

CANADA

HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIFTH SESSION—TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT

5-6 ELIZABETH II

VOLUME I, 1957

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE EIGHTH DAY OF JANUARY, 1957, TO THE ELEVENTH DAY OF FEBRUARY, 1957, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

328, 97102
C212

EDMOND CLOUTIER, C.M.G., O.A., D.S.P.
QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY
OTTAWA, 1957

REFERENCE LIBRARY
NATIONAL FILM BOARD OF CANADA

CANADA

House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable L. René Beaudoin

Tuesday, January 8, 1957

FIFTH SESSION—TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued earlier this day met again at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at 2.30 o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the secretary to the Governor General, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at 2.30 o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is again a pleasure for me to greet you as you resume your parliamentary duties in this new year.

The international scene continues to be characterized by instability in the Middle East and in eastern Europe.

My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the basic unity of the commonwealth and the reality of the western alliance, to contribute effectively to the supervision of the cessation of hostilities between Israel and Egypt under the authority of the United Nations and to the achievement of a lasting settlement of Middle East problems.

Visits to Canada in the last few weeks by the prime ministers of Ceylon and India have been conducive to a renewed strengthening of the bonds which unite the peoples of the commonwealth in their constant aim to co-operate in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress.

An encouraging advance is being made, as evidenced by the latest ministerial meeting of the council, in the development of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the non-military as well as in the military field. My ministers remain strongly convinced of the need to maintain the North Atlantic treaty as the keystone of the defence of the western nations.

In the Middle East Canadian servicemen, as part of the United Nations emergency force proposed by Canada at the general assembly of the United Nations, are performing valuable tasks in the interest of world peace.

The United Nations has served to focus world opinion on the brutal repression of the heroic Hungarian people in their endeavour to throw off the yoke of Soviet imperialism. The vast humanitarian problems that have arisen as a result of Soviet intervention require the joint efforts of many countries. Through the United Nations, the Red Cross, and in co-operation with the government of Austria, this country is playing its part in relieving suffering and re-settling the refugees.

The entrance into Canada of Hungarian refugees has been greatly facilitated and free transportation provided from Austria to new homes in this country. Already thousands of these Hungarians have been welcomed to Canada and we look forward to receiving thousands more during the winter and spring. There are also substantially increasing numbers of immigrants from the British Isles arranging to proceed to Canada this year.

Recent events have confirmed my ministers' belief in the importance of seeking solutions to international problems through the United Nations and of upholding by all practical and constructive means the principles of the United Nations charter. My ministers also believe, however, that while making every effort to achieve these long-term goals, the western nations must remain strong and united in their defences and in their diplomacy in order that aggressive action against them will be prevented and international tension can be lessened.

Excellent progress is being made in our national economic development. Expansion is evident in every part of Canada. Rapid strides are being made in opening up and utilizing our natural resources and in our industrial and urban growth. Employment has reached unprecedented levels. Once again we have been blessed with good crops. External trade was considerably greater last year than during any previous year. Canadians in almost every part of the country have been enjoying the benefits of this invigorating economic climate.

Indeed our economic expansion has been so rapid that it has put a serious strain upon the supply of various types of labour and materials needed for the many projects which are being put in hand. The corresponding competition to borrow savings to finance all these projects has brought about an increase in interest rates. Increases in the volume of money and credit have had to be carefully limited in order to check inflationary tendencies and the financial policies of my government have also been directed to counteract these same tendencies.

In the last few days a serious industrial dispute has led to a stoppage of work on one of the major railways of Canada despite the use of the normal processes of conciliation. Special efforts have been made and are continuing to be made by my ministers to assist the parties to reach an agreed settlement.

The preliminary report of the royal commission on economic prospects has been received and will shortly be laid before you.

You will be asked to approve a measure for the establishment of a Canada Council for the arts, humanities and social sciences, in order to give a new impetus to the development of Canadian scholarship and culture. In this measure you will be asked to approve an endowment for the council so that it may discharge its functions with the greatest possible sense of responsibility.

Because it is important that our universities should be able to keep pace with the increasing demands to be made upon them by the increasing number of young Canadians, you will be asked to approve a further grant of money to the Canada Council to be distributed by it for the purpose of assisting Canadian universities in some of their necessary construction projects. You will also be asked to approve the doubling of the annual grants to universities, and the payment of these funds to the national conference of Canadian universities for division by it among the recognized institutions of higher learning.

A measure will be placed before you for the purpose of renewing on a revised and increased basis the federal program of grants to provincial governments in aid of technical and vocational training.

It is proposed to recommend in the Senate the establishment of a committee to consider what should be done to make better use of land for agriculture and thus to contribute more effectively to the improvement of agricultural production and the incomes of those engaged in it.

An amendment extending the scope of the Municipal Grants Act will be laid before you to authorize the payment of grants in lieu of taxes on federal property in all municipalities where such property receives the normal municipal services.

[Mr. Speaker.]

An amendment to the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act will be presented making appropriate improvements in the scale of benefits to disabled seamen and the dependents of deceased seamen.

You will be asked to consider legislation for the implementation of a north Pacific fur seal convention.

An amendment to the Sockeye Salmon Convention Act to include pink salmon in this international agreement will also be laid before you.

You will be asked to consider a revision of the law controlling narcotic drugs in the light of the report of the Senate committee on the use of narcotics in Canada.

A bill will be introduced for the purpose of continuing the Canadian wheat board as the sole marketing agency for western wheat, oats and barley.

A measure will be laid before you to provide for the division of the national museum of Canada into two museums to be known as the Canadian museum of natural history and the Canadian museum of human history.

A revision of the Federal District Commission Act will be presented for your consideration.

Amendments of detail to a number of other acts will also be introduced.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to maintain the services and payments provided under the authority of parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

MOTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION LATER THIS DAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration later this day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before this motion carries, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government plans at any time to make a statement on or provide for a discussion of the present railway strike, and in that connection whether the government would consider tabling all documents in relation to this matter, including Senator Roebuck's minority report?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, the matter has been referred to in the speech from the throne and I think it is extremely apt to be dealt with in the debate that will take place on the speech from the throne. As to the production of papers, may I say that any papers in the possession of the Department of Labour can, I assume, be laid on the table for the information of hon. members.

Motion agreed to.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN

INCLUSION OF SPEECHES MADE AT UNVEILING OF STATUE TODAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house, I hope, I beg leave to move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, that the addresses delivered today at the unveiling of the statue of Sir Robert Borden, a former prime minister of Canada, be made an appendix to the Hansard of this day.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of above see appendix, pages 15-19.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION ON ELECTION AND ASSUMPTION OF DUTIES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have another agreeable duty to perform. I would preface it by reminding the house that, at the beginning of the special session of parliament, which was officially closed this morning, I had the privilege of expressing our sincere regret that Hon. George Drew's health made it impossible for him to continue as leader of his party and of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in this house.

I also expressed our hope, which I know was shared by all hon. members, for the speedy restoration of Mr. Drew's health and for the continuance of his important contributions in the public service of our country. I know hon. members must have been delighted to see him at the ceremonies this morning which marked the unveiling of the monument to Sir Robert Borden and to note what rapid progress Mr. Drew has already made, and I am sure they will join with me in wishing him an early, complete and lasting return to his former robust health.

I now wish to extend our most hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on his recent election as the leader of his party and on the assumption of his duties as Leader of the Opposition in this chamber. The hon. member's new position is one of the most important in our parliamentary system. In all countries which model their system on that of the United Kingdom, competent and responsible examination in the House of Commons of government policies and conduct has proved throughout the years to be one of the most convincing guarantees of efficiency and fairness in the administration of public affairs. Here in Canada the leader of the opposition is also recognized as the most likely alternative for the position of prime minister in the event—which he and his supporters perhaps consider less unlikely and remote than do we on this side of the house—that the government should fail to have the support of a majority of the members of this house.

The hon. member for Prince Albert has had a long experience in public life and all of us in this chamber have learned to appreciate his talents, his industry, his incisiveness and his pertinacity in promoting what he has regarded as in the best interests of Canada. I do not imagine that his new responsibilities are apt to lessen his belief that the most urgent requirement in that regard is to bring about the downfall of this government; and to, I am sure, the satisfaction of those who sit on the other side of the house, I promise him that we will do our best to provide him with a long period in which to exercise his pertinacious efforts towards that objective.

He and I have disagreed on many occasions and I expect that we shall continue to do so perhaps quite frequently in the future. That is only natural in view of our respective positions. But I hope that we shall be able to disagree in a manner in keeping with the high standards of parliamentary debate and that despite our disagreements we shall continue to respect the sincerity of purpose of one another and our common desire to be of real service to our fellow citizens.

I extend to the Leader of the Opposition our sincere good wishes in his new position and I wish to assure him quite seriously that I will be ready at all times to discuss with him in advance matters which need not be controversial on party lines and about which national unity might perhaps be best served by solutions that we could all recommend to those whom we represent in parliament.

(Translation):

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member on the excellent French he used in the few sentences in this other official language of our people when he addressed the convention at which he was elected leader of his party last December.

Finally, in conclusion, I ask Mrs. Diefenbaker to rest assured that we associate her in our minds in the congratulations and good wishes which we are conveying to her husband today, for we are well aware of the important part which she will play in helping him in the appropriate performance of his new responsibilities.

(Text):

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I join the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in extending congratulations to one of our number who has been elevated to the high office of Leader of the Opposition. I am sure that irrespective of our parties in this house we recognize the importance of the office to which he has been elevated and the large obligations which he has had to assume, both as leader of his party and Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition and I for a long time occupied neighbouring constituencies and therefore I have known him for a number of years. I am quite sure all of us hope he will retain good health and strength in order that he may carry on the work that is demanded of this very important office. Too many of those who have assumed high office in this country, as leader of the opposition or in other capacity, have broken down under the strain.

I join in the regret expressed by the Prime Minister, regarding the loss from this house of the former leader of the opposition. I want to say to the Leader of the Opposition that I hope, in spite of the efforts he will make to build up his party to a more influential position than it has had for a large number of years, he will take care of his health, because that is of primary importance.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): We would like to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the leader of the C.C.F. party, Mr. Speaker, in extending a very warm welcome to the newly elected leader of the official opposition in this house. We congratulate him on his elevation to that very important position. We recognize fully the great responsibilities that do devolve on a leader of the opposition. Good government in Canada has to depend to a very large degree on the quality of the opposition and the leadership in that opposition; that is very important.

I should like to express one word of caution and advice, as has already been expressed by my friend the leader of the C.C.F., and it is this. I think that to safeguard his health the Leader of the Opposition ought to relax. Since, as the Prime Minister has said, he is going to have plenty of time he can do his work without working under tension and stress, because that is what kills. If he will take a word of advice from me he will take better care of himself than some others have done, including myself. I do wish him every success and warmly congratulate him. He is a westerner. He has been a good friend of mine throughout the years, and I am glad to see him elevated to this very important position.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): My first words, Mr. Speaker, must be to express my deep and abiding appreciation for the very warm sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister and by the leaders of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties. I am one of those who, over the years, have known all of these gentlemen, the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar before I came into this house. I love this chamber, for however much we may disagree—and when strong men have strong opinions on occasion they use strong language to express them—we retain that conformity with the tradition of respect for one another. It is in that spirit that I thank the Prime Minister and the other hon. members for what they have said.

I want to thank the Prime Minister, too, for those very chivalrous words that he expressed regarding my wife, words that were full of kindness and consideration and represent something of what we so often forget in this chamber, the contribution that our helpmates make to us in order to permit us to remain in public life.

The Prime Minister referred, somewhat eulogistically, to my endeavours to speak one of the two official languages. May I be permitted, with diffidence which I do feel, to reply to him as best I may. With the indulgence of the house I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

I appreciate the generous references made by the Prime Minister in the French language and with diffidence I hope that the day will come when I shall be able to express myself with greater ease and assurance in that beautiful language.

(Text):

That will be my endeavour, realizing the difficulties that I will experience in that regard. Over the years I have endeavoured, as you know, sir, to anticipate the day that I would do so. Over five years ago, at the parliamentary conference in Australia, I told you of my desire, but my extreme diffidence.

The Prime Minister has mentioned the position of the opposition, recognized as it is in our democratic tradition as a basic element of parliamentary government. Some there are of the communist states that claim to have parliamentary democracies, but the salient differences between those democracies and ours may be summarized in a few words. Oppositions do not exist in the tradition of communist countries. The essence of our system of government, the basic foundation, is the right of each of us to disagree. The Prime Minister paraphrased, I think, the words of Tierney, who over 140 years ago said, as I recall it, "The function of an opposition is to propose nothing, to oppose everything and to turn out the government." With the first two obligations, I am in disagreement, but I say, sir, that in this year of grace the third would seem to be one worthy of adoption.

As the Prime Minister showed such an intimate knowledge of the responsibilities of an opposition, I hope the opportunity will come to him and to Canada to display that knowledge.

Now, sir, all I will say further at this time is to repeat my thanks and to reaffirm my desire to maintain, as the Prime Minister so eloquently said, the traditions and the customs of parliament, to expedite the public business and at all times—and I say this with humility—determine to do nothing that will detract from the dignity and prestige of this institution, our parliament. Six hundred years of experience has revealed that if parliament is maintained in all its greatness, and if the functions of free debate are not interfered with, freedom will never be destroyed or even impaired.

I believe that this institution is one which, when it discharges its responsibilities in accordance with our traditions, will preserve our freedom from within as from without. I thank the Prime Minister and my hon. friends for being so kind as to suggest that I may, in a humble way, discharge the responsibilities of this office.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Hon. James J. McCann, Minister of National Revenue, the Hon. S. S. Garson, Minister of Justice, the Hon. Hugues Lapointe, Minister of Veterans Affairs, and the Hon. W. E. Harris, Minister of Finance, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 143rd chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, intituled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house under standing order 65, the said committee to be composed of Messrs. Harris, Knowles, Lapointe, Tustin and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That Edward T. Applewhaite, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Skeena, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. R. F. L. HANNA AND SECONDED BY MR. H. J. ROBICHAUD

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, on this memorable occasion of my life I would first of all like to thank the right hon. Prime Minister for the great honour he has bestowed upon me by inviting me to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne here this afternoon. I have no doubt, however, that the Prime Minister desired especially to honour the residents of Edmonton-Strathcona whom I have the privilege of representing in this House of Commons. On their behalf I assure him that we are most grateful for the recognition that he has bestowed on what we believe to be one of the finest communities in all of Canada. It is my hope that on this occasion I may be able to do justice to them as their representative in parliament.

As we have barely crossed the threshold of 1957, Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to wish you, sir, and through you, all hon. members of this House of Commons a happy, healthful and prosperous new year.

I do regret, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure do all hon. members, the circumstances which have compelled the Hon. George Drew to resign his seat in this House of Commons. He will be very much missed by everybody here. Mr. Drew has performed outstanding services to his country in many ways, and I am sure we all wish for him a speedy recovery to his normal good health and vigour. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on his election as leader of the Progressive Conservative party of Canada. He, too, has had a distinguished career both at the bar and here in parliament. He is now leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, and I know that he will appreciate my sincerity as a supporter of this government when I wish him many happy years in the high office which he now holds in parliament. I was impressed this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, by the good counsel that he received from other members of this chamber that he should not work too hard to overthrow the present government.

It is a good thing for Canada, I believe, that on an occasion like this the government can select a government backbencher from any one of the 10 provinces or the northern territories to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Regardless of what political party may be in power from time to time, I think it is important that that party should draw support from all parts of Canada, and I am certainly glad that this is so at the commencement of this fourth session of the 22nd parliament. It is one more example, I think, of the national unity which is more in evidence throughout Canada as time goes on, and I would like to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Gloucester in the province of New Brunswick, on being invited to second the address. His province, we all recall, was one of the four originals in the spendidly conceived confederation of Canada.

May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, at this point, to say a few words about the province and the city from which I come? I consider myself fortunate indeed to be the representative of a city that has no special problems other than those that arise out of prosperity, growth and good fortune. We in Edmonton are not plagued by any misfortunes of climate, fire, flood or social and economic upheavals such as frequently befall peoples in other parts of the world. Compared with the peoples of many lands, Albertans, and indeed Canadians generally, have every right to be thankful. We do have some problems, it is true, but those problems are relatively small and well within our capacity to solve. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is not out of place at this time to pause and count our many blessings.

Alberta is now coming into its own as one of the richest provinces of Canada. Even today its vast riches are far beyond accurate estimation. The past year 1956 has been by far the most prosperous in our 51-year history. Retail trade was up 10 per cent over 1955. Capital construction planned for Alberta in 1956 was in the neighbourhood of $900 million. This was about 12 per cent of the capital construction planned for the whole country although Alberta has less than 7 per cent of the total population of Canada. Sales of new automobiles and trucks were up 16 per cent in volume and 30 per cent in dollar value over the previous record year, 1955.

Agriculture, still our basic industry in Alberta, is doing well too. The latest figures which I could obtain show that farm cash income is up about 14 per cent over 1955 although this figure is tempered somewhat by ever-rising farm costs.

Oil production was up not less than 30 per cent over 1955. Oil production in Alberta now averages well over 400,000 barrels a day with a potential of over 700,000 barrels a day if markets were available. Power consumption was up 19 per cent over 1955 and so it goes; during 1956, in every area of our economic life, old records tumbled. But Alberta's finest treasure is the quality of her people. They are increasing in numbers, too, although we have room for many more in our province. During the past 12 months the population of Alberta continued to increase and it is now over 1,100,000.

The population of the city of Edmonton proper according to official census figures reached 224,000 last June. This moves Edmonton up from eighth place to sixth place amongst the leading cities of Canada in the short space of five years and during the same period, Mr. Speaker, the population of the constituency of Edmonton-Strathcona increased from 56,000 to over 90,000 which is an increase of 60 per cent. I think that is probably a record.

Since the discovery of oil at Leduc near Edmonton in 1947 the industrialization of Alberta has been taking place very rapidly. During 1956 alone some $85 million was spent in establishing new industries in the Edmonton area. These new industries, mostly petro-chemical in nature, are attracted to Edmonton largely because of our supply of natural gas. This wonder fuel is not only inexpensive but it serves both as a source of energy and as a source of raw material for our manufacturers.

In 1951, five years ago, 10,500 persons were employed in the manufacturing industry in Edmonton and in 1956, 20,251 persons were so employed, an increase of 90 per cent in five years. Indications are that manufacturing will very soon become Alberta's major industry in terms of dollar value.

They used to say, Mr. Speaker, all the major companies operating in the oil fields and new industries in Edmonton located their head offices elsewhere. In 1956 that has been changed. Not less than ten large office buildings are under construction in Edmonton at the present time representing an investment of over $30 million.

I know my constituents and the people of Edmonton generally would want me to thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) for the progress he is making toward the construction of a fine new international airport in the constituency of Edmonton-Strathcona. The necessary site is being acquired and plans are being advanced so that actual construction will start in the coming spring. I can certainly sympathize with those people who have to move off their farms and out of their homes to make way for this new development. However, I am confident that the government will compensate them adequately and I think this is the best we can do under the circumstances. I hope the minister will allow nothing to stand in the way of this project which is so badly needed if Edmonton is to continue to develop as the aerial crossroads of the world. I mention this not from a narrow local interest only but in the interests of air transportation for all of Canada.

I would also like to thank the Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) for the fine job he and his department have been doing to keep mail delivery up to par in such a fast growing area as the one I represent. I would also like to say, Mr. Speaker, that both in his capacity as Postmaster General and as Minister of Veterans Affairs this hon. gentleman has proven to be a most efficient administrator. He is always most attentive to all reasonable representations.

I would like to remind my colleagues from eastern Canada how much the people of Edmonton enjoyed the renewed meeting last November between our champion Edmonton Eskimos and the Montreal Alouettes in the annual Grey Cup classic. Out where I come from they are still calling Edmonton the home of the Grey Cup. This now famous annual event, I am sure, is contributing a great deal toward better understanding between all sections of the Canadian people both in the east and in the west.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I was deeply touched by the confidence shown me by the Prime Minister when he invited me to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Unfortunately, I lack his command of the two official languages of our country. However, in order to thank him and to follow the example of this illustrious Canadian, I do wish to say a few words in French. I hope to show in this way my confidence in the development of Canada, firmly based on two of the richest cultures of human civilization. Here we are, less than two months after the short special session held in November, when the Prime Minister and his colleagues grew even greater in the esteem of the Canadian people and of peoples abroad as a result of policies which are sensible and at the same time compassionate towards less fortunate peoples, such as the unhappy Hungarian people. They have helped to preserve order and peace in the world.

By its recognized sincerity and its great desire for peace, the Canadian government commands respect in international circles. Here at home, the Canadian nation has reached a remarkable degree of national unity based on the mutual respect of its citizens. In addition, the government strives to promote a fair distribution among all Canadians of the fruits of the general prosperity enjoyed throughout Canada.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the names of Canada and of its present political leaders will be recorded in history in terms that will honour all our grandchildren.

(Text):

I should like to turn now to matters a little farther afield but still of serious consequence for Canadians. I refer of course to the serious world situation which we have been facing in recent months. I wish I had the talent to express adequately my feeling toward our Prime Minister, the minister of external affairs and other ministers of the crown who have contributed so much to the pre-eminent position which Canada holds today in the council of nations. Certainly they have stood tall in the eyes of the world during the biggest and busiest year in Canada's history. It is fortunate indeed that this nation is endowed with such leadership during these unsettled times. The people of Canada will not soon forget the debt we owe them for their patience and vision and tireless efforts for peace and freedom and security throughout the world.

In her external relationships Canada has three principal avenues of approach. At one and the same time we are leading members of the great British commonwealth, of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and of the United Nations. None of these several avenues of approach is in my opinion inconsistent or mutually exclusive. As a nation we endeavour to act on the strongest moral principles at all times. We believe that there cannot be several definitions of right and wrong according to the exigencies of immediate and pressing situations.

While we realize we must be prepared to use force to defend ourselves if need be, Canada stands firmly in the belief that ways must be found eventually to outlaw the use of force as an instrument of international policy. We believe that mankind has a conscience and we hope that sanctions under the moral law will one day replace brute force as the guiding rule of conduct among nations, as it now is amongst individuals. Unfortunately all individuals do not always conform to the moral law and to meet this situation we have police forces. Internationally speaking, we believe the same system should be followed. We believe that the moral force of world opinion, backed up by effective police action, is the best hope of mankind if large-scale wars are to be avoided. This is the basis of our policy in the difficult situation that prevails in the Middle East.

Canada's oldest and strongest ties are with the member nations of the British commonwealth in which we are playing an increasingly important part. Never in the history of the world has there been an organization comparable to the commonwealth for the promotion of peace, freedom, justice and mutual understanding among the diverse peoples of the world. Canadians have a tremendous loyalty to and abiding faith in the commonwealth. We rejoice that the head of the commonwealth is also Queen of Canada. We recall very clearly how the present Prime Minister of Great Britain referred to our own Prime Minister here in this chamber as "the wisest of counsellors and the most loyal of friends".

History very clearly relates how the commonwealth has evolved over the years. The commonwealth is very old in some ways, yet ever new in others. It has proven that it is capable of adapting itself to the needs of the times. It is the only international body in the history of mankind which has survived two major world conflicts and several minor ones. Surely the leaders of the British empire of a century or more ago would scarcely recognize the commonwealth of today. Former ideas of colonial rule, perhaps justifiable in their time and place, have given way to a commonwealth of nations that is the greatest force for enlightened democratic government that the world has ever known.

The Statute of Westminster of 1931 underlined the autonomy and independence of commonwealth nations under the crown. That famous enactment of the British parliament has been the inspiration for the promotion of self-government and freedom all over the globe. In this day and age we are all familiar with the brilliant array of new commonwealth partners that have developed or are developing at the present time their own particular institutions of self-government under the guiding hand of the mother of parliaments at Westminster. This in itself is powerful testimony to the integrity of British leadership in world affairs.

There is nothing in our commonwealth relationship which compels any member to remain within the family against its own wishes. That is precisely as it should be. There is no loyalty so strong as that solidly based on freedom of will. Accordingly, to preserve, to keep intact and to promote further commonwealth growth and understanding should be the endless aim of each and every component member. That, I am confident, is the aim and object of Her Majesty's government of Great Britain. That, I am equally confident, is the aim and object of Her Majesty's government of Canada. In our view the commonwealth must be preserved, all of it. None of it is expendable. All of it is well worth while.

I do not wish to suggest for one moment that there cannot be differences of opinion between members of the commonwealth from time to time. Because of the voluntary nature of our association that is only natural. But when differences do occur they are the differences that one normally expects between members of the same family or between friend and friend. Let no one erroneously suppose that these diverse opinions are signs of weakness or of disunity. Quite the contrary. Diversity is in fact one of the main sources of the strength of the commonwealth family. Like the mortar in a brick wall it separates the various units and at the same time binds them securely together. A brick wall without mortar is weak indeed. On more than one occasion in the past the enemies of our sovereign have learned not to underestimate the inherent strength of the commonwealth's invisible ties.

We in Canada are proud of the fact that numerically speaking the greater part of the commonwealth embraces nations in Asia and in Africa which recently have achieved or, speaking of Africa in particular, are about to achieve full and complete self-government. We are happy that these peoples share our common heritage of free institutions and we are anxious to assist them to develop their material resources. We are thankful for the bridgehead of mutual trust and understanding that the commonwealth ties maintain between them and us. We hope they will all remain in the commonwealth. Certainly we in Canada will be the last to forsake our common heritage. Nor do we cling to this common heritage for material gain, but rather for a better understanding amongst all peoples everywhere.

We welcome the recent visit of the Prime Minister of India to our nation's capital. We recall with affection the most cordial reception our own Prime Minister was given when he visited the nations of Asia in 1954. We congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on his globe-girdling tour of commonwealth countries. As a result of such visits of good will and understanding, there is growing today a stronger, better commonwealth than we have known before.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am one of those people who upon occasion have speculated on the possibility of expanding the commonwealth to include freedom loving nations of good will who are not now members. I am happy indeed to recall that from time to time such hopeful speculation has been indulged in by a good many other people. All of us remember, I am sure, that during the darkest days of world war II the great Sir Winston Churchill proposed what was in effect an outright amalgamation of the British and French empires. Unfortunately, such a bold and imaginative development was not to be. However, had it taken place I am sure this grand union, or should I say reunion, of the British and French peoples would have been worked out along lines similar to those which were used so effectively in building the great Dominion of Canada.

But if it is not practicable at this time to bring new members into the commonwealth from outside, I am proud that Canada has played such an important part in promoting international good will by other means. I refer, of course, to another avenue of our external relations, namely, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Here we have banded together some 14 freedom loving nations not only for mutual defence but also for the promotion of better social, cultural and economic ties. We have unstinting confidence in the present and ultimate success of NATO. Here is another vast area of mankind in which we believe war to be unthinkable as a solution to mutual problems.

In the still wider field of the United Nations itself Canada has earned for herself an enviable reputation for promoting the highest ideals of mankind. We follow this course because as a people we are deeply and genuinely concerned about the future peace and prosperity of the whole world. Unfortunately, in this larger sphere we are not yet sure that war is impossible but we will never stop trying to make it so.

It has become fashionable, Mr. Speaker, for some people, some pessimists, to speculate upon what they regard as the impracticability of our cordial relations with the United States upon the one hand and the members of the British commonwealth on the other. Such sceptics completely overlook the fact that one of the greatest single factors in world affairs today is the now traditional basic friendship and understanding that exists among the great English speaking peoples of the world. Certainly there are differences among us but they are superficial only. The things that unite us are far stronger than those that divide us. I for one hope and believe that this happy state of affairs will soon be spread all over the face of the earth. That is the essence of the international outlook of this Liberal government. We believe that our friends, the people of the United States, appreciate fully what the commonwealth means to the peace and security of the world. For our part, we will never cease trying until the spirit of mutual trust so evident amongst the commonwealth partners thoroughly permeates the whole United Nations.

We are happy, Mr. Speaker, that the speech from the throne asks parliament to approve a measure to set up a Canada council for the arts, humanities and social sciences. Important also is the suggested aid to our hard-pressed universities. This financial assistance, if approved by parliament, will be extended in two ways, namely, grants for capital expenditures and annual grants for current operations.

The other day I happened to see the breakdown of the finances of the University of Alberta in Edmonton for the current fiscal year. It shows a provincial grant for operation of $2,167,000, a federal grant for operation of $545,000, and students' fees amounting to $900,000. Under the proposal in the speech from the throne the federal grant will be about $1,100,000. This amount will be 26 per cent of the university's annual operating budget whereas students' fees will be about 21 per cent. I mention these figures because many people are under the impression that very little is being done by our senior governments for higher education.

The increased grants to the provinces for the encouragement of technical and vocational training will also help to meet a very real need in our country's development.

The proposal to set up a committee in the other place to consider ways and means of assisting agriculture further will be welcomed by all the people of Canada. I am sure this is a matter which will have everyone's wholehearted support. More of our people are engaged in agriculture than in any other single business. Yet their standard of living is hardly up to par with that of those who spend their energies in industrial pursuits.

In many cases the reason is that these people are operating what is generally called submarginal land. Their farms simply will not yield a decent standard of living in return for the effort expended. It is suggested that we take some of these farms out of active agricultural production and return them to some use more in keeping with their productive capacity. This will conserve not only the land itself but also the labour being expended on it without satisfactory results. Most of this land is not really submarginal at all but submarginal only in its present use. Its yield may be quite considerable in some other use. I am sure we will all await the findings of this committee with interest.

During the latter part of 1956 this country experienced a definite upswing in immigration. With the tremendous growth of our national economy, Canada can use a great many more people. It is encouraging to hear of so many people planning to come here from the British Isles. I for one feel sure that they will not be disappointed with what Canada has to offer them.

This parliament and the people of Canada have demonstrated beyond any shadow of doubt their welcome for the unfortunate refugees from tyranny in Hungary. I am sure these people will quickly find remunerative positions here within the framework of our national economy. While we rejoice in their coming here, I am sure we all deeply regret the conditions which have caused them to flee for their lives from their native land.

In this connection I feel I should not overlook a word of commendation and praise for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) who acted so swiftly to give his personal attention to the movement of Hungarian refugees to Canada. I have met no one who is not filled with admiration for his decision to go to Austria to make sure that everything humanly possible was being done by his department for the relief of distress and suffering.

I am sure that everyone here, Mr. Speaker, regrets as much as I do the unfortunate industrial dispute which has led to the stoppage of work on the whole Canadian Pacific railway system. This stoppage is having very serious implications for the whole nation. In the interests of Canada I hope that the parties to the dispute will soon agree to come together to effect a settlement. The present situation is hurting many innocent people and it will have to be settled some time. In the name of reason I hope we can have a settlement now before any more damage is done. I am sure that the good offices of the federal Department of Labour are always available to the parties concerned.

Those responsible for municipal government in our country will, I am sure, be most happy that their representations for the payment of taxes by the federal government on federal property have not gone unheeded. This will assist them materially to carry out the numerous obligations which our orderly development as a nation is placing upon their shoulders. This is also a matter which I and other government supporters in the house have raised from time to time and I cannot help noting that it is good to see that attention is being given to these matters, for it belies the contention of some uninformed individuals to the effect that the views of backbenchers on issues of the day are usually of no avail.

As representatives of the people of Canada, we are thankful for what the contents of the speech from the throne will mean to our country.

Seconded by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) I have the honour to move:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, C.H., Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

(Translation):

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, when I was asked by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) whether I would accept to second the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I was deeply moved by the invitation, and I accepted it in all humility. I wish to offer my sincere thanks to the Prime Minister and to the members of his cabinet for this honour which I accept not only in my personal name but above all in the name of the electors of my constituency of Gloucester and more particularly in the name of the racial group which I have the privilege of representing in this house.

I also wish to join with my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), in expressing to you, Mr. Speaker, as well as to every member of this house, my best wishes for a good, happy, prosperous and holy new year.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I want to be the first one to extend to my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), who had the honour of moving this address, my heartiest congratulations on his splendid presentation. I was deeply moved by his noble gesture in addressing a few remarks in the French language, the other official language of this country. This is another tribute to this Canadian unity which today is prevailing throughout this Canada of ours under the leadership of our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). All members of this house, I am confident, are being impressed by the necessity for Canadians, regardless of our religious beliefs or racial origins, to work closely together, in harmony and mutual understanding, for the welfare of the whole population of our beloved country.

May I also pause for one moment to offer at this time my most sincere and hearty congratulations to the new leader of Her Majesty's official opposition, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). His years of experience and his reputation as an outstanding lawyer and parliamentarian have assured him of this confidence and the highly responsible honour tendered him by his party supporters.

(Translation):

The 60,000-odd citizens of Gloucester constituency, of whom 85 per cent are the descendants of those who lived in the Acadia of 1755, have made a very important contribution to the economic and cultural growth of our country. They are also among the first to understand the necessity of national unity in the pursuit of our common goal. After their deportation, the Acadian people were in a very precarious situation. But, through their indomitable courage and their will to survive, they gradually recovered and overcame many obstacles before becoming an important element in the life of our nation. Their gradual settlement in northern New Brunswick and along the coast of Gloucester can perhaps be explained by their love of the sea and the forest, and an irresistible urge to settle close to the ocean.

I do not intend to take undue advantage of the few minutes at my disposal to relate the history of my constituency. As most of the population is rural, a great many of my people are interested in the fishing industry, and a sizeable proportion of them practise the noble occupation of farmer. During the last ten years, the fishing industry, which is predominant along the 200 miles or so of coastal areas in Gloucester, has known a development and an expansion comparable with the transformations which have taken place in every section of this country. Our modern fishing fleet compares favourably with any other on the Atlantic coast. The federal departments of fisheries and public works have widely co-operated with provincial authorities in making possible these changes in the fishing industry in my constituency.

As we enumerate the important milestones in the evolution of this country and in the economic expansion of the last few years, we must take note of the mineral developments in the Bathurst district. The discovery of zinc, lead and copper ore must rank foremost among the major mining discoveries of the year 1953. We may infer from it an economic expansion unprecedented in the history of our province. Bathurst, a little town of 5,000 people, has been mainly known so far for its pulp and paper mill, its lumber industries, its mechanical parts plant, etc. This little town, which up to now had been perfectly calm, has now become a centre of great activity and undergone changes which in the near future may well go beyond the most optimistic hopes. It is true that a large number of the people in my constituency and even in the province of New Brunswick as a whole are uncertain and doubtful about these developments, which they find somewhat too slow and possibly not spectacular enough. I would like to reassure them and to inspire them with my own confidence. A new public building will be built this year in Bathurst. Moreover, a deep water port will soon be established there from which minerals and other products of the area may be shipped, almost the year round. The mining companies will continue to expand and we are assured of the fullest co-operation of the federal authorities in each and every area which is of concern to them.

These mines will bring additional revenue to our province and contribute to the economic expansion of this country. We in New Brunswick are only beginning this mining expansion whose value in 1956 reached the almost fabulous amount of over two billion dollars, representing twice the production of 1950. Through the co-operation of the department of mines and technical surveys, we were assured of an excellent service which made this development possible particularly in New Brunswick. There is no longer any doubt that the marked and sensational development of the Bathurst area will gradually extend to other areas of my constituency and of the province.

New jobs will be available for thousands of people and, with the contemplated increase in population, new outlets will be created for our agricultural and fish products.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to overtax the patience of this house and, without further ado, I shall deal with some of the main points of the speech that was just read to us in the senate by His Excellency the Governor General.

At the beginning of this new year, there is no doubt that we are going through one of the most critical periods of our history. As stated in the speech from the throne, the instability of the situation in the Middle East, the disastrous effects of the persecution of the unfortunate Hungarian people should make us think more seriously and bring each and every one of us, whatever our political affiliation, to a sense of responsibility, that will guide us in our deliberations, and to a greater appreciation of the freedom of speech and action guaranteed to us by the constitution of our country.

It was with pride, was it not, and not without some glory, that the great majority of the Canadian people approved the stand taken by our representatives at the United Nations.

Has not Canada, despite the opinion expressed by some political antagonists, been an important factor of solidarity in the commonwealth as has been so clearly indicated, once again, by our representatives at the last session of the United Nations assembly? Has not Canada, as a free country under the clever and wise leadership of our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), contributed, perhaps more than any other country to the achievement of the noble goals dictated by the charter of the United Nations? Its objective will insure us as well as mankind as a whole, that useful measures will be taken to lead us towards that era of peace which we are all so much longing for.

Has not Mr. Nehru, prime minister of India, while in Ottawa, declared to a press conference that Canada, in recent conflicts, has been playing a part of paramount importance and has rendered a valuable service by establishing links between the countries of Asia, Europe and America which are all experiencing a strong economic development? That part played by Canada must undoubtedly be put down to the credit of our Prime Minister, of his government and of our energetic and untiring Secretary of State for External Affairs. The goodwill tour of our Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), which will be completed in a few days, after a visit to Pakistan and other countries which receive assistance under the Colombo Plan, is another obvious and glaring proof of our foreign policy aimed at insuring throughout the world a lasting peace based on Christian charity. The main purpose of that visit was to convey to the Asiatic populations in the name of the people and the government of Canada a message of friendship and goodwill. In every country he visited our ambassador of goodwill met an attitude of respect and friendship for the Canadian people. Our representatives, our engineers and experts in the fields of medicine, public health and education who have been sent to those countries have largely contributed to the betterment of conditions there and of the way of life of those peoples.

The speech from the throne recommends the introduction, at this session, of legislation designed to set up a Senate committee on agriculture. We, from the eastern provinces, consider this approach on the part of the government as a very promising one for the future. There is no doubt that a gradual recession of farm income would endanger the continued strength of our general economy. We do not doubt that the changes and developments which have taken place in agriculture these last few years will be a prominent factor in the progress of our nation's industrial growth. The changes occurring both in domestic and in foreign markets basically require an entirely novel adjustment calling for a revision of measures applied so far with regard to consumption as well as to production. However, we cannot ignore the fact that, during the past year, farm incomes have reached a record figure in our history.

We hope that this committee, whose object will be to contribute effectively to increasing agricultural production and the income of agricultural workers, will take advantage of the opportunity to make a thorough study of the particular position and conditions of the eastern provinces. Our farmers, our New Brunswick agriculturists and especially those of the northernmost districts, recognize that they can no longer make any progress or even make a living unless they are given substantial financial aid so that they may improve or adapt their methods in accordance with the development and modern trends of other industries. They believe, and rightly so, that the regulations, or the interpretation of the Canadian Farm Loan Act do not enable them to obtain the share of loans to which they are entitled. Let us hope that the committee proposed under this new legislation will use its authority and prerogatives to make a thorough study of this problem, one of unequalled importance to the effective development of agriculture in our section of the country.

The whole Canadian people has been pleased to hear the declaration of our Prime Minister on November 12 last, in the speech he made at the national conference on secondary education. The establishment of a Canadian council for the encouragement of the Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences, as was put forward in the speech from the throne, and in accordance with the recommendations of the report of the Massey Commission, will encourage and help voluntary organizations concerned with arts, humanities and social sciences, and will foster our cultural relations with foreign countries. Again, in accordance with this report, it is the intention of the government to introduce a measure designed to vest this council of the arts with another important function. I think that the voting by this house, or rather this parliament, of an additional credit of $50 million which would be entrusted to the council and distributed over a ten-year period, will help meet that urgent need for capital expenditure which is facing our Canadian universities.

Thanks to private enterprise and a proper national policy, our economic prosperity stands at a record level. The Canadian government realizes that our cultural development must go hand in hand with our economic development. It is the duty of the state to help financially, but without controlling it of course, that private enterprise which looks after the development of our national culture.

With the great majority of our Canadian universities, I am glad of the government's decision to recommend to parliament, at this session, that the annual federal grants to the universities be doubled. Coming as I do from an English province and being of the French minority, I realize that such a frank and courageous decision on the part of our government will have important repercussions on the future of our youth and on the development of our national life.

We find, in my constituency, the University of the Sacred Heart, under the direction of the Eudist fathers. No one will ever be able to assess what Acadia, what New Brunswick, and what my constituency of Gloucester owe to these educators who, for more than half a century, have devoted their lives and energies to our young people, without asking anything in return. We recognize that the rapid growth of our country requires a similar development of our universities and we approve without any reservation the financial participation of the state as long as the federal government does not intend to interfere in the field of education, which belongs to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, and as long as the central government does not threaten the freedom of our universities.

Our institutions of higher learning, such as the Sacred Heart university which I mentioned a moment ago, need the financial help of the government to continue to dispense to our young people the knowledge which will prepare them to take charge of the development of the natural resources of our country.

As long as the federal subsidies to universities continue to be paid unconditionally, as long as the central government makes no attempt to intervene in the administration or the management of these universities, we who are from provinces with French-speaking minorities will rejoice in this financial assistance which constitutes another means of safeguarding our cultural autonomy. Along with our Prime Minister, we are convinced that these proposals will help fill a gap in the national life of this country and help solve the critical difficulties now being felt by Canadian institutions of higher learning.

Our government is not content to increase this help given to our institutions of higher learning. It recognizes the increased demands brought about by our national evolution. It therefore proposes to revise once more and to increase subsidies and subventions to provincial governments to assist them in providing technical and vocational training for our young people. May I point out one of the problems facing our municipalities, the seriousness of which is constantly increasing from year to year. In my constituency of Gloucester, for instance, the population of 60,000 inhabitants has to provide primary education to some 15,000 children. The high cost of building and maintaining our schools, as well as teachers' salaries require direct taxation, far beyond the taxpayers' ability to pay. It must be recognized however that this matter is exclusively of provincial jurisdiction and that it would not be logical to ask federal authorities to intervene in the settlement of our problems of primary and secondary education. This should be dealt with exclusively by our provincial legislatures, and it is up to the municipalities to insist upon the distribution by the provincial governments of a larger share of the subsidies granted the provinces by the federal government under the federal-provincial tax agreements.

We shall also be called upon to deal with some amendments to the federal program of subsidies to municipalities. We hope that the study of the suggested amendments will help us to lighten the already too heavy burden borne by municipalities in providing the additional services made necessary by our economic expansion and our growing population.

(Text):

Before resuming my seat I want to say a word about the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. We have confidence that the report of the Gordon commission, which is expected to be made public within the next few days, will deal—in a most encouraging manner, we hope—with problems affecting the provinces of the Atlantic coast. The day has come when we of the maritime provinces must desist from this attitude of utter discouragement which has been so prevalent amongst ourselves for the last two or three decades. Let us do away with the expression of depressed or "have not" provinces for which we ourselves, residents of the maritimes, may have been responsible and had to bear the consequences. We realize that the maritime provinces may not have shared equally in the general economic upswing which has been maintained so vigorously throughout the last few years. We feel that our geographical position is creating transportation problems, but we are confident that these problems can be solved. We have faith in the future of our country and faith in the future of our own maritime provinces.

Our new attitude of self-reliance must be a realistic indication of our determination to share in this period of unequaled prosperity in Canadian history. New industries have sprung up in the maritime provinces, new pulp and paper mills have come into being, power generation is increasing gradually, and New Brunswick's lead, zinc, copper and manganese developments have given our province new industrial importance. We will be waiting with great interest for this report of the Gordon commission. We feel confident that proper consideration has been given to our difficulties in the field of transportation, and in the supplying of electrical energy.

We regard as a move in the right direction the recent decision of the board of transport commissioners which has resulted in a saving of $100,000 annually for our New Brunswick potato farmers. We approve of the recent announcement of the Canadian government travel bureau to increase by $300,000 its annual contribution for the promotion of the tourist industry in the maritime provinces where the charm of our ports, our salmon rivers, our valleys, our long coast line and historic woodland highways and our moderate climate is attracting thousands of tourists annually to spend some $50 million a year.

We support the renewal of an agreement between the Canadian government, the province of New Brunswick and private industry to carry on with the spraying program to protect our forests against the disastrous destruction by budworms. In this particular field we sincerely hope that the Canadian government will recognize the importance of our forests to our general economy and, in view of the wide scope of this program, increase substantially the federal contribution which to date has reached a total of over $2 million.

We most welcome the latest revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act regulations which provides for the inclusion of commercial fishermen in unemployment insurance benefits. The application of this new measure could easily mean an additional $200,000 annually for the fishermen of Gloucester county.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, in formally seconding the resolution moved by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, I should also like to pay tribute to the right hon. Prime Minister.

At this time, and in this critical period of our history, the Canadian people are thankful to Divine Providence for the fact that they have as a leader a man whose wisdom and foresight are also greatly admired abroad. He knows how to apply to national affairs those same Christian principles which he has adopted with regard to his own life, and his policy is based on his determination to preserve Canadian unity while securing for each and everyone the material and cultural security which is essential to our national unity.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Report of the parliamentary librarian.—Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 4.52 p.m.

APPENDIX

The
UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF
SIR ROBERT BORDEN
on
Tuesday, January 8, 1957

Speeches of the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, Hon. L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Henry Borden, Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker, Mr. M. J. Coldwell and Mr. Solon E. Low.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): Ladies and gentlemen, "O Canada".

(Whereupon the gathering sang O Canada.)

Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Chief Justice, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen: We are assembled here to do honour to the memory of a great Canadian, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Borden, a former prime minister of Canada. We, and the unseen audience, through the magic of television, have just witnessed the unveiling of the statue to his memory, located on a site just west of the west block on parliament hill. For seasonal reasons the continuing ceremonies are being held in the Hall of Honour of the centre block.

Seated on the platform in addition to the co-chairman, the Honourable L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons, are:

Right Honourable L. S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada
Honourable Patrick Kerwin,
Chief Justice of Canada
Mr. Henry Borden
Honourable W. Ross Macdonald,
Government Leader in the Senate
Mr. John Diefenbaker,
Leader of the Opposition
Mrs. Henry Borden
Honourable T. A. Crerar
Honourable George Drew
Honourable J. T. Haig,
Leader of the Opposition in the Senate
Mr. John Bracken
Mr. M. J. Coldwell,
Leader of the C.C.F. party
Mr. Solon Low,
Leader of the Social Credit party.

The Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, the Honourable Esioff L. Patenaude and the Honourable Albert A. Sevigny were invited to attend but expressed their regrets. They, with Senator Crerar, are the only surviving members of Sir Robert's government.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Speaker of the House of Commons.

(Translation):

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. Prime Minister, Honourable Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, ladies and gentlemen, we are gathered here this afternoon to honour the memory of a Canadian who was prime minister of our country and who, in the course of a long and remarkable political career, has rendered outstanding services: Sir Robert Laird Borden.

A few moments ago, in the presence of the present Right Honourable Prime Minister, and of the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Henry Borden, Q.C., a nephew of Sir Robert Borden, unveiled a monument erected on parliament hill to remind future generations of our past glories and of the debt of gratitude which we owe to the builders of this nation.

We are therefore witnessing one of those great parliamentary occasions. The leaders of all parties unite in paying a nation's tribute to Sir Robert Laird Borden.

(Text):

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate):

Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honour to present the Prime Minister of Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Co-chairmen, Mr. Chief Justice, Mr. Borden, ladies and gentlemen: Just before we begin the heavy schedule of another session of parliament, it is fitting that we should pause to pay tribute to one of the great figures in Canadian history, Sir Robert Borden.

I wish to congratulate Miss Frances Loring on the striking likeness and the excellent workmanship of the statue which Mr. Henry Borden unveiled a few minutes ago. She has expressed for the permanent records of our nation in a fashion more eloquent than words many of the fine characteristics of that distinguished statesman.

Statue of Sir Robert Borden

The Right Honourable Sir Robert Borden was born over one hundred years ago in the small rural community of Grand Pré, Nova Scotia, the native province of three of Canada's prime ministers. He is remembered particularly by us as Canada's prime minister during the first world war.

Much has been written about Canada's role in the first world war and no doubt much will be written in the future. This was one of the most critical periods of Canadian history. Much progress has been made since confederation in the development of a strong and united nation, but the national fabric has never faced such a severe test and none could tell if it could withstand the strains imposed upon it.

Canadians were fortunate in those trying years to have as their leader a man of unquestionable integrity, a high sense of duty, a thoroughly trained mind and an exceptional capacity for unremitting hard work. Whatever opinions might be advanced on the policies which he pursued, his personal qualities and particularly his honesty and sincerity of purpose in seeking to serve his country well were outstanding.

Under Sir Robert Borden's leadership Canada made a contribution to the first world war which won the praise and admiration of her allies. In addition to his leadership at home, Sir Robert played an active role in the imperial war cabinet in London. He strove throughout the war to ensure that Canada should have a voice in the formulation of allied policy rather than limit her role to supplying men and material. With a wide and statesmanlike view of this country's capacities and her future, he sought to encourage his fellow citizens to accept their new and inevitable responsibilities.

In 1919 Sir Robert Borden was our chief plenipotentiary delegate at the peace conference in Paris, and in 1920 he signed the treaty of Versailles as the representative of Canada on terms of equality with the representatives of the other allied nations. In the same year Canada was admitted as an original member of the league of nations.

Another of Sir Robert's accomplishments at about the same time was to secure for Canada the right to have a minister plenipotentiary in Washington accredited by the King and appointed on the advice of the Canadian cabinet. Such an appointment, however, was only made several years later. Sir Robert also suggested at the imperial war conference of 1918 that Canada should decide its own constitutional questions. This, as you know, was accomplished in the last few years.

In his book, "Canada in the Commonwealth", published after his retirement, he welcomed the definition of the relations of Great Britain and the dominion contained in the Balfour report as "autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any respect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations."

"The dominions having sought and gained the status of nationhood", Sir Robert wrote, "they cannot recede from assumption of its responsibilities." And in the last lines of his book Sir Robert Borden expressed his hope that this freedom within the unity of the commonwealth was "an earnest of what may yet be accomplished in an ever wider sphere. The league of the commonwealth may serve as an exemplar to the league of nations."

(Translation):

Sir Robert devoted himself to his work with such energy that even his own vast physical resources proved unequal to the task. He was obliged to retire in 1920. Fortunately, he soon recovered his good health, a fact which enabled him to continue his active life for a number of years afterwards. I had the pleasure of hearing him in 1929 when he spoke before the Canadian Bar Association in Quebec city. I well remember him and the words he spoke on that occasion. During the war it was believed in certain quarters that he did not understand those Canadians belonging to the French-speaking group, and that he had no real sympathy for them. It is perhaps for that reason that he availed himself of that opportunity to speak of the very origin of Canadian history in the heart of the province of Quebec, in that city which he called the "founding city" of Canada. When he had finished speaking, he had removed any doubts we may have had about his real sympathy for French-speaking Canadians. May I be allowed to quote the last sentences of his speech:

(Text):

On the whole there has been an honourable and wholesome co-operation of the two races in the upbuilding of Canadian institutions and in the development of the heritage with which Providence has endowed the Canadian nation. The pioneer races are and they always will be distinctive but in their origins they are much nearer to each other than either seems to imagine. It is desirable to emphasize their points of sympathy and contact rather than their divergences of temperament and outlook.

(Translation):

Those words were spoken by Sir Robert Borden more than a quarter of a century ago. Since then, our policy, both internal and external, has undergone great changes. Perhaps he would not approve of them all. I am sure however that he would agree with us that we have gone a long way on the road to national maturity and unity.

(Text):

In the years since his death we have learned to have a more accurate and a deeper appreciation of a great Canadian statesman. And I am sure that all Canadians who gaze upon the statue which has been unveiled today will recall with respect his sincerity of purpose and his selfless devotion to his country.

One of Sir Robert's oldest friends and perhaps his closest collaborator, who had hoped to be here on this occasion but who is prevented by illness from being present, has written me the following letter:

360 Bay Street, Toronto
January 3, 1957

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I feel grateful for your invitation to be present at the coming Sir Robert Borden memorial event (January 8) but am resolutely forbidden to leave the house by my doctor. I have, therefore, prepared a very short statement of acknowledgement and regret. This I hope you will read to the assembled people.

There has been nothing in the past that I had to shrink from which I regretted like I do this failure to take my part.

I sincerely appreciate the invitation and am grateful to you personally.

Sincerely yours,
Arthur Meighen.

This is the statement enclosed with Mr. Meighen's letter:

It is with extreme remorse that I find myself ill and quite unable to attend the proceedings on parliament hill which are to do honor to Sir Robert Borden.

In his lifetime, Sir Robert Borden had friends unnumbered in all parts of Canada, but none, I sincerely submit, more devoted and tireless than myself and this relationship continued until the hour of his death.

To have survived until this event takes place will add much to my feelings of gratitude and satisfaction, and one cannot be wrong in indulging an inward assurance that the waves of goodwill generated here, the richer sense of unity and common purpose inspired, the pride we all have in those who have toiled nobly and passed on, that all these flaming truths will keep us resolutely on our course.

Arthur Meighen.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): Ladies and gentlemen, may I present Mr. Henry Borden, nephew of Sir Robert Borden and one of the most outstanding Canadian figures in the business and professional life of Canada.

Mr. Henry Borden, Q.C.: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Chief Justice, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: This is indeed an historic occasion and I wish, Mr. Prime Minister, to thank you sincerely for doing me the great honour and giving me the unforgettable privilege of unveiling this statue of Sir Robert Borden. I have no hesitation in saying that I dearly loved Sir Robert and my life has been enriched by the deep affection and kindliness which he bestowed on me.

The statue, in the design and completion of which you, sir, have taken such a genuine personal interest, will serve to keep fresh in the minds of future generations the memory of a distinguished Canadian statesman, of whom you have just spoken in such complimentary terms.

On behalf of Sir Robert's relatives and friends I wish to join in the Prime Minister's congratulations to Miss Loring, and to thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, and through you the citizens of Canada, for causing this wonderful memorial to be created on parliament hill. Thank you very much indeed.

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Ladies and gentlemen, the honourable the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. John Diefenbaker, Q.C., M.P., will now speak.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker, Q.C.: Joint chairmen, Mr. Prime Minister, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: First, I want to join with Mr. Borden in thanking the Prime Minister for the generous terms in which he referred to the service to Canada of Sir Robert Borden. This is in keeping with the traditions of our public service. While we may disagree in matters of policy each of us must, under our democratic system, realize that it is only in a community of counsel that the best for Canada will be achieved.

I think it is most fitting that we, on this occasion, honour one of Canada's greatest statesmen. As I listened to the Prime Minister review the constitutional development of this country I thought it was a magnificent tribute from one constitutional lawyer, regarding the constitutional development of this country, in giving approval to the contribution made by another. After all, there is that bond of union amongst members of the legal profession wherein the greatness of a contribution is at all times recognized by one's fellows. It is of interest to know, too, that out of the eleven prime ministers of Canada, seven were members of the legal profession, all making their contribution toward the building of this country into the ideal of us all.

Mention was made of the reaction to the attitude of Sir Robert Borden and the stand

Statue of Sir Robert Borden

he took at the peace conference. It was he who insisted, following the sacrifices of the war, that Canada be recognized as an autonomous nation within the family of British nations, and insisted on the right to sign the treaty of Versailles and join as a signatory of the league of nations pact whereby Canada adopted responsibilities that heretofore had not been regarded as a necessary incident of our membership in the commonwealth.

After all, we judge men and women first on the basis of those who served with them. This morning I found a quotation in Lloyd George's memoirs which sets forth the attitude that was taken by Lloyd George to this man who has been honoured today in the unveiling of this statue. Lloyd George said of him this:

> Canada was represented (at the imperial conference of 1917) by Sir Robert Borden who was the very quintessence of common sense. Always calm, well balanced, a man of co-operating temper, invariably subordinating self to the common cause, he was a sagacious and helpful counsellor, never forgetting that his first duty was to the people of the great dominion he represented, but also realizing that an insistent and obstructive particularism would destroy any hope of achieving success in the common task.

While it was Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier who joined together the two great races and founded Canada, and who had still a greater contribution to make in the years to follow, it was Sir Robert Borden and those who served with him who were able to achieve that unity and that international status which many had dreamed of 50 years before. It was only achieved in the light of the sacrifices of the war.

We recognize, too, as you said, Mr. Prime Minister, the contribution of the two races to this country. With parliament opening today it is well to remember that in 1921 Sir Robert Borden, on the occasion of the gift of the Speaker's chair from Westminster to the House of Commons, said this:

> The parliamentary institutions which we hold as of right and not of grace were won by a common ancestry and through gradual evolution and development during the past five or six centuries. The man who summoned the first gathering that might be regarded as the forerunner of the commons house of parliament of Great Britain as that of Canada was a Frenchman, born in France. Thus we can look back with satisfaction upon the fact that Saxon and Norman five or six hundred years ago stood side by side in the assertion of liberties that are ours today.

I think on this occasion it is well to recall those words, as this monument has been unveiled. I think all of us will agree that his monument will be tangible evidence of his statesmanship; his living monument the establishment of the principle of equality among the free nations within the commonwealth and empire as he saw it, and his contribution to fashioning for Canada that role which she is playing so magnificently today. Of him it may indeed be said that "he builded better than he knew."

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Ladies and gentlemen, the honourable the leader of the C.C.F. party, Mr. M. J. Coldwell, will now speak.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell: Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Chief Justice, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: I think it is fitting that we have gathered here today to honour the memory of a great Canadian. There are times in the lives of nations when it is well to look back and remember famous men. Sir Robert Borden was a famous and a great man. As we have heard today he was one of the architects, indeed in many respects the principal architect, of the place which Canada now has in the world of today.

Sir Robert Borden, at Versailles, insisted on the recognition of Canada as a nation. Sir Robert Borden was, in that respect, one of those who placed the British commonwealth in its new phase. His services to this country and to the commonwealth deserve the recognition that has been given to him today. I am very happy indeed that I am one of those who, though not sharing the fundamental principles of the party he represented, can speak on behalf of those who, while disagreeing with him in some of his policies, none the less recognize fully that in his day and in his generation he played a great part in leading this country through difficult times and in laying the foundations of the Canada which we know today.

I am very happy indeed to have had this opportunity of being present and participating in this great event.

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Ladies and gentlemen, the honourable the leader of the Social Credit party, Mr. Solon Low, will now speak to you.

Mr. Solon E. Low: Messrs. Co-chairmen, Mr. Prime Minister, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: I feel greatly honoured to have this privilege of participating in an event which was designed to enable us to pay tribute to a great Canadian statesman. I shall not multiply words nor repeat the things that have already been said, though I am convinced that some of them might be worthy of repetition for the sake of emphasis. Suffice it to say that I concur most heartily in all those things which have been said of Sir Robert Borden, as well as of the artist who executed the statue that has been unveiled today.

As people in the days ahead look upon the likeness of Sir Robert that is now on the grounds of parliament, they will doubtless be moved to study the life and accomplishments of this great Canadian. If they do, I am sure that they will discover something which will give them considerable encouragement.

Sir Robert was born in humble circumstances, and through his own effort and determination to work hard he reached one of the highest positions within the ability of the Canadian people to bestow on any man. He accomplished this without benefit of family fortune or prestige of great family power. It will occur to all who will read and learn about this Canadian that what Sir Robert accomplished many another Canadian can also accomplish if he is prepared to devote himself unceasingly and with complete honesty of purpose to his task. We may differ with many of the views that were held by Sir Robert Borden. We may be critical even of some of the things he did, but anybody who took the trouble to study his life and the motives that activated him in his public service must agree that he did have complete honesty of purpose and an integrity that can stand as an example to all who are called to serve their country. It is fitting, therefore, that an occasion of this kind be used to remind ourselves that Providence has always raised up good men to meet the needs of the particular time in which they lived.

I am sure that Sir Robert was one of those, and furthermore if our nation continues in humility to seek after things of righteousness we will always be blessed with the kind of men who can give us the leadership we need for the particular circumstances of those times.

May I say in conclusion that I honour the memory of Sir Robert Borden for all the reasons that have been mentioned here today, and in addition for the fact that he had a thoroughly disciplined mind, which he applied with singleness of purpose to the development of Canada and the British Empire. Of Sir Robert it can truly be said that he served his country well.

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Ladies and gentlemen, I ask you now to rise and sing "God Save the Queen."

Whereupon the gathering sang God Save the Queen.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 9, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—TABLING OF CONCILIATION BOARD REPORTS

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a question addressed yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). In accordance with that request I tabled at noon five copies of the conciliation board's report covering the dispute between the locomotive engineers and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as well as five copies of the minority report.

Then as to the other part of the hon. member's question, he asked if we could table all the correspondence with the parties concerned dealing with the matter. On looking this up I find that the correspondence is quite sketchy, consisting mainly of copies of telegrams. In order to give a better picture I have undertaken to prepare a factual report covering the background of the dispute leading up to yesterday. This will contain summaries of telephone conversations as well as copies of telegrams. I am in your hands as to whether this should be tabled with the Clerk or included in Hansard.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this subject I wonder if not only the statement which the minister has prepared but also the report of the conciliation board and the minority report could be included as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Gregg: The report of the conciliation board and the minority report are very long documents and they have been tabled. If any hon. member would like to have a copy for study I would be happy to provide one. I think that would be better than including it in Hansard. This other document includes summaries of the reports and the correspondence we have had with the parties concerned, but it does not include a large number of wires, resolutions, summaries of telephone calls on this topic with parties who are not involved in the dispute.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the need for the government to appoint a controller to take over the temporary management of the Canadian Pacific Railway so that its operation on the former basis might be resumed immediately pending an agreement between the company and its employees on all matters now in dispute. I think it is obvious to the house that this is a definite matter of urgent public importance and I am therefore moving this motion.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out yesterday to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), it is a fact that this strike is referred to in the speech from the throne and the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne which is to proceed as soon as we reach orders of the day will permit hon. gentlemen to make any suggestions they wish to make in connection with this strike which they think are in the public interest. It is not only the urgency of a matter which determines whether you allow the regular procedure of the house to be interrupted; there is also the urgency of debate to be considered. There can be just as full a debate on the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne as there could be under the motion which has been submitted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

I think there have been several occasions when Your Honour has decided that that being the case there were no grounds for interrupting the course of the regular procedure of the house as it had been arranged, and in this case as it had been acquiesced in yesterday.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on the point raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as to whether there is urgency of debate in connection with this matter. According to the authorities—and on previous occasions Your Honour has made the same point—what you have to consider is not just the urgency of a matter but the urgency of debate. All of us recognize the urgency of the matter.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I submit that it is out of order for either the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to discuss the question of urgency until you yourself have given your ruling on that point. The standing order reads:

> He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order, and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken, Mr. Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places . . .

I submit no discussion can take place and no objection can be taken until after Your Honour has decided whether it is in order and of urgent public importance, and that a discussion between the mover of the motion and the Prime Minister or any member of the government is out of order until that ruling is made, at which time all members may have the right to speak on the matter if they so desire.

Mr. Speaker: Technically the hon. member is quite correct, but if I were to go further I could say that we are still under the order "motions" and I have not yet called orders of the day. At that time, just before proceeding with the question period, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar could have risen and presented his motion. However, I did not want to be technical about the matter and I listened to the Prime Minister and I was prepared to listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because I find I need some help.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My purpose is to direct myself to the one point, namely, whether there is urgency of debate. The Prime Minister suggests that this matter can be discussed during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne because the matter is mentioned in the speech from the throne. I would point out to you, sir, that under the new rules the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne can continue, and probably will continue, until Tuesday, January 22. That is another 13 days.

If the government is going to wait another 13 days to collect the opinions of the members of the house as expressed hit and miss in the debate on the address, that is hardly coming to grips with the issue. Because of the urgency of the issue itself, I suggest that there is urgency of debate and that it is urgent for the government to wait not 13 days to collect the opinions of the members of the house but it is urgent for the government to have today the opinions of members in all parties as to what should be done in connection with this matter.

My leader has laid before the house not only the matter itself but a specific, concrete proposal to which members can address themselves. I suggest that in view of what the present situation is doing to the economy of the country and in view of the rights of the men involved there is urgency of debate and urgency of having this matter discussed by parliament today rather than having it drag out for another 13 days.

Mr. Speaker: In the first place the Minister of Labour, in tabling a certain document, has made a suggestion that one document containing correspondence be printed as an appendix to Hansard. Is there unanimous consent to that effect? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of document referred to, see appendix, pages 51-56.)

Mr. Speaker: Is there any other business to be transacted under the heading of motions? If not, we are at the stage just before orders of the day are called.

Mr. Coldwell: I regret that I did not realize that you, Mr. Speaker, were about to call orders of the day. I was waiting for the appropriate place.

Mr. Speaker: We are now at the appropriate place. Mr. Coldwell has moved for leave to introduce a motion adjourning the house under standing order 26, and the purpose of it is to discuss a matter which is well defined and no doubt of urgent public importance. I listened to the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and also to those made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I also looked at standing order 38 which defines the order in which the debate on the address in reply is to be taken. If this motion were moved, let us say, tomorrow and if this evening the acting leader of the house announced, as is provided for in standing order 38, that we were not to proceed with the debate on the address in reply tomorrow but to skip a day or two, I would be inclined to allow the motion. The session opened yesterday. In the speech from the throne there is reference to this matter which is of extreme importance; and today, traditionally, after the mover and the seconder of the address have made their speeches, it is leaders' day. In view of the importance of the question I would greatly doubt that the leaders in their speeches today would not deal with the matter, although perhaps not along the lines of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). But as he knows, as soon as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has made his speech, he will be given the floor as is customary—

Mr. Coldwell: After the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Yes; after the Prime Minister. Then the leader of the C.C.F. party will be given the floor. I have always had certain difficulty with respect to this standing order 26 especially when the matter mentioned under it obviously is of urgent public importance. Not only in this case but in many others hon. members have moved a motion of importance similar to this one; and when I have had to decide whether there is urgency of debate it has been customary for me—and not only for me but for my predecessors ever since the standing order has existed—not to grant the motion when there is opportunity for a debate involving great latitude such as that on the address in reply, the budget debate or a motion to go into supply. The matter presents difficulty. As I told hon. members last year, I have been studying the matter and the Clerk and I have had discussions about it. I should not like to be called upon today to change the practice which has been so consistently followed in the past. I am still considering the matter. As I say, it presents difficulties. I should like the house to bear with me at this moment. I would ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to understand that I do not at the moment wish to change the practice which has been so consistently followed in the past. I shall give the matter some further thought. I do not say that he should not be permitted to make his motion again. I do not make any commitments but I would say that unless opportunity of discussion not only of the various matters mentioned in the speech from the throne but of this matter of urgency as well is given in the debate on the address in reply —if it is skipped for a day or two and not enough opportunities have been given for the house to express their views—I should be inclined to go along with the hon. member. I therefore do not accept the motion.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour to this effect. Have any arrangements or agreements been made to provide the necessities of life, food, fuel, and so forth, to those areas suffering a shortage owing to the railway strike?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, no agreements have been made to that effect, but in discussions with the two parties concerned those matters were discussed and I have already brought instances of pending hardship to their attention. If there are any that my hon. friend has in mind I would be glad to do what I can to bring them to the attention of both parties.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF TAX ON AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister giving consideration to a further reduction of excise tax on automobiles manufactured in Canada?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could remember the precise answer I made to the same question asked by the same member about a year ago. All I can say is that we consider everything.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): In order that automobile dealers may arrange their car inventories, can the minister advise when he expects to bring down the budget?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, it has been customary to give sometimes one week's and sometimes two weeks' notice of that date, but I am not in a position to give a date at the present time.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Can the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources tell the house when conversations between representatives of the government of Canada and the government of the United States with respect to problems concerning the development of the Columbia and other international rivers will commence?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No definite date has been set as yet.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1955 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce say whether an interim payment on the 1955 wheat crop can soon be made in order to improve the cash position on the prairies and avert any precipitous drop in farm income?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Under the terms of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, such a payment cannot be made until it is recommended by the Canadian wheat board, and I have received no recommendation to date.

Mr. Argue: Under the special circumstances, I wonder whether the minister would consider communicating with the wheat board in order to see whether such a payment could in fact be made?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall be glad to look into the matter.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF CANADIAN PACIFIC REFRIGERATOR CARS BY CANADIAN NATIONAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport this question. Is the Canadian National Railways permitted to use Canadian Pacific Railway refrigerator cars for the movement of perishable goods, such as potatoes, during the period in which the C.P.R. is closed down as a result of the present strike?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough, Mr. Speaker, to send me notice of his question and I have made some inquiries from the Canadian National. They advise me that such C.P.R. refrigerator cars as were on the Canadian National system at the time of the strike will continue to be used by Canadian National in the usual manner, but they will not move onto their own lines refrigerator cars at points not ordinarily served by the Canadian National.

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): In view of the termination of the duties of the former transport controller at the conclusion of navigation last December 17, can the minister make an announcement that an appointment has been made to fill this important post?

[Mr. Lesage.]

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Regardless of the impression of the hon. member, the resignations of the transport controller and of the deputy transport controller were received only in the last week of December. These resignations have not yet been acted upon by the government; consequently, I am not in a position to make any statement concerning their successors.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Am I to assume that there will be an appointment made at a very early date?

Mr. Marler: I think I should say this, that the transport controller carried out his duties with outstanding success in the face of very substantial criticism from the hon. gentleman opposite. In the first place, I think it is going to be exceedingly difficult for the government to find a transport controller of the calibre of Mr. Milner. In the second place, I think in view of the criticism expressed by my hon. friend it will be very difficult for us to find someone who will be willing to accept the duties.

Mr. Argue: Nonsense.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): What am I to conclude from that? Am I to conclude the government is not planning on making an appointment to this post?

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—SITUATION ON HOBBEMA RESERVE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the minister give a statement as to the future plans of his department for many Indian families living on the Hobbema reserve in Alberta who have allegedly been deprived of their treaty rights and the privilege of residing on that reserve?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not admit for one second the accuracy of the allegation made by the hon. gentleman, and therefore there is no occasion for any kind of statement.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not aware of the fact that over 100 Indians have been requested to leave that particular reserve within the next few weeks?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is quite well aware of what actually has happened on the reserve, yes.

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. What is done or what happens when a group of Indians are voted out of an Indian band? What becomes of them? Is anything done by the department to see that they find a new home or get on a different reserve? What are the plans?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is under a slight misapprehension. No Indian can be voted out of a band; no Indian can be deprived of his Indian status. But, as the hon. gentleman knows, since he participated in the revision of the Indian Act, which I did not, the Indian Act does provide legal procedure for the determination of who is or is not an Indian. When the status of an alleged Indian is challenged by another, that legal procedure, which was laid down by this parliament, is followed, and I think every hon. member, and certainly the Leader of the Opposition, would insist that the government should carry out the law as laid down by parliament. That is precisely what we are doing.

Mr. Ferguson: They join the C.C.F., don't they?

IMMIGRATION

ADDITIONAL RECEPTION AND HEALTH FACILITIES FOR HUNGARIAN REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with regard to reception arrangements being made for Hungarian refugees arriving in Canada, and particularly whether the dominion government has arranged to provide any additional reception and health facilities of its own for their accommodation and instruction until such time as they can be fitted into the employment picture in Canada?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Well, as the hon. gentleman very well knows, all the arrangements that have been made so far for the reception of the Hungarian refugees, over and above the normal facilities existing in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, have been on an ad hoc basis, in an effort to meet the problems as they have developed. I believe that up to the present we in Canada have been able to provide adequate reception for everyone who has arrived, perhaps not quite as nice as we sometimes would have liked it, but it has been pretty satisfactory, thanks, not nearly so much to the government as to the great generosity of the Canadian people, for which I am sure everyone in the house is grateful; and I have no doubt that if more facilities are needed in one way or another they will be provided either by the federal government or by provincial and local authorities, and I hope in large part by voluntary agencies. Up to the present the facilities have been adequate to meet the flow but this present week is going to see the biggest flow yet of Hungarian refugees across the country.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Despite the omission of the subject from the speech from the throne, can the Prime Minister say whether the government is still considering asking parliament at this session to raise the amount of the old age pension?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If there is any announcement to be made in that respect it will not require a question from the hon. member to have the announcement made.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I first through you extend to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, not only my congratulations on the outstanding manner in which they discharged their responsibilities—and I say that not in a routine manner—but also may I add my personal appreciation and thanks for the warm references they so kindly made regarding myself. I deeply appreciate what they said and I may add, sir, that I appreciate the attitude in general of my colleagues on both sides of the house who in their attitude toward me have revealed that understanding which becomes of the essence of our parliamentary system. As the years go by and as we face one another across the house, we develop that regard and respect for those who do not agree with us without which our parliamentary system would be meaningless and ineffectual.

I also want to add a word of personal regret concerning the circumstances which made necessary the resignation of the Hon. George Drew and to say through you, sir, to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that we on this side of the house wish to thank him and his colleagues for the words spoken by him regarding the outstanding contribution made by Mr. Drew to the public service and to Canada both in war and in peace. We couple therewith the hope that it will not be long before he will be restored to his former vitality and health and again able to take his place in the public affairs of our country.

Having said that, I am going to step immediately into a discussion of the speech from the throne. It is a somewhat lengthy document containing a rather extended reference to Canada's external affairs, to the Canada Council and federal grants, to the intention to amend the Municipal Grants Act which we in the opposition have advocated for so long, and to the necessity of certain statutes being amended. One is struck by the fact, however, that regarding an important issue facing Canada at this hour there is but a short and uncertain reference. I refer of course to the paragraph dealing with the strike in which the following words appear:

> In the last few days a serious industrial dispute has led to a stoppage of work on one of the major railways of Canada despite the use of the normal processes of conciliation. Special efforts have been made and are continuing to be made by my ministers to assist the parties to reach an agreed settlement.

That is a casual reference which calls apparently for cavalier contemplation of a situation which is dangerous, critical and crippling in its economic effects. This strike has now been in continuance for one week and with the exception of periodical statements which are more or less hopeful in their import there has been no declaration made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) regarding this very serious matter.

Across the country we find ourselves in this position today. In various parts of the maritimes which are served only by the Canadian Pacific railway a situation exists which is detrimental to the areas affected. Because of the tremendous glut of wheat, areas on the prairies served by the Canadian Pacific railway are faced with a critical situation. Yet all that parliament is vouchsafed is a pious declaration that special efforts have been made and are continuing to be made.

The motion introduced today by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is one which we had considered. We felt that under the rules it would not have been possible to move such a motion successfully. Indeed if it had been accepted the adjournment would have been only for today, but now there is an opportunity available—not only today but in the days ahead as changes take place—to discuss this matter which vitally affects the Canadian people.

Warehouses and docks are piled high with cargo. Unemployment is occurring because of necessary layoffs of men in industries directly affected by the strike. The common council of Saint John, New Brunswick, on Saturday declared a state of emergency. Prayers were offered in the Roman Catholic churches for a settlement. That is a summary of the press reference I have here and I do not intend to go into further detail.

What does the government do? It continues its policy of being resolute in irresolution. What has it done? This is not a new problem. This matter has been before the government for months. There has been postponement and procrastination, there have been promises that something is going to turn up. We have had daily repetition of promises for the future.

What does the government intend to do? That is a question which the Prime Minister must answer this afternoon. Across this country people are asking, "What do you intend to do?" Remember that the results flowing from automation are not of recent development. One year ago Mr. Jodoin suggested the setting up of a commission on the problems of automation. He stated the other day that if his suggestions in that regard had been met the strike might very well have been avoided.

Let us go back to 1950. In 1950 the situation of course was more general than it is today. In 1950 the strike was outlawed. In 1953 the Prime Minister indicated that if a strike then threatening was carried into effect action similar to that taken in 1950 would be taken.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I am sure the Leader of the Opposition does not want to go further than I went. I advised them that parliament would be called immediately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Parliament would be called to act. That is what the promise was. Then in 1956, a few days before Christmas, the press reported that the Prime Minister had stated—I know that he has since said in a rather uncertain way that he was not properly reported—that—

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If the hon. member wants to know what happened let me say that from half-past eleven o'clock of the night before I was getting continuous calls. I told everyone that if there was any statement to be made it would be made from Ottawa by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). One gentleman of the press said, "Two or three years ago you made a statement that there could be no strike." I said, "I hope there will not be one this time." That is as far as the conversation went. I got considerable criticism from the local paper in Sherbrooke because of the report which was made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister seems to be a little touchy on that point. If that represents the extent of the Prime Minister's statesmanship on a problem like this it indicates a curious lack of any plan to settle a matter as serious as this.

Mr. Pickersgill: What would the great Tory party do?

Mr. Rowe: It could not do less anyway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister has given his interpretation of what he said but the Canadian people have a right to expect something more than that from a government which over the years has governed this country. Yes, there should be something more than that. One reason no doubt for that action was political expediency, and there was no other.

Let me go on from there. I said a moment ago that the present situation is not one which has occurred overnight, it has been developing for months. In 1950 we in this party advocated a revision of the conciliation methods and procedures in the interests of flexibility and the prompt settlement of industrial disputes, but not the slightest attention was paid by the government to our proposal. These matters ought to have been calmly considered under normal conditions instead of waiting now until a major work stoppage has taken place. The government, by its attitude and conduct in 1950 and subsequently in 1953, has misled both management and employees. They have been misled by the government, by the uncertainty of the course followed by the government through the years. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) smiles regarding a problem that affects the hearts and purses of Canadians everywhere, that effects the economy of this country.

Over and over again there has been reference to the fact that negotiations have taken place between management and representatives of labour. Will the Prime Minister state to the house this afternoon what took place at these various meetings? Will my right hon. friend, that conciliator, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), tell the house what took place at these several meetings at which he and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) dealt with this problem?

I ask the Prime Minister to declare this afternoon what the government is going to do. What is its plan? To sit? To think? To contemplate and to issue daily statements? I ask the Prime Minister to say this afternoon what the government is going to do, what course it will follow, what leadership it will give to the House of Commons, what plans it has in mind.

Those are the questions that are being asked today across this country, for after all with the vast majority enjoyed by the government it is indeed in a position to indicate its plans and also to ask parliament to provide the means whereby those plans will be carried into effect. One week has gone by. I ask the Prime Minister this. Have you not got a plan? Is this thing to continue on and on?

An hon. Member: Have you got a plan?

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the Prime Minister has placed that plan before the house, it will be the first time there will be any indication of leadership on the part of the government in this matter that affects vitally the people of Canada and all the people of Canada.

I pass on now to the question of international affairs.

Mr. Herridge: What is your plan?

An hon. Member: What is your solution?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1950, having regard to the circumstances which then existed, we indicated our stand and that stand was voted down. In the light of experience since, the recommendations then made would have avoided the possibility of future tie-ups of this kind, particularly if the recommendations made from this side of the house with reference to improvement and modernization of the machinery for conciliation has been considered and implemented.

I pass on to the major question dealt with in the speech from the throne. It is interesting to note over the years the degree to which external affairs have more and more taken up the time of and received consideration by parliament. If one looks back over the years one finds in the debates of parliament that there was a time when little of the operative time of parliament was taken in the discussion of external affairs. But in the speech from the throne approximately two pages are devoted to the subject of foreign affairs, and there are one or two matters in connection therewith that I wish to bring to the attention of the house.

When one thinks of external affairs one cannot lose sight of the fact that one who throughout the years has given devoted service to the British people, the British commonwealth and to freedom has resigned today because of ill health. Whether one may agree or disagree with all of the stands he has taken throughout the years, no one can deny his devotion to freedom and the lengths to which Sir Anthony Eden was prepared to go in support of the principles in which he believed and to give of his best to the solution of problems affecting freedom loving people everywhere in the world.

I should like the Prime Minister, if he will, to review some of the events that have taken place in connection with international affairs since we last met in the short session of parliament. At that time we pointed out the degree to which Canada had joined with others in criticism of the stand taken by Britain and France and we indicated that there would be encouragement to Nasser to act in a way contrary to international principles. Indeed, the division among the nations of the free world was such that it brought about a cleavage serious to the preservation and maintenance of freedom. Since then Nasser has succeeded beyond, I would say, even his fondest dreams. He placed obstacles in the way of the clearance of the canal. He gave notice he would no longer recognize the six principles of the United Nations for the future of the canal. He first refused to permit British and French crews to work in the clearing operations and then finally said he would allow them if they handed over their equipment to the United Nations. Britain and France acted in good faith to quit Egypt and the canal was to be cleared on a non-political basis.

All these things took place and the situation today seems as serious as it did on the occasion of the short session of parliament, if not more so. At that time I had the honour to suggest that something be done by Canada to bring together the leaders of Britain, France and the United States. In the last few days there has been some suggestion that at an early date there will be such a conference. I ask the Prime Minister whether or not he is in agreement that Canada should be the country to act as host in bringing together these three nations in order to achieve that degree of unity, co-operation and united effort that has characterized these three powers over the years. What has been done in that connection? What course is being followed in order to bring about a restoration of better relations between these nations?

