at which a person may legally make a contract; if a man is twenty-one years of age he may legally make a contract, but if he is twenty years and nine months of age any contract he makes might be subject to attack. I admit that the distinction is pretty fine, but I do not propose to go so far. I do not think it would be in the public interest to say that a man should give up all his private business when he becomes a Minister of the Crown. I do think that if he can so arrange matters that he will be able to give up all active participation in his private business, leaving it to others, and to devote his whole time and attention to the public business, that is the ideal thing for him to do. After all, Mr. Speaker—we are discussing this matter in the most friendly fashion—how much practice of the law can the Prime Minister carry on at present at Portage La Prairie? Not very much; he has had to give it up, and there are members on this side who, if they went into the Cabinet, would have to lay aside their law practice for the time being. And the man who lays aside his law business is not merely giving up, so to speak, the interest on his capital; he is jeopardizing even his capital and is jeopardizing his practice.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, somewhat more is expected of lawyers than of other classes of the community.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. McMASTER: There is a great deal in that. I do not know any class of the community which renders more unselfish public service than the lawyers do. The doctors, too, give a great deal of unselfish public service, and perhaps more unselfish private service than the lawyers do.

Mr. BELAND: Why has the hon. gentleman set a period of fifteen days as the limit of time within which a man must resign his directorship after becoming sworn in as a Minister of the Crown? I should think it would be better to provide a period of fifteen days after his election, because it might so happen that after the election there would be no occasion for his resigning any directorship.

Mr. McMASTER: That is a matter which, I think could be taken up in committee. As the father of the Bill, I would be prepared to accept an amendment in that connection.

Mr. CHAPLIN: To be a director in a concern a man has necessarily to be a shareholder. Must a Minister, in resigning his directorship, also part with his shares?

Mr. McMASTER: No, I do not propose that for a moment.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Then his interest is there just the same.

Mr. McMASTER: His interest is there, it is quite true. But a shareholder has not, as a rule, the same control of policy that a director has. Quite often in large companies a man is asked to subscribe to shares, or is sometimes given qualifying shares, so that the company may enjoy either the direct benefit of his experience and business ability, or the 5 p.m. prestige of his name.

I frankly grant that you may ask me questions which are difficult to answer as regards the differentiation of private interests as between the shareholder and the director. I can imagine a case in which the private interest of a large shareholder in a company is much greater than the private interest of a director would be who might be a small shareholder. We could not, in fairness, shut out people who were shareholders in all companies from membership in the Government, because if we did we should too greatly limit the choice.

Mr. STEVENS: Suppose a man holds twenty-five per cent of the stock of some institution, and is a director and prominent member of it. He enters the Government, he resigns his directorship and retains his stock in the company. All he does is simply hide from the public his active interest, still retaining his real interest in the company. What is the difference?

Mr. McMASTER: Well, there is this difference: It is true that he retains his personal interest, but his fiduciary interest disappears. My hon. friend will realize that an honourable man will be more careful of the interests which he represents as a trustee than he will be of his own interests, and the cutting off of directors from portfolios does cut off from the Cabinet the possibility of conflicting fiduciary interests—the fiduciary interests of the director who represents his shareholders and that of the Minister of the Crown who represents the whole people. I quite agree that the personal interest of the shareholder remains; that is something which I do not think we can get rid of without unduly limiting the choice of Ministers of the Crown. But it is quite possible to prevent the carrying of interlocking directorates—which, I think, are now far too prevalent throughout the country—into the circle of the Cabinet itself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member not think that if his Bill is to be accepted it should, under our present practice, apply as well to the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I would have not the slightest objection to its applying to the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And to the leaders of both Oppositions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. McMASTER: I know my own leader and can speak for him; I am sure he would not have the slightest objection to having it apply to him. As regards the leader of the Opposition sitting angularly opposite, I cannot speak for him.

Mr. DOHERTY: But does the principle apply?

Mr. McMASTER: There is, of course, the consideration, as the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) remarks, that there is no salary attached to the position of the leader of the other Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the point.

Mr. McMASTER: That is not the great point, I admit. If that is the only thing standing in the way of the Government's acceptance of my Bill, I would be willing to go one step further and have it apply to the leader of the Opposition as well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be of no use to have the one without the other.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I should say right at the moment that I should feel it distinctly in the public interest to have the provision apply to the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really had not my hon. friend in mind; I was just leading through him to the other.

Mr. McMASTER: A sort of oratio obliqua. In bringing my remarks to a close, I must thank the House for the kindly, friendly and patient attention that has been given to my remarks. I am asking only that we place upon the Statute Book what I regard to be the best and the prevailing practice. I do not believe the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen), who leads the Government to-day, is a director in a company. He indicates by a shake of the head that he is not. I know that the last leader of the Government, the present member for King's N.S. (Sir Robert Borden), resigned his directorships. I remember, shortly after he became Prime Minister, having to examine the books of a very small company down in Nova Scotia and seeing on the books that he had sent in his resignation because he had become a minister of the Crown. I know that the only directorship which my late leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, ever accepted, was in a mutual life insurance company. Therefore, I am asking this Government to accept legislation that will merely crystallize in the form of a statute the best prevailing practice. It may be said, of course, and it will be urged, perhaps in this debate, that we should leave this matter to the individual feeling of delicacy and propriety of the ministers themselves. That has not been done in regard to senators and members. Under the Senate and House of Commons Act, their obligation to refrain from bringing before the House legislation in which they are interested, as lawyers, for instance, is very clearly set forth, and their inability to have an interest in a contract with the Government is also very clearly set forth. Therefore, that argument is offset by the fact that we have crystallized in the form of a statute the best prevailing practice as to members of Parliament, and I submit that what I ask for is right, and that it is calculated to enhance the honour and prestige of public men in this Dominion of Canada.

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Toronto East): Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say regarding the question which has been brought to the attention of the House through the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). In the first place, I should like to compliment him on the manner in which he has approached the question. I believe he is quite sincere in his proposal; but at the same time, it seems to me about as novel a proposal as I have ever heard in this House. In this way. What my hon. friend proposes is to have legislation passed stating who may not become members of a Government, and I do not know that there is any precedent for that. I think it is open to any Canadian citizen to become a member of the Government, provided that he is qualified for such a position. In these modern days of business, it is no news to members of the House to be told that business is carried on, not so much by, say John Smith as by John Smith, Limited. While, perhaps, twenty, thirty or forty years ago, the greater number of businesses were carried on by private individuals, nowadays, by far the greater number of businesses are carried on by corporations. John Smith may be carrying on business to-day with a capital of say $25,000 or $50,000, and to-morrow he may find it in the interest of organization to procure a charter from a provincial Government or from the Dominion Government and to organize his business into a joint stock corporation, but he still controls the corporation practically just as much as he did before it was incorporated. If he was a man of experience and integrity and was qualified in other ways to become a Cabinet Minister, if a new Government was being formed this man might be looked upon as pre-eminently one who would be of service to his country; but under those conditions, if the legislation proposed by my hon. friend were passed, that man would be disqualified.

Mr. McMASTER: He would not be disqualified; if he accepted the portfolio, he would have to resign his directorship. His directorship would not prevent his being chosen; but after he was chosen, he would have to choose between the retention of his portfolio and the retention of his directorship.

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I quite understand that, but that, to my mind, is rather a technical argument. A man publicly has his name on his letter head or bill head or whatever you like as a director of the company in which he is interested; he then becomes a member of a government, and he removes his name as director, and if he is asked across the floor of this House, if he is a director of this company, he says: "No," but practically his position is the same as it was before; he does not sell out; he cannot dispossess himself; he cannot sacrifice his rights; it is not likely that he would sacrifice his rights, and yet he may be in a position to be of great service to the government of whatever party it may be. My hon. friend probably did not have that matter which I have outlined as much in mind as he had what he termed interlocking directorates. If you stand several individuals up in line, all of them in different occupations and professions, how is it possible to say who is best qualified for Cabinet rank? A man might be a director in one or two or more financial corporations—let us get away from the smaller businesses—a government might be formed, and his services, because of his wider experience in the affairs of this country might be thought to be better than those of another man whose name is not connected with any corporation. The men whose names appear as directors of corporations are generally understood to be men who understand the affairs of this country as well as and, in most cases, have wider experiences in our country's affairs than other men, and consequently they would be more useful to this country. I cannot, therefore, see how you can pass a law to debar such men from becoming members of government in this country any more than you can pass a law saying who shall be members of government, and what occupations they shall hold in order to be members. My hon. friend gave some precedents in England, but the situation there is very different from what it is in Canada. Ninety per cent of the members of this House, whether they are in professions or in business, have risen from the ranks, and everybody, if he is looked upon generally in the community in which he resides, as a man of sufficient experience to become a member of a government, is supposed to be qualified in one sense or another for such a position. As I said when I rose, I did not intend to say more than a few words on this question, and I have not covered the subject at all; but it seems to me, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member for Brome has approached the subject in what appears to be a very impartial way, his argument is full of inconsistencies.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, I was struck with the speech of the hon. member for Toronto East (Sir Edward Kemp), but I think he has forgotten the fact that Parliament has already taken the step that he thinks is a hardship. Parliament has provided that a member of this House must not do any business with the Government. We have gone so far as to debar every member of the House of Commons in this respect. If my hon. friend will refer to the provisions of Chapter 10, of the Revised Statutes, he will see that the most drastic provision to this effect is made. My hon. friend's illustration of John Smith in his personal capacity, and John Smith Limited, does not apply, because even now if John Smith is not Limited he cannot be a minister and do business with the Government. He cannot be a member of this House and do business with the Government.

My hon. friend points out how difficult it would be to find a man to accept a position as minister of the Crown if he was prohibited from engaging in business. But we prohibit them already, because if John Smith is in business and becomes a member of this House, or a minister of the Crown, in his personal capacity he must not do any business with the Government. If he does, he becomes disqualified as a member of the House and as a minister of the Crown. So we have that prohibition already. Why should we make any distinction between John Smith in his personal capacity and John Smith Limited? Why should we prohibit John Smith in his personal capacity from doing business with the Government, if we are not at the same time going to prohibit him as John Smith Limited? The same principle is involved in both cases. If my hon. friend is not willing to pass this Bill, I think he ought to be willing to repeal Chapter 10, of the Revised Statutes, which provides that John Smith must not do any business with the Government. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the proposal of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) is sound. Shareholders are excepted under the law because, of course, it would be a hardship for a man of any means to have to dispose of his shares; that would be throwing away his property. But a director is in a much different position. My hon. friend from Brome has pointed out very clearly that it is the duty of a director acting in a fiduciary capacity to try and get a contract from the Government for his firm; it is his duty to do everything he can to make money for the shareholders that he represents. On the other hand, it is his duty as a minister of the Crown probably to give the contract to somebody else. These are two conflicting duties, and I can see no great hardship in compelling a man who accepts a position as minister of the Crown to resign his directorship in any company he is interested in. My hon. friend from Brome has pointed out that that is the practice already with some members of this Government. Very recently my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy) after joining the Government resigned his position in the firm in Nova Scotia with which he was formerly connected. Similar instances have been pointed out by my hon. friend from Brome. The practice exists now. I think it is a good practice, and that it would be a good thing to have it embodied in the statutes.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have followed this debate with very great interest, and with my hon. friend from Toronto (Sir Edward Kemp) I commend the tone adopted by my good friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) in discussing this important question. While I have not gone deeply into the matter, I must say that I differ from my hon. friend from Toronto in the view which he takes of this Bill. He says that men ought not to be debarred from joining the Government by the fact that they have large interests in limited companies and are directors on their boards. My hon. friend from Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has just cited the section of the Revised Statutes which debars members of parliament from entering into any contracts with the Government. But there is a more glaring instance. My hon. friend will also find that the Revised Statutes of Canada provide for the independence of the Bench. Some years ago this Parliament amended the Judicature Act to provide that judges who had been appointed directors and were drawing directors' fees in joint stock companies or in any other company must resign. I may be told at once that no judge was ever accused of being partial in his decisions because he was a director of a company. That may be the case, but there is a great principle involved in this matter, and it is that the public must have absolute confidence in the integrity and probity of those who administer the law. It was for that purpose—that the public might respect the more the Bench of Canada—that this Parliament decided that judges should not be directors of any company. The legislation evoked considerable discussion at the time, and some of the judges protested against what they called this hardship being imposed upon them; yet public opinion ratified the action of Parliament. Every litigant approved of it because, as we say in common parlance, Caesar's wife must be above suspicion. Justice must be protected not only by herself—and I use the word "herself" because I see her living on the Bench, personified by the judge who administers the law—she must also be protected against her own self, and that is the reason why Parliament decided that judges should have no interests as directors of companies. I may be told that ministers of the Crown are not judges. True, in a sense; but they make the laws. They decide long before-hand what laws shall be introduced, and therefore it seems to me they have an equal, if not a greater responsibility than the judges themselves.

I might give another illustration to show how sensitive public opinion is in regard to those who administer the law. My right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) knows that in our province —I do not know whether the same plan has been adopted in other provinces—the relative of a judge to the second degree is debarred from pleading before the judge, nor can any member of his firm appear before him. So intent is public opinion that justice shall be above suspicion. I commend again my hon. friend from Brome for his remarks this afternoon. This is a matter that applies to both parties, to ministers of the Crown of to-day, and to ministers of the Crown of tomorrow. It is in their interests that they should be protected against their own weaknesses; for we are all human. Public opinion should be saisfied that they have no monetary interest which might conflict with their duty as ministers of the Crown.

I may be told, as stated by my hon. friend from Toronto a moment ago, that business men of great ability and of substance might be debarred from giving their country the benefit of their experience. Well, let me recall to my hon. friend first of all the fact that the salaries of the ministers of the Crown have been increased. But I put that aside and I say is not the honour of being a minister of the Crown, the honour of being sworn in as a Privy Councillor, a reward by itself? In my humble judgment, no man should hesitate, when accepting that honour, to put aside his private interests. I think I am right in this, Mr. Speaker. I am glad to say that never since Confederation, up to the present time, has there been any reason on the part of the public to suspect the personal integrity of the Prime Ministers of Canada, and I include with pleasure in this statement the name of the right hon. gentleman who to-day as Prime Minister presides over the destinies of this country. But I say that it is in the interests of the ministers of the Crown, and of good government and of the good reputation of Parliament, that public opinion should be satisfied that there are no conflicting interests between ministers as such and any directors of private concerns. Why, it is obvious that any day of the month a minister of the Crown who has charge of a large spending department—let us take, for example, the Public Works Department, the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or the Department of the Interior—might be put in a very awkward position as between his fiduciary interests as member of a board and his public duties on the other hand. It may happen any day, and therefore I think, without having gone very deeply into the matter, that my hon. friend is living up to British custom, to precedent, and tradition in advocating this legislation. My hon. friend from Toronto spoke of the difference that existed between public men in this country and public men in the Old Country. Let me tell him that in the Old Country of late there has been a hue and cry in the public press and elsewhere against members of the House of Lords, ministers of the Crown—and that is not done very often with ministers of the Crown —lending their names as promoters or directors of boards. Mr. Speaker, if I were not afraid of hurting the feelings of any one, I could mention the name of a gentleman I have in mind who played a very great part in the history of the British Empire, a name which brought to his family and to his country much honour and glory. And yet that name was besmirched. Why? Because in a moment of weakness the bearer of that great name allowed it to figure in a promoters' scheme. I think of that name because it is so very eminent. But there are dozens and dozens of such names which have been lent to satisfy some promoter's greed. Now, do you believe that it is making for the honour and respect of public life that such things should be? I should like to have this discussion go a little further so that we might hear both sides of the question. It strikes me, after having heard my hon. friend and the objections that were made by some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side—mild objections I must say—that this is a needed reform and one which is consistent with British traditions.

Mr. FRANCIS HENRY KEEFER (Port Arthur and Kenora): The manner in which this discussion has been carried on shows clearly that there is no ulterior motive behind it. But I think that the hon. gentlemen who have been advocating this proposal have not given to it the fullest consideration which its ramifications warrant. I cannot see why a minister of the Crown should be compelled to resign his directorship in any company, whether they might or might not have anything to do with government business or with Parliament, unless you carry the principle to every member of Parliament. I would not object at all if it were laid down as public law that no member of Parliament should be a director in any company, if that were deemed advisable. Personally, I think it inadvisable, because there are thousands of companies that have no transactions with any of the offices of government. But to say that no Cabinet Minister should be permitted to hold any directorship in any corporation is going too far, unless you apply the principle also to members of Parliament. The public are well protected to-day by the independence of Parliament Act, Chapter 10. There it is laid down most specifically in Section 14 that no person, directly or indirectly, shall be allowed to have any interests in any contract or agreement, either through trustee or otherwise, if he is a member of Parliament.

Mr. PROULX: Does the hon. member think that that includes a member who is a director or has a controlling interest in an incorporated company?

Mr. KEEFER: As I understand, it includes any person. The Act reads as follows:—

Mr. PROULX: I am referring to the statute as at present.

Mr. KEEFER: Chapter ten?

Mr. PROULX: Yes.

Mr. KEEFER: Section 14 of chapter 10 says that no contract with the Government is permitted if a person has any interest in it directly or indirectly. Then, section 18 says further that in every such contract there must be a clause providing that no member of Parliament is to have any share or interest in such contract, or commission, or benefit to be derived therefrom. Such is to-day expressly forbidden. There is a penalty and this qualification for any contravention of the statute. There is only one exception, you are allowed to be a shareholder. Now is it not the interest in the company as a shareholder, that should be in question? The attack is only made upon the principle of the minister of the Crown being a director. I think the Bill as drafted has not been carefully thought out. There are many things which might receive further consideration. Why should the Independence of Parliament Act be at all restricted and apply to only ministers of the Crown as directors when that Act strikes directly at every member of Parliament? I see a great deal of force in what the member for Toronto said. If a man is carrying on a business as a partnership or as an individual, which might be a very large business, there is no interference. But if he finds it advisable to incorporate a company and to retain a seat on the board of directors in order to have some guidance of its affairs, why could he not as before incorporation, be a member of the government?

Mr. EDMOND PROULX (Prescott): I strongly approve the principles of the Bill presented by my hon. friend from Brome. The measure serves two purposes, one being to leave the minister free to devote his whole time to public business. I think that when a gentleman enters the Government of Canada he should be prepared to devote his whole time and attention to the country's affairs. At the last session of Parliament the salaries of the ministers were increased so as to render them independent of their ordinary profession or calling, and to afford them a decent living. Another important purpose to be served by this Bill, which is perhaps more important, is to secure the independence of a minister so that his private interests or the interests of his friends, or of his company, should not conflict with the public interests. I would go further, and I would say that a minister should not invariably have to sell his interests in any company when he enters the Government. I would permit him to be a shareholder so long as his company did not do any business with the Government. But the moment that company engaged upon any Government business the minister should be disqualified from remaining any longer as a shareholder in it. I would extend the principle of this Act to members of Parliament as my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) suggested. But I think my hon. friend misapprehends the meaning of section 10 of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons. Section 19 permits a shareholder in any incorporated company having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except any company which undertakes a contract for the building of a public works. A few years ago I presented a Bill to this House to disqualify any member, or any Senator, from having a seat in Parliament if he were a director, or had a controlling interest, in any company doing business with the Government. During the war many companies, in which members of Parliament and senators were directors, or had a controlling interest, sold supplies to the Government. As my hon. friend from Toronto has said there is a great difference in the manner of carrying on business to-day compared with that of twenty-five or thirty years ago. To-day business is not so much done by individuals as by incorporated companies. At the time the Act was framed business was transacted mostly by individuals. The statute, as quoted by my hon. friend from Port Arthur, provides that no person directly or indirectly, or with any other, can do business with the Government, but it excepts any shareholder in an incorporated company. Well, I would not go so far as to disqualify a member of Parliament or a Senator who might be simply a shareholder in a company doing business with the Government. But I would disqualify a member of Parliament or a Senator who was a director, or had a controlling interest in a company which was doing business with the Government. If we want to preserve the independence of Parliament, and to have a Parliament independent of the Ministry, we should provide all the safeguards possible to secure that independence. When the Act was framed I believe such was the intention of its framers. But by reason of the fact that the method of doing business has been changed this independence is not fully secured, because incorporated companies in which members of Parliament and members of the Senate have a controlling interest can do business with the Government. We know that some of these companies are one-man institutions or family organizations; strangers have only a few shares in them to qualify as directors. I think more wrong has been done by companies doing business with the Government than by particular individuals. I strongly endorse the principle of the Bill now before the House, but I would go further and exclude members of Parliament who are directors and have a controlling interest in incorporated companies doing business with the Government. Two years ago, when I presented a Bill to have the statute amended in this respect, I was met with the objection that some members of Parliament might be directors of printing companies who publish newspapers, and if their newspapers published Government advertisements they would be exposed to disqualification. In the Act respecting members of the Ontario legislature I believe there is a provision excepting members of the legislature who are shareholders or directors of companies publishing newspapers which in the ordinary course of business contain Government advertisements. I would be willing to incorporate that exception in the Federal statute. We have a provision similar to that in our Municipal Act to prevent the disqualification of members of the municipal council who, in the ordinary course of business, do any printing work for the municipality. I think with these exceptions the Act could be safely amended, and that we should amend it and secure fully the independence of ministers and of members of this House and of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): I should like to ask my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) if he is aware whether there is any English statute of similar character to the one he is introducing?

Mr. McMASTER: No.

Mr. BRISTOL: I would have been surprised if he had found one because I recollect being in England when the late Lord Rhondda bought control of a nerve tonic called " Phosphozone," and although he was then a member of the British Government he promoted a company and put the specific on the market. He told how much good it had done his nerves and the nerves of others suffering from the effects of the war. That struck me as carrying things rather far. But I think it indicates that to-day there is no such statute in force in England as that now proposed by the hon. member for Brome. In this country we have had this Independence of Parliament legislation on the statute books, I suppose, for nearly fifty years without any change, and suddenly we get this bill of my hon. friend, which to me seems to be an unintentional reflection on members of the Government past, present or future. Ministers from time to time have usually been men of good standing in business and of high personal honour, and it has been the custom of this country and of Parliament to trust them implicitly, in the belief that they will give to the country their best service; and I think we can well trust to the honour of our ministers to give us the same faithful service in future as we have received in the past.

What my hon. friend from East Toronto (Sir Edward Kemp) is putting before you is, I understand, this: If a gentleman under the name of John Smith, or John Smith & Company, has an enormous business it does not matter whether it is a partnership or not, he has a capital of say, one, two, or three million dollars, and although he may be dealing in every thing that the Government wants, he cannot enter into any contract with the Government because our Independence of Parliament Act prevents it. But adopting the system under which most modern business is conducted, he forms a joint stock company. Then under my hon. friend's Bill as brought in to-day that man on becoming a Minister of the Crown would have to resign as president or director of that company. When all is said and done, we want to get into Parliament men from all walks of life. It is the successful business men of the country who have arrived at an important position in the business world that a Prime Minister is anxious to bring into his Government, and it would be very hard indeed if any business man had to resign even from the directorship of the company which he has made a success. It is not in the public interest to ask him to resign from directorship or control of his company. So long as we are protected by the statute as it is, and so long as a member of Parliament who is a partner in a firm, as such cannot enter into a contract with the Government, and so long as a member who is a shareholder in a company cannot have his company take a contract for any public works, it seems to me the public are amply protected. On the whole I think it would be better to leave this matter to the good taste and good sense of present and future ministers rather than to pass special legislation to deal with it. It is certainly very much in the public interest that a minister's conduct should be above reproach. I think in the past our ministers have been men of the highest standing, and I am sure that that standard is not likely to go down but rather will go up. For myself, I think it will be better to leave the law as it is.

Mr. PROULX: Does it make any difference between a contract for public works and a contract to supply a large amount of goods?

Mr. BRISTOL: I am afraid the statute does make that difference; I am not making it. The statute is very clear, and I thought you read it.

Mr. PROULX: Yes.

Mr. BRISTOL: The section reads:

> This Act shall not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons by reason of his being,—
> (a) a shareholder in any incorporated company having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except any company which undertakes a contract for the building of any public work.

It might be quite proper to amend the Act and cover other things, but that is a totally different matter. I would be quite willing to consider any such amendment when it does not deal with the question of a man having to resign as a director if he wants to take a Cabinet position. My contention is that it is better to leave the law as it is, and that it is not in the interests of good administration in this country to force men to resign business affiliations which they have built up during the period of a lifetime.

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, it is said that in this discussion we need not be affected by party ideas, and, it seems to me, there can be no criticism whatever of the way in which the matter has been presented by the hon. member who gave us his reasons why the legislation he proposes should be enacted. But unfortunately I rather resent Bills of this kind, in that they are a statutory invasion of the realm of private honour and private morality. I always feel, and always have felt, that when Parliament attempts by statute to regulate the conduct of public men or judges they are doing something which in the end does not help the public. If the public gets to believe that everything is done by statute, then there will be not so much anxiety to preserve private honour. I feel like being rather a drag on the wheels of justice when they go outside the realms of crime and take up private matters.

In addition to that, I have an idea that it is not good to present to the public a predication of possible impropriety of conduct of gentlemen who are chosen as ministers of the Crown. The public should not have the idea spread upon the statutes that ministers of the Crown would do anything which would interfere with their conduct of public business or their own dignity. It is true that a statute was passed a few years ago limiting the activities of judges, but, as I recollect, it was not for the reason that judges would try cases in which they were interested, but that some judges, on account of the inadequacy of their salaries were inclined to go into business and were not giving sufficient time to their work on the bench.

It seems to me that if my hon. friend from Brome had suggested that the circumstances at the present time required this legislation, he would have made his argument much stronger, because I believe none of us know of any cases which have in any way indicated that ministers of the Crown have swerved from their duty simply because they happened to be bank or company directors.

There is another reason against this Bill, although perhaps this might be better discussed in committee. The Bill goes too far in that it makes no distinction between a large company which might affect a man's action and mind, and a small company in a man's home town which has nothing to do with the Government business at all. By passing the Bill in its present form we would to a large extent interfere with the rights of people in the country who had invested their means in companies only for the reason that they trusted the men who afterwards become Cabinet ministers. It is most unusual to find a man fit for a Cabinet position who is not a director of one or more companies, especially companies of a local character, and the people of the district in all probability invested their money solely for the reason that a prominent local man being president or director of the company they knew their money was safe. If by statute we do away with the right of that man to be a director, then we affect the rights of those who have invested their money. In other words, in the case of a man who becomes a Cabinet minister and is a trustee for people who have invested their money, any restrictive legislation of this kind is not in the public interest. For these reasons, I think that the matter might very well stand for the present, especially in view of the fact that no suggestion has been made that there is any urgent need for such legislation at this time. We are going too far, it seems to me, to think out possible improprieties when no case has presented itself to us to justify any such conclusion.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS, (Vancouver Centre): There are only a few moments before six o'clock, and as I should like to make a number of observations in connection with this matter, I shall say just a few words before the Houses rises.

I think it has wholly escaped the attention of the hon. member (Mr. McMaster) who introduces the resolution what the practical effect of a measure of this kind might be. There is also the question whether it would serve any really useful end. With regard to the latter point, I fail to recall at the moment, and during the short time I have had to consider it, any outstanding instance where a minister of the Crown in Canada— speaking now of all parties—has in any way flagrantly abused his position and thus given occasion for the measure which my hon. friend now brings forward. I think it is a sound principle for this House to follow to avoid legislation that is not called for. We have altogether too much legislation in this country—altogether too many artificial safeguards, if you like, or imaginary safeguards, and it is about time that we as a Parliament studied how we could avoid legislating on various subjects rather than seek out subjects to legislate upon. I submit, in the same spirit in which my hon. friend so admirably introduced the matter, that no evidence has been forthcoming in support of this kind of legislation. That is my first point, and I think it is an important one.

Another point relates to the practical side of it. Take, for instance, the co-operative associations. I have not particularly in mind my hon. friends across the way, but it is a fact that all over the country, in nearly every county throughout the provinces, there are co-operative businesses. Now, a director of one of these co-operative associations would be debarred from membership in the Government. Or take the case of a man operating a real estate, insurance and ordinary loan business, a financial brokerage business. Invariably that class of business is carried on under some corporate name, and frequently two or three men may be partners and own virtually all the stock; or the business may be entirely controlled by one man. If a member of such an organization became a minister of the Crown, he could resign his directorship on the understanding with his colleagues that when he should cease to be a minister of the Crown he would come back to his old position. In that way the Bill would, I think, put a premium on subterfuge and evasion, rather than maintain what the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) very properly referred to as the high standard of honour which has characterized the public life of Canada, from before Confederation down to the present time. There are other points to which I wish to refer, Mr. Speaker; I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Right Hon. Mr. Meighen the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Monday, March 7, 1921.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTED INCREASE IN CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I desire to direct the attention of the Government, and of the Finance Minister (Sir Henry Drayton) in particular, to a statement sent out by one of the larger New York banks to its Canadian correspondents, and by them passed along to their branches throughout Canada, intimating that the New York bank has information that the Canadian Government will, within a very short time, increase the customs duties by adding 30 per cent to the already existing duties. I am sure that if this information is not well-founded, the Government and the Finance Minister will see the importance of at once giving it a flat denial; otherwise, it will stimulate imports that are not immediately needed. On the other hand, if it is well-founded, someone has been indiscreet.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I thank the hon. member for bringing the matter to my attention. This is the very first I have heard of it. My hon. friend is well aware that it would be entirely improper for us to make any declarations on the subject matter of the report one way or the other, at the present time. I may say, however, that the imposition of an additional 30 per cent is not even being considered.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the provisions of the Audit Act which require that a copy of the Auditor General's reports shall be laid on the Table, within fifteen days after the opening of the session, and to ask why the Act has not been complied with this session.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): I shall have very great pleasure in looking into the matter immediately.

CENSUS OFFICIALS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture when we may expect the official list of the Chief Census officers for the districts in my riding.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Minister of Agriculture): That matter comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce now, not the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Then I will put the question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think the lists are already published, with the exception of the province of Quebec and the latter will be ready in a day or two, if not already published. I will send my hon. friend a copy.

MACKENZIE BASIN OIL REGULATIONS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to a matter of great importance and urgency. Under an Order in Council passed in January, the oil regulations governing Mackenzie Basin district were suspended. Under another Order in Council—

Mr. SPEAKER: I trust that the hon. member does not propose at this stage to make a speech as on a matter of urgency. If he desires to submit a question to the Government, of an urgent nature, and of general application, he might perhaps be in order, but not in making a speech.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): I cannot very well put my question before stating the facts in connection with the case. However, I might start with the question, and then give the explanation. I will put it this way: When will it be possible for the Government to issue leases for oil in the Northwest Territories, having regard to the statement in the last Order in Council passed by the Government?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The hon. member was good enough to intimate to me this morning that he would ask this question, and I have sought since to get in touch with the Minister of the Interior so as to procure the desired information, but without success. I will have an answer for my hon. friend to-morrow.

GERMAN REPARATION—ALLIED TROOPS' MOVEMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I should like to ask my right hon. friend the leader of the Government,—and I hope I shall not embarrass him by asking—whether in view of the cables of to-day that Allied troops are marching on Berlin; in view of the further fact that Canada is vitally interested in all these questions, for causes upon which I need not expatiate; in view of the further fact that we have been assured again and again recently that Canada is a nation,—is the Government being kept fully informed of what is proceeding in these areas, and would my right hon. friend like to make a statement to the House at some date convenient to himself?

[Sir George Foster.]

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I am justified in saying that generally the Government is kept informed by secret despatch of proceedings in connection with the difficulties between the Allied Powers and Germany. Definite information of the nature of that stated by the hon. member has not reached the Government; consequently there is nothing further than this that I can say.

Bill No. 16, respecting "Les Révérends Pères Oblats de Marie Immaculée des Territoires du Nord-Ouest."—Mr. Mackie (Edmonton).

THE JAMES MACLAREN COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. ALFRED ERNEST FRIPP (Ottawa) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, respecting The James MacLaren Company, Limited.—Mr. Fontaine.

Mr. BUREAU: Before the motion carries, may I submit that it might be well to refer this Bill to the Law Clerk of the House for the purpose of ascertaining to which committee it ought properly to be referred? I see they are asking leave to build railway terminals and telegraph lines, and to do other things that come more within the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee, and I think that the matter might be referred back to the Law Clerk for his advice.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be quite competent for the committee to do that in the case of a private bill in which there are provisions that might be referred to another standing committee of the House. It may however be as well to let the motion stand.

Motion stands.

1. What was the cost of each of the by-elections held since last session in the Dominion of Canada for the House of Commons?

2. How many members of the Government have taken part in same and what are their names?

3. Where did they work or speak?

4. Was there any Government private car or motor used in connection with said by-elections by the members of the Government or their representatives?

5. If so, how many and for what special election?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. ROBB for Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

For a statement showing: (a) the total amount collected by the Government on packing houses and cold storage plants, (1) under the law of excess profits, (2) under the Order in Council of 9th of March, 1918, fixing the profits of such houses and cold storage plants; (b) the names of these firms who have paid; (c) the dates of said payments; (d) the amount of each payment respectively.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is adopted, I desire to point out that there is no objection whatever to complying with the motion in so far as it ought to be complied with. There are, however, provisions in the different Acts which look towards keeping confidential information which is confidentially obtained. So far as I can see there is no reason why the return should not be made showing the total amount collected by the Government on packing houses and cold storage plants; showing also how much is collected under the law of excess profits; and showing also how much is collected under the Order in Council of March 9, 1918. The matter which is open to question and objection is the disclosing names of particular firms and the amounts of their particular business. I think the hon. member will probably agree with me.

Motion agreed to.

MINISTERS AND DIRECTORSHIPS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. McMaster for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect this debate would be resumed so early and I have not before me some of the memoranda that I had intended to use in dealing with the subject.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. member might further adjourn the debate.

Mr. STEVENS: If it would be all right, Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to move the adjournment of the debate again.

Mr. SPEAKER: The order will stand by consent.

FRENCH TREATY

Mr. ROBB for Mr. ARCHAMBAULT moved:

For a copy of the new treaty of commerce between France and Canada.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I desire to inform the hon. member that the treaty has not yet been dealt with by the other parties to it sufficiently far to warrant us in publishing a copy. When the treaty is ready for publication we shall be glad to furnish my hon. friend with a copy.

Mr. ROBB: We might let the motion stand until the return of the hon. member. (Mr. Archambault.)

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

INSPECTION OF GAS AND GAS METERS

On motion of Rt. Hon. Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce) Bill No. 13 to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the Inpection of Gas and Gas Meters, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—definitions:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This Bill is both to amend and to consolidate different Acts. Perhaps my hon. friend would direct the attention of the Committee to any amending features when they are not apparent from the Bill itself.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will do that as we pass along. Some amendments are introduced, and consolidation has taken place. It was thought better to consolidate the old Acts and make the amendments at the same time so that it would be all under the one cover.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—regulations:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move that clause 3 be amended by adding thereto, as paragraph (g), the following words: "as to pressure under which gas is to be supplied." That is at present in the old Act, but it was omitted in the printing of the new.

Mr. BUREAU: In the old Act I find these words, immediately following those which my hon. friend has just moved to insert as paragraph (g):

In the case of inodorous gas, to require the addition of such substances as he deems necessary in order to communicate the odor.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the old Act there is such a clause as my hon. friend has mentioned; I do not know just why it has been left out of this Bill. My officer is on his way here; we will let the clause stand until we get an explanation from him.

Amendment agreed to.

Section stands.

On section 4—units of measure:

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Does paragraph 2 have reference to natural gas as supplied to consumers in different parts in Canada?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Bill deals with both natural and manufactured gas.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): What provision is made for the testing of natural gas?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We shall come to that a little later.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—certificate of registration:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is a new clause so far as inspection of gas is concerned, but old as regards electricity. It is considered necessary to apply to the supplying of gas the inspection provision which has worked so well with regard to electrical supply. The certificates are furnished free of charge, and are for the period of a year. They have a statistical value as well, because you know then who are engaged in the work of supplying gas and are able to keep the business under supervision, which you could not do if you did not have the system of registration.

Mr. PARENT: Will this legislation be retroactive? Will it apply to companies already in existence?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has no retroactive effect.

Mr. BUREAU: But it must apply to companies already in existence, for it says:

No distribution system for supplying gas to any purchaser shall be operated until the contractor has obtained from the minister a certificate of registration for such system.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not retroactive; it does not operate until the Bill becomes law, but when the Bill does become law the certificate will be asked for from that date.

Mr. BUREAU: Take the case of Three Rivers, where the system of gas distribution has been in operation for some time and under very varying conditions. We have had natural gas and we have had artificial gas, and I do not think that anyone in the town could make any accurate report on the system, because it is not known where the pipes are. If the provision has reference to the manner in which the gas is manufactured, whether with coal or with sawdust, well and good.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All it requires is that the company or person operating the distribution system shall get a certificate of registration. You cannot carry on your inspection system unless you know what persons or companies are operating the different systems.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. BUREAU: That is, every gas company must register with the department?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: For a couple of months last winter the gas supplied in Montreal was very bad and complaints poured into the City Hall every day. The company replied that the coal was inferior. Is there in this Bill anything to prevent a repetition of that state of affairs?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not quite know what brought about that state of affairs. The department has to do with the inspection of gas; I do not think it has anything to do with looking out for supplies of coal or the finances of a company or anything of that kind. This is merely to see that the gas which is distributed, is measured under proper regulations, so that the consumer shall get his benefit and the contractor or supplier shall be under the regulations and rules of the department.

Mr. MARCIL: Did the department receive any complaints from Montreal last winter in regard to the quality of the gas supplied and, if so, did the department take any action? The gas gave out a very bad smell; in fact, in some places we had to cease using the gas entirely on account of its inferior quality. Is any power taken in this Bill to prevent a repetition of that state of affairs?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The impurity of gases and the bad quality of gases come directly under the department and we have penalties and fines which may be imposed. The matter is now being attended to in the courts.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton East): We have a number of companies distributing natural gas in cities and towns in the western part of Ontario, and at times the gas that is supplied is mixed with a large quantity of air. While the gas meters are supplying the people who own the gas wells with the means of taxing the consumer, on the other hand, the consumer is compelled to pay for a very inferior quality of gas. I do not see in the Bill any provision whereby the consumer is sufficiently protected in that regard. The same thing would apply in connection with gas supplied to cities, as has been stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil).

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am informed that natural gas is not purified by any steps which are taken by the department and it is very difficult to do that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton East): What protection is there in the Bill for the consumer of natural gas?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That seems to be a matter between the contractor and the purchaser. Natural gas is sold as it comes from the soil, and the question whether it is or is not good, and of a quality to fulfil the expectations of the purchaser must, to a large extent, be a matter of bargain between the purchaser and the supplier.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton East): I am sorry indeed there is not in the Bill some provision whereby consumers of natural gas are protected against the men who supply the gas. While it is true that at certain periods of the year, the gas furnished to consumers in western Ontario in particular is of very good quality, yet when there is a shortage of that gas, the general impression is that a large proportion of the material that is furnished through the meters is air which is allowed to be pumped into the pipe lines. I should like to see some protection of the consumer of natural gas, if that is at all possible.

Mr. McKENZIE: What effect would the presence of air in the pipes have on gas? I do not know anything about natural gas, but I know something about coal gas.

Mr. ARMSTRONG, (Lambton East): It simply passes through the meter and is registered as gas, although it is merely air which, when it is placed under your furnace or in your stove, does not produce very much heat.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The former legislation which we are amending today made no provision for that, and it is not considered that it is really possible to do so under our Constitution.

Mr. CAHILL: What is required by the department from the contractor in order that he may receive a certificate?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He must give the information that he is a distributor of gas, the number of his meters, and a general idea as to his system of distribution.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton East): Will the minister be good enough to request his officials to investigate this matter in order to see if it is not possible to devise some legislation whereby consumers of natural gas will be sufficiently protected?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why is an annual certificate required? Business men, as a rule, like to have as little interference as possible, and if they receive a certificate when things are going along well, with no complaints from the inspector, why should they be kept under observation every year and compelled to take out a new certificate?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is not much trouble in getting or in giving a certificate. The questions which have to be answered are very few and simple; but the department wants to know quite as much as those who go out of the business as the new ones who come into it. Therefore, if you have the expiry of the certificate at the end of each year, you know exactly how many have gone out of the business; and if you require a certificate from everyone doing business, you know all the new ones who come in. In that way your record is complete, and the interference with the business or the trouble given to the firm or association is practically nil.

Mr. PARENT: There seems to be no particular reason why this matter is not left in the hands of the provinces, because a province can grant a charter to a company to distribute gas or electricity. I should like to know if there is any special reason why the federal authorities are interfering in this matter.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This has been the practice since Confederation, since the first establishment of these two branches I can see very evident advantages which would come from having a capable general supervisory power, and it would be fair to assume, I think, that you would get a better supervisory power from the federal department which devotes its time to the whole Dominion, and can bring about uniformity of work and uniform protection for the citizens.

Mr. PARENT: If this condition has existed since Confederation, I do not see why the section is marked "New."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Weights and Measures certainly come under the federal jurisdiction, and this is simply a device for measuring or weighing gas.

Mr. CAHILL: What would be the penalty for failing to apply for this certificate?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We will come to that section later.

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend in answer to a question put by my hon.

friend (Mr. Cahill) or my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) rather indicated that the obtaining of this certificate of registration was largely a matter of form. If that be the fact, I would point out that the language of the section itself indicates that it goes somewhat beyond that. It says:

No distribution system for supplying gas to any purchaser shall be operated until the contractor has obtained from the minister a certificate of registration for such system.

Assuming that an application was made and the certificate refused, obviously under this section no person could proceed to distribute under any particular system. That being obvious, what I would like to know is, what is the practical application of the section? Is it optional with the department to refuse such a certificate, or has the department some standard up to which all systems must measure or what regulations in the department have to be complied with before such certificate can be issued? Obviously, if this section were to be strictly interpreted, a person might be prohibited from doing business altogether.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is very true. It is really one of the objects of the Act, that inefficient systems which are not scientific in their nature, or not correct in their working, shall not be operated to the disadvantage of consumers, who have to pay according to the meter readings. It is for the purpose of protecting the consumers from inefficient or deficient methods of distribution. The department has to satisfy itself that the system is reasonably efficient for distribution, and that under that particular system the purchaser of gas will get the service that is reasonably due.

Mr. MURPHY: May I inquire if there are certain fixed standards or regulations in the department that are well known to people engaged in this business?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am informed by the officer that the purpose of this section is mainly statistical, so that the department shall know who are and who are not doing business. The certificates are generally granted as a matter of course when application is made, and the information obtained is filed.

Mr. MURPHY: Having regard to the explanation just given by my right hon. friend, does he not think that the language of this section is a little too rigid?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It merely asks that a certificate be granted.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MURPHY: But it leaves it optional with the department to refuse to grant the certificate, and without the certificate a person cannot carry on business.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am told that exactly the same provision has been in the Electrical Inspection Act, and that no trouble has ever been found.

Mr. BUREAU: I would suggest that if the object of this section is merely that the department shall know who are and who are not doing business in Canada, it ought to be changed, because at present it provides that no system shall be operated until the contractor has first obtained a certificate. That is too drastic, as my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) says. If the object of the section is mainly statistical, why not draft the clause to read that every contractor supplying gas shall obtain a certificate under a penalty; but do not stop the system just because he does not get a certificate. Under this section, as it stands, if a man in Three Rivers, or in Ottawa, or anywhere else, did not get a certificate. some over-zealous officer in the department could come down and close his plant. That is too drastic. If we are going to legislate as to the quality of gas and provide remedies where a bad quality of gas is being distributed, let us have another clause drafted. But this one exposes even the consumer to hardship.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not the intention of this clause to interfere with systems already existing and distributing gas, but that every new company shall get a certificate of registration, and that thereafter these certificates shall be supplied yearly in order that a complete statistical record may be kept of what companies are doing business.

Mr. BUREAU: If that is the object, we ought to say "No distribution system for supplying gas hereafter installed or established," and so on. As the section reads now, all existing distributing systems are included, and the supply of gas could be cut off if a certificate was not obtained.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This clause covers a question that has been a very troublesome one in some parts of the country during the past winter, where companies had threatened to shut off the gas supply to some of their patrons, who had objected to the very great increase in the price of gas charged by the company in violation of contracts made with certain towns. I was not aware that it was necessary for the companies to receive a certificate of registration annually from the department, but that being the case, I can see the danger of having the supply entirely cut off in case the certificate is refused. A great many people in western Ontario use this natural gas for heating their houses, and if a license is not to be issued, then some means should be provided to see that the supply be maintained so that these people shall not suffer seriously as a result. Many people have no other heating facilities than natural gas. With regard to the question of the impurities of natural gas, the difficulty in certain towns in western Ontario during the past winter has been that companies have refused to purify the gas as they had contracted to do. As this Bill is endeavouring to regulate the gas companies, some provision should be embodied in it to ensure the purity of the gas, and also that, in the event of a certificate being refused a company, some means should be provided to see that the supply is maintained and that the consumer does not suffer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Possibly my hon. friend did not hear the slight conversation that passed between another hon. gentleman and myself with reference to natural gas, in the course of which I stated that none of our legislation preceding this had undertaken to look after the purification of natural gas. It is a very difficult thing to do, and I promised my hon. friend to have my officers look into the matter to see whether there was any possible method of doing it. The matter will have to rest there for the present. The difficulties which my hon. friend has stated I have seen discussed in the newspapers and in representations made from various quarters, as to the poor quality of natural gas. I must say that we have not yet legislated in that direction; heretofore the department has considered it so difficult that it has not undertaken to do that work.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was particularly interested in the fact that these companies require an annual license, and I was anxious to know what would happen if that certificate were not granted and a company were unable to do business, especially in the middle of winter when their customers depend almost entirely on the supply of natural gas. If the company were refused this certificate, what machinery is there to insure the supply to those who depend upon this gas for their heating purposes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The purpose of this clause is merely to get statistics into the hands of the department. It is not its purpose at all to refuse a certificate because of the quality of the gas, the defects of the system, or anything of that kind. The purpose of this clause, I repeat, is simply statistical.

Mr. MURPHY: In view of what my hon. friend says and obviously intends to do, would it not be better to amend the wording of the section so as to provide that every distribution system shall file with the department so and so, whatever the regulations are, upon which filing the certificates shall issue?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The objection to clause 5 as urged on this side of the House as well as on the other, seems to be the apprehension that it will stop the operation of gas companies altogether, with some embarrassment to those who are receiving gas. I would suggest that the minister change the clause so as to read:

> Every system supplying gas to any purchaser shall obtain from the minister a certificate of registration for such system, such certificate to expire on the 31st day of March each year.

That would compel them to get a certificate while it would not interfere with their operations. Section 13 says the contractor is penalized if he does not get the certificate.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If he does not get his registered certificate.

Mr. McKENZIE: Under clause 5, which says that no distribution system for supplying gas "shall be operated until the contractor has obtained from the minister a certificate of registration," prevents him from operating if he fails to get the certificate. I do not think it is the intention of the minister to interfere with the operations of these gas concerns, but only to subject them to a penalty for failure to obtain the certificates. I think therefore that the clause is open to amendment.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is right in the statement that it is not the intention to stop the operation of any gas system by reason of failure to obtain the certificate. The purpose of the clause is simply to compel the contractor to obtain his certificate, so that you may know that he is at work. The penalty in clause 13 is imposed for failure to get registration.

The certificate of registration is really given as a matter of course.

Mr. BUREAU: I think clause 5 ought to be amended in accordance with the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie).

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Section 5 is not intended to prevent operation at all; it merely requires registration.

Mr. BUREAU: If it has any object it must be to scare the contractor. As it stands, however, it seems to me that failure to get the certificate precludes operation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The registered certificate is required solely for statistical purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: Section 13 states that failure to obtain the certificate is punishable by fine of $10 for each day during which such failure continues. That is quite plain. If it is not the intention to prevent operations on this account, then I say that section 5 must be amended; because as it stands it distinctly prevents any work being done: It says that no distribution system "shall" be operated until certificate is obtained.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Perhaps it might meet the difficulty and be perfectly clear if the section read:

> Every distribution system for supplying gas to any purchaser shall obtain from the minister a certificate of registration for such system.

Mr. PEDLOW: What is the particular reason for requiring an annual application for registration? Once a gas company has registered would that not be quite sufficient? These concerns are not like some small affair; the contractors cannot put them on their backs and walk off with them.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It would be rather difficult for them to put the gas system into their pockets and go away with them, but still a company might go out of business, and it is well to have the registration complete in the office. Besides, it entails no hardship.

The CHAIRMAN: The clause now reads:

> Every distribution system for supplying gas to any purchaser shall first obtain from the minister a certificate of registration for such system.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The word "first" should not be there.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. NESBITT: Supposing a contractor is supplying gas and at the end of the year he fails to obtain a certificate?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: He gets his certificate as a matter of course, as long as he has a system in operation.

Section as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Bureau now moves that the committee refer to clause 3 of the Bill. Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Mr. BUREAU: I renew my objections.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The hon. gentleman's point is provided for in section 19 which we will come to later.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with this clause may I ask my right hon. friend if provision is made elsewhere in the Bill for the speedy publication of these Orders in Council that are passed? The Bill is of such general application and of such importance, that it seems to me necessary that the different Orders in Council which may be passed under this section should become speedily known.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Copies of the Orders in Council are distributed immediately to each company direct from the office.

Mr. MURPHY: May it not be a matter of general interest that the Orders in Council should be published in the Canada Gazette, for instance, within a certain time after the Orders are passed?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Order in Council affects the contractor and he gets a copy of it. The departmental officer thinks that no good purpose would be gained by carrying out my friend's suggestion. It would only be another cause of expense and we are so economical these days.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think section 19, to which my right hon. friend referred, meets the case. It does not appear to me that the provisions are such as to give sufficient protection to the consumer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I understand the question has been raised as to whether the power to act in this matter belongs to the Dominion, or whether it is a question of provincial and municipal regulation.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not see that there would be any danger to the public interest if we were to preserve the language of the old Act. It has been in effect since 1910 and I do not think its authority has ever been disputed.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am informed that on two or three occasions cases have been taken to Court and we have lost them.

Mr. BUREAU: I would like the right hon. gentleman to cite me one of those cases in respect to gas.

Section as amended agreed to.

On Section 6—right of access by contractor to premises where gas is used.

Mr. BUREAU: Paragraph (c) gives the contractor the power to enter the premises of a purchaser for the purpose of changing or removing any piping, et cetera. That seems to me to be a kind of arbitrary power to confer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: But the contractor will be responsible for repairs.

Mr. BUREAU: That is all very well but some times a person would prefer not to be deprived of gas even if he obtained damages. It is provided that the contractor shall be responsible for any damage done, but he can take the piping away and leave the consumer without gas—in fact he may do it summarily. If it were provided that it might be done for certain reasons, or under certain conditions it would afford better protection for the consumer.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The clause as introduced here is new only as relates to gas inspection. It has been in force for the last twenty years in the inspection of electricity and no difficulty has been experienced under it.

Mr. BUREAU: The two systems are not the same in character and therefore you cannot compare them. Although they give the same results, that is to say they yield power, heat and light, the two systems are absolutely different.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I know they are different, but in both cases contractor has to go inside the house to install the apparatus.

Mr. BUREAU: But I maintain that the two cases are not on all fours. There is nothing in the Act concerning electricity that gives a contractor power to go into another person's house and rip up floors in order to put in wiring. Unless it is a matter of contract as between the parties, the company, in the case of electricity stops at the outside wall and provides you with the current there.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think my hon. friend's fears are justified as to what injury may be done.

Mr. BUREAU: I have not got any fears.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Experience is the best test in a matter of this kind.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not believe in waiting until the horse is stolen before locking the stable.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If a pipe gets out of order and the contractor is responsible he ought to have the right of entry and the right to make good the damage which exists inside and prevents the system from working.

Mr. BUREAU: To say that the contractor can enter a house and remove any piping is a little hard.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Bureau moves: that clause 6 be amended by striking out the words "or removing" in the fortieth line. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. McDERMAND: Does the provision in clause (c) mean that the inspector may enter a gas field and remove any of the regulators and so stop the pressure of gas to the public?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If the owner of the building or house comes to the conclusion that he will not take any more gas, the contractor will have the right to enter and remove his fixtures.

Mr. BUREAU: He has already at law full remedy to get back what belongs to him. I do not see why we should give him this drastic power of entering and ripping out pipes and meters.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is not an hon. member of this group entitled to have his question answered so that he can hear the answer?

Mr. McDERMAND: Will the inspector have the right to enter a private building and remove the piping or interfere with a line supplying a village with gas by removing a meter or cutting a pipe without consulting the consumer or consumers?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is the contractor.

Mr. McDERMAND: Would he have that right without giving notice to the public?

The reason I ask this question is because in my immediate vicinity last fall a whole village was cut off by a certain gas company removing the pressure meter, and the people were in darkness and suffered a good deal of inconvenience in consequence; in fact, the lighthouses along the lake were out.

Mr. McKENZIE: I submit that this right should be left entirely to the contract or agreement that the selling of gas makes with the purchaser. They have their private contract, and one of its terms should be that the contractor has the right to go in and remove his property from any building, or to go in and repair that property; but I think it is rather arbitrary for us to make a one-sided contract and give the contractor this unlimited power.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the Committee ready for the question? Sir George Foster moves that clause 6 do carry. Mr. Bureau moves an amendment to strike out the words "or removing" in the fortieth line.

Mr. NESBITT: Before you put the motion, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but I must remind the hon. member that the motion was put for the second time. The Committee was asked if it was ready for the question, and no answer came. I am sure the hon. gentleman's remarks will be quite relevant after the motion is put.

Amendment (Mr. Bureau) negatived.

Mr. NESBITT: I was going to speak on the amendment, Mr. Chairman, but as it has been declared lost I have nothing more to say.

Mr. PEDLOW: Has the Minister considered—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend will allow me? I think we had better be a little careful before we strike this out of the Bill as it has been very carefully prepared by officers who have had this matter under their charge for many years, and they have brought down to the House what they consider is necessary for the proper carrying out of the Act. I have been speaking with the inspector, and if the clause be considered somewhat drastic in its present form, as stated by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), it might be made perfectly reasonable by the addition of this phrase:

The contractor may at all reasonable hours and with the consent of the purchaser. . .

[Mr. McDermand.]

Mr. BUREAU: Since my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. McDermand) has taken the floor I think my case is far stronger. Supposing gas is being supplied to me and to another consumer through a common pipe, and the company wish to cut off his supply by tearing out a piece of pipe not only my house but the house of the man whom they wanted to deprive of gas will be shut off. Why should the contractor come on the premises and tear out the pipe? My hon. friend says that it is the contractor's property. But the contractor is entitled to replevy that property at any time. I think a county court judge is much better equipped to try each particular case than we are to lay down a general law empowering a contractor at any time to enter and remove piping. My right hon. friend may change the wording of the clause, but the removal of the piping is the objectionable feature.

Mr. McDERMAND: It was the question of removal that affected the village of which I spoke. The company removed the generator in that case and the whole village was in darkness and subject to the weather. I think the consumer should have certain notice given him before changes or removals are made.

Mr. MURPHY: Who did it in that case?

Mr. McDERMAND: The Dominion Gas Company.

Mr. NESBITT: The amendment was declared lost.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment to strike out the words "or removing" from clause (c) was lost, but any other amendment striking out the entire paragraph or amending it in any way except deleting the words "or removing" would be in order.

Mr. DOHERTY: It might be pointed out that this section, at all events as I understand it, does not confer on a man the right to remove piping; it is for the purpose of giving him a right to enter the premises.

Mr. BUREAU: For what purpose?

Mr. DOHERTY: Supposing that that man had a lawful right to remove piping. If you strike out the words "or removing", then he would not have the right to enter the premises. The purpose, as I understand it, is not to determine whether the contractor has the right to remove any piping, but when he has that right, to determine whether he shall have the right to enter at any reasonable hour for the purpose of exercising his right of removal. I would suggest that instead of striking out the words "or removing" we insert after "removing" the words, "when lawfully entitled so to do". I should think there would be no objection to adding these words.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister will see the difficulty which is there introduced. Who is to decide what is a lawful right?

Mr. DOHERTY: My own interpretation of the section is that it confers a right to enter, not a right to remove; but where a man has a right to remove, this section gives him a right to enter. Nobody can decide then and there whether or not he has a right to remove; that necessarily would have to be fought out afterwards. Suppose a man had a judgment of the court determining that he had a right to remove, and the occupant barred the door.

Mr. BUREAU: He could go to the sheriff.

Mr. DOHERTY: He might have to go to the sheriff; but why, in cases where the right to remove is not disputed or disputable should there not be a right to enter?

Mr. McKENZIE: The purposes for which the contractor may enter are clearly defined in the section. It provides first that he may enter; then it sets forth what he may do after he gets in. Now, if it is objectionable that he should go in and do all these things, we should not allow him to go in. So far as I am familiar with the operations of electric concerns—and they are about the same thing; one supplies light and the other gas—the local Acts give them authority to put up poles, string their wires, and all that sort of thing, but the matter of what happens between the purchaser and the contractor as respects what the contractor shall do in the purchaser's house is the subject of private agreement between them. Perhaps we might well leave it to themselves to make such arrangements as might be thought proper in this regard, instead of making an unilateral contract—telling a contractor what he may do, and offering no protection to the purchaser, the man who owns the house. Then, I think the caption of this section is somewhat deceiving—"Inspection." If these things were done by a qualified inspector, I would have no objection, because he would be a good man, interested in both parties. But this is not an inspection; it is conferring power on the owner of the plant to do certain things. I do not quite understand why it comes under the head of "inspection."

Mr. MORPHY: I agree with the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie). I cannot help feeling, upon reading the whole section and the caption of it, that whoever drafted the clause intended to make sub-section (c) read this way:

> Changing or improving any piping, fittings, meters or other apparatus belonging to the contractor.

That, to my mind, is a reasonable view to take of the section; any other view is quite out of keeping with the rights of the public in dealing with large corporations supplying gas. If, on the other hand, it should be said that my view in this regard is not correct, I would simply fall in with the amendment of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) by adding to it these words: "after three days' notice to the occupant," so that paragraph (c) would read:

> changing or removing, when lawfully entitled so to do, after three days' notice to the occupant, any piping, fittings, meters or other apparatus belonging to the contractor.

So that if a person is aggrieved by arbitrary or captious pressure on the part of an incorporated company, amounting, in his opinion, to infringement upon his personal rights, he would have three days within which to apply to the court for an injunction to restrain the removal and thereby get redress before the damage is actually done.

Mr. NESBITT: I can hardly agree with my hon. friend. As to what the member for North Cape Breton says about the word "inspection," I may point out that the inspection is by the contractor's inspector, not by the provincial inspector or whoever the province employs. As to the words "removing any piping, fittings, meters" and so on, you have to give the contractor permission to remove piping because if the purchaser has not been paying his bills or for some other reason the contractor thinks it necessary to remove the meter, he could not do so without at the same time removing a certain amount of piping. I do not see how we can refuse to allow the contractor to do what is necessary to the carrying on of his business in a business-like way. He should not be asked to supply gas to people who do not pay for it. I think that the clause, taken with sub-section 2, which makes the company responsible for damage, is all right as it stands, because I do not believe any contractor or supplier of gas is going to remove piping or meters unless such action is necessary, because he is not being paid for the gas, or has some other good reasons of that kind. These men are out to do business, just the same as anybody else, and unless they are selling at a loss —and that is not likely—the more gas they can sell the better for them.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should like the attention of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) to what I am about to suggest because I think we have been talking about this under a misapprehension; at least I know I have. This does not purport to give the right of forcible entry. It establishes the fact that a man has a right to go in to do all those things that are enumerated. If I am a tenant in possession and I do not think he has any right to do the things that he proposes to do when he enters my residence, I will simply barricade my door. He will not have any right of forcible entry; to enforce his right of entry, he will have to go to the court, and then we shall thresh out the question whether he has a right to do those things which he says he wants to enter to do. I do not think anybody is exposed to any forcible action, because the law simply says that the man has a right of entry for certain purposes, and I think we can take it for granted that his right of entry is only subject to his being in a position lawfully to do those things. I do not think anybody suffers any great danger under this clause.

Mr. BUREAU: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) knows as well as I do that when a company is getting a charter to supply gas, it is careful to see that everything is put in that is necessary for the protection of its rights. By this clause we are giving a man, who is not under the control of the Federal Government, certain powers as regards his contract with another man who owns a house. If you were saying that the inspector should go in. I would say: "All right; this is one of your own officers, and it is up to you to legislate as to your officers". But you say, "The contractor." My right hon. friend says: "What we want by this clause is the right to enter the premises;" but where has the contractor a right to read the meter, except by this section? Where has he a right to take it away, except by this section? My objection is that we step in and say that the contractor shall do certain things. The contractor is not our officer. He may have his charter from the Dominion Government, as is the case with the Ottawa Gas company; he may get it from a provincial legislature, and in his charter all the powers of the contractor are well defined and enumerated and I think those who look after the contractor are careful, when they ask for a charter, to see that all necessary powers are granted. Why then should we give additional powrs to a contractor, such as the removal of pipes or entry at any time? Let the inspector go in and bring in the contractor if he pleases, but I object to the contractor or his servant being given the right to enter my house and to remove pipes or to do the other things that are enumerated.

As regards the clause relating to damages, I have only to mention the word "damages" to the Minister of Justice to make him smile. He knows as well as I do that very often when we go before the courts to get damages, the costs of the action exceed the compensation received. I might call that section a section of frivolity, because it does not amount to anything.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think we are going far beyond the purview of this legislation when we are dealing with property end civil rights. At an early stage of the discussion this afternoon the question was raised as to our right to go into the provinces at all to deal with matters of this kind. The minister quite properly answered that the question of weights and measures comes within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and consequently we had a right to deal with weights and measures. But clause 6 goes far beyond that; it tells a man who owns a house what shall happen; that a certain contractor may enter his house, and may do certain things. That is dealing with property and civil rights and has nothing to do with weights and measures. If we say that our inspector can go in and examine a house and do what ever is necessary for the purpose of the Bill, I will say that that is incidental to the jurisdiction of weights and measures; but I ask the Minister of Justice; By what authority can we deal in this Bill with property and civil rights? This is a question of property within a province, and we are telling a man he can go in and do practically what he pleases with that property. I do not think that comes within the scope of this legislation.

Mr. MURPHY: Listening to this debate, I felt that the matters covered by this clause are rather trifling and unimportant to be included in a Dominion Act, and I want to supplement what my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has said by suggesting to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that the matter might very well be left to contract between individuals. Would that not be covered in such cases by the ordinary arrangements that are made in regard to matters of this kind, making it unnecessary for us to incorporate it in an Act of Dominion application?

Mr. BUREAU: As regards the amendment moved by the Minister of Justice, is the contractor not lawfully entitled to enter when he is given the right of access?

Mr. DOHERTY: If anybody objects to my amendment I have no desire to press it. Personally, I do not think it is necessary. I think, that with the exception of the right to enter, this clause does not confer substantial rights on anybody who has not those rights already.

Mr. BUREAU: Strike it out.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: As regards the sub-amendment " after three days' notice to the occupants," that might act very badly; gas might be escaping, running all through a house, poisoning everybody, or it might catch fire and burn up the whole place.

Mr. MURPHY: I am sure, if gas were escaping, no objection would be raised to the contractor coming in and stopping the leak. What I wish to provide against is an arbitrary entry, when no gas was escaping, in order to take away pipes that are useful, not that are useless.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the real purpose of this clause in any event? In the first place, every gas company, before it can supply gas will have a franchise from a municipality, and under that franchise it will have rights that should be sufficient for it. Why should the Dominion Government be passing this legislation, and particularly this clause, when they have all these rights already under their franchise; and if not, why should we give them rights which the municipal franchise would not give.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I should like to consult the officers of the Department before I make a decision, and I therefore move that further consideration of this section be postponed.

Motion agreed to. Section stands.

On section 7—pressure:

Mr. NESBITT: This clause provides that "The contractor shall from time to time report to the minister what the minimum service pressure is and shall provide, free of charge, etc., etc." We have had a great deal of trouble in Western Ontario over gas this last year. Some corporations have complained that there is not enough pressure, and others that the gas is poisonous and smells too much, and they have had the provincial Railway Board and a gas inspector up there investigating. There has been a lot of trouble between the municipalities and the gas companies, and my question is: where does the Dominion Government's authority come in, and where does the Provincial Government's authority come in? The same question applies to section 6, which has been allowed to stand. If the two authorities clash, I should like to know exactly where they do clash, because this is a very vexed question up in Western Ontario, and is causing constant rows between the municipalities and the gas companies.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The purpose of this clause is to put the department in possession of a fact, as to what the pressure really is. We have no power, and this does not give us power, to say what the pressure shall be.

Mr. NESBITT: If you have no authority to do anything, what is the good of having the knowledge?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The knowledge of what the pressure is, is necessary to us in testing the meters, and that is the whole purpose for which this clause exists. The pressure may be high or low, and in order to make an accurate test we have to know just what the pressure is.

Mr. NESBITT: Then we have no authority to control the gas companies?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We cannot say what the pressure shall be.

Mr. NESBITT: Or what the supply shall be?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: You have to go to your municipality for that.

Mr. CAHILL: This is a new clause. How have the companies and the authorities been getting along hitherto without it? The minister does not give any good reason why it should be inserted.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think the reason I have given is a good one. If we want a piece of information for the purpose of carrying out our work, we ought to be able to get that information.

We are not responsible for the fact of what the pressure is, but we are responsible for testing the meters, and we simply want to get the fact as to the pressure, in order that we may do our work in conformity with that fact.

Mr. CAHILL: Just what is the work of the department?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The work of the department in so far as this is concerned, is to get information upon which to test the meters. The pressure may be high or it may be low. Now the meter has to be tested according to the pressure, and we simply want to know the fact of what the pressure is. This very same provision has been in force with respect to the inspection of electricity for the very same purpose.

Mr. McKENZIE: No doubt the minister has a perfect right to test the pressure, because that is incidental to the real purpose of the inspection, but I have very grave doubts whether he has power to compel the contractor to furnish the tools for doing that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It is not the tools.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is the apparatus, then. You are saying to the contractor: We want to make tests, and we are going to make you supply the necessary machinery to make our tests. Now I have very grave doubts whether you have any right to say that to any contractor. I have very grave doubts whether you can compel him to keep extra apparatus for that purpose.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It has always been done in connection with the inspection. Do not put it into their heads that we have no right to do it.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): Is this clause new? What has been the procedure in the past?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The meter has to be tested under the existing conditions, and one of those conditions is the amount of the pressure. We want to know just what that pressure is, for without that knowledge we cannot fairly test the meters.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka): What has been the practice in the past?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The officer tells me they have simply had to take their chances in testing the meters, and that it has been very unsatisfactory.

[Sir George Foster.]

Mr. COPP: Has the minister received any information from the gas companies throughout the Dominion as to how this will affect their operations? We have natural gas in the city of Moncton. It is piped seven or eight miles into the city and then distributed. Sometimes the gas has been reported pretty low. Has the minister conferred with the companies who will be affected by this legislation.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend will see that this will not interfere with any company which is piping gas into a city. It merely asks that company: Please be kind enough to tell us what your pressure is, as we want the information in order to test the meters. That does not affect the company's operation.

Mr. COPP: Except that they have to supply the pipe and facilities for the test.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is only a neighbourly thing for them to do.

Mr. COPP: How will these tests be made, and to what expenses will the companies be put in supplying these facilities? I should like some information on these points.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This really means a saving to the companies because, instead of asking them to bring their meters to be inspected at the office of the inspector, our meters are taken to the premises and all the company is asked to do is to connect up a pipe to help the inspector in making the test.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Director.

Mr. ROSS: This seems to be a radical departure from the Acts of 1906 and 1910. We seem to be appointing a new director and new officers, and you are taking great powers to yourselves. You are appointing numerous inspectors and assistants. What is the reason for this change, and what will the additional cost be?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am glad to be able to tell my hon. friend that this does not contemplate, nor does it provide for, the appointment of a single additional officer. It merely gives the names and the powers of officers already at work.

Mr. MORPHY: It seems to me that the caption of the clause is rather misleading when read in connection with section 6. Section 6 is headed "Inspection." To my mind it should be headed "Directors' rights and privileges." Section 8 is headed "Officers" and deals with inspection. The caption should indicate the purport of the clause. Then they would not be misleading the people who wished to understand the law.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This deals with the appointment of officers.

Mr. MORPHY: For inspection purposes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: And the one that deals with directors' right is headed "Inspection". It seems so abnormally out of place that I thought I would mention it.

Mr. STEVENS: I would draw attention to sub-clause 4. Does not the Civil Service Act as it now stands provide for this qualifying examination? Why insist on introducing it into this legislation?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think the provisions of the Civil Service Act cover this case, but perhaps it might be just as well to let it stand.

Mr. STEVENS: As I understand the Civil Service Act, all these positions in all departments are filled by examination, and I think it unwise to introduce into this Act or any other Act a special clause with reference to examination.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it not a fact that by Order in Council the Government can at any time over-ride this provision with regard to examination, as they have done in connection with the census Enumerators and the Purchasing Board?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I move to strike out sub-section 4.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the subsection?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It provides what is already provided under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have the greatest objection to striking out anything that has any tendency to remind the Government that there is such a thing as the Civil Service Act, because it should be kept before them continually. They should be reminded of it at every turn of the road. It is bad enough as it is, but if nothing is said in the House or in bills about the Civil Service Act the Governement will forget all about it.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is quite wrong.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend (Mr. Cahill) has just brought to the attention of the Government the fact that officials under the census regulations have been appointed regardless of the Civil Service Act. I do not quite understand why that should be so. Surely this is a matter that ought to come within the operations of the Act. These officers do Government work of a very important character, and why should not the Government ask the Civil Service Commission to submit to them a list of men in the different counties of Canada capable of doing this work? Other matters of less importance are submitted to the Civil Service Commission, but here was a very large slice of patronage and the Civil Service Commission was put aside. The old Tory machine is renovated and put into running order, and the appointees are absolutely and entirely of the old school. I have had the opportunity of looking at the Halifax papers this morning in which the officers in my own county and others in the province are given, and I can assure my right hon. friend that they will pass the acid test of Toryism of the finest order. In mentioning this I am not finding fault, because if I had power and the Civil Service Act were out of the way I would do exactly the same thing. But I do object to the camouflage of affirming that there is a Civil Service Act in this country under which we are supposed to select officers through a commission appointed for the purpose, while at the same time we find the Government over-riding that Act. I think the minister at this very stage should define as clearly as he can where the Civil Service Act is in this legislation, so that henceforth we shall know when there is a transgression of that Act. I should like to have some explanation from the minister. Perhaps it does not come within the scope of this discussion as to why he as one of the ministers of the Crown has ignored—if such is the case—the Civil Service Act in connection with the census. Why should the appointments be made regardless of the provisions of that Act?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We shall have ample time no doubt on a more fitting occasion to take up that particular question and discuss it. It really has nothing to do with the use of gas or the work of testing meters or anything of that nature. There will be an answer for my hon. friend at the proper time and I hope he will restrain his impatience until then.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I do not think this clause should be struck out. If we leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Civil Service Commission they may determine that an examination is not necessary, and may dispense with it in making these appointments. Now, where we are dealing with gas, something which is very essential and at the same time very dangerous, I think there should be the statutory requirement that no persons should be appointed to these positions until they have passed a technical examination. This clause simply makes it obligatory that there shall be a technical examination under the direction of the Civil Service Commission. I do not think it would be wise to leave it in the hands of the Commission to say whether or not there should be a technical examination, or any examination at all, and give the Commission power to make the appointment without deciding whether the applicants for these positions are techncially qualified to fill them.

Mr. CALDER: I am inclined to think there is a point in the argument of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie). As I understand the Civil Service law, appointments to the Civil Service are certified by the Civil Service Commission either with or without examination, the matter being left to their judgment as to whether an examination is necessary or not. It seems to me that in cases of officials of this character there should be an examination.

Mr. STEVENS: I would suggest to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization this fact: This clause gives the Civil Service Commission absolute power to prescribe the nature of the examination, but it does not state that it shall be of a certain type. It says "such examination to be held under the direction of the Civil Service Commission." I submit the whole thing is covered by the Civil Service Act, and this is a perfectly useless clause.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There are two sides to that question and I am not sure but that the suggestion of my hon. friend back of me (Mr. Tweedie) should be taken into consideration. It is just possible—I think it may be more than that—the Civil Service Commission under the powers given to them by the Act may appoint these officers without examination. Now, the purpose of inserting this clause is that in reference to these officers there shall be an examination provided for by the Civil Service Commission, and that they shall be appointed by the Commission only after a technical examination. If that me so, if it is absolutely essential that technical acquirements shall be the basis for the appointment of officers to these positions, and that seems to be the case, the clause should remain. Under the circumstances I will ask that further discussion of the matter be postponed, and the section be held for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the minister have the right to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. McKENZIE: I certainly think that subsection 4 of section 8 is important and should remain. We know that the Civil Service Commission now appoint parties to the public service from year to year without an examination at all, and call such appointments temporary. If it it imperative that no person should be appointed to a position such as is provided for here without passing a technical examination then the section should remain.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is withdrawn, shall the clause carry?

Mr. CAHILL: The minister stated that there were to be no new appointments, and yet the very first clause of the Bill provides for the appointment of a director.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is, an officer who is already existent and performing the duties shall be made director, that is all. The statement I made is correct.

Mr. CAHILL: And there is to be no change in the salary?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: No change in the salary and no change in the number of officers.

Mr. PARENT: Am I right in understanding from the minister that the appointment of a director and inspectors will be made by the Civil Service Commission?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The existing Civil Service Act brings the appointment of these officers under the Civil Service Commission. The only point which has been raised is this: the Civil Service Commission may appoint to an office either with or without an examination. The department takes the view that with reference to these officers there must always be a technical examination. That is the reason we have put this clause in the Act, to make sure that the Civil Service Commission in appointing shall only appoint after an examination of the technical qualifications of the applicants.

Mr. PARENT: That may be the minister's view but if the section is taken as it is, it will be found to be possible for the Civil Service Commisson to have ten or fifteen men pass an examination and be pronounced qualified for these positions. Section 4 does not say that appointments will be made by the Civil Service Commission.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Civil Service Act does that.

Mr. PARENT: But this section may supersede the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The object of this section is simply to make sure that there shall be a technical examination, which I think is perfectly right.

Mr. CAHILL: Does that mean that the present officers shall have to take an examination, or is the examination only to apply to new officers that may be appointed from time to time?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I presume it applies to new officers only. The present officers are qualified.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would ask the minister if he considers the wording of subsection 3 of section 8 sufficiently definite. We are now framing this Bill, and I think we should make it a little more specific in certain details. The provision to which I have particular reference declares that an officer may at all reasonable hours enter any premises. Now we should define what we consider "reasonable hours" to be and not leave the matter open. The same, or similar, phraseology occurs in section 6. I think we should define what we mean by "reasonable hours," and I would suggest that we say between the hours of 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There might be something occurring at the other hours to prevent the officer from carrying out the duty. I think my hon. friend will find it very difficult to go further in the matter of definition than is set out in the Bill. Circumstances must determine the hour.

Mr. PEDLOW: But there may be two opinions as to what constitutes "reasonable hours." A moment ago in the discussion of this Bill we had a difference of opinion upon certain matters, and it is equally possible that there will be a difference of opinion in regard to the present point. I certainly think we should settle details of this kind when we are framing the Bill.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not think we could make the provision more specific than it is.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—meters, etc:

Mr. PARENT: Will not the provisions of this clause interfere with the ordinary employees of a gas company? By this clause it would seem to me that no inspector outside of the one nominated by the Government, or the Civil Service Commission, would have the right to enter houses and verify the meters, although at the present time the gas companies' employees perform this work.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We do not interfere with the employees of the company which is furnishing the gas.

Mr. MORPHY: Subsection 9 reads:

> Within six years from each verification and sealing every meter shall be presented by the owner for re-verification and re-sealing, or for the cancellation of the seal by the inspector.

There is no definition under this Act of what constitutes an owner, but there is a definition of what constitutes a contractor—the person who supplies the gas. Invariably the contractors supply the meters, and in my experience they rent those meters and will not sell them. Now, it seems to me from the point of view of public right that the duty under sub-section 5 should be cast upon the contractor, the man who supplies the gas, to provide at his own expense for the re-verification of the meters at that period of time when they should be verified. The word "owner" in used in the subsection. There may be a way of getting around that by the contractor saying he leased the meter, or in some other way he may say that he is not the owner; I cannot say what might happen under the interpretation that might be given to the clause; but I think the word "contractor" should be put into that section specifically and that the duty should be cast upon him of arranging and paying for the re-verification of the meters periodically.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There are cases in which the contractor or the company does not own the meters, they are owned by the consumers themselves; and this subsection makes it necessary for either owner, whether it be the consumer or the company, to have the re-verification carried out.

Mr. MORPHY: If that is certain, I am satisfied.

Mr. ROSS: Under this clause there does not seem to be any protection thrown around the public in regard to when the meter should be verified. In the old Act of 1906 by section 19 it is provided:

> No meter shall be stamped which is found by the inspector to register, or capable of being made to register, quantities varying from the true standard measure of gas, more than three per centum in favour of the seller, or four per centum in favour of the consumer.

But there seems to be nothing in this Bill protecting the consumer in that regard. Why was this protection left out?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am told that the inspector of the department has the power to order the re-verification of a meter at any time if it is found to be defective, but that all meters under this general clause must be re-verified every six years.

Mr. ROSS: The minister does not quite get my point. Under the Act of 1906, and also under the later Act of 1910, there are standards set up to protect the public; but under this Bill there is no provision at all in that regard.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is a provision in this Bill by which the standard shall be set by Order in Council, and the officer works under that Order in Council.

Mr. ROSS: Why should it be done by Order in Council now when it has never been done heretofore in that way; why not by statute?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The reason is that if it is in the Act, every time you changed the standard you would have to enact fresh legislation. These changes of standard take place from time to time, and it is conducive to the best operation that they shall be adopted without loss of time. The same amount of protection is afforded under this Bill, but added protection is given as according to experience we change the fineness of the standard.

Mr. ROSS: I do not quite follow the minister's explanation. I cannot conceive that the fineness of standard would vary so rapidly that we could not establish a basis in the statute to protect the consumer. From the fact that the standard established in 1906 was not changed in the Act of 1910, I would assume that the standards do not vary very rapidly, and even if we had to pass legislation I think the public would be much more satisfied to depend on a statutory provision rather than on an Order in Council which might or might not be passed.

Mr. CHISHOLM: These gentlemen have a habit of passing Orders in Council.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The officers of the department think it would be better to have the section remain in its present form.

On section 10—tests in the case of disputed accuracy of meter:

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This is just the same as the old Act, except that it is a little more definitely stated.

Mr. ROSS: There were many rules in the old Act with respect to testing which I do not find in this Bill. Why were they left out?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They will be provided for, as I said before, in regulations passed by Order in Council, and for the same reason.

Section agreed to.

On Section 16—for not keeping records or permitting inspection of them:

Mr. McKENZIE: I move that the words "not exceeding" be inserted after the word "of" in the fourth line.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All right—the penalty not to be less than five dollars.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. McKenzie moves to amend clause 16 by adding after the word "of" in the fourth line thereof, the following words: "of not less than five and not more than,"

so that the clause will read:

> shall be liable to a penalty of not less than five and not more than fifty dollars.

Mr. PARENT: What is to get the benefit of the penalty, the Crown, or the man who prosecutes?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Crown.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 19—for supplying injurious gas:

Mr. McCOIG: In the old Act there is a section which has a very important effect on the part of the country from which I come. It provides that:

> The supply of gas shall be regular and sufficient.

The old Act distinctly provides that a company shall give a sufficient supply of gas, when they have the gas to give to the consumer. This is omitted from the present Bill, and I think it would be a great mistake to eliminate it from this legislation, because it is telling a company which enjoys all the privileges that many gas companies enjoy, that they shall supply the consumer with a sufficient supply of gas, especially in the cold season of the year when gas is very much required. I do not think the minister should ask us to eliminate such an important section when it means so much to the people of Ontario who are being supplied with natural gas at the present time.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am informed that that has been left out of the present Bill because the opinion has been given that we have not the power to enforce it. We might, however, go through with the remaining clauses of the Bill, and then I will leave the Bill in committee and we can take it up again and consider it a little further.

Mr. ROSS: Clause 19 is not closed so far as the committee is concerned?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It was not clause 19 that was particularly referred to. Another point was raised there which my hon. friend (Mr. McCoig) contended was of vital importance, that it was in the old Act and that it was not brought into this. I suggested that, as we had an opinion from the Minister of Justice that we had not powers with reference to that, we could not do that under our powers, that we might pass these other sections, and I would allow the Bill to remain in committee until I had an opportunity of consulting the Minister of Justice with reference to the matter. Then it could be brought up again. I will not ask that the Bill be passed until I have an opportunity of doing that.

Mr. ROSS: The Bill will be brought up in committee again.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—for offence specific penalty for which is not provided:

Mr. PARENT: How does this read with the amendment passed a few minutes ago reducing the minimum penalty to $5?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: This would be a blanket for all the rest. That was a special penalty for a special case. This will provide for other cases which are not provided for specially.

Section agreed to.

Progress reported.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 19, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that copies of this Bill have been distributed as yet.

Mr. DOHERTY: They have been distributed, I understand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would point out to my right hon. friend that this Bill does not appear to be on the official fyle. Copies of the Bill may be lying on the table, but I do not think hon. members have had an opportunity of perusing the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, I have no desire to proceed with the Bill if any hon. gentleman thinks he has not had proper opportunity of perusing it, but as I explained the other day, it is a very simple Bill, very easy of apprehension, and I would not anticipate there would be serious objection to it. There are two clauses. Their purpose is to provide that on appeals from the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents, which appeals under the existing law lie to the Exchequer Court, and are brought at the instance of the party interested, the Commissioner of Patents, as representing the Crown and the public interest, shall as matter of right be entitled to be heard before the Exchequer Court, and shall, in the event of the decision of the Exchequer Court reversing the decision of the Commissioner have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. I may say that until 1913 the only appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Patents was to the Governor General in Council. At the time that was not considered a suitable means of rectifying any error that the Commissioner might fall into, and in consequence, by an Act passed in that year, the appeal was made to the Exchequer Court instead of to the Governor in Council. That appeal, of course, was at the instance of the party interested. Though there was no provision in that law for the Commissioner of Patents being represented before the Exchequer Court, as a matter of practice he always has been so represented. My information is that the judge of the Exchequer Court thought it desirable that the other side of the case should be put, and at his suggestion the Commissioner of Patents appeared and defended his view.

That practice has gone on without question until a recent case. In that recent case the decision of the Exchequer Court was favourable to the private party and adverse to the decision of the Commissioner of Patents. The latter, assuming, apparently, from the well-established practice, that he was a proper party in the case made an application for leave to appeal to one of the judges of the Supreme Court. That application was necessary because upon the question arising there was no amount involved, and therefore no sum of $500. The commissioner made his application to the judge for leave to appeal, and the judge presiding declined to grant leave to appeal, taking the position that the Commissioner of Patents was not a party to the case and, therefore, in effect had no standing even before the Exchequer Court, and, of course, no right of appeal to the Supreme Court. Now the purpose of this Bill is simply to convert into a legal right what by practice was recognized as the privilege of the commissioner, to appear before the Exchequer Court to defend his decision. Of course, it was not at all in the interests of the commissioner himself that that right should be recognized, but it was felt that there should be somebody to represent the public interest, to put before the court that public interest and the reasons why in that public interest the decision of the commissioner should be maintained. This present Bill provides simply for that right to the commissioner to appear before the Exchequer Court and uphold the public interest in the matter, and, in the event of the Exchequer Court deciding adversely, to carry the case to appeal, just as the private party has the right to carry the case to appeal. The object, in a word, is to put the public on a footing of equality with the private interest, and I would think there would be general consent that there should be such a provision.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not find any fault with the purpose of this Bill, to give the commissioner the right of appeal which the private party enjoys, but what I would suggest is this: here is a matter that refers exclusively to the Patent Act, just as Chapter 17 of the Statutes of 1913 which transferred all appeals from the Governor in Council, and even all pending cases, if I remember rightly, to the Exchequer Court, refers exclusively to the Patent Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: The object of this Bill is to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. BUREAU: I know, and that is where confusion may arise. The fact of amending the Exchequer Court Act in order to give a certain person mentioned only in the Patent Act, and whose duties are defined by the Patent Act, the right of appeal might embarrass anyone looking up the legislation on the matter. There are always in the Patent Act certain provisions whereby an appeal lies from the decision of the commissioner. Now, why not include the provisions of the present Bill in the Patent Act, so that anyone looking up the legislation would not have to turn up the Exchequer Court Act to find out whether the commissioner had the right of appeal? If we are to give the commissioner the right of appeal by amending the Exchequer Court Act, one could not tell by looking up the Patent Act that he had that right Under the consolidation he would find that the appeal lies with the Exchequer Court, but he would have to look under the head of "Exchequer Court" to find a matter which is exclusively and entirely within the purview of the Patent Act. The Bill is all right. I do not want my hon. friend to think that I am criticising its principle; my only objection is in regard to the place which the title occupies in the statute. My object is to make the work easier for lawyers looking up the Patent Act to ascertain what the powers and the rights of appeal are, instead of having to look up the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: I rather fear the House is getting into matters of detail which can properly be discussed only in committee. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) states that he has no fault to find with the principle of the Bill, with which he is satisfied. The only question involved in his objection is one which it would be well to discuss in committee.

Mr. BUREAU: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that changing the title of the Bill would be changing the whole Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: That does not involve the principle of the Bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, and on motion of Hon. Mr. Doherty the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the chair.

On Section 1—Commissioner of Patents may appear by Counsel.

Mr. DOHERTY: I quite realize there is a good deal of force, from the point of view of convenience, in that suggestion that the hon. member for Three Rivers makes. But unfortunately the practice has been to cover the entire jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court by the provisions in the Exchequer Court Act, and this particular provision does not differ from others, if I am correctly informed. You look to the Exchequer Court Act for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, and there you find also a great variety of matters referred to. But it is there you go to ascertain the jurisdiction of that Court. The suggestion of the hon. gentleman, if it were to be useful, would involve the repealing of the Act of 1913 to which I think people have become thoroughly accustomed, and re-enacting it as an amendment to the Patent Act. While that might perhaps be advisable from the point of view of convenience, and while it might be well to put a clause into the Patent Act to say that there is an appeal to the Exchequer Court, I still think that the Exchequer Court Act is the proper place to regulate the jurisdiction of that Court, as likewise the right of appeal from the Exchequer Court to the Supreme Court. We might consider the desirability of putting a clause into the Patent Act, if it is not there, to indicate that there is an appeal to the Exchequer Court, but in the meantime it would be well to let this bill pass. We are not here conferring jurisdiction on the Exchequer Court; that is already conferred by the existing Act. We are only making provision as to who shall be entitled to be heard before the Exchequer Court, and providing a right of appeal for both parties. As the law stands at present, the Exchequer Court has jurisdiction, and the appeal exists. The only difficulty is that it is now interpreted to mean that only one party can be heard before the Exchequer Court and only one party can appeal. We are not creating the appeal; we are simply providing that both parties may be heard on an appeal which already is provided for in the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. BUREAU: The statement of the minister gives more force to my suggestion. We are not conferring jurisdiction on the Exchequer Court; it already has jurisdiction. The only question is that an officer who comes within the scope of a specific Act, namely, the Commissioner of Patents, shall have the right to appeal to that court. The gist of the thing is not the right of appeal or the question of jurisdiction, but the right of the commissioner; and if you were looking for his powers, if you wanted to find out whether he had a right of appeal, you would naturally look to the Patent Act under the duties and powers of the commissioner. I do not object to this Bill being passed, but it creates confusion. My hon. friend knows better than any one else that if you have to go through five or six statutes having reference to different matters in order to find out what particular officer has to do, you are put to considerable labour and sometimes confusion is created. My object is to put under one heading and in one Act all the powers and privileges conferred upon this particular officer.

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill does not create the appeal. It does not give the right of appeal even to the Commissioner of Patents. It only provides that on an appeal from the decision of the Commissioner of Patents, which appeal can only be by the other parties and which already exists and is provided for in the Exchequer Court Act, the Commissioner of Patents shall be entitled to be heard. Then having once given him that right to be heard, we give him the same right to appeal from that decision that already exists in favour of the other party. So that we are in reality only regulating the procedure. There is convenience in confining the entire jurisdiction and procedure before the Exchequer Court in the Exchequer Court Act, and this is a matter of procedure. Before the section passes I desire to amend it to some extent. I do not know that it is necessary, but perhaps it is as well to put in the amendment which I shall propose. It has reference to the way in which the Commissioner of Patents is entitled to appeal. I would also move to insert, after the word "patents" in the eleventh line, the words "acting in the said capacity."

Mr. CANNON: (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) means, by the terms of his amendment, that the Commissioner of Patents shall have the right to appear for the Crown and as representing the interests of the public. If he adds "representing the interests of the public," and should the Supreme Court find against the opinion of the commissioner, should we infer that the finding is contrary to the interests of the public?

The Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) There are two interests to be represented: on the one side the interest of the party applying for the patent; then, against that, is the interest of the public, which may require that the patent be withheld; and there is the interest of the Crown. The commissioner will represent the public at large interested in its withholdment. It may not be absolutely necessary to say that he has the right to appear as representing the Crown and also as representing the interests of the public, but I do not see what objection there could be to it. There are cases where the Crown may appear by reason of having a special interest in the matter. There are others, as in the present case, in which the Crown is interested in appearing not in order to protect a special interest of the Crown, but in the interests of the public at large. Such seems to be the case on hand.

Mr. CANNON: (Translation.) I understand the explanation given by the right hon. Minister of Justice, but I believe that we may take as a principle in law that in a case where the Government is represented, the Government, through its representative, appears for the Crown. Now, under our constitution, the Crown represents the public in a general way, and if in a clause of our law we say that any one represents the Crown, I take it that we infer thereby that this person appears for the public in a general way. By adding that this person appears not only for the Crown but also in the interest of the public, we either make a distinction which should not be found in our laws, or it constitutes a tautology, which is not necessary. I believe that by saying, "The Commissioner of Patents, in the name of the Crown, shall have the right to appear . . ." the phraseology would be better and the idea more constitutional.

The Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: (Translation.) I should congratulate myself over the fact that the hon. member so completely admits that the Government represents the interests of the whole public—

Mr. CANNON: (Translation.) As a legal fiction.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) But I might perhaps acknowledge the tautology, for I confess that the phrase is not absolutely necessary. However, notwithstanding the respect I have for the opinion of the hon. member, I conceive that there are cases where the Crown, that is to say, the Government, acts as being itself interested, that is to say, by reason of the organized government as such having an interest therein; and there are other cases—such as this one—where the Government as such is in no way interested in a patent being granted or denied to the applicant. In this case the interested party is the public in general. Though I admit that there would be no necessity of saying so expressly, it appears nevertheless desirable to indicate clearly in what capacity our commissioners are to be recognized and it can do no harm to state that they not only represent the Crown but have the special object of protecting an interest which is not so much that of the Crown as of the public in general. I concede that the Crown has the right to protect the interests of the public in general but if one refers simply to the general law, it is the Attorney General who should intervene to represent these interests. I wish to make it clear that the commissioner can, as representative of the public interests, lodge this appeal, as well as the Attorney General.

Mr. CANNON: (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am astonished to hear the hon. Minister of Justice advance this argument. We are in a British country. We live under British institutions, and in framing our legislation, we should, as far as possible, follow the principle of the British Constitution. I do not believe that in our public law, any more than in our private legislation, there could be a distinction between the Crown, as representative of the executive power of the judicial power, and of the people. It is very different in the United States. In that country I understand that one can say "The people vs. so and so," "The State vs. so and so;" but in a British country there can be no question of the people against an individual or of the State against an individual it is always the Crown. I am even more astonished to hear the right hon. Minister of Justice suggest a case where the interests of the Crown, in the acceptatioon of the word I have just indicated, might conflict with the interests of the people in a general way. How could it happen in a case before the Supreme Court that there might be conflict between the interest of the Government—the word Government, according to what the hon. Minister of Justice has just said, would then mean the Crown—and the interest of the general public? Who then would represent the general public? Who would have a mandate to represent the general public, according to the principles of our Constitution? Who could present himself before the Supreme Court—not only before the Supreme Court but before any court of our country—and say, "I represent the interests of the general public?" And how again could the commissioner or his representative claim to have the mandate to represent before the Supreme Court the interests of the general public, if these conflicted with those of the Crown? Who would represent the Crown? Could the Commissioner of Patents, as an officer of the Government, as one of the Crown's representatives, claim that he represented the interests of the general public as opposed to those of the Crown? I believe that as a legal proposition, it would hardlly be defensible. Certainly my experience is much more limited than that of the minister, but I cannot conceive of cases where the Government could be represented by a lawyer who would go before the Supreme Court and claim that he represented the interests of the general public and that these interests were opposed to those of the Crown. A lawyer who would appear and uphold interests opposed to those of the Crown could not be the representative of the Government according to the principles which govern our Coustitution.

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, we might no doubt prolong this very interesting discussion in dwelling upon the part taken in it by the hon. member for Dorchester, but it would not lead to very important practical results. I will only say that I was misunderstood if it was believed that I had suggested that there could be interests of the Crown opposed to those of the general public. My proposition was, that, among the interests that the Crown is called upon to defend and protect, one might make a distinction between those of the Crown proper, so called, and those of the public, which the Crown, as its representative, is charged with protecting. Now these two interests usually are protected through the intermediary of the Attorney General. In this case under consideration, we make an exception as to the official who would appear to protect these interests, and we designate this official to represent the interests that are as a rule represented by the Attorney General. It seems to me that in any case there is no harm in stating it. I admit the thing would go without saying, and as is often repeated—the remark was first made by a great man—things that go without saying are still better when said.

Mr. BUREAU: (Translation.) Would the object of the amendment then be that of removing all responsibility from the commissioner showing that he is acting as a representative of the Crown?

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: (Translation.) In that case, why not insert the phrase "ès-qualité"? It is short, it is understood by every one, and it would show exactly in what capacity he comes before the Court.

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) These words would be better understood in our province than in any other part of the country. I do not know that these words have the same meaning in the English provinces as they have in our laws. Besides, even in saying "ès-qualité," we do not specify in what capacity. There are several capacities. We say "ès-qualité" when one appears as a tutor or as a curator. Could it be wrong to embody in the law not only that he appears ès-qualité, but also state in which capacity?

Mr. BUREAU: (Translation.) Would not the English words "Acting in his official capacity" translate the words "ès-qualité"?

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) I do not think they would, not in the present instance; because if we say "In his official capacity," this would not mean in the capacity of Commissioner of Patents. We are simply granting him a new power. I do not know that I would have moved this amendment had I known that it would be objected to.

Mr. BUREAU: (Translation.) I am not objecting, I am merely asking for information.

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) I believe the best reason is that one which I gave in reply to the hon. member for Dorchester. I do not think it wrong to say things sometimes which are not absolutely necessary.

Mr. CANNON: (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, the clause such as it reads before the hon. minister moved the amendment was the following: "The Commissioner of Patents has the right to appear and be heard through his lawyer, on the hearing of the appeal." The hon. minister now suggests that we add: "The Commissioner of Patents, on behalf of the Crown and as representing the interests of the public, shall have the right to appear and be heard through his lawyer, on the hearing of the appeal." Who shall decide if the commissioner appears for the Crown or if he does so in the interests of the public?

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) There shall be no necessity of a decision, for he shall have to do both. The amendment reads "On behalf of the Crown and as representing the interests of the public." If there are two distinct interests, he must represent both.

Mr. CANNON: (Translation.) As I said, before, there can be no distinction from the legal and the constitutional point of view, between the interests of the Crown and the interests of the public. Therefore, as the hon. minister has just said, if there is no distinction, there is no reason to add "the interests of the public" after saying "on behalf of the Crown" this being sufficient. The right hon. minister told us just a while ago, that there were cases where a distinction might exist. Now, he tells us that such a distinction does not exist. If it does not exist, then it amounts to what I said: It is a case of redundancy, and it would be better to eliminate the last part of the amendment, in due regard for the principles of the constitution as well as for the improvement of our legal phraseology.

Mr. BUREAU: (Translation.) Will the right hon. minister allow me to remark that there is a clause, in the patents law, which might properly apply to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Dorchester, namely, when an employee in the civil service asks for a patent. This employee has no right to obtain it for himself, unless he ask the government; there is a provision to the effect that the government is to be served first. The commissioner is the one who shall decide on what terms the patent may be granted. In a case like this, the interests of the public may differ from those of the Crown; and then, the commissioner cannot represent both interests at the same time, because in his official capacity, he will have to represent the Crown and refuse to grant the patent to the employee, or else make such terms as would not be in the interests of the public generally. The words "or" instead of "and" should therefore be inserted, so that when a conflict should arise, he could choose between the two.

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) How then conciliate the opinion of my hon. friend from Dorchester with that of my hon. friend from Three Rivers? I am indeed on the horns of a dilemma.

It is obvious that I could not please both the hon. members at the same time, because my hon. friend from Three Rivers gives us to understand that in some cases the fact that the commissioner would be serving the interest of the Crown would preclude the idea that he was acting in the interest of the whole people.

Mr. BUREAU: (Translation.) Not necessarily.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: (Translation.) No, but I think the hon. member from Three Rivers came to my rescue during the discussion in which I was engaged with my hon. friend from Dorchester.

The hon. gentleman is supposing a case in which the commissioner, when claiming on behalf of the Crown a royalty from the man who is trying to use his patent, would be there to uphold the rights of the Crown as to the collection of a certain sum. Now, I do not deny that the people are indirectly concerned in that matter. All that is added to the public revenue benefits the people. However, such is not the case when it is a matter of safeguarding a right which each individual is directly entitled to. In fact, when it is a question whether a man is entitled to a patent or not, if he obtains it to whose detriment is it? To the detriment of the public who, by the fact this patent is granted, is debarred from using such an article. True, it is in a sense that the public is interested, even when the question is what amount should a man pay as a royalty for the privilege of availing himself of a patent. As I said a few minutes ago, although the Crown is primarily interested as collector of the revenue the people who are benefited by it are also interested.

Mr. BUREAU: (Translation.) The commissioner has the right to prevent the use of that patent, and it might be in the public interest that such a patent should be used.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: (Translation.) In that sense, yes.

Mr. BUREAU: That is provided for in the same section.

(Section as amended agreed to.)

Bill, as amended, reported.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the order "Notices of Motions" was called, forty-six were read through and no hon. member was ready to proceed. Believing that some hon. members are prepared to go on now, I would move, with the consent of the House, this being private member's day, that the House do now return to the order, "Notices of Motions."

Motion agreed to.

PENSION DEDUCTIONS FOR RETURNED SOLDIERS INSURANCE

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient, in order that a greater number of disabled soldiers and dependents be enabled to enjoy the benefits of the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act, that arrangements be made to, at the request of the Pensioner, deduct from Pension payments such sums as the said Pensioner shall indicate and apply same to the payment of insurance premiums under the said Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution is a very simple one. Under authority of an Act passed last session, the Government has entered into a plan of insurance for returned soldiers and their dependents. Although the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act has not been in force very long, it seems to have been productive of good results. I am informed that a large number of returned soldiers have taken advantage of it, and it is in order to allow a still larger number to be insured that I propose this resolution.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, a number of soldiers receive pensions, rather small in amount, varying from $2.50 to $10, $15 and more a month. The money derived from these small pensions is not, as a rule, put to the very best use. The amount is too small to be saved; it is more in the nature of pin money or spending money, so that the soldier derives no real benefit from it. Should the resolution which I propose carry, the soldier will be permitted, on making application to the Board of Pension Commissioners, to have his pension, or such part of it as may be necessary, apply toward the payment of premiums on insurance under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. The premiums are fairly small; the rates are somewhat better than those given by the line companies, and if the soldier is permitted to request that deductions be made from his monthly pension cheque, to be applied upon premiums, he will be in a position to leave his dependents in a much better position should he unfortunately be carried off. I understand that there is no very great objection to the proposal on the part of the Government, except that its adoption might cause some trouble to the Board of Pension Commissioners; they might have to do a little extra work, and there may be some difficulty in connection with changes of pensions. For instance, having passed a new medical examination, a pensioner might be found quite fit, his pension would be cut off—I understand that this is the objection of the Board of Pension Commissioners—the insurance might be dropped. The answer to that is quite plain. In any case the man would be no worse off than he is at present; he would simply have to continue the payments out of his own resources. I do not think I need add anything further by way of explanation. I think the resolution ought to carry.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this resolution refers to a matter of some importance, but none the less a matter of administrative detail. It calls for the granting of the privilege to the pensioner of assigning all or part of his pension, thus making it applicable to the support of an insurance policy under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. As hon. members know, particularly those who have been members of the Government, all departments of the Government are opposed to accepting assignments of pay; it is not the practice in any department that any payee from that department shall be permitted to make an assignment to a private citizen, to a company, even to another department, of his or her salary. No doubt, the objection on general grounds is on account of the greater administrative difficulty of being sure of the correct payment. I do not think any matter of mere difficulty or delay should stand in the way of an improvement, particularly if it is to advance or help the position of a returned soldier. I am not sure whether this would help him very much or not. Of course, any soldier now can turn his cheque back just as soon as he receives it.

Mr. McMASTER: It will be easier if he never gets it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he never gets it, he does not bother with it at all; but even if he does get it, if he gives an assignment of the whole or part of it on his insurance, he can withdraw that assignment at any time he has a mind to. I suppose there would be less possibility—just slightly less —of a withdrawal or a lapse of the insurance if the privilege of assignment were given. I know the Pension Commissioners, doubtless more than any other branch of Government, have difficulty in being certain of the promptness and correctness of their payments. I do not know what the number is, but many cheques are returned every month, not finding their proper destination, and undoubtedly those difficulties would be enhanced if the assignment privileges were given. There is no doubt in the world that errors would creep in.

I think I am justified in saying, at this stage, that I purpose submitting to the House very shortly a resolution calling for the reappointment this session of a joint committee on re-establishment, along the lines of the re-establishment resolution of last session and the session before, though, perhaps, not just in the same wording. That being the case it occurs to me that, this would be a proper subject to submit to that committee. I think, therefore, it would be well, before giving the consent of the House to this resolution, that one or two members or officials of the Pension Board should be heard, so that the House might be advised by the committee who make detailed inquiry, whether it is worth while adopting this plan or not. I, therefore, suggest to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) that he allow the resolution to be withdrawn, on the understanding that the subject matter of the resolution will be submitted to the joint committee for report this session.

Mr. POWER: Only a word in answer to the Prime Minister. I understand that no other member wishes to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: I thought, perhaps, the hon. member was about to withdraw his resolution. Of course, if any other hon. member desires to speak, he should do so now.

Mr. POWER: With reference to the remark of the Prime Minister that it has not been the policy of the Government to permit assignments of any moneys due by governments, I will point out to him that, all during the war, assignments of soldiers' pay were not only permitted but, in fact, enforced. Soldiers were forced to assign their pay, for their own good, it was said, so that, on a matter of principle such as that, the objection would fall to the ground, whereas, in this case the assignment would be simply a voluntary one in what the soldier would consider to be his own interest.

With reference to cheques being returned, it seems to me that the objection of the Prime Minister would disappear. If the cheques were simply transferred from one department to another, we would have less difficulty in reference to returned cheques; there would be less difficulty with reference to wrong addresses of the pensioners, as the cheques would simply be sent from the Board of Pension Commissioners direct to the Department of Returned Soldiers' Insurance. The Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act is a new one, and very few of us are familiar with the details of it. The proposition which I make, although I have already made it to the Pension Commissioners, is perhaps new to a large number of the members of this House, so that, in order to give them occasion to study it, I will cheerfully accede to the request of the Prime Minister, on the understanding that the subject matter of the resolution is to receive further consideration during the session.

9 p.m.

Resolution withdrawn.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWED MOTHERS OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to amend the Act to provide pensions to or in respect of members of the Canadian Naval and Military Air Forces, 1919, so as to provide that the pension of a widowed mother of a member of the forces who has died on active service shall not be reduced on account of her income; and further that pension shall be granted her of right whether or not there are other living children.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as hon. members who have been interested in pensions are doubtless aware, this is by no means a new matter. Since I have been a member of this House, on every occasion on which an opportunity has presented itself, I have brought this subject to the attention of the House of Commons; I have advocated it in committee and on the floor of the House. We have the Pension Act which provides for pensions for disabled ex-soldiers, their dependents, the widows of soldiers, and, to a certain extent, the dependents parents of soldiers. This provision for dependent parents of soldiers is limited in many respects, and, to my mind, it is and has been altogether too limited.

In this resolution I intend to discuss only that phase of the situation which has regard to the widowed mother of a soldier who has been killed overseas. It is my intention that this widowed mother should receive, at the hands of the state, absolutely the same treatment as the actual widow of a soldier killed at the front. There are and have been certain restrictions and limitations to the pensions allotted to the widowed mother. Some of those restrictions I am glad to say, owing to the efforts of those members in the House who have been interested in that class of pensioners, have disappeared. Formerly the widowed mother who earned any money was not allowed to benefit by the Pension Act. We had the sad spectacle of the mother who had given her only son to the cause being obliged, though her age hardly permitted her to work, to engage as scrub woman. This, I am glad to say, has disappeared since the Pension Committee has made the recommendation, which the House has accepted, to the effect that the actual earnings of the widowed mother shall not be taken into account in calculating her pension. But the widowed mother's enjoyment of a pension is limited by statute. By the Pension Act of 1920, it is provided that:

> The pension to any parent or person in the place of a parent shall be subject to review from time to time and shall be continued, increased, decreased or discontinued in accordance with the amount deemed necessary by the Commission to provide a maintenance for such parent or person but in no case shall such pension exceed the amount of pension prescribed for parents in schedule B of this Act.

One great complaint we have had hitherto is that the widowed mother, being limited and restricted with reference to her pension, has had to have this pension revised at different times, and the pension itself has always been subject to review. The result has been that in order to keep these pensions straight, a whole horde of inspectors and visitors comes down on the unfortunate woman who receives a pension. We have had cases of these visitors coming in and questioning the poor widow whether or not she was satisfied with the pension she obtained, and by a series of adroit questions finding out that perhaps the poor woman obtained certain sums from insurance on her late husband or that she owned a little piece of property in some other part of the country, or had a few dollars in the bank. All these things were duly reported to headquarters by the visitor, and headquarters in a large number of cases, I am sorry to say, cut off the pension. There have been numerous complaints as to pensions being cut off in this way; and it is to obviate that difficulty that I am proposing that this pension should not be subject to any review whatsoever, but that once granted it should be granted for good and all. Section 23 of the Pensions Act provides:

> When a parent or person in the place of a parent has unmarried sons residing with him or her who should, in the opinion of the Commission, be earning an amount sufficient to permit them to contribute to the support of such parent or person, each such unmarried son shall be deemed to be contributing not less than ten dollars a month towards such support.

You will note that the statute makes reference only to unmarried sons. Now it was well understood, and I think every member of last year's Pensions Committee will bear me out in this, that in no case was the Act to be interpreted in such a fashion as to allow any deductions to be made from a widow's pension on account of the earnings of any married male member of the family or of any female members of the family. If I remember rightly, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), or the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), last year instanced a case where an amount was deducted from a pension because one of the girl members of the family had earned a certain amount of money by working as a stenographer, and at the time the Chairman of the Committee, the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), indignantly denied that anything was to be deducted from the widow's pension on account of the earnings of any of the female members of the family. If I have given the wrong names or ascribed to any hon. member things he did not say, I hope he will call my attention to it. Now, how does this work out in practice? I had a case to submit during the course of the summer, one among very many, to the Board of Pension Commissioners. I may state in passing that it is not my intention to attack in any way the Board of Pension Commissioners. I consider they have a very difficult duty to ferform, and that on the whole they have performed it well, but I contend that no such discretion should be given to the Board or to any other Government officials as is given under this Act. It has been the experience, I think, with those who have had to do with Government departments that when we give too much discretion to Government officials, they are apt to become very officious, and we are apt to find that their discretion is usually not in the best interests of those whose affiairs they are supposed to administer. However, to return to the point I was discussing. of unmarried sons geing presumed to contribute $10 per month, in this particular case I was informed by the Board as follows:

> According to your letter W is earning $1,200 per annum. J. is undergoing treatment for T. B. C. in the S. C. R.

I might say that in this case three sons were at the war; one is now earning a certain amount of money, another owing to war service is now totally disabled and is undergoing treatment in the S. C. R., and it was suggested by the Board of Pension Commissioners that this gentleman undergoing treatment in the S. C. R. for T. B. C. should support on the allowance he gets from the S.C. R. his widowed mother. I will leave that suggestion with those who took part in the deliberations of the Pensions Committee last year. The Board goes on to state:

> Further, that the income of the home is $1,500 per annum on account of the earnings of the two daughters.

Because the daughters between them were earning $1,500 this widowed mother was not granted the pension to which she would have been entitled under the Act. Now I submit that under the Act mention is made only of deductions on account of the earnings of an unmarried son residing with the parent, and not in the case of those residing elsewhere, and most certainly not from the earnings of daughters who are obliged owing to the family circumstances to earn their living in the world. Further, paragraph (7) provides, and I think the members of the Pensions' Committee will remember that there was considerable discussion of this point last year:

> The pension to a widowed mother shall not be reduced on account of her earnnigs from personal employment or on account of her having free lodgings or so long as she resides in Canada on account of her having an income from other sources which does not exceed two hundred and forty dollars per annum.

The first point is this: If the widowed mother's income exceeds $240 per annum, that is, if she has more than $20 per month. they will have nothing to do with her, they will give her no pension. The widowed mother, in many cases too old to work and utterly incapable of earning her living, is supposed to be able to get along on a measly $20 per month. I submit that in the judgment of this House we should not force these women, who in many cases have lost their only support, to be obliged to live in such fashion.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman is wrong there. I think he must have got a wrong impression from reading the Act. That is not the law at all.

Mr. NESBITT: Quite the contrary.

Mr. POWER: I am very glad if it is not but I am under the impression that it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the $20 is unearned income, that is, if it comes from some source other than her own earnings, it is deducted from the maximum she is entitled to, which is $60, and I understand this is the only country in the world where she gets such a maximum.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have understated it. She may get the $60 in addition to the $20. Up to $20 there is no deduction, but beyond that, if her income is unearned, it may be deducted from the $60. That is the law.

Mr. POWER: As a matter of fact that should be the interpretation of the law. But in the correspondence which I have had with the Board of Pension Commissioners that is not the interpretation which has been given it, and that is why I wish to make the matter perfectly clear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member read the letter?

Mr. POWER: I have four or five letters, but I should not like to go into the details or to give names.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well.

Mr. POWER: I may say, however, that there has been considerable discussion about the matter and I am quite willing to communicate to the Prime Minister the purport of this correspondence. In any case we will suppose that the Prime Minister is right and that the Board of Pension Commissioners do interpret the law in the way they should. I will call the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that section 7 provides that the pension shall not be reduced by reason of earnings so long as the recipient resides in Canada. This would have the effect of precluding all those widowed mothers who reside, let us say, in the United States, in Scotland, or in England. On this point I would remind the Prime Minister that last year during the discussion of the Pensions Bill certain hon. members, for instance, the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), pressed this point to such an extent that the then Prime Minister, the right hon. member for King's (Sir Robert Borden), asked that the section be suspended for some time. After this suspension the Prime Minister returned to the House, whilst the discussion of the Bill was still in progress and stated:

> I shall certainly take into consideration what has been said on this subject by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. I see some force in the observation as to the feeling of irritation which might be created by too close or too frequent inquiries into the private affairs of persons who have lost near relatives in the war.

This refers to the first point.

> But my hon. friends will observe that it will be impossible to change this provision without bringing down another resolution. I hope, therefore, they will be willing to accept my assurance that what they have said in the matter will not be overlooked.

I think that if I had time I could show to the present Prime Minister that the postponement of further consideration of the clause was due, in great part at any rate, to the objections of hon. members on this side as well as across the floor in regard to widowed mothers resident in the United States. Subsection 8 section 23 of the Act says that the pension of a parent or person in place of a parent shall not be reduced on account of the payment of such person of municipal insurance on the life of a deceased member of the forces. I contend that the pension should not be reduced by reason of the payment of any insurance. My contention is that if the deceased young man made his insurance payable to his mother, as in a great many cases good boys do, and paid for it, she should get it and should not have her pension deducted in consequence. As my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) reminds me, such payment would not be deducted in the case of a claim for damages. And though this is not a case of a claim for damages against the country, it is a case in which the country has a solemn obligation to fulfil towards these soldiers and their dependents. When the soldiers went to the war it was definitely promised that their people would be no worse off financially, should they be so unfortunate as to lose their lives in the cause for which the country was fighting, than when they went away, I submit—and this is the whole tenor of my resolution—that the widowed mother should be placed on exactly the same basis as the widow. The widowed mother who lost her son at the front is as a rule well up in years and is unable to earn her living in any way or to increase her income; and it should be the peculiar and special care of the state to look after her. I say that we have possibly a greater obligation towards the widowed mother than towards the widow herself, and it is our duty to see to it that we are not told that the aged mothers of Canadian soldiers are in want or are apt to be in want owing to discriminatory legislation of this Parliament.

I do not think there is very much more that I need say on this subject. I think, however, that it might perhaps have been better to have discussed it on a day when there was a larger attendance of members. But I see a number of those who in the past have supported the object of this resolution, and I hope that this, the fifth session during which I have brought this matter to the attention of the House, will be the last in which I shall have been obliged to argue in favour of this class of dependents who deserve so much from the country.

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London): The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Power) will admit that he and I have fought together on this question through several of the pension committees sitting in former years, and sometimes we were practically alone in our fight in that respect. Now I certainly do not want to say anything to-night that would prejudice or pre-judge the position of the widowed mother. No one could have greater sympathy with her than I have. I cannot forget the remark of one of the Chairmen of patriotic funds who, during the course of the war—said he had yet to find a mother who was not broken-hearted because her son went overseas. But throughout not only our pension legislation but that of every other country has run the difference between a pension to a widow and a pension to dependent parents. The widow as the hon. member has said, gets her pension as of right absolutely independently of what her station in life may be; but the parents of the man who has died have always been called upon to prove, first; that they were supported, or might be supported, by the son who had died, and, second; that their financial position was such that they were really in a dependent position. Once their financial independence was shown their right to a pension ceased. Well, we have improved the position to a certain extent. In the early years of the war the widowed mother only got $22 a month. She gets now, with the bonus awarded during this year, $60 a month. Then she had deducted from her pension her personal earnings. Well, that was corrected. She was, I think, two years ago allowed her personal earnings without any deduction for her pension. Any independent or unearned income which she might receive was deducted from the pension awarded to her; and the Pension Board, as perhaps was their duty, went to some lengths in construing what was an independent income. They held, for instance, that the ownership of a house was equivalent to a certain amout of rental per annum, and while they fixed that rental at a reasonable figure, some $10 or $15 a month, the mother's ownership of that house did result in a reduction in her pension. They also held that if she had sons capable of maintaining her living with her and earning a sufficient income, the duty of maintaining the mother rested on those living sons and that no pension was due. Well, as I say, we corrected some of those things. A widow may now live in her own house and yet we make no reduction from her pension; and as the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) says, if she is in receipt of an independent income up to $20 a month, no deduction is made on account of that income. That is to say she will get $60 a month by way of pension even if she is in receipt of $20 a month of independent income, or $80 a month altogether. If she gets $25 a month independent income, $5 comes off her pension. If she gets $80 a month independent income she gets no pension at all and, to that extent, she is in an absolutely different position from the widow of a soldier. Then we have also provided under the last Act, as has already been explained, that if the mother had sons living with her who, in the opinion of the Pension Board, were capable of supporting her, those sons should be held to be contributing $10 a month toward the support of their mother. If she only had two such sons, and had no independent income, that would be considered to be equivalent to $20 of unearned income and no deduction would be made from her pension; but if she had more than two sons, or if she had an independent income and two sons living with her, then there might be a deduction of income.

[Mr. Cronyn.]

I confess that I am surprised to learn that the Act has been so construed that the earnings of a daughter are deducted or are taken into account. It was certainly not according to my recollection. I have not had the opportunity of looking at the Act recently, but my memory is very clear that so far as the Pension Committee is concerned we only considered and were only considering sons, and the question of daughters or the earnings of daughters never arose.

While one hesitates to mention the question of cost in a matter of this kind I think I should point out to the House that the estimate of the cost of the proposed changes which we made last year—those changes which I have tried to outline—represented an increase of nearly two and a half millions in the annual pension bill of the country. It struck me that that was a very high estimate at the time, but it was the one furnished us by responsible officials and we had to adopt it. I have not yet had any intimation as to how the changes have worked out in actual practise. I believe that we are the only country that has, up to date, made the allowances on behalf of a mother that have been made. As I understand it the greatest amount allowed by any other country to a dependent mother is $48 a month, and all unearned income is deducted from that pension. Perhaps we have not gone far enough yet. I think it is a matter that might very well be again considered if a committee is appointed this session.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): This is a question which I, with the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), have fought for a good many years. I am not considering either what the cost to Canada is, or what any other country does; it is a question of whether Canada has done justice to these women or whether she has not. I agree with the hon. member for Quebec South that there has been a great deal of irritation, too much irritation, by having inspectors unnecessarily visit these women. They go around more or less in disguise, they do not know what they are after, and the first thing the recipients know these widows' pensions are cut off, or reduced, and we do not get any reason for such action until we come down here to the Pension Board at Ottawa. I do not think that is fair. Neither do I think it is fair that there should be any discrimination between widows and widowed mothers. While I do not wish to raise the question of discrimination here,

I would certainly say that if any discrimination were to be made it should be made in favour of the mothers. We all know that these women are older as a class than the wives, and their earning power and capacity in life is diminished, compared with the younger set of women who happen to be left widows. In estimating their dependent condition I think the figures have been set altogether too low. For instance you say that a woman is not entitled to a pension unless she is in a dependent condition, and I admit there is a great deal to be said for that.

But then you come down to set a figure, and you set $240 as the limit. That is to say, I think no deduction should be made —and I moved this in committee once or twice last year—where a woman is in receipt of less than $700 or $800 a year. Considering the cost of living to-day, I do think a woman is dependent if she has not that amount of income, and I think a great deal of this trouble might be eliminated if that standard was raised. I realize, of course, that it would not do to put women enjoying an income of $4,000 or $5,000 on a footing of equality with women who have a very small income, but I think it is altogether too low to set the limit at $240.

I agree with the hon. member for Quebec South that we have to make the administration more a matter of routine, and not leave so much to the discretion of the Board of Pension Commissioners. I have nothing but the highest praised for those commissioners. I have found them at all times considerate and more or less generous, but they do have a faculty of interpreting the regulations in a manner which does not always meet with my approval. As I said before, I think we must eliminate all these irritating conditions. I do not think it is fair to deduct from a married woman's pension $10 a month if she has a boy who is not working or whom she is not able to make work. It is pretty hard for a mother to say to her boy, "You have got to work or get out." Sometimes he is not able to work, and sometimes she is absolutely unable to force him, and in a great many cases she has not the heart to do it. In my opinion these pensions should be made a matter of absolute right. I do not think you can put them on any other ground and do justice to the widows and mothers of the soldiers who died in France. I cannot see why any distinction should be made between a boy's mother and a boy's widow when they were both dependent upon him for a living. I also agree with the hon. member for Quebec South that any insurance they might have coming to them through the generosity of municipalities or firms or societies should not be deducted from their pensions. Surely Canada is big enough and generous enough to pay her own debts to these widows and widowed mothers without taking into consideration such insurance. I hope that this matter will be settled once for all. I think the Pension Committee in the past has succeeded in eliminating nearly all the defects of the Pension Act. Up to a couple of years ago it had many defects, but during the last year I think the committee has worked admirably, and as far as I have been able to find there are to-day very few complaints indeed. Most of them, I am sorry to say, are associated nearly altogether with the medical men. Consciously or unconsciously, they seem to have got into their system some kind of microbe which impels them to screw pensioners down very often to the lowest possible figure. I do not believe that that is in the best interests of Canada, and I do not believe that such action expresses the will of this House, the will of this Government, or the will of the people.

Hon. S. C. MEWBURN (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with many of the suggestions thrown out by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). My sympathy goes out very largely to the widowed mother. I do not think that we should boast of what Canada has done or is doing for her soldiers. I believe it is the desire of this Government and the wish of the people that none of her soldiers' dependents should suffer one iota. When I was Minister of Militia I suggested in this House that the Government should grant to the mothers who had lost their boys in the war a small silver cross, which I designated The Mother's Cross of Sacrifice. To my mind the greatest sacrifice in this war was made by the mothers who reared their boys and sent them to the battlefront. I know of many instances where a widowed mother has suffered more than any one realizes, and is in fact suffering to-day, and will continue to suffer for the rest of her life. While this country has been generous, and while I for one realize that the Board of Pension Commissioners have done herculean work and that complaints have been few and far between, yet I think the commissioners are forgetting one essential fact in the administration of the Act, namely, that they are dealing with human beings.

I think there should be a little more human kindness in the administration. I have every confidence in the Prime Minister's assurance that he proposes to move for the appointment of another committee to go into these various matters this session. The committee appointed last year did magnificent work, of which the soldiers and the country heartily approved, as did also this House. If that committee is reappointed I am confident that what has been brought forward by the hon. member for South Quebec, with a portion of which I entirely agree, will have the most careful and sympathetic consideration and that something will be worked out to meet this situation.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Pension Committee ever since there was a pension committee of this House, I must confess that I think we considered this question at all our meetings. Somebody has said that the widowed mother is always old. I know a great many widowed mothers that are not any older than the widows of our boys, so that that description is not always appropriate.

As to the limit of $240, the Ontario Government recently passed an Act whereby the widow without children gets $30 a month; the widow with one child, $35 a month; the widow with two children, $40 a month; the mother with three children, $45 a month, and the widow with four children, $50 a month. Our pension to the widowed mother was $60 a month with no deduction for her own earnings, but a deduction for unearned income over $240, leaving $80 a month as explained by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn).

I see no reason why, sons, who are unmarried and living at home, should not assist in supporting their mother or their father, for it encourages thrift on the part of the boys, and, after all, it is their duty. If a mother wants to board her son without charging him anything, why that is her or the family's lookout, but the country should not be called upon to be philanthropic to the extent of making good her indulgence or his default. That sort of philanthropy breeds a type of people who are not of much use in this country. Nobody respects the mother more than I do, whether she be a widow or not a widow, and whether she be in this country or in any other country. But we have gone pretty far in the granting of pensions, and if people are economical and try to get on they will find the pensions ample to maintain their families in all decency. Somebody said that the boy who was in a sanitarium was expected to pay something toward the upkeep of his mother, as well as the boy who has been living at home. As I understand it, the boy in the sanitarium is allowed $17 a month for incidental expenses—cigarettes, laundry, and that sort of thing, and the dependent receives $75 a month. No man who is in a sanitarium, no matter where it is located, requires that $75 a month, for he is supplied with everything—nursing, food, and so on.

Mr. POWER: Does my hon. friend think that this $75 a month, granted of right to the soldier who has been disabled by war service, should be applied to the unkeep of his dependent mother?

Mr. NESBITT: I do not see why part of it should not be so applied. If the man is disabled he will be pensioned; if he is in the sanitarium only temporarily and subsequently recovers fully, he will not receive a pension when he comes out; he is expected to earn his living in civil life. I have the greatest sympathy for both the widow and the widowed mother, but there is no use in running away with sentiment; it does not assist either the widow or the widowed mother to become independent, to become a good citizen. I repeat that the boy who leaves home and who will not help to support his mother or his father will never become a good citizen. I see no reason why the Government or the Board of Pension Commissioners should make that deduction of $10 a month. It is a very small amount. After all, the pensions throughout are generous. However, this is a question which should be brought before the Pension Committee, if it is going to be appointed, and thrashed out by them; then if the House does not agree with the report of that Committee, the matter can be further discussed here.

Mr. T. M. M. TWEEDIE (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support the resolution of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). I could never see any justification for a distinction between the pension payable to the widow and wife of the soldier and that payable to the widowed mother. It seems to me that the test is whether the pension is payable as a matter of right or as a matter of dependency. We must adopt either of these two principles as applicable to both class of cases. We have adopted the principle that the widow or wife of the soldier is entitled to pension as a matter of right, and we endeavour to ascertain what amount will be sufficient to enable her to live comfortably and decently during the time she is in receipt of that pension. We should apply the same principle to the widowed mother and grant her the pension as a matter if right, as in the case of the widow.

The member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) contends that if we pay these sums to widowed mothers as a matter of right, there will be a tendency to breed in this country a class of people entirely dependent upon the Government for support. But if he stands by that argument he must also apply it to the widow or wife of the soldier who was killed at the front, because many a man who was killed at the front left behind him sons who are just as capable of supporting his widow—their mother—as the brothers of a man killed overseas are capable of supporting their widowed mother. I think it is simply a matter of right that the widowed mother should be classed with the widow of the soldier, and that pensions should be paid to her without any deductions on account of insurance or other income from independent sources. When the Committee are considering this question they can bear in mind the opinions which have been expressed in the House tonight in connection with the matter, and if they do I should think that they they would bring in a report along the lines I have suggested. Should they fail to do so the House will be at liberty to deal with the matter on a subsequent occasion. I have much pleasure in supporting the arguments which have been submitted to the House by the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in supporting the views of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). This is a question which has been before the Pension Committee for some time. I believe that in every case the widowed mother should be treated in just the same way as the dependent widow. There is another question in connection with this matter which has come to my mind during the progress of the debate, and that is the position of the woman who marries the returned soldier who dies subsequent to his injury from any cause. As the member for Muskoka rightly said, our medical men are apt to interpret the law very closely, and in many cases the widow of a returned soldier is left without any assistance from the Government simply because she married a soldier after his return to Canada. We find that men who returned to Canada 90 or 75 or 60 per cent. disabled receive for themselves, their wives and children, an amount of pension proportionate to their disability, while the wife of the soldier, whom she married after his return to Canada and who subsequently died, receives nothing. These aspects of the question should be taken into consideration by the Committee and reported upon favourably.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to let this opportunity pass without again expressing my sympathy with the object of the resolution moved by the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). I have, on two or three previous occasions, spoken very strongly in favour of the utmost liberality as regards the treatment of the widowed mother of a soldier. While her pension has been improved in many respects, I feel it is hardly yet as liberal as I should like to see it. I admire the spirit that actuates the hon. member for Oxford North (Mr. Nesbitt) in keeping down the expenses of the country as far as possible—and, perhaps, there are too few of us who take that course—but I feel that in the present case the committee have not yet been over liberal. I know of a few cases in which hardship has resulted. I have always taken the ground—and I do not see any reason for changing it—that when men have died, as these men have, in the interest of this country and the Empire, we owe them a different debt from that which we may owe to any other class of citizens. The hon. member for Oxford North has related what has been done in Ontario with regard to pensions for widows, but it ought to be remembered that the widows who are provided for by the Ontario Act have become widows by an act of Providence.

Mr. NESBITT: What about the others? Was that not an act of Providence?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Just a moment. The one has become a widow by an act of Providence, and in the other case the soldier has died in the service of his country. I consider that there is a greater responsibility upon the country when a man dies in its service than there is in the case of a man who has died without giving any particular service to his country. I hope, of course, all citizens do some service to their country, and I do not say they do not; but this country owes a certain debt to the man who has died at the front or on account of illness that he has contracted at the front, by reason of the sacrifice that has been made, and if we cannot pay that debt to the man, we can pay it to the widow. There is quite a strong difference, and deductions should not be made by reason of the earnings of the widowed mother.

Mr. NESBITT: They are not.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Yes, they are. I remember a case that I have brought up two or three times before the Pension Board and it is not yet settled. Because the widow has up to the present been able to earn a fairly good living, she is denied a pension. The late member for York-Sunbury (Mr. McLeod) also brought up the same matter and, so far as I know, it has never been settled because the widow is able to earn a certain amount in a banking institution, and if the amount is above the specific amount that has been named, nothing is done. They tell her that if she finally becomes incapacitated so that she cannot work, her case will be taken into consideration, but not as long as she can earn what is possibly a fairly good living for a widow. She is, however, working beyond her years, and the day will soon be at hand when she cannot continue to work. The country owes a debt to that widow whether she is willing and able to go out and earn her daily bread or not; she may wish to lay up something for a rainy day, and the country should not be so severe in making deductions from the pension of a widow simply because she is able to earn a certain amount for her sustenance. I speak very strongly in this connection. I know the hon. member for Oxford North does not agree with me—and I am sorry for that because I esteem his judgment as very valuable—but at the same time I believe, if he opens up his heart-strings a little more, the country will not find fault with him in that respect. I believe in being absolutely generous to the widows and widowed mothers of returned soldiers. If we do anything to lighten the burden and to make them forget some of the sad loss that they have sustained as a result of this war, we are doing what is simply our duty and the most liberal treatment we can give is not too much in connection with the resolution that my hon. friend (Mr. Power) has put on the Order Paper. I am pleased to add a word on behalf of this matter and I trust, if a committee is appointed, this matter will be further considered and I am sure it will meet the views of a large number of the members of this House if even more generous treatment is given to the widows and widowed mothers of returned soldiers.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) is to be congratulated on having presented this matter to the House in such a form as to win, as it has, a large measure of sympathy from hon. members. I have such a high appreciation of the work done by the committee that sat during the last two years under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), that I would be reluctant to see any change made in the matter of pensions without having the matter first submitted to the committee. I hope from the expressions of opinion given by hon. members this evening that the committee will be able to concur in the case presented by the hon. member, but, at all events, an opportunity will be given for considering it. I know the object of these deductions, and it is a good one. The idea is that you do not want to pay pensions to people who do not need them. That is a very commendable object; but if we have regard to the number of pensions generally, are there enough cases of that kind to make it worth while to make that regulation? In making these deductions with the resultant worry and interference, is the game worth the candle? The number of wealthy people in Canada is not very great; in this country wealth is fairly equally and comfortably distributed—and that is better than a few people having the wealth as is the case in some countries—so that if you had no deductions at all, the number of widows who would get a pension and who did not need it, would not be very large, and if they got a little more, no great harm would be done. The suggestion of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. P. McGibbon) is that, unless it can be shown that the widow is in receipt of a very substantial sum from other quarters, the wise policy would be to have no deductions at all. I would suggest to the hon. member for Quebec South that, having made the progress he has in the good work, he consent to let the matter go to the committee and bring it up at a later date, if that be necessary.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it affords me a great deal of pleasure to join with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in congratulating the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Powers) upon the manner in which he has brought his motion forward, and upon the reception with which his presentation of it has been met. There is no doubt that the case of the widowed mother is one that appeals most strongly to the sympathies of all of us. I am sure that we would all desire that every means should be taken to prevent its happening that any mother who has lost her son in the service of this country should be left in any condition approaching even to want. Of course, when you come to carry out your desires, there are some considerations that have to be borne in mind, because, after all, you have to arrive at some definite sum. Some consideration ought to be given to equality. While you may avoid laying down an absolute rule as to what particular amount of income, independent of other sources than the pension, should lead to deductions being made from a pension, still, it does rather appeal to one that a good deal is to be said against granting pensions to people with regard to whom it is absolutely impossible to suggest that there can be any need. It has occurred to me, listening to the discussion, that one way of meeting the situation, and perhaps a fairer way—I am not expressing any conclusion; this is only what occurred to me—might lie in the direction of increasing the maximum amount of sixty dollars that is to be given as a pension, rather than in directing one's attention solely to the question of what deductions, if any, ought to be made.

However, I do not desire to express any final opinion on the subject this evening. I think the hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power) can rest assured that the matter will engage the serious, and I do not think I would be going too far in saying, the sympathetic attention of the committee. I would join with my hon. friend from Shelburn and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in asking the hon. member for South Quebec, if with the assurance that the matter will be brought to the attention of the committee, and seriously, and carefully, and I think I may say, sympathetically looked into by them, he might not think it proper at the present time to withdraw his motion.

Mr. THOMAS W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton, N.B.): As a member of last year's Pension Committee it would probably not be amiss for me to say a word in this discussion. I supported the hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power) when he moved this resolution before the Pension Committee last year. When the resolution was defeated in the committee it was only by a very small majority, and I felt at the time, and still feel, that if the whole committee had been present when the vote was taken it would have carried.

There is one other case I wish to bring to the notice of the House and of the committee, and it is that of the widow of the soldier who was wounded or disabled overseas and who marries after his return to Canada. His widow is absolutely denied a pension under the present Act. I would like to see this injustice to the large number of widows of returned soldiers who have married subsequent to their disability remedied this session. I also agree with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) that the sum of $240 per annum is too small an amount of income to allow before deductions are made from the pension. I fully agree with my hon. friend from Muskoka that no deduction should be made from the widow's pension on an unearned income of less than $700 or $800 a year. In view of the fact that a pension committee is to be appointed this year, I think it would be the part of wisdom for my hon. friend from South Quebec to let this matter go before that committee, and I think there is very little question that these matters will be remedied in accordance with his resolution.

Mr. DANIEL D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): There is just one phase of this subject that I should like to bring to the notice of the House, and particularly of the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn), who was chairman of the Pension Committee last year and who in the natural course of events will be chairman this year if another committee is appointed. I appreciate very much the forceful and very proper way in which the hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power) has placed the subject before the House, and I am sure the discussion that has taken place, and the experiences that several members have given, will be of assistance to the committee when they come to consider these questions.

There is one point I would like to impress upon the House, and that is in connection with the deductions that are made from the pension in cases where there happen to be two or more sons. I know that in the part of the country from which I come there are many cases where there are perhaps one or two sons who should support their mother, but who will not, and what is the good of throwing the impossible burden on the widow of compelling these boys to support her? There are lots of boys who will not do so, and unless they are supporting their mother voluntarily and freely, it is not right to say that the mother shall suffer because they are not doing their duty. In cases of that kind, where the widowed mother cannot increase her income except by what her boys might give, I would certainly say to the House and to the committee, whoever they may be, that they might very well leave out of consideration making any deduction from the pension of the widow.

Mr. NESBITT: May I ask whether these boys live at home with the mother?

Mr. McKENZIE: In some cases they do and perhaps in a niggardly way pay their board. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) knows that boys sometimes take advantage of their mother when they are boarding and rooming with her that they would not take of other people, and will not pay as much for their board as they would have to pay elsewhere. I know cases of that kind, where the mother has to do the washing, for instance, and give the board cheaper than the boys could get it elsewhere. The boys will pay just the amount they were paying before prices went up, and the mother is the loser. That is all the profit she gets from boarding her boys. I do not wish to give a bad name to the people in my part of the country, but there are cases of that kind, and I think I am more than justified in bringing them to the attention of the committee. I repeat that the committee should leave out their consideration making deductions from the pension of a widow who has sons who might support her, but who are not doing so.

I wish particularly to bring to the notice of the House the case of some widows who are not receiving a pension at all, and so far as I know, have not received any consideration from the Government so far. It is within the knowledge of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Guthrie), the exminister (Mr. Mewburn), and other members of this House that at certain stages of the war, in 1915, 1916, and perhaps later, this Government engaged some steamers to carry supplies to the old country, iron and steel, for instance, from Sydney, for the purposes of the war on the other side of the water. These steamers were engaged for that war service, and I have one particularly in mind at the present moment, the "Sharon," owned, I think, in Quebec. She was chartered by the Department of Railways and Canals, loaded with steel at Sydney, and started for the other side of the water, but she never got across. The belief is that she was torpedoed. At all events, she never reached the other side, and all on board were lost. Sixteen or seventeen, perhaps twenty, widows were left in my town by reason of the loss of the "Sharon." Now if the steamer was torpedoed, and there being no evidence to the contrary it is not a great stretch of the imagination to believe she was, while engaged by the Government of this country for the purposes of the war, these men lost their lives by reason of the war, and it does not take very close reasoning to show that their widows are entitled to some consideration at the hands of the people of this country, and of this Parliament. I would like to have cases of this kind kept in mind by the committee when they come to consider the other features that have been brought to their notice. These steamers that were chartered were not war vessels, but they were used for the purpose of carrying supplies to be used for war purposes, and while the "Sharon" was so engaged these men lost their lives by reason of the unsafe condition of navigation. I would urge that as just as good a case for consideration by the committee as if the men had been killed at the front.

Mr. POWER: It has been alleged during the course of this discussion, or at least it has been suggested, that in some cases the widowed mother obtained more than the widow herself and that she should be very well off with the sum of, say, $80 per month. Now, I am not asking for $80, I simply ask that she be given $60 per month in exactly the same way as the widow obtains it, and without there being any deduction whatsoever. I ask that she be given it of right, that there be no question as to whether she has a house, as to whether she lives in the house which she owns, whether she is keeping a boarding-house or has turned it into an apartment house, deriving an income therefrom, whether she has a few dollars in the bank, or whether a few dollars were left to her from insurance, or any other consideration of that kind. The point I wish to make quite clear to the House is that to my mind, the widowed mother of the soldier is entitled to be placed by this country in exactly the same position as the widow of the soldier. I have been told also that we should encourage the widowed mother to become independent. It seems to me that the mother of a boy who has been killed at the front has usually reached an age when it is no business of the country to try to encourage her to become independent; it is rather its duty to see that she is independent. We are not going to set up a school to teach the elderly women who have sacrificed their all in the great war how to become independent in this country. There is no question to my mind of the opinion of the House on this matter, I think that every hon. member will agree with me that this is no time to bring this question before the House. What the province of Ontario does with regard to mothers' pensions is one matter. I do not care what it does. But what the Dominion of Canada does with regard to the mothers of the sons whom she sent to the front is a matter with which we are all concerned. We have our pledged word to these boys; we have our pledged word in the face of the whole Dominion of Canada; and it seems to me that the least a House of Commons such as this, elected during the war and in the war spirit, can do is to keep its war pledges.

Now, I have been asked to allow this matter to be referred to committee. As I said before, for four years I have been fighting the case of the widowed mothers, and have spoken in furtherance of it in committee; and on each occasion, I am sorry to say, the committee refused to bring in a favourable report. Last year, I submitted this identical resolution, which a number of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House and to my left supported. It was referred to the Pension Committee, amidst, I may say, the acclamation of the entire House of Commons. But when the Pension Committee reported they were too busy reporting on other things to have anything to say in favour of the widowed mother, except for a very small amendment to the law as it stood. And when, not being satisfied with the decision of the Pension Committee, either last year or the year before, I carried the matter to the floor of the House, where it was discussed, I was told first that if this point were to be insisted upon, The whole matter would have to be referred back to the committee and in that event it would be held up because the committee would not have time to report before the end of the session. This has been the case for two or three years in succession. Whenever the report of the Pension Committee came in, we who wished to critise or amend it or to refer it back to the committee were told: Well, we are very willing to help you, and you are possibly right in what you say, but if you oppose this committee's report, no report at all will be brought in and the pensioners will not have the benefit of these provisions. Last session, in spite of this objection made by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), I insisted on pushing the matter and I desired to bring it to the vote. On asking the Chair to put the question to the vote, however, I was ruled out of order because, had the law been amended in the direction I proposed, it would have been necessary first to obtain a resolution of the House, as there was involved the question of voting larger sums from the exchequer. This has happened in two years. Now, I have no guarantee that it will not happen again. There is no guarantee that the Pension Committee's report will not be brought down in the dying days of the session and that the Government will not say again: Unless you accept this report and swallow it holus-bolus the pensioners will be deprived of the benefit thereof. And there is equally no guarantee that if I insist on bringing this amendment before the House it will not again be ruled out of order. As a matter of fact, it should be ruled out of order if the chairman of the committee did his duty properly, so that I should be absolutely without recourse. We have a proposition which has been received by the House with enthusiasm for two, three and four years, and every time we came to what I might call a show-down the matter was thrown out.

Mr. ARTHURS: Did the hon. member ever bring that proposition to a vote in this House?

Mr. POWER: In order to explain more fully to the hon. gentleman, who has evidently not understood what I have been talking about for the last five minutes, I will tell him that last year I endeavored to bring the matter to a vote but that it was thrown out by the chairman on the ground that I was not in order in proposing that further moneys be voted from the Crown at the request of a private member without a resolution of the House.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. member was a member of the committee whose actions he is complaining of, but he did not bring in a minority report.

Mr. POWER: I will answer that question too. For the last three years, on every occasion when the committee brought in a report, I have objected to the omission of any provision for the widowed mother. On every occasion when the matter has been brought before this House I have insisted on these provisions such as I have advocated to-night being placed in the bill. And if the hon. gentleman had the interest of the pensioners and their dependents so much at heart, as I am sure he should have—and as I am sure he would have but for the fact that probably he is under—

Mr. ARTHURS: You are not answering the question.

Mr. POWER: What is your question?

Mr. ARTHURS: Have you brought in any minority report?

Mr. POWER: I did on one occasion bring in a minority report, but I was all alone on this question, and not having had any satisfaction in introducing such a report, I proposed, with the consent and, I think, with the knowledge of all members of the committee to debate this matter on the floor of the House. And as a matter of fact I did debate it on the floor of the House. It is no new question and the hon. gentleman ought to know that. Speaking frankly, I am somewhat reluctant to agree to the request made by the Minister of Justice and my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). Another reason is that personally I am under the impression that the returned soldiers have no longer very much faith in this Pension Committee. I rather think that in the past few years they have been looking at the Pension Committee and the Committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment as a means of thwarting what they consider to be their legitimate desires. Last year we had somewhat of a tempest in a teapot but we saw at that time what the true feelings of the soldiers were with reference to the Pension Committee. I am willing to do my best for the returned soldiers at any time, but I will certainly not sit on the committee another year. I know that on several occasions during the proceedings of the committee last year, the soldier vote was defeated by an almost entirely civilian vote; and if that is to happen again—and it might very well happen on this very question—I do not see any necessity or any reason why the committee should sit another year. I have on every possible occasion placed my views on this important matter before the committee and before the House, and I do not think I could serve any useful purpose by sitting on the committee another year. Nevertheless, I have to bear in mind that if this question were not referred to a committee at the present time my proposition might be defeated, and in all likelihood would result in a worse condition for the poor people whom I am endeavouring to benefit. I am strongly desirous of furthering the cause of the widowed mothers, and if it were left to my own feelings in the matter I would say, "Let us come to a show-down and see whether those who have been telling us so much about their interest in the returned soldiers and their dependents will prove their interest by their votes on the question when put to them in a fair and straightforward manner." However it seems to be the opinion of those who are better versed in parliamentary matters than I am, that more good may perhaps be obtained by referring this question again to a committee; that there may be a better chance of the committee this year seeing things in their true light than has been the case in the past three or four years. Therefore, at the request of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, for whose opinion I maintain the highest respect, I beg leave to withdraw the motion.

[Mr. Arthurs.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw the motion?

Motion withdrawn.

On motion of Right Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

Tuesday, March 8, 1921.

The House met at three o'clock.

GERMAN REPARATION—CANADA'S CLAIM—THE EXISTING SITUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PAMPHILE REAL DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to know, in view of the situation in Europe at the present time between the Allies and Germany, whether the Government intends to take proper steps to ensure the indemnity which Canada was supposed to be entitled to, or which, at any rate, we hoped to receive from Germany.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): There is no statement I can make just now having particular reference to reparations, other than such as applies to the general question of reparations, which of course is in the hands of the Supreme Allied Council. This matter was referred to yesterday in more general terms by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) when enquiry was made whether a statement could not be given to the House as to the condition of affairs consequent upon the demand for distinct reparation proposals from Germany by that Supreme Council, and the unsatisfactory response thereto. As I said yesterday, continual communication passes between the British Government and ourselves as to the principal occurrences of the Supreme Allied Council. Those communications are marked "Secret", but I see no objection to stating in the House such of them as in certain form have already reached the press. The only result will be of course to give something in the nature of official confirmation to these facts. It will be remembered that the Supreme Allied Council met, in January last, in Paris, in order to formulate proposals for submission to Germany on the question of reparations. An adjournment was made to London, and the meeting there took place last week. The proposals which Germany was asked to make were not at all as to the amount of reparations but rather as to the methods by which she should undertake to make good the call for reparations. At such meeting in London Germany undertook to lay a statement of her methods before the Supreme Allied Council, but she added thereto, or made a part thereof, proposals as to the amount of reparations as well, which, in the judgment of the Council, were not only wholly inadequate but constituted a challenge to the foundation of the Treaty itself; in a word, an intimation that it was not the intention of Germany to abide by the terms of the Treaty. That being the case, Germany was informed through the British Prime Minister that there was nothing in her proposals that could form even a basis for discussion and that she would be advised as to what steps would be taken in order to enforce the provisions of the Treaty itself. Consequently, Germany was advised, in brief, as follows: First, that a small area on the right bank of the Rhine would be occupied; second, that it was intended to deduct from moneys owing Germany from outside countries for German goods a certain proportion applicable to the Reparations Account; and third, that control would be taken of the customs in all occupied territory. These intentions were submitted to the German representatives and, failing any adequate proposals on their part up to noon of yesterday, the Allied proposals became operative at that hour. It will be observed that there is nothing in the programme which involves an increase of the forces now occupying German territory for its enforcement and, as well, that no Canadian troops are engaged. I do not feel that there is anything more than I can say at the present time, except that no specific proposal as to co-operation is before us.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST TYPHUS, ETC.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): In view of the very widespread prevalence of typhus fever in Eastern Europe, and in view also of the fact that within the last day or two cases of the disease have been found among immigrants arriving at the ports of Boston and New York, I would ask the Minister of Immigration and Colonization to state to the House what precautions are being taken to prevent the introduction of this disease into Canada.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I am not aware of all the details of the situation, but I can assure the House that every precaution is being taken at the present time to prevent the introduction into Canada not only of typhus but of one or two other epidemic diseases that are very prevalent in certain parts of Europe at the present time. As a matter of fact the countries of Western Europe are all keenly alive to the situation—that is to say, Great Britain, France, Italy, Spain and other nations—and they are taking every precaution to prevent the spreading of these diseases from Eastern to Western Europe. As far as my information goes there are but few cases of typhus at present at the quarantine stations at Boston and New York—very few cases. Only one case—which is located at Massena, in New York State—has broken loose. That case is under strict observation, and every precaution is being adopted to prevent the disease from spreading further. I may also state that we have stationed three of our officers at New York to study the conditions there and make themselves thoroughly acquainted with the steps being taken by the American authorities to prevent the spread of these diseases in the United States. In addition to that our own officers are very keenly alive to the situation and very strict instructions have been issued to the officers in our own ports to exercise every vigilance. At the present time not a single case of this disease has landed at any port in Canada and, as I have already said, very few in the United States. I can assure the hon. gentleman and the House that the officers of the Health Department are thoroughly alive to the importance of taking every means to prevent these diseases from entering Canada, and are co-operating to that end with the American authorities and our Provincial Health Officers.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DESAULNIERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ARTHUR L. DESAULNIERS (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the Montreal Gazette of to-day I am reported as having placed on the Order Paper a resolution seeking to suspend immigration into this country. I wish to state that I am not the author of the resolution to which the Montreal Gazette refers, and that if this resolution is brought up for discussion in this House I will oppose it.

ESTIMATES FOR 1921-1922

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the year ending March, 31st, 1922 was presented by Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the Committee of Supply.

REINSTATEMENT OF MR. ALEXANDER JOHNSTON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I would like to ask the Government whether the statement appearing in the newspapers that Mr. Alexander Johnston has returned to the public service is correct, and if so, what his status will be in the Department of Marine and Fisheries?

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): In answer to the hon. member I desire to state that Mr. Alexander Johnston has been reinstated in his former position as Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

EXCHEQUER COURT AMENDMENT ACT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill No. 19, to amend the Exchequer Court Act be read the third time.

Motion agreed to. Bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT

Resuming debate on the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Doherty for the second reading of Bill No. 17, to define Canadian Nationals, adjourned from March 4.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): As I explained to the House when this matter was up last it is my intention, when we get into committee, to propose amendments to the definition of a Canadian National as set forth in the Bill. As that definition constitutes practically the entire Bill, I quite recognize the importance of the changes which I have in contemplation. I have asked to have the Bill as proposed to be amended printed and circulated, and I believe that has been carried out. I was informed this morning that it had been printed, and last evening I handed to the leader of the Opposition a number of copies of the Bill as proposed to be amended. I trust that under those circumstances there has been opportunity for hon. gentlemen to take communication of the amendments. Upon what may be called the principle of the Bill, it seems to me that very little is called for beyond the explanation which was given at the first reading. What needs to be clearly understood at the outset—I think it is perhaps scarcely necessary for me to mention this, but it is well to avoid any misapprehension—is that the Bill does not contemplate to in any way affect the status or position of any Canadian as a British subject. Notwithstanding its enactment we shall all remain, of course, British subjects; and under the definition as proposed nobody will be a Canadian national who is not a British subject. But the purpose of the Bill is to define a particular class of British subjects who, in addition to having all the rights and all the obligations of British subjects, have particular rights because of the fact that they are Canadians. I think we have always understood that without a specific statutory definition there has for a long time been such a person as a Canadian, and some outstanding indications which justify a man in claiming to be a Canadian. But we have reached a stage now where there are certain specific rights created in favour of Canadians, or, to use the expression in the Bill, of Canadian nationals, as such, and should the legislation which this House last year asked to have passed by the British Parliament clearing up any doubt as to the extra-territorial effect of our legislation be enacted, as I have every reason to believe it will be, it will then be important to have a clear-cut definition of who are the people who may be affected by that legislation.

I might give an outstanding instance of where we have rights created in favour of Canadian nationals the provisions of the Convention establishing the permanent Court of International Justice. Under those provisions—which I have no doubt will meet with the approval of this House when the Convention is brought down—the judges of that court are to be elected by the representatives of the different members of the League. To secure election, it is essential that a candidate or aspirant should have a majority of the votes both of the Council and of the Assembly. Each country, member of the League, has a right, —a right not to be exercised directly by its government, but in the manner which I will point out in a moment—to nominate candidates. Each country proceeding in the manner to which I have referred is entitled to nominate four candidates; not more than two, however, of those candidates can be Nationals of the nominating country. So there we have a case where we need to distinguish between a National and a non-National of the nominating country.

Mr. BUREAU: Will the minister allow me a question? He states that a distinction has to be made between a Canadian national and a Canadian citizen. Is it on account of the League of Nations that the word "national" is used?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have already a definition of a Canadian citizen in the Immigration Act, but that definition is expressly limited to the Act itself, and we have no definition of a Canadian citizen which can be of general application.

Mr. BUREAU: That is not exactly what I had in my mind.

Mr. DOHERTY: I know, but I wanted to make that clear. There is a reason for using the word "national" rather than the word "citizen." It is to be found in this, that in the particular convention to which I referred and in the general proceedings of the League the word "national" is used as designating a person, whether subject or citizen, who forms part of the people of a particular member of the League. I am not certain that "national" is perhaps the most desirable word for England, but the word used in the French version of those proceedings by which the word "national" in our Bill should be translated is the word "ressortissant." I think the idea of using that word was to avoid the necessity of making distinctions between people who are subjects or citizens of a country and to get one word that, whatever the national designation, would cover the class of people who constitute the people of that country.

M. BUREAU: Le mot "ressortissant," est-il celui employé dans les procédures officielles de la Société des nations?

Mr. DOHERTY: Oui, le mot est celui employé. But perhaps I had better proceed in English. In the official documents this word "ressortissant" is used. You may have to talk of the "subject" of one country and of the "citizen" of another country, but in "ressortissant" you get one word for them all. We passed considerable time with some very distinguished French gentlemen and some equally distinguished English gentlemen trying to find an English word that would be an exact translation of "ressortissant."

Mr. BUREAU: Do they use the word "national" in the English translation?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, the word "national" is taken as the translation of the word "ressortissant." It seems further desirable that in making the definition we should use the term which is employed in these documents, because, after all, what we want to do, so far as that is a particular reason for this measure, is to have a clear-cut definition of who is the person who, as being a national of Canada, is entitled to these rights.

There is to be found in the convention a further reason for having this clear-cut definition. There is a provision in the convention that if two or more candidates, nationals of the same member of the League, should be elected judges, the question of which of these should be the judge is to be determined—and it is perhaps consoling to those of us who are not as young as we at one time were—in favour of the gentleman who counts the largest number of years to his credit. But it is obviously important that we should be able to establish just who is a Canadian national, so that it may not be suggested that, if another British subject is elected and one of our men is elected, that would be a case of the election of two men who are nationals of the same member of the League. I may say that the convention as originally drafted might have been open to that suggestion, but at the instance of the representatives of Canada, among others, the wording was modified so as to make it quite clear that this question of one giving way to the other would not arise when there were elected not merely two nationals of the British Empire, but two nationals of the same member of the League. That is another instance in which we have the creation of a right in favour of the Canadian national. The recognition that each member of the League has nationals of its own being once made so clear, it seems to me only a natural thing, even if there were no other reason for it, that this country should take the responsibility of defining who its nationals are, and that is what this Bill proposes to do. As I said at the outset, there is no question of modifying in any way the position and status of us all as British subjects. The purpose of the Bill is only to define a particular class of British subjects—a class who have the peculiar quality of being that kind of British subjects who are nationals of Canada. As to the details, I assume we would deal with them better in committee. But speaking in a general way, if hon. gentlemen will look at the Bill they will see that the provisions defining "Canadian national", in the first place make such a Canadian national every British subject who come swithin the definition of a Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act. In addition, a provision is made with regard to certain classes of persons which follows the principles upon which the question of the quality of British subject is determined by the British Nationality Act, which we also have enacted. The definition of "Canadian citizen" in the Immigration Act limits the quality, so far as that quality results from birth, to the person born in Canada. In addition to the person born in Canada this Bill proposes to enact that the son of a Canadian national born while his father is a Canadian national, even though he be born outside of Canada, shall be a Canadian national. All hon. gentlemen will agree that if any one of us found himself in the unfortunate position of being absent from Canada temporarily with his family at a time when a child was born to him, he would want that child to be as full-fledged a Canadian as he is himself.

There is also a provision that the wife of a Canadian national shall be a Canadian national. With regard to persons such as the child in question, whose quality of Canadian national results from the fact of his paternity, though he was born elsewhere, there is a provision analogous to that which is found in the British Nationality Act, conferring upon such a child, if he should be entitled to nationality in any other British dominion, the privilege of renouncing his Canadian nationality. There is no need of providing for what will happen if he is entitled to become and desires to become the subject of some other country, because that is already covered in the British Nationality and Naturalization Act. Of course, if a man ceases to be a British subject he necessarily ceases to be a Canadian national.

Mr. EULER: In the case of men who were naturalized while they were minors, because of the fact that their fathers were naturalized, but who under the present Franchise Act have no vote unless they obtain a voting certificate—are they considered Canadian nationals under this Bill, even if they have not that certificate?

Mr. DOHERTY: Anybody who is a British subject and who was born in this country or who has domicile in this country as described in the Immigration Act, is a Canadian national. This proposed legislation, of course, has nothing to do with the franchise. I do not know what action may be taken in the future; the franchise may or may not be granted to all Canadian nationals, that depends upon the legislation of this Parliament on the question of the franchise. The Bill does not deal with any particular rights that are to belong to Canadian nationals; it is concerned simply with the making of a definition. The question as to what rights should belong to them or whether there should be differences between different classes, either as to the franchise or as to any other matter, is a thing that would have to be dealt with in separate legislation.

There is also provision for the case where a child is by reason of his birth a Canadian national, but by reason of his parentage or for some other reason, may at the time of his birth or later become entitled to recognition as a national of some other part of the Empire; the same privilege is given to him to make the declaration whereby he would cease to be a Canadian national. Both these classes follow absolutely the principle laid down with regard to the quality of British subject in the Act dealing with British nationality.

Mr. EULER: I would like to ask the minister another question.

Mr. DOHERTY: Might I suggest that questions will come more regularly and could be better dealt with when we go into committee on the Bill? Of course, I am precluded now from saying anything more on this reading save by way of reply to close the debate.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I regret that, from my point of view, with which all may not agree, this is another step in the wrong direction. When a false step is taken, it leads to another false step, and the first one having been taken, the second, perhaps, becomes unavoidable, and that is possibly the situation to-day. The word "National", as a noun, would be properly and fairly interpreted in the language of international affairs as a citizen of a sovereign State. Hitherto, we have all been glad to be British nationals. Canada is not a sovereign State; I do not want it to become a sovereign State, and I claim the expression "Canadian national" is rather difficult to be understood. This is, however, a step in the wrong direction; I do not expect to correct it, and I am satisfied simply to express my opinion.

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): Mr. Speaker, if I understand aright the explanation of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), this legislation has become necessary in order to define membership in the League of Nations. The word "ressortissant", which has been translated by "national", must mean that a man, although not, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has stated, a member of an independent nation or of a sovereign State, has a voice in the League of Nations and must be more particularly identified. That is the reason why the expression "Canadian national" is used to translate the word "ressortissant", to show that the man belongs to one of the Dominions, that is, Canada. This Act on the statute books comes, comme un cheveu sur la soupe, an Act to define Canadian nationals. Might I suggest that, in order to facilitate the understanding of this legislation in the future, we put a preamble to it, stating in as few words as possible the explanation which has just been given by the Minister of Justice? I might suggest these words: That whereas it has become necessary, for the purpose of the better working of the League of Nations where Canada has a voice as a separate entity to define the status of the members who appear in the League of Nations as representing Canada, this legislation should be enacted defining these representatives as Canadian nationals —comme ressortissant de la nation canadienne, comme bon semblera. In that way, it will be seen in years to come why this legislation was enacted. In a few years the world will, perhaps, become normal again, and the next generation or the generation succeeding that will possibly be at a loss to know how this legislation came on the statute book unless some explanation is given by the preamble.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères): (Translation). Mr. Speaker, in the French version of the Bill, these words "Nationaux Canadiens" are incorrectly given as a translation for the English "Canadian Nationals." The definition given of these people in paragraph "B" is as follows:

(b) British subjects who ordinarily reside in Canada although not domiciled there.

I should like to know from the right hon. minister whether British subjects residing in India, in South Africa and even in China may be termed "Canadian Nationals."

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. member will allow me, I am afraid he is reading from the Bill as it was originally introduced.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I explained the matter and I am responsible for the confusion. I am surprised we have not the Bill before us as reprinted, because I gave most special instructions and it was reported to me early this forenoon—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: (Translation.) I am surprised myself but can we continue the discussion if we have not the Bill before us?

Right Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: (Translation.) I said, at the outset of my remarks, that in case some hon. members would deem it advisable, I would not insist on proceeding with the Bill, but how could I possibly make such a suggestion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am out of order, I am afraid, but I only want to make the suggestion that questions of this kind seem to be questions that should properly be dealt with in committee. The difficulty is that I am being asked questions and I am not entitled to answer. If, when we go into committee on the Bill, any hon. gentleman feels that he is under a disadvantage by reason of this unfortunate accident, I certainly shall not insist on pressing the Bill through.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I submit we should not discuss a Bill that we do not have before us.

Mr. DOHERTY: All right.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising now is not to take exception to the principle of the Bill, but rather to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) to the form in which the Government is introducing its legislation. This is the second important Bill to which, after its introduction, the Government has presented an amendment much more substantial in its nature than the provisions of the Bill itself, with the result that we on this side of the House are expected to discuss a measure, the provisions of which we have not seen and with which we are not familiar. It is quite true the Minister of Justice last night presented me with a copy of the amendment he purposes moving to the Bill, but the amendment is a more substantial measure than the Bill itself. While I have been favoured with a number of copies, there has been no opportunity for members on this side to consider the matter, and, what I think is equally important, there has been no opportunity for the country to become familiar with the measure which my right hon. friend has introduced. We should have some idea of the measures that are to be discussed in this chamber, and some opportunity should be given for public opinion to express itself before measures are finally passed through this House. My right hon. friend would be taking a course that would be in the public interest if he would have his Bill presented in the form in which he hopes it to pass this House. The Government might consider that suggestion as applicable equally to all future legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I may be permitted, I thought I had said, we shall say, at least half a dozen times, that I did not expect hon. members to discuss the Bill unless they felt ready to do so. I made the most frank, candid and open confession that there had happened this error; that I acknowledged my responsibility and asked nobody to suffer in the slightest degree, and in the face of that complaint is made that hon. members are expected to do this, that and the other thing, whereas hon. members had been assured that they were not expected to do anything of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the practice to which we are objecting.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let us get the whole mystery and see what the awful crime of this Government was. The imputation is that this matter was not given consideration. The trouble came, perhaps, because it got too careful consideration. Two drafts were made of this Bill, and the unpardonable offence that occurred was that, when I was handed the draft for introduction, I was handed the first draft instead of the second. My offence goes to that extent and no further. I have acknowledged that members should have this Bill before them and that they should not be expected to discuss the matter without it. As to presentation, if the hon. gentleman thinks something is to be gained by that, I have no particular objection to take this Bill back and re-introduce it. But as a matter of fact, the Bill as proposed to be amended is printed in full, and if it is not actually in the hands of members, the responsibility is on whoever has charge of the distribution of those papers. Let me make this suggestion: Let the Bill go into committee, as I said a few moments ago, and if then it is not thought there has been opportunity for its consideration, I shall certainly not press that it be proceeded with.

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask a queston?

Mr. SPEAKER: We must come to some semblance of order in this debate. We are debating the principle of the Bill on its second reading, where hon. members are restricted by the rules to only one speech. Now we have had two or three speeches, and all sorts of questions. I submit that the debate ought to be adjourned, or else brought to a conclusion, one or the other. If it goes on, we must adhere to the rules.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet intervened in this debate, and therefore I am in order in speaking now. I think we should not be called upon to discuss even the principle of this Bill, without having had it before us. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), with his usual courtesy, has said that he is prepared to do everything to meet our reasonable requirements, which is only what we would expect of him. We accept the evidence of this spirit of justice, and I would now move that the debate be adjourned and that we proceed to some other business. If I want to speak again, I shall have another opportunity.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

COPYRIGHT ACT

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend and consolidate the law relating to copyright.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the minister give us an explanation of the Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: The measure has been re-introduced this session after having been, I think, twice before this House. This measure went through the Senate, substantially in its present form, in the session of 1919, I think. It came to this House, but unfortunately, for one reason or another, did not get through. The Bill was re-introduced in this House last year and, equally unfortunately, it did not reach its culmination; it was not adopted.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: There is nothing on the Order Paper to indicate that the Bill has been printed in French. I have not on file a copy of the Bill in French.

Mr. DOHERTY: This is another case where I was assured the Bill had been printed and distributed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not on the file.

Mr. DOHERTY: If that is the fact, that the Bill is not in the hands of hon. members, I am where I was in the other matter. The hon. gentleman asked for an explanation of the Bill, and I was proceeding to give it. I have no desire unduly to press the matter. I have sent to inquire what is the explanation for the Bills not being here, because I gave the most positive orders that the Bill, which had been delayed in the course of printing, should be completed and distributed, and I was assured that that had been done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Bill has certainly not been distributed.

Mr. BELAND: Too many officials were dismissed from the Printing Bureau.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Probably Griffenhagen has the Bills.

Mr. VIEN: It is apparent from the Order Paper that the Bill has not been printed in French, because the letter "F" does not appear after it, in accordance with the note at the top.

Mr. BUREAU: Is it printed in English?

Mr. DOHERTY: I was assured this morning that the Bill had been printed and distributed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the minister a copy?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have one at the office, but, unfortunately, I did not bring it with me, as I expected there would be plenty here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Either we must proceed with the reading of this Bill, or the Order must stand.

Order stands.

MINISTERS AND DIRECTORSHIPS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. McMaster for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, when this order was called on a previous occasion I was making a few observations in connection with it. I have given the Bill considerable thought, and it appears to me there are certain objections to it.

In the first place, I contend that there is no demand for this type of legislation. I have carefully inquired, and I am not able to find any record showing that ministers of the Crown in the past have in any sense violated the ethics or the privileges of their office in the way sought to be remedied by this Bill. From that standpoint, I contend there is no need of the Bill. In the next place, it is unwise for this House to persist in introducing legislation where legislation is not required. Our statute books are perhaps filled now with numerous measures about which the public know nothing, which are neither observed nor enforced and which serve no really good purpose.

Another point I would suggest is this, that you are not going to make men honourable or good by statute. My hon. friend in this Bill purposes to surround the morals and the ethics of a minister of the Crown with certain regulations. Now I think it is a sound argument to advance, certainly it is a sound reason in law, that when you set forth in a law a certain restriction, it carries with it the suggestion that as long as you keep within the exact bounds of that particular stated law, you are at liberty perhaps to indulge in practices that otherwise would not be indulged in. You may prevent a man who holds a directorship in a company from being a minister of the Crown or compel him to resign his directorship, but you do not change his position as an individual, as a citizen, as a member of the company, towards the Government in the slightest degree, because it stands to reason, that it certainly would obtain, that while a man might conform with the technical demands of the law, he would not necessarily conform with its spirit. He may resign his directorship but retain his shares and be in exactly the same position as he was before.

The ordinary ethics obtaining in this House in connection with the position of members of Parliament, and more particularly in connection with those who in years gone by have held the high office of minister of the Crown, are such that I think the public has been amply protected in the past, and I believe it would be wise for this House to recognize that fact and rather to rest its case upon a personal sense of honour than upon conformity with some rule laid down such as this. My hon. friend in this Bill is seeking to prevent any minister of the Crown from holding the position of director in corporations. It is desirable, I think, that we should have in this House representative citizens from every walk in life. We often hear the statement made that we ought to have more business men holding public office, civic, provincial and Dominion; that it would be a good thing for the country if the capable, efficient business men of the country took a greater interest in public affairs; and that we might in that event run the affairs of the country more on a business basis. I am not advancing this as my own view; I am merely stating what is currently expressed by a large number of persons. Now, my hon. friend is going to circumscribe the entry of business men into the affairs of the country, and I want him and other hon. members of this House to consider this question: Why should we prevent a man holding a directorship in a company from holding a position in the Government, and yet allow the chief counsel, the chief legal adviser, of corporations to fill such a position? Certainly if there is a danger—mark you, I am not endorsing this argument; I am merely stating it as inferred by my hon. friend the mover of the Bill—in a man holding a position as minister of the Crown who happens to be a director of a company, I submit that there is still greater danger in having in that position a legal adviser or what is known as a corporation lawyer, a man who is engaged particularly in that class of legal practice. I would say that if the Bill were to be seriously considered by the House, it should be amended to include legal advisers of corporations. Now, that is only one argument. I go a step further and submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if that argument is sound—and I notice my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) nods his head as if he accepts it as sound—then the auditors of companies, that is, expert accountants who are closely identified with large corporations should also be precluded. Let us take, for example, the auditor of a large bank, or of a large commercial or industrial corporation doing business with the Government. That official would be just as likely to be influenced by the interest of the corporation as would an individual who was a director. Perhaps he might not be influenced to the same extent, but almost so. Then we might carry the argument still further; and as I explore this field of argument I find its ramifications stretch in all directions. Take a large corporation like the Toronto Street Railway, the Montreal Street Railway, or an important steel corporation—any of these large institutions that have a great amount of insurance, we will say. They frequently do business with one firm. They contract with an insurance firm to cover all their insurance, running into millions of dollars. Now, does any hon. gentleman mean to say that there is not just as much danger of undue influence in this case as there would be in the case of a director of a company? What I am driving at in this argument is simply this: first, that there is no demand for this Bill, so far as I can judge; and secondly, that it is trying to state in a meagre statute what ethics shall control the actions of a man who happens to be a member of the ministry. That is bad, in my estimation. It is inherently bad, and there is no sound argument, nor is there any demand for such legislation so far as I can see.

These are some of the arguments that occurred to me in glancing over the Bill. I confess I have not had time nor opportunity to delve very deeply into the constitutional history of the British form of government having regard to this particular measure. But I do not recall any statute of this character, or any stated rule of this kind, set forth in any of the great authorities, Bourinot, May or any other, as a desirable thing even. Consequently I submit to the House that it would be very unwise for us to encumber the statutes of this country with an unnecessary Act which, so far as I can judge, can do no good and in all probability would simply serve to dull the sharp edge of honour and ethics as they now obtain in connection with public office. It may have been well for the hon. member to bring the Bill to the attention of the House so that this particular branch of parliamentary ethics might come prominently before hon. members and thus serve to remind them of their high responsibility. In that respect it has done no harm; but I submit that it would be unwise for this House to adopt the Bill as presented by the hon. member.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. McMASTER: I presume, before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of replying to the arguments that have been advanced.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is my duty to inform hon. members that the hon. member for Brome is about to exercise his right of closing the debate. Any other hon. members who desire to speak may do so now.

Mr. EDWARD WALTER NESBITT (North Oxford): My experience is that a great many men who are directors of corporations—I think the resolution refers to them particularly—hold very little interest in those corporations, being frequently appointed directors by reason of their general knowledge of business and their ability to serve the corporations of which they are appointed directors. The shareholders may consider them so qualified from their business experience and their integrity that they make them directors without their having any particular financial interest in the company. I have known many instances where directors held not more than two or three shares—enough to qualify them. So that the mere fact of a man's being a director of a corporation does not necessarily prove that he has any real interest in the business. The man who is really interested is the man that holds the shares or certificates, the stock of the corporation. I do not understand by the resolution of the hon. member for Brome that it is intended to shut out the man who owns stock in the corporation, but simply the man who is a director. I think that the great majority of men who have become ministers, so far as my knowledge goes, have resigned as directors of corporations. Then again, there is nothing in the proposed legislation to stop a member of a partnership from being a minister; and a member of a partnership, whether it be two or four, is just as much interested in the business as though he were one of five or seven directors of a corporation. Therefore, the proposal, in my judgment, attempts to single out the director unnecessarily, and will accomplish absolutely no good, because, after all, a man is interested largely according to the extent that his pocket is affected. Further, as I understand it, the independence of Parliament Act prohibits a man, no matter whether he be a minister or an ordinary member of Parliament, from being directly or indirectly interested —I think that is the wording—in any undertaking that has a business connection with the Government. In that way I think the public are amply protected if we regard people as honourable. If they are not honourable, you cannot possibly do anything by the wording of an Act of Parliament or resolution, to make them honourable—at least that is my opinion. The mere fact of this House passing a resolution or declaring by statute, that a director shall not be a member of a government will not—let me repeat—by any manner of means cover the desired ground if such person continues to be a shareholder, because, there is where his vital interest lies. I do not know why my hon. friend wants to introduce this legislation, because I believe that the present law protects the country amply, protects it just as well as it would be protected were we to pass the present Bill.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (minister of Marine and Fisheries): No doubt the hon. member for Brome had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries clearly in mind when he was drafting this legislation.

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am very glad to know that such was not the case. I have no hesitation in stating that I am a director of many large industrial companies throughout Canada. I am also a director of banks and trust companies. I ask how could it be otherwise? A man who enters business early in life, achieves a success, and becomes associated not only with a large industrial concern—of which he may happen to be the president, vice-president or managing director—but with other commercial undertakings in the city or town in which he resides, and who amasses wealth, will find himself invited to become a director of other large corporations, banks or trust companies. If a man is not successful in business, and if he is not possessed of good judgment he will not find himself on any of these various directorates. Now, suppose a business man is called to serve his country? It is a well-known fact that business men who have no desire to become members of parliament, great as the honour is, or to become members of a government although they appreciate to the full what that honour means. Judging from the political history of Canada and other countries it is a rare thing to find a business man, who has succeeded in commerce or in finance, either a member of the popular Chamber or a member of any particular cabinet. But, Sir, if the State does call that man, there is only one thing for him to do. He must place the duties of his public office, the duty of serving his country, before his business interests, and henceforward devote all his time and all his attention to the administration of those public affairs to which he has been called. If I may be permitted to make a personal reference for a moment my position as a member of the Government and as a member of the House is no different from the position which would be taken by any other business man. I had, of course, to drop all my business connections as far as my giving them any personal attention was concerned; I have not been able to attend to the duties of the various boards to which I belong. But, Mr. Speaker, is it fair for the hon.member (Mr. McMaster) to expect a business man identified with large interests in this country to at once resign from those boards upon his entering the Government? And after all, as my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has said, that really does not reach the kernel of what the hon. member for Brome is striving to accomplish as long as a member of the Government, or a member of the House, is a large stockholder in various large industries, banks, and other business institutions. Therefore it comes down to this: If one were to do what the hon. member for Brome desires he would have to throw all his stock holdings in various companies, on to the market and take whatever he could get for them, resign from all these boards, and then appear before this House and in the words of the well-known hymn it would be a case of "Take me as I am". Surely no person who considers the subject seriously would for one moment expect a man who had been in business all his life to sell his holdings in these companies and to retire from these different boards. Because, secure as this Government is at the present time, as well as the party that sits to your right, Mr. Speaker, governments come and governments go. Therefore a business man would be most unwise to dispose of all his holdings and resign from all the boards on which he sat as a director in order to accept a passing honour in any particular government that might last for only a few years.

But, Sir, the vital point is the one I referred to a moment ago. Any Canadian citizen who has been in business in a large way and is a director of various companies, must put those interests to one side, and the honesty and uprightness of that man must be depended upon to serve the State rightly and to ensure that he give his full time and attention to the country's affairs. What difference would the fact make that a man had resigned from the boards on which he sat? As the hon. member for North Oxford has so well pointed out, as long as a man's interest remains in these various companies he would have the same interest in them whether he was a director of a board or whether he was not. Therefore I do not see the need or the usefulness of such a proposition as the hon. member for Brome has made to the House.

Let me say one thing more before I resume my seat. I do not claim to have any particular qualifications over and above those possessed by the ordinary business man for the position I occupy at the present time, but after acting for over three years as a minister of the Crown, and after an experience of twenty years as general manager of one of the largest corporations in this country, and having some knowledge of business, I have no hesitation in saying to hon. members that to be the minister of, we will say, any of the five or six large departments of government requires more business skill and more executive ability than to be the general manager of any of the largest corporations. I find no fault with so many gentlemen of the legal profession being in this House or in the Government; we need all classes of men here; but, Sir, if you are to have business men of large affairs in this House or in the Cabinet, then such small legislation as this, if I may be permitted to so term it, is only going to have the effect of still further discouraging business men from entering Parliament or the Government.

Therefore I have no hesitation in saying that I entirely disagree with my hon friend from Brome, and I am quite satisfied that when any man has the responsibilities of a minister of the Crown placed upon his shoulders he will see to it that he serves the interests of the state first and his private interests afterwards.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, after having listened to the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne), I have only these few brief remarks to offer. First, I think the minister, judging by what he has just said, is likely to be far more successful if he confines himself to building sailing boats than he will ever be by continuing to build a mercantile marine. The hon. gentleman has told us the number of companies in which he holds directorships, also the numerous companies of which he was or is general manager. This debate, Mr. Speaker, I do not think ought to be narrowed down to the personality of any member of the Cabinet, and I do not think it was the intention of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) to introduce a Bill which might be construed as being aimed at any individual member of the Government. The Bill brings before the House a matter of much higher importance, notwithstanding the importance that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine may have in the Cabinet. I do not claim that the Minister of Marine, because he is a director of many companies, is not a competent minister; and on the other hand I do not claim that he is a competent minister because he is a director of those numerous companies. Should a minister of the Crown have interests other than the interests of the state? That is the whole question. Several hon. members have addressed the House from the other side and they have told us that public life in Canada has shown numerous examples of ministers who had very large commercial interests and nevertheless served the state to the best of their ability. Such is the case, and I do not deny it. But, on the other hand, can you say, without danger of being contradicted, that our ministers have always acted in that way?

The hon. Minister of Marine has said that since he became a minister it has been impossible for him to give proper attention to his business interests. Therefore, I infer that as a director of the companies which he has mentioned he has not been of much usefulness to them. If he has not given any attention to those companies, why should he remain a director, why should he draw his fees? Why should he have any objection to resign his directorships if he has not time to attend to their business? On the other hand, if another member of the Cabinet is in the same position as the hon. Minister of Marine, but, instead of giving no attention to the business of his companies, has done so since he became a member of the Cabinet, every hour and every day which he has given to the business of his companies is an hour and a day taken away from the state, and that attention and work devoted to his companies is attention and work that he should have given to the public business of this country.

The hon. minister asks: Is it fair to expect a public man when he enters the Government of Canada to resign his business interests when he may hold his portfolio for only a very short period? That argument is commonly called the "Safety first" argument. I admit its strength, I admit that a minister when he enters a government, and especially a government like the present one, is not very sure of what may happen the day following his entry. But to keep in touch with his corporations and with his business associates as the hon. minister has to remain friendly with them, and should the interests of those associates diverge from the interests of the state, what is his position? The hon. minister has not explained that to the House. For instance, should the tariff policy be discussed around the Council table if the Minister of Marine is a director of several companies, and if those companies are interested in the drafting of the tariff schedules, will the minister think of the interests of Canada first, or will he think of the interests of his business associates? That is the question that the House is supposed to discuss. It is not a question of individuality or personality, although the hon. gentleman is very important in this Government; the question is away beyond his importance and reaches greater heights. The question is: Are we to have in this Government ministers who will be free from business interests so as always to make decisions in the best interests of the country at large?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Am I to infer from his remarks that he would want any member of the Government to sell all his interest in various companies in order that he might be completely disinterested?

Mr. CANNON: No, Mr. Speaker, because, as the hon. minister has said, when a man has wealth and ability, he is sought by everybody in Canada so that that ability and wealth may be used. But I say that a gentleman who enters the Cabinet should make his investments in such a way, and should have business associates of such a nature, that neither his investments nor his business associations will interfere with his conduct of public business. That is my contention. I say further that a minister who is a director of a dozen companies and large corporations such as those mentioned by my hon. friend places himself in such a position that if he remains human, runs the risk of being incompetent, and if he wishes to be an angel he runs the risk of being misunderstood.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (Perth North): Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat to be regretted that the debate has taken a line totally different from that in which it proceeded in its earlier stages. It does seem to me that this matter should be discussed entirely free from personalities; that we should deal with the principle of the Bill and that alone. To my mind no real reason has been put forward in support of the Bill by its sponsor or by those who have spoken in favour of it. To me as a Canadian the public life of Canada has been, within my recollection at least, upon a very high plane; Canadian public men have held high and honourable positions, much to the credit of Canadian public life. But this Bill leaves the inference that a totally different condition prevails among our public men and in the public life of Canada, and it seeks to prevent something that has not at all become an abuse. In other words, its object is to prevent Cabinet Ministers who are directors of companies from working selfishly in the interests of the companies they serve as against the public welfare. In that respect I think the Bill is a reactionary measure; it is putting something forward to induce and perpetuate an atmosphere derogatory to the best interests of our national life. The promoter of the Bill has shown no reason why business men of wide experience should be debarred from the councils of Canada. There never was a time in the history of Canada when men of great force, men of wide business experience, men of fine parts, men of honour and integrity, were more needed in the councils of a nation than they are to-day in this period of readjustment. What is the objection to such men acting in that capacity? Is it any crime to be a man of business ability, of wide business experience? Should such men be debarred from the highest positions in the public life of Canada? I say, no; a thousand times, no. Not all members of the Cabinet need be men of these large parts, but certainly the fact that they are men of that quality and of that class is no argument against their holding such positions.

It is contended that a man honourable in every way, without a stain upon his business, personal or public character, should not be eligible to hold office in the ministry if he be a director of a company. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) says it would be that man's duty, where he a minister of the Crown, to get all the business he could for the firm of which he was a director. But is it so, Mr. Speaker? Has the public life of Canada degenerated to such a point that the statement of the member for Guysborough is applicable to it? No. I rather take the view that a minister who is a director of one company or of two or three companies, if ordinarily inclined to be venal or corrupt, is much less inclined to be so in connection with his public office, if he holds a directorate, because he is under a fierce light; the finger of suspicion may be pointed at him because he is a director. His directorate is a deterrent force; it keeps him free from corruption and graft; free from any unfair activities on behalf of his firm. Let him cease to be a director, and what is the result? He has put on a cloak that shelters him, because he can say: I am no longer a director of any company, but I hold my stock; my influence is just as great in the councils of a nation as it ever was; I can get things done, and they cannot say that I did it because I was a director of a company. In other words, this Bill opens the door to the very thing that the promoter of it desires to prevent; it enables those who may be venally inclined to do the very thing my hon. friend does not want them to do by virtue of their directorship.