I realize that since we met the council of NATO has met. What took place there? The report of the council indicates that progress was made. There were some of us who were surprised that, in the choice of the Secretary General, one who had the qualifications of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had not accepted the appointment. I think it was suggested that he would do so. There were many who expected it. Indeed, I think some of his colleagues sitting not too far from him had hoped that he would do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest it was hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not referring to my hon. friend. Would the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) indicate what took place at the NATO conference in so far as changes were brought into being which will unite once more the freedom-loving powers to which I have referred? What is being done? After all, there is a reference to NATO. The Prime Minister indicates that he was not there. In the speech from the throne we find this paragraph:

> An encouraging advance is being made, as evidenced by the latest ministerial meeting of the council, in the development of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the non-military as well as in the military field. My ministers remain strongly convinced of the need to maintain the North Atlantic Treaty as the keystone of the defence of the western nations.

Would the Prime Minister say what is being done? Would he say whether or not even now, if an invitation has not been previously extended, he would feel like extending that invitation on behalf of the people of Canada to the leaders of the three powers to meet here to the end that in an atmosphere of goodwill within this country the leaders of these nations might come together and once more restore the strength of the alliances between them.

Then there was a reference to the United Nations and the degree to which the United Nations is achieving a new importance in the world. There is a reference to the heroic stand of the Hungarian people, and with that there can be no disagreement; for so long as freedom lives in the hearts of men the stand of those Hungarian people will be an epic, and a heroic one, in the history of freedom regardless of what stands may be taken in the future.

But what of the United Nations in connection with Hungary? When resolutions were passed with regard to Britain and France, action was taken by those countries. What is the intention of Canada with reference to the attitude taken by the Hungarian government in refusing in any way except, in the most qualified manner, to carry out the wishes and the directions of the United Nations? What is going to be done on the part of Canada in order to show that the laws of morality and justice cannot be defied and that the authority of the United Nations cannot be flouted in the manner in which it has been done by Hungary in recent days. For after all law, however beneficial, becomes ineffective and in fact an incitement to lawlessness, unless it is enforced.

I want to ask the Prime Minister what views he has with regard to the recent declaration of President Eisenhower relative to the policy for the Middle East in so far as the military end of it is concerned. With the exception that there are reservations in large measure, it represents a step forward to the attitude taken by Britain and France a few weeks ago, subject to only two reservations and no other. What stand is Canada going to take? What attitude does Canada take with reference to this matter? Does she intend to join with the United States in support of the action contemplated by the United States? After all, that is a problem that today must be faced; for had the United States taken a similar attitude six months ago or even three months ago, what took place in the Middle East might never have occurred and the unity of the free world might not have been impaired. These things are not dealt with in the speech from the throne. These things deserve amplification and explanation by the Prime Minister on this occasion.

I am now going to refer to one or two other matters and then I am going to leave to my colleagues a discussion of the various subjects inherent in the various paragraphs in the speech from the throne. There are many things with which we agree. We agree as to the need for assistance to the municipalities across this country. Today the municipalities find themselves in a position in which they are unable to carry on with their sources of taxation removed, their responsibilities amplified, their condition aggravated by the fact that in many cities and towns government buildings and government institutions, even under the present legislation, have been almost entirely freed from any responsibility for the payment of taxation. I make a suggestion because of the fact that the municipal field has never been seriously considered. Casual consideration was given to it at the time of the Sirois report. I suggest that a study should be made of the problem of municipal governments in relation to their present financial resources and that it should be instituted by the federal authority in co-operation with the provinces—for the present condition of affairs cannot continue—if the municipalities, faced as they are with increasing expenditures, are to be enabled to meet the responsibilities that are theirs.

I intend now to make a reference to agriculture, and in particular arising out of the promise made in the speech from the throne to have a committee of the Senate look into the question of submarginal land and the uses of submarginal land. I think the step in this regard is a good one. It is one that is long overdue. We in the western provinces over the years have seen the tremendous contribution that the prairie farm rehabilitation administration has made to the removal of those areas subject to erosion and to the restoration of productivity in areas that under normal circumstances would have become waste land with the expiry of years. I hope that the legislation—I refer to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which incidentally is a monument to the foresight of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and of his minister of agriculture the Hon. Robert Weir—will be extended in the days ahead to include all areas of Canada and in particular to meet the serious problem that faces the maritime provinces.

I do not want to go into local matters affecting western Canada. They will be dealt with by other members on this side of the house. But I do feel that consideration should be given to a very serious readjustment of the detrimental position in which the United States, by its give away program, has placed the industry of wheat production in Canada, a major industry under government control. What is the government going to do about it? This problem has been up for the last several years. When we first brought this before the house the attitude taken by the government was: Well, just trust us; there is really nothing to worry about; what is being done will not interfere in any way with Canada's markets for its fast accumulating surplus of wheat. Formal protests were made, but merely formal ones. Two of them were made two years ago, and when the question was asked of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), what reply did you receive, in effect he said that there was no need for a reply. We did not expect a reply.

Well, Mr. Speaker, letters such as that complaining against an illegal interference with the marketing of farm products in another country—action which was in contravention of the agreement under GATT and also of the regulations passed under FAO—should have been made not by pusillanimous and puerile notes but by language that can be understood. I should like the Prime Minister to say when he speaks, when he was recently in the United States and met with the president face to face, did he bring to his attention the very serious result that will flow from the United States disposal program whereby, on a bargain counter and with extended credit over the years, not only is the United States appropriating markets for today but also markets for three, four or even more years ahead. What the United States is doing and what it did in connection with the Brazil agreement was a contravention of international agreement. Brazil will purchase 18,000 tons of wheat over a three year period.

What happens to Canada's markets when Brazil is bound under the agreement, because of its beneficial nature, to continue to purchase. That is not fair international competition, but illegal. The Prime Minister was not averse to strong words of criticism of Britain and France a few weeks ago when he referred to these supermen. I ask the Prime Minister, what did he say to the President of the United States? Did he get any assurance from him that this serious condition brought about through improper means and in derogation of trading relationships shall be discontinued?

What about Brazil? In 1952-53, Brazil purchased from Canada 11,089,000 bushels and that was some 7,200,000 bushels more than the year before. In 1953-54 Brazil bought 7,706,000 bushels, and now we are practically out of the market. The same condition prevails in 12 other countries. The United States, by its policy, is securing a greater proportion of the world market than is justified by proper means. Canada cannot meet this type of unfair competition. We have not the resources. In addition to that the fact that we import, as we do, all our commodity requirements from the United States that could be purchased elsewhere is no incentive for nations to purchase agricultural products from us.

Two years have gone by since the United States started this system of disposing of surpluses by local currency and give away deals. In the last two crop years Canada has fallen behind the United States and has lost her place as the leading wheat exporter to the United States. What about the deal with India? The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is over there now. Is he endeavouring to secure markets, while the United States has cornered the market there for the future—in part by a deal that is unjust and a denial of all the principles of fair international trading recognized under GATT and also under FAO?

According to the press it was not until September, 1956, that the government finally found out these give away deals carried with them an undertaking on the part of the recipient country to continue to deal with the United States for a set number of bushels to be imported in the years ahead. What is the government going to do about it? India takes $400 million worth of agricultural products on terms so dangerous as to constitute a gift. If this goes on and the United States extends similar offers to West Germany and Japan and some of our other good customers, Canada will suffer irreparable damage. I say to the Prime Minister that a policy of sit tight and contemplate and sending simple messages is not sufficient. The president of the United States must be made to realize that conduct such as this is not advisable for the maintenance of the strength of the free nations and is a denial of the undertakings of the United States under the international agreements to which I have made reference.

As far back as September 17, 1952, the agricultural attache to the United States embassy at Ottawa stated that there was no danger in this and that surpluses would only be sold abroad by the United States competitively and always fairly. What is the Prime Minister going to do? What attitude is being taken by this government? An attitude similar to that taken in the last few weeks in connection with the potential railway strike and since is not the kind of action that will secure for Canada her markets and the markets to which she will be entitled provided she is able to meet fair competition—which is all that Canada expects and all that she has a right to expect.

Now, sir, the other questions in the speech from the throne will be dealt with by other members on this side of the house. All I have tried to do today is to place before the house two or three instances of resolute inaction on the part of the government. For some reason the attitude of the ministers individually and collectively is this, that action is not necessary; that we can hope and expect and ultimately something will happen. This applies in the international field and applies in the national field in the examples I have already given. It applies in many places to which reference will be made during the progress of this debate.

Having regard to these circumstances, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), that the following be added to the address:

We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national and international problems and their disregard of the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house and have lost the confidence of the people of Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the new Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in extending warm congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address. Since I follow the Leader of the Opposition I wish to extend some congratulations to him, perhaps especially on the fact that he left the most violent of his impeachments of the government to the terms of his motion rather than stating them publicly in the house. But the motion ends in this way: Your Excellency's advisers, for the reasons stated:

. . . are not entitled to the confidence of this house and have lost the confidence of the people of Canada.

Well, as to the confidence of the house, there will be an early test of that assertion of the new Leader of the Opposition, and we shall then count noses and see whether his appreciation of the temper of the house is any more accurate than that of some of his predecessors in past years. There is also the impression throughout the country, which I am not going to attempt to dispel this afternoon, that there may be before very many months an opportunity for the people of Canada to say whether or not they agree with his statement that the government has lost the confidence of the people of Canada.

Now, perhaps my answer to the hon. gentleman might sound more appropriate if I began with the last items he dealt with and then gradually moved up toward the first. At the end of his speech he was dealing with agriculture, about which he seemed to say that this horrible conduct of the United States must in some way be stopped. Well, it reminded me of an assertion of one of his predecessors that Canada was going to blast her way into world markets. This was a suggestion that Canada, in the view of the hon. gentleman, should blast the United States out of the policies decided on by its congress. Well, I do not think that his suggestion would be more successful in achieving the objective, which is the very desirable objective of having competition on the normal basis which existed in the years gone by, than the other was. I do not think that it would be any more successful in blasting the United States out of that kind of conduct than were the attempts to blast Canada's way into world markets by an imperial conference held here in Ottawa and other measures which were perhaps intended to be covered by the expression "blast"; but the detonation of which was not very loud, not very resounding, throughout the world.

With respect to agriculture, it might be of some interest to the house if I were to put on the record just a few statistical figures of what has been happening in the past year. During the crop year of 1955-56 August 1 to December 28 the marketings of all grains, were 161.7 million bushels. During the same period of this year they happened to have been 239.8 million bushels, an increase of 78 million bushels over the preceding year. The shipments from country points in 1955 were 163.3 million bushels. In the crop year 1956-57 they were 248.2 million bushels, an increase of 84.9 million bushels. The cars loaded during the same period in the 1955-56 crop year were 96,000. The cars loaded in the crop year 1956-57 were 132,000. The lake and rail shipments for the 1955-56 were 122 million bushels. In 1956-57 they were 173 million bushels, an increase of 51 million bushels. The shipments from the Pacific coast in 1955-56 amounted to 32.8 million bushels, and in 1956-57 it was 53.7 million bushels, a difference of 20.9 million bushels, and that has resulted in a difference in cash distributed to the western producers of some $150 million. In Manitoba in 1955 it was $48,270,000; in 1956 it was $70,692,000 for the first nine months of the years 1955 and 1956. In Saskatchewan, instead of $215 million—I am leaving off the hundreds of thousands, but in some cases they are important—it was $322,700,000. In Alberta, instead of $111 million, it was $132,800,000, or a total for those nine months of the two last years of $374,-681,000 in 1955 and $526,248,000 in 1956. Well, we would all have been happy had it been more, but it does not show that there have been, because of this "give-away" problem, any greater difficulties in marketing Canadian wheat than there had been before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the wheat board says.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): But notwithstanding that, I was very happy when, toward the end of my short holiday in Florida, I received a telephone call from the White House that the president would be glad if I would drop off at Augusta, Georgia, on my way back, have lunch with him and have a game of golf. Well I found in fact, you know, that a game of golf with one of those electric go-carts was about the best way to have an international conference because you are getting off the go-cart quite frequently for only a couple of minutes but for time enough to reflect on what has been said up to that moment and to reflect on what is going to be said when you get back on the seat of the go-cart. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the tone of our conversation and the character of the relationship was somewhat better than would have resulted from any blasting that might have occurred.

I can assure the hon. gentleman first of all that I expressed some considerable gratification at the fact that he had been able to turn down the recommendation of the tariff board there that there be such an increase in tariff on fish from our Canadian fisheries as would seriously interfere with the continuance of that trade which is very vital to a substantial portion of the population of the Atlantic area. I was very glad to find that the President agreed with the suggestion that had been made to me that the difficulties of the New England fishermen were not due so much to the fact that there was fish coming in from Canada and there was also some coming in from Iceland but were due to the fact that they had rather exhausted their fisheries and therefore their costs of producing fish in their own boats had considerably increased and had got beyond what both the Icelandic fishermen and the Canadian fishermen could supply fish for in that market even with the tariff that was already in existence.

I was very glad to receive the impression that the President was quite conscious of the importance of the Canadian market to the United States trading nation and I must confess that he was rather surprised when I said to him that in the course of the present year it looked as if we were going to import from the United States almost a billion dollars' worth of goods more than they were going to buy from us and that was a figure that seemed to astound him. I also told him I was not saying it in any plaintive way because we were getting that large volume of additional commodities because most of them were being built into productive facilities that were going up in our own country but that that was a situation which of course he realized could not continue. It was being balanced at the present time by the attractiveness of industrial development in Canada to United States capital; but that there was going to be, as a result of the investment of American capital in Canada, a very substantial increase in production and that we were buying more than we were selling at the present time just as it sometimes happens to a farmer that he buys more in the spring than he sells in the spring. But it is because he is going to use the fertilizer and seed which occasion the additional buying to have a crop that is going to be larger in the fall; and that we were going to have a crop of production in our country a portion of which was going to be the crop resulting from the investment of his own fellow citizens in the industries of our country and that there would have to be at that time a much fairer balance of trade because it could not be expected that trade with them—of course it is not a one-way street—would be so predominantly moving more northward than the volume that was moving southward.

Well, I came away with the impression that the golf game had been very enjoyable but also that there had been other aspects of the half day I spent with him that were quite more important in what I was going to remember than the golf score on the splendid golf links of Augusta.

There was another reason for which I was very happy to have this confidential chat with the President which occurred on the eve of Mr. Nehru's visit. I said to the President quite frankly that I believed he and Mr. Nehru at the present time were probably the two most influential statesmen in the world, the two statesmen whose influence radiated the most widely in the free world at this time. I said, "Of course, I am not saying anything about China because I have never been behind the bamboo curtain and I do not know Mr. Chou En-lai, but I do know, or at least I think I know from my own personal observation, that Mr. Nehru is a statesman of whom, whether or not they will admit it openly, all Asians are proud. They are proud of his stature in the world at this time, and his attitudes, even for those who will not state that they fully agree with them, are attitudes which have an influence on their thinking." I believe the same is true of the President of the United States. The personal attitudes of the President of the United States are attitudes that radiate throughout the free world, and whether or not we always agree with all of them our thinking is always influenced to a degree by the attitudes which are adopted by him.

I asserted with conviction that Mr. Nehru was just as anti-communist as Mr. Eisenhower was, although in India there was not the same fear of dangers imminent from communism that Senator McCarthy had in the United States; that there might not always be the same approaches to the proper methods of counteracting what influences might be exercised by communism; but that it should not be forgotten that the background of the United States or the North American continent was not the only background against which we should appraise the attitudes of other people throughout the world outside of the North American continent.

I think this is something that we all have had to learn. Human nature and the essential aspirations of human nature are very much the same all over the world, but the background against which you have to place the attitudes of different people must be the background of their own civilization, of their own tradition and ancestral habits and ways of thinking and of acting. I am quite happy to report to the house that I got the very distinct impression, when Mr. Nehru visited us after his visit to the United States, that he was very much better satisfied with his last visit than he had been with the visit he made in 1949.

The hon. member speaks of a conference of France, the United States and the United Kingdom. It would be important and it is important that their actions be conducive to the same general results for the benefits of free people all over the world as they have to such a great degree in the past years and perhaps even in the past century. But there are other peoples in the world, and if we want to have peace in the world there must not be strife, there must not be misgivings, and there must not be mistrust or suspicion among the leaders of any of the other nations.

We have to try to behave in such a way that we will not be looked upon with suspicion and misgiving. Many hon. gentlemen saw and heard Mr. Nehru being interviewed by Mr. McInnes on the Sunday afternoon preceding his departure from Ottawa. I had the privilege of seeing him almost immediately afterward at the reception at the home of the high commissioner for India and I complimented him and told him that I hoped a lot of people in the United States enjoyed seeing him on the screen and of having the opportunity of appreciating his discussion with Mr. McInnes.

I told him that I must remind him that he had reminded me that the terrestrial globe might look different to one sitting on the north pole than it would to someone sitting at the equator. I told him that I had accepted that as a reason for his, and his people's, approaching some problems somewhat differently from our own people. I said that the aspect of the international situation at the present time might appear somewhat different to us in Ottawa and to Mr. Eisenhower and his colleagues in Washington than it would to Mr. Nehru and his colleagues in New Delhi.

I said that there did not seem to be any suggestion that India was going to be the ultimate target of any aggression which might be undertaken, but that so long as there were these terrible agents of destruction at the disposal of us in the free world and of those behind the iron curtain we had to be sure that those behind the iron curtain who might be—I do not think they are apt to be for a very long period—actual aggressors should be convinced that if there was aggression there would be inevitable retaliation which would do to the aggressor at least as much damage as they might do to the nation attacked.

If there was to be that kind of aggression it did not seem improbable that the ultimate target would be the United States and that the way to the United States would be on a path which led through Canada and that we intended to have that path in such condition that it could not be used for aggression without serious damage to those using it and that if it was used, no matter how rapid or how unexpected the aggression was, there would still be inevitable retaliation which would do as great damage to the aggressor as he might have caused.

We agreed that the likelihood of going to war with these terrible implements of destruction was not great, but that there was still a possibility. Because of that possibility we felt that the free nations must remain in such a position that possible aggressors would realize that retaliation would be inevitable and the result would unfortunately be a great degree of mutual destruction.

Mr. Nehru had suggested that military alliances appeared to him to be adding to the international tension because they appeared to denote a warlike attitude. I told him that unfortunately for us we were in such a position that we had to maintain military alliances as long as there was any possibility of aggression with the use of these new weapons because we ourselves did not have them. In our military alliances the tasks had been distributed and we could count, and possible aggressors knew this, upon the fact that these weapons were at the disposition of the United States.

I was saying all this to him, not to criticize his attitude but to ask him to feel that we also could rationalize our conduct, that we had what appeared to us to be very good reasons for maintaining these alliances and not adopting the view taken by him that there might be less international tension. We felt that the tension which existed was necessary as a deterrent against the use of any of these terrible instruments.

I have got quite a distance away from the agricultural problem that my hon. friend was discussing. With respect to that I can assure him that we are anxious to conserve that confidence we have had from the Canadian electorate for a number of years and that we are not going to omit doing anything we can do, anything which in the lights that providence has given us we would estimate to be beneficial, to enable us to conserve that confidence.

We realize, as do the hon. gentleman and his friends, the importance to the economy of this nation of our agricultural population. We know, as he knows, that the P.F.R.A. has produced very beneficial results in the western provinces. We know, as he knows—perhaps I know this a little more intimately—that in my own province of Quebec there are people who are doing back-breaking work on land which does not yield them a proper income. I do not think that that is really inevitable in our country. I think that intelligent industry properly applied can yield in this country an income sufficient for a man and his family to live upon.

That happens, not only in the maritime provinces where it exists to quite an extent but in Quebec and in some portions of Ontario. Over a considerable period of time there have been large numbers of farmers in eastern Canada who have been making ends meet only because we have been buying butter from them at 58 cents a pound and have been buying rather more than has been actually consumed up to the present time.

But the population of Canada is increasing and my colleague here does not think that the problem of surplus butter is going to be of very long duration. I know I am eating more than my doctor thinks I should, but I am not making very great inroads into the surpluses that have accumulated. But our population is increasing by means of very satisfactory immigration and also by very satisfactory natural increases.

I was at one of the parishes in my constituency just before New Year's and the parish priest told me that there had been 550-odd baptisms and less than 100 burials in his parish during 1956. I think that was a most satisfactory situation. I cannot give that as an example of what is going on throughout the whole province because this is a new parish in which a lot of young people have purchased home lots. The proportion of home owners in that parish is larger than in any other parish of the city of Quebec and that young population is doing its best to increase our over-all population.

Our over-all population is going to have to be fed. This means that with probably something less than the present area of land under cultivation in eastern Canada, very much more has to be produced. This population is not going to remain at 16 million. I do not know what the figure will be a couple of decades from now but there will be very many more than there are at the present time, and I think the fertility of the soil fit for agriculture in eastern Canada can produce enough even for a doubling of the population in eastern Canada. But that is something which requires some attention from all the authorities. The jurisdiction in respect of this matter is generally looked upon as being the jurisdiction and responsibility of the provinces, but there is also the provision in the British North America Act that there is joint legislative jurisdiction in the federal parliament and in the provincial legislatures.

The investigation by the Senate committee will not be completed during the present session of parliament. It is something that will probably go on for much more than one session, but it will focus the attention of the public on the problem and will afford a forum to which those who know much better than I do how the problem can be dealt with and cured may come and state their views and have them publicized throughout the country. I think it will bring about an atmosphere in which the Canadian public in their threefold capacity of municipal electors, provincial electors and federal electors are going to want to have something done to bring about an improved situation. I know from some things that have happened in my own lifetime that when our farming population is shown how to do a thing better and shown that it is profitable to do it in the better way, they do come around and do it in the better way.

The maple product is a typical example of that. It took a certain number of years, but now the product of practically everyone who goes to the trouble of tapping maple trees is of prime quality and commands high prices. I know of tree fruit and small fruit growing. I know of the production of sunflower seeds, of alfalfa hay and things of that kind which have been used in certain parts but have not yet become general throughout the whole locality, and which do bring about an increase in production and an increase in income that will make life more attractive than it has been on those farms where young people see their parents doing very much more hard work than is compensated for by the returns they get from their farms.

I think that matter can be studied in the Senate to the great advantage of the Canadian public, and it will be a good thing for the status of the Senate to have the public of Canada realize what a useful job they will be doing in investigating that problem.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I hear some laughter. I am one of those who believe that the Senate is a useful institution in our parliamentary set-up. I will admit there have been times when I have felt, like many others, that they could be doing more useful work than was being done, but that is not something inherent to the system.

The hon. gentleman speaks about a study of the problems of municipal government to be instituted by the federal government. Well, before his predecessor became leader of the opposition and while he was still premier of Ontario, I heard him deprecate at the 1945 federal-provincial conference anything being dealt with on a national scale that was already being dealt with by the provincial authorities. I know that in that regard the premier of my own province is, shall I say, more sensitive and has a more tender skin than Hon. George Drew had when he was premier of Ontario.

Now, national unity is very important to this country. We have to be careful to keep a majority of the reasonably-minded Canadians on our side and not have them feel that we are trying to centralize and sabotage the work of the fathers of confederation. There will be some who will make that assertion no matter what we do. No matter what precautions we try to take to avoid it being done there will be some who would affirm, if we were going to do something about municipal government, that we were aiming at destroying the Catholic religion and the French language in the province of Quebec. Could anything be more silly, more groundless than that?

I remember there were some, not many, who were scandalized when, sitting not in this seat but in the one next to it, I ventured to suggest that the day would come when the ability to use both official languages would be required of all those who wanted to sit on the front benches either on this side or on the other side of the house. At the time it was a scandal to make that kind of suggestion. To how many hon. gentlemen should I now extend my congratulations for the serious efforts they have made to indicate that they would like to speak the French language as well as they speak the English language?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): They have taken considerable pains to do that because they came to feel it was something that was going to be helpful toward bringing about a feeling of national unity from one ocean to the other in this country. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is good citizenship always to be just as careful as we can to avoid offending even the tenderest skin in the suggestions we make about the activities of the federal government in fields which are enumerated as being within provincial jurisdiction under section 92 of the British North America Act.

This does not mean that we should not be tending toward a Canadian nationhood. The fathers of confederation intended Canada to be a nation and we all intend Canada to be a nation. But they recognized that the way to make a fruitful start in that respect was along the lines of the British North America Act. Some changes have been made in the act by agreement. Sometimes there has not been agreement and the changes have been made notwithstanding. So far I think we are in a position where we do feel that there is a more widespread feeling of Canadianism than there has been in the past. I hope that will continue and that we can do those things, but do them in such a way that we will not frighten anyone with the bugaboo that the religion and the language of the people of my own race in the province of Quebec are going to be taken away from them.

The hon. gentleman made some comments about external affairs. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will give a fuller report of what took place at the NATO council meeting than I could give secondhand from the reports I got, and I think it would be unnecessary duplication for me to attempt to say very much about it. But there is one thing I want to say to the hon. gentleman. I have known the Secretary of State for External Affairs for a number of years, and for a number of years I have felt that he was dedicating his life to the service of his country. I have felt—and I have said this to him on more than one occasion—that anyone who was dedicating his life to the service of his country had the right to select where he thought his services would be the most useful to his country. Since I have become Prime Minister, on more than one occasion when there were other possible attractions or things that I felt might be possible attractions I have said to him that it was of course his responsibility to decide whether, in being thus attracted, he could be of greater service to his country than he could in continuing to head a Department of External Affairs which has acquired a reputation throughout the world that is quite creditable to a nation of 16 million people.

The maintenance of world peace and the establishment of multilateral trade, these things which are international in character, are extremely important to the well-being of the Canadian nation. But I have ventured to say to him that while of course he had to make his own decision about that matter I felt that the possibilities of his exercising the right kind of influence for the maintenance of world peace, for the restoration of normal trading conditions throughout the world and for the restoration of good feeling and proper cultural exchanges throughout the world were greater in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada than they might be even in the extremely important post of Secretary General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The hon. gentleman need have no illusions about that matter. My colleagues were quite as delighted as I was when we were informed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was going to decline the suggestions that were being made to him that he should be a candidate for the office of Secretary General of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Fulton: We shall have to have an individual poll.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I know that all members on this side of the house will agree—and I hope most members on the other side of the house will do so—that he is apt to be of greater service to Canada in the role he has occupied with such distinction for the last eight years than he would be even as Secretary General of the NATO organization.

The hon. gentleman said he would like me to say something about the railway strike. There are some things—and this applies not only to international relations—that are not best served by blasting. I can assure the hon. gentleman that my colleagues and I have not been inactive and that the remaining stumbling block has been narrowed very considerably. If I am not mistaken—and I do not think I am, because I have had the kind of contacts which satisfy me that I am not mistaken in that regard—the only thing that remains now to be resolved is whether or not a determination as to what is required for proper safety in the use of diesel engines would be automatically binding on the union and on the company or would be just something that the union and the company would be obliged to take into account and to pay great respect to in renegotiating any agreement reached at the present time.

The union say, "If you ask us to sign an agreement that we will be bound by the finding, that is the equivalent of compulsory arbitration". I am not at all sure that their abhorrence of compulsory arbitration has not been stimulated by the attitude of the oppositions in 1950. However, it is an extremely real and sensitive matter with them. They tell me that they just cannot enter into an agreement that what would be determined after investigation as to proper safety requirements in the operation of diesel engines would automatically become part of or an amendment to the agreement they would sign to carry on in the meantime under practically the same conditions as those prevailing on the C.N.R.

The company have been equally adamant. They say, "If that is not agreed to, the thing will all have to start over again when the determination has been made by a proper judicial or semi-judicial body, and one strike is enough". My experience has been that when there has been one strike, those who have been parties to it are not anxious to have another one at an early date.

The conciliation board held public sittings, but the public was not concerned. Nobody paid any attention to what was going on before the conciliation board. If an investigation were made at the present time into the question of proper safety measures in the handling of diesel engines and proper measures to serve all the humane considerations that must be observed, I think the public would be vitally interested in that investigation. If, after that investigation, there was a finding—whichever way it went—that appeared to the majority of the Canadian people to be a proper finding on the investigation that they would be reading about, no one could withstand the effect. That would have become, by that kind of finding, the law of the country.

The members of the trade unions are good, loyal Canadians like the rest of Canadians and they would not go up against what had become, by general consent, the law of the country. The railway company has quite a creditable record since its establishment in this country. Even if it felt that the decision did not agree with its views, its experience and its knowledge of conditions, the railway company would not attempt to hold out against what had thus been established as a proper situation for the operation of diesel engines. No individual man would be obliged to work on a diesel engine if he felt that occupation was too dangerous. No attractive Canadian young lady must become a hostess on an aeroplane if she feels that this occupation involves risks that she should not take. But our attractive Canadian young ladies are not going to attempt to organize any union to force a different way of operating aeroplanes in Canada from the way accepted by the public as being the proper way. I am therefore not at all fearful that this strike is not going to become fairly soon a matter of industrial life history, and that there will not soon be a resumption of services. The less compulsion that has to be exercised in order to bring about that kind of situation, the more fruitful, I think, the results are going to be.

Now, I do not think I should say any more about that. I enjoy pretty good personal relations with the labour leaders and with the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I think both sides feel that I am trying to bring about the best kind of an outcome. I may have to come to the conclusion that it is not possible to agree to what I am suggesting, that they sign a temporary agreement to carry on under the same conditions as the Canadian National and await some other determination than the one that has been made by the board of conciliation as to the proper safety measures in operating diesel engines. But I think it is still just a little bit premature to resort to compulsory measures, and I hope we will not have to resort to them at all.

I do wish to join with the Leader of the Opposition in expressing deep regret that Right Hon. Sir Anthony Eden felt he had to ask our beloved sovereign to relieve him of his responsibilities as Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Of course the affairs that have to be dealt with and that become the responsibility of those who are in office, and I include the office of the Leader of the Opposition in that, are heavy responsibilities and do take quite a toll of those who have to carry them. We thought Sir Anthony had made a wonderful recovery after his serious condition of two and a half years ago when he had to undergo such a grave surgical operation. We thought his health had been fully restored. We also thought the health of the former leader of the opposition had been fully restored when he returned to this chamber after the serious attack of meningitis with which he had been afflicted.

I think this is an example to us all that we must do everything required of us in order to have the personal satisfaction that we have done our best, but having done that we should not feel that we should have been able to manage the affairs of the world. There is a course of events that no one human individual can change. When he has done his best to perform his duty toward what he would consider a proper course of human events I think he should, without allowing it to undermine his vitality, be prepared to accept the results that most of us believe are part of a general design for the affairs of the world that is attributable to a power infinitely greater and wiser than any one of us.

It sometimes happens that these conditions, without any fault of our own, do develop. We all share with, I am sure, the people of the United Kingdom, regrets at what seems to be I hope not an end but a serious alteration in the kind of service Sir Anthony Eden can render to his fellow citizens. We hope for him, as we hope for my hon. friend's predecessor, that before long Sir Anthony's health will be such that he can resume service which has been so outstanding and so distinguished over so many years to the people of the United Kingdom, and because of its value to the people of the United Kingdom, so valuable to all the other nations of the commonwealth.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I join in congratulating both the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address. I think generally the house has been very fortunate over a number of years in having the address moved and seconded in a very satisfactory manner, and this year was no exception.

Before commenting at any length on the speech from the throne I should like to indicate what my objective is in making the comments that I am going to make. Some mention has been made, both in the House of Commons and outside it, regarding the responsibility of an opposition party. Some suggestion has been made that when the government has apparently abdicated its responsibility and refused to reveal its policies on particular matters, especially when those matters affect the national well-being, the opposition should adopt exactly the same kind of method. This, I noted, was the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) outside the house last night, and I noticed that it was the position taken again today in parliament.

Now, I could not disagree more with that position than I do. We in this group do not intend to remain silent until the government has announced its policy. We do not intend to be in the position of merely criticizing without having some positive proposals of our own to meet that kind of situation. Of course, the industrial disputes act could be amended, or new methods could be adopted by a conciliation board, and these points are worthy of our lengthy consideration. But they would not meet the immediate situation that confronts the Canadian people and the economy of Canada today. We believe that an opposition party worthy of the name must present to the Canadian people not only an alternative government, but it must present alternative policies that such a government would pursue. Anything less than that does not provide opportunities for the people of the country to make a real choice. We in this group have sought throughout the years to present real alternatives on any policy, that requires it, and this I believe to be the traditional parliamentary attitude generally wherever parliaments like ours exist, and is consistent with the tradition in this Canadian House of Commons.

Having said that, let me turn immediately to the railway strike. There is no doubt that any dislocation caused by a shut-down of traffic on the Canadian Pacific Railway will become increasingly serious as time goes on if the present situation is allowed to continue. There is no doubt, therefore, that it is in the national interest that railway operations should be recommenced as expeditiously as possible while another attempt is made to settle the differences between management and the employees.

That, it seems to me, was the desire of the Prime Minister in his closing remarks this afternoon. But I think we should go farther than waiting, as he suggested. A request should be made to both parties to recommence railway operations immediately on the basis previously existing, without prejudice to the rights of either side, and such a proposal is indeed reasonable. I believe that the C.P.R. employees will agree to this proposal. Indeed, they have already indicated that they would do so in a statement they issued two or three days ago, on January 7 to be precise. So far the C.P.R. management has refused, and if that refusal is continued—indeed I think the time has come now—the only alternative is for the federal government to appoint a controller to take temporary management of the C.P.R. and direct the immediate resumption of operations while further negotiations are continuing. I reiterate that this should be done without delay.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that the principal issue involved is the question of the management's desire to cease the employment of firemen on diesel engines in freight and yard services. On that issue the main disagreement between the company and the union, or its employees, is the question of safety. Now, the safety factor cannot be ignored either by this house, by the company, by the union or by the country. We in this House of Commons have a definite responsibility to the nation to make certain that any change which may subsequently be put into effect should completely safeguard the interests of the public in every particular.

Because the determination of this factor is really a technical question, it is a matter that should be investigated by an impartial board of inquiry comprised of experts and technicians that would hear and study representations concerning the safety and other factors involved in the removal of firemen from diesel freight and yard locomotives. Indeed, the report of the conciliation board itself suggested some sort of survey after the proposed change had been made and in the light of experience gained. I believe it is the part of wisdom to conduct this inquiry first, particularly because the majority and minority reports disagreed on this point, and because of an obvious doubt even in the majority report which suggested that there might be reconsideration of the matter after a year's trial. I think we must take the doubts in the minds of the majority and the definite opinion of the minority into account.

The report of a board of inquiry such as we suggest should go to the mediation board thereafter appointed by the federal government, which would seek to mediate all issues remaining in dispute between the two parties, and seek to reach an agreement on the part of both parties. In the meantime, let me reiterate, the public interest requires the immediate resumption of the services over the C.P.R., and I believe it is the duty of this parliament to serve the public interest and to do indeed what we are suggesting.

Another important but separate problem never far from the minds of the employees of practically any industry you may name is the problem of automation. I am not saying that the problem of automation is specifically involved in the present railway dispute, but no government can stand idly by while the advent of this revolution in productive techniques creates certain crises in industry. There is no doubt that these new developments in production can be of great benefit to the community as a whole, but only if there is over-all planning to smoothly adjust the economy to the changes that are taking place or are anticipated. It is of little satisfaction to the worker if a magnificent new and technologically superior machine deprives him of his job and there is no other job to be found; nor is automation of much advantage to workers in industries, whether in factories, on the farms or in mines, if it deprives them of their means of life and of their markets.

Accordingly we think this is an opportunity for the federal government to consider this problem and no longer delay the appointment of a council comprised of representative employers, of trade unions, of government, of technical experts and other interests, to study and advise this house on the impact of automation, and to make sure that the new wealth that automation will make possible will be shared by all groups in the community. Intelligent approaches to all these problems should give authoritative advice on how best to promote the industrial, transportation and other changes involved in new techniques without inconveniencing the community, as strikes do, or disrupting the community, which they also do, yet continuing the right of free men and women in a free society to give or to withhold their labour; for compulsion in this respect would destroy a fundamental principle of our democracy.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, may I turn to other matters which should receive consideration in this debate on the speech from the throne, even if some of them are not mentioned in that speech. There is one overall assessment which we must immediately make, and that is the revelation in the speech from the throne of the refusal, or the incapacity, of the government to deal with the needs of the common man and the common woman in our country. Economic expansion in Canada is pointed to, and there has been great economic expansion, but there is no awareness that large groups of Canadians do not share in the benefits of this great expansion. Take the case of the old age pensioner. There is no indication that old age pensions will be increased, in spite of the continued rise in the cost of living. No responsible person today would claim that the present old age pension is anywhere near adequate. Bearing in mind the substantial surplus which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is indicating he expects to be able to report to this house when he brings down the budget, the refusal of the government to do anything for the old age and other pensioners can be described as nothing less than callous.

The same judgment applies to the failure of the government to indicate improvements in social welfare generally. The steady processes of inflation, for which the government must assume its share of responsibility, have filched away the real value of the social welfare programs that have been announced with fanfare from time to time by the government and put into effect unanimously by members in this house, or indeed so almost unanimously that one can say unanimously. Therefore, although the speech from the throne refers to what it calls the excellent program of economic development in Canada, there is no doubt that those who are ill, those who are unable to work any longer because of age, are not sharing in this prosperity, but instead find that as the statistics of production climb, their lot by relativity becomes more and more unhappy.

Nor is there a single mention of health insurance in the speech from the throne. By the rigid limitations the government has set on its hospitalization program it has made the proposals it offered last year into a political football, and has even further postponed the carrying out of a pledge first made by the Liberal party 38 years ago. The failure of the government to act with resolution in this matter is, I think, unsupportable.

May I say to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) that while at the moment because of conditions that exist in certain countries we are able to bring to this country large numbers of desirable immigrants, yet one of the barriers hitherto against immigration to this country from the Scandinavian countries, the United Kingdom and other countries like them has been the lack of a comprehensive national health plan in Canada. I was told that authoritatively on several occasions when I was in northwest Europe during the autumn. When I suggested that we would like more people from the countries there I was told there were two reasons why we would not get them. One reason was, of course, that there was full employment, and the other was that the people understood that Canada had not social security measures which were sufficiently attractive to cause the people to emigrate to our country. In Britain I saw references to the lack of such measures here by people who had returned and who on one or two occasions gave their reasons for returning. After having been happy in Canada for two or three years illness came along and wiped out all their savings, and they had returned in order to get the benefits of the protection of the social security measures which they have there.

Health is one of the measures concerning which I felt there should have been discussion in this parliament even during the special session last November following the disposition of the international matters. I cannot adequately express my own disappointment that the government adjourned the session, thus preventing discussion on that occasion, nor can I adequately express my disappointment that when the speech from the throne came in there was no mention in it of national health insurance. I must say I expected it; in fact I was almost confident that something would be done in this regard at this session of parliament to at least bring proposals before the house so that when the provinces were willing and able to come under such a plan the plan would be available to them.

The speech from the throne also ignores the continuing chronic crisis in Canadian agriculture. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave some interesting figures this afternoon but they do not meet the situation nor do they meet the criticism that there is a chronic crisis in our agricultural economy. I have not ceased to deal with this in the house whenever the opportunity arose, but the government has rigidly refused to take the action necessary to enable agriculture to participate equitably in the benefits that the improvements in technology and other developments generally are bringing to Canada as a whole.

I know that even outside of the agricultural sector the gains in the economy are shared inequitably and unfairly but in agriculture, of course, the problem is more lasting and severe. I have only to read the financial sections of the daily newspapers to find concrete indications of the large increases in the profits of various corporations and the dividends that are being paid, increases that are not matched by the people who are, after all, the real and continuing producers of wealth whether they work in offices, in mines, in factories, on the farms or go down to the sea and fish. There is no doubt but that the cream of the so-called prosperity is being skimmed off by privileged groups in this country. I say to the Minister of Finance that there is something fundamentally wrong in the Canadian economy when in the midst of relative prosperity one of the basic industries of this country continues in a chronically depressed state.

Agriculture has suffered a severe and prolonged decline in its income, but it has not been as the result of lower production. This afternoon the Prime Minister produced some figures which I do not have but in 1955, the latest year for which complete statistics are available, the physical volume of agricultural production was actually higher than that of eight out of the 12 years between 1941 and 1954 and, indeed, as much as 30 per cent higher than in some years. A preliminary estimate indicates another increase in the index of farm production in 1956 as was suggested this afternoon; yet the real net income to the farmer in 1955 was lower than in any year since 1941 except 1954. I have the dominion bureau of statistics table before me which substantiates the statement I have just made. Indications are that the real net income in 1956 may be better, but not substantially better and certainly not better than in many of the years between 1941 and 1955.

It is a tragedy that in many cases the more successful a Canadian farmer is in giving the best of his talents to the production of food the lower becomes his income, his real return. As I have said, frequently the more successful a farmer is in increasing production and the more generous climatic factors are, the more serious the crisis he faces as far as income is concerned. Abundance in this economy is punished and scarcity is rewarded.

That, I submit, is a sense of values which indicates an outmoded economy. It is the sense of values of great monopolistic concerns which derive their profits from the economy of scarcity rather than the economy of abundance. I think we in this house do not immediately share that conception of such an economy; yet it is the economy that we permit to continue existing. So from time to time we find shivers of apprehension running through even my hon. friends of the Liberal government whenever reports come in of a big crop in western Canada or a heavy yield of apples in Nova Scotia or British Columbia, more potatoes in Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick or more cattle in some other parts of Canada. When Providence has been generous there is a crisis in the air; there is worry and concern instead of rejoicing; there is inaction instead of programs designed to distribute the bountiful gifts of Providence to the people who need them.

In other words the farmer is suffering a depression because in a world where many children—yes, even in some parts of Canada—do not get enough milk, there has been too much milk; because in a world where two-thirds of the people go to bed hungry every night, there is too much bread; because where many old age pensioners have not enough income to buy all they would like in the way of changes of diet there have been on occasion too many peaches, too many apples and indeed too many potatoes. We in the C.C.F. say that a society which is unable to turn abundance to the service of the people is morally bankrupt and the government that stands idly by deserves the strongest censure. I cannot for a moment accept the dictum of some so-called private enterprisers that an economy of scarcity is better than one of abundance, and that two loaves of bread can be of less real value than one.

We have suggested many changes in policy that should be made. Precious years have been lost when the government instead of opposing the world food bank at United Nations could have been fostering it. If they had done so and if that bank had come into existence, we would then have had an effective international program for the disposal of our so-called agricultural surpluses.

The government's price support program initially was a measure to ensure that farm prices would bear an equitable relationship to the cost of things which the farmer had to buy, but this has proved to be a sham and a deception in many cases. It is certainly better than nothing, but it has not even begun to meet the promise made by a Liberal prime minister in 1944. At that time our farmers were expending their energies to produce but were taking perhaps lower prices than they might have got for the products they were producing, and Mr. Mackenzie King made this statement:

> If, to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to ensure them against an agricultural depression after the war.

I am not contending that we have the world-wide depression which was foreshadowed at the United Nations in 1945, or that that is what Mr. Mackenzie King had in mind, although it may have been. In any event he made that promise, and the fact is that today agriculture is a depressed industry. The agricultural depression is here and has been here for some time. We know now how quickly that solemn promise was forgotten.

Vigorous government action is needed to establish a parity price program for agricultural products to ensure a fair and adequate return for the produce of the farm, for the produce of our agricultural industry. A comprehensive plan of crop insurance is required. The P.F.A.A. is a good start, but I should like to see a comprehensive plan such as we have been advocating for the last 25 years.

Cash advances on farm-stored grain are needed and are warranted under the circumstances which now exist. National marketing boards should be established where requested by producers for all farm products entering into interprovincial and export trade. I am not advocating interference with provincial rights when I suggest that. Long-term commodity agreements and the acceptance of sterling in part payment for Canadian produce sold in sterling area countries are necessary. We could not accept full payment in sterling but we could accept part payment in sterling.

The Canadian government should announce a permanent national food and fibre policy which would have the objective of ensuring that the means of obtaining sufficient food and clothing for basic adequate standards would be placed within the reach of every Canadian, and that wherever possible temporary surpluses of agricultural commodities should be used as an important step toward feeding the hungry people of the world. I believe that by feeding the hungry people of the world, and by enabling them to feed themselves by the provision of machines and other aids, we can meet the threat of communism better than in any other way.

These are some of the elements of a dynamic policy to deal with Canada's agricultural crisis. There should be in effect a national farm policy which would attempt to integrate the production, price and distribution problems more effectively into the rest of the economy.

Other questions are of immediate concern to this house at this time. I have referred to the effect that inflation has had upon the purchasing power of the dollar since the end of the war. These forces are again reasserting themselves. All of us are aware that inflation benefits large corporations the most because profits rise more than anything else. On the other hand those who are on fixed incomes, like pensioners, find their financial position severely affected. The farmers' plight too is made even more severe by inflation. The farm price-cost squeeze is made even more evident and apparent. The government claims to be adopting certain measures to deal with these forces. It is asserted that certain monetary measures have been taken to influence the flow of credit in this country. How effective they are remains to be seen, but certainly the government is not exercising the positive role which is necessary.

It has long been felt that one of the prime functions of the Bank of Canada when it was originally set up by the Bennett government—incidentally, at the strong urging of the C.C.F. and those who organized this movement—it has only finally won the reluctant support of the Liberal government—was to perform just that function, in part at least. We have been told that one of the means by which the central bank can affect the flow of credit in the country is through the use of the rediscount rate. Yet we had the admission of the Minister of Finance during the special session that the rediscount rate is being determined practically automatically by the chartered banks.

Mr. Harris: I am sure I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but I understood him to say "by the chartered banks".

Mr. Coldwell: I did say "by the chartered banks," but perhaps it would be better to say by the situation which the chartered banks reflect in the country.

Mr. Harris: It is automatic with respect to the treasury bill rate.

Mr. Coldwell: If it is automatic with regard to the treasury bill rate then I do not think the statement made in the special session by the Minister of Finance was correct. I do not think it was correct and I believe he is saying something different at the present time. However, that is something we can check when I look up again what he said during the special session.

Mr. Macdonnell: He is saying the same thing, but he is wrong both times.

Mr. Coldwell: In any event the central bank was supposed to do what is not being done by the government at this time. I do not think any other conclusion can be reached but that the government is permitting the banks to determine the monetary policy of this country. Surely this has made of the Bank of Canada something of a shadow of what it was intended to be when this parliament passed legislation to establish it some years ago.

Let us see what have been some of the results of the policy which has been pursued. An increase in the interest rate bears most heavily on those sectors of the population least able to afford it. It has not restricted investment generally, but it has had the effect of sharply curtailing the funds available for housing and of sharply increasing the cost to thousands of people throughout Canada who had hoped to obtain the homes they needed.

The provinces and municipalities, too, faced with the heavy burden of extending public utilities and building more schools and hospitals, have found that a sharply increased interest rate has drastically increased their costs and their commitments. Many years ago we saw provinces inviting investors to invest in bonds yielding 5 per cent or better, and many municipalities were paying rates of 5 per cent or better. That is true again of many of the larger municipalities and some provinces, and I do not know what the smaller municipalities are going to do. These provinces and municipalities face an increasingly serious crisis.

Clearly what is called for is a series of selective controls directing investment into those fields most socially useful, and certainly housing, hospitals and schools should have the top priority in this field. We have long advocated, and it was in the Liberal platform for several elections, that we should establish a national investment board to achieve what I have just suggested. We should not permit the planning of development of this country to be done on the basis of the ability of people to pay a high interest rate. I do not think that is a proper or fair method to employ.

There is another problem that has been completely ignored by the government and which was touched upon this afternoon by both the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister. That is the phenomenally large deficit on current account of $1,002 million that Canada has in its trade balance for the first three quarters of 1956, as compared with $437 million for the same period in 1955. This deficit has been met—and again the Prime Minister indicated this this afternoon—only by the heavy inflow of United States funds for investment in this country. We are put in a dangerous position by this situation. The government may think we now have little to fear. It may be inclined in its complacency to postpone taking the decisions that must inevitably be taken. Canada's trade cannot forever be balanced by this import of capital. The time will inevitably come when the inflow will decrease or the payment of interest and dividends on these investment funds will exceed the amount coming in. That is the time, possibly some years hence, perhaps sooner than we think, when the people of Canada will regret the failure of its government at an earlier time to take the steps necessary to place Canada's trade in a more stable position.

Our failure to develop better trading relationships with the commonwealth countries will, I believe, bring serious results. It is one of the factors, I am sure, that is causing Britain to look for closer association in the new system of trade which has been talked about a great deal in western Europe. That development, if Canada does not enter into special relationships with it—and we should make efforts at this early stage to ensure that we do—may very well leave our trade even more concentrated in the United States market with all the implications that threaten the independence of action of the Canadian nation even in political affairs as well as development. I realize that this European system will take some time to put into effect, but I feel that Canada should now be considering the possibilities by which we can be associated with it when it comes into effect.

I have always regretted that the Canadian government did not press more strongly for the establishment of a permanent international trading agency within the United Nations after the war. The international trade organization envisaged then was to bring to reality the vision of practical planning on the international level. The international trade organization was to deal with tariffs. It was to deal with commercial policy, economic development, commodity policy and, of course, cartels and agreements of a similar sort. Had Canada and other countries pressed more strongly for some such agency I believe Canada's trading position would be healthier. Canada should continue to work for some such system, but in the meantime there is no excuse for not having adopted such planning in our trading policies as has from time to time been suggested from this corner of the house.

Lest I forget it before I conclude what I wish to say, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis):

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "the rights of parliament", the following words:

"and by reason of their failure to announce legislation establishing a comprehensive and nation-wide program of health insurance, with provision for provincial participation."

I have been critical of what the speech from the throne contains and perhaps more particularly of what it does not contain. However, in conclusion I want to change the tune a little and commend the government for some of the things that are in the speech from the throne. I am glad indeed to see that it foreshadows financial aid through the provinces to the municipalities. I am very glad to see that aid is to be given to the universities that will participate in the plan, and like others in the house I regret that one of our great provinces has not seen fit to accept what I think is a proper offer of assistance to our universities from the government of Canada.

I think it is being more clearly shown from day to day and, indeed, was indicated in the example the Prime Minister gave in his speech this afternoon of the co-operation between the two language groups, that there is no desire to interfere with the control under the constitution of those matters that are placed within the right of the provinces. I was very happy indeed to see this provision in the speech from the throne and to note that at last something is going to be done for our universities.

I am also glad to note that a Canada Council is to be established. I have long felt that we could do much in this country through a Canada Council to promote scholarships. However, I do not think that what is suggested is in any way adequate, nor will the grants to the universities provide adequate funds to do what is needed for our young people in order to provide them with the opportunities that I found—I say "I found"—are afforded to young people in the United Kingdom and some other western European countries to achieve the educational training and standing that will enable them to play a decisive part in their countries.

I was happy to see, too, that a committee is to be set up in the other place to study land utilization. I hope they will not overlook irrigation, and I hope they will not overlook flood areas that need to be drained. Particularly do I hope they will not overlook the South Saskatchewan river plan, which I believe would be of a great benefit to a large area within one of our prairie provinces.

Having said these things, Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has just expired. I hope I have made at least some contribution to the discussion, and with that I am going to leave it at this time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my comments on His Excellency's address I should like to offer my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I commend particularly the hon. member for Edmonton South, whose speech in my judgment was informative, moderate in tone and statesmanlike in quality.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is almost barren of any proposals offering relief for the average Canadian from the harassing problems which have been hounding him during the past several years. The little man has been almost completely forgotten by the government, unless it can be argued that providing him with culture is an achievement worthy of being called relief. I can hardly appreciate the government's concern about providing culture to the Canadian people while those same people are allowed to languish under a dog eat dog policy that keeps them worried stiff and in the grip of fear from one week to another, fear lest their incomes may not be stretched over the needs of food, clothing and shelter. I believe, I think as much as does anyone in the house, in encouraging cultural pursuits for all Canadians, but there are such things as priorities. First I think we should do something to bring old age pensions, war veterans allowances and like social security measures into line with prices as they have risen in this country.

I very much commend the government for its decision to appropriate a further amount of money to be distributed by the Canada Council for assisting our Canadian universities in some of their construction projects. The Canadian universities have been having a fairly hard time. It is also worthy of commendation that the government is preparing to double the annual grants to the Canadian universities, and that these increased funds will be paid to the National Conference of Canadian Universities to be divided by them amongst the recognized institutions of higher learning. That is something it seems to me can be classed as a worthy project and one which, if the appropriations are substantial enough, will bring much-needed relief to the universities that are overcrowded and understaffed at a time when enrolments are rising swiftly.

However, if this provision to help the universities could be accompanied by some substantial measure of help to worthy students through scholarships and bursaries, and extended into the high school area, then it would seem to me that we would be making the kind of progress in higher education that is so much needed to meet the challenge of these times. In the judgment of any Social Crediter, no monetary consideration should be allowed to stand between any capable and determined student and the greatest measure of higher learning that he wishes to attain. Our country is always richer and better off every time our universities and high schools turn out a truly educated and skilled Canadian.

I must also commend the government for the proposal to increase the federal grants to provincial governments in aid of technical and vocational training. I support all these proposals wholeheartedly, and I urge the government to be generous in the amounts they provide in each case.

I should like to say just a word about that section of His Excellency's address which deals with the entrance into Canada of Hungarian refugees. I think the government did well to send the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration over to Europe to study the situation at first hand so he would know exactly what to do about relieving Austria of the extremely heavy burden of looking after the refugees who had gone across the border into that country. His personal appearance on the scene in Europe will also help decide how far Canada can go in helping to relieve the suffering of these patriots who have demonstrated that they love liberty even more than they love life.

Canada is short of labour. That is one of the reasons given for rising costs of living and of materials. We in this country need skills of every kind. It would therefore seem to me to be foolish in the extreme to be too selective at a time like this about our immigration. We should receive into Canada as many of these patriots as we can possibly integrate into our society, using care only to screen out any possible subversives. In addition to that, since many thousands of Britons are now making application for permanent entry into this country, we should do everything we can to provide them with transportation to Canada on an equal basis with the Hungarians, and to provide employment for them when they get here.

I hope the government is stretching every resource in both of these worthy projects. I know that it is going to tax our housing accommodation to the very limit temporarily, but I am also sure that the Canadian people from one end of this country to the other will respond wholeheartedly to the government's appeal for assistance in providing the new immigrants with homes. Canada needs to increase her population as rapidly as it is safe to do so. Some of our problems will never be solved until Canada has 25 million, 30 million or 35 million people.

Having said those things I now return to something I said to begin with, namely that the speech from the throne hardly mentions any one of a dozen or more serious problems that are besetting the Canadian people and have been giving them trouble for quite a long time. To be specific, may I say that I was amazed that the speech gives only passing reference to one of the worst tragedies that has struck our country for a long time. I refer, of course, to the Canadian Pacific Railway strike. A great deal has been said this afternoon about it. I was not at all satisfied with either the contribution made by the Leader of the Opposition or that made by the leader of the government. It is tragic in the extreme, it seems to me, that at this time of year, in the dead of winter, the wheels of the great Canadian Pacific Railway should be brought to a full stop.

It must be remembered that in many important parts of our country the Canadian Pacific Railway has had almost a total monopoly on transportation for many years. The whole of the southern part of my province from Calgary south to the international border is served by only one railroad, namely the Canadian Pacific. There are a good many communities in that area and in other areas in Canada, including the maritime provinces, that are running dangerously low in their supplies of fuel and food. Wheat and livestock are not being moved. Hence the farmer's chance of getting even a small supply of cash with which to meet his living costs has been utterly destroyed. The farmer has already had to carry a much heavier burden than he ought to have been called upon to carry, considering the tremendous contribution he has made to the economy of this country for so many years.

I think the grounds on which the strike was called were rather slim, and certainly not important enough to justify the complete tie-up of the whole Canadian Pacific system. I am not trying to direct the blame against either the labour unions or the railway company. Undoubtedly the union people fear the results of automation. This alone should indicate to the government how important it is that some new policy be adopted which will guarantee the distribution amongst the consumers of Canada of an adequate supply of purchasing power in spite of any rapid extension of mechanization and industry. The government has not done anything whatever to modify its policy to meet this growing trend toward automation which is bound to dislocate the labour forces of Canada, at least in its first stages. In the long run automation, in my judgment, will be a blessing to mankind; but for some years it could easily be a grave threat to security and a cause of fear unless steps are taken to make up for the lack of consumer purchasing power which will result from the process—that is, to make up that shortage—by a direct issue to the consumers of this country.

It is absolutely imperative, in my judgment and in our judgment here, that the railway start running again as quickly as possible. The first responsibility of this parliament should be, by whatever means lies in its power, to get the C.P.R. into operation. At the same time the outstanding matter of dispute between the railway and the firemen and engineers should be referred to a commission for study. That commission should, as quickly as possible, investigate every angle of the situation, and particularly the safety factor in the operation of freight trains and yard engines; and when the commission's decision is handed down it should be considered as binding on both parties. It seems to me that there is too much inclination to try to maintain the status quo at all costs. In matters of this kind there must be a disposition to find the right answer even if it means some compromise.

In the United States I understand that they have a board or commission that is called the presidential fact-finding board. I understand that board can be used for just such cases as we now have in our country. When the board is named, I understand that no strike is permitted. In other words, let the men go back to work. Then, the board must get busy at once and complete its investigation within a specified period of time. If I am not mistaken the board's decisions, when handed down, are considered final and binding upon both parties. I only point that out to indicate that there is a precedent in other countries for such a commission or board as has been suggested. I am certain that something will have to be done as soon as possible to get this railway running, even if it means the appointment of such a board.

I think the railway are to be commended for trying to discover ways of cutting down costs and effecting savings wherever they can. They are placed in a most difficult position. On the one hand the Canadian people, especially those in the western provinces that stand at the very peak of the freight rate structure, are demanding a reduction in the heavy and discriminatory freight rates that exist. They point out that since 1945 these freight rates have more than doubled. The farmers, especially in western Canada, are forced to pay freight costs both ways, on the goods they buy that come from eastern Canada and on the goods they sell that go to the head of the lakes or to the seaboard. You cannot blame them, therefore, for demanding lower freight rates, and in turn if they demand lower freight rates the railway must effect savings. Who is to say, therefore, that the railway is wrong in trying to effect these savings?

According to western Canadian thinking the government has been seriously lacking in courage in connection with this whole strike from the beginning. Certainly the government has not shown very much disposition to get the railway running again; that is clear. It is clear also that the nearness to a general election has made them timid and diffident in dealing with a situation like this. This is a time for courage and vision. I am positively certain that there were ways and means during the past few weeks by which the disastrous work stoppage on the Canadian Pacific could have been avoided, but it was not avoided and somebody has to take the responsibility for it. As I said, the important thing now is to get the railway running again, and Social Crediters are prepared to back the government in whatever measures may be taken to accomplish that end and to provide for a thorough study of the dispute outstanding between the two sides. Let me also say that when a mutually satisfactory commission does hand down a decision, that decision should be binding on both parties.

We must not follow any policy, Mr. Speaker, that will deny to industry the opportunity to improve its processes and give better service to the Canadian people at lower cost; that is fundamental to our thinking. The future and its needs are going to demand improvements in all our industrial processes and lower costs. Certainly it can be said with perfect truth that the technological advances that have been made over the years, and that are now being made, are not resulting in the reduction of costs to the Canadian consumer. There is a reason for that, and we ought to find that reason and correct it. Automation is fast replacing labour in many fields. It is going to be necessary for labour to find employment in other fields. This in itself gives rise to considerable fear on the part of the working man. There is a fear that the Canadian Pacific Railway, for example, may be inclined to place the names of presently unneeded workmen on the call board along with many other names, and that it will become a stagnant board with a great many names and few calls for some of the persons whose names are on that board. That is a real fear on the part of railwaymen.

There is a fear also lest they be cut off with no jobs at all. A suggestion has been made that in cases of this kind, and for those who may be affected in the future, certain financial assistance should be extended for a period of six months or until such time as the displaced workmen can be absorbed into some other industry. Perhaps though, with a provision of that kind, some effort should be made to provide training for the displaced workmen so they can readily find employment in some other field. Those are suggestions that can be considered and will have to be considered as the months wear on and more mechanization comes into our industry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to turn for a few minutes to some of those problems I mentioned that have been harassing Canadian people for a long time and from which little or no relief appears to be indicated in government policy in the speech from the throne. I think the one which most plagues the Canadian people as a whole and which causes them more distress than anything else is the continuously rising cost of living. Recent announcements from the bureau of statistics show that the cost of living index stands at 120.4 in terms of the new method of expressing it. This is an all-time high. When it is converted into terms of the pre-1949 index, in December it would have stood at 193.4, that is in relation to 100 for the 1935-39 period. The speed with which the index rose during the autumn months of 1956 startled the Canadian people. Most of the people with whom I came into contact in travelling across the country expressed alarm at the prospect that they feared we would have to expect for the next six months. There seems to be every evidence now that nothing we can do will prevent a further rise of several points in the cost of living index between now and July of this year.

There is not a single word, however, to be found about that situation in the speech from the throne. You would think the government would have something to say about a matter as important as that, impinging as it does very heavily upon the welfare of the people. I do not wish to attempt, by any means, to throw all the blame for the situation on the government. I know there are many factors entering into this increasing price and cost of living structure. But the people of Canada will judge the government on its policies, and of course they will do that within the next few months when the government goes to the country in a general election. There is no doubt in my mind, however, that government policy has not only failed to come to grips with the problem of the rising cost of living and provide relief for the Canadian consumer, but actually government policy has contributed to a great extent to the spiralling of costs. The government is inclined, of course, to shrug off the whole nasty situation by saying we are suffering from inflation caused by an unprecedented rate of capital expansion. There is some truth to that, of course, but only some.

It is generally conceded, Mr. Speaker, that inflation means too much money chasing after too few goods. Now, in the light of that is the present situation in Canada real inflation? I want to examine that for just a moment or two. First let us take a look at the supply of goods available to the consumers of this country. The September, 1956, statement of inventories, shipments and orders in the manufacturing industries issued by the dominion bureau of statistics contains some very interesting tables. I want first of all to look at this table found on page 4 of the report, where one finds estimated the stocks on hand for every month from January, 1952, to September, 1956. The table shows that the total of all inventory held by manufacturing industries in Canada as of September, 1956, was $4,578,805,000. That was the highest total inventory of any month certainly since 1952, and I am satisfied that if I could get all the facts going back over the years I could venture to say the highest in Canada's history.

Of this total inventory held by the manufacturing industries there are three divisions; raw materials, goods in process of manufacture, and finished products.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask what month that is for?

Mr. Low: I said September, 1956. In every one of these three divisions the total at September, 1956, was considerably in excess of the total in any preceding month except for a $5 million decline in raw materials from August to September of 1956, but that is a negligible amount and it can be attributed to the seasonal changes in arrangements. There is also a slight decline in the goods in process from June, 1956, to September of the same year, which again is negligible. Both of these can be attributed, as I said, to seasonal fluctuations, which are only natural. The general trend has been continuously upward, and we now have on hand in Canada over $4½ billion worth of goods held by the manufacturing industries of this country.

Now, in the consumer goods industries the total inventory at the end of September of 1956 reached $1,093,138,000, a total that is higher than at any other time since 1952, and very likely higher than at any previous time in our history. A similar statement can be made of perishable goods. In petroleum and coal products the inventory at September last was the highest in history. In electrical supplies, although there was a slight decline in the three months from July, 1956, to September, yet the inventory at September, 1956, was $15 million over that for December, 1955, and $133 million over that for January, 1952.

Even in the iron and steel products industries the total inventory at September was $841,666,000, a figure greater than at any time since 1952. There was some decline in the finished products division of this particular industry, but both goods in process and raw materials on hand were greater in value than at any time since 1952. And this is the particular division where this country is supposed to have the serious shortages. The figures successfully dispute that claim.

I will not weary the house with many more figures, but I think I should say just a word about the capital goods industries lest someone here finds reason in that section to claim that we are actually suffering a shortage of goods. The total inventory in the capital goods industries at September, 1956, was $391,335,000, which is greater than at any time since 1952, and very likely the greatest of all time.

Let us turn for a moment to the money supply of our country, which is the other angle to the situation. The total money supply in 1954 was $11,276,900,000, while at September of 1956 it was $12 billion, in round figures. This shows a very small increase in the total money supply available to the public with which to buy a very greatly increased production. Let us not forget that at September, 1956, our gross national production was running at the rate of $29 billion a year, while in 1954 it reached only about $25 billion.

Mr. Harris: Twenty-six and a quarter billion for the year.

Mr. Low: That was 1955.

Mr. Harris: I beg your pardon; yes, it was 1955.

Mr. Low: It was running at approximately $25 billion in 1954. I think I am quite right. In the light of these facts it is perfectly clear to me that the present high cost of living cannot be blamed on real inflation, too many dollars chasing far too few goods. Especially is this conclusion given real backing when we consider that there has been a slackening off in production in certain much-wanted goods in this country. That slackening off has reached quite serious proportions in the last six months.

I was attracted to an article that appeared recently in the Calgary Herald concerning a great industry in this country. It appeared in the issue dated October 25, 1956. The heading of the article is "Lay-Offs Hit B.C. Lumbering". This is the pertinent story:

> Labour and management officials in the British Columbia timber industry have forecast widespread unemployment in the industry this winter.
>
> Both groups agreed it would be "the worst winter since the war" and some said unemployment might spread to other industries.
>
> International Woodworkers of America expect to have 1,200 men out of work by mid-November. Already nearly 800 have been laid off.

That was back in October. There are more than that now. The article goes on to say:

> "I cannot remember losing 1,200 men in such a short time", an I.W.A. official said.
>
> "In nine years experience I have never seen so many men looking for work as there are now."

Further on in the article, Mr. Speaker, we find the following:

> Officials agreed that sawmill workers will be hit first.
>
> Two reasons given for the expected slump are:
>
> Attempts by the government to control inflation by clamping down on new home mortgages, thus reducing the demand for new houses.
>
> High shipping costs which have caused the United Kingdom to reduce orders from Canada and start buying more common grade timber from Russia and the Baltic countries.
>
> A spokesman said the industry will have to consider asking Ottawa to lift the mortgage restrictions.

I point that out only to indicate the truth of what I said a moment ago and to give backing to it. At a time when we are actually slackening off production in the country, not only in the lumber industry but in certain others, how in the name of common sense anyone can cling to the old story that we are suffering real inflation I cannot understand.

There is another fact, Mr. Speaker, which I think we all ought to take into account as we consider this particular subject of the cost of living and what to do about it. The dominion bureau of statistics figures indicate clearly that in 1955 the Canadian people piled up a total of $26,600 million worth of goods and services. I think that was the figure mentioned a moment ago by the Minister of Finance. In that same year, 1955, the distribution of purchasing power amongst the consumers of this country fell so far short of being enough to enable the Canadian people to buy and consume what they had produced, if they wanted it, that they were forced to run charge accounts, to buy on instalment credit and to borrow in the form of cash personal loans from the banks and small loan companies the staggering total of $2,600 million. These are the facts as supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics. In other words, the Canadian people in 1955 had to mortgage future incomes to the extent of more than $2½ billion in order to be able to consume the goods they had produced. Does that indicate, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, too much money chasing after too few goods? I maintain that it shows just the opposite and the situation for 1956, when all the facts are in, will indicate a similar picture, if not one that is worse.

What, then, is causing the continuous increases in prices and in the cost of living? It certainly is not inflation, according to the accepted meaning of the term. Economists are finding it necessary to coin new phrases and terms to describe it. They are calling it a wage-price spiral. This spiral was set in motion on the one hand by the government itself in its demands for manpower and materials. It is competing with private industry for both manpower and materials that are available. It is true that the one real shortage we find in this country is in certain types of labour, unless one calls a lack of brains and vision on the other side of the house a shortage. I think perhaps that will have to be considered, brains and vision to meet the situation as we face it today.

An hon. Member: And courage.

Mr. Low: And courage. We in the opposition for quite a number of years now have been urging the government to take swift and sure action to guard against the contingency that is now arising. In fact it is getting worse from day to day. We have advocated a far more realistic immigration policy that would increase the labour supply in those divisions where a shortage was indicated, or was developing; but the government did nothing about our proposals, or very little. The people of Canada will undoubtedly have this in mind when they weigh the government in balance in the next few months. There is no doubt that if courage and vision had been exercised since the war the present wage-price spiral would not have developed.

When that spiral began to assume serious proportions it appears that the government became panicky; they budgeted for a revenue surplus for this year to restrict the money supply. That surplus will likely reach more than $300 million by the end of this fiscal year. Moreover, the government and its agencies together took monetary action to bring about a blanket restriction of credit. The government have been exceedingly evasive about what they have done in this field thus far. They have refused to give the house the information that it requires to properly assess the situation.

The fact is, however, that this government has established a short term treasury bill rate of around 3½ per cent, which unquestionably has been the snake in the grass in this whole rise in the interest rate which has had such undesirable effects upon our whole economy. The Bank of Canada quite properly felt it could not maintain a rediscount rate lower than the government's own short term treasury bill rate. The chartered banks then used this rediscount rate as an excuse for increasing the general interest rate to borrowers, and as a matter of fact they were encouraged to do so by the central bank and the government. In addition they were required by the central bank to maintain a special 7 per cent cash reserve over and above the 8 per cent normally required by the Bank of Canada.

This over-all credit restriction in itself has contributed to the wage-price spiral, in that it has imposed much heavier costs upon producers who have had to borrow for production purposes. It has been highly discriminatory right from the beginning. The big industry has had no trouble whatever getting the money it needed, and it is not having too much trouble today. However, the smaller industries, the little men, have been hardest hit and many of them have been forced out of business. Those Canadian people who have been trying to get homes for themselves—the little people again—have found it impossible during the past six months to borrow in order to get roofs over their heads. The home situation in Canada is serious and will likely be much more serious as the days go by and we bring in more immigrants. The small merchant, the individual enterpriser who has actually been the banker for many of the communities in Canada, has been forced into a desperate position as a consequence of the credit squeeze. The farmer has also been put in a very bad position.

I am sure that with enough time at my disposal it would be easy to prove that the over-all credit control effort by this government through the use of the discount rate and restriction of loans has been unjustified, has been wrong in principle and most ineffective. What the government has done in this respect has been likened to burning down the barn to kill the rat. Selective credit controls under the circumstances would have been perfectly justified and far more effective, selected in those areas wherein the trouble lay. Why in the world make everyone suffer because of those particular difficulties? But the government has not looked at it that way. The blanket credit control program put into effect by the governor of the Bank of Canada has discriminated against the little man, the individual enterpriser and the municipalities and provinces that have been so seriously affected by the government's policy.

The government ought to have learned that the mere tightening or loosening of the total volume of credit is not a cure-all for economic fluctuations. Over the years it should have been clear from our experience that the disastrous business cycle can be levelled out only through interrelation of government spending, taxes, savings, and investments, income, employment and money supply. If we are going to try to operate a full employment policy, then we must begin to bring our whole money system under the most careful and scientific management, not to leave it to Joe over in the Bank of Canada to set the policy and then follow along like a blind turkey. If we are going to try to operate with that full employment policy then we must bring our entire money system under close scrutiny and careful and scientific management.

I believe we now face the absolute necessity of the early appointment of a national finance and economic commission answerable directly to this parliament. Then this parliament should lay down for it a policy in specific terms and clothe it with authority to manage that policy. Nothing points out more strongly the real need for such a commission than the events of the past 14 or 15 years. In his state of the nation address last Saturday President Eisenhower suggested that he would ask congress to set up a similar commission for the United States. We Social Crediters have been advocating for many years the necessity of having a finance and economic commission clothed with the responsibilities I have mentioned. It seems to me it is time we did so in order that our efforts may be properly co-ordinated.

Nobody likes credit restrictions, that is true. I do not like them. However, it might be necessary under certain combinations of circumstances to apply selective credit controls in those particular branches of our economy where the trouble actually exists. I oppose most strongly the government's blanket credit control policy because it simply is not working, and it hits hardest the small business, the little fellow, the best and steadiest taxpayer we have in this country.

I think there is a lesson for all in the experience we are having at the present time. It is true that total volume of corporation profits looks big; percentage-wise it may not be so impressive. However, when we see those swollen profits, rather than immediately demanding higher wages and salaries which can benefit only one section of the Canadian people at the expense of the others and at the same time force costs and therefore prices to go higher, would it not be better for us all to take the position that a fair share of those profits should be used to bring down costs and prices for everybody? It can be done. After all, it is not the level of wages and salaries that counts; it is the purchasing power we take home that matters. Our present inclination as a people seems to be to follow too eagerly the dog eat dog policy when for the sake of security and happiness we should follow the policy of live and help to live.

The rise in the cost of living can be successfully stopped without any serious interference with individual freedom, and it ought to be stopped; and the government must take immediate and strong action in this regard. However, the rest of us must be prepared to help; it is not a matter requiring only the effort of the government. I believe the federal government should allow a moderate increase in the money supply so as to bring down interest rates. That is indicated in every single aspect of our whole financial and economic situation. This moderate increase in the money supply could be used at this time to buy lower prices for the Canadian people through the use of the compensated price discount system which we have advocated for many years. Such a system will prevent increases in consumer prices but will not interfere in any way with adequate producer income.

I think, too, the government will have to be prepared to arrange for loans from the Bank of Canada to the provincial and municipal governments for those public works projects that are considered to be essential to the development of the provinces and their resources. These loans could be arranged at a rate of interest which would act as a stimulus for the downward interest trend that is so essential at this time.

I see, Mr. Speaker, my time is up. I have indicated only one of the harassing problems facing the Canadian people and with which the government is not coming to grips. I should have liked to deal with external affairs, agriculture and other important matters; there are at least 12 or 13 more. However, I am going to ask my colleagues to deal with them in the course of their contributions to this debate. They will be outlining the policies and program advocated by the Social Credit Association of Canada, and they will not be afraid to say positively what they would do in specific circumstances.

Let me say in conclusion that as a political organization in this country we place ourselves squarely and firmly on the side of the little fellow, the private enterpriser, the farmer, the small businessman, the Canadian consumer, and the home owner in the struggle for a better way of life, a freer way of life, under a policy of live and help to live that should apply within Canada as well as in our relations with other countries.

On motion of Mr. Cauchon the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we will be going on with this debate tomorrow and Friday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

STATEMENT AND DOCUMENTS RELATING TO RAILWAY STRIKE

Statement by Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour):

Mr. Speaker:

In view of the widespread interest in the causes and effects of the work stoppage on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company system, not only in this house but in all parts of Canada, I think I should place on record a statement of the events leading up to the cessation of work at 4 p.m. on January 2 last.

The collective agreements between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company (eastern, prairie and Pacific regions including the Quebec Central Railway and Dominion Atlantic Railway) and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, effective April 1, 1954, expired on March 31, 1956. Two months earlier, on February 1, the brotherhood served letters of notice on the managements of the eastern, prairie and Pacific regions of the railway and upon its subsidiaries for the revision of these agreements. On February 6 and 7, the company served similar notice on the brotherhood.

Representatives of the parties met in Toronto on February 21 and in Calgary on February 29 and negotiations between them continued up to April 18. On that date, the company requested me to establish a conciliation board to deal with the dispute and at the same time stated in detail its proposals for the revision of the collective agreements. On April 19, the brotherhood made the same request and likewise outlined its proposals for the revision of the agreement.

On the following day, April 20, 1956, I authorized a board of conciliation to be established and it was constituted as follows: His Honour Judge J. C. Anderson, Belleville, Ontario, chairman; Mr. Emmett M. Hall, Q.C., Saskatoon, and the honourable Senator Arthur W. Roebuck, Q.C., Toronto, nominees of the company and brotherhood respectively.

The brotherhood's proposals for changes in the collective agreement were as follows:

1. Increase basic rates of pay in all classes of service by 25 per cent. All arbitraries, differentials and special allowances to be maintained and increased accordingly. Increased rates to be effective April 1, 1956.

2. One full day's pay for each statutory holiday not worked. When service is performed during any part of a statutory holiday the entire day will be compensated for on the basis of time and one half the basic daily rate for the class of service concerned.

3. Allowable service for pension purposes will accrue on the basis of all time in service. The words "allowable service" will mean continuous relationships; absences for furlough or other reasons when seniority is unimpaired not to be deducted.

4. A fireman or helper taken from the seniority ranks of locomotive firemen shall be employed on all motor cars used in road service and propelled by diesel, electric, gasoline, electricity or other power, and operated under the uniform code of operating rules by an engineer.

5. Add to "mileage regulations": When a fireman is called for additional service out of his home terminal after he has attained the maximum mileage of 4,800 in passenger service or 3,800 in other service he will be paid at one and one half times the regular rate, double time where overtime is involved.

6. Revise article 5, clause b (2) eastern region, article 5, clause b (5) prairie and Pacific regions as follows:

In the event of a fireman being deadheaded to an assignment at a station auxiliary to the main terminal, he is to be paid deadhead mileage in both directions to and from the main terminal. When assignments or runs are bulletined and no bids are received for positions at auxiliary terminals the junior firemen on the spare board at the main terminal will be required to man the assignment and will be paid deadhead mileage going to and returning from the assignment or run. The provisions of article 29(q) will not be applicable to firemen who are required to deadhead from their home terminal to fill assignments or runs at points which are auxiliary to their divisional home terminal.

The company's proposals were as follows:

Firemen—System

1. Eliminate all agreements, rules, regulations, interpretations or practices, however established, which require the employment or use of firemen (helpers) on other than steam power, and establish a rule to provide that the company shall have the unrestricted right to determine when and if a fireman (helper) shall be used on other than steam power.

2. Eliminate all agreements, rules, regulations, interpretations or practices, however established, which provide rates of pay and daily earnings minima for firemen (helpers) on other than steam power, and establish a rule to provide that in instances where fireman (helper) is used on other than steam power a minimum rate of $7 per day of 100 miles shall apply.

3. Eliminate preparatory and inspection time arbitraries and provide that firemen when employed will be paid for all time required to report for duty until released.

4. Provide for initial terminal time payments in road service to be used to make up a short day on the same basis as final terminal time is now applied.

5. Eliminate mountain and valley differentials.

The board held approximately 30 meetings between June 9, 1956, and November 25, 1956, all necessary adjournments in that period being made with the consent of the parties. The board's report submitted by His Honour Judge Anderson and Mr. Hall was received by me on December 18, 1956. A minority report submitted by Hon. Mr. Roebuck was received on the same date.

In summary, the report of the board contained the following recommendations:

1. That the diesel rules be amended to permit the company to operate diesel engines in yard and freight service without firemen, with the understanding that if as a result of actual operating experience it appears that in some circumstances the services of the firemen might again be required, a modification of the rule might again be necessary and would then become the subject of further bargaining at a time when another agreement is being negotiated.

2. That the company continue to employ all firemen who are at the date of the new agreement on the firemen's roster and who have passed their engineer's qualifications and/or attained three years of seniority as firemen.

3. That the company give an undertaking to the brotherhood not to seek, when future contracts are open, the right to release these firemen from employment or to transfer them to other employment with the company where their direct line of promotion would not be to engineer, provided that the brotherhood at the same time gives an undertaking to the company which would provide that if at any time in the future it should agree to allow the Canadian National Railways to release from employment any or all of its firemen or to allow that railway to transfer to other employment any or all of its firemen, where the direct promotion is not to engineer, it would allow the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to do likewise.

4. That the parties to the dispute agree to set up a joint committee to discuss, decide and put into effect all plans, rules, details and procedures necessary to enable the company to carry out the new diesel rule.

5. That the parties themselves discuss revisions of the present rules governing arbitraries relating to preparatory and inspection time and initial terminal time and that all mountain differentials be reduced to the amount of the valley differentials but that the valley differentials be continued.

6. That all wage rates applicable to miles, hours, overtime, arbitraries and special allowances be increased by 7 per cent effective April 1, 1956, and by a further 5 per cent effective June 1, 1957, and that the $4.25 per month per employee included in these increases subsequent to January 1, 1957, be in lieu of health and welfare benefits.

7. That firemen in yard service be granted six statutory holidays with pay.

8. That the pension proposal was clearly beyond the board's terms of reference.

9. That the present rule relating to the operation of Budd cars remain unchanged.

10. That the present rule governing mileage regulations remain unchanged.

In summary, the minority report recommended:

1. That the present diesel rule in the collective agreements be not changed.

2. That the company withdraw its proposal that firemen's pay on passenger diesel locomotive be reduced.

3. That all present arbitraries be continued and that firemen be granted statutory holidays with pay on the same basis as now applying to trainmen.

4. That a wage increase be granted as recommended in the report of the majority of the board.

5. That the mileage regulations proposals be negotiated by the parties on the withdrawal by the company of its major proposal, i.e., the removal of firemen on diesels in freight and yard service.

On December 20, my department was advised by the brotherhood that the recommendations of the board were not acceptable and on the following day, December 21, the company advised that it was prepared to accept and implement the recommendations of the board.

On the evening of Wednesday, December 26, a telegram (copy attached—Appendix "A") was received from Mr. W. E. Gamble, vice president of the brotherhood, advising that a strike vote by telegraph of the joint grievance committees of the brotherhood on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Quebec Central Railway and Dominion Atlantic Railway, was unanimously in favour of strike action and that a withdrawal from railway service had been authorized, effective 4.00 p.m., January 2.

On Thursday, December 27, I discussed the whole matter with the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Howe, and by telegram, I invited Mr. N. R. Crump, president of the company, and Mr. Gamble, Canadian vice president of the brotherhood, to meet in Ottawa at 11.30 Saturday morning, December 29. (Copies attached—Appendix "B")

On Saturday morning and afternoon, December 29, the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Howe, and I discussed the issues in dispute and methods of settlement with Mr. Crump and Mr. Gamble. The discussions revealed that the parties were adamant in their positions with respect to the employment of firemen on diesel locomotive in freight and yard service of the company. The company took the position that such employment was no longer necessary and the brotherhood was equally firm in holding that such employment was necessary both from the viewpoint of duties involved and the safety factor. The first meeting held on Saturday, was in the main exploratory in nature. No definite proposals were advanced by Mr. Howe or myself but the suggestion was made that the parties should consider a formula which would involve: (1) the union calling off the strike and the company withholding action on the removal of diesel firemen until: (2) a joint union-company committee with an independent chairman had given consideration to all aspects of the diesel issue: (3) in the meantime negotiations on other factors to continue. The parties were requested to consider this formula over Sunday and be prepared to discuss it more fully at the next meeting which was scheduled for Monday, Dec. 31.

The talks resumed at 10.00 a.m. on December 31 and, following morning and afternoon sessions, the Acting Prime Minister and myself announced that our efforts to obtain a settlement between the railway and the brotherhood had not succeeded. The discussions broke down on the diesel issue and both parties were unable to agree on the method by which this question should be resolved. Mr. Gamble stated that the brotherhood was willing to call off the strike and submit the diesel issue to a tribunal composed of company and union representatives, with an impartial chairman, the recommendations of such a body not to be binding on either party. Mr. Crump, for the company, on the other hand, desired that all issues in dispute be put before an impartial tribunal, for final determination binding on both parties.

Before dispersing, the parties were asked to give earnest consideration to the far-reaching and serious effects of the railway strike, more particularly in certain areas of Canada and on a large number of railway and other employees not directly affected by the dispute. At the same time they were advised that further mediation services would be made available if they were to reconsider their positions in the dispute.

On January 1, I telephoned both Mr. Gamble and Mr. Crump in order to see if they had altered their positions in any way and if the Department of Labour could be of further assistance to them but found no change in attitudes.

On January 2, the Acting Prime Minister addressed a telegram to Mr. Gamble and Mr. Crump (copies attached—Appendix "C") and received replies on January 3.

It had been made clear to both the parties to the dispute that the Department of Labour would be available if their services were required or in conveying any point of view from one side to the other, or for anything that might provide the basis of further negotiations.

The strike went into effect on 2nd January at 4 p.m.

On the afternoon of Friday, 4th January, I had a phone call from the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Claude Jodoin, asking me where I might be reached the following day, Saturday. I told him I would be at my office.

Late in the morning Saturday, 5th January, I had a further phone call from Mr. Jodoin saying he had been having a meeting at his headquarters during the morning attended by his senior congress officials and by railway brotherhood officials. He asked if he and his two senior congress officers could come up to my office at once. I invited them to do so.

On arrival Mr. Jodoin told me that he was authorized to present a new proposal for settling the dispute.

Upon hearing this proposal I realized that it visualized a tribunal or commission of broader representation and scope than any that had been discussed by the two parties on the weekend before.

I reported this proposal to the Prime Minister and to the Right Hon. Mr. Howe on Saturday, 5th January.

The Prime Minister discussed the proposal by long distance with Mr. Crump in Montreal on Saturday evening.

Mr. Jodoin stated that he would ask the union leaders to remain in Ottawa over the week end or for as long as may be useful.

On Monday, 7th January, the president of the Canadian Labour Congress announced the Saturday proposals to the press, and sent me a copy of his press release thereon from which the proposal is set out attached in Appendix "D". On the same day the president of the C.P.R. announced that this proposal was not acceptable to the management.

Labour Conditions—C.P.R. Strike

On Monday 7th January Mr. Crump made his reply known through the press. (Citizen report of that date attached—Appendix "E").

This summary deals exclusively with communication with or between the two parties to the actual dispute.

APPENDIX "A"

CANADIAN NATIONAL TELEGRAPHS

MOA 269 32 FD Montreal Que 26 546 P 1956 Dec 26 PM 6 26

Bernard Wilson, Director of Industrial Relations Dept of Labour Ottawa

Telegraphic strike vote of general grievances committees BLFE on CPR QCR DAR unanimously in favor of strike action in current dispute with company. Withdrawal from service authorize effective four PM January Second

W E GAMBLE

CPR QCR DAR PM BLFE

APPENDIX "B"

CANADIAN PACIFIC TELEGRAPHS

Ottawa, December 27, 1956.

Mr. N. R. Crump,
President,
Canadian Pacific Railway Company,
Windsor Street Station,
Montreal, Que.

Due to urgency of railway dispute situation I am inviting Mr. Gamble and you to meet with me at my office Confederation Building at eleven thirty Saturday morning December twenty-ninth. Please confirm. I do not propose to give publicity to this invitation.

MILTON F. GREGG

CANADIAN PACIFIC TELEGRAPHS

Ottawa, December 27, 1956.

Mr. W. E. Gamble,
Vice-President,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Engineers,
802 Castle Bldg., 1410 Stanley St.,
Montreal, Que.

Due to urgency of railway dispute situation I am inviting Mr. Crump and you to meet with me at my office Confederation Building at eleven thirty Saturday morning December twenty-ninth. Please confirm. I do not propose to give publicity to this invitation.

MILTON F. GREGG

Following replies received:

CANADIAN PACIFIC TELEGRAPHS

Montreal Que
December 28, 1956.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg,
Minister of Labor,
Ottawa, Ont.
C/) GTC RUSH

Will be glad to attend meeting your office 11.30 tomorrow morning (stop) from your wire I presume Mr. Gamble will not be accompanied by his negotiating committee

N R CRUMP

CANADIAN PACIFIC TELEGRAPHS

Montreal Que
December 27, 1956.

Milton F Gregg
Ministry of Labor
Confederation Bldg
Ottawa

Your wire today I am pleased to accept your invitation to meet with you and Mr. Crump at your office at 11.30 Saturday morning December twenty ninth

W E GAMBLE
B OF LF & E

APPENDIX "C"

The following wire was sent to the two parties Jan. 2 by Mr. Howe:

"Although Mr. Gregg and I are being inundated this morning with demands that the strike be stopped we know it is not necessary to emphasize again to you that the cessation of train service on the Canadian Pacific Railway Lines resulting from the withdrawal from service of the locomotive firemen scheduled to take effect this afternoon will give rise to very serious inconvenience and hardship to many Canadian communities serviced by Canadian Pacific Railway lines as well as serious disruption in movement of grain, fuel and other essential commodities. The action will also affect the employment of many thousands of railway workers not directly involved in the strike as well as of workers in other industries. In all the circumstances we strongly urge you to give favourable consideration to the proposal explored during our discussions namely that strike action be cancelled forthwith and that the diesel issue be separated from the other matters in dispute and submitted to an independent tribunal for disposition and that the parties continue negotiations for settlement of other issues involved in the contract dispute. Same wire sent to Mr. Crump (Mr. Gamble). I would be glad to have your reply."

The following reply was received from Mr. Gamble Jan. 3:

"Re your telegram today the brotherhood appreciates the gravity of the situation arising from strike action and gave careful consideration to its many serious implications before reaching decision to withdraw from service of the Canadian Pacific Railway stop Further it continues to bear in mind all the adverse effects that may result stop But in view of the several facts among them that the Canadian Pacific Railway is the only important railway of the North American continent refusing to withdraw those demands in the diesel issue and also refusing to grant locomotive firemen deserved wage increases the brotherhood cannot conclude otherwise than that the primary responsibility rests with the company stop May we restate our position: that the important wage issue be settled on a basis such as granted other railway employees stop We believe that an independent tribunal such as we discussed could render a valuable report on the diesel issue and we continue to be ready to work with such a tribunal in a thorough study of firemen duties and universal acceptance of them by others than the employer in this case."

The following reply was received from Mr. Crump Jan. 3:

"Refering to your joint wire date to Mr. Gamble and me regarding dispute between locomotive firemen and enginemen and Canadian Pacific Railway stop As you realise from our discussions in Ottawa Canadian Pacific is keenly aware of the hardship and loss that will be suffered not only by other Canadian Pacific employees but by the many communities served by Canadian Pacific as well stop To prevent this calamity Canadian Pacific is still agreeable that the diesel issue be submitted to an independent tribunal for final disposition and that other issues be settled by negotiations between the parties stop Operations could be resumed forthwith on this basis."

APPENDIX "D"

January 7, 1957.

On Saturday morning a delegation from the negotiating committee of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen met with the three executive officers of the Canadian Labour Congress—President Claude Jodoin, executive vice president Gordon Cushing, and secretary treasurer Donald MacDonald. As a result of these discussions a proposal was developed by the C.L.C. with Labour Minister Gregg shortly before noon Saturday.

Mr. Gregg, in turn, conveyed the plan to Prime Minister St. Laurent who placed it before the company. The proposal was acceptable to the brotherhood. Since Saturday afternoon union representatives have been standing by in the hope that the company would accept and so enable the issuance of an immediate back to work order by the union. No such reply has been received.

The suggestion was:

1. The establishment of a commission to conduct a public investigation of all the effects of transferring firemen's work and responsibilities to other employees on all railways in Canada.

2. The commission would be composed of seven members. Two would represent the company's viewpoint; two the union's; and three impartial public members, one of whom would be chairman.

3. The commission would hold public hearings with full power to make on the scene study of actual operations and working conditions on all railways.

4. The commission would have until December 31, 1957, to make its report to the government.

5. The pattern of adjustments applied during 1956 to other railway employees in Canada would be offered to the B.L.F.&E. All other conditions of employment would remain unchanged.

The view was expressed by representatives of both the congress and the brotherhood that the type of commission and enquiry proposed would meet the need for further investigation. This need would not be served by an arbitration procedure. It would be highly improper to arbitrate matters of public safety, safety of other railway employees, and issues which have implications which will inevitably extend into the operation of all other railways. The universal nature of these issues is shown by the fact that the same demands made by C.P.R. were also voiced by the C.N.R. and all major railroads in the United States, but were subsequently withdrawn by all these railroads including subsidiaries of the C.P.R. in the United States.

Claude Jodoin, president of the Canadian Labour Congress, commenting on the proposal, said: "We have discussed this matter thoroughly with the brotherhood and they are quite in agreement with us that it offers a fair and reasonable solution to the current work stoppage. The union feels that the public is not now familiar with the actual facts and these could be brought out by a public enquiry of the broad and comprehensive scope contemplated in this suggestion. Acceptance of this proposal by the railway would mean that the way is immediately cleared for the resumption of railway operations. The hesitation of the company in accepting such a proposal is incomprehensible in the face of the inevitable disruption which stoppage of railway operations is causing and on which the Canadian Pacific Railway has placed great emphasis in the past few days."

W. E. Gamble, vice president of the B.L.F. &E., expressed the brotherhood's gratitude to the Prime Minister, labour minister Gregg, and the officers of the Canadian Labour Congress for their efforts to develop a quick settlement of the dispute.

With Mr. Gamble were: John Graham, Montreal, B.L.F.&E. chief bargaining representative on the C.P.R., a member of the negotiating committee; A. E. Matthews, Parry Sound, Ont., B.L.F.&E. bargaining agent on the central region of the C.N.R., also a member of the national negotiating committee; and Arthur Garmaise, Montreal, counsel for the union.

APPENDIX "E"

"The solution suggested by Mr. Jodoin (Claude Jodoin, C.L.C. president) would not solve the diesel issue. It would merely postpone coming to grips with that issue and leave the country subject to renewal of the strike.

"Every question the union has raised on the diesel issue was considered by the conciliation board in public hearings. There is no new question to be dealt with.

"Mr. Jodoin's plan is not a solution of the diesel issue because:

"1. It fails to provide for final disposition.

"2. It would delay any possible settlement of the issue, to the detriment of the public, the railway and all Canadian Pacific employees.

"3. It would leave the country subject to renewal of the strike at such time as the Cleveland, Ohio, headquarters of the firemen's union might dictate.

"Sugar-Coated Version . . . "

"4. The C.L.C. plan is a sugar-coated version of the position taken by the firemen's union ever since the diesel proposal of Canadian Pacific was approved by the conciliation board.

"The essence of the C.L.C. plan was conveyed to me last Saturday. That evening I indicated to the Prime Minister in a telephone conversation such a plan was unsound because it did not provide for final disposition of the diesel issue. The plan was, therefore, unacceptable to Canadian Pacific and would be contrary to the best interests of Canada. I further indicated to the Prime Minister I would be willing to go to Ottawa to meet with him and other parties concerned in this dispute.

"However, in view of the adamant stand of the firemen's union, and my steadfast position as to the necessity for final disposition of the diesel issue, we agreed that such a meeting would not be useful under existing circumstances."

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 10, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF ANNUAL VACATIONS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the first reading of Bill No. 2, to provide for annual vacations with pay for employees.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that all employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction shall have at least two weeks' annual vacation with pay after one year's service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION OF STATUTORY HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to provide for pay for statutory holidays for employees and for pay for work performed on statutory holidays.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that all employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction shall have at least eight statutory holidays with pay each year.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to write the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues into the federal labour code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

EXTENSION OF RIGHT TO VOTE AT ADVANCE POLLS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to extend the privilege of voting at advance polls in federal elections to any qualified voter who finds he must be away from his constituency on election day.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ADMIRALTY ACT

PAYMENT OF SALARIES IN LIEU OF FEES TO SURROGATE JUDGES AND REGISTRARS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Admiralty Act to provide that the governor in council may authorize the payment of salaries out of the consolidated revenue fund, in lieu of fees, to certain surrogate judges, not exceeding three hundred dollars per annum and to certain registrars for admiralty districts, not exceeding two hundred dollars per annum.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF TWO NATIONAL MUSEUMS

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources Act to provide for the establishment of two national museums in lieu of one, as at the present time, to be known as the Canadian museum of natural history and the Canadian museum of human history.

Motion agreed to.

Proposed Legislation

CANADA COUNCIL

PROVISION FOR ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE ARTS, HUMANITIES AND SOCIAL SCIENCES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences and further to provide inter alia that

(a) the Minister of Finance may, out of the consolidated revenue fund, pay to the council the sum of fifty million dollars to constitute an endowment fund for the purposes of the act, and

(b) the council shall establish a fund to be called the university capital grants fund, to which shall be credited the sum of fifty million dollars, to be paid to the council by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he would give the house and the country a statement as to the present position of negotiations as between the C.P.R. and the union officials and also an indication as to the nature of the plan which he submitted to them and which is now the subject of consideration.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is preferable to say little at this time about the negotiations. They have been informal negotiations which I have found, not to my surprise at all but to my satisfaction, were perhaps more conducive to bringing about a feeling between the parties that an earnest effort should be made by them to overcome the narrow margin between their respective attitudes. The plan would be one to have the operations resumed at the earliest possible moment and to have them resumed on the terms of a contract that would be practically along the lines of the contract entered into between the same union and the Canadian National Railways last June for the period up to March 31, 1958, with a provision that the same diesel rule would be in that contract but would be subject to renegotiation in the light of the report of a board that would be set up by the government to investigate the aspects of the diesel rule that are not agreed to by both parties. The details that I trust both parties will find it in the interests of Canada generally to agree to are being discussed and worked out, and there would not be a reference until there has been the greatest possible measure of agreement by the parties as to what the terms of reference should be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I might ask a supplementary question, when was the suggestion by the Prime Minister in order to bring these two groups together in agreement submitted? Was it suggested at the time the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour met with representatives of the C.P.R. and the union or was it submitted for the first time yesterday or the day before? Would the Prime Minister also say what he means, and what he meant yesterday, when he stated there was only a slight margin of difference between the parties? What is the margin of difference to which he referred?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It is the same suggestion that was made at the first meeting of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as acting prime minister, and the Minister of Labour with the parties on the last Saturday of the year. It has been discussed and certain aspects of it have been the subject of suggestions by both parties that would imply some variation in the details. I feel convinced that the only point at issue now is whether there should be a contractual undertaking by both parties to accept and write into their modified agreement something that would be in conformity with the findings of the investigating board appointed by the government.

I am not sure whether or not I said it yesterday, but the objection of the union is that it is tantamount to their acceptance of compulsory arbitration. The objection of the railway company to that not being a contractual undertaking now is that if they do not make it a contractual undertaking the dispute could start all over again. I have been urging that is not a realistic view to take. If there is a thorough investigation and report, neither side is going to attempt, after that, to hold out on a formula for safe operations that will have been recommended after a full investigation by a board that would be constituted in such a way as to have considerable prestige with Canadian public opinion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have one more question. As to the nature of the board, is that to be the board of transport commissioners or an independent board to be set up composed of representatives of the government, the railway and the union?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The possibilities with respect to the two kinds of board the hon. gentleman mentioned have been under consideration. There is such a volume of work before the board of transport commissioners that that has been one reason for not asking them to set everything else aside and devote quite a long period to this problem, because it will take some time to make a full investigation that will be such as to satisfy the public that it has been given every possible consideration before a recommendation is made.

There is more than one statute under which that kind of board could be set up. Under the Railway Act it could be a reference to the board of transport commissioners. Under the industrial disputes act it could be a board constituted by the Minister of Labour, under one of the sections of that act. There is also, of course, the general Inquiries Act, under which a royal commission could be set up. What is being pressed, I will say, by us is something that will be apt to be accepted without compulsion having to be resorted to.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And is the decision final?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There will not be any agreement accepted by the union of a contractual obligation to accept the decision, but Canadian citizens usually accept what properly constituted authority determines to be the right kind of law for the land.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question? Would he not consider that in setting up such a board it is important to have members with some technical knowledge of the principal problem involved? What I have in mind is that the conciliation board consisted of three lawyers. While I have every respect for the legal profession—and we can tell by the volume of applause which greeted my remarks that there is an undue number of them in the house—nonetheless, I think in a case of this description rather than legal minds what we need are people who have some technical knowledge of the matter in view of the controversy over the safety factor.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, all these aspects have been very much in our minds. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman that there is an undue number of lawyers in the House of Commons. I have great respect for all other avocations but I believe that a knowledge of the law as it is is somewhat helpful in considering what the law might be altered to be in the future. However, this is not just a matter of law; it is a matter of fact as well, and that has been in the minds not only of the parties but in the minds of my colleagues and myself in our negotiations with the parties.

SUGAR

REFERENCE TO REPORTED CONTINUED RISE IN WORLD PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is there any reason for the continued substantial rise in the world price of sugar?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the world price of sugar is influenced by a number of factors. One is the buying habits of the public. Another is that there was a short crop last year. There has been very heavy buying, particularly in France and England, abnormally heavy, and there is some talk of a present shortage of sugar in England. We have studied the matter, and as far as we can judge the situation the production and the supply of sugar are about in balance. We also think that there will be an adjustment of the price when the buying at abnormal rates comes to an end. But at the moment we think the world price is being governed by abnormal demand in certain countries and the short crop.

HOUSING

REPORTED SIGNIFICANT DECLINE IN RESIDENTIAL BUILDING THIS YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, and I apologize for not having sent him a little more notice. In view of the fact that this is the time of the year when the construction industry is organizing and planning for the year ahead, would the minister be able to elaborate or comment or give some word of encouragement in regard to the gloomy prediction of his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), on December 27 that there is likely to be a significant decline in residential building this year?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree that the prediction of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was gloomy. He said there would probably be some decline in house building in 1957 as compared with the record performance of 1956 and the preceding year. The only comment I can make is that as far as I am concerned the remarks of my colleague were accurate, as they always are—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winters: —but that nevertheless there will be a high record of house building in 1957.

[Later:]

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works arising out of the answer he gave to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). Would he not consider the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to the effect that, of all the major investment sectors, residential building—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ellis: —is the only one likely to show a significant decline, is a gloomy and pessimistic statement?

Mr. Gauthier (Nickel Belt): He shoots, he scores.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, when you consider that during the last two years over one-quarter of a million houses were built in Canada, and when the Minister of Trade and Commerce says there might be some decline this year but nevertheless there still will be a high level of house building activity in Canada, I do not think that is a gloomy statement.

Mr. Ellis: Well, Mr. Speaker, this statement makes one specific reference to residential construction. In other words, out of all the construction going on in Canada only residential construction is likely to show a significant decline in the coming year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

IMMIGRATION

C. G. HANNA—REASON FOR REFUSAL TO ADMIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill). Was permission to enter Canada recently refused to one C. G. Hanna at a west coast port? If so, on what grounds?

Would the minister also advise as to the present whereabouts and status of that unfortunate individual?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I wonder if I might have Your Honour's permission to answer this question notwithstanding a ruling you made at a previous session that you would not permit questions about individual immigration cases.

There has been a most extraordinary amount of publicity about the case of this unfortunate young man and I think perhaps hon. members would like to be in possession of the real facts.

He has on three different occasions appeared on a merchant ship at a Canadian port. He is in no way admissible to Canada under the Immigration Act and in fact at least four or five different provisions of the act would have to be set aside if he were to be admitted to this country. In view of the fact that he had no connection with anyone in this country, that he was on the ship of a highly civilized country and there were no doubt other places in the world where it would be possible for him to go, it did not seem to me it would be a proper thing for me to disregard the law enacted by this parliament and to seek by some back-door method to get around the law which was made by this parliament.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have been approached by people in my constituency who I suppose may be described by saying they believe in broad humanitarian principles rather than in technical rules at all times. I would like to ask the minister whether he thinks it possible to consider this situation on its merits and see whether a case can be made rather than to deal with it in a purely legalistic manner. It seems to me this young man might spend his life on freighters.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, sir, as to where this young man may spend his life, I think it is very unlikely that he would spend any great part of it in any one place because, having read his own life story as told by himself in the Toronto Star, I gather he seems to have made rather a habit of moving about from one place to another.

I think the case has been considered on such merits as we were able to find in the case and I am afraid that compared with a great number of other cases, often very tragic cases, of persons closely related to Canadian citizens, whom on account of the law that was enacted by this parliament it is not possible for me to agree to admit to this country, I would certainly not consider, on any kind of merits that it has been possible for me to discern, that it would be proper to ask to have an exception made in this case.

Mr. Pearkes: Could the minister say whether this man has actually left the west coast now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, he has not landed in Canada during this voyage. I have no guarantee that my information is accurate but I was told the ship he is on at the present time is going to sail on either the 12th or the 15th, I am not sure which, from whatever port it is at on the west coast, either Victoria or Vancouver, I am not sure.

Mr. Pearkes: Victoria, I think.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POSITION OF EMPLOYEES RELIEF AND INSURANCE ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister say what is the present status of the Canadian government railway employees' relief and insurance association? Has the action which was taken toward the end of December, that is the reinstatement of the deduction plan for insurance benefits, meant that the association is recognized in all its aspects, or is it merely on the insurance basis? This is a matter of some urgency to the employees concerned.

Hon George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I can say at the moment is that I know the matter has been under consideration but I shall have to make inquiries of the management in order to answer the hon. lady's question more specifically.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

YEMEN—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can give us the facts with regard to the situation in Yemen, and particularly whether there is any foundation for the accusations being made by the Yemenese against the British?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot give the facts. We have tried to ascertain them. The hon. gentleman does know that the allegations made by the Yemen government have been denied by the United Kingdom government and I think we should accept that denial. I understand the matter is being referred to the United Nations where we will probably hear more about it. In the meantime I shall try to ascertain what facts I can.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO FILLING OF VACANCY ON CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State. Will the Secretary of State state what progress has been made toward filling the vacancy on the civil service commission which has existed for a year and a half?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): The only thing I can say in answer to the question is that the appointment will be made in due course and will be announced by the government.

Mrs. Fairclough: How many years?

SHIPPING

COASTAL TRADE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if he can tell the house what is the situation with respect to the report of the royal commission on the coastal trade and whether parliament will likely have an opportunity to act upon that report at this session?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to say when the report will be brought down and because of that fact I am unable to answer the second part of the hon. member's question.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Robert Cauchon (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) who has most ably moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Translation):

Also, Mr. Speaker, my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) for having carried out his task equally well when seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

At the time of the great fire in the town of Salaberry of Valleyfield, on December 30, last, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) sent a message of sympathy to the families who had lost their homes. On their behalf and also speaking for myself, I want to express our sincere appreciation to him. It is comforting to realize the spirit of good-will that is shown in such circumstances, for without the heroic efforts of our firemen and of those who volunteered to help in one way or another, our town would certainly have had to deplore a much larger misfortune.

(Text):

As in speeches of former sessions, Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne has expressed the Liberal government's policy of promoting social welfare and economic development and of effecting the continuance of the prosperity our country has enjoyed under the wise guidance of its capable Liberal leaders. An outstanding example of this guidance applied internationally was the plan submitted to the United Nations by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) at a time when that body was, I would say, nearly paralysed by war in the Middle East and Hungary. As one Canadian newspaperman said, "This week Canadians at the United Nations in New York have good reason to be proud to be Canadians." Never, Mr. Speaker, was constructive leadership more needed than at that moment and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his Canadian delegation gave that leadership.

Although the opposition may refuse to our administrators the credit so justly theirs, it cannot deny that Canada has had prosperity; nor can it deny that foresight, good administration and sound financing have resulted in unprecedented progress within the last two decades. What is more, steps have been taken to assure Canada's continued prosperity. Think, Mr. Speaker, of the two great projects now under way, one to give the west eastern markets for its great resources of natural gas, the other to develop the great hydro power resources of the east and at the same time to give the lakehead direct access to the Atlantic seaboard.

These gigantic undertakings, together with the ever increasing amity among Canadians of different national origins, have served to convince all Canadians that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has done more to unite, both tangibly and intangibly, the people and the geographical units of this vast country than has any other Canadian. In the annals of of Canada I am sure he will be accorded that honour for all time.

In justice too, I must pay a well merited tribute to our Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) who has so skilfully led the house in its deliberations and the country through a time of dangerous inflationary trends. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and other ministers have also, with courage and fortitude in the face of determined opposition, taken measures to assure Canada's economic development.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, one immediately thinks of the Hon. Lionel Chevrier and the seaway authority. In April, 1951, I spoke to him of my constituency's interest in the work to be undertaken and voiced our objections to lift bridges at St. Louis de Gonzague, on Larocque road and at Melocheville where increasingly heavy traffic would be dangerously impeded. At that time he promised to study the matter and, Mr. Speaker, as a result I was pleased to be able to announce last year that we could be assured of a tunnel at Melocheville. I hope also to be able to announce that something will be done at the other two points. On behalf of my riding of Beauharnois-Salaberry I wish to thank the Hon. Mr. Chevrier and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler).

That part of Quebec which I have the honour to represent now has, as I have formerly intimated, unrivalled industrial sites. The tremendous combined navigation-power project now under construction together with power now available, a skilled reliable labour force, a productive countryside, almost unlimited water supplies and an excellent situation in respect to markets should be most attractive both to light and heavy industries seeking new sites or working out plans for decentralization.

My foregoing remarks were preliminary to the introduction of a subject that has been of sincere concern to me for some years, that is, the practice of discrimination against the older but employable worker. Though I have no intention of reiterating the facts I presented in 1951, I feel it my duty to say that this discrimination continues and seeks justification for the same reasons as then. Proof of my assertion may be found in the advertisements of our daily newspapers.

We must concede that evolution of a population through the complex stages of its economic development and the continuing industrial revolution with the resultant increase in automation give rise to many difficult problems, but problems nonetheless necessary of resolution.

Then too we must accept the idea that a nation's progress depends upon (1) higher production with a corresponding rise in living standards for all and (2) new outlets for the investment capital which provides new jobs and skills not only for the young but for those still employable who have been thrown out of work by changed production methods or similar causes.

All workers should and must share equally in job opportunities created by our present economic growth. Canada's citizens, even those 41 to 60, should have equal opportunities in its labour markets; that is, of course, if age is not a bona fide occupational limitation. Both government and private enterprise, therefore, have the task of anticipating and resolving problems arising from this continuing evolution, especially problems pertaining to the unemployment of any section of Canadian labour.

Because I have kept myself well informed regarding the employment situation in my own industrial community, it is clear to me that workers over 40 are most frequently the sufferers when production methods change. Consequently I have followed closely the attempts of various governments to check discrimination because of age. Recently I have read "New Channels for the Golden Years", a document issued by the New York state joint legislative committee on problems of the aging, under the chairmanship of Senator Thomas Desmond. Among the recommendations made on page 7 of the report there are two of particular interest. They are:

That the state encourage industry to establish vested pension plans and move in that direction itself in connection with the state retirement system.

That the state recognize the greater difficulty older persons have in finding jobs by providing an unemployment insurance differential for those over 40.

On page 10 the advantages of a vested pension plan are thus described:

Our committee believes that vested pension plans hold forth promise of

(a) increasing likelihood of employers hiring workers at ages 55, 60 and over;

(b) preventing indigency in later life resulting from workers changing employment in firms which grant pensions only after lengthy service;

(c) reducing pressure on government to take drastic action such as adopting an old age pension act.

The British national advisory committee on employment of older men and women after studying the problem also has emphasized the need of "preserving pension rights on change of employment." The committee later in the report makes a recommendation that the state expand its anti-discrimination law to include age, as does that of the state of Massachusetts. Moreover, the following recommendation is also made as found on page 23 of the same report:

To give further emphasis to our belief that the state should move to end discriminatory practices in employment of the 40-plus, we recommend:

That the state should bar any company from bidding on state construction, equipment, service or other contracts if it discriminates against the 40-plus;

The burden and stigma placed on our free enterprise system by the crude, raw, unscientific policy of banning the employment of the 40-plus by modern industry, particularly big industries, and especially new industries, warrants society, through its elective officials, in taking steps effectively to prevent such personnel policies.

To the contention, "But it costs industry more money to hire the 40-plus", we reply, "These are costs industry and society must bear".

If the cost of employment of the 40-plus is increased prices, we need to add that to our costs, just as we have added to the cost of production the cost of sanitary, safe factories, social security taxes, shorter work week.

However, we have seen no evidence that hiring the 40-plus will increase the cost of production. We have seen figures indicating that workmen's compensation costs rise, but these have been disproved.

We have seen figures that group insurance costs rise, but these do not appear significant.

We have seen figures that pension costs rise when the 40-plus are hired, but we have not seen them balanced against any compensating figures reflecting lower absenteeism, the greater loyalty, the greater stability, the lower turnover rate, the increased know-how of the older worker.

Nor have we seen what the cost to industry would be if vested pensions were adopted so that the employer hiring a man at 55 would not have to feel he had to provide "a suitable pension" for him at 65, but only a 10-year pension.

I was also interested to see by the 1955 report of the International Labour Organization that the state of Massachusetts had almost eliminated all discrimination in employment practices, including that against age.

In order to learn more about the Massachusetts law I went to Boston last spring to gather at first hand information from the officers of the commission.

It might be well at this point to summarize briefly the Massachusetts Fair Employment Practice Act and its amendment, sponsored by the American Federation of Labour, to include age. Age is defined as being between 45 and 65.

Every employer, employment agency and labour union subject to the provisions of the law must post it conspicuously on its premises. Those not subject are employers with fewer than six persons, clubs, et cetera not organized for private profit, domestic servants, and those employed in family businesses. The law reads as follows:

No person shall be denied the right to work because of race, colour, religious creed, national origin, age or ancestry.

In respect to age, it is illegal for employers or employment agencies to: (1) ask questions before employment which directly or indirectly disclose age; (2) to print or circulate advertisements which directly or indirectly specify limitation because of age, unless that limitation is based upon a bona fide occupational qualification; (3) in case of employers to discharge or refuse to hire an individual because of age; (4) to act unfairly against an individual in matters relating to compensation, terms of employment et cetera because of age.

Labour organizations and groups of employees are forbidden to exclude from membership or to resist employment of such persons.

Moreover—and this is important—the law has been interpreted to apply even if a company had, prior to its passing, adopted a retirement or pension plan calling for the retirement of persons between those ages, 45-65.

The commission seeks to gain compliance with the law by means of conference, conciliation and persuasion. A commissioner is assigned to investigate each complaint. Only once has a public hearing of a case been necessary. Public acceptance of the law has been due principally to the educational program initiated by the commission which arranges conferences with groups affected in various communities. In addition, surveys of the industrial communities are made by small committees of their own citizens, serving without remuneration. These acquaint the commission with problems peculiar to each locality. The surveys also tend to arouse interest and to enlist the co-operation of those affected by the law.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I might say that Pennsylvania has also enacted a similar statute.

As a result of my study of this question, I would make the following recommendations:

1. That the Department of Labour should begin a study of the Massachusetts commission against discrimination with a view to setting up a similar commission in Canada.

2. That the department should also consider amending the national Unemployment Insurance Act to enable the worker to change employment without loss of his rights in a pension plan.

Possibly pension stamps could be affixed to the workers' unemployment insurance books together with the unemployment insurance stamps. Whatever system is adopted, it should effectively protect the senior members of our society from discrimination and assure them of pension upon their retirement.

We cannot permit industry to make a unilateral decision to oust or to exclude middle-aged workers from jobs. Jobs can, in some cases, be adapted to the workers; in others, the workers can be trained for new jobs.

It is the inherent duty of each Canadian to discharge the responsibilities of citizenship. It is equally the right of each Canadian to contribute to and share in his country's progress and prosperity. I believe it is industry's and government's joint responsibility, in recognition of the innate dignity of the human soul, to provide employment for each worker during the years he is employable and to assure him of a pension sufficient to free him from want in his old age.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, as the first speaker of the Conservative party to follow our new leader I wish formally for the record of this house to congratulate him on his new position and naturally, without any reservation, to wish him all the success in the world. The last two days here and outside the house have certainly shown that his fine qualities and capabilities will now be made known to all in this country. I want to say also that we extend to our retired leader the best wishes for complete restoration in the future of that good health that he knew formerly. I wish to congratulate too, Mr. Speaker, the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. There were remarks made by both these hon. members which I thought were very fair. They called attention to some of the problems I have in my own constituency.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), in speaking of the city of Edmonton, said that they were indeed fortunate to have such fine prosperity and growth in that area. It was my pleasure to be in Edmonton a few weeks ago and I can say that is true. I commend him for further suggesting in this regard that perhaps their problems were not as great as those of some other areas.

The seconder, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), who is from my home province of New Brunswick, suggested that there is a new optimism in our province which has replaced the old pessimism. I agree with him. I commend him also for having received that new spirit.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not point out some of the difficulties that still exist in the Saint John area, in the province of New Brunswick and also in the maritime provinces. I do not wish to be thought pessimistic, but these are problems that have of late taken serious and grave form. At the outset, I want to say that these problems which I will mention are economic and geographic in nature; that is agreed. However, I would suggest, in the second place, that there is a grave federal responsibility in each of these serious problems—perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it could be better described as a lack of federal responsibility for these ills that are creeping into our economic life in an area that is not quite as fortunate as the area mentioned by the mover of the address yesterday.

Our sad story begins about one year ago when we had a serious strike at the Atlantic sugar refinery in Saint John. There were 700 men out of work and 16 working days were lost. It was a wage dispute and was settled at Christmas of 1955. I am not taking sides in the matter. I only want to point out what was stated by management at that time, and I do not think it has been seriously disputed by anybody connected with that matter. It was stated that two problems exist for an industry in such an area as the maritimes. They were out of the immediate marketing area for their product and the difficulties with respect to their competitors were greatly increased. Secondly, there was the problem which a new survey had shown would be felt when the St. Lawrence seaway was opened.

Next, we had a strike during the same period on the Princess Helene, the C.P.R. vessel which connects Saint John and western Nova Scotia at Digby. There were 80 days lost. The strike ended in December 1955 and it was later settled in the spring of last year when wage talks resumed after the vessel returned to service. Again the problem there was one of economics and geography. The strike, to a large degree, was managed by a gentleman who is well known to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and others in this house by the name of Hal Banks. Direction for that strike,—again I am not taking sides, but I am simply trying to point out the position in which we were and how it was misunderstood—came from Montreal by telephone and the strikers did not even know when they should begin the strike. This was the first waterfront strike we had had since the seamen's union of 1949, but it was felt by all in the community of New Brunswick and also in Nova Scotia.

The third serious situation, Mr. Speaker, came to a head on November 14 of this past year when a public meeting was held in Saint John with respect to the very serious lay-offs at the Saint John drydock, our important shipbuilding industry. I think perhaps I could best explain this by reading a resolution that was passed at that time and agreed upon by all concerned who were attending that meeting.

Whereas the Saint John dry dock is one of the most important sources of employment and purchasing power in the Saint John area:

And whereas employment at the dry dock is at a very low level with only some 300 employees as against more than 900 a year ago and a full employment level of more than 1,500:

And whereas the present situation represents a weekly payroll decline of more than $40,000 in comparison with last year;

And whereas this condition severely affects many other industries and commercial establishments in Saint John;

Therefore be it resolved:

That an appeal be directed to the proper authorities, civic, provincial, and federal, that special arrangements be made forthwith to place with the dry dock contracts which will ensure a higher level of employment and so relieve a most difficult situation for the employees and which will also aid in improving the purchasing power of the community of greater Saint John.

I do not wish to go into the details of that situation which has already been brought to the attention of the house, but I simply want to say that at that meeting it was brought out, and agreed by all concerned, that one of the main difficulties was a $3.50 freight differential with the various other competitors of this shipbuilding industry in Canada. We also know that the related problem of a Canadian merchant navy is connected with it. However, I do want to mention one aspect of this meeting which calls attention, I hope, to the problem I am pressing here today of the lack of federal responsibility. I refer to a telegram that was sent by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) to that gathering when he had been asked to attend or send a nominee. This is a telegram from the Hon. George C. Marler, addressed to the secretary-treasurer of local No. 3, Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers:

Regret that I am unable personally to attend meeting Saint John Wednesday, November 14 and do not think any useful purpose would be served by sending representative of my department. The Canadian maritime commission is fully aware of the situation at Saint John dry dock and is making every effort to see whether it is possible to find some work which could be allocated to it.

George Marler

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, the workers who were finding it hard to make ends meet were not too pleased with this telegram. However, I do not wish to be hard on the Minister of Transport at the present time because he has shown interest in Saint John, and he has made two or three trips there since taking his position.

I now come to the most important and gravest aspect of our problem, namely, the present C.P.R. strike. I think the difficulties of the community of Saint John are well known to the nation at the present time. The strike was a double blow to our community because we also have shipping as well as railway facilities to consider. In addition, thousands of refugees were coming to our shores and they further congested the efforts that we were making to use the small Canadian National Railway facilities there. Seven daily freight trains had to be laid off. The C.P.R. employees, who number nearly 2,000, are all out of work as a result of the strike, and over 2,000 longshoremen are being thrown out of work at the present time because of ship diversions at the height of our very busy winter port season. Extra staff has been taken on at our unemployment insurance office. It is a serious blow that we have received, and it recalls to our minds the situation 35 or 40 years ago when we also had similar difficulties. Perhaps an indication of the seriousness of it, if any further word needs to be given, is the fact that prayers have been said in churches to help relieve the hardship which has resulted.

This is a permanent money loss to our city. It is not just the case of the $50,000 a day that we shall be losing. It is a fact that we can never recover this business and this money which we so sorely need. The longshoremen in our area live on credit from one season to the next. They have a busy peak season, and when ships are lost to other ports and when we know that the backlog cannot be caught up until the St. Lawrence opens we realize it is a permanent blow. In this connection, I have telegrams from the mayors of the city of Saint John and the city of Lancaster which explain the declaration that was made by both of their common councils with respect to the C.P.R. strike, and which state formally that an emergency condition existed in both of those cities. I will not put these on the record, Mr. Speaker, but I also just received a telegram explaining the seriousness of the strike in western Nova Scotia. This telegram was received from the affiliated boards of trade in the Annapolis valley, which was a joint effort, and probably speaks for the whole of the western Nova Scotia communities. This is the story of this serious strike. I have dealt with it from the local aspect. Then we can go on to the provincial aspect of it. I could probably refer to any area of the province, but surely we would be entitled to go to the constituency of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) who knows what some of these difficulties are with regard to layoffs and some of the other problems which I have mentioned.

We remember the serious layoffs that resulted two or three years ago from the shutdown of the cotton mill in Marysville; we remember some of the efforts that were made, but we also remember the lack of consideration that the federal government gave to this serious problem of ours. The Minister of Labour probably is not happy today when he knows that in the town of McAdam in his constituency over 92 per cent of the 3,000 inhabitants are completely dependent on the C.P.R. payroll. He cannot be happy about that. I am not taking the time now to refer to other problems; I am simply saying that this strike is affecting the entire province of New Brunswick.

Then we come to the maritime aspect of this problem. I have mentioned some of the local difficulties we have had; I have mentioned some of the provincial difficulties, and I now wish to refer to one of the serious problems that we have faced in the maritimes because of the hard money policy of the Bank of Canada and of this government. The best way that it can be explained, probably, is to refer to a statement that one of our people made at the time when he said that there is a family of 10 children and one of the children of that family happens to be taken ill. The present government gives the whole 10 children a dose of castor oil. We are of the opinion in the maritimes that we have never known inflation, and various statistics which have been given here and which will be given later will prove that. We object very strongly to this hard money policy which cripples us much more than it cripples some of the other expanding areas of this country. Our premier has objected strongly to this policy. He has made approaches to the Prime Minister and little attention has been given to it by this government. We do have that on the record.

I also wish to refer to the present upward revision of freight rates. For the first time in the history of the Atlantic provinces the four premiers, two Conservative now and two Liberal, got together and gave a joint statement of objection to the new increase in freight rates. This is a serious problem. It is one that we feel very strongly. The old benefits of the Maritime Freight Rates Act are no longer helpful to us, and those horizontal increases are making it extremely difficult for us to compete in the central Canadian markets. It is another example of the economic difficulty we have, and which is recognized but which also bears a lack of federal interest.

I refer to another recent announcement, Mr. Speaker, which was made when the statistics of the Department of National Revenue were given at the end of 1956 dealing with the incomes of 56 Canadian cities. We noted that Halifax was in 46th position, Moncton 47th and Saint John 51st. This is another indication of the economic difficulties of the maritime provinces.

Then we also remember the story of the election in Nova Scotia and I imagine this matter will be given better treatment by those who know more about it. However, we remember the story of the former premier's last desperate despondent attempt to avoid the inevitable defeat which he saw coming. He came here to Ottawa to see the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) ostensibly on behalf of all the maritime premiers but he really came here to see if something could be done not only in order to save the Liberal party in Nova Scotia but to try and do something for the entire region. At that time the Prime Minister was quoted as saying to the then premier of Nova Scotia:

> The making of direct expenditures toward the improvement of the economy of a particular area by the federal government would be justifiable if it were felt that the indirect results of such expenditure would develop the economy of Canada as a whole.

The Prime Minister was reported as saying this in the Daily Gleaner on September 6, 1956.

Well, Mr. Speaker, needless to say nothing was done about that and the Liberal government went down to bitter defeat in Nova Scotia. In that same connection we remember a statement the Prime Minister made at the labour convention which I think was held in April of last year, a statement that has often been referred to in this house, to the effect that initiative should come from the people in the maritimes. We took that statement at its face value in an honest way because most maritimers are honest and we then proceeded to make our proposals and many were made.

One proposal which we have been making in New Brunswick for many years concerns power development. The Beechwood project has been brought here in a non-partisan way together with the complete facts, our proposals and our formulas, and nothing has been done about it.

I can think of several ways in which the Prime Minister could have taken action if the statements he made at the labour convention and to the former premier of Nova Scotia were true. I can think of a complete new revision of our freight rates; I can think of a further interest on the part of the federal government in fostering traffic through our maritime ports. Protected and subsidized industries in Canada still continue to use United States ports for a great deal of their export and import business. These are but a few of the ways in which the Prime Minister could bring about the intention of his words.

At the same time, however, we should be fair enough to recognize that in the throne speech this year there is mention of a proposed plan to assist in the solution of our agricultural problems. If it is successful the committee of the Senate will deal with and consider the better use of land for agriculture to contribute more effectively to the improvement of agricultural production and the income of those engaged in it.

The Prime Minister referred to the problems of the farmers in Quebec and these are similar to the problems facing the farmers in New Brunswick and other parts of the maritimes. The government is finally making an effort to do something concerning these problems which have been brought to the attention of this house time and time again. Of course it is late and it comes just before the election but I suppose we must put in some kind words here concerning the fact that the government is considering this matter.

The Prime Minister mentioned, and rightly so, some of the problems which exist in Quebec. We have many French speaking Canadians in the province of New Brunswick; they constitute nearly 50 per cent of our population. I suppose they will benefit from the farming improvements that might be made and they will also benefit from any interest the Prime Minister and others take in their particular problems. I might point out, however, that we have other specific problems in this country many of which exist in the maritimes. I am merely saying that we should have from this government action that will bear out the intention of the words that have been spoken by the Prime Minister and others on many occasions.

I have mentioned the local problems in Saint John, I have mentioned the provincial problems that exist in the maritimes, and I have mentioned problems from a strictly maritime standpoint. I recognize that peculiar economic and geographic difficulties exist but I suggest there has been a lack of federal responsibility in these matters.

Probably the most important problem confronting us and requiring immediate attention is the strike. I have tried to deal fairly with it from a strictly local aspect. In the light of what has been said inside and outside of this house, in the light of the meeting that was held yesterday between the president of the C.P.R. and the Prime Minister, in the light of the meetings that have been held with the union and in the light of the indications the Prime Minister mentioned both yesterday and today that a solution will soon be forthcoming, I now ask the Prime Minister to come out and let us have the solution. It is there; they know what the plan is and what the answer must be. Let us have it. My people in Saint John want the strike settled. It has been suggested there is a solution that will soon be forthcoming. Is it coming this afternoon, tomorrow or the next day? Is the government waiting around with it so that they can be big heroes and produce a solution after everybody is thoroughly fed up and then the Canadian people generally will commend the government? I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the Canadian people will give the government any commendation in this case. We want that strike settled from the Saint John point of view at least and if the government has a plan we want it right now.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): What is your solution?

Mr. Bell: Over the Christmas holidays I began reading a book concerning a gentleman who appeals to me very much. The book is entitled Man and Power and it was written by Lord Beaverbrook. It is a most interesting book written in Lord Beaverbrook's inimitable fashion and in it he refers to a very fine character by the name of Herbert Asquith who was prime minister of Great Britain up to 1916 when he was succeeded by Lloyd George. Lord Asquith was a liberal in the tradition of liberalism as we knew it then. A splendid parliamentarian, he advocated fine liberal policies and in spite of his contribution he was accused of being a person who waited to see. In the words of Lord Beaverbrook, he was accused of being "mild and ineffective in serious crises. He was lulled into a sense of false security." Mr. Speaker, I hope there is not a parallel that can be drawn between that Liberal prime minister and a certain other liberal prime minister.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking but I wonder if I could ask him a question.

Mr. Bell: Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I would like the hon. member to tell us, if he would, what he would suggest as a solution to the railway strike.

Mr. Bell: The resignation of this government would be the best one, but I stated that we only wanted the Prime Minister to bring out his plan for a solution which he now has in his vest pocket.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Wrong bell again.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): May I ask the hon. member what is his plan for a solution to this problem?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) on their splendid speeches in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

In the next few minutes I hope to place before hon. members mostly items of interest in my own riding, leaving world affairs to others so much better versed in such matters.

I would like at this time to say to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) that although competition between the ports of Saint John and Halifax is always very keen it is always friendly and while we in Halifax are benefitting at the present time and Saint John is losing we wish to say to the hon. member we get no glory out of such increases in business and we join with him in hoping the strike may be ended very soon.

On Tuesday my colleague and I attended the unveiling ceremony of the monument to honour the memory of a great Canadian, the late Sir Robert Borden, a former distinguished prime minister of Canada, who served his country through the critical and anxious years of the first world war and represented Halifax honourably and ably from 1896 to 1904 and again from 1908 to 1917. It is only meet and right that we should honour our great men, for a wise nation preserves its records and remembers the sacrifices and glories of the past.

As the year 1957 opens, we have in Canada a situation of extraordinary buoyancy. Few Canadians are suffering because of broad economic or business problems. There are situations, as there always will be, where an individual or an industry is affected unfavourably, but on the whole Canadians find themselves in a fortunate economic position. The province of Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces have participated in this general growth and expansion and a spirit of optimism prevails generally and we are very much gratified over this situation.

What is far more important at the moment and of greater significance for the future is the practical and tangible recognition by the government of Canada of the disparity in economic circumstances as between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada. This recognition has taken the form of imaginative measures which in some cases represent extensions of established policies and in others represent an altogether new approach.

We were all pleased with the announcement made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) concerning the government's intention to spend an extra $270,000 in its 1957 tourist promotion budget for the specific purpose of encouraging more vacational travel in the Atlantic provinces. This in addition to the Bluenose service between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor, this ship having been constructed through the co-operation of the government of the province, will give a boost to the tourist trade in Nova Scotia.

Another forward step is the acquisition of the Grand Pré park which I believe is to be operated as a federal park.

A further step in the development of our fisheries is indicated by the recent announcement of an extension of the subsidy to provide for loans for the larger vessels. To parallel this assistance to the larger operators I think the development program for the inshore fishermen should be stepped up. To put this suggestion in concrete form and based on the experience in my own constituency, I think the need for federally assisted bait freezers and cold storage facilities for Halifax east and west should be examined. If there is a need for additional facilities which would assist in the sound economic development of our fisheries resources, let us make every reasonable effort to encourage sound growth.

On December 30 a terrific wind storm struck Nova Scotia wrecking great numbers of fishing boats and lobster traps. I have had many letters from fishermen who have suffered to an extent far beyond their means of recuperation. They have asked for assistance in becoming rehabilitated. I appreciate that this is probably not within the scope of the federal authority but I would ask that our fisheries inspectors and officers do everything they possibly can to assist and that the federal government draw to the attention of the proper provincial authorities the necessity of a close survey and the urgent need of financial assistance.

On previous occasions in this house I have expressed regret at the relative lack of impact on the Atlantic provinces of the industrial development bank. This was evident from the small proportion of total loans going to firms in those provinces. I was delighted at the decision to open a branch of the bank to serve the Atlantic region. I know from the bank's operations, even since June of last year, that its facilities are being more widely used. The reports indicate a very satisfactory public reaction to the administration of the affairs of the bank in Halifax. Perhaps as experience within the present policy develops there may emerge a broad program of development going beyond the existing program which would involve detailed planning on a broad basis.

While on the subject I should like to make a comment on the volume of foreign investment in Canada, particularly United States capital. I know of no community or township which would not welcome a new factory or new resources development, whether financed by Canadian, United States, or funds of other nationalities. Efforts are being made now by provincial and local officials to interest United States or other financial groups in our forest resources. We have an excellent working force, one that is second to none, and there is ample power, either at hand or available on short notice.

Another recent statement of interest to maritimers was the Prime Minister's (Mr. St. Laurent's) reference to an inquiry into the problem of land use and development in eastern Canada. I hope that a comprehensive inquiry will include an examination of soil conservation and flood control to include fresh water areas. There is one area in Halifax county, the Musquodoboits, which has a well established farming and lumbering economy which could benefit greatly from a properly conceived plan and managed flood control. Opportunities for development would then be much greater and more numerous if there were proper conservation and flood control.

While on this subject I should like to emphasize that these forward moves are not falling on barren ground. The Atlantic provinces jointly and severally are eager to do their parts as individuals, as companies, as associations, as communities or as provinces in order to develop their opportunities. Thirty years ago the maritime board of trade and the three provincial governments joined forces to set up the maritimes transportation commission. The purpose was to have an agency whose sole job was to give service to maritimers on freight rate problems. The commission now also includes Newfoundland.

Two years ago, again at the instigation of the maritime provinces board of trade, the four provincial premiers presided, so to speak, at the birth of the Atlantic provinces economic council or, in short, APEC, an organization of businessmen dedicated to improving economic conditions in the Atlantic provinces. The spirit of co-operation has grown since then and with it enthusiasm for the promotional objects of this economic council.

With government, labour, agriculture and industry all working together, I feel that the four Atlantic provinces are on the march. We do not wish for any special treatment from Ottawa but we do want the opportunity to carry on and to have the Atlantic region live and prosper with the other parts of this great dominion.

In the consideration of broad national policies which takes place in the debate on the speech from the throne, we always find ourselves providing for one phase or another of our transportation problem. This is not surprising when you realize that transportation was one of the cornerstones of confederation and over the years has been a major preoccupation of government. It comes in many guises—railways, airlines, canals, ferries, port facilities and so on.

Today I want to speak about some matters in this field which though of a local and regional nature are nonetheless an important part of the national program. The first is the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Since 1927, when the act was passed, many changes have taken place. The benefits that were intended under the act have been reduced or whittled away by the effects of the so-called horizontal freight rate increases that have taken place since the war. Developments in other parts of Canada have contributed to this trend. Since the railways are not able to raise rates where intense truck and water competition exists, they must obtain their additional revenue where competition is less keen. So the pyramid grows. With the addition of the St. Lawrence seaway to the facilities of the central provinces their relative position will improve faster in comparison with other parts of Canada.

It is time then for another look and not only a look, Mr. Speaker, but a searching examination of the actual effects of the act as it now stands. Let me remind the house that this piece of legislation was not a special sop to an area because we happened to be less well off than other parts of Canada. The reduction in rates was based on a judgment of the amount of compensation required to make up for the circuitous route of the rail line, a route chosen for strategic purposes and reasons as opposed to the requirements of commerce.

This matter has been discussed in the house before by myself and other members from the east. It was brought to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) early last summer by the Hon. Mr. Hicks of Nova Scotia, speaking on behalf of the four Atlantic provinces. The royal commission on Canada's economic prospects has been asked to consider the problem and we await with interest their findings on this matter. I would emphasize that this is not a question to be argued before the board of transport commissioners. It is rather a matter of the highest government policy to be dealt with on the basis of thorough and expert examination of the whole transportation problem in the Atlantic provinces.

I would here commend also the improvement and increase in grain handling facilities at the port of Halifax. Substantial additions are also under way to the facilities on the Dartmouth side of the harbour. It is time now, in the over-all planning for port development, that more attention be paid to related projects which involve the town of Dartmouth and the municipality of the county of Halifax. Along the waterfront from Dartmouth to Eastern Passage there are major industrial and defence establishments. Imperial Oil Limited has just opened a modern refinery, double the capacity of the previous one, with an added investment of over $30 million. Irving Oil has added storage and wharf facilities. We have Fairey Aviation Limited, a progressive and well-managed aircraft organization, and the Shearwater naval base is also situated there. All the attendant traffic has been added to the demands of normal growth. This has created problems which cannot fairly be regarded as the sole responsibility of the local authorities. In the interests of assuring the best use of harbour facilities as well as making proper provision for defence, federal assistance in planning and financing additional road facilities is, I consider, warranted.

Further, in connection with the strategic position of Halifax, the necessity for road transport facilities in time of emergency should be considered. There is not much point in having expensive vehicles for transport if they can be quickly immobilized for lack of roads. I know that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) is anxious to see the trans-Canada highway a national asset. I suggest that defence considerations call for the extension of that highway from Truro to Halifax. I am led to believe by the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Purdy) that Truro is gaining so much in importance that it will eventually be the capital of Nova Scotia. This road from Truro to Halifax would be in addition to the road to Sydney.

In a growing country like Canada we can never stand still. We must always improve and go forward. There is immediate need for improvement of the Canadian National Railways facilities at the centre of maritime activity, Halifax. If the baggage and express operations are not the heart of the service, they are certainly the most obvious to the public. The freight office and yards in the north end of the city may affect more lives, but I am sure more of the public see and go through the old wooden structures which are an eyesore in a modern community and certainly cannot be a credit to an important organization like the C.N.R. Nor do they speak well for the efficiency of that great enterprise.

I might also make a suggestion at this point concerning the Nova Scotian hotel. It is a well known fact the Halifax hotels have a high occupancy rate and that accommodation is pitifully lacking. Undoubtedly this has a deterrent effect on general business and in particular the tourist business on which both federal and provincial governments are spending substantial sums to develop it. It seems to me that a relatively minor expenditure in terms of over-all investment by the C.N.R. could add much-needed rooms and conference facilities as well. With the overhead expenses carried by more patrons, it is most likely that such an addition would improve the operating cost picture as well. The need for facilities is well known. Why not move ahead now?

Before leaving this subject I want to refer briefly to the use made of Canadian ports by our manufacturers. Of course, coming from the east, naturally I am interested in the ports of Saint John and Halifax. I think this is important because it is a situation that can be controlled. By that I mean that with the transportation facilities which belong to the nation and which have been built largely at public expense and are available at comparable prices, it is to the advantage of all that shippers direct their cargoes via Canadian ports.

I should like to cite a few examples where the Canadian public has a right to expect a different situation. In 1955 84 per cent of exports of farm implements made in Canada passed through United States ports. Likewise, 60 per cent of the automobiles exported and 49 per cent of automobile parts went via United States ports. Other products, where a greater or lesser proportion was involved, are such things as rubber tires, whisky, leather and electrical apparatus. Without exception, these commodities have the benefit of protection in the form of tariffs.

In other words, the Canadian consumer has to pay more for each of these articles he wants in order to enable them to be manufactured in Canada. Is it not reasonable then to suppose that the automobile industry, for example, show its appreciation of the protection it receives by directing foreign shipments from their plants through Canadian ports?

I should like to refer again to what I consider the need for permanent headquarters buildings for the army and air force in Halifax. I am not going to enlarge on that matter but I shall barely mention it. These services are operating in temporary buildings for the most part, and although I must commend both for the "spic and span" appearance of their buildings, there is still something to be desired.

Last year in the house I expressed some views on the administration of the legislation concerning disability pensions. This forward step in our welfare program ought to have been received with general enthusiasm, but seldom has such a well-intentioned measure given me such concern.

Many people have complained of the rather rigid regulations and suggested a broader definition of total disability. This would doubtless solve many individual problems but it is not the whole answer. We must avoid putting a premium on being able to prove total disability, and the best way to do that is to provide an incentive for the individual to capitalize on any potential ability. This can be a broadly-conceived rehabilitation program which provides assistance and training for the people who are not totally and permanently disabled and for whom there is a chance of rehabilitation. An allowance should be paid for those people for whom there is some hope of rehabilitation, regardless of how meager that hope may be. Those who benefit from training and can make even a partial contribution to their own support will justify the program. This provision, with more flexibility in the general administration, would put the program where it should be.

Another measure in the field of social welfare which should be considered for revision is the Old Age Security Act. I believe it is time for an increase in the pensions paid to those over 70 and I suggest that another $10 per month be added. I realize that such an increase is in a sense contrary to the efforts of the government to curb inflation. However, I do not believe for a moment that the effect would be so serious as to outweigh the benefits. With a rising cost of living bearing so heavily on those who have not the capacity to increase their income to buy the necessities of life, we should be prepared to reconsider the needs of the aged. At the same time the assistance to the needy between 65 and 70 should also be boosted a similar amount. The inflationary impact on our economy would be more than offset or compensated for by the satisfaction in seeing these people happier in their last years.

In speaking of our social security, I should also like to suggest that there be reciprocity among commonwealth countries. We want an interchange of people. Especially do we want more immigrants from the United Kingdom. If we want to encourage this immigration we should be prepared to give such people the benefits of Canadian citizenship, namely the right to old age security without the limitation of 20-year residence. This could be done upon a reciprocal basis between Canada and the United Kingdom, and with other commonwealth countries which are willing to extend the same benefits.

There is another way in which the government can help to improve the position of the older age group and at the same time benefit the economy. This is in the application of its retirement policy. Automatic retirement at 65 does not make sense in the light of our present knowledge of the differing capacities of people at various ages. While it may not be quite true to say that you are as young as you feel, you can say that some feel and are much younger at 65 than others are at 55, and so on.

This is a situation in which the government should take the lead and not bring up the rear as it is doing at the present time. The employment policy of the civil service, and for that matter those who head up hourly-paid government employees, should be such as to utilize the services of people as long as they are willing and able to work. I know it is a great comfort to any civil servant—and to any politician for that matter—to have everything laid down by rule and regulation. Then when anyone comes along with a situation that calls for judgment, we can say that we have no discretion in the matter. However, that is a poor way in which to face up to the demands of a complicated society. Let us tackle these problems even though we are creating difficulties for ourselves. I am still convinced that it is better to be maligned and in the political wilderness and to have made a contribution to good government than to have overlooked problems for the sake of comfort and re-election.

I am asking at this time that all those hourly-paid and prevailing-rate employees who have reached the age of 65 or over, but under 70, and can do a day's work be retained in 1957. If necessary, have an independent commission or committee be the judge as to who is fit to continue.

On the employment practices of the government I have another matter to bring up. I refer to the practice of the civil service with regard to persons convicted of crimes. Here we are, as a government, spending substantial sums of money to train prisoners for jobs when they return to society. Our government spokesmen encourage such organizations as the John Howard Society to help in the rehabilitation of ex-prisoners. We ask private industry to employ people who have been convicted of crimes but have paid their penalties. We exhort private employers to give such people a chance to become useful members of society. How can the government expect the public to take seriously its exhortations on penal reform and rehabilitation? Common humanity would suggest to an employer that he give the unfortunate a "leg up" instead of driving him into the streets. Let us get out from behind some of these comfortable rules and require the exercise of judgment in the name of humanity.

There are many other matters with which I should like to deal but I will not do so at this time. I refer to such matters as the formation of an independent parole board in Canada, and not only one but three in different parts of Canada so that they will be available and handy. I should like to speak on the world health organization, but I shall leave that till later. I should certainly like to say something about the salacious literature which is so prevalent in Canada. I should also like to speak about the evil of the trading and bonus stamps which are so prevalent at the present time. On a later occasion I should like to speak on the expeditious and happy way in which the customs branch, the immigration branch, the Red Cross and volunteer workers handled the influx of Hungarian refugees at Halifax on every occasion.

I should like to mention now, and perhaps speak later on it, the matter of a suggested change whereby the dominion sales tax would be collected at the wholesale level instead of the manufacturer's level. I wonder who thought that one up! It is not in the spirit of the first tax collector in the world, namely Saint Matthew. He was far too humane and understanding even to think of such an imposition.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, let me preface my remarks by commenting briefly on the speech from the throne and its shortcomings. I agree with my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), in his remarks yesterday when he commented on the failure of the government at this time to announce, among other things, legislation to provide for a comprehensive health insurance scheme in Canada. I among other members had felt that this year, after some long period of time from 1919, the government would have seen fit to introduce such a scheme. The failure to do so at this time indicates a lack of sympathy on the part of the government with the aims of organized labour and with the aims of a great number of men throughout Canada who have over the years expressed their desire for a comprehensive health scheme. There are many other shortcomings at this time when the Canadian people are confronted with a great many economic difficulties.

We are faced now with runaway inflation—

Mr. Harris: Are we?

Mr. Ellis: —and a rapidly increasing cost of living. I might say to the Minister of Finance that over the years the Regina Leader-Post, a newspaper in my own constituency, has always given support to the Liberal party. Just a month ago this newspaper stated it now agreed inflation has reached runaway proportions. I suggest that when such a strong champion of the Liberal party as the Regina Leader-Post now comes to this conclusion, the government should take some action to prevent this rapidly increasing cost of living.

There have been other evidences of that, Mr. Speaker. There is the failure of the government, in view of the increasing cost of living, to provide decent old age pensions; the failure of the government to make provision for increases in war veterans allowances or to make provision for others in this country on fixed incomes who are victimized by this runaway inflation. I think these are things which all members of this house must sincerely regret.

This morning some questions were asked of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) concerning the housing program in this country. I am always amazed at the Minister of Public Works because he uses these terms "housing starts" and "housing completions" interchangeably. A year or so ago if he were asked a question about housing in Canada he would say that next year we are going to have so many starts. This year when he is asked a question about how many starts have been made, he is now talking about completions. He will not admit that, while it is true completions have been high owing to starts made previously, as a result of the fiscal policies of this government home construction is falling off. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) states in his year end review, to which reference was made this morning, that in the Canadian economy the one segment which will suffer a significant decline is the home construction industry, then the government should take heed of this warning and do something to accelerate the housing program in this country.

The figures showing the amount of homes being constructed must be viewed in connection with the natural increase in our population and the fact that there are many new Canadians being welcomed to our shores. There is no excuse for any falling off of home construction in this country. There is a tremendous backlog of housing needs which should be met. Hon. members will recall that during the short session I asked the Minister of Public Works whether, in view of the fact home construction starts were falling off—they are certainly falling off in my constituency and I fancy that is the general picture throughout Canada—the government might not be prepared to introduce some legislation to restore or to increase the number of homes being constructed in this country during the coming years. Of course, we get the answer again boasting of the number of completions which have been made and completely ignoring the fact that while a certain number of completions may have been made in the past year, the rate of home construction in Canada is falling off. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate the government is aware of these extremely important issues.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in a debate of this type we have some responsibility in bringing to the attention of the government the issues which we feel most important. I think that of all the immediate issues facing parliament at the present time, one of the most important is the suspension of rail operations on the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have this comment to make at the outset, that I can hardly conceive of any labour dispute which has occurred in Canada in recent years in which the general public has received so little information about one side of the case. I think it may be due to the fact that the public relations work of the railroad brotherhood has been a little weak and they have not been successful in getting their point of view across to the public. On the other hand, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has done a very good public relations job in getting across its side of the story.

We find newspaper editorials in which it is categorically stated that firemen helpers are not necessary; they take that as being the ultimate. On whose authority do they make this statement? It is made simply as a result of the submission made by the railroad company, without consideration to the excellent case put up by the railroad brotherhood. There have been comments made in the press and by the general public about the calling of this strike. There have been suggestions made that the rank and file membership of the brotherhood did not have a vote on this particular issue. These allegations completely ignore the fact that this matter was introduced almost a year ago.

It was on February 1 of last year that the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen approached the company to negotiate a new contract. After negotiations had commenced—as a matter of fact, after negotiations had been in progress for a week or so—the Canadian Pacific Railway injected the issue of the diesel rule. In other words when the two parties to the contract negotiations were sitting around the table discussing the issues which were negotiable, the railway company saw fit to inject an issue which is extremely important, an issue which affects not only the members of the brotherhood but the safety of all Canadians.

When the Canadian Pacific Railway Company submitted its proposal to eliminate firemen helpers from diesel engines in freight and yard service, identical proposals were submitted by Canadian National Railways and by some 140 railroads in the United States. The second point to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, is that later in the same year, as a matter of fact on November 20, the Canadian National Railways signed an agreement with the brotherhood as did the 140 railroads in the United States. When we state, therefore, that firemen are not necessary simply because Mr. Crump and the C.P.R. say so, then we must take into consideration the fact that the Canadian National Railways and 140 railways in the United States have seen fit to sign an agreement with the brotherhood providing for the retention of firemen helpers on diesels in freight and yard service. The question then arises, who is correct? Is the C.P.R. right and all the other railroads wrong? Is everybody out of step but the C.P.R.?

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Ellis: When the house rose at one o'clock I was discussing the effectiveness of the company's propaganda in creating a climate of public opinion favourable to the railway company in connection with the present dispute between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen. I pointed out that the Canadian public, on a technical matter of this kind, is perhaps not fully acquainted with all the details involved in the dispute and therefore is likely to be misled in any conclusions arrived at. I feel that the effectiveness of the railroad company's public relations campaign, coupled with the fact of having many friends in high places, indicates one of the reasons why many of the newspapers in Canada are able to editorialize and create very misleading impressions about the nature of this dispute. I am quite sure that in this dispute we are very much disappointed with the action, or lack of action, taken by the government. I should have thought that the government would have used its good offices to promote an orderly settlement and perhaps to have averted this unfortunate stoppage of work on the C.P.R. Above all, I should have thought that the official opposition would have fulfilled their proper function and would have submitted some practical alternative. It could not be an alternative because the government had not made its wishes known; but certainly it could have given some advice to the government on how best to deal with this particular matter. But I understand that the Prime Minister has had in the past very close association with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in his capacity as a corporation lawyer.

Moreover, I know that the leader of the official opposition has on numerous occasions gone to bat on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know that in the agricultural committee last year the Leader of the Opposition was very quick to jump to the defence of the C.P.R. and to describe that company as being made the scapegoat in connection with the distribution of box cars. Therefore, in the circumstances the reticence on the part of members of this house to seek to convey to the Canadian public the facts concerning this dispute is most regrettable. I have particular reference to a letter which was presumably drafted and sent to all employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company but which, in my judgment, was intended mainly to be used as a propaganda weapon directed against the general public. In that letter, a very plausible sounding letter, very well drafted and over the signature of the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, many misleading statements are made. Among the statements made by Mr. Crump is the one that there can be no dispute about firemen's wages or working conditions. The letter goes on to say:

> The conciliation board recommended wage increases totalling 12 per cent—the same as agreed on with other train service employees—and extra pay for six statutory holidays in yard service.

Of course, the thing we have to bear in mind today is that what the railway company is going to do is to negotiate with a group on the basis that that group would liquidate itself, so that any talk about wage increases, of course, begs the main question. As far as there being no dispute is concerned, I would draw your attention to the fact that when the union presented its proposals last February 1 they asked for a 25 per cent wage increase, so that there is a reasonable dispute in connection with wages, but the major issue, of course, involves the diesel question.

I think I should point out at this time, Mr. Speaker, that in the United States the railway companies have signed a 3-year agreement with members of the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen calling for a general wage increase amounting to some 26½ cents per hour. Therefore, I think I can rightly say there are many issues in dispute. But Mr. Crump points out that there is no dispute on those issues, and goes on to say:

> There can be no dispute about firemen in passenger service. Passenger trains will continue to have firemen. The company proposes to run diesels without firemen only in freight and yard service. This will be a gradual change.

That is not what the Canadian Pacific Railway asked for in their submissions to the union and in their submissions to the conciliation board. As a matter of fact, the C.P.R. asked for the elimination of agreements, rules, regulations, interpretations or practices, however established, which require the employment or use of firemen helpers on other than steam power, and establish a rule to provide that the company shall have the unrestricted right to determine when and if a fireman helper shall be used on other than steam power. In other words, the C.P.R. says, we are not asking for that; it is not involved in this dispute; but in their submission before the conciliation board they asked for unlimited powers. The reason the Canadian Pacific Railway Company claim that they are not asking for the removal of firemen from diesels in passenger service is not that they are concerned about the safety of the travelling public, but rather that in order to heat the passenger cars it is necessary to have someone in the cab to take care of the steam generator. Therefore, there is no guarantee whatsoever that the railroad company might not at some future date use the unlimited powers which they are seeking, if they are granted, to remove firemen helpers from the diesels on passenger service. Then, Mr. Crump goes on and says:

> There is no dispute about the jobs of any firemen who have worked three years or more. They will stay on as firemen until they become enginemen.

This sounds very good to the average person reading it. They might think these people are being well taken care of; but how on earth can you guarantee employment as firemen if there are no jobs as firemen? Anyone who knows anything about the operation of railroads knows very well that runs are obtained on the basis of seniority, and if the railroad company is going to dismiss a thousand or more firemen almost immediately, then the chances of firemen getting employment at their trade are practically negligible. The only employment they are likely to obtain will be on steam service for the time being until the line is completely dieselized. Other advancements, of course, will be made possible only through the death or retirement of existing locomotive engineers. Therefore, this is somewhat meaningless when examined very closely.

Then, in similar vein, Mr. Crump goes on to point out:

> Nor can there be any dispute about firemen with less than three years service. They are to get other jobs with Canadian Pacific and without loss of their seniority as firemen. If they desire to leave the service the company will pay them a cash allowance based on their length of service.

Here again this is entirely meaningless, because there will be no work for these men as firemen, and what is the use of seniority as firemen if there is no employment as firemen? I think these statements made by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company deserve some careful consideration by the people of Canada in order that justice might be done.

Then, the suggestion made by Mr. Crump that severance pay be granted is highly significant because, if firemen leave the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it will not be because they desire to change their employment; it will be because they are virtually forced out of employment since there are no jobs as firemen.

There are statements with regard to diesels in passenger service. They say that there is no dispute, but at the same time the railway company is proposing that the firemen left in their employment on diesels in passenger service shall take about a 35 per cent reduction in salary. In spite of that, the railway company says there is no dispute. There is a great deal of dispute on every one of those principles, and yet the railway company is using big advertisements in every daily newspaper across Canada to give the public a very misleading idea of the issues involved in this dispute. As a result of this letter the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is seeking to do two things. First of all, he is trying to create the impression that no fireman in the employ of the company will suffer as a result of the acceptance of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's decision. I think the comments I have made give the lie to that assertion.

Furthermore, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, through this letter, are trying to convey the impression that the board of conciliation came out solidly on their behalf. Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact that even in the majority report of the conciliation board, the board gave only conditional support to the position taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. As a matter of fact, in the summary of the conclusions arrived at by the conciliation board, they admit they have not considered this problem in its entirety. They state:

> The board has not undertaken to discuss and analyze all the evidence tendered in support of and against the company's proposal for a change in the "diesel rule", but it has taken all the evidence both pro and con into consideration and has examined all the exhibits and has weighed carefully the submissions and arguments of counsel for the brotherhood and for the railway.

In other words, they have admitted that they have made no study of the technical aspects of this particular problem. They have simply listened to the opposing arguments of counsel representing the brotherhood on the one hand and the railway company on the other, and they have arrived at their conditional decision on the basis of arguments pro and con.

The majority report goes on to say:

> The board's conclusion thus arrived at is that the company has established, in the main, its contention and accordingly we recommend that the company should be allowed to change the "diesel rule" which would allow it to operate locomotives in freight and yard service without a fireman in the cab upon the understanding, however, that if as a result of actual operating experience it appears that in some circumstances the services of the fireman (helper) might again be required, a modification of the rule might again be necessary and would then become the subject of further bargaining at a time when another agreement is being negotiated.

So that it gives conditional support. They said, "Let us try it out for a year and if it does not work out we will go back". If the safety factor is involved, is it not wiser to make sure there is no danger to the travelling public or to the employees of the railway company before making the change? Surely this is preferable to making the change and then waiting until there is a major train accident involving the loss of life and limb and personal property before the railway company recognizes the lack of wisdom in seeking to force this issue at the present time.

The majority report is by no means absolute in its support of the contentions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. And let us also consider the minority report. There is no more forthright denunciation of the proposals of the railway company than are contained in the report submitted by Senator Roebuck. In his minority report Senator Roebuck makes an excellent case on behalf of the people of Canada because there is more involved in this dispute than the question of the employment of a thousand odd firemen on the Canadian Pacific Railway. What is involved is the question of whether the railway company shall be permitted to take an action which will jeopardize the safety of the travelling public; that is the main issue.

In my own constituency my own children cross railway tracks on their way to school every day and this is true of many children in every city in Canada. Children being what they are they will play around switching yards. The railways are unable to fence off their property and ensure that the safety of pedestrian traffic and particularly children is protected and guaranteed at all times. I would hate to think of any children playing around railway yards where one side of the locomotives is blind, where there is no man on the left side of the locomotive. I believe this is something which should be of concern to each and every parent and citizen of this country.

If the railway proposal goes through and the second man is taken out of the cabs of locomotives in yard service going back and forth on to spare tracks it will be done only at the expense of jeopardizing the safety of the men, women and children who live in the vicinity of railway yards. Those are factors which the conciliation board admits it did not have the opportunity to examine in minute detail and that is the consideration the railway unions want to have examined in the minutest detail.

In examining the issues involved in this dispute I think one must consider the problem of the firemen themselves and the unsatisfactory assurances given by the railway company. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the majority report lays a certain amount of blame on the shoulders of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Concerning alternative employment for firemen the majority report at page 3 says:

> If the company had seen fit to accompany its proposal on the diesel issue with a concrete blueprint, spelling out in detail what provision it was willing to make for the 1,000 odd firemen who would be immediately cut off the payroll, and the not inconsiderable number of other firemen who would ultimately lose their employment if the company request were granted, the no compromise position which the union throughout maintained might have been at least in some respects relaxed or modified.

I think it is clear from what I have read that the majority report lays a great deal of the blame squarely on the shoulders of the railway company for not being more forthright and specific in its proposal to take care of the firemen who will be removed from employment, but as I have already indicated the major issue is the safety factor.

I can think of no better indication of the type of evidence presented before the conciliation board than that which can be gained by examining the type of witnesses who appeared before that board. Approximately 15 witnesses appeared on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway company and all of those people were executives. All but two of them were officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company primarily interested, of course, in safeguarding the interests of the shareholders of the company and inclined, of course, to place that consideration above all others. We know that as far as the union witnesses were concerned the brotherhoods brought in approximately 35 witnesses. Only two of their witnesses were foremen or men in supervisory work. All the other witnesses were men actually engaged in railroad operations including conductors, trainmen, brakemen and shop mechanics. All of these people gave evidence to the effect that in their opinion the removal of firemen from diesel locomotives could not be done without endangering the lives of both railroad employees and the general public.

It seems to me under that weight of evidence a strong case has been made for deferring any action on the question of the removal of firemen from diesel locomotives. It is also apparent to me that the locomotive engineers would perhaps have a more intimate knowledge of the role played by firemen and they have taken an unequivocal stand on this particular issue. They appeared before the conciliation board and pleaded with it to retain the firemen on diesel engines. Moreover, if you noticed the press report in one of the Toronto papers the other night you will be aware that the locomotive engineers in that city have stated categorically that irrespective of what might come of this dispute they are not prepared to take diesel locomotives out of the shops unless they are accompanied in the cab by a qualified fireman.

I believe that is a reasonable position for these men to take. They are the people best qualified to speak about the role played by firemen in diesel service. I think perhaps the terminology could be changed and firemen could better be described as co-engineers or assistant engineers. I think that is something which would go a long way toward eliminating some of the misunderstandings which presently exist.

It seems to me that we have to take into account the valued opinions of these people who are vitally concerned with railroad operations when coming to a conclusion on this broad issue. If everyone in Canada were in a position to read the excellent report submitted by Senator Roebuck the ground swell of public opinion would certainly be solidly behind the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen. In that report Senator Roebuck makes it quite clear that in the interests of the safety of the travelling public and the railway employees themselves it is absolutely necessary to maintain in the cab of diesel locomotives fireman-helpers. Reference is made to the fact that T.C.A. planes have co-pilots and I suppose it might be argued that one pilot could handle the controls of the plane.

We have to recognize today that dieselization has made it possible for the railway companies to run more trains, longer trains and faster trains. This of course only points out the need for increased vigilance. Now is certainly not the time to be taking out of the cabs enginemen whose judgment is extremely necessary in many cases.

I think Senator Roebuck sums it up very well in his report when he refers to the tremendous responsibility placed upon the shoulders of the locomotive engineer. On page 3 of his report he points out:

> There are few workers in the industrial life of Canada who bear so terrible a responsibility as that of the locomotive engineer in charge of a modern train.

And again:

> So long as trains have been running, the engineer has been furnished with an assistant, who, in addition to taking care of the mechanical needs of the locomotive and sharing the task of lookout, has been charged with the responsibility of observance of the operating rules and the train orders and has kept track of changing schedules and has calculated the time of meets. The fireman is the engineer's co-pilot. It is not given to mere humans individually to always be right, to never be mistaken, and it is the duty and function of the fireman to catch an oversight, a momentary failure to observe, or a miscalculation of the time of an approaching train or the speed under varying conditions of his own train on the part of the engineer, and thus to avoid what would otherwise result in some frightful accident in which two trains may be involved with hundreds of thousands of dollars in property and the life and limb of passengers and crews.

That is a most categorical statement by one member of the conciliation board who makes it quite clear that in his view the position of the railway company is very ill-advised. It seems to me that some effort has been made to suggest that the firemen are holding out against automation. May I point out that dieselization already has cost almost 3,000 employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company their jobs and there was no sign of a work stoppage. Those people accepted the inevitable technological changes. Those mechanics in the shops were replaced by the dieselization program of the C.P.R.