The Bill is filled with subject matters that might be carried a good deal further. Is the hon. member going to say also that if the member of Parliament happens to be a shareholder in a company he must be debarred from being a member of the government? It is as natural to say that as it is to say the other; in fact, if you follow through all the avenues that lead to interest it would not be long before you would have no Parliament at all.

My chief objection, then, to the Bill is that it reflects upon what I conceive to be a pure Canadian public life, and that it is put forward without any evidence being offered of its necessity. Surely, at a time when we in Canada are on the threshold of the readjustment period, with a debt of $2,400,000,000 staring us in the face, we should call to the councils of the nation the best men we have from the point of view of business, from the point of view of the rebuilding of Canada, from the point of view of reducing the almost insufferable burden under which the country groans by way of debt. Public men honourable in character should be free from even the suspicion of attack that this Bill conveys. Let us get down to business; let us call to the councils of our country the best men we can obtain, and then let us treat them fairly and honourably, and be thankful that we get their services—services rendered, in many cases, at the expense of large personal business interests.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I want to detain the House only for a moment or two in discussing this matter. Let me say, at the outset, that I am in grave doubt as to the wisdom of passing this somewhat drastic legislation. I am in that doubt because I would prefer to see a matter of this kind settled by what I venture to call the good sense, discretion and high-mindedness of men in public life, rather than by the strong arm of the law. There was a great deal in the argument of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) when he said that, as a pure matter of using properly the energies of a minister, it was necessary that this legislation should be enacted. We are all familiar with the old saying that "no man can serve two masters," and that is particularly true if each master wants all of a man's time. Clearly, a Cabinet minister's time is so much occupied that he probably has not time to devote to other businesses. One of my greatest friends in the press gallery when I first came to Ottawa said to me: "There is only one thing worse than being a member of Parliament, and that is being a minister," and I think, from the point of view of hard work, that statement was probably strictly true. Never having been a minister, nor having any particular expectation or ambitions in that way, I am personally unconcerned; but from all that I see of Cabinet ministers, their job is sufficient to use all their activities, so that the hon. member for Brome reasoned well when he said that if a minister's work is sufficient for him, if he accepts directorships of companies, he must either rob his country or rob his companies in the matter of time.

Then there is the further consideration that Caesar's wife should be above suspicion. Men in the service of the state should not occupy, in regard to companies, a position which could be considered even doubtful. I am not aware of what the law is in the Old Country, but I know what is the very general practice there. There is probably no man of greater high-mindedness in the world to-day than the former Foreign Secretary of England, Lord Grey; and when Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman made Lord Grey his Foreign Secretary, the latter did not need any law; he did not need any instructions from his chief; he was at the time chairman of the directors of the Northeastern Railway Company, which position carried with it a salary of £5,000 a year and he at once, of his own initiative, gave up the chairmanship of the directors of the railway company and became Foreign Secretary, with the best results, I think, to the Empire.

I am quite willing to admit that there are differences between Canada and the Old Country in this respect. The Old Country is an old country; it has for generations and centuries had large numbers of leisured people, with abundant private income, who devote themselves very largely to public affairs. We are a younger country, and we have not that leisured class up to the present moment in our national history. At the same time, the sooner we follow the example of the Old Country in that respect, the better. One of the grounds on which I would have extended my remarks in that connection the other day is that I should have congratulated the House and the country on our new Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) on being a House of Commons man. He learned his politics; he learned what he knows—and it is a good deal—of the science of government, in this House; and it will be well for this country when, for the purpose of having trained statesmen and politicians—I pay no attention to the sneer at professional politicians in this connection—something is done to appoint from the membership of this House, young men as secretaries (without salaries) to ministers, as they have them in the Old Country with salaries, to learn the intricacies of statesmanship. Pending such a time, we have many men who make sacrifices to serve their country, and even though there were more sacrifice required than there would be on the part of many of our public men to give up business directorships, I feel it would be a desirable state of affairs to bring that about.

[Mr. M. Clark.]

I want to repeat that I have doubts about the wisdom of passing drastic legislation upon the subject at the present period of our national history. It might be an unwise step to go too far in that direction. I am not one of those who believe in the omniscience of governments or even of parliaments, and I have a very great suspicion of governments interfering in human affairs beyond the point that is wise. There are certain proper limitations of state control beyond which governments should not go. And in this connection, while I have the utmost sympathy with the view of my hon. friend, I doubt if he could carry his measure anyhow. If he takes it to a vote, I am very much afraid that at the present stage of my thinking, I could not vote for the enactment of quite so drastic a measure as this; but I want to repeat that the condition of thought in our public men and in our citizens ought speedily to be brought to the point at which for generations the highest-minded public men have arrived in the Old Country. I have given an illustration, which must appeal to every section of this House, in the action of Lord Grey when he took office under Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Châteauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, it must be apparent to you and the hon. members of the House that the measure before us is not a party measure. It is in no way the policy of the Liberal party to attempt to do anything that will keep business men from taking their fair share in the work of carrying on the business of Canada. Every hon. member knows that John Smith, as John Smith, if he is a member of Parliament, cannot do business with the Government of Canada; but John Smith and Co., Ltd., incorporated, can go on and do all the business he likes. So I imagine what the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) had in mind was to create such conditions as would put incorporated companies on about the same basis as a man doing business under his own name or under the name of a partnership. But I submit in all sincerity to the hon. member for Brome that he cannot attain that object by the Bill now before the House, because there is nothing in the world to prevent a man, if he so desires, from withdrawing from a directorship if he becomes a minister and putting in as director his chief clerk or some other man in whom he has confidence, and doing business, and more business under that cloak which does not expose him to any legal attack. I submit that that man is a greater menace to the state than the man doing business openly as a director, because in the latter case you know whom you are dealing with. Therefore, I am not at all in favour of the proposed measure. If my hon. friend were to introduce legislation that would prevent incorporated companies that had on their directorate a Minister of the Crown from doing business with the Government, I submit that he would be upon sound ground, but I fear the measure now before the House will be misunderstood, will do no good, and will not attain the object which my hon. friend desires. I am sure he had nothing personal in his mind when he introduced this measure. I am not going to offer him advice, because he is better posted upon these questions than I am, but it does seem to me that if he wishes to create such conditions as will prevent incorporated companies from abusing their privileges he might very well introduce such a measure as will put an incorporated company, with a director in the ministry, upon the same basis as a private man doing business.

That is all I have to say in regard to this Bill. Looking at it purely from a business point of view, looking back over my experience in Parliament of now over twelve years, I am bound to say that the greatest menace to good legislation in this Parliament has not been the business men. There have been some other men who have been able to come to the members of this Parliament and go before committees, and it does seem to me that my hon. friend might exercise his energies in correcting some of these abuses before he attempts to interfere with business men taking their proper place in the national councils in this Parliament.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): My mind on the matter is governed very much by considerations such as those put forward by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), the only difference between myself and him being, I think, that I have advanced, or retrogressed, if that is a better word, to more definite conclusions than he.

The subject matter of the measure has no interest for me at all, personally. I am not now, and have not been for many years, a director of any company. I believe the Parliamentary handbook discloses my name as connected with two little companies in Western Canada, but I have to confess that they both went into liquidation about twelve years ago, and I have not taken the precaution to have the Parliamentary handbook brought up to date. Possibly the House now has the explanation why these companies went into liquidation. Since that time I have not afflicted any company with the acceptance of a directorship. But my position with regard to this Bill would be just the same were I in a more favoured place as regards the business community.

I am not able to follow the arguments presented on behalf of the Bill at all. In the first place, this fact must impress itself upon the House: there is no other country that I know of, certainly none has been named to Parliament and the authority adduced, where legislation of this kind is in effect. I do not believe it is in effect in England. The practice may be in effect there of resigning directorships upon accession to Cabinet position more than it is in Canada, but I think I am safe in saying that that practice is by no means universal in England right up to the present time. In no other country is it in effect. It is not in effect in the provinces of Canada, nor has it been the practice in this Dominion to any great extent in all the years that have gone. Governments now existing and governments that have existed, both in federal and in provincial affairs, have retained within their number men who still were directors of companies. Now that is a fact that, while it is not conclusive, must impress the House with much force. At all events, in the presence of that fact a considerable weight of argument would be necessary to convince us that we should mark out a new trail and impose new restrictions upon the accession to Cabinet position of men of business in Canada. We are called upon to do so by the mover (Mr. McMaster), and in very specific language by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), because of a principle which they claim to have discovered which compels us so to act. Now what is the principle? It is defined in different ways by hon. members who support the Bill, but in very broad language this definition is common to all: they say that a minister of the Crown requires all his energies and all his talents for his office; his master is the state; therefore, he should give all his time and all his energies to the fulfilment of his duties as a minister, and he should have no other interests of a fiduciary character or otherwise which conflict with the performance of his primary task. Well, that is either a principle which we should follow or it is not. In the first place it is a principle that it is impossible to follow. It could not be lived up to as expressed; it could not be lived up to no matter how you express it. The hon. member for Dorchester says that a minister of the Crown should have no other interests at all to occupy his time. If that is correct, he should not even have a family.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know that is an extreme interpretation of what he said, but it comes within the principle that the hon. gentleman argued for. What he asks for is that a minister's whole time should be given to the state, that the state should be his only interest. Certainly it follows that he should have no other interests of any kind, whether as director or otherwise. If it is true that where your treasure is there will your heart be also, then if his principle must prevail, one cannot have a treasure, one cannot have anything.

I was most impressed by the illustration that was given by the hon. member for East Toronto (Sir Edward Kemp). A gentleman comes into Parliament and is called to be a member of the Government. He is the owner or very largely the owner of a business. We will say it is unincorporated. Let us illustrate by figures, and say that this man is eighty per cent owner of that business. Now undoubtedly he is a trustee in so far as the other twenty per cent is concerned, in the management of that business, and consequently, he not only has his treasure there, but in a sense he is a trustee for others who have a treasure in the same business. Now we will assmue that he is called to public office as a member of the Government. He is permitted, if the Bill passes, to occupy just the same position in that business that he did before, and if he puts it into the form of a joint stock company, which would be a wise thing to do under those circumstances, he is not allowed access to the "treasure" that he has gained in all his years of hard work, to enable him to see that it is being managed at least fairly in his interests. He is not allowed that access that comes from the occupation of the post of director. He is compelled, merely because he has put that business into the form of a stock company, to abandon the earnings of his lifetime and to take no further interest in it than to commit it to others. He is not to be allowed to gain at least that access to, and that knowledge of, its supervision which he might have if he were permitted to retain the post of director.

Now, it is quite true that he cannot occupy any substantial time in the supervision of such shares as he may hold in a company by reason of his occupying the post of director. That is quite true. The fact that he is a director, however, keeps him in touch at least with his own investment; it keeps him in touch with the management of it to a certain extent; and without occupying any substantial portion of his time it there stands in a safer position, more satisfactory to himself, than it would be in if he were compelled to abandon it altogether and leave it to the management of others. Now, I am thoroughly in agreement with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that there may come a time when the occupation of high government office becomes inconsistent with the retention of directorships or with fiduciary relations to others; that time may come, but I do not think that its advent can be settled by legislation or that the severance can be enforced by statute. Indeed, that time has come in Canada. I well recall that the right hon. gentleman who occupied the position of Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) prior to the present minister (Sir Henry Drayton)—and so far as I know this is true of the present minister—resigned his directorships in all the companies he was in. He did that, I have no doubt, because of the belief that in the actual administration of his public office he came into too direct contact with the interests in respect of which he was responsible as a director. There was such direct and intimate contact and relationship between his position under the Crown and his directorships that he felt it to be inconsistent with the proper discharge of his ministerial duties. It is to his credit that he took that position. There was a degree of intimacy and closeness of relation that does not at all exist ordinarily between directorships and the duties of a minister of the Crown. There was a directness of intimacy and a closeness of relationship which he felt made it impossible for him to hold both positions, and, as I have said, it is to his credit that he took that position, although I must say that I have not observed up to this hour that he was accorded any great degree of credit in this House or out of it because he took that stand. I did not observe that the hand of attack was stayed or that the voice of calumny was stilled at all, because it was always asserted, with a random abandon that did not seem to me to be creditable, that he still was merely the mouthpiece of the business interests from which he came. However, he took that stand. And there have been cases in British public life where the same has been done; and I believe that in our own country public men of both parties on attaining office can be depended upon to see to it that if the retention of directorships in companies or even of stock in companies—because there is no great difference, if there is any material or imaginable difference between the relationship of a directorship to a minister of the Crown, and the relationship of a stockholder to a minister of the Crown—they can be depended upon that, if the relationship is so close that the administration of their office might be open to influence, they will drop the private interest in deference to the imperative demands of public welfare.

Now, I do not know how that may be defined by legislation. I do not know how it can be definitely stated when the time comes that the relationship is so close that the one position must be dropped. There is always a relationship. I do not know where one is to put his money if it is in a Canadian company—yea, or even if it is in an American company—so that it will be in such a position as not to be affected by any act of the Government of Canada or of Parliament. There is no place in which to put it so that it may be absolutely and entirely outside of the scope of the actions of Parliament. It is said that he should invest it in such a way that there may be no danger of his being influenced by it in the slightest degree in the discharge of his public duties. Well, I should like to have a suggestion as to how he could so invest it; personally I do not know how he could. It is a matter of degree. If one invests in any company or in any business in this country, whether he be a minister of the Crown or a member of Parliament, the destiny, the safety, the success of that investment is undoubtedly influenceable by legislation of this House and the administration of the Government. That you cannot get away from.

There is no fine and clear principle that you can state and enforce by the passing of this legislation. It becomes wholly a matter of degree, a matter of the good judgment of the man who is called to public office. On that account it seems to me that this legislation would be futile. If you carried the attempt made by this legislation to the extent of the whole principle involved, you would be compelled to enact not only that a minister should not hold any directorships in this country, or exercise the slightest supervision over the earnings of his life up to the time he became a minister, and over the property that alone will be the support of his family when he leaves his public office, but that he must sell the stock he holds in companies that come into contact with the Government and with the administration of his department. And you would have to go further and enact that members of Parliament should do the same, because in the end it is Parliament that determines the legislation and not the government at all; and if it is feared that members of the Government will be unduly influenced by their holdings in various concerns, there is just the same reason to assume that members of Parliament will be similarly influenced.

It seems to me therefore that the House would be wise to follow the practice that has obtained in Britain, and in Canada as well, federally and provincially, and in every other country, so far as I know, and leave it to the sense of honour of public men and to the sense of accountability to the great public of the country; because in all things they do they are accountable not only to Parliament but to the entire country. Leave it to their own sense of honour and responsibility and we shall get better results in the end than by trying to enforce impossible enactments such as that put forward in the Bill.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member is about to close the debate.

Mr. DANIEL D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I want to say just a word or two. The speech made by the Prime Minister is, in its conclusion, in direct contradiction to the speeches made by many of his supporters on the other side of the House. For instance, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) made a speech which was highly condemnatory of this Bill and of the principle which it espouses, and characterized the sponsor of it as a man who was usurping the rights and powers of Parliament and doing something that was entirely wrong.

That is not the way in which this Bill should be approached. Every member of the House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) included, must agree that the ideal condition is that a minister of the Crown should not be a director. That is the ideal. If one minister of this Government can be a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is there any reason why every other minister should not be a director of that concern? And is it a desirable condition, when the business of the country comes into conflict with the business of a private corporation of the magnitude and the far-reaching effects in operation such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, that every member of the Government should be a director of that company? When the question of rates came up, or legislation affecting the operations of that company in its relations with the people of Canada, would not the public be shocked to find that when the board sat as a board every member of the Government of this country was on it and that there was no one to represent the country at all? That is a condition that is quite possible according to the gospel preached by my good friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who launched into the hymn "Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow" and expressed other lofty ideas as if he wished to also have them set to music in this House.

Now I am not saying that this is a practicable Bill. I am not saying that it can be carried out; but I do say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Brome should not be brought before the bar of the House and chastised and indeed brought to task severely, because he dared to introduce the measure. Its introduction has worked a lot of good. It has been shown that it was desirable, whenever it could be brought about, that members of a government should not be directors; that although we have fifteen or sixteen, perhaps twenty, heads of departments here, it does not follow that even although every one of them retired from being director of companies, anything would happen the country. In the event of their retirement the companies will go along just as they did before. The interests of the individual who happens to be a minister would, if he were not on a directorate, be in the hands of other directors, just as the business of other men formerly were in his hands, and things would go along first rate. Perhaps it is not practicable to carry out this proposition; but let me say to the Prime Minister as well as to the House, that the ideal condition is that men who are ministers should have nothing to do with such companies in particular as are concerned in a large way with the Government.

The hon. member for East Toronto (Sir Edward Kemp) spoke about a private man acting in a private capacity, and that such a man can do business with the Government and be a minister; but the moment his business becomes incorporated he is debarred from serving in the Government or being a director of his own business. Well, those are small matters in a way. About a man who is conducting a private business as a manufacturer, or some other line, I do not concern myself at all; it is his private affair, and even if he incorporates the business the fact is still true to a great extent; but the cases I have particularly in my mind are those of any members of the Government who are acting in the dual capacity of directors of concerns that have to do with the public and at the same time are occupying positions as heads of departments that deal with these concerns. I think such a position is an anomalous one, and the exercise by ministers of such dual capacities should be avoided as much as possible.

Mr. WILLIAM FOSTER COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Before the hon. member for Brome closes the debate, I want to say a word or two on this question. It appears to me that the idea that the Bill may be passed in accordance with high moral ethics is not a businesslike proposition. The fact has already been referred to that the business interests of Canada—and when I speak of "the business interests" I mean everybody who is engaged in any trade or commerce of any kind, which would embrace a very large proportion of our population—is now and always has been under-represented in almost every government that has been formed in Canada since I can recollect. That applies to the provinces as well as to the Dominion. Now this Bill which the hon. member has introduced would further circumscribe the bringing into office of any business man in Canada. It is well known that no man gets on very far in these days who does not become a director of some kind of a company. He might be a very poor director and it might be a very poor company, but he is a director of some kind of a company if he has got on at all in the business world. Yet this Bill would preclude him from taking his seat in the present or any other government. We now have in Toronto a government that has not a single business man in it, and I am sorry for the province that it is so. If there were business men in that government I think some of the loans that have recently been floated at very high rates would not have been floated; they would have been placed on the market at rates that would have yielded a much better return for the money of the province than we are now getting. I say the same with regard to this Government. From time to time, I believe, the legal element has predominated and legislation—often not very useful legislation—has emanated from legal men like my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) who would like to pass his name down to posterity as the father of some great Act in operation in the country. For my part I would like my name celebrated—and I have been here quite a number of years—as a man who has prevented unnecessary legislation from going on the statute books, rather than as a man who had been a party to passing doubtful measures of any kind. There is far too much legislation passed in this country, and in my judgment it begets a contempt of law; in fact the people become so befogged that they do not know where they are half the time in regard to obeying the laws that this country has enacted. Many of such laws have gone through this House since I have been here. We let some through last session that members now are sorry for and they woke up to the fact afterwards. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that far too much legislation goes through and in its passage it is hurried to too great an extent. My hon. friend from Brome has submitted a Bill that may be deemed perhaps to be receiving undue consideration, but it is a far reaching measure and it is quite opposed to the practice that has been in vogue in this country for many years. I believe if this legislation were to pass my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) would not have to resign from any directorates. I may be wrong but I judge that he would not have to resign from any directorates in order to qualify if this legislation were to pass, and that also may properly be said with respect to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). Holding the particular views that my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) does I do not think he would be a valuable asset to any ordinary manufacturing or commercial company, and therefore perhaps he is not so very much sought after. My hon. friend in bringing in this legislation is, I think, entirely in the wrong.

Let me say that I have known the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) for a great many years, long before he entered this Government. I have known him for at least twenty-five years and have done business with him, and I recognize him as one of the first business men of Canada. Now, to say that he should divest himself of directorates in companies because he is here to-day and—as my hon. friend would have told him last week—he is going to be gone to-morrow; he then called upon the whole Cabinet to resign immediately and get out, he declared—they have no place here—is unreasonable. The hon. member would compel a minister to divest himself of all his business interests, and in the second clause he calls upon him to do so within fifteen days after he is sworn in. Now a minister upon accepting office might go to his constituency and not be elected. He might have resigned all his business interests and thrown them to the winds, and still his constituents might not endorse him. Perhaps they would rather refuse to endorse him because of the fact that he had thrown away his business interests, and would no longer have that position of influence in the community that he would enjoy did he continue to retain his business interests,—because in every community the man who employs a large number of his fellows or makes a success of business is rightly looked up to. Are you going to put into office the man who fails, the man that cannot qualify, or are you going to choose the man whose business career has justified him in being selected among his fellows for a position of this kind?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has gone too far afield in this measure and that there is no call for such legislation in the Dominion of Canada at the present time. I do not remember the existing situation ever having infringed upon the rights of the people to any extent. I trust that no one in particular has been especially aimed at in this legislation. I do not believe the hon. member for Brome would do such a thing. I have a higher opinion of him than that, and I do not think he has any particular person in mind in the matter. But I would like to point out to him that his Bill would limit a class of men who may be selected for Governments, and it would cut out those who, perhaps by their training and by the success they have made in business career, are the best fitted for that particular calling.

I am not sure that my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) who leads the third party was not included in this measure. I rather fear he would be. While he has no doubt got his eye upon this proffered legislation and is able to look after himself, it seems to me that possibly the United Grain Growers and the Elevator Companies may be directly concerned. No one would say, no matter what opinion they had of the Grain Growers party, that the leader of the party was the man to be dropped, when it is doubtless understood that he is by far the most capable man for the position for which he has been selected by the Council of Agriculture, and by those who follow him.

I think, Mr. Speaker, when the House looks at this in a sober, clear way it will see that the interests of the country have not suffered, nor are they likely to suffer, because the moment any minister of the Crown showed that he was allowing his private interests to dictate his public policy, he would be a marked man in the House and in the country and the Government could not get rid of him too quickly. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw his measure, because I think it is pretty sure to be defeated.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the reference to myself made by my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) induces me to participate in this debate very briefly. If I might be permitted a personal allusion, when the Union Government was formed in October, 1917, I held a directorship in the company with which I had been associated for many years, and I was also a director in one of the smaller Canadian banks. I am divulging no confidence, I think, when I say that before accepting office I discussed the matter with the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) who was then Prime Minister, and as far as my own business relations were concerned, it was clearly understood that my time was to be entirely free from them. As far as my position with the bank was concerned, I considered it then my duty to resign my directorship, and I did so.

I am in cordial agreement with what my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has said, and also with what my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) has said, that the best approach to a solution of this question comes through a high-minded sense of public duty. I am at a little difference of opinion with my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster). I cannot see that his position is entirely consistent or logical. He proposes that any one who is a director of a corporation doing business in Canada shall sever his business connection on being elevated to the high honour of a minister of the Crown. If my hon. friend is consistent I think he must pursue that principle still further. Take the case, for instance, of a gentleman who may be elected to this House, and is the head, or a member, of an important legal firm. Should he accept a Cabinet position, would it not naturally follow, for the reasons stated by the hon. member for Brome, that he should sever his connection with his legal firm? We might carry the principle further. My hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) is, I believe, a general merchant in that town. If a new Government should be formed and my hon. friend should be asked to become a member of it, should he thereupon be compelled to dispose of all his business interests in Renfrew? I might pursue that line of reasoning still further, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Reid) is a farmer. Were he to be elevated to Cabinet rank, would it follow that he should dispose of his farm holdings in order that there might be no division of interests in the prosecution and fulfilment of his duty as a minister of the Crown? I think that principle could be carried to very extreme lengths.

I do hold very strongly, however, that business of the Government should be entirely dissociated from the business of corporations of which members of the Government may be directors. I think that is in the public interest. After all, I believe the best solution of this question may be found in the development of the high sense of public duty that was manifested by Lord Grey in the instance given by my hon. friend from Red Deer. But the discussion has done good, and I am sorry that I was not in the House when my hon. friend from Brome, for whom I have a very high respect, introduced this measure, as I have no knowledge of what he stated on that occasion. But viewing the whole question on general principles, although I think it is very highly desirable that the conduct of our public men should be put beyond any possibility of reproach, yet it seems to me that the position taken by my hon. friend from Brome is perhaps a little too far in advance at the present time.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, in the observations which I made when introducing this Bill last Friday, I was very careful to endeavour to dissociate any expression of personality in my discussion of its subject matter. I am glad to say that, with one exception, that attitude of mind on my part has been followed by hon. members who have spoken in this debate, and I thank them for it.

I am quite aware that there are arguments against my Bill. There is the weighty argument which has been discussed by the hon. member for East Toronto (Sir Edward Kemp) and by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). Their point was that in the case of a man who has built up a personal business of his own under the law and the practice as at present there is nothing to prevent him accepting the office of a minister of the Crown and retaining his interest in his personal business—remaining its manager, so to speak. But the member for East Toronto said: If this Bill goes into effect, then such a man if he changed his business into an incorporated form would be precluded from being a minister of the Crown. Now, I had thought of that case before it was brought up and—I do not know whether I am exactly in order in making this statement, Mr. Speaker—in the hope that the principle of the Bill may be accepted, I thought of meeting such a case in this way: By defining what I would call a personally owned and controlled company. Let us define such a company as one in which 85 per cent of the capital stock is owned by the minister and his relations within the degree of first cousins, and the board of which is composed of a majority of the minister's relations within the same degree. Then I would make an exception of such a company and would allow the minister to retain his directorship; but if he did so I would preclude his company from doing any business with any department of the Government or with any national system of railways or of ships. I would be prepared to do that to meet the objection made by the hon. member for East Toronto and by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, in which I think there is a great deal of force.

My hon. friend from East Toronto also said: Trust the ministers. That has been the motive, so to speak, of a great many of the speeches made against my Bill—that it is unnecessary and that we should trust to the delicacy of honour of the minister. If that is a good argument in regard to ministers, why is it not an equally good argument in relation to members of Parliament? Section 14 of the Senate and House of Commons Act sets out very clearly that a member of Parliament shall not be concerned > —directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, with or for the Government of Canada on behalf of the Crown.

The cases are not exactly analogous, but they are very similar. In enacting this legislation, Parliament in its wisdom has not relied upon the honour of members of Parliament. What the member of Parliament is told he shall not do are exactly the things which delicacy of feeling will prevent him from doing; nevertheless it has been thought wise to incorporate these prohibitions in the statute.

The next point to which I wish to refer was that made by the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), whose idea was that Parliament should resent a Bill invading the realm of private honour—I think I quote his exact words. Well, this Bill no more invades the realm of private honour than the legislation we already have upon the statute book.

There is no demand for this legislation, says the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I do not know whether the hon. member is apprised of the fact, but there is abroad among the people of Canada a very strong impression—to put it in the most moderate language—that the large business interests of the country now have and have had in the past, whether one party or the other was in power, a great deal too much to say as to how the country should be governed. The legislation which I am asking the House to adopt is for the purpose of preventing, as I said before, interlocking directorates from entering into the circle of the Cabinet.

The member for Vancouver Centre expressed the view that if such legislation as this were adopted the Bill should be extended so as to make ineligible for entry into the Cabinet a man who was acting as counsel for a large company. Now, that depends upon whether or not my hon. friend has reference to counsel acting under a yearly retainer. For instance, if a man acting as solicitor for a large company on the basis of a standing retainer of perhaps $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 a year should enter the Cabinet without resigning that position as solicitor, the procedure would be just as improper as it would be for a director to enter the Cabinet and retain his directorship. If I correctly apprehend what my hon. friend said, I am perfectly willing to enlarge my Bill to that extent. I do not agree with him that auditors should be in the same position. The auditor, after all, is a man who sees that the books are kept properly. My hon. friend, who is not, I think, a member of the legal profession, should realize, as an intelligent layman, what a vast difference there is between the part played by the auditor in his connection with the company, and the part played by the lawyer as respects the advice which he gives. The hon. member also made a reference to including the insurance agent, but I think that was a species of humour on his part.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that it is unnecessary and inadvisable to provide that members of the Cabinet shall not be directors in incorporated companies. But if I mistake not, it is specially provided in the Act creating the Railway Commission that no Railway Commissioner shall be a director in an incorporated company. Well, the cabinet sits as a court of appeal form the decisions of the Railway Commission; therefore we have this peculiar position: the court of original jurisdiction is forbidden to hold directorships, but the court of appeal from that court is allowed to do so. That does not seem to me to be logical.

Now, I come to the argument made by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne). I may say—and I would call all members of this House to witness who heard me the other day—that in introducing this measure I studiously refrained from imputing any wrong-doing to any minister, and I refrained absolutely from making a personal attack upon anyone. But the Minister of Marine has endeavoured to attract the lightning upon himself; his doing so has been no fault of mine. The minister has been frank, if he has been anything. He said: I am a director in many large industrial companies, in banks and in trust companies. He seems to think that his holding of these positions is perfectly compatible with his being a minister of the Crown—and he now nods his head in token of assent. But, Mr. Speaker, he goes on to say this: The energy and the skill required in the administration of a large department of the Government is such that I have not been able to give any attention to my company matters—and he nods his head again. Well, in all kindness I ask him, is it fair to the shareholders of the Royal Trust Company that he should remain a director of that company, that he should give his name to the institution and the prestige that his name carries with it, while he gives no attention at all to the affairs of the company? Is it fair, is it right, for a man to hold himself out as a guardian of the interests of the shareholders and of the depositors, if there are any, of the Royal Trust Company, and yet give no attention to the affairs of the company? My hon. friend is a director, if I mistake not—and he will correct me if I make any mistake—of the Merchants' Bank of Canada. Is it fair or right that the workingmen of this country should be invited to place their hard-earned savings in the care of the Merchants' Bank of Canada, relying upon my hon. friend being a director of that institution, when as a matter of fact he tells us that he can give no attention to the matter? I do not think it is right, and I think that on further consideration, my hon. friend will come to the same conclusion.

Now, I do not want to make this a personal quarrel between the Minister of Marine and myself, because I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman. But he has endeavoured to justify his retaining of directorships while acting as minister of the Crown. Let us return for a moment to the Royal Trust Company, which, he will admit, is a kind of side-door of the Bank of Montreal, or represents the same or almost the same business interests. Is it right that the minister should be a director of a company so closely associated with the Bank of Montreal as the Royal Trust Company when the Bank of Montreal is one of the bankers of the Government of this country? I do not think it is. My hon. friend may think it amusing, but there are members on this side who fail to see the humour of the situation.

In connection with this matter I wish to direct the attention of the House to an item published in the Ottawa Citizen of to-day, which states that Andrew Mellon, the new Secretary of the United States Treasury, resigned all directorships which he held on taking office under President Harding. I think that is the better method to adopt.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) endeavoured to push the matter to an absurdity. He wanted to infer that we wished to impose celibacy upon the Cabinet. We do not wish to go that far—that, I understand, would be a difficult job. I wish no longer to detain the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: —and I am sorry if my remarks have caused such pain to

hon. gentlemen as to force them to give audible expression to what seems to me an almost discourteous desire to see me finish my remarks. There is no need for me to recapitulate what I said. It seems to me that the whole matter resolves itself down to this very simple proposition. The position of a minister of the Crown demands all a man's energy and skill, and I think that is one thing on which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) and I agree. That being so, if a minister retains directorships, he must, perforce, either neglect state matters or neglect company matters. I believe in most cases he will neglect company matters and give his time and attention to the state. That is unfair. I have made no imputation of wrongdoing to anyone; but there is a possibility that there may be conflict of interest, and the public interest suffers. Even if that never happened, there is always the liability of the public thinking there is something wrong, and we should avoid that at all costs.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. McMaster for the second reading of the Bill, which motion was negatived on the following division:

PRIVATE BILLS

THE JAMES MacLAREN COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. G. H. BOIVIN, for Mr. Fontaine, moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, respecting the James MacLaren Company Limited. He said: When this order was called yesterday, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) made some objections to the reference of this Bill to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. I see that in his remarks he stated that the Bill concerned the construction of railway terminals and telegraph lines, and that possibly it ought to be referred to the Select Standing Committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Since the order has been allowed to stand, the hon. member for Three Rivers has looked into the matter, and he has authorized me to say that he is perfectly willing that the Bill should be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 20, to incorporate The Mayo Valley Railway, Limited.—Mr. Thompson (Yukon).

Bill No. 21, respecting The Oshawa Railway Company.—Mr. Smith.

Bill No. 22, respecting The Thousand Islands Railway Company.—Mr. Smith.

OIL IN THE PRAIRIE PROVINCES

RESOLUTION WITH RESPECT TO OWNERS OF SURFACE RIGHTS WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the proposed Resolution of Mr. Griesbach. That in the opinion of this House, should oil be found and produced in or under any lands in the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba, in which ownership to the sub-surface is in the Crown, the Owner of the surface right shall be entitled to one-sixteenth of such oil, provided that such owner shall have made a homestead entry, or other entry, for the said land prior to the date of the application for the oil lease in the sub-surface. And whereas, all existing leases contain a provision that they are subject to the provisions of the regulations in force at the time of the granting of the same and also any regulations subsequently adopted. Therefore alteration should be made in the regulations to give the owner of the surface rights a similar interest in the oil produced under leases heretofore granted in which no development work has been done upon the said lands under the said leases.

Rt. Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker in the absence of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Griesbach) it might be deemed unfair to go on with this debate just now. Perhaps the order might stand in the meantime. The hon. member, I am just informed, is now in the House and is prepared to withdraw his resolution.

Resolution withdrawn.

STANDARDIZATION OF PARTS OF AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. McCoig moves that I do now leave the Chair for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the standardization of parts of agricultural machinery, and to enact,—

1. That from and after the first day of November, 1922, all agricultural implements and farm wagons manufactured in Canada for use within Canada, shall with respect to the following parts, namely:—Grain Binder Knife Sections, Knife Heads and Pitmans, Mowing Machine Knife Sections, Mowing Machine Knife Heads, Mowing Machine Pitman's Clamps, Mowing Machine Guards and Guard Ledger Plates, Hay Rake Teeth, Land Cultivator Teeth and Cultivator Points, Sprocket Chains—different sizes, Plows Points, Plow Sole Plates, Plow Clevises, Ensilage Blower Pipes, Nuts for Wagon Arms, Machine Bolts and Nuts; be made to conform to the standards prescribed by regulations to be made by the Minister of Agriculture prior to the first day of November, 1921, and approved by the Governor General in Council; and that further and other regulations may be made by the minister from time to time.

2. That from and after the first day of November, 1922, no agricultural implement or farm wagon shall be manufactured in Canada for use within Canada which with respect to the said parts fails to comply with the regulations then in force, and any manufacturer of agricultural implements or farm wagons for use within Canada violating these provisions or regulations shall incur a penalty of not less than $200 and not more than $1,000.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent, O.): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair—

Mr. SPEAKER: I put the motion that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the resolution. Does the hon. member desire to debate that motion?

Mr. McCOIG: I desire to say a few words in connection with the resolution standing in my name. In the first place, it is very gratifying to be able to present to Parliament a resolution of a non-contentious nature such as this which I think will meet with the general approval of the people of Canada, including the manufacturers as well as the users of agricultural implements. I think the manufacturers of agricultural implements should be glad that such a resolution has been presented to Parliament, and particularly if it should be adopted. There never was a time in the history of Canada when the manufacturers were enjoying greater prosperity or higher prices for the goods they are disposing of to the agriculturists of Canada. This resolution, if carried into effect, would put them in the position of having many of the parts of their different implements interchangeable. The parts would be standardized so that if an agricultural implement shipped to a foreign market required a spare part, the purchaser would be in the fortunate position of being able to get the required part from any Canadian manufacturers' agent which would not be the case with purchasers of agricultural implements from manufacturers in other parts of the world. This matter is not an entirely new proposal. It was up last session before the Committee on Agriculture, and in all fairness to the chairman and members of that committee let me say that they all recognized the importance of this proposal, and gave it their hearty endorsation whenever the matter was up for discussion.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that I was not able to advance the Bill I introduced in the House last session dealing with this matter, because it had not been preceded by a resolution, but I repeat, the members of the Committee on Agriculture discussed the matter, and one and all approved the proposal of having the different parts of farm machinery made in this country interchangeable.

For the benefit of hon. members who are not members of the Committee on Agriculture I might say that the first item dealt with in the resolution is grain binder knife sections. As you no doubt are aware, Mr. Speaker, all the sections are of exactly the same size, three inches, the only difference between different makes being that the holes are drilled differently, so that the sections are not interchangeable; that is, one manufacturer's knife sections could not be used on the machine of another manufacturer. At present a man using a Massey-Harris binder who required a knife section would have to get it from the Massey-Harris repair man, whereas if these sections were made interchangeable he could go to the International Harvester Company agent, or the agent of any other Canadian manufacturer living up to these proposed regulations, and get the part he required. The same thing applies to pitmans. They are all wood, but they are made in different sizes, so that if a man breaks a pitman he has to get another part from the agent of the particular company that sold him the machine. The same thing applies to mowing machine knife sections. All the sections of the mowing machines are of the same size, but they are drilled differently. Then the pitman clamps are all of the same length, but they also are made just a little bit differently, so that they are not interchangeable. If this resolution were carried into effect these parts would be standardized, and then if a man wanted a repair part he would not have to drive to the agent of the particular company from whom he bought the machine, but could get the part from any Canadian manufacturer of these implements. If for instance a farmer broke a pitman clamp on his machine while in the hay field at a busy time of the year he would not have to drive to some dealer at a distance to procure the necessary repair. It is an article worth only thirty-five cents, but it is of very great importance, and if these clamps were the same for all makes of machine it would obviate considerable trouble and annoyance when time is of the utmost value. As it is, they are made just a little different in the various makes of machine and are therefore not interchangeable. The same thing applies to the knife heads on mowers. All mowing machine knives are made in five, six and seven foot lengths, and but for a little twist they are almost indentical; but this slight difference renders them uninterchangeable. Now, if this article were standardized a company would not need to reconstruct a mowing machine because the knife heads would be standardized and be made interchangeable, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the resultant saving would be considerable, not only in money but in time also, which is of equal if not greater importance.

Another article which should be standardized—and this is of vital importance—is the ledger plate. The ledger plate has to be repaired from time to time during the lifetime of the machine, and I think it is highly important that a farmer should be able to procure this repair with the slightest possible inconvenience. This also applies to the hay rake teeth and land cultivator teeth. Let me say, for the benefit of hon. members who are not conversant with agricultural implements, that these teeth are of the same size, but they are slightly different in some minor respects and if a man wishes to buy teeth for a rake he may find that the ends of the teeth in one make are bent in the opposite direction to that of the rake he is using, and consequently no end of trouble and annoyance is involved. The standardization of this part of farm machinery could be accomplished without any expense or reconstruction of rakes; the expense to the manufacturer would be very slight indeed. This applies not only to hay rake teeth but also to land cultivator teeth. If a man owned a rake purchased five or ten years ago he could, if my proposal were adopted and these parts were standardized, be able to go to some concern near at hand and get the proper repair.

The next article to which I desire to refer is the sprocket chain. I may say for the benefit of the uninformed on these matters that we could have three or four different sizes of chains but have them all standardized so that whatever number of chain a man wanted he could go to a repair house and get it without any trouble. The next thing is the question of plough points. We have in Ontario to-day five or six different plough firms making what is known as the No. 21 plough, which is the most desirable general purpose plough that can be procured. But the points in the different makes are not identical; there is just enough difference in the way the holes are drilled to prevent their being interchanged. All that would be necessary would be to have the points standardized and the holes drilled in the proper place so that the farmer might be able to go to any plough firm and get the necessary repairs for his machine. The same thing applies to plough sole plates. Let us take blower pipes, which are very much in use. Farmers throughout the country are erecting silos and it is necessary to procure a lot of piping. These pipes could with very little expense be standardized and it would be a great blessing to any farmer using a silo filler. Next we have the question of wagon arms. Now, I would not say that the arm should be standardized, but I contend that the nuts should have the same thread on all wagons. It would cost practically nothing to change the present nuts so as have the threads on all arms of wagons the same. If that were done a farmer who lost a nut off his wagon would not have to go to five or six different repair houses to get his wagon fixed up. There are some other articles on the list such as machine bolts, etc., and while I do not refer to them, I think I have said enough to show the inconvenience to which users of agricultural implements have been put in securing parts for their machines. This is why I am anxious to have this matter brought to the attention of the House. Now, some manufacturers might tell hon. members that they are keeping a large supply of repairs for their particular line of goods in every agency and municipality throughout the country. Well, why did the provincial legislature of Saskatchewan pass the legislation that it did during last session? I quote the following from "Canadian Farm Implements:"

The Saskatchewan Farm Implement Act has been altered by the addition of two new provisions. The first provides a penalty of $100 for each offence where a vendor fails to maintain a sufficient supply of repairs required for machines sold by him and in operation in the province; and the second authorize the Minister of Agriculture to appoint inspectors whose duties shall be to inspect the stocks of repairs kept by vendors and who shall have free access during business hours to the vendors' premises.

This goes to show the importance of having a repair stock kept on hand by different vendors in the agricultural implement business. It is evident that a lot of agencies have not been keeping repairs to supply the farmers; otherwise, it would not have been necessary for the provincial legislature to pass this legislation. If the repair parts were standardized as I suggest it would be unnecessary for a lot of different agents to keep a full stock because one stock would supply the demand in small towns and villages throughout the country. As hon. members know, there are many articles in common household use now that are standardized. It was not such a long time ago when we could not get an electric bulb that would fit any socket. To-day all bulbs are standardized and the convenience in consequence is incalculable. The same thing applies to plumbing; we have plumbing repairs standardized so as to be interchangeable. And so far as automobiles are concerned, tires and rims are standardized; so that a man, regardless of the kind of car he owns, can easily get these parts of his car from any dealer. Now, we have a precedent for standardization of farming implements in action that has been taken abroad, and I might read from "Canadian Farm Implements," printed in Winnipeg, the following:

The Standard Committee of the American Society of Agricultural Engineers reports that excellent progress has been made in stadardization during 1920. The following standards are now ready for final adoption. Standard belt speeds, in which it is proposed to include five speeds, viz., 1,500, 2,600, 3,000, 3,250 and 3,500 feet per minute. Standard tractor and plough hitches, which include height of vertical hitch on tractor and lateral adjustments for ploughs of two, three and four bottoms.

Farm wagon standards, including the standard automobile track of 56 inches and tire widths for wagons of various capacity ratings.

The following standards are in the process of development:

A standard code for testing and rating the belt and drawbar power of tractors.

A standard manger form for dairy barns.

Standard ratings for letter carrier capacities and dimensions.

Standard ratings for capacities and power requirements of ensilage cutters.

This is not an entirely new matter. It started in the United States in many different lines and I feel satisfied that if we do not carry out legislation in the same direction we shall be very much behind the times. I think that the benefits to be derived from the standardization of parts of agricultural machinery are so obvious that this matter needs no great argument. This question has been directed to the attention of many prominent men in this country who are interested in agriculture, as, for instance, the Minister of Agriculture in the government of Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Doherty. I desire in this connection to quote the following:

I represent the United Farmers of Ontario. This matter has been up for discussion at meetings of the United Farmers during the past year. It is a very live question with the farmers of the province. They are very quick to see the immense advantages that would accrue to them from the standardization of the wearable and breakable parts of their machines. Last fall there was a meeting of the Fairs and Exhibitions Association in Toronto, and they discussed this matter at some considerable length, and passed a resolution. I only refer to these matters to show the members of this Committee that the farmers of the province of Ontario will appreciate anything you can accomplish along the line which you are now following, and would be very grateful for any results that can be secured, along that line. I congratulate you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee upon taking up a question that is of such vital importance to the farmers. At the Fairs and Exhibitions Association, in which 350 agricultural societies of Ontario are represented, the following resolution was passed:

"That this Association in Convention assembled hereby express their hearty approval of the standardization of the breakable and wearable parts of farm machinery and would respectfully recommend that the Federal Government arrange for a committee of mechanical experts, three to be appointed by the Federal Government and three by the manufacturers of farming implements to arrange for such standardization and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Sir Robert Borden and Hon. T. A. Crerar."

This statement, Mr. Speaker, only goes to show that the farmers of this country know how important this question is. They know the hardships everybody engaged in farming has to contend with during the busy harvesting time and they know how easy it would be for the manufacturers of our country to standardize some of the parts I have referred to. I hope the members of the House will give this matter their most serious consideration and will follow it up by according their support to the resolution. I feel satisfied that if they do so, the users of agricultural implements will be extremely grateful to this Parliament. The Canadian manufacturers of agricultural implements will not be hurt to any extent but will be fortunate in the years to come to be in the happy position that they will be able to secure in European markets, as well as at home, the patronage of the users of agricultural implements for their machinery, in preference to the implements of foreign manufacturers.

Mr. R. C. HENDERS (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact, as the mover of the resolution has remarked, that this question is not a new one but has received some consideration from the House in previous sessions, I, as chairman of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture, before whom a full discussion of the matter took place and upon whose advice arrangements have been made for the carrying on of an investigation with regard to securing all the necessary information as to what would be a proper solution of this very important question, deem it to be my privilege and my duty to make a few observations at this time. I wish it distinctly understood that any remarks I have to make will be perfectly in accord with those of the last speaker as to the desirability of a standardization of the important parts of agricultural implements. But my special object in speaking on the present occasion, is to draw attention to the fact that the Standing Committee on Agriculture has been giving consideration to this question for a considerable time, and that it has appointed a sub-committee to conduct an investigation and to hold conferences with manufacturers who are directly interested in the other side of the question. I may state that such conferences have been held and such discussions carried on, as tend to throw some light on this important question. Further, the matter is still under review by the Committee on Agriculture. The first meeting of that committee for the present session, which is now arranged for, has on its agenda the taking up of business left over from the sittings of the committee last session. Under that heading the present question will come under review. No doubt the sub-committee, of which the mover of the resolution is a member, will make certain recommendations to the general committee. Then the Standing Committee on Agriculture, with all the facts before it, will bring in certain recommendations to the House. Therefore in view of what has been done by that committee, and the sub-committee as well, I think it would be better for the House to defer any lengthened discussion of the matter until such time as the findings of the committee are brought down. I therefore beg to move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Harold):

That all the words after the word "that" in the first paragraph of the said resolution be struck out and that the whole question incorporated in the Motion before the House be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture for their further consideration, requesting said Committee to bring in such recommendations as their investigation of the facts will warrant.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think, perhaps, the amendment would be in better form if the two paragraphs by way of preamble were omitted.

Mr. HENDERS: The last clause is the important one, and in fact all that I included in the amendment.

Mr. FIELDING: If you strike out everything except the word "that," there is no question to be referred to the Committee. I do not know whether my hon. friend is prepared to accept it or not, but the better way would be, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, which, it seems to me, would affect the purpose he has in view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It struck me that way at first, but on further consideration, I am inclined to think the amendment is in order.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not say it is not in order, I say it is not very intelligible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not very intelligible to me before. The motion is, that the Speaker do now leave the Chair in order that this resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole. The hon. member moves that everything after "that" be omitted.

Mr. FIELDING: In the motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That the Speaker do now leave the Chair, and that instead of this motion this resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. FIELDING: No. That the question incorporated in the resolution be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SPEAKER: The resolution reads properly and carries out the intent of the mover. I suggest in the first place that the two paragraphs by way of preamble be stricken out because they are not essential to the motion at all. The motion as submitted by the hon. member is as follows:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out, and that the whole question incorporated in the resolution before the House be submitted to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for their further consideration, requesting said committee to bring in such recommendation as their investigation of the facts shall warrant.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Mr. BUREAU: The amendment reads?

Mr. SPEAKER: That all the words after "that" be struck out, and that the whole question incorporated in the resolution before the House be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture for their further consideration—

Mr. BUREAU: You leave the word "that" in No. 1?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not essential that the word "that" should be left there at all. The essential thing is to have the resolution referred back to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. FIELDING: That is not what the amendment says.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Should not the amendment be, that the Speaker do not now leave the Chair?

Mr. SPEAKER: That would give the amendment a better form, but I did not want to emasculate the motion entirely. I may say that I had not seen it before, and I am trying to assist the hon. mover of the motion.

Mr. McCOIG: In view of the statement made by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Henders) as chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, I shall be glad to adopt his suggestion that the resolution be sent to his committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I should like to ask a question of my hon. friend for Macdonald, who is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. Can he give the House any assurance that this matter will be considered by that Standing Committee and a report presented in time for action by this House if deemed necessary?

Mr. HENDERS: I have pleasure in stating that notice is already in the hands of the secretary of the committee to deal with this matter as unfinished business from last session.

Mr. CRERAR: That answer is not quite satisfactory. I should like to have an assurance that the matter will be placed before this House for action this session, if necessary.

Mr. HENDERS: I cannot speak for the committee, but, speaking for myself, I can say that this matter will come regularly before the committee for their consideration, and it will come in the form in which this amendment presents it, which simply means that the question will come up for consideration by the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the amendment as I have put it to the House reads properly and is quite in order.

Amendment agreed to.

TAR SAND RIGHTS REGULATIONS

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton):

Why were the regulations established by Order in Council dated the 14th day of February, 1910, for the disposal of Tar Sand Rights in the province of Alberta, suspended by Order in Council dated the 31st day of May, 1912 (P. C. 1486)?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

As it appeared that no process for the commercial recovery of oil and other by-products from these tar-sands had at that time been perfected, and as a further examination of the deposit and research work in connection therewith appeared to be necessary to determine the value of these tar-sands, it was considered advisable in the public interest to suspend the regulations for the disposal of such rights.

GENL. WM. BETHUNE LINDSAY, M.I.E.C.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton):

1. Has General William Bethune Lindsay, M.I.E.C., secured or selected the 1920 acres of Tar Sand Rights in the province of Alberta, as granted to him by Order in Council, P.C. 1547, and dated the 8th day of July, 1920?

ALBERTA OIL LEASE RENTALS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Strathcona):

1. What amount of money has been collected by the Government from oil leases in the province of Alberta during the years 1905 to 1920 inclusive?

2. What amount of money has been collected by the Government from gas leases in the province of Alberta during the years 1905 to 1920 inclusive?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN:

1. $2,384,008.29.

[Mr. H. A. Mackie.]

2. The petroleum and natural gas rights are included in all leases issued, so that the above amount was collected on account of petroleum and natural gas.

HUDSON BAY COMPANY LANDS

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry-Stormont):

1. When does or did the time expire for the selection of lands provided for in the transfer of the Hudson Bay Company's right to the Government in 1870?

2. When are or were lands reserved by the Crown for selection by the Hudson's Bay Company, and not selected, released for settlement?

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY:

1. 23rd June, 1920.

2. Such lands have not been released for settlement.

BRIQUETTING PLANT AT BIENFAIT, SASK.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie):

1. What is the total amount of moneys spent up to date on briquetting plant in Saskatchewan at the lignite coal fields?

2. What is the estimated cost of the plant when completed?

3. What will be its briquetting capacity?

4. When may we expect to have briquettes on the market?

5. Are there any by-products to be developed in connection with this plant? If so, what are they?

6. Is the erection of the plant being done by contract or day labour, or on a percentage basis?

7. If by contract, were tenders called and who are the contractors?

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE:

1. The total expenditure by The Lignite Utilization Board on the briquetting plant at Bienfait, Saskatchewan, and in preliminary investigations up to February 24, 1921, was $399,578.45. Of this sum one-half was provided by the Federal Government, and the other half, in equal amounts, by the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

2. The estimated total cost of the necessary preliminary investigations, the plant (and houses) when completed is $675,000.

3. The minimum capacity of the plant will be 100 tons of briquettes per day.

4. It is expected that briquettes will be produced at the plant about the month of June, 1921, and as soon as the necessary period of trial and adjustment is concluded these will be placed on the open market through the ordinary channels of trade.

5. The only by-products that the board contemplates removing from the gas are the lignite tars and pitches. The board is attempting to find a market for this material at the present moment. The gas itself is to be used to heat the carbonizers and also probably the rotary dryers.

6. The buildings, plant and houses are being erected by contract. The contract is of a special cost plus nature with bonus and penalty clauses of various kinds. The raw lignite handling equipment, the conveyors, the piping, the valves, power wiring, the motors, the dryers, the boilers, the mixers, and the briquetting press, are being supplied on contract after competitive bidding. The carbonizers are being built by day labour (owing to exceptionally high prices quoted on competitive bidding), and the erection of a great deal of the equipment is being done also by day labour.

7. The plant buildings and the houses have been erected by contract for which public tenders were advertised. Seven tenders were received, and the contract was awarded to the lowest bidder, Messrs. Smith Bros. & Wilson, Limited, Regina, Sask.

*Mr. COWAN:

1. When will the briquetting plant now being erected at Bienfait be completed?
2. After completion, how is the product to be handled?
3. If sold by local agents, who will appoint the said agents?
4. At what price will the briquettes be sold?
5. What is the amount now expended by the Federal Government in this plant?

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE:

1. It is expected that the briquetting plant being erected by the Lignite Utilization Board at Bienfait, Saskatchewan, will be producing briquettes about the month of June, 1921.

2. The product of the plant is to be marketed through the ordinary channels of trade.

3. The question of agency has not yet been settled. The appointment of any agent or agents rests with the Lignite Utilization Board.

4. The Lignite Utilization Board cannot at present commit itself to any statement as to price at which briquettes will be sold, but the price will be well below the price at which anthracite coal is selling to-day in the Manitoba market.

5. The total expenditure by the Lignite Utilization Board on the briquetting plant at Bienfait, Saskatchewan, and in preliminary investigations up to February 24, 1921, was $399,578.45. Of this sum one-half was provided by the Federal Government, and the other half, in equal amounts, by the Provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

3. What compensation was paid to each of them to date, and what amount, if any, is still owing them?

GREAT LAKES—ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TRANSPORTATION

Mr. F. H. KEEFER (Port Arthur and Kenora) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a Special Committee consisting of members should be appointed to consider and investigate the benefits to be derived from a deep waterway for transportation from the Great Lakes to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence river, having regard in particular to the benefits arising from the then increased navigation facilities and the utilization of the Hydro-Electric energy of the St. Lawrence river, and that the Special Committee have power to hold sessions in Ottawa or elsewhere during the recess of Parliament and have power to call for persons, papers, or records and to examine witnesses, under oath, and to report from time to time to this House.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the deepening of the St. Lawrence river has been pronounced by some of the best minds of the United States and Canada as probably one of the greatest economic questions of the day. It is greatest in its magnitude, greatest in the benefits which its accomplishment would bring about. It is desirable, therefore, that the matter should be investigated by members of the House so that when we return to our constituencies we can, in turn, explain it to them, and it is with that purpose in view that I have moved this resolution. I hope that the press will do all that they can to give publicity to the matter.

I think it advisable to give at this stage a short account of the history of the deep waterway transportation question from the Great Lakes to the sea, by way of the St. Lawrence river. About two years ago five of the states of the Northwest United States organized themselves into a body known as the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, with the sole object of endeavouring to get their products to the sea. To show you how serious they were in the matter, I may point out that each of these states subscribed $10,000 from their legislative moneys, making a fund of $50,000 to carry on a propaganda at Washington. They went to Washington with their senators and congressmen, and, of course, the Administration granted their request, and the matter was referred to the International Joint Commission. The International Joint Commission then received from the two Governments certain questions to be answered—questions of a two-fold nature, one economic, and the other engineering. Each Government appointed an engineer to assist the Commission and prepare estimates as to what the cost of the project would be. The Commission has been holding sessions all over Canada and the United States; with, I believe, one more sitting at Detroit they will conclude their public hearings, and it is expected that their report will be published in Ottawa about the second week in April, when their regular statutory sittings are held.

Now, this motion for a committee is in no way to interfere with or to derogate from the International Joint Commission. It is important that we come to understand this question just as our cousins to the South have understood it. They have realized the importance of it; it is equally important to us—not, of course, in point of population, the United States outnumbering us ten to one, but the benefit is common in all other respects.

I should like to say a few words with regard to the benefits that will be derived from this project when completed. They are two-fold in their nature, one affecting the question of transportation, and the other the question of fuel and the development of power as a substitute for fuel. As regards transportation, it goes without saying that it is the tie which binds the different parts of the country together. If isolated parts of a dominion or an empire are without means of transportation, without means of getting to or from the centres or the markets, the sentiment of attachment slowly dies out, and, feeling their isolation, the separated parts are liable to drop off and fall away. It is apparent therefore, that the development of means of transportation is bound to promote the public good. I would like our friends in the prairie country to realize that the problem in no way conflicts with that which is very dear to their hearts—the Hudson Bay Railway project. When the International Joint Commission held sittings at various points on the prairies the suggestion was made that there might be an interference in this connection. But we do not wish in any way to interfere with the Hudson Bay Railway project; this proposal in no way touches it or affects it.

Now, what are the benefits of these transportation facilities? I have lived for some thirty years at the head of the Lakes. Originally the movement of freight was from the East to the West. I have seen the wheat going into the West steadily and none going out, and I have seen, as is the condition to-day, hundreds of millions of bushels going from the West to the East. Heretofore Canada has endeavoured to meet this situation by the use of her canal systems but owing to the changes which have taken place we are now behind the times. We ship the grain from Port Arthur in vessels carrying 500,000 bushels, but vessels of that kind can only go as far as Port Colborne, and it takes four ships of present Welland and St. Lawrence canal size to carry that same cargo from Port Colborne to Montreal. Necessarily, because of the large carrying capacity, the freight charge to Port Colborne or to Buffalo is lower than it is for the comparatively short distance from Port Colborne to Montreal. The rate last year was four cents from the head of the Lakes to Port Colborne or Buffalo, a voyage occupying about five days. If the rate for that five days trip is four cents a bushel, it is not unreasonable to assume that for two days additional journey the rate would be an additional two cents a bushel. If therefore, the vessel did not have to discharge at Port Colborne, the rate through to Montreal from Port Arthur, Duluth or Chicago would be six cents a bushel. But under the present procedure the grain does not go to Montreal; it is unloaded at Buffalo and shipped to New York. It costs twelve cents a bushel to get it from Buffalo to New York by rail and the barge canal rate is now practically the same as the rail rate. People do not realize that Buffalo or Port Colborne are as near to the market at, say, Liverpool by the St. Lawrence as New York is in distance.

That being the case, why unnecessarily transport this grain four or five hundred miles more to New York and have that cost of transporting the grain and then be just as far away as when you were at Buffalo? I make the statement that there will be to every producer of grain in the West a direct saving the moment a ship can go straight through with a large cargo to Montreal, instead of breaking bulk en route. When the vessel is at Montreal, she is three or four hundred miles nearer Liverpool than if she were at New York, and the rate from Montreal to Liverpool is the same as the rate from New York to Liverpool. It is quite clear that you can save five cents a bushel on all the grains of the West if they can be moved without breaking bulk at the foot of lake Erie. Let me explain the reason why. The price of every article is, of course, governed by the market, and the market for our grain is in Europe. The producer, the farmer in the West, gets that market price, less the cost, including brokerage, insurance and everything else, of getting his product to the market. If, therefore, you can reduce the transportation charges by five cents, you are going to put that saving into every producer's pocket, and it needs no mathematical computation by me to show how the producers of the West are going to benefit. Grain for export and grain which is used for home consumption command the same price. So much for grain.

As regards flour, the moment you handle any package freight, the cost runs up very largely, and the saving on package freight will be very large. One of the problems with which this country has to grapple is to get the flour out instead of simply moving out the grain, because it is very much more profitable to Canada to ship out flour and to keep the by-products of grain in our country as far as we can than it is to ship out wheat. One can readily see that on articles like dairy produce, canned goods and package freight of that kind, that has to be handled two or three times, the saving will be considerable. I should like to call the attention of hon. members to what I found in my mail box this morning. This is a newspaper called the Weekly Market News and Financial Farmer. I do not know where or by whom it is published. It was sent to me as a marked copy containing a report of the Wheat Board; but in it is a copy of an address given by Julius H. Barnes, who was formerly Wheat Director and President of the United States Grain Corporation, and with the permission of the House I should like to read what Mr. Barnes said in his address to the Farmers Marketing Committee of Seventeen at Chicago on November 5, 1920. Mr. Barnes is the recognized authority in the United States on these questions. In the middle of his address he speaks of the improvement possible in the relative position of the producer, and under the head of water transportation he says:

> It follows then that a project such as that before the country to-day of so improving the St. Lawrence that ocean carriers reach the western ports of the Great Lakes or that the Lake carriers may deliver their cargoes alongside the ocean carriers in the St. Lawrence instead of breaking the bulk at Buffalo, deserves the earnest consideration and support of those who have at heart the improvement of the relative position of the western producer.

Then he goes on to say:

> Its relation to the farm delivery cost simply stated is this: The present rail rate from Buffalo to New York is twelve cents per bushel. Also, to reach Montreal, the rail rate from Georgian bay is also approximately 12 cents per bushel. Ocean carriers may be secured at the same rate from Montreal as from New York. The opening of the St. Lawrence waterway and the improvement of the Welland canal, already undertaken by Canada, would enable the lake carrier to Buffalo to extend its trip to Montreal—only forty-eight hours longer—at a cost probably not exceeding two cents per bushel. This promises a saving of ten cents a bushel during part of the year. Its influence may reasonably be calculated to affect and improve the farm price by five cents per bushel on the entire grain crops of that section of the country whose arc of competitive rail rates would thus be centred on the Great lakes ports —Duluth, Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland.

He is speaking from the point of view of the United States side of the line and, of course, what he says is equally applicable to the Canadian side.

> This applies to home consumption as well as exportable surplus, so it may reasonably be calculated on some 4,000,000,000 bushels of grain or $200,000,000 annually.

If the United States and Canada could realize that they are losing to the producers of grain $200,000,000 annually by not setting this canal built, I think we would get a little more rapid movement than we have had so far. There are in the United States some gentlemen who, since this organization started, made this statement —and I believe it can be justified when you compute the package freight as well as everything else—that it would pay the two countries, Canada and the United States, to build this canal each year and tear it down and rebuild it rather than continue without it as at present. If that be true, or anywhere nearly true, the question arises, even if we are hard up, even if we need to conserve in every respect, which is better—to spend some money on this project and pay sinking fund and interest upon it and have something from year to year, or to throw away twice, or three times, or five times the amount annually? That is what the situation is going to boil down to. I feel perfectly certain that when the Government and this House realize the financial side of this question, they will not allow this project to be delayed any longer. So much for the question of package freight.

I see the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) opposite me. I hope to see the day when a ship will be able to come with coal from his town of Sydney up to the head of the lakes and deliver it there, which is a thing that cannot be done to-day. Ontario is and has been suffering from a coal famine, and I cannot see why that coal should not be marketed in Ontario and brought up even to the head of the lakes and used on the railways further west. Every year large quantities of Pennsylvania coal are brought up to the head of the lakes and stored for railway systems. There is, to my mind, no reason why, if those vessels did not have to break bulk, they could not load with coal in Nova Scotia, carry it right to the head of the lakes and bring back grain which could be shipped overseas from Nova Scotia.

Somebody may say, as has frequently been said, that this will never be used by salt water ships, but it is rather difficult to say these days that anything will not happen. Let us think for a moment what is happening. The Kiel canal did not simply open up a new navigation system; it shortened a journey by about three or four hundred miles. Formerly, ships could go round by Jutland; now they go through the Kiel canal, thus saving three or four hundred miles, and before the war many ships were using that route. We know the situation in regard to the Suez canal. What is the effect of the Panama canal, which is a locking system and which is quite a long one?

Let me show you what effect the Panama Canal has had upon the Middle States and the same thing will apply to our Middle Northwest. In Montana the Anaconda mine produces zinc and copper ores. The market for that zinc and copper is New York city. To transport it by rail would cost so much. Since the Panama Canal has been built, the owners of that mine have found that by shipping their product to Seattle, and then by vessels through the Panama Canal to New York, they are saving six cents a hundred pounds in freights, or $1,000,000 a year. They transport by rail to Seattle, on the Pacific coast, I said, which is exactly the same distance from their mine as Duluth, upon Lake Superior. They could transport their product to Duluth by rail, and the rate ought to be less because they do not have to climb the divide. Then from Duluth to New York by water, the rate is forty per cent. of what it is from Seattle, and therefore it is computed they will save at least three cents a pound, which will amount to a saving of $500,000 per annum on that one mine, if they could ship without breaking bulk from Duluth by water. So it will be with many another industry in Canada and the United States.

Ah, but some say, you will never have coastwise trade from the Great Lakes to the sea board. Why not? If the Strait of Gibraltar were not open boats would not go past there, but as it is open, the boats do go in. It is much longer to go around by Gibraltar from the Baltic ports than to ship across land by rail, and yet the produce of all those countries goes round by water. The route to Constantinople is 800 or 900 miles longer by water than by rail, yet the freight from, say, Antwerp or London, all goes by water. Why should not the same thing happen here? Why should not ships from Boston, New York and inland ports on the great lake system use this waterway once it is open?

Take another example of a canal. Manchester was feeling the loss of her manufacturing business. In order to get rid of the high cost of handling, manufacturing firms were moving away from Manchester to the sea board. A man, I think, by the name of Stevenson hammered away until he got the Manchester Ship Canal built. It is some 35 miles long, with 5 locks. What has been the result of the building of that canal? To-day Manchester is the third largest shipping port in Great Britain. Now, if salt water ships will go up that 35 miles of canal and through 5 locks, for the traffic coming out of the one port of Manchester, why should not salt water ships come up this inland waterway to Buffalo, Detroit, Erie, Chicago and Ontario ports, and serve both them and the whole country tributary thereto? Why, Mr. Speaker, there is no country in the world that is so rich in products natural and manufactured as the Great Lakes country. You take any area 300 or 400 miles away from the Great Lakes and draw a line round on the map and see what you cover. Look at the natural timber wealth, look at the natural mineral wealth, look at the agricultural wealth and the manufacturing wealth of all those cities and prairie towns. This waterway would double and treble the transportation facilities, and the minute you reduced the cost of freights you would get articles moving that are not moving now.

Some may say that salt water ships would not be able to come up on account of their draught. They may not want to come, but they do elsewhere. Salt water ships go a thousand miles up the Amazon river. Now, ships can float in fresh water as in salt, and on the question of draught, let me give you some figures of the large ports of the world. The depth at Odessa, the great wheat port of Russia, is only 24 feet, Petrograd, 19 1-2 feet, Riga 23 feet, Libau 27 1-2 feet, Constantinople 22 feet. Our canals are going down to 30 feet on the sill, and 25 feet in the channel of over 800 feet in length and when the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence canals are built, it is estimated that 86 per cent. of the salt water tonnage can, if it wishes, reach Lake Erie. The popular idea is that ships are too large to come up these canals, but the number of very large ships on the ocean is very small compared with the number of tramp vessels, just as the number of Pullman cars is relatively small compared with the number of box cars on the railways. The number of vessels that draw more than 24 feet of water is relatively small. You have a few Mauretanias, Lusitanias, Leviathans, and so forth, but not many, while you have thousands of tramp vessels carrying only freight cargoes. I expect to see the day when these ships can find their way into any port on this inland Mediterranean. In the early days I have as a lawyer protested a ship from Antwerp, coming up the lakes with a cargo of rails. Now if that ship can come over from Antwerp, I cannot see why, if the canal is made large enough, any other salt water ship cannot come. These vessels will not take the place of our fresh water marine. These vessels are built for quick transportation with 30 or 40 hatches than can be quickly opened and shut, ensuring rapid receiving and rapid delivery. They will always continue to handle iron ore and wheat. A tramp steamer may occasionally come in for a cargo of wheat, but these tramp vessels in the main would take a large amount of stuff that is not now moving, but that would move if the freight rate was reduced. They would take dairy products, for instance, and any kind of package freight, and it is in that kind of freight that the cost of handling runs up very fast on account of there being so much handling in and out of cars, vessels, and freight sheds. That class of business would materially be benefited. Meats, bacon, and all that sort of thing would move more freely and cheaply. One of the chief objections to this route has come from the city of Buffalo. It was very pleasant indeed to be in Montreal, and to observe the contrast. Each of these two places was largely affected in the same manner. They feared the stoppage of breaking in bulk. Montreal took the broad view and said that what was good for Canada was good for Montreal. Buffalo said: Why, this will ruin Buffalo. You take a 10,000 ton ship that comes to Buffalo and it means employment for so many hands to get the freight out of the ship, transport it across to the railway car, and get it to New York; the same thing in New York, and vice versa on the return. "Exactly," said those opponents of Buffalo in the West. "That is what we want to stop. We do not want to continue paying that tribute to you unnecessarily, and that will be the effect. Buffalo will however gain greatly by this development; she will become a seaport as near to Liverpool as New York is. She will have the Erie Canal to bring in by barge freight a large amount of manufactured products from the centres of industrial life, and instead of losing business she will gain." On the contrary, it is pleasing to see that Montreal took the view that even though she should lose she would not stand in the way of the development of the great West of Canada.

The other phase of the question is that of Hydro-Electric energy. It has been estimated that on the St. Lawrence river the horsepower available is some 4,000,000 and only a small fraction thereof has been used. It could not all be used at once, nor could it be consumed for some time to come. But we are rapidly running short of electrical energy. We of Ontario know what the significance has been during the last two years of orders coming from the Hydro-Electric: "shut off your current for such and such a time." It is a serious thing for the industrial life of the country. What would be the effect of this in a town that depended on this electric energy? Ordinarily it is estimated, I think, that it takes ten tons of coal for one horsepower. That means $100 per horsepower, and yet we can do it Hydro-Electrically for $25. Why do we not do it? Simply because we are asleep. We are wasting that much money all the time. Ontario has awakened to this fact until she has used up all the power produced at Niagara Falls and is building a canal down to Queenstown, the intention being practically to scrap the plants built at Niagara Falls eventually in order to get the full benefit or head of the water there. We have 4,000,000 horsepower running to waste on the St. Lawrence. Practically three-fourths of that is Canadian. That 4,000,000 horsepower would represent 40,000,000 tons of coal. We are importing every year fifteen or twenty million tons of coal, going on our knees to the United States to obtain it, and paying high exchange for it. The day is not very far distant when that coal will not be allowed to come into this country, for eventually it will have to be conserved for use in the United States. It behooves us, therefore, seriously to consider this matter. I see that the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) has a motion on the Order Paper asking for a committee to investigate the coal question, and I think it would be well for him to associate himself with this motion and, if we get that committee, to bring out before it the facts which he desires to deal with. Once the barrier at the St. Lawrence is open we can have coal come up from Nova Scotia or anywhere else, even Swansea, England, or any other place. Coal carriers do come over from the Old Country to United States ports and I see no reason why they could not enter Canadian ports as well. If we once get this energy developed there will be between Montreal and Toronto on both sides of the river the greatest hive of industrial life that the world has ever seen. We do not realize what it means. If we can once get the people to realize that there is any quantity of electrical energy there that can be developed steadily, with industry after industry located there, it will mean an enormous benefit for Canada, because they can get their power cheap as well as transportation to and from there on the highway of the sea. The salt water ships can come to them, and the point is an ideal manufacturing one.

I do not know that there is anything in regard to which the whole of Canada would be so greatly benefited. I have roughly outlined the benefit that would accrue to the farming community of the West, and the consumer would be benefited by the increased production that would ensue. Why should Boston and the large cities of the East be short of food when it is rotting in the interior? The cry all the time is "No cars." In addition to that, the cost of manufactured articles should be reduced because of the cheapness of electricity. I hope, therefore, that this House will begin to study this question and try to realize that although we are hard up and need to be careful and not spend money unnecessarily, we should not continue to lose money as we are doing at the present time.

That is the whole gist of the motion. I do not know a better time at which this matter could be brought up. This project would be mutually beneficial to the two countries. The United States and Canada would be co-operating in its construction and that could have only one result, namely, a great benefit. It would also be world-wide in its effects in the cheapening of products. And above all things, I do not think there is a better time for us to begin to tackle this question. It will take a year yet before we can get the proper engineering data to tackle the question. But, Mr. Speaker, let us look at this matter in the light of a peace memorial. Just before the war broke out in 1914 there was under way a project to construct an international bridge at Niagara as a memorial to the hundred years of peace between Great Britain and the United States, and it does seem to me that a work like this, international in character, would make one of the finest peace memorials and of our co-operation as allies which we could possibly conceive.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) and I find that his resolution calls for a special committee consisting of an unspecified number of members for the consideration and investigation of the benefits to be derived from a deep waterway for transportation from the Great Lakes to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence river. The House is very well aware of the fact that a similar commission was appointed some years ago to study the water-powers, the water levels, and the whole question which my hon. friend would like to have investigated at the present time, and that that commission decided at the time, after a study of the St. Lawrence waterway, that the only possible settlement of the transportation question by way of water would be from the Great Lakes down through the Ottawa river to Montreal.

There were very many reasons adduced in favour of the project, some of which my hon. friend (Mr. Keefer) has mentioned this evening. I recall the discussion of this matter in this House upon different occasions. I remember it was pointed out that our Nova Scotia coal could not get farther west than Montreal owing to the expense of its carriage by rail; but that by the construction of the Georgian Bay Canal, Nova Scotia coal could be transported up the Ottawa river. The great advantage of the Ottawa River route over the St. Lawrence route, which my hon. friend endorses to-night, is that it would give the whole of the upper Ottawa country, and all the lands within reach of the Ottawa river, a chance of being developed. There are untold natural resources in that country, but they cannot be developed and the products carried out at present because of the expensive rail rates. This is a story that many members of the House are familiar with. Still there are a considerable number who were not in Parliament when the discussion of the Georgian Bay Canal project invariably formed part of the proceedings of the House on one, if not two days of each session. My hon. friend surely would not like to see set aside the recommendation of the commission which the Government appointed to inquire into this project, and whose report is a wonderful work which must be in the Library of Parliament; I know I would not be without a copy of it in my own home. Surely he would not ignore the surveys which were then made of the whole of the waterway system from the Great Lakes down, and in which due account was taken of the possible electrical development. The power development possible on the St. Lawrence system does not begin to compare with that capable of being developed through the medium of the water powers along the Ottawa river. Many people have mistaken the idea of the Georgian Bay canal by imagining that it is proposed to construct a canal from one end of the system to the other. The canal system is a very small part of the project. There are a great many natural water courses along the route and out of approximately four hundred miles, if I remember correctly, there would be but very few miles of canal system to be constructed. My hon. friend from Port Arthur would enjoy, through the Georgian Bay system, all the facilities that he would have if the system which he has so eloquently advocated to-night were built. I really would not like to embarrass the Government but I am sure that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. McCurdy) is now telling the Prime Minister that his department is already in possession of the reports, plans and surveys made in the past of the water ways along the proposed Georgian Bay Canal route; and that department is perfectly familiar with the matter.

Mr. McCURDY: A pretty good guess.

Mr. DEVLIN: Does the minister say that those reports are not in his possession?

Mr. McCURDY: I am not saying.

Mr. DEVLIN: I do not think I am making a wrong guess.

Mr. KEEFER: Is the hon. member aware of the fact that the St. Lawrence route involves the construction of only about five locks from Prescott to Montreal; that out of these five, two are necessary to get into Lake St. Louis; and that when you get into Lake St. Louis there is only six feet—something like that, a small amount at any rate—of a rise by means of a lock to get into the Ottawa river? Therefore two-fifths of the St. Lawrence locks would form part of the Georgian Bay Canal system?

Mr. DEVLIN: How many locks are there at present?

Mr. KEEFER: There are twenty-five now. There are twenty-six on the Welland canal, and there would be seven on the new Welland canal, and five on the new St. Lawrence system.

Mr. DEVLIN: I am convinced that what would tend to the success of the Georgian Bay system would not only be the carrying power which it would give, but the development of electrical power which would result from it. My hon. friend from Port Arthur must admit that there is a greater electrical power to be developed on the Ottawa river than on the St. Lawrence. The fact must also be held in mind that at the present moment there is considerable data in existence dealing with the cost of construction of the Georgian Bay project, and other details. However, that is all I wish to say at this stage of the proceedings, because I have spoken so often on the subject of the Georgian Bay canal, that I prefer not to speak now at any greater length.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and interest to the very able presentation of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer). I have also listened with considerable interest to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Devlin) and I must frankly say that it afforded me very great and unusual pleasure to hear him say in the course of his remarks that he would not wish to embarrass the Government. Such political mellowness on the part of my hon. friend is so extremely unusual that it could not pass unnoticed. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on this new development of a kindly nature hitherto unsuspected on my part at least. I hope he will continue to develop along the same line and that he will exhibit in the days and years to come the same desire which he has expressed to-night, a desire not to embarrass the Government. Hitherto I have never seen the hon. gentleman manifest any such spirit. However,

> While the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest sinner may return.

I do not wish to insinuate that the hon. gentleman is the vilest of sinners or even a sinner, but I do hope that he will continue along that line and not try to embarrass the Government.

Mr. DEVLIN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me?

Mr. EDWARDS: Certainly.

Mr. DEVLIN: I merely wish to ask my hon. friend if I did not use the words "unduly embarrass the Government"?

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, I apologize most abjectly to the hon. gentleman for leaving out the word "unduly". It was certainly an oversight on my part, for I might have known that the hon. gentleman would have some qualifying word in regard to his attitude towards the Government. We are to assume by that qualification that he is prepared to carry on this work of embarrassment of the Government to the extent of his ability.

However, Mr. Speaker, it was not in reference to that feature that I wished to speak. This matter of the canalization of the St. Lawrence river for vessels of the deepest draft is something which has long since passed the dream stage and has reached the point where men of the greatest ability, both in the United States and Canada, are giving the question most serious consideration. I have nothing to say in regard to the project for the Georgian Bay-Ottawa route. I can understand the position of my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin), representing the constituency that he does, in availing himself of this opportunity to make a little political capital for himself. Very well, there is no objection to that, I presume. And if he has that right, and honestly he will raise no question along that line, then I will claim the same right for myself, and, situated as I am down near the foot of deepwater navigation in the county of Frontenac, in which county the city of Kingston has the honour to occupy a little corner, I may say that we in that part of the country are very greatly interested in this project of making the St. Lawrence navigable for vessels of the deepest draft.

There may be very serious objections to this project. Unquestionably it will cost a large amount of money; so will the proposed Georgian Bay-Ottawa scheme. Is that any reason why we should not give it the most serious consideration? The resolution of the hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a special committee consisting of hon. members should be appointed to consider and investigate the benefits to be derived from a deep waterway for transportation from the Great Lakes to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence river,—

The matter has been considered by able gentleman on both sides of the line—very seriously considered. Why, then, should it not be considered by hon. members of this House? I think the resolution is most proper and most opportune. You cannot throw this scheme to one side. Let a special committee be appointed, as the hon. gentleman asks, and let that committee investigate, seek evidence and so on. All the points which my hon. friend from Wright would seek to advance in favour of the route which appeals to him will of course come before that committee.

Mr. DEVLIN: Not for political reasons.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, perhaps not. But, still sticking to the notion which I expressed awhile ago, that my hon. friend would make use of such an opportunity for political purposes—

Mr. DEVLIN: But the county has been all divided.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well apart from political considerations, let us look at this matter from the standpoint of a great national enterprise.

Mr. DEVLIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: Why should my hon. friend or any other hon. gentleman object to this special committee? May I repeat, and I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me, that such a committee in considering evidence connected with the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence route would unquestionably have brought before it alternative reasons for the other route which my hon. friend favours. Surely he will agree with me there. The whole thing, it seems to me, is very advisable, because the object is to bring out the facts in connection with this route. If it has advantages over any other route, well and good, we want to know that. If in the opinion of the committee it turns out that some other route has advantages over this route, then I presume that my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) as well as myself would be the first to say "Very well, let us adopt that route."

Nature has so placed these Great Lakes that I believe it was intended that they should be utilized for the benefit of the people of this country. We have undertaken to utilize them to some extent, for we have a canal system, constructed perhaps in accordance with the needs of the country at the time it was undertaken. We have time and again acknowledged that that system was not sufficient for this growing country, and this House accepted that principle when it decided to enlarge the Welland canal. If you enlarge the Welland canal so as to permit the largest vessels to pass down lake Ontario, what follows as a matter of course? The largest vessels would load at Fort William, come down through the Welland canal and into Lake Ontario. Already Oswego is taking steps to look after all the grain which will come down from the head of the lakes by those big vessels, and they will try to get more than their share of that business. I want to avail myself of the opportunity to say that the time has arrived and long since passed when every dollar voted by this Parliament for the deepening of the Welland canal should be voted with the distinct understanding and the declared policy on the part of the Government that the Welland canal is only part of a larger scheme, and that the deepening of that canal carries with it the providing of grain facilities at the foot of deepwater navigation, namely, Kingston. In my judgment the Government should announce as part of its policy harbour improvements at the city of Kingston, and the building of a Government elevator there for the handiing of the first cargo that passes down through the enlarged Welland canal, and that that should be brought forth not merely as a local matter but as part of a great scheme which has for its object the carrying at the cheapest possible rate of the grain of the West right through to the port of Montreal; and as the St. Lawrence is enlarged, and as I believe it will be in the course of time, the carrying of that grain straight across the Atlantic to the markets of Europe.

But apart from that and apart from the question of the development of hydro-electric power, surely we must all admit that we have arrived at a time in this country when we cannot throw to one side the development of the St. Lawrence river as a navigable channel for the largest vessels that are afloat. If we even consider that as a scheme which is possible—and in view of the attitude of every prominent men on the other side of the line as well as on this side, we cannot regard it as something which is not worth considering—then I give my support to this resolution, which asks for the appointment of a committee of this House to investigate and take evidence in regard to the matter. This, after all, is the Parliament which will be asked to vote the money to carry on any scheme of this kind. Surely the appointment of such a committee as is proposed, to consider this matter and to hear such evidence as may be brought before it, should meet with the approval of every hon. member of this House. Having regard to the fact that this matter has now passed what we may call the dreamland stage and is something that we should grapple with, I do submit that a committee of this House is a proper body to appoint for the taking of evidence and the gathering of all available information. I do not wish to be understood as knocking what I assume to be dear to the heart of my hon. friend, the Georgian Bay and Ottawa route. I have given considerable attention to the facts that were adduced in regard to that route, and I may say that I have been much impressed by them. But what I do want to see is this Dominion of Canada taking whatever steps are necessary to bring about the carrying of Canadian grain through Canadian channels to the point of export instead of its passing through—as sixty or seventy per cent of it has done in the past—American ports. That is what I want to see, and I believe this country is big enough and courageous enough to do what is necessary to bring that about. The time will come when it will be generally recognized that we should make use of this great waterway provided by nature. It was not put there simply to be looked at or as a place in the vicinity of which rich men could build their summer homes It was put there to be utilized for the benefit of humankind, and I want to see the people of Canada utilize it and get the benefit of it.

Mr. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the House who live upon the Great Lakes, I should like to say a few words upon this question. In speaking to the subject dealt with by the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) I do not wish it to be thought by anybody that this is a proposal put forward by the head of the Lakes, including Port Arthur and Fort William. As a matter of fact the proposal, as my hon. friend pointed out, was originally put forward within the last year or two by committees on the American side, in conjunction with committees on the Canadian side, particularly committees from the neigbourhood of the constituency of my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Kennedy). It was at a meeting of that committee that this idea developed for the working out of some scheme whereby ocean freighters could enter the Great Lakes and make of the Great Lakes an American Mediterranean. Any one, Sir, who has read the fascinating stories of Parkman with regard to the original explorations about the shores of the Great Lakes must naturally be interested in such a question as this. When we remember that it was the men, those old French voyageurs particularly, who explored every mile of the Great Lakes, and down to the mouth of the Mississippi,—men like La Salle, Marquette, Joliet, Duluth, De la Verendrye, and those other great explorers who went from the mouth of the St. Lawrence and up through the Lakes, through what is proposed as the Georgian Bay route by my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) and also through what is proposed as the southern route by the committee that has been discussing this question—when we remember that, the matter is one of romantic interest to all of us.

With regard to the Georgian Bay Canal, I may point out to my hon. friend from Wright, who, naturally, by virtue of the fact that his constituency would be more interested in the building of that canal than in the carrying out of the southern route project, is a supporter of that scheme —that the parts of the Great Lakes west of the Sault are as much interested in the Georgian Bay canal as they would be in the carrying out of the southern or St. Lawrence route project. So far as Port Arthur and Fort William are concerned we would be just as much pleased up there to see the Georgian Bay route built as the southern route. But since the Government of Canada has undertaken to spend some seventy or eighty million of dollars upon the Welland canal, and since the great industrial part of Canada so far as Ontario is concerned is situated along the southern route, it appears that the most likely proposal to be gone on with is the southern route, and it appears also that that southern route would obtain a great deal more traffic than the northern route. The question of the building of the Georgian Bay canal has been discussed at the head of the lakes as far back as I can remember, and the construction of that route would be received with as great pleasure as the other. But the point is that opportunities come, perhaps, in one particular direction and we are ready for them as they come. So that with regard to this question I am supporting in a general way the project for the building of one of these canals.

A point for my hon. friends in Quebec to remember is that Montreal is closer by about five hundred miles to London and Liverpool than New York is. That can hardly be believed until one looks at the map and observes the exact directions of traffic. Another point which is worth remembering is that the area of the Great Lakes and the industrial part of Ontario are not the only parts of the country interested in this project. It is stated by the American supporters of this scheme—and there are many more of them than there are Canadian supporters of it—that one-third of the population and one-third of the area of the United States are concerned in matters affecting the states bordering on the Great Lakes; and they go on to say that seventy per cent of the raw materials and foods produced in the United States are produced in the neighbourhood of the Great Lakes. That naturally makes the southern route of much more importance from the commercial standpoint than the Georgian Bay route. In the Georgian Bay route the ships would have to go up around Lake Nipissing, up around the Georgian bay, down lake Huron, and then make a circuitous trip in order to tap such parts of the Great Lakes as those around lake Ontario and lake Erie. It is worth while pointing out the amount of traffic which is going through the Soo canal much of which would be influenced or affected by the building of a southern route. In 1855, 106,000 tons passed through the Soo canal; in 1881, 2,000,000 tons; in 1891, 8,000,000; in 1901, 24,000,000 tons; in 1916, 70,000,000 tons. It is said that the amount of tonnage passing through the Soo canal is four times the amount which passes through the Suez canal.

Some hon. gentleman—either the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) or the member for Wright—remarks that ships have in the past taken advantage of this route to go up the Great Lakes. I well remember when I was a boy—and that was quite a few years ago now—seeing a Norwegian vessel which had travelled across the Atlantic ocean and which came through the Welland canal and unloaded a cargo at Fort William. True, it was a small vessel, but this goes to show that vessels have already made this trip. It is a fact also that during the war a number of small war vessels were built for the French Government at the head of the lakes.. Therefore, this route has already been navigated to a certain extent.

It is true that before the war $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 was looked upon as a vast amount of money to think of spending on transportation routes, such as railways or canals, or any other investment of that kind, but since Canada alone has spent in the war something like $2,000,000,000, perhaps a question of this kind will receive more kindly consideration and will not be looked upon with so much dread because of the fact that it might cost Canada $100,000,000 or $200,000,000. The fact that there are, as my hon. friend (Mr. Keefer) has pointed out, some 4,000,000 horsepower of potential electrical energy in the waterfalls of the St. Lawrence river must be considered. We can get some idea of what that means when we realize that in Canada there is said to be some 18,000,000 or 20,000,000 horsepower of potential electrical energy of which only 2,000,000 horsepower has so far been developed.

My hon. friend also pointed out that there would be a saving in the cost of transportation of wheat. That means that on every bushel of wheat grown in the West which is exported—and that includes about 80 per cent of the wheat of the West—there would be a possible saving of from five to ten cents. My hon. friend read part of a speech delivered by Mr. Julius Barnes who is known to every hon. member who has had any dealings with the wheat question, and in that address Mr. Barnes pointed out that there might be a saving of ten cents a bushel. In other words, it would probably cost ten cents a bushel less to take wheat from Buffalo to Montreal than from Buffalo to New York. It might be worth while recalling that in the past 65 per cent of the wheat of the Canadian West has gone by Buffalo to New York, so that this canal would be the means of bringing that Canadian traffic back to Canadian channels again.

Whatever opposition has come to this proposition has come from New York and Buffalo, and without blaming them in any way for the stand they are taking, one must admit that their stand is taken from an entirely selfish point of view, just as I presume our standpoint may be regarded as a selfish one from the outlook of those Canadians who live on the shores of the Great lakes. But at the same time this is a matter which is of the utmost moment to those living not only on the shores of the Great lakes, but on the vast prairies of the West, not only of Canada, but of the United States. It has been stated by authorities that 80 per cent of the present ocean freighters could utilize these canals once they were built without these canals being made to a depth greater than 24 feet. In other words that means that only 20 per cent of the ocean freighters are so large that they could not use this route.

In closing these rather desultory remarks, I should like to point out the importance of the international aspect of this question. We cannot help remembering that for over 100 years the United States and Canada have been living side by side without a fort on either side of the international boundary line, without a gun pointing across the boundary, and this would be of the utmost importance as an example to the rest of the world how two great countries, the United States and Canada, can join together to build up such an important international project as this.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. W. C. KENNEDY (Essex North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion moved by the hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) this evening, and I think the members of this House are indebted to that hon. gentleman for the very clear and lucid exposition of facts that he gave us in connection with this project. To-day, there are agitating the minds of most of the thinking people of this country two great questions that are very closely allied, one being the question of transportation of all kinds and the other the question of freight rates. The recent increase that was granted in freight rates was granted, so I understood and so it was stated in the press, in order that the railway companies might operate without from month to month, having a deficit which they were threatened with on account of increased cost of operation. So far as I have been able to judge from the financial statements that have been published, I am not quite sure that the railway companies have benefited by the increases; but I know the increased freight rates have succeeded in stifling manufacture, in limiting production and in increasing the cost of the necesaries of life in every home in this land. Therefore, it seems to me that any project that has for its purpose the lowering of freight rates is one that should meet with the approval of the people generally, and the motion of the hon. gentleman this evening asking for consideration of this project by a special committee, is one that should be readily granted by this House.