As a result of dieselization the C.P.R. has been able to effect very considerable savings. According to their own figures, in 1955 they saved some $18 million in transportation costs and an additional $6 million in the reduced maintenance of locomotives. One can therefore point out that dieselization already has brought about great savings to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. No one takes issue with that fact. We are happy to see these technical changes taking place.

What is involved here is not a question of automation, it is a question of the safety of the public generally and of the train crews.

It seems to me that in this dispute, which I hope will be speedily resolved, we should recognize the validity of the position taken by the brotherhood. The brotherhood's argument is quite clear. They say that the conciliation board should have been armed with sufficient technical knowledge in order to bring down an opinion based on more than a refereeing between two conflicting points of view. Reference was made this morning by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), to the fact that the three members of the conciliation board were lawyers. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) could not see anything wrong with that, but I suggest that if we are going to have an objective study made of this problem we will have to have experts and not lawyers consider it. Lawyers may be quite learned in the law but when it comes to operating a railway I think we should have the opinions of people who know what they are discussing. Certainly that cannot be achieved with the type of conciliation board referred to previously.

I am hoping that the Prime Minister's statement today presages a breaking of the stalemate and the bringing about of an early resumption of the operations of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Clearly the position which the union has taken is quite logical and reasonable. They say that they are prepared to go back to work provided there is an undertaking that this matter will be referred to a board qualified to discuss the whole question and that the findings of that board will then be referred to a conciliation board.

The conciliation board to which we referred earlier admitted that it was not in a position to pass judgment on technical matters. The members of that board admitted that their judgment was based merely on the ability of the opposing counsel to put across the best point of view. Surely that is not the basis upon which an important matter of this kind should be settled.

I feel that the government has been lax in dealing with this matter. They have held over the heads of the employees the threat of compulsory arbitration. The example of 1950 is still fresh in their minds. At the same time the government has not paid the slightest attention to the reasonable proposal put forth by the leader of this group the other day when he suggested that in the interests of the railroad workers themselves and in the interests of the Canadian people there should be an immediate resumption of rail operations over the lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and that if the railroad company was adamant in its refusal to meet that reasonable request the government should appoint an administrator to take over the temporary management of the C.P.R. and to see that the railroad trains are running as soon as possible.

I think that is the position as it stands at the moment. Negotiations are in progress and it is our earnest hope that the resumption of rail operations will occur at the earliest possible moment. I plead with the government to leave no stone unturned to see that the railway company are persuaded to adopt a proposal such as the one outlined by the Prime Minister today when he suggested that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were prepared to accept the same settlement as that granted by Canadian National Railways while this matter was being investigated there was no reason why railroad operations could not be resumed. I suggest that the failure to come to a settlement must be placed squarely on the shoulders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Every effort should be made to bring about a resumption of rail operations. The onus now rests upon the railway company.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member has complained of the fact that all three members of the conciliation board were lawyers. I am not going to argue with him on that but I would like to ask him whether, in view of the fact that two of the members are always appointed upon the recommendation of the two parties to the dispute, would he have the Minister of Labour refuse to appoint the nominee of management or labour if that person happened to be a lawyer.

Mr. Ellis: I have just been pointing out that one of the difficulties about this conciliation board report is the fact that the board based its judgment, not on facts but on the ability of opposing counsel to present their points of view. The railroad company appointed a good lawyer to represent its side of the case under courtroom procedure and the brotherhood of locomotive firemen and enginemen had no other recourse but to obtain the services of a lawyer in order that their point of view could be represented.

Mr. Castleden: Would the Prime Minister recommend a lawyer as controller?

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, it gives me particular pleasure this afternoon to extend the customary congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, not only because they made excellent speeches, well thought out, well composed and well delivered, but also because of the fact that they both spoke in the two official languages of our nation. I was particularly impressed by the fact that the mover, whose mother tongue is English, was able to speak to us at such length and so well in the French language. I was also impressed by the fact that the seconder, whose mother tongue is French, was able to speak to us at such length and so well in the English language. I congratulate these two members and at the same time I also wish to congratulate all members on both sides of the house who have been making the sincere effort that I have had occasion to observe during the last eight years to become more and more bilingual and to be able to understand and express themselves in the two official languages of our nation.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal with two of the subjects that are covered in the speech from the throne, the references to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the railway strike. Then I intend to discuss certain matters that concern my constituency particularly. In connection with NATO I find this reference in the speech from the throne:

> An encouraging advance is being made, as evidenced by the latest ministerial meeting of the council, in the development of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the non-military as well as in the military field. My ministers remain strongly convinced of the need to maintain the North Atlantic treaty as the keystone of the defence of the western nations.

Farther on I find this reference:

> Recent events have confirmed my ministers' belief in the importance of seeking solutions to international problems through the United Nations and of upholding by all practical and constructive means the principles of the United Nations charter. My ministers also believe, however—

This is the part I wish to emphasize.

> —that while making every effort to achieve these long term goals, the western nations must remain strong and united in their defences and in their diplomacy in order that aggressive action against them will be prevented and international tension can be lessened.

That paragraph evidently refers to NATO. As chairman of the executive committee of the Canadian NATO parliamentary association, I am of course pleased with these references to NATO made in the speech from the throne and I heartily endorse the attitude that the government is taking. I had the privilege of leading the Canadian delegation to the interparliamentary conference that took place in Paris from the 18th to the 23rd of November last, and I think that the best way for me to express to the house my thoughts and feelings about the importance of NATO at this time is to quote from a speech that I delivered at this conference of NATO parliamentarians. I said:

> When we were in Paris last year in the month of July the Geneva conference was taking place and the Russians were advancing their plans for peaceful coexistence putting on the mask of friendship and trying to give the impression that a great change had taken place in Russia since Stalin's death and that Russian policy was being liberalized, becoming more human and friendly. The Russian delegates to the Geneva conference declared their peaceful intentions and made disarmament proposals.
>
> One of the main consequences of this attitude taken by the Russians was to make some people doubt the necessity and utility of NATO and to bring to some governments of NATO countries the temptation to reduce their efforts to build up NATO's military defence forces in Europe.
>
> Some extreme optimists even expressed the view that before long NATO would no longer be so necessary and that the NATO countries would soon be able to diminish considerably if not abolish entirely their defence expenditures.
>
> But, Mr. Chairman, what a change now! The deplorable events that have taken place in Hungary recently have altered all that.
>
> The Russians when confronted by the courageous demands of the Hungarian people for self-government, for free elections, for the abolition of the farce that is the system of one-party elections and for the withdrawal of the Russian army from their country, showed their real nature; they removed the mask of hypocrisy and duplicity they had been wearing and gave free course to the brutality and the cruelty that have always been the hallmark of all communist regimes and particularly of the Soviet regime.
>
> After having received the demands of the brave Hungarian people, they pretended to negotiate the withdrawal of Russian troops from the country. During the so-called negotiations and directly contrary to the object of these negotiations, they brought into Hungary great numbers of men and quantities of military equipment, forged a ring of steel composed of 1,000 tanks around Budapest and made prisoners the legitimate government of the country and the very envoys with whom they were supposed to be negotiating.
>
> They then proceeded to drown in a bath of blood the protests and resistance of the Hungarian patriots.
>
> I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this unmasking of the Russians has greatly changed the NATO picture.
>
> There can no more be any doubt of the usefulness of NATO and the necessity of keeping defence forces strong and alert. There can be no doubt about the desirability of closer union between the different NATO countries and of tightening the cultural and economic bonds that unite them as foreseen by Article II of the treaty.

Those are my feelings, Mr. Speaker, about NATO, and I am pleased that so many members of the Senate and the House of Commons have shown their interest in NATO by joining our association. The importance of NATO parliamentary associations has been underlined and I think there should be placed on the record an excerpt from the report of the committee of three, of which our distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was one, which was appointed by NATO to make a report. Their report has been issued recently, and paragraphs 58 and 59 of the report read as follows:

58. Among the best supporters of NATO and its purposes are those members of parliament who have had a chance at first hand to see some of its activities and to learn of its problems, and to exchange views with their colleagues from other parliaments. In particular, the formation of national parliamentary associations and the activities of the conference of members of parliament from NATO countries have contributed to the development of public support for NATO and solidarity among its members.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting and, in my opinion, very well deserved commendation of NATO parliamentary associations on the part of the members of this committee of three. They go on to say:

59. In order to maintain a close relationship of parliamentarians with NATO, the following arrangements are recommended:

(a) That the Secretary-General continue to place the facilities of NATO headquarters at the disposal of parliamentary conferences and give all possible help with arrangements for their meetings.

(b) That invited representatives of member governments and the Secretary-General and other senior NATO civil and military officers attend certain of these meetings. In this way the parliamentarians would be informed on the state of the alliance and the problems before it, and the value of their discussions would be increased.

I submit you have there, Mr. Speaker, a very useful and very interesting appraisal of the importance of associations such as ours. By chance, and purely by chance, our meeting in Paris in the month of November came at a very opportune time. I say by chance because, of course, the date of the conference had been fixed many weeks or months before the Suez canal difficulties arose and before, as a result of those difficulties and the events about which we all know, a certain division arose among the three principal, original members of NATO, namely, England, France and the United States. I say that our meeting was particularly well timed because it gave an opportunity to parliamentarians of the free countries to meet to discuss their differences of opinion, to thresh out the matter, I might say. I am convinced that these meetings, these conversations, these arguments if you like, did a great deal of good and helped to bring together the opinions of parliamentarians of these three countries.

The fundamental importance of the NATO parliamentary associations was brought home to us in 1955 by no less a personage than General Gruenther. When we went to supreme headquarters, SHAPE, in Paris General Gruenther gave us a briefing. One of the things he said to us was this. He said we must not forget that all the members of the North Atlantic treaty alliance are democracies and that in a democracy the very existence of the government depends upon public opinion. Therefore in a democracy a continuance of the policy of any government depends equally upon public opinion. If we wish NATO to continue to endure and to continue to give to the freedom-loving nations the service that it is giving, he said, we must interest public opinion in the NATO countries in NATO and the work that NATO is doing; and, said General Gruenther, the best way in which to interest public opinion in NATO and the work that NATO is doing is to get parliamentarians who are the representatives of the people, who are the representatives of public opinion in their different countries, interested in NATO; and the best way in which to do that is to organize NATO parliamentary associations in the different countries.

The Canadians who attended this meeting took an active part. Out of 14 members of the Canadian delegation there were seven speakers. Those speakers were the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott), the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Leduc), the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth), the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland), the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) and myself. In proportion to the numbers of our delegation, I think that we had one of the best records. I do not think that any delegation had more than 50 per cent of their members making speeches. I say this to underline what an active interest our delegates took in the proceedings. While I am on this subject I wish to mention the fact that the two delegates sent by the Senate distinguished themselves. Senator McLean was elected head of the economic committee. Senator Dessureault took an active part in the deliberations of the political committee.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, we came back from this meeting of NATO parliamentarians in time for the short session which was called here in November to deal with the Suez matter. My experience at NATO confirmed this year the opinion that I had formed last year and convinced me more than ever of the necessity and the utility of these NATO parliamentary associations and their meetings.

I now pass on to the second subject with which I wish to deal and which is alluded to in the speech from the throne. I refer to the railway strike. I do not pretend to be an expert—far from it—and I have not gone into the pros and cons of the matter. I am not going to express my opinion as to whether the railway company is right or whether the union is right. I am going to examine the subject from the point of view of the general public. From the point of view of the general public I must say that I think these strikes in public utilities are extremely deplorable indeed. I have had some experience in the matter because in 1950 I was privileged to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne in the special session that took place that year for the purpose of dealing with the disastrous railway strike when both of our railways were strikebound. I wish to quote briefly from a speech I made on that occasion. Dealing with strikes in public utilities I had this to say as reported at page 84 of Hansard of August 31, 1950:

In the province of Quebec, public opinion has already accepted legislation forbidding strikes in public utilities. In 1944, the legislative assembly of that province passed a bill decreeing compulsory arbitration in every dispute over labour conditions where a public utility and its employees were involved and rendering illegal any strike in a public utility under any circumstances whatsoever.

Heavy penalties are provided in this legislation for every day that such an illegal strike would last. This law is still in force and has given good results. It was enacted by a Liberal government known for its sympathy towards organized labour.

However our federal government did not want to incorporate this principle into the labour legislation of this country. It did not want to enact general legislation prohibiting strikes in public utilities and subjecting them to compulsory arbitration.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether public opinion is not coming around now to that idea, now that we have had another railway strike within six years. I wonder whether public opinion would not accept legislation outlawing strikes in public utilities, based, of course, on the general principle that the general good must be given preference over the good of the individual or even over the good of a group of individuals. I do not wish to elaborate on the matter now but I wish to leave with the house the thought that three things might help in the future to avoid in railways and in public utilities strikes that are so detrimental to the economy and to the well-being of our country. Apart from legislation prohibiting strikes in public utilities there is also the thought that if there was less influence by outside unions on our unions in Canada, there might be fewer labour disturbances. If our unions were entirely independent and were not subject to the influence of other branches of so-called international unions, I think that situation might also help to avoid strikes. In the third place, I think that the method of voting on such important issues is surprising, to say the least. I was greatly surprised to read in the editorial of a newspaper—it is a well-informed paper and I have no reason to believe that what was stated is not true—that this strike which we are now suffering was decided by a vote of 36 men sent by telegraph, namely the 36 heads of the different unions that were involved. The workmen were never given the chance to vote. The workmen were never given the chance to declare themselves as to whether or not they wanted to strike. The thought that I am going to leave—

Mr. Nicholson: Does the hon. member suggest that the firemen are not behind the strike?

Mr. Cannon: You make your own speech some time. The thought I wish to express is this. If legislation were passed to oblige that a secret ballot be taken of all workmen affected by a strike, it might have a considerable effect in avoiding strikes of this kind in the future.

These are three suggestions that I make. I am sure that they will not all be adopted by the government at the same time but I am making them nonetheless and I underline these suggestions. Even if only one of these three suggestions were adopted, it might have a considerable effect in avoiding strikes of the kind from which we are now suffering.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I am now coming to the part of my speech which deals with the fine county of the Magdalen islands, which I have the honour to represent in this house.

First, I wish to thank, in the name of my constituents, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and all those who helped secure President Eisenhower's rejection of the recommendation which had been made by the United States tariff board, suggesting the imposition of an additional duty on the importation of Canadian fish to the United States. If that resolution had been sanctioned by the president of the United States, it would have had disastrous effects on Canada's eastern fisheries and particularly on the Magdalen islands fisheries, inasmuch as a large part of their products are marketed in the United States. Therefore, in the name of my constituents, I should like to express my most sincere appreciation to the right hon. Prime Minister and to all others who appealed to President Eisenhower in this respect.

In the name of my constituents, I also want more particularly to thank the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) for having authorized the fine modern airport, which is already in operation on Magdalen islands. Until now, aircraft have had to land on the beach, which was at times fairly easy to do, but at other times not quite so easy. I am proud to say we obtained the building of this airport because conditions on the beach were not always the best. While I am on the subject of aviation, I want also to seize the opportunity of thanking the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe) for giving us a daily mail delivery service. When I was first elected member for the Magdalen islands, we had only semi-weekly mail service. Some time ago, I had managed to obtain three weekly deliveries. Now, with the co-operation of the Postmaster General and the Maritime Central Airways, we too will enjoy a daily service.

The year 1956 was a good year for us. Our fisheries yielded about twice as much as in 1954. I do not intend to claim any credit for that increase, since it is due to the fact that fishing was better or that our fishermen were luckier. Besides, if I were to take credit for it, I would have to take the blame when fishing is bad, and everyone knows that the result of fishing is always rather uncertain.

However, I am convinced that the improvements made at the Iles-de-la-Madeleine these last eight years, improvements to the ports, the harbours and wharves, the slips which have been installed, the breakwaters which have been put up, the dredging which has been done to improve shipping, as well as the assistance given towards shipbuilding and the buying of equipment for our fishermen, have greatly helped my people to achieve these splendid results. That is why, finding that the value of the catch by the Magdalen islands fishermen in 1956 was twice as large as in 1954, I want to thank the government most sincerely for what they have done for my county.

I now come to unemployment insurance. Ever since I have been the member for the Magdalen islands—it will be eight years next summer—I have, at each session, untiringly asked for the payment of unemployment insurance to fishermen. At the last session of parliament, my efforts were successful, thanks to the understanding of the government and, more particularly, of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). Through an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, fishermen came under the act. Regulations are now being prepared which will apply to those cases, and which, I am told, will come into force not later than next April. Fishermen will then benefit from the act on the same basis as workers in other industries. There, again, is a great improvement for the fishermen of Magdalen islands.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. Speaker, may I say a few words now on the subject of family allowances. My views on this matter I have stated in this house on previous occasions. I shall therefore limit myself to quoting from a speech I made January 17, 1956, on the occasion of this same debate in reply to the speech from the throne. Talking about family allowances, I said:

> Our great leader, the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, was responsible for them and history will record that his decision to create family allowances was that of a great statesman.
>
> But over ten years have gone by and family allowances have not been increased. As everyone knows, the cost of living has increased enormously during that time, while the needs of children have not decreased. The means of meeting the needs of the children should be increased to keep pace with the cost of supplying them.

Then I said further:

> I have received representations, both verbally and in writing, from my constituents to the effect that they think it is time family allowances were increased. These people point to the increase in the cost of living since 1945 and the fact that government income available for purposes other than war purposes has greatly increased since that time. I agree with them, and I make an appeal to the government to increase family allowances. If they cannot double them, as requested in some quarters, they should at least increase them 25 per cent or 50 per cent. If it is impossible for the government to increase family allowances all along the line they should—and this is the minimum they should do—at least increase the monthly allowances of $5, $6 or $7 for the younger children to the $8 given to the older children, so the same scale would apply to all. This modification would not only benefit the children but would greatly simplify the administration of the act.

Such were my sentiments last year, Mr. Speaker, and such are they again this year. My constituents send me many representations, signed by hundreds of my good friends, people who admire the government and the right hon. Prime Minister, and who, despite the improvement with which they have been gratified and the good things they have received from the government, keep writing me to ask that family allowances be increased. I believe those requests are justified, and for the same reasons as were put forward by myself last year I say again that family allowances should be increased.

I would go even further and say, that, in my belief, family allowances are more important than health insurance. All people have children who need education, clothing and food; but not everyone becomes ill. I sincerely believe that it is more important to increase family allowances than to provide for health insurance.

In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize the fact that unemployment insurance benefits paid to Magdalen islands fishermen will put several hundred thousand dollars into circulation in this constituency. The estimate I have been given amounts to four or five hundred thousand dollars, and this will help our fishermen to get by until family allowances are increased. While I point out this fact, I none the less urge an increase of family allowances as soon as possible.

In the matter of public works, I should like to mention very briefly the main projects that should be undertaken in the Magdalen islands. To give an idea of the needs in the western end of the islands, I need only quote an article from the magazine A Pleines Voiles which is published at Ste-Anne-de-la-Pocatière and is interested especially in the welfare of fishermen. That magazine prints a column entitled "The Voice of the Islands" which I always read very carefully. I need not mention that the islands referred to are the Magdalen islands. Any Madelinot knows that when one refers to "the islands," one always means the Magdalen Islands. I quote:

Grande-Entrée is up and coming!

At the south of Grande-Entrée lies the Ile du Bassin. Between it and Grande-Entrée, the sea forms a marvelous little bay, sheltered from the winds, east and west, by the sand banks. If it were adequately developed, that bay could be turned into the best fishing harbour of the islands; it would be mostly suitable for all kinds of fishing, especially for lobster, halibut and cod. The required works would include the digging of a channel on the west side and the construction of a protective wall, docks and factories. Thus, the eastern part of the islands would be saved for fisheries and would enjoy the prospect of a most promising economic future.

Such is the project advocated by the religious and civil authorities of Grande-Entrée and by the taxpayers of that community. Such is the foremost proposition at the present time at the islands and everybody is in favour of it.

I spoke about it to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters). I am sure that he is interested in that project and I am confident that work will be undertaken this very year in order that this marvelous project may be implemented at Grande-Entrée.

Mr. Speaker, here are a few among the public works which will be undertaken at the islands and which are included in my program. A new breakwater at North Cape (Cap-du-Nord), a new breakwater at Dune-du-Sud to prevent silting, such as has been the case with the present structure, improvements to the harbours at Pointe-Basse and Cap-aux-Meules, construction of a quay or dock on the west side of l'Étang-du-Nord.

As regards harbour improvements at Havre-Aubert, the chamber of commerce there recently prepared a blueprint, a copy of which was sent to me and which I have forwarded to the Minister of Public Works. I am sure that department officials will find it most useful in planning future work at Havre-Aubert. I also take this opportunity to congratulate the members of the Havre-Aubert chamber of commerce on the spirit of initiative and of public duty they have shown in preparing this plan and in sending me a copy.

We also have an airport at Havre-Aubert, although not as large as the one built at Havre-aux-Maisons, to which I referred a moment ago. However, and precisely because it is a smaller one, it should be enlarged, maintained and improved. The reason is evident. Business is picking up at Havre-Aubert, as everywhere else in the islands, and it would not be fair to let this airport go to ruin. I have already asked the Department of Transport to enlarge it, and I will keep on asking that this be done. I am sure my good friend the Minister of Transport will admit that my representations are well founded.

We also wish to improve the wharf and the slip at Entry island and to deepen the harbour at Étang-des-Caps.

There, Mr. Speaker, is a short summary of what we in the Magdalen islands would require in the way of works for this year. I am sure that the government will favourably consider these requests which I am submitting.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of these few remarks, I have dealt with matters in the international, national and local fields. I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister for the important part he played in world affairs thanks to his friendly contacts with such people as the president of the United States, Mr. Eisenhower, and Mr. Nehru, the prime minister of India. It is a great satisfaction to our people to see that we can rely on the firm and sure guidance of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Liberal government in these particularly difficult times on the international level. Clearly the people of Canada are also very satisfied with their government, at the national level, and I am sure that new evidence of this satisfaction will be given by a resounding victory of our beloved leader and our party at the next general election.

(Text):

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising today to take part in this throne speech debate I, like those before me, wish to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud). To the mover I just wish to say that I enjoyed very much the remarks that he had to make, and I regret that I was unable to follow the speech of the seconder, but I did take the time to read it.

Each session of parliament each year, Mr. Speaker, seems to bring its particular problems, and this year of 1957, only in its 10th day, seems to be loaded with problems, even though the announcement expected today of the settlement of the strike will bring some measure of relief to many thousands of Canadians. It seems to me there are five problems that loom large on the horizon of 1957 in its 365-day run. I do, however, wish to say a word or two about the strike, and not only this strike but what might and could be done for the future. One other item of immense importance is the state of international affairs, with the Middle East the hot spot and the Kremlin engaged in making trouble wherever it seems to be possible or profitable for them so to do.

Another problem facing Canadians is that of inflation. We have heard a great deal about it. Much has been said about it in the 10 years since the war. There is also the problem of agriculture, the poor relations in a booming economy, and our $1 billion trade deficit, which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) says is an indication of the growth and development of this country.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister, in his speech dealing with the problems of the day, revealed the mailed fist in the gloved hand, and today the strike is more or less settled. All Canadians are alarmed at the recurring number of strikes and are asking for and thinking that there must be, some solution to the problems of relations between industry and labour, not only on the railways but in many key industries. They are alarmed at the influence exerted by persons outside of Canada in these labour troubles. They are also alarmed at the control outside of Canada of many of our key industries and raw resources.

I think the search on the part of hon. members of parliament for a solution not only to the rail strike which is concluding but concerning the question of strikes in major industries generally is an indication of the importance which they feel strikes assume in relation to the economy of the country and how they can cripple a nation if of long duration or extended to more than one or two industries in the country. The worst feature of such strikes is the fact that in many cases the innocent bystander is injured to a greater extent than is the industry or the men involved.

If a strike progresses the supplying industries become idle either through lack of raw materials or lack of markets and we find even today that as a result of the strike lumber, mining, manufacturing and agriculture all have been seriously affected. But the worst effect, in my estimation, is on the small businessman who lacking the resources of large corporations is not able to withstand the blow of the strike and in a short time faces economic disaster.

I am wondering if it would be possible for us, in regard to industrial strife, to apply our thinking as far as international affairs are concerned. Hon. members will recall that at the close of the first world war of 1914-18 there was set up at that time a league of nations and although it collapsed the idea and the ideal was to prevent an outbreak of another world war. If the United States had been prepared to play its part at that time the second world war might possibly have been averted. At the conclusion of the second world war in 1945 the nations got together again and set up the United Nations in the hope that it might avert a third world war.

In all democratic countries and in other countries, too, there are ethics, codes and laws which govern the relationship between man and man and for the settlement of civil disputes. Two parties engage in a lawsuit which goes to the courts and a judgment is handed down which is accepted as final and is enforced.

Similarly we have rules governing the field of sports. If we go to a ball game, a hockey match or a prize fight we accept the decisions which are made by the referee according to the rules of the game or the laws governing the sport. We have tried to achieve the same thing in the field of international affairs and possibly we have succeeded to a degree, but when it comes to the relationships between an employer and an employee we find we still have to slug it out until one side or the other succumbs or the government steps in. Whenever the government steps in it puts labour in a most unfortunate position because it leaves industry in the position where it can sit back and let the strike run its course in full confidence that the government will eventually intervene and end the strike. That is what we and labour generally do not wish to see come to pass in this country. Surely if we have developed to the stage where we have a tribunal for international disputes, civil law courts for the settlement of civil disputes and referees enforcing the laws governing the field of sports, disputes between labour and management can also be eliminated if the proper procedures could be brought into being which had the full confidence of labour and management and the Canadian people so that when a judgment was handed down the weight of public opinion would make it almost necessary that the judgment be accepted by both parties.

For many years I have said in this house and outside of it that one of the solutions to industrial strife would be the introduction of profit sharing plans whereby labour becomes a partner with industry and shares in the wealth that the hands of labour have helped to create. It is interesting to note that more and more industries are adopting properly established profit sharing plans which are being enjoyed by many working people. Some companies have built up enormous resources for distribution to their employees. The strange thing about it, however, is that the leaders of unions are not interested in selling to employees the idea of profit sharing plans. They apparently seem to thrive on a certain amount of industrial strife. I hope, therefore, that before another serious strike is on our doorstep concrete action will be taken by labour and industry to avert such a disaster.

I wish to say a few words concerning our $1,000 million trade deficit and about trade in general. I noticed in the Prime Minister's speech yesterday he referred to the trade deficit and he used as a comparison a Canadian farmer who in the springtime would buy seed, feed and fertilizer and then in the fall would be able to make up his investment with the crop that he garnered. Our trade deficit is somewhat different and I am afraid a parallel such as the Prime Minister suggests cannot be drawn. We are buying this $1,000 million deficit from the United States of America but when the crop is harvested are we going to be able to sell it back to them? I do not believe it is possible. The United States is being very careful to see that any attempts made to sell our goods to that country are met with irritation, restrictions, uncertainties, give-away programs and a disregard for the GATT treaties. Consequently the easy solution suggested by the Prime Minister is not practical.

I also found it interesting to observe that it has been only during the last few weeks that the Prime Minister has become so acutely interested in the problem of the farmer and I am wondering if the proximity of an election has had some effect on his thinking as far as agriculture is concerned.

The argument is being advanced that we must buy from abroad in order to sell abroad, but the joker in the pack, so far as that argument is concerned, is this. Canada is a great producing nation, yet we are buying a great many agricultural products from abroad, products which we as Canadians could produce. Those products purchased abroad provide dollars with which foreign countries are able to buy Canadian manufactured products. They do not buy Canadian farm products. Actually the Canadian farm economy is being exploited to provide markets for manufactured goods.

There is another disturbing factor as far as agriculture is concerned and that is that in this inflated, high-cost economy we are being undersold by many countries. Our industries are protected by tariffs while many farm products are protected only for short periods of time, in some cases for as little as three weeks. I wonder why this is being done. I should not wonder because I think I know the answer. This government has found by experience through several elections that between elections they can kick the farmer around but when the next election rolls around the farmer will still vote for them.

It is interesting to note and I mention it again that yesterday and recently the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) dealt with agricultural problems. It is interesting to note that the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and others have been quoting statistics to prove how well off agriculture is, but I want to say to the government that agricultural statistics are not negotiable, they do not pay taxes, they do not buy feed, seed and fertilizer nor do they pay the interest on the mortgage. If they did, our farmers would be tickled to death because they would be able to get along. But the fact is that agricultural statistics do none of those things.

I was interested also in what the Prime Minister had to say about his golf game. He seemed to be able to improve his golf score and his social relations with the President of the United States but apparently he was not able to reduce the $1,000 million trade deficit by any appreciable degree.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Ike took him for a ride.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There has been another interesting development in recent weeks. Last session we engaged in a very acrimonious debate regarding the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company. I see now that Trans-Canada and Tennessee Transmission have entered into a deal which probably will cost the Canadian gas producers and Canadians generally anywhere from $5 million to $10 million a year.

An hon. Member: Propaganda.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): You will have a chance to answer all these questions in the not too distant future and it will take more than gas to answer them satisfactorily. If the government has an agricultural policy it certainly is not known. I notice that when it announces some decision the federation of agriculture shortly adopts it as their policy. In other words the hookup between the right hon. minister and the federation apparently is very close.

While I am dealing with our trade problems I should like to say a little about the problem of inflation. For many years Canadians have been led to believe that the Bank of Canada by controlling currency and credit controlled the bank rate, but now when the issue is becoming a hot one we see news items in the papers and otherwise stating that the bank rate is controlled by the sale of treasury bills as they are bid for and sold each Friday. But they fail to tell you that while the chartered banks, brokerage firms and others can buy and sell treasury bills, the Bank of Canada is also in the market and can control the bank interest rate while saying to the public that they have nothing to do with it.

I might mention for the information of the house that I called up the Bank of Canada this morning and tried to get hold of one of these treasury bills. They told me that they were easily negotiable and were worth from $25,000 right up to $1 million. They did not provide me with one but they told me what they looked like.

An hon. Member: Did you buy one?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): No, I did not buy one. The average Canadian is asking who is fooling whom about this bank rate and is the increased bank rate likely to do the things it is proposed it will do as far as inflation is concerned. We have been told, and I think I am prepared to believe it, that inflation can be brought about in two ways. It can be brought about by a surplus of money—I do not know of any farmer in Ontario or anywhere else who would know anything about a surplus of money—or by an undersupply or scarcity of goods. By making it more difficult for businesses to carry on, an increased interest rate becomes part of the cost of goods sold. Industry is discouraged from producing and this brings about a further scarcity of goods rather than making them more plentiful. I cannot see how the measures which the government is favouring will eliminate a scarcity of goods which is partly the cause of inflation and the desire on the part of many people to purchase them.

It also discourages the building of houses. An increasing number of Canadians desire to own homes but as was admitted today in the house there is a decreased number of housing units being built. It is also likely to make these units more expensive.

As I mentioned before, by the expansion of money the productive industry of this country is going to be discouraged, which will result in further scarcities. I note that the president of the Canadian gas association has stated that gas distribution is likely to be seriously threatened, which in turn will affect the sale of gas-burning equipment. Consequently the householders in every city where gas may be distributed will be affected. On the other hand, luxury items enjoy a bigger spread or margin of profit, and those industries are not likely to be as seriously affected as are the industries supplying necessary goods. But curtailment of credit affects every Canadian industry adversely.

There is another rather alarming angle to this, Mr. Speaker, and it is that the credit curbs do not affect United States investors. They can bring their money over here and invest it. That is exactly what is happening; and the thing we wanted to get away from, more and more control by Americans of our raw resources, is going to be magnified and increased rather than decreased by the action of the government in its attempt to control inflation. In my opinion the controls are just ten years too late. If the government had thought about this when it was mentioned years ago instead of now when the dollar is only worth a few cents they would have been doing something.

It is of interest to note when I am talking about interest rates that I had as a visitor at my home just a week ago an agricultural expert from Switzerland. I asked him about the value of farm property there, and he told me the average would be $1,000 per acre. I asked him about the price of milk and other products produced there and I said, "How in the world do you ever pay off the mortgage if you buy a 60-acre farm for $60,000?" He said, "Why, the people in Switzerland who have money do not want us to pay off the mortgages. They will lend us money at approximately 2½ per cent and they are glad to have these mortgages go on for generations as long as they are sure of their 2½ per cent." I am not certain what rate is being charged today by the Canadian farm loan board but I imagine it is around 5 per cent, or double the rate at which the Swiss people are able to borrow money in the form of farm loans.

I would also point out that Switzerland has money for export. The people of Switzerland are not going to the United States for money to develop their country. Yet although Canada has vast resources, people from the United States are able to come here and invest their money because we are so poor from paying taxes. Thirty-one cents out of every dollar that we take in goes out in taxes to our government. No wonder we have not money to invest in our natural resources.

It is also a bit alarming to read that some 500 bankruptcies occurred during the past year, or almost up to the level of the depression years. Curtailment of credit will not bring about an increase in goods, and therefore I doubt whether it will be very effective in controlling inflation.

It has not been my practice in the past to say anything about international affairs because there were others who were making detailed studies of the problems, but the developments during the last few months have struck home into the hearts of every Canadian, and I think what I have to say reflects the thinking of the vast majority of my constituents. The resignation yesterday of Prime Minister Eden came as a shock to most of us, but it only served to bring into focus the tremendous burden under which the leader of the United Kingdom government has been labouring for many months.

We should not forget that when Eden and Mollet were endeavouring to prevent a communist coup in the Middle East, brought about by the ineffectiveness of the United Nations, the Canadian government played a role that tormented France and Britain and gave solace to our enemies. Last night's news only served to emphasize that statement. The United States, in the midst of a presidential campaign, chose to be against Britain and France; but now we see the president and congress trying desperately to regain lost ground. Resolutions of the United Nations condemning Britain and France were adopted, but I think more and more people will come to the conclusion that the only mistake Eden made was that he left the Middle East too soon. Britain and France left in the hope that their retirement would help the cause of world peace and would preserve the United Nations.

Have Russia or Hungary respected the pious resolutions of the United Nations? While untold thousands suffered the United Nations dared not even send an observer to Hungary. It is rather interesting to note that Mr. Nehru has been shocked by the events in Hungary. I would suggest it has taken him a long time to realize what most of us in the western world have known since the close of world war I.

It has been my privilege to meet some of the Hungarian refugees and to hear something of their desperate fight for freedom at first hand. But what did the United Nations do? Nothing but talk. Hungary has revealed to the world that the will to be free is strong in the face of terrible odds. Hungary has revealed the communist world in its true light, ruthless and out for world conquest. Hungary has revealed the United Nations as an idealistic but impotent force. The United Nations must face realities or perish.

I turn to another phase of Canada's role in international affairs, that of foreign aid. In the past I have supported enthusiastically the Colombo plan and other plans devised to assist the so-called have-not or backward nations. But when the Suez crisis arose some of these so-called have-not nations were able to put into action a more efficient navy and air force than Canada is able to summon after spending nearly $2 billion a year since Korea. This makes me wonder whether we can bribe these foreign countries or buy their loyalty. I am afraid that all that is happening is that they are damning us because we do not give them more. At the very time we were able to supply this foreign aid the maritimes asked for financial backing for their bonds to build hydroelectric and other projects, and they were even refused the backing of the federal government. In western Canada there are many developments that could have been undertaken but they were held in abeyance, probably for the next election.

As far as I personally am concerned, events in the past few months have but served to sour the milk of human kindness. The government and all Canadians should work to strengthen the ties of the commonwealth, because after all the commonwealth of nations is probably the single greatest factor for peace in the world. I think the role of the commonwealth should be as a balance of power between the United States on the one hand and the U.S.S.R. on the other. As such it can probably maintain the peace of the world, but only if we have a strong, united commonwealth.

Trade policies and all other measures that can be devised should be aimed at bringing the commonwealth together. Finally I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs by way of paraphrase of psalm 144, "Lead us not into captivity."

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, first may I add my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In doing so may I say that I am reminded of a little story I heard in Edmonton on my way through. It seems that there is always a great deal of argument between the city of Calgary and the city of Edmonton. Calgary boasts of having more chinook winds. The best reply I heard from Edmonton was that Edmonton has the sunny smile of Dick Hanna, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

As to the graceful speech we heard in French from the hon. member for Gloucester I thought to myself yesterday that we in this house sometimes forget that we owe two debts to the people who speak so eloquently in the French language. In listening to those from Quebec who speak so often and so well in the French language, we sometimes forget the contribution made by the other French-speaking group, namely those from Acadia. I refer not only to such members as the hon. member for Gloucester but the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Michaud) and other Acadian members.

While I am still in the congratulatory mood, and before I get around to the strike, may I also congratulate my old friend the new Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the skilful way in which he spoke yesterday for nearly two hours, I think, and said absolutely nothing.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Philpott: I thought he did a much better job the night before on television. I thought we perhaps have a new television star arising in Canada. I think the new Leader of the Opposition was better when he was explaining his own omissions or errors or whatever you call them that the newspapermen were putting up to him than he was yesterday when he was setting out to criticize the government. It seemed to me that he did not say yes and he did not say no. He was waiting to see whether the government was going to do something, in which case he would have said they should have done nothing; or he was waiting to see whether the government was going to do nothing, in which case he would have said that they should have done something.

Before I talk about the strike I may say that I know the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is waiting for some extremely good news later on in the day. As far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to sit down at any time when he has that announcement which we are all waiting to hear and about the coming of which the hon. member who spoke immediately preceding me did not seem to be so pleased.

I do not want to keep the house too long on this matter, but I for one believe that we are now successfully coming to the end of one of the most potentially dangerous situations that we have ever had in Canada. I for one believe that this extremely difficult situation we have had in the past couple of weeks in Canada has been admirably handled by the present government. It seems to me that there were two clear-cut issues involved in this work stoppage. The first issue involved that certainly directly concerns us here as members of parliament, lawmakers for this great Dominion of Canada, was this: Should a democratic parliament in a democratic country forbid such a strike? If so, should it do so under all conditions or just under some conditions?

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be a terrible mistake for Canada or any other democratic country that prides itself on freedom of action to put an arbitrary ban on the right to strike of any great group of Canadian workers, whether those workers happen to be railway workers or others. I am quite well aware of the fact that in a utility such as the great railroads where actual life and death, and the prosperity of so many of the people, depend on the continued service of the railway, no government—neither this government or any other one—could long permit an interruption in the service of so vital a utility. But in a true democracy I submit that you must always balance the things on both sides.

I know that in any police state, whether it is a fascist police state or a communist police state, the first act of any dictatorial government in regard to the industrial set-up of the country is to forbid the holding of strikes. I believe that any democracy—and this applies to Canada or any other democracy—takes an extremely unwise step when it arbitrarily passes an over-all law forbidding a strike. But in any event, surely the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I think the diplomatic, wise and fair way in which the government of Canada has handled this present work stoppage in Canada, as to which we all hope at any time to hear of an amicable settlement having been arrived at acceptable to all concerned, is surely the preferable way.

We all know that the basis on which this work stoppage is going to be settled, when it is settled, is this. It will be settled on the basis that work will be resumed more or less on the basis of the status quo. There will be certain adjustments of wages and so on. There has been no great insoluble problem in that regard. The main problem which has not been settled will be left to further consideration under some kind of a fair test by some sort of tribunal which will carry more weight with the Canadian people.

I cannot share the suggestions made earlier this afternoon by my friend the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) in two respects. I certainly cannot share with him the suggestion that the government of Canada should go to the arbitrary length of putting in a controller to run the Canadian Pacific Railway. The C.P.R. is an institution of which every Canadian citizen should be proud. There is nothing in our whole national life that has contributed more to the welfare and prosperity of this great Canadian nation than has the great Canadian Pacific Railway. We ought to be proud of the management. If the management has some kind of suggestion which it thinks will improve the operation of the railway, of course every sensible person will listen to that suggestion.

In the second place, I do not agree with the hon. member for Regina City when he says that no lawyer should be allowed to sit on the board. I was a little bit puzzled by his speech, because he spent exactly half his time lauding the findings of one lawyer who happens to be on the board—perhaps because he is a Liberal lawyer—and denouncing all other lawyers and saying that no lawyer should be allowed to sit on the board.

Mr. Knowles: There has to be an exception to every rule.

Mr. Philpott: I have no objection to lawyers, so long as we do not get too many of them at the same time. It seems to me that there were two things wrong with the conciliation hearing which was held. The first thing that was wrong was quite simple; there was not enough publicity. I am a member of this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, and I try to do my job, as I think most of the other members of this house do. I, for one, confess that I know practically nothing about the findings of the board of conciliation except what I have read in the newspapers since this strike started. I think we have to have a tribunal of the kind that will focus the whole publicity of this country on what is involved in this issue, because the most binding law in any democracy, including Canada, is the law of common sense.

What is involved in this work stoppage is this. Is it or is it not safe to operate diesel engine locomotives with a one-man crew? I submit that contrary to what a good many people seem to assume, the only conclusion reached by two of the three members of the conciliation board was what I would call the old Scottish verdict of not proven. Certainly they did not settle the argument, and in my opinion the argument cannot be settled. As a layman who has travelled quite often over the railway lines of both systems to the far west coast, I am very much in the position of the man from Missouri when it comes to saying that a one-man crew can ever safely operate any kind of engine down through the Fraser valley, whether it is on a passenger train or a freight train. I have been on those trains when it has taken a whole 24 hours to go from the peak of the Rocky mountains down to the coast, and when they required all their crew up in the front end to be on the lookout for the hazards of the day.

I say, therefore, nobody should assume that because this tribunal is going to be set up to focus the attention of all the people of Canada on this great question, is it or is it not safe to operate diesel locomotives with one-man crews, that the finding is automatically going to be that it is safe at all times and in all circumstances.

I have here a brief submitted, certainly to myself and I assume to other members of parliament, by local 657 of the brotherhood of locomotive engineers. I would submit that the locomotive engineers of Canada are a most responsible body of men in whose hands we literally entrust our lives day after day, week after week, all year round. Here are some of the things they say on page 2 of this brief:

> It would not be possible or practicable to list here all the incidents in which the fireman helper has established his worth, the saving of human lives and valuable property. However for the purpose of this review the following is set forth: When trainman Martin on August 22nd, 1955, got off the engine at Glacier, B.C. in order to make a running inspection of his train he slipped and his body contacted the spring rigging of the lead Diesel unit he continued to turn over and over in a rolling fashion, but unable to get away from the side of the locomotive. Fireman helper, Saari, was at his station, and because of his instantaneous action the train was brought to an immediate stop. Trainman Martin suffered among other injuries a broken back. However he has now recovered and has resumed his normal occupation, but he freely states that but for the fact that the fireman helper (engineer's eyes) it would be impossible for him to be alive today.
>
> On September 30, 1950, a locomotive was being turned on the Wye at Glacier, B.C. In the absence of a trainman the fireman was throwing switches; a child playing on the left side of the engine which had passed out of the view of both the engineer and the fireman was struck down and died 24 hours later. It was without question established at the coroner's inquest that if the fireman had been at his station in the cab of the engine, this tragic death could not have occurred.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit when this tribunal sits, as it will sit to settle this question of whether one-man operation is safe as well as efficient for the country, the men who actually operate the trains, whether they are passenger trains or freight trains, will have to have their say and they will have to have their say in a forum which will enable the people of Canada to hear what they are saying. When the tribunal makes its findings, in my opinion all of the people of Canada, who are 99 and 44-100th's per cent law-abiding, will loyally accept the findings.

There is one point I should like to make here, and it is this. There is no greater fallacy than the idea that the trade unionists are automatically opposed to automation. There is no class in our whole industrial society in North America so well aware of the value of the machine in raising wages as the skilled mechanics who operate those machines. Every skilled mechanic who operates any kind of great machine knows that the more expensive the machine he is operating, in 99 cases out of 100, the higher are his wages because the more skilled person he has to be to operate that machine. As Walter Reuther and other great trade union leaders have pointed out in recent months, labour is not opposed to automation; trade unions are not opposed to automation. All the trade unionist demands is that there should be a fair transition from the old methods to the new.

No, Mr. Speaker; labour knows very well that the machine is the best friend of the man who operates the machine, and that the more machines you have in the country the more of the products of the machines you have to divide amongst your population. The difference between a very poor and backward country and a very rich and advanced country, like Canada or the United States, is that we have the machine as our servant and other people do not.

I wish to turn now, Mr. Speaker, very briefly to one other topic. We are going to have an election this year. Contrary to what some of my friends opposite might expect, I make no prediction. I think that is presumption on the part of anyone who really attempts to believe in democracy. I say to my hon. friends whom I see smiling over at me that I hope they do better this year. I am all for them. I believe in the two-party system. I think that alternatives to the present government are always necessary if our democracy is to have real vitality. I rejoice in the fact that the great Conservative party has found a fit and worthy successor to that great Canadian who sat for several years in the position of leader of the opposition. I refer, of course to my old friend George Drew.

In my opinion the election of 1957 is going to hinge very largely on one important point, and that is which party which is or aspires to be the government of Canada can contribute most to the paramount question in the world today, the question of war and peace. I submit that there is no more practical team of peacemakers in the world today than the team represented by that great and distinguished Canadian the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) and his associate in the field of foreign affairs, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I submit that on their own record they are the most practical pair of peacemakers in the world today.

As I see it, the foreign policy of Canada, the peacemaking policy of Canada, is based on four solid cornerstones. The first solid cornerstone of the Canadian peacemaking policy is Canadian nationality, pride in Canada as a dominion—yes, I am proud of that term "dominion"—but as a nation, too. Only this week some of us here witnessed the ceremony of the unveiling of that fine statue to that great Canadian and Conservative, Sir Robert Borden. I listened, I think it was last night or perhaps it was the night before, over the radio to someone interviewing the very distinguished woman sculptor who did that fine statue of Sir Robert Borden. The young man who was interviewing this great artist of whom every Canadian should be proud asked this distinguished Toronto lady what it was she looked for in Sir Robert Borden to try to put in that bronze and on that stone. She said this: "When I read and reread the life of Sir Robert Borden I found that he was a great Canadian nationalist". She said, "I got his Canadian nationhood standing foursquare in the way that he has his two feet planted on the ground". The only place I ever differ with my hon. friend's opposite in the official opposition is when they sometimes think there is some conflict between a robust Canadian nationalism and a 100 per cent loyalty to that great organization that we call the British commonwealth.

I submit that the second cornerstone in the peacemaking policy of the present government is the undying loyalty to and fervent faith in the great organization which we call the British commonwealth. No government that now exists or has ever existed on earth has done more to maintain and strengthen that great organization than this present Liberal government of Canada that sits here today. If I had to choose between all the international organizations that exist, between NATO and the United Nations and the British commonwealth, and I could have my say so we could keep only one of those international organizations, without a minute's hesitation I would say, "I will stand by the British commonwealth" because the British commonwealth is an organic thing that has grown up on the basis of the actual trials and tribulations of history over the centuries. We must keep the British commonwealth and keep it alive and vital. Where I sometimes differ from some of my hon. friends is that the British commonwealth they have in mind is a purely imaginary thing. We are dealing with a British commonwealth that actually exists.

We had a crisis not so many weeks ago over Suez. In my opinion it was an entirely unnecessary crisis; for every good thing that that great statesman, Sir Anthony Eden, tried to do in the wrong way by his ill advice, perhaps stupidly, without consultation, he could have done more effectively in the right way, keeping the 100 per cent support of the British commonwealth and of all the loyal members of the United Nations. I submit that on that occasion we had the third and fourth cornerstones of the peacemaking policy of the present Liberal government of Canada very well exemplified, because Canada stepped into the breach to restore and bridge again the gap that had been developed between the great allies of this western alliance. Canada stepped in to repair the damage that had been done to the United Nations. If that was disloyalty to the British commonwealth, as I have heard some people suggest, it is a very strange kind of disloyalty indeed.

When I was reading of the very great and historic events that have taken place in and around the holy land, Egypt and the Suez canal in the past few weeks, and especially when I got to thinking that the actual war itself had started in the Sinai peninsula, the very spot where Moses, the great lawgiver himself, brought down the ten commandments that became the basis of all civilized law wherever civilized men are, I went back to the original source and read the fascinating story. I read all about Gaza. We have been reading about Gaza and the Gaza strip in the last few weeks, and so on. I heard of another man who was operating in Gaza some thousands of years ago, and how he went down and confounded his enemies by making them a bet that he could come up with a riddle they could not answer in several days. Now, I know my old and good friend from Fort William would have answered this riddle in two seconds, but they were not as lucky several thousand years ago in Gaza as he is.

The riddle which Samson asked his enemies was this: "Out of the eater came something to eat; out of the strong came something sweet". Day after day went by, and they could not answer it. Well, of course, if you read the Bible story in Judges XIV you will see that he found a bee's nest in a lion's carcass. The honey was in the lion's carcass and the sweet came out of the strong meat.

In this great Suez crisis we started out with what appeared to be a terrible tragedy, the falling out of old friends and old allies, even a threat to split the British commonwealth itself. How did it all end? Because we had a practical peacemaker on the job in the person of our Secretary of State for External Affairs, he snatched victory from defeat. "Out of the eater came something to eat; out of the strong came something sweet". We achieved a victory from the defeat, because the suggestion of our practical peacemaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was to set up a United Nations emergency force which, in fact, did restore peace in that part of the world, as Sir Anthony Eden himself said only a few days ago. In my opinion what has been done in Suez is only a beginning.

I am glad to say that in recent weeks at the United Nations our Canadian delegation has gone one step farther and has made the practical suggestion that there should be a uniformed United Nations force always ready to go into action at a moment's notice in the hot spots of the world. I submit, Mr. Speaker, it might have made a great difference had we had even a small force built up on a permanent basis, sworn under an oath of loyalty to obey the United Nations and not any one particular nation in the United Nations; highly mobile, with laws of its own, discipline of its own, and a uniform of its own—and how important is a uniform. How important did we find the uniforms of our own mounted police in the old days of the wild western frontier, when even the scarlet coat of one lone constable, or the scarlet coats of a pair of constables, was the moral force which symbolized to turbulent elements the presence of law and order.

I say this, Mr. Speaker, because when you have situations like that and such as those which exist to a certain extent on the world front today, it is not the actual physical strength of the force of policemen on the front line but it is the uniform they wear and what they symbolize in the way of strength which can be drawn in to establish the principle of law.

I submit that in recent weeks with regard to the Suez crisis we took an important and significant step—a short step, yes, but a significant one—toward the day when law shall apply among the nations, when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more".

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I feel a bit diffident after listening to oratory such as we have just heard. With some of what the hon. member said I heartily agree, pertaining to the British commonwealth in particular, but there are some things he said which I would receive with very serious reservations.

However, in beginning my remarks I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe I can do that more honestly and sincerely than I have been able to do the similar thing, on any previous occasion. I was happy to hear two young men give good speeches in full sincerity, putting their whole hearts behind everything they said, which is a pretty rare thing to find in speeches moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both hon. gentlemen expressed thoughts which I believe were entirely worthy of expression.

I should congratulate the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), my longtime friend, who has just been elevated, as we all know, to the very difficult position of Leader of the Opposition. I scarcely know exactly how to go about saying what I want to say to him. I congratulate him for the honour that has been conferred on him in that the members of his party have seen fit to entrust their future to his hands, but I can also condole and commiserate with him on the health-breaking and heartbreaking responsibilities he has assumed.

I have been here for 21 years, Mr. Speaker, and during that time I have seen leader after leader after leader of the opposition come and go. Among those who came and went was the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett who, in my opinion, was one of the greatest statesmen Canada has produced but this man was broken by the Conservative party. Now why, I never could make out, unless it was that being accused of being responsible for the depression by misrepresenting Liberals, one of the greatest lies ever perpetrated on the people of Canada in the history of this country, he was defeated in 1935. Well, now, he was the first one, and then we had a group following in quick succession. We had Hon. John Bracken brought in—

An hon. Member: What about Mr. Manion?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, but I am not going to name them all because the list is too long. However, here was Mr. Bracken who was brought down from Manitoba where he was in a position in which he would have been honoured and doubtless retained for the rest of his life. He was brought to Ottawa and broken here by this great machine called the Conservative party within a very few years. It certainly was not because of a lack of ability. The west has been proud of Mr. Bracken; I am proud of him. Somehow or other he did not fit in with the Conservative party. I do not intend to go down the list in detail.

Mr. Brooks: You were once leader of the Social Credit party.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, now, if you would just let me deliver this speech I can assure you I will get around to all of you in due time. I think I am quite capable of delivering my own thoughts. If I fail just suggest it to me, please.

All right; I will proceed. The Leader of the Opposition is going to be faced with three or four extremely serious problems. The first one is to be able to say and do something that will be different from what the Liberals are doing and saying.

An hon. Member: He has been invited to join them.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not hesitate for a moment to say it will be next to impossible even for the legal mind of the present Leader of the Opposition to find one single, solitary fundamental difference in any respect whatsoever between his party and the Liberal party. When the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) talked about an alternative he certainly must have been unrealistic to the highest degree. There is no alternative to the Liberal party in the Conservative party; there is in the Conservative party no alternative to the Liberal party in any way, shape or form. I would invite the hon. member for Vancouver South, when he thinks he has had enough preparation, to get up and establish that there is.

The Leader of the Opposition will have this difficulty, too, the difficulty of finding money with which to fight elections. I have an idea that the Liberals pretty well have a monopoly on the one source in the Dominion of Canada from which a party could likely get plenty of money. The Leader of the Opposition will perhaps be able to get a share of that money, but I am not sure; and that is one of the things which will break him down.

He will have this difficulty, also. When he comes to support the proposals he makes he will have the difficulty which I have heard passed across the house for over 21 years: "Well, where would you get the money to do the thing you are advocating? Would you favour an increase in taxes? If so, in what tax?" That is all it is necessary to say, and the Leader of the Opposition will be flattened right down flatter than if a steamroller had run over him.

I am mentioning just two or three of the difficulties this good man is going to face. I do not want to forecast that he will be a broken man in ten years, but if the past is any indication of what the future holds that is exactly what he will be. A man ought to be able to carry on for ten years anyway, I think, without being broken.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: If you will just give me time I will deal with all of you, don't doubt that for a minute.

The leader of the Social Credit party yesterday read item 1 of the Social Credit program. He has done me the honour of asking that I read the second item of that program and this I will now do:

> Get into the hands of Canadian consumers enough purchasing power to buy the goods Canadians produce and, at the same time, see that farmers, fishermen and other producers, and those who would be producers, are able to get the credit necessary to produce in greater and greater abundance, more and more kinds of goods.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this constitutes an alternative. If the Conservatives can figure out how to do this they will then have an alternative to the Liberals; but if they cannot figure out how to do it they will have no alternative to the Liberals, not even anything that looks like an alternative.

I now propose to address myself for a minute or two to this particular item of the Social Credit program for the coming years. This item calls for the implementation of the Social Credit financial technique in Canada.

I suppose I will be told that a recent royal commission in New Zealand killed Social Credit. We had an extravagant writer, named Leiterman or something of the sort, who recently scattered this foolishness all over the pages by saying that such a thing had happened. I might suggest to hon. members that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) will probably take that man all to pieces.

Meanwhile may I say that contrary to Mr. Leiterman and all other wishful thinkers, Social Credit is very much alive. The need for Social Credit is very much alive. Social Credit simply must spread in Canada if freedom is to survive. No one can pretend that at the present time the Liberal government is leading this country toward freedom. If anyone pretends that, he will pretend anything. It is leading it to slavery just as rapidly as it can, slavery of just exactly the kind they suffer over in Russia. It may be doing it by a back-door method but the ultimate end result will be precisely the same.

I do not know anywhere you can go where you will find more terror than that reigning in the heart of the average Canadian working man who is endeavouring to keep his family together. In a country with $29 billion of production we find that men are afraid of losing their jobs, that they will not have sufficient to cover the rapidly increasing cost of living. The result is that there is unhappiness, misery and anxiety in the heart of every man I have contacted in every walk of life. That is just something terribly serious. It stands as a condemnation of the Liberal government.

Just think of the misery being endured by the old age pensioners in this country. Just think of the misery being endured by those in receipt of pensions for the blind. They are faced with rising prices with no evidence at all that there will be a point at which prices will stop rising, or that there is any idea in the minds of Liberals as to how they are going to stop them from rising. The increase gradually goes on. If that is not enough to strike terror into the heart of any person then I must say that I am completely unrealistic.

I wish to say just a word or two concerning Social Credit. Major C. H. Douglas, a world famous engineer, originated Social Credit as a technique. Many people forget that he was a man famous all over the world as an engineer. An engineer is a realist if any man in any occupation is a realist. Major Douglas worked out his Social Credit proposals with mathematical accuracy and a great appreciation and understanding of facts as they were.

Speaking on April 6, 1934, before the agricultural committee of the Alberta legislature, Major Douglas made a statement which should arrest the mind of every man in Canada just as it arrested the minds of nearly all the Alberta people. He said:

> Given the power, either I or dozens of other people could provide you in three months with a scheme which would work perfectly and put Alberta, or Canada, depending on the extent to which it is applied, forever outside the range of poverty.

Mr. Campbell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member could wait I would prefer to have his question at the end of my speech. However, if he really wants to ask it now I will agree to his doing so.

Mr. Campbell: Can the hon. member state why Major Douglas refused to come to Alberta to help the first Social Credit government in Canada?

Mr. Blackmore: One of the principal reasons he did not come to Alberta was that he did not believe in taking social credit into political life. Because Premier Aberhart did believe in that there was created a certain amount of unhappiness between Major Douglas and Premier Aberhart. I would imagine that is just about the most satisfactory explanation. They were both powerful men, they were both dynamic gentlemen, great in every respect. I knew them both; I think that is the explanation. I think almost any person who has had any experience will realize that.

I should have said that the quotation I have read is from page 97 of the evidence taken before the agricultural committee of the Alberta legislature, published in 1934. On that same page 97 he was asked, "What is Social Credit?" and he said:

> Social Credit from the technical point of view is simply the power to monetize real wealth. That is very nearly a complete definition of social financial credit. The power to monetize real wealth is now a monopoly. We want the power to monetize and distribute money to be public property.

It could not be better put although he was speaking extemporaneously at the time. He gave that comprehensive definition of Social Credit. What is the meaning of the expression "monetizing real wealth" as it is used in that quotation? To monetize real wealth means to turn real wealth into money. Ordinarily we think that the only way in which we can turn real wealth such as goods into money is to sell the goods. That is the first thing that orthodox people think about it, but there is another means which Major Douglas had in mind. I should like to give a few examples of this matter of turning real wealth into money.

First there is the ordinary I.O.U. with which every hon. member of the house is familiar. For instance, a man may say, "I.O.U. one ton of coal" or "I.O.U. one hour's work" or "I.O.U. five pounds of sugar." Such an I.O.U. could be passed from one man to another in payment for many things and would probably affect four or five persons before it came back to be honoured by the person who wrote it out. Such an I.O.U. would be a ticket to claim goods or services. Any ticket to claim goods or services is a form of monetizing those goods and services.

It could be passed from one person to another as a medium of exchange, which is the first definition of money.

Then it is a store of value. As long as it stands for five pounds of sugar or one ton of coal it is a store of value. A unit of money such as a one dollar bill is merely a medium of exchange and a ticket to goods. Therefore an I.O.U. made by a man owning a ton of coal or five pounds of sugar is in effect the monetizing of that coal or sugar which he has, and it would be something that could be used as money if people accepted it as such.

Speaking broadly, any person or group of persons who creates or brings into existence any claim to goods or services or any instrument which could be employed as a unit of money is monetizing those goods and services, providing the people concerned are willing to accept that instrument as money. That of course is the all-important point, that the people readily accept it as money.

What are some other examples of units of money in Canadian history created by the monetizing of goods and services? A good many people think Social Credit is something new. It has been in existence almost ever since human beings have been on this earth. May I list a few such examples as they are described in a booklet entitled, "The Story of Canada's Currency", published for the Bank of Canada in 1955. One famous kind of early Canadian currency was Hudson's Bay tokens. From page 8 of the booklet I read:

> Hudson's Bay tokens. These Hudson's Bay Company tokens represented the unit of currency used in the fur trade for many decades. The largest, one "made-beaver", was equal in value to the skin of an adult male beaver in prime condition. Smaller sizes represented one-half, one-quarter and one-eighth "made-beaver". Before these brass tokens came into use, a made-beaver was represented by a stick, a porcupine quill, an ivory disc, a musket ball or anything else agreed upon by trader and trapper. The trapper would be handed a number of the units agreed upon representing the value of his catch and with these would make his purchases from the store. The tokens were designed by George Simpson McTavish of Albany Fort in 1854.

What the Hudson's Bay Company had done there when it made these tokens was to create in effect an I.O.U. which was backed by all the goods the company had in its stores or which the company would have in its stores right up to the time the person who had received the tokens came and recovered the goods. In other words they monetized those goods.

Another famous kind of Canadian currency was playing card money, first issued in 1685 by the French colonial authorities. From page 7 of the booklet I read:

> Although card money began as a short term financial device it was not long before the cards began to circulate among people as a medium of common exchange and later issues of card money were provided with this specific aim in mind. With the passage of time card money became an important part of the currency of French Canada and remained until the fall of Quebec in 1759.

In this case it is not so easy to see that the money created was a monetization of any particular bit of wealth, as was the case with the Hudson's Bay tokens which monetized all the goods in the Hudson's Bay stores. In the case of the French Canadian card money an attempt was made to monetize all the goods and services being produced in the area which was using the card money, because the card money would be a demand or claim on any goods or services in that area. The claim was made good because people accepted the cards as money.

From 1800 to 1855 they began using another kind of money. May I read from page 14 of this same little pamphlet to which I have already referred:

> The demand for currency in these times also stimulated the practice of merchants issuing "bons" good for the face value in merchandise. From 1800 to 1837 a very large part of the small change in circulation consisted of these merchants' tokens.

When the merchant issued one of these tokens he simply monetized the goods which were in his store and would be in his store until such time as the token was brought back to the store to be redeemed in goods. I go on:

> Many were copper penny and half penny tokens of good quality imported from Britain but these were gradually replaced by lighter tokens of copper or brass.

Then further down:

> In the latter period these sometimes took the form of store cards bearing the merchant's name, address and frequently the type of business.

There you have once more tokens, monetizations of goods, instruments of money, instruments of credit created by people with the goods to sell. In the particular town where I grew up there were two stores when I was a small boy, one called H. S. Allen and Company and the other called the Cardston Co-Operative Mercantile Institution. Each of these issued little tokens which they called scrip. We used scrip. I can remember seeing my mother come in with butter and eggs and various other produce, turn them in to the store, receive scrip for the goods, and go out and buy the things she needed to buy with this scrip. It was good. There was no need of having gold behind it. There was no need of having the Bank of Canada behind it or the Dominion of Canada behind it. The scrip was accepted almost readily as cash.

Mr. Byrne: In the next town?

Mr. Blackmore: It depended on whether there was an understanding between that town and the next town, but in that town it was accepted as cash. Presumably if you had scrip issued by the Dominion of Canada it would be accepted in the next town, in the next province and all across the country. What we are endeavouring to do now is to show what we mean by monetizing wealth. I think that makes it clear to anyone.

Mr. Byrne: No.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, my hon. friend may need a special course. I will give him a few detention classes after school. In two of the illustrations I used, the backing was goods and services. In the case of the playing cards the backing was the total production of the whole area in which the playing cards were being used, just as a dollar bill in Canada today is a ticket to any kind of goods or services you can name from one coast of Canada to the other, and that is all it is. That is all it needs to be. No one ever calls for the dollar of gold behind a Bank of Canada dollar. It would be foolish to do so. Once we know we can buy anything we want to use we are satisfied. We accept the dollar bill, and it is a good dollar bill because it has plenty of goods behind it.

The only thing we have to worry about under these circumstances is that the price remains stable. Everyone in the house knows that the Canadian dollar bill has lost practically one-half of its value in the last ten years and that under the glorious Liberal government with all its splendid capacity to govern the people right and maintain freedom! I would think that ought to sober even the most enthusiastic Liberal. It is important to have the goods to back the money and to keep the price stable. Then the money can be made of paper or, as was the case with the Hudson's Bay Company, even porcupine quills.

I propose to leave other things I could say concerning the Canadian financial system and come down to the finance act. Those who have read the financial history of Canada remember that in 1868 there was passed what was called the Dominion Notes Act. The Dominion Notes Act empowered the government of Canada to create tickets, "made-beavers", if you like, "playing card money", if you like, dollars that would be acceptable from coast to coast in Canada. When we come down to 1914 we find that there was passed, as a measure in connection with the war, the finance act of 1914, later re-enacted by the Liberals as the finance act of 1923.

Here are some of the things that were done under the finance act of 1914. They issued $26 million of bills backed by railway securities and spent them into circulation as part of the national revenue. They created $10 million in bills backed by nothing in particular except the credit of Canada, namely the ability of Canada in that case to deliver goods and services. They created $50 million in 1917 and bought horses, harness, grain and other supplies that were needed in conducting the war and sent those goods over to Britain. Britain used them to fight the war. Those $50 million were good money. The farmers who received them had no objection. They were just as good as any other money. They had nothing behind them except that they were a claim on goods in Canada.

What could be done under the finance act of 1914 one would certainly think would be possible to be done in Canada today. If it is not possible today in Canada to do what was done in 1914, then whoever thinks it is not, had better prepare himself to stand before this house and justify his position with great care.

Social Credit need not hesitate for a minute to talk about creating money. It has been done all through Canadian history.

One of the important things concerning this 1914 act and what was done under it was this. Much of the money was spent into circulation. That $50 million, that $26 million and that $10 million could have been used to pay old age pensions. It could have been used in bringing down the price of goods by a discount. It was spent into circulation.

We went on under the finance act re-enacted in 1923 by a Liberal government. Just at this point may I recall that it was a Conservative government that enacted the finance act of 1914, and that it was a Liberal government which had seen the act in operation all during world war I, which re-enacted it as the finance act of 1923, notwithstanding the fact that they might have been suspected of having political animosity toward the legislation because they did not introduce it. If that is not clear proof that our forefathers of 1914 and 1923 saw the possibilities of the government creating money and spending it into circulation, backed only by goods and services and the producing capacity of the country, then where would you go to find evidence that would prove anything?

What is the limit of creating and circulating such money? The general limit of it must be the amount of goods there are in the country. Since money, after all, is a ticket to goods, a claim to goods, it would be dangerous and unsocial to create more money than there were goods. On the other hand, if it is desired to be able to create more money and have it in the country, the first thing we must look after is the production of more goods. If the Minister of Finance at the present time were budgeting on a basis of that sort and were wondering where he was going to get the money to pay twice as big old age pensions, the first thing he would do would be to look into the matter of increasing Canada's production by an amount large enough to justify the creation of the necessary money. Thus he would have in his hands a means whereby he could bring about any kind of condition of prosperity within the country by the simple device of increasing production.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member if it is not a fact that production in Canada has grown in the last few years to such a proportion that we have a problem because of it?

Mr. Blackmore: We have two or three different kinds of problems. Of course if we create things which we are obliged to sell abroad, then there is difficulty there. But why not concentrate on the things that people are going to be using? If we are going to provide double the old age pension, why not produce the food, the clothing, the shelter and the various other kinds of things that old age pensioners need right within the country? And if we happen not to be producing a particular kind of goods now, why not concentrate on beginning to produce it? Thus we would have a realistic approach to this whole matter. I am making a suggestion which I think is perfectly sound. As the hon. member for Peace River so well showed, if it is found that there is a great inventory of many kinds of goods in Canada, why can we not create money, put it into the hands of the old age pensioners, and let them buy some of those goods? There is no answer. There is no answer to the Social Credit position all the way through.

Let us now take the Bank of Canada, which was set up in 1934 under the act passed in that year, and see what has been done under the Bank of Canada. The Bank of Canada, when it was set up, had the power to create money almost limitlessly. The one thing that stood in the way was that a certain amount of gold was required. But as the result of amendments to the act which were made in 1940, I am told, the Bank of Canada no longer is obliged to have gold as a backing for money. The Bank of Canada can take a $1 million dominion bond, turn it into money and let the government have that $1 million and spend it as part of the national revenue if there are enough goods to spend it on; and there will be no cost except for the little bit of paper, ink and so on involved. This is extremely important. What Social Crediters say is this. Since we have this Bank of Canada with all the power which the finance act had, in the name of common sense, and in the interests of Canada why not use it not only to lend to people money with which to produce, but let people have it with which to buy up to the point where they buy either what they need, or all there is to buy. That is the Social Credit position. It is simple.

Having indicated what is the centre, the pivot, the heart or the core of the Social Credit idea, namely the creation of money to represent goods, may I now turn to the financial technique of Social Credit? When money is created the first thing that is done with it is to bring down the price of goods to the consumer. If you are worried about the rise in prices, why not use the compensated discount to bring down the price of goods? Why not? The result would be exemplified by this: If it be found that a pair of shoes is being sold at $10 and we want to bring the price down to $9, why not give to the merchant instructions that he may sell that pair of shoes for $9, turn in the bill to the bank and be compensated with $1 and given credit for $10? Then the bank will turn in the bill to the Receiver General of Canada and receive the $1. In this way, by the simple use of this government power to create money, the price of shoes would be brought down 10 per cent.

The same kind of principle could be applied to all the goods in Canada, bringing down the price of those goods. We are not obliged to be absolutely slaves to these conditions which are arising around us and causing so much difficulty. Would that course not be far better sense than to let the Bank of Canada raise the discount rate and force up the interest to people who are producing, thereby forcing up the cost of production and forcing up the cost of goods, and then hypocritically call that inflation?

Now, the hon. member for Peace River reminds me that it would be optional for the merchant to do that sort of thing, but Social Credit is based on the principle of co-operation. Surely people have sense enough to co-operate when they see something is to their advantage. If they do not, let them wait for a while until they have lost their trade through the competition of others who are co-operating.

The third principle of Social Credit is this. If the amount of money which is in circulation in the country as a result of the compensated discount and as a result of the money which is lent out for production in the form of farm loans and the like is not enough to enable the people of Canada as a whole to buy the production of Canada up to the desirable point, then issue the people dividends of created money, personal issues of purchasing power, which will enable them to buy up to the point at which consumption in Canada will equate the production in Canada.

The people will naturally ask, has this Social Credit ever been tried? I say, not under that name. For some most interesting reason the people who have money, and certain great forces that are seeking to enslave the world, are fighting Social Credit with a vigour that the fiends from the infernal pit would envy. They have such control over the press and the other means of teaching people that they delude people and keep them from accepting Social Credit and entering into a state of prosperity and security which is right here if we only had the wisdom to adopt the measures to make it available to the people of Canada.

Mr. Campbell: What would all this do to the value of our money in world markets?

Mr. Blackmore: The value of our money in world markets—that is a very good question. The value of the Canadian dollar on world markets is the value in Canada. If your dollar will buy, for example—I am striking out at random—three pounds of raisins on the Canadian market, well a person in the United States can buy three pounds of raisins with it just as well. The money would be worth just as much to him as it would be to us. The value of Canadian money in the world market depends on Canada's ability to deliver the goods or services to cover that money and on Canada's ability to keep her prices stable so the person who gets Canadian money is not going to be the loser. That is simple enough. We do not send our money out very much, anyway. We turn our money into United States money or French money or the money of any other country with which we deal and send their money out. The value of our money and their money depends on the value in terms of goods in our own country.

I was going to go into some detail in speaking about some of the great schemes that have been tried successfully throughout the world. The Guernsey island experiment was most impressive in respect of the things it was capable of achieving while that experiment was in progress. The British Bradbury experiment was a surprisingly successful experiment in the use of state money. All the banks in Britain notified the government in 1914 that they were having to close their doors. The British government created one pound notes called Bradburys, sent them to the banks and said, let the people who come for their money have these. They will be good. There were £354 million of that money printed and circulated in Britain during world war I. With that money she won the war, and with that money she would have won the peace if wisdom had prevailed amongst the men who were managing Britain's money. As it was, they turned the whole issue over to the Bank of England, with exactly the results you would expect from the Bank of England.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I am a little diffident about following the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) with their obvious rhetorical abilities. I always do find myself a little nonplussed after listening to the hon. member for Lethbridge. I thought I might apply to join that course along with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) and learn something.

Mr. Blackmore: You would be very welcome and it would be highly profitable.

Mr. Enfield: That may be, because if what the hon. member for Lethbridge says is true of the party in official opposition it does not look as though it is going to be much of a moving force in the future in Canadian politics. The hon. member's charge that there is no difference between the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative party can be quickly cleared by an alliance between his group and the other groups.

Mr. Blackmore: That would be impossible, unless the Conservatives could come and join us.

Mr. Enfield: At least then we might see some sharp differences in policies and platforms.

However, it is a privilege, Mr. Speaker, to have this opportunity to speak in the debate on the reply to the speech from the throne. It is a privilege and a duty, a duty I think to say something of what the people are feeling and thinking in one's own particular constituency and area, to do your best to try to put across what they feel to be the important political and governmental considerations. I think this debate, more than any other, gives us an opportunity to do just that. Before I commence on that I want to take the opportunity of sincerely congratulating the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They come from widely separated parts of the country and exhibited a sense of urgency in their well-prepared addresses in regard to the problems with which they are faced. They showed also a degree of aggressiveness and optimism, particularly in the case of the hon. member for Gloucester, that was very refreshing in this house. Altogether they embodied a spirit of cohesion and unity that I hope will always remain the same in so far as our great party is concerned.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, traditionally one should say something about one's own constituency. I want to do this in relation to two matters in particular, because I cannot cover the whole gamut of the measures that are proposed in the throne speech. First of all I want to discuss Canadian foreign policy, because I think that now the Middle East situation has more or less found a temporary calmness, it is a good time to bring to bear the thoughts one has in that regard. Second, I want to talk about something that is entirely unrelated, and that is the question of taxation for education on the municipal level. I chose these two subjects because I think it is about those two matters that people are feeling most strongly in the metropolitan area with which I am acquainted.

First of all I just want to take a moment to acquaint you with two or three physical facts about the constituency I represent. Hon. members will be glad to know that the Scarborough bluffs are still standing. I received a copy of the preliminary population totals for the Dominion of Canada showing changes in population in the municipalities in Canada that are most interesting.

I noted that in the municipality of Scarborough we had an increase from 56,000 to 139,000 in the years 1951 to 1956. That is an increase of 83,000 people. In the municipality of North York, a great part of which is included in the constituency of York-Scarborough, we had an increase in population in those years from 85,000 to 168,000, again, oddly enough, an increase of 83,000 people. That gives the house an idea of the tremendous growth that is taking place in the population. If you look through the list of municipalities across the country, with the exception of the township of Etobicoke in the metropolitan area of Toronto I do not think you will find any place with anywhere near a similar increase in population. Hon. members can understand the problems that arise when such a condition occurs, and not necessarily just political problems, in trying to meet and know the 83,000 new people.

We are very prolific in this area, but I imagine that apart from the natural growth a great number of the people moved into the area from outside. The problems arising from this growth are very difficult to handle. From the federal point of view we have the usual one of postal service. It has taken a great deal of one's time to cope with the situation in so far as the delivery of mail is concerned, which is a most important function of the federal government. We have had an increase of 30,000 in actual points of call on door to door delivery in my constituency alone. We have just finished constructing a new post office in Scarborough, and no sooner had we opened it than it was filled to capacity. It will shortly require an extension, making it twice the size it is now. I have urged the Post Office Department to undertake a survey in another great part of the constituency which is growing rapidly. This survey is to commence very shortly. I would encourage the Post Office Department to develop a sense of urgency about the need for this postal service.

It is not always easy for the civil service here in Ottawa to visualize the extent of this growth that is taking place. It is not easy for people who have a particular job to do, and who are busy doing that particular job, to make themselves go out and initiate proceedings and surveys that in the final analysis are going to mean more work and more problems for themselves. I do find that the post office department in Toronto need a great deal of encouragement to initiate activity that will provide the increase in services that we so greatly need.

Problems of transportation also arise. We have, I think, about 56 level crossings in the township of Scarborough alone, at one of which there was a recent fatality. We know that it is well nigh impossible to get the money to provide underpasses and do away with level crossings. I think the report we received last year stated that it would cost $600 million merely to convert 10 per cent of the existing grade crossings. Obviously this points to a need for more thinking on the part of those responsible for proper protection devices at the existing grade crossings. We have also been urging that this be done.

On the economic side, employment is satisfactory in my constituency. There have been some soft spots in certain businesses such as the building trades. I do not want to deal at length with the situation in house construction at this time, though I would like to speak on it later in the session, but it is a fact that the so-called tight money policy of the government has created quite a change in the building industry in those fast-growing areas. You have all read recently of the demise, or should I say bankruptcy, of the largest real estate trading firm in the dominion. I think that was a situation where, because of over extension of credit facilities, or over extension of the use of credit, the firm found itself in close juxtaposition with this tight money policy and could not obtain that credit. This will result in the slowing down of the development of great areas of land where normally a great deal of house building would take place.

I am not saying that this is right or wrong. I am saying, however, that monetary policy, and the method we are using in dealing with it, represents a fairly new science, and I would urge the government to keep a careful eye on its means of measuring the impact of the policy it has instituted so it can decide just when to draw the line and encourage the opposite effect to take place. I think that is the theory, to use what monetary means you have at your disposal to try to iron out the peaks and valleys; but the problem is, when do you make your move? I have great confidence that the government will not let the tight money policy go so far as to cause a decrease particularly in house building, which I think is the basis of our economy, to the point where it is going to create a hardship on anyone.

I have digressed a little from my original plan, and I want to go back and talk briefly on the question of Canada's foreign policy, with particular reference to the Middle East situation. In this debate on the speech from the throne many members have mentioned this subject. In the past three years that has not always been done. In fact in the past I have never felt competent to discuss it at all. I think we all suffer in various degrees from a lack of personal knowledge of and personal experience with the facts that govern foreign policy, which prevents us from feeling overly confident to discuss the subject; therefore I wish to state my view very briefly.

It is this. In this last crisis there was a great divergence of opinion among the people in my constituency as to the action taken by the United Kingdom. There was a sharp cleavage, in fact. The interesting thing about it was that people were either all for the move on the one hand or all against it on the other, with very few taking a sort of neutral watching ground in between. This resulted in widespread confusion on the subject and the result of the action that was taken in the Middle East. It was followed by a depressed attitude owing to the cleavage between the emotions perhaps, on the one hand, where the feeling was to back the move, and on the other the reasoning which suggested that we had suffered an obvious loss of prestige and power in the Middle East that resulted from the sequence of events.

It was from this position that the people looked to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for their leadership in this crisis. I know I can report very accurately that public opinion in my constituency, and I think everywhere in Canada, is enthusiastic in its acclaim of the stand taken by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this crisis, and is unanimous in the feeling that as a result Canada has gained in stature in world leadership. But to be fair we must emphasize that people were shocked and indeed appalled at the rapid transposition that took place from a solid group forming the western alliance to a position in the United Nations wherein overnight great stresses and strains developed and we found the United States taking a stand directly opposite to the stand taken by Great Britain. I think it showed to many people that the United Nations has a long way to go. I believe it revealed great weaknesses in the United Nations organization, and I am convinced that people still have a feeling of insecurity and uncertainty as a result. We in Canada have given our support unstintingly to the United Nations. In some respects we have had the ground knocked out from under our feet by the events that have taken place; and we must not forget this, because it means we have to urge our leaders in the United Nations, our Canadian representatives, to do everything possible to strengthen this organization, to suggest policies and forms of activity that will make it a stronger working group so that with a feeling of security and conviction we can back a group which we know is going to be an effective international body.

After all, the whole principle on which our foreign policy is based is one of containment of the Russian power and its satellites, a policy of containment based on the philosophy that things do not always remain the same, that with the passage of time there will be a softening of the attitude of those we call the enemy and a modus operandi arrived at whereby the two groups, or perhaps three groups in our world, will find themselves able to work completely together and there will be lasting peace. That type of philosophy depends entirely on building up a solid western alliance and a true United Nations group.

We would like, then, in our constituency the following questions to be answered in regard to foreign policy. To what extent can Canada make its own independent influence felt in the United Nations? Must the question always be "As the United States goes so goes the United Nations"? What is the meaning of the unilateral action taken by the United States in recent days in the Middle East? What is happening to NATO? Will the combination of the current economic crisis in Britain and the reduction of French and British forces in Europe drastically alter the course of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization? These are questions that I myself, and I think my constituents, would like to see answered, and if there are no positive answers we would like to see these questions thoroughly explored.

I would like now, Mr. Speaker, to turn to the other portion of my submission in this debate, which is entirely unrelated to what has gone before. As I said previously, this portion of my address concerns the field of taxation with regard to education in the metropolitan area. There was reference in the throne speech to an increase in grants for certain types of education, and this is something I believe everyone was pleased to see. From time to time there is a wide and insistent expression of opinion from provincial and municipal authorities that the federal government should do something in order to aid education. I find these expressions of opinion are not always accompanied by information that would make it possible to give every consideration to the request.

For example, I received a letter some time ago from the board of control of the city of Toronto requesting that the city be given greater aid through the taxation of federally-owned properties in the city. There was nothing in that letter to indicate what the impact would be of such aid, what it would mean in terms of increasing tax revenues. I found on reading the Globe and Mail yesterday morning that the city may gain about $800,000 under this measure that is mentioned in the throne speech.

I think the fundamental question here is this. If these bodies are going to ask for further financial aid from the federal government in a field that is historically and legally that of the province and municipality, then we are put in a position where we have to examine the entire financial structure of the province and municipality themselves. We cannot simply say, "Well, fine, you need aid, and we will give you aid". We have a responsibility for these trust moneys that we call taxes to the people from whom we collect them. We have only a certain legal basis on which we can expend them; therefore we must look into the method the provinces employ in collecting and expending taxes, or receive full information from the provinces as to just why they find themselves unable to carry out what has always been their job, a job of which they are very jealous in many parts of the country.

Despite this, when it is said, "Why do we not do something to aid education," the fact that we are aiding education considerably seems to be completely ignored. In the 1955-56 session of parliament I put a question on the order paper. I want to read it now because I received an extremely full answer, and I think it is very revealing. The question appears at page 3728 of Hansard for May 9, 1956, and reads as follows:

During the fiscal year 1955-56, what sums of money by way of outright grants, bursaries, scholarships and loans were expended by the federal government directly in aid of education in Canada, including grants for assistance to Indians and Eskimos; (a) by each department of government in each province, for aid to university students, and including professional training; (b) by each department of government in each province for education on the secondary and elementary school levels?

I tried to cover all aspects of education in the question because on going through the estimates I found that grants, scholarships, bursaries and loans were scattered all the way through the different departments of government for various courses and aspects of education. I cannot possibly put on the record all the details of the information that is contained in the answer. The total aid to education provided by the government in the year 1955-56 amounted to over $28 million. I should like to place on record what has been spent in the various provinces, because it may be of some value to hon. members. The expenditures to the nearest thousand dollars were as follows:

British Columbia	$2,989,000
Alberta	2,261,000
Saskatchewan	1,862,000
Manitoba	1,437,000
Ontario	7,228,000
Quebec	2,952,000
New Brunswick	739,000
Nova Scotia	1,007,000
Prince Edward Island	123,000
Newfoundland	422,000
Yukon	76,000
Northwest Territories	1,025,000

It will be seen that we are expending considerable amounts in our efforts to aid education. It is not true to say that we are doing nothing in this field. These expenditures are spread out through the departments because these totals are made up of a tremendous number of small detailed propositions for education. I would suggest it might be a good idea to channel them through a single minister of the crown. I am not suggesting that one minister should have the responsibility of initiating all such measures; I am not suggesting that one minister should be responsible for dealing with all such measures, but I do suggest that there be one gathering point where the public and hon. members could look at a list and see just what is being done, what is being spent and where it is being spent.

I do not think this list shows much of a trend in so far as the division or separating of this money is concerned. There is one grant to universities made by the Department of Finance which amounts to some $8 million, and which now presumably will amount to something like $16 million. This is based on a formula so far as the division of the money is concerned, but that is not so with the rest of these expenditures. I make this suggestion because the public in inquiring of the federal government as to what is available for education must find it most difficult to ascertain just what is taking place.

Coming back to the province, if I may take just one or two more minutes on this subject, it has been suggested that there should be further aid for education. At one time the province of Ontario agreed to pay to the municipalities 50 per cent of the cost of education. I have obtained some figures of the actual grants, and I find that in 1945 the province to the municipalities paid some 54 per cent of those costs for education. I find also that in 1954-55 the grants for education by the province of Ontario came to some 34 per cent of the moneys spent by municipalities for that purpose.

This is quite a drastic change. What is the reason? We do not know. We are being asked to provide more money for education without any explanation of why this proposed division of the cost of education as between the province and the municipalities has broken down. Is it that educational costs have risen too steeply? Is it that the revenues of the province have not been so controlled as to increase in the manner in which they should? Is the province not sufficiently taxing certain industries—the mines, perhaps, and the lumbering and forest industry? Are the revenues not sufficiently stable and equitable from all sources in the province? We do not know the answers to those questions, and we cannot exercise proper and good judgment in regard to these constant requests for educational aid unless they are answered properly by the provinces and the municipalities.

These are my submissions in the throne speech debate. I venture to suggest that when the vote is taken in the next few days the government will receive a resounding vote of confidence in regard to its activities.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I extend the usual congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Next, I should like to extend my warm personal congratulations to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on his election to the high office of leader of the party of which I am a member. The hon. member for Prince Albert follows a long line of illustrious leaders of the Conservative party in Canada, and I know will be making a notably great contribution as leader of the Conservative party and as a prime minister of Canada in the years ahead.

At the same time, sir, may I express my deep personal regrets at the enforced retirement of Hon. George Drew as leader of my party due to ill health. Mr. Drew made a notable contribution to our country, to the party which he led and to parliament itself during his many years in office.

My main purpose tonight is to review the recent past and the near-term future of the great new Canadian industry which makes its headquarters in Calgary. I refer, of course, to western Canada's oil and gas industry, which has made Calgary one of the two fastest growing cities in Canada and earned for my home city the title of Canada's oil capital.

Before doing that I have a few comments to make concerning the C.P.R. strike, which is having a serious effect upon every phase of Canada's economy. In the west grain shipments have slowed down, aggravating the problems of our great agricultural industry which provides the broad base of the western economy. In a number of manufacturing industries in Alberta and elsewhere in the west cut-backs in production and in employment are already in effect because of the C.P.R. strike, and the situation will become far more serious over the next few days unless the strike is settled among industries dependent upon the C.P.R. for the transport of raw materials and finished products.

On strike are some 3,000 members of the firemen's union over the issue of whether or not firemen should be retained on diesel-powered freight and yard engines. The issue might also be summed up in this way. Should the railways and their workers keep pace with other industries and their workers in the trend toward automation and greater efficiency, consistent with adequate safety measures, in a world and especially in a country like Canada where competition in trade and in transport is tight and where manpower to build the future is in short supply?

Only 3,000 are on strike, but over 70,000 C.P.R. employees are off the payroll as a result of the complete shut-down the strike involves. Rapidly increasing thousands of non-railwaymen are losing jobs in other industries because of the strike. The cost to Canada's economy and to every citizen of our country grows heavier every hour.

This government has shown little willingness so far to face up to the real issue involved, to put the interests of all of Canada ahead of any other consideration and get the C.P.R. back in operation by application of firm and courageous government policy. The government seems to be relying upon public opinion to push it into action and to determine the specific kind of action that should be taken.

Back in 1950 the Conservative group in the house proposed the improvement and modernization of the machinery for the conciliation of industrial disputes. The government voted down the proposal. Since then neither labour nor management has known with any certainty the government's labour dispute policies. Certainly there has been no government policy in so far as the effective handling of problems arising from automation and changing industrial trends are concerned. Issues such as wages or working conditions between labour and management can ordinarily be resolved by normal conciliation or bargaining practices. But can the same be said for issues such as automation, technological changes, related safety measures and so forth? Why has not this government, knowing full well that considerations other than wages and other normal matters of difference existed so far as the C.P.R. and the firemen's union were concerned, taken adequate steps in advance of this tragic strike to create machinery for the proper resolving by an authority independent of the two sides to the dispute of the matters at issue?

Certainly the basic point of dispute between the firemen's union and the railway is one that cannot possibly be solved by a strike, for a strike, regardless of which side wins out, does not and cannot resolve in equity and fairness the merits and demerits of automation or safety measures which are at issue. Regardless of where our individual sympathies may lie as between the railway and union positions, the majority of Canadians at least recognize that the issue is a somewhat technical one calling for the application of careful study on an unbiased basis by a qualified commission. Both sides to the dispute in fact agree to that extent. So also to that extent does the government now seem to agree in its position as representative of the most vitally interested party of all, the general public of Canada.

Speaking as an individual member of parliament and in no other capacity, I say to both the union and the C.P.R. management: If you believe your case is right, if you believe it can stand up under the harsh light of critical examination by a competent, unbiased public board, then back your faith now by voluntarily agreeing to present all the facts and arguments to that unbiased board and to abide by the decision of that board. I refer to the technical issue of the need or lack of it for firemen on diesel engines for efficient operation, and the related technical issue of adequate safety measures for railwaymen, property and the public. In the meantime, restore the status quo and get the railway back in operation.

To the government I say this: Show more courage and leadership than you have to date to get Canada back on the rails. Quit waiting for public opinion to force you into decisive action on this particular problem and the far broader question of modernized government machinery to assist in the fair and equitable resolving of technological problems such as those now facing Canada, plus much better machinery for the resolving without compulsion of the more normal differences on wages and other matters which arise from time to time between labour and management.

The Conservative party back in 1950 and at various times since has given the government a sound basis for a better labour dispute policy. I urge the government to end its dilly-dallying by concrete action now. Or are we on this side of the house and the Canadian public generally to assume that the government has not solved the railway problem but has quietly helped to relieve Canada's shortage of steel for industry by giving away that steel that should have been retained in the collective government backbone?

Departing from the railroad strike, I should like to make a few comments on the western Canadian oil and gas industry, give a brief review of the past and take a look at the present and the near-term future for what has become Canada's No. 1 mineral-producing industry and western Canada's No. 2 industry, second, of course, to agriculture in terms of revenue and employment.

First let me deal with revenue. In 1956 this industry in western Canada poured out a record $404 million worth of crude oil and other liquid petroleum products, an average of about $1,122,000 a day. In the current year, 1957, production revenues should climb to substantially over half a billion dollars. The rate of growth is all the more remarkable when we consider that in 1947, a decade ago, when the Leduc discovery set off the boom, production amounted to only $18 million yearly. By 1955 it had climbed to $307 million for that year, and rose by a third again in 1956.

Offsetting the revenue is investment. Into the western Canadian economy in 1956 the host of members—hundreds of them—of the oil and gas industry pumped an investment of around $700 million for exploration, development, land, pipe lines and refineries, an amount far in excess of the former record of just over a half a billion dollars set in 1955. A decade ago the investment rate was only $12 million yearly. In 1957 over-all investment should come close to the 1956 record, with gas and oil pipe-line construction helping to offset some curtailment in exploration and development spendings.

Along with revenue and investment, of course, has come production. In terms of oil production, the normal rate of growth has been accelerated in recent months by the Middle East crisis which has forced a reshuffling of world oil supply lines to offset the closing of the Suez canal in Egypt, the closing of three of the four oil pipe lines crossing Syria to the Mediterranean, and Saudi Arabia's embargo on its oil deliveries to British and French markets. Canada's role in this crisis, so far as oil is concerned, has been and is delivery of its oil to various North American and Asian markets in order to free Venezuelan and United States gulf coast oil for delivery to hard-pressed Europe.

Largely because of offshore shipments from Vancouver to California and Japan, and increased deliveries to the United States midwest, western Canada's oil production climbed to an average of 509,000 barrels daily during the final quarter of 1956, which was about 52,000 barrels a day more than during the first nine months of the year. The net result of this was a 1956 daily average production of 470,000 barrels, which was about 110,000 barrels a day more than that of 1955.

During the first quarter of 1957 production is expected to advance a further 58,000 barrels a day over the late 1956 rate to around 567,000 barrels daily, and to hold around this level until the final quarter of the year, when additions to pipe lines and refinery facilities will permit a step-up to somewhere between 623,000 barrels and 658,000 barrels per day.

The actual volume late this year will depend a good deal on the speed with which world oil supply lines and ocean transport costs are restored to normalcy. Normalcy, however, will not involve loss by Canada of the production gains it is registering during the present emergency; for the growing hunger in North America, and the probable adoption by the United States of a continental oil policy, will leave Canadian oil relatively free to expand its markets in both Canadian and American areas within economic reach. A continental policy for oil and gas, which I have long advocated in this house, has been winning support in such vital bodies as the United States office of defence mobilization as a result of the impact of the Middle East oil crisis.

A measure of the importance of western Canadian oil to the nation and to the free world is given by the fact that in early 1957, just one decade since Leduc's discovery, production will be running at a rate 30 times greater than that of 10 years ago, and during this year daily yield will increase by a further amount three to five times greater than our west's entire production of pre-Leduc days.

Mr. Speaker, production also involves a matter of price. Along with the oil supply crisis, particularly in Europe, the Middle East situation has brought some fantastic boosts in oil transport costs by tanker, throwing the normal competitive factors of world oil pricing out of kilter. Markets for western hemisphere oil have been tightening as the result of big boosts in production to help supply Europe. These factors have directly brought on in recent weeks increases in wellhead prices for oil in Venezuela, California and the United States midwest, and in the past week have brought on a general increase averaging 35 cents per barrel in Texas, Louisiana and the other major United States producing states. These increases are somewhat less than might have applied if the full rise in ocean transport costs were taken into account.

This general rise in United States oil prices in the past few days will likely bring on an increase in western Canadian oil prices in the immediate future, probably somewhere in the range between 20 cents and 30 cents per barrel. The Canadian oil price structure is tied competitively to that of the United States, whose oil is the alternative supply for the major markets in North America where our oil competes. The United States held oil prices in major areas constant for the last three years until last week, despite rising costs of industry operation, wages, steel and so forth, while Canadian producers had gradually to reduce their wellhead prices in order to expand their marketing area. Now the move will be in the opposite direction. Incidentally, western Canadian oil prices will continue to be around 10 per cent to 12 per cent lower than wellhead prices in the major United States producing areas. The higher crude oil costs will likely mean about one cent per gallon increase in gasoline and other petroleum products costs in the United States and Canada. These boosts started in the United States last week, and likely will start in Canada very shortly.

An extremely important point about the growth of this industry has been the growth of oil exports. Exports of our western Canadian oil to foreign markets, mainly in contiguous areas of the United States, more than doubled in 1956 to an average of over 112,500 barrels daily, compared to only 51,000 barrels daily in 1955 and only 8,000 barrels daily in 1954, when exports commenced. United States dollar payments for the 1956 exports are estimated at nearly $120 million for the 40 million barrels moved beyond Canada's borders, thus putting oil into the top half dozen of foreign exchange earners for Canada.

During 1957 Canada's oil exports are expected nearly to double again, and should average at least 198,000 barrels daily for this year, but may run as high as 213,000 barrels. During the early part of this year exports should average 185,000 barrels daily, and will climb as more transport and processing facilities become available, perhaps reaching as high as a quarter of a million barrels later this year.

The greater volume of export, plus some rise in price levels, may make our western oil in 1957 a quarter billion dollar foreign exchange earner. Fully a third of Canada's 1957 production will find its way to foreign markets, with as much as 10,000 barrels daily on an average going to Japan, and the balance to the United States Pacific coast and midwest areas. Canada's rapidly rising foreign exchange return from oil exports, and the continuing heavy inflow of foreign capital for natural resource development, are vital factors in preventing a grave worsening of Canada's imbalance between exports and imports.

During recent months the Middle East crisis eliminated the cushion in pipe-line transport capacity east and west from our oil territory, as demand for oil brought capacity into full use. The crisis also speeded up plans for expansion of transport systems, particularly by the Trans Mountain pipe line across the Rockies. A looping program will start this year that could, within two to three years, bring a complete second parallel oil line to the Pacific. The Interprovincial pipe line running east from Alberta will be extended this summer from Sarnia into Toronto, tying in with refinery expansion at Toronto to permit Canadian oil to displace foreign oil in a larger share of the eastern Ontario market. Interprovincial will also complete its looping program across the prairies this year, to enable winter deliveries by the year end to both eastern Canada and the United States midwest.

In 1957-58 there will be greater expansion of certain Canadian refineries using western Canadian oil, further contributing to the growth of this vital Canadian industry. But the biggest single market boost over the next three years is going to be the United States Pacific northwest. Here construction will start this year of at least two major refineries with a capacity totalling over 100,000 barrels daily and one or two more will likely start construction soon after.

Of course we cannot consider oil without touching also on natural gas. The first major export of western Canadian natural gas, Mr. Speaker, to both Canadian and United States markets will actually commence in the second half of this year. Thus will come the start of the realization of dreams and plans in existence for nearly nine years, since the first gas pipe line was proposed and started running into political and economic roadblocks. The flow of gas from the Peace river region of Alberta and British Columbia will start this summer through the first completed major gas line, Westcoast Transmission Company's 650-mile line across the Rockies to Vancouver and the United States border, where it will connect with the recently completed Pacific Northwest pipe-line system. Gas from southern Alberta will start its movement eastward this year through the prairie sections of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines system, and during 1958-59 will probably reach into eastern Canada and the midwest United States in large volume.

Westcoast licked its major problems in 1956. It completed adequate gas sales contracts in British Columbia and the United States, successfully completed its financing and started construction. The line is now 70 per cent completed, and construction will be completed this spring and summer, with operation to start by late summer. In the meantime, through the Pacific Northwest pipe line United States gas is now reaching Vancouver. This flow will be reversed when Westcoast completes its Peace river line.

Within the next three weeks Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will launch the public financing of its 2,250-mile system, with reasonable assurance that the financing will be successful. One of the company's toughest economic problems, the politically-dictated all-Canadian route through 1,000 miles of limited-market Northern Ontario, was offset last spring by the Ontario-federal government plan covering that section of the system to ease the financial strain during the early tough years of market build-up. The other problem, access to United States midwest markets to provide revenue to help carry the Canadian system at lowest possible gas costs to Canadian consumers, is still being battled out before the United States federal power commission, but it is now fairly evident that mutual Canadian-United States economic and defence interests ensure that access will be obtained in the relatively near future, either in the form presently proposed or in some modification of it.

During 1956, with the help of short-term advances from the Canadian government, Trans-Canada started construction of its system across Saskatchewan and Manitoba, but the United States steel strike held back pipe deliveries and prevented completion to Winnipeg before the onset of winter halted construction. By then 227 miles of pipe line had been completed. Construction will resume this spring as soon as weather permits, and gas should be as far as Winnipeg late this summer. In the meantime, Trans-Canada has successfully completed arrangements for the sale of its senior bonds to United States and Canadian insurance companies, subject to certain revisions in its gas purchase contract demanded by a key insurance firm. By this week contracts for over 80 per cent of the gas had been renegotiated in line with these requirements, and the balance will probably be completed shortly.

The new terms involved no change in prices to be paid for gas, but do involve changes in volumes committed for by Trans-Canada on a take or pay basis. They involve an additional hardship for gas producers on top of that imposed by the fairly low start in prices dictated by the all-Canadian route, but are accepted by producers as part of the price they must pay to help free Canadian gas from its shackles and thus speed the building of a great new phase of the Canadian oil and gas industry. To the extent that they are ready and willing to do so, Canadians across the nation will have their biggest single opportunity to date to invest in a major gas or oil transport system when Trans-Canada's public offer is made within the next three weeks. The offering will total $120 million, including $40 million in common stock and $80 million in junior bonds set up in a stock-bond package.

Canadians can, if they desire, buy a substantial majority of the total equity stock to be issued by Trans-Canada on terms comparable to those under which capital has been subscribed by the several major and independent oil and gas firms who are Trans-Canada's present shareholders. The same opportunity will be extended soon after, primarily to Alberta citizens, in the financing of the Alberta gas trunk pipe line which will gather gas in Alberta for delivery to Trans-Canada at the Saskatchewan border.

Neither of these, sir, are get rich quick schemes, but they do appear to have a fairly solid long-term future. They represent not only a good, long-term opportunity to share Canada's future, but also a definite challenge to those Canadians critical of a heavy foreign capital flavour in Canadian resource development, and those who have decried what they term a shortage of opportunities for Canadians to invest in and control major resource projects. The coming two projects alone will give Canadians in 1957 more than $160 million worth of such opportunity. I trust they will avail themselves of it and hold their investment, rather than let the securities drift away to foreign investors who have faith in Canada's future.

Part and parcel of large-scale gas exports, Mr. Speaker—and just as important from western Canada's point of view—is the building and operation of gas processing plants, sulphur recovery plants and related chemical plants in the gas-source fields in nearby communities. In anticipation of Westcoast's pipe line, Canadians and Americans joined in 1956 to start construction in the Peace river area of British Columbia of a $30 million gas, sulphur and refinery project. This, the first large industrial operation of its kind in British Columbia, is slated to go into production this summer.

In anticipation of Trans-Canada's pipe line, and to open a source of sulphur supply to the big new nitro-chemical plant built by Canadian and United States interests at Medicine Hat in 1956, the owners of the Pincher Creek gas field completed recently the first phases in southwest Alberta of what will become in years ahead Canada's largest gas processing and sulphur project. As dry gas needs of Trans-Canada and Westcoast expand into more of the currently shut-in gas fields of the west, there will be a host of new plants for the extraction of natural gasoline, propane, butane and sulphur from the fields to be put to use. During this year it is probable that several more such projects will be announced, particularly in south and central Alberta.

I should like now to briefly refer to exploration and development in the west. In 1956, for the first time in history, more than 3,000 wells were completed in western Canada. Some 3,287 wells gave their answer, 400 more than in 1955, and 1,000 more than in 1954. Of these 2,360 completions were for oil wells, 190 were gas wells and there were 737 which were dry holes or failures which are inevitable in exploration.

This year will be another big year so far as exploration and development are concerned, but a number of factors indicate that it will fall short of 1956 in terms of new capital invested in those phases of industry spendings and in terms of well completions. These factors include first of all the present tight money situation and higher interest rates which hit particularly, so far as oil is concerned, at capital-seeking independents, though of course not even major firms are immune. Second, our Canadian taxation laws, which are less favourable than United States laws in respect to depletion and certain other write-offs, tend to mitigate against Canadian companies in resource development here, and will tend also in the near future to divert United States capital and also Canadian capital to United States development rather than into Canadian projects. I trust that the recommendations made today in the Gordon report, if carried out fast enough, will have a favourable result in offsetting the present outlook so far as tax laws affecting development of our resources are concerned.

A third factor in this year's development is something of fairly recent origin, namely rulings by Canadian tax collectors reclassifying some forms of presumed tax-free capital gains as capital income in the hands of a number of oil men and investors. This has definitely discouraged a number of affected operators who have long been prominent in Canadian oil and gas development. For the benefit of my C.C.F. friends, may I say I am not one of those affected.

The fourth point is the recent sharp curtailment in Middle East oil income going to international oil companies, which is now having some effect on their 1957 budget planning for their Canadian as well as other areas of development.

The fifth point is the fact that there is some diversion of funds from exploration and development because of the high capital requirements for refinery and transport system.

The final point affecting capital for development has been the generally unfavourable levels in 1956 of United States-Canadian oil and gas prices which, incidentally, are lower in Canada than in the United States. Those did not advance during the year to offset rises in wages, steel and other material costs. It is now expected, however, that the price situation will generally improve this year, as it started to do in the United States last week and will likely start to do in Canada in the immediate future.

In the two or three minutes remaining to me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly, since I have dealt with Western Canada as a whole, on the major areas of promise in the west. Alberta, of course, has been and still is Canada's top oil and gas province. By the end of 1956 Alberta boosted its oil production to around 426,000 barrels a day, and will climb from around 450,000 barrels a day, today, to probably over half a million barrels a day by the end of the year.

In 1956 Saskatchewan clinched its position as the second most important oil-producing province in Canada. Saskatchewan had a long string of oil discoveries in the south-eastern section of the province, and they have already established over a hundred million barrels of reserves. The new southeast Saskatchewan area has combined with the older southwest area to bring about a skyrocketing of Saskatchewan oil production. That production almost doubled last year to an average of over 53,000 barrels a day. They started off in 1957 with over 75,000 barrels a day, and within the next three or four months Saskatchewan will be producing in excess of 100,000 barrels a day.

Manitoba, the third ranking province, showed some increase during the year. Its production built up during the year from 11,000 to about 17,000 barrels a day. There has been no notable discovery during the year, but prospects are quite bright.

British Columbia during 1956 produced its first oil, and by the end of the year passed its first milestone of 1,000 barrels a day. During the current year British Columbia will greatly increase its importance as an oil-producing area and will also, of course, begin to come into its own as a major supplier of natural gas and by-products.

The Northwest Territories, which possesses Canada's most northerly oil field, Norman Wells, continued during last year to meet the needs of the mining and transport operations in the Northwest Territories, namely around 1,100 barrels a day. There are at the present time several million acres of territory containing mineral rights currently held by large oil and mineral companies in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and during the year and in the years ahead a great deal of money will be expended by industry, not only to untap but to unlock some of these large resources of oil, gas and other minerals which most competent observers now believe to exist in the northern reaches of our country.

My time has expired, Mr. Speaker, and I shall take my seat.

Mr. McIvor: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for the outstanding information he has given to us.

(Translation):

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I would not want to miss the opportunity to congratulate sincerely the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, because they have both shown themselves worthy of their constituents and I have no doubt that they will soon be given unmistakable evidence of appreciation.

I intend to deal with certain problems of special concern to my constituency, one of which is mentioned in the speech from the throne, that is "greater encouragement to the farmers", and to make a few suggestions concerning the application of the unemployment insurance act.

Representing a constituency that is exclusively agricultural, I consider that the interest shown by the present government in these numerous problems facing our farmers must be implemented by measures whose application will soon have salutary effects; otherwise within ten years we shall witness a substantial reduction of the present number of operating farms.

The farmer's income must remain at least equal to the average of that of other trades, and agriculture must offer advantages at least equal to those enjoyed by Canadian workers generally.

Our farmers hold with reason that too often their products merely cover their expenses. The uncertainty of obtaining adequate prices for their products has the effect of discouraging private initiative.

On many farms, the farmers have been making a living out of lumbering as well as from the sale of the usual farm products. On many farms the timber stands are depleted, and the farmer loses half of his income sources. If the farmer is not helped and guided in his production, he will tend to seek another way of life. His status as owner will be changed to that of an employee offering his services to industry. There follow from this a number of serious consequences for the survival of the agricultural class in this country; unemployment, removal to cities and the loss of an important part of our national heritage, a part which is as essential to the progress of this country as every great phase of our industrial development.

Among the necessary remedies besides reforestation we must include planned production and the assurance given these fellow citizens of ours that their labours will be recompensed by stable markets and a remuneration sufficiently large to allow them to earn their living in as much comfort at least as other classes of Canadian workers.

I would also like to bring to the Minister of Finance's (Mr. Harris) attention and to the attention too of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) a request already made by the Catholic Farmers' Union, and which I consider highly justified. They ask that farm revenue be considered as the result of a family enterprise and not as the fruit of the work of the father only.

At the present time a farmer who works the land with his sons must pay income tax on the whole of the revenue unless he has paid his sons in cash.

It must not be forgotten that the father who is a farmer is the head of a family undertaking. The work of the children is the source of his revenue and even if this work is not paid in cash, it can legitimately be argued that it should be deducted from the personal income of the father. Should the father wish to remunerate the work accomplished by his sons, he would have to pay considerable salaries which would reduce his income and which would be deductible from his income tax under present arrangements.

Child labour, whether paid for in cash or not, should also be legitimately deducted from the revenue of the whole farm since revenue due to the work of a large number of people should not be taxed as revenue earned by only one person. The father-son relationship should not constitute an exception to this rule.

I now wish to call the attention of the house to the present situation as far as unemployment insurance is concerned.

I am going to make but a few suggestions which, I believe, could appreciably improve the administration of the unemployment insurance act and regulations.

It should always be borne in mind that, and I believe that it is the purpose of this law, the unemployed is in most cases in urgent need of an income.

The great number of insurance claims may seem normal to the officer dealing with the claims, but a quick settlement of the cases submitted is essential to the unemployed.

In my opinion a further decentralization of the insurance offices is required, as in some periods of the year they are overworked, and cannot, in spite of the co-operation of the staff, deal adequately with the claims submitted.

[Mr. Laflamme.]

Also the unemployed person should not have to travel several miles at his own expense in order to submit his claim or to obtain the information he wants.

A larger number of offices would meet that need more adequately.

A good many claimants often need information either about the way they should submit their claim or about the administration of the act, the regulations under which are amended almost every year. It is essential, I think, that any unemployed person applying to an unemployment office to fill in his application forms be met by someone in a position to give him all the information required, to acquaint him with the benefits provided by law and to interpret the act in connection with the facts stated by the applicant.

Often the commission sends by mail to the applicant a set of questions with which he is unable to deal adequately. However, the answers are taken literally and sometimes result in unjustified disqualifications.

Surely all these worries suffered by the applicant could be avoided by a more thorough study of the case at the outset.

In the event of an appeal from the decisions of the insurance officer, the appellant, in most cases, must go to a lawyer. If he wins his case, the commission returns him his benefits but makes no allowance whatever for his travelling expenses and does not even pay the fees of the person who helped him state his case.

In my opinion, this is not normal. Either the commission must provide free of charge the services of a lawyer, in such a case, or it should have in its own office someone who would act in all cases as counsel for the claimants and would at all times be at their disposal. This is the procedure followed in connection with the pensions and allowances of war veterans.

Moreover, I would suggest that a lawyer sit on every conciliation board made up of three (3) members since, in fact, the function of these boards is to pass judgment on the legality of a claim and to analyse the facts in accordance with the spirit of the act. The decisions at present made by these boards are based, 95 per cent of the time, on cases already heard. Such decisions make up a jurisprudence while we all know that each case may have characteristics of its own.

In summing up, Mr. Speaker, I suggest:

1. That a larger number of offices be established so as to be within reach of the unemployed and thus avoid large travelling expenses.

2. That employees responsible for supplying information and acting, so to speak, as counsel for the claimant be posted in each office.

3. That costs be paid to each claimant who succeeds in gaining his point before the board of arbitration.

4. That a lawyer be named on each board of arbitration.

All this should be done in order to lend a greater efficiency to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is so essential to the workers, to ensure better relations between claimants and commission employees, and to make people aware that unemployment insurance, which is paid by the government, by the employers and by the employees is a capital guarantee for the workers to whom it gives collective security in case of unemployment.

My fellow-citizens always look to the future with confidence and they remain confident that their demands will always be heard more favourably by the present government than under any other system of government.

The legislation enacted by the government in the social security field and gigantic projects such as the St. Lawrence seaway and the construction of a trans-Canada pipe line set the pace for our industrial development and stimulate private enterprise. We can safely say that our people enjoy the highest standard of living in the world, after our neighbours to the south.

Enjoying an enviable reputation, having a truly Canadian foreign policy, we will soon see the day, I hope, when our Canadianism will be attested by a national emblem which will remain a symbol of unity, and of a desire for peace and freedom.

(Text):

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I deem it a great privilege to be able to voice once again in this House of Commons what I believe are the sentiments of the people of my constituency. I regret the need to mention once again some of the problems that face the people back home. I had hoped that a large number of these problems which already existed when I was first elected in 1953 would have been met by adequate legislation on the part of this parliament by this date; however, the government has not seen fit to meet these needs thus far.

There are a great many problems that cause us some concern, but in one short talk one cannot begin to deal with all of them. I would like very much to deal with the problem of housing, which threatens to become a most serious problem this year. I would also like to speak on the subject of insurance in all its phases. When I look at the statistics that are available I see the Canadian people are bleeding themselves white in a vain effort to buy for themselves a feeling of security in this rich Canada of ours. I would like, too, to raise the problems confronting the Canadian veteran, and I would also like to speak concerning the problems of the British Columbia farmer. I do feel, however, there are two problems which are most urgent at the present time, and I intend to confine my remarks to these two matters.

I think the greatest problem facing the people, in my constituency at least, is the need for an upward revision in the old age pension. I believe I am safe in saying that there are not many constituencies in Canada in which reside over 7,000 old age pensioners. Almost every fourth or fifth person I meet when I am home is under old age security benefits.

The other problem I have in mind is the failure of the federal government of Canada to recognize adequately other levels of government in Canada. I do not use the term "lower levels of government" because that would be reflecting the attitude of the government of Canada. In my estimation the other governments of Canada are not in any way lower governments, and I feel it is time that we put an end to people referring to municipal and provincial governments and other forms of organized society as lower levels of government.

I listened closely, and the following day I read closely, the speech from the throne, but failed to find an indication that those two major problems are being tackled by the proposals offered by the government. I see recorded on page 2 of Hansard such expressions as "excellent progress", "expansion", "rapid strides", "unprecedented levels", "blessed", "greater" and "enjoying the benefits". In one paragraph almost every sentence contains an adjective or superlative to indicate the wonderful blessings we have in Canada, the inference of course being while under a Liberal regime.

I dare say that may be so in a good many respects, and I do not want to take away any credit for progress where progress has been made. In my estimation the speech from the throne consists of 75 per cent pious platitudes, 20 per cent references to minor legislation and amendments of detail, and 5 per cent reference to some of the problems with which Canadians will be faced. In that 5 per cent I would include the reference to the setting up of a Canada Council, an increase in grants to universities, increases and extensions of grants to technical and vocational education, an amendment to the Municipal Grants Act, and the continuation of the wheat board as the sole marketing agency.

This is a long way from meeting some of the problems faced by our people, many of which have been caused directly by the progress we have been making in certain fields. My greatest complaint and the greatest complaint of old age pensioners is that the prosperity of Canada is not being shared equitably by all sections of the Canadian people. I think if old age pensioners read that one paragraph beginning with "excellent progress" and containing such expressions as "expansion", "rapid strides", "unprecedented levels" and so on, they would find such boasting slightly nauseating, almost as nauseating as the gas which unfortunately many of them turn on at night in order to put an end to the miserable existence they are forced to face.

The C.C.F. proposal in regard to old age pensions has been for long $65 a month at age 65 without a means test. In addition we have proposed on numerous occasions, and in the province of Saskatchewan where the C.C.F. forms the government we have implemented, a program of health care for old age pensioners. We have advocated on more than one occasion—and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has referred to this in the house—low rental housing for our senior citizens and others with similar low incomes.

An old age pension of $65 a month at age 65 in British Columbia, if we retained the present $20 supplementary payment by the provincial government with a means test, would mean that the needy people of our province would have an income of $85 per month. That would go a long way toward making those people feel that they too were enjoying some of the benefits of this rich Canada which they had helped to build.

I want to pay a compliment to another relatively new political party in Canada upon the attitude it has taken on the subject of old age pensions, and I refer to the Social Credit party. I feel that in the three western provinces we have gone a long way toward alleviating some of the suffering of these people, and we fail to understand why a rich province such as Ontario cannot do at least as well as Saskatchewan, under a C.C.F. government, or Alberta and British Columbia, and pay a $20 supplementary allowance.

I regret that I cannot go along with the proposals which have received publicity in our daily press back home and which have been made by the Social Credit government in British Columbia. According to the press reports they are advocating that Ottawa continue to pay $40 a month but agree to share the cost of the supplementary allowance on a 50-50 basis. If I have misunderstood the proposal I hope that succeeding speakers will correct me, but I understand that this would mean $80 per month in British Columbia, which almost equals $85.

However, we in our group are sufficiently aware of the problems faced by other parts of Canada to realize that while such a proposal might be satisfactory to the rich provinces of Canada, there are many provinces that would be unable to meet that type of matching grant arrangement. If such an arrangement were to be adopted by this government it would mean that once again we would have old age pensioners in one part of Canada receiving much less than those in other parts.

The other day someone asked me how much I thought old age pensions in Canada should be. The C.C.F. and many other major non-political organizations have advocated $65 at 65 without a means test, but my answer to that question was that in reality it is very difficult to say offhand how much an old age pension should be. My answer would be that the least we could do is to bring the purchasing power of the old age pension back to what it was in 1927. I submit that $40 does not supply to our senior citizens today those things which they have to buy to the extent that $20 did back in 1927. It may be that the value of our money has been reduced by about that percentage, but when we consider the things on which these people spend their money we are today on a much lower level than we were back when old age pensions were first introduced. That purchasing power, as I said, should be restored, and in addition I feel that the senior citizens of Canada should also share in the technological advances and the great increase in production of our Canadian economy. They are as entitled as anyone else to an ever-rising standard of living.

The first essential, of course, when we advocate an increase in the old age pension, is that we must establish the need for an increase. I do not think I have to say very much on that point. Our government recognizes, and I am in full accord with what they are doing in this respect, that our newly-arriving immigrants from Hungary must be maintained at government expense for some time until they can be fully established. However, what is the estimate of this expense? As I understand the situation, the government is prepared, where necessary, to pay up to $3 a day for the maintenance of a refugee from Hungary. I want to make it very clear that I do not oppose that in any way. The C.C.F. party was the first to criticize the government for not doing enough for would-be immigrants to Canada.

However, we can easily understand the feeling of our senior citizens when they are told that they must exist on $1.33 a day in a country they have helped to build and for whose wealth they are responsible when the same country can turn around and, after ignoring their needs, can pay for the maintenance of other people the sum of $3 per day. It seems rather inequitable. With respect to the need, where do we find these senior citizens who need an increase in the old age pension so badly? Sometimes they are rather difficult to find. They cannot afford to live on the ground floor level with the street. You have to go up to third and fourth floor attic rooms to find them. You have to go into musty basement rooms to find them. You have to go to the shacks on the outskirts of the better residential areas. When we consider the conditions under which our senior citizens are forced to live in many parts of Canada I believe that some of us should hang our heads in shame.

What can you buy today on $40 a month? You go to various homes in our cities and you find that the average modest room in an old dilapidated rooming house will cost you $30 a month. That leaves our old age pensioner with the magnificent sum of $10 a month with which to pay for food, clothing, in many cases medical care, and all the other necessities of life. I know I am not speaking of the average citizen in Canada today. However, there are over 100,000 old age pensioners in the province of British Columbia alone to whom this is an important issue.

I know that some of the people of Canada have been enjoying relatively good times ever since world war II began. I know there are some Canadians, and I meet some of them rather often, who as a hobby are able to afford farms in the country. They would not dare attempt to make a living from their farms; otherwise we might get some decent farm legislation. You know, it is lovely to be able to take your guests on a Sunday to the farm or ranch. Some of these people keep horses there, or cattle and other livestock. I have seen some of the stables. It is very nice to be able to show your guests around. But in carrying out these hobbies far more money is being spent on housing for the horses and cattle than is being spent on housing, food and clothing for people who have helped to develop this country and who are responsible for some being able to have farms as a hobby where they can go on a Sunday, and maybe by having such farms help to relieve the income tax situation.

It is not the fault of these old people that they are in such great need. Not only are they in great need, but so are our blind pensioners, our veterans and our disabled people. In referring to our old age pensioners I have in mind all people who have to exist on pensions paid by the people of Canada through the government. I almost made the mistake of saying "paid by the government". The money is paid by the people of Canada through the government.

Many little things can be done to make the lives of many people easier. We still insist on the cruel 20-year residence clause. You do not have to be a citizen in order to obtain the $40 a month. You can be a foreigner. You need never have made any major contribution to Canadian citizenship and the welfare of the Canadian community as a whole. You need have no citizenship papers, but if you have lived here for 20 years you are entitled to the $40 a month. However, if you were a refugee from Hitlerism in the Sudetenland and came here in 1939 because you were a believer in democracy and your life was at stake, then even though you may be as old as Methuselah this government will not have any mercy on you because you have not lived here for 20 years. If you are in need you have to go and beg assistance from the local municipal welfare office.

I think it is high time that we removed the 20-year residence requirement. When our own citizens are given a rawer deal than people who may have lived here for a long time but have never assumed the responsibilities of citizenship, I think something should be done.

The question then arises, can we afford $65 a month at 65 for everyone in Canada, plus free health care and plus low rental housing for these people? In 1927 the gross national product of Canada was a little under $6 billion. In 1956 it was over $29 billion, and for this year the forecast is over $30 billion. In other words our gross national product has gone up five times since 1927. If we could afford to pay $20 a month then it is not too illogical to conclude that we should be able to pay $100 a month now, or five times what we paid then.

Looking at the matter in another way and going back only to 1949, when the universal $40 pension was introduced, at that time the gross national product of Canada amounted to $16.4 billion. This year we expect it to be practically twice as much. On the basis of a gross national product of $16.4 billion we decided the economy could afford a pension of $40 a month. Surely when our production is twice as high the economy should be able to afford twice as high a pension. That would be $80 a month.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, the C.C.F. proposals turn out to be most reasonable indeed. I receive letters in my mail asking me to plead for a pension of $100 a month. I am not saying that Canada cannot afford to pay $100 a month. However, if the government would pay $65 a month at 65 I know it would go a long way toward meeting the urgent need in Canada. We are responsible to a very great extent for the financial position in which these people find themselves. By deliberate policy the government has permitted the inflation of our currency over a long period of years, thereby indirectly—it may seem very direct to those affected—robbing hundreds of thousands of our senior citizens of what they thought was an adequate retirement plan for which they had sacrificed. Many of them had purchased annuities. Many of them had done it through life insurance company investments. Many of them had done it through investment in farms and the like.

There were a great many who lost their assets during the catastrophe of the hungry thirties. There are many in my riding who lost their farms on the prairies because of the economic conditions at that time. This parliament at that time passed emergency legislation to safeguard the apparent solvency of the investment houses and insurance companies of Canada, but this parliament did nothing to safeguard the solvency of the vast majority of the producers of Canada, at that time notably the farmers of the western plains. I have many of them in my riding who, under normal circumstances, would have been able to look after themselves in their old age in their own way and would have done so very well.

That is why I say this parliament shares a great measure of responsibility for the need that now exists. Not all the proposed increase will be net cost to government. Much of this money returns into the hands of the various governments of Canada. By means of sales and excise taxes, customs duties and, in the case of those who do not need it, income tax and succession duties, a goodly share of this money is returned and is therefore not a net loss to government income.

I also think of the great aid this would be to Canadian agriculture. When these old age pensioners get more money, what will they do with it? They will go out into the market place and maybe for once be able to buy a few eggs, a little bit of bacon, some butter, some cheese and so on. That is what our farmers need. They need a market at home in Canada. Paying more money to the old age and other pensioners of Canada is the easiest way of relieving at least some of the problems of Canadian agriculture.

I do not plead, Mr. Speaker, for the old age pensioners because of our ability to pay more money. I do not plead for them because of pity for them. I do not plead for them for the sake of a market for the farmers. I do not plead for them for the sake of election. I plead for them because, if we represent these people in the House of Commons, it is our duty to bring to the floor of this house the needs of those we profess to represent. I feel that they are entitled to more money and that it is a right that ought to be granted to them.

Then there is one other problem that I feel is not being met. I welcome the proposed amendment to the Municipal Grants Act, but that is meeting the situation only a small part of the way. Some day in Canada we shall again be obliged to sit down around the conference table and rethink Canadian confederation. This is going to be a long process, because the problems are many and varied. However, I feel that this year, 10 years before our hundredth national anniversary, would maybe be a good time to begin facing up to the situation.

Here in Ottawa we have a government that collects over 70 per cent of the tax revenue of Canada, yet the major responsibilities for the business of government in Canada are not in Ottawa at all. In my case they are back in Burnaby and in British Columbia. The individual back home, the taxpayer, just has to stop and think for a moment to realize that he gets most from his hospital board, his school board, his municipal council and his provincial government. They are the organizations that give him most of the things he needs. Yet when he considers who gets his tax money he is obliged to realize that it is time we began thinking about this problem that is threatening Canadian institutions more and more as the years go by.

I propose that we have 10 years of time in which to begin to meet the problem. A mere amendment to the Municipal Grants Act is not solving the problem at all. Certainly it is a little bit of relief for some of our municipalities; but the taxes on real estate, which were once the major source of income, have reached their limit. The taxes on Canadian homes and on Canadian farm land are, I feel, as high as they can safely be set. It is time we declared a moratorium on any increase in taxation on real estate in Canada.

I am not a centralizer. I do not feel that this government should bear all the responsibilities of government in Canada. I believe democracy begins at home, and that you build on from there if you want to build a successful democracy. However, I do not believe that you should rob the home of all the money it has and shoulder the home with all the responsibility. I think that situation must be met. I feel that the Canadian people are rational, reasonable and educated enough so that if there is a will to meet the problem, it can be solved and we can go on to the second century of Canadian progress and Canadian development.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that my time has expired. I should like to repeat once again what I said before. In fact we are all worried about that little piece of land we occupy in this House of Commons, and especially that piece of land across from me occupied by government members. Here is another reference to a piece of land. I have reference to the old age pension. It is a quotation we all know, Mr. Speaker:

Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I always pay particular attention to this part of this debate. This year I thought the addresses were of a high order. They showed an amount of careful preparation, and the subjects they introduced were well thought out. The addresses were delivered in a very fine manner.

I wish to speak for a short time tonight on the question of the railway strike. In this connection I wish to present a petition which I have received from the clerk of the town of Smiths Falls. In that town there are 1,700 people involved in this strike. This petition did not come to me in the usual way of petitions; it came in the form of a letter. I could not present it in the usual way by filing it with the Clerk or during routine proceedings, because the letter is addressed directly to me. With your consent, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read this petition into the record because of the fact that it is a letter addressed to me. It reads as follows:

Municipal Offices
Smiths Falls
Ontario.

January 8, 1957

Dr. W. G. Blair, M.P.,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Dr. Blair:

At a meeting of our municipal council duly convened on the evening of January 7, 1957, the following resolution was passed for your attention and action thereon:

"Whereas the welfare of the town of Smiths Falls and district is threatened by the railway strike

Be it resolved that the mayor convey to the federal member for Lanark county, Dr. W. G. Blair, M.P., this fact and ask him to inform the government of Canada of the urgent need of having the strike settled."

Yours truly,
F. R. Gilroy,
Town Clerk.

Having presented this petition which came in the form of a letter, there are some things I wish to say concerning this strike because it affects a considerable proportion of the people of the riding which I have the honour to represent. The general consensus, so far as I could judge from the addresses in this house, is that this strike is having a very serious effect on the economy of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and that the sooner it is settled the better. We heard one address yesterday from a maritime member concerning conditions around the port of Saint John. We know the situation with respect to the western wheat farmer. We know the effect on industry in Ontario, and I think opinion is unanimous that this strike must be settled as soon as possible.

I was glad to hear today that there was some sign of settlement of this strike by getting these people together. We hear a great deal about automation, and there are people talking about automation now who never even thought of it two weeks ago. Certainly automation is going to make progress, and any person who would say it is not is simply talking in a foolish manner. Automation will proceed, and automation on the railways will increase in the coming years. I think a good example is to go back to conditions in England in 1850 at the time certain improvements were made in the textile industry with the introduction of new looms, whereby it was possible for one workman to do the work that was formerly done by four or five. At the time automation was introduced into the textile industry it was the main industry in the midlands of Britain. These textiles were shipped all over the world. When the new looms came into use people were thrown out of work. There was a great deal of unemployment. There were riots and difficult times in England. It was not easy for people to understand just what was happening, but there must be progress along those lines. Progress will be made in so far as the railroads are concerned.

I had one thing in mind concerning this strike. I admit candidly that I am not so well versed on labour matters, but I am concerned with the matter of safety. I noted that in the report of the conciliation board there was one sentence that cast some doubt on the question of safety. In considering the question of removing the firemen or engineer's helpers, as they have been called, from the locomotives, there was the suggestion that we would try this thing out and if it did not succeed then we could return to the old system. At least that is the way I interpreted that part of the report, that various changes could be made. I confess, sir, that I have not had experience with labour relations but I have had experience with casualties. I cannot get away from the feeling that there should be a full inquiry into this matter. In so far as the firemen are concerned, they have made a statement that this procedure is not safe. I believe that the firemen are a group of highly responsible people, and if it is not safe there should be a full inquiry into the matter.

If it is ruled by an impartial board that automation has proceeded to the point where the other man is not required on the engine, that is one thing; but if there is the slightest element of danger, then that should be taken into consideration. Any person who has had any experience with railroads knows that wrecks have occurred even under present conditions. It is rather difficult to get away from the matter of human error. Sir, I can call to your mind some accidents that have happened in Canada. I can refer to probably one of the worst accidents that ever happened on a railroad; that is the one that occurred at Almonte a few years ago. It was a dreadful accident; and with all the safety devices on the railroad, with good crews and every care being taken, that accident did happen with the resultant loss of life and horrible injury. I am not fully convinced, therefore, that this matter of safety and the question of human error has been dealt with fully as yet. I feel there should be a further inquiry by a board to make absolutely sure the public is protected.

It is all very well to say you can try this out. It is just like driving an automobile; it is a lot easier to fix the automobile than it is to recover from physical injury. I am glad to see that there has been some move toward an inquiry along that line. As I have stated, I will not be fully convinced until I read a report concerning the matter of safety. I want to be absolutely sure the public of Canada is protected from any form of accident. In my opinion this matter of safety is the crux of the whole thing. Either we do require that extra man on the engine or we do not, and that is the matter which must receive careful consideration from any board appointed to investigate the situation.

Another aspect of the strike with which I am concerned is the matter of people employed in public utilities. I know I am suggesting something very difficult, but it would seem to me that those employed in public utilities—I am thinking of such public utilities as the hydro, police force and firemen, without whom we cannot get along—should work out some formula or some device for conciliation between the employer, which is generally a municipality or a province, and those working in the public utility. I feel it would be better for such a move to come from labour. It is a very difficult thing to work out, I admit, but if a move were made along that line I think it would be of benefit to all concerned.

I wish to turn for a few minutes to the question of agriculture. I was glad to note the other day in the speech from the throne that some consideration would be given to the question of submarginal land and the possibility of using some device such as the prairie farm rehabilitation act. We go back in the history of this country to the time when the pioneers came here. In going across the country it is very easy to see the areas in which these pioneers settled. They took the high land, and the valleys and lower parts of the country were not utilized at first. They cleared the timber right off the land because it was their ambition to put in crops of some kind to carry them through the ensuing season.

Since that time we have carried on a program of cutting down everything in the nature of timber. I have seen areas in the country where anything that would make a small piece of timber seemed to have been ruthlessly cut down. We have formed no program for the replacement of those trees. This is becoming very important now, because there is usually a spring run-off and there are no trees to hold back the water. The water goes down the streams very rapidly, and we are trying to correct that by building reserve dams.

That is not the answer, Mr. Speaker. We should have a program in this country something like that which has been adopted in some of the Scandinavian countries, namely, if you cut down a tree, plant a tree. There are places in some of the older areas of Canada which do require reforestation, because some of the land was not suitable for farming when it was first cleared. There are other areas which are now classed as submarginal land, which could be used if that land had not been mined but had received proper crop rotation, and if the farmer could have afforded to place fertilizer on the land.

You hear remarks made by economists in agriculture that the time is coming, because of the new type of machinery that is available at the present time, when the larger farm will be the only type of agricultural unit that will pay. I for one would be very sorry to see some of these smaller farms discontinue operations. The usual description is family farms. I cannot help but think of the fine families that were raised on those farms and the contribution they made to the economy of this country. But I do believe that some of the farms that are worked out at the present time have been mined on account of the fact that farming is becoming a difficult financial venture. I believe that some of those farms could be brought back by the proper use of fertilizer and crop rotation, and that the situation is not hopeless. But there are abandoned farms, Mr. Speaker, the occupants of which have become discouraged. You will find them working in industry. They are not doing any practical farming but are living in the houses on the farms and spending their time in industry. The general complaint of farmers across the country, and especially in my part of the country, is that the prices received for farm products have not kept pace with the prices of consumer goods that the farmer buys. They will all tell you that. This is becoming very apparent to the farmer and is causing many of them to leave the farms; and it is discouraging many young people from entering into the occupation of farming.

Then there is another thing. There has been a steady upward movement in the cost of living. It has gone steadily up in the last three months. I was rather surprised and sorry to note the other day that while the added cost of living was due to various things, there was one thing that seemed to balance out the other way, namely the lower price received for farm products. From the reports we receive I am quite sure that 1957 may be a better year in agricultural circles so far as prices are concerned. There has been the feeling that it may be slightly better than it has been the last four years. Toward the end of last year there was some rise in the prices of agricultural products, and 1957 may be a better year, or equal to 1954; but net farm income will be hundreds of millions of dollars less than the record year of 1951 because costs were lower in 1951 than they were in 1956. Retail prices of food in the stores in 1951 were about the same as they were in 1956, but freight costs, wages and processing costs have increased.

I am going to quote one very well-known authority on agriculture, namely Mr. Bryan L. White, for whose judgment on agricultural matters I have the greatest respect. In the farm page of the Ottawa Journal he points out this fact:

> There is only one deduction for any fair-minded person to draw from these facts. It is that the farmers of Canada have practically paid for all costs added to food since 1951.

Mr. White was referring to the matter of costs and farm income in the years 1951 to 1956, and he went on to say this:

> Wages in the food processing industry have advanced every year, packaging has cost more, but few if any of these costs have been reflected in consumer prices. They have all been deducted at the bottom from the farmer.

I did mention, sir, that I was interested in this committee. I hope when the committee makes its report on the so-called submarginal land it will remember other things, namely that it is necessary to have trees to preserve water; and if industry is going to grow in a province such as Ontario recognition must be given to the enormous amount of water that is used by industry at the present time. Water has become precious. The building of reserve dams will not fully cover the whole matter. It is necessary that we learn and progress more along the line of reforestation, and also consider the deleterious effect of erosion on land.

The matter of reforestation is something that is very important at the present time, but it is difficult to get people to understand it. When our ancestors came to this country it had immense forest cover, but we are only beginning to realize that we cannot proceed without doing something to bring back the land. I remember talking to a forestry man in the Ontario government. I mentioned a part of the country to him and asked why we could not cover those thousands and thousands of acres with pine trees. The land was originally covered with white pine. He made a remark that amazed me. He pointed out that this land had been burned over and it would really take hundreds of years before the land would again become capable of growing pine trees.

It is not a foolish project to carry on a reforestation program, because in time the timber will begin to pay as it did years ago when the land was first cleared, when the trees were sold in the form of squared timber and mighty rafts went down the river to Quebec. The market for squared timber was one of the principal markets of our earlier pioneers.

There is one other matter that I wish to talk about tonight, sir, and that is some of the things that are misunderstood in so far as public relations are concerned between urban and rural dwellers. There is one matter that is really very interesting, because the other night I heard a man speaking on the radio who was evidently a trainer of athletes. He was talking about the harmful effect of milk. There are people talking about this who do not know what they are talking about, because we have always regarded milk as being the perfect food. If this propaganda goes out from people who do not know what they are talking about it will have a harmful effect on the dairy industry.

Medical research has been carried on into the cause of some heart conditions. The work is not yet completed, but there is a feeling that various animal fats have something to do with the causes. When we consider that for years children have been raised on milk—and we believe that milk is a perfect food—it would seem to me that we must attack this problem with common sense, because the eating of fats, or the eating of anything, is all a question of temperance and how you use it. The overeating of any particular type of food is a foolish thing.

This idea is taking hold in the public mind, possibly due to the fact that people read in the paper of the large number of citizens who seem to have developed heart conditions. This is to the detriment of the Canadian dairy industry. This has not yet been advocated by dietitians, and the question of temperance enters into this matter. As I have said, intemperance with regard to any form of food could produce the same effect.

The Prime Minister, in speaking of the matter of health yesterday, made mention of the fact that men in public life and those occupying high positions were subject to great strain and stress, and that the demands of their positions were having a bad effect as far as their physical condition was concerned. The day before yesterday we had the resignation of Hon. George Drew the leader of this party due to ill health, and yesterday brought word of the resignation of Sir Anthony Eden for the same reason. Sir Anthony Eden underwent a most difficult operation three years ago, and those who are his political enemies could very well bear in mind that here is a man who carried on and did a job for his country despite his physical condition. The President of the United States, General Eisenhower, has had difficulties with his health, as has Mr. Dulles. I fully agree with the Prime Minister that the strain and stress of public life is taking its toll among people who are at the head of governments and those who occupy prominent positions. No matter what our political affiliation may be, I feel we should take this into consideration and a measure of sympathy should be extended toward these people.

Before I leave the question of agriculture I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning. The article is somewhat interesting, and it concerns the health of farmers. It seems that in the southern United States there is an organization known as the international federation of agricultural producers. The Louisiana State University school of medicine conducted a survey in which this organization was interested. The survey revealed that more than 60 per cent of the population of the United States suffers from headaches. The investigation also revealed that medical students had more recurring headaches than anyone else in the country, while farmers had fewer than any other group. This is not a joke; it is a report of the survey made by the Louisiana State University school of medicine. The article goes on to say:

> It was not suggested that farmers have less to worry about than other people. The reason for fewer headaches on the farm may be that farmers breathe more fresh air.

I have inserted this in my address because I thought it contained a touch of humour. I am perfectly sure that if farmers do not suffer the physical ills of headaches they certainly suffer headaches in the slang sense of that word. It is a fact that the returns from the sale of farm products have not kept pace with the increased cost of living to the farmer. That is the issue which is causing so much difficulty for the farmer at the present time.

There is one other matter contained in the speech from the throne with which I should like to deal, and that is the question of aid to municipalities. Every person in this chamber, every home owner, and every person who rents in this country is becoming increasingly aware of the fact that taxation on real estate has reached the saturation point; there is no doubt about that. I noticed a statement made by the premier of the province of Ontario a few months ago. He said he had to deal with the reception of 750,000 additional children in primary and elementary schools within the next nine years. This simply means the province of Ontario and its municipalities must make arrangements for the education of almost double the number of pupils they have at the present time.

It is going to be extremely difficult for the municipalities to meet that increased demand by the addition of elementary and high schools. In the same period of time the universities will also double the number of students they have. This is a most serious matter. The young people of this country are our greatest asset. Meeting the increased demands involves in addition to education the supplying of public utilities, sewers, roads, highways, and all the things that are dealt with by the municipalities.

There is no doubt but that real estate has reached its saturation point in terms of taxation, and that at some stage in the next few years we must make arrangements for increased expenditures. I have grave doubts that the broadening of the taxation field through an increase in population or increased industrial expansion will entirely cope with this matter. With regard to aid to the municipalities, any thought the government has given to this matter and any start it makes, no matter how small it may be, will be a step toward some realization of the position of the municipalities. If conditions do not change in the next nine or ten years we are going to be faced with a serious problem. In some way or other there must be a means of granting increased aid to the municipalities.

There are other matters, sir, which I might mention at this time, and one is the position of the veterans. Before I left my home last week I watched a television program which dealt with an institute that cares for homeless men, men in a difficult financial position; as a matter of fact it is a mission. During the program the superintendent of this mission interviewed some of the men who were enjoying a free meal there. In many cases they were returned soldiers, and some reported that they received the veterans allowance. Others said they were not able to work because of their age or state of health, and some were not in receipt of a pension adequate to provide them with a room, meals and the comforts of life.

There is one group of ex-soldiers for whom I wish to make a special appeal. I refer to the soldiers of the first war who served only in England, and who are not eligible for veterans allowance. It is important to remember that they feel they have just as much right to receive the war veterans allowance as do members of the second war who served only in England. This feeling was created possibly because a theatre of war was declared with regard to one war and not with regard to the other. Many of the men who served only in England in the first war were held in position there, and some were ill or unfit. It was through no fault of their own. They made themselves useful in their positions. If you have had any experience in the army you will be aware it is not a good thing to take a man away from a job he is doing well.

Those who served in the first war are growing old, and they are few in number. They look at their comrades who served in the second war, many of whom served only a short time in England, and they feel they are being discriminated against because they are not receiving the war veterans allowance. Certainly their hearts were in the right place when they enlisted, and it is not their fault that they are not eligible. They are becoming older and fewer in number all the time.

In view of the decreasing number of these old gentlemen, who with the best possible motives enlisted in the first world war, I ask the government to reconsider the matter of war veterans allowances and grant allowances to those who served in England in the first world war. As I watched the movie showing these men being fed I felt that there was something wrong when they were forced to obtain a meal at a mission in order to keep body and soul together. Certainly this parliament should do something.

There are not many of them, and it would not cost this country very much. I hope no member of the government will say that we of the opposition ask the government to spend money and at the same time ask the government to save money. This is a small matter, and it does not enter into the question of spending money. It is the duty of Canada to look after these aged citizens who with the best motives volunteered in the first world war.

I know some of these men personally. They have no pensions, as they are in between the age groups. The average age of men who served in the first world war is in the early sixties, and many of them are not eligible for the old age pension with a means test. They are receiving nothing. The fact that they served should be recognized. I know it would be the wish of every Canadian that these people not be neglected.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks, I wish to join with the hon. members who have already congratulated the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Hanna and Mr. Robichaud), who carried out their particular function in a splendid and masterful fashion. They spoke as statesmen, and we thank them for enlightening the house on many subjects.

Since the last session, important changes have taken place in this house, especially on the other side where we see a new leader of the opposition. I wonder if I must congratulate him or commiserate with him. A mixture of both feelings is appropriate, I guess. I must congratulate him for the support he received from his friends of the Conservative party who gave him a majority on the very first ballot. On the other hand, it seems that I must commiserate with him as he has entered a field fraught with difficulties. He will have to bear a very heavy burden, and I hope that Divine Providence will give him the strength and courage to do so, for, even if he should come back to this house as leader of the opposition after the election, I must say to him that it is no dishonour to remain in that post for a long time.

We have been speaking quite extensively in this house about the well known question of Suez, and some people have gone as far as to suggest that the behaviour of the Canadian government during the crisis had endangered the future of the British commonwealth. I wonder if those people have bothered to study the matter with sufficient thoroughness.

When Israel invaded Egypt, for reasons which they explained clearly enough from their own point of view, France and England immediately undertook their own invasion, thus leaving peace in a most delicate position.

The Canadian government's position with regard to this matter has, to my mind, been most commendable. The representative of the Canadian government to the United Nations, the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), did not want to condemn either England or France, but he nevertheless tried to maintain peace in the world with a reasonable suggestion. He therefore asked, by means of a resolution, that France and England withdraw their troops from Egypt and that the United Nations replace them with a force that would be responsible for maintaining peace and preventing invaders of any country from returning to this area.

The position of the Canadian government under those circumstances has been commended by almost all the countries of the globe. The United States took this opportunity to support the proposal made by our government because they also sought universal peace. That is why I hold that, by its action, the Canadian government did not endanger the British commonwealth. On the contrary, by its attitude, it merely consolidated its relations, because the commonwealth was on the verge of losing the support of India and of some other countries of the East who wanted to leave the commonwealth as a result of England's attitude. Since then, our union has been once more strengthened. Recently we received in this country the visit of the prime minister of India who came to hold talks with our own Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) about affairs of concern to the whole world. He believes that the whole world needs Canada's help. He knows that our country has been capable of stopping to reflect on matters, of taking no account of its own particular preferences, of looking facts in the face and of attempting to protect that peace for which we have so often fought in the past.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that Canada now deserves to be considered as one of the most enlightened countries in the whole world and that our leaders have acted in a most admirable fashion.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the time, I propose the adjournment of the debate.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Caron the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 11, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR PRINTING OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IN BOTH ENGLISH AND FRENCH

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Poulin: The purpose of this bill is to provide that every cheque, postal note, etc., issued by any department or crown corporation shall be printed in both official languages.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the government has any intention of bringing in legislation at this session to implement any of the recommendations of the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects; and second, and in particular, whether it is the intention of the government to bring in any measures to encourage Canadian companies in business to compete successfully with foreign companies, such as by special tax concessions and the like, as recommended by the commission?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report of the commission was published only yesterday and will be given careful consideration. There has been no decision by the government about any of its recommendations up to the present time. If after careful consideration of the report the decision is made that there would be time during the present session to give proper consideration to legislation, it will be introduced in due course.

The hon. gentleman's question about competition by Canadian companies is in very general terms. There are Canadian companies which are competing most successfully for business in both the domestic and world markets.

There are, perhaps, others that are not in a position to do so as successfully; all these matters will receive serious consideration. Now, with respect to the tax matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred he well knows that any announcements of that character are made in the budget speech and not before the budget speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then, Mr. Speaker, is this clear that at the present time the government has nothing in contemplation to be introduced at this session, having regard to the necessary shortness of this session, to implement the recommendations?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The government has nothing to announce on this matter and it may very well be that some of the projects that the government will place before parliament will—not because of the report but because of the consideration that had been given to the matters previously—coincide with recommendations of the report; but nothing has been decided on the report since it was produced and submitted in the ordinary way to His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some of the recommendations do not coincide with government views?

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO PRIOR STUDY BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he had an opportunity to study the recommendations of the Gordon commission before their official publication and submission to the members of this house.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As soon as the report was received it was submitted to His Excellency the Governor General. I read a summary of the report and I read the report itself in typewritten form. I did interest myself in the general tenor of the report but I had no time to go into it thoroughly. It is a very long and interesting document. There were some portions of it that did not surprise me at all and there were some that probably did surprise me because they seemed to indicate a conception of the existing situation, for example, with respect to the wheat board, that did not fit with my conception of what the role of the wheat board was. I was rather surprised that there should be in that section pages that appeared to me not to reflect a proper conception of what parliament had intended the role of the wheat board to be.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister? Will he say whether or not a settlement was reached in connection with the C.P.R. strike, and if not can he say what is the present position of each side with respect to the position?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No settlement has yet been reached. I have had more than one interview with representatives of both sides and both sides have submitted objections to some of the terms I had set out in a short paper that I had entitled "A Proposal for the Termination of the Interruption of Transportation Services on the Canadian Pacific Railway Lines."

The objections were not the same on both sides, but I do not consider that they are insuperable objections. This is being considered by both sides and I hope that there will be a speedy settlement which will permit of a speedy resumption of the transportation services.

(Translation):

FINANCE

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM LOAN AGREEMENT—WAIVER OF INTEREST ENTITLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister. Could he tell the house if the government has made any undertaking with regard to the proposed waiver of $22 million in interest charges due by the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member will see no objection to my answering his question in English since I will have to refer to statutes, and these references are in English. I have had no time to check the French text and I should not like to make a free translation whose terms would probably not be those which the official translators have used in the French version of the statutes.

(Text):

The Canadian-United Kingdom loan agreement of 1946, which appears as a schedule to the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act (1946, Chap. 12), provides that the United Kingdom is entitled to a waiver of interest in any year in which certain conditions exist. In brief, the Canadian loan agreement entitles the United Kingdom to a waiver when the following conditions are met:

(a) That the United Kingdom finds it necessary, having regard to its gold and foreign exchange reserves;

(b) That the international monetary fund certifies to certain specified conditions regarding United Kingdom balance of payments statistics; and

(c) That any other country which has made a loan with similar conditions is also waiving the interest payment.

That is a commitment that was made in the contract that was approved by parliament in 1946. Early in December of last year the United Kingdom formally requested a waiver of the interest which would be due on the 31st of December, 1956. Because of another rather complicated clause in the United States-United Kingdom agreement relating to the status of certain sterling balances, a clause which is not in the Canada-United Kingdom agreement, the United States government found it lacked authority to grant the waiver, but it announced that it would renegotiate the waiver clause and submit a new clause to congress. That, of course, prevents one of the conditions under which the waiver would be contractually obligatory upon Canada from being realized.

The Canadian government is considering what action it would be appropriate for this government to take and as soon as this consideration has been completed the conclusion arrived at by the government will be put before parliament and there will be an opportunity to discuss it here in parliament.

In the meantime the United Kingdom has paid the instalment of principal amounting to $15½ million which was due on December 31 and has, I understand, set aside in an account in the Bank of Canada the amount of interest, this to be held by the Bank of Canada until a decision has been reached whether or not there will be a waiver of interest granted by all those who have similar loans.

ROYAL BANK OF CANADA—REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REMARKS OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister had drawn to his attention the remarks made yesterday by Mr. Muir, president of the Royal Bank, on the question of credit controls, and will the minister comment on them at all now or at some future date?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I have read the remarks as reported in the morning newspaper. My first impression is that Mr. Muir agrees with government policy that some form of credit restriction is necessary and not only agrees but goes further and says that perhaps additional forms of credit restriction are necessary. We shall have a look at his remarks in greater detail when there is an opportunity.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was congratulating the government for preserving the unity of the commonwealth at a time of particularly serious emergency and saving the world from a third world conflict. Canada has declared its opposition to wars of aggression and we must recognize that, in this regard, its position was sound, no economic interests to my mind being worth a single drop of blood. If some people are not yet convinced that problems should be solved by peaceful means, they must not count on our aid. If the unfortunate experiences of 1914 and 1939 have not been such as to cause them to reflect upon these matters, the world is indeed in desperate straits.

As President Eisenhower said yesterday to the United States Congress: "An aggressive war is a crime against humanity". That is also the opinion of Canada; we do not want to be parties to any crime.

It is precisely because Canada is opposed to crimes against humanity that at the General Assembly of the United Nations our representatives have condemned in unequivocal terms the repression by the Soviet Union of Hungarian patriots.

I had the great pleasure of entertaining in my own home, on Christmas day, a group of Hungarian refugees, one of whom spoke French and another English. These people told me things that we would have not thought possible in this twentieth century. A father, his wife and two children had to crawl several miles through mud to take cover from Russian fire. Russians were firing at them to prevent them from gaining their freedom. These people told me that story themselves and it was corroborated by another member of the group.

In Budapest, a woman and child were killed by soldiers for failing to stop when ordered to do so. All these refugees can thus recount instances of truly revolting brutality.

I am convinced that when this crisis of Russian imperialistic madness is over, those barbarians themselves will blush at their own deeds. I am happy to congratulate the government, and particularly the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), for the promptness with which Canada opened its frontiers to those unfortunate victims of their love of freedom.

I also congratulate the government for wishing to endow Canada with a council for the arts, humanities and social sciences. If our country has reached political and economic maturity, it must now turn to things of the mind. To prevent Canadians from becoming merely poor imitators, we must endeavour to create a truly Canadian art, one which will not be a pathetic copy of imported art.

A question that has been and will continue to be widely discussed, both verbally and in print, is the matter of proposed government assistance to universities. It is high time for action in that field and the Prime Minister has had the courage to propose a formula designed to save those temples of knowledge from bankruptcy; but the Quebec dictator is opposed to it, unconcerned about what our nation will become without those institutions of high learning.

In a country expanding as rapidly as Canada is doing, there is a growing need of specialists in all fields, which only our universities can train.

Indeed, we already hear the laments of those who are responsible for this stagnation! They accuse us of being centralizers. They claim that, through these donations, the federal government infringes upon a field that is exclusively provincial, that of education.

But how and where can the millions of dollars given unconditionally to universities be considered as an intrusion in the field of education?

With such reasoning, millionaires should no longer be permitted to bequeath part of their fortune to such institutions. Wealthy corporations should no longer be allowed to grant scholarships for special studies. That would be ridiculous. I would be prepared to agree with them if, in exchange for such grants, the government required changes of curriculum in this or that faculty but, as I said, an unconditional donation does not constitute interference.

In all parts of Canada, rectors of universities have gladly and gratefully accepted this offer from the federal government, except in Quebec, where fear of the master causes them to hesitate between a realization of the great need, and threats which are not even veiled.

It is high time that the leaders of our Quebec universities make up their mind to face up squarely to the dictator and tell him: "Take care, for in the end we will come out the winners; remember that spirit has always prevailed over brute force." Then you will see the type of turn about of which this tumbler is capable.

When I hear people find fault with this proposal of the federal government under the pretence of safeguarding our language and our faith, I am inclined to think that this is sheer demagogy.

If actually we had been meant to disappear as a racial entity, it is immediately after the conquest of 1760 that it would have happened, because at that time, the noble and the rich went back to France, leaving behind 60 thousand poor people, most of them illiterate, to fight it out by themselves, or just about, with the conquerors who, however, have respected treaties.

Now that this miracle of the survival of a handful of men has been brought about by Providence, it would be impossible to crush the six million French-speaking Canadians scattered all over Canada, most of whom live in the province of Quebec.

We have acquired such a strength that we now hold the balance of power in Ottawa, a fact that the Liberal party has understood much earlier than did the other parties which are still stagnating on the opposition side.

Moreover, so long have we been ruled by fear, that French Canadians still hesitate to play their full part in our great Canada.

Yes, our country is now an international power, an evolution which the Fathers of the Confederation could not foresee. That is why we must look and act as full-grown men in a great country which will soon have, I hope, a truly distinctive flag bearing no sign whatever of interdependence.

[Mr. Caron.]

(Text):

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): It is not often, Mr. Speaker, that in the throne speech debate I concentrate exclusively on local matters. This year, as I look through the speech from the throne, unfortunately it does not provide too much opportunity to dwell on domestic problems because a large part of it is concerned with external policy. It could be argued, of course, that in view of the continuing international crisis this emphasis is important. We are still under the shadow of the crisis in Suez, and if those problems are not settled adequately there is very little use giving attention to domestic issues.

The speech from the throne is sometimes referred to as a state of the nation speech, and we should be able to cover the issues that are most pertinent in Canada at the present time, particularly those which concern our local constituencies. As far as the problems on the higher level of external and foreign policy are concerned, we hope there will be other occasions in this house during this session when we will be able to come to closer grips with these matters.

I notice that in their presentations both the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) concerned themselves with the matters that were closest to their constituencies. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, in his genial Irish way, very effectively presented the problems of his area, although I think perhaps he did not have much to say about those problems. He had definitely kissed the blarney stone in the traditional Irish sense, and he presented a picture that all was for the best in the best of possible worlds in Edmonton-Strathcona. Then, too, the hon. member for Gloucester in his presentation ended on an optimistic note. He thought it was time that the maritimers forgot to be pessimistic and moved forward to emphasize the positive or the optimistic side of the picture. I am glad to know that he agrees that under the new regimes in the maritimes things are going to be much better in that part of the country.

Mr. Gillis: Read the Gordon report.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have not read it in detail.

Mr. Gillis: On the maritimes.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is all in the past.

Mr. Gillis: It is not very optimistic.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is it not?

Mr. Gillis: He deals with the future.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am going to crave the indulgence of the house to refer to some matters that are of immediate concern in the Brandon-Souris constituency. It is true the speech from the throne talks in general terms about the continuing prosperity in Canada. However, I sometimes feel that on the Ottawa level we cannot see the woods for the trees, and while we can speak in grandiose terms about the general prevailing prosperity, sections of the economy have not participated in an equitable way in the general economic upsurge in Canada during the post-war years. However, I do not want to begin on that note, either.

One of the reasons why I am sticking to local matters in this address is that this year, in my particular corner of the country, we are entering upon anniversary observances which have some importance. These anniversary observances commenced some three years ago in southwestern Manitoba, an area that was settled in the early 1880's. In the past three years several of our communities have been observing 75th anniversaries. Two years ago the town of Deloraine had an observance of that kind. Last year it was the towns of Boissevain and Souris, and this year the towns of Killarney and Virden and the city of Brandon will be observing 75th anniversaries. It is an occasion when we are marking the achievements of the past and looking forward to the prospects of the future. The celebrating of 75 years of actual settlement and incorporation in that part of the world underlines the fact that we are a very young community in western Canada. There is to be another 75th anniversary this year. Very shortly, I believe, our Prime Minister will be celebrating his 75th birthday, his 75th anniversary. This also points out that actually within the lifetime of one man, who has assumed a very prominent role in this country, western Canada has progressed to the present relatively high state of organization and progress.

We are still a very young nation and while we sometimes feel we have not made very much progress in some parts of Canada this is perhaps due to our youthfulness and our anxiety to get on with the job, to seize the tremendous opportunities that are available to all Canadians today and also, of course, to seize the responsibilities arising from those opportunities.

My constituency which is presently called the constituency of Brandon-Souris existed as the constituency of Brandon until the redistribution in 1953. It is typical, I feel, of the type of social organization that has emerged in the west since settlement began in 1880. It has produced some of the most prominent men who have held a position of representation in this house.

From the year 1896 until about 1912, I believe, the late Sir Clifford Sifton was the member for Brandon. It was under Sir Clifford's leadership that the tremendous upsurge in immigration took place in the early 1900's which assured that western Canada would assume a growing position of prominence in our Canadian economy. He established a pattern for immigration during those years that might well be followed by the present administration because in a comparatively short time some three million new citizens were brought into western Canada under his leadership.

Another important era in public life in this country was marked by another former member for Brandon, the late Hon. Robert Forke who for a few years was the leader of the Progressive party in this chamber. I think all hon. members will agree that very significant developments in public life on the national level emerged out of that period of politics in the twenties when the Progressive party played a prominent role.

I do not think I will be regarded as prejudiced if I say the Progressive movement, the farmers' movement in this country and particularly in western Canada, brought a fresh breath of air into public affairs which has had an influence right up to the present time. Certainly the Liberal party under the leadership of Mr. Mackenzie King, after he had absorbed the Progressive movement or certain aspects of it, was a very different Liberal party from the Liberal party that existed under the earlier regime of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. There was a new emphasis in Canadian public life. Not all of the things that emerged out of that movement were beneficial, of course. Sometimes we westerners are known as the wild and wooly westerners; sometimes perhaps we are regarded as being somewhat irresponsible or at least certain influences in western Canada are considered in that light. Nevertheless there were some beneficial influences that emerged out of the Progressive movement.

On opening day it was my privilege to attend the ceremonies held in connection with the unveiling of the monument to Sir Robert Borden. I found those ceremonies very impressive indeed and I was interested to hear the tributes that were paid to that outstanding Canadian leader and particularly the emphasis that was placed on the role he had played in establishing Canada's position as an autonomous nation amongst the British commonwealth of nations. It occurred to me at that time that had it not been for the fresh breezes that blew out of the west in the wake of the Progressive movement that introduced new ideas and emphases into Canadian public life it would not have been possible for Sir Robert Borden to have achieved the new status for Canada. Certainly the wave of immigration under the leadership of Sir Clifford Sifton brought in new ideas and a new emphasis on national spirit that made it possible for Prime Minister Borden to declare a position of independence for Canada at the treaty of Versailles conferences without creating too much unfavourable reaction back home in Canada.

The fact exists as well that we had established our reputation as a responsible national power during the trial of world war I, but I still claim for western Canada that some of these new concepts, this fresh impetus and the new emphases made it possible for Canada to proceed one step further along the road toward becoming a nation among the nations of the world.

More recently we have had outstanding representatives from the constituency of Brandon in the persons of Colonel D. W. Beaubier, who represented that area during the difficult early thirties, the late Mr. J. E. Matthews, who at the time of his death was the dean of this house by point of age, and then of course, just prior to the amalgamation of the constituencies of Brandon and Souris, the latter constituency was represented by Mr. J. A. Ross who, like so many of those who have devoted the major part of their lives to public service, is unfortunately at the present time not enjoying good health. In the past two years he has unfortunately been suffering from ill health, a reaction to the strenuous exertion he put forward in this house for a period of 13 years on behalf of the people of the constituency I now have the honour to represent.

We have rather an illustrious history emerging from this part of southwestern Manitoba. It was the opening of western Canada which made it possible for the flow of golden grain which in many respects changed our whole national economic picture. In the early days Brandon became known as the wheat city of the west because it was the first point at which large shipments of wheat were received. John A. Macdonald's dream of national unity was only made possible when he conceived the whole plan of confederation on the opening up of western Canada and the beginning of our grain economy.

In those days the city of Brandon founded an agricultural exhibition. Perhaps they were a little ambitious when they called it the dominion agricultural exhibition. No doubt they hoped to occupy the place now occupied by the royal agricultural winter fair in the city of Toronto. Such was the spirit of those early pioneers who moved into that area. Somewhat later they had to be satisfied with calling their exhibition the provincial winter fair and the provincial exhibition, but it is still one of the largest of its kind in the country and has made outstanding contributions to agricultural life.

That was the picture down through the years until fairly recently, perhaps we can say up to the commencement of world war II in 1939. More recently Brandon has become the home of the western Canada trade fair. I think that name nicely and aptly suggests the new pattern which is emerging in the western economy where you have the western Canada trade fair intimately associated with the provincial exhibition of Manitoba and the provincial winter fair.

There is a new order, if I may call it that, or a new era emerging in the prairie economy which has become clear to all hon. members from that part of the country. This is the picture which was presented by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona in his excellent remarks the other day. However, unfortunately the speech from the throne gives little indication that the present government is aware of what is taking place in western Canada. It gives little indication that the government is aware of the dynamic changes which are taking place.

I have had the preliminary report of the Gordon commission in my hands only overnight and have had an opportunity merely to scan it, but after scanning some of the main points in this interesting report I would say that here are a group of economists who have given serious thought to what is taking place in the Canadian economy at the present time, who have an appreciation of the changes that are taking place.