The war has changed to a certain extent the alignment of trade. We in Canada hope to make this a great exporting nation, not only of natural, but of manufactured products, and if we are to take our products abroad, if we are to meet competition in the open markets of the world, surely one thing that we need more than almost anything else is all the assistance we can have in the way of low carrying charges. There are two elements that enter into the matter—the carrying of the raw material and the carrying of the finished products. Low freight rates will not only enable us to meet competition abroad, but mean that we shall be gainers as regards our domestic business. As has been said in this House this evening by one hon. gentleman in speaking of the probable cost of this project, it will mean a large expenditure of public money. I am not insensible of the financial condition of this country to-day. I appreciate that this is a country with a population of approximately 9,000,000 people; that we have a net debt of over $2,300,000,000 and that it is asking everything that the people of this country can bear to meet the fixed charges upon that debt. I appreciate too that there is throughout this country to-day a demand on the part of the people that there shall be retrenchment in regard to the actual expense of carrying on government, and also that there shall be a cessation of borrowings in connection with capital charges. But there are capital charges and capital charges. It is one thing to incur an expenditure in connection with a massive pile of buildings that do not earn one dollar of income during the year, and that probably cause an increased expenditure in the way of maintenance and other charges in connection therewith, while it is quite another thing to spend money in developing a project such as that pointed out by the hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer), one that will mean lower freight rates, cheaper carrying charges and, in addition to that, the development of electrical energy that, if the figures quoted to-night are correct, will mean that interest charges on the capital expended will be met from that source.

Those of us who live in municipalities that border on the Great Lakes or on their tributaries are keenly interested in this project. In the city of Windsor two years ago we had a meeting of the International Waterways Commission, and when the people of that city had the facts presented to them and an opportunity of considering the question as it was discussed at that convention, they were unanimous in their approval of this project. I believe that would apply equally well to the people throughout the Dominion; and if this Government will grant the committee that is asked for, so that the facts will be adduced, and considering, I believe, it will have the approval of the people in connection with such an outlay.

I rise also to-night for the reason that, with your permission, Sir, I desire to place on Hansard a telegram that I have received from the chairman of the Board of Commerce of our city. This telegram reads:

> The Border Chamber of Commerce unanimously and emphatically endorsed deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways and the development of the power consequent thereon, as advocated by Canadian Deep Waterways and Power Association organized at Windsor in November, 1919. We believe this to be greatest economic project of the age.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Regina): Mr. Speaker, lest any one should come to the conclusion that only those living at the head of the lakes or in the country immediately bordering on the lakes are interested in this particular question, I rise simply as one from the far West to give endorsement to the proposal introduced by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer). I may say that I certainly was not a supporter of this project until recently, not that I knew anything particular about it, but as my hon. friend from Port Arthur has said, a very large number of our people have been opposed to this project simply because they believed it would kill the Hudson Bay railway. Let me say as emphatically as I can that if I thought for one minute that this canal system was going to kill the Hudson Bay Railway project, or injure it in any way, I for one would not support this proposal, because for years, like thousands of others in Western Canada, I have been thoroughly convinced of the feasibility and practicability of the Hudson Bay route, and I am thoroughly satisfied that as soon as this Government can find the money to complete that project, and does so, it will be a success. But I have been led by the hon. member for Port Arthur and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) to look into this deep waterway scheme in the past year or two, because I have always found them men who took a keen interest in practical questions as opposed to academic or theoretical questions. A project that was practical always found their support, and they are the kind of men I like to associate myself with. So I looked into this scheme, and I have come to the conclusion that it has very substantial merit, and that the Canadian people ought to give it their very best attention.

What has surprised me most is the ease with which the scheme can be carried out? Had I been asked some time ago whether or not it was a difficult engineering problem, I think I would have answered, as thousands of other Canadians would, that it was too difficult altogether for the Canadian people to undertake, but when I find that there are only some 40 miles of canalization necessary, and that those who have investigated the project estimate that it would require only about $100,000,000, and that there is a drop only of some 220 feet, I say at once that it is not such a tremendous project that the Canadian people need be afraid of it. Why, even the Welland canal comes almost up to it in magnitude. The Welland canal, I understand, is 25 miles long and has a drop of over 300 feet, so the project at present under discussion is not much greater than what we have already done. Such being the case, why need we be afraid of it? My own opinion is that if the St. Lawrence waterway had been wholly within the Dominion of Canada or wholly within the United States this project would long since have been carried to completion, but the difficulty is that it is an international waterway, and as a consequence a great deal of unnecessary delay has occurred.

Now, why should we support this scheme? My candid opinion is that it will be of such enormous benefit to the whole of Canada, and particularly Western Canada, in increasing production that we cannot afford to do without it. My hon. friend from Port Arthur has suggested to-night that if we had this deep waterway scheme we would save 5 cents a bushel on every bushel of wheat we produced. We would make that much, if his figures are correct, for that is what it amounts to. In a case such as this, it is not the consumer who pays, because we must deliver our grain from Canada to Liverpool in competition with the grain with the rest of the world. Therefore, every cent that is added in the way of unnecessary cost of transportation must be borne by the farmers of Western Canada, and if you can reduce that cost you put just that much into the pants pockets, or into the treasury, which is the same thing, of our farmers. At present we are exporting anywhere from 100,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels a year. That would mean a saving of from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 a year.

But does that state the whole case? Far from it. Even if a start were made on this project now, it would be from 3 to 5 years before it would be completed and if the progress of Western Canada continues at the same rate as in the past few years, we shall be producing in Western Canada before these canals are completed anywhere from 300,000,000 to 500,000,000 bushels for export. There is no question about that. Do not think for one minute that Western Canada has ceased to progress; do not think for one minute that we have stopped our development. We have no intention of doing anything of the kind. My candid opinion is that within twenty years Saskatchewan will be the most populous province in the Dominion. At any rate by the time the project is completed we will have at least 400,000,000 bushels a year for export, and what an enormous profit this project will mean,—not only in cash,—for at the present time a great deal of our very superior wheat goes to Buffalo, is transported from there to New York, and, I am sorry to say, my information is that very inferior wheat is mixed with it and the mixture is then sold on the British market. Somebody makes an enormous profit out of that transaction on the American side. If we could get our grain straight on to the British market, we would prevent anything of that kind. Our good Canadian wheat would get on to the British market as good Canadian grown wheat, and our people would get the full benefit of raising grain superior to any grown anywhere else on the continent of America. It is these reasons that have induced me to support this scheme and the Hudson Bay Railway, so that we can get away from this foreign interference with our wheat.

As has been stated, this project has been supported very strongly in the United States, and lately it has been receiving very great support in our part of the country. I have before me a list of sixteen states, each of which is contributing $10,000 a year, making a total of $160,000 for propaganda work in favour of this project. They are as follows: Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Indiana, Ohio, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri, and one other which I cannot recall at the moment. All these sixteen states are supporting the project, backed up by a large part of the population of Western Canada. We do not intend to allow selfish interests anywhere to interfere with our determination to develop our country in such a way as to give to our people the full value of everything they produce and for that reason I am satisfied that this project will be started some time, and the Government might just as well make up their minds to get into the procession and take the credit for having started it. I merely rose to give my support to this proposal, feeling that somebody from west of the Great Lakes should speak in support of it.

Mr. HENRI E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec County): The project which has been brought before the House by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) is one of great importance. I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. gentleman and I think that the proposal is certainly one that merits the attention of the House and of the country at large. If, however, I may be permitted to offer the hon. gentleman a suggestion, I think that he might add to his resolution that the Committee to be selected from among the members of this House be empowered to investigate the question of grain traffic by waterways and also by way of rail. There is no doubt that this project is one of great importance, and it was really a revelation, at least to some of the members of this House, to hear the hon. gentleman state, and confirm his assertion with official figures, that over two-thirds of the grain from the west of the Great Lakes was shipped by way of American seaports at a cost of from five to ten cents per bushel more than it would cost by water-way from the Lakes down to the St. Lawrence. I am sure that if an investigation were held in regard to the shipment of grain by rail from Toronto to the American seaports it would be found that a further additional cost, to say nothing of loss of time, could be obviated by shipping the grain by way of the Transcontinental direct from Winnipeg to Quebec. This would represent a great economy, if we take into consideration the great advantages that could be derived from this means of transportation.

It is not too much to say that the great national port of this country, Quebec, would, if some money were spent on it to provide proper equipment, be beneficial to the whole country. I do not think that I am pessimistic in saying that at present Quebec stands in need of improvement in this respect. I believe that if the port of Quebec were adequately equipped the bulk of navigation could be concentrated there and the accruing advantage would be great. If this committee that is to be appointed to investigate the proposal before the House undertook to study the needs of Quebec I am sure that it would decide to recommend to the Government that proper equipment be provided and that adequate steps be taken to take care of grain transportation from the West direct to Quebec. I principally desired to urge upon the hon. member for Port Arthur, that he add to his resolution a clause empowering the investigation by the committee of the question of grain transportation by rail.

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): In a great movement such as this it is necessary first of all to have, in any country but especially in Canada, men of vision and optimism who constantly advocate their views and bring them before the people until their proposals become accomplished facts. In the old days of the '20's people regarded the Welland canal as something only to be hoped for, and it would not have materialized had it not been for the special efforts of William Hamilton Merritt and George Keefer. It is a significant and interesting fact that we have in this House now a descendant of George Keefer who is advocating as mover of this resolution, for the benefit of the country, an improvement of very much greater magnitude. Coming from the head of the Lakes he, along with my hon. friend, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), supports this proposal; and it is only proper that I, representing people at the foot of the Lakes, should also say that he will have on lake Ontario an almost unanimous assent to the project. Indeed, it has been so well thought over by the people of Toronto that they have anticipated the movement, and are not dismayed by engineering or financial obstacles. They have spent millions of dollars, and propose to send twenty million dollars and more, for the improvement of their own harbour by making it a thirty-foot harbour with dockage facilities for the ships which they hope and believe will eventually come from the ocean to increase the commerce between them and the old countries. It is true we do not expect so much benefit from what comes from the West; but if it is accomplished we shall have a harbour that will accommodate all the shipping that will come either way. Having spent this vast sum of money, with certain assistance from the Dominion, it is natural that we should desire in Toronto to see this work carried along. I know that in a matter of this sort there is always jealousy of water-borne traffic on the part of the railways. But I am convinced from what I have read on the subject that this jealousy is altogether unwarrantable. When water-borne traffic increases, the business of the railways increase at the same time. The one helps the other, and if it should turn out that there is any opposition or any coldness from the friends of the railways in regard to this scheme, I am sure that a consideration of the examples both in America and in England will dispel such opposition and show that it is unfounded in view of the facts of history.

When the Manchester Ship canal was constructed it took a great many years for the British parliament to put the project through, largely owing to the opposition of the railways. But Manchester was put upon the seas, so to speak; and yet it increased in railway traffic from Liverpool, and this vastly beyond the expectations of all concerned. The railway earnings were largely increased. The same thing will probably apply in this case. This is but a motion for a committee, and until we have that committee we cannot know where we stand. At any rate, the project is big enough and can be limited only by money and engineering consideration. We have been told on most excellent authority in the United States that this is by no means an insurmountable project financially, especially if by friendly arrangement we can be assisted by American capital. And from the engineering standpoint there is no great obstacle. It is true we are dismayed at present at the thought of spending money. But if, as my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) pointed out, the profit will eventually be very great, and if prominent engineers, whom we cannot ignore, are of the opinion that the scheme is practicable, we can proceed, call these engineers before the committee, get something definite as to what the cost will be and a sound opinion regarding its feasibility and for the first time place before the country the engineering and financial data.

I am also impressed with the importance of the scheme from the fact that it gives an immense increase in Hydro-electrical power. On the St. Lawrence rapids, where there is a fall of 92 feet, it is estimated that we can get as much power as we now get from Niagara, and as the country on the St. Lawrence is by no means at its hayday yet it will naturally become a thriving manufacturing centre by reason of the adjacency of this power. It has been estimated by a man of eminence in the engineering field that there can be collected from tolls for electric power in the St. Lawrence valley and adjacently at least $12,000,000 a year. That sum at five per cent would represent a capitalization of $240,000,000. I do not think the scheme could be put through for $100,000,000 as has been estimated—$300,000,000 would be a more likely figure. But if we could make it pay by developing hydraulic power through its medium and could raise an income as has been estimated, namely $12,000,000 we have almost the whole cost of the work financed already, and the rest would be easy enough. The whole thing is something that appeals to every patriotic man. Water borne traffic is absolutely necessary, as we all know, to a successful country. The canals of the older countries, both in Europe and in Great Britain, have proved of immense importance; and the improvement in the building of small ocean going vessels, constructed of steel leads us to believe that it is not a chimerical idea that we should have the Great Lakes tributary to the ocean, and would have indeed a waterway that could be used with facility by all ocean going vessels except those of the very largest type. If this is so we need not be dismayed about the expenditure initially of a large sum which we can readily see will return to us at no very distant date.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Naturally I would be in favour of anything that would make for the development of Canada. For that reason I believe I would be inclined to support the resolution of my hon. friend from Port Arthur if there were not a better project, entirely through Canadian territory, capable of more easy development. The Georgian Bay Canal, rather than the St. Lawrence deep waterways would develop Canadian territory entirely for the advantage of the Canadian people. On the other hand my hon. friend in speaking of the advantages that would accure to the country from the development that he proposes said, if I caught him aright, that it would be of great benefit to the cities of Buffalo, Clevland, Toledo, Detroit and Chicago. Now none of these cities are within the borders of Canada. A few years ago when hon. gentlemen on this side wanted a little closer trade relationship with the American people my hon. friends opposite would not have any truck or trade with them. Now they are willing to develop Canadian water courses and Canadian water powers for the benefit of Buffalo, Clevland, Toledo, Detroit and Chicago. I would very much rather, Mr. Speaker, see the Georgian Bay Canal developed, and build up such towns as North Bay, Mattawa, Pembroke, Campbell's Bay, Arnprior, Ottawa, and Hawkesbury. These are all Canadian towns that would be developed by the Georgian Bay project. That project would also develop a country that is rich in low grade minerals, rich in agricultural possibilities, just as rich in waterway possibilities as the St.

Lawrence route, and rich in timber resources. If the Georgian Bay Canal were constructed it would be entirely through Canadian territory, and would develop Canada to a very much larger extent than would be possible by aiding the St. Lawrence route. It is true that the latter enterprise would be of greater advantage to a portion of Ontario adjacent to the St. Lawrence; but it would not be of any particular advantage to the rest of the Dominion that would not be equally benefited by the Georgian Bay Canal. The latter project would be in the interest of the greater portion of the country, it would develop the interior of Canada, and would altogether be a very much better project than the deepening of the St. Lawrence. I have not much confidence in the possibility of the deepening of the St. Lawrence at the present time when we are called upon to vote $165,000,000 to bolster up our transportation system. Mr. Sanford Evans was engaged on a report of the Georgian Bay Canal route for some two or three years; but that gentleman's report never having been presented, it does not seem that the Government are very much interested in the development of the waterways of this country. Otherwise they would have at least made public Mr. Sanford Evans' report on the Georgian Bay Canal project. Furthermore I understand that private enterprise is willing to undertake the construction of the Georgian Bay Canal. I understand there is a company that is quite willing to undertake the construction of this work and make it possible to move grain from the great West, and move to inland points coal brought from the Eastern Provinces, at no cost whatever to the taxpayers of the Dominion. If that be the case I do not see the force of my hon. friend's argument in asking for a commission to spend more money investigating the St. Lawrence route, when the Government have already in their possession reports giving full details as to the construction of the Georgian Bay Canal.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): I have just one or two observations to make on the resolution before the House. I listened with interest to the remarks made by my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) and to the rest of the discussion that has taken place. I listened particularly to my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) and if I gathered aright the sense of his observations he proposed to make the National Railway System pay by another vast expenditure of money to deepen our waterways. Well, that proposition may have some merit, but I have grave doubts about it. It does strike me, Sir, in connection with this whole matter that we should have a little regard to the financial position of the country at the present time. My hon. friend (Mr. Keefer) proposes to have a commission of inquiry that I presume will travel round the country and gather evidence wherever it can be gathered, sit during the recess of Parliament, and undoubtedly spend some money. I do not wish to be considered as opposing the principle of the scheme. I am among those who believe that this country would have been very much further ahead if we had spent a few of the hundreds of millions of dollars which have been expended on railways in providing this deep waterway. But we did not do so, and I do submit now that until we get our financial house in good order this is not the time to consider additional expenditures of public money on a large scale.

I am not so certain that the bringing of ocean-going vessels to the Head of the Lakes will achieve all that is expected or hoped for in the reduction of rates on grain to Europe. One very important factor which must be taken into consideration in any survey of the matter is the ocean rates from the Atlantic seaboard to Europe. It is a well established principle that ocean rates from America to Europe depend in a very considerably degree on the amount of goods that are carried from Europe to America. In other words, a vessel operating on the high seas must have a cargo both ways if it is to establish a fair rate one way. We also know that to-day a large amount of our western wheat is going out by United States Atlantic ports. The reason is simply this, that ocean-going vessels can get return cargoes from Europe to the Atlantic seaports of the United States while they cannot get them to our Canadian Atlantic ports, and that is due to the fact that the United States Atlantic ports are supplying a population of 106,000,000, while our Atlantic ports are supplying a population of only 8,000,000. For that reason exporters of grain, and I speak from knowledge, can always secure from Philadelphia, Newport News, New York or Boston much better ocean rates to Europe than can be secured from Canadian ports, which is a most important consideration to be kept in mind in a consideration of this whole question.

I would suggest that this resolution might well stand for a year and then possibly the scheme could be looked into in the manner suggested by my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer). I see very little to be gained in prosecuting an inquiry at considerable public expense while we have no possibility, as far as I can see, of finding the money necessary to carry on the proposed development. In a few years when our financial difficulties have cleared away and when we have put our financial house in order, we might be open to consider such a proposition; but in the meantime I would suggest that no very great harm will come if the proposal is allowed to stand over for another year.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer), not as a partisan either of the route proposed by him or of the route proposed by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) and the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill),—the Georgian Bay canal—because I at once confess that I am not in a position to say which of the two is the more advantageous. But as one who is interested in the whole question of transportation, I believe that the subject brought before the House by the hon. member for Port Arthur is deserving of very careful consideration.

I do not quite agree with my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that it is too early to begin an investigation of which is the proper route and what is the best method of relieving the country of some of the burdens it is carrying on account of the tremendous transportation charges that now obtain. As I view the situation, if Canada is to develop in competition with other countries—and she has tremendous latent resources awaiting development—it will only be by means of making transportation easier and cheaper, so that our resources may be transported from the interior of the country to the markets of the world at less cost than is possible at the present time. Transportation cost is to a very considerable extent strangling the whole progress of this country, and will continue to strangle it until we find means of cheapening the cost.

The question of the deficit on the Canadian National railways has been referred to. My judgment is that the development of our waterways will not injure our railways in the least, but rather that the increased prosperity resulting from that development will make it possible to so increase the freight traffic of those railways that their revenues will be more than sufficient to cover their operating costs.

A point that in my opinion cannot be emphasized too strongly is that by making it possible for ocean-going vessels to run from Nova Scotia ports, or from England if you will, to the very centre of Canada two results will be at once achieved. First it will put us in a much more independant position than we are in at present; and secondly, it will cheapen industry and make it possible as a consequence for Canada to get what she must always have, a supply of reasonably cheap coal. Then there is the question of electrical development that will accrue in connection with the deepening of our waterways. It is said that there is enough electrical energy going to waste on the St. Lawrence to operate every single line of railway in Ontario and save the tremendous quantity of coal that now has to be used for that purpose. The steady increase in the cost of fuel is one of the difficulties that our railways have to contend with. These two things would go hand in hand with either of the projects. As I said, I am not a partisan of either, and we should endeavour to find out accurately and beyond question which is the better scheme and go ahead with it. As has been pointed out, it will take time to get this under way, and if we start an investigation this year it will be one or two years before we are in a position to spend a dollar on which ever route may be chosen. I believe that the resolution is along the right lines and that the House should give it concurrence.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this resolution before it is finally disposed of. The transportation question is one of the most important for the future of Canada. This project has been before the country for some little time, having originated, I think, in connection with the development of the Northwest. The western provinces are, in my opinion, probably the most important factors in connection with our national development, and it is absolutely necessary that their development should be encouraged in the interests of the Dominion generally, and to ensure that development we must give them the cheapest transportation possible. It was considered in the interests of the West that we should enlarge the Welland canal, which resulted in reducing the cost of transportation of the products of the great West to the seaboard by several cents per bushel. Later it was considered that if the St. Lawrence route also was developed the cost of transportation of the products of the West would be further decreased. The matter was brought to the attention of, and was considered by the Government, as it had been by previous governments. Later the question of the development of water-powers and of electrical energy was considered in that connection. I think it is in the interest of Canada that every possible chance of decreasing the cost of transportation, whether by the St. Lawrence route, the Georgian Bay route or the Hudson Bay route, should be considered and taken advantage of, if it is going to assist in the development of the great natural resources of Canada. When the matter was brought to the attention of this Government they took it up with the government of the United States. I would like to read a letter which was addressed to Mr. C. A. Magrath, Chairman of the International Joint Commission, as showing that the Government are alive to the situation and that they have already taken steps to ascertain exactly what the conditions are and what they would be if these routes were developed. The letter is dated at Ottawa, January 21, 1920, and is as follows:

C. A. MAGRATH, Esq.,
Chairman, Canadian Section,
International Joint Commission,
Ottawa.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Governments of the United States of America and of the Dominion of Canada, under the provisions of Article IX of the Treaty of the 11th of January, 1909, between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, herewith refer certain questions, as set forth below involving the beneficial use of the waters of the St. Lawrence river, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, in the interests of both countries, and, in general, the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other, or to the inhabitants of the other along their common frontier.

It is desired that the said questions be made the basis of an investigation to be carried out by the International Joint Commission, to the end that the said Commission may submit a report to the two countries covering the subject matter of this reference, together with such conclusions and recommendations as may be considered pertinent in the premises.

Question 1.—What further improvement in the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, is necessary to make the same navigable for deep draught vessels of either the lake or ocean-going type; what draught of water is recommended, and what is the estimated cost?

In answering this question the Commission is requested to consider:

(a) Navigation interests alone, whether by the construction of locks and dams in the river; by side canals with the necessary locks; or by a combination of the two.

(b) The combination of navigation and power interests to obtain the greatest beneficial use of the waters of the river.

Question 2.—Which of the schemes submitted by the Government or other engineers is preferred, and why?

Question 3.—Under what general method of procedure and in what general order shall the various physical and administrative features of the improvement be carried out?

Question 4.—Upon what basis shall the capital cost of the completed improvement be apportioned to each country?

Question 5.—Upon what basiis shall the costs of operation and maintenance be apportioned to each country?

Question 6.—What method of control is recommended for the operation of the improved waterway to secure its most beneficial use?

Question 7.—Will regulating Lake Ontario increase the low water flow in the St. Lawrence ship channel below Montréal? And if so, to what extent and at what additional cost?

Question 8.—To what extent will the improvement develop the resources, commerce and industry of each country?

Question 9.—What traffic, both incoming and outgoing, in kind and quantity, is likely to be carried upon the proposed route both at its inception and in the future? Consideration to be given not only to present conditions, but to probable changes therein resulting from the development of industrial activities due to availability of large quantities of hydraulic power?

Pending the receipt of plans, estimates, and other engineering data necessary for the final consideration of this reference, the Commission is requested to hold such public hearings as may be considered necessary or advisable in order to obtain all information bearing, directly or indirectly, on the physical, commercial and economic feasibility of the project as a whole.

To facilitate the preparation of the desired report each Government will, from its official engineering personnel appoint an engineer with full authority to confer with a similar officer of the other Government for the purpose: first, of acquiring, each in his own country, such data as may be found necessary to supplement the existing engineering data and surveys, and second, of preparing complete outline plans for and estimates of the cost of the proposed improvement, including the value of all property easements, damages and rights connected therewith. These plans and estimates are to be submitted to the Commission as soon as practicable but not later than one year from the date of appointment and the Commission is requested to forward to the two Governments its final report with recommendation not later than three months thereafter. A copy of the instructions furnished these engineers is attached hereto.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
N. W. ROWELL,
Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

So that over a year ago the Government took action in this matter. The United States government agreed, in accordance with the subject matter of this letter, to a reference of the whole question to the International Joint Commission. That commission has held hearings in the United States and in Canada, and its report will be presented to each government in due course. The matter had to be brought before both governments because the St. Lawrence river is, in part, an international waterway and the consent of both governments would have to be obtained before we could proceed with any such development as is advocated in this resolution.

I know the St. Lawrence waterways route. There are at present twenty-six locks between the upper entrance of the river St. Lawrence and the city of Montreal. There is a fourteen foot draught for vessels passing through that waterway. If five dams were constructed we would have a waterway through which any vessel could pass that crosses the Atlantic and such vessels would be able to proceed to Port Arthur when the Welland canal is completed. In the construction of these five dams, at least two million horse-power would be developed. In my opinion, once the Welland canal is completed, it will be almost absolutely necessary that the St. Lawrence waterway should be proceeded with and, if financial conditions will allow, that it should be completed. I believe the development of the St. Lawrence waterway would decrease the cost of transportation by several cents per bushel on all grain produced in the western provinces, but I feel that the development of this waterway is also of very great importance to Ontario and part of Quebec as well, in another way.

Every year the people of Ontario, yes, and I may say part of Manitoba, are in fear and trembling on account of coal strikes taking place on the other side of the line, because, when strikes occur, it is almost impossible to secure coal. If we had the St. Lawrence waterway completed, we would be able to bring coal from Nova Scotia to that part of Quebec that is on the St. Lawrence river west of Montreal, also to Ontario up to Port Arthur and even as far as Winnipeg, thus saving a recurrence of the fear and trembling that we have had in the past on account of the possibility of a shortage of fuel during the winter months.

Some hon. gentlemen have referred to the Georgian Bay route, and while I do not wish to take issue with them in regard to that route, I wish to draw their attention to the fact, that vessels that would cross the Atlantic could not possibly make use of the Georgian Bay route. Vessels that would pass through the St. Lawrence canal and through the Welland canal and on to Port Arthur would be vessels of 12,000, 15,000 or 18,000 tons. The route along the Georgian Bay canal is narrow, and vessels of that type could not possibly go through that canal. There is no doubt that there would be a large development of waterpower if the Georgian Bay canal were proceeded with, but it would not take the place of our great St. Lawrence Canal route. Private parties, I believe, would build the five dams along the St. Lawrence river if we would give them the water-powers, but I am one of those who do not believe it is in the public interest to hand over our natural resources, such as two or three million horse-power to private parties to develop. They should be held in the public interest, but I mention that to show the House that the development of the great water-powers on the St. Lawrence would almost pay for the investment that would have to be made for carrying out this great project.

It has also been mentioned that a large proportion of our products goes via Buffalo, and there is no doubt about that. Up to the present time, each year a large percentage of the products of the great West goes via Buffalo. It should go via Montreal and our great St. Lawrence route, but it cannot go that way until we are able to compete with our transportation rates, and as long as the development of the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence route is delayed, just so long will the transshipment of grain via the St. Lawrence route be delayed.

An hon. member mentioned that this project was in the interest of Cleveland and other American ports, but that is not a fact, except in this way. Americans, at least in many of the Western States, are looking at this project in much the same way as people in Western Canada. If they can ship their products via Duluth and by the St. Lawrence route, and in that way get their products more cheaply to the European market, it is in their interest to urge their country to take part in developing this route which Americans are interested in on account of its being international.

Some hon. member has referred to the large amount that the development of our railways is costing the country, and there is no doubt that that is a very serious matter. I had not intended referring to it were it not that some hon. members mentioned it casually in the discussion this evening. The cost of operation of railways, not only in Canada, but in the United States, has increased so tremendously in the last two or three years that, in my judgment, it is hindering or preventing the future development of our country, and unless some means are taken to decrease the cost of operation of our railways, the development of our country will continue to be hindered. The development of this country and the United States has been hindered by what is called the McAdoo award in fixing the wages of railway employees. Some action must be taken, and I think the railway employees themselves should look into this matter and endeavour to adjust matters in such a way that the future of this country will not be hindered on account of the enormous cost of operation of railways as is the case at the present time.

The Estimates that have been presented to the House to-day, perhaps, may not and cannot be understood until we are able to explain them to the House in detail, but the fact that the sum of $160,000,000 appears in the Estimates does not mean that there has been that loss in connection with the railways, or that it is estimated there will be that loss next year. What it really means is that it has been estimated by those who are in charge of the Canadian National railways, which include the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, that there will be a loss of some $50,000,000 during the year 1921. But in addition to that loss, large amounts are required for construction—betterments that are really charged to capital account—and in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific a large amount will have to be charged in connection with capital account. As regards the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which the Government must take over, the Government has to assume responsibility in connection with liabilities that are falling due. It must not, however, be considered that the amount mentioned in the Estimates means a deficit of that amount next year. There is no doubt that the Canadian National railways and the other Canadian railways are meeting with great losses; but the railways in the United States are meeting with proportionately much larger losses than our Canadian railways. I mention this in passing simply for the reason that one or two speakers who have touched upon it do not, I believe, understand the situation. Otherwise, they would not have given out the impression that the railways were losing the amounts mentioned in the Estimates.

I am myself very anxious that these great waterways should be developed, first, for navigation purposes. I believe in the development of this great waterway. I believe it would be worth the amount it would cost simply because of the development it would bring to the West from Port Arthur to British Columbia. In addition to that, I believe it would be of the greatest importance in developing the natural resources in Ontario and Quebec from Port Arthur east. I believe also it is one of the most important projects that could be undertaken for the protection of that part of the country from Manitoba east, so far as its coal and fuel supply for the future is concerned. There is the additional fact that it would develop some 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 horse power. This development would cheapen the cost of transportation on the railways between Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa. It would furnish power for a very large number of industries in Ontario and elsewhere in Canada, and would assist in the development of the natural resources of this province and Canada generally. It would mean the bringing of more people to Ontario and Canada. Population is what we want, and everything should be done towards that end. As Minister of Railways I have hesitated to urge proceeding with this work during the last two or three years, on account of the very great expenditures due to the war, and also on account of the large amounts that are required to complete at the very earliest possible date projects that have already been undertaken.

So far as this resolution is concerned I do not think it would be advisable to appoint a Special Committee while the present Waterways Commission is investigating this question.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. REID: But I believe it would be in the interests of Canada as a whole that hon. members of this House should have the opportunity of learning just what this waterway means towards the development of the West, of Central Canada, and of the country as a whole. Having already referred this matter to the International Joint Waterways Commission, I would suggest to the hon. member that if he can see his way clear to withdraw his resolution, I would undertake to have it brought before the committee of this House which has already been constituted, consisting of some 30 or 35 members, and known as the Forest Waterways and Water Powers Committee, with a view to having the committee take whatever steps they think necessary to secure all available information on this project. In that way we would not be interfering with the Joint Waterways Commission, and probably before Parliament prorogues the committee would have before it the final report of the Waterways Commission, and would then be in a position to bring before the House all the facts in connection with the matter, and the question could be discussed here. I am sure that when the committee has received the report of the International Joint Waterways Commission, and has collected information on its own account, its decision and that of the House will be to proceed with the development of this great waterways system, not only for navigation but for power purposes, just as soon as the financial conditions of the country will permit.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): At the risk of being considered unprogressive in the promotion of this enterprise, I feel very much inclined to agree with the leader of the Progressive party. That is perhaps all the more remarkable in view of the fact that the original movement for the development of the great waterways was launched in the city of Kitchener, or Berlin as it was then, something like eight years ago. A meeting was held there of representatives from various municipalities throughout western Ontario to develop an organization that should promote the deepening of the waterways to permit of the bringing of ocean vessels up to the head of the lakes. The result of that meeting was that a deputation of something like 1,800 or 2,000 men waited upon the Government in the House of Commons Chamber in the old building about eight years ago; but nothing particular came of it. At that time I was in favour of the development that is suggested now, because I believed it would do a great deal of good. But that was before the war, before we had laid on this country a debt of nearly two-and-a-half billion dollars. I for one do not look lightly as one hon. member did to-night, on the expenditure of a mere bagatelle of $100,000,000 at this time and which would probably expand to twice this amount before completion. I think the country ought to set its financial house in order before it takes upon itself any such heavy financial obligations as are suggested at this particular time.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Just in passing I might refer to an argument made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan), who stated that if he felt this development would interfere with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway he would be against it. Now, Sir, that is one of the reasons, if there were any, why I would be for it, for I believe, in regard to that particular enterprise, that this country has entered upon an expenditure which is almost entirely wasted and should not be continued. It has also been stated that the deepening of the waterway will decrease the cost of carrying wheat from the West. Probably it would do so; but I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that just to the extent to which the wheat is carried by waterway, the railways will find their business diminished. The result, I presume, would be that in order to get larger receipts and decrease the deficits on the railways we would continue again and again to increase the railway rates, and finally the latter would do a constantly lessening business and the deficit would accumulate from year to year owing to lack of traffic. I for one believe, Mr. Speaker, that the present deficit is, to some extent at least, the result of an increase in rates which makes it impossible to do business at a profit.

The Minister of Railways and Canals, (Mr. Reid) advanced another argument which is of considerable interest to those of us who come from Central Ontario where we have no coal. He believes that with the deepening of the waterways it would be possible to bring coal from the Maritime Provinces at a cheap rate and sell it in Ontario and also farther west. I think the argument is a good one; but accompanying it I believe there would have to be a stipulation that the coal of the Maritime Provinces be taken from the control of the two great corporations which have it in their possession at this time. And I for one, speaking in the light of the history of the development of resources in this country, do not believe for one moment that, even if the cost of carrying coal were greatly reduced, the general public would benefit a great deal from such reduction so long as these great and necessary natural resources remained entirely under the control of private interests.

Now, that is all I have to say. I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to the project ultimately, but I do not think that the present is the time for entering upon the expenditure of another hundred million dollars for this work. We should first find out where we stand, and it will be time enough to proceed with an undertaking of this nature when the Dominion of Canada has adjusted itself to the burden under which it is labouring to-day.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Coming from the far East, Mr. Speaker, and being as you know directly and indirectly interested in this discussion, I should like to say something on the motion before the Chair. But it is now getting late, and as I understand that there are other hon. gentlemen who desire to speak on the subject, with your permission I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Meighen the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Wednesday, March 9, 1921.

The House met at Two o'clock.

(b) For the withdrawal from disposal of the Gypsum Mining Rights under the said property.

TRANSLATION OF FRENCH SPEECHES

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchéres) moved:

Considering that the French language is official in the House of Commons.

Considering that a great number of speeches are delivered in French;

Considering that it is important that the members should be acquainted with all that is said in Parliament;

Considering that the majority of the English members do not understand French;

Considering that speeches delivered in French do not appear in English in Hansard, unless in the revised edition six or seven months hence, whilst the English speeches are translated in French the next day in Hansard;

Therefore this House is of the opinion that the speeches delivered in French should be immediately translated and published; that the Government should at once instruct the translators and the King's Printer to publish every Monday, during the session, a special sheet of Hansard containing the translation into English of all the speeches which have been delivered in French the preceding week.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution standing in my name is non-partisan and will, I am sure, appeal to all hon. members. A similar resolution was introduced by me on the 24th March last year with the same object in view, but probably not in as definite form in regard to the means to accomplish it. I am confident, Sir, that it would be unfair to state that some hon. members do not desire to know all that is said in the House. Nevertheless I am sorry to say that at least two-thirds of hon. members do not understand the French language, and therefore if the translation of the speeches delivered in French is not made a few days afterwards the English-speaking members will not have cognizance of those speeches until six or eight and sometimes ten months later, in the revised edition of the Debates.

Let me explain in a few words what I mean. The first day after speeches are delivered in this House they appear in the unrevised Hansard in their original text. Two or three days later there is a new publication of the unrevised Hansard wholly in French, and the speeches which were delivered in English are translated and published in this second edition, together with the speeches which were delivered in French and which have already been published in the first edition. I submit, Sir, that that procedure is unfair to the English-speaking members who, I am sure, are anxious to know what their French-speaking colleagues have said; and it is also unfair to the French-speaking members who desire that their English-speaking colleagues should know what they have said. The object of my resolution is to remedy this state of affairs and have the translation of the French speeches published every Monday; that is, every Monday the speeches which have been delivered in French during the preceding week shall be published in English in a special pamphlet for the benefit of all hon. members.

Last session when I moved this resolution not a dissenting voice was heard; on the contrary, much sympathy was expressed with the object sought to be obtained. The leader of the Government at the time, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) said on that occasion, and his words are to be found at page 700 of vol. 1 of last year's debates:

> I am entirely in sympathy with the idea that these speeches should be translated and at the disposal of members within a reasonable time; and if it be true that it runs to five, six or seven months before these translations appear, that is not a condition of things that ought to be continued. My sympathy, then, is entirely with the purpose of the motion.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) also expressed sympathy with the motion in the following words:

> This motion has been moved and seconded by two French-speaking members. As a matter of fact it is the English-speaking members who should desire the improvement that my hon. friend is asking for... But if we cannot all understand the French language and have the pleasure of listening to and enjoying the addresses of our French friends, the next best thing is that we shall as early as possible afterwards have those addresses translated into English.

The hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) and the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and other hon. members also spoke in favour of the resolution and, as I said before, there was not a dissenting voice.

My right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the time suggested that I should call a meeting of the Debates Committee and have the matter discussed. I did so, and the meeting was presided over by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson). The matter was discussed, the Chief Translator, Mr. Léon Gérin, and other translators were present, and two suggestions were made. The first suggestion was that to the English unrevised Hansard published every Monday should be added a translation of the French speeches made during the preceding week. The second suggestion was that a special pamphlet should be published every Monday containing the translation of those French speeches. I wrote my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the time and had several interviews with him, and he continued to show his sympathy with my motion. On the last day of last session I called the attention of my right hon. friend to the matter and he again expressed his sympathy with my purpose in these words, which will be found at page 4588, vol. 5 of last year's debates:

> The sympathy that I expressed at the time my hon. friend introduced this matter still exists. I hope that before another session those of us who are spared to come back will have reached a reasonable and sensible solution of this question. Certainly I feel that in some sense an injury has been done to my English colleagues in that they have not had an opportunity to read the translations of the speeches of their French confrères.

Of course, I expected that during the recess I would receive a letter from my right hon. friend, but I understand he was away on very important duties. When he came back I wrote him under date of 28th January last, reminding him of his promise on the last day of the session and asking him to discuss the matter with the members of the Debates Committee in order that this improvement, as I may call it, should be put into effect this session. The Minister of Trade and Commerce wrote me a letter informing me that he would endeavour to have the matter settled at an early day.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Did the Debates Committee last year make a report after holding that meeting?

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: No, I do not think they made a report, but I had a conversation with my right hon. friend and I think he promised me that he would confer with the member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) and also with Mr. Leon Gérin. I was disappointed to find, when I came back here at the beginning of the session, that no instructions had been given in the matter, and that is why I put this motion on the Order Paper. It is all very well to have the sympathy and encouragement of the minister, but these must be coupled with practical results. My resolution is a very fair one, I submit; it seeks to accomplish a very useful object. I think I can say without boasting that the English-speaking members of this House would find very valuable and interesting information and suggestions in the translation of speeches made by French members. The object is definite; it is feasible; it is practicable. The session has now proceeded for nearly four weeks, and I would like to see action taken in this matter. I trust that the ministry will accept the resolution; at any rate, I wish to have the opinion of the House with regard to it, and I am confident that it will be favourable.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy only a moment or two of the time of the House in availing myself of this opportunity—an opportunity, which I regret to say, very seldom offers itself to me—of agreeing with hon. gentlemen opposite. I am in entire sympathy with the resolution proposed by the hon. member from Chambly-Vercheres (Mr. Archambault). No reason occurs to my mind why this resolution should not be adopted and effect given to the proposal which it contains. Having said that, I do not know that it is necessary to argue the point further. I agree that we on this side of the House, and, for that matter, some hon. gentlemen opposite whose education has been neglected to a certain extent—I mean, those of us who are unable to understand the French language as it is so eloquently and beautifully spoken by hon. gentlemen opposite—feel that we are handicapped because of that lack of understanding. I certainly think that the hon. member voiced the opinion of every hon. gentleman in the House when he said that we would find in the speeches of those who chose to address the House in French very much valuable and instructive information. I shall have very great pleasure in supporting the resolution.

Mr. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski): (Translation.) I am glad in the first place to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) for the support that he gives to the resolution of my hon. friend, the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), and I am sure that every hon. member from the other side will follow his example, by unanimously passing this resolution, so ably presented to the House.

Last session, I had the honour to be the seconder of the motion which was presented by my hon. friend from Chambly and Verchères. I wish to congratulate him because he has thought proper this year to bring it up once more to this chamber and it is with an equal pleasure that I heartily endorse it to-day. It is not necessary for me to argue at length, as the hon. member has explained the question very clearly. Therefore, my remarks will be very brief.

As it is stated in the motion, the French language is one of the official languages of Canada and, therefore of the Canadian Parliament. It is useless to argue this point, inasmuch as the fact is generally known and acknowledged. I do not see then any reason why this motion should not be passed, on the other hand, as the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères so pointedly said, it is more in the interest of the English speaking members that it is introduced. I may say, without boasting, that I am one of those who always spoke in French and I am glad of it. In 1918, when I sat for the first time in this House, I remember that, during the session, barely five or six speeches were delivered in French and I think that, for my part, I delivered three of them. During the session of 1920, if we take the Hansard it will be found that thirty-five or forty French speeches were delivered. We can see then that the idea made its way and that this resolution is well-timed.

The hon. member for Chambly and Verchères quoted a moment ago the English text of the remarks made last year on this subject by the right hon. Minister of Commerce, and I will now quote them in French:

> I am entirely in sympathy with the idea that these speeches should be translated and at the disposal of the members in a reasonable time; and if it be true that it runs to five, or six, or seven months before these translations appear, that is not a condition of things that ought to be continued. My sympathy then is entirely with the purpose of the motion, but this is a matter which pertains to the management of the translators and the publishing of the debates and is under the Debates Committee, composed of members of both sides of the House.

As it was said by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères, nothing was done in that direction. We are now in the fourth week of the session and we do not hear that the Government has the intention to comply with my hon. friend's request.

I will not urge that point any longer, because I trust that the Government will agree this year to the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères. It is a question of justice as well as of courtesy toward hon. members of this House who do not know the French language. On the other hand I have adopted as a line of conduct to speak in French in this House, and I would be pleased, when I take the floor, to be understood by all, because I do not fear to say what I think.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I hope the House will unanimously agree to the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères. It will only be doing what is right for the French element of this country and, at the same time, it will help to tighten more firmly the bonds that should exist between the several groups which make up the Canadian nation.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmoreland): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given by my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) last year to the representations made by the member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Archambault), I had hoped that at this session arrangements would have been made to enable English-speaking members to read the speeches made by their confreres in the French language. It is only a matter, I understand, of working out the details. I am sure that every hon. member who does not understand the French language misses a great deal of pleasure and interest as well as education on account of not being able to follow the remarks made in the House from time to time by hon. gentlemen speaking in that language. I want to associate myself with those who ask that at the earliest moment arrangements be made for the translation of the French speeches into English. I differ with the mover of the resolution in only one respect: I would like to see the translation done from day to day instead of only once a week. If the translation is done only once a week there may be quite a number of speeches in French and some of them might not be read, whereas if we had them from day to day along with speeches of other hon. gentlemen delivered during the same debate or discussion, we should find it much more convenient. I have no desire to take up any more of the time of the House except to associate myself entirely and emphatically with the motion moved by my hon. friend.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, the motion moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Archambault) and the communications which he had with me, perhaps, make it necessary that I should occupy a very few moments by way of explanation. At the time my hon. friend brought his motion before the House, I expressed my entire sympathy with the object of his proposition, and he has detailed absolutely as they occurred the communications which have taken place. On the receipt of his last letter, I at once put myself into communication with the Chairman of the Debates Committee; but unfortunately he has been suffering from ill health, and he has not been able to be present or to attend to the work of that committee. I also had a conversation with the Speaker in reference to the matter, and we saw no particular difficulty in coming to an arrangement which would practically carry out the views held by my hon. friend. I am of the same opinion still, and the different wording which he has given and the more definite statement of his proposition seem to me to offer a solution which might very well be accepted. Personally, not only am I still in entire sympathy, but I would be quite willing to add a little boost to that sympathy on this particular motion.

Hon. S. C. MEWBURN (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the English-speaking members on this side deeply appreciate the hon. member's motion, the purpose of which is to enlighten them in regard to the French speeches in Hansard. He also, by a genial touch, disclosed the inability, which we must admit, of hon. members on this side to read or speak the French language. In these days of supposed strict economy, might I venture to suggest that the hon. member should to-morrow bring in a motion to do away with Hansard altogether. I do not know whether it would be acceptable to the House, but I believe it would be to the country. In that way a great economy would be effected; the work of the House would be expedited and we would not be sitting here so long.

Mr. BELAND: Make the motion yourself.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I saw this motion on the Order Paper at the opening of the session, I endeavoured to get into touch with the Editor of Debates in order to ascertain what the effect would be were this motion to pass. His unfortunate illness and subsequent death prevented me from doing so. I asked for a memorandum from the Chief Translator, and though he asked to be consulted again on the subject so that he would have an opportunity of giving further and more reliable details, I gather from his memorandum that there is nothing insuperable in the way. While I would prefer that this motion should go to the Debates Committee, I do not think the importance of further consideration is such as to justify deferring the matter at all. I am quite content that the motion should pass, with only this one proviso, that if it is considered more convenient to print the translations on Monday morning as part of Hansard, that method may be adopted instead of the special sheets.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault) on having again brought this motion to the attention of the House, and on having brought it forward in such a manner as to secure the unanimous endorsation of hon. members. In connection with the subject to which the motion refers, I was reminded, while the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) was speaking, of two remarkable instances in connection with members in this chamber. The first that I was reminded of refers to the case of a Mr. Gigault who, many years ago, I think between 1882 and 1887, occupied a seat in this House. In those days, my participation in the work of Parliament was from the gallery of the House in which I was, perhaps, at that time the most frequent attender. The gentleman to whom I refer came to Parliament and in the first session was unable to speak a word of English; but by continuous application and close study, that gentleman, in the last session of that Parliament, delivered in English an address which, in cogency of argument and in felicity of phrase, equalled the speech of any English-speaking man who then occupied a seat in the House. That was a remarkable performance. I understand that the gentleman to whom I refer was the representative of Rouville. In this Parliament and in our own day, indeed, in very recent days, we have seen that achievement duplicated the other way around in the case of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Although still quite a young man, I remember the right hon. gentleman's advent to this chamber; I was in the gallery when he entered the House, and I heard him make his first speech here. I have been a fairly close student of his political career since then, not always agreeing with it, but always maintaining a very great respect and esteem for the right hon. gentleman's capacity and ability. While there are in that right hon. gentleman's career some things to which, of course, as a political opponent, I am bound to take exception, I want to pay this tribute to him to-day, that of all the things that stand to his credit, there is none which equals his mastery of the French language within the last few years. For that reason, as well as for the cordial way in which the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and other hon. gentlemen opposite have received the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères, (Mr. Archambault) I think the House and the country are to be congratulated upon this brief discussion this afternoon, and the Government also upon their hearty aceptance of the principle embodied in the motion.

Mr. M. R. BLAKE (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise, not so much to support the motion of the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Archambault), as to agree with the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Copp). Very few speeches are delivered in French nowadays, and I see no reason why they should not be translated and in our hands the next morning; I do not see the necessity of carrying the translation over for a week. Many issues which are discussed on the floor of this House are past and ancient history in a week and the speeches have passed into oblivion by that time. I agree with the hon. member for Westmoreland that these French speeches should be translated each day and form part of Hansard the next morning.

Motion agreed to.

THE CATTLE EMBARGO.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH (South Ontario) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it would not be in the interests of Canada should the Government of Great Britain remove the embargo upon cattle going into the United Kingdom.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in asking the indulgence of the House for a very short time while I speak to this resolution, I should like it to be distinctly understood, first of all, that I am speaking for no party and no particular body of men. This embargo question is one that has engaged the attention of succeeding administrations in this country during the last 30 years. Before the embargo was placed upon Canadian cattle entering Great Britain, all kinds of fat and store cattle could be landed there, and that may have been advantageous to some extent to the Canadian people; but when the embargo was placed upon our Canadian cattle it was felt that a stigma had been laid upon them, because it had been generally admitted that our herds were free from all contagious diseases. So much did I feel that to be the case, that some years ago when I had the honour of a seat in this House I moved a resolution to the effect that the Canadian Government should ask the British Government to send one or more of their most eminent veterinarians to Canada, to go from coast to coast and inspect our herds wherever they thought inspection advisable. I thought this should be done. However, my resolution was side-tracked in one of the ways in which this can be done, just as this resolution may also be side-tracked; but I accomplished my purpose in introducing the resolution.

The embargo that was imposed by Great Britain included cattle from all other countries as well as Canada, and it is now held that it was put on for the purpose of satisfying particularly the Irish people. In passing, I might say that in the year 1920 Ireland sent 924,000 cattle across the channel to England, at a value of £30,000,000, so you can imagine what that trade meant to Ireland. Call it protection, or what you will, it makes but very little difference. Efforts were made from time to time by different Canadian governments to have the embargo removed, but all their efforts failed. During the last few weeks representations have been made to the British Government by private individuals who are taking the matter in their own hands and dictating, as it were, to the British Government what they should do in a matter of purely domestic concern. Whether they will succeed or not I cannot say, but I do feel that if they succeed they will make one of the greatest possible mistakes so far as Canada is concerned. To-day we can send cattle across the sea. They are landed in Great Britain and have to be slaughtered within ten days of their arrival. It therefore follows that only a finished animal can be sent because you would not want an unfinished or store animal to be slaughtered. I admit that if the embargo were removed no harm really should take place, but from our experience in the past, and from my own observation not only in Canada but in the Mother Land, I have come to the conclusion that if the embargo were removed we would do in the future what we did in the past, that is, we would send not only our finished cattle across, but also unfinished or store cattle.

Now, my contention is this: We should feed and slaughter our own cattle. The Government should build an abattoir at Halifax, which is twenty-four hours nearer Great Britain than any other Canadian port, and is open all the year round. Our cattle could be slaughtered there, and the meat should be chilled, not frozen, and sent across. If you ship across the water a 1,000-pound animal, you are sending across 460 pounds of waste matter, which is not worth a great deal, and which could be manufactured into something just as well in Canada as in the Old Country. Our cattle would then be fed in Canada; it would be our grass, our corn, our grain, and our labour. I noticed the other day that even labour has been petitioning for the removal of the embargo. Now, if any one can tell me how labour will be benefited in the slightest degree by the removal of the embargo, they can tell me something I do not know. Why, the people of Deptford in the south of England are petitioning the British Government to establish a slaughter station there. They formerly employed 1,500 men. Now, why not have these 1,500 men in Canada instead of across the seas?

The removal of the embargo might lead to other difficulties. Disease might break out amongst the cattle on their way across to England. Then we might have difficulty with our American friends. If the embargo were removed against Canadian cattle and not against American cattle, there would undoubtedly be a certain amount of irritation, and probably many of their cattle would come through Canada to be shipped across the sea. That would cause trouble, because their cattle are not altogether free from disease.

I have no doubt that some hon. gentlemen who will speak to this resolution will talk a good deal about sentiment, about our having sent our men across the sea, and their having fought and bled and died for the British Empire; but I want it distinctly understood in that connection that when our bushel basket was overflowing with sentiment, there was a whole lot of selfishness mixed with it. I do not propose to follow that thought any further, but I could if necessary.

In connection with this whole matter I believe that it would be in the interests of Canada to produce, feed and slaughter within her own borders all the cattle that we can. I have arrived at this conclusion after a fairly long life upon the farm and a great deal of experience with live stock. I have seen how it has worked in the Mother Land, and I have seen its workings here. The Minister of Agriculture in the Ontario Government stated the other day that he had convinced a very prominent man in Scotland that the embargo should be removed. I have talked more hours with Mr. Montgomery than this gentleman ever talked minutes with him, and I know that he has not persuaded Mr. Montgomery that it would be in the best interests of the Old Country that the embargo should be removed.

One word more, and then I will leave this matter in the hands of the House. It is just possible that I may not have the sympathy of the Government, the sympathy of the House, or the sympathy of the country at my back, but notwithstanding that, I am convinced from my own observation and experience that my resolution is in the right direction.

Mr. WILLIAM H. WHITE (Victoria, Alta.): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad indeed that the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) has brought this question before the House. He is a man who has had a great deal of experience in the live stock business and knows stock conditions on both sides of the Atlantic. His opinions are therefore of considerable weight. From personal experience I cannot say what advantages might accrue to this country if the embargo on cattle were raised. Although I have been interested in a small way in the raising of stock during a large part of my life, I have never been a shipper or importer of cattle, but I take it from the large stock growers, particularly of Western Canada, who have both exported and imported stock, that their anxiety to have the embargo removed must be attributable to some definite advantages which they foresee. The raising of the embargo is a thing with which this Parliament or this Government has little to do, and it is very doubtful whether we shall ever succeed in that direction. The alternate proposition of my hon. friend I heartily agree with, and that is to establish cold storages and abattoirs on this side of the water to enable us to send our dead meat over.

The first year I came to this House, in 1908, I placed a resolution on the order paper, and, like that which my hon. friend has mentioned, it got side-tracked in some way, not however before it had been discussed to some extent. I remember that both sides of the House agreed with me, and the strongest advocate of cold storage at that time was the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen).

There is one thing that is beyond dispute, and that is that, whether by embargo or by the establishment of cold storage throughout this country, something must be done to carry on the live stock business of the western plains. If our market were closed to the United States there would be no future whatever for this industry, and we know that there are still large areas of grazing land that might be used for the purposes of cattle raising. The Government has made an attempt to stimulate the industry and enhance production, and unless we have some assurance that we are to have outside markets for our cattle very few men will remain in the business for any length of time.

When you reflect that the same grade of cattle that were selling in 1919 as high as twelve and fourteen cents as now sold in the western yards at between five and seven cents, you can see that the business is not in a very healthy condition. The slump in grain prices was large but the slump in prices of cattle was unexpected, and after the experience of the bad winter the year before last many stockmen were thrown out of business. Indeed, I believe that the number of those engaged in the business has declined some 50 per cent in the last year as compared with what it was during the past three or four years. With my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Smith), I say emphatically that something must be done. The removal of the embargo would be highly beneficial and the stockmen of the country seem to think that it would be advantageous. But whether or not the removal of the embargo would be the means of keeping up our industry in Canada, the one thing that I heartily agree with is that some steps should be taken to establish on this side of the water a system of cold storage and abattoirs so that if we were forced out of the American market and could get no relief from the embargo being removed, we should still have a way of handling our stock in this country.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton East): I do not favour the resolution on the Order Paper. This matter has been the subject of discussion for the last two or three weeks in the Provincial Legislature of Alberta because a candidate was defeated on this question in an election recently held in England, and it is a sore point with every cattleman in Western Canada. I do not know by what method of reasoning my hon. friend arrives at the conclusion that it is necessary for England to put a stigma on our cattle in order to develop the industry in Canada. I am not going to take any issue with the mover of the resolution (Mr. Smith) as to the method of increasing our trade in Canada and improving our labour conditions. He may be right on that point or he may be wrong. But there is one thing that the Canadian people in Western Canada will not stand, and that is an indirect method of adopting protection in England without a tariff, by placing a mark of inferiority on our cattle which they do not deserve. I sincerely hope that if the resolution is adopted it will be only after considerable protest on the part of hon. members. I will not go into any lengthy discussion of this matter, because the press has been full of the subject for the last two or three weeks, dealing with it from a provincial as well as a Federal point of view. But I wish to take my stand against the resolution and to say that I differ from the hon. member for Victoria, Alta. (Mr. White) who supports it.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Like my hon. friend from Victoria, Alta. (Mr. White) I have the highest appreciation of what the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) has done for the live stock industry of this country, and I am sure that every member of this House who has taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the record of my hon. friend on this subject will listen with the greatest respect to any views which he advances at any time upon the live stock industry of this country. I go this distance, at any rate, in sympathy with my hon. friend's resolution and in opposition, I think, to the spirit of the remarks of the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie), that I have no sympathy whatsoever with the attempts to get Canadian cattle into Britain by means of the crowbar. I observe there are politicians over in Britain who tell the British people how they should conduct their business. Well, the attempts of these gentlemen remind me of the fact that a distinguished British statesman was sitting forty years ago at a dinner table in London next to a distinguished European diplomatist who was loud-mouthed in his criticisms of Mr. Gladstone's Government of that date because he could not keep order in Ireland. The British statesman said that he refrained from pointing out to this diplomatist that he would be in a better position to criticise the inability of Mr. Gladstone's Government to keep order in Ireland if his own Government could keep order in its capital. The friend to whom he spoke asked him why he had refrained from so stating. He replied: "Because I have learned the truth of Chamfort's saying, that in this world we have often to be instructed upon many things by people who know nothing about them." I am opposed to the method of the crowbar because I believe in the golden rule. I believe in doing to others as I would be done by, and I know nothing in this world that would create a greater storm in Canada than if any British statesman were to come here and insist that we should have a free market for Lancashire cottons because they were better than Canadian cottons. I have not imagination enough to conceive of the storm that would be created. Of course there is a reason for that. While we, who have lived any time in the world, know that all men are equal, we have also learned that as a rule, especially to-day, youngsters know a great deal more than their fathers. While I have a great respect for the knowledge of Canadians, and I have great respect for their knowledge of their own business I do think that we ought to extend an equal respect to the British people in regard to their business.

I want to endorse what has fallen from my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. White), and to carry his remarks a little further. He said we have very little to do with what the British people take into Britain. I should say that we have nothing to do with it; and I support my view upon that by reminding this House that we would not for one moment stand for British statesmen interfering to-day with any tariff we liked to put on goods here. However, I have to differ from my hon. friend in regard to his resolution to this extent—that I think under freedom we should get a great many of the advantages that he dilates upon very wisely and very truly. I think the more of our cattle we finish at home the better it will be for the live stock industry; but if we have a free entry into Britain for our cattle we should not be compelled to sell them there—we should have perfect freedom in the matter. After all it is rather an abstract question to discuss. We could send cattle alive or we could send the meat frozen, or in any shape that it pleased us to send it and the people with whom we were dealing to receive it. Under freedom we should have all the advantages that my hon. friend points out; we could sell just as we wanted to do.

I do not know whether the House would bear with me if I offered to tell them how they could sell more beef in Britain. They could sell more beef in Britain if they bought more cotton and woollen goods there. It is very elementary—and here I am talking about what pertains to Canadian rights, Canadian opinions, and Canadian business. If, as my hon. friend from Victoria asserts, we need more markets for our agricultural produce, and I certainly agree with him, if such a market is to be found in Britain, there is one way to get it: We must give some inducement for the ships to come to Canada and carry produce over, and ships do not carry loads one way in this world if they can carry them two ways. Now, as a matter of fact, at the present moment Manchurian wheat, Argentine wheat, Australian wheat, is beating Manitoba wheat out of the markets in Britain by its cheapness. That is a matter of fact at the present moment. What is the consequence? That British ships are going to Manchuria, going to Australia, going to the Argentine—especially to the Argentine where the tariffs are extremely low against British goods—and they are carrying wheat from all these places. If we want to compete with these countries in the matter of wheat then the lesson is obvious—bring the ships to our coasts. The same thing applies to cattle.

I consider this Government had a magnificent opportunity at the end of the war if they had had the courage and initiative —a magnificent opportunity. We are very much the nearest of the outlying portions of the Empire to Britain. During the war immense sympathy was created between Britain and this country. Not only was sympathy created, but we had a ferry boat service established between this country and the Old Country by the exigencies of the war. Reduced to economic considerations why was that ferry boat service established? Because we had the markets for our goods: not only Britain but the other nations of Europe had to have our goods. Thank God, the exigencies of the war disappeared, but the exigencies of economics remain with us; and the thought I want to leave with my hon. friend and with the House is, that if we want markets we must give them. If we want to get our cattle into Britain we must reduce our tariff against British goods and bring the ships to our shores. I say there was a magnificent opportunity because of the sympathy that had been created between this country and the Old Country, and because of our nearness to the Old Country. If we had had a government of initiative and courage at the end of the war they would have seen the state of affairs coming to which I have referred. They would have seen the wheat produced in other countries beating our western wheat, they would have seen the cattle from Australia and from the Argentine beating our cattle—because there is a large amount of cattle being taken from both of these countries to Britain, three and four times the distance that Canada is from the Old Country—and they would have reduced the tariff and kept up some portion at least of what I have ventured to describe as "the ferry boat service" that was established during the war.

I regret extremely on personal grounds that if my hon. friend takes this resolution to a vote I cannot vote with him. I see much force in many of the things that he said but he would hardly expect me. While I agree with him that we have nothing to do with telling Great Britain what she should do, he would hardly expect me as a free trader to do anything to persuade Britain to keep up obstacles against trade in any shape or form whatsoever. For these reasons if my hon. friend takes his resolution to a vote I am afraid I shall have to vote against it and, I repeat, I shall do so, on personal grounds, with very much regret.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The Order Paper would indicate that the resolution now before the House is one that is commanding the attention of quite a number of hon. members. The present resolution is followed on the Order Paper by another motion from an hon. member who holds entirely opposite views to those advocated by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith). I doubt if there is in the Dominion a man who can speak with greater knowledge of the subject than the mover of the resolution we are now discussing. He has been identified with the live stock interests of Canada for many years. He has occupied a very prominent place among the live stock breeders of this country, and I am inclined to attach considerable importance to the views which he holds with regard to this question which is apparently exercising the minds of a great number of people to a marked degree at the present time.

I have a very distinct recollection of the coming into effect of the embargo against Canadian cattle. At that time my special interest in farming was in finishing beef cattle for the British market, and I have since been engaged in that business to a greater or less extent almost continuously. I have a very vivid recollection of the predictions that were made when the embargo was placed against our cattle, and I have followed the discussion very closely from that time down to the present. In November of 1892, when some suspected cases of pleuro-pneumonia were discovered in a shipment of cattle from Toronto, the embargo was placed against Canadian cattle. It was in effect previous to that time against cattle from the United States from the year 1879. I have a recollection of a motion moved by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) in 1905 advocating the bringing to this country of British experts with a view to having them ascertain whether there was any disease among our cattle or not. There is no contention on the part of the British authorities to-day that this embargo is being maintained against our cattle by reason of disease; they freely admit that it is a system of protection in favour of those engaged in the cattle industry in the Old Land. Notwithstanding the address this afternoon by that ardent free trader from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) on his old hobby, I think he can find examples in Great Britain of protection that ought to be a lesson to a younger country like Canada, and it seems to me that we might very well copy some of the policies pursued by the British Government.

As far as I am concerned I do not presume to advise the people of Great Britain what they should do in this matter. For many years I felt very sore to think that while our cattle were free from disease the embargo was still maintained against us, but after having heard such an ardent free trader as the hon. member for Red Deer get up in this House a few years ago and take an entirely opposite view to the one that he would like us to believe that he is in favour of to-day, I have not felt quite so sore. I have reference to the debate on the Naval question, which I am using just to illustrate the inconsistency of the hon. gentleman. His argument then was to manufacture the finished product (Battleships) in our own country in order to employ Canadian labour and have the money spent in producing the finished article spent in Canada. I do not wish to get away from the subject before the House, but I do desire to point out that there are two sides to this question, and that we had better make the best of what we now believe is the established policy in Great Britain in regard to the cattle embargo.

I am sorry to think that during the last few months an effort has been made in certain quarters to make this a political issue. Only to-day I notice prominently featured on the front pages of the Ottawa press references to the Ontario Minister of Agriculture who is now in London, and I am going to quote some of the newspaper articles which have appeared during the last few days. It is only about two weeks ago that the Provincial Treasurer of Ontario, Hon. Peter Smith, delivered an address in the town of St. Marys. I quote from the report of that meeting given in the daily press:

> St. Mary's, Feb., 20.—Hon. Peter Smith, in his address at the opening of the new U.F.O. Club room here Saturday afternoon, touched briefly on the Drury-Morrison controversy, declaring it was an unfortunate affair.

Excuse me, I have started reading in the wrong place. This is the part to which I wished to call attention. The speaker referred to is Hon. Peter Smith:

> The speaker mentioned the amount of tuberculosis in cattle, saying that it had been necessary to kill 84 out of 85 head at Monteith.
>
> To Hon. Manning Doherty, he said, will go the whole credit if the embargo on cattle is lifted by Great Britain which is likely to be the case.

A herd of cattle on a Government farm managed by the provincial authorities of Ontario diseased to the extent of 84 out of 85! This would not indicate that our bill of health is so clean as some people imagine. I also notice the following in the Ottawa press of February 23rd:

> The resolution moved in the Quebec Legislature by the Hon. J. E. Caron, Minister of Agriculture, and seconded by Premier Taschereau, is as follows:
> "This House, after obtaining knowledge of the facts of the embargo against Canadian cattle, believes that this embargo is not justified and regrets that it is maintained. Mr. Caron speaking on the question, said, in part: I do not like the policy of the British authorities. It is a strange stand they take on this embargo question. They claim that Great Britain is the country of free trade in commerce. That does not exist for us, but does exist in large degree for the United States. We have helped England and made so many sacrifices that I believe that Great Britain should consider us at least as favorably as the United States."

As a matter of fact this embargo does not rest against Canadian cattle any more than it does against cattle from the United States or any other country, it applies to all countries. In November, 1902, regulations were put in effect by the British Board of Agriculture to prevent cattle from Canada coming into that country, and in 1894 the British statuts with regard to cattle embargoes were consolidated. In 1895 the provision by which the Board of Agriculture might exempt cattle coming from any country was cancelled and the embargo was embodied in a statute. In that statute Canada was not mentioned specifically; the embargo is applicable to all countries.

Now, why were the British authorities so anxious to keep cattle disease out of their country? It is not necessary to say that the British people are pretty shrewd and well able to take care of their own interests. Stock breeders from all parts of the world look to Great Britain to secure stock of high quality to improve their herds and flocks. Previous to the imposition of the embargo disease had for years decimated the British herds to such a degree that the authorities were amply justified in adopting protective measures. It is now admitted by those authorities that they cannot afford to remove this embargo. Those who are engaged in the livestock industry in Great Britain, and who are bringing tremendous revenues to their country by reason of their sales of livestock, do not feel that their interests ought to be jeopardized by permitting importations of livestock from outlying parts of the world. The hon. member for South Ontario has pointed out what the result is in respect to Ireland alone. The same might be said in respect to Scotland. The farmers in Great Britain have benefited immensely by reason of the embargo. I do not know, but possibly on account of the unsettled conditions that prevail in Great Britain, particularly in labour circles, the British Government may be forced to change their policy on this subject. I think myself that it is very unfortunate that we should endeavour to stir up any further labour troubles in Great Britain, because we all know they have enough to contend with in any event. But I notice in the Ottawa papers this morning the following:

> Hon. Manning H. Doherty, Ontario Minister of Agriculture, had a star place among the speakers and made special reference to London newspaper attacks on him in regard to his attitude on the embargo....
> Mr. Doherty proceeded to prove that Canada possessed a clear bill of health from thirty years of official records and denied the charge of disease as one of the most unmitigated falsehoods ever promulgated. The same was true of the assertion that those who believed in the agitation would make money by the removal of the embargo. Not one of them would make a dollar, he said.
> Mr. Doherty readily admitted that the matter was one for negotiation between Great Britain and the Federal authorities.

Evidently he recognizes that he has no authority to go over there and deal with the British Government or any one acting on behalf of the British Government. He is simply there in the capacity of a private individual, evidently trying to stir up trouble in labour circles in Great Britain. I think it is rather significant that the Minister of Agriculture for Quebec should adopt the same attitude; and I believe the same attitude has been adopted by some of the members of provincial governments in Western Canada. It is unfortunate, I think, that this aspect of the situation should be forced on the people as it has been. The resolution practically intimates that notwithstanding all these press notices that are being featured, we had better attend to our own business and let Great Britain do the same. In brief, I think that is the substance of the resolution, and I heartily agree with those sentiments. The hon. member for Victoria, Alta. (Mr. White), has pointed out the conditions that prevailed in 1919 and those which prevail to-day with regard to the live stock industry, and states that there has been a great fall in the price of beef cattle. That is quite true. There has been a serious deflation in the prices of all farm products, and it has struck the farmer a little in advance of most other people; consequently he is somewhat apprehensive as to what the future has in store for him.

In that regard I wish to refer to something which may have escaped the attention of hon. members who have not been engaged in farming operations. For the last few years we have been drawing very heavily upon our capital account and trying to make ourselves believe that we have been making good profits. The day is not far distant when we shall be forced, by the fact that our capital has become exhausted, to adopt different methods. That has been quite evident in the older provinces during the last few years, where there has been a desire to produce as much as possible while prices were high. A very poor system of farming has been carried on through those years, and the result is quite apparent. I believe that the same condition prevails throughout Western Canada. Reference has been made to the shipments of grain to England from Manchuria, Argentina and other parts of the world. I have on a number of occasions pointed out the effect that the shipment of so much wheat and so little flour from this country has had, and have even gone so far as to advocate the putting into commission of some of the Government-owned transports in order that flour, the finished product, should not be discriminated against but should be put on an equal footing with wheat in regard to ocean rates. As it is to-day, there is a preference of about fifteen cents a bushel in favour of wheat and against flour, and I think that militates against the interests of the farmer of Canada to a greater degree than the average man realizes.

Before, during and since the war, Great Britain controlled the shipping of the world. While the people of that country are, in a sense, a free trade people, they are doubly protected in that their government arrange to bring them the raw material by which they can finish their stock with the mill feed and put that stock on the market—a market in which it will command the highest price because it has an advantage over stock from other countries by reason of the embargo. Now, I do not blame the people of Great Britain for doing this; it is good business on their part; and it would be good business on our part if we adopted similar measures with regard to our raw material and fed it in this country. I have always believed and contended that a country which ships out its raw material in the unfinished state is bound to remain a poor country. It is the finished article that commands the high price. Why is there a difference of from three to five cents a pound between the stocker and the finished animal? Because the finished animal is the one that is most desirable, and will bring to those who finish it a price that the man who raises the stocker will not receive. Why are so many anxious to have a market for the stocker? Because they are following the line of least resistance. Many of our friends in Western Canada have for some years found conditions much easier than we have in the older provinces. While they have been able to grow big crops and to let their cattle run on the ranches without the care we are forced to give to the cattle in the older provinces, they view with alarm the possibility of their cattle being debarred from the United States under the tariff that may be put into effect by the new government there. They think, therefore, that it would be advisable in any event, to have the British embargo removed, because their unfinished cattle would then be able to reach that market. That would be all right, but I believe that the remedy we should adopt is the one under which we shall not be drawing on our capital account but shall be enriching the soil that is under cultivation in this country. I have thought for years that instead of endeavouring to spread our people over more acres and bring more land under cultivation it would be better to farm more intensively the land that has already been broken up. Some hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to leave the impression that we have in Ontario quite a number of abandoned farms. I do not know where there is one abandoned farm in Ontario, notwithstanding the frequent assertions to the contrary made by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. VIEN: Is it not a fact that the rural statistics of Ontario show that there is a decreased acreage under cultivation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, I do not think they do. There is a much larger area used for grazing than there was a few years ago, on account of farm labour not being available. What this country requires more than anything else is people from the Old Land. Bring the emigrants from the Old Land—those who will go on the land—and thus enable our farmers to carry on as they should carry on, and you will be doing something for the benefit of the whole of the people of Canada. Do not pay too much attention to this cry that is being raised that we must debar immigrants from coming into this country, because in our towns and cities hundreds and thousands of people are out of employment. Have hon. members ever stopped to ask themselves why so many people are out of employment? They are out of employment because they will not do the work that is here ready and waiting for some one to tackle; but rather than do the work that ought to be and must be done before we shall be able to meet our obligations, many people will accept aid in order to carry them on in the hope that something congenial may turn up. We must face the situation with courage. I am satisfied that we have been pursuing a most wasteful and prodigal policy with regard to our natural resources. We have found our natural resources being depleted to such a degree that many people, it is true, are anxious to get off the farms and they are getting off the farms very fast. They have drawn on their capital, and with the profit they have made in addition to that, they are in a position to leave the farm and allow the land to be tilled by some one else, while they seek employment elsewhere.

To my mind, the live stock industry of this country is our only hope for replenishing the depleted soil fertility of our farms, and we should apply ourselves, with proper Government assistance, in order to see that those who are finishing the live stock of this country ready for the market are not hampered as they have been hampered, and seriously hampered, for many years past by reason of regulations passed which did not permit them to have a fair show in finishing their stock for the market. I have pointed this out on numerous occasions in this House, indeed, until some people have begun to think that this is a fad of mine and that there is really not so much in it after all. I refer to the adulteration of millfeed. But I am more convinced to-day than I have ever been in the past that I was right, and that we must remedy those conditions and make it possible for the farmers of this country not only to raise the best kind of stock that can be raised, but to finish them, and we must see that that live stock can be placed on the market in the easiest possible manner. I believe it would be much more desirable to have abattoirs at points nearer where the animals are finished than to have them at the seaboard as has been advocated by some hon. members. If our animals are shipped to Great Britain in a finished condition, as they ought to be, the farmers of this country will benefit much more than they would by shipping out the unfinished animals. I am not so much alarmed about this embargo which has been on the statutes of Great Britain since 1895, but which was in effect by an order of the Board of Agriculture in 1892. I believe the live stock industry of this country, with the high-grade breeding stock that we have been bringing out from Great Britain, has a bright future. But these things will have to be done; we shall have to have better facilities, and better transportation rates must be had for the shipment of stock than we have at the present time.

I might give just one illustration of the handicaps under which we are labouring to-day. I am now finishing cattle that were raised in Western Canada near Battleford, and hon. members can understand that with a six days' trip from Battleford to Toronto, and then from Toronto to my farm, considerable expense is entailed before those cattle reach the stable where they are to be finished. I have not the slightest doubt that the system in vogue in Western Canada will be changed very materially in the near future, and instead of sending out the unfinished animals, the raisers of live stock will finish with grain, which is raised in such immense quantities in that part of the country, thus finishing them in Western Canada, and in a few years the number of finished live stock that will be shipped out of Western Canada will greatly surprise many members of this House. I do not intend to take up any more of the time of the House in regard to this matter, but I contend that the finishing of our live stock in this country will be conducive to the breeding of better stock; that it will result in a much better system of farming, and that the fertility of the soil will be greatly enhanced as a result of such methods. Consequently, I approve leaving the British authorities to manage their own business in that respect, and we shall be doing very well when we mind our own, because they admit they have adopted this measure in Great Britain for the protection of their farmers.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House as I have on the Order Paper a resolution dealing with the same subject. I am not rising to answer my hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) or the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) who, we all know, is very familiar with the subject and who is himself one of the best stock breeders in this country. His motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it would not be in the interests of Canada should the Government of Great Britain remove the embargo upon cattle going into the United Kingdom.

I do not oppose this motion on the grounds taken by my hon. friend, who is very familiar with the business and who, I understand, has in mind the establishment of abattoirs and of a big trade in beef and meat with other countries. As to that, I have nothing to say; but I rise this afternoon, not because I wish to meddle with any domestic business which concerns Great Britain, but because I think we should not let Canadian cattle lie under the stigma with which it is now being branded throughout the world. That is the only point which I wish to make. I am too much a friend of Canadian autonomy myself to go and meddle with political matters in Great Britain. Great Britain is free to mind her own business as Canada is free to mind hers. We know that the tie between Great Britain and Canada is very slender. Indeed the only ties which bind us to the Mother Country, are first, the Crown; second, the Governor General, and third, the appeals to the Privy Council, and then there is that right of veto which the home Government has never exercised. As an hon. gentleman said the other day, in our domestic affairs, we are practically absolutely free. I do not wish to interfere with the policies of British statesmen when those policies concern only the United Kingdom; but whenever in Great Britain a policy is pursued which directly affects the interests or rights of Canada, I as a Canadian, as a free man, and, I will say, as a Britisher, have a right to remonstrate politely, but to remonstrate firmly with the Mother Country; and in the present instance I claim it is not meddling with British politics to protest that on this question of the embargo, to say the least, a very grievous mistake, nay more, a very serious wrong has been committed.

I know of only one man of late years who has taken up this matter and made a political issue of it. He is a Canadian, and we all know his name—Lord Beaverbrook. I think not many will approve the stand he has taken in England on this question. Personally I do not think he took the proper stand on the embargo in the by-election which took place in England only a few days ago. He had no mandate to speak for the Canadian people and was therefore simply importing a Canadian issue into British politics. But We, the members of the Canadian Parliament, speaking for the whole people of Canada, have the right to remonstrate with the Board of Agriculture in Great Britain and say: You have adopted a measure prohibiting Canadian cattle from being landed on the docks at Liverpool, Glasgow, or any other port in the United Kingdom on the pretext that these cattle are tainted with a disease; now it has been proven beyond the shadow of a doubt that the disease did not exist in that case, and we protest against this libel against our Canadian cattle. If the Britsih Government wish to adopt a protective policy, which the embargo is in effect, I do not object to that, but in that case let them say openly that it is a measure of protection for the cattle breeders in Scotland and in the north of Ireland. The various Canadian legislatures which of late have adopted resolutions on this question have not been animated by any political motives. It is a Canadian question which effects Canadian stock breeders and Canada at large, and the legislatures of Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and Alberta also, I believe, spoke only the minds of the people. Their remonstrances were couched in very dignified language, and I do not think we in this Parliament are debarred from speaking to the Mother Country in language such as was used by these divers Canadian legislatures.

Let me say that I have had the honour to belong to a Government which gave a preference to the Mother Country. That preference was the crowning work of the hon. gentleman who sits beside me, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). There were Canadians at the time who said: Now that you are giving a preference to the Mother Country, you should at the same time claim a reciprocal preference from her. But the hon. gentleman answered: No, it suits Canada to give a preference to Britain; we ask nothing in return. That is exactly the attitude which as Canadians we take with the Mother Country in fiscal matters. We are free to act as we please, and if to-morrow Great Britain adopts a tariff against Canadian goods what complaint have we? Have we not ourselves taxed British goods for the last forty-five years, and was it not a Canadian statesman who in answer to the complaint that our tariff against British goods might perhaps break the British connection made the famous retort "So much the worse for the British connection." That is not my view, but it was the view held by someone well known to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). No, Mr. Speaker, on trade matters we are perfectly free, and for myself I admire good old England which in spite of all these tariffs against her from Australia, New Zealand, Canada, the premier Dominion, and the United States has maintained free trade throughout all these years.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Just for my own information I should like my hon. friend to verify the quotation he gave just now. Can he do it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is now a matter of history. The words were used by Sir John A. Macdonald, but we know that he was not always in earnest in what he said, and he might have used these words in a Pickwickian sense. At all events, they were attributed to him.

To come back to this question of the embargo, I think no one will deny the accuracy of the statement made by the late Sir Charles Tupper. He was a stout Canadian, and also a good Britisher, and when he was High Commissioner in London he tackled this question—and he was the first High Commissioner to do it—with the Board of Agriculture in England. I thought when I quoted him the other day in speaking on the Address, that I would find a report of his activities in connection with this matter in his memoirs, but I failed to find it there. I had read it in the Life of Sir Charles Tupper by Mr. J. W. Longley, where I read, at page 184:

> Sir Charles Tupper's acceptance of the High Commissionership left a large blank in the political life of Canada, but he acted in accordance with true patriotism in accepting this post, and raised it to an importance not contemplated when it was originally created. He infused great vigor into his discharge of duties previously regarded as prefunctory, and was watchful regarding everything which concerned Canada's interests. When the Imperial Government was about to take steps to prevent Canadian cattle being admitted to Great Britain on the ground that disease had been discovered among cattle in some parts of the United States, Sir Charles went straight to Liverpool with British experts, caused several animals selected by the experts to be slaughtered and carefully examined, in which technical investigation, his medical education gave him a strong position. So far as it was in human power to establish the unimpeachable freedom of Canadian cattle from all disease, Sir Charles was absolutely triumphant. Not a trace of disease was found in a single animal slaughtered. But this had no effect in staying the determination to place an embargo on Canadian cattle, which have remained ever since under the bann, though the most conclusive evidence has been repeatdly furnished that no disease existed. This leads to the suspicion that other reasons than fear of disease contributed to uphold this policy. It had every appearance of being a prohibitive measure in the interests of British cattle-raisers. This matter has only been referred to as an instance of the personal devotion of Sir Charles in determining that no means should be spared to see that the cattle industry of Canada was given fair play.

I have quoted this just to show that it has been established beyond a shadow of a doubt that the charge that our cattle are tainted with pleuro-pneumonia is unfounded. The intent and purport of my motion that humble representations be made to the British authorities that in the event of the embargo against Canadian cattle being maintained, the British authorities should state that it is not because our cattle are diseased, but simply because they wish to maintain a protective measure for the cattle raisers of the United Kingdom. That is the purport of my motion, which of course, is not now under discussion, but I might urge this in connection with the motion of my hon. friend the respected member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith). If a vote is taken on this question I shall vote not so much against the text of the resolution introduced by my hon. friend because he upheld by a very sensible statement the object of his resolution which is the development of the meat industry and the chilling process in Canada, and the establishment of abattoirs. I have no objection to that. But he spoke also about the embargo, and therein lies the difference between himself and myself. I have no objection to the embargo provided it is well understood that the reason for it is not that our cattle are diseased, for that is a mere myth. The British Government may impose all sorts of prohibitive measures they deem fit. It is their business and they are free to act in their capacity as legislators on the other side, as we do in Canada, on trade matters affecting us. But I do seriously object to our Canadian cattle being stigmatized throughout the world as tainted with disease.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is it not a fact that when the embargo was placed upon United States cattle going into Britain in 1879, the condition was laid down that Canada would have to impose a ninety-day quarantine against American cattle coming into this country? And, after that had been done, did not the United States retaliate by imposing a similar restriction on Canadian cattle going into that country?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I do not contest my hon. friend's assertion in this regard. He may be right. But what is absolutely true to-day is that as a result of investigation after investigation held during the last thirty years our Canadian cattle have been declared wholly free from disease, and this fact has been admitted without reserve. During the past summer the Imperial Press Conference, as is well known, visited Canada and it was a revelation to me to read some of the speeches made by some gentlemen who accompanied that delegation. In answer to questions put to them regarding the prohibition against our Canadian cattle, some of the representatives of the Imperial Conference admitted that there was no contagious disease in the cattle raised in this country, but that the question involved was merely one of protection for the cattle-raisers of the Old Country. Once more, let me say that I do not object to Great Britain having a tariff against Canada or any other country. It is her business to act as she sees best in this respect, and John Bull is a shrewd old business man. But I certainly do object to the libel.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): As a contribution to history, if I can make nothing better of the matter, I think I can supply the information on which my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) desired regarding that quotation. I do not think it came from Sir John Macdonald. It came from the Toronto Mail and Empire, which was very close to Sir John and at that time was regarded as his organ. So much for the history of the quotation.

Now, the resolution of the hon. member (Mr. Smith) is quite contrary to the one proposed by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). The mover of the resolution wants the embargo retained; my hon. friend from Maisonneuve seeks to have it removed. The question is a very old one. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve that we have the right to remonstrate in regard to any question that effects us prejudicially, and that as British subjects it is our privilege to go and state our views before the government of the Old Country. But having stated them fully and accurately, I do not see what there is to be gained by our continuing to nag at the British Government. As I say, this is an old story. Several hon. gentlemen have given us dates of the embargoes. I remember a good many years ago when Lord Onslow was Minister of Agriculture in the British Government. I had discussed the matter with him. I happened to be in England soon after there was a change of government. Meeting Lord Onslow I said: "I see that C. B. has come in"—C. B. was the familiar designation of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman—"and I presume that the folk who have been agitating for the removal of the embargo will now have their way." He said: "I bet you they won't." Well, I did not take the bet, and it was well that I did not, for I should have lost. Some British politicians occasionally argue in favour of the abolition of the embargo, but the Department of Agriculture of the British Government —strongly supported by the landed interests of England—have been determined to keep it up, and they will continue to do so. But the embargo is no longer put upon the ground that there is disease in Canadian cattle. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) says that what he complains of is the libel which the embargo places upon our cattle. Well, he is mistaken, for if ever disease was attributed as a reason for the embargo that is no longer the case. The reason is entirely one of self-protection on the part of the British people. They admit freely that our cattle are free from disease. But it is argued that there is more than a possibility of disease being introduced from the United States through Canada and in that way affecting the cattle in the Mother Country. That is the sole ground on which they place the embargo. I read recently a very interesting article from the pen of Lord Crewe on this subject. He was formerly Colonial Secretary, and to-day, I think, he is leader of the Liberal Opposition in the British House of Lords. He has written a strong letter regarding the action of Lord Lee, President of the Board of Agriculture, who preceded the member that was defeated the other day, and he says that the agriculturists of England are standing behind Lord Lee in this matter, and will insist on this regulation being kept up. I am inclined to think that at bottom it was a protective measure; I have a suspicion that it was designed to protect the cattle raisers of England and Ireland. An hon. member says that he wants them to admit that. Well, did you ever know a man to admit a protective policy squarely as such? You sometimes adopt measures which some people describe as protective, but you hate to call them so yourself, and that is about the situation to-day in England. I thing that this measure is retained owing to their desire—a desire with which hon. gentlemen opposite should not, I think, find fault—to protect the cattle trade of England and Ireland. In recent days, however, as I have already stated, disease in Canada is no longer given as a reason for the embargo, and the British authorities make this absolutely clear. The letter of Lord Crewe, to which I have already referred, and the declarations of other authorities in England, emphatically state that the cattle of Canada are free from disease. This being the case, therefore, I do not see that there is any libel on Canada. It is contended, however, that there is a danger of cattle disease being brought into England from the United States through Canada.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): Has any statement been made by the British House of Commons to the effect that the embargo is merely a measure of protection?

Mr. FIELDING: I do not suppose that the British Commons have made any such declaration; I should not expect it. But even if that is so, I think it is beyond dispute that the ground is no longer taken that the embargo is due to any disease in our cattle. That reason has been abandoned, and it is now useless to argue against the embargo on the ground that there is any objection to our cattle by reason of disease. The British Board of Agriculture admit that there is no disease in Canadian cattle; Lord Crewe and Lord Lee both admit the same thing; and all the literature on the subject is clear that the whole ground, good or bad, has nothing to do with any question of disease in our cattle.

Mr. CURRIE: As the hon. member is a student of this subject, may I ask him to go further and state that Lord Beaverbrook's contention was not one in favour of the admission of Canadian cattle but in favour of cheap meat and cheap bread? That is the whole question.

Mr. FIELDING: I would rather not introduce Lord Beaverbrook into the matter; but I quite agree that if we feel aggrieved in this matter at all, it is our right as citizens and as a Parliament to remonstrate. Having remonstrated, and having the facts clearly placed before us, I think all will agree with me that is is rather undignified to keep nagging on the question all the time. It is a matter entirely for the British people, although we may have the right to think they are wrong. I think they are wrong in the matter, but since, after full deliberation the British Government and the British Parliament, the leaders of public opinion in Great Britain—those who have a powerful influence, or practically speaking, the controlling influence in the British Parliament, in the House of Lords, in the House of Commons and in the various departments—have made up their minds, are we to be continually asking them to recede from their position? I have no objection to it being declared that the Canadian people think the embargo is a mistake, but I do not think the matter is one which we should threaten and bluster and make a great fuss about, and make it appear that the British Government and the British Parliament are treating us in a very bad way. The matter is one which is entirely within their right. They have a right to be wrong if they want to, and I am quite willing to concede that to them.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): If I believed that the removal of the embargo would discourage the finishing of cattle in Canada, or necessarily discourage us in establishing abattoirs, I would be disposed to vote for the resolution of my hon. friend because he probably knows more about the live stock industry than any other man in this House. But I have not heard anything to convince me that the removal of the embargo would interfere in the least with the finishing of beef cattle in Canada. I had hoped that when my hon. friend was dealing with the question he would have given us some information upon it because his knowledge is probably better than that of the majority of us. I would have liked to have heard him state what the effect of the embargo has been in the matter of encouraging people to finish cattle in Canada for the English market. If he could have told us the average price paid for Canadian cattle when they reached Liverpool or Scotland, compared with the price of the best Scotch finished beef, and if he could have satisfied us that the Canadian cattle being shipped across under present conditions would bring as high a price as the best Scotch finished animals, I would have said there is a great deal in his argument. But I do not think my hon. friend can give us figures showing anything of the kind. I am rather inclined to think that the price which we receive for our finished stock is not to be for one moment compared with the highest price paid for the stock finished in Scotland. I do not think my hon. friend will for one moment claim that the price paid for Canadian animals comes anyway near the price paid for the Scottish animals. Therefore, if I am right in my supposition, it shows the maintenance of the embargo is an absolute failure for the purpose for which my hon. friend wishes it maintained—it has not had the effect which he thinks it would have.

If that be so we must consider the case from some other standpoint. I would not for one moment wish to be associated with any interference with British legislators. My hon. friend's argument might be argument advanced in opposition to the resolution placed on the Order Paper by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux); it is not argument in favour of the present resolution. If the present resolution means anything at all it amounts to an attempt to give advice to the British legislators and I think that in England it will be looked upon as such. I think it will be looked upon there as a bit of advice from this House recommending them to maintain the embargo. It seems to me that that is the only way in which it can be regarded. Therfore I fail to see anything whatever in such an argument.

Let me go back to the question of the finishing of cattle. I do not think that every part of the world is suited to the finishing of beef cattle. As a matter of fact I doubt very much if the cattle that we look upon in Canada as finished would be accepted in Liverpool as finished animals at all. I do not think they can for a moment be compared with the finished animals that the Scotchman turns out. I am advised that a great many of the Irish feeders do not finish their cattle at all, and their finished cattle are very much better than ours from Western Canada. I am advised that a very large proportion of the Irish feeders ship their cattle to Scotland for the Scotchmen to finish, because the Scotchman makes a specialty of finishing those animals which are sent from different parts of Great Britain. If that be so why not let him have a chance of finishing some of ours. We can turn out very good stock but I do not think we have ever got the habit—not even our best feeders—of finishing our cattle as they are finished there. I say that the Irishman, whom I am advised ships his cattle to Scotland to be finished, is in a very much better position to do that finishing than we are, especially those of us in the western country.