Looking at some of the sections of the report I find that their subject matters have been the topics of discussion in this house during recent months. I find reference to wheat, to the development of energy resources, the taxation of the oil and gas industries, secondary manufacturing industries, our commercial policy and foreign capital investment in Canada. After noting those I almost come to the conclusion that the commissioners responsible for the report had been looking over the shoulder of the Hon. George A. Drew or had been reading Hansard diligently to see the excellent analyses he had made of the situation during the past few years when it was my privilege to serve under his leadership in this house. I can almost say that he must have written part of this report.

Certainly it is a stimulating experience to find that those who have been charged with the responsibility for analysing our economy as it is and our future economic prospects have shown such a progressive and enlightened grasp of the situation. In many respects it is the viewpoint that we have held in western Canada during recent years. It is a direct challenge to the government to do something about these things, to keep step with the dynamics of the economic and social changes which have been occurring in Canada, particularly since the end of world war II. It is a challenge to the government to do something about it or to step aside and let someone else meet the situation as it needs to be met at the present time.

There were some references in the speech from the throne to certain problems on the agricultural front. The agricultural picture has been far from bright in the past few years. Reference is made to a survey to be conducted in all parts of Canada of land use, and the suggestion is that the government is going to give consideration at long last to the possibility of establishing a legislative program for comprehensive conservation measures.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has been on the statute books ever since the days of the drought in the early thirties. As has been mentioned in this house, it is a tribute to the appreciation of the problem by the prime minister of that day, Mr. R. B. Bennett. Unfortunately it applies only to western Canada. Certainly a measure of this kind would be in the best interests of the Canadian economy as a whole, not only from the agricultural standpoint but also from the standpoint of the total picture.

Considering the rapidity with which our economy is developing at the moment, we must give serious attention to this problem of conservation on a national basis. During recent years certain private members have placed resolutions on the order paper covering this matter and we have had worth while discussions, but to amend the P.F.R.A. in an attempt to cope with this problem is to deal only with a small aspect of the total difficulties which face agriculture at the moment.

We are moving toward an industrial economy. It has become almost platitudinous to say that you cannot have a healthy economy or a healthy society unless you have a strong, solvent and progressive underlying agricultural industry. Unfortunately we do not have that at the present time. The industrial revolution which has hit western Canada has made serious inroads into our agricultural activity. The government has done nothing to deal with the changes which are taking place. These matters have been mentioned many times in the house. We have talked about the price squeeze under which the farmer is suffering. We have talked about the problems created by surplus production. However, perhaps the major difficulty is the general exodus of people from the farm.

These are only three of the subjects which require immediate action on the part of the present administration having regard to the nature of the economy in which we are operating at the present time and to the "price squeeze" in which the farmer finds himself. It is an inflationary economy—an economy key-noted by industrial development in which both capital and labour find themselves on a price escalator. It seems that no sooner do prices rise under the impact of creeping inflation than labour asks for an increase in wages. It is a fine, thrilling ride for those who largely derive their incomes from these two orders of activity, that is to say, capital and labour, but for those who are not on the "escalator" it presents a very difficult situation indeed. Those who do not benefit include, unfortunately, our farmers and those of our citizens in receipt of fixed incomes.

We have had many dramatic pleas in this house that some action should be taken which would at least place these people in receipt of fixed incomes on the first step of the stairway to better conditions even if they cannot ride the escalator which exerts such a heady influence on those who are riding it at the present time. We have heard appeals for war pensioners, appeals for blind pensioners and others, and I would like in particular to join in supporting the appeal which the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) made last night on behalf of veterans of the first world war who saw service only in the United Kingdom and who as a result are not eligible for war veterans' allowances. These are obvious questions, and questions to which immediate attention should be given by a government which professes to be representing the general interest of the people of Canada.

Someone has said that if capital and labour ever get together it will be "good night" to the rest of us, which recalls the original point I was making, namely that we find prices and wages going up in parts of the Canadian economy and remaining static in others. In these circumstances there is more truth than fiction in a statement of that kind. The price situation is, of course, giving rise to much discussion in western Canada concerning a fair price relationship. We hear a lot of talk among farmers' organizations about the necessity for parity. I think we can quite safely say that in regard to government intervention in economic matters the farmer has been the most neglected individual. Last spring we were sitting in on a hearing in connection with amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act and we were hearing evidence from Dr. Hope, who is the economist for the Canadian federation of agriculture. Someone—I have forgotten which member it was, but it was one of the members from Saskatchewan—asked Dr. Hope this pointed question: "Do you, Dr. Hope, know of any country where the government does less for the farmer than does the Canadian government"? Dr. Hope's reply was very brief, yet very emphatic. It was: "No".

The agitation that goes on in the west as the farmers try to cope with the very rapid changes that are taking place in the economy is quite justified. A lot of it, perhaps, is not in touch with the realities of economics and there has been a divergency of opinion expressed from time to time; the organizations representing the farmers have not agreed as to what the best solution might be. But certainly, Mr. Speaker, something has to be done to stabilize the price position of the farmer more effectively if we are going to avoid some of the worst consequences to our agricultural industry. The Gordon commission deals with this question. I cannot refer to its report in any detail because I have not had time to read it fully but, briefly, the commission does refer to farm prices and makes recommendations concerning the activities of the Canadian wheat board and, no doubt, the government will be giving attention to some of these recommendations. On page 29 of the report in the chapter headed "Agriculture", paragraph 15, the report says:

> We believe that the objective of a price support program for farmers should be roughly the same as that of unemployment assistance to industrial workers, namely, to mitigate distress due to economic fluctuations.

In paragraph 16 the report goes further with regard to this subject, and the concluding sentence says:

> We believe that the determination of the support price on the advice of a full-time board would be preferable to the application of more or less automatic formulae.

These are specific recommendations made by the economists who were dealing with the problems.

The movement of people from the farms is one of the major difficulties. Dr. Baker, who has been conducting some research into agricultural matters in the province of Saskatchewan, says that the small farm has become obsolete on the prairies and that we are going to see a continuation of this movement of farmers away from the prairies. This is, of course, related to the problems of the price squeeze and surplus production. The danger point here is not that the farmers are leaving the farms—that is an inevitable process in a changing economy—but that the changeover may not be accomplished satisfactorily. I see, as I glance through the Gordon commission report, that in the year 1980, they mention, four out of every five of our citizens will be living in urban communities, which suggests that this trend from country to city will continue apace. But that is not the crux of the problem. The crux of the problem is: Where do they go and how do they get there? That is a matter to which this government has given absolutely no attention though it is one of the major difficulties which lie before us. The solution involves changes in educational policy—we shall be discussing that at length, Mr. Speaker, in this house in relation to improved grants to universities—it involves equitable distribution of industry across Canada rather than having it concentrated in two central provinces; it raises the old question of the decentralization of industry, and the government has hardly given that any consideration whatsoever.

This involves all the problems that arise when resettlement problems emerge in our economy. For example, with respect to the educational problem it has been pointed out to us on many occasions that we are not beginning to meet the need for new technicians in Canada. In a recent Citizen's Forum discussion on radio and television it was pointed out that we need immediately 100,000 new technicians. How are we going to produce them? We have two institutions devoted to this activity, the Ryerson Institute in Toronto and the Institute of Technology in the city of Calgary. They are capable of producing a relatively small number of technicians each year. In contrast, Russia has 1,500 technical schools.

This means that we are wasting the talents of our engineers by having them perform the functions of technicians when they should be devoting their better training to the functions of engineers. Someone has suggested that the proportion of technicians to engineers should be four to one. At the present time our position is the reverse: we have approximately three engineers for every technician. This situation is vitally related to the agricultural problem I have been discussing. If young people are moving from the farms in response to the changing economic pressures, if smaller farms are being absorbed in larger farms, certainly there is plenty of room for these displaced persons in our growing industrial activity, but the government must take some responsibility with respect to resettlement and retraining.

My time is rapidly coming to an end and rather than go farther with the matter of inequities in our national development I shall leave it on the basis of what I have said about agriculture. I could have gone further and discussed the industrial aspect. The two are closely related. After all, we are a national economy and if changes take place in one segment we must make the necessary adjustments to restore a balance to the situation.

Donald Creighton, who has acquired a certain fame recently following the publication of his excellent biography of the life of Sir John A. Macdonald, Canada's first prime minister, made a speech to the anniversary banquet of the United Grain Growers in Calgary last November in which he put his finger on the nub of the matter with respect to the point I have been trying to make that there is an imbalance in development in Canada. At that time he said:

> The farm leaders drove home the truth that a true national policy must be for the whole nation, for agriculture as well as for industry, and that the powers and resources of the state must be employed so as to distribute burdens and equalize opportunities over the nation and through all its classes and groups.

That, I think, Mr. Speaker, is an excellent summary of the approach that must be taken by the federal government during these changing times. The speech from the throne was utterly disappointing in this respect. I trust that the government, in any further proposals that it makes during this important session of parliament, will attempt to come to grips with the problem. Otherwise I am afraid the amendment to the speech from the throne moved by this group will come true very quickly in this country and it will be apparent that not only has the house lost confidence but that the people of Canada have also lost confidence in this administration.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The mover is well known to us all but we fellow New Brunswickers wish to express our appreciation of and gratitude for the manner in which our colleague from Gloucester county, New Brunswick, conducted himself during this debate. I believe his speech will be very well received by his constituents and by the people of the province of New Brunswick as a whole.

We met here on January 8 earlier this week at a time when a most serious and apparently unnecessary railway strike was affecting many parts of our great country. In my county, the county of Charlotte, we have no C.N.R. connections of any kind and this creates a more serious problem. Thousands of tons of Minto coal go to the pulp mill at Woodland, Maine. Thousands of tons of Minto coal go to the cotton mills in Milltown in my own riding. Conleys, who export hundreds of thousands of pounds of lobster to the United States, are obliged to truck their product long distances under very difficult circumstances. Connors Brothers Limited are in the same position. Ganong Brothers Limited, candy manufacturers in St. Stephen, are in the same position. I have received telegrams from many people explaining the serious situation as supplies of coal are running very short at this time.

Unemployment directly and indirectly attributable to the strike is having a most serious effect in my constituency and in all parts of the maritime provinces. We must all acknowledge, however, that the city and port of Saint John will be harder hit than any other section of our province.

I had expected great things from the new leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he spoke on this serious problem in the house a few days ago, and I was particularly sure that the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) would come up with some constructive suggestions since his home city has been declared an area of serious emergency.

An hon. Member: What a hope!

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The attitude taken by these two hon. members, however, is one of fence-sitting, pussyfooting, petty politicians. In his remarks yesterday in this chamber the hon. member for Saint John-Albert mentioned a strike which took place a year ago at a sugar refinery in Saint John and immediately said with emphasis: Remember now, I am not taking sides. With respect to every other strike he mentioned he wanted to emphasize the fact that he did not want it forgotten that he was not taking sides. The same statement was made with respect to the present strike and the difficulties we have had to contend with in our part of the country. In his remarks regarding the railway strike he was most careful not to commit himself in any way. When he resumed his seat I asked him a question. I did not interrupt while he was speaking. I said, as found at page 68 of Hansard:

> I would like the hon. member to tell us, if he would, what he would suggest as a solution to the railway strike.

He answered:

The resignation of this government would be the best one—

The resignation of the present government would only mean a 20 year delay so far as the Conservative party is concerned. That may be his solution to the problem but I know that most people in the maritime provinces would not be prepared to wait 20 years for a solution of this serious railway strike with which we are faced right now.

Mr. Cardiff: How silly can you get?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I do not think that is quite as silly as my friend to the left because I keep still when others are speaking. I think he might follow the same practice. It is quite obvious that the hon. member for Saint John-Albert left this serious matter in a way that would allow him to interpret his remarks in any manner he wished. If the hon. member for Saint John-Albert were asked by a C.P.R. employee what his views were, he could immediately change this whole situation to meet the need. If he were asked by the management of the C.P.R. what his views were in connection with the matter, again, if he would be honest, he would say, "I have said nothing". But I feel quite sure that his attitude in this regard will not be acceptable to his own home city of Saint John. I do not believe that they would be satisfied with the manner in which he has dealt with this matter.

I received telegrams from W. W. Macaulay, mayor of Saint John; Parker D. Mitchell, mayor of the city of Lancaster; and E. B. Ross, deputy mayor of St. Andrews; Charlotte county board of trade and other boards of trade. In every case these words were used: A state of emergency exists. We request you to act at once by urging the government to use their emergency powers. That is exactly what I did when I came to Ottawa. I urged upon the government the necessity of settling the strike as soon as possible, and that they use anything within their power to see that it was settled. I want the people in my constituency to know just where I stand in this regard. There is no pussy-footing on my part. I believe in being straightforward and speaking what you believe to be honest facts.

The telegrams I have received are all urgent ones. The people who are sending those telegrams are greatly alarmed over conditions there at this particular time. I believe that circumstances warrant members from the maritimes taking that stand and that action. However, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I am sorry to say, did not take a stand at any time during his remarks in this house. It was a case of sitting on the fence from start to finish. It may not offend many in his constituency, but I feel sure it will not be endorsed by too many either.

After his remarks in connection with the strike, the hon. member went on to condemn the federal government for their lack of interest in the maritime provinces. At the same time he painted a most gloomy picture of our economic future. I have here an advertisement that appeared in his own Saint John Telegraph-Journal just six months ago. It was placed in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal by the Progressive Conservative Association of New Brunswick. It reads in part:

Premier Hugh John Flemming has announced a $20 million manganese refining industry for New Brunswick.

Attorney General West has announced the reopening of the mill at Marysville.

The Ministers of Agriculture and of Industry and Development have announced a new frozen food plant for Florenceville. Another one is in prospect for the city of Lancaster.

Hon. Mr. Fournier has announced the Flemming government will construct a new bridge at Edmundston. The new Limestone Bridge, in Victoria county, was officially opened Saturday.

The pulp and paper industry has announced plans for a huge five-year expansion program—a direct result of Hugh John Flemming's power development.

Wages are up more than 15 per cent since 1952. Construction is up 21 per cent in New Brunswick over last year—the second highest increase in all Canada.

The economy of the province was never better . . .

For three consecutive years, the Flemming government has reduced the net debt . . .

I realize that when we reduce a net debt here we are bitterly criticized by those sitting in the official opposition. But I am proud of any government that has a surplus rather than a deficit. Surely a government that has a surplus, be it federal or provincial, does not need financial aid. When they boast of their surpluses, it is good indication to the people of this country that things are not too bad.

I might follow this up with the statement that on New Year's eve our premier came out with a statement in the same glowing terms as the one I have just read, indicating that conditions were very good in our province. At that time I am sure he did not ask for any assistance of any kind. That story that was told in June and the one that was told on New Year's eve is different from the story we heard told here yesterday by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. He made no mention, it is true, of the fact that the federal expenditure in the province of New Brunswick during the past twelve months was more than double the total revenue of our provincial government. This federal government spent in my province in the last twelve months $130 million but we never hear any credit given to anyone in connection with it. At this point I may say that $20 million of the $50 million that we have as our total revenue comes as a contribution from this government. Two fifths of our total revenue in the province of New Brunswick comes directly from the federal government. I never hear a Conservative member ever give anyone any credit for that. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in my province we could not exist without that assistance we are receiving from the federal government. There was no mention of the fact that this $20 million is used to provide employment for the friends of the Conservative government, something which is true. We all know it. Only yesterday I received a report. It is from the editorial and information division of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and it reads in part as follows:

> . . . plans were outlined for a 1957 expenditure of about $3,500,000 to control the spruce budworm outbreak in northern New Brunswick.

This has been going on for several years. The federal government has never been hesitant in any way in making their contribution. I have yet to find one single circumstance where this government has ever refused to assist our provincial government when it had a legitimate case to place before it. I have searched the record and can find no case where assistance, when it was requested from the province of New Brunswick and where it was felt that the matter under consideration was beyond their financial capacity, was not provided. I also doubt that the hon. member for Saint John-Albert himself can find any such case. I have not been able to do so.

There is an article that appears in Maclean's magazine—a copy was sent to me yesterday—by Blair Fraser. It is headed "Backstage at Ottawa" and there are some extremely interesting remarks in that particular article. Under the subheading "Where can Ottawa spend Its Hoarded Half-Billion?" we find the following:

> One region that leaps to mind when capital development is discussed is, of course, the Atlantic provinces—the maritimes and Newfoundland. Hundreds of millions in public funds have been spent or lent to develop other parts of Canada in recent years, with projects like the St. Lawrence seaway and the trans-Canada pipeline. Nothing proportionate has been done for the Atlantic region.

Ottawa would like to correct this imbalance. Hon. Robert H. Winters is Minister of Public Works as well as M.P. for Lunenburg, N.S., and a devoted maritimer.

That is something we all can confirm. The article continues:

> He has repeatedly made, and Prime Minister St. Laurent has echoed, invitations to maritime spokesmen to bring to Ottawa any ideas they may have for development of their native land. The implication is that if money is all that's needed, that will be no obstacle.
>
> So far there has been amazingly little response. New Brunswick has a hydro-electric project in mind but it presents serious engineering problems, as well as the doubt that a sound hydro project should need help anyway. Otherwise, a typical maritime reaction has been, "If Ottawa would make its suggestion more specific, we'd be delighted to discuss it". The fact that Ottawa is inviting suggestions, not making them, is glossed over.

I think Blair Fraser made a true statement according to facts right there. He goes on to say that some plans have been proposed that are rather fantastic. We all know that. But as to any constructive plan that came from the province of New Brunswick that would help the province and the country, so far as federal funds are concerned I am confident that this government are prepared to go ahead and do what they can to improve conditions.

We must all admit, as New Brunswickers, that our retarded development in New Brunswick is caused by the serious lack of cheap electrical energy. We all know that. We can never hope to become an industrialized area until an abundance of electrical power at a reasonable cost can be developed. None of the projects now under construction or consideration can supply that power except the Passamaquoddy tidal power project. A survey has been undertaken jointly by the United States government and the Canadian government to determine whether this project is economically feasible. A full-scale investigation will get under way this spring. Today these engineers, whom I meet very often, are compiling information in their offices on both sides of the border that dates back 30 years. They hope to be able, by April 1, to get a full-scale investigation under way. It is my honest, sincere opinion that this is the only answer to our economic problems in New Brunswick. It is on this project that I pin my faith, and it is on this project that federal assistance will be required. It is on this project that federal assistance will be provided if the investigation proves the project is a sound one from an economic standpoint.

Again, I would wish to emphasize the fact that an abundance of cheap power is the only answer to our problem in New Brunswick. As Blair Fraser quite rightly said, some of the plans that have been proposed whereby federal financial assistance would be required are pretty fantastic. Any assistance from the federal government should have long-term benefits, not just a flash in the pan. Let us hold this ace in the hole until we have the answer with regard to the Passamaquoddy project because that is the only source in New Brunswick, or in that area that I know of, where a great block of power might be provided. I have great faith in my own province, and I have faith in all the maritime provinces. If we wish to improve our standard of living and create an environment which will induce the young men and women to stay there with us, we must take full advantage of the bountiful resources God has provided for us. If all the citizens of the maritime provinces would place less emphasis on complaining and criticism and give more serious thought to constructive contributions, we might look to the future with a much more enthusiastic attitude. Criticism, as we listen to it here, and complaint without constructive suggestions, will never build a bigger and better maritimes which is the goal we all hope we may be able to achieve.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Members of this group, Mr. Speaker, are earnestly hoping that a settlement of the strike on the Canadian Pacific Railway will be reached today. In fact, we hope it might be reached at any moment, certainly within a few hours. We have felt right from the start that the only reason the strike came about was because the Canadian Pacific Railway insisted on injecting an issue into its negotiations with the firemen which should not have been raised at all, namely an issue relating to the safety of railway operations. I shall have something more to say about that in a moment.

May I at this point add the comment that we believe it has become clear to many more members of the house than was the case at the start, and has become clear to large sections of the public, that it is the intransigence of the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway which was responsible not only for the strike in the first place but is responsible for the delay in its settlement. The proposal the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has made to both sides for a temporary agreement similar to that made between the brotherhood and the Canadian National Railways is in line to a large extent with the proposals made earlier by the Canadian Labour Congress and supported by the union. It is also in line with the first proposal that we in this group made in a press release which we gave out on January 8. It is obvious, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the proposal made by the Prime Minister is not only one that commends itself to this house as reasonable, but it obviously commends itself to the men who are affected. Indeed, a report in this morning's Montreal Gazette says that Mr. Jodoin has stated that the Prime Minister's statements and suggestions were very acceptable to the Canadian Labour Congress and to the brotherhood. This seems to make it quite clear to all who may want to look at this matter objectively that it is the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway which is holding out on the very fair proposals made to both sides by the government. Any further continuing of the strike is, therefore, the responsibility of the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We hope that there will soon be agreement to the proposal made by the government so that the strike may be settled and the operation of the railway resumed.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that in the view of the members of this group the strike came about only because in the midst of negotiations on wages, working conditions and other matters, the Canadian Pacific sought to introduce an extraneous matter, namely the proposal to do away with firemen on diesel locomotives in yard and freight service regardless of the effect of such a change on the safety of railway operations. We feel that a false picture of this proposed change has been given, largely through the publicity channels of the Canadian Pacific Railways, as to what it meant. The Canadian Pacific Railway has tried to play up the fact that on diesel locomotives there is no need for firing, as such, as used to be the case on steam locomotives. The Canadian Pacific Railway has overlooked the other functions of the person known as fireman on diesel locomotives. Gradually, as this matter has been discussed, and as attention has been paid to it because of the fact a strike was in progress, people are beginning to realize that on modern diesel locomotives with modern lengthy trains travelling at high speeds, there are many other functions to perform that have taken the place of the actual firing that used to be the main task of the fireman.

Not only has the publicity which the C.P.R. has been able to get for its side of the case played up the fact that there is no actual firing necessary on the part of the fireman on a diesel locomotive, but it has played down the safety angle involved. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this attempt to draw attention to the fact that all the C.P.R. is asking for is the elimination of firemen on freight and yard diesels is an attempt to lull the public into a feeling of security in the knowledge that, for the moment at any rate, passenger trains will still have firemen on diesel locomotives. After all, so far as the public is concerned, for the most part our experience is in travelling on passenger trains, and of course so long as the C.P.R. does not propose to take firemen off diesel locomotives hauling passenger trains the general public could have a certain sense of security.

I suggest there are two points which ought to be taken into consideration in regard to that phase of the matter. One is that the change in the diesel rule which Canadian Pacific Railway is asking for is an over-all blanket change. True, for the moment, the C.P.R. says it intends to take firemen off only yard and freight diesels, but the change in the rule is so comprehensive that it would be possible at any time for the C.P.R., under that new rule, to eliminate firemen from diesels hauling passenger trains as well.

Even apart from the question as to whether or not firemen would be taken off diesels hauling passenger trains, surely the Canadian Pacific Railway, the government, parliament and the public have a responsibility to the employees who operate freight trains. Even if they never take them off passenger diesels, the fact is that we have a responsibility to protect the life and limb of those who are operating freight trains. To us it is a case of a callous disregard of the rights of workers for the Canadian Pacific Railway to assume that in the eyes of the public it is perfectly all right to have less of a safety factor on yard and freight trains than the public would expect to have on passenger trains.

During the negotiations, once this issue was raised, representations, of course, were made as best they could be made by the representatives of the brotherhood. I have had the privilege of looking over some of the evidence that was presented; I have had the privilege of seeing copies of scores of photographs that were shown to the board indicating the difficulties of operating diesel locomotives in yard service. Those photographs which were presented to the conciliation board show instance after instance where the view of the engineer on the right side of a diesel locomotive is completely obstructed so far as the situation on the left side of the train is concerned, to the increase of danger to the employees who have just as much right to protection by the C.P.R., protection by parliament and protection by the public as have passengers who ride on the trains operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

There is also the factor, Mr. Speaker, that if you step by step do away with the firemen on diesel locomotives, and if you increase the dieselization of our railways, the day will come when, with present engineers retiring and moving out of the picture, engineers will have to be trained without having had the prior experience of being firemen. I have had both correspondence and conversations with engineers as well as with firemen during the time this matter has been under discussion, and engineers have said to me that they would not want to become engineers without first of all having had the experience of being firemen. It is one thing to train a person as to the actual techniques of operating a modern locomotive; it is another thing to have the experience of being put through as a sort of co-engineer during the years that one is a fireman. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we feel that this whole safety factor is one that has not been sufficiently publicized during the time this matter has been in dispute. It has not been sufficiently appreciated by the Canadian Pacific Railway; indeed, we think it was not sufficiently appreciated by the conciliation board. In our view, it should not have been thrown into these negotiations at all. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had not come along after the negotiations were started and thrown in this issue I am sure that the other matters that were being negotiated by the parties could have been settled and we would not have had a strike at all.

The day has to come, Mr. Speaker, when an organization such as the Canadian Pacific Railway must realize its responsibility in matters of labour relations. Parliament does its best to regulate labour relations by legislation such as the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act; but even after the legislation has been passed, even after the best possible legislation has been passed, harmonious labour relations will depend on good will on the part of both sides. This whole story of the relations between the Canadian Pacific Railway and its firemen is an example, in our view, of a high-handed attitude toward labour, of a disregard for the safety factor and a willingness to trifle with the safety of workers and the public in order to try to beat down the wage and other demands of the union. We think the Canadian Pacific Railway must yet learn the lesson that in addition to good labour legislation we need the type of management that recognizes its responsibility to all sections of the public, including its responsibility to the employees who work for a company such as the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Others have already spoken on this matter on behalf of this group, and all of us who speak are expressing the views of all members of this group. In the remarks that have been made it has been pointed out—but perhaps it should be pointed out again—that the attempt of the Canadian Pacific Railway and particularly the attempt of its president, Mr. N. R. Crump, to rely on the fact that the conciliation board agreed to the elimination of firemen from yard and freight diesels is really not justified. After all, that board consisted of three members. The majority recommendation, signed by two members, was qualified by certain doubts. The third member, Senator Roebuck, made a very strong recommendation, a very strongly worded report, which he submitted to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), opposing outright the proposal to eliminate firemen from its locomotives. He went so far as to call upon the Canadian Pacific Railway to withdraw its ill-conceived proposal. He said that he was fortified in his position by what had been done by the Canadian National Railways and by what had been done by all the railways in the United States. He also cited his experience as a lawyer when on occasions he had had to defend engineers against charges of manslaughter. On the basis of that experience, he pointed out that it is an extremely onerous responsibility that is placed on engineers, and, in his view, no engineer should be asked to operate any locomotive, passenger, freight or yard, without having a co-engineer, or a fireman, as the second person in the cab.

There has been some discussion about the time when the head trainman rides in the cab, and it has been said that he provides the second person but, as Senator Roebuck and others have pointed out, the responsibilities of the head brakeman or the head trainman are of a totally different nature. He is concerned with the train itself, and the work that he has to do when the train is stopped. His whole responsibility, and his whole training, detract from the possibility of his taking care of the safety factors which the fireman is in a position to assume. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we feel satisfied the time has come when the public has begun to get a little different picture of this from what was the case at the start. First, it was thought by many just that here was a group of people trying to hold on to their jobs. Any of us who have had connections with trade unions know that the trade union movement accepts and welcomes technological changes. It does its best to protect the rights of workers as changes take place; but to suggest that this is only an attempt to stop progress on the part of the union is to be completely false to the approach of the trade union movement generally. Indeed, the very thing that we are talking about, namely, dieselization has already displaced many other workers, machinists, and so on, across this country. There has not been any strike over that, much as it has done by way of dislocating many people because, in the other instances, the safety factor was not involved, as it is in this situation.

We are glad of one other thing, Mr. Speaker, in this whole story. So far there has been no attempt on the part of the government to repeat the performance of 1950. There have been those who have spoken in this debate who have come pretty close to the suggestion that the government should use its power—I was not sure of what the last speaker had in mind—to get the railways running again, even if it meant forcing the men back to work. We feel that real damage was done to collective bargaining and to labour-management relations on the railways when, in 1950, the government called upon parliament to pass a bill which we opposed, that included compulsory arbitration. To the extent that that has not been done at this time—and I hope the government will stay with its refusal to resort to compulsory arbitration—to that extent some of the damage that was done in 1950 is being undone. As a matter of fact, I think Mr. Crump assumed right from the start he had nothing to worry about, that the government which had put the men back to work by act of parliament in 1950 would do it again, that the government would not permit a railway strike to go on and so all he had to do was take his position, unreasonable as it was, and the government would bail him out.

I am glad the government has not asked parliament to do that and I hope other steps will be taken to reinstate the collective bargaining position that obtained on the railways prior to the strike of 1950. I say again, Mr. Speaker, not only is it necessary to have good labour legislation, not only is it necessary to have the good offices of the Department of Labour to mediate in situations like this, not only is it necessary to have well chosen conciliation boards, but harmonious labour relations depend upon goodwill and good faith on both sides and it is our feeling that the Canadian Pacific Railway management in this whole piece has been oblivious to the rights of the men concerned, has been oblivious to the safety factor not just as it affects the general public but as it affects even a few of its employees. We feel, as Senator Roebuck says, that the whole proposal should be withdrawn and that there should be no further attempt to reduce the safety of railway operation by eliminating the firemen from locomotives on any operation be it passenger, freight or yard service. That is our position on this important issue.

Mr. Speaker, there are one or two other matters about which I would like to say a few words at this time. First of all, I wish to refer once again to the question of the old age pension. I am delighted that this subject has been mentioned by hon. members who have spoken in this debate in all parts of the house. The tragedy is that it was not mentioned in the speech from the throne.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if it had been possible to take a poll of public opinion prior to the reading of the speech from the throne it would have been pretty generally agreed that that speech would include a forecast of an increase in the old age pension. Certainly last year when the government was under fire during the pipe line debate, under fire not only here but in the press and suffering considerable discredit across the country, there were strong rumours to the effect that one of the ways in which the government would attempt to retrieve its position would be by bringing in improvements in social legislation at this session, one of them to be an increase in the old age pension.

Lo and behold, this year the government apparently thinks it has nothing to worry about, that it has the election in the bag. It may have another think coming. But because it thinks that way the government has brought down a speech from the throne with a few things contained in it that are acceptable and uncontentious but which contains nothing at all that comes to grips with the basic problems facing our people, such as the plight of our senior citizens.

It is well and good, Mr. Speaker, to boast about our buoyant economy and it is fine to talk about the great prosperity that exists in the country but the more our economy is buoyed up and the more prosperous the country is as a whole, the more tragic becomes the position of those who are on fixed incomes and particularly those who are on low fixed incomes.

This figure of $40 a month which is presently being paid under federal legislation both to those in receipt of old age security and those in receipt of old age assistance, as well as to the blind and the totally disabled, was set back in 1949. At that time the gross national production of this country was $16.4 billion a year. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if we have been able to increase our gross national production since 1949 it is only decent and proper that we should give to our old age pensioners an increase in what we pay them proportionate to the increase in our gross national production.

This year the gross national product may be $29 or $30 billion a year. If it is $29 billion that will be an increase of 77 per cent over what it was in 1949. If it is $30 billion that will be an increase of 82 per cent over what it was in 1949. The 77 per cent increase would call for an increase in the old age pension to $70 a month. The 82 per cent increase would call for an increase in the pension to $72 a month.

There was a time when to speak of figures like that for old age pension would have seemed outlandish but what the government does not seem to know is that Canadians generally have moved forward to the position that an old age pension should no longer be just an amount of money to keep a person barely alive but rather that an old age pension should be one of the rights of citizenship, should be one way of enabling our older people who have helped to build up the country to live in dignified and decent retirement and enjoy some of the wealth that the country is then producing because of what they have done.

We need—the country has it, it is the government that needs it—a new concept of the old age pension. The government should realize that it should be not just an existence allowance but rather the right to share in the wealth of the country at any given time. This party at its last national convention held in Winnipeg last August went on record urging that the old age pension be increased to not less than $65 a month and that it be payable without a means test from age 65.

I noticed that one Liberal across the way went out on a limb in expressing the opinion that the old age pension should be increased by $10 to $50 a month. In the light of the increase in our gross national product an increase of $10 a month would surely be very niggardly. We say that in the light of Canada's present increased prosperity and in the light of the suffering and needs of these people the pension should be increased to not less than $65 a month, and that these other figures I have given should be borne in mind for surely all Canadians are entitled to share in our gross national product.

Speaking of the gross national product it seems to be the popular thing today to refer to the Gordon report, preliminary copies of which reached us yesterday. I note in the report that if the conditions the board indicates are met it is expected that by 1980 the gross national product of Canada will reach the figure of $76 billion a year. I think it would not be improper for me to carry forward the percentage figuring I was doing a moment ago. If we do achieve a gross national product of $76 billion a year by 1980 that will represent an increase of 360 per cent over the $16.4 billion that obtained in 1949. If the old age pension were to be increased in proportion thereto it should be raised by 1980 to $184 a month.

Now I say again to hon. members, do not laugh at this kind of figure just because some hon. members were brought up in the days when the old age pension was $20 a month, barely enough to keep body and soul together. The old age pension has a purpose different from mere existence. Its purpose is to recognize what older people have done for the country and to give them their share of a decent life as we would do in any ordinary decent family.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, we are going to have to reconsider this whole question. It seems to me that what we need in relation to old age pensions is not only the universal plan we have that pays a flat amount to all our people but in addition to that we need something in the nature of the national industrial pension plan which has been proposed by the Canadian Labour Congress and the sooner we come to grips with this issue at the parliamentary level the better it will be for this country as a whole. There is really not very much in the speech from the throne for this session. I suppose that after the debate on the address is over a couple of weeks would be sufficient to clean up all the legislation set out in the speech from the throne. Maybe that is what the government intends, that we will be here for a couple of weeks and then go home for the election, but there are indications that we are going to stay here until close to Easter.

Therefore I suggest that if the government is not prepared on its own to bring in a substantial increase in the old age pension it should do what was done in 1950 and appoint immediately a special committee of this house to consider the whole question of old age pensions to see if what some of us are saying is not the proper course, namely that the universal pension now paid under old age security should be increased to a figure of $65 a month or more and made payable at age 65 years, and that in addition to that there should be established a comprehensive national industrial pension plan so that all pension plans of workers and others in the country could be integrated on a contributory basis, so the funds invested in that way could be controlled for the good of the country, and so we might look forward to the provision of decent and dignified retirement for our senior citizens instead of the mere pittance that they now have to keep themselves alive.

[Mr. Knowles.]

This issue is one of deep importance. I feel, as do many members of this group, that it is a matter of great regret that the government has shown by its barren speech from the throne that it thinks it has the election won so why disturb it; that they just have to sit back and let things go their own way. They may have to have another thought about that, but even if it were true that the government stands to win the next election, what sort of leadership is it to sit back and do nothing because you are not being pressed by political considerations. If that is what the government wants, if it wants pressure and prodding and the fear of defeat in order to provide action on this issue we will do our best to give that to them because we believe the people of Canada are entitled at this time to a substantial increase in the old age pension that is now paid and that they are entitled at this time to a consideration of this whole question proposed by Mr. Jodoin and the Canadian Labour Congress of a national pension plan which my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and others of us have been proposing in this house for many years.

I urge this question of old age pensions as strongly as I can because it seems to me that the lethargy of the government, feeling that it did something back in 1950 and 1951, does not meet the wishes or the thinking of the Canadian people. This concerns not only the senior citizens themselves but younger people who have concern for them and who are thinking about their own futures. They realize that when a country can boast of a $29 billion or $30 billion gross national production, when a country is pictured in the Gordon report as going to have a production of $76 billion by 1980, it is not being decent, it is not being sensible, it is not being humane when it gives such a short end of the stick to our senior citizens.

Not only is the government showing its indifference to the wishes and needs of the people by its failure to act in this field of old age pensions, it is also highly noticeable, as my leader and others have pointed out, that there is no reference in the speech from the throne to the question of health insurance. Hon. members will recall the great fanfare we had last year. Of course the leader of that fanfare is not here at the moment to keep it going but I understand he will be back in a few days. I refer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). A year ago we had a conference attended by the provincial representatives which the minister said was one of the finest conferences they had ever had.

He sat back for a while and then a proposition was made but attached to the proposition was a condition that it would be put into effect only if a substantial majority of the provinces representing a substantial majority of the population of Canada agreed to it.

That meant that there had to be agreement by six provinces, and that either Ontario or Quebec had to be included in those six. We pointed out at the time that the plan, although a step in the right direction, and despite of the shortcomings of its coverage, did not make a sufficiently attractive offer to the provinces to ensure that six would agree. We have had a year and only three, namely the three western provinces, have agreed to the plan. My own province of Manitoba, which has the only Liberal government in the country west of those which border on the Atlantic ocean, has virtually said that it will not have anything to do with the plan. No Liberal government in Canada has shown any interest in it to the point of indicating it would agree. No other governments have come in and it begins to look as though the plan is virtually dead.

I say to the government that if they were acting in good faith a year ago when they were talking about health insurance they should realize that a year having gone by with only three provinces agreeing the time has come when they should review the proposition and improve and revise the offer so that they can get six provinces to agree. In fact, that is what I looked for in the speech from the throne. After all an election is coming and a pre-election speech from the throne usually pays some attention to the wishes and needs of the Canadian people.

Here is a field, like that of old age pensions, where the needs of the Canadian people are very great, particularly so just now when hospital and medical costs are going up and when increases are reflected in increases in the Blue Cross and other medical plan payments. Things are getting to the point where despite our prosperity, of which the government of this country boasts, the basic care of health is something that is being rationed to our people by their purse. We are not getting the full advantage of medical science or of the money being spent on hospital construction and in other ways.

It all awaits a plan to make these things financially possible for the Canadian people. It all awaits a plan of health insurance. We feel that any plan of health insurance should be comprehensive and include not only hospitalization but medical, dental and optical care. It should include sickness benefits when the bread-winner is out of work. That is our objective. Nevertheless, we admit that it is a good thing to get started. On that basis we admit that the proposal made by the government last year for national hospitalization insurance was a step in the right direction.

I am sure that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) who is paying me the honour of listening to what I am saying, will agree with me that it is now obvious that the terms of last year's proposal were not attractive enough. A sufficient number of provinces have not agreed. If there is any sincerity and validity to the 38-year old interest in health insurance evinced by the Liberal party that should be indicated now by increasing the offer to the provinces so that six of them will come in and we can get health insurance started.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I believe my 40 minutes had just about expired when the house rose for lunch. I had hoped that by this time the government would be in a position to announce the settlement of the strike. No minister has risen in his place to make such an announcement and I assume that the government is not yet ready to do so. I am sure we all hope such an announcement will be made before the house rises at six o'clock. Indeed, if a settlement is not reached very soon on what I might call the basis of the first point in our proposal of the other day, namely, a request to both parties that they resume operations leaving the diesel question to be settled later, the government may have to consider the second point of our proposal, namely taking over the C.P.R. and running it pending a settlement of that issue. Nevertheless, it is our hope that an announcement of a settlement can, as I said before, be made by the government before the house rises at six o'clock tonight.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just one further word on the two other subjects which I raised before lunch. It is our view and, we believe it is the opinion of a vast number of Canadian people, that action should be taken by the government at this session of parliament on the old age pension question and on the matter of national health insurance. We believe that the old age pension should be raised substantially now. We believe a national health insurance plan with provision for provincial participation should be put on the statute books now. We contend, indeed, that if the government fails in its responsibility in these two matters it should be dealt with by the people of Canada at election time giving it the treatment which such an irresponsible government should be given.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset join with the others who have preceded me in extending heartiest congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have ably discharged their duties with, I am sure, credit to themselves and to the constituencies which they represent.

There are in the speech from the throne a number of items in which I am particularly interested but on this occasion I am going to confine my remarks to just one. May I refer to that section of the speech from the throne which deals with agriculture? It is proposed to recommend in the Senate the establishment of a committee to consider what should be done to make better use of land for agriculture and thus to contribute more effectively to the improvement of agricultural production and the incomes of those connected with it. I would hope that any such committee would take the view that the approach in any region should be made not only with a view to the percentage importance to the national income but also with regard to the value of the industry as a source of employment and to its importance in the economy of the region under study. I say that for this reason: the farm income of Newfoundland would be a very small percentage of the total farm income of all the provinces of Canada and the result is that if we were to approach the problem of agriculture in Newfoundland and to give it only the importance, percentagewise, that it has in the total national economy it would not receive the attention it deserves in the general economy of the province of Newfoundland and, in particular, the importance of the industry to the various regions where agriculture is carried out in Newfoundland.

As everybody knows, Newfoundland is not an agricultural province. We, like other parts of Canada, have our limitations; for example, we have a limitation of climate—our climate may in some respects not be such as to enable us to produce certain agricultural products which are produced in other parts of Canada. Nevertheless the limitation placed upon agriculture in Newfoundland is not such as to prevent, for example, poultry enterprises, livestock farming and root vegetable growing being carried out successfully.

We also have limitations with regard to soil. Our soil is mainly of the mineral variety. It has a high acid content and a low content of organic material. We do have some alluvial soil, found mostly in the areas surrounding the mouths of the rivers, particularly those flowing into the gulf of St. Lawrence. We have no large areas of heavy clay such as are found in some of the other provinces of Canada but there are, nevertheless, considerable areas, usually consisting of small acreages, where farming is being carried out very successfully, and these limitations of climate and soil to which I have referred are not such as would prohibit poultry enterprises, livestock farming and root vegetable farming. I believe the potential is such as to warrant sufficient attention to make it play a more important part in the economy of the province than it has in the past or does now at the present time in its expanded state.

The growth of agriculture in Newfoundland has been very slow. In the early days following colonization, I believe I may say, no encouragement was given to farming; it might even be more correct to say that settlement and the cultivation of the land were actually prohibited. It was not until 1813—over two centuries after the first days of colonization—that permission to lease land for agricultural purposes was granted, and it was only granted then on 30-year leases and on payment of an annual rent. Nine years later these rents were abolished and in 1825 Governor Cochrane, the first resident governor of Newfoundland, gave some impetus to agriculture within the province. However, it was not until 1878 that the government of Newfoundland formally identified itself with the development of agriculture.

There were other factors too which hindered the growth of agriculture in the island. First, the early settlers were fishermen accustomed to the ways of the sea. They were not farmers. Secondly, fishing was a very attractive industry while farming was a very unattractive industry. Lack of roads and large rivers on the coast where most of the settlement took place meant that most of the interior was inaccessible. Thus, for those who came to settle there it was necessary to have as soon as possible a stable export commodity. That stable export commodity could be found in the fishing industry very easily; it was unlikely to be found in the farming industry as it existed in Newfoundland at that time. Fishermen gradually recognized the importance of farming in their own economy and gradually a system of supplementary farming was developed. This means, of course, that attention was given to the farming industry when the returns from the fishing industry were poor. No attention was given to the farming industry when the returns from the fishing industry were good. The history of supplementary farming has been that it is not a very consistent effort. In more recent times the development of other industries within the province has taken labour from not only the farming industry but also the fishing industry.

In the report of the royal commission on farming published in 1955 it is pointed out on page 29 that in 1921 there were 38,206 people engaged in some form of farming but only 3,227 of those were full-time farmers. In 1935 there were 39,808 people engaged in farming but only 4,226 were engaged in farming as a full-time occupation. In 1945 35,574 people were engaged in cultivating the land but only 2,809 of those could be considered as full-time farmers.

Since 1949 there has been a very marked and pronounced expansion in some types of farming and particularly in the poultry enterprise. I would say there are many reasons for this. One would be first of all the small amount of land required by this particular industry. Second, there was the growth of larger areas which served as markets for the produce from the poultry enterprise. Third, there was the improvement in the general welfare which enabled people to buy the produce of the poultry industry.

But one thing that had a very great effect upon the development of the poultry enterprise in Newfoundland was the feed grain freight assistance policy initiated by this government in 1941. If I may digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, over the last few years we have experienced successive increases in freight rates and these successive increases in freight rates are beginning to be felt very keenly both in the commercial and industrial life in Newfoundland. We, because we live on the fringe of this great country, have a long haul, and when there is an increase in freight rate based percentagewise it means that because we have a longer haul and therefore a larger amount of freight to be paid the people of Newfoundland will pay a higher increase than anybody else east of Ottawa.

On the other hand, we do not, for example, have the road systems and the trucking concerns that would enable us to offer any alternative to the present carriers now operating in Newfoundland which are, of course, the C.N.R. operating their rail line from Port aux Basques to St. John's and also operating the steamship services around the coast of Newfoundland. We have no alternative to these carriers and therefore whatever increase there happens to be in freight rates we just have to pay the shot.

I should like for a moment to look at the freight rates from, for example, the lakehead to one or two rail points in Newfoundland, and I take this particular route because I want to return to feed grains. Before January 30, 1956, a hundred-weight of freight shipped from the lakehead to Toronto cost 55 cents. On January 1 of this year, owing to the increase amounting to 11 per cent, people in Toronto are now paying 61 cents or an increase of 6 cents. This, as I said before, results from the 7 per cent increase authorized on June 18, 1956 by the board of transport commissioners which came into effect on July 3, and also by reason of the authority given by the board to the railways on December 17 for a further increase of 4 per cent, thus bringing freight rates to a level 11 per cent above those which prevailed on June 30, 1956. As a result of this, as I have just said, there is an increase of 6 cents per hundredweight or $1.20 per ton from the lakehead to Toronto.

Coming down to Corner Brook, Newfoundland, the increase is from $1.17 to $1.30 per hundredweight or 13 cents. Per ton the increase is from $23.40 to $26, or an increase of $2.60. In other words, the increase in the freight rate for a ton of freight from the lakehead to Corner Brook, Newfoundland, is three times as much as the increase in the case of the province of Ontario or near rail points in the province of Quebec.

These increases in freight rates become more significant when we are dealing with commodities which have been given some freight assistance as in the case of feed grains, for then the consignee must not only pay the increase in the freight rates based upon the freight but must also pay the increase based upon the percentage of the assistance. Let me give an example of exactly what I mean. Because of the feed grain freight assistance policy of the Department of Agriculture, all the maritime provinces, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, prior to June 30, 1956 received feed grains at a freight rate of $5 per ton to the consignee. The difference between the $5 and the actual cost of the freight was made up by this assistance policy.

But now with an 11 percent increase in the freight rate the freight rate on a ton of feed from the lakehead to Corner Brook, for example, has now been increased by $2.60 which means that we are now paying $7.60 where previously we paid $5. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the increase of 11 per cent in the freight rate has resulted in a 52 per cent increase in the actual freight paid by the consignee in Corner Brook. If we go farther along and take the town of St. John's we find that the recent increase of 11 per cent in freight rates has resulted in an actual increase to the consignee of 64 per cent.

I should like to say at this time that these feed grains are very important to Newfoundland not only in the poultry enterprise but also in the livestock industry and the lumber industry. May I respectfully suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) at this time that consideration be given to some form of corrective adjustment so that the inequalities now existing will not retard expansion in the industries concerned and so that they may continue to enjoy the advantages which they have received as a result of this policy.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, as usual at the commencement of a new speech in this debate one pays tribute to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Such tributes may sometimes be conventional but they are usually and almost always sincere. They certainly are in this case because I am sure the two hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address in this debate acquitted themselves with distinction and deserve the congratulations of all members of the house.

This has been a rather unique session. In the few short days that we have been here, overhanging the atmosphere of the house, of course, has been the paramount national question of the settlement of the railway strike. In addition, we have seen certain historical events moving before us. We have seen the resignation as a member of this house of the leader of the political party to which I belong, one who I am sure all members will agree has served this house and his country with distinction, and the house is the poorer because of his resignation.

We have also read of the resignation of the prime minister of the United Kingdom. Within the last 48 hours we have seen unveiled here a memorial to a former Conservative leader, a former prime minister of this country. Hence, in the few short hours in which we have been sitting here much of political history has been enacted or dramatized before our eyes. Personally, I am extremely happy to have seen this memorial unveiled. It is something which I had advocated for some years in the past as, shall I say, the political descendant of the gentleman in question. In the days in which he represented a Nova Scotia constituency redistribution had not taken the toll of the constituency which it since has taken and he was the member for Kings county which is part of my own constituency today.

I am sure all the people of Nova Scotia, particularly those of that county, appreciate the tributes which were paid to his memory and the memorial which has been erected to him on the grounds of this parliament building, where the services which he rendered to this country with such great distinction will be memorialized and, we trust, perpetuated, subject to atomic bombs, at least within the memory and the lifetime of any of us who are now serving in parliament or have any connection with the government of Canada.

As I said a moment ago, the one matter which is uppermost in our minds is the question of the strike. If it were not for that matter I do not think I would have trespassed on the time of the house on this occasion. There are many things which one could discuss. Perhaps it is rather discouraging, Mr. Speaker, when one goes back to the speeches that one has made on a similar occasion during the last six or seven years, to find how many matters one has suggested and to note that some of those problems are still before us.

However, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has stated, we are all hopeful that the strike will be settled within the next few hours. We have been waiting in anticipation of an announcement to that effect. The hon. member suggested that there was a great deal of intransigence on one side, namely, on the side of the management of the C.P.R. Naturally, we would not expect him to attribute any intransigence to the firemen. I think one can say quite fairly that his speech was, to a large extent, an apologia for the firemen's union or brotherhood. I have had the privilege and the pleasure of knowing many of those members personally. I come from a constituency which is served entirely by a wholly-owned subsidiary of the C.P.R. I know many of those firemen. No finer citizens live in this country than the firemen in the employment of the Dominion Atlantic Railway and, I presume, generally in the employment of the C.P.R. We know that they are not the type who would wilfully promote trouble or wilfully attempt to wreck the economy of this country. Yet there is at stake a larger issue than that. We have that constituency today, as I said, which is wholly served by this C.P.R. subsidiary, with the exception of one station, completely tied up, with not a wheel moving on the railroads except in the town of Middleton where a branch of the Canadian National runs from the constituency of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) right across into the valley and possibly as a last resort fuel and supplies could be brought in there to avert a disaster.

But at the moment we are dependent to a substantial extent on the apple industry. Having harvested the apple crop, having had it packed, having had negotiations with the government of Great Britain, many of our shipments having been made to Great Britain but many to be made in January and February and that is the situation now. We have tens of thousands of boxes of apples headed to the British market which we cannot move. I can understand the complaints, the worries of our friends from the west where a similar situation confronts the wheat grower; but at least wheat will keep. Under the aegis of this government they have had to keep the wheat for a long while now and they will probably have to keep it for a while longer yet. But you cannot keep apples indefinitely. Steamship space has been bought. Steamers have been coming into Halifax with space booked which we could not fill.

You cannot truck those apples because, with subzero temperatures, it is impossible to transport them in that way at this time of year. They must go in reefer cars. The reefer cars are immobilized. The whole fruit industry of the valley is affected, I was going to say, but of course not all of it is affected because substantial marketings were made in October, November and December. However, a substantial part of it is now completely tied up. If these apples cannot be moved within the next few days the fruit industry will suffer as bad a blow as it suffered last year because of the glut, when the market went completely to pieces and apples could not be sold. Hence our people down there feel that this government must exercise leadership in this matter and must achieve a solution and do so rapidly.

If my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is correct when he says there is intransigence on the one side, may I say in parenthesis that I have been involved in litigation and in disputes for a period of thirty years and I have never seen any one side have a monopoly on intransigence. Usually it is divided between the two sides to a certain extent. But if there is intransigence it is the duty of this government to solve the problem and to deal with it and not to wait idly by piously hoping that something will happen whereby it will be unnecessary to take any action whatsoever.

I was brought up in a pioneering economy. I was born away out in the rural area of Digby county. As a little boy I used to go out to the sugar grove with my mother where they were boiling maple sap and making it into maple sugar. I remember her instructing me as to how it should be done. You had to get the syrup to a certain temperature. You had to get it hot enough and yet you had to have the snow cold enough so that when you brought the two together you could get a fusion of some kind and thereby you could manufacture maple sugar. I sometimes think this government has been waiting idly by, hoping that the temperature would get hot enough on the outside with public opinion and yet get cold enough on the inside so that by simply standing by and waiting they may jell something into maple syrup or maple sugar and thereby achieve settlement of the strike. That, Mr. Speaker, is not national leadership.

At least in so far as the part of the country from which I come is concerned, I could bring to this house and could read them to you, if you would permit me to do so, a stack of telegrams—forty or fifty of them—from boards of trade, mayors of towns, gentlemen who are well known to the Minister of Public Works, all saying one thing. They did not say what the hon. member for Charlotte read. Apparently they have more confidence in him as a member than my constituents have in me because he told us this morning that the telegrams told him to do something. My telegrams said: Tell the government to do something; we want the government to do something and that is what we need. If the prognostications are correct, and if within the next few hours a settlement can be negotiated, well and good. But if it cannot be negotiated, the economy of this country, at least that of the part of the country from which I come, will be injured. I have spoken particularly of the apple industry and the same thing could be said of the scallop fishermen. This is their season. This is the season in which scallops are being brought ashore every day. What can they do with them? Under normal circumstances they could perhaps run them across the bay of Fundy in their boats and ship them from Saint John. But as the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) pointed out yesterday, Saint John is tied up. If they are going to ship them out of there, they have got to send them on ships to Saint John, Moncton and around a circuitous route into the markets of New England, Quebec or Ontario. The whole industry of that area has been brought to a full stop. The gypsum plant just outside my constituency had 800 men laid off because gypsum is moved by rail to the shipping point and there is no rail transportation. One could go on and on. I know this is the common story in many constituencies in this country, but I think perhaps we are harder hit because of our dependence upon this one railroad.

Wherever the fault may be, I have found the management of that company has always been considerate and has been desirous of serving the public interest. I know, too, that the employees are amongst the better citizens we have in this country. You cannot tell me, sir, that with action, with leadership, and if necessary some pressure, you could not achieve a result whereby this railroad could be put back into operation in the very near future. If it is not, then we are going to suffer an economic blow which will have repercussions for many years to come, and certainly it is going to have repercussions in the political field within the next few months.

In the particular area from which I come—perhaps that is why we are more impatient in these matters—for weeks and months last summer and last fall we suffered a strike tying up the steamship system of the C.P.R. Wherever the intransigence may be now, there was no intransigence on the part of management in connection with that strike. Management was ready and willing at all times to start operation of that ship, but it could not be done. We have suffered two of these economic blows within the last nine months. In both of these cases it is felt that the government of this country has not given the leadership and the direction which is required. The people are asking for it, and I am urging it now. I say that the time has come when you had better stop waiting for the maple syrup to jell. You have to do some stirring yourself and not wait for the pot to boil over naturally as this government has been doing for the last eight or nine days. The sands have run out of the hourglass in so far as that thing is concerned.

Speaking of transportation, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of another matter that the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) was discussing a few moments ago, the feed grain subvention policy of this government and the effect of freight rates upon that. I subscribe to all that he said. I have urged for years that this government make a permanent part of its policy the maintenance of the freight rate subvention on the movement of feed grains. Even up to today our farmers do not know from one six-months period to another whether or not that is going to be maintained or be discontinued. Surely, the time has come when it should be made a permanent part of our economy. It should be written into the statutes. We should not be dependent upon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) bringing into his main estimates a vote for the first six months of the year and then having to wait for the supplementary estimates at the end of the year to find out whether or not we are going to pay for what went on from July to the end of the year. The party to which I belong, in a convention the other day, passed as one of its planks a resolution to the effect this policy should be made a permanent part of our economy.

I raise this matter in connection with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's for another reason and that is that we have before us today this preliminary report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. In this report there is a reference to the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I am reading from page 101 where at the bottom of the page we find this:

> The commission suggests that this should be the subject of a special inquiry which should also include in its terms of reference a re-examination of the present effects of the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

One does not have to stress this matter of freight rates in this chamber, and certainly those of us from the maritime provinces do not have to do it. I believe I have spoken on this subject on every occasion on the address in reply to the speech from the throne since I first came into this house in 1949. Up to the present time, nothing has been done with respect to this matter. During recent months the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said, I am waiting for recommendations from the premiers of the maritime provinces. When they make specific recommendations, we will be prepared to deal with them. Personally I think, not speaking critically, that is evasive action. You have four premiers, and if they cannot agree then the Prime Minister can say we will wait until you get unanimity. Along comes an election and you can always be waiting for reports from the premier; then you get by that election and you do not have to worry any more about the matter for four years. This matter has been treated in that way. The government has said, we are waiting for specific recommendations and when we get them we are prepared to deal with them.

The premier of New Brunswick has made a specific recommendation, and that is that the maritime freight rates be considered and that the act be redrafted and brought up to date. The former premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Hicks, urged the same thing. He came up in July to see the Prime Minister about this, or so he said during the election and I have no reason to doubt that he did. The Prime Minister said that of course we have to wait until we get the report of the Gordon commission. Now, you have got it. The present premier of Nova Scotia has made the same recommendation. I have urged it year in and year out in this house. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) and every other maritime member of the House of Commons, regardless of his party, has urged it. Now, you have this report. Let us not have any more delay on the subject of these maritime freight rates. The time for excuses has gone by in so far as this government is concerned. They have to take action with respect to it.

You know the story of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which was passed thirty years ago. Why was it passed? It was passed because the situation in the maritimes with respect to freight rates was so serious, so disastrous, the government of the day said something had to be done about it. They appointed a commission which made an investigation and as a result we have the act. Naturally, it did not remove all the difficulties. One cannot expect legislation to do that, but it was of material assistance to the economy of the maritime provinces. As the years have gone by, with increasing horizontal freight rate adjustments, with all the incidence of truck transportation and the rest of it every benefit—at least let us say this, Mr. Speaker, 98 per cent of benefits we receive from the Maritime Freight Rates Act have been wiped out. This situation has been in existence for some years and has been aggravated by the recent increases, as I have said. We have urged that some action be taken. We have been referred to the premiers; we have been referred to the Gordon commission; we have been told to wait and see, as Asquith said in Britain many years ago, and you know what happened to Mr. Asquith, Mr. Speaker. The time for waiting and seeing has gone by. You have definite recommendations from this commission that the Maritime Freight Rates Act be dealt with and that it is vital to our economy that that be done. I do not think it involves even the appointment of a royal commission.

We in the maritime provinces have the maritime transportation commission, financed by the provincial governments and employing experts, men who know their work and know the problems. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) has expert officials in his department. I have not any doubt if these two groups got together for a period of two weeks or ten days, no longer than it has taken us to settle the strike, if it is settled, these parties could agree on the terms of a bill which would, in large measure, restore the economy of the maritime provinces in so far as it is affected and prejudiced by freight rates. I urge this government to do that, and do it now, not wait until after the elections or wait and see what the premiers of those provinces may do. Let us get action on it and get action in the very near future.

Now, so much for matters in which I urge action. Perhaps in fairness one should comment on this as well. I have been very happy during the last few weeks to see the Minister of Transport has inaugurated a system whereby he is imposing lower rates on truck transportation on the motor vessel Bluenose crossing from Yarmouth to Bar Harbor. I have been urging this for the last two years, and I am glad to see that the government has brought that into effect. I hope that the results which will be achieved by that will be such as to encourage the government to carry on that practice in the future. I am glad to see that the Prime Minister noted the recommendation made in this house with respect to university grants. Although it is only an approach to the problem, although as we all realize much more must be done, it is a start. I think the problem of the universities, like the problem of the maritime provinces, is one which is going to be before this house for many years to come. These problems have to be solved, but at least the government in making the grants available direct to the universities—I am not speaking now of the capital grants but the reallocation of the per capita grant per student—will have gone a considerable distance in alleviating the discrimination from which the maritime universities have suffered under the inflexible system which was in effect before. I commend the government for that. As I said, it is only a beginning in the right direction.

The other day the Prime Minister spoke of his conversation with the president of the United States when he had the humpty-dumpty ride over the golf course, the rickshaw ride, and he told us of the progress which was made with respect to fisheries, and that the president of the United States had decided not to impose a tariff on Canadian fish. I wish he would tell us now of his conversation with the president, or whether he had a conversation, with respect to the 12-mile limit and the recommendation which our government has made. We on this side of the house have urged in the eight years that I have been in the house that the 12-mile limit be extended for the benefit of the fishermen. We know that representations have been made through the United Nations; we know we need the support of the United States if it is to be carried into effect. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair intimated when his estimates were before the house last spring that he was a little bit doubtful as to the support that the proposal might get from the government of the United States, and I had hoped that the Prime Minister would be able to tell us that he also had time when he was getting on and off that go-cart during the day to talk to the president of the United States about the 12-mile limit, and that we can be told before this session is over that we can have legislation with respect to it, and that the matter will be settled once and for all.

Although the speech from the throne makes reference to some assistance to fishermen—and that is necessary—I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that on the east coast at least, and it is the only coast I know, there is no assistance that is more material to our inshore fishermen that can possibly be given than the inauguration of the 12-mile limit. Time for action has come with respect to this matter. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) this morning talked about the Passamaquoddy and said that he had urged the development of the Passamaquoddy. No doubt he has. What has the government done about it? He said it was the solution of our problems. We have talked about the Passamaquoddy in this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker. It was talked about 50 years before I came here and I fear that it will be talked about for another 50 years. In the maritimes we want some action. You can have pious platitudes; you can have the laying on of hands and the kissing of children; you can have all of these things for a long while, but in the end you need to get something done. In the maritimes we have had too many pious platitudes and too little action. The time has come when we must get action in that respect.

Since I speak of the maritimes, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to a doleful report. This report refers euphemistically to the Atlantic provinces. Those from the Atlantic provinces who read this report, Mr. Speaker, will thank God that it came after Christmas rather than before because if it had come before Christmas it certainly would have spoiled the Christmas atmosphere and their appetites for Christmas dinner. What is the solution of the problems of the maritime provinces as foreseen by this report? They refer to the difficulties and they say:

> But despite these qualifications, the fact remains that living standards are lower in the Atlantic provinces than they are in the rest of Canada, and that it is in everyone's interest to reduce this differential if it is at all possible to do so.

Did you ever see a greater atmosphere of resignation or discouragement, Mr. Speaker? "If it is possible to do so" we are going to do something for these poor people down there to raise their standard of living and, if we cannot, what do they say, Mr. Speaker? They say:

> If it should turn out that there is not the necessary combination of resources in sufficient quantities to permit a substantial rise in living standards in the Atlantic region, generous assistance should be given to those people who might wish to move to other parts of Canada where there may be greater opportunities.

In other words, we are going to have our travelling expenses paid, Mr. Speaker, out of the maritimes and be sent to some other place where we can settle down to greater opportunities. At least they are going to treat us as well as the Hungarians have been treated in getting us out of the maritime provinces. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that that would have a disastrous effect upon the rest of Canada. Where has Canada got its leadership throughout the years but from the maritime provinces where they have come for the heads of churches, state, banks and universities. If you move us out of the maritime provinces—

An hon. Member: What about the west?

Mr. Nowlan: Of course, in the meantime, we created the west and provided for the Diefenbakers and a few more. We started it. If you move us out of the maritimes, where are you going to get the men through whom the rest of Canada can develop? If for no other reason than that, you have to find a better solution of the problem.

I am told there are 65,000 words in the report, and of that number there are about 12½ words of comfort for the maritime provinces. This is what we have been waiting for; this is the economic bible for which we have been waiting for years. Let us stop waiting; let us get some action. As I said, there is one solution suggested here. Dozens of other recommendations can be made and will be made during this session, Mr. Speaker.

I started to speak very briefly with respect to freight rates. The other afternoon I got the impression when the Prime Minister was taking his buggy ride and looking at the clock that he was waiting for four-thirty o'clock; that he was waiting for the zero hour, when he would announce that the strike was settled. We received the impression that he was stalling in order to make the announcement. Probably we were over optimistic. I am not going to stall any longer. I cannot make the announcement. The announcement has to come from the other side of the house. They are probably working on it now. I say, if we get the announcement, well and good. If not, this government has got to give leadership and see that the matter is resolved within the next few hours.

(Translation):

Mr. Arthur Masse (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the address, I have to inform my colleagues that I shall not delay the passing of the address, but as the speech from the throne contains a paragraph on agriculture, and as my county consists almost entirely of farmers, it is my duty to thank, and to give credit to, the government for its position with regard to them.

May I first be permitted to tender my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Ever since I have had the honour to represent the county of Kamouraska in this house, I have heard only criticism from the members opposite, or from the opposing parties. Yet, this government has been in power for more than twenty-one years and, if there is any truth in the saying vox populi vox dei, I believe the government still enjoys the confidence of the majority of our people.

I am not one of those who believe that everything is perfect in the administration of a country such as ours, but rather one of those who know that little mistakes will happen here and there. I am convinced that those who have been entrusted with the management of Canada have given of their best for the good of this country.

Today, I would like to give an outline, as accurate as possible, of the conditions in which the farmers of my constituency find themselves. They realize the merits of the efforts made by the government of this country to improve their condition through the enactment of such legislation as price support, subsidy on the transportation of feed grain and subsidies paid to farmers.

However the price of fertilizers bears no relation to the return our farmers get on certain products. In some parts of my constituency, agriculture alone does not provide sufficient income to enable a man to support his family and give his children an adequate education. Until now, the wood-lot has provided the needed supplement to agriculture to cover the purchase of mechanized farm equipment.

To prove that all is not so bad in the field of agriculture, I shall quote figures taken from a book entitled "Taxation Statistics", published by the Department of National Revenue, Income Tax Division. Here are the figures:

Report	Year	Farmers Paying Income Tax
1952	1950	360
1953	1951	430
1954	1952	520
1955	1953	750
1956	1954	860

The number of farmers paying income tax may seem small compared to those of other provinces but I do want to put on record a few figures showing the average income of the farmers of my constituency, particularly those who carry on farming operations as a family undertaking. The figures I shall quote are based on the average for 31 farmers who take part in agricultural contests and who keep books in perfect order. However the average applies to only 27 of them, data for the four others being incomplete. The income of each of these 27 farmers amounts to $1,454.15 in cash and $501.70 from products derived from the farm, making a total of $1,955.85.

These farmers are not necessarily those in the highest or lowest income brackets, but they make up a group fairly representative of the present situation.

These farms average 76 arpents in area and most of them are located in the estuary of the St. Lawrence. Some distance away from this plateau whose soil is rather rich, are the higher lands where the soil is poor. In that area the figures I have just mentioned should be reduced by 20 or 40 per cent. The revenue which I have just quoted is made up of family earnings, including the work of the mother and children.

It is therefore not surprising that the residents of our rural areas emigrate to the city where salaries are higher and hours of work shorter. On the other hand it is comforting to note that the Canadian government wishes to improve matters.

Here is what is said about this matter in the speech from the throne, I quote:

> It is proposed to recommend in the Senate the establishment of a committee to consider what should be done to make better use of land for agriculture and thus to contribute more effectively to the improvement of agricultural production and the incomes of those engaged in it.

I would also like to read an article published by the Quebec Evénement-Journal of November 21, 1956. In this article may be found words said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at the Toronto Catholic social life conference. He said, with regard to the state of farms in Eastern Quebec:

I say that should not be continued because we are blessed by Providence in this country with such great and valuable resources that any man's consistent arduous work could and should provide him with adequate returns . . .

I am convinced that some of the land in Eastern Canada that hard working Canadians are trying to use as farms should go back to forest and water conservation uses and those attempting to live on them resettled in more rewarding surroundings.

I therefore suggest that it should be the urgent business of all levels of government as well as private enterprise, both individual and co-operative to see to it that agricultural production keeps up with our increase in population and thus provides the farming population with a fair share of the national income.

Two days later, the newspaper Le Soleil gave a more elaborate account of the Prime Minister's conference and added:

Under this scheme, the federal government would share with the provinces the cost of programs of irrigation, of soil conservation, of land clearing and of the settlement of farmers living on submarginal lands.

A little further on, the article added:

Mr. St. Laurent stated his conviction that a certain proportion of eastern lands which Canadians have attempted to farm should be reforested or used in water conservation projects. People who are trying to make a living on those farms, he added, should seek work in industries where their efforts would be more adequately rewarded.

For my part, I have repeatedly brought up this matter in the house, as I consider it of utmost importance for our farmers whose revenue would be inadequate if they could not make up for their agricultural deficits with income from their wood-lots. In my opinion, governments should seek the improvement of wood-lots.

There can be no doubt about the fact that our farmers' income is inadequate considering the amount of work they have to do. Up to now, the money required to wipe out agricultural deficits has come from wood-lots. Here is exactly what I said in this house on March 2, 1950, page 417 of Hansard. Speaking about the agricultural organizations of my constituency and more particularly about the experimental farm at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, I said:

It seems to me that some wood lots should be added to the federal experimental farm and subjected to continuous study, in order that the forests which are adjuncts of the farms in my constituency, may be taken care of by our governments in the same way as agriculture.

Then I added:

May I make a recommendation? Federal and provincial authorities should co-operate in bringing wood lots under a forestry program so that all profitable wood lots may be used economically.

Also on January 13, 1955, I had this to say in this house:

To realize how much our forests contribute to agriculture in the lower Quebec area, one need only read publication No. 890 of the federal Department of Agriculture. This pamphlet deals with wood lots on Ontario farms and, at page 22, it is indicated that on the 162 farms which were thoroughly investigated, production reached a total value of $516 per farm.

That is an indisputable proof that lumbering plays a capital role together with agriculture in regions such as ours, where forests cover about 75 per cent of the land, only 22 per cent being suitable for cultivation.

Those experiments have been conducted in the province of Ontario with the co-operation of the federal Department of Agriculture and of the Ontario government. I hope similar experiments will be undertaken in my province to show how necessary it is to complement farming through the use of a wood lot in most regions.

Mr. Speaker, our farms in eastern Quebec need the shelter of wind-breaks. Our steep slopes should be reforested against disastrous gullying and erosion. Trees are also needed to prevent water from running too fast down steep slopes which separate the various high lands. Could not the government of Canada supply the experimental farm of Ste. Anne de la Pocatière with facilities for innovating in this field, because experimentation is not a matter for private enterprise but for governments, through their institutions, and our experimental farms are the sources of new achievements.

There is no better teaching than that acquired by looking at nature with our own eyes. Life is but the experience of others.

The establishment of a Senate committee to consider ways and means of making better use of land in eastern Quebec is an appropriate and courageous initiative on the part of the Prime Minister of Canada.

There is no doubt that certain areas should never have been farmed, for they could have yielded a higher return if they had been put to some other use.

A study of the development of agriculture in the lower St. Lawrence area indicates that the land was first cleared on the lower plateaux near the river, and then, with the increase in population, it was thought, with no idea of doing the wrong thing, that certain districts should be opened up which should have been left as they were or kept as wood lots. And conditions were made more difficult when parishes were founded and when certain institutions had been in existence for a long time. That is why I admire the spirited approach of the Canadian government in putting forward a program such as this.

Let us also keep in mind that a small bare rock on a farm presents a deplorable aspect to the traveller. On the other hand, a clump of variegated trees offers that same thirsty traveller a resting-place and brings revenue to the landowner.

It was I believe a prime minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said: "the heart of a nation is in the depth of its forests; a people without forests is a dying people." I believe that the initiative rests with the Prime Minister of Canada to implement Sir Wilfrid Laurier's words and to give back to the forests the parts which were removed from them temporarily.

That is why we should seek to improve the conditions of lumber production on the Quebec farms, specially because the forest protects the tillable land, regulates the flow of rivers and constitutes a water reserve in times of drought.

In the early days of the colony, the tree was an enemy because room had to be made for the vigorous pioneers. Today, when a tree is felled, two other trees should be planted to restore the balance between forests and tillable land.

I hope that the committee to be set by the government will succeed in drawing people's attention to this matter so that the responsibilities of each and everyone of us may be well distributed.

Mr. Speaker, I trust I may be allowed to say a few words on behalf of our large families, with regard to income tax. If we look at the exemption allowed a childless married couple, we see that both are entitled to one thousand dollars. A man and a woman with one child aged less than sixteen years are entitled to an exemption of $2,150, to which we must add family allowance, that is $80 to obtain a total of $2,230, that is $743 per person. A man and woman with ten children aged less than sixteen years enjoy an exemption of $3,500. The family allowance being added to this figure, we obtain the total sum of $4,460, that is $372 per person.

It seems to me that departmental experts should look into the matter in order to protect our large families. Care and education generally require large sums of money. I respectfully submit these comments to the attention of the hon. Minister of National Revenue and the hon. Minister of Finance.

The few remarks I made were not intended as a criticism, but rather as a loyal service to those who asked me to represent them in this house and to all our fellow-citizens.

(Text):

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words, and at the commencement of my speech I intend to follow the tradition of offering congratulations. While we may not always agree with the material contained in the speeches given by the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address, yet we do congratulate them upon having been the ones chosen by the government party to move and second what we consider as His Excellency's most gracious speech.

I wish also at this time to congratulate the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) upon his election to the leadership of his party. I of course had no summons from the party, so I was not a registered delegate at their recent conference; but in quite a real sense I was there because we live now in a day when conventions can be brought right into our homes through the medium of television and radio. I sat and listened to part of the proceedings of that convention. Of course it was at first debatable who might get the leadership of the Conservative party, and the reason I am mentioning this is that one does not sit in this house for as long as some of us have, especially if we hold some little responsibility in the parties to which we belong, without being interested in any progress that might be made or any changes that might be made in the other political parties in the country.

I was, therefore, naturally interested as to who might lead the Conservative party. My opinion all along was that the hon. member for Prince Albert would be that gentleman. As I listened to the radio and as I viewed part of the convention by means of television I could not help but feel that there was a good deal of showmanship in respect to the convention; that it was, in reality, quite a circus. That is quite natural, I suppose. Whether or not the results of the convention will accomplish very much for Canada still remains to be seen. I remember reading an article in connection with that convention the title of which rather fascinated me. It was, "The Conservatives Whoop it Up—Tories Let Down Their Hair at Leadership Meeting." This, Mr. Speaker was from the Calgary Herald, which has always been a Conservative paper. The article told how the Conservative supporters rallied round Mr. Diefenbaker, and here is a paragraph which I would like to read because it does show that a certain showmanship is characteristic of these functions. They would not, of course, be interesting if there were not some element of that kind present. The article reads:

> Led by a group of troubadours providing an accompaniment of accordion music Mr. Diefenbaker's supporters marched into the hall singing the Diefenbaker song to the tune of "Coming Through the Rye". This is the way it went:
>
> Diefenbaker, Diefenbaker, Diefenbaker, yea,
> He will lead us on to victory on election day.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell:

> John's the man who'll get them swinging, swinging back our way,
> It's Diefenbaker, Diefenbaker, Diefenbaker, yea.

An hon. Member: You should sing it.

Mr. Hansell: I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his election. He is a good man; he is an honest man; he is a man, I think, of undisputed integrity. We would all agree that he is a man of some considerable ability in his profession and that he is also a man of some considerable ability in this house, but I wish to repeat what the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said yesterday. He is, in reality, in a most unenviable position.

I have sometimes said that one of the easiest ways to destroy a political leader is to make him leader of the official opposition. Some of us have sat here a good many years; some of us in this corner of the house are now in our twenty-second year. We have watched leaders come and we have watched them go by the process of destruction. We sat here during part of the leadership of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, perhaps one of the most capable parliamentarians who ever came to the House of Commons in Canada. He is gone. He resigned the party leadership. He was followed by another capable man, a very respected man, Hon. Mr. Manion, who was defeated at the polls. Mr. Manion was followed, not in the party leadership but in the house leadership by another capable man, Mr. Hanson, and Mr. Hanson was followed in turn by a further very capable man, Mr. Graydon. Both led the party in this house, but the party was leaderless as far as a national leader was concerned, and they searched the four corners of the earth to find a man who could lead the Conservatives back to victory.

The lot fell upon another very able and hon. gentleman, Mr. Bracken by name, who had been Premier of Manitoba for many years. He came to the party with one proviso, that they should put the word "Progressive" in front of their name. He came into this house with high hopes of steering the party through to victory in an election, but eventually he resigned. They searched the four quarters of the earth again for someone who was honourable and capable enough to lead them back to a glorious victory. This time they chose none other than the gentleman who had been the premier of the province of Ontario, Mr. Drew. He came into this house with high hopes, and he contributed considerably to the value of debate. But Mr. Drew also went the way of all Conservative flesh and eventually had to resign.

I say once again that we who have sat in this corner of the house have seen six house leaders come and go. Now there is a seventh. I say once again that the present Leader of the Opposition is a good man, an honest man, a man of great integrity, a man of ability in his profession. I sound as though I am preaching a funeral sermon. We usually attempt to eulogize the dead. The present leader of the Conservative party is a long, long way from being dead.

Mr. Fulton: It is the atmosphere you breathe in your party that gives you that outlook.

Mr. Hansell: I am accustomed to burying people and I should like to bury a few more. However, I say that he is in a most unenviable position. A man came to me on the streets of my own village when all the hullabaloo was taking place with respect to the leadership and he said, "What do you think of this man Diefenbaker?" "O," I said, "he is a very fine and excellent gentleman."

I do not know what atmosphere I breathe, but I will tell my hon. friend that when I am out in the country I never ridicule one of my colleagues. I never try to destroy him. I am telling my hon. friend what the picture is and what to expect.

Mr. Dufresne: That is what you think.

Mr. Hansell: I said to my friend who stopped me on the street, "He is a very honourable and capable man, why do you ask me that question? Where did this man come from? For all that I have heard in the recent past you would think he came from some other world. Has it never occurred to you that he has been here all the time, that he has been one of the most capable men in the Conservative party, that the Conservative party has always had at its disposal the advice of this man? The thing I would like to know is whether he is bringing any new policies with him. Can he present any concrete alternative that the people can grasp and go forward to something bigger and greater, something that will give the people of this country greater contentment and satisfaction?"

That is the thing that makes political parties successful. Unless a political party has concrete policies, unless it can present alternative policies that will appeal to the people as something new and better than what they have today, then all the individuals rolled into one will not lead this country on to greater things. I would not say too much about this except for the fact that I have heard a good deal lately about the possibility of some sort of coalition between the Conservatives and Social Crediters. The word has been modified. It is said that certain statements have been misunderstood, that all the new leader of the Conservative party is doing is to appeal to the supporters of splinter groups to come over to them and lend them their support. To do what? To put this government out. They say, "Come to us; support us in putting this government out, because we are the only other party in the country who can possibly form a new government."

Mr. Dufresne: That is right.

Mr. Hansell: Let me point out two errors in that sort of reasoning. Who said they were the only other party in this country that could possibly form a government? Nobody knows that. Any party that can nominate and elect enough candidates can form a new government in Canada. That is one error. What I would call the second error in that reasoning is this. Are we to be told that the objective of the Conservative party is to put the government out?

Mr. Dufresne: And form a better one.

Mr. Hansell: That is not what was said when they were talking about coalition, when they were bidding for the support of those who support the splinter parties. If the objective is to put this government out then it is a negative objective. Of course you cannot form a new government without putting the old one out but we do not go throughout this country with that sort of objective. When we go across this country we do so with an alternative suggestion. We attempt to enlighten the people with respect to what we believe is a way of life, a change in basic policies; and presenting this in constructive fashion we say, "Is this what you want?"

I am going to make a prediction, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps someone will read back to me what I have said after the next election. They may pick up Hansard, read it back to me and say that my predictions were all wrong. Somebody is bound to if they are wrong. If they are right perhaps we will hear nothing about them. I predict that the result of the next election will not see the Conservative party sitting on the government side of the house. I go further than that. I will particularize my prediction. I predict that the Conservative party will come back here with fewer members west of the great lakes.

Mr. Dufresne: The best joke we ever heard.

Mr. Fulton: Canada's No. 1 wishful thinker.

Mr. Hansell: If this best joke is in Hansard I may pick up Hansard in 1957 and read it back to see if it is a joke.

Mr. Dufresne: You will find that it is.

Mr. Hansell: I will predict this, if I may particularize. Let us take a look at the province of Saskatchewan from which the Leader of the Opposition comes. I will make this prediction. If he is elected—and he might be elected; it is conceivable to think that he might be elected—he will be the only Conservative member coming back here from Saskatchewan after the next election. I will go to my own province of Alberta, where the Conservatives now have two seats. It is conceivable that they may return two members. It is also conceivable that their membership will be cut in half, because all they need to do is lose one member in order to achieve that result. However, I shall be a bit magnanimous in my prediction there. I will predict that after the next election they will not come back with any more than two members from Alberta. I will go to British Columbia and I will make this prediction. I will predict that they come back here with fewer members from British Columbia than they have now. I am not prepared to predict too much about Manitoba. However, I will predict that they will not come back with any greater number from the province of Manitoba. If my predictions prove to be correct and if they come back here with fewer members from west of the great lakes, then how on earth do they ever think they will form a government from the rest of Canada?