It is not the first time I have listened to lectures from my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) as to how we should farm in the West. I suggest to my hon. friend that it would be better to leave the western farmers to work out their own salvation rather than that advice should come from people who do not know what they are talking about. We out there know very much better how to overcome the difficulties in our way or what should be done to meet them, we are very much better informed about that country than is my hon. friend. With all due deference to him we know some of the difficulties we have had to encounter; and any man who has been identified with feeding stock in the western country knows there are many difficulties in the way of finishing that stock as it should be finished for the British market. In time we may overcome those difficulties; but the solution will have to be worked out, it cannot be arrived at all at once. The present embargo is a great handicap to us in shipping cattle to Great Britain and so long as it continues in force that will continue to be the case. The western farmers feel very keenly that so long as that embargo remains they will be very seriously handicapped, and I submit that they know a great deal more about the situation there than my hon. friend from Ontario.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: You have had it for twenty-nine years.

Mr. THOMSON: That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I mean the embargo.

Mr. THOMSON: I thought it was our farming operations you were referring to. The embargo has been in force for some time and it may be in force for some time yet. So long as it is there it will be a barrier—not merely an embargo, but a barrier to our success at stock raising in so far as we depend upon the British market. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have no other alternative than to vote against the resolution of my hon. friend. While I shall vote in that way I do not say that I would vote in favour of any resolution presented here asking for a removal of that embargo; that would require separate and very careful consideration. I certainly am opposed to any resolution such as the present one which to my mind is practically a bit of advice offered to the British Parliament that they should keep the embargo on and that we do not want it removed. With that I cannot agree.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat took, if I may say so, a somewhat peculiar position in the last few sentences which he uttered. He objects to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith), on the ground that it is giving advice to the British Government and asking them to retain the embargo. He says, however, in regard to a resolution which would ask for the removal of the embargo, and which would certainly be a greater interference on our part than the present resolution, that he would give such a resolution some consideration; that he would not be prepared to vote against that on the same ground as he would vote against the present one because it would meet his own views—he could not see in the other resolution the interference which he apparently sees in the resolution now before the House. That, with all due respect to the fact that my hon. friend is a lawyer and supposed to argue questions and come to a right conclusion, strikes me as rather a peculiar attitude.

I would also say a word in regard to the attitude of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), or, since this is a subject more especially concerning people who live in rural districts, the hon. member for Gaspé. Of course, on industrial questions we will refer to him as representing his other constituency. But on this question the hon. member for Gaspé has assumed a somewhat peculiar position also. I was surprised to hear him taking rather strong exception to some utterances by Lord Beaverbrook, especially because, if I read correctly the newspaper reports of what the noble lord said, I would certainly think that if he had a seat in this House he would vote for the resolution which stands in the name of the hon. member for Gaspé, as I can only infer from his utterances that Lord Beaverbrook is opposed to the embargo against Canadian cattle and wishes to have it removed. However, my hon. friend sees in the remarks of Lord Beaverbrook a meddling in British affairs. If it is considered perfectly proper for an hon. gentlemen in this House to move a resolution which certainly can only be taken as a piece of gratuitous advice to the British authorities, I would think that a man who has a seat in the British Parliament might at least be allowed to express his opinions on British policy, and that, I believe, is all that Lord Beaverbrook has done.

Now, Sir, the hon. member for Gaspé has said that he does not want to be taken as interfering in British affairs or giving advice to the Old Country as to how they should regulate their policy in regard to the importation of cattle. He has expressed a belief, as have other hon. gentlemen, that this attitude on the part of the British Government in placing an embargo on cattle from Canada and the United States and other countries is not due, so far as Canada is concerned at least, to any belief on their part that our cattle are diseased. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was very emphatic in expressing that view, in which I entirely concur. If that is true, if we are convinced that the British people do not entertain the thought that our cattle are diseased, then we must look for another reason for the embargo, and that reason strikes me as being purely and simply an attempt to protect their cattle industry, that is all it amounts to. Then, if my hon. friend from Gaspé does not want to appear as interfering or giving advice to Great Britain in the matter of her embargo policy, why does not his resolution state exactly what he does want? Really what he wants to get from the British Government is a statement, duly signed, sealed and witnessed, I suppose, to the effect that they do not believe our cattle are diseased. If that is the case, then his resolution should state that, and that alone. Great Britain has a right to arrange her fiscal policy to suit herself, just as we have a similar right.

This debate, of course, has given the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) an opportunity to talk free trade again. I was expecting the hon. gentleman would get up, and I thought: What a wonderful opportunity he will have of—if I may use a common expression—lambasting the British Government for its protective policy in this instance. The hon. gentleman, however, had very little to say in condemnation of the British attitude. Still he must get off his free trade speech, and as he did not desire to say very much about the British policy, he took it out on Canada and gave us advice on what we should do in the way of developing more trade between the two countries.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: May I put a question to my hon. friend just with a view of elucidating this matter fully? Does not his case against Great Britain as to this embargo being a purely protective measure not fall down, somewhat at least, in view of the consideration that Great Britain imports any amount of dead meat without duty?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not think it does, because Great Britain evidently believes that in keeping on this embargo she is protecting her own livestock industry. My hon. friend will not say that that embargo is being continued in order to protect British stock men from diseased cattle? Then what is the object if it is not to protect them in the raising of livestock? Undoubtedly the embargo is purely a protective measure on their part, and I think that every hon. member recognizes it as such. If Great Britain placed a duty of $100 per head on imported Canadian cattle, no person here would raise any question at all; we would recognize her right to do so. But an import duty of $100 a head would not be any more prohibitive against our cattle than the present embargo; they would both serve exactly the same purpose, which is absolutely one of protection.

I gathered from the remarks of the hon. member for South Ontario, who is a very experienced stock man and one to whom we always listen with interest and profit, that it would be in the best interests of Canadian livestock men to finish their product here rather than ship it to England partly finished, as they would do if the embargo was taken off. In that I entirely agree with him. I am not inclined to altogether agree with him that the best place for abattoirs would be in Halifax, because if the argument holds good that in shipping the live animal from Halifax we would be shipping a lot of waste material, it would also apply in shipping stock, we will say, from Ontario to Halifax, and so the abattoirs might be better placed nearer the point where the animals are being finished. I do think, especially in view of action which the United States may take, that the Government would be well advised in establishing abattoirs in various parts of the country in order to encourage those in the livestock industry to finish their animals and ship them in the form of meat rather than on the hoof.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, may I add this? It is unfair to expect our livestock men to compete on even terms with the stock raisers of the Argentine or of the Southern States, for instance, Texas. There again I want to say—and this I pass on for the special benefit of the hon. member for Red Deer—that the Government should, if anything, raise the duty on live animals coming into this country. It is unfair to ask our farmers and stock raisers with the disadvantages of our climate, to compete on even terms with Southern States like Texas or with South American countries like the Argentine, where they have no winter conditions to contend with. This is something, it seems to me, which even my hon. friend from Red Deer, ardent free trader as he is, might do well to consider when he is preaching his free trade doctrine in this House. The hon. gentleman loses sight entirely of the climatic conditions we have to contend with when he is talking free trade whether in regard to cattle or anything else. He knows perfectly well that the farmers of this country have thousands of dollars invested in barns and stables to take care of their stock, and that they must be put to very great expense in fitting their cattle for the market. In that respect their competitors in Argentina and Texas have a very great advantage over them. These are things which should be considered in this connection.

Another thing which the Government might well consider—and I advanced this view in the House a year or two ago—is the desirability of giving Canadian flour shipped from Canadian ports to the markets of Europe a preference over wheat in the matter of ocean rates, thus inducing the milling of more wheat in this country and making available to Canadian farmers the by-products of wheat which they must have if they are to compete with those parts of the United States and those other countries which are more fortunate than we are as respects climatic conditions. All these things, it seems to me, are worthy of consideration in connection with this matter. But I most strongly deprecate this House undertaking, in connection with this resolution or with any other resolution, to tell Great Britain what she should do in handling her own affairs. Let Great Britain handle her affairs as she deems best, and we can maintain the right to do the same for ourselves. They have never undertaken to advise us in matters of legislation; very often this House has undertaken to advise Great Britain, a procedure which, I think, is not only undignified, but borders very closely on the impertinent.

Mr. J. F. REID: (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make just a few observations on this resolution, which I consider to be a very important one. Should the resolution carry, it will be an admission on our part, as I read it, that our Canadian cattle are diseased. It says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it would not be in the interests of Canada should the Government of Great Britain remove the embargo upon cattle going into the United Kingdom.

It is well known that the reason why our cattle are not admitted free into Great Britain is because of the discovery of disease in them some years ago. It has been suggested that the embargo is a measure of protection on behalf of the British stock raiser. I know for a fact that Scottish stock feeders want to be able to purchase our Canadian stocker: several of them have told me that our cattle are the best and the healthiest that they can buy. The same applies to the English farmer. But the protection is a protection for Ireland, for the Irish farmer, and, I think, Mr. Speaker, we will all agree that Ireland needs a little protection.

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. White) has voiced the sentiments of western stock men to the effect that if something is not done to stabilize the stock industry, especially in the West, the stock-raisers will practically have to go out of business. It is all very well for our friends in Ontario, and in the East to say that we should finish the cattle in Canada before we ship them abroad, but that cannot apply to Western Canada. We have unlimited grazing lands in Western Canada that are not occupied. If this embargo was removed and we were able to ship our cattle to the Old Country, the live stock industry in the West would be stimulated. I admit that the day may come when we shall finish our cattle in the West, but in the meantime there must be some disposition of our cattle before they are finished.

Then, I think the Government should make some inquiries with regard to the building of abattoirs. I agree with the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that abattoirs should be built as nearly as possible to the districts in which the stock is raised. It is necessary to avoid excessive freight rates and wastage in the live animal, so that the nearer we get the abattoirs to the stock-raising fields, the better.

The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), in advancing the argument that our stock should be finished at home advocated the use of smaller farms and the employment of more men on the land. I just want to say in passing that if that principle were adapted, the revenue from an income tax point would be considerably decreased. I notice that the farmers of Alberta, which is not a thickly settled province, paid last year by way of income tax over $360,000. In Alberta we have a great many ranchers and a great many stock-raisers, so I think it would be unwise to encourage small holdings in that province. In Saskatchewan the farmers paid $340,000 by way of income tax—I am giving the round figures and speaking partly from memory, so that I am subject to correction. In Saskatchewan there are fewer ranchers than in Alberta. The income tax paid by the farmers of Ontario amounted for the same period to $64,000. I do not think, therefore, that it would be wise, even for the sake of obtaining the benefit which would result from finishing our live stock on the farms, to encourage small holdings. I rather think we should encourage larger holdings and stock-raising as is the practice on the western prairies. If practicable, we should ask Great Brtiain to remove the embargo, and should the Government consider it advisable to do this, I suggest that they should say to the British Government at the same time: If you will remove the embargo on our Canadian cattle, we will take off all the duties against British manufactured goods.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of speaking on this question a good many times, and though I cannot profess to be quite up to date on the subject I think I may be justified in placing a few facts before the House in reference to the conditions as they existed a few years ago.

Five years after the embargo was placed upon our Canadian cattle, there was still a strong agitation to have the embargo removed. At that time I asked the Customs Department to furnish me with a statement of the number of cattle shipped during the five years prior to the placing of the embargo and the five years following the placing of the embargo. I am sorry to say that I have not these figures before me, though I kept them for many years; probably they are still among my treasures. But it may be broadly stated that prior to the placing of the embargo an immense export trade in live cattle had been carried on from Ontario to the United Kingdom and the cattle were bringing at that time a very high price. If my memory serves me correctly, the average price obtained for Canadian cattle at the time the embargo went on was about $95 per head. As we were sending hundreds of thousands of cattle into the British market, that meant many millions of dollars for the province of Ontario alone. Immediately after the embargo was imposed, the number of cattle exported diminished very rapidly, and the price decreased just as rapidly as the number of cattle exported diminished, thus showing conclusively, to my mind, that we lost a very valuable market by an act which I always considered to be a great injustice to the Dominion. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said, that an effort was made lately to show that the embargo was not imposed on account of disease; but the fact is that the embargo was imposed in the first place on account of disease and no other disease than pleuro-pneumonia. The diseases which the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) mentioned were not in the category at all. While Canadian cattle were free from disease, there was a possibility that United States cattle were not; I believe they were not entirely free, and that, perhaps, there came across our borders into Canada a few cattle that were affected with disease. I believe, if anybody will go to the customs and ask for the figures, he will find that they prove that, after the passing of the embargo, the number of cattle exported fell off very rapidly and the price fell just as rapidly, so that we lost both ways.

The hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) is one of the highest authorities on livestock matters, and I feel like a very humble member beside him in debating any of these questions pertaining to cattle. It is only because, in years gone by, I have made a considerable study of this question that I venture to make these few remarks. Taking it for granted that the best proposition is to send the finished cattle from Canada, that is, that they should be fed on our own grain and absolutely matured in Canada before they go to the British market, I want to point this out—and I do not think it has been mentioned so far in the debate—that cattle travelling under sea conditions, herded and fed and watered as they are, are a good deal like men or women making the same voyage; they arrive in a condition, not fit to kill. I think the hon. member will realize the truth of that. I have crossed the Atlantic many times; I know what seasickness means, and I am told that cattle are just as much subject to seasickness as human beings. Therefore, when these cattle arrive at Liverpool and other markets, they are not in shape to kill; they have not been fed or watered or housed properly, and as a result they have lost a lot of flesh and the flesh that remains is not in a good condition. Anyone can understand that when an animal has been affected by seasickness for ten days or two weeks, it is not in a condition to kill, and in justice to the British people, they should not be fed on the flesh of cattle that have been killed in a seasick condition. Yet the regulations say that those animals must be slaughtered within ten days after arrival. The proposition on the face of it is not a good one.

It is said that Lord Beaverbrook is conducting a Canadian campaign, but I am not sure that he has said that it is a Canadian campaign he is conducting. I am sorry this has become a political issue in the Old Country; I hope it will not become a political issue in Canada, and perhaps the best course for us to pursue at the present time is to say very little about the matter either one way or the other. I have never known my hon. friend (Mr. Smith) to go wrong on agricultural matters; but, perhaps, he is not going to divide the House on this question and I shall not have to oppose him at present. The cattle question in Canada is to my mind one amongst a number of burning questions, and in Ontario with the Minister of Agriculture of that province going overseas in order to push the matter, it has become a more live question than usual. Whether that gentleman has any mandate from Ontario to go and push that question, I am not so clear. I think, perhaps, on the whole, as we have on the Order Paper these two resolutions, pro and con, the better idea would be to withdraw them both and let the debate go for what it is worth. For myself, I believe an injustice is being done to Canada; that it ought to be removed and that we should not be told our cattle are diseased. To the hon. member for South Ontario, I would say that it is not necessary for us to take advantage of the removal of the embargo, if it is not to our interest to do so, but we would have the privilege of taking advantage of it if there is anything to be gained.

I cannot refrain from pointing this out to my good friend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) because, although he made some remarks on the cattle question, he strayed a little afield, when he said that we could never expect in this country to have the trade that we should have unless we brought back full ships as well as sent out full ships. I think that was the idea the hon. gentleman had. You may build all the ships in the world; but when you bring in more than half the goods that come into Canada, by rail, and not by ships,—and that is a policy which my hon. friend is pushing for all he is worth, namely, to bring in goods from the United States by rail—you will never have full ships crossing the Atlantic. I would support my hon. friend if he said that we should buy more British goods than American; then he would be talking; but, at present, goods are being brought in by a short rail route from the United States, much to the detriment of our railways that need the traffic, as can be seen by looking at the railway Estimates, instead of being brought in by ships to Halifax, St. John, Quebec, and being loaded on our railways, thus furnishing a trade route throughout the whole country. Out of about $1,500,000,000 worth of goods that we have brought into Canada, nearly $1,000,000,000 have come from the United States, and, I believe, almost entirely by rail. So I say to the hon. member for Red Deer: You cannot fill ships on that basis The difficulty is not that we are not buying enough goods; we are at the present time buying more than we are selling, but we are buying them in the wrong quarter.

Mr. M. CLARK: May I remove a misapprehension my hon. friend seems to be under? I never had the least idea of taking goods from or bringing goods to the United States in ships. It is the British trade to which I was referring.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend said that the reason why Canada did not have sufficient trade was because we were not buying enough, and we were not filling our ships because we did not bring in sufficient across the water. I am pointing out that we are buying too many goods, but in the wrong quarter, the United States, when we should be buying them from the Mother Country. If we did that, we would fill our ships; we would furnish transportation for our railways, and our cattle going to and fro would be filling those ships and the railway cars with the desired freight. I think my hon. friend will see that his policy of buying more goods is not what we need.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Would not an increase in the British preference cause us to buy more from Great Britain and less from the United States? That is what my hon. friend had in mind.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Possibly that might be, but we are already giving a very handsome preference to British manufacturers. We are already giving them a preference of 33⅓ per cent which, if they are able to compete, as we are often told by my hon. friend they are, ought to be sufficient to enable them to beat the Americans or the manufacturers of any other country, because British manufacturers can import their goods into Canada at one-third less than the Americans can. I do not, however, know that this has anything particular to do with the question of the embargo. I am pointing out that in my judgment it was wrongly imposed in the first instance; that strong efforts have been made by various governments to have, it removed, and that it is not a political question. It was first urged by Sir Charles Tupper, who certainly could not be accused of being unfriendly to this Government as long as he lived, or to many of the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House at the present time. He took very strong ground on this question, and ever since his day down to the present there have been spasmodic efforts to have this injustice remedied. For my part, I think it should be remedied. I think it should be openly stated by the British Government that it does not believe Canadian cattle are so diseased that they should not enter that country. If they want to protect their own breeders I say to them: Be men and put a £5 or £10 duty per head on cattle if you wish, and then let them come in. Nobody would kick at that. I am a protectionist, and I would be only too glad to see the British Government taking a protectionist step of that kind. It is not protection they are giving now; it is prohibition, and I do not believe that even some of my hon. friends opposite believe in prohibition to the utmost. But this embargo is an absolute prohibition. The British Government says: No matter what your cattle are, no matter what your price is, no matter what may be their bill of health, they cannot come into this country at any price. We in Canada, on the other hand, will take in anything from Great Britain or the United States, with very few exceptions, if the required duty is paid. But this embargo is an absolute prohibition. I do not know whether my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith) thinks I have given him any light with regard to that seasick business, but I think there is quite a bit in that, and if he thinks over it I believe he will withdraw his resolution, which has been very fully discussed. We do not want to put ourselves in the position of dictating to the British Government, one way or the other, at the present time.

Mr. J. W. KENNEDY (Glengarry and Stormont): I just want to say a few words in this debate. While I have the greatest respect for my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith), whom I know to be a man who has been interested in the live stock industry for years, and who has done very much to improve the live stock business in the province of Ontario, I must differ from him on the resolution which he has submitted to the House this afternoon. The reason given, and it was given in this debate this afternoon, for the placing of an embargo upon our cattle, was that possibly disease might be brought into the herds of the Old Land from Canada. I do not think there is any country in the world that has been so free from these diseases as Canada. The disease particularly mentioned in connection with this embargo is pleuro-pneumonia. We are told that there has been no case of pleuro-pneumonia in this country since 1886, and that the cases at that time were confined to a quarantine station. The disease did not get beyond the bounds of that station, and the animals were cremated, so there was no danger of a spread of infection from that source. It has also been stated that British cattle breeders fear that the foot and mouth disease might be introduced into Great Britain by our cattle, but there has been no outbreak of foot and mouth disease in this country since 1884, and the cases then were confined to a quarantine station; they never got beyond that. Very strict regulations were put in force by the Federal Department of Agriculture when live stock was being shipped from this country to the Old Land. Inspectors were stationed at all shipping points, and all the cattle for export had to undergo a very severe examination. Those regulations are ready to be put into force again should that trade be revived. Just to show that our Federal Department has the situation fully in hand, I would remind the House that in the last outbreak of foot and mouth disease across the line, which affected a great area, 23 states, I think, of the American Union, and cost the Americans hundreds of thousands of dollars, the quarantine regulations put into force by our department at that time prevented the disease spreading to the herds in this country. It was a very severe test that the Federal Department was put to at that time, and the result proves conclusively, I think, that there is no danger of disease from that source, because those regulations are still in force and should our cattle trade with the Old Land be revived the Federal Department could take the same measures to prevent the spread of infection from our herds to the Old Land.

My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has given a few figures on the export trade from Canada to Great Britain before the embargo was placed on our live cattle. That trade, of course, fell off, but during the last few years since the United States has been admitting our cattle free, quite a large trade has developed across the line in live cattle. Since 1914 there have been, in round figures, 200,000 cattle per year sent across the line; in some years, a few more, and in others perhaps less. Valuing these at $100 per head, the trade would amount to about $20,000,000 per year, a very valuable trade indeed.

It has been argued in this debate that it would be better for Canada to finish her store cattle at home, to feed them here, and place them on the British market in a finished condition. Canada cannot do that at the present time. On account of our wide areas, our rather extensive pasture areas, our scarcity of labour, Canada can rear and produce far more cattle than she can finish. Our present stage of development is better fitted for rearing and producing a far greater number of cattle than we can finish. On the other hand, the British farmer, who carries on operations on a far more intensive scale than we do, is in a better position to take these cattle and finish them. He will stable them, feed them high, and finish them in a short time, and have a quick turnover. He can finish more than one group in one year, whereas the Canadian farmer would require two, three or four years in order to produce and rear the cattle that he has to sell. There is no question, however, that a great number of cattle are being finished in our country, and placed on the markets of the world in a finished condition, and undoubtedly in the future the number will be larger. But under present conditions, where we have large areas of pasture, and a scarcity of labour, the Canadian farmer can produce and rear far more cattle than he can finish, and it would be of great advantage to him as well as to the British farmer to have the embargo removed, so that he could produce and rear a large number of store cattle, to be shipped over to Great Britain and finished there.

I do not at all underestimate the value of the finishing of our cattle here and placing them upon any market in that condition. That, of course, is desirable, and it is an end towards which we are working. But at the present time we have a large surplus of store cattle, and if we cannot get them out of the country we shall suffer a very great loss. I have already spoken in regard to the trade that has developed between Canada and the United States in this regard. We have heard something in the last few days concerning the Fordney Bill. Now, should this Bill or any other of a similar character be carried into effect and our trade with the United States be cut off, there would be an immense glut of store cattle on the Canadian market, and if the British embargo were removed we should immediately have an outlet for this produce to take the place of the American market.

There is another phase of this question upon which I should like to touch. I understand, although I am not certain on this point, that the embargo applies not only to our cattle but to our sheep as well. Canada, of course, is not a great sheep-producing country, nor, on the other hand, is she a great mutton-consuming nation, and at certain seasons of the year there is a considerable glut of mutton on the Canadian market. If the embargo were removed an outlet would be provided for our live sheep and it would ensure us against these gluts that occasionally occur in this country.

There is another feature of this question which is sometimes overlooked. The British herds and flocks have been a source from which Canadian breeders have imported a great deal of stock for the improvement of their own cattle and sheep. If the embargo were removed and our live cattle were allowed to enter Great Britain free, there is no doubt whatever that the return trade that would result of pure-bred stock from the Old Land would improve our herds, particularly in regard to bulls, in which respect our herds in this country are lamentably deficient. Just in this connection I may say that since this trade has developed with the United States there have been coming into this country particularly into the Canadian West a considerable number of pure-bred bulls. If the embargo were removed I feel sure that the British breeders would compete and share in that trade, and the result would be a very valuable improvement in the herds and flocks of the livestock men of this country.

Mr. MORPHY: Do English animals come into Canada free of duty?

Mr. KENNEDY: I think the pure-bred animals come free of duty. The Old Country has been a very fertile source of pure-bred stock for Canadian breeders, and there is no question that our herds have been greatly improved by importations from their herds. We must admit that in many cases they are ahead of us in this business, and we should cultivate this return trade to as great an extent as possible. I should be sorry indeed to see the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from South Ontario (Mr. Smith) carried in this House.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City, B. C.): In rising to say a few words on this resolution I desire at the outset to pay a tribute to the mover for the excellent service he has rendered the livestock interests of Canada during his years of experience as a breeder and importer in the province of Ontario. He is one of our oldest, most respected, and most capable breeders of purebred stock, being known all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He has been not only a successful exhibitor at many of our fairs, but has filled the important position of judge on many an occasion on both sides of the line. However, I feel that on this occasion I cannot quite agree with him on this embargo question. In the first place, when the embargo was imposed, the argument was advanced that Canadian cattle were affected with contagious disease,—at that time pleuro-pneumonia. The adoption of this resolution might convey the impression that we are perfectly satisfied and have been satisfied for thirty years, with this embargo, whereas, as a matter of fact, ever since the embargo was imposed the Government have from time to time been making regular efforts to have it removed.

The embargo was put on about thirty years ago on the assumption that pleuro-pneumonia had appeared in a shipment of cattle from Canada to the Old Country. I very well remember the occasion. I was then a student of veterinary science in Toronto and this matter was discussed at college on many occasions, and I remember distinctly that many veterinarians of Great Britain strongly protested against the diagnosis that was made by the official veterinary authorities on that occasion. It is about thirty-four years or more now since we last had a case of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, and as the previous speaker informed the House, it occurred in a shipment sent over here. That shipment remained in quarantine for the regular period and the animals were destroyed and the premises disinfected. It is about thirty-six years since there was a case of foot-and-mouth disease in Canada, which occurred in exactly the same way. It also was stopped in quarantine and it got no further. But there is every proof that our cattle are free from disease. As you know, we have the privilege of shipping cattle to Great Britain for salughter at the port of entry, and during the intervening period since the imposition of the embargo we have slaughtered no fewer than three million head of Canadian cattle on the British side, under British inspection, and not one single case of pleuropneumonia has been discovered.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. speaker, ever since the embargo was imposed our Governments have been making efforts to secure its removal, and in 1917 the then Prime Minister, (Sir Robert Borden) received a distinct promise from the Minister of Agriculture of Great Britain, that the embargo would be removed. Shortly after that two delegates were sent from Canada to Great Britain to instruct the people regarding the health of Canadian cattle and also to represent the unfairness of imposing this embargo on the ground of disease in our cattle. They did this work entirely with the approval of the Minister of Agriculture of Great Britain and clearly through official channels. They interviewed many organizations of livestock breeders, labour organizations, etc., and also took up the matter with the press of the country. They rendered a very excellent service but one that had no effect. It is now rather regrettable that this matter has assumed a political aspect and that certain men are trying to make political capital out of the embargo situation. Lord Lee clearly stated a short time ago that if he undertook to remove the embargo, or had any business with the Government of Canada with reference to the subject, it would be through the proper channel, the Federal Department of Agriculture. It is unfortunate, therefore, that this matter has been taken up in the way that it has by some of the representatives from this side, and also by some of the press, with the result, I think, that the work has been hindered to a very great extent in as much as people have been very much irritated and they have misinterpreted the intentions of those who have been carrying on that campaign.

Now with regard to our markets, is the removal of this embargo going to help the cattle industry of Canada? I may say that at the present time we cannot possibly consume the number of beef cattle produced in this country at home. The result is that we have to look for an export market. We have been shipping these cattle to the United States, but there are rumors of tariff changes over there that will prevent our cattle from going into that market if those changes are approved. I want to say here that on the fourteenth of January I had the pleasure of addressing the American National Live Stock Association assembled at El Paso, Texas. This Association represents all the range cattle breeders of the United States extending from Texas to California, from California north to Washington, and East as far as the Dakotas. Those men were unanimously in favour of imposing duties on Canadian and Mexican cattle coming into the United States, so that if that market is removed we are going to have a little difficulty—in the beginning at least—in disposing of our surplus products. If we could place those cattle on the British market we could do so to great advantage, and a nice outlet would be provided for our cattle during the period in which we are getting our farmers to become feeders of livestock.

I quite admit that it would be much more beneficial, from an economic standpoint, to finish off the cattle in this country than to ship over our chilled beef to Great Britain. Let us see for a moment what kind of luck we would have in carrying on work of that kind? I think it was the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who stated that the Government should have taken up an active policy immediately after the close of the war to get our meat on the British market in competition with the Argentine and Australia. Perhaps you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that at that time, immediately after the conclusion of the war, owing to the lack of shipping, a large number of animals had accumulated in the Argentine and also in Australia; so that at that particular period the Argentine was placing chilled beef on the British market at from eleven to fourteen cents a pound, while the Canadians were asking twenty-five cents for their article. The shipping of chilled beef in competition with the Argentine and Australia would not at the present time, I am afraid, be a very profitable work to undertake. In the first place you will perhaps be astounded, Mr. Speaker, to know that of the million cattle passing annually through our inspection abattoirs less than ten per cent are fitted for export to the British Islands in competition with the beef from the two countries I have mentioned, on account of their small size, their poor quality, and their lack of finish.

The Government has long recognized that situation and we are making every effort to induce the farmers to feed and finish their cattle. We have introduced what is known as "A carlot and smaller group policy" at our various fat stock shows. We are giving special prizes for finished animals in carlots and in smaller groups, and we have had very excellent results. Last year at Brandon Fat Stock Show there were some three hundred cattle on exhibition and a very excellent quality of cattle they were. At some other shows we have also had good results. We also may assist in the establishment of a large fat stock show in the city of Toronto along the lines of the big International Show held in Chicago. The International Show at Chicago brings together cattle breeders and finishers from all over the continent, and from both sides of the International boundary line, so that it has done a very great deal in stimulating the finishing of beef cattle. We hope that the Toronto show when it gets started, probably next winter, will have similar effects in stimulating the finishing of Canadian cattle.

But what are we going to do with our cattle in the meantime? If the United States imposes a duty we cannot ship them there; we must have some other outlet. Let me point out that what is a finished steer on the western ranges of Canada is just about ready to go into the hands of Scotch or English feeders to be finished to suit the taste of the British market. Over there they like very much fatter beef than we use on this side, so that when these cattle have been fed on the ranges of Alberta, or wherever they are fed out in the West, they can then be shipped profitably to Great Britain and sold to the feeders there to finish.

To give you an idea of what cattle are selling for in Great Britain at the present time—and this will perhaps explain the enquiry of some person who wondered how the labour men were interested in the shipment of cattle to Great Britain—let me say that at a recent sale that took place there beef steers brought $358, beef heifers $241, calves $94 and spring dairy cows $448 per head, showing that there would be a most excellent profit in shipping cattle to the Old Country from Canada.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): Will my hon. friend give the comparable prices for Canadian cattle?

Mr. TOLMIE: Finished beef steers for May delivery are quoted now in Western Canada, I understand, at about ten and a half to eleven cents per pound. Heifers would run about two cents per pound less than that. Fall calves would sell for $25 or $35, and dairy cows would run from $125 to $175 or $200 acording to quality.

There is another explanation for the very great difference in the prices paid for fresh killed beef. The Britisher, the man who has money, the middle class man, and all others, have a very keen appetite for fresh killed beef, and in that they show rather better taste, I think, than do Canadians. The prices run almost twice as much for fresh killed beef as can be obtained for chilled beef or frozen beef from overseas. So that by sending our beef cattle over there, we would not only be securing a good market for our output, but would also be catering to the tastes of the British consumer.

With regard to the objections raised by the Imperial Government to the shipment of cattle to Britain, let me say that one of their first arguments has been the possibility of getting disease from Canadian cattle. I want to say here as a veterinarian, and one who has kept in close touch with the handling of animal contagious diseases all over the world, that we are in a better shape in Canada to-day than almost any other country in the world. We have a Health of Animals Branch that is made up of men fully qualified for the work, men who not only have to be graduates of a well recognized veterinary institution, but must, in addition to that, pass a special examination before they are permitted to undertake this important work. The proof of what I am saying is the past history of contagious disease in Canada. You will remember that during recent years there have been several very serious outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in the United States—a most infectious disease and very easily carried—and that our veterinarians here were successful in protecting us with a boundary line four thousand miles long, and not one single case of foot-and-mouth disease occurred in the Dominion during that time. This is a clear-cut answer to the claim of the British Government that disease may get in from the United States. In addition to that we have had on the western plains a disease known as dourine amongst horses, a disease that has existed there for a number of years. Not only were we able to clean that up entirely but our pathologist, Dr. Watson, who is at the head of our Pathological staff in the Health of Animals Branch, made a vaccine by which he was able to easily diagnose the disease and to use the most up-to-date methods in cleaning it up. Then again the record of our Health of Animals Branch recently made in the dipping of 120,000 head of cattle in the province of Alberta for cattle mange to clean up the disease was successful to such an extent that we were able to raise the blanket quarantine existing over an area of more than 2,600 square miles. I think that was one of the finest performances ever accomplished by any group of veterinarians anywhere in the world.

Now, touching again on this particular point of cattle coming in from the United States. I think there would be no difficulty whatever in guarding British herds against contamination by animals from that country. It would be no trouble to permanently mark those cattle on entry so as to prevent any of them being shipped to England by taking advantage of any arrangement that might be made between Canada and Great Britain for the shipment of our cattle over there.

I feel that perhaps we have no right to make suggestions to Great Britain about her domestic affairs, but, on the other hand, I feel that they should come out in the open and remove the stigma that has been placed on Canadian cattle. This stigma has done us considerable damage. When some of our cattle shippers attempted to send cattle over to the Continent immediately after the war, I understand, one country rejected Canadian cattle because of the fact that they were refused entry into Great Britain ostensibly on account of cattle disease being prevalent in Canada. That is one of the impressions that get abroad as a result of this embargo. Let me point out further that a year and a half ago we were asked to get a special permit from Great Britain to send a shipment of pure bred Holstein cattle to British Holstein breeders, but we were not successful, although only a few years before that a shipment of pure-bred Holsteins brought in by special license from Holland. Yet in Holland foot-and-mouth disease prevails most of the time.

We are importing from Great Britain pure-bred cattle under certain restrictive regulations that have placed us absolutely on the safe side; in other words, we have never had any disease as a result of those importations, although foot-and-mouth disease prevails in England from time to time. As I said a moment ago, we have not had a case here for over thirty-six years. So arguing from these premises, I submit it would be safer for Great Britain to import cattle from this country than it would be for us to import their cattle, although, as I have shown, we have been importing British pure-bred stock for several years so successfully that we have had no disease as a result.

I have been very pleased to notice the great interest that has been taken in this very important matter, and I think that the mover of the resolution has also been gratified, and in taking my seat I would ask him to be kind enough to favourably consider its withdrawal.

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, after the many very excellent addresses that we have listened to this afternoon on this subject and one which is of so much importance to our stock breeders and cattlemen I think our labours of the afternoon would be abortive if the results were of a negative nature. In my judgment it is the opinion of the majority of those who have taken part in this debate that there is a grievance, and that some appeal should be made with a view to its removal. I am sorry that I was not present until the mover of this resolution (Mr. Smith) had got about half way through his speech, and I must say that, not being an expert in this business such as he is, I raise objection to the request embodied in his resolution with a certain amount of fear and trembling.

It is true, as has been emphasized by hon. members this afternoon, that Great Britain has claimed a reason for an embargo being placed on our cattle. And from my experience and knowledge of the live stock business extending over a period almost as long as that of the previous speaker (Mr. Tolmie), who said this country has been free from both tubercular and foot and mouth disease for over thirty-six years, I think it is really desirable that something should be done to remove the stigma placed on our cattle by Great Britain. Therefore without delaying the House any longer, I would propose that the following amendment be made to the resolution:

> That all the words after the word "House" in the resolution be struck out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "the Government of Canada should make a strong protest against the reasons assigned by the British Government that Canadian cattle are diseased as an excuse for placing an embargo on Canadian live cattle going into the United Kingdom."

I think that this amendment will embody the concensus of opinion as expressed by hon. members this afternoon, and will accomplish something more than would be possible by merely allowing the matter to rest where it is at the moment and withdraw the resolution. I have much pleasure therefore in moving this amendment.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have only been able to follow the speech of the mover of the resolution (Mr. Smith) and the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) who sat down a few moments ago. The amendment moved by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) would seem to imply that such a protest had not been made. Surely he is aware that the history of the last thirty years is the history of protests made not only by the government in office when the embargo was first imposed, but made almost yearly since by every successive government. The Government that was in office from 1896 to 1911 took, so far as I am aware, precisely the same position as regards this embargo as the Government that is in power to-day. The record, for example, of the 1917 conference on this subject is a record of about as definite and insistent a protest as any Government is capable of making on the very grounds stated in the amendment. I am utterly unable to understand what can be the object of an amendment urging a protest when protest has been the policy of Canada for thirty years and every measure that the successive officers of the Department of Agriculture and the numbers of successive governments could devise has been resorted to to push that process to the effective limit. If any hon. member who thinks of supporting the amendment can make a suggestion as to what further can be done in the way of pressing or implementing the protest, then an amendment embodying that suggestion will be of value for the consideration of the House. I do not know what more could be done; it is on the ground of the implication embodied in the British policy that our protest has all along been lodged and is lodged to-day. It is on that ground that strong and determined action was taken at the conference to which I refer, and by reason of that ground the British Minister of Agriculture at that time was good enough to say that, at some date which I am sorry he did not specify—I believe that, in rather indefinite language, he fixed it as the termination of the war—the Government would see that this embargo was removed. The case of Canada to-day rests most strongly upon that promise, and, basing our claim on that promise and on the wrong done to this country by the implication, the Government of to-day is losing no time and sparing no effort to have the embargo removed.

Now, there is a way by which these negotiations or the continuance of this protest can be carried on. There is a proper way, consistent with the full exercise of authority of the British Government and Parliament within their own domain and consistent with the principle that there shall be no interference from outside with the exerciseing of that authority. I do not think that even for the sake of bringing about the removal of the embargo we would be justified in stepping beyond that method. We have sought through the appropriate channels, through the channels constitutionally established, to bring home to the British Government the wrong done by the implication embodied in the embargo, and nothing has been left undone in that regard. But I do not think it is a proper function of this country or of authorities within this country to launch or initiate among the British people a propaganda against the course taken by the British Government. From that action we have refrained, but we have refrained from nothing in the way of making known the facts as to Canadian cattle in order that the British people may understand that there is no justification in fact for the implication. We have not, however, gone the length of endeavouring to instigate the British people against their own Administration, of endeavouring to launch a propaganda amongst the people against the conduct of their Government. I know that were similar action taken by British authorities against the conduct of this Government, no matter how unpopular the conduct of this Government might be, such action would be resented here. Nor do I understand how we could ever in future resent corresponding action on their part if we made ourselves guilty of initiating the process. I say, therefore, that through the proper channels, and by the proper methods, we will not cease to bring home to the British Government our conviction that if they intend to protect the breeder of stock in England, or protect whatever they like to protect, they should not do so in such a manner as to carry a false implication against the livestock of Canada.

I rose, however, only to suggest to the mover of the amendment—for I had no intimation that any amendment was intended—that it is scarcely fair to ask the House to lodge a protest that is already lodged, and that it is hardly going to put this House in a position of very great dignity as respects the British Government to pass a motion now asking that we do that which the British Government knows we have never ceased to do for thirty years.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am sorry that I have not been able to follow the discussion of this resolution, but after hearing my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, I feel impelled to say a word or two as to why I am in favour of the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow).

The Prime Minister states that this Government has lodged protests on many occasions; that it has kept on lodging protests against that embargo. Well, what is the objection to the Parliament of Canada stating emphatically by way of resolution that we support the Government in the lodging of that protest?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No objection.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no objection, then, to my hon. friend's amendment. If it is the wish of members on both sides of the House, why not incorporate it in the form of resolution as my hon. friend suggests?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amendment does not say that. If the amendment was drawn that way, there would be no objection to it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, it might be worded as I suggest. I must express my concurrence in the view that we should not interfere with the policies of Britain. I admit quite freely that we would resent any such interference on the part of Britain with our own policies. But there is another consideration in regard to this embargo. Britain is at liberty to prohibit the entrance of our cattle into her country, but what I strongly object to is the reason given for that prohibition. If such a reason were given for similar action by any foreign country we would resent it, and we resent it when it comes from Britain, and the fact that it is done by Britain is no reason why we should not say so in this Canadian Parliament. Let them place an embargo on our Canadian cattle if they like, but we resent the reasons they are giving. Our cattle are not diseased, and it is a slander against one of the main articles of Canadian production to assign that reason for any embargo.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka) (rising).

Mr. PEDLOW: I would just like to reply briefly to—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pedlow) would certainly be out of order in replying to the remarks of the Prime Minister unless he did so with the unanimous consent of the House. The hon. member who moves a substantive motion has the right to reply, but the amendment is not a substantive motion; therefore, the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) has not that right unless it is given to him by unanimous consent of the House. Do I understand that the hon. member from Muskoka desires to say a word?

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the view expressed here this afternoon, that Canada, who guards so jealously her own rights and privileges, should refrain from interfering with similar rights and privileges enjoyed by the Mother Country. I recognize that there has been a reflection upon Canada in the charge that her cattle have been diseased.

When the late Sir Charles Tupper was acting as High Commissioner in England, this question first came up. He engaged some of the best veterinary surgeons in England, and on several occasions he had Canadian cattle slaughtered when they arrived in that country and their lungs and other organs examined for tuberculosis. On every occasion the report was that Canadian cattle were perfectly free from the disease with which they had been credited. From that time on I believe every Government in this country has been bringing to the attention of the authorities in England the falseness of that accusation levied against Canadian stock breeders. I would, however, be very sorry if this Parliament went on record as in any way seeking to interfere with the rights and liberties of the Mother Country. We have not only jealously guarded our national status but we have exalted it to such a degree that not long ago Right Hon. Bonar Law announced in the House of Commons that if Canada wished complete independence, there would be no opposition from the Mother Country. How can we, in the face of such statements, interfere with what is a domestic right of the British authorities? I hope the implication that has been levied against the stock breeders and the cattle of this country can be removed, but I shall be very sorry to see this Government in order to gain that end go out of its way to interfere with the affairs of the Mother Country. Canada has placed her case before the British authorities, and having done that she should rest her energies at that point. Further than that, we have no right to go, and I cerainly think we should not go.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has stated that the British authorities no longer take the view that Canadian cattle are diseased, but they say that it is possible for diseased cattle to come from the United States into Canada and in that way get to England. If that be the case, if the British authorities no longer take the position that this embargo was imposed on Canadian cattle because of their being diseased, it seems we are hammering a straw man very hard. But there is one ground on which I think both these resolutions should be withdrawn, and that is, that it is quite evident from the newspapers to-day that the question of embargo or no embargo is an active political question before the British electorate. It certainly has not been stated in the press that one side are saying that Canadian cattle are diseased and the other side saying that they are not diseased. The question that was raised for the British electorate to decide was this: Do you want an embargo or not? If you have no embargo, you are going to have cheaper food in Great Britain. They are not saying: you are going to have diseased cattle. The opposition to that, whatever it was, is not stated, and it is immaterial so long as the other side do not take and have not taken the position that the embargo is imposed because Canadian cattle are diseased. Therefore, there is before the British electorate to-day the issue of cheap food; it is an active political question, and it is not in the interest of the people of Canada or the Canadian Parliament to express any further opinion on this question at this time by a resolution of this House. Let the British people fight out their domestic questions as they like. The British authorities are not slandering us before the people of Great Britain to-day; we should let them follow their own course in their political matters, and let us attend to a few things we have to do here ourselves.

Mr. M. CLARK (Red Deer): I think I am in order in speaking to the amendment, and I should like to make a suggestion to the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow). I quite agree with the attitude of my hon. friend (Mr. Bristol), and I think the position, which I took myself and which I understood him to support on general grounds, apart, of course, from my incursion into fiscal matters, gained a very strong reinforcement from his drawing attention to the fact that these matters are exciting the attention of the people of Great Britain politically.

I rose, however, for the purpose of stating clearly what I understand to be Britain's position in this matter. I think it is well our people should understand it without any possibility of doubt as to the actual facts of the case. If I am wrong, I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) will correct me, or my hon. friend to whose speech we all listened with the greatest possible interest. Some talk as if Great Britain were doing something specially directed against Canada on this question. The Minister of Agriculture can tell the House far better than I can of the immense value of the British herds of cattle, and how owners of British herds from time to time sell cattle at almost fabulous prices. Having regard to the value of those cattle, the British Government have for years taken the position that they will play doubly safe in regard to the health of their cattle within their shores. That is the position they took to begin with, and they take it still. If they admit, what they have to admit, that we have a very fine bill of health amongst our stock in Canada, they still have a fear about diseased cattle coming in from the United States. They play safe within their borders in regard to the health of their extremely valuable cattle, and they put on this embargo, not specially against Canada, but, as I understand the matter, against all countries in the world. Do they take live cattle in from any country except to kill them at the port of debarkation?

Mr. TOLMIE: Not without a special license.

Mr. CLARK: Not without a license do they take them from anywhere. I think it is important, with a view towards the best possible relationships and understanding between the Canadian and the British people, that the fact should be known, that this is not a special act against Canada; that it is an act that is undertaken along the line of extreme caution in the preservation of the health of their herds. In view of that fact, I very much doubt the wisdom of successive Governments in doing what the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) said they are doing, and that is how I view the question. He has said, as I have said before him, that in Canada we should resent very quickly and ferociously any interference with our affairs. There is no text upon which I have heard so many sermons preached in this House as that of Canadian autonomy, and this question is one of British autonomy. On that ground I would appeal to the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Pedlow) to think carefully before he presses his amendment, and I appeal to him specially on another ground. We are told that all Governments in Canada have taken a line of action which the Prime Minister tells us this Government is taking. I am sure, if there is anything that would infuse a doubt into the mind of the hon. member for Renfrew South about the wisdom of this course of protest, it would be that it is being undertaken by the present Government. I should like him to think twice before he undertakes to press an amendment before this House to put himself in wrong with the people in specially reinforcing an action of the Government against which he so cheerfully voted a want of all confidence the other day.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I would very gladly vote for the amendment of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow), if it were founded on fact, but I think he is mistaken. He proposes to say that the Government should make a strong protest against the reason that Canadian cattle are diseased being assigned by the government of Great Britain as an excuse for placing the embargo. I do not think the British Government do assign that as a reason. They may have done so in years gone by; I am not going to dispute that, but in all recent discussion of the matter to which I have had my attention drawn, no such reason has been assigned. Quite the contrary. They admit that Canadian cattle are not diseased, and the whole argument now is that unless they have the embargo American cattle may enter Great Britain through Canada. I do not argue whether that is right or wrong, but that is their ground, and if they allege that as a ground we ought not to put on record something else. I would call the attention of my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) to that. I think his resolution states as a fact that which we have no evidence of. I do not think it is a fact. I do not believe he could quote from any recent utterance of the President of the Board of Agriculture or of any other British minister in the recent discussion in the Dudley election, for example, which would warrant the statement that the British Government has used as an excuse the allegation that our cattle are diseased; and if that is not founded in fact, why should we vote for it here?

Mr. PEDLOW: Is there any official information on record either here or in the Old Country setting forth the facts that the hon. member is now trying to illustrate?

Mr. FIELDING: Would it not be in order for me to ask him if there is anything on record for what he says? We are not bound to prove a negative.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU: It is common talk on the street and in the press, that disease is the reason for the embargo.

Mr. FIELDING: That is no evidence on which to base a resolution of the House of Commons. This is a serious matter. I entirely agree with my hon. friend from South Renfrew in feeling that the embargo is unfair to Canada, but here is a statement that the British Government allege as a reason for the embargo that Canadian cattle are diseased. Now is that true or not? I say that the British Government, so far as I know, do not take that ground at all, and if that be so, why should we in a solemn resolution of this Parliament allege that they have? I think that it is up to my hon. friend from South Renfrew to show the ground for his statement, and if it is well-founded, I will support him, but my impression is that he cannot find any authority for the statement he makes. Holding that view, I hope that my hon. friend will not press his amendment. It is not for me to prove the contrary; it is for my hon. friend to prove that it is a fact.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I do not require such written documents as evidence as some hon. members seem to require. Mr. Bennett, a former member of this House, in his speech before all the Press Delegates in Calgary, gave as a reason why Canadian cattle were prohibited from entering Great Britain—and he called it a slander on the cattle of Canada; I do not know whether he said that the British Government gave this as a reason—that it was on account of disease. That is sufficient evidence for me.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will look at the record of the 1907 conference he will see that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) is right. The British Government do not assign disease as a reason. They have abandoned that, but the implication is there because of the cause for which the embargo was originally imposed.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, it is there. They have sent abroad the statement that they were refusing our cattle because they were diseased, and here we have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) who tells us that that statement is not true. It is a slander on our cattle, and I think we should take some action to show that we resent it. If the embargo is not being maintained for the reason that was assigned in the first place, let the British government come out and say so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have done so.

Mr. BUREAU: They have?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think so.

Mr. BUREAU: They should do so. If it was any other country we would protest. I do not think we should allow this stigma to rest on our cattle. It is not fair that one of our staple exports should be allowed to rest under the imputation of being diseased. The impression still prevails; it is common talk in the street, and is discussed in the press. When you travel on the railway trains you will hear everybody asking why the embargo on Canadian cattle is maintained, and the reason given is that the cattle are not fit to be consumed by English people or anybody else. I say that we should take steps to remove this stigma on our cattle, and if this is the best means, I am going to vote for the amendment. I think some of our friends are a little bit too ticklish.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BUREAU: Do not laugh. Some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken would have called the hon. member for South Renfrew disloyal—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, yes. I have been through the mill, boys, and I know. We are here to transact business, and I am going to vote in favour of a resolution that will have the effect of making the British Government dispel the idea that our cattle are diseased. They have created that impression, and I think it is only right that we should say we do not like it, and feel that they should dispel it.

Mr. KEEFER (Port Arthur and Kenora): I would suggest, in view of the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) and of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, (Mr. Fielding) and as it is now ten minutes to six o'clock, that it would be well to let this resolution stand until it can be licked into such shape that everybody could vote for it. So far as I can understand, there appears to be a great difference of opinion about nothing. We do not want to make ourselves ridiculous unnecessarily. I do not claim to know very much about the subject, but I have read in the papers reports of meetings where British ministers have stated that there was no disease among our cattle in Canada, and that they were not afraid of disease being carried to the English herds. I think we should let the resolution stand in the meantime.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): In the debate it has been generally admitted that the herds of Canada are practically free from disease. My hon. friend from Red Deer, when speaking of the splendid reputation for health that British cattle enjoy, apparently forgot that frequently throughout the British Isles there is an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer): I must correct my hon. friend as to a matter of fact. I said nothing whatever about disease among British cattle; I spoke of their immense money value.

Mr. ROBB: In that regard there is no difference between their herds and our herds, which are also of immense money value. The people of Great Britain by implication say that our Canadian cattle are diseased. Now it would be just as logical for us in Canada to say that we would not admit British cattle because frequently there are outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease in the herds of Great Britain and their cattle are subject to tubercular trouble. It is a matter of record that any herds coming from the British Isles are quarantined. Sometimes the cattle are returned, and sometimes they are allowed to come in and spread this disease. I think that we in this Parliament, representing the people of Canada, would be just as well justified in putting on an embargo against British cattle on those grounds, as the British Government is justified in maintaining an embargo against our cattle because sometimes there is disease among our herds. I agree with those who have advanced the argument that we should say to Great Britain: Very well, if you wish to keep our cattle out, you can put on a tariff; but remove this stigma from our herds.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): I think we have all listened with very great interest to the debate that has taken place this afternoon, especially as it is a question that is affecting the farmers throughout Ontario to a considerable degree at the present time; not that the farmers themselves perhaps are so deeply interested in it, but the question has been raised in the province of Ontario by the Minister of Agriculture for the province, for reasons which he can perhaps better explain than I can. However, the statement of the mover of the original resolution this afternoon was one worthy of the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith), and one which clearly convinces us still further that he is eminently fitted for the important positions which he has held for many years in the livestock organizations of this province. The reply of the hon. minister was, I am sure, one that appealed to us all as a most businesslike statement. I do not think I have ever seen any statement on the question which appealed to me more than that made by the minister this afternoon, which put some phases of the matter in a way that must appeal to us very forcibly. The amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) is two-fold, and with both phases of it I heartily agree. One aspect of that amendment is its approval of the course of this Government. The hon. member moves that a protest be entered against the action of the British Government, and this is a policy which has been followed by this Government ever since it came into power, and, in fact, by every Government, I think, which has been in power in Canada since the embargo was imposed. The amendment is therefore, an approval not only of the Government that holds the reins of power to-day, but also of previous Governments. But I also interpret it as a disapproval of the policy which has been adopted by the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario. The amendment to the resolution says that this Parliament, and the Canadian people represented by this Parliament, should make a protest against the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario. That minister says: "I am going over to create an agitation in Britain among the people which will be so strong that it will compel the British Government to remove the embargo." Some of his colleagues assert that the embargo is going to be removed as a result of his visit to England; and, further than that, they say that if it is removed he is going to receive all the credit therefor. Leaving that aside for the moment, let us consider what the likely results will be of the action of the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario in going to Britain at this time and taking part in the by-elections there, where this question is being discussed by the people. I think that instead of assisting the farmers of Canada in securing the removal of the embargo, his action will embitter the British people and create a feeling of resentment among them which will not easily subside; and instead of aiding the cause which he professes to have at heart, which this Parliament is anxious to aid, and which the Government has been endeavouring to bring to a successful issue, he is going to create new difficulties for the Government, which will probably have the effect of retarding the removal of the embargo. It being six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 10, 1921

The House met at Three o'clock.

CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER'S REPORTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Acting Solicitor General) moved:

That the reports made by the Chief Electoral Officer to the Honourable the Speaker, under section 74 of the Dominion Elections Act be printed and that Rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto and that the same be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to consider and report thereon to this House.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNED SOLDIERS—SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire, with the consent of the House if necessary, to move the following resolution:

That a Special Committee be appointed to consider questions relating to the pensions, insurance and re-establishment of returned soldiers, and any amendments to the existing laws in relation thereto which may be proposed or considered necessary by the committee; with power to send for persons, papers and records, to print from day to day its proceedings and the evidence taken, for the use of the committee, and to report from time to time; and that Rule 11 be suspended in relation thereto.

The House will remember that for at least two sessions a Special Committee has been appointed to deal with these matters, and, indeed, the administrative policy followed by this country, in relation to soldiers' re-establishment has been largely developed by these special committees. The returned men have on more than one occasion requested that a similar course be pursued this session. It may be the opinion of some hon. members that this subject has been already very thoroughly considered by Parliament, and that little, if anything, could be expected from another committee this session. Still, I believe it is the disposition of every hon. member, as I know it is the disposition of the Government, that the utmost pains be taken to see that nothing is left undone within the power of the country to take care of the just demands of those who did so much for us and for the world in the late war, and that to that end we should review all the administrative activities now under way looking to re-establishment, in order to ascertain the defects, if any exist—and there must be some—and to make recommendations as to what can be undertaken to improve upon our present methods; and generally to again go over the work done in previous sessions, so that we may all be sure that to the utmost of our power we are doing everything that can be done in the way of re-establishment. I therefore have pleasure in moving this resolution which is virtually in the terms of similar motions adopted in previous sessions.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move that the Special Committee appointed in conformity with the resolution agreed to by the House this day to consider questions relating to the pensions, insurance and re-establishment of returned soldiers, and any amendments to the existing laws in relation thereto which may be proposed or considered necessary by the committee, consist of the following members: Messrs. Arthurs, Beland, Brien, Caldwell, Chisholm, Cooper, Copp, Cronyn, Douglas (Strathcona), Edwards, Green, McGregor, McNutt, Morphy, Nesbitt, Peck, Power, Redman, Ross, Savard, Spinney, Turgeon, White (Victoria), Wilson (Saskatoon).

Mr. SPEAKER: In the absence of notice this motion requires consent. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, as my name is mentioned as a member of this committee, I should like to make an inquiry with reference to it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) has stated that requests have come to the Government from returned soldiers for the appointment of this committee. Have any particular requests been made by returned soldiers' organizations for the granting of bonuses or other privileges or rewards of a special character? As the Prime Minister has intimated, this subject was very thoroughly gone into in the three previous sessions, particularly in the last session, and a good deal of time—very properly so—has been given to the matter. Is it the intention of the Government that the work done last session shall be gone over during this session? Of course, it will depend in some degree on the committee itself. I should like to ask further whether the request for the appointment of the committee has been made by organizations of returned men, or only by private individuals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad that the hon. member (Mr. Béland) had brought up the several subjects dealt with in his remarks. I am not certain at the moment just what written requests the Government has for the appointment of this committee. In my travels through the country, though, it was the exception rather than otherwise that I should not be met at different cities, and met always by organized bodies of returned men, and the request proffered that this committee be re-appointed. I could name cities in which I recall being met by organized returned men representing not only the Great War Veterans' Association, but other organizations as well. I am quite free to state to the House that the Great War Veterans' Association, Federal Command, are very anxious for the re-appointment of this committee. They are, of course, one of the most numerous of all the soldier organizations.

I understand the hon. member also to ask what form of assistance was generally requested, and in that connection, what is expected to be done in relation to the bonus request. Well, many suggestions have been made, many requests have been urged, for all manner of things—improvements on present machinery, new schemes of assistance, such as loans for housing, and the like; I really would not be able to recite the number and variety of requests made. Certainly we have been asked to reconsider the Government's attitude in relation to a general bonus to returned men. I have invariably stated in answer to those requests that as respects that form of assistance, a general cash bonus to returned men, the Government had stated its policy adverse to the suggestion, and that that policy had not been changed.

Motion agreed to.

EXCHANGE IN CUSTOMS TRANSACTIONS

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Is the Government aware that the Customs collectors are still estimating the American dollar at par, in reference to goods imported from the United States?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to instruct Customs collectors so that they appraise such goods at the current rate of exchange as has been done in the case of European currency?

Hon. Mr. WIGMORE:

1. Yes.

2. Section 59 of the Customs Act provides that in computing the value for duty of the currency of country of export, the rate thereof shall be such as has been ordered and proclaimed from time to time by the Governor in Council, and the rate so ordered shall be based upon the actual value of the standard coins or currency of such country as compared with the standard dollar of Canada, in so far as such comparative values are known. There is no difference in value between the standard dollar of Canada and the standard dollar of the United States.

STEEL CONTRACT

Mr. RINFRET:

2. If so, what was the nature of that contract?
3. What was the amount of same?
4. What were the reasons which led to the annulment of that contract?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. The Government has rescinded the contract with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company for the supply of steel plates.

2 and 3. The contract provided for the construction by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company of a modern 110 inch plate mill at Sydney and for the purchase by the Government from the company of a minimum quantity of 50,000 tons of plates per annum for five years.

4. The demand for plates, as the result of the decline in shipbuilding all over the world, practically ceased during the latter part of 1920. Consequent upon these conditions there was a marked decline in the price of plates more especially in the United States and Belgium. Had the contract been continued the Government would be obliged to market as much as possible of the quantity of plates it had agreed to purchase, in competition with those offering by Belgium and the United States, which course would doubtless entail a substantial loss to the Government. In these circumstances, the Government concluded that the public interests would be more fully protected by renouncing the contract.

Rt. Hon. Mr. DOHERTY: Ten single women, one of whom has since resigned, were selected for permanent appointment by the Civil Service Commission. They had all passed the necessary Civil Service Examination to qualify for permanent appointment, and were the senior qualified temporary clerks. Fifty-five temporary clerks were taken on for the annual leave. Five of them were stenographers, and were afterwards kept on to fill permanent vacancies on the staff. 2. Of the foodstuffs purchased by Belgium in Canada, by means of this credit, amounting to the sum of $277,774, what portion of the said sum comprised manufactured articles of food?

DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS WAR SUPPLIES

Mr. EULER:

1. Is it true that the Militia Department at Ottawa sold war supplies to junk dealers at such prices as $1 per pair for leather boots; 10 cents per shirt for flannel fatigue shirts; 35 cents per garment for woollen underwear; 90 cents a pair for woollen trousers; $1 per mattress for Ostermoor mattresses?

4. If they have not been investigated, does the Government intend to do so?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE: All sales made by the Militia Department have been made by authority of, and through the Purchasing Commission of Canada. No new articles have been sold at prices quoted. Much higher prices were obtained in the case of new articles surplus to requirements, which prices have been set by the Purchasing Commission of Canada. Part-worn articles have been sold also at prices fixed by the Purchasing Commission of Canada as hereunder, in accordance with percentage serviceability:

Boots, ankle, part-worn, $1.40, $1.50 and $1.75.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

3. Does the Government intend to take steps toward the resumption of the hearings of said board in a near future?

Rt. Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to know if the attention of the Prime Minister has been drawn to a despatch appearing in a number of eastern papers and particularly in yesterday morning's papers of this city. The despatch reads:

Victoria, March 8.—Attorney-General J. W. DeB. Farris, during the discussion in the Legislature to-day on Premier Oliver's motion asking the Legislature to approve an address to Ottawa requesting an amendment to the Canadian Temperance Act, to prohibit importations of liquor into British Columbia, criticized the Doherty measure as a worthless one which prohibition provinces had refused to take advantage of because it was wholly unworkable.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman would perhaps be in order if he would submit a question, but not in reading an article which, as far as I can understand, is not essential to the question at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I was just going to submit my question. The question I wished to ask was if, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, the statement made in the press despatch as coming from the Attorney General of British Columbia is correct, namely, that the so-called Doherty Act is a worthless measure and in the second place—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The second question I trust will be more directly in point than the first one which serves to reflect on an Act of Parliament, and therefore is not a proper question to submit, either on the Orders of the Day or on giving notice.

Mr. STEVENS: I desire to ask another question. Is it true that several provinces of Canada, having prohibitory laws, have refused to take advantage of this Act? Another question I should like to ask is—will the Prime Minister please state if, in the opinion of the Government, the present Canada Temperance Act, known as the Doherty Act, will prevent importation of liquor into provinces to the full extent of the prohibitory laws of such provinces?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: In answer to the first question, whether the statement of the Attorney General has been brought to my attention, I can say that it was not until brought in the form of the question of to-day. In answer to the second question, whether the Act known as the Doherty Act is worthless, or invalid, I have no hesitation in saying "No". As to whether provinces have refused to avail themselves of its provisions, having adopted prohibitory measures, I would say that no province has done so, because it is a Dominion Act and goes into effect by virtue of the force of a Dominion statute, irrespective of the will of any province, once that province passes laws relating to liquor within its own domain. As to whether the Act prevents the ingress of liquor to be used contrary to the laws of the province, I say that it does; those are its terms and the validity of its terms has never been challenged.

PRIVILEGE—MR. PEDLOW

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I find on page 79 of the printed copy before me of Votes and Proceedings of yesterday that an amendment standing in my name to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Ontario South (Mr. Smith) is not the amendment as moved by me yesterday. The amendment as it appears in the Votes and Proceedings reads: Shall I read it?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. PEDLOW: The correct amendment as moved by me will be found on page 762 of Hansard. Shall I read it?

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like this error corrected at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: This matter was brought to my attention a few moments before I came into the Chamber, and the hon. member is quite right in his statement of fact. As I understand it, a suggested alteration in the amendment was engrossed upon its back by the Prime Minister, and when the document was transmitted to the proper officer of the House to have it entered in the Votes and Proceedings he quite inadvertently, through incorrect instruction, put in the amended motion as prepared by the Prime Minister. The amendment as submitted by the hon. gentleman apears on page 762 of Hansard, and I will see that the proper entry is made in the Journals.

PURCHASES OF GERMAN GOODS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (Renfrew South): Is it the intention of the Government to follow the same course as that pursued by the Chancellor of Great Britain in regard to payments of purchases from Germany? I find that it is the intention of the Imperial Government to pass an enactment whereby 50 per cent of the purchase money for German goods will be paid to the British Government and 50 per cent will be paid to the seller, and the German seller will receive a voucher for the amount—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has submitted his question. The answer, if any is to come, should come from the Government.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): I have no difficulty in answering. The matter has not yet been submitted to the Government in such definite form that there is anything for consideration.

AUDITOR-GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Minister ouf Finance inform us when the House will receive the remaining volumes of the Auditor-General's Report? According to the Statute the entire report should be placed upon the table of the House within a week of the assembling of Parliament, and with the report incomplete the volumes that have already been tabled are of little value.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) was kind enough to bring the matter of the Auditor General's report to my attention a couple of days ago, and since getting the benefit of that reminder, I have had the pleasure of tabling the first two volumes of the report. I hope to have the third volume ready for the House this week, and as soon as the work is finished on that, I shall use my utmost efforts to have the rest of the report tabled. I hope to have the complete report brought down to the House earlier than has been the usual practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My. hon. friend speaks of the "usual practice." The usual practice has come to be to bring the last volume of the report down about the end of the session. That is a practice to which we wish to take very strong exception. The law requires that the entire report shall be brought down within a week after the assembling of Parliament. My hon. friend can see that it is impossible for us to discuss the Estimates until we have the full report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What I was referring to was my anxiety to get away from that practice of almost immemorial standing which my hon. friend deplores. I think I got the complete report down earlier last year, and I am going to try and get it down still earlier this year.

THE BUDGET—APPROXIMATE DATE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Do not think the practice is of immemorial standing. I should like to submit a question to my hon. friend touching the Budget. I do not mean to express a desire that he shall at the present stage fix a date on which the Budget shall be brought down, but so much of the business of the House depends on the presentation of the Budget that it would be helpful if he would give us some information as to the approximate date he expects to bring it down. I should not like to ask my hon. friend to be definite.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance): The hon. member will realize the difficulty of intimating even an approximate date at this moment. He himself has gone through the toils and trials and tribulations that a revision of the tariff entails. As soon as you get up to a certain point, you get a lot of other information, and delegations come from all over Canada. I have been busy all this morning with delegations, and will be busy with them again this afternoon. These gentlemen, of course, have the right to be heard and to have their cases considered as well as one can possibly consider them. All I can say is that there is no stint of time being given to the question, and the Budget will be brought down at the earliest possible moment.

GREAT LAKES—ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TRANSPORTATION

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 8, the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Keefer, for the appointment of a Special Committee on deep waterway transportation from the Great Lakes to the sea by way of the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. DANIEL D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, subject of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) is not altogether new in this House, for we have discussed more than once most of what is included in that resolution. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I should like to express my appreciation of his having brought this matter before the House and of the very able manner in which he presented his case. His arguments were strong, and I am sure that hon. members who had the opportunity of hearing his speech were pleased with his presentation of the case. But as he dealt with the subject matter of the resolution largely from the point of view of Ontario and the West, I think it is only fair that something should be said from the other end of the navigable route which he proposes to make a more complete avenue of trade than it is at present. In Nova Scotia we appreciate very highly inland navigation as far as it goes. The river St. Lawrence up as far as Montreal, and as much further west as we can take full advantage of it, is of great benefit to the people of the province of Nova Scotia, and if this route is extended further west to Port Arthur, as the hon. member proposes, it would certainly be much more beneficial to Nova Scotia and the Maritime Provinces generally than it is at present.

I need not remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the great opposition to Confederation in the Maritime Provinces, and particularly in Nova Scotia, was that by reason of the terms of Confederation, and the tariffs that were being imposed, our trade with the New England states was being shut off, and nothing appeared to be in sight to take its place. The people of the provinces of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick had at that time a very profitable trade with the New England states, and those who were opposed to Confederation contended, and with much force, that if this trade with the New England states was shut off by reason of Confederation, and no new trade routes opened in other directions, we would be getting the worst of the bargain. The building of the Intercolonial railway was therefore proposed as a remedy. We were told that it would afford an avenue for the sending of our goods to Ontario and western points. But I need not remind you, Sir, that we have been very much disappointed in that respect. The freight rates have always been a hindrance to that trade, and now they are absolutely prohibitive. So far as our fish is concerned, I never heard of any of it being shipped west except one-half barrel of herring to Edmonton, and by the time it reached there, though its value was only $3, the freight had amounted to $8.50. That will show hon. gentlemen at once how impossible it is for us to hope for any trade with the West if we have no better means of transportation and no lower rates than the present railway communication affords. Let me say at once that I am for railways myself; if the rates were such that we could develop our trade by rail communication, I would be in favour of that means because with water transportation we are at best precluded at certain seasons of the year from the shipment of goods—traffic is suspended owing to the freezing over of the St. Lawrence. Canals are also frozen. So at certain seasons of the year there would always be a suspension of traffic owing to the waterway being unnavigable. That, of course, would not be the case with a railway; traffic would go on uninterruptedly. I need not say that in order to have a happy community and trade conditions that will be satisfactory to the different provinces, it is highly necessary that there should be reciprocity in trade between the several provinces. If we in the East get flour from Manitoba and the West, and manufactured goods from Ontario and Quebec, it is only rational to suppose that the people of the Maritime Provinces would be anxious to ship their goods west in exchange for the commodities that they buy there. If the traffic is all one way and our perishable goods cannot reach the people of the West in a fresh state, things will not be satisfactory. We therefore have a strong desire that there should be a means of getting our fish, and also our coal and lumber and whatever else we have to exchange, conveyed to the interior of the country in such a way that we shall be able to carry on a satisfactory trade.

Under present conditions it is highly desirable that we should encourage proper immigration to this country in order to swell our population. We have now only eight or eight and one-half millions of people, and we are faced with per capita responsibilities which are enormous, startling, to say the least; and it is not at all conducive to success in any attempt to bring immigrants to this or any other country when you are obliged to tell them that the per capita debt is very large, the cost of living very high, and conditions such as to require a great deal of money to be able to live comfortably. If this navigation were opened it would have a tendency, for one thing, to cheapen food. We in the province from which I come pay $16 per barrel for flour to-day, and have been paying in the neighbourhood of this sum for a number of years past. Perhaps it is a little cheaper now, but it is most extraordinary, Mr. Speaker, that in this country, where we have millions upon millions of bushels of wheat, and from year to year are told that there are large surpluses which we are not using, the poor miner, the poor lumberman, and the poor fisherman should have to pay $16 for a barrel of this staple commodity. There is something wrong somewhere when in this country, where we have such enormous production, and possibilities for further production of wheat, that we should have to pay as much for flour as in countries where wheat is not grown. I submit to the Government and to the people generally that there should be some way of surmounting this difficulty, and we should do everything in our power to bring about such a condition as would enable us with confidence to point out to prospective immigrants that at least one thing they might be certain of, and that was that there was plenty to eat for everybody in the country and that this was not an expensive place to live in. Now, if by opening of navigation between Port Arthur and the Atlantic —and I believe a great part has been opened already—we can make transportation cheaper, so that the flour from the West can reach the Maritime Provinces more easily than at present, our people would have every reason to anticipate great results.

So far as coal is concerned, let me say to the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, and particularly to the Government, that one thing of which we can assure them is the fact that we have inexhaustible quantities of magnificent coal in the province of Nova Scotia. The people of Ontario have in the past been somewhat fastidious in regard to the quality of the coal they burn, and they have complained that our coal smoked, was sooty, and so forth. Well, let me say that we in Nova Scotia think we are just as good as any other people on earth,—not better, but just as good—and we find our coal quite satisfactory and conducive to comfort. It gives us all the warmth and comfort we need, and for that reason we should have no hesitation whatever in recommending its use to the people of Ontario and other provinces further west to which it could be carried if this channel of communication were opened. As to the route which my hon. friend proposes. I am not in a position to offer very much criticism, but the sooner we get some satisfactory route the better.

The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) is not here, but I notice that the other night he made a speech on this question, and I wish to compliment him, in passing, on the adroitness which he displayed on that occasion. As a verbal juggler and acrobat I think he is unrivalled in this country of ours. People marvel at the dexterity of a man who is able to keep five or six balls in the air at the same time, but I never before saw a man who could keep five or six canals in the air with such success as the Minister of Railways and Canals. He did this with wonderful skill. By the way, I am glad to see that he has now come into the House, and I want to tell him that I should like to know how he was able to keep six canals in the air at once as he did the other day. I trust that he will be prevailed upon to do something besides dazzling the eyes of the Canadian people with this art of his of keeping these things in suspense. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that in exchange for the things which the people of the West have to give us we can supply coal especially; and I think it is common knowledge also that we have inexhaustible schools of magnificent fish in Nova Scotia. It is unnecessary to tell hon. gentlemen in this House that fact, because, judging from the fish they eat in this part of the country, I would say that they know nothing whatever about good fish. This magnificent food they get only when it is spoiled. I have been eating at the restaurant here since coming to Ottawa and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I never eat fish—I simply cannot; it is so unlike the genuine article that I cannot touch it. But as I see other gentleman eat it with apparent relish it strikes me that they do so because they do not know better. Now, if this navigation were opened and our ships could come up here with this article of food, I am sure that a great development would take place in connection with this industry, such as has never been known before. You know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I do, that we are only touching the fringe of the industry. We are only at the edge of what can be produced from the fisheries in our province, and on the coast generally. I have no desire to take up more time. My heartiest approval is given to the resolution and the ideas which it contains. I again congratulate the hon. gentleman who introduced it upon bringing it before the House, and I sincerely trust that something substantial will result. The Minister of Railways and Canals made a speech the other night which I scarcely think the hon. mover might have expected as a comment on his resolution. We were told that a mere letter had been written to an official of this Government by the Minister of Railways telling him to do certain things. Well, suppose we had the answer which that official will make to the letter. What good is that? I am not aware of any arrangement between this country and the United States by which we can ask some official of this Government to make a certain report which could be binding on that country.

Hon. Mr. REID: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to correct him. He does not understand what I really intended to convey with reference to the letter. I desired to explain to the House that the Government had taken action by writing a letter to the Chairman of the International Joint Waterways Commission bringing the matter to their attention, and also that an Order in Council had been passed bringing it before the United States Government. The whole question has been placed in the hands of the International Joint Waterways Commission—composed, of course, of representatives of both countries—and they are now making an examination and will present an official report. The report will be signed by the Commissioners of both countries, but, of course, it is not binding in any way. It will be merely an official report and both governments will be in a position to take action as they see fit.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite understood the position set forth by the minister the other night, and it is exactly as I stated. It was a letter written by the minister to an official of this Government. It was not a letter addressed to the Commission because I took particular care to find out what kind of a communication it was. If we expect to get a report from the Waterways Commission it would be in response to a request sent to it by this Government. The letter in question being merely a communication sent to one of our own officials that official would no doubt reply over his own signature, which would mean nothing at all. Let me tell the Minister of Railways the matter is one that should be governed by common sense rules. In a matter of an international character it is customary for delegates appointed by this Government to meet delegates appointed by the Government of the United States; in other words this Government agrees with the Government of the United States, with the assistance of the Imperial Government, as to what things are to be done by the Waterways Commission. And when, following negotiations between the Governments concerned, an agreement is reached, then our Government will submit legislation to Parliament to confirm the agreement, and a similar course will be pursued by the United States in obtaining the sanction of Congress. Then it will be possible to make some progress with the question. But the mere sending of a letter by the Minister of Railways to an official of our own is certainly a capital way of delaying the matter and deferring action; no beneficial effect will follow as far as the country is concerned. I am sorry that in all the years this Government has been in power they have done nothing with this very important question, but merely cause one letter to be written to an official, good and capable as that official may be. Let me say to the Minister of Railways that I have the highest possible appreciation of his ability as a politician; in fact there never was a better one connected with the Government. I hope the Government will hang on to him and that he will not be among those ministers whom it is intended to discard. As a man who will keep things going under the least possible pretext they will never get the like of him agaain. There is this further to be said about the present Government: They are so busy defending their own heads, defending their lives and avoiding political graves and political graveyards, that they are paying very little attention to the business of the country; all their time and all their energy is devoted to keeping clear of the undertaker. Let me say in conclusion that I have much pleasure in assisting my good friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) in dealing with this very important question.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I am sorry I was not in the Chamber when this resolution was introduced. By reason of my absence all I have heard of the debate has been that portion of it which was contributed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) who has just resumed his seat. I have no desire to discuss the merits of the question, as to the desirability of constructing a deep waterway system between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic via the St. Lawrence route. As I understand it, the International Commission, on which the United States and Canada are equally represented, are thoroughly investigating whether the project is feasible from a commercial standpoint, and also whether it would reduce the cost of transportation. The International Commission, I believe, have been looking into the question very carefully and have been holding meetings not only in the various sections of Canada that might be interested in the scheme, but also at various points throughout the United States. If that is the case, and I have no doubt it is, the report of that commission, containing all the evidence given before it, will no doubt be available to every member of this House and each will then be able to consider the question from an intelligent standpoint.

The resolution itself asks that a committee of members of the House be appointed to re-investigate the very question that is being inquired into by the Deep Waterways Commission. Let me point out that it is absolutely impossible for a committee to sit, take evidence, and present a report without incurring a great deal of expense even if that committee be composed of members of Parliament. The resolution also asks that the committee be allowed to sit during the recess, which will also still further increase the expense. Now the estimates that have just been submitted to Parliament call for an expenditure of $586,000,000, and the Supplementary Estimates are yet to be presented. If that is not enough to stagger the mind of any hon. member and set him wondering where we are going to get our revenues, then he must be possessed of a very vivid imagination. Personally I am absolutely opposed to appointing unnecessary commissions of any kind, especially where it will simply be duplicating an enquiry already under way. Therefore, without discussing the matter further I wish to state that I am opposed to this resolution.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): I believe that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is the only member who has said anything against the great national and international undertaking contemplated by the resolution. I have closely watched the debate that has so far taken place, and there has been, with that exception, a unanimous expression of opinion in favour of this deep waterways canal and hydro-electric power development plan. Personally I believe it to be the most progressive step taken in Canada for many years. I regard this great waterway as a national asset, and the proposal to harness the forces of nature and place them at the service of mankind is one of its most desirable features. I agree with some hon. gentlemen that the estimate of the probable cost is doubtless far too small, but the territory to be benefited will be extremely large. The area of country which this great waterway will serve, not only in Canada but in the United States produces an abundance of agricultural products, oil, gas, and minerals of all kinds. I strongly believe in developing the St. Lawrence waterway system. In my opinion it will be a great adjunct to the Welland canal upon which so large an amount of money has already been expended. Let us remember that if we bring the channel up to the level of lake Ontario we have assured the wisdom of building the Welland canal.

Knowing something of hydro power development, I believe that the power which would be generated would of itself pay for the whole undertaking, as every horsepower that we did not need could be sold to the great New England centres at a handsome profit. This development, too, will also help us in the electrification of our railways, which is certain to come. Under the most scientific tests it has been demonstrated that the electrically driven locomotive is far and away superior to the steam locomotive both in tractive power and speed, to say nothing of ease of operation.

This country is exceedingly fortunate in owning three great rivers, the Nelson and Mackenzie absolutely, and the St. Lawrence jointly with the United States, although it is practically ours. I do not wish to say anything to make the United States suspicious, but it is patent that we hold the key to the great inland lakes, and we believe that our neighbours will not only help this project forward, but we will assess them on the basis of tonnage so the scheme will pay for itself. As some authorities have said, we could scrap it after a year's operations. But we of course would not do that. We believe that the Americans will pay towards the deepening of this waterway and also contribute towards its maintenance on a percentage basis. I would not for one moment defend this proposition if I thought it would mean increasing our national debt, but I fully believe that it would be good policy to proceed with this undertaking which would be to the great advantage of the country and without being a great burden on our shoulders. Think of the cheapening of food brought down from the West for the benefit of the East; and think of the corresponding benefit to the West from Nova Scotia coal being carried direct to the head of the Lakes.

Then this development should be undertaken as an indirect benefit, a stimulus to immigration, and we should see to it that in all contracts Canadian labour and Canadian material are used; and I know that we have factories that can make everything requisite for hydro power development.

Then we need cheap labour. When we go down to the vicinity of New York city and see the hundreds of millions of dollars invested in the development of elevated, surface and subway lines of railway we can only regret that we also have not a similar development. We know that all that was done with cheap labour. At the present time hydro development costs about three to four dollars where before the war it only cost one dollar. The last word in hydro-electric power to-day depends on cheap labour. But let this international arrangement be made so that the immense power to be derived from the St. Lawrence river can be developed proportionately for the United States and for Canada, for nothing will give a greater stimulus to our trade, and nothing will enthuse Canadians more than to see ocean-going boats steaming straight through to the head of the Lakes.

I believe the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) mentioned the Georgian Bay water system. I must be an optimist, for I believe in that too. But let me assure hon. members that in developing the St. Lawrence route we shall supplement the Georgian Bay project and bring its accomplishment closer. The St. Lawrence route is a necessity for ocean-going boats, while the Georgian Bay route is only suitable for small craft. Therefore, there need be no friction between these two routes, and I am just as much in favour of the Georgian Bay route when the time for it comes, as I am of this route.

A great deal has been said in this House about the high cost of transportation.

We know that it is very high and is adding to the cost of lving. Now, this hydro development will have a tendency to increase our domestic trade for we will not have to go to Pennsylvania for coal when our railways are electrified, and we know that no other country in the world is so well endowed by nature in this respect as is Canada. It makes my heart throb to think of the great potential wealth of this vast country of ours, and I am highly pleased to think that this project is working into shape which will result in the greatest possible expansion from the centre to the circumference of this great country.

I am also in favour of the Hudson Bay route. There is nothing local about me!

We have always said that we are proud of the West, and the building of this canal will help to still further develop the West. We have the finest waterways of any country in the world, and their development must result in making this great country of ours still greater and more prosperous.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton): Living on the chain of Great Lakes, I naturally take a very keen interest in this question, although, as a Canadian, I should be equally as interested were I not living there. There is one thing that always appeals to me in reference to this project, especially when I hear hon. members asking, as I believe I heard the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) ask a little while ago: Could it be carried out as a commercial proposition? To my mind the answer to that question is to be found in the very strong opposition to this scheme from certain parts of the United States.

Mr. NESBITT: Mr. Speaker, will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him? I did not say that I questioned whether the scheme could be carried out as a commercial proposition. I said that the International Commission would no doubt report on whether it was a commercial proposition or not.

Mr. PARDEE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon and withdraw my remark, but I understood him the other way. There can be no question that this scheme must be a commercial proposition, because the best minds in this country and in the United States have been brought to bear on the subject, and there would not be such strenuous opposition to it from certain interests in the United States if they did not regard it as a commercial proposition. Providence has placed this great waterway at our disposal, and it is our duty to develop it as far as we can. It is true that the cost would be great—some estimate it at $100,000,000, others at as high as $300,000,000. I do not say that at the moment Canada is in a position to embark upon an expenditure so great, but I do say that as the result of any expenditure on this account there would be direct returns to the people. To my mind, many expenditures we are making to-day might be cut off and the amounts thus saved applied to a development project of this kind. There is no question of the fact that it would bring about a reduction of freight rates and result in a very great development of electrical energy—and more electrical energy must be developed in this country in order to increase development in the way of manufacturing, the production of fuel, and so on. If these results can be accomplished by the deepening of this water system, the people of Canada will be fairly repaid for any expenditure they make on that account.

A further result from the carrying out of this project would be the development of the ports of Montreal and Quebec—and the development of these ports would result in benefit to the whole country. It has been proved on numerous occasions that small vessels which have crossed the ocean can go up to the head of the Lakes, and it obviously follows that with the deepening of our waterways and the enlargement of our canal system, larger vessels can do the same; bulk will not have to be broken so often, freight rates will go down, and a general benefit will result to the people. This is a question, therefore, that this House and successive Houses must take into their most serious consideration, with a view to seeing whether or not a way can be found to carry out this project. If a committee of this House is not appointed to take evidence, or even to review the evidence already taken by the International Joint Commission, the report of that body may be given little attention, the matter may be shelved and nothing done for some considerable time. This is a live question in many respects; as to the details I do not wish to detain the House now, but it is a question which deeply and vitally affects the interests of the whole people. I therefore have very much pleasure in supporting the motion of my hon. friend from Port Arthur.

Mr. EDMUND BRISTOL (Centre Toronto): I am sorry that I have not heard all that has been said during the course of this debate, but I do not think there should be any lack of unanimity among hon. members with regard to the resolution before the House. A matter of most vital importance in this country is the development of our national resources in such a way that Canada will receive the greatest possible benefit from them. The water-Powers of Canada are unquestionably among the greatest natural resources which the country possesses. They have this enormous advantage over other natural resources: so long as the earth lasts, water will last and water-powers will exist. It is therefore extremely important, and in the public interest, not only that they should be developed but also that they should be nationally owned and controlled and that the public should get the direct benefit of these vast resources.

It is absolutely necessary for Canada to take such action as will help to get her out of her present state of debt, particularly that vast load of debt which the war has put upon her. The St. Lawrence route is the greatest national resource that Canada has. It has an enormous advantage over every other public work that this country has heretofore undertaken. The development of that route, the making of a depth of thirty feet over the sills in the canals, so that ships drawing thirty feet of water may go up and down the St. Lawrence, will bring about the production of such an amount of electrical energy that the people of Canada will receive by way of rental an amount sufficient to pay the interest on the vast cost of this development. It does not seem, therefore, necessary to argue that as soon as possible a report should be obtained with regard to the matter and data put before Parliament so that intelligent action can be taken. I understand that an international commission has been dealing with the matter, and I assume that at any early day we shall have engineering and other statements which will enable us to form an intelligent idea of what can be done and what the cost will be. There is no doubt that the work would have to be undertaken internationally, because at least thirty-five states of the United States have so far placed themselves on record as being in favour of the project. The State of New York has uniformly opposed the project, but so far as Canada is concerned, the only opposition to it that I have heard has come from the city of Montreal. Well, I do not think that opposition is serious, because, when all is said and done, the great city of Montreal will undoubtedly benefit as much as the rest of Canada by this project. The only question in the minds of shipping people is whether this project should be carried out, or whether what is known as the Georgian Bay Canal route would be the better. Now, I have heard men who were the best people, so far as I could find, to express an opinion in the matter, say that it would take so long for ships to cover the long canal distance involved in the Georgian Bay route, the rate of speed being necessarily slow, that the thing would be impracticable from a shipping point of view, and that the St. Lawrence route is the natural and the best route for the shipping interests of this country. We can get the coal resources of Cape Breton up to the head of the Lakes only if we carry out this great project of canalizing the St. Lawrence; and what it would mean to the people of Canada to buy practically all their coal in their own country is something which no one can readily compute. But I venture to say that one of the most important things to the people of Eastern Canada is the obtaining of their own coal in Canada from Canadian coal mines. The completion of the project which we have been discussing to-day would put us in such a position that, at least so far as Eastern Canada is concerned, we should not have to depend upon the United States for our chief supply of coal. Moreover, the ships that bring the coal up from the Nova Scotia districts could take grain down there, and that grain could be shipped from Nova Scotia to the Old Country during the winter months.

The importance of this project is so great, in my opinion, that we should give it immediate consideration in the general interests of Canada. It would lead to the cheapening of freight rates from the great West; it would produce from four to five million horse-power right in the centre of Canada, where labour is easily obtained and transportation easily available for the manufactured goods which would be turned out in large quantities as the result of the utilization of these vast water-powers. It would enable us also, as I have said, to get supplies of coal from Nova Scotia to the head of the Lakes; to send our grain down to the eastern ports, and, generally speaking, to promote the development of our great natural resources.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (Lambton East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the addresses that have been delivered with regard to the resolution now before the House, and I have come to the conclusion that this is another proposal under which the people of Canada are going to be asked to expend an enormous sum of money in order to develop transportation on our inland waters. I would respectfully ask the House, before reaching a decision on the subject, to consider this question: We have already expended over $400,000,000 on deepening, buoying and lighting our rivers, building canals, dredging, deepening and lighting our harbours, for the purpose of cheapening the rates on the freight carried on those waters. What has been the result? Simply this, that the more money we spend, the higher go the rates. The rates have been doubled, trebled and quadrupled, and this Parliament has no control. The time has come when we must take a decided stand on this question, and I for one would oppose the expenditure of any large sum of money on this proposition until Parliament has absolute control over the rates that are to be charged on our inland and coastal waters. It is very nice for these gentlemen to get up one after another and say: "Oh well, we will go on and spend this enormous sum of money, three or four hundred million dollars, in carrying out this proposition, and we will give you cheaper rates." That has always been the cry—that was the cry that helped to build the canals. It is the same old cry that men are making who are coming and asking this Government to deepen, buoy and light harbours, deepen rivers and build canals. It is the same old story. We are going on spending tens of millions of dollars in building the Welland canal. What control have we over the freight rates? Absolutely none. Yet, we meet here session after session, and when a measure is brought in asking the Government to have control over these rates, we sit here and ignore that measure. I hope, before this session is closed, we shall have control at least over the rates on freight transported on our inland waters. Until such time comes, I question whether it would be wise for us to appoint another committee and go on and see how much we can spend on such a proposition as this. I am in hearty sympathy with any means of developing transportation on our great inland waterways, but I am also in this position that I for one will at least demand that we have control over those waters and over the rates, tolls, and charges that are made by the vesselmen who operate on those waters.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull): (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the attention of the House at any great length, but I think it is my duty to express my views on the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer). I am certainly in favour of all that can be done towards the development of the country, but my opinion is that the motion which is now before the House has no other object than that of preventing the Georgian Bay canal from being built, and this, from my point of view, would be much more in the interests of the country, than would be my hon. friend's proposal. I listened the other day to the remarks made in the House, and from these I infer that if this resolution were adopted, the United States would benefit by the Canadian money which we would spend. I must say that I am surprised at the new position taken by my hon. friends on the Government side of the House, they who, in 1911, were against any trade with the Americans and who now wish to let the latter take advantage of a Canadian undertaking. I think it would be more reasonable, Mr. Speaker, to make only such expenditure as would be fully helpful to Canada, and I have always understood that the Georgian Bay canal would be built entirely and exclusively for Canada's benefit. I am astonished at such readiness to spend the large amount which would be required if a committee were appointed to report on the deepening of the St. Lawrence river, when we already have the reports made on the Georgian Bay canal, by most competent engineers, amongst whom, Mr. Sanford Evans; these reports have never been submitted to the House for consideration.

On behalf of my constituents who are interested in the building of the canal, I certainly will object to the hon. member's motion, as also to all the outlay which it would entail. I therefore request that the House adopt the necessary measures, so that the Georgian Bay canal may be built as soon as possible; this undertaking is of special interest to Canada and it would contribute largely to the development of the country.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, this is a project which is not only of national interest, but of international interest, and when a question of developing the great natural resources of Canada arises, every Canadian is apt immediately to favour any such development on any occasion, at any time and for whatever purpose it may be intended. During the last twenty-five years many projects have been put forward in Canada; projects which to-day are calling for the serious attention of our people, projects that have not always received, perhaps, the attention they deserve; projects which have been neglected in their development and which have placed Canada to-day in a position which calls for the thoughtful attention of every business man and every tiller of the soil. For the first time in my Parliamentary life, I am not able to agree with my esteemed friend, the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie), who views this project with great equanimity, and who speaks of the great prospects for the development of trade between Nova Scotia and the other Maritime Provinces and the western provinces.

This project, as I have said, is not only national, but international,—and this is the serious point of the question which must cause every Canadian to halt in his decision in order to see what may be the effect upon the nation at large, and not merely a portion of the country which may be more directly affected by the construction of any proposed public work. This project will be for the great benefit of Canada or it will be to the great detriment of Canada. And with our great expanse of country stretching for thousands of miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and when we know that our great desire is to make Canada a nation, with every portion of the country as one in its aspirations, the East for the West and the West for the East, I consider that, instead of entering upon such a project as lightly, as I am afraid some of our Canadians are entering upon it, we should pause for a moment and consider its effect, national as well as commercial, facilities which will keep the West and the East together first of all, in order to keep Canada within the Empire, a nation worthy of the name.

It is this commercial dismemberment that attracts my attention today. I was not in the House when my hon. friend from Port Arthur and Kenora (Mr. Keefer) presented his resolution, but I have read his speech in Hansard and I know that he presented his case in the best possible colours and in the best language that could be used. I have also read the remarks of my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan), who hopes that by this new route the products of the West will be carried to the ports of the East. Those ports were placed there by the hand of Providence, not especially for the development of the Maritime provinces, but for the benefit of the western provinces—ports which will be able to take care of all possible development in the West for centuries to come, and will help to build up a united Canada in every possible direction.

This waterway project is an international one, and we know we are in a false position at the present time on account of our traffic going to the United States instead of over Canadian railways. Had the proper attention been given to that great project initiated not so many years ago by the veteran leader of Canada for fifteen years, had the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Quebec and St. John and Halifax been looked after as it should have been, Canada would not be confronted to-day with the problem of high freight rates. This problem of freight rates is on our hands because that great project has been neglected by the Government, and it was the only project that could unite Canada East and Canada West by transportation facilities. The products of the Prairie Provinces at the present time are taken to the city of Winnipeg, and then go to a foreign country through United States channels. Our national railways have immense deficits to-day, and next year we will have a deficit of $100,000,000. As a Canadian I believe that the people of this country will appreciate the necessities of the moment, but I do not think they will endorse this project of opening new channels of transportation and further neglecting the one that, if properly handled, would have made Canada a better nation than it is to-day. I sympathize with the Minister of Railways in having to present to Parliament the deficit existing on the National roads to-day, but I say that if the Government that took office in 1911 had been inspired with goodwill towards the Transcontinental and given its attention to the development of the road from Winnipeg to the Maritime provinces, we would not be confronted with the situation that exists to-day. At this time we should consider the best way out of our present difficulties rather than the project my hon. friend from Port Arthur and Kenora proposes, which, however much it might benefit Canada, would be of greater advantage still to the United States. It could not be otherwise, in view of the means the American nation possesses compared with ours. All the traffic of the American West and the Canadian West would go through American channels, just the same as it has done in the past. I do not think my hon. friend the Minister of Railways will contradict me when I say that the deficits on our national railways to-day are due to the fact that we do not use them. I think everybody in the House will agree that we have commanded only forty per cent of the export trade of the West, while the other sixty per cent has gone through United States channels. What we should have done to stop the deficits was, not so much to increase the rates as to get business for the roads instead of allowing that business to go to the United States. Had we commanded ninety-five or one hundred per cent of the traffic from the West in the last five or six years, we would have scarcely any deficits at all on our railways to-day. The problem that should engage our attention to-day is how to secure for our National railways the traffic that originates in Canada, and every possible step should be taken by the Department of Railways and Canals, by the Government, and by this Parliament, to see that every bushel of grain from Winnipeg should be directed along the Transcontinental to Quebec and the harbours of the Maritime provinces. This would mean a saving of from ten to fifteen cents a bushel to the producers of the prairie provinces. That route saves 214 miles of transportation between Winnipeg and Quebec, and equally to St. John and Halifax. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) is very much concerned over the amount of coal he has to use over the road, especially during the winter season. I would tell him that with proper usage of the Transcontinental, he could save ten to fifteen per cent of his coal on the journey from Winnipeg to Quebec. The road was especially built for heavy loads and long hauls, except the last few miles, which this Government degraded with the object, no doubt, of saying that the road was not up to standard. I think every sensible man is convinced that the road as a whole cannot be surpassed, and it is the only link we have to bring the products of the west to the east, and to transport to the west the products of the east and those that come from across the sea. Nature is there, and the road is there. No one will deny that if you can save a haul of 215 miles on a certain road, it must be cheaper than a longer route. It is simply a matter of judgment, but it calls for the attention of every one in authority, and for patriotic effort on the part of the Government and Parliament. I think that before going further into transportation problems it would be well for us to undertake, the proper equipment of our railways, so that we might make the fullest use of them, for they are in need of amelioration. The Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is quite justified in saying that no expenditure should be incurred for waterway transportation until our railroads are more fully utilized. Up to that point I did not feel it my duty to interrupt the hon. member, but I must point out that he cannot, on this motion, discuss in detail the administration of the railways of Canada.

Mr. TURGEON: No one, Mr. Speaker, is more anxious to obey your rulings than the member for Gloucester. But there is such a close connection between the project under consideration and the question of railways that it is rather difficult for a member who feels strongly that something should be done to improve railway transportation in Canada, not to transgress the ruling you have just made. However, I shall attempt to bring by remarks to a close as speedily as possible.

Let me say that the Georgian Bay canal enlists my sympathy to a greater extent than the deepening of the Lakes, because it is a purely Canadian route. Now, I hope that my hon. and genial friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) will consider this subject in all its bearings and urge upon the House nothing that will not be in the best interests of the whole country. I should not like to see this country embark on any scheme that might not be commercially wise, nor commendable from the standpoint of patriotism. While I do not say that the proposal before the House is one that does not deserve consideration, I do say that it is one which the people of Canada can well afford to let stand in abeyance until we have placed our railways in a better position and have been able to reduce freight rates through the better operation of the roads. I hope my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is considering the improvement of our railways, and until this is done I do not think other things should be attempted. I cannot support the motion.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I fear I shall be open to the same criticism which the previous speaker encountered by discussing the railway question when a canal proposition is under consideration. But that hon. gentleman (Mr. Turgeon) has brought before the House an important fact, namely, that we have an immense expenditure in this country in connection with our railways and that we are now seeking to improve our railway system by consolidations. While I have a good deal of sympathy with the idea of improving our transportation by waterway, by better canalization of the lakes and rivers, I say that the urgent need in this country to-day in regard to transportation is the immediate consolidation of the railways, to the end that freight rates may be reduced, as proposed by the hon. member who has just spoken. I hope that before this debate is over, indeed within the next two or three weeks, we shall have an announcement from the Government that they do intend, almost immediately, to consolidate our railway systems and so bring the relief to transportation which is loudly called for at the present time by farmers of the West and by residents of all portions of Canada.

Mr. FIELDING: What does consolidation mean?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It means what it ought to mean,—great economy, great efficiency, and other desirable things of that kind, not to mention lower freight rates.

Mr. FIELDING: Consolidation of what roads?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The roads we have taken over but which we have not yet consolidated.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think the House will immediately realize that the speaker was more or less justified in ruling that the administration of our railways should not be widely discussed upon this resolution. I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks as far as possible to the question of waterways development.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, but my hon. friend opposite tried to lead me aside.

Mr. FIELDING: No, no.

Mr. MACLEAN: He tried to make me wander from the subject. I take it that the subject before the House is this, that we are trying to improve our waterway transportation, and it is a very expensive proposition. The canalization involved, harbour improvements, the building of ships of one kind and another, must appeal to hon. gentlemen as matters that would entail considerable expenditures. And in these times, when the country has such an enormous debt and has so many obligations to meet, if we cannot at present improve our transportation by way of this expensive proposition we can at least do something to reduce transportation charges by the improvement of our railway service, an improvement that is due and ought to be carried out almost immediately. The criticism in the country to-day is that we are under enormous expenses in connection with our railways, and that we have great deficits; and, therefore, if we cannot just for the moment go into the expensive proposition of deeper channels, new canals, improved harbours, and so forth, the Government and this parliament ought to do something immediately in the direction of reducing freight charges in Canada by the amalgamation and the co-ordination of the railroads which we now have, for their diversified administration as well as the duplications that exist represent a great waste of money. I might say on behalf of the people of Ontario that we have every sympathy with the proposal to deepen waterways and also the proposal to increase power development, which would come from the deepening of our rivers and canals. I agree with what has been said to-day as to the enormous electrical energy that could be developed in connection with these deeper waterways, and while it would not mean an entire settlement of the proposition, the Government could take up any day the first great development, namely, that between Montreal and the lower end of Lake Ontario, and in that way we should have a great source of power and be able to bring sea-going vessels into Lake Ontario. Now, if this scheme is a good one, and if you can bring ships right up Lake Ontario, you have proved the whole case. But if that preliminary part of the scheme fails, there is no need to go on. The thing that should be undertaken now, and perhaps we can do it by reason of the great demand for electrical energy, is, by co-operation on the part of the Government with the United States, to carry out an improvement at the lower end of the St. Lawrence and thus allow steamships to get to Lake Ontario. If that proved successful we should be justified in going further. These are questions connected with transportation that notwithstanding our great commitments, must be dealt with. They ought to be dealt with now, and now to my mind is the time to press for some kind of co-operation between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada in the direction of deeping our waterways system.

Mr. SAMUEL WILLIAM JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I think the discussion during the past day or two on the resolution introduced by my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) indicates as clearly as could possibly be indicated that a general election is impending. Within the last thirty or thirty-five years, which is as far as I can remember, when we have had discussion on the Georgian Bay canal in the House and in the newspapers of the government of the day, that was invariably followed by a general election. Engineers were located in different parts of the country, mostly in doubtful constituencies, with mysterious looking tripods and other instruments for the purpose of influencing the electorate. To use a rather slang expression the government used to "get away with it." But to-day it seems to me that that old trick is played out. My hon. friend from Port Arthur coming from a region which perhaps is a little more backward than the constituencies farther east from which some of us come, probably thinks that the people of that district can be induced to vote for the Government on representations such as those made by the member supporting the Government. Otherwise I cannot see why such a resolution as this should be introduced at this juncture following the bringing down of the Estimates which indicate that we have to provide for expenditures of something in the region of $600,000,000. That was more than twice what the national debt of Canada was seven or eight years ago. To-day we have to provide for $600,000,000, notwithstanding that my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) told us blandly that before the war $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 meant a great deal. Now, said he, we have got accustomed to spending such vast sums it does not mean as much as it did at that time. Well, that is a curious kind of reasoning. Before we spent that two billions of dollars we had it, and we could have spent it very much better than we can now because we have not got it. But notwithstanding that these two gentlemen from the Twin cities—who think in pairs and hunt in pairs—for reasons best known to themselves are advocating the expenditure of enormous sums of money in the face of the crushing debt the interest upon which we have to meet. Physicians tell us, Mr. Speaker, that the first symptoms of paresis, a form of insanity well known, is the hallucination of the patient that he is possessed of illimitable sums of money, he proceeds to squander it in a reckless way and in due course he is examined mentally and is sent to an asylum. Now if the Government does not take care some person will have to examine them mentally and see that they are put in a place where they cannot lavishly spend the money of the people of this country. The scheme, so far as I can see, is one of the wildest that has been brought before the House—having regard to all the circumstances—since I have had the honour of being a member of it. In face of the fact that we are overbuilt in the matter of railways and will not be able to catch up for the next twenty-five or thirty years, in the face of the fact that the Estimates already brought down contain a vote of $140,000,000 to provide for these railways—and I understand that during the recess an Order in Council for an expenditure of something like $77,000,000 was obtained by the Government for the purpose of keeping these railways running—I say in the face of that, it is a foolhardy thing on the part of any member to get up and advocate a matter of this kind even in an academic way. We ought to be brought to our senses in the matter of expenditure of money; and representing as I do the city of Montreal, which contains within its borders something like ten per cent of the entire population of Canada, I cannot allow this resolution to be placed before the House without getting up and most strenuously objecting to it.

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): I do not want to be considered as knocking this scheme at all. In my opinion there is considerable merit in the project that is outlined in the resolution but, I think, there are other conditions that we must first take into consideration. In my opinion the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) hit the nail squarely on the head in the few remarks that he made which had reference to the control of the shipping on our Great Lakes. I do not know whether the conditions that exist at the present time in that regard are generally known or not. It is very well known to the grain trade however; and I do not think we are confronted with a bigger combine anywhere on the North American continent than the one we have to deal with in the shipment of our grain across the Great Lakes. The difficulty is not merely in connection with the freight charges; but a combination exists in connection with insurance and boat space that you cannot possibly get away from. You have got to secure your insurance in connection with your boat space or you do not get your boat space at all; and the rates that you are paying run from twenty-five to thirty per cent more than an individual could get insurance for providing he could secure boat space. Now, that is a condition that should not exist. If the Government are aware of that, I think they are somewhat dilatory in the performance of their duty in not at least attempting to remedy such a situation. Surely we should not be compelled to pay that excessive insurance we are compelled to pay by having to take insurance in conjunction with the boat space. That the two requirements should go together is bad enough; but when it becomes a case of paying twenty-five or thirty-five per cent more than you could obtain your insurance for otherwise if you could secure your boat space, then I think it is time for drastic, and very drastic action to be taken. We quite realize that the question of transportation, in so far as the West is concerned, is a very important one, very important; and water transportation should be of the utmost importance providing that we have control. But, as the member for East Lambton said, why should we continue expending millions and millions of dollars every year, as we are now doing and get absolutely no benefit from it. Rates are going up, and up, and up, and to-day they are about three times what they were a few years ago. A year ago they were about four times what they formerly were. Now, Sir, this combine not only goes to the extent of compelling you to take insurance but they absolutely refuse to move. Why, I have it on good authority that the combine in question even held up the Canada Wheat Board for days and days before they would accept shipment because they could not get the conditions that they asked for. When a combine will hold up a Board that has the Government behind it, what treatment is an individual likely to receive from an organization of that nature. In so far as the West is concerned it is not to-day a matter of water transportation. As regards getting our grain out the facilities are there. They take the grain and take it much faster than the railroads can get it to the lakes. There has never been a time that I know of that the terminal elevators have ever been full during navigation, or anywhere near full. It has generally been the case that only a very small percentage of the space at the head of the lakes has been occupied by grain when navigation closed. We lost in the West this year through lack of railway transportation far more than we could hope to gain even if we had this increased service and control over the rates. It was quite a common instance for seven, eight, ten and twelve cents, and in fact up as high as fifteen cents a bushel, more to be paid for grain where you had assurance that you could get it forwarded to the head of the Lakes at once as against taking a chance of having it forwarded one, two, three or even four months later.

The House may not be aware of all the features of the grain grade. It is not the price paid for grain, that is, cash grain in store or on track, that governs the price paid to the individual delivering on the railroad. The price he is paid for his grain is the price at which some one will purchase from you for future delivery. That delivery may be one, two, or three months hence. It is not contingent on the cash price at all, and if you were delivering grain to an elevator on a line railway where the buyer knows he is not going to get it out for, say, three months, then he has to pay the price that some one will pay him for that grain for delivery three months hence. That accounts for the discrepency. It is not the fault of the grain man at all. He is the victim of circumstances and can only pay the price that he can sell that grain for at the time he can make delivery of it. The contention has been made that the sooner the grain is got out of the country the better. That applies particularly to the interior. Get your grain out from the interior if you can, but immediately you get it to the head of the Lakes you have the Government guarantee of its quality and you have no difficulty in financing. But to my mind it is questionable whether it is advisable to throw all your grain on the European markets in one or two months, as the advocates of this scheme recommend. We have not had any trouble in getting our grain from the head of the Lakes; our trouble has been to get it to the head of the Lakes. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I think it will be wise to withhold further action on this project for some little time. If there is any money to spend, so far as the West is concerned, I think railway improvements would be of much more value to us at the present time than increased water transportation.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Keefer) who, I presume, will close the debate, rather than to offer any argument. I notice that his resolution calls for the appointment of a committee to make an investigation as to the benefits to be derived from such a scheme. I think we all know pretty well what the benefits will be, we know they will be great, but what we are more interested in just now is the cost, and it seems to me that if my hon. friend would add that to the scope of the investigation he would be enormously increasing the benefit to be derived from it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of the House to the circumstance that the mover will close the debate, and therefore, if any other hon. members desire to speak they should do so now.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take any part in this debate, but in view of the way in which work is duplicated by various departments of the Government, and of the bad example set in that regard by Parliament itself, I want to say a few words. Let me begin by congratulating the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) for the position he took the other evening in regard to this motion, when he pointed out that not only the work that it is proposed to have done by the terms of this resolution but very much more extensive work is at the present time being done by the International Joint Waterways Commission. For that reason the Minister of Railways and Canals urged upon the hon. gentleman who presented this motion, and supported it in a very interesting speech, the propriety of withdrawing it instead of pressing it forward at the present time. No more timely and wholesome advice than that could possibly be given in view of the financial condition of the country and of the burdens that rest upon it, some of which are outlined in the Estimates that have already been presented to the House. As I said a moment ago, it was not my intention to intervene in this debate, but as the discussion has wandered so far afield and so many opinions, interesting and otherwise, have been vouchsafed regarding transportation generally and the carriage of water-borne goods, I may be permitted, Sir, without infringing any of the rules of the House, to follow for a few minutes the bad example set by some of my colleagues on both sides of the Chamber. For that reason, I desire to allude very briefly to that feature of the discussion which compared the benefits of the extension and deepening of the St. Lawrence channel with that of the Ottawa and its tributaries which were referred to as the Georgian Bay canal project. The Georgian Bay canal project has been very fully gone into by a committee of engineers, appointed with the sanction of Parliament and under the direction of a previous government. Investigation was carried on for some years, and in the end a very comprehensive report was made. That investigation and report cost this country a very large amount of money, and it would be just as unreasonable I submit, at this date, to propose that that work be done over again by another committee as it is to propose that a special committee of this House should be appointed to ascertain certain things which, if they have not already been ascertained, will be ascertained in a very short time by the members of the International Joint Waterways Commission. By reason of the fact that the report made by the Georgian Bay Canal Commission may not be familiar to hon. members who at the present time occupy seats in this House, and in view of certain statements in regard to it that have been made in the course of this debate, I would like, for a few moments to direct the attention of the House to some of the findings of the board of eminent engineers which was appointed to investigate that project. In the first place they reported as a result of their investigation:

> That a 22-foot waterway for the largest lake boats (600 ft. x 60 ft. x 20 ft. draft) can be established for one hundred million dollars in ten years, and that the annual maintenance will be approximately $900,000, including the operation of storage reservoirs for the better distribution of the flood waters of the Ottawa river.

Then a further finding was set forth in a subsequent paragraph as follows:

> That sufficient water may be stored within its own and adjacent watersheds to operate a summit level above Lake Nipissing. That to use the Lake Nipissing level as a summit would increase the cost at least $10,000,000 and introduce 12 additional miles of canal cutting.

A still further finding in the same report was in these words:

That the probable time taken by a lake freight boat of 12-mile maximum speed, without delays at locks or in meeting other boats, from French River harbour to Montreal would be 70 hours. That the season of navigation will average 210 days from May to November.

And later on in the report it was stated:

That with a storage system as planned, and the tributary basins thereto required for the navigation project, a reliable water-power supply is secured at various dams amounting to 1,000,000 horse-power, which can be developed for about $50 per horse-power.

And finally, there was the following declaration in that report:

That no international waters are affected.

That feature, Sir—the one I have last mentioned—was one that commended the report to a great many people in this country, and it was a feature which was alluded to the other evening by my friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), and I think, by my friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) in the course of their admirable addresses on this resolution.

Now, let me point out further, Sir, that a great portion of the water-power which this committee found could be developed, is located within easy transmission distance of the territory that would be served from the St. Lawrence. In the first place we have at the Little Chaudière and Déschênes at Ottawa, 45,000 horse-power; at Hawkesbury, 65 miles east of Ottawa, 71,000 horse-power; at Point Fortune, 75 miles east of Ottawa, 148,000 horse-power; at the Chats, 30 miles west of Ottawa, 113,000 horse-power; at the Chenaux, 50 miles west of Ottawa, 68,000 horse-power; at Calumet, 63 miles west of Ottawa, 56,000 horse-power; at Rocher Fendu No. 1 and Rocher Fendu No. 2, 65 miles west of Ottawa, 78,000 horse-power; at Paquette Alumette, 85 miles west of Ottawa, 25,000 horse-power; at Des Joachims, 140 miles west of Ottawa, 60,000 horse-power; at Rocher Capitaine, 160 miles west of Ottawa, 80,000 horse-power; at Deux Rivières, 170 miles west of Ottawa, 38,000 horse-power—or a total in the group I have just mentioned of 782,000 horse-power. In addition to these there are several smaller groups of water-powers, aggregating, according to reliable engineers, about 1,500,000 horse-power. Now, the point I want to make in connection with this group of powers is this: any one of these can be developed for a comparatively small sum of money and would supply the area to be supplied by the development of power on the St. Lawrence, while, on the other hand, according to eminent engineers, the work on the St. Lawrence would involve the development of four or five blocks of 1,000,000 horse-power each at an expense that is absolutely staggering. That is apparent from the fact that a complete waterway of 30 feet could not be secured on the St. Lawrence for even one ocean going vessel until four or five such power developments had been made. And even if one such block of horse-power were developed, it would merely serve a territory which could be reached by these smaller powers on the Ottawa river and its tributaries.

In this connection some very interesting evidence was given before the International Joint Commission at one of the sessions held last fall, I think it was, in the city of New York, in pursuance of the instructions contained in the letter from the Government to the chairman of the International Joint Commission which was read in this House the other evening by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid). At that meeting one of the most eminent engineering firms in America stated that the cost of developing the St. Lawrence river at one point alone would be $550,000,000, exclusive of the cost of all the shore works and the damages for flooding. Moreover, according to the Minister of Railways—indeed, I think also according to my friend, the member for Port Arthur, who introduced this resolution—there are four or five other such points on the St. Lawrence where the development would be in quantity such as the one I have mentioned and that would cost approximately $550,000,000 in each case.

So that, Mr. Speaker, having regard to the point first raised in this debate by the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and emphasized by subsequent speakers, it is preposterous at the present time to talk of any such expenditure as would be involved in a scheme of this kind.

However, it is quite true that the resolution of my hon. friend does not propose that this work be proceeded with; it merely proposes an investigation to see what benefits would be derived if such a development were carried out. But as has been pointed out by previous speakers, the appointment of such a committee, with power to sit during the recess, examine witnesses, travel about from place to place and conduct a general roaming inquiry, would of itself involve the expenditure of a sum of money which this Parliament, if it retains its sober senses, would under no circumstances think of authorizing. For that reason, Sir, and without going into the merits of these rival schemes, but having given the House some statistics for the purposes of comparison, I desire to express my entire concurrence with the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Railways that all good purposes would be served, at the present time in any event, by the withdrawal of this motion.

Mr. F. H. KEEFER (Port Arthur and Kenora): Mr. Speaker, I think that the object of this motion has been well attained in the full discussion that has taken place thereon. I do not intend to reply to all the different arguments that have been advanced or to refer to all the points that have been raised during the course of the debate; I shall simply touch upon two or three of them. In a general way I might say that with the exception of the remarks of the member for the Cartier division of Montreal (Mr. Jacobs), the whole of the discussion has been favourable to the carrying out of the project, provided certain contingencies were concurrent. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier, however, labels the project a foolhardy proposition. I am glad to know that he is not backed up by his city in that respect. I had the pleasure of attending the sitting of the International Joint Commission in Montreal, upon which occasion the city of Montreal took a much wider and wiser view of the matter, one based upon the general benefit which would accrue to the country as the result of the carrying out of this project. The remarks of the member for the Cartier division of Montreal were very much like the views expressed in Buffalo and in New York in opposition to the scheme —and I cannot help feeling that there was a certain amount of selfish interest in the opposition that came from those quarters. Be that as it may, the city of Montreal took a broad view at the public hearing held by the Commission, believing that the carrying out of the project would result in benefit to Montreal as well as to Canada generally. Montreal is able to look beyond its mountain to the West and to realize what the general benefit will be to Canada as well as to herself. I may add that it was not necessary to call in the doctor to examine any of their heads, because they took a sane view of the matter.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend says that the city of Montreal said this and said that. Who was "the city of Montreal"?

Mr. KEEFER: Different organizations were represented, including the Board of Trade. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) extended a welcome on behalf of the city itself and made the remarks to which I refer with respect to the attitude of the city of Montreal. The only ones who were opposed to it, so far as I heard, were some shipping interests that did not want to have any shipping go past Montreal. The general trend of opinion in that city, however, was in favour of it.

The objection has been raised that any committee appointed under this resolution, would, in its operations, interfere with the work being carried on in regard to this matter by the International Joint Commission. That never was intended, and I stated so in my opening remarks. The idea in view is that when the Commission make their report, when they submit their findings or recommendations and tender the evidence which they heard, a committee of this House will be available to receive that report and look into it and see that it is distributed among members of the House instead of being consigned to the waste paper basket, as might otherwise be the case. The remarks of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) in that respect were quite apropos. It was never intended—although the resolution is so worded, I must confess—that this committee should attempt to hear evidence on the subject while the International Joint Commission were doing the same work.

The other objection I have heard stated is that the carrying out of this project might interfere with our Canadian National railway receipts; that we have a large amount invested in our railways and must do nothing to interfere with their revenues. Well, in a sense that is a good argument, though it is not sound argument if we are asked to continue to have people pay extravagant freight rates when they could get their goods forwarded for one-tenth of the rail freight cost. But the point I want to make is that those who object to the proposal on this ground have entirely missed the point of the problem —that this is a water proposition, a proposal for the improvement of water routes, and therefore involving a decrease of water rates only and having no affect upon railway receipts. Everybody will admit that at no time when a water route is available will a person ship by rail, because the cost of shipping by rail is many times as much as by water

You can bring wheat down from Port Colborne by water for 5 cents, whereas, it costs much more by rail. Nobody would think of shipping by rail in the summer time, so that this project does not compete against railway transportation. It does, however, reduce the cost, as has been stated, of water-borne transportation during the summer months by the amount which has been stated and which has not been controverted. I have here letters from presidents of United States railways, stating that the improvement and development of this scheme will increase their receipts. Why? To-day practically everything is being taken down to New York and Boston and shipped out from those ports, and the result is that the cars are tied up. The cry is "No cars." There is a loss on those cars, a loss of earning power. They are held waiting for return cargoes, or they come back empty a long distance to the West. They all pile in at the eastern seaboard at a certain time, at the close of the year; and these gentlemen point out that, if they had several seaports, especially at a shorter distance, to which the railways could haul their cars, as they do to Port Arthur and Fort William in the summer time, they would avoid that unnecessary cost and loss. They point out that by this process you open up 2,000 miles of additional ocean navigation, and you have many additional ports to which the railways can haul freight and quickly return for more. As regards our Canadian railways, the latter advantage is not so applicable; but the point is this: In the summer time you do not see the wheat brought by rail around the north shore of Lake Superior on any of the three transcontinental railways. In the winter time this question cannot affect the railways, because the water route is not open; there is no competition. Whatever the railway is and whatever the receipts are, those receipts during the winter will come in. I cannot, therefore, see the force of the objection that this is in any way going to decrease the receipts of our national railways, but I can see how it is going to increase their receipts. At the present time, many products of the North West would come out if they could profitably rise over the top of the rates, unnecessarily high by water. Lower the rates and those products will come out and be hauled down to the head of the Great Lakes and our railways will then get those additional receipts. Therefore, I say that this work when completed will increase the receipts of our national transcontinental railways. In the winter time very little wheat is hauled by rail around the shores of Lake Superior. During the war quite a quantity was brought down at a considerable cost, but the experience is that, on account of the locomotives being able to haul only half the number of cars and the additional loss of time, it is not a profitable business to be hauling unnecessarily in the winter time around Lake Superior. If this project is carried out, the receipts of our railways will be increased and the quantity of products coming out from the West will also be increased. You will increase in every respect the volume of the trade of the railways, and that is what is desired. We shall then not have so much the cry: "Where are the cars? Where are the new cars that have been asked for in this House?" They will be out in the West doing their work instead of lying idle at the seaboard. And furthermore, much can be saved in additional rolling stock now required to be produced. It is, therefore, a sound policy for Canada, notwithstanding a large expenditure for railways, as quickly as she can to get this canal built so as to increase the receipts of her railways and save capital expenditures that would otherwise be required.

It has been stated that, with the enormous debt that we have upon our shoulders, this is no time to contemplate making any new expenditures. My friend the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), for whom I have a great respect, jocularly said that this project had been brought forward at a time when there was the prospect of an election. Two years ago Canada sent two Cabinet Ministers to Washington in an endeavour to get this matter referred to the International Waterways Commission. The present Prime Minister and the late Hon. Mr. Sifton, went there along with some officials, but nothing was done. But when the Western States arose in their strength and in their own interest on account of the produce of the farmers being unnecessarily taxed by high freight rates, demanded of Washington, that this matter be referred to the International Waterways Commission, then the matter was so referred. Two years ago a communication came from the United States, when no election was in sight. Canada dealt with that communication and suggested that engineers from both countries be appointed to prepare the proper and necessary questions of reference to the International Joint Commission. Each country appointed an engineer; those engineers met and framed the questions that were frequently transmitted by the letter read by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid). Orders in Council were then passed authorizing the reference, and in that way the whole matter was, by Canada and by the United States, referred to the International Commission to investigate, and we shall soon have that report. But it is very surprising, listening to some of the remarks made in this House, to realize what an utter lack of information there is upon this important subject, and it was with the sole object of getting this matter from this International Commission by its report to the attention of the members through a committee, that this motion has been made.

Another objection has been made—"Oh there is an alternative route, the Georgian bay." There are two routes to the West, and I am not going to argue particularly in favour of one or the other. As the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) said, as long as we can get transportation through without breaking bulk to the head of the lakes, so that the products will not be charged as high as at present in getting them to the market, we are content; it makes no difference whether it is by the Georgian bay route or by this other route. But I remember the criticism of the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), which was to the effect that this project is, perhaps, not advisable. He did not say that it was not; but he went on to say that freight rates depend upon the return cargoes, and you must have the return cargoes. It is for that reason that I was endeavouring to accentuate the point that there were return cargoes, I refered in opening this matter to the boats going in and out of Manchester to take cargoes in and bring cargoes out. In this case, when this canal is opened up, there would be many cities from which cargoes could be had, such as Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit and Chicago. The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) said that I said nothing of the Canadian cities. I beg his pardon. I mentioned, "and the Ontario ports". We shall have all those places on the American side and on the Canadian side. Ontario is surrounded on the south by water; it is her boundary all the way until you get practically to Manitoba, and all the busy cities and towns of Ontario will have freight to send out and be able to receive freight from overseas. There is your return cargo to and from Canada; but the point is this, in answer to the hon. member for Marquette —he will also have his return cargo which is to-day going to and being received by the seaports of New York and Boston. Why? Where do these goods go to? To New York? No, they go to Chicago, Indianapolis, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, Detroit, Wisconsin, Indiana. Now we will have ocean tramp steamers coming into those upper lakes on account of that class of business and there will be no difficulty at all, after having brought their cargo in and discharging, in their making the short journey either to Chicago, Duluth, Port Arthur, or Fort William, and loading up with grain or any other agricultural products. Because of that we will have these return cargoes, and therefore it is that those who have given the matter the most consideration realize that the immediate construction of this waterway would be in the national interests. There is the further fact that we have spent millions on the Welland canal, which will be useless unless it is connected up with the Port of Montreal.

There are other reasons that could be urged by those who have studied the question of the Georgian Bay and the St. Lawrence. The St. Lawrence is primarily a navigation proposition. Secondly, it is a power proposition. The St. Lawrence river is the most remarkable river in the world so far as navigation is concerned. No other river in the world has such a steady constant flow. The St. Lawrence never varies in one year more than 1·2 feet. Nature has built immense reservoirs and dams like our inland lakes, which would have cost an enormous sum for man to build. The waters flowing from the different rivers, the Kaministiqua, the Nipigon, the White river, the Michipicoten, etc., settle down in the lakes to a clear blue water, not carrying any sediment. These settling works have already been constructed. The river never varies in the springtime. Compare that with the Ottawa river. We must stop that rise and fall of 20 feet every year; then when we have done that, we will be able to say it may become a ship canal; it is a ship canal we are after, not a barge canal. Experience teaches us that ships will take short canals for long water stretches, but that they will not take long canals for the opposite. I cannot understand why hon. members representing the constituencies along the Ottawa river, especially those representing the city of Ottawa, are not in favour of this project. There will only be five locks in the St. Lawrence. Two of these locks must be built as part of the Georgian Bay or Ottawa river system, to get into the lake St. Louis. Then you would be within six feet of the level of the lake of Two Mountains, which is an enlargement of the Ottawa river, which river here flows into lake St. Louis, which in turn is an enlargement of the St. Lawrence river. Then you could carry on with the Georgian Bay system, from these two locks already then built. I would have thought that any person desiring to see Ottawa become a seaport, to see the Ottawa river developed, to see even the Georgian Bay canal built, would feel that in so doing they were getting two-fifths of the benefit of the St. Lawrence system for their own canal. Those are the facts. I cannot understand any opposition to this project once it is properly understood.

If the International Joint Waterways Commission are dealing only with the St. Lawrence, let this whole question be referred to a committee of the House, and if the other scheme is preferable the House can throw this one out if it sees fit, and take on the other. But let us get the facts, and disseminate them, and then we will know what to do.

As to the question of cost as I said at the outset, we are hard up, we cannot afford to spend money; but if we are spending money at the present time and do not know it we should take that wasteful expenditure by the throat, and that is what we would be doing in this case. I made the assertion in the opening of my remarks, and I still maintain that it is true, that the United States and Canada are losing hundreds of millions of dollars by not having this canal built. Mr. Julius H. Barnes, formerly president of the United States Grain Corporation, has shown that on the 4,000,000,000 grain product of the United States and Canada the producers are losing $200,000,000 annually, and that statement has not been controverted. Add to that the loss on the package freight, and—leaving aside the question of electric power—this project will pay on navigation and navigation alone. If that be so, why should we not pay annually sinking fund, and interest on the capital invested, particularly if it is only one-tenth of the amount that is wasted every year. We would not tolerate that waste if we knew it. Let us get the facts, and I am sure the people of this country will say: Hard-up as we are, we do not want to pay for this waste in freight rates, but would rather pay it straight to the Federal treasury and have something for it.

With reference to the cost of development of power, the statement made by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) was, I believe, the statement of a New York engineer who was the consulting engineer of the water-power interests. That was the opposition we had in Montreal—the water-power interests. They are not anxious to see the further development of water-powers on the St. Lawrence river, and their policy was to make the cost as great as possible, but let me remind my hon. friend from Russell, who I am sure is aware of it, that the Parliament of Canada heretofore has had a proposition before it from gentlemen of New York State offering to build the canal at that point if they were given the power at the point of which he speaks. They would build the canal locks free of cost to either country if they were handed over the power—this power that we are told now was to cost at this one point, $550,000,000. That proposition nearly got through this House. It got through the New York State legislature. Then application was made to the courts of the United States to quash the whole incorporation of the American Company on the ground that it was ultra viras, that no private company could be given the rights of navigation by the state. This place where $550,000,000 was to be spent for power, we could have had built without it costing Canada anything, if we had seen fit. I do not know just what the $550,000,000 represents, whether it means complete water-power development, machinery and everything else. I dare say it does. I have been told that when you start in and develop water-power, your development cost is, say, $1, for the mere dams and so forth; but for your plant, your houses, your necessary machinery, the living quarters for the men who live there, moving pictures and so on, the cost is $100 to every $1. Probably that $550,000,000 includes all those items.

What I say is that as Canadians we should get to understand this question, just as our cousins to the south now understand it. The only opposition they have over there is the selfish opposition of part of New York State, and of the Buffalo and Erie Canal interests. The people over there now see the benefit of this canal, and let us try to see what benefit there is in it for us also. I have no objection to seeing also what the cost is. Let us know exactly what it will cost. The hon. member for Quebec said, let us also refer to the committee at the same time the question of getting the grain to Quebec as well as to Montreal all rail. Be it so. He will find that by rail it is ten times the cost it would be by water. Let all these questions be referred to the committee; let us get the facts, and then we can act intelligently. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Reid) was good enough to say that if I withdrew this resolution he would undertake to see that this whole question was referred to one of the standing committees of the House. A committee which I did not know existed at the time I drafted the resolution, namely, the Committee on Forests, Waterways and Water-powers. I should be glad to see the matter go before that committee. There is nothing much that can be done until we have the evidence and the report from the International Joint Commission as a basis to work upon. The report should be presented about the second Tuesday in April next, and under the circumstances I gladly avail myself of the undertaking of the Minister of Railways and withdraw the motion on this understanding.

Motion withdrawn.

THE CATTLE EMBARGO

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Smith, that in the opinion of this House it would not be in the interests of Canada should the Government of Great Britain remove the embargo upon cattle going into the United Kingdom, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Pedlow.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock yesterday I moved the adjournment of this debate, and it is rather a coincidence that I should now be tempted again at six o'clock to move its further adjournment. However, I shall not do so, although it is practically time for recess. I shall conclude the remarks which I was addressing to the House yesterday. I was speaking at the time of adjournment on the visit of the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario to Britain in connection with the removal of the embargo, and had expressed the opinion that that visit, instead of assisting in the endeavour to secure its removal, would on the contrary have a prejudicial effect by creating a feeling of resentment on the part of the British people against this country by reason of the interference of a provincial minister in a matter purely within the decision of the British people. That my opinion is well founded is obvious from the following comment which I shall quote from the London "Morning Post" as reported in the press:

> The London Morning Post says: "Mr. Doherty will associate himself with political action here, a proceeding so obviously improper that we can only suppose that the Minister for Ontario has not understood to what he is being committed."

I think we shall all agree that the "Morning Post" has sized up that minister very accurately. Mr. Doherty has said that he is in Great Britain to-day, not as the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario but in his capacity as a private citizen of Canada. He is evidently endeavouring to play the dual role of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. When he is in Ontario he is the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, and when he goes to Great Britain on a message relating to agriculture he is a private citizen. I do not think that it will tend to predispose the British people in favour of the removal of this embargo, when a private citizen of Canada goes there to give them counsel gratuitously as to what they ought to do. This has been made a political question. The Labour people have taken it up and are using the removal of the embargo as an argument against the government of Great Britain. What is the reason they give for its removal? Is it because they are anxious to assist the British agriculturists? Not at all. Is it because they want to assist Canadian exporters? By no means. What they want is cheap meat, and it does seem to me that this is not a very strong reason why the Canadian people should desire the removal of the embargo. If the embargo were removed in accordance with the wishes of the Labour people of Britain, it would be removed not only from Canadian cattle but from cattle coming from Argentine and Australia, and it would be hopeless for the Canadian people to think of competing in the British market with the cattle from those countries. The Canadian farmer is in a much better position to-day than he would be in with the removal of the embargo from the cattle of all countries, because, being nearer Great Britain than any of those cattle-producing countries, he can ship his cattle there alive much more freely and expeditiously and to better advantage than the farmers of Australia or the Argentine. We therefore have a sort of preference in the British market in that respect. I am afraid that the only reputation which the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario will gain in the Old Country will be one that will not be very favourable. He will go down in British history, I fear, by the appellation of "Meddlesome Manning," meddling with things with which he has no business and no concern, and ignoring the proper channel through which this question should be taken up, namely, the Federal Government. I was struck with the statement yesterday of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) to the effect that of a million cattle annually passing inspection at our abattoirs less than ten per cent are fitted for export to the British Islands to compete there with the cattle of Australia and Argentine. If that is so, then I think it should be a stimulus to the Canadian farmer to improve his cattle still further. It may be difficult for the farmers of the West to do this, but certainly the farmers of Ontario should be urged, and urged very strongly, to finish their cattle properly so that they can send them in a condition that will secure the approval of the British people. What we need in the livestock industry in Ontario is more intense feeding. That seems to be the principle which the British farmer has followed for years, and it is a good one for the Ontario farmer to emulate. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to move an amendment to the amendment to the following effect:

That all the words after the word "that" in the original motion, and all the words of the proposed amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "This House approves and supports the policy of the Government and of previous Governments of Canada in protesting against the implication of disease in Canadian cattle by reason of the maintenance of the embargo thereon by the British Government."

This Government has done all that it possibly can to secure the removal of the embargo. It received a promise from the British Minister of Agriculture in 1917 that the embargo would be removed, and if that promise has not been carried out it is not the fault of the Government. Seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best, I beg to move the amendment to the amendment which I have just read.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): I do not intend to deal at any great length with this subject at the present time for the reason that I was not quite ready to do so to-night owing to an understanding I had that it should not be discussed until Monday's sitting, which would have given me more leisure to make further investigation into the matter. There is now before the House the resolution of the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith), the amendment moved by myself, and the sub-amendment of the member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). During the time that has elapsed, and during the discussion that has ensued, since I placed my amendment before the House, there seems to have arisen in the minds of some hon. gentlemen a misapprehension as to my motives and as to the aims of my amendment. Let me say distinctly at the outset, Sir, and so that there may be no room whatever left for any misunderstanding, that there was no intention on my part to dictate to the Imperial Government as to the course they should pursue in domestic affairs, and I do not think that any person reading my amendment could come to that conclusion. I moved that amendment at almost the conclusion of the debate on the resolution, and it seemed to me that it would be rather unfortunate, after so much discussion on an important subject of this kind, if the resolution should be withdrawn without apparently accomplishing anything beyond affording hon. members an opportunity to express their opinions. I therefore briefly outlined my reasons for taking the course I did, and moved my amendment, which reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "House" in the resolution be struck out and the following inserted in lieu thereof: "The Government of Canada should make a strong protest against the reasons assigned by the British Government that Canadian cattle are diseased as an excuse for placing an embargo on Canadian live cattle going into the United Kingdom".

I do not think that amendment warrants the conclusion that some hon. gentlemen seem to have reached. It certainly was not my intention either to interfere in the pending elections in the Old Country, or to attempt to dictate to the Imperial Government as to what course they should pursue in domestic affairs. But, Sir, we have a grievance that we should voice; and the fact that we have no right to interefere in Imperial affairs does not debar us from protesting to the Imperial Government, if we have a grievance, just as we would protest to the authorities of any other country, had we cause to do so. I do not think that we in Canada should hesitate—in fact I do not think the Imperial Government expects us to do so—to express our disapproval of Imperial action on this question. As a matter of fact, during the whole period covering the years that have passed from 1892 down to the present time, successive Canadian Governments have protested against the unfairness of this embargo on our cattle. In the brief interval since yesterday I have hurriedly read the records and find that government after government have protested against, not the embargo only but the unfairness of the reasons assigned or implied for its imposition. As a matter of fact, there is no room for concluding that, in the early stages at least, the reasons for the embargo were merely implied; they wer specifically stated. I read that many efforts were made during all these years. And what has been accomplished, Mr. Speaker? As far as I can learn, practically nothing. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister says that a promise was at last extracted from the British Government. But for what purpose? Simply that this embargo would be removed after the war. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if in his judgment we are still at war? I know that the great country to the south of us claim that they are still at war with Germany; and certainly their refusal to repeal certain war-time provisions against the enemy would lead to that conclusion. But so far as Canada is concerned the war ceased on July 9, 1919, and since then the Imperial authorities, one would think, have had ample time to implement their promise.

Now, Sir, I have been challenged by some hon. members, among them my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), to adduce facts in support of my resolution, and that hon. gentleman has stated that if I can produce the data on which I base the conclusions arrived at in my amendment to the resolution he will support me. Therefore I should like to call the attention of the House to some extracts from Sessional Papers, Vol. XXVI, published in 1893. I find away back in that year two unfortunate cows were the beginning of all this trouble, and that from that date down to the present time various governments, both Conservative and Liberal—and I suppose Unionist, too, when it had time to spare for work of that kind—have been dealing with the subject, but without much result. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) informed us the other day that even as late as a year ago an attempt had been made by the Government to have this embargo removed, but practically nothing was accomplished. I find in a Sessional Paper, dated London, October 24, 1892, the following cablegram:

> Two animals, one a cow, ex steamer "Monkseaton" or "Huronia" at Dundee and Fifeshire slaughtered suspicion pleuro-pneumonia. Post-mortem indication very similar pleuro but no decision yet arrived at. Have seen authorities and pointed out impossibility disease being pleuro. Make immediate inquiry where all animals came from. Most important to prove no contact with American cattle and no disease in locality stock came from.
> (Signed) TUPPER.

From that time on a voluminous correspondence ensued, and Sir Charles Tupper refers again to these unfortunate cows. He writes:

> I cannot help thinking it a pity, in any circumstances, that the two "old worn-out" cows, to which Dr. McEachran refers as having been shipped by the "Huronia", should ever have been allowed to come over, and I am strongly of the opinion that we should follow the practice of the Danes, who rigorously keep back any animal that is likely to cause suspicion, or require to be examined on landing in this country. We cannot be too careful, in view of the difficulties, trouble, expense and anxiety which any case like that at present under consideration causes, and I shall be glad if you will give the matter your attention.
>
> I remain, yours faithfully,
> CHARLES TUPPER.

Nothing apparently was accomplished, although protests continued to be made by the Dominion Government. In that respect, you will notice, Mr. Speaker, that I was not finding fault with the Government for not attempting to get the embargo removed, but I was rather impatient at their failure to produce something of value as the result of their efforts. The Edinburgh Scotsman of 5th November, 1892, published the following:

> The urgent representations of the great bodies of English agriculturalists have prevailed at the board of agriculture, and Canada is to be deprived of the privilege she has up till now enjoyed of free trade with this country in live cattle. Mr. Herbert Gardner has, at any rate, waited to hear both sides before coming to this decision. The Canadian authorities have, I believe, been most diligent in their efforts to rebut the suspicion cast upon the Dominion cattle.

The week following that an influential deputation waited upon the president of the British Board of Agriculture in London. The Duke of Westminster in introducing the deputation said:

> Mr. Gardner would not have been surprised that they had requested to have this interview with him, on account of the very deep and well founded alarm that had been spread all over the country from the fact of the importation of cattle from Canada into Scotland; from the fact of their distribution over the country; and from the fact of there having been an outbreak of contagious pleuro-pneumonia which occurred not very long after the landing and inspection of these animals, he believed, at Dundee.

That is another instance in which the Imperial authorities are on record as stating the reasons for which this embargo was placed on Canadian cattle. There is no mistaking that statement, that the embargo was placed on Canadian cattle because of disease. Further on I read an extract from Mr. Gardner's reply to this delegation, as follows:

We do this with the deepest regret. I may say, personally that after the most anxious investigation of the facts,—after a most lengthened and patient consideration of the matter in all its bearings, we have come to the conclusion that these facts are inconsistent with the reasonable security contemplated by the law, and that we absolutely have no alternative but to withdraw the privilege of the free importation which Canada—

Mark the word "Canada."

—has enjoyed in the past.

Many speakers during the discussion have emphasized as a fact that the Imperial authorities had made a general ruling against all countries and that there was no specific ruling against Canada. I think the quotations I have cited should clear away that impression, if it does really exist in the minds of any hon. members to-night. This continues:

—and I may say that an order to that effect is already signed.

That order was as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in the Animals Order of 1886, unless and until the board of agriculture otherwise order, chapter 32, (foreign animals not subject to slaughter or quarantine) of the said order shall not apply to cattle brought from Her Majesty's possessions in North America, and such cattle shall be subject to the provisions of part 1 (slaughter at port of landing) of the fifth schedule of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1888, and to the provisions of chapter 30 (foreign animals subject to slaughter) of the said Animals Order of 1886.

Now, that schedule reads as follows—and I would like to place it on Hansard so that there will be no misunderstanding in the matter:

The Third Schedule: Foreign animals. Part 1. Slaughter at Port of Landing.

1. The animals shall be landed only at a part of a port defined for that purpose by order of the Board of Agriculture, to be called a foreign animals wharf.

2. The animals shall be landed in such manner, at such times, and subject to such supervision and control as the Commissioners of Customs direct.

3. The animals shall not be moved alive out of the wharf.

I think I have quoted sufficient, Mr. Speaker, to show that there is record of the fact that there is an embargo on cattle from Canada—a specific ruling on the subject, and I have yet to find any ruling which rescinds that decision. If I have overlooked anything of that kind I should be pleased if hon. members would correct me, but if they find that I am right, they should support the amendment to the resolution.

It often occurs, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members of this House change their minds. On May, 6, 1895, the then member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith) moved the following resolution in this House with regard to the embargo on Canadian cattle:

That in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Government should engage the services of one or more competent British veterinary surgeons to examine into and report upon the health of Canadian cattle herds, with a view to obtaining such evidence as will convince the British Government that no danger of infection will be incurred by the admission of Canadian cattle into Great Britain without slaughter at the port of debarkation.

Apparently the hon. member has changed his views in the meantime, because he now wants the British authorities to continue the embargo. That is where he and I differ on the subject. I agree with his contention that it would be in the interests of cattle breeders and cattle raisers in this country if they shipped their cattle out of the country in a finished state. If they did, they would be able to use the grains of the country for the feeding of their cattle, and instead of shipping out what is practically the raw material of that industry, they would be shipping out the finished product.

I was rather amused at the positions taken during the discussion by some hon. members in regard to this matter of embargo. While they were afraid to do anything that would offend the Imperial authorities, afraid to dictate to the Imperial Government, afraid even to protest against the unfairness of the position that Canadian cattle are placed in, they were willing, some of them, particularly the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that the Canadian Government should place a duty on cattle coming in from the United States. That would seem to be a very extraordinary action on the part of Canada, in view of the fact that our cattle go into the United States duty free. The member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) was willing that the Imperial authorities should place a duty on Canadian cattle of ten per cent to take the place of the embargo, but he would not attempt to suggest to the British authorities that they should remove the embargo. He would admit the unfairness of the situation, but he would not enter a protest against the action of the Imperial authorities with regard to Canadian cattle.

The Minister of Agricuture—and this is in itself evidence of the fact that Canada is being unfairly dealt with—has called attention to the fact that while Holland is allowed to send into Great Britain pure bred Holsteins—under special license, of course—Canadians are not allowed that privilege. I wanted to find out the reason for that, and an examination of the report of the Commissioners of the Agricultural Department of Great Britain, 1893-94, volume 23, proved to be interesting in that regard. It is a report as to the conditions of cattle in Belgium, a country adjacent to Holland. I find that in 1892 there were 940 cases of pleuro-pneumonia in Belgium and 38,250 cases of foot-and-mouth disease —in a country so small compared with Canada that you could lose it in one of our Great Lakes. If the Imperial authorities are prepared to extend consideration to these countries, I do not see why Canadians should not make a determined effort now to bring about the removal of an embargo against Canadian cattle, particularly in view of the promise made in 1917 that the embargo would be removed after the war. The war has long since come to a conclusion; a great deal of history has been made in the meantime, and there is no reason why this condition should obtain. The Imperial authorities admit that there is no disease in our Canadian cattle. The Minister of Agriculture said yesterday that there would be no difficulty in keeping diseased cattle from coming into Canada from the United States. That being the case, there should be no difficulty in complying with the requirements in that regard and keeping diseased cattle from the United States from being shipped to Great Britain through Canadian ports.

I find in the appendix to the report of the British Agricultural Commission the following with regard to Canada:

> It had always been felt that with so extended a line of frontier there must be a risk of United States cattle finding their way across the border, and now that pleuro-pneumonia had been found to exist in cattle only recently landed from Canada, the Board decided that they had no alternative but to place the Canadian cattle in the same position as those from the United States. Their exemption from slaughter under part IV of the Third Schedule to the Act of 1878 was therefore withdrawn.
> During the year 1892 we received from Canada 98,228 cattle, 15,747 sheep, and 1,235 swine. All these animals were admitted free into the interior of the country.

That was in 1892. Now, if that is the only thing that stands in the way of our obtaining the consideration desired; if that is the only thing required to be done by the Canadian Government in order that the request of the Imperial authorities in the matter shall be complied with, I submit that the sooner we are in a position to inform the British authorities that the requirements have been complied with and to demand a fulfilment of the promise made in 1917, the better it will be for this country, because this is a matter that affects a very important industry.

I find, Sir, that there is very little difference in substance between my amendment to the resolution and the sub-amendmend that has been offered. This embodies to a large extent the idea I had in mind, and in view of the fact that it asks the House to approve and support the policy of this Government and previous Governments—you will notice that it approves the policy not only of this Government, but of previous Governments—I have no hesitation whatever in accepting this sub-amendment to my amendment. But while I accept the sub-amendment, and while I approve and support the policy of the Government, I want the Government to understand that I support their policy only in regard to this particular transaction. I want to qualify my support of their policy to that extent, and if they behave themselves properly, in future, it is hard to say what may occur. This is, however, an instalment on account, and with this expressed reservation on the subject, I have much pleasure in accepting this sub-amendment to my amendment to the resolution.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) is, as I heard it read, in the terms suggested by myself yesterday to be substituted for that of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow). But I understood my hon. friend to take exception to that as not being his amendment, and consequently the sub-amendment became necessary. Therefore, as I understand the matter now, it is the sub-amendment that is before the House.

The only word that I rise to add on this occasion is that I do not think this subject should be seized upon to endeavour to create in Canada a feeling against Great Britain. The hon. member for Red Deer

(Mr. Clark) put the whole subject in a very concise and, as I thought, fair and proper way in the speech he made yesterday. His words, associated with those of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) expressed what I think ought to be the attitude of Parliament towards this question at this time. It would be quite wrong for Parliament to affirm that the British Government assign, as a reason for the maintenance of this embargo, disease amongst Canadian cattle. The British Government, when the embargo was put on some thirty years ago, did so, assigning as a reason then, just as quoted by the hon. member for South Renfrew, that there was suspicion of disease in respect of at least one animal—it may be that my hon. friend is correct in describing the case as that of "two unfortunate cows" —in a Canadian shipment, which animal, I understand, had actually come from the United States. It is a fact that now they assign, as at least one of the grounds, if not the only one, for the maintenance of the embargo, the fear that, although our herds to-day are free and have, for many years, been free of disease, nevertheless, contagion may come to their stock through Canada from importations from the United States or otherwise, or from disease subsequently recurring within the herds of Canada. They do not at all assert, nor even venture to suspect, that the herds of this country to-day are not wholly free from disease. Consequently, it would be very unfair on the part of this Parliament to pass an amendment embodying an assertion on our part of something that was not strictly a fact.

But inasmuch as the original embargo arose from suspicion of disease, if not disease on the part of an animal that came with a Canadian herd, the continuance of an embargo, arising from that source, we have claimed, constitutes an implication against Canadian stock. I must say that there are many who think—and from this opinion I am not free myself—that the continuation of this policy in Great Britain is really a measure of protection established by the British Government for the benefit of cattle raisers in the old land. It is not the only measure that has protective effect which the British Government now enforces, to which they have had resort in recent years, and it has often occurred to me that the public opinion that they have created there—and possibly it is better described as a public prejudice—against protective duties, is at the bottom of the disposition on the part of the Government and Parliament there to resort to other means to get the same result. Consequently, we feel that as they are able to get that result by other means, those other means if any, should be adopted, and they should not continue an embargo that arose from a cause that they know has now passed away.

If they feel that, as was expressed by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), they should continue the embargo for the reason that they want to be doubly sure that there will be no recurrence of disease or no admission of diseased cattle to Canada and, consequently, transmission of the contagion to British cattle, then they should take such appropriate action as will remove the original imputation that has all along attended this embargo and place their policy upon another basis. I think I have expressed with some care and, I believe, exactly, the position that governments in Canada have taken for some time, and this finds expression as well in the sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). It seems to me that the passing of that sub-amendment is consonant with the historic policy of Canada, with the dignity of Canada and also with the continuous practice of this country to respect the rights of the British Parliament within their own domain. Therefore, I hope the House will accept, as it stands, the sub-amendment, and if possible, that there will be no division of opinion upon it.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, the sub-amendment is a vote of confidence in the present Government and in preceding Governments for having protested against this embargo. I am not aware that anybody has attacked the attitude of the present Government or of any preceding Government on that point. Therefore, I do not think the present Government or the preceding government, of which I had the honour to be a member, needs any whitewashing of that kind; but I do not think it does any harm and I have no objection to offer to it.

Mr. PROULX: Will this sub-amendment be communicated to the Imperial Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. I will see that the resolution as passed by Parliament is duly transmitted to the High Commissioner, as it is through his office that the representations of this country have been made.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin): I just wish to say that the reason why I second and shall support the sub-amendment is this: I believe that the present Government and all former governments in the last 20 or 25 years have tried to do all they could to have the cattle embargo removed. The reason I am opposed to the original resolution is that I think we have no right to dictate to the British Government what shall be done in the matter of the embargo; it is their business, not ours. The reason I am opposed to the amendment is because the British Government, as I think every hon. member is aware, are not claiming that there is disease among our cattle at the present time. While the embargo was put on for that reason in the first place, I fully agree with my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that we have no authority whatever for saying that the British Government claim now that there is disease among our cattle. We cannot go by newspaper reports and by what people say. I believe that the newspapers and the amendment to the resolution are simply doing harm to our cattle, because the amendment practically says that the British Government is keeping the embargo on because there is disease among our cattle. I repeat, we have no right to dictate to the British Government what laws they shall make, and I do not want the British Government or the government of any other country to dictate to us. I certainly shall not vote to dictate to them.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): I do not see that very much is to be gained either by the amendment or by the sub-amendment. There is one thing, however, that I wish to say to the Prime Minister, and to my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), and that is, there is no record of the British Government ever having changed the stand they took on the question of pleuro-pneumonia. They gave as a reason for putting on the embargo, that there was disease among our cattle, and that reason is of record. Now if there is a change in their attitude, that also should be a matter of record with some government of this country, and until the Prime Minister or some other member of the Government can show that the British Government have receded from the stand they took some twenty or more years ago, and that that change of attitude is a matter of record in this country, there is no use talking about it any more. To say that there has been a change of attitude on the part of the British Government without being able to produce any evidence to that effect, is as futile as it would be for me to stand up in court and say: Such and such is the decision of the courts on the records, but a case has been decided somewhere that has not been reported, and I ask your lordships to follow that unreported case. Of course, their lordships would tell me at once that they could pay no attention to that unreported case, but would have to follow the reports of the law as they found them. I submit to the Government, and particularly to the Minister of Agriculture, that we have no record that the British Government have changed their minds, and until they have reversed what they unjustly said about our stock, we cannot very well say that the matter has been fully cleared up.

I think there is very litle difference, Mr. Speaker, between the amendment and the sub-amendment. I am sorry that even in these little things there must be fault found and that the Government has apparently reached the conclusion that no good thing can come out of Nazareth at all. They would not suggest to my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) that he change a word or two in his amendment, but if there was any credit to be gained from action in this matter, his resolution had to be wiped out entirely and one introduced from the other side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. I suggested yesterday, and even sent across the floor, this very amendment, but when it appeared to-day as the amendment of the hon. member for South Renfrew, he repudiated it.

Mr. McKENZIE: The amendment was not made. My right hon. friend is not fair. What got into the report and into the records was a bungle and a mistake. As I understand it, and as will appear by Hansard to-morrow, the thing was simply written on the back of some paper, and the officer of the House who was taking this thing down just took it as if it was all right. The fact of the matter is simply this. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) was afraid that the hon. member for South Renfrew would get some kudos out of this thing, so he had to come forward with an amendment of his own. The idea in both is exactly the same; the difference is only a word or two one way or the other, and if we get any results from our action in this matter, I say that the hon. member for South Renfrew is entitled to the whole credit.

Mr. PEDLOW: If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a mis-statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would rule that the hon. member has the right to correct a mis-statement if one has been made.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understood the Prime Minister a few moments ago to make the statement that the amendment apparently to be accepted by the House was sent across the floor of the House yesterday evening. If by that he meant that the amendment was sent to myself, his statement is not correct. The Prime Minister, I am sure, does not wish to be unfair. He may have been under the impression that it was delivered to me, but the first time I saw the amendment in its present form was to-night after the House rose at six o'clock.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I might say that I had the privilege of occupying the Chair at the time, and I remember distinctly that the amendment was sent across the floor of the House, but it was only sent as far as the front benches on the Opposition side, and read by some hon. member sitting there. I am quite sure it did not reach the hon. member for South Renfrew.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I merely rise to protest against the statement that has been repeatedly made during this debate that there is an embargo against Canadian cattle entering the ports of Great Britain. The embargo is not against Canadian cattle, but against cattle from all countries. The word "Canada" does not appear in it at all, and I am surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite and some hon. members on this side of the House have discussed the embargo as though it were an enactment of the British Government directed particularly against Canadian cattle. When it was first imposed that was the case. In November, 1902, the British Board of Agriculture had the right to prohibit the importation into Great Britain of cattle from any country providing disease was suspected to exist in the herds of that country. In 1904 the Acts of the British Parliament were consolidated, and what was then known as the Diseases of Animals Act came into effect. In 1896, on the 20th of July, the Act that is at present in force in Great Britain came into operation, and that Act applies to all countries. The exception that is to-day being taken might well have been justified with regard to British legislation from November, 1902, up to July 20th, 1906, but no exception can be taken to the action of the British Government in passing the Act of 1896 as directed solely against Canadian cattle, and I was surprised to find in the press again to-day a reference by one of the provincial Prime Ministers of this country to the matter. We have now three, if not four, of them on record protesting against the embargo on Canadian cattle which has been imposed by the British Government. In order to clear the minds of some of those who apparently are labouring under a misapprehension, I will read section 26 of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894. The Board of Agriculture were given certain authority under this Act. Section 26 reads:

> In relation to foreign animals other than those the landing whereof is for the time being prohibited by order of the Board of Agriculture—

This is the class we were in at that time. Canadian cattle were prohibited in November, 1902, from entry into the interior and were compelled to be slaughtered at the port of landing.

> —and other than those brought from the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man, if and so long as the Board are satisfied with respect to any country out of the United Kingdom or any specified part of such country that the laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals, and to the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease, and the general sanitary condition of animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of diseased animals, the Board, by order, shall allow animals or any specified kind of animals, brought from that country or such part to be landed without being subject to the provisions of the Third Schedule to this Act as to slaughter or quarantine, and may for that purpose alter or add to those provisions as the case may require.
> Provided that the admission of such animals sall be subject to such regulations as to the route by which the animals are conveyed to this country, quarantine or otherwise, as the Board of Agriculture may by order direct.

The Board of Agriculture were given a certain latitude to exercise their own judgment in matters of this kind. But as I have already pointed out, on the 20th of July, 1896, the British Government passed an Act, which reads:

> An Act to amend the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894 (20th July, 1896). Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same; as follows:
>
> 1. (1) For section twenty-four of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, shall be substituted the following section, namely;

Now, I would ask the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) to pay particular attention to this provision, which covers cattle such as were taken in from Holland for exhibition purposes.

The provisions set forth in part 1 (slaughter at port of landing) of the Third Schedule to this Act shall apply to all foreign animals other than—

(a) foreign animals the landing of which is for the time being prohibited by order of the Board of Agriculture; and

(b) foreign animals intended for exhibition or other exceptional purposes,—

The very class of cattle alluded to by the hon. member for South Renfrew.

—and the landing of which is allowed for the time being by the Board, subject to the provisions of Part 2 (quarantine) of the Third Schedule to this Act.

(2) Section twenty-six of the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, is hereby repealed.

Now, this is the law in Great Britain, and the name of Canada is nowhere to be found in it; is not even considered in the matter. The Act is one to protect the herds of Great Britain from the possibility of the introduction of disease, and it has been consistently maintained by the British Government from that day to the present; and the governments of this country, both present and past, have been continually taking this matter up, as they were justified in doing. I have no doubt that they did everything possible to induce the British Government to consider the matter favourably from our standpoint, and in fact I know that such has been the case. In view of this fact, therefore, I think it is very unfair and, indeed, undignified on the part of any individual or Provincial Government of this country to do anything or take any action that would have the effect of embarrassing the Government of Great Britain at the present time. From the character of the agitation that is now on foot, and the meetings that are being held, it is obvious what the object is. Do you believe that this agitation to have the embargo removed is due to any consideration for the welfare of this country? Is it due to an honest desire to free our cattle from a supposed stigma? If that were the case I think that different methods would be adopted and the matter would be properly urged upon the British authorities. But we had the spectacle of the Minister of Finance of Ontario addressing a meeting in Western Ontario less than two weeks ago, when he pointed out what was likely to happen, and said that if the embargo were lifted the full credit would go to the Hon. Manning Doherty. The Provincial Minister of Agriculture. He endeavours to forestall a possible event in the future and to appropriate to a member of the Ontario Government the full credit therefor. I think that the attitude of those hon. gentlemen who are even now anticipating the removal of the embargo and trying to claim in advance full credit for it shows exactly what their whole object is. Now, I do not desire to prolong this discussion. I expressed myself yesterday on the subject, and I rise on this occasion only to remove the impression, if it still remains in the minds of any hon. gentleman, that the British authorities have an embargo on the cattle of this country exclusively on account of disease in our herds. In 1902 an embargo was placed on Canadian cattle because of the belief that there was disease, but since 1896 an embargo has rested on all cattle from foreign countries, and it has been purely a protective policy on the part of the Government of Great Britain, not only to protect the livestock interests of that country but also to safeguard them from the introduction of disease into their herds from other countries.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): The hon. member who has taken his seat (Mr. Sutherland) seems to see a difference between the attitude of the British Government before and after 1896. I understand that the British Government at the present time does not say that Canadian cattle are diseased. They say in effect: Your means of quarantine, your quarantine organization at the border, is so far from perfect that a stray sick animal from the United States can get in, and that is the reason this law has to apply to you as well as to other parts of the world. I think it has been shown us in the very excellent speech of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) that our quarantine organization is of the best, when of three million animals slaughtered in the Old Country not one showed the diseases complained of. Now, I should like this matter to be treated not as a party question. The Government is doing right, as other governments have done in the past, in protesting against the implication that our cattle are diseased, and if we can hold up their hands in that regard as the united representatives of a united people, who do not want this slander to be perpetuated on any ground whatsoever, whether against our cattle or against our quarantine organization, then I say that we should make our action as non-partisan as possible and should speak with a united voice against this wrong. I am not going to speak at any length, but I have the honour to represent in this House one of the most purely agricultural counties in the whole Dominion of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: —a county which is renowned for its splendid cattle. There is no better butter made in the world than in the hills of the Eastern Townships.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: Let me repeat that statement. I am always moderate in all my statements, and this is not by any means extravagant. There is no better butter made than in my county. I shall make no comparisons to hurt any one's feelings and so I leave it at that. I think we should speak in a united manner on this question and support the hands of the Government, who are only following the good precedent established by previous governments in urging that this embargo upon cattle coming from this country, where no disease exists and where the quarantine organization is as good as it is, shall be removed.

Mr. EDMOND PROULX: (Prescott): My hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) objects to the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario taking part in the protest against the embargo. Well, I think that the Government should invite the various provincial governments to help them in their endeavour to have the embargo removed. Even if the embargo does not rest on Canadian cattle only, but on the cattle of all countries, the fact remains that our cattle are under that disadvantage. It has been said that the embargo is not directed against Canadian cattle in particular but is also enforced against cattle coming from other countries. Nevertheless, we have been asking the British Government for many years to remove it but without success. If we now obtain the co-operation of the various Provincial Governments in Canada we will stand a better chance of succeeding. The other day the Legislature of Quebec passed a resolution in favour of the removal of the embargo, and I think the Legislature of Alberta adopted a similar course. The Ontario Government is also taking an active part in the movement to have the embargo removed. The Minister of Agriculture for the Province of Ontario, a very active and very capable man, is at present interesting himself to that end. He may perhaps carry the agitation into Great Britain itself, but we know that all these obstacles to trade are only removed after a strong agitation; and I would have no objection to the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario conducting a little agitation along the desired lines if it is felt to be necessary. If the embargo is removed I have not the least objection to giving some of the credit to the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario, as well as to the Ministers of Agriculture for the other provinces. I think the Federal Government should invite the co-operation of the various Provincial Governments, and that a united demand should go from Canada insisting on the removal of this embargo. If that were done I think there would be a greater chance of the embargo being lifted and thus removing an injustice which has existed for so many years. The Prime Minister said it seemed to him, and I must admit the same idea has occurred to me, that the embargo is retained more as a safeguard against the introduction of disease. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) and my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow) have proved to our entire satisfaction that the disease complained of does not exist among Canadian herds. Under all the circumstances if the embargo is removed I will accord a certain amount of credit to the Federal Government, and I would be ready likewise to give credit to some of the Provincial Governments.

Sub-amendment agreed to, and motion as amended agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, as I have a motion on the Order Paper bearing on the question of the embargo on Canadian cattle and as the vote just taken meets with my views, I would ask permission to drop the motion standing in my name.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: When the resolution proposed by the hon. member is reached it will be dropped.

TREATY BETWEEN FRANCE AND CANADA

On the Order for the motion calling for a copy of the new Treaty of Commerce between France and Canada—Mr. Archambault.

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask that the motion stand, and that it continue to stand, should I not be here when it is called, until such time as the Government feel justified in bringing the Treaty down.

Mr. FIELDING: Does that mean that the Treaty is not completed?

Right Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: I inquired of the Minister of Trade and Commerce two or three days ago and I gathered from him that France, the other party to the Treaty, had not advanced far enough with the ratification of the Treaty to warrant us in bringing it down.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the order for the motion calling for:

A copy of all letters, reports exchanged between engineers and officers of the Canadian National Railways concerning the demolition of the round house at St. Foy, opposite the Quebec bridge, the removal from that place of a mechanical staff to a place called Charny on the other side of the St. Lawrence river; the proposed demolition of the station on the main line of the Transcontinental Railway at Quebec bridge.—Mr. Parent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I ask that this motion stand. It appears to call for correspondence between officers of the Canadian National Railways and some other people about some Canadian National railway business. The Government would not have that correspondence.

Mr. CAHILL: If the Government have not the information I presume they could obtain it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government could not get it any more than the hon. member could.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The resolution stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

For a copy of the Order in Council of July 9, 1920, appointing the Honourable Sir Thomas White as an arbitrator to value the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, any subsequent Orders in Council having reference to this matter, and for all correspondence between the Government and the Honourable Sir Thomas White respecting such appointment.—Mr. Mackenzie King.

STEAMSHIP SERVICE TO MAGDALEN ISLANDS, P.Q.

On the Order for the following proposed resolution—

That, in the opinion of this House, an up-to-date semi-weekly steamer's service should be established under Government control, between the various harbours of Magdalen Islands, P.Q., and the mainland.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Dropped. My reason for dropping this resolution is that since I gave notice of it, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has provided the Magdalen Islands with an excellent service.

On the Order "Notices of Motion:"

Mr. ROBB: Before you leave the Notices of Motion, Mr. Speaker, may I draw to your attention and to the attention of the House that they are not numbered the same in the English and French editions, which leads to confusion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I will call the attention of the proper officer to that fact and the necessary correction will be made in the Votes and Proceedings tomorrow.

CANADIAN NATIONALS DEFINITION ACT

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) for the second reading of Bill No. 17, to define Canadian nationals, adjourned from March 8.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand that this debate was adjourned by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster).

Mr. McMASTER: I merely adjourned the debate, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of getting over an impasse, and not with any intention of contributing to it until I had listened with the same attention as I always do to the extensive remarks—

Mr. BUREAU: The more extensive remarks.

Mr. McMASTER: —to the more extensive remarks of the right hon. Minister of Justice.

Bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: I beg to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this Bill is a reprint of the original Bill as proposed to be amended in Committee of the whole House. Mr. Doherty moves to amend clause one by striking out all the words after the word "persons" in the first line and substituting the following words:

—shall be deemed to be Canadian nationals, viz:—

(a) Any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act, Chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended.

(b) The wife of any such citizen.

(c) Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BUREAU: May I call the attention of the committee to the French version of the Bill? If I understood the explanation of the Minister of Justice, this "Canadian national" was originally baptized in French at the League of Nations, and then was translated into English. I see that the English version was first used before this House and then translated into French, and that translation does not correspond with the original term which was born at the League of Nations. Of course, this is a matter that cannot very well be left to the translators, as, if so, it generally brings confusion later on. In order that the English version which I have in my hand should correspond with the French version, I would first ask the Minister of Justice if he would not consider it advisable that section one instead of reading "The following persons shall be deemed to be," should read, "The following persons shall be Canadian nationals"? For, after all, we make them Canadian nationals, and we do not want to have anything equivocal about their status. Therefore in the latter form it would correspond with the French version, "Sont réputées ressortissantes du Canada les personnes suivantes, savoir."

Mr. DOHERTY: I would have no objection to accepting the modification. I may explain that instead of declaring that certain persons are British subjects, or that certain persons are Canadian nationals —which, I am prepared to admit, seems to be the more natural and more direct expression—it seems for a very long time past to have been the practice to say that certain persons "shall be deemed to be" etc. In the draft as it was originally before the House the words "the following persons are Canadian nationals" were used. I see no objection to accepting the definition, if the hon. gentleman thinks it is important. I believe the meaning is absolutely the same. But if we are going to modify it, I would rather say "the following persons are Canadian nationals," than "the following persons shall be Canadians nationals."

Mr. BUREAU: That is better.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg therefore to move that section one, as now before the committee, be amended by substituting the word "are" for the words "shall be deemed to be."

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Doherty moves to amend section one, as proposed to be amended, by striking out the words "shall be deemed to be" and replacing them by the word "are." Shall the sub-amendment carry?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think we might just as well deal with the French version at the same time.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move to amend subsection one in the French version by substituting the words "sont ressortissantes" for the words "sont réputées ressortissantes."

M. le PRESIDENT: M. Doherty propose que la première clause du Bill 17, version française, soit amendée en remplaçant les mots "sont réputées ressortissantes" par les mots "sont ressortissantes."

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to further amend that same section by striking out the words "les personnes suivantes, savoir:" so the section would read: "Sont ressortissants du Canada."

Mr. FIELDING: Is there such a thing now as a Canadian national? Is it right to say, "the following persons are Canadian nationals," or do we not by this Bill make them so? It is a very fine distinction; I merely call the hon. gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that both things are true. There does exist to-day such a thing as a Canadian national; if there does not, then all those who are proud of the fact that they are Canadians have been attaching to themselves a designation that means nothing. It is equally true that this Act, speaking the day it is passed, declares the fact to exist that certain persons are Canadian nationals. The moment this Bill is passed—whether by virtue of this law or by virtue of any anterior thing is immaterial—these people are Canadian nationals.

Mr. McMASTER: The present tense is used in the expectation that the Bill will pass. If the Bill does not pass, then anything provided in it is of no avail. I take it, therefore, looking at the matter from the purely legal aspect, that it is correct to use the present tense.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the hon. gentleman is quite right. The Bill speaks the moment it is passed; until that moment it says nothing.

Mr. MORPHY: If there is no such thing as a Canadian national, how can it be said, as set forth in subsection (c) of section 1, that any person born out of Canada "whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth," shall be a Canadian national?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that the verb "was" as used there has in mind the fact that we are speaking of a person who will be born in the future. The reference is to any person whose father "was" a Canadian national when that person was born.

Mr. MORPHY: But there is no such thing as a Canadian national.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman does not suppose there are going to be no children born in the future; that our Canadian nationals are all going to be barren?

Mr. McMASTER: Some of them are barons.

Mr. DOHERTY: But not barren. I am really puzzled to know how to make it any clearer. Perhaps my hon. friend will suggest a method.

Mr. CANNON: Prior to the introduction of this Bill was there any correspondence on the subject between the Canadian Government and the British Government?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that this Bill is a very important one in that it gives to Canadian citizens what might be called a separate status from that of a British subject. Has the Government in any way, shape or form conferred with the British authorities, formally or informally, with regard to this measure?

Mr. DOHERTY: No. The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension if he thinks that this Bill modifies to the extent of one iota the status of any of us as British subjects. It did not seem to the Government necessary to ask the permission of the British Government—which, I am sure, would not have had the slightest objection—how we ought to define a Canadian, still leaving that Canadian as a British subject just where he was before. I do not see how the hon. gentleman could regard that as necessary.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Will this Bill involve any change in the classification of the census returns?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know that there has been in the past any heading in the census returns specifying people as being or not being Canadian nationals.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): But do we specify Canadians now?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have not the census returns before me, but I am under the impression that people are classified according to the origin of their ancestors. I am not quite certain whether there is a column which classifies people as Canadians.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Then it is high time we had some definition of that kind. In our documents we do not recognize a man as a Canadian; he is distributed here and there and all over.

Mr. COPP: That is for election purposes.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Perhaps so; I have nothing to say on that. But our statutes, our documents and our official returns seem to go out of the way to avoid defining a Canadian. I had thought that this was the beginning of legislation in that direction.

Mr. DOHERTY: I hope it is.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I hope we shall soon have legislation of that kind so that it will be established here, in our documents and otherwise, as well as among all other nations, that there is such a thing as a Canadian. I do not ask for any amendment just now in that direction, but I hope that the Minister of Justice and the Government generally will do what they can to see that a Canadian is at least recognized on his own statute book; for he has not been so recognized in the past. When I say that I speak for the people of all the provinces. A recognition in our statutes, public documents, etc., of what a Canadian is, would be a further step towards the unification of the people of this country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I endorse the view of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). It is because I think it is a step in that direction that I heartily support the Bill. I was sorry I was not here when the second reading was moved.

Mr. MORPHY: The Minister spoke about trying to make clear subsection (c) of section 1, which provides that any person born out of Canada "whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth" shall be deemed to be a Canadian national. That language imports the idea that there was such a thing as a Canadian national prior to the passing of this Bill. I take it from the minister that there is no such thing until this Bill is passed, so that a boy or girl born ten years ago or five days ago could not say that his or her father was a Canadian national at the time of that child's birth, because there was no such thing then. If this is intended to apply after the Bill is passed and assented to, I see two things. The provision that "Any person born out of Canada whose father is a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth," will apply to the future; it does not cover the past. Therefore, the clause is worthy of a little consideration, when we are taking what I conceive to be a rather important step in defining Canadian nationality. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) and the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe), in their desire, which I apprehend is the desire of the whole House, so to define Canadian nationality that it will appear in everything Canadian from this time forward.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): I am not a lawyer, but I say that the original draft of the Bill was more to the point and to the argument we are now making, that is, if the words "shall be deemed to be" are in the Bill. I have seen in the Statutes, especially in past practice, a good many clauses where that term is constantly used. If we are creating a new thing and making a new departure here to-day, beginning to establish and recognize at this late hour a Canadian national, the most emphatic way of asserting it is to put in those very words: "shall be deemed to be." I will not press that for the moment on the Minister of Justice; but I think, when he consults his law officers and the practice heretofore in our statute books, he will find that the term "shall be deemed to be" as it was first read in this chamber this evening, is not only more explicit, but announces the beginning of a new condition of affairs, and we are now beginning to define what a Canadian national is. It will be another landmark in the creation of Canadian nationality.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not think the Minister of Justice has quite caught the point raised by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy). Let me state a case. Twenty years ago a British subject residing in Ontario moved his family across to the United States, and a year later a son was born to them. That son to-day is nineteen years of age. Does he become a Canadian national under this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Mr. FIELDING: The minister thinks he does.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am quite sure.

Mr. FIELDING: The clause reads:

> Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth.

That person was born nineteen years ago. The hon. member for North Perth says—and I agree with him there—that there was then no such thing as a Canadian national, and, therefore, that does not bring the son nineteen years of age to-day and residing in Buffalo, within this Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Does my hon. friend contend that the original drafting would convey the intention he wishes to see conveyed?

Mr. FIELDING: I rather thought the expression "shall be deemed to be" was a better one, but that was objected to, and apparently with good reasons. My objection goes to the root of the whole business. I think it is nonsense.

Mr. DOHERTY: I rose hoping to be in agreement with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), but unfortunately his last statement makes that impossible. I am disposed to think, as suggested by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Morphy), that the definition as it is in the Bill, is not wide enough to cover a person born before the passing of this measure, but I think we can find a form of words that will produce that result by letting the present clause stand as it is, but by adding to it in this way.

> (c) Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth, or with regard to a person born before the passing of this Act whose father at the time of such person's birth possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this Act.

I think that will make the matter clear.

Mr. EULER: I am not a lawyer like most of the gentlemen who have spoken on the Bill, and I realize that perhaps I am rather bold in attempting to point out what seems to me to be a lack of consistency between subsection (a) of section 1 on the one hand and subsections (b) and (c). Subsection (a) reads:

> The following persons shall be deemed to be Canadian nationals, viz:—(a) any British subject who is a Canadian citizen within the meaning of the Immigration Act, chapter 27 of the Statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended.

In looking up the Immigration Act, chapter 27, section 2, I find the last paragraph of subsection (f) reads:

Provided that for the purpose of this Act a woman who has not been landed in Canada shall not be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship by virtue of her husband being a Canadian citizen; neither shall a child, who has not been landed in Canada be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship through its father or mother being a Canadian citizen.

That seems to exclude certain women and certain men, and yet subsection (b) of the Bill states specifically that the wife of any such citizen shall be deemed to be a Canadian national, and subsection (c) reads:

Any person born out of Canada whose father was a Canadian national at the time of that person's birth.

There is an inconsistency there. If we interpret according to subsection (a) and the Immigration Act, certain women and certain men would not be included, and yet subsection (b) makes no exception whatever; it says simply "the wife of any such citizen." I do not know whether the point is well taken or not.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are here defining Canadian nationals. The Immigration Act was defining a Canadian citizen. The first subsection in this Bill makes everybody who is a Canadian citizen a Canadian national, and the two other subsections deal with people who are not necessarily Canadian citizens. With regard to the wife, it seemed to us proper that the wife of a Canadian national should be a Canadian national. In the Immigration Act there is a special and particular reason for not recognizing necessarily as a Canadian citizen the wife of a person who is a Canadian citizen, and the purpose of making a distinction there was to prevent a woman who never had been in Canada, and who perhaps might be subject to some objection from the immigration point of view, from coming into Canada merely because her husband had succeeded in meeting all the requirements and had become a Canadian citizen. The Immigration Act is dealing with immigration, and the term "Canadian citizen" has in that Act a meaning only with regard to immigration. We have, however, taken everybody who is a Canadian citizen under that Act and recognized him or her as a Canadian national, because that Act put upon the definition of a Canadian citizen every restriction that was thought necessary with regard to people coming into this country. If in the Immigration Act the wife of a Canadian citizen as such, without any other condition, had become a Canadian citizen we need not have said anything about her in this Act; but we are doing so because we do not see the necessity of maintaining with regard to a Canadian national the same distinction which from the immigration point of view it was thought desirable to make in the case of a person who never was in Canada.

With regard to the Canadian citizen suppose a man came into this country and acquired Canadian citizenship under the Immigration Act and then went out and married the most notorious prostitute, a woman of the worst of habits. It would not be thought desirable, would it, that because she had married that Canadian citizen, she should be entitled to come right into our country? She will not be entitled to come right into our country and therefore in this Act it does not seem necessary to make the same distinction with regard to a Canadian national. Though under this Act she may be entitled to call herself a Canadian national, under the Immigration Act she would not be entitled to come into Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: In view of the point raised by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, and the explanation given by the Minister of Justice, may I suggest to him that a good deal of confusion with regard to the interpretation of this section might be avoided if no part of that interpretation was dependent upon the language of some other statute? If, instead of this reference in subsection (a) to another Act, a definition were given in the subsection without reference to any other Act, there would be less danger of confusion, because the other Act upon which the interpretation of this subsection depends may be amended from time to time, and consequently the definition in this Act will be affected by such amendment.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member will notice that in referring to the definition we refer to "a Canadian citizen within the meaning of The Immigration Act, chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1910, as heretofore amended." We say, "as heretofore amended." We are fixing it now. It is not going to follow that because somebody amends the Immigration Act in the future, that that amendment will affect this Act.

With regard to the other part of it, what seemed to us was this: We get a definition in the Immigration Act as it stands that is satisfactory. What would be gained by copying that definition into this statute? I think that there is some value in connecting your legislation, but all that we were concerned with in this Act, once we had come to the conclusion that the definition of a Canadian citizen in the Immigration Act was satisfactory as far as it went, was to provide for people, if there were any, who we thought ought to be Canadian nationals, though they did not come within the definition of a Canadian citizen as contained in the Immigration Act, and those two classes are the people dealt with in (b) and (c). The Immigration Act, peculiarly enough, does not say anywhere that the wife of a Canadian citizen, even after she has come into Canada, and is accepted, is by the fact of her being the wife of a Canadian citizen, a Canadian citizen herself, but it does enact as though it thought that if she were landed in Canada the mere fact that her husband was a Canadian citizen would make her one. It does enact negativing her right to be a Canadian citizen merely because her husband is one, unless she has been landed in Canada. That, I think, is a very wise provision from the point of view of immigration. It protects us from the coming in of improper people merely because they happen to be the wives of perfectly proper people perhaps. It did not seem to us in dealing with the definition of a Canadian national generally, where there was no question of the country being practically affected, that it was necessary to get down to as fine a definition as that. We thought we might safely follow what is a general rule in all legislation I have seen with regard to nationality, namely, that the wife of the man has the nationality he has.

Mr. EULER: I quite understand that it is possible for a person to be a Canadian national, and yet not be a Canadian citizen, but it seemed to me there was some conflict in the various subsections.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is an intentional difference.

Mr. EULER: Is it fair to assume, then, that sub-sections (b) and (c) are inserted in order to over-ride the disqualification that would otherwise exist by virtue of subsection (a) of the Immigration Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: No. The Immigration Act stands absolutely untouched, and as regards immigration will continue absolutely to govern. Our reference to it is only for the purpose of bringing in as Canadian nationals everybody who is a Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act. It does not make anybody a Canadian citizen who under the Immigration Act is not a Canadian citizen. It does not remove any disability, as, for instance, in the case of the wife, the disability resulting from the fact that she has not been landed in Canada. The Immigration Act stands as the law, absolutely untouched. All that this Act is doing is defining what is a Canadian national.

Mr. VIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman read the definition in the Immigration Act?

Mr. McMASTER: Before the minister does so, I should like to say just a word. Would it not be well for the minister to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Russell (Mr Murphy)? We are going to be asked in this statute to make reference to another statute that may be changed from year to year. The minister has pointed out that this statute will not change from year to year, and he is quite right, but in order to find out what this statute says, we will have to turn in years to come, not to the Immigration Act that we are familiar with at that future date, but to the Immigration Act as it exists today. We will have to trace the changes in the Immigration Act up to this day, and then stop there. I wish the minister to realize that most of the questions that have come from this side of the House are in the tone of helpful and instructive criticism; I think I am speaking for a great number on this side of the House when I say that we are glad to see anything that points to a definite acceptance of our status of nationality; of course, in this vale of tears I never expect to reach the condition where everybody will agree with what I say, but I put it to the minister, as this Act may be consulted frequently from time to time, would it not be better to have that other Act put in full in this clause, in order that it may be a sort of handbook for us in the future?

Mr. DOHERTY: I will answer first the question of my hon. friend from Lotbiniere. Sub-section (f) of section 2 of the Immigration Act says:

(2) A British subject who has Canadian domicile; or,

(3) A person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile:

Provided that for the purpose of this Act a woman who has not been landed in Canada shall not be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship by virture of her husband being a Canadian citizen; neither shall a child who has not been landed in Canada be held to have acquired Canadian citizenship through its father or mother being a Canadian citizen.

That is the definition broadly. But there are definitions of Canadian domicile which of course have to be read into that definition, because we have to deal with a British subject who has Canadian domicile. Now, I did not repeat that definition because it would have involved in this Bill not only the reproduction of those few lines from the Immigration Act, but also the definitions in that Act, first, of domicile, and then of Canadian domicile and, I think, even of how Canadian domicile is lost, because Canadian citizenship goes with it; and under our definition Canadian nationalism would go with it if nationalism or citizenship does not depend on birth but merely on domicile. It would be possible to copy this into this Act.

Mr. VIEN: What is the difference between domicile, as defined by that Act, and Canadian domicile?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think that the definition in the Act is exactly the definition which, generally speaking, would by law define domicile. So far as I can see, the definition there was intended perhaps to avoid the difficulties with regard to intention which arise when you have at common law to determine the question of the change of domicile. I think the purpose of making this particular definition of domicile was to get rid of that question of determining that there was an intention to change domicile: As I think every lawyer knows, it is one of the most puzzling things when you are thrown on the common or everyday law for the purpose of determining change of domicile.

Mr. VIEN: How would they overcome the difficulty by the definition?

Mr. DOHERTY: Whether they succeeded I do not say, but domicile in the definitions means:

> The place in which a person has his home, or in which he resides, or to which he returns as his place of permanent abode, and does not mean the place where he resides for some special or temporary purpose.

I may be mistaken, but I think that if you did not have that section a man might have his home in Canada, which might be the place to which he returned, but he might never have given up his domicile of origin and might be still domiciled in France or England. I do not want to get into the niceties of the matter.

Mr. VIEN: I fail to see how the definition as given in the Immigration Act overcomes the question of intention, which has to be proven in every case. If he has not left his domicile in England his real domicile will of course be there, because he cannot have two.

Mr. DOHERTY: Under that definition, though his domicile, to all intents and purposes, may be in England he will, under our Immigration Act, have a Canadian domicile. I would rather not be led into what I am satisfied might be an interminable discussion of the intricacies of the question of how you determine at common law when a man has changed his domicile. I have had occasion to go into the question in a number of cases, and I think it was a wise provision in the statute here not to require, in order to enable a man to say that he had Canadian domicile that allowed him to come back into this country, that he should be able to establish positively, according to the ordinary law, that his domicile of origin had actually ceased to be his domicile and that his actual and real domicile was here. At all events, whatever may have been the wisdom of it, the definition is there.