Mr. Fulton: Your predictions are not correct.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, once again I wish to say that I have the greatest respect for the new leader of the Conservative party. A little while ago I said that one of the best ways to destroy a political leader was to make him leader of the official opposition. Politics sometimes plays tricks. As to our own party, let me say this. I should like to see—and perhaps I shall—a little game of leap-frog that we sometimes play, whereby we leap over all the rest of the parties and leap from a third party to the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: Of course I knew that somebody would smile at that statement, but let me tell hon. members that it has happened twice in Canada in recent years. In 1935 in the province of Alberta we did not have one legislator sitting in the legislature. We jumped from nothing. We leap-frogged over all the other parties and formed a government.

A few years later almost the same thing happened in British Columbia. We started with a nucleus of Social Credit support. When the campaign started out the C.C.F., the Liberals and the Conservatives were fighting one another. The campaign got under way and they began to discover that there was quite a surge toward us, about three weeks to a month into the election campaign—a few weeks on—until about two weeks before election day, when they stopped fighting one another and trained their guns on us. Why should they do that if we were so inconsequential? However, they did it. We played leap-frog again and we jumped from nothing into the government. My friends can smile but it happened twice before. It is conceivable that it could happen once again.

I say that the leader of any opposition in any parliament in Canada is just like the proverbial coconut at the country fair: three chances for a dime or eight for a quarter. There he sits, the object of attack. Unless he can come clean with some definite alternative that can be presented to the people and that will capture their imagination, unless he has something to propose that will eclipse anything else, he goes down as a failure and the party remains in opposition.

One thing about which we are extremely proud in our party, Mr. Speaker, is that we have an alternative. Oh, you may not believe in it. You may say that it is all haywire. You may say that we are a lot of crackpots. But be that as it may, one thing you will not say is that we have not the ability to present an alternative in basic and fundamental policy; and when I speak of an alternative policy I do not mean a paint shop or a repair job. If something is fundamentally wrong with the combustion engine there is no use in saying we will change the tires. That procedure is no good, but that is the game our Conservative friends are playing. They say, "We will pursue a taxation policy, all right, but we will tax somebody else instead of somebody else. We will readjust the taxation. Oh, yes; we will pay bigger old age pensions, bigger this or bigger that." But if you ask them the question, "Where are you going to get the money from?" the answer you get is, "We will reduce our taxation."

Let us look at that picture. It is as plain as day. You must get the money if you are going to spend it. If it comes from taxation, then you must get more in taxation if you spend more money. It does not take even a grade 3 schoolboy to figure out that proposition. Have they any alternative suggestion? Have they any alternative basic policy?

The Social Credit organization for real political and economic democracy is, I may say, on the rise in Canada today. Two provincial governments—those of Alberta and British Columbia—are Social Credit governments. These two governments have so administered the affairs of those provinces that they are two of the wealthiest, if not the wealthiest, provinces in Canada today. The people of the other provinces have taken note of this progress and have set up Social Credit organizations right across this country.

Mr. Campbell: How did the wealth get there, in those two provinces?

Mr. Hansell: The wealth has been there all the time, even with previous administrations. It is for that reason I say that when the Social Credit government took over in the hungry thirties things began to move because of wise policies.

Mr. Blackmore: Honest policies.

Mr. Hansell: Yes, honest policies. Another reason for the spread of Social Credit throughout Canada is that once people realize the basic principles for which we stand they are gripped with a conviction that in Social Credit lies the great hope for a greater Canada with a happy and free people living in the economic security which our vast productive resources are able to give. Social Credit has developed in Canada into an active movement to free Canadians from the strangling dictatorship of the money power and political party machine rule, and to make the Canadian economy function in such a way as to give all people the economic justice which the enormous natural wealth of Canada is able to give. Social Credit is founded upon powerful and enduring principles which can never be destroyed.

Mr. Studer: We will settle for $25.

Mr. Hansell: That old chestnut has been—

Mr. Studer: Roasted.

Mr. Hansell: —bandied around a great deal. It has been roasted by old age. Don't ever believe that the old, old story of $25 per month cannot be answered. We have answered it over and over again.

Mr. Studer: The federal government can answer it, but not Social Credit.

Mr. Blackmore: Why doesn't it do it?

Mr. Hansell: One of the great principles of Social Credit is that mankind was created to be free; that is an enduring principle. We claim that people are not to be regarded as the common herd to be pushed around at the whim of the masters. The very moment you do that you reduce mankind to the status of the beasts of the field.

Mr. Fulton: Why did you allow parliament to be pushed around during the session last spring? Why did you help push parliament around?

Mr. Hansell: I should like to know why some people pushed Mr. Speaker around.

Mr. Fulton: Ask the Minister of Finance; he is the man who did it.

Mr. Blackmore: Shame.

Mr. Fulton: Supported by you.

Mr. Thomas: The Tories do not like to be pushed around, that is the trouble.

Mr. Hansell: Social Credit is based upon great moral principles and must not be regarded—this is one thing I want to point out—as it might be by some Canadian people who have a common conception that we are merely another political party.

Mr. Studer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Campbell: Have you a monopoly on that principle?

Mr. Hansell: Social Credit is a way of life.

Mr. Fulton: So is bigamy.

Mr. Hansell: It is more than merely a political party. If there had been a party in Canada that would have formulated great basic principles and brought into operation the monetary reform policies which we are advocating and which would solve the problems of Canada, there would have been no need for a Social Credit party. The reason we exist is that other parties refuse to bring about these monetary reform policies that we claim will be the means of solving the economic problems which face Canada today.

Mr. Campbell: What Social Credit policies have you introduced in Alberta and British Columbia?

Mr. Hansell: Oh, shut up.

Mr. Fulton: That is the new way of life.

Mr. Hansell: In the Social Credit movement we believe that all things were created for the benefit and progress of all mankind. We believe that man was given dominion over the whole earth, and that as he subdues it and through his expanding genius makes the earth yield an abundance of those good things of life, they should be distributed and made to bless all mankind.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me dwell on that for a moment. Is it not the strangest thing in the world that an abundance in Canada today produces a problem for this government? That is a problem for which Social Credit has the answer, because our monetary policies are applied to the distribution of abundance. We have been advocating that for many, many years. It is one thing to which this present administration blind their eyes and regard abundances as catastrophes.

Mr. Lesage: No, no.

Mr. Hansell: Well, they are not dealing with them, anyway. Now, say "no, no" to that. They are frightened by an abundance; that is the strange thing. They fear some things that are good and proper.

Mr. Lesage: We consider we are blessed with abundance.

Mr. Hansell: I am going to say this, that the present administration fears peace.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lesage: That is ridiculous; you do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Hansell: It is not ridiculous. The one thing that is keeping the economy of this country going today is the cold war which necessitates the bolstering of our defences. If defence spending were to stop tomorrow we would be plunged into an abject depression. In that regard, this administration fear peace. This administration fear expansion, so they cut back credit and impose credit restrictions, thus preventing expansion.

Mr. Lesage: Inflation.

Mr. Hansell: My leader gave an answer to that the other day. Read his speech; that is all you have to do. This present government fear progress. I will tell you what they fear. They fear automation. They have not the answer to automation.

Mr. Eyre: Nobody has.

Mr. Hansell: That is the very thing for which we do have the answer because all our active proposals are designed to meet a power age where men and women who labour are displaced by the machines.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Too bad we could not turn this thing off.

Mr. Hansell: These good things we do not fear; these good things this present government fear, for which they have no answer. There are some things we in this group fear, Mr. Speaker. We fear the centralization of power that somehow or other does gradually by stealth take charge of the people of Canada. In order to keep men free the principle of decentralization must be adopted. We have to get back to the place where there is decentralization of power, with more power put into the hands of local governments rather than centralized governments, and particularly a centralized government sitting here in Ottawa. I believe that is a principle which should be heeded throughout all our legislation, no matter what it is. For instance, the municipalities in this country are suffering.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Hansell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was not aware that time was slipping by so quickly. I shall pursue the matter at some future time. Thank you very much.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I am capable of doing it, but since the hon. member who has just folded his wings and sat down took us on a trip through the clouds, I should like to try to bring us back to earth.

Before I proceed with my main remarks I should like to join the other hon. members of my party in extending congratulations to my new leader. While it was a tragedy to lose a great Canadian, as Hon. George Drew, our former leader, was, nevertheless it was very interesting to learn that out of that tragedy and the events that followed one certain thing emerged, namely that the great Progressive Conservative party is a fighting and vital force in this country. It is on the march again; it is a national party. Regardless of what the last speaker said, Mr. Speaker, it is quite within the realm of possibility that it will form the next government of Canada under our new leader.

I also wish to join with my leader and other hon. members and express my sincere regrets at the loss of Hon. George Drew. Like other hon. members, I hope for his sake and that of Mrs. Drew that he shall have a full and complete restoration to health, because he is a great Canadian. Because of his experience, his knowledge and ability, with a complete restoration to health I am sure he will have a great contribution to make to the building of this nation and the country which he certainly loves.

Since I last spoke in this house and since the last general session we have lost two members of this party. I refer to the late Miss Sybil Bennett and Dr. Trainor. These two people contributed much not only to parliament but to the public service in general and also to their own communities, and we all regret their untimely passing. If I might be permitted to mention one other individual, I should like to pay my respects to a man who was born and lived all his life in my constituency. I refer to the late Senator Pirie, who passed on since parliament closed last year. He was a man who throughout his life gave a great many of his years to public service, first in our legislature where he sat as an ordinary member and later on held the important portfolio of minister of lands and mines. He was one of the outstanding successful businessmen of the maritime provinces. If he was not the largest potato grower in the maritime provinces he was certainly one of them. He built up a great reputation for being a reliable shipper of seed stock potatoes; he was interested in manufacturing as well, and I know I speak for a large number of the citizens of my constituency when I say we certainly regret his passing at the early age at which he died.

Since it is the custom—but I should like to make it a little more sincere than that—I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) on his address. It was very interesting to listen to him and to learn that he comes from a province and city which are among the richest and fastest growing in Canada. After listening to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) one would almost think that all this rapid growth and richness came to the province and the city of the mover of the address as a result of their happening to have a Social Credit government. That is something I shall have to look into a little further to see which one of them deserves the most credit.

However, I would like to extend congratulations particularly to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), one of our own provincial representatives, who seconded the address. I think his remarks were well delivered and they will be well received. He acquitted himself well. He mentioned one or two things, and I certainly have no quarrel with him about them. In that connection I might say I was rather well pleased that the Prime Minister realized that in his large family he had a supporter from New Brunswick, because it has been quite a long time since we have been remembered. It may be that the Prime Minister also realizes it is just possible this is the last opportunity he will have of doing honour to a member from New Brunswick, at least for a while.

I now come to the speech from the throne. It is not a long document. There is not very much in it with which I intend to deal. A great deal of it has to do with foreign affairs, national and international policy, with which I would be incapable of dealing anyway. But there are one or two things in it to which I feel I can give my full support. The first one I should like to mention is the increased grants to universities. We shall have a bill coming before us which we shall be able to study to understand the method by which those grants will be administered. When this government, or any other government, is prepared to improve the educational system of this country it can depend on me for what little support I can give it. Our institutions of learning, the people in charge of them, our teachers, professors, and so on, who have charge of the youth of our land, are possibly the most important institutions and people to whom we can give consideration. They have a great deal to do with the moulding of the youth of our nation. This contact takes place in the formative years, when young people commence to consider what their outlook in life should be and prepare to make the important choices which will confront them. They should be taught in the educational institutions by the finest minds in the country in order to lead them into wise consideration of what would be the best form of government and administration in order to maintain in the country a great free democracy such as we enjoy today. Any support for universities and those connected with them is a thing for which this or any other government should receive applause.

I notice that another bill will be brought before us concerning the renewing on a revised and enlarged basis the federal program of grants to provincial governments in aid of technical and vocational training. This is something about which I have been talking for two years, and I am extremely pleased to see that the government is going to bring before the house this session a bill to revise and increase these grants.

I happen to have in my constituency a vocational school. Although it is not large it is one of the older schools in this country and the staff is very proud of it; indeed, all of us are proud of the graduates of that school. There is also an agricultural department connected with it, and graduates from the school are filling important positions today all across Canada. I do not have a list of them and I could not begin to name them all, but a few months ago the director named for me a group of young men who have graduated from the agricultural department of that vocational school and are holding important and challenging posts all across Canada in work dealing with agriculture in one or another of its aspects.

I would like to confine the main body of my remarks to my own province and constituency. Agriculture is the chief industry not only in my own constituency but in the province of New Brunswick, and lumbering comes next. These two industries affect our economic life more than any others, and I would like first to say a word about lumbering.

I was recently speaking to a young man who had been in the lumbering business with his father and later carried on the business in partnership with his brothers. In order to keep the record straight let me point out that he is not of the same political faith as I am, but he came to me because I am a member of parliament. In discussing the lumbering business he said to me, "This tight money policy, the restriction of credit and the actions of the Bank of Canada are making it very difficult for lumbermen". He continued, "When you get to Ottawa look into this matter, and waste no time in trying to impress upon those people down there that this tight money policy may be all right for Ontario or some of the other provinces but it is actually hurting us in New Brunswick, and especially those who operate small businesses".

I am passing that along through you, Mr. Speaker, to the government to show that complaints are being made concerning the restriction of credit and the high interest rates that have been imposed by the Bank of Canada, and that these are actually harming some of our small industries.

As I have said, agriculture is our prime industry in the province of New Brunswick, but as was pointed out by the hon. member for Gloucester when he was speaking the other day, mining is rapidly emerging as an important aspect of the industrial development of our province. This has come about through the expansion of our power resources which we launched upon in the last few years, and this expansion must be continued.

When the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) spoke he implied that many people in the province are opposing such developments as the Passamaquoddy project. I want to assure him and other hon. members that those members from New Brunswick with whom I have spoken are just as much interested in this project as is the hon. member for Charlotte. We are sincerely hoping that the surveys will indicate that it is a feasible project. I found it interesting that he should tell us in plain terms that if it was found to be feasible the federal government would back us in the development.

That came as good news to me. I do not know how much authority the hon. member has, but I will say this. The federal authorities could back us on this and similar power developments without it costing them a cent. We could then finance some of our bigger projects and save our people a great deal of money. In addition we would be able to sell our power at a more attractive price and thereby attract more small industry to the province.

In spite of all the things I have mentioned I think the people of New Brunswick generally have had a very good year. The spirit which now exists in the province is different from the spirit which prevailed a few years ago, and although our economy is not forging ahead it is more than holding its own among the other provinces of Canada. At the risk of being accused of boasting I am going to suggest that much of this has been brought about because of the fact that we have been assisted and encouraged and given new leadership by an able provincial administration which works as much as it can in full co-operation with the federal authorities.

I might point out that the federal government will never lose anything by giving fuller co-operation to the present administration in New Brunswick. I challenge any hon. member from New Brunswick to stand up in this house and say that the money which goes to New Brunswick is being used for political purposes. Such statements could not be supported because they are without truth or foundation; I know what I am talking about.

Our province like some other parts of the maritimes did lag behind for a number of years. We did not have the revenue to meet the demands which piled up, and the requirements are enormous in the fields of education, hospitalization and health. The province can do only so much by itself. We have a province containing many roads and bridges, many of which have deteriorated or are in bad shape. These must be restored, repaired and replaced by new ones, and all this construction will take a tremendous toll of the revenue available to the province.

I wish now to pass on to another matter referred to in the speech from the throne. I refer to the establishment of a committee to consider what should be done to make better use of land for agriculture and thus to contribute more effectively to the improvement of agricultural production and the incomes of those engaged in it. I have no quarrel with this and I offer no particular criticism of it, but in listening to the Prime Minister's speech on this matter the other day I could not help but feel that at best this is a long-term project. From that standpoint I have no criticism to make, but the farmers of the maritimes are looking for results which will come a little faster than that. They should have had assistance in 1956, and they are looking for assistance in 1957.

After listening to the Prime Minister and reading that statement in the speech from the throne it would appear to me that apparently this government have the feeling that our farmers are backward, are more or less ignorant and have very little knowledge of farming, where to farm or how to select land. That seems to me a mistaken idea. I want to say to hon. members of this house that some of the cleverest men are farmers. Some of the most successful men in our province are farmers.

I do not see any need to set up a committee which will cost this country hundreds of thousands of dollars in order to run around the country to find out if farmers know where to get land on which to farm, how to select land, or what crops to grow. All you have to do is assist the agriculturist by providing markets in which he can sell the products he raises at a reasonable profit. If that is done he will produce the goods. I challenge anyone to take issue with that statement. The farmers are able to pick out land, and they will move from place to place if it is profitable to do so. In other words they will be able to find out what are the best crops to grow on their land, and there is no need of a committee running around the country telling them to do that. What our farmers need are markets in which to sell their produce at a reasonable return.

There are other ways in which our farmers can be assisted. At the moment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is not in his seat but no doubt what I am about to say will be called to his attention, because I believe his department is responsible for the administration of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It will be recalled that when an amendment to this act was being considered last session it was pointed out that the farmers were not getting the type of assistance to which they felt they were entitled and which the framers of this legislation intended they should get. I am sure almost every hon. member has had cases brought to his attention, and as a matter of fact the hon. member for Gloucester mentioned this legislation in his remarks the other day.

One case came to my attention which was so ridiculous that I cannot refrain from bringing it to the attention of the house and the Minister of Finance. A young man in his twenties, raised on a farm, married and with a family, owns one parcel of land consisting of 150 acres on which is a fairly good house which could not be built today for less than $5,000. In addition he owns another parcel of 100 acres on which is a much better house. Against that parcel of land there is an obligation of not more than $1,500, and there is nothing against the 150 acres. The two parcels of land are situated side by side. This man has a good deal of machinery, and as he lives quite close to his father they are able to exchange labour. He raised 5,000 barrels of potatoes this year, of which he still has 2,000 barrels in his potato house, a good portion of which he will have for sale.

He went to the Canadian farm loan for a loan of $3,000 because he wanted to build a stock barn which would cost him at least $6,000. He wanted to put up a modern barn on the 150 acres, but his request for a loan of $3,000 was turned down. I understand he was told that his buildings were not of sufficient value to warrant a loan under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. As I say, his request for a loan was turned down.

But that is not going to stop him. This young man was born and brought up in this particular community. He is a successful farmer, as his family have been before him. He is going to get help, but the burden will be greater because his payments will be more and the interest rate greater than if he could get a loan from the Canadian farm loan board. In my opinion he should have been able to get that loan if this legislation is on our statute books to assist good farmers.

The necessary lumber for this barn is already at the mill ready to be processed into boards. This young man is going to go ahead with that barn but, as I say, he should not have been turned down when he presented a proposition like that. I am afraid that the department has set up this Canadian farm loan board as a type of bank where a man must be able to put up two or three dollars in order to borrow one dollar as a loan. Other applications have come to my attention which I admit were not so glaring; therefore I am saying nothing about them. But there is a happy medium, and that is why I bring this case to the attention of the Minister of Finance. I hope they will see that the administration of the Canadian Farm Loan Act is loosened up some. I know the people will appreciate that.

A farmer must sell his produce on fluctuating markets and he must depend upon the weather in order to carry on his harvesting and so on. All these things make farming hazardous. As you all know I am interested in the potato industry, as a great many of my people depend upon the growing of potatoes for their livelihood. Some of our young farmers are seeing what they can do to overcome the transportation problem and the fact that their markets are so far from home.

This brings me to another matter which I hope will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance. In raising potatoes the grower is faced with high freight rates and the fact that he has no protection. Then to add insult to injury as far as the growers of potatoes are concerned, they are faced with a 4 per cent premium on the Canadian dollar. Neighbours of ours within 14 miles, just across the border, are able to ship their potatoes into Montreal and other cities and towns in Quebec and Ontario and lay them down at a lower price than can our farmers.

The one item of 4 cents on the dollar amounts to considerable on a carload of potatoes. A car will hold 240 to 250 barrels, and that premium represents a profit of about 10 to 11 cents a barrel. That is what our farmers are up against. There are three young men in our community, men who were brought up on the farm, men who are potato growers and who have shown that they are good businessmen. They have launched a new frozen fruit and vegetable industry and propose to freeze French fried potatoes, and in so doing to handle several thousand barrels of potatoes. Those potatoes would be brought into the plant from within 20 or 25 miles, processed and then shipped in smaller bulk to the markets of Canada. By this means an opportunity will be given to the small farmer who can grow a few potatoes or strawberries or small vegetables and whose produce can be sent to the factory by truck or car.

I notice that neither the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) nor the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is present in the house, but perhaps some other member would convey this to them, because it is, maybe, the first time I have wished to pass them a bouquet. I want to thank the Minister of Labour and the right hon. Minister of Agriculture for the consideration they showed toward these young men in co-operation with the province of New Brunswick in the erection of this plant. When he was approached the Minister of Agriculture told me last spring they would do what they could to help, and I wish now to say that we are pleased with what they did.

Since this plant was put in operation it has been found that the cottonseed oil which is imported in order to process these farm products has to carry a tariff of 20 per cent or more, which means a considerable burden on the cost of processing. In the letter I have it is stated that from 20 to 30 per cent of the cost is due to this oil. The operators find that the reason a tariff has been placed on it is because the same oil is imported for the manufacture of margarine. I am not surprised. I am glad there is a tariff on the importation of a substance for use in the manufacture of margarine because margarine, when manufactured, goes on the market in competition with an agricultural product. Therefore, I say, we should protect our agricultural product and put on a tariff when necessary. However, there is a point which I would like to ask the Minister of Finance to take into consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I would like to ask the consent of the house to revert to motions in order that I may make a brief announcement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well. The remaining time of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) will be protected.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have here a proposal to terminate the interruption of transportation services on the Canadian Pacific Railway lines which has just been signed by Mr. Crump for the company and Mr. Gamble for the union.

A commission consisting of three judges to be constituted under the Inquiries Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 154, and to have the benefit of any technical advice it requires from the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and from any other public body it deems advisable. This act provides that the commission may engage the services of technical advisers or other experts to aid and assist the commission in its inquiry.

In view of the establishment of this commission, an agreement shall be entered into by the parties, including the present diesel rule, arbitraries and mountain differential, which diesel rule, arbitraries and mountain differential shall be subject to amendment by renegotiation in the light of the advisory report of the commission.

The terms and conditions of the agreement in respect of all outstanding matters other than the diesel rule, arbitraries and mountain differential shall be in accordance with the report of the conciliation board.

Transportation services will be resumed forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It is suggested that the commission begin its inquiry as soon as possible and that it report not later than October 1, 1957. The understanding is that immediate notices are going out to all concerned, and that work to get the transportation services into operation will start not later than daylight tomorrow morning.

I think hon. members will wish me to express on their behalf and on behalf of all the Canadian people appreciation for the serious and genuine efforts which have been made by those representing both parties to this dispute to eliminate the differences which occasioned the interruption of transportation services; and that the parties will realize that in bringing about a speedy resumption of transportation services they will be rendering not only to those people they represent but to the whole Canadian people a very much appreciated service and one for which all will, I think, be grateful. I think the gratitude and good will which will radiate from this short document will help to restore good will between the company and its employees, a good will that means so much to the successful service of the public by the transportation system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition, who has had to leave this afternoon, has asked me to express on his behalf and on behalf of the official opposition our gratification at the fact that the Prime Minister has been able to announce the resumption of operations by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I know we all wish to be associated with what he has just said with regard to the pleasure it will give to hear that the men have been able to go back to work, that operations are to be resumed, and that this has been done under the processes of free collective bargaining.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): We certainly welcome the announcement made by the Prime Minister. The very fact that three judges have been allotted to this important inquiry and that they can obtain all the technical assistance they require should be the means of bringing down a report which I hope will settle this problem. We are happy to know, too, that the problem of the diesels will be separated from the other problems that will be dealt with by the parties concerned. We, too, express satisfaction that there has been no compulsion; free men in a free society, bargaining freely, have achieved the result, and that is very much to the good. I am glad there was no compulsion exercised against either party in this dispute, and I am sure the people of Canada will welcome the announcement made by the Prime Minister. I wish to congratulate all those who have participated in bringing about this satisfactory result.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we, too, are very gratified that the service of the C.P.R. will resume very soon. That was the main point in our urging the government to do everything it could to bring about an early end to the strike. We also are gratified that the agreement to resume work has been possible without resorting to compulsory arbitration, and we hope that when the commission's work is finished and their report is handed down public opinion will be strong enough behind what it discloses that its findings will be accepted by both sides and good will will be shown by both parties.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): May I express my gratitude to the hon. member who had the floor when I came in for allowing me to make this announcement at this time. I know and he knows that it was anxiously awaited by many Canadians in many parts of Canada, and perhaps nowhere more anxiously awaited than in the maritime provinces, which have been rather sorely tried by the fact that under winter conditions there were not the transportation services that were essential to the functioning of their economy.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his kind words. I felt that something important was impending when I saw him come in, and certainly it was a great pleasure for me to give way to hear his announcement and to learn that the strike was settled. A good part of my constituency has been tied up by the strike. We are served by the C.P.R. and, as a matter of fact, in order for me to get here on time I had to travel for three days instead of a little over a day and a half. We are all very grateful.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I had been making a few remarks concerning the importation of cottonseed oil, which is a matter of interest to a young industry in my constituency. I want to impress upon the Minister of Finance and his department that we would appreciate it very much if, at the request of this young industry, they would do anything within their power to grant relief. My chief argument is that while there could be a tariff against the oil when it is brought in and processed with other materials to make a manufactured product which is on the market in competition with agricultural products, I think when the oil is brought in to process an agricultural product itself in order to put that product on the market there could be some way in which the oil could be reclassified, in the same way that soy bean oil brought in for the processing or canning of fish is allowed to come in free. I leave that with the hope that the Minister of Finance and his officials will give every consideration to the matter.

There is another matter I should like to mention, and my plea in this instance is also made to the Minister of Finance. I want to assure him briefly that the greatest complaint of the potato producers of New Brunswick is that regardless of what the tariff board found they do want a tariff or some arrangement made whereby Canadian potatoes may enter the United States market on the same terms as potatoes from that country enter the Canadian market. I am instructed to impress that very strongly on the government.

I am not going to say much about freight rates at this time except to say, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) said, that it is time a new look was taken at the Maritime Freight Rates Act. In the light of the increases in freight rates that have taken place, the act should be revamped so we will get the benefits that it was originally intended that the east would get.

I should also like to say a word or two about veterans affairs. I am not going to spend very much time on the matter, not because it is not an important subject but because there are other veterans in the house who as a rule can present the subject much better than I can. But I support the brief the Canadian Legion submitted to the government wherein they ask in particular that the ceilings on total permissible incomes under the War Veterans Allowance Act be increased to $1,200 and $2,000. I also feel very strongly that Canadian veterans of world war I whose overseas service was restricted to the United Kingdom should be eligible for the war veterans allowance, provided that their service in the United Kingdom was of at least one year's duration.

There is another submission by the Legion that I certainly think deserves serious consideration, namely that the widows of allied ex-servicemen be granted the war veterans allowance in cases where the husband died before completing 20 years' residence in Canada, provided that the effective date of her eligibility be 20 years after the husband's arrival to take up permanent residence in Canada, that the widow herself has completed 20 years' residence in Canada, and that both the husband and wife under all other circumstances would be entitled to the pension.

There is one other thing that seems to me to be rather unfair, and it is something I did not know existed. Section 8 of the War Veterans Allowance Act reads:

> No allowance shall be paid in respect of any orphan who is in receipt of a pension under the Pension Act.

This section has the effect of refusing to children of men who died in action, or as the result of service disabilities, the same level of income as that provided to orphans under the War Veterans Allowance Act. An orphan under the War Veterans Allowance Act can be financially assisted up to a maximum of $720 per year, but because of this restrictive section, that is section 8 of the War Veterans Allowance Act, an orphan under the Canadian Pension Act, even where there is no other income, is limited to $480 per year. This appears to be a very unjust situation.

I strongly support the Legion in these demands. There are some others which may not be so necessary, such as the one respecting the permissive equity value in a home, although it must be said that values have gone up greatly since the provision was originally enacted. They also ask in their brief for an increase in general disability pensions. I am not going to say anything about that, but I do say that I support particularly the requests to which I have referred, and I support generally the brief of the Canadian Legion.

As I said a minute ago, I do not have much to say about the strike. I did not intend to say very much because others have spoken fully. My area is going to be very pleased at the settlement, because it was very badly tied up. However, I do want to refer to one assertion made by the hon. member for Charlotte that we from the maritimes do not come to the federal authorities with any sound ideas. I do not agree with him. I do not think it is a fair statement to make.

I want to tell the house, Mr. Speaker, that in the Atlantic provinces economic council, ordinarily referred to as APEC, I think we have a group of sincere men working together and when their ideas are submitted they should not be called cockeyed, as the hon. member did in referring to them this morning. I think it is unfair. I have a lot of faith in APEC. I am satisfied they are doing a good job and are going to do a better job for the maritime provinces. I am satisfied, regardless of what was said this morning, that the federal government will pay some attention and give a good hearing to the ideas brought forth by the Atlantic provinces economic council.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to devote any time to congratulating the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It has been done so often that I think it can be taken for granted that we all echo the sentiments of our leaders who tendered congratulations in the first instance.

I am going to try to be specific in what I say. I listened with a great deal of attention this afternoon to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). While we may not agree with all he had to say, I think we can agree that he livened the house up and put the situation in its proper perspective. This is an election session. Many of us will not be here next session, and it is well that we pay our respects to each other before we leave. But I think it is particularly necessary that, before leaving here, we make ourselves clear as to why we may want to come back. The hon. member for Macleod rather paved the way. Of course, as far as he is concerned, no one is coming back next session except Social Credit members.

This year the throne speech is a rather puzzling one. The fact of the matter is that, when I read it over, my opinion was that this being an election year, the government are being extremely careful in anything they may propose by way of legislation. They are not sure what is best to do so far as the country is concerned. Hence they figured that if they brought in a speech from the throne with nothing in it that was controversial, the members of the house when discussing it for the next 10 days would give the government an idea as to what they should do this session by way of legislation to supplement the speech from the throne. In other words, in my judgment it is just a trial balloon. There is not anything to disagree with; there is not anything to agree with, very much. We shall just be obliged to tell the government what we think is best for the Minister of Finance to do in his budget and what they should bring in by way of legislation at this session, as we see it, if they want to get elected again in the country.

I think the puzzler for the government at this time is the question whether the Minister of Finance should use his present surplus for the purpose of reducing taxes or whether he should use it for the purpose of building up social security payments right along the line. Before I get through I am going to tell him in no uncertain terms what I think he should do. I believe that is what the government want us to do.

For a start, let me say this. The throne speech does one thing that is necessary, though I do not think it goes far enough and I do not think it is equal as between province and province. I refer to federal aid to education. There is a great disparity between the disbursements in the maritime provinces and in the rest of Canada. I have here a clipping reporting the speech of a learned professor who was making an analysis of the subject. It is quite lengthy. He goes into the matter rather fully. However, he makes this observation dealing with the proposal to double the amount of money available for university aid:

> Assuming the announced doubling of last year's amount of federal grant to universities a university in Alberta will receive $300 per student and one in Ontario, $275. A university in Nova Scotia, however, will receive $160 for rendering the same service to the nation, Dr. Kerr said.

While we all believe that making available that additional money is a step in the right direction, I believe the equalization of those payments as between province and province is something that should be taken under consideration. There is no reason why the amount per student should vary so greatly as between universities in the maritimes and the other universities across the country. Of course another provision forecast in the throne speech is to boost the aid to technical high schools and trade centres. The money had run out. New agreements are now available which provide for much more money. It is a development that is badly needed across the country. That is another thing for which this throne speech has provided. Of course the details will have to be worked out as between the provinces and the federal government.

There is another good thing that was in the throne speech—I picked out all that was good in it, and there were only three things—was the increased aid for disabled seamen. The federal compensation act is being revised and brought into line with the compensation acts in the provinces, and the pension to the widow of a seaman who may have lost his life is now being equalized as it is paid from province to province. These are the three things that were of value in the throne speech. In view of the fact that I consider it to be a trial balloon and that the government are looking for advice as to what they might bring down, I am going to try to tell them from there on in.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Am I right in thinking that the reason the grant per student in the maritime provinces is so much lower than it is elsewhere is that there is a higher percentage of students there to the whole population, and that the grant is made per head of population?

Mr. Gillis: That is exactly right, and it is an extremely easy matter to iron out. It is merely a matter of a little bit of arithmetic.

I should like to say just one or two words about the announcement made by the Prime Minister a few moments ago. I am not going to hold any post mortem on the matter, but I should just like to say this. This country today is going through a process of industrialization that is a new industrial revolution. I view that strike on the C.P.R. as one of the reflex pains of automation. It happens not only on the C.P.R.; it is happening in every industry in the country. Technological advance—and we must accept it—brings about these things. We had it in the mining industry. We had it in the automobile industry. Now we have it on the railways.

I think the government will be obliged to provide certain machinery, and I think it is simple to provide it. We have been advocating it for years. I believe the government should set up industrial councils by means of which representatives from every industry in the country would be able to meet with the government, with representatives of management, and the unions called in whenever there was a threatened disturbance because of technological advance. The matter is not going to stop there. That machinery is today necessary so the Department of Labour at least would have a ready contact with people in the industry who know the repercussions of any changes that may be taking place.

The building industry has had that machinery for years. You never hear of any trouble in the building industry. They have had their own industrial council for many years and they come in here and meet with the minister and his officials, both management and employees, and iron out their difficulties before they get started. That is prevention. In these matters, as with disease, prevention is better than a cure. It is better to prevent an appendix eruption than to have an operation. If you had had an industrial council of the railway industry, with competent people who had seen that strike developing, and if they had met together before the eruption, I am reasonably sure that it would not have taken place.

I just say that now in passing because I think the government should take advantage of that kind of machinery. It does not cost them anything. It is merely a matter of having the personnel appointed from each industry and from the railroads so that when something like what has happened occurs they have someone to whom to go rather than being left to get out in the street and fight it out among themselves, and disrupt either that industry or the economy of the country, as happened in this case. I hope the Minister of Labour particularly and the government will give some thought to that, because we have been preaching it for 10 years. The example of the building trades is a good one, because any friction is ironed out before there are any difficulties.

I said a moment ago that if we are leaving here to go back for an election we should be quite clear in our own minds where we stand and for what we stand. This morning—and I am not saying this to be mean—I listened to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) speak. I always enjoy his speeches. He took the Gordon report—

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Dinsdale: Just parts of it; I did not read it in detail.

Mr. Gillis: But it is like the Bible; you cannot take just one parable, you have to take the whole thing. The hon. member said the Gordon report was a wonderful document. In fact he said he believed these people were looking down the neck of George Drew when they wrote that report.

Mr. Dinsdale: In connection with the items to which I referred.

Mr. Gillis: If anyone wants to accept that report as an election manifesto he is quite welcome to it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Just on the items to which I referred. I had not time to read the whole thing.

Mr. Gillis: They are not going to take this bit by bit, taking the good and leaving out the bad. I just want to warn my hon. friend, because that will be held against him at the right time and in the right place, not by me but by people sitting not very far from him. If I were living close to the hon. member I would make full use of it, too, and I know he would if the positions were reversed.

I know this is an interim report of the Gordon commission and the final report may be much different. I hope it is. There is not anything new in it. I am going to deal particularly with the maritime sections of it. He pretty well writes off the maritimes. I am dealing particularly with the coal industry now, because he made a special study of the coal industry. On page 51 of the report there is a table headed, "The Estimated Sources or Types of Energy Used in Canada". This table shows how the coal industry has declined and will decline by 1980. It shows coal, including coal for electrical energy, as a percentage of the total energy consumed. In 1926 it was 69 per cent; in 1953, 39 per cent; and by 1980 it will only be 16 per cent. That is not a very bright picture.

Then, again, over on page 103 of the report, in the first paragraph on the page he dealt with the mechanization taking place in the mines. He said:

> This means, according to estimates contained in our study on the Nova Scotia coal industry, that if there were no reduction in employment an additional two million tons of coal would be produced each year. On the other hand, if production is not increased the services of some 4,000 of the 11,000 mine workers presently employed will not be required.

Knowing the industry as I do, he is practically telling me there will be 4,000 more people go out of that industry. There has been a heavy exodus from it in the last five years.

Over in another section of this report on the maritimes he tells us that he sees the future of Nova Scotia coal marketing as being backed up into the maritime provinces only. Of course he advocates the development of thermal power to supplement the power at Gagetown through the use of coal from Nova Scotia. Well, that is not a new story; that is the Christie report. We have heard all that over the years. So far as I am concerned there is nothing in the report with respect to the maritime provinces except a reiteration of the policies that have been in effect for the last 50 years. He says to move out. We have been moving out for the last 50 years, and there is nothing in the report that would suggest that there is any future development for the maritime provinces.

He makes one recommendation here with which I agree, although the mechanics are not exactly as I would like to see them. Over the years I have advocated a national energy policy. In this report he recommends a national energy board which would replace the present coal board. It is not necessary to replace that coal board. All you need to do is amend the act under which that board is set up, broaden the powers of the board and give it the necessary technical personnel to examine coal, gas, electricity and any other fuel that may develop in the future. He says the board should supervise imports, exports and so forth, but I would add "regulation", because if you have no power to regulate you have no power to direct. If it were merely a matter of advising as between the provinces and federal government and the industry, then it would not be a very effective board. At least he has taken a step in the direction that I have been advocating for some considerable time.

I hope before a final report is written the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys will have some consultations with Mr. Gordon in order to enable Mr. Gordon to understand the problem as it really is. You have to have a board with the proper personnel, but you do not have to replace the coal board. If you broadened the board and added to it, then you could give it the power of regulation to make it effective.

According to press reports, coal is far from dead. It is one of the main problems of the Russians today. I have a newspaper report written by Victor Riesel, the correspondent who writes for the New York Mirror and who was blinded not so long ago by gangsters of the labour movement in the United States. I am not going to read the full report, but according to it the great difficulty Russia is having today, and one of the main reasons for the uprisings in the satellite countries, is that the miners are not producing coal. He says it was the miners in Hungary who spearheaded that revolution. The interesting part of the story to me is that there is a tremendous market in West Germany and in France for coal from this continent. He says:

> You get a picture of just what the Hungarian mines mean to Moscow if you look at the needs of the Germans and French. The western Germans, for example, would be happy if they could increase their purchase of 8 million tons of coal annually to 15 million. They've flown over some of their top industrialists to see John L. and coal industry leaders here. They'll get the tonnage if we can put ships to sea.
>
> The French have had their people here too, seeking an increase from 3 million tons to 7 million tons a year. Compare these figures—which the French and Germans reckon can keep their industries alive—with what the Russians are losing just in Hungary.

It is a good story and points out the fact that coal is far from dead. In this Gordon report there is the observation that there is a tremendous market for coal in Europe, provided we can get the proper subsidy understanding with the federal government. I am saying this just as a warning; we do not want to close out our coal industry in this country too fast. I am reasonably sure also that if a competent examination is made by this Gordon commission of the economics of laying a pipe line to bring natural gas from Alberta to Quebec and Montreal and changing your equipment over to use that gas, and compare that with the economics of coal in that area, coal will stay in that area. I am reasonably sure that would happen. I hope that before the final report is written something will be done on that particular matter.

I hear everybody talking about an increase in population. That increase is taking place in almost every section of Canada except the maritimes. I was looking at some figures on urban centres issued in 1956. I note that in the province of Nova Scotia, instead of there being an increase from 1951 to 1956, there has been a decrease of 11,000. I know in my own particular area, in two or three towns, we have lost around 1,840 people, and the trend is in that direction.

In his report Mr. Gordon has said very little about the rehabilitation of agriculture in the maritimes. One of the main reasons why agriculture is not developing in that province in the way it should is the cost of fertilizer. We are dragging fertilizer all the way down from Ontario. The government, of course, is subsidizing the freight rate on it, but even after it gets there it is very expensive. A few days ago I was interested in picking up another report which shows that there is a complete lack of thinking in our part of the country with respect to the use of our own resources. This article has a startling headline, as follows: "Charges Fertilizer Source Neglected". The article says:

> Some 100,000 tons of material that should be going on Nova Scotia farm soil is being wasted every year at the steel industry in Sydney, Dr. G. R. Smith, chairman of the soils and fertilizer committee at the Truro agricultural college, told the Nova Scotia agricultural conference here yesterday.

This is quite a lengthy article. The 100,000 tons referred to consist of slag, waste from the steel plant. I remember an estimate going through this house in 1942 that gave the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation a substantial sum of money for research into the possibilities of using that slag for fertilizer or whether it should be treated, and so forth. Evidently its possibilities were proven, and according to this article by this man, who is an expert, it is an excellent fertilizer, as good as any they are hauling from Ontario. Well, that is the kind of thing Mr. Gordon should look into.

I believe that the agricultural industry in that part of the country should be stepped up. I do not think any country can survive long whose main basis is not agriculture, because people have to eat. You can make as many automobiles and steel plants as you like; you can produce as much manufactured goods as you like, but you still have to come back to the farmers of the country in order to feed the people.

This report also indicates that on a national scale our farm population is going to decline terrifically by 1980. This is something the federal government should definitely take a look at, because we just cannot afford to keep on crowding people into urban centres, building skyscrapers, putting children into those buildings and cooping them up like chickens where they have no fresh air and no place to play or to do anything else. I believe a country that neglects its agriculture and does not maintain it as its main base will pay for it before very long. That was the forecast of the economists who assisted in compiling the report.

If we have 100,000 tons of good fertilizer which has been thrown away in that part of the country, then I ask this question. Why could it not be utilized and given to the farmers? It could be given to them at very low cost, and it might encourage them if they do not have to pay $90 or $100 a ton for fertilizer, as they are doing today. I mention that because I think it is something the federal government should take a look at. The federal government has already put money into the project in the research stage, and according to the report I read it has proved practicable. It was good fertilizer but it has been thrown away.

Of course one could go on and on with the Gordon report, but I am not going to do that. There are many things I would like to say about it, but I should like to save them until I see the final report. This is only a sketchy thing, but it definitely pinpoints the maritimes. They made a special examination of the coal industry and other resources, but they certainly did not come up with anything. The recommendations in the report with respect to the kind of public investment fund for the purpose of assisting industry are quite all right. It is quite all right to set up a fund of that kind. That has already been done in the maritimes. There is a provincial public investment fund today, but in addition to that we have the Atlantic provinces economic council which is doing the research, and then we have industrial development boards in many sections of the province.

Some of these boards are bringing small industry into certain sections. I know that right in my own area a plant was recently established with local capital by the local industrial development board. This plant will employ some 300 people. This is the kind of development I like to see. If a plant locates in the province, the investment fund in the province will grant a dollar for every dollar invested by the plant itself. They will be assisted by the provincial government advancing dollar for dollar.

The economic council shows me, at least, that there is no need to appoint a new body to come in to do that kind of work. They are doing it themselves. The men who are doing that work are men who are living in the province and know the needs of the province and the marketing possibilities of the province, and have an idea as to how much interprovincial marketing can be done, because this is one of the main objectives of the organization. As I said before, they have their own industrial boards in different sections which are raising funds locally and are trying to bring in small industries.

If the federal government goes along with the Gordon recommendation that a fund should be set up by the federal government to assist in the rehabilitation of those areas, it should be done in co-operation with the province to supplement work already being done by those boards. Full advantage should be taken of the Atlantic provinces economic council and the facilities they can supply locally in all four provinces. It would be the best machinery that could be set up.

I am glad to see the Minister of Finance entering the chamber. Before he came in I was telling the house that the throne speech, with very few exceptions, was a trial balloon. I did not see much in it. It leaves a lot for the members to say. The suggestion is, let the members talk on this speech and by the time the minister is ready to write his budget he will have a fairly good idea as to whether he should reduce taxes because of his surplus, or whether he should step up social security payments all along the line. Of course other legislation can be brought in despite the fact that there is not much in the speech from the throne.

Well, I would like to tell the minister that as far as I am concerned there are many people in this country who would get no relief from a tax cut. The last time the minister of finance, now Mr. Justice Abbott, presented his budget speech, he pointed out that there were 137,000 families in the country living on incomes below the income tax level, and they received no relief from a tax cut. If the minister was considering using that surplus I would suggest the way he could get the greatest political value from it across the country would be, as a start, to step up the old age pension to the figure of $60 a month, I would say, because that is needed. These people are living on the borderline of charity, and those who do not have relatives or friends who will assist them are in a worse position than borderline charity cases.

It would be a good gesture on the part of the minister if he would step up the old age security pension, and I believe the second thing he could do would be to remove the means test from the blind pension. These people are already penalized as it is; they are living in darkness. Those who are able to go out and supplement that pension by some income should not be further penalized and the income should not militate against their right to retain the $40 a month, as it does today. It would be a good idea to bring the blind pension up to a par with the old age security pension.

A third step would be to modify the regulations of the Old Age Assistance Act. I believe the qualification age of 65 is too high. In large part these people are disabled through sickness or by some other means and have no income. I believe the qualification age should be lowered to 60 in the case of men and 50 in the case of women. The most pathetic figure in our midst is the woman of 50 years of age who has raised a family, now broken in health, whose children are away, who is without a home and who lives with friends and neighbours. Any hon. member who has done any work in his riding must know of many cases like that which come to his attention, and there is nothing one can tell these women. It is a very sad thing to have to tell a woman in those circumstances that there is nothing one can do because there is no legislation.

A fourth step would be a modification of the Disabled Persons Act, and we have been hammering at this now for a couple of years. Today you can live in a wheel chair, but if you are able to wheel yourself to the table and eat you cannot qualify for a pension under this act. You may even be mentally and physically incapacitated from birth and now 50 years of age. I know of some cases like that. Some of the people I know in this situation have never earned a dollar in their lives but they are able to walk, and therefore cannot qualify under the act. I am convinced there should be some modification in the administration of the act.

Of course all the things I have mentioned cost money, and the minister may not have enough money in the surplus to meet these needs. Nevertheless, another piece of social security that is a must is a national health plan. At some time in some way during this session an effort should be made to enable people across this country to secure medical attention at a nominal cost. The standards of medicine are high in this country, and we have many centres across Canada which are just as good as the Mayo clinic or other institutions in the United States. Personally if I required an operation of any kind I would not leave Halifax to have it performed, but thousands and thousands of Canadian people are unable to reach medical centres.

In my own community we maintain local medical institutions and on a panel basis we pay doctors in our hospitals, and this is true of many centres across Canada. It sometimes happens in small communities that one cannot get the attention which one requires, and some people must pay $1,000 to receive some attention in Halifax or elsewhere. Local hospitals today are going further and further into debt and their equipment is becoming more and more out of date. These hospitals expect that something will be done on a national basis, and they are not going out on drives to build up their resources because they believe a national health program will come into being, and I think it is essential at this time.

I believe the greatest relief the people of Canada could receive at this time would come if the government took the bit in its teeth and established a national health plan. I do not think it could be done under the formula laid down at the last dominion-provincial conference, which stipulated that six provinces must consent and Ontario and Quebec must join. It will not be done on such a basis. With the exception of the western provinces the other provinces have not indicated their willingness to come in, and I think another formula must be devised. Realizing the need for this type of legislation, the federal government should take it upon itself to work out a formula that would perhaps make it easier for the provinces to accept such a plan, and something should be done at this session of parliament.

If the minister will accept my advice he will bring about the social security measures I have mentioned rather than reduce taxes, which gives very little relief except to those who are in the brackets where greater taxation must be paid. Those who are earning $5,000 and more per year do not require relief to the extent that it is required by those in the lower brackets. After all, it is not the amount of tax you pay but what you have left that counts.

If the minister could find his way clear to using some of that surplus in the various ways I have described, in stepping up the social security measures and bringing about a national health program, then he would be doing something for which I personally, and I am convinced people right across this country, would commend him.

I believe my time has expired, Mr. Speaker, and I will close by saying I trust that when the minister brings in his budget I will be able to stand up and vote for it.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member just one question. My recollection is that the party he belongs to has on other occasions advocated that we should increase the basic exemptions for married and single people to an extent which would more than dispose of my surplus. At this time I would like to ask him which he wants.

Mr. Gillis: I thought I was quite clear, Mr. Speaker, when I said that as far as I am concerned if the minister will use his surplus for the purposes I enumerated in my address I would be quite satisfied to leave the tax structure as it is.

Mr. Harris: All right.

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased this afternoon to take part in this debate, and like many hon. members who have spoken previously I wish to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), who is my seat mate, and the seconder, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who is a colleague of mine from my home province, New Brunswick.

I am pleased to hear the news that the C.P.R. strike has ended and the men are returning to work. Coming as I do from a railway city, in this case a Canadian National Railways city, where we have about 5,000 railway employees working in and out of the locality, you will understand my concern and interest in this matter. I know the employees of the C.N.R. in Moncton will be pleased to hear that their fellow workmen are returning to their jobs.

Unlike the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery), who expressed his sympathy over the loss of a senator from his county, I wish to express my happiness on the appointment of a new senator from the county of Westmorland. We now have a colleague in Ottawa, although he is in the other place, who is an expert on agriculture. Mr. Taylor served as minister of agriculture in the province of New Brunswick for a period of approximately 17 years. I will feel more confident now when matters relating to agriculture come up. We have listened to many people from other parts of the country bringing up agricultural problems pertaining to the west, of which they had expert knowledge, and I feel now that we have someone from the east who will be of assistance to us.

Nearly every time I have spoken in the House of Commons I have talked about the Chignecto canal. It did not seem to arouse very much interest, but I am not going to let the opportunity offered today go by without mentioning it. I hope that with the continual repetitious reference to this matter the canal will some day come into being.

As hon. members know, the proposed Chignecto canal would be 18 miles long, connecting Northumberland strait with the bay of Fundy and crossing the isthmus which now connects New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. This canal has been a subject of discussion in this house for many years and was actively under discussion long before I came to the chamber. With the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway ships will still have to go around the province of Nova Scotia when headed for the United States, Mexico or South America.

I believe that some day the government of the United States, as well as the government of this country, will consider the building of this canal to be a security measure, as it would afford a sheltered route from ports on the east coast of the United States such as New York and Boston to United States ports on the great lakes. Ships would be able to go from New York, Portland and Boston to Chicago and other lake ports and take on and discharge cargo both coming and going. I feel that some day this matter probably will be better presented and more publicity given to it nationally.

All hon. members from New Brunswick at some time or other have indicated in the house their support of this project. I believe the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) expressed it at a public meeting held in Saint John, but I have heard the rest of the hon. members express their support of this proposal in this house. This project was implied at the time of confederation, and was considered to be a confederation promise. I hope the promise will be honoured some day. If the hon. members from the maritime provinces would be as consistently insistent as western hon. members are in presenting their problems, I feel that this matter would receive the publicity and attention it deserves. I am not going to go into the matter at great length, but I do hope someone else will bring it up and tell the house more about it, and perhaps be more persuasive in putting the matter before the house.

I should like now to bring up a few matters concerning my constituency. Recently the Department of Fisheries announced that between $150,000 and $200,000 would be spent over a three-year period to restock and rehabilitate the oyster fishing beds of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It is my earnest hope that some of this work will take place in the Northumberland strait, or parts of the Northumberland strait adjoining Westmorland county, and in that part of Kent county which adjoins Westmorland county. I appreciate that as far as coastal waters are concerned there is no real boundary between counties. A few years ago this area produced many good oysters, and I would be pleased if the Minister of Fisheries could give details of the work to be done in the rehabilitation and seeding of the oyster beds, as this would be of benefit to the different districts in the province of New Brunswick.

In connection with the fishing industry I should like to refer briefly to the conveniences and facilities for fishermen in the way of wharves and dredging which have been provided, and to express my appreciation to the Minister of Public Works and the department for the new wharf recently completed at Emily's point at Shemogue. This project has been needed for some time and was built during the summer and fall of last year. It will fill a great need of the fishermen in that area.

Last year I referred to the need of extensions to certain existing wharves. Representations have been made to me on many occasions by fishermen along the coast of Westmorland county from Barachois to Cape Tormentine, setting out the need for wharf extensions in that area in order that they may be better able to land their fish. During the summer a great amount of dredging was done in many small harbours, and this enables fishermen to bring their boats in to unload at the wharves.

However, there are a few wharves which still require to be extended because of the increased fishing industry, and I would ask the Minister of Public Works to consider carefully the representations made by fishermen for increased wharf facilities at cape Bald, Dupuis Corner, Robichaud and Kouchibouguac river. These extensions are necessary because of the increased volume of business.

While I am speaking of wharves, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the need for improvements to the wharf at Point du Chene. Years ago this was the terminal for the ferry operating between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, before the Cape Tormentine-Borden ferry was started. Besides being used by fishing boats, this wharf is used by sea-going vessels engaged in the pulpwood export trade.

On motion of Mr. Murphy (Westmorland) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this debate on Monday and Tuesday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 14, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE VOTING AGE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Canada Elections Act (age of voters).

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Argue: The purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Elections Act to reduce the eligible voting age from 21 to 18 years.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH MAXIMUM RATE

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Interest Act.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Argue: The purpose of this bill is to place a limit of 12 per cent per annum on the interest, carrying and other charges that may be made by companies engaged in lending money, instalment sales, automobile financing or any other such financial transaction.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND EXPIRY DATE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The purpose of this bill is to extend the expiry date of the act by a further five years.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNITED NATIONS

PARLIAMENTARY OBSERVERS—ALLEGED REQUEST TO SIGN DECLARATION RESPECTING SECRECY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with a recent request made of parliamentary observers from Canada to the United Nations assembly in being asked to sign a declaration to the effect that they would be bound by the Official Secrets Act or intimating the need for such a declaration being signed. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister the other day and he has looked into it. In view of all the circumstances I would ask him whether a decision has been made that the discretion of members of parliament, having regard to the oaths they take as members of parliament, is of itself sufficient to absolve them from being obliged to make such a declaration.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as soon as I heard of the procedure which had been proposed at our delegation to bring to the attention of these members of the delegation, including members of parliament who had not taken an oath under the Official Secrets Act, the requirements of that act, I looked into the matter. It was also brought to my attention by my friend the Leader of the Opposition. I have written to him on the subject to the effect that while the intention of the officials concerned was, in my opinion, a laudable one so that members would know what were the requirements under the act, nevertheless the procedure which was adopted was, I think, regrettable as it might conceivably give rise to the impression that some limitation was being imposed on their freedom of action in the House of Commons when they returned from the delegation.

That, of course, has never been the intention of the government and I think the hon. members of the opposition party who have been at the United Nations assembly meetings will agree that there has been no suggestion that a limitation of that kind should be imposed on any member of the delegation. I think it is desirable that all members should be informed of the requirements of the act. However, the procedures adopted for this purpose were, as I have said, regrettable and I have given instructions that they should not be followed.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, whom I am sure we all welcome back to Canada. In view of the fact that only three provinces have agreed to the health insurance proposals made by the federal government last year, is consideration being given to improving those proposals so that at least six provinces might see their way clear to agree to them in order that this country might soon take some steps in connection with national health insurance?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if there could ever have been any evidence of my hon. friend's interest in these matters, that has now been provided, and it is that the hon. gentleman does not give me even an opportunity to catch my first breath. Nevertheless, I may say to him that the matter of the hospital insurance proposals is one which, during the time that I have been absent from the country, has not been without full attention on the part of the government and indeed of some of the provinces. I hope that before too many days are out we shall perhaps be able to make a further observation in this connection. I think the proposal is basically so constructively wise that it does not need the suggested changes proposed by my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Can the minister say whether the government of any province which is Liberal in character has shown any interest in agreeing to the proposal?

Mr. Martin: Practically every government in Canada has shown interest in the proposal.

OIL

PRICE INCREASES—BLOCKAGE OF SUEZ CANAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In opening may I state that he may not have received a copy of the question I sent him in time, and if not perhaps he would accept this as notice of the question. In view of the fact that only 15 per cent of petroleum imported into Canada for refining comes from the Middle East, is the government considering taking action to make sure that the blockage of the Suez canal is not used as a pretext by the oil companies to increase the price of crude oil and refined products, as has been done in some parts of the United States?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The oil that comes into the eastern part of Canada comes largely from Venezuela and from the United States. Only a small part of our requirement comes from the Middle East. The prices of the product are prices fixed in the United States, and the question of whether or not further Middle East oil is received in eastern Canada will have no bearing on the price of the product.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he has had time, since the end of the session last August, to give further consideration to the plight of superannuated civil servants, particularly those whose pensions are in the lower brackets? Will something be done to improve their position in the near future?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): We have considered the question of superannuated civil servants and their pensions at some considerable length, Mr. Speaker, and have had discussions with various groups of persons who would be interested in it, including a deputation from the superannuated civil servants themselves. I do not want anyone to conclude from this that any action is imminent because these things are only announced in due course, if they are announced at all.

SHIPPING

REGULATION OF MOTOR PROPELLED CRAFT ON INLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, which he may take as notice. In view of the fact that at the last regular session the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines approved a proposal for the regulation of motor propelled craft on the inland waters of Canada, have any steps been taken to draw up these regulations or have any conferences been held with operators of motorboats in connection with this matter?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): As I am not in a position to answer the question now, I will take the question as notice.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, January 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): On Friday last when the house adjourned, Mr. Speaker, I was speaking about wharves and in particular the wharf at Point du Chene in Westmorland county. This wharf was used as a terminal for the Prince Edward Island ferry and is now used by fishermen and by exporters in the pulpwood business. However, since the war shipping to and from the ports has not been as great. One of the reasons for this is the channel. I feel that some dredging should be done in the channel, to a depth of at least 18 feet, so ocean going steamers will not have to leave Point du Chene harbour and complete the loading at some other port in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. I ask that this wharf be maintained and that dredging be carried out in the very near future.

I should like now to speak of some of the matters that are brought to my attention, sometimes very forcibly, by my constituents. One thing about which I am going to speak is television. Last year I spoke about television, and perhaps I was not very complimentary about some of the programs.

This year I should first of all like to start my remarks on television by complimenting the television section of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on some of the fine programs they have for children, and some of the shows they put on at other times. I also wish to say that the local television station, CKCWTV, which has 22 hours of live broadcasting, is doing a wonderful job in the southeastern New Brunswick area. They do a lot of community work. The news service is quite good, as are also the children's programs and live shows.

I am going to criticize some of the television productions or shows, and in particular I am speaking of the arrangement of time of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television broadcasts. In the constituency that I represent we can receive three stations very well, and in some instances more. These stations are in Saint John, Charlottetown and Moncton. During the week program time is allotted for Canadian Broadcasting Corporation production. One program is called "C.B.C. Folio". In the month of December, starting at 9.30 at night, "C.B.C. Folio" came on and continued until eleven o'clock, the very choice part of the listening evening. During the programs I received many telephone calls complaining about the type of program. I am not saying that the programs should not be shown, but the people in my district do not like to get such a large dose of one type of program at one time.

Take ballet. About three weeks ago we had 90 minutes of ballet right in the middle of the evening. I know there are people who are very fond of ballet but there are people who are not, and many people called me up. They were annoyed that they should be subjected to 90 minutes of ballet. They would call me and ask me if I was watching the program and ask me for my opinion of "those long-haired nut boys cavorting around in tight, long underwear" for an hour and-a-half. I could not say very much one way or another except that some people like this type of program. The answer I would get from my constituents was, "Why, certainly some people like it and they should be able to see it." They would go on and tell me that they liked wrestling, boxing or mystery shows, but this type of program that the minority of viewers liked was put on at a later hour after the news, at the time of the late show, and I think probably the ballet lovers could do the same as other people and have their favourite program 90 minutes long at some other time rather than in the middle of the evening.

The next week it was opera that lasted the same length of time. There are many people in my riding who like opera, but there are just as many who like other types of programs that are produced locally or by the C.B.C. Some like the old time music; some others like choral music produced by the choirs we have in our section. I would like to point out that in New Brunswick we are not lacking in fine music. We have St. Joseph's University choir, a group known as the Westmorland singers, and the Notre Dame Convent choir. These are all splendid choirs but when we view them on television their appearances last only for a short period of time.

I understand that everybody is now culture conscious and I believe that over a period of years a Canadian culture will evolve. I do not think, however, we are a people who want to absorb culture in large doses, nor do I think this will in any way contribute to the evolution of a distinctive Canadian culture, and therefore I am making the suggestion that the time of C.B.C. productions on stations in New Brunswick be revised, that a second look be taken into the matter. I know something can be worked out.

Last year the radio listeners in New Brunswick complained that they could not get the national league play off hockey games which were broadcast elsewhere. Hockey is the national sport of Canada and is enjoyed by most Canadians. I took up this matter with the department and I am told listeners in Moncton, Westmorland county and in New Brunswick generally will be able to hear the national league play off hockey games this year.

We all enjoy comedy on television and radio but I think it is sometimes carried a little too far. I am not being thin skinned about anything in connection with the government, but recently I watched a C.B.C. television program which attempted to review in broad farce the events of 1956. In this farce a parliament in China was depicted. At the opening of the program headlines from all the big Canadian newspapers such as the Montreal Gazette and the Globe and Mail were shown and they all related to the pipeline debate. It was obviously a parody of the pipeline debate held in the House of Commons last year. The next scene opened in the parliament of China in the third century and the debate taking place there concerned the building of the wall of China by the trans-Canton wall company. The procedure was similar to that which occurred in the pipeline debate here last year. The leader of the government in this production was Mr. Ho and the leader of the opposition was Mr. Doho. The mace was replaced by a crow.

I believe in the freedom of the press and certainly many cartoons appear in newspapers which poke fun at the government and parliament, but when parliament votes money to a crown corporation I think the corporation should undertake to use the time to better advantage. I am suggesting the public's money could be better spent than ridiculing and showing disrespect to parliament and the symbol of the crown.

I would ask that a second look be taken at the television productions of the C.B.C. before they are released. If they want to speak to me in private I can point out many objectionable features in their productions. I would also ask that the allocation of time on the private stations carrying C.B.C. programs be arranged so we would have a choice and not have three or four stations in an area carrying the same type of program simultaneously. As I said previously, I am not contending that they should not produce these programs. I am saying, though, that we are not all "egg heads"—we are not all high intellectual types who can stand two or three hours of ballet. I think that since we are paying for this we should have what we like. The minority groups should be able to enjoy their types of programs at suitable hours.

[Mr. Murphy (Westmorland).]

Another matter that I should like to bring up, though very briefly because several of my colleagues will be dealing with it more extensively, is an agricultural matter. When I was home between the sessions I attended a meeting of agricultural association in my district—it is called the W. A. K. E. Federation of Agriculture—and at that meeting agricultural problems were discussed. In particular they asked me to bring to the attention of the government for discussion and consideration the question of the importation of powdered dairy products from Australia and New Zealand, and to suggest that the older tariff regulations set some time ago be reconsidered and, if it was thought advisable—that is to say if it would not disturb export and import balances—that another look be taken into the tariff regulations between Australia, New Zealand and Canada.

In my concluding remarks I would like to mention the Gordon commission. I have not read the whole of the report but I have read that section which deals with the Atlantic provinces. There are some things that I am very pleased to read in it and there are others with which I do not, perhaps, agree. I certainly would not agree with the movement of the people from the province of New Brunswick or the maritime provinces to other parts of Canada. We in New Brunswick and in the maritimes went there because of conditions in other countries similar to those which the Gordon report now describes—low incomes, famine or the fact that landlords could make more money by turning the tenant farmers out and raising sheep. We came to New Brunswick 100 years ago or more, and now we are told we should move on again. But I believe that if conditions in the maritime provinces continue to go ahead as they have been, and this report shows that the economy of New Brunswick and the maritime provinces is rapidly catching up with the rest of Canada—the percentages are given and are rising by leaps and bounds—with continued and increased government assistance such as we have had since 1935, by 1980 or earlier our maritime provinces will be on a par with the rest of Canada and perhaps on their way to surpassing the rest of Canada.

There is one paragraph in the Gordon report which I should like to read into the record because it sums up conditions there so well. That paragraph is on page 104 and it deals with the establishment of the army camp at Gagetown, New Brunswick. It reads:

> The establishment of the army camp at Gagetown, New Brunswick, will undoubtedly result in very substantial benefits to that province in the years to come. There may be a number of other matters which, while of relatively lesser importance, might be handled in a way which would help one or other of the Atlantic provinces. To begin with, it is suggested that a greater measure of decentralization of government purchasing policies would be beneficial to local areas. This might be particularly true in the case of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia where the defence forces have considerable establishments. Similarly, if it should prove possible to place a greater number of defence orders with manufacturing concerns in the Atlantic region without substantially adding to costs, the resulting benefits might more than justify the additional effort and perhaps inconvenience involved. Then too, as previously suggested, if the railways were able to work out their purchasing program more evenly over a longer period this would be of great benefit to the car manufacturing industry in Nova Scotia and help to stabilize employment in that area.

That is a very fine paragraph. The establishment of Camp Gagetown has already resulted in benefits to the province of New Brunswick and I believe that if the policy and the suggestions of the Gordon report, as set out in that paragraph, were carried out there would never be any need for the movement of people from New Brunswick to other parts of Canada. With that, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the maritime provinces and the province of New Brunswick be given special consideration this year by my government. Thank you.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may my first words be those of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the acceptance of the speech from the throne? I was particularly interested in hearing of the development of the city of Edmonton which was described in the speech of the proposer. My next remark must be that of satisfaction that the rail strike has been solved for the time being. The whole country has been seriously disrupted and communications with the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway came to a standstill during the time the strike was in progress. One thing that I believe everybody will be wondering is why, if it was possible last Friday for the government to impose certain conditions both on the company and the firemen's union, similar action had not been taken a couple of weeks ago. Why was it necessary to subject the country to all the inconvenience we had to go through when a temporary solution was apparently such an easy matter to bring about? Surely, if a little more energy had been displayed on the part of the government, that strike could have been averted altogether or at least postponed, as perhaps it is being postponed now, until next October. After all, this is only a temporary solution which has been reached. The strike was a great inconvenience to the people of this land and I feel that more resolute action might have been expected from the government.

An inquiry is to be set up into the various aspects of the dispute particularly in connection with the diesel problem and the safety angle connected with the running of these diesel locomotives. A few weeks ago I had the opportunity of travelling in what is technically known as a Budd car, which is an ordinary passenger coach driven by a diesel engine, and I was invited to go into the cab of this coach between Nanaimo and Victoria. I was surprised to find that there was only the engineer in that cab; there was no fireman, no front end brakeman, and yet this coach was carrying 60 or more passengers and was travelling at a high speed, in some places at well over 60 miles an hour. It did seem to me that that engineer was in an extremely lonely position, shut in by closed doors from the rest of the coach, and that he had difficulty in observing both to the right and to the left. He was sitting on the right-hand side of the coach and was able to see with some ease cars approaching on the right—there was a large number of level crossings—and he could see the signals given to him, but when passing stations and signals on the left and any cars approaching from the left-hand side his view was obstructed. I do suggest that when this board carries out its investigations it should not limit its inquiries solely to the freight and yard engines but that consideration should be given to advisability of having just one man in the cab of the Budd passenger coach.

Living on an island, as we do, we are not so much concerned with the railway as we are with other approaches. Our railways are limited and they are in the main used for the conveyance of logs and lumber to the seaboard. From the seaboard exports are taken by vessel to all the ports of the world and it is the development of the ports and the means of getting our produce off the island, and the means of bringing people to the island to enjoy the holiday resorts of Vancouver island, that concern us rather than the actual operations of the railway.

I do not think that in the whole history of Vancouver island in the last 75 years has the provision for the movement of the residents of the island to the mainland has been so inadequate as it is today. The service between the southern portion of the island and the mainland of British Columbia is extremely poor despite the fact that the traffic available justifies a much better service than is being provided at the present time. If one wishes to leave the city of Victoria in order to catch the fast train, either the C.P.R. or C.N., out of Vancouver the next day, one has to take the boat overnight from Victoria and remain the whole of the following day in Vancouver. Alternatively you have to drive 75 miles up to Nanaimo and take the ferry across from Nanaimo. There is no direct connection between the Canadian Pacific boat service between Victoria and Vancouver which avoids a long delay in order to make connections with the fast trains to the east. Exactly the same thing happens on the return journey. The last time I went back to my constituency I had to take the ferry to Nanaimo and drive 75 miles to Victoria.

For many years recommendations have been made by various bodies that greater facilities should be provided somewhere on the Saanich peninsula so that a fast passenger and freight ferry service could operate all the year round between some port in the southern end of the island and Vancouver. Recommendations were made as long ago as 1913 that a breakwater should be constructed at the village of Sidney, at the northern end of the Saanich peninsula. If that harbour were developed it would be quite possible for vessels plying out of Vancouver to land their passengers at Sidney and they would then have to drive rather less than 20 miles to Victoria, thus saving two hours on the trip.

The harbour is exposed during the winter to high winds and surf from the southeast and some form of breakwater is required in order to make it suitable for all-year service. Ministers of the crown have visited the harbour but have done nothing about its development after their visits. This is not merely a local problem, it is one which concerns the whole economy of Vancouver island. One of the main industries of Vancouver island is the providing of accommodation for tourists who visit the island at all times.

The increase in the number of tourists coming to Vancouver island is demonstrated by the figures indicating the number of passengers and vehicles which have been transported to the island at Sidney from the state of Washington in the United States. During the summer months the Washington state ferries operate a service and in 1953 they carried 42,884 passengers; in 1955 that had gone up to 67,216 passengers, and last year up to August 31, they had carried 83,853 passengers. The number of passengers coming to Sidney from the state of Washington has doubled in three years. The same increase has occurred in the number of vehicles carried. In 1953 the Washington state ferries carried 13,532 vehicles whereas last year up to August 31 they carried 26,765.

That is an indication of the travel between the United States and Vancouver island. The same development would be possible if facilities were provided for a fast ferry service between Vancouver and the southern part of the island. There is a customs port at Sidney and last year 1,300 United States yachts put in there to clear customs. The only accommodation they had was a float approximately 150 feet long. I have seen vessels lined up five and six deep waiting for better accommodation. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) was out there a year ago and looked over the situation. In a letter which he wrote he indicated that he recognized that there was a shortage of mooring space and stated that proper facilities could be provided for approximately $432,000. I hope it will be possible for some action to be taken.

There is another problem connected with transportation which was brought to my attention recently and this is the hazard created by overhead power lines particularly when they cross navigable waters. About six weeks ago I flew over and under some power lines which had been constructed recently by the B. C. Electric between Salt Spring island and Vancouver island. There were no markings whatever on the five wires which span Sansum narrows. You could not see the cables until you were almost on top of them and if my pilot had not known exactly where they were he might have been forced to alter course on very short notice. Some attempt was made to mark these lines by suspending spheres every 150 feet, but that did not prove adequate when there are low clouds and seaplanes are approaching the seaplane base at Patricia Bay.

I feel it is up to the Department of Transport to investigate this matter. This does not concern Vancouver island only because power lines have been placed across many navigable waters. A particular hazard is created when these lines are on the direct approach route to seaplane bases. The line I am referring to is on the direct route for planes coming from the north into the seaplane base at Patricia Bay, which is a recognized base. The Department of Transport must be aware of the danger and know that with the increased number of power lines being constructed all over the country this danger is increasing.

I believe that wherever possible these power lines should be submerged rather than hanging at not too great heights across navigable waters. If they cannot be submerged they should be clearly marked. I should think it would be possible to have some sort of flashing red light attached to these power lines.

To give some idea of the length and of the danger that there is, I should like to give some instances. Over the Sansum narrows to which I referred there is a span of 5,753 feet. The highest part of the supporting structure on Salt Springs island is 900 feet whereas the lowest point in the sag of the cable comes down to 200 feet. Hence you have a diagonal cable running across that approach. But by no means is that the longest stretch there is. In Jervis inlet there is a span of 10,100 feet, and at many other places on the west coast there are other spans of cable which are more than 5,000 feet in length. So much for the question of transport.

I wish to say a word with regard to agriculture because I note that, according to the speech from the throne, a committee is to be set up to inquire into the better use of agricultural lands. We have some spots of extremely fertile land on Vancouver island but I suppose the majority of it would be considered as rather submarginal on account of the rocky condition of the soil. When crops are grown they must be rotated in just exactly the same way as crops are rotated in the larger agricultural districts. In the main our crops do not consist of cereals, such as wheat, oats and barley. They consist largely of vegetables, small fruits and flowers. Flowers are used as a definite rotation crop on a great deal of our land and every encouragement should be given to increase the yield and to facilitate marketing conditions in connection with our flower crop. In other instances where it is not possible to grow extensive crops outdoors, utilization is made of the land and developments are made for the improvement of our flower crop by the construction and operation of greenhouses.

Greenhouses are only assisting nature in the growing of the flowers. The flowers depend upon the soil which is placed in the greenhouse and on the amount of sun which they receive. Yet for some reason or another plants produced in the greenhouses or flowers cut in the open fields are regarded by this government as being manufactured articles and therefore a ten per cent sales tax is imposed on cut flowers which are sold. We believe that flowers are part of the general economy of our island and that they should be regarded as an agricultural crop, not as manufactured articles.

To show how ridiculous is the imposition of the tax, may I give this illustration. If an agriculturalist cuts holly off his trees for the markets in eastern Canada at Christmas time, he must pay a ten per cent tax on those holly berries which are shipped. If, on the other hand, he digs up a whole tree, wraps it up in burlap and sends it away he is not obliged to pay any sales tax at all on it. If somebody goes out and cuts boughs off a cedar tree for decorations or with which to wrap up flowers which are being sent across the country, he must pay a ten per cent tax on those cedar boughs. But there is no tax on Christmas trees which can be dug out and sold. The whole thing is full of inconsistencies and I think it should be carefully investigated.

Another important industry on our island is that of our fisheries. It is interesting to note what has been said in the Gordon report with regard to the fishing industry. One sentence which is found at page 36 of the report reads as follows:

> We are of the opinion that it will also be necessary for Canada to re-examine its doctrine of territorial waters . . .

This question of the distance over which Canada can control her fisheries has been brought very much to the fore in the last year. Owing to recent technical developments, both for the discovery of fish and for increasing the efficiency of catching fish, larger and larger vessels have been used. The result is that those larger and larger vessels move farther and farther out into the ocean. This year there has been evidence that fishing vessels with nets a mile long have been catching salmon far beyond our territorial waters. If that condition is allowed to continue and if no control is exercised in the catching of fish beyond our territorial waters, then we can predict the depletion of our salmon fish industry in the foreseeable future. It is of the utmost importance that in the near future steps be taken to find some method by which the catch of fish far out in the ocean is to be regulated.

I am pleased that in the speech from the throne there is an indication that the sockeye salmon treaty will be extended to include the pink salmon. Pink salmon are also now being caught farther out to sea than they were a few years ago. It is going to be a case of either extending control beyond our territorial waters or finding some other method of regulating the catch if our fish industry is to be preserved. As these larger vessels move farther and farther out to sea there is likely to be a concentration of the industry in various ports. Such large fishing centres as Vancouver, New Westminster and, farther north, Prince Rupert are replacing the old-fashioned, small fishing villages. At the southern end of British Columbia the fishing industry is mainly centred around Vancouver. It is there that the boats are registered and from where they commence their operations. They go far out to sea, and the approach to the Pacific ocean lies around the south end of Vancouver island. As more money is being spent for the development of bigger vessels and more modern equipment, it becomes more and more important that safe harbours be provided. There is a shortage of safe harbour sites on the south coast of Vancouver island.

I am pleased that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) has been carrying out some investigations as to the advisability of developing harbour facilities at Port Renfrew. I would urge that without any further delay a model of the approaches and water conditions in that island should be constructed. I have seen some of the models that have been made of Hecate strait, and it is undoubtedly an up-to-date method of deciding on the type of construction which should be undertaken. I hope it will be possible, even if some expense may be involved, to construct a large-sized model of the harbour of Port Renfrew in order that a decision may be made of the best type of structure to be built there so that a safe harbour may be developed for the fishing fleet which operates now so much farther out to sea.

In connection with the last point I wish to make I should like to endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) a couple of days ago when he pleaded so earnestly that consideration be given to extending the war veterans' allowance to those men who served only in the United Kingdom during the first world war. I noticed that the Legion presented a brief to the government in November, and that they had introduced into the recommendations they have been making for a great many years on this point, the fact that a limitation should be imposed in that before a veteran could receive the allowance he should have served in the United Kingdom for at least one year. I think that is a qualification that should appeal to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) and should make it quite possible for the government to extend that war veterans' allowance to those men who, through no fault of their own, were retained in the United Kingdom during the first world war, and who have now reached advanced years and are in rather straitened financial circumstances, their power of earning a livelihood very definitely restricted because of age and disability. Now is the time when we can extend that war veterans' allowance to include those men who served in the United Kingdom only during world war I, provided that they served there for at least one year.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like in the first place, Mr. Speaker, to join very sincerely and warmly in the congratulations that have already been offered to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, on the way in which they have discharged those important duties. Their participation in the work of the house and the contributions they have made to our debates, gave us every reason to believe that they would discharge these tasks with distinction and we were not, of course, disappointed.

A very considerable portion of the speech from the throne is devoted to external affairs, Mr. Speaker. This fact, as well as the fact that reference has been made to external affairs in the debate, will, I am afraid, make it difficult for me to discuss, as I would otherwise like to discuss, developments in the banner constituency of Canada. I need hardly say that I refer to Algoma East and the exciting industrial developments that are taking place there, especially in the field of uranium production.

So far as external affairs are concerned, Mr. Speaker, recent events, especially events in the Middle East, have emphasized to all Canadians the importance and the responsibilities of Canadian foreign policy, even in respect of far away areas where there may seem to be few direct Canadian interests but where the paramount interests of all in peace and war are often involved. These events have also brought about, not only widespread public discussion of the decisions that we have made and may have to make, but also a reassessment of the principles which have underlined our policies and the factors which influence them. It has, I think, Mr. Speaker, been confirmed, if confirmation was necessary, that our foreign policy must be Canadian, based on Canadian considerations, Canadian values and Canadian interests, the greatest of which, however, apart from freedom itself, is peace. But a Canadian policy, in this day and age, is not necessarily the same as an independent policy. There is no country in the world today, even the most powerful, which in the preservation of peace and security can afford the luxury of, or run the risk of, a policy of independence in foreign affairs, in the sense that independence means isolation from one's friends or immunity from the effect of their decisions and their actions.

We should not, of course, and we do not, automatically or unhesitatingly follow the policy of the United States or the United Kingdom or any other country. Nevertheless, we cannot, and I suggest we should not, make our own decisions and our own policies without being influenced by, without taking into consideration, the policies of the United Kingdom or the United States or those of our other friends and allies with whom we are associated. No country is in a better position to appreciate the necessity and indeed, if you like, the opportunities of interdependence in the realm of foreign policy than Canada, situated as we are on the North American continent but being an active member, as we are also, of the commonwealth of nations, NATO and the United Nations and trying to play a responsible part in all those associations. We are, of course, a free and a sovereign state, but freedom and sovereignty do not mean for us, or for other nations, either isolation or immunity; unless we abandon all of our national and international responsibilities, and perhaps not even then. It seems to me evident, then, that Canadian foreign policy must be influenced by various factors which we can and indeed which we often try to modify, but which we ignore at our peril.

These principal factors, I suggest, are four in number. The first is our membership in the commonwealth of nations, four-fifths of the people of which are now Asian, 443 million out of 530 million. Action by any of the commonwealth nations which seems likely to foster and strengthen the ties which bind us together is almost certain to deserve, and certainly should receive, our support. The reverse, of course, is also often true.

In actual practice, there have been over the last 10 years or so since world war II very few international occasions when we have not been on the side of Great Britain; the centre of our commonwealth. But the rarity of dissenting occasions stems not from our automatic acceptance of the policies of Great Britain but from the fact in the vast majority of international questions our interest and hers have happily been almost invariably identical. When that does not happen we, of course, regret it deeply and we do our best to reconcile our differences without delay and without recrimination. We experienced such regret indeed to the point of distress when we differed, not perhaps in objectives but in methods and procedures, with the United Kingdom on certain occasions at the United Nations assembly meeting last autumn in connection with the Suez crisis. The commonwealth was indeed deeply split on that issue and our relief was therefore correspondingly great, a relief shared in full measure by the Asian members of the commonwealth, where the separation pressures were most intense, when this danger to the commonwealth was removed by the Anglo-French decision to accept the cease-fire resolution of the United Nations assembly. So the commonwealth association remains strong and close. The friendly, informal and frank exchange of views in a sincere effort to reach agreement on all matters of common concern goes on, and the commonwealth continues to play its invaluable and constructive role in today's troubled world; a role for which the whole world has reason to be grateful.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? What nations of the commonwealth would have left the commonwealth had the British and French not abided by the resolution of the United Nations?