Mr. VIEN: You are in effect reproducing it in this Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. The view as expressed in this Bill is that if it is a good enough domicile to entitle a man to come into this country and to go back and forth freely under the Immigration Act, it is good enough to entitle him, on the one hand, to be treated as a Canadian national and, on the other hand, to subject him to the obligations of a Canadian national. It must be borne in mind that while it looms large in our eyes as a very great privilege to be a Canadian national, that privilege carries with it certain duties, and we are interested not only in seeing that those entitled to this great privilege may be able to demonstrate it, but that it is made clear just who are subject to our legislation as applicable exclusively to Canadian nationals; and that will come to have a greater importance when, as I anticipate, we have had passed the amendment removing doubts as to the extraterritoriality of our legislation. The practical question is, what is the balance of convenience —because I do not understand that we differ as to the substance of the matter— to recopy into this Act all these definitions of domicile, etc., or to content ourselves with stereotyping them now as being for all time, at least until we amend the law, the test as to who is a Canadian national? Now, it is true that a man will have to go to the Immigration Act to-day to ascertain what domicile is. But might I point out that until our present Act which we are passing is modified he will have to go back to the Canadian Nationalization Act of to-day to find what a Canadian national is? I do not really appreciate as greatly as my hon. friends do the difficulty of having to refer from one statute to another, both being cotemporaneous. The Act appeared to me to be really more simple and clear by putting it into the shape in which it was, but if hon. gentlemen think it a matter of importance, I am willing to consider the suggestion that we might improve things by recopying this statute. It is very usual to legislate by reference to other existing statutes rather than to repeat the provisions referred to.

Mr. VIEN: I think that the reasons given by the right hon. gentleman should prompt us to ask that the question put by my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) be further considered and answered. The right hon. gentleman has told us that he wanted to avoid two things; first, a discussion as to the definition given in the Immigration Act of the word "domicile"; secondly, the repetition of that definition because it meant three definitions—the first that of "Canadian citizen," the second "domicile" and the third, "Canadian domicile." In the explanation which the minister has given I find a reason that should justify us in insisting upon a definition of the word "domicile." I have the definition as given by the minister, but I contend that if in the Immigration Act the word " domicile" may be so defined, it will not preclude a person from becoming a Canadian citizen, even if he has not left his domicile in England. I contend, Sir, that we should define what a Canadian national is and we should attach to the definition of "domicile" such restrictions as would permit nobody to be a Canadian national if he has kept his domicile in England or elsewhere. Suppose, for instance, that a gentleman comes from Holland. According to the definition of the word " domicile" in the Immigration Act he is not necessarily bound to prove that he has left his domicile in Holland. He could become a Canadian citizen without that, provided he complies with the wording of the Immigration Act which is, as the right hon. gentleman clearly stated and explained a minute ago, that he has a principal place of domicile where he returns to.

Mr. DOHERTY: May I point out to the hon. gentleman that if his theory is right we will inevitably get into a long discussion as to what technically may be a "domicile."

Mr. VIEN: It may be necessary.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is almost inevitable with regard to every man who wants to be a Canadian national, is that you may have the greatest difficulty in the world in establishing his domicile. More particularly will that be difficult in the case of his children. Surely the hon. gentleman would be satisfied—

Mr. VIEN: No, not after the explanation given by the hon. gentleman a minute ago.

Mr. DOHERTY: Because I told the hon. gentleman in substance that theoretically a man's domicile may be somewhere else he will not be satisfied though the man has practically done all the things which satisfied the requirements of the Immigration Act. The purpose of that definition is to get rid of the difficulty of proving a thing exceedingly difficult to prove. Now, will the hon. gentleman look for a moment at the other side of this picture. It will be acknowledged that in many and many an instance there will be an interest in claiming that the man is a Canadian national. Are we going to have people coming into this country, and domiciled under all the conditions prescribed under all the conditions prescribed in the Immigration Act, free to say to us: "Oh, I am not a Canadian national; I am not governed by those laws that apply to Canadian nationals." I sympathize with the hon. gentleman in the high value, the immense value, that he attaches to being a Canadian citizen—we are all proud of our Canadian nationality—but while I fully join with my hon. friend in that sentiment he must remember also that in many and many a case it will be the interest of this country to establish the fact that a man who is living in Canada—and getting all the advantages and benefits that he enjoys if he complies with the definition of a domicile—should be subjected to every law that applies to a Canadian national.

Mr. VIEN: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but the explanation given does not convince me at all. I think that we should not allow a person residing in Canada to claim to be a Canadian national if he has a domicile elsewhere. That the Immigration Act does not compel a person to prove his intent to abandon his domicile elsewhere before becoming a Canadian citizen is an unfortunate thing in my opinion. I am not responsible for what was done in 1910 or for the amendments made to that Act; but if I had been a member of the House at that time I would have objected to a definition which would allow a person to become a Canadian citizen without at first giving up the domicile that he had in any other country, be it France, Belgium, England or elsewhere. It is impossible to obtain national unity in this country, it is impossible to create that Canadianism which the right hon. gentleman claims to have fostered for the last few years, without exacting from every person who wishes to become a Canadian citizen the abandonment of any domicile he may have in any other country.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does the hon. gentleman know that in order to become a British subject and to be naturalized under the laws of this country there is absolutely no requirement to abandon domicile? All that is required to become a British subject is that you should reside in this country for five years. The question of domicile is not raised at all; there is no requirement of any kind of domicile. We have gone further in our definition of Canadian citizenship than is necessary to be naturalized as a British subject. The hon. gentleman would create for our Canadian nationalism, and the acquisition of it, conditions that no other country has dreamed of requiring. What I want to point out to the hon. gentleman again is that the cases involved will be few and far between—very, very few—where the man who has complied with the requirements of our Immigration Act has not really got his domicile in Canada. But the purpose of that definition is to avoid the necessity, once you get all these outstanding facts—which in nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand cases will mean that the man actually has his domicile here—establishing under the common law the change of intention as regards domicile. When I say "one in a thousand" it would probably be only in one case in ten thousand that the domicile of a man who had complied with all the requirements would not be in Canada. The purpse is to get rid of the difficulty of proving what is in a man's mind as to the seat of his principal establishment and to get rid of the rule under common law that a man always through his life has his domicile of origin unless you prove affirmatively not merely that he came away from there and lived elsewhere, but that he had the intention of changing his domicile.

Mr. VIEN: Does not the right hon. gentleman believe that it is a good thing?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have difficulty in thinking of anything that could be worse. There is nothing sacred about the common law domicile. If we get people to come here and make Canada their place of abode, whether they are British subjects to begin with or become naturalized as such, I cannot conceive that it would be a misfortune that they should be Canadian nationals during all that time because perhaps they have in the back of their heads the idea that some time they will go back to be buried, we will say, in the country they came from. At common law that is what you have got to negative. You have got to prove in some way what the man's intention was in addition to everything he did. Of course, what he did is valuable evidence of what he intended. If the hon. gentleman's suggestion were carried out, so far as it would modify this law it would make it unworkable and would not prevent any misunderstanding.

Mr. VIEN: We are trying to define Canadian nationals—ressortissants du Canada. I would object to any definition which would cover persons who do not live in Canada with the intention of making this country their home permanently—

Mr. DOHERTY: We require him to make it his home.

Mr. VIEN: There is no similarity between the case of a British subject and the case of a Canadian national. A British subject may be such whether he lived in Australia, in India, or in South Africa.

Mr. DOHERTY: Or whether he lived in France.

Mr. VIEN: It does not matter at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: Exactly, Why should it matter here?

Mr. VIEN: That is why I say there is no similarity between the principle of becoming a British subject, as mentioned by the right hon. gentleman, and what we purpose to do by this law; that is to say, to create Canadian nationals. I would not like to say that all British subjects will become Canadian nationals, because the minister must bear in mind that it gives some advantage for those persons who are about to be defined by the Act to be able to claim they are Canadian nationals, it also implies a responsibility. Therefore, I would not like the Act to define as Canadian nationals persons who do not intend to make Canada their principal place of permanent abode. In the second place, Sir, I beg strongly to support the motion of my hon. friend from Brome. No matter what the definition may be, it will be much clearer and much handier for reference purposes that these three definitions be given here. For that reason I would ask that the expressions "Canadian citizen," "domicile" and "Canadian domicile" be repeated in this Bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. CAHILL: Is a British subject under all conditions permitted to come into Canada under the Immigration Act; and, if so what is a British subject under the Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are certain classes of British subjects who may be excluded from Canada. That is precisely the advantage of being a Canadian citizen. All British subjects are not entitled de pleno simply because they are British subjects to come into Canada; they are likely to be excluded if they come under any of the excluding sections of the Canadian Act. When the hon. gentleman asks me what is a British subject, I would inform him that he would find enumerated in the British National Act the kinds of people who are British subjects. For instance, everybody born within the realm is a British subject; everybody born outside the realm but of a father who is a British subject is a British subject; and everybody naturalized under the laws of the United Kingdom or under the laws of Canada becomes by such naturalization a British subject. A British subject is a man who owes allegiance to, and who is entitled to protection as a subject of the British Crown. Our Canadian national will be that kind of British subject who is in a special manner subject to and owes obedience to Canadian laws as administered through Parliament and the Government and ultimately His Majesty, he being King of these Dominions just as he is King of Great Britain and the entire Empire.

As regards the suggestion that I should insert this definition in the Bill, I cannot attach to it the importance that the hon. gentleman does. However, I would be willing to consider referring to this definition as fully developed in the schedule and printed in those sections in the schedule. I am sorry that I cannot follow the reasoning of the hon. gentleman with regard to the question of domicile although I recognize the strength of his conviction on the subject. As to the mere form, I do think it would make a very awkward Act if you deemed it necessary to take definitions out of another Act to which you refer and recopy them into an Act intended only to give a definition and I confess I do not see the advantage of it. It would be almost as reasonable to say that when you amend an article of the Civil Code of Quebec you must begin by going back and reproducing the code; that every time there is any connection between any two laws you must reproduce both of them in the same statute. I confess that I cannot see the importance of taking such a course. We have at all times to refer from one statute to another and, as I pointed out a little while ago, supposing it is tweny-five years hence, this Act will have been amended by that time or it will not have been. If it has not been, you will have to go right back to this date to find the definition. But if you did, what would the hardship be?

Mr. VIEN: The hardship would be this: you will have to cover a period of ten years to find out what amendments have been made.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, is it such an appalling thing to have to look at statutes going back a period of ten years? Surely in my hon. friend's own experience the cases are few in which he does not have to look at more than one statute. The Immigration Act as it stands to-day is printed in one book, and it would be very easy to look up.

Mr. CANNON: At the opening of the discussion the right hon. gentleman explained that this Bill is a consequence of our being a separate and distinct member of the League of Nations. The British Empire is also a member of the League of Nations; will the British Empire have British Empire nationals, while at the same time, Australia, Canada, India, and South Africa have nationals of their own? If so, what will be the legal difference between a British Empire national and a Canadian national?

Mr. DOHERTY: The description of the British Empire as a distinct member of the League has always been interpreted as meaning the United Kingdom with the Crown colonies and dependencies.

Mr. CANNON: Excluding the dominions?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. I may say that there has been serious criticism of the adoption of that form. It was urged at the time that the United Kingdom with the Crown colonies and dependencies should have been one member, and we should have been the others, all together going to make up the British Empire. We were not able to get it put that way, in words.

Mr. VIEN: Why?

Mr. DOHERTY: Really I cannot tell you why; no reason was given that I could possibly grasp. I do not know how far it is proper that I should publicly discuss things that took place in discussion in a small committee; perhaps it is not proper that I should go into the details. But while we could not get our view recognized in words, we have it recognized in practice. The British Empire is spoken of as one member of the League, but in the practical operation it is the United Kingdom that is that particular member, and we of the dominions had our membership and our representation and our say on a footing of equality with the gentlemen who represented the United Kingdom. I think that when the proper opporutnity comes we should urge that that misnomer be corrected, and when we do so we shall probably be able to make the reasonableness of our contention apparent. Perhaps it will be permissible for me to say that in officialdom, which counts for a great deal on the other side, you find an aversion to calling things by their right names. They have a love for hanging on to an old name, even when the thing itself has ceased to exist. Possibly after a thing has been gone for years, even for centuries, the name will still be there.

Mr. VIEN: Has it not occurred in Canada also?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: Particularly in the naming of political parties.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. I have always been struck with the extent to which the name "Liberal" is a misnomer, as applied to so many hon. gentlemen who sit opposite. Certainly my hon. friend has hit upon an apt illustration.

Mr. VIEN: And the word "Tory."

Mr. DOHERTY: And how utterly inapplicable the word "Tory" is to some people over here.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): When I was in Paris about ten years ago I sought to have myself registered as a Canadian in one of the Departments of the French Government. That designation was refused and I was inscribed simply as a British subject. That, of course, was quite satisfactory to me, but I would like to know whether as a result of this legislation a man may in future claim to be inscribed on any public document as a Canadian?

Mr. DOHERTY: I certainly think he would be entitled to; indeed, I thought he was in the past. On any occasion when I have been travelling and have been asked what my nationality was, I have said: "Canadian"—and it went right down. At the League of Nations we from Canada were never known as anything else—and we were not anything else—than the Canadian representatives, and we sat at the table in the position officially designated "Canadian Delegation." As I had occasion to say the other day, time develops many things. Perhaps it is some years since my hon. friend was in Paris.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I was there in 1910.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, that is ten years ago—and we are getting along.

Mr. VIEN: Is it the purpose of the Bill to establish clearly who is a Canadian national as distinguished from nationals of France or of other countries?

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, we can only make laws that are laws in Canada. When the country defines what its nationals or its subjects or its citizens are, it does not make a law that binds an outside country. But it puts before the world its contention; in the first place, it makes them such in its own country, where its law has force, and then it puts before the world who it is that it claims as its subjects. It can do nothing more.

Mr. VIEN: And a subject may be claimed by two countries?

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly, just to-day we have innumerable cases of dual nationality. In the recent war there were many instances of young men who had been born in Canada of French fathers. Those young men were Canadians, British subjects, undoubtedly, but in France they were French citizens, and we saw many of them go back to join the colours in France, recognizing their position as French citizens. It is one of the things that is inseparable from nationality that, as each country makes its own laws, you always have the possibility of dual nationalities; I do not think you can get rid of them until you have some system of treaties or conventions.

Mr. CANNON: What will be the exact new privileges or rights conferred on Canadian nationals, in accordance with this law?

Mr. DOHERTY: This law confers no rights whatever upon Canadian nationals. It defines what a Canadian national is.

Mr. CANNON: What is the object of the law?

Mr. DOHERTY: If there never had been a League of Nations, and if, therefore, we never had any rights to exercise there, I would have thought the Canadian Parliament, in view, amongst other things, of what the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) said a little while ago and in view of what the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has said, would have welcomed a Bill defining this.

Mr. CANNON: We all do.

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, the hon. gentleman asks me what rights this Bill is going to confer. This Bill is not going to give anybody any rights. This Bill makes a definition. Let me give one instance, and it is only one. The nationals of every country that is a member of the League have, to begin with, a right to representation in the Assembly. We want to exercise those rights. We have a right to nominate Canadian nationals as aspirants for appointment to the permanent Court of Internationl Justice and, if we get a majority, to elect them. If we have litigation with any other country brought before that permanent Court, and there happens to be sitting upon that permanent Court a national for our adversary, then we have a right to say: "We want a national of ours to sit there too to balance the thing up," because they do not proceed by recusing the judge who is a national of one of the parties; their method of evening the matter up is to say to the other party: "You may have a judge of your nationality." All these things turn upon our nationality. Supposing some one says to us: "Is this gentleman a Canadian national?" What is a Canadian national? What is a British subject? This is what the Parliament of Canada is defining to be a Canadian national. If, after the passing of this legislation, I declare that I am a Canadian national, and anybody disputes that, I will turn to the Statute and say: "I fulfil all those conditions." For years back, why do you find in the laws of Great Britain, or in France, or of any other civilized country, the definition of their citizen or subject or national? Surely we have the same interest as all other countries have to form a clear-cut idea of who it is that is entitled, not only to rights in the outside world, but to claim for himself the honourable and distinctive title of Canadian national. We want to define that.

Mr. VIEN: I understand the minister is going to introduce a schedule containing a definition.

Mr. DOHERTY: I said that I was going to consider that. I must say that I have not been able to consider it very much since, but the more I consider it, the less it impresses me as a necessary thing. I shall, however, be glad to consider whether it would be desirable to do that or not.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose the principle of this Bill is conceded by its receiving its second reading. It is fortunate for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) that he is a member of a Tory Government when introducing and advocating and carrying through Parliament legislation of this kind. I can recall very well conditions in this House when, if a Minister of Justice in a Liberal administration would introduce anything that would look like severance from the mother country and cutting away the sacred ties between ourselves and the mother land, woe betide us because we would hear from the stalwart gentleman from Ontario whom I see looking at me from the other side.

Mr. DOHERTY: This does not.

Mr. McKENZIE: But it seems to be all right for this Minister of Justice to be a Nationalist. A Nationalist in this country has a significant meaning, and our Tory friend do not like to be told that they are in league with the Nationalists; that they are in league with a Nationalist who used to make openings in the British flag.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are Nationalists and Nationalists.

Mr. McKENZIE: Now it is all right to put us all in the same class and say that we are all Nationalists. The Bourassa sect and everybody that followed him are all right now. We have found that we have come to them, and we are all Nationalists. I do not think the good loyal people of Ontario will like the idea that we have forsaken Canadian citizenship with all that that term meant, and that we are now Nationalists, if we take our definition of a Nationalist from what Mr. Bourassa and those behind him were preaching. In 1867, only four provinces of Canada entered Confederation; they each had their status before Confederation; but when they became Canada, they got that status from an Imperial Act of Parliament, and in that Imperial Act they are called the "Dominion of Canada." By what right does this Parliament change the name from the "Dominion of Canada" to the "Nation of Canada"? We have no right, instead of calling ourselves the "Dominion of Canada" to call ourselves the "Nation of Canada." That means a change in the British North America Act, and after this Act passes, wherever the name "Dominion of Canada" occurs in the British North America Act, we shall have to substitute for it the "Nation of Canada" or the "Kingdom of Canada." There is no "Nation of Canada," and no person can say for one moment that there is. Before you can have a Nationalist, you must have a nation. As far as I am concerned, to be a Canadian citizen and a British subject is good enough for me, and I do not find it necessary, even with all its beauty and wealth of language and fine definition, to go to France for any definition of what I am. I am a Canadian.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are trying to give you a home-made definition.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am a Canadian and a British subject and particularly proud of being a subject of the British Empire and under the folds of the British flag. For that reason, I submit to the minister that I do not think we have any right to use the word "national," nor have we any business to declare ourselves a nation except by some convention with the Mother Country. If it is agreed to by convention that all the Dominions shall be called nations, and so forth, I shall have no fault to find; but it is going too far for this Parliament to declare that we are no longer a Dominion of Canada, but a nation with all the responsibilities that that word implies. We must be either one thing or the other. If we are a nation,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: —we have a right to declare war. Will my hon. friends who are saying, "hear, hear" say that we have a right to declare war, or to pass in this House legislation that would be a cause of war between Great Britain and any other country? They will have to say that we could not. But if people are satisfied with the empty shell and are content to think they are a nation when they are not, I suppose we should not deprive them of the privilege of playing with the idea; but there is no such thing. It is always unwise to live under false pretences, and I see no advantage whatever in trying prematurely to get away from our present status to be a nation when we are really not. I think the whole of this legislation is a useless bungle of words.

Mr. PARENT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I want to point out to the committee before the hon. member speaks that a discussion on the principle of the Bill is certainly not now in order. The Bill was held over at the request of the Opposition owing to the fact that it was not printed, and in order that the principle might be discussed upon the second reading. It is certainly not in order for hon. members to discuss the principle of the Bill at this stage.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the Chairman has any reference to me he is sending coals to Newcastle. I was in this House many years before the hon. gentleman, and I know the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman will then possibly remember that among the rules of the House is one that the ruling of the Chair cannot be questioned, and that it can only be appealed from. I hope that the other hon. members of the committee will adhere to the ruling.

Mr. PARENT: It was not my intention to make a speech at all. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) to a state of affairs which I have noticed while travelling from New York to Montreal. I was just wondering whether it would not be possible to have the form of questions submitted to immigrants and Canadian passengers coming into this country printed in both the French and English languages. That will be a good job for the Printing Bureau if the hon. gentleman wants to see that both languages in this country receive equal consideration.

Mr. CALDER: That involves a question that is scarcely pertinent to the provisions of this Bill. There is something in the suggestion made by the hon. member but at the same time we must remember there are a great many people in Canada other than the French-speaking people. The number of people entering Canada from France during the last 10 or 15 years has been comparatively small compared with the numbers arriving from other countries, and if it is desirable to have these forms printed in some language other than English, it certainly would be desirable to have them printed in these other languages as well. I am aware, of course, of the argument for having public documents printed in the two official languages, but that is not applied all along the line.

Mr. McMASTER: I think I ought to point out very respectfully to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization that the French language is on a very different footing in this country from the other languages to which he alludes. The first part of my hon. friend's remarks would almost lead an impartial observer to the conclusion that he had forgotten that fact. I am sure that he cannot have done so, but if by any possibility he has, I take in all kindness this opportunity of reminding him of it. As far as official documents are concerned, the hon. member (Mr. Parent) is only asking what I would imagine the constitution of the country accorded him.

Mr. VIEN: There is something more to be said in that direction in answer to my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and Colonization. The question put by my hon. frend (Mr. Parent) was in reference to Canadian nationals who travel—they are not necessarily immigrants—and who when coming into Canada after a journey to the United States are obliged to answer a questionnaire. A great number of those who travel from New York, Boston, and other American cities to Canada would not understand the questions if they were put to them in English. Very often these people are Canadian nationals coming back to their country. May I ask when we shall know the decision of the right hon. the Minister of Justice as to the schedule?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have promised to consider it. I would like to have the Bill go through, and if I should come to the conclusion that it was desirable to add the schedule, I would have the Bill sent back into committee. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he would be kind enough to think it over too, because I know of only one reason for accepting his suggestion, and that is his strong feeling on the subject; I have a great respect for that. Perhaps we might make an honourable compromise in that way. If the Bill goes through committee, I would seriously consider the suggestion, and perhaps he will do so too; perhaps we shall both come to the conclusion that the schedule is not necessary, or perhaps we shall both come to the conclusion that it is.

Mr. PARENT: May I ask the right hon. the Minister of Justice if in his capacity as minister he would recommend to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization that the forms submitted to Canadian nationals travelling from other countries to Canada be printed in both the French and English languages?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think they ought to have the questions put to them in one or the other of the official languages which they understand, which, of course, in my own case and the case of many hon. gentlemen on the other side will involve the necessity of printing them in both languages, as we happen to have the good fortune to understand both. I think that was the sense in which the Minister of Immigration and Colonization spoke. I do not suppose the suggestion is that when you are face to face with a Russian who does not speak either French or English, you should put the questions to him in both French and English before you go out to get a Russian interpreter and try and put the questions in some language he does understand. My hon. friends, I think, know without my saying it that I have every sympathy for their feeling with regard to their language. For myself I never see any ground to make comparisons between the French language and any other language than the English in this country. I never see the possibility of putting the French language on a par with any foreign language in this country. To that extent I go, but I think all will agree that there can be no object in dumping before a Russian who understands neither French nor English a list of questions in French any more than there would be in putting them in English.

Mr. PARENT: If such a man comes here he knows the situation?

Mr. DOHERTY: Do not let the hon. gentleman suppose I am putting the French and Russian languages on a par, but the French and English. When you get people who understand neither, I would think there was not much object in talking to them in either.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Doherty moves to amend clause 1 as printed in the Bill by substituting the word "are" for the words "shall be deemed to be," and adding the following words, "or with regard to any person born before the passing of this Act whose father at the time of such birth possessed all the qualifications of a Canadian national as defined in this Act."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I move to add to the Bill as Clause 2 the following:

2. (a) Any person who by reason of his having been born in Canada is a Canadian national, but who at his birth or during his minority became under the law of the United Kingdom or of any of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire, a national also of that Kingdom or Dominion, and is still such a national, and,

(b) any person who though born out of Canada is a Canadian national; may, if of full age and not under disability, make a declaration renouncing his Canadian nationality and on making such declaration shall cease to be a Canadian national.

Mr. FIELDING: Where has this declaration to be made? The Act is silent on that point.

Mr. DOHERTY: It may perhaps be desirable to specify the place. If I fall into error in that regard it is simply in following the identical analagous provision contained in the British Nationality Act and also the Act of this country. No particular formality was required for the declaration of alienage as between the nationals of different parts of the Empire. The principle laid down in the British Act with regard to a British subject who, under the circumstances mentioned there, renounces his British citizenship, was followed, and I think the section, with the words mutatis mutandis, was copied directly from that Act.

Mr. FIELDING: What do you understand it to mean as it stands now? The declaration is to be made under what circumstances, at what point, in what form, and before whom?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I say, the Act does not subject that declaration to formality. It might be well that it should. If we did that, however, we should be making a new departure. A declaration without prescribed formalities has been deemed sufficient under the existing legislation.

Mr. VIEN: It may be a verbal declaration.

Mr. DOHERTY: I realize there is a value in the suggestion that there should be a definite form, and I shall be prepared to ascertain what is the proper form in which the declaration should be put.

Mr. CANNON: Last year in the course of the discussion of the Electoral Act, my hon. friend from Waterloo (Mr. Euler) raised certain questions as to amendments which he desired to have introduced into the law, and at that time it was declared by the Government that certain arrangements had been come to between the Imperial authorities and the overseas Dominions as to having a uniform law of nationality or citizenship.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not citizenship.

Mr. CANNON: I meant to say naturalization. The right hon. gentleman who was Prime Minister at the time (Sir Robert Borden), said if I remember rightly, that no amendment could be introduced or assented to unless the Imperial authorities were consulted. We had that official declaration in the House last year. Does this new legislation interfere in any way with the arrangements made at that time and still existing between the Imperial authorities and the Canadian Government?

Mr. DOHERTY: This legislation does not touch the question of naturalization at all. It leaves it absolutely where it was before any one talked about this Bill, or where it would be if this Bill were never passed. As to the arrangements which the hon. gentleman speaks about, it might be well to have the circumstances in regard thereto stated clearly. There is no more arrangement that we must do as the Imperial Parliament wants on the subject of naturalization, than there is that the Imperial Parliament must do what we want. The arrangement that was come to was that, because there was something that this Parliament could give which no one else could give, and because there was something else that the British Parliament could give which neither we nor any one else could give, we would make this agreement, that so long as our laws were identical, our naturalizations, which of their own force did not apply in the United Kingdom, would by reason of this arrangement be effective there, and vice versa, so long as our laws were identical we would recognize the home naturalization laws as effective in this country. To that extent there is an understanding. It is as desirable that our naturalization should be effective throughout the Empire as it is that the naturalization of the United Kingdom should be effective here; and because constitutionally the Parliament of the United Kingdom could not naturalize a man in Canada we agreed that it was necessary to have this arrangement, just as because we could not naturalize a man in the United Kingdom it became necessary to secure a similar undertaking on their part. The agreement was one on a footing of perfect equality.

Mr. CANNON: Is it possible for a man to be a Canadian national in Canada, that is, a Canadian citizen, and not be a British subject in any other part of the British Empire?

Mr. DOHERTY: A man to be a Canadian national must be a British subject.

Mr. CANNON: In Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: Can he be a Canadian national and a British subject in Canada and not be a British subject in another part of the British Empire?

Mr. DOHERTY: If he has the good fortune to be naturalized under Canadian law he is a naturalized British subject in Canada and will be a naturalized British subject in the United Kingdom. He may not be one in Australia or in New Zealand, because they have not as yet passed the necessary legislation, and that is unfortunate. But I see no inconsistency in a man's being a Canadian national though he is not a British subject in Australia.

Mr. CANNON: What would be the case of a man who was born in the United States, naturalized a British subject under Canadian law, and now lives in England? Is he a Canadian national?

Mr. DOHERTY: If a man was born in the United States and now lives in England, having been naturalized in Canada—if these are all the facts and you have nothing else to suggest—he would not be a Canadian national because he was not born in Canada. When he was naturalized in Canada he was made a British subject, but in addition to being a British subject, if not born in Canada, he must have acquired a Canadian domicile.

Mr. POWER: There is, I presume, a law defining a United Kingdom national?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not that I know of.

Mr. POWER: The Bill refers to a national "of that kingdom." I presume that refers to the United Kingdom. So there is such a thing as a United Kingdom national.

Mr. DOHERTY: I know of no Act defining one. There are lots of things that are law though they are not in Acts, and if there be no Act or law now there may be one in the future. But I think there would be a little difficulty in ascertaining who were "ressortissants" of the United Kingdom.

Mr. POWER: Am I to understand that Canada is the first of the self-governing colonies to have nationals of its own?

Mr. McMASTER: So much the better.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think they all have but we are the first, so far as I know, to make the definition.

Mr. McMASTER: Why should we not be.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that is our proper place, first in the line and first all the time.

Mr. POWER: What would be the position of a gentleman in West Africa who lives under a mandatory power? What kind of a national would he be?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think it would take a very wise man indeed—wiser than I can pretend to be—to define the position of the inhabitants of countries who are under mandatories. I have not had the advantage of seeing the terms of the mandates, I do not know that they are settled, and I am afraid I will have to say that I cannot answer the question; I do not know anybody that could just now.

Mr. VIEN: The Minister has spoken of an agreement which was come to, probably at the Imperial Conference in England, as to the identity of our laws on naturalization. What was the nature of that agreement? Was it written and where can it be found?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman will find it in the Canadian Statute dealing with naturalization. He will likewise find it in the statute of the United Kingdom dealing with the same subject.

Mr. VIEN: That is an enactment; my question had reference to the agreement.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps "agreement" is not a proper word. I might say this to the hon. gentleman: The agreement, so far as we can talk about an agreement, was reached at the Imperial Conference at which Sir Wilfrid Laurier represented Canada.

Mr. VIEN: What year please?

Mr. DOHERTY: In 1911. Now what was agreed there was that it was desirable that we should have a common naturalization, and that the way to do that was to pass similar laws of naturalization in both countries. Then we passed similar laws, and out of that there arose the necessity of our keeping our laws similar. It was not peculiar to our Parliament that it was said: We cannot very well deal with the question because we have no understanding that the United Kingdom will deal with it and we want to keep our laws similar. If the hon. gentleman will look at the debate on the Naturalization Act in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom he will find numerous suggestions with respect to which the Minister in charge of the Bill said: "I think that is a good suggestion but you see we have not consulted with the Dominions and we want to avoid getting our laws different." It was not a question of the United Kingdom telling us what we must do any more than a question of our telling them what they must do. It was a question of two peoples who wanted to keep their action in line to attain a common purpose. Therefore, on their side they tried to communicate with us before final action and we tried to communicate with them. But the origin of the understanding that was come to that a general naturalization was desirable and that the way to do it was by uniform legislation is to be found—although it had been talked about earlier—in the Imperial Conference of 1911. The hon. gentleman will see there what in substance is the understanding that was come to which was carried out by the British Act of 1914 and the Canadian Act of 1914.

Mr. VIEN: I understand then that it was an agreement reached by all those self-governing Dominions that took part in the Conference in 1911?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: I understand further that Canada and the United Kingdom are the only two parties that have acted in conformity to that agreement?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, that is my latest understanding.

Mr. VIEN: Has any information been received by the Government as to the reasons why, after the period of ten years which has elapsed since 1911, the other self-governing Dominions did not act in accordance with the agreement that was reached at the Conference?

Mr. DOHERTY: No. I cannot possibly tell the hon. gentleman. I may tell him this: By way of carrying out the understanding or agreement, and when I say "agreement," I do not want to be misunderstood—

Mr. VIEN: It was a resolution of the Conference.

Mr. DOHERTY: Everybody came to an agreement that if it was a desirable thing to have a naturalization that would go all over the Empire the best way to do it was by uniform legislation. I do not say that anyone sat down and said "I will do it," but that was what was agreed to be the best thing to do. Carrying that out the British authorities drafted an Act which they claimed carried out the understanding, or which purported to do so. That Act was circulated throughout the Dominions and they were all asked if it was acceptable to them. All of them except Canada said that it was acceptable. Now I do not want to indulge in anything in the nature of criticism at all, but the draft had come to this country shortly before the change of Government. I do not think it had been considered by the Government that preceded the Borden administration. When we came into office we found it there and we said: "No, that never was the understanding of the agreement and we will not submit to it." That was an Act which purported to make the United Kingdom Naturalization Act effective in Canada, so that by virtue of their legislation people would find themselves entitled to have their naturalization recognized in Canada. We took the position that we would not submit to that; that whoever was to be recognized in Canada as properly naturalized must be so under the enactment of the Canadian Parliament. It took us two years and a trip to England to get that acknowledged. Finally, it was acknowledged and now our legislation stands. The position we took was the validity of a naturalization in Canada must be accepted because it complies with all the provisions of the law of the Parliament of Canada, and not as resting on any other law. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Naturalization Act he will see that was carried out.

Mr. EULER: It certainly was my impression that when two years ago the question of the naturalization of certain aliens, introduced by myself, was before the House the then Prime Minister and the Acting Solicitor General (now Minister of Militia) stated that the Canadian Parliament was not competent to grant naturalization acording to its own wishes because it conflicted with the wishes of the British Parliament or with the terms of the British Act. I am very strongly of the impresion that was so stated in the House of Commons by the then Prime Minister and also by the then Solicitor General. We remained under that impression in the session of 1919 and it was accentuated during the session of 1920. It was only at the last moment, when the Act was changed, that the admission was made that there never was ground for stating in this Parliament that the British Government was trying to dictate to us in any shape or form, that we always had that power. We were delayed for two years because members of the ministry, including the then Prime Minister, were under a wrong impression as to the law.

Mr. DOHERTY: I suppose it will be conceded that this discussion is not very relevant to the Bill we are now discussing.

Mr. EULER: But I would like a statement from the minister.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall be very pleased if I can to remove the misapprehension which is in the mind of the hon. member. I am quite sure that there is a misapprehension there but I am not certain that I can succeed in removing it. What was stated by the Prime Minister of the time of which the hon. gentleman speaks, and also by the Solicitor General, was just what I pointed out a little while ago—that in order to maintain the Empire-wide quality of our naturalization the Parliament of the United Kingdom must see to it that its law was the same as ours, and we on our side must see to it that our law was the same as theirs. It was not for lack of authority, but it was because the Imperial Parliament had passed certain provisions and there was a mistaken impression that those provisions had been embodied by the draftsman in that portion of the Act which it was necessary should be identical with the British Act. It was in that the mistake consisted. The clauses referred to were not included in that portion of the Act which was required to be identical. I may say that as it happened—and I am not saying this to glorify myself—when I took up the statute and read it two things became apparent to me. That there had been a mistake; but from the form in which the statute was drafted in was not at all to be wondered that the draftsman had fallen into confusion. Let me tender my congratulations to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I know it makes him so happy, and I would hate to detract from his happiness. I admit that we made a mistake. Oh, joy, that there was once a Government composed of members of this party that made a mistake! I hope that through the years to come the hon. gentleman will be able to hug that delightful thought to his bosom, and I feel some happiness in so far as I have contributed to the mistake which has brought that very great happiness to the hon. gentleman. Now I would like to get back to our Bill if I might.

Mr. EULER: Just one moment. The minister perhaps takes almost as much pleasure out of the last part of his oration as he hoped I was taking.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is impossible.

Mr. EULER: My object in making the statement I did a few moments ago was possibly because of misapprehension of what the minister had said. I understand him to say that this Government could not have enacted naturalization legislation without reference to the British law, and that it took this Government two years to induce the British Government to change its attitude. If that is not what he said I misunderstood him.

Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly you did.

Mr. EULER: I know that the mistake, which never should have occurred and which gives him so much pleasure to dwell upon, was not the fault of the minister himself but some one else's entirely.

Mr. DOHERTY: From what the hon. gentleman says I must have conveyed an entirely erroneous impression. We must be fair to everybody. The mistake was exactly the mistake I referred to in taking the Act up here. As the hon. gentleman will have occasion sometimes to refer to that Act he will find that it is divided into two parts.

Mr. EULER: I know all about that.

Mr. DOHERTY: Part two of the Act is essentially the part to keep identical. When the British Parliament came to amend the Act they made certain amendments to part two by inserting certain words in the section here and there, and I think in some places they substituted sections; then they enacted three additional sections, making new substantive dispositions, and finally they put a clause at the end to say—I do not recall it at the present moment, but it was one that would convey to one the impression at first glance that all of these preceding amendments were amendments to part two; but when you looked at them closely you could see that that was not correct, and that the last two or three dispositions were perfectly distinct and not intended to amend part two. To be perfectly fair to the British Government, they never pretended that those articles did amend part two; the mistake was on this side entirely. In fact, it is apparent very early in the correspondence that not only had the British Government not fallen into error, but that when they found the discussion that was going on here they took occasion to cable calling our attention to the fact that we were making a mistake. So the hon. gentleman must not have any idea that it was any attempt at imposition of authority on the part of the British Government. We make mistakes sometimes. I made one the other day and was admonished by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and it is always a delight to him when he is able to talk of our blunders.

Mr. McKENZIE: He would be talking all the time.

Mr. VIEN: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that when the Government undertake to enact naturalization laws they confer with the British Government so as to obtain some similarity between their laws and ours. Is that conference taking place also with the other self-governing dominions so as to try and obtain that similarity with their laws?

Mr. DOHERTY: The practice has been to transfer suggestions to the other dominions. For instance, if the British Government made suggestions to us they would make them to the other self-governing dominions too, and if we transmitted suggestions to the British Government that Government would submit them to the Parliaments of the other self-governing dominions. Why the other self-governing dominions have not acted I have no reason of knowing.

Mr. VIEN: As to that—

An hon. MEMBER: Let us get to bed.

Mr. VIEN: Everybody who wants to go to bed is free to go.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VIEN: Was the proposed Bill discussed at the League of Nations?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. VIEN: Was it suggested at the Peace Conference?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. VIEN: And was it discussed as between Canada and the United Kingdom?

Mr. DOHERTY: No.

Mr. VIEN: It is purely on the initiative of Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: And without any understanding that any other part of the British Empire will take the same action?

Mr. DOHERTY: Exactly; we have no understanding as to whether any other part of the British Empire will think proper to define its nationals or not, and with all respect I think it is none of our business. Equally so, I like to believe that other parts of the Empire fully recognize that this is no concern of theirs. We are defining our own Canadian nationals. Some other of the self-governing dominions may deem it wise to define their nationals—Australia, for instance—but Australia will do exactly what she likes about it. I do not think the Canadian Parliament would feel that we had to go and ask anybody else's leave to define who we are. It is for us to recognize who is a Canadian and who is not.

Mr. CANNON: I understand that after this Bill is passed Canada will, at future meetings of the League, always be represented by a Canadian national.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should think so.

Mr. CANNON: Or might Canada be in the same position as South Africa was at the last meeting of the League, when she was represented by Lord Robert Cecil? In view of the passage of this Bill will it no longer be possible for the Government to delegate their powers, for instance, to someone else of his standing?

Mr. DOHERTY: I should not like to answer for what may happen in the future —when, for instance, my hon. friend becomes a member of the Canadian Government. I should think, however, that any Canadian Government would always be able to find Canadian nationals competent to represent Canada in the Assembly of the League of Nations. I do not want to enter upon any discussion of what General Smuts thought it proper to do in regard to South Africa; that is a matter for South Africans to settle. All hon. gentlemen will agree that on some odd occasion it might happen, when there was nothing important to be done and ornamental representation only was required, you might ask somebody on the spot to be good enough to act as Canada's representative.

Mr. McMASTER: I hope the minister does not infer that the people in the British Isles or in any other part of the Empire would be more ornamental than Canadian nationals?

Mr. DOHERTY: Not more ornamental, but, you see, "quand on n'a pas ce qu'on aime, on aime ce qu'on a." When you do not have a simon-pure Canadian national, then, if occasion requires, you might utilize somebody who was not quite so good-looking.

Mr. VIEN: It has been found difficult so far to get a Canadian national to represent us at Washington; it may be difficult to get a Canadian national to represent us at the League of Nations.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman should not pile all our troubles on us at the one moment. When he sees whom we shall select, he will agree that the waiting was worth while.

Mr. CANNON: Especially if, as the press reports suggest, my hon. friend himself is appointed to the position.

Mr. VIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman tell us what has been the cause of the delay?

M. DOHERTY: Waiting for the numerous suggestions that we gather in day by day and night by night. It would have been a pity if opportunity had not been given for the valuable advice that that wait has given rise to.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand that the British flag is the only flag recognized on Canadian ships by foreign nations. Will the adoption of this measure bring about any change in that respect?

Mr. DOHERTY: It will not affect our ships in the slightest; we will keep on land for the time being.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Then our flag will still not be recognized in any foreign country?

Mr. DOHERTY: When we get a flag I suppose we wil attend to its recognition.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member knows well that on the Canadian merchant ships we fly the red ensign the same as the British ships, except that we have the Canadian coat-of-arms on it.

Mr. VIEN: Is it recognized abroad?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: Internationally?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I believe so.

Mr. VIEN: I understand that a few years ago our Canadian flag—a British ensign with the Canadian coat-of-arms—was hauled down in the harbour of New York or Boston because it was not internationally recognized. Has this status been changed?

Mr. COPP: After this Bill passes will it be possible for a person to be a Canadian national and also a national of some other overseas dominion or the United Kingdom?

Mr. DOHERTY: So long as a person who is a Canadian national did not, even though he became a national of some other dominion, make the declaration contemplated in the Bill, he would continue to be a Canadian national. If a British subject in the United States had a son born to him, that son would be a British subject and an American citizen. I mentioned instances earlier in the evening of men born in this country who were both British subjects and French citizens. I know of no way of avoiding that unless we come to some convention in the matter. It might be desirable at some time that some convention in that regard should be arrived at between the dominions and the Mother Country. We have a provision here to enable a man to choose which one he will adhere to if he should happen to find himself in that position.

Mr. COPP: But if he is a national of Canada and also of another dominion or the United Kingdom and does not choose to make any declaration, which must he take?

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill does not undertake to say what his relationship is to any other country. According to the law of this country, if he was born, say, in Canada, and makes no declaration, he will continue to be a Canadian national.

Mr. COPP: He can exercise all the privileges of being a Canadian national, irrespective of whether he is also a national of another country?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, just as a man born in Canada, though his father, being a Frenchman, was a French citizen, may enjoy all the privileges of a British subject either in this country or in the United Kingdom.

Mr. PARENT: Under the Indian Act I understand that an Indian is not a "person". Will he become a Canadian national under this Act?

Mr. DOHERTY: Well, I must confess that I have not given consideration to the question of the Indian. However, I have no reason to doubt that under the disposition of this Act an Indian would be a Canadian national if he was born in Canada.

Mr. VIEN: When is the minister going to bring down that definition of the declaration?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I can take it that these clauses are adopted. I was going to move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. FIELDING: And let the Bill remain in committee?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, for the purpose of the declaration.

Mr. McKENZIE: It would seem to me that subsection (b) of section 2 more properly belongs to the Naturalization Act. I do not think we have any right to declare here how any man can throw off the responsibility of having become a British subject.

Mr. DOHERTY: The question is not one of throwing off British citizenship; it is purely limited to his Canadian nationality, and that is what he is throwing off. The British Nationality Act, which we have enacted also, provides how a man can throw off his quality of British subject. This Act does not touch that in the slightest. A man would lose his Canadian nationality when he threw off his quality of British subject, but his merely throwing off his quality of Canadian national does not affect his quality of British subject at all.

Mr. McKENZIE: What will he be? He is not a native of Canada; he is not a native of any other country. What on earth is he?

Mr. FIELDING: Nothing at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let us take a very simple case. A man was born in England of a father who was a Canadian national. That man would be a British subject and a Canadian national. He would have two qualities. By-and-by he thinks he would rather be a national or resortissant of the United Kingdom. He says: "I want to renounce my Canadian nationality," and that is all he renounces; he remains just the same British subject he was before. It will depend upon what the laws of the different portions of the Empire are whether or not he becomes a national of one of those countries. It is not essential that he should be a national of any thing at all when he is living in any part of the Empire which does not deem it necessary to define its nationalism. He may be in the unfortunate situation of being a national of nothing in particular; but he will always be a British subject, and under those circumstances, I presume he would be a national of the United Kingdom.

Mr. FIELDING: And yet a man born in the United States of a father who was a British subject, would be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a Canadian national?

Mr. DOHERTY: And a British subject.

Mr. FIELDING: By reason of this Bill only.

Mr. DOHERTY: He would be a British subject without this Bill.

Mr. FIELDING: This Bill makes him a British subject.

Mr. DOHERTY: It makes him a Canadian national. But before a man can be a Canadian national, he has to be a British subject. Supposing this Bill was never passed, a man born in the United States of a father who is a British subject is both an American citizen and a British subject. I know this sounds anomalous, and there is a provision in the British Nationality Act to enable a man, just as we provide here for throwing off the mere national, to throw off the quality of British subject where a man, under those circumstances by reason of his father being a British subject, is a British subject. Under that provision—I have not the text of it—that man may make a declaration of alienage and cease to be a British subject, or he may refrain from making that declaration and continue to be a British subject. There are in the world any number of people who are in the anomalous position of being subjects of two countries.

Mr. CANNON: Will this Bill, from an international viewpoint, receive any application so far as Canada is concerned, outside of our territory?

Mr. DOHERTY: No law has any application outside of the territory of the country that made it, but I think I am safe in saying that it is the universal international custom to accept a country's own definition of who its citizens or subjects are unless some other country disputes it. If somebody gets disputing over some of our most distinguished citizens, I can readily comprehend we may have serious disputes between different parts of this Empire as to who is entitled to claim some of the distinguished gentlemen I see in front of me. If such dispute should arise, I would not contend that our law should govern anywhere outside of Canada, any more than a British law saying that a man is a British subject governs anywhere outside of the British realms. Such laws have to depend upon international comity for any recognition outside. It would be just as absurd for me to say that this law will govern outside of Canada as to our nationality, as it would be for the British Prime Minister to say that when the Parliament of Great Britain passes a law, defining a British subject, that makes people in France say: That man is a British subject. People in France say so on account of international comity, but they are not bound to do so; they might legislate and say: That man is a French citizen, and that is the law of France.

Mr. CANNON: As I understand my right hon. friend, the question is not one of law, but of courtesy, and this law is passed so as to secure representation by a Canadian national at future meetings of the League. Those meetings are held generally outside of Canada, so that the law would never apply except through courtesy.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am sorry, but I cannot make for Canadians a position that does not belong to anybody in the wide world. When a British man, say Mr. Balfour—nobody will doubt his identity as a British subject and statesman—arrives at the Assembly in France and says: "I am a British subject," there is no law to entitle him to recognition as such; it is not because the law of Great Britain says he is a British subject that in France he is a British subject. He is a British subject in France because France recognizes the fact. But if France chose to legislate and say that everybody born in England should be a French citizen, every one of those men, the moment he stepped into France, would be a French citizen. No country in the world can legislate to make a man its citizen outside of its borders, because no country's laws govern outside of its limits; but it is the universal practice of countries to define who are their citizens, and it is the usual practice of civilized countries to accept each country's definition of who is its citizen, until some other country puts in a claim to such people and then you may have a dispute.

Mr. POWER: They may enforce their right.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes. We may pass laws until we are blue in the face; but we cannot prevent outside countries from passing laws contrary to ours, and we can never make our laws govern in a foreign country.

Bill No. 25, respecting The Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Green.

Bill No. 26, respecting The Manitoba and North Western Railway Company of Canada.—Mr. Lang.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. POWER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On reading yesterday's Hansard I note that my name has been given as one of those who are to sit on the committee on soldiers' re-establishment and pensions. I have already stated to the House—and I gave my reasons therefor at the time—that I had no intention of acting on that committee this year. I would therefore like the Prime Minister to withdraw my name.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The name of the hon. member (Mr. Power) came, I think, from the other side—from the Whip or the Leader—in the ordinary course. Undoubtedly, if the hon. member desires not to act, some arrangement will be made to have another hon. member to take his place.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RALWAYS REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRANK CAHILL (Pontiac): May I ask the Government when we may expect a detailed report of the Canadian National Railways for the fiscal year 1919-20?

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Prime Minister): The Minister of Railways is not in his seat. I will direct the matter to his attention and have it referred to on Monday.

On motion of Mr. Meighen, the House proceeded to the order: Notices of Motions.

POLITICAL PATRONAGE IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the best interests of Canada and its people would be served, and the principles of responsible Government would be maintained by a system of political patronage wherein appointments to and promotions in both the Outside Civil Service and the Inside Civil Service would be brought under the specific consideration and recommendation of the members of Parliament, or the defeated candidates of the party in power; always having due regard for the stability of the service, the promotion of deserving officers, and the proper conduct of the business of the country; and that the Civil Service Act be amended in conformity therewith; and also to place the Civil Service Commission in an unequivocal position, consistent with its dignity and importance in a new sphere of action.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest that it would be to the advantage of hon. members of the House if the hon. member could find it convenient to move just a little further down the Chamber, thus enabling a much larger number of members to hear him.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Mr. Speaker, I regret that my physical condition is such that I must curtail my remarks to-day. Possibly it is just as well, as I understand that the House is unanimously in favour of that part of the resolution which deals with the Outside Service. Besides, the authority of these medical advisers is inexorable; I have to bow to their orders. I do not propose to take up in any very great detail the subject matter of this resolution. I may point out, however, that during the war—and if I tread on anyone's corns I hope I will be pardoned, for I am taking a view of the matter from a little distance—fads of all descriptions were foisted on the public. We had the food control; we had the fuel control; we had the Board of Commerce; we had the labour movement agitation; we had the Grain Growers' movement; we had the U.F.O. movement; we have had liquor movements of various kinds, both ways; we have had the railway movement. Last, but by no means least, we have had the fad of taking the Outside Service in with the Inside Service and tightening up the Inside Service so as to make it as close a corporation as ever existed. Then, there were a thousand and one other freaks of a people carried away from their usual stability of thought and action. It was useless to try to stop such movements. Some freak or faddist, under the guise of democracy, would proclaim his fad, and forthwith it would assume definite form and be fastened on the public in direct contradiction of every principle of responsible government. The strange part of all this is that we were making war on Germany because of her autocracy, and yet every precaution pertaining to responsible government was directly and ruthlessly thrown to the winds in the carrying out of these activities. This applies not to Canada alone, but to Britain and to France as well.

As I have said, among other fads forced on the public by uplifters was the bringing of the Outside Service under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. In a nutshell, the rule adopted was that the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission would override the member of Parliament who was directly responsible to the people—although, for generations the member of Parliament had had the nomination of appointees in his riding—and would communicate with some local kindred faddist who was not responsible to the people—some personal friend possibly; some uplifter with no judgment in appointments of this kind. I could give various instances; I have a list of instances where the member of Parliament would know nothing about the matter until he found a man in office, and upon tracing it up he would find that the nomination had been made by some local uplifter or some gentleman who meant well possibly, but the member would have no say in the matter at all. I could give other instances in which the member's orders were overridden by the Civil Service Commission in connection with these appointments. It is not necesary that I should go into the details; others may do that. Instances by the score—indeed, by the hundred—are well known where the first the member of Parliament would know of an appointment would be to find the man in office, placed there by the manipulation of some clerk in the Civil Service Commission. Under the former rule, not only was the member of Parliament held responsible for the Outside Service; he was consulted also in respect to appointments in the Inside Service. This is not generally understood. I can well remember that, in Sir John Macdonald's time, members of Parliament were always consulted in regard to appointments, not only to the Outside Service, but to the Inside Service as well, and I think it is only proper that they should be. Most assuredly members of the Government should have full control. Under present conditions, I understand a deputy minister can tell a minister that he will not bow to his ruling; that he will not accede to his recommendations, but do as he has a mind to; under this cast iron law that has been placed on the statute book. I can well remember, in Sir John Macdonald's time, one member having the patronage for his own riding not only made appointments in the Outside Service, but also through the minister concerned, made appointments of his fair share of the Inside Service. He was also very active in helping other members with their appointments in the Inside Service. On one occasion when he recommended an appointment for the Inside Service, he was quietly shown that he had far exceeded his number, and he was amazed to find that his recommendations in support of other member's nominations were all charged up to himself. I mention this merely to show that in those days the Inside Service, the best the country has ever had, was recognized by Sir John Macdonald as belonging to the member of Parliament through the minister immediately concerned. I want it distinctly understood that the minister immediately concerned and the member of Parliament should be responsible for appointments to the Outside Service, and if the member of Parliament does not make a proper recommendation, then the minister will be absolutely justified in declining to accept that member's nomination.

Objections have been raised to members of Parliament having anything to do with the Inside Service, and the chief objection comes from members for constituencies in and around Ottawa. In the old days, the two members for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp and Mr. Chabot) had a hard time of it, and I expect the action of the people in rushing to those members by hundreds for jobs was responsible for bringing on this change. Under this resolution, that will be quite unnecessary. I claim, as representing the riding of Victoria, that I am as much entitled as any of the members for Ottawa or the constituencies immediately adjoining, to make recommendations for appointments in the Inside Civil Service in this city, and that I am entitled to give the young gentlemen and ladies in my constituencies who wish to make the Civil Service their vocation in life, an opportunity of doing so. Therefore, some system that would bring that condition of affairs about should be adopted. I am a firm believer in the powers of the House of Commons and of Parliament, and I would suggest the advisability of appointing a committee of this House to investigate the Civil Service Commission and the Civil Service, as a whole, session after session, taking their time and forming a committee in conjunction with some officers of the Civil Service. At the present time, if a clerk has some disability placed on him or if he has some grievance, no opportunity whatever, short of an appeal through friends on the side—and that does not amount to anything—is given him of having his grievance redressed. There should therefore, be some responsible body, —mark you, I believe all these public bodies should be responsible to the people, I do not believe in close commissions at all—to whom such clerks and other members of the Civil Service who have grievances could apply, and to whom application could be made in case of persons improperly promoted in a department. I have a mass of correspondence in regard to this matter, but I will not use it. I will, however, mention the case of one clerk who had been working at a salary of $900 a year or so ago, and who is now receiving a salary of three or four thousand dollars and is controlling, without any special education or qualification, the appointments of men who are infinitely his superior in education, tact and judgment. Under present conditions, all this sort of thing goes on and there is no redress. The cast-iron rule of the inside Civil Service stands in the way, and the matter cannot be adjusted. I understand that even some of the senior civil servants have had the temerity to tell members high up in the Cabinet that they decline to permit them to interfere in matters of that kind; that such matters belong to those civil servants entirely.

There are just two forms of human government—trust and mistrust. I do not want to be personal or to hark back, but I might just point this out in that regard. It may be remembered, that in 1915, and up to the first of March, 1916, I had the honour or raising 375,000 soldiers;—I had the honour of raising upwards of 450,000 altogether. When we started the system of groups, little bunches of soldiers, twenty-five here, fifty there, and so on throughout the country, some of my colleagues, very wise men, and many outside people, came to me and said: "But how are you going to control these soldiers?" I said: "In the name of Heaven, who controls them now? They know the way home at night; they know how to go to bed; they know how to conduct themselves properly as gentlemen, without the uniform, and when they don the uniform, with all the honour and pride involved in that action, they are going to behave themselves like gentlemen." These people wanted special officers appointed to control these soldiers; but in the whole Dominion, there was not a solitary police court case worthy of being a police court case out of those 375,000 men during the six months in that year. I have never been afraid to trust the people or members of Parliament in their appointments. I have never known a bad appointment made in my constituency through either my recommendation or that of my opponent when he had the honour of representing the riding, during the time when members of Parliament under the old rule had the privilege of recommending appointments to the Outside Service. You must have something directly responsible to the people, and the member of Parliament is the only one man who can be held responsible. The uplifter, the clergyman, the private wire-puller, are not responsible to the people, and they cannot be reached as can members of Parliament.

The various forms of irresponsibility are autocracy such as the Kaiser's; those fads such as food controls; labour agitators; Grain Growers and U.F.O. organizations. I trust the gentlemen representing the U.F.O. and the Grain Growers will not take my remarks amiss; the point I want to make in connection with them is that they do not represent the principle of responsible Government; they have no settled policy of human government other than what is based on a negative quality. In other words, it is not trust; it is mistrust. I am making these remarks in all kindness. Other forms of irresponsibility are ultramontane and uplifting churches; Bolshevism and all kindred organizations, where the consent of the people as a whole does not control. Under responsible government, good results have always followed, whereas under Civil Service government results have always been bad. I have lists showing the inferior class of some of the appointments made under the Civil Service Commission, although the people do not hear about such appointments. I can give one instance in which three fellows who were appointed committed misdemeanors, and when they were about to be arrested, they skipped out. You never hear of the crooks appointed under this system. I remember in one case a member of Parliament protested against the appointment of a man, but certain clergymen interfered and the man, a noted scalawag, and reprobate, was appointed over the recommendation of the member and over the recommendations of men in the riding and elsewhere of other and better men. I could give dozens of instances of that kind. Under responsible government you can get a high class of men. If you look back to the old days, you will see the best men, graduates of universities, getting positions, whereas now little boys and girls get them and the big men of the country cannot find positions in the Civil Service the same as they did under the old system of responsible government appointments. No government can be a compromise, nor a combination of responsible government and autocracy.

I will cut my remarks short because I know the House is familiar with this question. Permit me to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the Prime Minister for arranging to give me this opportunity of addressing a few words to the House to-day, and also for your kindness in giving me a place near the centre of the Chamber.

Mr. ALFRED ERNEST FRIPP (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I have seconded the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) in whole, though I am rather inclined to think that in part it ought not to apply to the Inside Service. I understand that the mover is satisfied with that position.

I speak upon this resolution because of some little experience that I think I have gained while having the honour of having a seat in this House representing this Capital city of the Dominion. In order to deal with this question properly, it seems to me, one must go back to the original Act, consequent upon which the Civil Service Commission was formed. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that Act was passed about 1908, and its purpose, as exemplified by the clauses of the Act itself, was, shortly, to place the control of appointments to the Civil Service of Canada under this Commission, and to provide that all appointments should be made after examination. That was the real purpose of the appointment of this commission. Before that, as hon. gentlemen are well aware, both political parties made appointments to the Inside and Outside Service. I experienced a short period of that privilege, if one may so express himself, by suggesting the appointment of certain persons in the city of Ottawa, and I venture to say that the appointments I made were as good if not better than the appointments now being made by the Civil Service Commission. Subsequently, the Government of the day, prior to the last election, made it a plank in its platform that political patronage so far as the Outside Service was concerned should be abolished, and that the Outside Service should be placed under the control of the commission.

With regard to political patronage, I am free to admit that I was one of those who were strongly in favour of its abolition so far as both the Outside and Inside Service was concerned. I must confess, however, that I have to some extent changed my mind, and my reasons may be stated in this way. First, while we are all in favour of the abolition of political patronage, our experience has been, I think, since the commission has been operating along these lines for the past three years, that the commission does not abolish patronage. By handing over to these gentlemen who constitute the Civil Service Commission the making of appointments we have not abolished patronage or attained the object we had in view when we placed this serious responsibility upon their shoulders.

My second objection is that it has cost this country an unnecessarily large sum of money in order to put the Outside Service, particularly, under the control of the Civil Service Commission. My third objection is that it has caused throughout the country, and especially amongst the Civil Servants of Canada; a great deal of unrest, and necessarily the work of the Government has not been as expeditiously and as efficiently done as it otherwise would have been.

Dealing with the first point I make, that the appointment of the Civil Service Commission does not abolish patronage, I do not propose to labour that except to give one or two instances. Instead of a member of Parliament recommending a man for the position, we will say, of a letter carrier, or any other position in the Service, we have simply handed over to two or three gentlemen the power to select that man. Now, if the selection were based upon the man's having passed an examination with a higher percentage of marks than any of his competitors, and upon that only, one perhaps could not object very much, but the difficulties—there are two—are these: First that the examinations set is not an examination upon the duties the man will have to perform if appointed; and, secondly, that is not the only consideration which, in my experience, has entered into the minds of the commissioners when they have made such appointments.

Take for example a large case which comes to my mind as I speak. Last year this Government undertook, with the authority of Parliament, to reorganize the Printing Bureau in the city of Ottawa. I have already expressed myself in this House in no uncertain way as to my views upon that question, but just let us see how patronage worked out there. The Civil Service Commission recommended to this Government that we should employ experts to classify the Civil Service of Canada. Well, we all know what that meant. It meant that these gentlemen, Messrs. Arthur Young and Company, came to Ottawa and gathered together the necessary material for this book, which is called "The Classification of the Civil Service of Canada," at an expenditure of very large sums of money. I find upon making inquiry that this country paid to Arthur Young and Company in the year 1918-19 $34,695, and in the year 1919-20 $95,270, and subsequently an additional $10,000 odd.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is there any more to pay?

Mr. FRIPP: No, the $10,000 odd was the last sum to be paid.

Mr. H. S. BELAND: What is the total?

Mr. FRIPP: It is $139,666. I wonder if any hon. members have ever read this classification. I open it at any page. Here, on page 527, is the position of Parcel Postman. The definition of class reads:

> To perform, under supervision, all work connected with the delivery of parcel post mail matter in the business and residence sections of a city; to deliver mail to nearby suburban offices; and to perform other related work as assigned.

Now surely it does not take an expert to tell us what the duties of a postman are. But this commission, instead of doing this work themselves as they ought to have done and might very well have done, employed these gentlemen and paid them a large sum of money. And one would have thought that having made a classification of the Civil Service, Arthur Young and Company would not possibly have considered their work complete without suggesting to the Government how the Civil Service could be reformed and, if necessary, reduced in numbers. But no; having made this classification these gentlemen stepped right out and another concern was brought in by the Civil Service Commission, Messrs. Griffenhagen and Associates, who have been undertaking the reorganization of the service. Surely Arthur Young and Company were not paid simply to compile a book setting forth the duties of the various public servants of Canada, and stopping there. It was, and ought to have been made, a necessary part of their work to report at the same time as to how the Civil Service could be improved, a work that has been attempted by Griffenhagen and Associates, who, I understand, have been paid about $70,000 to date. I am glad to observe, from newspaper reports, that the Government have considered it advisable to dispense with the services of these gentlemen.

Allow me to revert to my illustration. A part of this work of Arthur Young and Company was the reorganization of the Printing Bureau in Ottawa, and upon the recommendation of a German-American named Wolfe, a member of this firm, 400 men were laid off from the Bureau without an opportunity of appeal, without the chance of being heard as to whether it was just or necessary that they should be laid off in view of old age or any other possible reason that they might advance. They were laid off merely on his say-so. Surely it was a most obnoxious form of patronage for this country to have conferred on a gentleman of this kind the power to decide as to who should be employed in and who should be dismissed from one of our large institutions. But that is not all. These very same gentlemen are charged now with the destruction of very valuable books, as appears from the resolution of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), as well as of some invaluable plates, which cannot be restored, used for the printing of certain public documents. Under the circumstances, I contend that the Civil Service Commission has not been the means of abolishing patronage; it simply appropriates this power to itself or delegates it to others, its nominees, to say who shall be appointed and who shall not.

Let us take another illustration. Suppose any one of these departments required an architect, or a solicitor, or a barrister. Do the Commission make the appointment? No; they simply ask Mr. John Brown, Mr. Smith, and some person else to pass upon the recommendations that have been placed before them; and that is merely handing patronage over to three irresponsible persons, who, for personal or religious reasons, or from any other motive you choose to suggest, may be influenced in their choice of the applicant to fill the position. Now, that is an entire departure from the object for which the Civil Service Commission was originally established, namely, to hold competitive examinations, ascertain the results, and then report to the Government. Now they make these appointments, sometimes themselves, but very largely upon the say-so of other persons whom they consult of their own motion.

My second objection is that it has cost this country too much money to put the Outside Service under the control of the Civil Service Commission. The hon. member for Durham (Mr. Rowell), the Ex-President of the Privy Council, said in a speech last year that there were 5,000 persons employed in the Inside Service and 35,000 in the Outside, and I should like to bring to the attention of the Government just what it has cost this country to place the Outside Service under the control of the Commission. In 1908-9 the Civil Service Commission cost this country $12,531.45, and it had five permanent employees. In 1909-10 it cost the country about $11,000 and had eight permanent employees—of course, they needed just a small staff to prepare examination papers; indeed, they did not even prepare the examination papers; they merely collected the necessary details for the purpose of holding the examinations. In 1910-11 the cost was about the same; in 1911-12, it was $14,000; in 1913-14, $35,000, with fifteen employees. In 1915-16 the cost had risen to $41,970, although there were fourteen employees; but in 1917-18 there was a further increase in the cost, which was $43,925; while there were sixteen permanent employees and ten temporary employees. In 1918-19, including what was paid that year to Arthur Young and Company, it cost this country to classify the Civil Service and pay the salaries of the Commission, $149,399, and the permanent employees of the Commission numbered twenty-six, while there were forty-eight temporary employees. If you deduct the amount paid to Arthur Young and Company for that year, viz., $34,000, from the total, it will be seen that the Civil Service Commission in that year cost us practically $100,000, as compared with the cost a few years before, when the Outside Service was not under its control, of between $11,000 and $14,000 at the most. In 1919-20 the Commission and its employees, including the companies I have mentioned, cost the country $297,999.76. In that year their permanent employees had increased to forty-six and the temporary to one hundred and fifty-nine. Now, of that sum of $297,000 odd, $95,270 was paid to Arthur Young and Company; so that the Civil Service Commission itself cost us about $200,000 for that fiscal year. Why? because the appointments in the Outside Service must have entailed the large number of extra employees engaged. Now, Sir, I submit with all due respect to the Commission, that they have failed. I say, Sir, that they have failed to take care of the situation which this Parliament felt some years ago ought to be removed from the control of members of Parliament.

What has happened? Let us give a simple illustration. A postmaster is required in some county, say, in British Columbia. The stipend attaching to the position is, let us say, $50 or $100 a year. Now, that appointment has to be made at Ottawa. A certain amount of money must be spent advertising it in the local papers, and after considerable delay, the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa select the man. Surely that man could have been selected, and as good an appointment, if not better, made, by the member of Parliament in that locality, a man who is responsible to the people.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is not the postmaster now, as a matter of fact, selected on the recommendation of some one outside of the commission?

Mr. FRIPP: He is certainly selected upon the recommendation of another person, so that patronage is really diverted from the member of Parliament to an irresponsible person. Now I have the highest respect for the gentlemen who form the Civil Service Commission and the officers on the staff; but what I submit, Sir, is that this Government and this Parliament have given them an impossible task, in the sense that they cannot really secure greater benefits, or as great benefits—at all events if they do it is at much higher cost, at enormous cost to this country—as were formerly obtained. After all what we are striving to achieve is to increase the efficiency of the Civil Service, but that efficiency is not increased by the present system in any way—rather do I think it has diminished. We have departed from the well-known principle of the proper functions of the Government which is to govern and administer the affairs of the country. The Government should take the responsibility itself and do away with government by Commission. Then I think we shall be on safe ground. I submit that the Commission cannot give a better service—at all events as regards the Outside Service—than the local member or the defeated candidate of either political party, or any prominent man in the locality, could give by recommending for a position the person that is most fitted for it.

The present condition of affairs has caused a great deal of unrest in the Civil Service. I am told, Sir, that after the reclassification was made appeals were filed, and are now on record, to the Civil Service Commission to the number of thousands. Why, a thing has occurred in the Civil Service in Ottawa which is most unusual: A certain body of civil servants have become a trade union and are known as Local No. 66. Just to illustrate to the House what I mean,—and that is the point I wish to make,—just to illustrate how our Civil Service is being apparently driven into a position that it ought not to be driven into by the desire of its members to see that justice is done to them by the Civil Service Commission—I received a resolution adopted by a local union Lodge No. 412 of the International Association of Machinists, in which they recite the following:

> Whereas the Associated Federal Employees of Ottawa Federal Union No. 66, has after months of effort failed to secure the slightest recognition from the Government, nor has the latter granted the request of the said Union for an investigation into the charges and complaints made against the Board of Hearing.
>
> Be it resolved that as a Labour Organization this Association do place itself on record as supporting the claims of Federal Union No. 66 for recognition, and as expressing their opinion that the charges and complaints brought forward, and indeed to demand the fullest investigation into the administration of the said Board of Hearing.

The complaints referred to in the resolution arise out of the reclassification.

I say there is unrest in the service. There is a feeling that the Civil Service, both Inside and Outside, are not being fairly dealt with by the Canadian Parliament. Along that line I wish to make one or two observations. It seems to me that the Inside Service in Ottawa might well be re-organized by given the deputy ministers proper salaries and making them responsible for the management of their own departments free from the interference of any person. A very well known business man in Montreal who was asked by the Government during the war to become a member of the War Trade Board in this city spoke to me as follows one day: "Mr. Fripp, I cannot understand how your ministers really carry on as well as they do. In the first place instead of devoting themselves to matters of policy nearly half of their time seems to be taken up with matters of detail that ought to be managed by a good deputy. That deputy ought to be paid at least $15,000 and he should have full control of that department. His chief clerks ought to be paid salaries commensurate with their duties. That deputy and those chiefs of the different branches of the department should be held responsible for the work being done in a proper manner." It is the opinion of the gentleman in question, and it is my opinion, that if such a system were carried out the Civil Service of Ottawa could be properly cut in half. Then decent salaries, and adequate living wage, could be paid to those who are doing the work of the country which is not by any means the case at the present time. Why, seventy-five or eighty-five per cent of the Civil Service in Ottawa are receiving less than $1,000 a year. How can men live respectably and appear respectably dressed, as they have to, on salaries of that kind?

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have said enough to show that the experiment—for it was only an experiment for which no political party is responsible; Parliament as a whole is responsible—the experiment of placing appointments to the Outside Service under the Civil Service Commission has not, to put it very mildly, worked very satisfactorily in Canada during the past three years. The plan might work all right in a small country, but Canada is too large and too scattered a country for any body of men to be able to sit in this city and make proper appointments to the public service for all portions of the Dominion. In view of that fact, and bearing in mind the experience we have had, we might well take away appointments to the Outside Service from the commission upon the grounds which I have mentioned, namely, upon economical grounds; upon the ground that the commission are not doing away with the evil that we were anxious they should do away with—the making of appointments upon political grounds and as a matter of political patronage—and finally the ground that our Civil Service, if properly treated and given adequate salaries, wil increase in efficiency and perform the duties much better than they are doing at the present time and with more satisfaction to themselves. Why, Sir, let me give one more illustration. The Militia Department engaged numerous employees during the war, many of whom were returned soldiers—temporary employees. I know that there are two hundred odd of these employees leaving at the end of this month. Many of them are returned soldiers, most of them are married men. They have had four or five years experience as first-class clerks and they have made good. Why should not these men be transferred to other departments that need experienced clerks when the Civil Service Commission is advertising every day for clerks needed in different departments? It seems to be a rule of the Civil Service Commission that no man who has been a temporary employee can become permanent no matter how efficient he may be. I think that is a good illustration of the necessity of reconsidering the management of the Outside Service, and of seeing that the duties of the Civil Service Commission should be confined practically to the Inside Service in this city which is immediately under their observation and under their control. It is a mistake to add to the duties of the commission in Ottawa, which are already heavy and onerous for the Inside Service, the additional duty of having to appoint men all over the Dominion to the number, as estimated, of nearly thirty-five thousand.

Mr. JOHN L. CHABOT (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting with more than ordinary interest for the remarks of my esteemed colleague of the city of Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) on the question before the House. We have both had a somewhat similar experience in the course of our parliamentary career, and I think I am well within the judgment of this House when I declare that no other members have ever suffered from the pernicious effects of the patronage system to the same extent.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that during the first years I sat in this House as representative of the city of Ottawa I lost my practice and many of my friends. I gave up time, day and night, week-day and Sunday, month in and month out, in a vain endeavour to satisfy the army of applicants seeking Government jobs; and for every man or woman that apparently became my friend because I had succeeded in finding them a job, I made a score of enemies with unsuccessful competitors and their friends. I think, if I remember rightly, it was Abraham Lincoln who on a certain occasion when asked his opinion about appointments to the Civil Service remarked, that if for one vacant position there were fifty applicants you made forty-nine enemies and in due course the appointed one became an ingrate. Well, my experience in the city of Ottawa has to some extent proved the correctness of Lincoln's statement. Surely this reason alone would have justified any hon. gentleman having like experience in opposing to the limit of his voice and vote the movement to restore the patronage system.

I am compelled to declare that I am absolutely at variance with the views that have been expressed by my esteemed colleague (Mr. Fripp); and I may add that it was only on the distinct understanding that the patronage system was to be abolished that I consented to contest a seat in this House at the last general election. Patronage was abolished, and I may state, Sir, that for the past three years life, so far as its public duties are concerned, has once more become worth living. I have been able to devote myself to my practice out of session, and while this House has been in session, I have been free to give my time and what small ability I may have to matters of real national importance. Of course, last session and the session before I may have been apparently derelict in the performance of my parliamentary duties, but I wish to state that my absence was caused by illness, and while I am not asking for sympathy I am offering this as an explanation of my apparent neglect.

An Hon. MEMBER: We are all happy to see you well.

Mr. CHABOT: I must admit, Sir, that I am not able to understand how any member of Parliament can really desire to return to the old patronage system, at least if he has had any personal experience therewith. Moreover, may I remind the House that this has a far wider importance than its bearing on the personal fortunes of individual members? Its baneful effects are so well known and acknowledged throughout the country—and nowhere so emphatically as in this capital city—that it needs no assertion nor argument on my part. Every political pary has in succession claimed to have considered its abolition of so much importance that it has been made a prominent plank in every platform for many elections. Some of the greatest minds that have adorned these benches have expressed themselves in no uncertain terms in condemnation thereof. And, further, I am satisfied that in so expressing themselves they have given voice to their honest and well-matured conviction—but alas! until some three years ago partisan pressure was too severe and their good intentions perforce became abortive.

Parliament itself, Mr. Speaker, is responsible for the legislation now on the statute book and for the splendid reform which was inaugurated less than three years ago and which has since been on trial. Parliament did not take this step hastily. It knew what it was doing, and surely nothing very serious has occurred in the interim to modify, much less change, the principles or the view then so generally expressed and so definitely given effect to. Of course, it is outside the limit of human power to satisfy in their entirety the expectations or demands of the Civil Service of Canada or of any other country.

In the course of this debate the House has listened to considerable criticism of the Civil Service Commission, and many harsh things have been said and—may I add?—many ill-founded assertions have been made of its actions. But if the House will consider a moment I think hon. members will agree with me that Parliament imposed upon the Civil Service Commission an almost impossible task when it assigned to it the duties called for under the Act of 1918. At that time the staff of the Commission consisted of some fourteen or fifteen, housed in quarters and equipped with machinery adequate for the more or less routine and perfunctory work of which it at the time had charge. In the interim that staff has been increased to a strength of 225, every man and woman of which is working at high pressure and an appreciable percentage of whom find it necessary to put in many hours of overtime. I claim that that shows beyond the last doubt that the duties of the Commission have become more numerous and more important.

In the comparatively brief interval since that Act was passed machinery has been organized and a staff built up which has practically reorganized the service and put the entire machinery of Government on a new, modern and more efficient basis. Undoubtedly some mistakes have been made. Some temporary disturbance of work and some passing inconvenience to the departments must inevitably attend a reorganization so drastic, and indeed revolutionary, but in my opinion the result has been eminently satisfactory. What has been aimed at and what has been actually accomplished is being better understood and more thoroughly appreciated every day, not only in the service itself, but throughout the country, and I cannot imagine it would be possible to make a greater mistake than to stop the work of progress and reform which has been so well started and so assiduously developed.

The Civil Service itself—and I know whereof I speak when I make the statement—is opposed to any return of the patronage system, notwithstanding the remarks made by my worthy colleague that a great deal of unrest exists in the service itself. I should like to read to this House a letter which I received only to-day, and which I think shows that my hon. colleague has either been misinformed or is labouring under a delusion. This letter, which is dated the 11th instant, is addressed to me by the Secretary-Treasurer of the Civil Service Association of Ottawa and by the Secretary-Treasurer of the Civil Service Federation of Canada.

Dear Sir,—The undersigned, on behalf of the Civil Service Federation of Canada, representing the Outside Service from coast to coast, and the Civil Service Association, representing the Inside Service at Ottawa, respectfully but urgently beg to draw your attention to our views with regard to the question of patronage, which is at present before the House in the form of resolution.

We are emphatically opposed to patronage in any form. We regard the abolition of patronage as the most outstanding and beneficial reform in the history of the Canadian Civil Service, and we desire to express our gratitude to you for the enactment of the present Civil Service Act, which embodies the Merit System, and in doing so, we voice the undoubted sentiment of an overwhelming majority of the service.

It has been the experience of the service in the past that under the patronage system influence predominates and worth counts for little. We are convinced that under the Merit System, meritorious service will be rewarded and toadyism will disappear. It is true that during the present period of transition conditions are inevitably somewhat chaotic, and the advantages of the reform have not yet been realized. We feel sure, however, that if the Merit System is given a fair trial effective and satisfactory methods of administration will be evolved and carried out.

Yours respectfully,

L. H. LAMOTHE,
Secretary-Treasurer,
Civil Service Federation of Canada.

J. H. RYAN,
Secretary-Treasurer,
Civil Service Association of Ottawa.

Every thoughtful elector in the country is antagonistic to patronage as a manner of appointments to the public service. The system has been condemned by every commission appointed by the various political parties that have held the reins of power in this country. I have already pointed out, that the leading public men of all political schools of thought have expressed themselves unmistakably in favour of the competitive system. In every progressive country in the world to-day this is the system which is followed in recruiting the public service, and I would therefore regard any interference with the present methods that are being developed in our federal service as a retrograde step which can only result in disaster.

Feeling as I do, Mr. Speaker, that patronage as it existed some years ago was unsatisfactory, unbusinesslike, undemocratic, and in some cases unfair—and a last but not the least argument in support of my contention, that it has been one of the chief causes of the downfall of almost every Government since Confederation—I cannot support the resolution of my hon. and gallant friend, the member from Victoria.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve-Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate the mover of this resolution, the genial member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) upon his being with us after a somewhat serious illness. I think I voice the sentiment of all hon. members when I express the wish that he may soon be completely restored to health.

I gave very close attention to the remarks of my hon. friend this afternoon, and I was pleased to note that he was applauded by hon. gentlemen on the other side when he gave expression to sentiments that were decidedly Liberal in their character. He said that no Government could be carried on if there was distrust of the people; that any such attitude on the part of a Government would result in chaos and anarchy; that the only way to govern a country was to trust the people. These, Sir, are eminently Liberal sentiments and Liberal principles, and I am glad to see that they are accepted with readiness by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House.

I sympathize, Mr. Speaker, with some hon. gentlemen who would like to restore patronage in the Civil Service in order to get a little more kudos with some of their electors. But after twenty-five years' experience in public life, I am still in favour of that great reform which was brought about by the Liberal Government through the establishment of the Civil Service Commission at Ottawa. I am in favour of the Civil Service Commission for the appointment of officers to the Inside Service, and I think that we should have in the large cities like Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Quebec.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Quebec, of course.

Mr. BUREAU: Three Rivers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In all the large cities where there is a branch of the Civil Service, competitive examination should be held in order that these centres may be given the best possible service. There is no use in beating about the bush, Mr. Speaker; you can have an efficient Civil Service, both inside and outside, only by maintaining the system of competitive examination. I am not speaking of petty post offices, lighthouse keepers, charwomen, and so on; I am speaking of the regular Civil Service, inside and outside. As was stated this afternoon, the appointment of a country postmaster, for instance, might well be left to the recommendation of the elected representatives in the House of Commons. If the representative cannot safely be trusted with that responsibility he is not worthy of the mandate that he has received from the people. If he is given the responsibility, he will have to face the people if he does not recommend a man who is suitable, morally and otherwise, for the post to which he is recommended.

I have had some experience in the government of the country. I have presided over one of the large departments, and I know whereof I speak so far as patronage is concerned. Let me tell my hon. friends who have not been in the Government—but some of whom, judging by their radiant faces, will soon grace the Treasury benches—that life would not be worth living if the Civil Service Commission were abolished. As was stated a moment ago by my genial friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chabot), the life of a minister of the Crown would not be worth living if he could not give at least a few hours a day to the study of national affairs. I have worked under both systems—when there was no commission, and after a commission had been established. When there was no commission, a minister of the Crown almost had to be a hero in order to accomplish anything for the country. Why, Sir, his office was besieged from Monday until Saturday, and his house was stormed, by the army, the host, of office-seekers. He could not appoint them all, and naturally he was accused of nepotism, of thinking only of his family. I am glad to take this opportunity of declaring that although I have been charged by disgruntled office-seekers with having given offices to every member of my family, none would have accepted and none did accept a Government job while I was Postmaster General or Minister of Marine and Fisheries. But as I could not appoint an army of office-seekers, I was accused, of course, of giving fat jobs to every member of my family—to every cousin, to every friend, and to every elector.

No country, Mr. Speaker, can hope to have sound, responsible government if the hands of its ministers are tied through the activities of office-seekers. That has been the experience of England and of the United States as well. It is not so many years—because the reform was accomplished only in the fifties—since nepotism reigned supreme in England. It is due to the exertions of men like Peel, Macaulay—who presided over one of the first Civil Service Commissions in England—Gladstone, and Beaconsfield, that there has been established and firmly rooted in England the best Civil Service in the world. Not very long ago I read a statement made by Lord Morley in his memoirs with reference to Lord Minto and his vice-royalty in India. Commenting on the fidelity and loyalty to the Crown during so many years of from three hundred to four hundred millions of Indian subjects, he said: It is largely due to the excellent Indian Civil Service, which is a model and an example to the whole world. In England, you never hear of a member of the House or a minister of the Crown being pestered by office seekers. It is now part of the constitution which is not written, that the hands of a minister, the hands of a member of the House of Commons, are unshackled; he can speak his mind freely, and he is not bothered and stampeded by office-seekers. How has that condition of affairs been brought about? By the system of competitive examination, which has in England given the most perfect Civil Service that exists in Europe.

As regards the United States, I am not so old that I do not remember some of the presidential elections. I recall, when I was a boy, the elections of Grant, Garfield, Hayes and McKinley, and at every election, it was openly stated that "to the victor belonged the spoils." Whichever party came into office, the public servants of the United States would at one fell swoop be dismissed from office. It was a scandal to think that the great republic would treat her public servants in that fashion. That is no more the case, thanks to the commonsense of the American people. The leaders of both parties united, and there is to-day a permanent Civil Service Commission, to which belong the most influential men irrespective of parties, and that commission at times suggests reforms which are adopted by Congress. Sir, since 1883, the Civil Service in the United States has been declared permanent, and thus you have at Washington a Civil Service which is second only to that of Great Britain.

In Canada, my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster), who is the senior member of this House, knows how the lives of ministers of the Crown and of members of the House of Commons have been made unhappy through this infernal patronage system. I remember in the old days that members of the Civil Service from our various constituencies would come into the lobbies of the House of Commons and order ministers and members out of their seats and dictate to them what increase they should get, stating that if they refused, their families would vote against the minister or member; that the parish would vote against the minister or member, because some of our parishes are made up of one family, some of the families being as you know very numerous. In 1907, my then colleague, the Hon. Sydney Fisher, one of the best men this country has ever known, decided that we should put a stop to that system, and he introduced into this House a Bill instituting the Civil Service Commission. Two men were appointed, Prof. Shortt, and Mr. LaRochelle, K.C., of Montreal—two excellent men. Since that time, the commission has been increased, and I declare that I personally trust in the wisdom ability, and honesty of Hon. Mr. Roche, with whom I sat in this House, Mr. Jameson, ex-M.P., and Mr. LaRochelle, K.C. They are gentlemen who have had very wide experience. The system may not be perfect; we are simply beginning to introduce that system into Canada, and I quite understand that some people are somewhat perturbed by the loss of patronage. Let it be understood that henceforward patronage is abolished and, as the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot) said a moment ago, life will be worth living. Members of Parliament will be able to work for Canada, will have some time left to study our national problems. When this country is faced with a huge railway deficit, with an enormous war debt, we, the representatives of the people, can well afford to leave the administration of the Civil Service in the hands of the commission. Of course, I quite understand that there may be some abuses. I regret, for instance, the appointment of Arthur Young and company, and I deplore the appointment of Griffenhagen and Company. The country could have well improved—if there was anything to improve in the Civil Service—the business of that commission without calling upon strangers.

Mr. BELAND: Foreigners.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Well, I am afraid to use the word "foreigner" or the word "stranger." I remember one day that Sir Wilfrid Laurier nearly created a revolution in this country because by a slip of the tongue he used the word "foreigner" when he should have used the word "stranger." The presence of those foreigners explains why, for instance, a man like Mr. Sydney Smith in the Post Office Department, a son of an ex-Postmaster General of Canada, one of the most faithful public servants this country has ever had, was replaced a few days ago by a German under an assumed name.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Name him.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We shall hear more about this later on. For the moment, I wish to say this: I have no objection to give the public men of this country on both sides of the House the right to suggest the appointment of country postmasters, petty customs house officers and all other local office holders throughout the country; but as regards the Inside Service at Ottawa and in the large cities, I cling to the Civil Service Commission. Of course, the commission can stand some reform; but the principle of competitive examination is essentially sound and fair; it is essentially British, too.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and I am opposed to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). I do not believe in political patronage. It has been tried in many countries of the world, and it has been found wanting everywhere. I think that positions should go to merit and never to influence, on the part of either the candidates themselves or of their families, and I am opposed to nepotism in the distribution of public offices. Of course, as the hon. member for Maisonneuve has said, the system is not altogether perfect, and there is room for improvement. Let us make these improvements, and not do away with what is certainly a great public reform.

There is one matter I wish to deal with for a moment or two, and that is, the fact that this Government is not giving proper support to the Civil Service Commission. While this Government pretends to have abolished patronage in the public service, it has not done so in many instances. This country is going to proceed in a few months to take the decennial census, and commissioners are to be appointed, if not already appointed, for every electoral district in the Dominion of Canada. Each commissioner is going to appoint enumerators; there will be many of them in every county, so altogether throughout the Dominion it means the appointment of thousands of officers. I submit that here was a case where patronage should not have been exercised. The Civil Service Commission should have made the appointments just as it does in the different departments. Last fall I had the same experience, I suppose, as other hon. members had, of receiving a letter from the Chief Statistician for the Dominion, Mr. Coats, sending me a list of the subdivisions in my electoral district of Quebec East, asking whether I approved of such subdivisions, and if there were any suggestions I should like to offer. I sent suggestions to this gentleman, and at the time he agreed with me so far as those suggestions were concerned. Seeing that he had so much confidence in me so far as the conditions under which the census should be taken in Quebec East were concerned, I offered him my services in the selection of a commissioner to take the census. I told him I would be happy indeed to co-operate with him when the selection of that officer should be made. To that letter I received an answer reading as follows—Mr. Coats is evidently a French scholar:

OTTAWA, le 16 décembre 1920.

Cher Monsieur,—J'accuse réception de votre lettre en date du 26 novembre, et vous remercie pour vos suggestions qui seront suivies pour la division de Québec-Est en sous districts de recensement.

Concernant la nomination des commissaires, ces officiers seront comme dans les autres recensements, nommés par le député appuyant le Gouvernement.

Votre bien dévoué,

R. H. COATS,
Saisicien du Dominion.

Monsieur Ernest Lapointe, M.P.,
126 rue St-Pierre,
Québec, Qué.

Translated it reads:

Dear Sir.—I acknowledge receipt of your letter dated November 26th, and thank you for your suggestions, which shall be followed as far as the subdivision of the electoral district of Quebec East are concerned, for census purposes. As regards the appointments of the Commissioners such officers will be appointed as has been done formerly by the member supporting the Government.

Yours very truly,

R. H. COATS.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Coats will be promoted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: To that letter I offered a modest answer reading—I will translate it—as follows:

Dear sir,—I acknowledge receipt of your letter of December 16th in which you state that the census commissioners will be appointed by the member supporting the Government in each electoral division. In reply I beg to call to your notice that in the division of Quebec East the member is not a supporter of the Government. Would you have the kindness to tell me under those circumstances who will be consulted with regard to the appointment of the Commissioner?

Believe me, Sir,
Yours very truly,
ERNEST LAPOINTE.

To that letter Mr. Coats replied as follows:

OTTAWA, December, 21, 1920.

Dear Sir,—In answer to your letter of the 18th instant, I have the honour to inform you that the appointment of the census commissioners is now in the hands of the Right Hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Yours very truly,
R. H. COATS,
Dominion Statistician.

Then on January 25 I wrote to the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce the following letter, in French, which I will translate:

The Right Hon. Sir George Foster,
Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir George,

On December 21st last Mr. Coats, Dominion Statistician, after many communications wrote me that the appointment of the census commissioners is in the hands of the Rt. Hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Consequently I take the liberty of recommending to you for appointment as census commissioner for the division of Quebec East Mr. Arthur E. Simard, Notary, 52 rue St-Joseph, Québec.

Mr. Simard has his office and his residence in the division of Quebec East, is an elector, is well-acquainted with the population, and is the best qualified man, to my knowledge, to fill this position.

Believe me, with consideration,
Yours very truly,
ERNEST LAPOINTE.

On January 27 I received the following reply from the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

Dear Mr. Lapointe,

I have your letter of January 25th forwarding the name of Mr. Arthur E. Simard, 52 rue St. Joseph, Quebec, for the position of census commissioner.

In answer I beg to say that the position of census commissioner for Quebec East has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Paul Samson, N.P., St. Roch de Quebec.

Yours very truly,
GEORGE E. FOSTER.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Too late.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Now, Sir, I bring to your attention the fact that this was on the 27th of January. I was surprised that the appointment had been made at that time. It has not yet been made public, or not until very recently at all events. I have nothing to say against Mr. Samson. He is a nice gentleman, well qualified, and a good Conservative. The only point of inferiority he would have as compared with the gentleman I recommended is that according to the new law of one man, one vote, he is not an elector of Quebec East. I think Mr. Simard should have been appointed as he is an elector of the division.

Mr. DAVIDSON: May I ask what was the politics of the gentleman whom my hon. friend recommended?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is a Liberal, by all means. There are so many Liberals in that electoral district that it would have been difficult for the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce to select anybody else, so he had to go outside the division to get a man. I say, Sir, this is patronage with a vengeance, and it is no use for the Government to pretend that political patronage has been abolished when such cases as this occur.

But it is not only as regards the census commissioners that political patronage is exercised; it is exercised in connection with the most prominent positions under the Crown in Canada. Take the case of judges. How many advocates belonging to the Liberal party have been appointed during the two past years?—I mean so far as my own province is concerned. Let me say, at once, I have nothing to say against the appointments to the Bench that have been made in the province of Quebec, not even against those that have been made recently. I have not one word of criticism to offer so far as those gentlemen are concerned. But when you are aware of the fact that in the province of Quebec there are many more Liberals than there are Conservatives—and this is true not only as regards the Bar but in other professions and walks in life—is it any wonder that my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), cannot see his way clear to offer a judical position to any member of the Bar in that province who happens to be a Liberal? Do not be mistaken. I am not complaining because I have not been offered a position myself; I would not accept one if it were offered me. But, Mr.

Speaker, why pretend that there is no more patronage in the public service of Canada in the face of such facts? And there are other positions of prominence too in which patronage is evident. This Government has a reputation for the number of commissions it has created,—commissions of a very important character. How many Liberals—and I speak particularly in regard to the province with which I am best acquainted—have been appointed on these commissions? Well, Sir, when it was necessary to appoint a man from Quebec they always resorted to this very estimable gentleman, Sir Hormidas Laporte, who has been a prominent commissioner of the Government from the province of Quebec on all the boards which they have created, because he was a member of the Conservative party, and a supporter of the Government. Indeed, Sir, they have even tried to induce him to join the Government; but as this is a matter on which the electorates have something to say, they have not so far succeeded. Well, I say that patronage must be abolished; it ought to be abolished; and we should have honesty, frankness, and sincerity in regard to this as in regard to any other question. It is only camouflage to say that patronage does not exist in regard to many positions; and instead of having patronage, virtually if not nominally, as my hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) suggests, we should be sincere about the matter and really abolish patronage, giving to the best qualified men those positions that are vacant. And the Government should help the Civil Service Commission in that respect.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This subject, which has been debated this afternoon, mostly on general principles, will no doubt come before the House in its details before this session is very many weeks older. Therefore, I am not going to go extensively into the matter now. But I wish to say a word or two in respect to what has been said by speakers that have already addressed the Chamber. In the first place, with reference to my old friend and colleague who moved the motion (Sir Sam Hughes), I do not need to say more than that, in common with all my fellow-members, I was glad to see the vigour which he still maintains, though under great disabilities; and we do not, I think, fail to keep in our memories to-day, under certain circumstances not so favourable to him as formerly in the matter of health, the greater vigour and energy which for many years he displayed in this Parliament when his health gave him an opportunity to do so. Though I do not agree with the tendency of his argument, nor the conclusion to which it would lead one, I accord him, as I do all my fellow-members, the perfect privilege of expressing his ideas fearlessly and frankly in the House. I shall do the same on this occasion, and perhaps on others, with reference to the subject which is now before us, for I consider it a very important one.

In the first place, I desire to correct a wrong impression which is prevalent throughout the Civil Service, throughout the city of Ottawa and, I think, probably in this Chamber, as to the work which has been performed by the Civil Service Commission, by the first employee of the Civil Service Commission, Arthur Young and Company, and by the employees, of the sub-committee of the Privy Council, Griffenhagen and Associates. First of all, let me ask hon. members, who are going to form their opinion with reference to the results of the work, that they take two things into consideration: First, the immensity of the work which was to be done; and, secondly, the perturbed and untoward circumstances under which this work was begun and has been carried on up to the present time by the Civil Service Commission and by their employees. I do not need to go into detail with reference to this. We all know that the years through which we have lived since 1913 have been troubled years in every respect, no less troubled in any respect than as regards the work of the Civil Service, in the way of actual performance of duty and also in connection with the reorganization and improvement of the service. Let me also ask, is it generically a thing upon which we must decide merit, that a man's name is Wolfe and not Jones? Is it the essence of a proposition that a man's name should not be Griffenhagen but might very well be Brown? We may have our likes as to names, but at the same time, in a matter of service performed, is it the name or is it the service that counts? It is quality and character; there can be no two opinions about that. Now, my hon. friend opposite made a very strong assertion,—he is apt to make strong assertions; he sometimes makes very strong assertions without good ground. His assertion in this case amounted to this: That a foreigner by the name of Wolfe stole into the sheepfold in Ottawa, took hold of a venerable member of the Civil Service, chucked him out of the service neck and crop, and put in his place—a man with German antecedents, if not a German name. What foundation has my hon. friend for making an assertion of that kind? He has not any.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I will give proof to the right hon. gentleman.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In the first place Arthur Young and Company had nothing to do with putting civil servants out of office, or putting people into office as civil servants; not one single iota of influence or right of action or power had they to exercise in that respect. Arthur Young and Company—regardless of whether it was a good thing to take that company or another—were employed by the Civil Service Commission to do what? To classify the positions in the Civil Service. The Civil Service Commission themselves made the placements and the re-placements, the retirements and the appointments, and Arthur Young and Company had nothing, good, bad or indifferent to do in connection therewith. The classification that they did was the classification of positions—ascertaining the qualifications for, and the scope of work of certain positions—and their experience enabled them to give valuable advice in that respect. They were asked to do it, paid to do it, they did it, and the positions were classified, in the main, according to their recommendations, modified by conferences between them and the Civil Service Commission. Once the positions were classified it became the duty, the sole duty, of the Civil Service Commission, by whatever tests they might use, to fill positions and to make retirements.

Now, Sir, if there is one piece of work that was ever performed on this Hill to the credit of the commission, and to the credit of the Government which helped or enabled to help it to be performed, it is the re-organization of the Bureau of Printing and Stationery. There will be a report placed before this House in a short time which will give the history of that re-organization. Let me say two or three words with reference thereto. An investigation was ordered by the Government of Canada and several years ago a committee of three, if I remember aright, was turned into that Printing Bureau and asked to make a report. The committee made a report and the members of the House know what that report was. On the groundwork of that report the Civil Service Commission engaged Arthur Young and Company not only to carry out the classification work but to organize that department—which meant what? Which meant to find out, in the first place what were the physical relations in the department not simply of the units of one branch of the service, but of the units of all the branches of the service. For instance they found on three, four or five flats, one unit each segregated on its flat and trying to carry on its work by communications with the other units. It was obvious that if you could get all the parts of a unit together that had a common basis of work, if you could get them close together and acting in unison you would do the work much more economically, much more quickly, and much more effectively, than if you had one unit in one building and another unit in another building elsewhere in the city. That simply goes to show the form of work that organization takes.

Now the company went to work. It passed through the Bureau, it performed its duties, and the organization was completed by the Civil Service Commission who placed every officer that is under it and displaced every civil servant that went out from it, not the organizing company itself. The results are seen. What are they? Four hundred-odd employees are not now at work there who were employed before that organization. Are we honest in our desire for economy? Is it right to get up here and say that this Hill is packed with civil servants, and then to turn round and rend the organization that has carried out the suggestion that you made? Four hundred-odd employees less are now at work in the Printing Bureau than were employed before the organization was carried out. What else must be added? From $500,000 to $600,000 a year is saved in salaries. You might save salaries and you might not get the work done; but the other point is this—that more work, better work, more congenial and more uniform, and characterized by an esprit de corps, is now done in the Printing Bureau than ever before. There you have the results. The same committee, minus one man who has since died, that made the initial investigation and pointed out the need for re-organization in the Bureau, the other day made a thorough investigation of the re-organized Bureau. Its report will be presented to the House, and it carries out absolutely just what I have stated in two or three sentences. You cannot judge a re-organization until it is completed and until it has had just a little time to work on the completed new basis. In this case it is seven or eight months since the re-organization went into full effect, and it has consequently settled down into the groove of actual and efficient work. That is the condition with reference to the Printing Bureau. What happened next? The Government saw how that work was done, they kept track of it every week it was going on; and when they saw not only that a great saving was effected, but that better work was performed with amelioration of the former conditions—not only as regards hand work and machine work but with respect to the work generally and with the resultant esprit de corps that comes from the operation of a body united and congenial—when the Government saw that they said: There is still more work to be done on this Hill. The suggestion has been made "Just leave it with the deputies and it will be done." We have had deputies on this Hill ever since 1867. The deputies have had powers, large powers, ever since. Deputies have sat from generation to generation in these very places that I have been speaking of; they have sat in the branches we are now organizing; and yet these things have gone on and organization has not taken place. There are great difficulties in a minister re-organizing a large department that he has the headship of. He has not the time to do it, he has not the knowledge necessary to do it, he cannot do it. A deputy head is almost in the same position, although he has an opportunity of being very much better acquainted with all the units in his department and the men in those units, than the minister has. But there are the facts of the case. In some way or other you have to get a breath of new inspiration from outside; you have to get a little bit of the light of modern business introduced innto a department; you have to get some new enterprize and some new initiative; to call the attention of a department to new business methods as they are so rapidly developing in the world of business to-day. The Government thought its duty was to extend re-organization. It immediately cast about to determine as to whom it should put in charge of that re-organization, and it engaged most of the men who had been in the employ of the Arthur Young Company, and who had worked in the former reorganization and classification, these men having taken over the mechanical organization work of Arthur Young and Company and transformed themselves into another company—which, by the way, is incorporated in Canada and has membership in Canada. Looking over the field, it came to the conclusion that these were the best men to undertake the reorganization of some of the departments on this Hill. Why? They had become familiarized with the circumstances and conditions of the service, in the reorganization of the Printing Bureau, and if you brought in a strange body of engineers they would have to acquire all this knowledge that these men already had. We thought that that was a qualification which we should take advantage of, and we did. We made a contract with Griffenhagen and Associates under which they were to give us certain engineering work for a certain amount of pay. We appointed a sub-committee of the Privy Council to have charge of the contract and to work out with these men and with the officers of the departments, in a spirit of co-operation and amity, improvements in the other departments.

5 p.m.

Mr. MURPHY: Will my right hon. friend allow me to ask a question?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY: Were Griffenhagen and Associates given any greater or different authority with regard to the replacing or displacing of officials than that which the Arthur Young Company had?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I will come to that. So we made the contract, and the sub-committee of Council has been working that matter out with those men. I have had the misfortune—or good fortune, I am not saying which—of being the chairman of that sub-committee, and I know the work which it has entailed and the amount of care which that sub-committee has given to the work. The same reorganization is being put into effect in two of the departments on the Hill, the Post Office Department and the Department of Customs and Inland Revenue, and in the course of a little while, longer or shorter, a perfected reorganization will be had in both those departments, as it has been had in the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.

What is the modus operandi? These gentlemen make their observations to find out the defects—where services are being duplicated, where unnecessary services are being performed; where modern methods of printing and machine work may take the place of hand labour; and when they have completed their observations they make their reports and their recommendations as to what is to be done to overcome those weaknesses and effect improvements. The sub-committee of Council, with what time and ability it has, goes carefully over those reports. Then those men and the officers of the departments get together and with the sub-committee come to points of agreement. I may say that in all the improvements which are being made in the two departments which are now under reorganization there has scarcely been a point upon which in the end Griffenhagen and Associates with their staff and with the deputy heads and other officers of the departments which are being reorganized have not come to a point of agreement, and the work has been carried on in co-operation. That does away with so much that has been said about sending a lot of men into a department, and without any co-operation with or knowledge of or implemented work from the department itself, letting them go hither and thither to do as they choose in these matters.

Now to answer my hon. friend's question. Griffenhagen and Associates to-day have no more power than Arthur Young and Company had before. When the sub-committee have considered Griffenhagen and Associates' reports, and have authorized the work to be taken in hand, then the officials of Griffenhagen and Associates and the officials of the department work together to carry it out.

Mr. MURPHY: My right hon. friend uses the word "to-day." I do not know whether he wishes to limit Griffenhagen and Associates' authority as to time. If so, I should like to ask what authority they had before to-day?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend must not have the least suspicion that I am trying to dodge the question.

Mr. MURPHY: I have not.

SIR GEORGE FOSTER: I am going to give him a flat, square answer, I am giving the methods so as to see how the final results were reached. The office work of Griffenhagen and Associates is simply to find out and recommend as to methods of work; and when their recommendation is agreed to by the sub-committee then Griffenhagen and Associates' duty is just to find out what services can be amalgamated, what can be done away with and what can be put in as an improvement in their place. And Griffenhagen and Associates never took Sidney Smith by the coat-collar and threw him out of the department any more than they could take Mr. Fripp by the coat collar and throw him out of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It was not their business, and they had nothing to do with it. If any changes are made they will be made by the Civil Service Commission, which alone can authorize retirements, transfers, appointments and promotions. Now, I hope I have answered that question fairly.

Mr. PROULX: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me a question?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: Why was Mr. Smith put out of the department?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I do not know that he has been put out. I do not know who will go out and who will not; that is for the Civil Service Commission. Neither the minister, nor the sub-committee, nor Griffenhagen and Associates have anything to say about that until the Civil Service Commission send in their report to the Council as to what shall be done in the way of retirements, appointments or otherwise. I am not going to pursue that question any further except to say that I am, and always have been, a protagonist of doing away with patronage, and my record in that respect is well known to this House. From the time I became a member I imbibed that idea, and I have always kept it and tried to forward it all that I possibly could.

Mr. FIELDING: In the census appointments?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I am coming to that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do not dodge that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend is a little " previous" about that. I am coming to that a little later on. But I am frank to say this, that in the multiplied work of Dominion administration over three or four thousand miles of territory, there is an area which can well be canvassed as to whether it shall be undertaken by the Civil Service Commission under their rules, or whether it shall be done in some other way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: "Hear, hear." That is a loophole which was opened by my hon. friend—a loophole which would be opened by every frank man on that side or on this side of the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: When you come to the appointment of a petty officer up in the Yukon, such as a caretaker or something like that, it is debatable whether you shall tie up everything to three men here in Ottawa in order to have that appointment made according to its rules. Do not let us forget to be frank and straightforward with each other in that respect. Now, in so far as there may be betterments in administration, I am open to the adoption of those betterments, but I am absolutely against putting patronage back either here or in the Outside Service, except under very exceptional circumstances, and there may be those very exceptional circumstances. It is a good thing to take advantage of the experience of others, and I take the experience—to go no further—of Great Britain and of the United States, both of whom have evolved, through centuries, Civil Service systems which are very effective and of a very high order. We can come to that same thing here in Canada. I do not want to go back to the old system of patronage. I felt my heart throb in response to sentiments expressed by the member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot), when he faintly adumbrated the joy and the pleasure of living in Ottawa as a public man in these days as compared with the times when patronage had full sway. My experience goes exactly on all-fours with his in that regard. Speaking from my own experience alone, under the system of patronage the member of Parliament is subjected to continual pulling and hauling, hectoring and domineering, all going to make up a process which goes on when the patronage gate is half open and the multitudes who would like to pass through have to be shaved down to the fractional number that can pass through—and the burden, compared with which the burden of Atlas was a holiday recreation—is borne by the member of Parliament.

Now, let me come just for a moment to the remarks of my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). When I came to consider the equipment necessary to the taking of the census, I approached the subject with a mind prepossessed in favour of having the Civil Service Commission take the matter in hand, but, like a good minister, I also had the exigencies of the service to take into account. I sat down with the Civil Service Commission; we canvassed the whole matter thoroughly, and then I asked the commission to make their will evident to council. They recommended that, so far as the census was concerned, being an emergent work distributed over the whole country and involving over 13,000 appointments, it would be impossible for them to undertake that work and do it in accordance with the exigencies of the situation. It is true that my hon. friend and all representatives in this House were asked by the Dominion statistician to furnish some information as to the boundaries of their constituencies and their relation to the boundaries of census commissioner districts. They gave that information, and it was utilized. When it came to the appointment of census commissioners and census enumerators, that under the law, is placed under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am responsible in the end for all these appointments, and as the quickest and most satisfactory way of dealing with the matter, I went back to the experience of all Governments from 1867 to the present time, and adopted the same policy. If I had had more time to think about it I might have thought out a scheme of my own, but I relied on the experience of the Fathers in that respect and trod in their footsteps. If my hon. friend had only written me a little earlier he might have received the answer that I would take into the very best consideration possible the representations that he had made. He was a little disappointed in that respect, but that must be attributed to the fact that he did not get an answer giving assurance of full and serious consideration. But, honest Indian, as they say, if the member for Quebec East had been in my position and I in his, would he have done very much differently?

I do not think I will labour the point any further. My main object, Mr. Speaker, was to clear up a slight misapprehension, which existed more widely than it should, as to the work which is being carried on in the reorganization of some departments.

Mr. BELAND: May I ask my right hon. friend how he comes to say that there will be about twenty-four thousand appointments? Is the estimate based on the number of polling districts in the country?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It comes about in this way: there are about 230 members in the House, some representing double constituencies, but most of them representing single constituencies. So that, at the least, you will have one census district for every member of Parliament in point of numbers. Some districts are so divided for economic or geographical purposes that you have to have more than one census commissioner for a district, but broadly speaking there will be about 230 commissioners. The enumeration has to take place within a very short time, and you have to have sufficient enumerators in each district to cover the ground in the period allotted. Altogether, the enumerators will number over 13,000 we do not know exactly how many there will be.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, of interfering in the interesting quarrel between the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and his friend the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp). According to the representations made by my friend from Ottawa, there has been in this Civil Service business gross mismanagement, gross extravagance, gross waste of public money. That is a statement made not by any hon. member on this side, but by a supporter of the Government, one who is in close touch with governmental departments here in Ottawa. At all events, if he has not made correct statements in the matter, it cannot be because of any lack of opportunity to get the facts. I leave that, however, as a matter between the right hon. gentleman and his friend from Ottawa.

So far as the Government have honestly endeavoured to abolish patronage, my sympathies have been with them. I raise no objection to it from the point of view of those who desire to exercise patronage. But my complaint is that the Government have not abolished patronage, although they have professed to do so. The Government of which I was a member introduced an effective Civil Service reform when they appointed a Civil Service Commission to deal with the Inside Service at Ottawa. I do not mean to say that the system then adopted was such a vast improvement in every department; even the old system of patronage, if you call it so, was capable, under wise administration, of giving to the people in general honest and faithful service. I shall speak for my own department, because it is the one of which I have the best knowledge. When I retired from that department, I believe I left, in the public service, a body of men, many of them appointed by me, many of them by my predecessors, as well qualified to administer the public service as any men that could be obtained under any system of competitive examination. That is my conviction, and I know my successors in office have testified to the quality of the men they found there. Although I mention what is the case in my department, I have no doubt that the same thing will apply to other departments as well. The principle, however, of examination is a good one; you have to have it; it is not perfect, but I do not know that anything better can be offered. I confess that within my opportunities and observation, I should like to have a man come into my office and sit down and talk to me, so as to let me have some knowledge of what he knows, what he is capable of doing, his capacity, his temperament, all that enters into the best qualities of a man. I should like to have that opportunity if I could. In the absence, however, of any better system, the system of examination seems to be the proper thing; at all events it gives you a test of a man's education and his qualifications from the educational point of view. Therefore, I agree with and support the principle of competitive examination as applied to the Inside Service at Ottawa. I believe that principle could properly have been extended, as the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) said this afternoon, to the large cities and towns, wherever you could adopt the principle of competitive examination. The Civil Service Commission was never intended to be a patronage distributing body; it was intended to conduct competitive examinations and to award prizes according to the marks achieved. That system could be followed out in the case of the Montreal customs house, the Montreal post office and such offices in St. John, Halifax, Toronto, Kingston and other of the larger cities. If the Government had gone that far, I think they would have made a further step in the right direction. They have gone a good deal further than that; and while I am not objecting to that, I do not think it is working out very well. When you undertake to appoint a petty officer of some sort—I am using the words of my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) when he spoke of a petty officer up in the Yukon—say a minor postmaster in one of the towns away down in the far-off districts of New Brunswick, how is the Civil Service Commission going to appoint that man? What knowledge can they get about him? There is no competitive examination. They put up a ticket stating that the office is vacant, and Tom, Dick and

Harry put in their applications. How can the Civil Service Commission adopt any system that will enable them properly to judge of those men's qualifications? They have to refer to somebody. What I suppose they will do to-day is to refer to the post office inspector of New Brunswick, and he will go down into that district and make inquiries of somebody in the neighbourhood. But he must be guarded; he must not, for his life, ask a member of Parliament, because the latter knows something about the matter. He has to ask somebody who knows nothing about it. The system is very much like the system of examining men for a jury. You cross-examine men as to their knowledge of the case, and by the time you are through, you almost reach the conclusion that only imbeciles are qualified to be on a jury at all. That is pushing the thing to the extreme. The absence of patronage does not worry me. When the Government went beyond where they could use the competitive examination, I think they went rather too far. Under the old system, if a vacancy occurred in a little post office in the constituency of one of my hon. friends opposite, he was notified and he selected some one on the advice of his friends and neighbours, and in nine cases out of ten the man whom he recommended was a decent, honest man. If he had not been so, he could not have been appointed. Under the new system, there is so much red tape that it takes months to fill a vacancy, and that in itself is an argument against the system. While I think the Government went further than necessary, I have no complaint to make except to point out that where there is no opportunity for competitive examination, I do not see how you can apply the system for which the Civil Service Commission was created. The point, however, which I desire to make to my hon. friends opposite is not that they have abolished patronage; my complaint is that they have not abolished patronage. The meanest kind of quality in mankind is hypocrisy, and it is just as mean in politics as it is in social life. Hon. gentlemen opposite made a great virtue of abolishing patronage; they put that plank in their platform; they talked about it throughout the country and in this House; they spoke about the glorious record of this Government in abolishing patronage. But what do we find? My right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) comes here to-day, and admits that in another month or two, in his own department 24,000 men are going to be appointed under the old patronage system. My right hon. friend has truly said that he has always denounced political patronage; but if he has been constant in denouncing it and then he practises it, what are we to think of him? I have in my hand an extract from a speech of my right hon. friend, in which he is giving us a picture of the evils of patronage. Perhaps, his picture is a little coloured, but he not only pictures the evils of patronage, but speaks of the great harm that is going to come to those who practise it, and I want him to take that to heart. This is a speech made by my right hon. friend some years ago. It will be found in the Hansard of 1916, at page 907:

Sir George Foster: Now, as to patronage, I have been thirty-four years in public life; I have been a pretty close student of political parties and political history in this country, and I have simply this to say—I give it as my individual opinion—I have long felt it and I feel it now—that in the whole course of my political life I cannot point to a single instance where political patronage ever raised the status of the bench, ever promoted the efficiency of the Civil Service, ever helped to economy in administration or enhanced the status of public administrators, no matter what functions they performed, ever helped a member of Parliament in reality, or ever strengthened a Government in reality.

I would draw my right hon. friend's attention to that. Even the present Government will not be strengthened in reality by his 24,000 appointments.

On the contrary it almost always causes the dry rot and disintegration that break up government after government and party after party,—

Think of that, 24,000 appointments made which will introduce dry rot which is going to break up the Government.

—and I wish now, in the white heat and light of this great contest and struggle and the self-sacrifice that we are called upon to make, that we might speak from the heart out, and make an agreement in this country between both parties, that hereafter patronage shall not be applied by political parties in the administration of our public services. Now, that is a frank admission. Some may say to me that I have no right to make it. I presume upon my grey beard and thirty-four years in public life, and I make that statement for what it is worth. I will just append to that one single sentence, and it is this; that if there is any laxity in the public virtue of this country to-day, if there is any canker of public corruption, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred you can trace it to the baleful effect of political party patronage.

Having reflected upon these pious utterances made not many months ago, the right hon. gentleman immediately, as he says himself, goes back to the old system and appoints 24,000 people under the system of patronage.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The old dry rot.

Mr. FIELDING: The old dry rot, the old corruption, and my right hon. friend will see now, if he applies his own words to the situation, the end that is awaiting him. I had a little experience like that of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). I have referred to it already; I may enlarge upon it now. A man in my constituency had heard somewhere that the members for the counties were going to nominate the census men, and wrote to me about it. I wrote him that I thought he was mistaken, but I would inquire. So I wrote to my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) intimating that I had had this question, and I would be glad to have an answer. I said I could understand that possibly the Civil Service Commission was going to make the appointments, and if so, I had no objection to make, but if for any reason —and I anticipated they would find a reason—they were not going to have the Civil Service Commission do it, I said perhaps the suggestion of my correspondent was all right—that if patronage had been abolished the members representing the various counties, irrespective of politics, should make the nominations. I got the answer that my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) did. They were going back to the old game. They were going to take nominations only from the members supporting the Government.

Mr. Speaker, this is a serious matter. I admit there might have been a difficulty in the Civil Service Commission making these appointments in the way they make others. Considering how long it takes to appoint a country postmaster, I do not know how long it would take them to appoint 24,000 officers, so I will not quarrel with my right hon. friend for assuming they could not do the job. But if he wanted to be honest in the matter why did he not say:—This is a case in which I will ask every member of Parliament to make nominations, no matter what his politics. Then he could have fairly said he was trying to abolish patronage. No, he could not do that. He has gone back to the old game. He has boasted and tried to take credit for the abolition of patronage, but he has returned to it now. How can he expect that the Government will be respected in this matter by the community at large in the face of the acknowledgment he makes to-day that he is not going to allow any hon. member on this side of the House to make any nomination? He is not going to abolish political patronage. He is going to use these 24,000 appointments in connection with the census as a corrupting agent, a canker, a dry rot, as he describes it here. He is going to use them in the old way. Yet he is going to stand before the people of this country and say: Oh, give us credit, for we abolished patronage.

Right Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I am not quite sure whether I am lost in admiration of the indignation—I wonder how real it is—of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), or whether I am covered with confusion, confusion in some measure for myself, but in large measure for my right hon. friend to my left (Sir George Foster). Woe is my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, for do we not all know that it is written, it is necessary that scandals should come, but woe to the man that bringeth them, even to the least among my children. It were better for him that he should have a millstone hanged about his neck and that he should be cast into the sea than that he should have given scandal to even the least among my children. And lo and behold, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce hath given scandal to one who counts among the greatest, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. That hon. gentleman is overwhelmed with indignation. He sees the coming back of the dry rot and the corruption that is going to undermine all that is good in this world. Why? Because on one occasion, which he himself admits is an occasion when the Civil Service Commission could not properly have made the appointments in question, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the performance of his duty undertook to make them. My hon. friend is scandalized because in the making of those appointments the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not think it necessary to consult the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's or the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who, we notice, was very ready to nominate his political friend. I wonder how it would have worked out as political patronage if application had been made to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the hon. member for Quebec East, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's as the hon. member for Quebec East had already done, absolutely without regard to considerations of political patronage, had found it absolutely impossible for him to nominate anybody save one of his most active political supporters for the position. I wonder how different the situation would have been then. I wonder whether his scathing language about hypocrisy does not find some landing place on the other side of the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us get down to commonsense, I respect the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's too much to believe that he was serious—he actually admits he was not serious, see the smile on his face —in the expression of indignation for which he could hardly find words. Why, he had just admitted himself that if there was fault to find with this Government in its Civil Service legislation, it was that it had gone too far. He pointed out, and, speaking for myself, he pointed out with a good deal of force, that when you have got to the stage where the competitive examination system is applied to the making of classes of appointments where that system could not find its application, he was bound to question whether you were not carrying the principle too far. I am prepared to concede that it is open to question, and that there is room for consideration in that regard. He had just admitted that, and then he treated us to all this mock indignation over the fact that census commissioners were chosen by the minister. So far as there has been reference to those who were chosen, we have been told they were eminently fit people; the hon. member for Quebec East gave us testimony in that regard, and then my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's raises his hands in holp horror because there are going to 24,000 enumerators appointed, all eminently fit people, by the commissioners whom the Minister of Trade and Commerce selects, and he speaks of the dry rot and corruption coming back again. Let us be serious. Let us proceed to the question with which we are concerned.

In so far as the principle embodied in the Civil Service legislation is concerned, for my part it commended itself to my judgment when that legislation was adopted. It commends itself to my judgment still. I do think that there are evils attached to purely political patronage against which the law should provide some system of check, and that, as I understand it, was the principle which underlay the Civil Service legislation as we have it at the present time. The principle is absolutely sound, in my judgment, but it is well to remember that when you come to put principles into practical application, however good those principles may be you must at the same time have the application of sound common sense. There was once a very great artist who was asked what he mixed his colours with to produce such beautiful results, and his answer was: "With brains, Sir." Now, when you come to apply any principle you must exercise common sense. We have had three years of experience in the working of this particular Civil Service legislation, and I see in that experience no reason to depart from the principle that underlies it, although I think that in the carrying out of the Act certain things may have developed that make it proper for us all to consider whether in the practical application of the principle there is not room for improvement, and whether you would not, perhaps, obtain better results, from the point of view of efficiency in the public service as well as from the standpoint of economy—which, after all, is the objective of those who are held responsible for the working of the system,—if certain of the provisions of the Act were modified. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) has indicated a line of consideration, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) quite agrees, I understand, with the view implied therein, that is, as to whether the application of the principle indiscriminately to all classes of public servants is wise in the interests of the efficiency of the public service. Just to take one class that occurs to my mind at the moment. I am not expressing any final conclusion as to what ought to be done, but I think it is fair for us to put before the House things that present themselves to our minds as indicating a possible necessity for modification in the law as it stands. Let us take one class—a numerous one—those men who have to be employed in purely manual labour. Now, there is a case where certainly you cannot apply any system of competitive examination, and it seems to be a question that calls for serious consideration whether it might not be advisable to withdraw that class of people from the operation of the provisions of the present Civil Service Act. Reference has been made to rural postmasters. Possibly, it might be to the advantage of the public service that they should be withdrawn from the control of this Act; and in the very carrying out of the Act itself it would seem to me, while adhering to its principle, while seeing to it that proper precautions are taken against abuses of political patronage, that at all events, we should consider the wisdom of making such provision for the exercise of direction on the part of those who are ultimately responsible to the public as would create some corresponding relation between that responsibility—which, under our system of government, both governments and members of Parliament cannot avoid—and some measure of opportunity for being heard in connection with those things for which they are held responsible.

We have heard a good deal this afternoon on the merits of this suggestion. None of us can have his eyes closed to the situation created by the Act, and it is not impossible that, in the first fervour of the desire for absolute reform, some things may have been overlooked that should have been taken cognizance of, and perhaps the pendulum was allowed to swing too far in one direction. These are things that call for consideration. They have been receiving the attention of the Government, and with the additional light which has been thrown on the subject this afternoon, it is the purpose of the Government further to consider the question as to what modification, if any, might in the public interest be made in the present law, and more particularly in the present system of its application. And in view of this declaration which I am now making, I understand —and this, I believe, was anticipated—that the hon. gentleman who made the motion, is prepared to withdraw it.

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): Before the hon. gentleman who has introduced the resolution either withdraws it or puts it to the decision of the House, I wish to offer a few remarks on the subject with which it deals. I cannot support the resolution because I contend that it is vicious in principle and unfounded in fact. The assertion that it is vicious in principle I base upon the remarks that have been made by previous speakers during this debate. There is no doubt that a Civil Service which is to offer the required standard of efficiency should be a service altogether outside of the evils of patronage. This has been recognized in every truly civilized country. It has been recognized for years in Great Britain. The system has been introduced in the United States recently, and, so far as Canada is concerned, this reform, as in the case of practically every other great reform in this country, was first talked of and then put upon our statute books by the Liberal party, under the leadership of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The reform of the Civil Service in regard to patronage is, therefore, I say, a good one, and this legislation aiming at its abrogation is vicious in principle. I said that the resolution was not only vicious in principle, but that it was, as regards the present Government, unfounded in fact, and I will explain that contention. I see no reason why Government supporters on the other side of the House should complain that political patronage has been taken from their hands. Every day, every month, every year since 1911, and particularly since 1917, political patronage has been rampant. It has blossomed and has flourished under the present system. No appointment of any importance has been made in this country except through political patronage, and only appointments of no importance have been left to the Civil Service Commission. The reason for this is quite obvious. Why, even when a law is being introduced in this Parliament, we find patronage prevails. If it provides for appointments to important positions carrying with them fat salaries, in most cases a clause is inserted in the Act, and special provision is made in the estimates, providing that the appointment shall not be subject to the Civil Service Act.

I do not wish to detain the House very long, I merely desire to say this further: Not only on general lines has this Government preserved and maintained the system of patronage, but in the province of Quebec especially, patronage has always existed since 1911. And when I was listening to the hon. gentleman who spoke of the Department of Justice I was wondering if he really wanted to be serious or whether he was trying to be humorous. In the cities of Montreal and Quebec, in every city of importance in that province, not an appointment is made in any branch of the service without the political leaders supporting the Government being consulted. We all know that. My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has referred to judicial appointments. The judiciary in our province is highly respected, and that is because it deserves to be respected. I desire to say, however, that as far as the Minister of Justice is concerned, since he has had to choose the judges in our province his choice in the majority of cases has been most happy. I therefore do not wish to offer any criticism, but simply to call attention to one instance which shows that even when appointments to the very highest posts are made politics are not excluded.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CANNON: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will not refer to that one instance. It is a well-established rule that nothing shall be said in debate which in any way reflects upon the judiciary. If it is desired to call in question any such matter there is a well-known rule of procedure to be followed.

Mr. CANNON: I do not wish to reflect upon any member of the Bench, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that not very long ago a gentleman highly respected, a gentleman recommended by all the members of the local bar and who was the batonnier of our province was not appointed to the Bench, and the reason given why he was not appointed, notwithstanding all his qualifications, was that he happened to be the partner of a Liberal minister in the provincial Cabinet. Mr. Speaker, I say that when such a condition exists the Government supporters ought to—

Mr. DOHERTY: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, in view of the statement which he has made, I presume I am responsible for the fact that the gentleman referred to was not appointed.

Mr. CANNON: I hope not.

Mr. DOHERTY: I presume I am responsible since, of course, I officially made the nomination of the gentleman who was appointed to the vacancy which otherwise the gentleman alluded to might have filled. Let me assure the hon. gentleman, that if he was informed that in the decision come to the fact that the gentleman to whom he refers was the partner of a Liberal member of the profession had anything to do with the decision arrived at at that time, he was entirely misinformed.

Mr. CANNON: As far as my right hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) is concerned, let me say that when he was out of the Chamber I stated that I wished to congratulate him upon the appointments he has made to the Bench in the province of Quebec, in most cases, since he has been Minister of Justice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the last instance to be brought to your attention as to the exercise of patronage, not only in the province of Quebec but throughout the Dominion, is that of the appointment of census commissioners. I have before me the list of the census commissioners appointed in the several constituencies in the province of Quebec. We may look this list over once, twice and three times, and nowhere will be found the name of one gentleman who might have been, or who might be, directly or indirectly connected with the Liberal party in any way whatsoever.

An hon. MEMBER: Bleu.

Mr. CANNON: In our city of Quebec every name on this list is the name of a true Bleu. With respect to the gentleman appointed in my constituency I do not wish to offer any criticism, he is an honest, respectable man and I am quite sure will perform his duties with satisfaction to the public. But the point is this: Why should the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when addressing the House in eloquent terms as he did this afternoon state the enormous sums of money which have been spent all over this country to bring about Civil Service reform and the abolition of patronage, and yet when the right hon. gentleman himself as a minister, has to make appointments in Canada, as a truly reactionary Tory he goes back to the system that existed forty years ago and to every post appoints one of his own friends? Let the right hon. gentleman do so if he wishes, but if he is a supporter and partisan of patronage in civil appointments let him get up here and say so. Mr. Speaker, I go further. The list to which I refer—not drawn up by my right hon. friend I know, but by the two ministers representing our province, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) and the Postmaster General—shows that in every constituency these two gentlemen have chosen former Tory members or former Tory candidates. It is their right to do so, but let them have the courage to get up in the House and admit the fact, and let this Government cease squandering hundreds of thousands of dollars on so-called Civil Service reform and cease pretending to the people of this country that they are trying to abolish patronage. On this question, as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has said, let us be honest and let us cease to be hypocrites. This is the stand taken by hon. gentlemen on this side and I think it is the stand supported by the majority of hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1911 there was promulgated something which has since been forgotten, I refer to the Halifax platform. That platform contained a plank declaring that patronage should be abolished. In 1917 this Government went to the country and one of the main planks in its platform was a similar declaration. I say, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding all the promises and declarations made by the Tory party in Canada, notwithstanding the enormous sums of money expended by this Government to reform the Civil Service, notwithstanding the scandal of Griffenhagen and other American experts imported into Canada to do things that Canadian experts could have done and done much better—notwithstanding all this I say that the present Government stands to-day in favour of patronage. The Government shows it in all its acts and appointments. The money that has been spent is money uselessly spent, and the promises made will never be kept by the present administration.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon) followed his customary practice of general fault finding, but I must say he did not indulge himself to his usual extent in those violent adjectives and political pyrotechnics with which he is prone to decorate his speeches in this House. The hon. gentleman was good enough to commend the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) for certain appointments to the bench in the province of Quebec. I am rather inclined to think that inasmuch as the hon. gentleman did not commend the minister for all the appointments made, the right hon. gentleman is perhaps to be congratulated more on the appointments which did not meet the approval of the hon. member for Dorchester than on those which did.

The hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks endorsed the word "hypocrisy" which was used by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and also repeated the advice of that hon. gentleman to the effect that henceforth we should be honest—politically honest. Well, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the thought comes rather late from these hon. gentlemen, especially from the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. However, the aspiration is a worthy one, and I trust that the hon. member will be spared for very many years to demonstrate his sincerity and to retrieve some of his past in this regard.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's referred to the Halifax programme and to a plank therein relating to patronage, and charged that this Government was guilty of hypocrisy or insincerity in not redeeming that plank. I do not know any hon. gentleman in this House who is running a greater risk than the hon. member if we are to define political insincerity as he defines it. A Liberal platform was issued in 1893, and if non-fulfilment of that platform for fifteen years warrants any person in charging with political insincerity those who failed to fulfil it, then I am afraid my hon. friend will occupy a very unfortunate position. And more recently we have the Liberal platform of 1919, which I think he indicated not so very long ago that he could not follow out in its entirety. But last year the hon. gentleman stated in this House:

> I think myself that we find that we are all prone in framing platforms to put things perhaps a little more strongly than is wise, and we all find when we come to the responsibility of office that we may have to modify our views.

Well, the hon. gentleman could speak feelingly in that respect, for he has had a great deal to do with the framing of platforms, and, if I may say so, with disregarding them afterwards. Now, Sir, in regard to the appointment of census enumerators, it has been conceded by one or two gentlemen opposite—I think I am correct in saying by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, and the hon. member for Gaspe and Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux)—that the Civil Service Act has gone too far. I think those are pretty nearly the words used by both those hon. gentlemen. It seems to me that they are right. Time has demonstrated that the Civil Service Act has gone too far, and our position in regard to appointments to the Civil Service is absolutely illogical and ridiculous. In so far as making appointments for the taking of the census is concerned, surely the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's should be the last to complain. We had a census taken in 1911, when that hon. gentleman was a member of the Government, and I know I am right in saying that to all positions from the Atlantic and to the Pacific only their own political friends were appointed. There was no Civil Service Commission at that time to make those appointments; it never was thought of. In the county which I have the honour to represent the patronage was handed over to the defeated candidate. The appointments were made through that gentleman, and the work, I believe, was well done. It became quite apparent to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) that the Civil Service Commission could not possibly make these census appointments. That has been agreed to by hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken, and who at the same time charged the Government with political patronage in this particular. Well, if the machinery provided by the Civil Service Act proved to be inadequate for the purpose, then it strikes me as a very natural thing for an old politician-statesman like the right ron. Minister of Trade and Commerce to fall back on a custom which has been in vogue in this country from time immemorial.

The hon. member for the two constituencies in the province of Quebec, the rural constituency of Gaspé and the industrial constituency of Maisonneuve, appears to be very much perturbed about the possibility of a return to patronage. He pictured in lurid language the horrors to which a member used to be subjected by patronage seekers, how he was worried and heckled and disturbed from morning till night. Well, Mr. Speaker, I can suggest to the hon. gentleman one way by which he, at least, could cut his worries in half should there be a return to the patronage system—by just resigning one of his two constituencies. I fancy every hon. member would think himself very fortunate if he could reduce all his political worries as easily as could the hon. gentleman. It is not my intention to discuss this resolution at any great length. I have spoken on this matter before, and I am perfectly consistent tonight when I express my opposition to the appointment to offices in this country being left in the hands of the Civil Service Commission. I am saying now something that I have said before in this House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You mean the Inside Service too?

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, I am more concerned, naturally, about the Outside Service, but I would go beyond that and say I think a mistake was made in handing over the making of appointments for both the Inside and the Outside Services to a Civil Service Commission. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for any three men occupying offices in Ottawa, I care not how capable they are, to make appointments to positions in all parts of this great country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They cannot do it; the thing is not only impracticable, but impossible. They must seek advice from some source or from some person, whether the appointment is in British Columbia or in Nova Scotia—and I mention the extreme West and the extreme East in order to emphasize the impossibility of any three men in Ottawa carrying on that work. Under the present system these three gentlemen—and I say nothing whatever against them or their capabilities—are responsible for the selection of persons to fill positions in all parts of the country. But if a man is to be appointed in British Columbia or in Kingston, they cannot run out to British Columbia or to Kingston and investigate the matter personally; they must apply to some person in British Columbia or in Kingston on whom they can rely. The ridiculous and illogical feature of it is that they must not under any circumstances seek the advice of the member for the constituency, although the efficiency or inefficiency of the service depends upon whether or not the appointment is a good one—and the member for the constituency is the man who is held responsible for the proper carrying on of the work. The whole thing seems to me to be absolutely illogical.

I have no doubt that the intention was a good one when it was thought fit to make these appointments through a body of men here in Ottawa, but time and again we have had evidence of their inability to carry on. On some occasions they have advertised for applicants for a position and have literally been deluged with applications, whereupon they have delegated to men chosen by themselves the task of going over these hundreds of applications and weeding them out. Is that getting rid of patronage? It is merely the transfer of the work to some person who is responsible to no one.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) said that he would not have the operations of the Civil Service Commission apply to the appointment of country postmasters and incumbents of small offices of that kind. But the principle is the same whether it is applied to some country post office or some larger office; I cannot see how it is possible for a board of three men to look into the merits or demerits of cases as they come before them and make proper selections. I do not think it is right; I do not think it is in the interests of the country. Moreover, the present system is most undemocratic. There is no more democratic way in making appointments to these positions than through the recommendation of the member. Suppose a postmaster is to be appointed, we will say, in the county of Frontenac. Now, what happens? If I have any astuteness as a politician I certainly am going to ascertain what the people in that particular locality want. I am merely their representative or mouthpiece; they are the ones who are making the appointment. I contend, therefore, that the appointment through the member, the member then being held responsible, is by far a more democratic method than the making of appointments through a Civil Service Commission.

Now, I am going to express my candid opinion as to what should be done. I would like to see the Government remove at least the Outside Service, from the control of the Civil Service Commission. I want to go further than that and state what my position is—and I am speaking only for myself. I would—call it patronage if you like—place the responsibility on the member for the making of appointments in his constituency, regardless of what side of the House he sat on or what party he supported. In this respect my view will probably differ from that of many hon. gentlemen in this House. But it does seem to me that when the people of a constituency expresses their wish at the polls to have a certain man do their business for them, that man should be entrusted with the recommendations for that constituency, not the man whom the people said they did not want to do that business for them. I would be willing to support this resolution if it were amended along the lines I have suggested. I repeat that this is merely my own view in regard to the matter. At all events, if that course were taken, the charge of making use of this responsibility for political purposes would, necessarily, very largely disappear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Would my hon. friend not maintain the commission for the appointment in the Civil Service here at Ottawa of technical officers and so on?

Mr. EDWARDS: That probably might be done. I think also that the Civil Service Commission can serve a very useful purpose in setting examination papers and examining candidates for important positions. You can have that examination test if you like; I would raise no objection to that. But for my part, I do not see how a minister of the Crown gets along in running his department. He must have a deputy minister; he must have certain clerks who will devote their whole time to the study of the details of his department. Here is a body of three men in Ottawa who have the say as to who is going to handle this, that, or the other branch of that department. The minister is held responsible for the proper administration of his department, but he has nothing to say as to whether this clerk can or cannot perform more effective work than another in a certain branch. The decision in that regard rests with three gentlemen who cannot possibly understand the situation as well as he does, and who must apply to someone else with more knowledge of the subject than they can possibly possess. So I charge against the system as it is now that it must result in inefficient administration of the detailed work of a department; that no person can judge better than the minister and his deputy as to the arrangement of the clerks and officials in his particular department, and to take that duty out of his hands and put it into the hands of a board of three men, is, it seems to me, illogical and not in the best interests of the conduct of his department.

That is all, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to say in regard to the matter. It is not that I have any desire as a member of this House to handle the patronage pertaining to my constituency. In fact, I am sure, representing as I do a rural constituency, I am only saying what applies to practically every other rural constituency, namely, that the patronage does not amount to a hill of beans so far as the member is concerned; but the responsibility is there just the same. I do not care if the appointment is merely that of a country postmaster; if you put in a person whom the people of that section do not want and who is really not a proper person to occupy that office, while, under present conditions, the member has nothing to say about the appointment of that man, the member will undoubtedly be held responsible if that man proves inefficient in his position.

Mr. I. E. PEDLOW (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on this resolution, let me at the outset associate myself with those who have preceded me in this discussion with kind thoughts and words of appreciation of the effort made by the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes). That gallant member has shown distinctly this afternoon the reason for the splendid work accomplished by him in the early stages of the war; he has shown the stuff of which he is made when, in his condition physically, he can come before this House and present a case in the manner in which he has presented it this afternoon. His effort deserves the congratulation of the House and the admiration of members on both sides.

Like the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon), I cannot support the resolution in its entirety. I would though be in favour of some of the provisions of the resolution. Like the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), I decline to subscribe to a condition that permits the defeated candidate in a constituency to have charge of the appointments in that constituency. I agree absolutely with the hon. member that the elected member, the person selected by the people as the fit and proper person to represent them on the floor of this House, should also represent them in the constituency in matters of that kind. I regret though that I cannot follow my genial friend any further in his remarks, nor agree with them, particularly, as regards the reference he made to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), when he spoke of that hon. gentleman's insincerity during his term of office, which was from 1896 to 1911. When the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's took charge of the finances of this Dominion, and when the government of which he was a member took control of the affairs of this Dominion, in 1896, those who are interested in the political affairs of the country know well the condition that obtained in Canada then; that there was depression on every hand and that the country was in almost a state of rebellion. But, as has been stated on the floor of this House, again and again, and on many platforms throughout the country, notwithstanding the moderate reductions made in the tariff by the hon. member who then controlled the destinies of the finances of this country—

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will not forget that we are discussing the question of patronage as proposed in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Victoria. I think it would be unfortunate if the hon. gentleman went on to discuss the general administration of a former Government.

Mr. PEDLOW: In duty bound, I bow to the ruling of the Chair and I do so gracefully. I was merely replying to a point raised by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards).

Mr. SPEAKER: The point raised by the hon. member for Frontenac had to do with the question of the consistency of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's on the question of patronage. It had nothing to do with his administration in other respects.

Mr. PEDLOW: I had just about reached that point, Sir, when you called me to order. The then Minister of Finance proved conclusively that he had, during his term of office, saved the citizens of this country a sum of no less than $300,000,000 in customs duties. In this respect I claim that the then Minister of Finance was absolutely sincere in following the Liberal platform of 1893, and in this regard I think the hon. member for Frontenac was hardly fair to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's.

To return to the question that is immediately under discussion, the resolution moved by the hon. member for Victoria, and some of the remarks that have followed in regard to that subject, I claim that the defeated candidate has no right to have control of the patronage, if you like to call it that, in any constituency. The sitting member, as the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) has so well expressed the matter, the elected member for any constituency, regardless to which party he belongs, has and should have the right to represent his constituents both in this House and in the constituency.

Let me look for a moment at the condition of the Civil Service of this country. What do those of us who have had the privilege of going around the various departments find? Do we find peace and contentment? I am sorry to say that, in my judgment, the very opposite prevails. There is on every hand discontent, dissatisfaction and unrest, and the classification that has recently been made by the firm that was imported from the country to the south of us to do the work is, to a large extent, responsible for that condition. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) this afternoon made reference to the magnificent work accomplished by that concern, Arthur Young and Company and also Griffenhagen and Company, more particularly in the Printing Bureau. He claimed a great improvement in the efficiency and output of that department and so on. But since coming to Ottawa three weeks ago, I have been informed that the output of that department has been greatly reduced since those dismissals have taken place, and I understand that a large quantity of the printing that was formerly done by the Printing Bureau is now done by offices throughout the city of Ottawa outside of the Government service, that work being paid for by the Government, so that the large amount of saving that is claimed by the Government through the dismissal of those 400 employees is to a large extent, a myth.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce intimated that part of the work accomplished by Young and Company was classification of positions and outline of requirements of the various departments. I found, on looking through the volume on classification of last session that one of the qualifications that was required was rather interesting and I will read it to the House. "Employees for the Senate cloak room." These employees were, amongst other things, required to be capable of rendering first aid. I have often wondered why this provision.

I agree most heartily with the conclusions arrived at by the hon. member for Maisonneuve and Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), that the Civil Service Commission is doing a good work in this country. If this commission is developed along proper business lines and receives the assistance of those in the service, the heads of the departments, and if the Government will only place on the deputy ministers and the heads of each department, the responsibility that should be placed on them and pay them in proportion, not necessarily to length of service, but to the results produced by them, then and then only will this Government receive efficient service at the hands of the various departments of the Government.

The Minister of Justice claims that the underlying principle of the Civil Service legislation is good, but that there is room for improvement. I agree with him. I should like to know what institution of human origin is perfect. Even in their old age they go on improving from day to day, from week to week, and year to year. Notwithstanding the many shortcomings that have been observed in the operation of the Civil Service Commission in Ottawa, I have no hesitation in saying that it has already accomplished much, and I believe that if the commission receive the assistance and support they deserve at the hands of the Government and of Parliament they will accomplish much in the years to come, will accomplish much in the years to come.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) stated that the Civil Service is undoubtedly sound and British to the core. I know something of the Civil Service in the Old Land, and the underlying principles that obtain there. Those principles are that appointments to the service shall be upon competitive examination, and that promotions shall be based on length of service and ability. That is why the Civil Service of Great Britain is the admiration of governments the world over. I think that the system of competitive examination is the proper method of making appointments, to the Inside Service at least. There is a good deal in what has been claimed by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) with regard to the Outside Service. These latter appointments, I have no hesitation in saying, should be left to a large extent in the hands of the elected member. I do not make this statement because I desire to obtain work of that kind, for I know it is irksome and will not be a pleasant duty for any hon. member to perform. I am sure he will find that instead of it being a political advantage, it will be a disadvantage. However, he is the man best able to perform work of that kind.

We have heard very much this afternoon on the subject of patronage. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is apparently adverse to patronage except in exceptional circumstances. Apparently he thinks that circumstances alter cases, and the exigencies of the situation appeal to him whenever that is necessary.

The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) entertained the House this afternoon with some correspondence they had had with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I have also had occasion to deal with this question of the appointment of census commissioners and enumerators. The impression seems to have been very general throughout the constituency of South Renfrew, largely, no doubt, due to the claim made by my opponent and his associates in the election of 1917, that patronage would be done away with if the Union Government were elected, that patronage actually had been abolished, and as a result I have been almost deluged with requests from individuals in every part of my riding for my influence in securing them an appointment as enumerator. I am not at all surprised they were of the opinion that I could assist them. Like my hon. friend from Quebec East, I also received a communication on Oct. 30th regarding the census of 1921. I shall not read the entire communication, but it sets forth what was stated by my hon. friend from Quebec

East this afternoon, enclosed a schedule of polling subdivisions, and asked me for a considerable amount of information. Feeling this was an olive branch thrown out along the line of the claims made by the Union Government in 1917, and since, I thought as the representative of the riding I would be quite justified in sending in the information asked for, which entailed a considerable amount of work, I wrote:

If you think I can be of any further assistance to you in this regard kindly write me again, and be sure and return the enclosed proclamation.

I had forwarded a proclamation giving information as to the different polling subdivisions. I went on:

Do you wish me to name some fit and proper person for the position of chief enumerator for the district of South Renfrew, or is it the intention of the Government to have the appointees named by the Government candidate in the last election? It occurs to me that possibly now that the "patronage system" has been done away with, the duly elected representative in each riding will be consulted in matters of this kind.

I did not receive a reply to that part of my letter at that time, but some time later I received a letter from a friend in Toronto, a gentleman I have known for a great many years, and who has been employed on the teaching staff of one of the collegiate institutes there. He wrote in part as follows:

We male teachers were talking at the collegiate about the taking of the census next year. Two or three years ago we helped in the registration and did our work for nothing. We think we should not be overlooked now. We, in the city here, are free early in the month of June and none can do the work better. Let patronage under our friend Meighen die, and give the appointments to teachers rather than to politicians.

I quoted that extract in a letter I wrote on November 15, to Mr. Coates as follows:

I have just received a letter to-day from a Toronto friend who is a teacher in one of the Collegiate Institutes in the city of Toronto, and I am taking the liberty of quoting the following extract from him.

That is, the quotation I have just read.

Now, I have no idea as to what arrangements your department proposes in regard to this matter, but it does strike we that the proposition made by my correspondent is a most excellent one, and deserves your earnest consideration. Men of this class are, undoubtedly, the best fitted for work of this kind, and there is no doubt about it, but that those selected for this work should be selected, regardless of politics. Patronage, which is supposed to have been buried since 1917, certainly should find no place in this work, and I sincerely trust your department will consider the subject along the lines suggested in the above quotation. By the way, your letter to me on November 2nd instant, in answer to mine of November 1st, did not give a reply to the last paragraph, of that communication, and I have been wondering since if it was an oversight on your part.

I refer there to the paragraph I read a moment ago. Some days later I received the following communication from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, signed by R. H. Coates, Dominion Statistician:

Dear Mr. Pedlow, I have yours of November 15, and agree that the school teachers would make excellent enumerators. A difficulty in the way is the fact that the census will be taken on June 1, 1921, and we shall complete the work in the field within the next following three weeks, during which time, of course, the schools are still open. Our census, as you know, is a rather elaborate inquiry. The matter of the appointment of enumerators will not arise until about March next, when your suggestion will be fully considered. The census commissioners and enumerators will be appointed, as in previous censuses, namely, on the nomination of the Government. It is the intention to place the appointment of enumerators more directly under the commissioners and to hold the latter somewhat more responsible for them than in previous censuses. We took the matter up in detail with the Civil Service Commission, at whose suggestion the appointment of the field staff was left at the discretion of the department. The staff to be appointed for the work of compilation will, however, be named by the Civil Service Commission. I regret the delay in answering your previous inquiry in this matter, which is due to my absence from the city of Ottawa.

Now, I reported to my friend in Toronto, from whom I received a reply, and I shall quote the following short extract:

Toronto, December 11.—I have been informed just lately by Mr. Mowat that I shall have to see certain members of the Ward Conservative Association if I wish an appointment. So you see the ward heeler still has the pull and the teachers will simply stand aside and watch the other fellow perhaps less competent do the trick.

As I have already stated, I have received, in consequence of the impression left in my riding, hundreds of communications asking me to appoint different persons in different sections of the riding as enumerators. But in every case I have replied that it was not within my province to do work of that kind, another gentleman in the riding, whose name I shall refer to later on apparently having been considered by the Government the fit and proper person to attend to this matter on behalf of the constituency. In this instance, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), who has always supported the abolition of patronage, is apparently in the position of the Apostle Paul who says: "For the good that I would, I do not; and the evil which I would not that I do"; and "when I would do good, evil is present with me." He also reminds one of Lot's wife, who, when leaving the wicked cities of Sodom and Gomorrah—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. PEDLOW: Looked back on the pleasures of sin and was turned into a pillar of salt. Although the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his associates in the Government profess to have turned their backs on the evils of party patronage, in their heart of hearts, they still long for it. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot) said that he hated the present system, which he described as unbusinesslike, unsatisfactory, and unfair, and I agree with all that he has said. Why this hypocrisy, this insincerity, and all this humbug? The word "humbug" has been used rather frequently to-day, and I do not know a more appropriate word in this connection. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and his staff of 24,000 census employees bring to my mind the utterance of a celebrated citizen of this world who exclaimed: "Oh, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." But there is this difference in the present instance, that the Government members and the Government defeated candidates all over the country have done the gathering in of these 24,000 of the faithful to perform the compilation of the census returns. Mr. Speaker, "there is not so great faith," no, not in all Canada, as this method of doing away with party patronage serves to illustrate.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to ask what my hon. friend has been quoting from?

An hon. MEMBER: The Bible.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am afraid the hon. member who asks this question is more conversant with overages in the wheat business and—

An hon. MEMBER: And Chinese immigration.

Mr. PEDLOW: Overages and Chinese immigration—

Mr. LEMIEUX: And dry docks.

Mr. PEDLOW—and apples and cabinet positions—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. PEDLOW:—than he is with the source from which I have been quoting—the Book of Books. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would ask this question in all seriousness: Is the Government really sincere in its protestations?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. PEDLOW: Let us see what happened in 1917 during the election. I am sure that other constituencies, like mine, were invaded by a flow of oratory and eloquence from one end to the other. The principal claim advanced for the support of the electorate was based on the issue of winning the war, and the Unionist party brought the gallant colonel, who was my opponent, all the way from France to win the war in South Renfrew. Among other things it was contended that there would be no more political parties in the future, that henceforward members would all belong to one party, that there was going to be a love feast down here at Ottawa after the election, and that there would not be any more patronage. As I have already stated that is one of the reasons why I, for one, have been besieged with requests for the nomination of parties to do the work of taking the census in the south riding of Renfrew. Before proceeding further with this branch of the subject I would like to draw attention to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on Saturday, August 14, 1920. In that article I find the following:

> Mr. Mackenzie King in his speech at Paisley asked what constructive legislation Union Government had passed.

The Journal says:

> That is an easy question. No Canadian Government ever passed so much advanced legislation. Here are four examples: The abolition of patronage—and so on.

I would like to show the House further what, according to my experience, actually happened in connection with the abolition of patronage, and I am going to quote from some correspondence that I had with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) in his concluding remarks wondered what the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) would do if they had been requested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to name a fit and proper person to oversee the taking of the census in their respective constituencies. No such request was made to them, I understand, by the minister. Had the member for Quebec East been asked to make such an appointment he would doubtless have replied that it would be impossible for him to find anybody in his constituency but a Liberal to appoint to such a position; and I am sure the member for Shelburne and Queen's could have made a suitable appointment from his constituency. But I have here a letter from the Minister of Trade and Commerce asking me to nominate a person for the position of returning officer in the forthcoming referendum in South Renfrew. The letter which is dated July 15, 1920, is as follows:

Dear Sir:— It is necessary to have an appointment made of a returning officer for the prohibition referendum which is soon to be held in the Province of Ontario. It has been usual, I think, to appoint the Sheriff or Registrar of the County and, failing these, a good and capable man.

Dr. Reid has had matter more in charge but has just left for British Columbia. He has sent me in a list of persons recommended and I find that your riding is vacant. I therefore take it that you have not recommended anyone. Would you kindly attend to this matter at once as the Secretary of State is anxious to get the names in hand. It will prevent further correspondence and much trouble will be saved if you will send in the full name of the man you recommend, his occupation, address, and the locality or building in which he will sum up the votes.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) G. E. FOSTER.

Mr. DUFF: Who is the letter addressed to?

Mr. PEDLOW: It is addressed to "I. E. Pedlow, Esq., M.P., Renfrew, Ont." I took it for granted—

Mr. DUFF: That there was something doing.

Mr. PEDLOW: —that the Government were really sincere up to that time. On July 17th, I replied to the right hon. gentleman as follows:

Dear Sir,—Your favor of the 15th, inst. is the first intimation I have had that I was expected to name a suitable person for the position of returning officer for the prohibition referendum for the South Riding of the county of Renfrew.

I have, however, very great pleasure in recommending Albert Edwin Bradwin, Editor and Proprietor, "The Watchman" newspaper, Arnprior, Ont., as a suitable person for this appointment. The votes will be summed up in the Town Hall Arnprior.

The sheriff or registrar of the county, resides in the North Riding of the County of Renfrew, consequently, I do not consider either of these officials eligible for the position, and this is the reason why I am submitting the above named gentleman, who, I feel confident, will fill the position satisfactorily.

Yours very truly,

Mr. CAHILL: Was he appointed?

[Mr. Pedlow.]

Mr. PEDLOW: The balance of the correspondence will show what happened if my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience. Nine days later I was informed that the communication of July 15th, was sent me in error, and that it should have been sent to Lieutenant Colonel Martin, who was the defeated candidate in South Renfrew in the 1917 election.

Mr. DUFF: How did you find that out?

Mr. PEDLOW: I have a communication here which explains that, but it is marked "Personal and Private." If I had the permission of the writer to do so I would certainly like to place the letter on Hansard.

Mr. CHISHOLM: I fear you will not get the permission.

Mr. PEDLOW: On the day I received this communication I called up the secretary of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was in charge of the office during the Minister's absence, and explained to him the unfortunate position in which I had been placed at the time, because I had informed Mr. Bradwin that I had recommended him for the appointment, and he in turn had told his friends of it and it had become public property. Therefore I asked that the nomination which I had made should be confirmed. The secretary of the Minister of Trade and Commerce assured me that he would look into the matter and see if the nomination I had made could be confirmed. He promised to write me, but from that day to this I have not heard anything further from him in regard to the subject. I then called the Prime Minister up on the phone. He too undertook to make inquiries into the matter and see if it were not possible to have the gentleman nominated by me appointed to the position. He likewise was to have written me but did not do so. I therefore wrote to the Prime Minister as follows:

9 p.m.

RENFREW, ONT., August, 3, 1920.

Dear Mr. Meighen,—Following our phone conversation of 27th. inst. regarding the appointment of returning officer in South Renfrew, for the Prohibition Referendum; I have been expecting a communication from you as a result of the investigation you promised me you would make at that time, and considering that such has not been received up to the present date, I am taking the liberty of writing to remind you of your promise, and I sincerely trust, if not asking too much, you will take time to let me know the result of your investigation under that subject.

Yours truly,

In reply I received the following:

OTTAWA, ONT., August 5, 1920.

Dear Mr. Pedlow,—I duly received your letter of 3rd, August. I looked into the matter about which you telephoned me and found that Mr. Payne, Sir George Foster's Secretary, had written you already a full explanation and that really there were no facts, so far as I know, uncommunicated to you.

I am sure you understand there was no desire on anyone's part to make difficulty for you of any kind. Under the circumstances, I do not think you have just ground of complaint that your recommendation was not accepted.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) ARTHUR MEIGHEN.

I replied to that as follows:

RENFREW, Ont., August 6th, 1920.

Dear Mr. Meighen,—It is not my desire to prolong this correspondence unnecessarily, but in acknowledging your esteemed favour of August 5th, in answer to mine of the 3rd, I desire you to understand that the information given you, "that Mr. Payne, Sir George Foster's secretary, had written me already a full explanation" of the subject under consideration is not correct.

On receiving Mr. Payne's letter of July 26 I phoned him, protesting against the change indicated, and he promised then to write me that evening fully on the subject, with particular reference as to whehter the appointment of John Brennan, of Arnprior, had been finally confirmed or not.

John Brennan, I understand, was named by the defeated candidate in South Renfrew in 1917.

Not hearing from him as promised, I called him up again at ten o'clock a.m. on Thursday, July 29th, and was told by whoever answered the phone that he had gone away on his holidays. I have heard nothing further from him since that date, so the information given to you in this instance is certainly not in accordance with the facts, and although it is only a trifling matter, still, I know you have been misinformed, and should know it.

I also wrote to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) on August 3rd, 1920, as follows:

Dear Sir,—On Tuesday, July 27th, I received a communication from your office in reply to my letter of July 17th, in which I named Albert Edwin Bradwin, of Arnprior, as a fit and proper person for the position of returning officer for the prohibition referendum for South Renfrew, and immediately on receipt of that communication in your absence I took up the subject matter with your private secretary, and he promised during the course of our phone conversation to make investigation regarding this appointment along the line of my suggestions and write me without fail that evening. So far I have not received the promised communication. I am therefore taking the matter up with you.

For your information I will recall briefly the position in which this matter is at the present time. On July 16th I received from your office a communication asking me to name a suitable person for the position of Returning Officer in South Renfrew for the prohibition referendum, and I replied to that request the following day, July 17th, naming a gentleman that I know would be entirely satisfactory to all parties concerned in this riding, and one entirely capable of filling the position satisfactorily. On July 27th I was informed that the letter of July 16th asking me to name a fit and proper person for the work was intended for Lt.-Col. Martin.

In view of this situation you can easily understand the unpleasant position I am placed in at the moment, for my choice has already been announced, and for that selection to be ignored, for reasons that are obvious, is neither fair to me, nor is it, I submit, good politics from the Government party point of view. I accepted the intimation in good faith and made the nomination in the same spirit, and for me to be told now practically that the elected candidate of this riding is not capable of making a selection of this kind is not an evidence of the claims made by the Government during the past three years, namely, that party patronage was completely done away with.

Lt.-Col. Martin, in my judgment, has no more right to name the officer for the above position than any man on the street. The fact that he is the defeated candidate in the election of 1917 should not, in view of the protestations of the Union Government then and since, entitle him to any say in a matter of this kind, and I sincerely trust you will not allow the nomination made by me in this instance to be overruled by the exigencies of party politics.

Eleven days later I received this communication from the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, dated August 14, 1920:

Dear Mr. Pedlow,—

Yours of August 3rd was handed to me by my secretary, on my return to Ottawa.

I should have considered it sooner but for a rather pressing engagement I have had with an old enemy, Mr. Lumbago, to wit, I thought one enemy enough at a time, and now come to you, more friendly and, I hope, by no means so relentless as the other.

The double notification was due to a mistake of my secretary in mailing the letter to you instead of to Lt-Col. Martin, as has been explained by him. In asking Lt.-Col. Martin, who had been a candidate for the riding and is a returned soldier, for the name of a suitable person to act as returning officer, the custom which has prevailed hitherto under all governments was followed. It is difficult, as you know, at once to get rid of old customs, even if they may be susceptible of improvement, though great progress has been made by the present Government in that direction.

I trust that no very great inconvenience will arise from the little misunderstanding that has taken place. Meanwhile you will have noticed that the referendum has been postponed. Anyway, I do not suppose that your nominee has taken any responsible steps consequent upon the sending in of his name. It is also to be remembered that though a nomination was asked for there was no implication that the name sent in would result in a final appointment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have occupied a considerable time in reading this extensive correspondence, but I think it is only right that it should be placed on Hansard, for it is quite in keeping with the spirit that has prevailed in the discussion this afternoon on the resolution now before the House. This brings me to these conclusions. Why not quit this pretending and this humbug? Why not put into practice the spirit of the claims and protestations made by the Government on this subject? Why not give heed to the demands of the people who themselves are most interested,—the civil servants? Why not listen to the appeal of all right thinking people everywhere? Why not follow the example of the Mother of Parliaments as well as the example of the Government of the great Republic to the south of us and decide for all time to do away with this evil thing, this custom that is so unbusinesslike and so unfair?

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow this resolution to pass without making a few observations upon it. I was very glad to see that the hon. and gallant member for Victoria, Ontario (Sir Sam Hughes) had so far regained his health as to be able to introduce his resolution this afternoon, and I hope his complete recovery will only be a matter of a short time. But, Sir, I cannot agree with the hon. member's resolution. In the campaign of 1917 one of the foremost planks in the platform of this Government—that is, if it was this Government then—was the complete abolition of the political patronage system. I remember very well hearing the late Hon. Arthur Sifton and also the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), both ministers at the time, state distinctly on a public platform in the city of Calgary that that was one of the planks of the Union Government and that they would put it into force. I believe they made an honest attempt to do so. I do not mean to say that the system as it is to-day is perfect, not by any means, but I do believe it is a step in the right direction, and I trust the Government will have sufficient determination to continue the present system and improve it from time to time.

I know for a fact that ever since it was learned that this resolution would be introduced, Civil Servants of the Federal Government have been profoundly affected; indeed, the matter has affected the peace of the homes of quite a few of our Civil Servants. To give this House an idea of how the Civil Service organizations view this matter, I wish to read the following resolution passed by the Civil Service Federation of Canada and endorsed by the Civil Service Association at Ottawa:

> We are emphatically opposed to patronage in any form. We regard the abolition of patronage as the most outstanding and beneficial reform in the history of the Canadian Civil Service, and we desire to express our gratitude to you for the enactment of the present Civil Service Act, which embodies the merit system, and in doing so, we voice the undoubted sentiment of an overwhelming majority of the Service.
>
> It has been the experience of the service in the past that under the patronage system influence predominates and worth counts for little. We are convinced that under the merit system, meritorious service will be rewarded and toadyism will disapper.

Then, Sir, here is another resolution from the Saskatchewan Customs Association:

> Be it resolved that the Saskatchewan Customs Association reaffirm its belief in the principles of the merit system, and the classification of the Civil Service, as at present administered and press for the continuance of the present system under the control of the Civil Service Commission and most strongly object to the return of the Civil Service to patronage.

One of the planks of the National Progressive party is "the complete abolition of the patronage system." My good friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who is opposed to the abolition of the patronage system, sets up a straw man so that he will have the pleasure of knocking him down. I submit that it is quite an easy matter for the Civil Service Commission to select a competent man to act as postmaster in a country district, no matter where it may be situated, because you can bring it right back to the people themselves. In many cases I have been applied to by persons who wanted the position of postmaster in a country district and it has been my practice—as I know it has been the practice of several members of this group—to write to the person who wanted the position suggesting that he have a petition circulated among the people who would get their mail from the office in question, and if they wanted him to be their postmaster surely he was the man who should be appointed. We have also post office inspectors all over the Dominion who are very well acquainted in every constituency. I am sure that every hon. member should do all in his power to prevent the restoration of the old political patronage system.

Now, we have two Civil Service organizations which are of great value in maintaining and increasing the efficiency of the Civil Service. I am speaking now of Federal Union No. 66. I wish to read the following short extract from a publication of that organization:

> Since its inception perhaps one of the most common criticisms made of Federal Union No.

66 has been that its policy was destructive—that it aimed at tearing down existing administrative machinery in the service yet proposed nothing constructive to take its place.

This criticism has always been without foundation. We have, it is true, pointed out, in no uncertain terms, the defects of the present system and the requisites for an efficient, contented and loyal Service.

Having covered this phase of our work we propose to make public in a series of memoranda our plans, as submitted, looking to the attainment of that efficiency, content, and loyalty We ask the service to study then dispassionately and without prejudice. We do not say they are perfect; we do not hesitate to say, however, that they are far in advance of any other effort so far made by Civil Service organizations.

It will be noted that our plans contain nothing revolutionary. We do not advocate placing the control of the Service in the hands of the rank and file of the Service. We ask that these have a voice but not the sole voice in the Civil Service administration. In short, we ask for Witley councils.

"Witley Council" is the name given to the Board of Hearing in the Old Country. I will explain very briefly the form of the Board of Hearing we have hear, which takes the place of the Witley Council. I quote again from this publication of Federal No. 66:

We consequently favour a certain amount of decentralization of control, from the Civil Service Commission back to the deputy ministers and branch heads in the departments, by whom certain features of Civil Service administration can be so much more effectively and promptly handled.

The Board of Hearing in connection with our Federal Civil Service is composed of a member of the Civil Service Commission, Mr. Jamieson, who is chairman of the Board; two deputy ministers, and two civil servants representing the staff, or what we might call the rank and file. Federal Union No. 66 believes that the number of the representatives of the rank and file should be increased from two to perhaps six or seven. In any case they ask that the personnel of the Board of Hearing be changed or increased. Here is a further extract from a publication of Federal Union No. 66, dated March 14, page 3:

The Commission is suitable for the purpose for which it was originally intended.

That shows clearly that this Civil Service organization, Federal Union No. 66, is strongly of the opinion that the Civil Service Commission is a valuable organizaton for the making of appointments to the Civil Service. The article goes on:

It is as desirable now as it was when the Commission was first formed, that appointments to the Service and promotions within the service, should be made through the Commission. The merit system is the only logical system of selection of persons to fill vacant positions and this organization would strongly resent and protect against any attempt to foist the pernicious patronage evil again upon the public service of Canada. It can not be too strongly emphasized that only when appointments are made for merit can it be expected that the public business will be carried on expeditiously and efficiently. Before the adoption of the merit system the Civil Service was cursed too long with misfits and failures who gravitated into the Service by political "pull." The Associated Federal Employees who aim at increased efficiency and business-like methods, feel that a return of such conditions would be intolerable.

Hence we ask for Joint Councils, not to replace the Civil Service Commission, but to work in harmony with it; a sharp line of demarcation being drawn between its functions and those of the Councils. The Board of Hearing should, in our opinion, be abolished.

I wish to say just a word or two regarding the Printing Bureau. I made it my business to inquire at the fountain head of information regarding the conditions in the Printing Bureau because I had been told by a certain member of this House, who was at one time an employee in the Printing Bureau, that conditions in that institution were far from satisfactory and that when he went into the Printing Bureau, it was through political pull that he got in, and when he got in, the foreman of the Printing Bureau received his card and told him: "Well, I have no work for you; in fact, I have no room for you; we are overcrowded here now; but hang around, perhaps there will be work for you after a while." This young man hung around until he was tired hanging around, and then he left in disgust because he found that he was not earning his money. Hon. members know very well that the cause of such a condition in the Printing Bureau was the old political patronage system; that under that obsolete system men were appointed who had no right to be there at all, men who knew nothing whatever about the printing business.

What was the condition of our Printing Bureau when the strike was on in Ottawa a few years ago? Again I got information from the fountain head source that there were in that Printing Bureau men who knew nothing whatever about the printing business and that moreover men were in there who were supposed to be proof-readers, who were blind, and who could not read print, even of the largest size. If the patronage system should be re-established—and I hope it will not be—what condition will our Civil Service be in? It will amount to this, that no man of any ability will go into the Civil Service; no man will want to work for the Government if he knows that the merit system is not in force. It will be needless for him to take a position in the Civil Service and try to rise to any higher position, because it will be political pull and not the merit of the man that will govern the conditions of his employment.

Reference has been made to the Old Country system of Civil Service. I have lived in the Old Country, and I know a little about how smoothly the Civil Service runs there. The Civil Service there knows not of a change of government. Everything goes along smoothly just the same as if no change of government had taken place. But what were the conditions in Canada a few years ago, for instance, away back in the early eighties? I have seen Tories discharged to make room for Grits and Grits discharged to make room for Tories in Civil Service offices out in the West. Such a condition should not prevail, and it certainly will prevail if we go back to the old patronage system, but I again express the hope that this Government will see to it that we do not go back.

As regards the present system, I must say, in my constituency I have no fault to find with the appointments. I was asked in certain cases if certain men were qualified, and if I considered they were, I certainly said so. It is true, I did not have the honour of recommending the census commissioner, but the appointment that has been made is, in my opinion, quite satisfactory. I again express the hope that if this resolution comes to a vote it will be voted down. I trust this Government will see to it that it is their duty to continue in force the Civil Service system that we have now.

Brig. Gen. GRIESBACH (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this question is one which involves efficiency in public business and the public good, and from that point of view, I cannot support the resolution now before the House, although I am bound to say that I do not entirely agree with certain aspects of the present situation. As regards the Outside Service, I feel the same difficulty that other hon. gentlemen have found in understanding how it is possible for the Civil Service Commission to make a proper selection at great distances from Ottawa and if, as a matter of fact, they consult with the local personages, then I think it is due to the members of the House and the public generally that we should know who those personages are and their standing in the community. As regards the Inside Civil Service, I think good work is being done. By far the largest part of the Civil Service is agreed that the system prevailing under the Commission is infinitely better than the patronage system. If they think well of the present system—and they do—then we should hope for better things and give to the commission a reasonable opportunity to carry on and work out their problems to a successful conclusion.

I cannot agree with the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp), who spoke in this House to-day and who took the view that patronage has not been in fact abolished, but that the patronage formerly exercised by members has been passed on to others who now exercise the same patronage. I cannot agree with that for this reason. I define patronage, as we understand it in this connection, as the power of appointment exercised by political personages with a view to political results. People cannot be born into the Civil Service; some persons must make appointments. If those persons, not being political personages, having no political results in view, and being honest and efficient themselves, proceed in a proper manner in making those appointments, nothing better can be done, and that particular method is away ahead of the system which formerly prevailed.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. In the old days, under the old system of patronage, upon a change of Government taking place, appointments were confined to the dominant party. Members of the Civil Service previously appointed kept quiet, attended to their work, did their best; members recently appointed were at liberty to go to their member of Parliament or to the defeated candidate with their grievances and, generally speaking, the Civil Service was satisfied with its job and loyal to the Government, and loyal to the State. Under the commission system of Government a new feature has been introduced, I regret to say, by a small number of civil servants. As I said a moment ago, for the most part, civil servants are perfectly satisfied with what is attempted to be done and they hope for better things in the future; but a small body of civil servants are dissatisfied, and they have introduced a new feature into the Civil Service of this country.

That feature is this: They have introduced the sentiment which is said to exist as between capital and labour. They have introduced that idea which is fathered by the I.W.W. and the O.B.U., that there exists a continual state of warfare between employer and employee, which can only be cured by constant agitation and perhaps, ultimately, by direct action. That particular body is confined to Ottawa and is known as Local Union No. 66. The members of this House have received its publications, and are in a position to form their own conclusions as to what sort of men these are. Now we do not want that spirit in the Civil Service of Canada. We want a service that will be loyal to the state, a service that will be the backbone of our state. We do not want our Civil Service to acquire the attitude I have mentioned, which is deplored everywhere, and is particularly to be deplored between the state and its employees. I have just this to say in conclusion. I would like to see the Government take power to itself at an early date to put itself in a position to dismiss the whole lot of that Union, and to fill their places from the ranks of returned men, of whom there are thousands in this country fitted for this particular kind of employment, and extremely anxious to get it.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): I have but few remarks to make, Mr. Speaker, and were it not for my desire to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) who has introduced this resolution, I should perhaps not take part in this debate at all. I wish to congratulate him upon having brought this matter up, although I am not in a position to vote for his resolution as drawn. I am sure that we are all sorry to observe some impairment of the old-time physical strength of the good man he has always shown himself to be, but we still appreciate his many fine qualities of heart and mind, and hope that his vigour will be restored, and that he will be spared for many years to this Parliament and to his thousands of friends in this country. I cannot vote for the resolution as drawn because it affects both the Inside and the Outside Service, and there is not the least question that it is only through such a body as the Civil Service Commission that we shall be able to command ultimately in this country a Civil Service that will have the respect of the people of Canada, and will give that efficient service which the people have a right to expect. I do not mean to depreciate in any way what the Civil Service Commission have already done, for I believe that when they were appointed they found appointees in the service of both political parties. I believe the Commission are doing their best, and the only serious criticism that can be made of them is their bringing in foreigners to reclassify the Civil Service instead of having the work done by Canadians. Both the Civil Service Commission and the Government have accepted the responsibility for engaging these men. I think it is to be regretted, particularly at a time when the members of the Government one after another have been telling this Parliament that we have reached the status of a great independent nation, able to take part in world affairs, that in a matter of purely domestic concern and of no great significance they have themselves gone outside of Canada to find men able to make a classification of the Civil Service of a country with a population of eight millions. I believe that the Civil Service Commission is necessary in connection with the Inside Service, because candidates for appointments can best have their education and efficiency tested by examinations. Even after they have passed an examination and a certificate has been issued as to their qualifications, the new appointees have to serve under a deputy or branch chief who, if he finds they are not qualified in other ways, that they lack tact, for instance, judgment or integrity, may have them censured or transferred to an inferior position in some other department. I do not consider the Outside Service is in the same position. For many positions in the Outside Service a slight education may be sufficient. What is required in that service more particularly is tact and judgment, integrity, and devotion to duty. While I do not wish to attach any blame to the members of the Civil Service Commission I must say that during the last year or two they have made appointments for which had I been responsible, I would not have dared to put my foot in my constituency again. It is only recently we have been witnesses to cases of neglect of duty and defalcations which have shocked society. Men appointed by the commission a few months ago have had to be dismissed and replaced by new appointees, under exactly the same conditions, and with no more knowledge of the tact, devotion to duty, and integrity required than those who preceded them.

My hon. friend the ex-Postmaster-General (Mr. Lemieux) emphasized this afternoon that we the representatives of the people should be given all possible time and opportunity for the study of great national questions. I thoroughly agree with him. I have rejoiced on many occasions during the last few years since I have been on this side of the House, that I have lost the opportunity of exercising patronage in my county. I have had more leisure than heretofore. When I was able to exercise patronage my house was invaded at 5 and 6 o'clock in the morning and up till 11 o'clock at night; and when I travelled through my county I would be stopped for half a day to listen to the complaints of those in the service or the aspirations of those desiring to get in. It has been a different life for me during the last few years. To show what little effect patronage has on winning elections I may say that when I had the responsibility of making appointments for my county I was always returned by majorities running from 1,000 to 1,500, but when my opponents enjoyed the exercise of patronage, as was their right until the last election, they were reduced to the impossibility of keeping a candidate in the field and I was elected by acclamation.

It is only by raising the standard of the Outside Service, as well as of the Inside, so that it may command the respect of the people of Canada that we shall discharge our duty fully by the electorate. In the light of my experience of public affairs in this country, and particularly in my own county, I am forced to the conclusion that it is in the best interests of the public service of Canada that all appointments, to the Outside Service at least, should again be made on the recommendation of the members elected to Parliament by the people. I do not, in this statement, anticipate any personal advantage; I advocate the reversion to the control of members of Parliament of appointments to the Outside Service purely and simply because I believe that it is the only judicious method that can be followed. Members of the Civil Service Commission, sitting in their offices in Ottawa, cannot possibly have the personal and local knowledge of applicants and conditions in any county which the member representing that county would possess.

Take the position of Collector of Customs, which involves the handling of large funds that might possibly hold out a serious temptation to any young man. The member in the constituency where a vacancy for such a position occurred, would be in a position to recommend the appointment of a thoroughly competent, responsible, and trustworthy man. He is personally acquainted with numerous men fitted in every way for such a post, and I see no reason why his recommendation should not be accepted. The same thing applies to such a position as that of Fisheries Officer. I think we should adopt the method followed for many years in France, where the member for an electoral division is charged with the responsibility of making such appointments as shall be in the interest of the whole constituency irrespective of political considerations. In this Parliament we have now three or four different classes of citizens represented. Besides Liberals and Conservatives, we have representatives of Labour and Agriculture, and what I contend, Mr. Speaker, is that every member of Parliament should have the responsibility—because it is, or ought to be essentially, a matter of responsibility and not of privilege—of recommending appointments. It does not matter whether a man belongs to one party or another, whether he is a supporter of the Government in power or a member of the Opposition. The fact that he has been returned to Parliament by a majority of his constituents is evidence that he enjoys their confidence and is entitled to express their views; and this is one of the most important matters on which they could express any desire. I have no very great desire to return to the old conditions, and certainly I have no desire to do so because of any personal considerations. But when the time comes, I shall be quite willing to shoulder my share of responsibility in the recommending of appointments, as I did for years in the past.

The Government of to-day claims to have abolished patronage; but in view of events which have been referred to in this debate, I do not think the people place any credence in this profession, for, since coming into power, the Government have thrown out practically every Liberal officer in the country and have brought in all their own friends. Customs officers, postmasters, and other officials, appointed under the Liberal regime, have been cast aside and their places filled by candidates approved of by the party authorities. While there may be a show of genuineness about the appointments made by the Civil Service Commission, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the supporters of the Government can allay the suspicion of the people in regard to what must strike them as a most remarkable accident, that appointees selected by the commission have so frequently been Conservatives. In my county I have recommended hundreds of men whom I know personally—for I have been travelling throughout that county for the last thirty years and more, and know every child that has been born there during that period, having followed the career of every one with paternal interest—and I am still to see one recommendation I have made accepted. After all, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of members of Parliament to make appointments, and their sense of responsibility to the people will influence them in making proper appointments; for they know that if their judgment is faulty, they will suffer in consequence. I agree with the remarks that have been made by many of the speakers who have preceded me, and I trust that the suggestion I have offered will appeal to the Government.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton East): While I do not propose to vote for the resolution before the House, I believe that if the abuses under the present system were tabulated they would lead one to the conclusion that they form the general rule and not the exception in the administration of affairs by the Civil Service Commission as it is constituted to-day. It appears to me that, in effect, patronage has been taken from the hands of the individual member and placed in the hands of deputy ministers, post office inspectors, post masters, and various menial employees of the Dominion Government. It is unfortunate that all members are not prepared to lay their complaints before the House and establish the fact that this substitution in the bestowal of patronage has really been made. The crux of the Civil Service Act lies in section 45. If there is any merit at all in the Act, it is to be found particularly in that section. Promotion, and promotion upon merit, is the basis of the Civil Service Act. Otherwise members might as well go back to the old system, and appoint those whom they thought best regardless of whether or not there might be a better person in the field. Section 45 of the Act says:

Promotions

(1) Promotion is a change from one class to another class with a higher maximum compensation, and vacancies shall be filled, as far as is consistent with the best interests of the civil service, by promotion.

(2) Promotion shall be made for merit by the Commission upon such examination as the Commission may by regulation prescribe. The Commission may by such regulation restrict the competition at such examinations to employees or to employees of a certain class or classes of a specified seniority, and may prescribe what marks may be obtained by such employees for efficiency and seniority. Such marks shall not, however, exceed one-half of the total marks that can be obtained at the examination.

Now, Sir, I have a case in point which I brought to the attention of the House last session and which in set out at page 4,518 and following pages of Hansard. I thought when I brought this matter before the House last session, that the undertaking given to me by the Minister in charge of this Act would have led the Civil Service Commission to remedy the injury which had been done us in the province of Alberta in this particular instance, but we are yet waiting any redress. In that particular case three men made application for the position of assistant Postmaster in the city of Edmonton. The three men were Clendenning, Thompson and Cryderman. Notwithstanding the fact that these three men had made application in writing to the Civil Service Commission, notwithstanding the fact that they were supposed to pass an examination and to receive marks in competition with each other, the Superintendent, Mr. Ross, the Deputy Postmaster General, and the members of the Civil Service Commission arranged it among themselves so that a man by the name of Rutledge, of Winnipeg, would be transferred to the position of Assistant Postmaster in Edmonton and the men in that city had the satisfaction merely of receiving a letter from the Civil Service Commission that the appointment had been made. Now there is a distinct breach of the Civil Service Act in that instance, and that is not the only case which I have tabulated, but as to which I shall not bother the House. If this was done over the Dominion of Canada, as I have reason to believe that it is to a fair extent, then the usefulness of the Civil Service Commission has ceased.

On the left of the Speaker a number of jocular references have been made to the appointment of the census commissioners. Well, perhaps that is not entirely as it should have been; but the complaint that they make in that respect is the complaint that I make in another respect. Where inspectors of post offices, for instance, who belong to the political persuasion to which my hon. friends opposite adhere, go about the country and appoint, whether things are equal or not, men of their political persuasion, then I say that they are also violating the principles of the Civil Service Act in that they are exercising a patronage that they ought not to exercise because they are really taking it out of my own hands to make our own appointments and making appointments of people of their own political persuasion. If that condition of things exists, I say, Sir, that I feel quite as capable so long as I represent East Edmonton, of making the appointments myself. I think it is well that there should be some appointments made such as I have in my mind, and for this reason. Up at Lake LaBiche, in Alberta, the appointee is of the Liberal persuasion, and he is active at the present time in making accusations —both against this Government and against myself—sweeping accusations that cannot be substantiated. I am perfectly willing that he should keep on doing that because it will be easier for me to destroy him and his friends when I get started.

I was in favour of the abolition of patronage in 1917, I am in favour of the abolition of patronage now; but I was not in favour of the transfer of patronage from members to deputy heads, and other officials in 1917; neither am I at the present time. I submit that while I cannot vote for the resolution before the House when it comes to a vote, it is urgent upon this Government to see that there is some remedy under this Act whereby patronage if not under the members of Parliament throughout Canada, that there will be a cessation of patronage dispensation within the public departments whether it is at Ottawa or elsewhere.

I wish to call attention to another point before I resume my seat, and it is in anticipation of an argument which may be made against me—that if appointments are made of politicians who use their positions for political purposes it is possible to remove them under section 32 of the Civil Service Act. That section which is headed "Political Partisanship" and reads as follows:

> No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the Civil Service shall be debarred from voting at any Dominion or provincial election if, under the laws governing the said election, he has the right to vote; but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election, or contribute, receive or in any way deal with any money for any party funds,

You will see from what I have read that there is only one condition under which a remedy can be given to a member who feels that he is aggrieved by a person who is a partisan, and it is that this person must be a partisan during election time. So that the party complained of has five years or four years, as the case may be, during which he can carry on political propaganda against the employer, and the member has no remedy unless the offender continues that attitude during the time there is an election. I submit there should be some remedy in this respect also. I have no objection to any man having his political opinions; this is a free country and he should have the liberty to exercise those opinions as he sees fit. But I also believe that there should be some recognition of the respective positions of employer and employee; and it is undignified, if not disloyal for a person to accept a position from the employer and then contrive all he can against him. If that is true in the case of the particular individual it is also true of the state. I submit, therefore, that the state should be in a position to see that the employees who do not behave themselves and who do not care to serve loyally, at all times and not merely when there is an election, shall be dismissed from the service.

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend participating in this debate, but I notice a document here containing the names of the census commissioners for the various counties throughout the province of Quebec, and I find that the Tories of the county of Pontiac have been slighted by the present Government. The address of the first commissioner for the county of Pontiac is given here as , 71 Spadina Ave., Ottawa. Now, Sir, the Tories are a bad lot anywhere, but I do not believe that they are any worse in Pontiac county than they are in Carleton county, and I think this appointment, since it was to be a Tory party appointment, should have been made from the county of Pontiac and not from the city of Ottawa.

I was asked by the Chief Commissioner of the Census for suggestions as to taking the census in the county of Pontiac which is one of the largest in the Dominion. I advised that he should have three commissioners for the three main divisions of the county. As I pointed out in a previous debate, I am as a rule careful not to make suggestions to this Government, because the best suggestion in the world would be so badly managed by them that it would have been better never to have made it. Apparently the Government followed my advice to some extent; at any rate, they appointed three commissioners. With two of them I have no quarrel, for they are from the county of Pontiac. But why the third appointee should be a man residing in the city of Ottawa is beyond my reasoning powers and is, I think, incapable of