Mr. Pearson: There is evidence, strong evidence, which I and others have received, to suggest that if the fighting in Egypt between Anglo-French and Israeli forces and Egyptian forces had continued and if the United Nations assembly cease-fire resolution had been repudiated or rejected, the pressures in regard to separation from the commonwealth in certain Asian members of the commonwealth would have been so great that it would have been indeed very difficult to resist them. We have had evidence to that effect both from New Delhi and from Karachi.

Mr. Churchill: Has that not been denied by both Ceylon and India?

Mr. Pearson: This has been questioned, I believe, in Ceylon, including the Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker, I am giving my opinion on the basis of information which I have received from the highest authorities in the government of India. I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker—and in my earlier statement on this I think I made it clear in the house I did not suggest—those pressures affected what we sometimes call the old members of the commonwealth, but they certainly did affect those new members which, as I have just said, constitute four-fifths of the population of the commonwealth.

It seems to me that this commonwealth association, which all its members wish to preserve, to be of enduring value must strive for the widest possible areas of agreement between its members. It seems to me also that the limits of such areas, though not often expressed, may be pretty clearly discerned. Whether or not we speak of it, there are certain fundamental things that unite the governments and the peoples of the commonwealth: freedom, personal and national; parliamentary democracy and the supremacy of the individual over the state. There is also a certain basis of morality in political action to which commonwealth members are by tacit consent expected to adhere. Such a basis can easily be disregarded, on the other hand, by those who do not share our commonwealth beliefs and our ways of doing things. They have, for instance, often been and are being disregarded by the Soviet union in Hungary; but the barbaric luxury of this type of conduct is not open to us. Indeed, it is completely foreign to us and that is one reason, perhaps a main reason, why we can and must work together in the commonwealth. It is more important than ever for us at this time to strengthen within the commonwealth our will to work together in defence of these principles; for very significant events are now about to occur in the commonwealth as significant perhaps as those which took place 10 years ago when India, Pakistan and Ceylon became members.

We often also, Mr. Speaker, speak of the commonwealth as a bridge, as it is, between Asia and the west; and perhaps it would not be inappropriate at this moment if I expressed my own feeling of gratitude for what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), in his recent trip to Asia, has done to strengthen that bridge. If there is such a bridge, it has been made possible by the accession of India, Pakistan and Ceylon, which was in its turn the result of an act of constructive abdication by the United Kingdom in India in 1947. Now, this evolving process is about to shift to Africa. On March 6 next we shall welcome a new member into the commonwealth, the state of Ghana, at present known as the Gold Coast. It will be the first native African member, and its progress as an independent nation inside the commonwealth will be watched with great interest throughout Africa and Asia, and also in the west and by the Soviet union.

Ghana will probably be the first of a series of new members to emerge from the continents of Africa and Asia. It may be that by 1960 and 1962 the commonwealth will include also Malaya, Nigeria, the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and nearer home the Caribbean federation.

Thus the process of what I might call creative withdrawal continues to the special credit and indeed to the glory of the heart and centre of the commonwealth, the United Kingdom. As has been said, "The smaller the empire the greater the commonwealth." New nations arise from former colonial territories to take their place among the free democracies of the world. As an older member of the commonwealth Canada is proud, I am sure, to assist in welcoming these young countries, as they attain independence, to our growing family and to assure them of our friendship and our support.

A second factor influencing Canadian foreign policy, Mr. Speaker, is the United Nations, now going through a testing period that will have far-reaching effects on its future as an organization effective for the promotion of international peace, security and justice.

It should, I think, be clear to us that so long as we try to discharge our obligations we have accepted under the United Nations charter we must by that fact accept some limitation on our complete independence in international affairs. There are now 80 members in the United Nations assembly with widely varied resources, traditions and political experience. The assembly's decisions, which are, after all, merely recommendations and not laws, although this is sometimes forgotten, necessarily involve a great deal of give and take. We cannot expect always to have our own way on matters which are decided by the wisdom, or if you like the unwisdom, of a majority of 80 sovereign states with differing interests, differing loyalties and unfortunately with different conceptions of peace and justice.

The activities of the United Nations assembly in recent weeks in regard to the Middle East have given us some ground for hope that the organization can be used effectively and swiftly in bringing about a cessation of hostilities, though it remains to be seen whether it will be as effective in bringing about a just settlement of the issues that brought about those hostilities. That will be for the United Nations a more important and I suspect a more difficult task. We can take satisfaction over what has already been done in the assembly, but recent developments have raised in our minds some questions regarding its future and I want to mention one or two of these.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, we have become more aware than we were previously of the gap between responsible and irresponsible membership; between the membership of those democratic countries such as the United Kingdom and France who are loyal members of the organization and as such take heed of its recommendations and those totalitarian despotisms such as the Soviet union which treat such recommendations with contempt when they cut across their own national policies.

This has led to a demand in some quarters that somehow or other the United Nations assembly should take action to enforce effectively its own recommendations. This of course ignores the fact that such compulsory enforcement procedure through the assembly is not in accordance with the terms of the charter as drafted; and also that resolutions that may be passed by an irresponsible majority in the assembly may be such that we ourselves would find great difficulty in accepting them and the enforcement of which we would in certain circumstances resist.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the minister mean by irresponsible?

Mr. Pearson: Well, I mean by exercising the right of membership in an irresponsible fashion against the principles of the charter which was accepted by all members. This leads to another question which causes some anxiety in our minds, and that is the growing tendency in the assembly, which is of course facilitated by the one-state one-vote principle, and regardless of the powers of state, to force through, by sheer voting strength, resolutions that are impractical and at times quite unreasonable. In reverse there is the power of a minority of one-third plus one to prevent reasonable and useful resolutions of the majority which we may consider ourselves to be both practical, reasonable and desirable.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in a very real sense the effectiveness of this unique instrument for the preservation of peace, the United Nations assembly, rests with a majority of small nations now operating at least to some extent in blocs. If the group veto or the bloc veto in the assembly, irresponsibly exercised, replaces the single-power veto in the security council, the larger body will soon become as futile as on so many occasions the smaller body has become. I suggest therefore that each member of the assembly has now a greater duty than ever before to exercise its rights with a clear and unprejudiced understanding of their implications for the future of the organization and for international peace and security. If they do it in that way they will be showing a sense of responsibility.

The need for a constructive and moderate approach to complex political and economic problems without which the general assembly will not be able to function effectively and may not even survive can be illustrated, this is only one illustration, by the attitude taken by some members of the assembly to what are called the colonial powers. Incidentally, those who use that term at the United Nations often exclude from its meaning the greatest colonial power of all and the one which exercises that power in the most arbitrary and tyrannical fashion, the Soviet union. The old colonialism is disappearing inevitably and, if the process is orderly, desirably; but that is all the more reason why those countries which still have direct responsibilities for non-self-governing territories should not be made to feel at the United Nations or elsewhere that they are oppressors to be deprived arbitrarily of their rights or indeed their reputations. The actual fact is that these countries for the most part have been leading participants in the great twentieth century experiment of bringing national consciousness and self-government to peoples who have never known them before.

There is another danger, Mr. Speaker, which faces the assembly of the United Nations, the tendency to forget that while the world organization can perform and is performing, as I see it, an indispensable role it is no substitute for the national policies of its members. It reflects those policies, it influences them, but it rarely creates them. I think it is wrong, even dangerous, to suggest that it does or to try to replace the necessity of hammering out wise and constructive policies among one's friends merely by a resort to high-sounding moral platitudes at the assembly. As Mr. Dean Acheson put it the other day, "Nothing more comes out of the United Nations than we put into it."

I think it is also wrong to rely on United Nations decisions only for a particular area or a particular situation. It should be remembered that if governments are to use the United Nations when they consider it in their interest to do so, and ignore it on other occasions when they find it a less convenient instrument for their purposes, the organization will be very greatly weakened indeed and will be open to the criticism of being merely an agency for power politics. I am not suggesting that these things have happened at the United Nations but I am suggesting that we should watch carefully to see that they do not happen.

Recently the assembly took a very important step indeed in extending its functions into the field of security after the security council itself became powerless in that field through the exercise of the veto. I refer, of course, to the emergency force which was set up to supervise and secure a cessation of hostilities. Now, Mr. Speaker, the immediate value of this force which now numbers, incidentally, about 5,500 of whom over 1,100 are Canadians, in respect of the specific emergency which brought it into being has I think been well established. Its continuing value in helping to bring about and maintain peaceful conditions and security in the area in which it operates remains, of course, to be proven. I myself think it should be of a great value for this purpose also, provided it remains genuinely international in control, composition and function, and providing also that its limitations are recognized, especially that it is a voluntary organization which must act strictly within the terms of resolutions which are only morally binding and which must be passed by two-thirds of the assembly in each case. But even within these limitations the United Nations force can, I think, play an important part in bringing about an honourable and enduring political settlement in the Palestine and Suez area.

We have been discussing the possibilities of such a settlement with friendly governments in recent weeks and it seems to be the general view among members of the United Nations that the present atmosphere, charged as it is with fears and suspicions which have been exacerbated by recent armed conflicts is not at the moment conducive to the kind of discussion and negotiation which would have to precede such a settlement. I think perhaps we have to accept that position. But if, however, the passions and the bitterness of fighting must be given time to recede, that does not, as I see it, mean we can safely sit back and let nature take its course. There may be some reason for delay; there is none for indifference or for indefinite avoidance by the United Nations of a responsibility which is escapable: to make peace in the area, without which the cease fire would not have any permanent value.

While the political climate of the Middle East is maturing toward the time when conditions will be more appropriate for a comprehensive settlement it is essential, I think, for the countries of the region, and indeed for us all, that there should be no return to the former state of strife and tension and conflict on the borders; that security should be maintained and, indeed, guaranteed. I suggest that for this purpose there will be a continuing need during the period until a political settlement is achieved for the stabilizing international influence that the emergency force is now exercising. And this essential stabilizing role might well require the continuing presence of a United Nations force along the boundary between Egypt and Israel; perhaps also for a time in the Gaza strip and, with the consent of the states involved, along the borders between Israel and her other Arab neighbours, though that of course would require a further resolution from the United Nations assembly.

Mr. Fulton: What about the Suez canal itself?

Mr. Pearson: I will be coming to that in a moment.

It seems to me that some such United Nations supervision might help to ensure the security of the nations concerned which is so vital if they are to approach with the necessary confidence negotiations toward a comprehensive solution of their conflicts.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Not only, Mr. Speaker, in my view, must the borders be made secure betwen Israel and her neighbours; so must freedom of navigation through the Suez canal and in the gulf of Aqaba. As the canal will soon be open to traffic again it is, I think, very important indeed to press on with discussions which have already begun at the United Nations so that the control of the operation, maintenance and development of the canal will be in accordance with the six principles agreed on at the security council last September—I think it was last September. Events since that time, far from weakening the validity of these principles, have strengthened that validity and I think it is now more important than ever that the operation of this essential international waterway be—and I quote from one of these principles—"insulated from the politics of any one nation" and that the United Nations recognize and confirm that fact.

This is a problem which is right on top of us at the United Nations assembly now, and it must be solved satisfactorily or there will be further trouble in that area. It is obvious of course—I think it is obvious, though I wish it were not—that the Soviet union will do its best to prevent such an agreed solution on terms satisfactory both to the users of the canal and to Egypt. Moscow has already shown that its policy is to trouble these waters and to fish in them.

Looking further ahead, the experience of the United Nations in respect of the Suez crisis, especially the necessity for hasty improvisation, underlines, I think, the desirability and the need of some international police force on a more permanent basis. We have recognized this need in the past. We have expressed that recognition at the United Nations and elsewhere as recently as in the General Assembly before the recess and we have done all we could to translate that necessity into reality, but for one reason or another it has never been possible for the United Nations, except in the special and limited cases of Korea and the Middle East, to have armed forces at its disposal; the reason for that I will not go into at this time.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister permit one question before he leaves the subject of Suez? Is it the view of the Canadian government that the United Nations emergency force should be assigned a stabilizing role in connection with the Suez canal?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are possibilities for that if such a role is needed, but if there is agreement between the users of the canal and the government of Egypt which would in its turn provide for a satisfactory means of resolving the dispute over the use of the canal it might not be necessary for any outside United Nations force to be present on the canal while that agreement is in effect. I think the best thing to do is to wait and see how these discussions work out.

This present emergency force in the Middle East is a unique experiment in the use of an international police agency to secure and supervise the cease fire which has been called for by the General Assembly. Why should we not, therefore, on the basis of this experience—the experience we have gained by the operation and establishment and organization of this force—consider how a more permanent United Nations machinery of this kind might be created for use in similar situations as required?

What the United Nations now would seem to need for these limited and essentially police functions is perhaps not so much a force in being as an assurance that members would be prepared to contribute contingents when asked to do so, to have them ready and organized for that purpose; with some appropriate central United Nations machinery along the lines of that which has already been established for this present emergency force.

The kind of force we have in mind would be designed to meet situations calling for action, intermediate if you like, between the passing of resolutions and the fighting of a war, and which might incidentally have the effect of reducing the risks of the latter. It would not, however, as I see it, be expected to operate in an area where fighting was actually in progress; it would be preventive and restoratory rather than punitive or belligerent.

It is not possible to determine in advance what would be required in any emergency, but surely members through the proper legislative processes could take in advance the necessary decisions in principle so that should the occasion arise the executive power could quickly meet United Nations requests for assistance which had been approved by it. In doing so we would be making at least some progress in putting international action behind international words.

The third factor that has a bearing on our independence in foreign policy is NATO, our membership in which gives us, not only the assurance of a strong and collective defence if we are attacked but, even more important, is our strongest deterrent against attack. Since I last had occasion to speak on foreign affairs in the house a NATO council meeting of very considerable importance has taken place in Paris.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister goes on to the next question. He has mentioned the need of a strong force under the United Nations and has expressed the hope that the day would come when that force would be able to carry out the resolutions or directions of the United Nations. What has the minister to say with regard to President Eisenhower's recent announcement that having regard to conditions in the Middle East there is a necessity for the establishment of a United States force to operate there in the event that aggression takes place. Has he taken any stand on behalf of Canada with relation to that announcement?

Mr. Pearson: I was going to say a few words about that if I could bring them within the 40 minutes of my time.

An hon. Member: We will give you more.

Mr. Pearson: I shall be coming to that later. The NATO council meeting, to which I have just referred, took place in Paris from December 11 to December 15. Ministers from each of the NATO countries met in Paris. My colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) and I represented the Canadian government at this meeting. In addition to the annual stocktaking of NATO's defence plan and the approval of a directive for future military planning, secret of course, which took into account both economic and atomic capabilities, we had what we considered to be useful discussions of the general international situation, particularly on the impact on the alliance of developments in the Middle East and eastern Europe.

In these discussions we devoted more time than usual to political developments outside of what is described as the NATO treaty area. That merely reflected the increasing awareness of the NATO governments that the security, stability and well being of an area like the Middle East, to quote one example, is essential to the maintenance of world peace, which in turn is the matter of primary concern to the NATO members.

A significant aspect of this recent meeting was the evident desire on the part of all members to strengthen the non-military side of NATO; as we increasingly realized that relations between the western alliance and the Soviet have become a contest in terms of political judgment and action; of economic and industrial power, and not merely a contest in military strength. Having said that, it would be unwise not to add that it was recognized at our council meeting that events in Hungary and the use of naked military force there by the Soviet union, which use might have had far-reaching effects; these events have underlined the absolute necessity of maintaining also our military defensive strength as we become more and more preoccupied with the political and economic aspects of the struggle. As has been said by so many people so many times, we have to continue to do both.

It was to these problems of non-military co-operation confronting the alliance that the committee of three report addressed itself. That report, which has been made public, was submitted to the council and its recommendations were accepted by the council members. Apart from maintaining defensive military strength the most important need of the NATO alliance in the present circumstances is for the development of common policies, as essential to that unity which is important as strength itself. The committee of three report recognized this, also that new institutional arrangements or organizational changes or changes in structure would not in themselves meet this need.

What is required, and this is easier to say than to bring about, is a sustained will and desire on the part of member governments to work out through consultation policies which will take into account the common interests of the members of the alliance. If that is not done and if national factors alone prevail in the formulation of policy, then the alliance will have great difficulty in surviving. Certainly it will not develop beyond a purely military arrangement which will disappear if and when the fears and emergencies of the present lessen and disappear.

The most powerful member of our NATO coalition, and as recent history has perhaps demonstrated the only one which now has the economic and military power to enable it to discharge fully truly world-wide responsibilities, is the United States. Within the last few days the administration in Washington has proposed to congress an increased acceptance of those responsibilities in the Middle East in what is called the Eisenhower doctrine.

I do not think it would be appropriate for me to discuss in detail a proposal of the United States government which is now before congress and concerning which differences of opinion have already appeared, but I think I can say without impropriety that the ideas behind this doctrine are welcomed by this government as evidence of the increased interest of the United States in the Middle East in terms of both defence and economic aid for the development of the area. It seems to me important that those two things go together there as elsewhere.

Mr. Dulles, in quoting the President's declaration to a congressional committee, has warned, and I think the warning is a good one, that no single formula will solve all the problems in the Middle East and that there is no single panacea for them. Nevertheless it is quite obvious I think that those proposals have very important implications which have been very well put in my view by the Washington correspondent of the Winnipeg Free Press, and I quote from one of his articles as follows:

> The American government, once congress has given its expected approval,—

Or perhaps as I should say "if congress gives its expected approval."

> —will be committed to a solemn and unprecedented obligation in the Middle East. It will be pledged to use force if necessary to protect that region from Russia or from any state responsive to Russia's pressures.

Then Mr. Freedman went on to say this:

> That is the ultimate commitment. There can be none greater. It has been defined in this challenging form to prevent Russia from believing that the eclipse of British and French influence allows it to bring the Middle East under Moscow's control.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question at this point?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Does that doctrine not suggest there is a danger of by-passing the United Nations?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think so. However, I shall have a word to say about that matter also. Indeed, I am coming to that point now. It has been said that the principles and the procedures envisaged in this doctrine are the same as those which prompted Anglo-French intervention in the Suez crisis last October. But I doubt whether that deduction will be borne out by the text of the presidential declaration which contains the following points, and some of these bear on the particular point raised by my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North: (1) any assistance against aggression would be given only at the request of the state attacked; (2) any obligation to give such assistance is restricted to overt aggression by any nation controlled by international communism; (3)—and this is of some importance—any measures taken must be consistent with the charter of the United Nations and with any action or any recommendations of the United Nations; and I take it that would mean either positive or negative action by the United Nations.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister this question? Does that mean that action is taken first and then the United Nations acts afterwards or just what does it mean?

Mr. Pearson: I think I had better stick to the wording of the declaration. You know what happened in the case of Korea, Mr. Speaker. Certain action was taken by one member of the United Nations. But within half an hour or an hour, I forget which—within a very short time—the matter was referred at once to the security council and this action was before security council for confirmation or otherwise.

Mr. Green: That is only because Russia was absenting herself.

Mr. Pearson: True, confirmation was received only because Russia absented herself from the security council. But we now have a procedure which, when action is vetoed in the security council, the assembly can be called together within twenty-four hours and the matter referred to the assembly, as was done indeed last October.

The fourth point is that the measures to be taken or envisaged would be "subject to the overriding authority of the United Nations security council in accordance with the charter".

Then, Mr. Speaker, I think I should also point out—and this is of some importance—that the declaration does not deal with conflict between non-communist states in the Middle East nor does it deal with communist subversion brought about by non-military means.

Welcome as is this indication of the acceptance by the United States of a direct and immediate responsibility for peace and economic progress in the Middle East, even more welcome to a Canadian would be the full restoration of close and friendly relations between London, Paris and Washington in respect of that area, and the strengthening of their co-operation generally.

Perhaps we in Canada are particularly conscious of the desirability and the need of this result. For that reason I think we would all want to give particularly wholehearted support, especially at this time, to one sentence from President Eisenhower's state of the union message last Thursday when he said this:

> America, alone and isolated, cannot assure even its own security. We must be joined by the capability and resolution of nations that have proved themselves dependable defenders of freedom. Isolation from them invites war.

I think it is hardly necessary to add in this house that no people in the world have proved themselves more "dependable defenders of freedom" than have the British.

Co-operation in the commonwealth of nations, in the United Nations and in NATO—all this—is important, indeed essential. But nothing is more important in the preservation of peace and the promotion of progress than is an enduring and solid friendship as the basis for co-operation and unity between the United Kingdom, France and the United States. The recent NATO council meeting in Paris—and this may have been almost its most important achievement—began the process of restoring and strengthening that co-operation after the strains and interruptions to it brought about by the Suez crisis. It is essential that this process should continue.

We now have a great opportunity to profit from the unhappy experiences of the recent past by taking steps to ensure that those experiences will not be repeated.

Perhaps I should not close, Mr. Speaker, without at least mentioning—and there will be time only to mention it—a fourth factor which bears strongly on the formulation and execution of Canadian foreign policy. I refer to the fact that we are a neighbour of the United States on the North American continent.

On our relations with the United States my colleagues and I have often spoken over the last few years. I think we have made it abundantly clear that our acknowledgement of the United States as the inevitable and indispensable leader of the free world does not at all imply automatic agreement with all its policies. I have even been told by some of my friends below the line that we have a tendency to make this fact almost unnecessarily clear. On the other hand, it seems to me to be difficult to imagine a really critical situation in international affairs, one which involved final questions of war or peace, on which we should be likely to diverge very widely from the attitude of our neighbours. If we had to, for Canadian purposes, we would certainly be in a most uneasy position. For us in Canada, therefore, to formulate and try to follow foreign policies which do not take into account the closeness of all the ties which link us—and must do so—with the United States, would surely be nothing but unrealistic and unprofitable jingoism. The time when we can comfortably enjoy this particular form of national indulgence seems to me to have long since disappeared.

In our relations, then, with the commonwealth, with the United Nations, with NATO, and with the United States, we have the fullest liberty to propose, to persuade, to advise, to object; and this liberty I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, we have used and shall use whenever a Canadian interest requires it. We will not, however, be using this freedom for the benefit of our country if we try to secede or weaken from our international commitments or if we try to ignore or take away from the geographic and economic facts of life on this continent. Membership in the international association to which we belong undoubtedly brings us nationally very great advantages in terms of security and progress. The national advantages are, however, coupled with international responsibilities. I think, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's record in the discharge of those responsibilities over the years has been a good one and I am sure it will continue to be so.

Mr. Nesbitt: I want to take a moment of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker. There are a lot of questions we would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), but we can ask them another time. There is one question I should like to put to the minister and it is this. Was it generally foreseen that because of the terms of what I believe was called the uniting for peace resolution, which was passed about a year ago by the United Nations general assembly, that the resolutions passed at the United Nations general assembly on November 2 and November 7 last, which were based on the former resolution would be clearly placing the Egyptian president in a position to dictate to the United Nations with respect to the emergency force?

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I could just try to answer that in a word. When the uniting for peace resolution was passed by the assembly, as my hon. friend may know, two committees were set up by the assembly to follow up the question of uniting for peace through the appropriate machinery. Canada was represented on one of those committees. At that time we did try to make provision, and made proposals to that effect, for some permanent United Nations police machinery which would be available for the kind of emergency which took place last October. This was not possible and, therefore, though we may have at that time foreseen the kind of emergency which we had at the end of last October, I am afraid we did not do very much to be in a position to meet it.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before making the remarks which I propose to make I should like to associate myself with those who have congratulated the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think this is more than just a pleasant piece of politeness. I believe it indicates something which is quite basic in our parliamentary practice and which has been referred to in these very often quoted words of Churchill who said, "The things that unite us are greater than the things that divide". Also, I think it is part and parcel of another thing which is essential in our parliamentary life, namely, a kind of sense of sportsmanship which does not often desert us, and which, when it does desert us, causes difficulties. I think ordinarily we have the feeling that, as I said, we can afford to be polite to each other, usually, because of the fact that the things that unite are greater than the things that divide.

I had no idea when I put together my thoughts to express today that I should have the honour of following the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I had, in fact, determined to base my remarks on that paragraph in the speech from the throne which did have a passing reference to the commonwealth and I do not propose to be diverted from that except that I shall try to comment on some of the remarks made by the minister with particular reference to the commonwealth.

I want to read the paragraph which refers to the commonwealth:

> Visits to Canada in the last few weeks by the prime ministers of Ceylon and India have been conducive to a renewed strengthening of the bonds which unite the peoples of the commonwealth in their constant aim to co-operate in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress.

Now, I suppose I ought to be grateful for two reasons that Mr. Nehru and the prime minister of Ceylon were here; if they had not been here we might not have had any reference to the commonwealth at all in the speech from the throne; and it is interesting to have them here, too, because of the fact that in the case of Nehru he represents hundreds of millions of Asians. We are reminded of this fact incidentally, in the article by the Right Hon. Mr. Nutting in the Montreal Gazette when he pointed out the other day that our great task now is to make friends with the teeming millions in what he called the "uncommitted world".

I find the words I have read from the speech from the throne very disappointing. There is nothing in them which suggests any action, and that is my criticism of the pleasant words used by the minister this morning in speaking about the commonwealth. "The visit is conducive to a renewed strengthening of the bonds". There is not very much suggestion of action there.

I suppose something had to be said about the commonwealth because of what happened in this chamber last November. A great many of us remember with great regret the words used by the Prime Minister on November 26 when he said, as reported at page 20 of Hansard:

> The era when the supermen of Europe could govern the whole world has and is coming pretty close to an end.

We remember not only the caustic words but the caustic tone which he used, and perhaps it was not surprising that before the session ended on November 29 the Prime Minister thought it wise to temper those caustic words in what I can only call a speech of repentance. It seems to me repentance; I think it was repentance. I quote briefly from the Prime Minister's words at page 174 of Hansard:

> While I am on my feet there was something I did wish to say, which I think was expressed in some of the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops and other hon. members and is summarized in a paragraph of an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of today. It reads:
>
> "Canada should have but one major goal for its foreign policy these days, more important even than the doings of its troops in Egypt: that is the immediate improvement of commonwealth relations, of Anglo-American-French relations—but the greatest need of all is the reuniting of the principles and policies of the British and American governments".

That is the end of the quotation from the Journal. The Prime Minister goes on:

> I had intended to take the opportunity of saying that had been the goal we have been pursuing ever since the first of these resolutions came before the United Nations, to work toward what we regard as almost essential for the peace and security of the free world; that is to say, the reliance on commonwealth relations and the reuniting of this alliance in an effective way between the United Kingdom, France and the United States; something that has, I think, been of immense value and without which there would be a void that would cause all of us deep anxiety.

In these words of the Prime Minister there was some warmth, some suggestion of action, but when we come again to read these tepid, lukewarm words in the speech from the throne there is no suggestion of warmth or of action. It is, as I say, a tepid, lukewarm performance.

I do not propose to refer at any great length to the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. One might say of it "good sentences, and well pronounced," in his reference to the commonwealth. I do not feel that I can quarrel much with what he said; they were fair words. But what one wants to know is what is going to be done. Is there any sign of action? And, also, I cannot rid myself entirely of the wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs is so completely North American, is so completely engrossed with his dealings with Washington, that he finds it impossible to take very seriously the affairs of the commonwealth. We remember when, some years ago, he came back from a meeting at Colombo with the other commonwealth nations and announced that he had been there as a "dollar gadfly." A gadfly is a not very co-operative form of insect. I understand what he meant, of course, is that he had been there, the only member representing a country not in the sterling bloc, and that he had been at pains to outline the special views of Canada as a non-member of the sterling bloc.

I wish to refer just briefly to another matter which troubles and perplexes me because of the fair words the minister uses about the commonwealth. He delivered some lectures at Princeton a year or more ago and I intend to read from page 95 of this book of lectures. I am also going to refer to an editorial reviewing the book in the Queen's University Quarterly. The reviewer says in brief:

> One very puzzling aspect of Mr. Pearson's . . . discussion is that there is only one mention of the commonwealth of nations.

That is, in this whole book of 120 pages or so. The reviewer goes on to say that while there are frequent references to the Atlantic triangle and our allies as represented by the Atlantic triangle there is only this one reference to the commonwealth of nations. As a matter of fact, the reference is introduced in rather curious words, almost words of apology. This was originally delivered as a lecture at Princeton University and I am now quoting from page 95 of the book of lectures:

> Before leaving this subject of understanding between systems of society and civilizations, I would like to mention—and it can be only to mention—the unique role which may be played in this matter by the commonwealth of nations of which Canada is privileged to be a member. Its value as a bridge of understanding between the west and Asia and Africa is very great in this age of suspicion and strain where there are few such bridges.

Well, I do not quarrel with those words; indeed, I rather welcome them. I would go back again to ask, however, whether we find any evidence of action as described in these fair words and in particular whether this paragraph which I have read suggests action or any approach to action. I find myself disappointed and indeed there are other things too which disappoint me. If we think back to the time when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) returned from the commonwealth conference last summer we will recall that he had very little to say about what had taken place. He said they had not had to deal at any length with the affairs of the commonwealth itself because they did not really need attention. His exact words as reported at page 5764 of Hansard for July 9, 1956 were:

> Problems of the commonwealth, as such, did not require very much attention.

It is quite true that the conference had discussed various other matters but we could get very little satisfaction from the Prime Minister because, as he said, "The problems of the commonwealth, as such, did not require very much attention". Those were the words of the Prime Minister on his return on July 9 last and when the then leader of the opposition, and the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) too, asked whether there was any indication of our taking the initiative in calling a future meeting the answer was in the negative.

In view of what has happened in these last few months I think the question arises again as to whether we can take the lead. If times were normal one could better tolerate a passive attitude, but the times are not normal. In the morning paper we read a remark of Mr. Chou En-lai of China who has been hailing the Russians as the leaders of the communists in the world and referring to the rest of us as "the enemy". I think the question arises as to whether we do or do not take these things seriously. If we do not, that is that; but if we do, then I suggest again that no proper steps are being taken to give the commonwealth the scope which it might have.

I wish to refer to Mr. Nutting's words in Saturday's Gazette in which he refers to the Anglo-American bridge. There are all kinds of bridges being referred to these days. He said:

> First I want to set forth some general ideas on the basic problems that face our two countries.
>
> Our survival depends on whether we can make friends not with communism but with the millions of the uncommitted world. That is the simple life and death issue which faces us, how do we approach it?

I come back to the paragraph I read from the speech from the throne and ask whether it means anything at all. Do the fair words of the minister this morning mean anything at all? Do they indicate any function for the commonwealth or do they just give it a blessing? Do we regard ourselves merely as members of a club or are we members of a live organization that is able to play its part?

The commonwealth has a special role among free nations and I want to read a sentence from an extremely interesting lecture delivered not long ago in Britain by Sir Oliver Franks, who has this to say about the commonwealth. Franks, you will remember, was the British Ambassador in Washington for some years and he gives rather an amusing picture of his arrival in these words:

> The nations of the commonwealth are free and equal: they are all sovereign states. This was impressed on me the very first day I arrived in Washington. There was a group at the station to welcome me. It included the chief of protocol from the American State Department, British Embassy staff, and seven commonwealth ambassadors. I suddenly realized that there were already six representatives of His Majesty in Washington, as well as the Indian ambassador whose government recognized the King as head of the commonwealth. From one point of view, and it was a real one, I was the junior ambassador of His Majesty in the United States.

At page 21 he says:

> The strength and vitality of the commonwealth does not lie in the separation of its members from their neighbours. It is not that sort of exclusive club. It is its nature to reach out, not to retreat like a snail into its shell. Rightly conceived, the connections of interest and policy which each commonwealth nation enjoys with its neighbours are a source of strength to the whole, not of weakness. They contribute to the effective working of the commonwealth because they increase the understanding and the influence of each member in its region. And between them the members cover five continents of the world.

Its members, one might say, have a dual role. Australia and New Zealand are part of Southeast Asia and they are also part of the commonwealth. Canada is part of the commonwealth but is also part of North America. Britain is part of the commonwealth and also part of Europe. India, Ceylon and Pakistan are part of Asia and also part of the commonwealth, and today we were told of other eastern nations that will shortly be coming into the commonwealth as well. We remind ourselves that in addition to the commonwealth there is NATO about which we hear so much and there is also ANZUS; that is the Pacific organization comprising Australia, New Zealand and the United States. It is still in existence and it continues to function although we do not hear nearly so much about it as we hear about NATO.

Having another look at the commonwealth we observe it is not a bloc. It is spread all over the world separated by large tracts of sea. As someone has said so aptly, "By its very existence it says to the world, 'Don't just be American or European or Asian or African, but something more than that. Be world-wide.'" It has something more in common than the sharing of a continent and it can bring the continents together.

I wish to read at greater length from what the minister said in his Princeton lecture. At page 95 the following words appear:

> I would like to mention the unique role which may be played in this matter by the commonwealth of nations . . . This is a loose but intimate association which includes in its membership nations from each of the continents. Its value as a bridge of understanding between the west and Asia and Africa is very great in this age of suspicion and strain where there are few such bridges . . . The strength of the commonwealth lies precisely in the undefined but genuine recognition by its members of the value to each of such an association with the others and of a common interest in the preservation of a system which includes us all.

I repeat that these are fine sentiments and are well expressed but the question which continually arises in my mind is that of action. Now the circumstances of the moment of course, in view of what has happened during these last months, suggest more than ever the strengthening of the commonwealth. Let us be frank. Britain has taken a knock, but do not let us forget 1940. A lot of people were ready to write her off then but we all remember the magnificent recovery which was made and I believe it will happen again. I do not think those 50 million brave and able people are going to play any second-rate part in world affairs. Their country is not as big or strong as the United States, of course, but I do not think they can be relegated to any second-rate role.

I have been discussing, particularly, political considerations up to now and those were the only considerations which the minister (Mr. Pearson) discussed this morning. That is one of the things that disappointed me—he said nothing about anything specific; he gave no indication of any function which the commonwealth could exercise at the moment; and yet it seems to me, there is a matter of vast importance spread before our eyes now and that is the question of whether Britain is going to join a free trade bloc of nations in Europe. Speaking of this possibility the Winnipeg Free Press says:

This is a bold design, if it is ever effectively translated into practice—through a transition period of perhaps ten years and more—it will recast the structure of world trade.

I am amazed that the minister said nothing about that this morning. I would have thought he should be particularly alive and alert to that situation. But there is no word, as far as I know, of any commonwealth conference being held this year, as has been requested. I can only hope it will take place this year because it seems to me it has now got something important to get its teeth into.

I am going to read a short piece from the London Economist's Canadian representative because he has things to say about this free trade prospect that I think we should bear in mind:

Canada must be concerned and disappointed that the free trade area as now envisaged by the British government puts paid to all hopes of expanding the exports of Canadian manufacturers to Britain. It is not comforting to hear British ministers brush off—as Mr. Macmillan has done—the "mere ten per cent" of present Canadian exports which would be affected by the plan.

It is true our manufactured exports are only ten per cent. Then the correspondent goes on to say this:

Most of the ten per cent consists of semi-fabricated goods like paper of various kinds, chemicals—whenever import licences could be obtained—and some synthetic fibres. All of them benefit from substantial preferences. If the quota restrictions can be overcome, the tariff has been favourable. All these commodities represent the fractional beginnings of what Canada has always hoped might develop into considerable lines of trade.

Later the article goes on to say:

Some of the most important products concerned, moreover, have been things like chemicals where Canada is establishing new domestic industries to which even a limited export market was of great importance. When therefore Canada is invited to give up all preference on its manufactured goods as against Europe, the reluctance stemmed chiefly not from attachment to the present ten per cent of exports but rather from the shattered dream of the exports that might have been.

Those are serious words used by serious men and yet no reference of any kind has been made to them today by the minister. It is quite true, when facing this situation that we must remember that Canada would have a special problem in any negotiations because of her status as a dollar country, but that does not mean the problem should be ignored; it merely means that it is a challenge to statesmanship.

If we lose vital contacts with the commonwealth we shall fall more and more into the orbit of the United States and increasingly lose our individuality; we are finding out what that means to an ever-increasing degree.

I have tried to make a case on the political side and in practical matters of trade. If the case is as strong as I have indicated, why are we not more forthcoming? I think there are two reasons, among others. I sometimes wonder if we are as forthcoming as Australia and New Zealand. I do not think we are. First, for example, I noted that the minister of external affairs in his book containing the Princeton lectures had occasion only once, in those lectures, to mention the commonwealth and even then rather apologetically. Is it because we are so dominated by the U.S.? Then there is, apparently, another reason which I mention particularly because I think it is so wrong, and that is the feeling that close association with the commonwealth will somehow lessen our position as an autonomous state. I think that is so wrong, and yet it presents the danger of driving a wedge between the two founding races in our country. Yet I believe that if we would consider it carefully we would find there is nothing in this point at all. I wish in this connection to quote briefly from three of the great voices of the past who have spoken on this subject—Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden.

Sir John Macdonald, speaking on February 20, 1890, in this house in a speech which concerned the rights of the French language, said:

> I appeal to all our friends in this house, without reference to party, to forget what may be an inconvenience when they go back to their constituents on both sides; to forget that for a moment, and to merge everything in the great desire to make Canada, French and English, one people without any hostile feeling, without any difference in feeling, further than that which arises from the different literatures and the different strains of mind that run always in different races and which sever the Scotsman and the Irishman from the Englishman as much as they sever the Frenchman from the Englishman. Let us forget this cry and we shall have our reward in seeing this unfortunate fire which has been kindled from so small a spark extinguished forever and we shall go on as we have been going on since 1867 as one people with one object, looking to one future and expecting to lay the foundations of one great country.

And now I wish to quote words from Sir Wilfrid Laurier which interested me particularly, partly because of the place in which they were uttered but also because of their intrinsic merit. When Sir Wilfrid was at the diamond jubilee in 1897 shortly after he became Prime Minister, he had occasion to visit Paris, and speaking in Paris he said this:

> In passing through this city, beautiful beyond all cities, I have noticed upon many public buildings the proud device that the armies of the republic carried through Europe—Liberty, Equality and Fraternity. Very well: all that there is of worth, of greatness, of generosity in that device we have today in Canada, that is our conquest. We have liberty absolute, complete; more complete—pardon my national pride for the affirmation I am making—more complete than in any country whatsoever in the world. Liberty for our religion, liberty for our language—liberty for all the institutions which our ancestors brought from France and which we regard as a sacred heritage. Equality is ours. What other proof of it could I give you than this? In this country, where the majority is of English descent and of the Protestant religion, the last general election have brought to power a man of French descent and Catholic religion, who has always strongly affirmed his race and religion. Fraternity is ours. There is with us no domination of one race over another. . . .
>
> If in becoming subjects of the British crown, we have been able to keep our ancient rights and even acquire new ones, upon the other hand we have undertaken obligations, which, descended as we are from a chivalrous race, we recognize in full and hold ourselves in honour bound to proclaim. . . . That double fidelity to ideas and aspirations quite distinct, is our glory—Canada. We are faithful to the great nation which gave us life, we are faithful to the great nation which has given us liberty.

I quote briefly from Sir Robert Borden, who was quoted by the Prime Minister himself the other day at the ceremony in connection with the unveiling of Sir Robert's statue. This is an extract from a speech given before the Canadian Bar Association in 1929:

> On the whole there has been an honourable and wholesome co-operation of the two races in the upbuilding of Canadian institutions and in the development of the heritage with which Providence has endowed the Canadian nation. The pioneer races are and they always will be distinctive but in their origins they are much nearer to each other than either seems to imagine. It is desirable to emphasize their points of sympathy and contact rather than their divergences of temperament and outlook.

I have quoted these words; I have reminded the house of the decisive part which the commonwealth played in two wars. I have indicated the enormous potential importance of commonwealth influence. I have pointed out its widespread ramifications and its influence everywhere in the world. I have reminded you that notwithstanding the autonomy of its component parts it has always been able to act together in crises. I have emphasized the need of unity of heart and purpose at home. I have quoted the great voices of the past.

I come back again to the urgent hope, the urgent demand that somehow or other this commonwealth will be able to play a greater part. I believe we have been soft pedalling. I feel it has not done what it should. I feel that the proximity of Washington and our constant contact with urgent problems which may arise there have perhaps served as an excuse but not as a reason for soft pedalling the work which the commonwealth can do and the services it can render. I believe that the services it can render are perhaps greater than ever before.

We have been well described as constituting a bridge between the east and the west, but in a sense we are also a bridge between the United States and the United Kingdom. That gives us a dual role, but it should not lead us to soft pedal the one because the claims of the other can so easily become insistent. Surely this all adds up to the conclusion that we should not be content with these tepid half-hearted words. I do hope that we shall have an indication that the real intention of the government is not expressed by these words and that we shall have action which will be much more reassuring than those faint and stumbling words which I have read.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is in accordance with our parliamentary traditions that one who has had the experience I have had in the last 63 days should at the first opportunity make a report to his colleagues in the House of Commons in a general way and through this house to the people at large of an experience which has been certainly for me of great value, and which I would like to think will prove to be of value to the country and to the assignment I was asked to undertake. Without having had an opportunity of preparing the headings under which I propose to speak I hope on this account I shall not be less effective in giving the house some of the information and some of the impressions which I gathered during my trip to South and Southeast Asia.

I was asked by the Prime Minister and my colleagues in the government to represent Canada at the consultative meetings on the ministerial level of the Colombo plan which were held, beginning on December 4, in Wellington, New Zealand and at the same time to take advantage of that long journey to visit some 13 countries in South and Southeast Asia with which Canada has not had as great contact in the past as have many other nations whose history and period of existence is longer than our own.

So on November 11 I journeyed first to the Philippines and from there to Indo-China to Viet Nam, Cambodia and Laos. I am the first Canadian minister of the crown to have had the privilege of going to Indo-China at any time, certainly since the setting up of the three international supervisory commissions which operate in those three countries in that historic part of Asia. From there I went to Indonesia and then to Thailand; from there to Australia and to New Zealand for the Colombo plan meeting. Then back to Sydney, that great city in Australia, and on to Canberra for consultation and talks with the prime minister and members of the government of Australia.

Afterward I journeyed to Singapore, to Malaya, to Ceylon, to India and Pakistan, and then back home.

In all of these places I had the opportunity of discussing matters with the head of every state where the head of the state is actually the chief of government. In those countries where the prime minister is the head of the government or, as in the case of Singapore and Malaya where the chief minister is the head of the government, I had the opportunity of conferring and talking with these latter persons on matters of mutual and world interest. Likewise in every country I had the opportunity of valuable talks with all the foreign ministers but one and with my opposite numbers in the field of health and welfare. I should like now to thank all of those governments for the opportunities which they provided me as a member of the government of Canada to discuss with them problems of common interest and of international concern.

It is I know difficult to draw conclusions from what one has seen and heard. It is possible sometimes to formulate too readily impressions which one has gathered particularly in a continent like Asia with its millions of people, more people than are to be found anywhere else in the world, more in the two countries of China and India than in all Europe and all the Americas together. The overriding impression I gained is that in the formulation of policy which has to do with the peace of the world, with the relations of one state with another, we ought in the assessment we make of other peoples' conduct and actions, of other governments' policies, to seek to understand the circumstances and the context in which those policies are formulated and projected. That certainly is true of Asia.

Canada has consistently sought to express to all nations its friendship and understanding. It has not received in return the kind of collaboration and appreciation that one would sometimes think it should receive from certain quarters. But as between Canada and India, for instance, there has been, during the past half decade at any rate, a close understanding and a disposition on our part to appreciate the significant and potential role and actual role which that country can play in Asia and in international affairs generally.

In spite of that, and although I in a modest way at the United Nations have from time to time been part of this desire to understand India, I must frankly say that I did say in India on several occasions that some of the attitudes taken in Asia did cause me personally at any rate on occasion to express some wonderment. In the light of this, with existing foreshadowings in terms of geography that confront that great nation and other Asian nations, I can well understand how important it is that each of us, officially and privately, try to understand the problems immediately confronting some of these countries and at the same time urge that there be reciprocal action on their part as to the reasons we in the west on occasion take the courses which, in our interests and in the interests of the world at large, from our point of view we regard as essential.

I neglected to mention that among the countries I visited was Burma, which borders on China, close to Indo-China and India. It is a country of 18 millions of people dedicated to the principles of a strong religious belief. It serves as a symbol in one sense, of the kind of forces that are at play in that great land mass we call Asia.

Wherever I went I sought first of all to affirm our friendship for these nations, and to indicate to them that the Canadian government, regardless of party, and the Canadian people, disposed as they are toward building a peaceful world, had for them nothing but a desire of friendship and collaboration to the extent of their capacity. I also told them that, as a member of the commonwealth, Canada felt that that instrument had in its very concept the opportunity of providing not only for the good of its constituents but for the welfare of all nations in the world, in Asia as well as elsewhere, who are prepared to understand its good intentions and purposes. I also sought to indicate that while there had been differences between Canada and others in the United Nations on recent actions on the part of one member of the commonwealth, because of that difference, while it reflected the objective character of Canada's approach to international affairs as certainly the government saw it, there could be no justification for any nation believing that Canada did not have absolute faith in the character of and the purposes which, generally speaking, Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom seeks to establish. I also sought to indicate that, because we were the closest neighbour of the United States with whom we did not always have full accord in matters having to do with problems affecting our two countries, we had, side by side, over 140 years, lived in peace; and that whatever may be the misgivings of certain countries about that nation it was my judgment, as one Canadian representing my government in Asia, that the basic foreign policy of the United States could only be interpreted as one directed toward the easing of international tension and the preservation of peace in the world.

I will not say that these interpretations were always acceptable but I thought that was the place to say these things, and I said them, I hope, in proper terms and in proper context; and I believe they were accepted as coming from a nation that has gradually built up for itself a reputation for an objective approach in international affairs.

Of course, in Australia and in New Zealand one felt that one was within, as it were, the family circle even though in respect to some matters of recent origin there have been honest differences of view. The position of Australia in this particular is well known. I had the opportunity of discussing these matters with Mr. Menzies, the Prime Minister of Australia, and his foreign minister and, indeed, on one memorable afternoon with all the members of his government. Mr. Menzies said of Canada that notwithstanding what may in particular instances be differences in point of view, one thing that the world could know of Canada was that it spoke as a member of the commonwealth in the light of what it understood to be its obligations based on no consideration but the good of the commonwealth and the good of all nations throughout the world.

In Ceylon, in India and in Pakistan, notwithstanding the fact that recent events have, understandably, caused a strain on certain relations I found that the situation there now —based upon my conversations with the three leaders, namely the Prime Minister of Ceylon, Mr. Bandaranaike, Mr. Nehru in India and Prime Minister Suhrawardy in Pakistan—is that there is on their part a recognition of the value of the commonwealth not only as a sensible grouping of nations in this interdependent world but as an instrument which can and is being used to interpret western opinion in many sectors of Asia. I believe that is an important fact to state and to remember. There may be dissident voices in some of these countries but my judgment would be that, for the most part, those who at the present time have to do with the conduct of government in those great countries recognize that in the consultations of prime ministers, in the consultations of commonwealth foreign ministers and in the collaboration that takes place in the United Nations, the commonwealth serves as a valuable instrument in a world that needs to move closer and closer together rather than diverge on an increasing scale.

I took occasion not only to discuss matters in accordance with the mandate given by my colleagues with those responsible for the conduct of government but to visit the people as well. I took occasion to go into their villages. Anyone who knows anything about the complex character of that great Asian state of India will understand what the village means to that country with its 360 millions of people, 80 per cent of whom live in the villages of which there are some half million which have the form, the character and the quality of centuries-old construction. I sought by going amongst the people to indicate, by manner and conduct, that it was the desire of the people of Canada that we should be friends with them, and as well with other nations in Asia, as indeed is the case with other countries in the world who are willing to accept our friendship.

There are some on this continent, and I suspect the same is true in other parts of the world, who possibly misunderstand on occasion a country like India; who sometimes feel that possibly India is disposed, because of its policy of neutralism, to give greater support to those who do not agree with the basic concepts of the free nations of the world. I should like to say this at once. There is a great undercurrent of spiritual conviction in India, as there is in the case of most of the countries I visited. The religion of Buddha, the Hindu religion, the Moslem religion, the Christian religion, together with the natural instinct so many Asians have for a philosophical bent, in my opinion all these things make these countries an impregnable fortress against the possible encroachment of totalitarian ideals or programs.

Based on these facts and the talks I had in India with many members of the government, with one of them on five occasions and with another on four, I cannot believe that we are justified in suggesting that India would ever embrace dialectal materialism as it is projected to us frequently from the Kremlin or from any other source. This is an important consideration in the kind of world in which we live, where some time there may have to be a decision as to which form of society will prevail ultimately. I am satisfied that while there may not always be political affinity there will be what is even more important, a sort of spiritual affinity between these nations of Asia and the basic concepts of western civilization.

In addition there is another reason for the conclusions I reached. India, Ceylon and Pakistan are deeply dedicated to the democratic form of government and to the parliamentary process. There is no disposition there to accept as efficient or as possible a totalitarian form of government, suppressing, as ultimately that form does, the kind of freedom out of which political maturity can only grow. Of course, that exists in Australia and New Zealand, as it does here. I spend little time on this because it is taken for granted, although in some places on this continent it is not taken for granted that the kind of fundamentals which I have postulated are accepted generally in Asia. I can only say that my belief, and it is a strongly entrenched belief now, is that these principles are widely accepted in India, in Pakistan and in Ceylon.

The Colombo plan came into being in 1951 in Ceylon, in the capital of the country which was the first nation of the commonwealth in that part of Asia which I visited. I think I can say, whether or not we all agree on the extent of the contributions made, that having in mind that the old world extracted from the great Asian land mass much of the wealth of that continent in another day oftentimes for its own benefit, nothing is more salutary in our time, I believe, than the fact that now the western nations of the British commonwealth, in association with nations in Asia, have joined together for the purpose of promoting the improvement of the economic and social life of the people of Asia. It is a hopeful sign for the improvement of international relations between certain nations of the west and that section of the world that it should be possible for nations like Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain and the United States to share some of their skills and some of their resources according to their capacity with nations whose material standards of life admittedly are not as high as their own. I am firmly of the view that to the extent we follow this course we will be making an important contribution to the peace of the world.

I realize that one must be practical and realistic about the extent to which any nation can go. But, Mr. Speaker, I could not refrain from saying these things to this house, when I think of the hospitals I have visited, the maternity centres I have visited, the eye centres I have seen, the need for medical schools and hospitals and the like. I cannot help but feel that we, through the Colombo plan, are really making a useful contribution in the kind of assistance which we are able to give. I saw a doctor in Chittagong, in east Pakistan, only 10 days ago who had received his degree as an ophthalmologist at the University of Montreal under the Colombo plan. He was the only eye specialist in that part of the country. I saw before him some 300 cases of glaucoma that might have gone without treatment if it had not been for the fact that he had received training under the Colombo plan and in this particular case through Canada.

But one should not for a moment conclude that it is possible through a plan of this sort to take care entirely of the problem of reconstruction in a continent like Asia. The assistance given by the United States, and it is considerable, and by the other participating countries in the Colombo plan, and that assistance too is considerable, is marginal only. If there is going to be a satisfactory measure of reconstruction on the economic and social side in Asia, it will be largely due to the efforts that are now being put forward by the people of Asia themselves. This I clearly indicated to them when I said, on behalf of Canada generally, that our assistance as a Colombo plan power was made without any strings attached. It was not made for the purpose of effecting political alliances or of having them move from positions of neutrality to positions of protagonistic support. I said, what is the case, that our assistance—and I indicated we were not all agreed in Canada on what the measure of assistance should be—was based upon a sincere appreciation that in this interdependent world our humanitarian obligations demanded of us to render some assistance to those nations and to these people.

While that is the case, I could not help but feel, particularly at the Colombo plan meetings, as I now visualize the political personalities who sat around the conference table, ministers representing every government of the Colombo plan group, that while we might have our differences in economic and social terms, every minister there represented governments that share with us common beliefs in the value of individual freedom, and share with us our view of the importance of the individual human being in his or her relationship to the state, and the belief that, inadequate as it sometimes may be, there is no more effective guarantee for the preservation of human freedom than governments composed of men and women chosen by the people to govern the nation; in other words, a common belief in the parliamentary form of government. And with those common denominators, together with the spiritual foundations, which I have already mentioned, I have no doubt, whether or not we belong to the same military alliances, or the same political grouping, that the vast majority of the nations of Asia with whom I had these contacts can be counted on in the long term to give their expression in support of a society based upon freedom and not on its suppression.

While there was concern in some places about actions taken in Egypt, there were strong denunciations about the aggression of the Soviet union in Hungary. I spoke on one occasion to the Indian council on world affairs. I do not know whether there were reports here of this meeting, but some critical comment was made by one or two individuals who interpolated questions at the meeting. I said in my remarks that there was a vast difference between the attitude of Great Britain and of France toward their obligations under the charter of the United Nations and the reaction of the Soviet union not to one but to 10 resolutions passed in the assembly against the aggression it perpetrated in Hungary. The difference in the two cases was that in the one there was an acceptance on the part of the charged parties, if you like, of the resolution taken by the United Nations and in the other a complete flouting of the resolutions passed by the United Nations. And that I regard as a matter of the greatest significance.

It would be wrong for me to overlook in this account the important work of the international supervisory commissions in Indo-China. Whenever I use the phrase "Indo-China" now I remember the correction made by a distinguished Australian who told me that I should no longer speak of Indo-China but rather of three countries in Indo-China. Indo-China is no longer a fact although at one time it did represent a geographical entity. Now there is no Indo-China but North and South Viet Nam, a nation in its undivided quality representing 20 millions of people; Cambodia, representing 3 million people; and Laos, a small nation representing 1½ million people. In each of these there is now a rivalry of varying dimensions for supremacy between competing interests.

The house will recall that the international supervisory commissions came into being not as a result of the action of the United Nations but of the accord arrived at in Geneva in 1954 by the great powers. Canada is represented on the three international supervisory commissions that exist in these countries. The chairman is a national of India and the third member is from Poland. If one wanted an example of the effectiveness of a United Nations paramilitary force in action to meet a specific ad hoc purpose one finds it in the three international supervisory commissions. Those three commissions have kept the peace in an area of the world that threatened us all, the house will recall, some two and one-half years ago. When those commissions will be able to finish their work I cannot say. Many Canadians are serving on these three commissions. I would like to pay a tribute, on the occasion of my return to the house, to the work of our fellow citizens who during the past two years, under the most trying of circumstances, have upheld the dignity and the honour of this nation.

It is difficult, I know, to translate one's feelings about a matter such as this, and I am not doing it to the extent that I possibly could if I were less fatigued and better prepared; but I would like the house to appreciate for one moment the significance of an international supervisory body that has its scene of operations away up in the mountains of Laos, in a primitive part of the country, where the march of civilization seemingly has made but little impress, and where the troops of the royal government occupy strategic hills in their several thousands, and not far away are the forces of the Pathet Lao group, forces that have received assistance from the so-called Chinese People's Republic and from the Soviet union, both holding fixed positions, positions that represent the situation on the date of cease-fire but who, thanks to the stabilizing influence of the international supervisory commission, are not at war but at peace with one another.

We shall hear more of these three countries in the course of the ensuing period. They may not be the most powerful countries in the world but they do occupy geographic areas of strategic interest, not only geographically but in terms of the acceptance or the rejection of political forces that are basic, Mr. Speaker, in the troubled world which confronts all of us. No one man represents Asia. When he was in Washington Mr. Nehru is reported to have said that he did not seek to be the single spokesman for Asia. I can well understand now what he meant and why he made that statement; but he hoped to provide a bridge between one important section of the western world and Asia. I believe that Mr. Nehru is the bridge between that section of the world and those sections of the west who respect his judgment and who understand the basic purposes of his policies. It would be easy and popular to join in decrying some of his actions but I shall not do that because I believe more strongly than ever before that in the interests of world peace if we are going to have a proper acceptance on the part of Asia of our good intentions we for our part must recognize the dominating motives of the present great prime minister of India.

For us he has great respect and in our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the President of the United States he has great confidence, as he has in other political leaders in other parts of the world, and the existence of this confidence is a most important matter.

I saw Mr. Nehru for a few moments immediately upon his return from the United States and Canada; I saw him the next morning and later again that day. I found in him the same disposition to understand other points of view in a spirit of tolerance that I personally had experienced at the United Nations in my relations with spokesmen of India. It is not always possible to agree but it is essential, if constructive efforts are to be made, that there should exist a capacity to appreciate the reasons for certain attitudes and approaches. It is in this way that differences are composed and agreements are achieved.

I do not believe one can attach too great importance to the acceptance by political leaders of the good intentions of others and their appreciation of the factors involved in differing attitudes. Given conditions of this kind and an absence of vituperation in the conduct of one nation with another, I think it is possible to work out solutions that will result in a satisfactory disposition of the problems that divide mankind at this time.

I was not the only one travelling in Asia at this time. There were more important political personalities than myself, holding higher offices and representing greater power numerically and perhaps influentially. I could not hope to emulate some of the receptions accorded them or the influence which for the time being they may have sought to exercise. I spoke in one village to about 10,000 people one day where others only a week before spoke to several hundreds of thousands. We did not speak of the same things and I am sure that behind the things that were said there were different motivations and intentions.

I spoke of international friendship, of the importance of social and economic reconstruction and of improvements in health and living standards, of our belief in the value of the United Nations as an instrument for the discussion, and we trust ultimately the resolving, of some major world problems that divide us at this time. Behind my simple observations was based the pattern that comes from a belief in spiritual values, that comes from a belief in individual freedom as opposed to totalitarian power through which millions of people are caused to accept the dictates of a small group which constitutes itself as the government of the day. No one can tell whether my peregrinations will have the kind of effect which I in moments of deep sincerity would like to think possible. But I would say this, that as one man in the face of the situation attending that tremendously interesting and complicated continent, I did my best to put forward not only the point of view of the government of Canada and of all shades of political opinion but as well the point of view of all the people of Canada. In my discussions with members of governments, of course, I could only speak for the government of Canada. I would like to think I did put forward in those private talks, the results of which I hope will in the not too distant future become apparent, the point of view which we on this side believe to be the most desirable position to take.

I come back from this experience, Mr. Speaker, not as an expert but more humble than ever in the face of the great problems that stagger mankind in Asia today as they do elsewhere. I return confident in the belief that if we observe the principles embodied in the charter of the United Nations, if we employ the media of adjudication and conciliation instead of force, if we bear in mind at the same time that every country has its own problems and its own way of dealing with them, then assuming the necessary conditions of good faith, we shall, as mankind has in the past, surmount the tremendous issues that confront us all.

Having said all these things I would not want to indicate to the people of Asia, whose guest I was, who extended me their friendship and their collaboration, whose members of government listened understandingly to what I had to say on behalf of my colleagues, that I now make invidious comparisons between my country and the lot of the people of Asia. That is not my purpose when I say that having had the experience of visiting lands where long before this country came into being there was deep theological and philosophic thought, having in mind the fact that the industrial revolution has not touched them as it has reached us and as a consequence has not given them the same material benefits it has given us, I will not be misunderstood when I say to this house that I return to my seat, I come back to Canada convinced more than ever before of the richness of our heritage.

I can only express the hope that all of us will in the face of our good fortune seek to give expression to Him who in the final analysis is responsible for many advantages that have not yet been opened to peoples in other areas, and that this will stir us on to recognize that we are all our brothers' keepers in this interdependent world. Unless this attitude and the policy of the good neighbour prevails, we cannot look forward to the fulfilment of what we want to see realized in our times and for our children, those things without which we cannot preserve responsible measures of security and freedom in a world at peace.

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to express the hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will reserve some of his energies in order to make a 50-minute address in this chamber to convince his colleagues of the desirability of introducing a comprehensive national health insurance plan.

I welcome the opportunity of participating again in this debate on the speech from the throne, and it will not be surprising to many members to learn that the subject of my speech is the problems which it is my duty and responsibility to present before this house. The problems that confront those in my constituency are not too different from those confronting all agricultural constituencies in western Canada and, in some measure, throughout all Canada. There is, it will be appreciated, a limitation of time on this debate, and I will therefore not be able to deal with all the problems which are confronting agriculture in Canada. I shall therefore limit my remarks specifically to matters affecting western Canada and those whom I represent in the Kindersley constituency.

Members representing other areas of Canada, if they have farmers within their constituencies, will have an appreciation of the problems confronting all these people and will, I feel, give consideration to what I have to say so they may better appreciate the peculiar circumstances which have existed in western Canada for the past five years. These are growing problems which, to my mind, are much greater than those which affect any other parts of Canada because after all, Mr. Speaker, agriculture is the backbone of our economy and western Canada has for decades played an important part in that economy.

I think we could say that the treatment which the present Liberal government has given agriculture over the past number of years is very shabby indeed. I am not going to condemn everything the Liberal government has done; it is not to be expected that in the 21 years during which they have been in power they could have blundered all the time. Some of the legislation they have introduced must have reflected the desires of the farmers in Canada. The comments and criticisms I am going to make in connection with agricultural problems are constructively intended to present our views to the government for their consideration and action and, as is characteristic of members of the C.C.F. party, I am not going to confine myself to criticism but am going to suggest solutions and policies that this government should adopt immediately.

It has been conceded generally that farmers all across Canada are being caught in the ever-tightening vise of cost-price squeeze. The cost of everything that we as farmers have to buy is going up and up while the price we receive for our products is continually declining. Today a western farmer is required to pay $7,000 for a self-propelled combine needed to harvest his crop. Seven thousand dollars is the price of a pretty good quarter-section of land in many areas, and members will appreciate what that means, when one piece of farm machinery equals the price of a quarter-section of land. The cost of repairs and fuel has also increased and, in addition, farmers are confronted with the problem of getting adequate labour to help in the operation of their farms. They have found that because of the continuously hazardous nature of agricultural production it is impossible to guarantee year-round employment to hired help. As a result they have to pay very high wages indeed in order to induce men to work on the farm. They have to ask for high wages because they, too, require security. This problem is becoming a very serious one indeed, Mr. Speaker, and it is felt in many areas that measures will have to be taken to assist farmers in securing full-time or part-time hired help. To this end I have introduced the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to provide coverage for agricultural workers.

It is my opinion that this will provide one solution, and I hope that when the matter is debated in the House of Commons favourable consideration will be given to that subject.

Along with these increasing costs which I have mentioned is the item of freight rates, which are increasing by leaps and bounds every year. Let us look on the price side. Members will find that the prices farmers are receiving are declining year by year. In 1950 farmers received $1.85 a bushel for their wheat. Today it is $1.40, both prices being at the head of the lakes with the farmers paying the freight on their wheat. The price of beef, eggs and poultry has declined this year. Last fall you could buy a calf at the Edmonton stockyards for $25. The Economic Annalist in the October issue, using the years 1935/39 as equalling 100 as a basis, points out that the cost of commodities and services to the farmer this year stood at a record high of 254.3, an increase of 24.3 points in the last five years. The price received for field crops stood at 171.1, a decrease of 29.3 in the last five years. In other words, in 1951 the cost price was separated by 29.6 points and in 1956 it was separated by the colossal amount of 83.2 points.

The cost of production of bountiful crops has naturally increased, and this has been reflected in the economic position of the farmers. In the Kindersley vocational farm management survey it is pointed out that out of 83 farms, only 65 per cent of all farms in this sample were able to realize the total cost of production on the basis of a yield of 24 bushels an acre, and not on the basis of the amount of wheat they were able to sell. This report goes on to indicate that the average cost of production for the 83 farms stands at $17.49 per crop acre basis, allowing no wage for the operator; with an operator's wage it stands at $24.61 per acre. It is apparent that the farmers in western Canada are indeed suffering because of the glut of wheat which has developed in Canada.

Judging from many of the reports we see in the newspapers and announcements by government leaders we are tempted to rush out to the granary to see if we have any wheat left, because those reports indicate it is being sold so rapidly that we are not going to have any left with which to fill our quota. But when you do go out to the granary you find the bottom six inches or one foot rotted, because after all the wheat has been there since 1952 or 1953.

The true picture is presented in the November issue of the Wheat Review, and I quote:

Total supplies of Canadian wheat for 1956-57 are estimated at 1,075 million bushels, consisting of the July 31, 1956 carryover of 537 million and the new crop of 538 million. A supply of the size indicated is the largest on record, 8 per cent above that of last year and exceeding the previous record of 998 million set in 1953-54.

That is the true picture. It is interesting to note that of the four major exporting countries, Canada is the only one with an increase in supply. There has been some indication that the delivery position is improving. At this time last year we had delivered only 83.6 million bushels during the period August 1 to December 19, while this year we have delivered 122.5 million bushels. Those deliveries must be compared with the ten-year average of 201.2 million bushels. It is quite apparent that our stocks are increasing because our sales are not increasing in proportion to the amount being grown.

It is apparent that the long-term solution of this problem must be along the lines of a more aggressive sales policy. Some might scoff at that and ask where we are going to sell more wheat, but I have here an indication where we can do so. I have here an extract from a paper prepared by the foreign agricultural service for the wheat commodity section of the 34th annual national agricultural outlook conference held in Washington, which indicates that the possibilities for the export of wheat will be much more favourable during the coming year. It states:

Exports July-October 1956-57 amounted to 160.4 million bushels, virtually twice as great as the 81.5 million bushels shipped in the same period a year earlier.

Exports for dollars are expected to be greater, especially to the northern European countries where poor harvesting weather together with the severe damage suffered in early 1956 have materially decreased domestic crops. Also, this situation will curtail wheat exports from France and some of those markets will be supplied by the United States.

There is an indication of an ever-expanding world market, and Canada must take its share of that market. As it presently stands, the impact of this increasing world market has been in the form of even lower quotas on the average to western Canada. When the government changed their policy last year and decided that no effort would be made to equalize the quotas, complete chaos reigned. We found some points that ended the crop year with a 4-bushel quota; some with 5 and some with 7. That certainly seemed inherently unfair and was protested by the Saskatchewan wheat pool and the Saskatchewan farmers' union. It was protested in the House of Commons by members of the C.C.F. group, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce assured us that those points which had a low quota would be given priority at the start of the new crop year to equalize their opportunity. That promise has never been filled.

We find that as of January 4 there are still three marketing points in western Canada on a unit quota; 478 are on a 1-bushel quota; 962 are on 2-bushels, 469 on 3-bushels and 140 on 4. Over two-thirds of the marketing points are on a 2-bushel quota or less, and I suspect that many of those points that are on quotas up to 4 bushels have not had an opportunity to deliver their grain.

There should be a much greater attempt to equalize these quotas in order to give each farmer an opportunity to share in the return from the sale of his grain. While consideration is being given to this problem, consideration should also be given to the problem of the allocation of box cars to marketing points on a more equitable basis. There is something else which has been requested consistently by farm organizations, and that is the allocation of box cars to the elevator of the farmer's choice.

The government does not seem to be concerned with these vexing problems, and there has been no spurt of activity to deal with them. Indeed the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) has indicated that he is not even going to bother appointing a transport controller. On January 9 I asked the Minister of Transport, as reported on page 24 of Hansard, the following:

> In view of the termination of the duties of the former transport controller at the conclusion of navigation last December 17, can the minister make an announcement that an appointment has been made to fill this important post.

The minister replied:

> Regardless of the impression of the hon. member, the resignations of the transport controller and of the deputy transport controller were received only in the last week of December.

Later on I asked this question:

> Am I to assume that there will be an appointment made at a very early date.

To this the minister replied as follows:

> I think I should say this, that the transport controller carried out his duties with outstanding success in the face of very substantial criticism from the hon. gentleman opposite. In the first place, I think it is going to be exceedingly difficult for the government to find a transport controller of the caliber of Mr. Milner. In the second place, I think in view of the criticism expressed by my hon. friend it will be very difficult for us to find someone who will be willing to accept the duties.

I would be the last one to deny that I have attempted to reflect the views of western farm organizations in a critical manner in relation to the way in which the transport controller has carried out his duties. It is significant that in the recommendations of the interprovincial farm union council is included a recommendation that a full-time transport controller be appointed with sufficient power to exercise the responsibility of making available sufficient numbers of box cars for the movement of grain. The Saskatchewan wheat pool has been on record consistently as objecting to the manner in which the former controller dealt with this problem. At one time the Minister of Transport indicated that he was not going to allow this position to remain vacant. Discussing the Department of Transport Act on April 25, 1956, as reported on page 3271 of Hansard, the minister said:

> I do not believe that an operation so complex as the movement of grain from the western provinces to the Pacific coast or to the lakehead and thence to Atlantic ports is something that can be left without direction.

Yet we have the situation that this same minister has left this important post unfilled for nearly one full month. During that month we had a tie-up of the Canadian Pacific Railway which further complicated the movement of grain in bulk. The minister might say that he received the resignation from Mr. Milner only at a very recent date, but I would point out that, as found at page 314 of the proceedings of the committee on agriculture of July 6, 1956, Mr. Milner states this:

> As I shall not be transport controller after the close of navigation this year, this occasion gives me the only opportunity . . .

And so on. It is just another indication, Mr. Speaker, of the irresponsibility of the present Liberal government in dealing with these grave domestic crises.

The government's solution to this problem has been to institute this despised system of bank loans, namely a system requiring the farmers to pay 5 per cent interest on what is in effect their own wages. The impracticability of that system has certainly been proven by the number of farmers who have been able to take advantage of the scheme. The farm organizations have requested the immediate adoption of a cash advance proposal on a permanent basis. This would give an opportunity to equalize the returns of farmers on unequal quotas. A farmer on a unit quota would then have the opportunity, which is justifiably his, of getting some return on his grain rather than being obliged to wait several months until the quota has been increased. The Gordon commission indicates that it is necessary to adopt this principle in part.

That would seem to be one point on which I could find myself in agreement with the Gordon commission. Yes, we must have a permanent system of cash advances in order to allow the farmers to have the income with which to meet their debts.

I would call on the government right now to make an immediate interim payment on last year's pool. This would be more valuable than any other single factor which the government could deal with at the present time. I estimate that there would be funds available for an interim payment of between 10 and 12 cents to be made in the very near future. I would warn the government that the financial position of the farmer is such that he is not in a position to wait for them to hand it out as a pre-election bribe in the form of a fatter annual final payment. The farmers who find they have huge piles of wheat out on the ground are not going to be fooled in that way.

I point out that the final solution to this problem, of course, is an increased trade policy to deal with the ever-expanding markets of the future. In the meantime the government should certainly give the farmers some assistance and some guidance in the selection of crops. I have seen many farmers who were in a complete quandary, not knowing what to grow for the future. Some farmers in my constituency tried growing Argentine rape, only to have it frozen. Others have tried flax on land unsuited for flax. Others have tried and are trying field peas in an attempt to diversify, in order to dodge the blows which the federal government seems determined to level at agriculture. Instead of using the agricultural conference which is held each fall as a means of giving a guide to our farmers, they just have it as a casual little meeting where a great many pious statements are made, but when you boil them all down there is no guide for the farmer. The farmer is not told to grow more Durum, more flax, more wheat or more barley. He is left entirely to his own devices.

I have pointed out many of the factors with regard to which this government has fallen down in dealing with agricultural problems in Canada, but the biggest problem of all is the complete absence of an agricultural policy. Oh, you might say that we have an Agricultural Prices Support Act, which in reality is nothing but a patchwork of support prices and guarantees, each below the market price. There is no program for agricultural credit. There is no program to guarantee the farmers a fair return for their produce. I should like to see this government adopt a comprehensive agricultural policy which would incorporate these features and give agriculture all across Canada a fair share of the national income, that is to say, give to the farmers of Canada a parity with other occupations.

I think it is only right that we should have that policy, because the farmers are certainly one class who are deserving of it. I should like to see this agricultural policy include price supports and price levels which would guarantee a reasonable standard of living to the family farm. It is a workable proposal which may, as the Saskatchewan wheat pool indicates, involve deficiency payments to producers. I think the adoption of an agricultural policy would do more than any other thing to resolve the dilemma which confronts us at the present time. The Edmonton Journal in a news story on Friday, November 16, 1956, had this to say under the heading "Liberals Say Farmers Unhappy at Policies":

> The closing sessions of the Alberta Liberal association's annual convention Wednesday, said farmers were uphappy with farm policies.
>
> Rulon Dahl of Raymond, Alta., said the average farmer in the west is not satisfied. "If we are to win the next election, we must smarten up the farm picture".

I think you will find many farmers in Canada who will agree with that speaker, and who feel that the Liberals must certainly smarten up the farm picture. But on the basis of their past record there is really no hope. It will take the C.C.F., through their role as an effective opposition or as the government, to provide fair treatment for what is still the basic industry of Canada, namely agriculture.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, allow me at this moment to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare on his extremely interesting description of his good-will mission around the world.

When the members of this house assembled on January 8 in the Senate chamber to hear the message from His Excellency, the representative of the Queen, I am sure we all had the feeling that the present session would be of the greatest importance. I for one have been much more impressed with this idea after hearing the speech from the throne, which reflects the powerful impetus our country is experiencing under the enlightened guidance of the present government. May Providence continue to inspire those who share in the heavy task of governing the country, and shower countless gifts upon our population.

Even if this does not mean that all is for the best in the best of worlds we may, however, consider ourselves a most privileged nation, which is now well on the way to becoming one of the most essential wheels in the gearbox of world affairs. Both on the international and the national levels Canada has shown in recent events its capacity to stand at the outposts of foreign affairs for the preservation of peace and the advancement of the human race. Only a few weeks ago our government, through our most able and distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson)and other members of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations, was the keystone in solving many of the Middle Eastern problems including the Suez canal crisis.

Moreover, a point has been reached now where no major decision on western policies can be taken without Canada being consulted. Our influence in international affairs is constantly growing, both because of the policy of our government on external affairs and the sound and comprehensive interpretation of our national problems. The well-established policies of the government on international affairs are agreed upon and supported by all including, I am sure, hon. members of the opposition. I shall, then, refrain from taking any more of the time of the house on this matter. I would feel guilty, however, if I did not mention our hope to see our country continue to be the guiding light and an effective worker in the task of healing many of the sore spots still threatening world peace.

May I at this point also congratulate the government for the efficiency and spontaneity with which they offered help to the Hungarian people who were forced by the communist persecutors to flee from their homeland. These martyrs to the cause of human freedom are most welcome to Canada because our nation wants to be in the forefront of those nations giving aid to these people who did not hesitate to sacrifice everything for the right to live as free citizens. They will be a great asset to our country in the future. Evidently new blood is needed to maintain the steady progress Canada has experienced during the last few years. With the enlightening advice contained in some of the conclusions drawn by the royal commission on economic prospects, there is no doubt but that the government will be in a position to use this increased manpower to the best economic advantage for the good of the country. It has shown already that it can give a stable and vigorous economy.

Incidentally, may I say that so stable and vigorous is the Canadian economy at present that it has hardly been disturbed by the recent railway strike, for the settlement of which the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet deserve to be highly commended. Some disturbances have occurred, as was to be expected, but they were of minor importance compared to what would have happened in a country with a staggering economy. However, that industrial dispute was a very serious one and had many ill effects on many sectors of the country. I noticed, for instance, that many remote areas were suddenly cut away from the economic life of the country, and this affected the daily life of the people as well as their daily productivity, small though it may have been. I see in this fact additional proof of the need for the decentralization of our manufacturing industries, both primary and secondary.

In the speech from the throne the government has indicated its intention to recommend the establishment of a committee to consider what should be done to make better use of the land for agriculture, and thus to contribute more effectively to the improvement of agricultural production and the incomes of those engaged in it.

(Translation):

In seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne, my hon. friend the member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) mentioned all the benefits that our farming class and our people in general can expect from that measure which, he said, is very promising indeed for the future. I agree with him completely and I take this opportunity to congratulate him on the excellent speech he made in this house in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Text):

By the same token, may I also extend my hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) on the very keen and interesting views he put forward in proposing the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The principles underlying the setting up of the proposed committee to study the means of making better use of land for agriculture are of the same vintage as those calling for a similar measure to study the possibilities of drawing a master plan to decentralize industry in this country. It will be recalled that last year during the budget debate I made such a suggestion. Those who have had the opportunity of perusing the preliminary report of the royal commission on economic prospects, tabled in this house last week, must realize that many findings of the commission call for such decentralization and for the better use of areas outside large centres which are suitable for manufacturing industry. One could be convinced that such a move would benefit agriculture as well as the manufacturing industry.

For instance, paragraph 17, chapter 2, of the Gordon preliminary report states that Canada is becoming an increasingly urban country and that this trend will continue. It is predicted that over the period running from 1951 to 1980 the proportion of the population living in metropolitan and urban areas of more than 100,000 people may represent from 36 to 56 per cent of the entire Canadian population. Is this expectation to become a reality, or should not something be done to alleviate the trend? Everyone knows that overpopulated metropolitan and urban areas are amongst the worst enemies of a sound and growing economy. I demonstrated that point last year, and I shall not take the time of this house to repeat what I said then. I will point out again, however, that in my own constituency of Glengarry-Prescott there are scores of communities suitable for industrial purposes, either for the establishment of new industries or the re-establishment of previously existing industries. The same situation, I am sure, prevails in dozens of other constituencies.

In Glengarry-Prescott we have all the facilities. I know that other areas cannot secure manufacturing industries because of lack of hydro-electric power. With the advent of dieselization and the coming use of atomic energy for industrial purposes I do not think this will constitute a problem any longer. In any case this is one of the points into which the committee or royal commission I suggested last year would have to investigate. Had such a body been formed last year it could have laid down the main foundation of its work after the publication of the report of the Gordon commission. Now that the preliminary report is out, I think it is more than ever the time for the government to give all its attention to such a measure if we are to draw up a policy capable of influencing the economic life of Canada in the course of the next 25 years.

To further help the economy of the manufacturing industries; to ease the housing situation in the big cities; to provide for better and more logical distribution of industrial products, decentralization would give more impetus to the agricultural areas benefiting from it. The increase of population it would bring in those semi-urban regions normally would increase the local consumption of agricultural products grown nearby, thereby reducing the cost of transportation and consequently lowering the cost of living.

Another effect of decentralization would be to get more agricultural manpower on the farm. The Gordon preliminary report also points out that in agriculture output is expected to decline in round figures from 13 per cent to 6 per cent of the total output. Here again I think efforts should be made to alleviate such a trend. In my humble opinion the boosting of regional economy and the keeping of agricultural manpower on the farms would be two very important steps in the right direction.

Since the preliminary report of the royal commission on economic prospects has been tabled, economics have been paramount in most parliamentary and political circles. It is surely a subject of prime importance, and I think in a democratic and peace-loving country like ours a sound economy is possible only if all classes of society are assured of a decent living and of freedom from want. That is why the government initiated a program of social security some years ago.

Some of my colleagues who have preceded me in this debate have voiced their views on the subject. I should like very briefly to emphasize the importance it has for the people of Canada. When speaking of social security one thinks almost immediately of old age pensions. The number of people for whom this measure means the difference between a very frugal living and dire poverty is unbelievable, and statistics do not always reflect that. What these old people receive now under the Old Age Pensions Act, however, is merely sufficient to subsist on. When it was increased to $40 a month the old age pension came as a benediction from heaven for those who had nothing to live on, and even then it could not buy for them all they needed; but nowadays it is felt that this amount is utterly insufficient.

We all know that the cost of living has skyrocketed during the last few years. It has also skyrocketed for old people, especially for those who have no other source of income but this pension. That is why I would suggest the increase be possibly $25 a month, bringing the pension to $65 a month for all old age pensioners, with a means test for those who are between 65 and 70 years of age. Also, if we are to help the Canadian people to keep pace with the constantly rising cost of living, I feel that family allowances should be increased accordingly, let us say to possibly $5 to $7 on the basic allowance, with an equivalent increase for other classes.

In that regard I am also very sorry to deplore the fact that it has been impossible up to now to implement the health insurance plan that the Canadian government proposed last year. It is to be hoped that some of the provinces will not continue to minimize the importance of such a scheme of social security to our country.

In the speech from the throne the government has shown once again its appreciation of the interrelation between the various activities which are to make Canada a great country in the future. It is very gratifying indeed to know that hon. members will be asked to approve the establishment of the Canada Council for arts, humanities and social sciences. Although those three fields are not directly connected with the administration of the country, they must be considered as the inspiration of the leaders and as vital factors in the superiority of a nation.

This new council will be called upon to grant many scholarships and bursaries, especially to young Canadians. I would like, then, to suggest that it could be attached, for administrative purposes, to a new department of youth which I have advocated many times in this house. Under the same new youth department could come the administration of the increased annual grants to universities, to be distributed by the national conference of Canadian universities, for the purpose of helping our institutions of higher learning to prepare the future leaders of our country.

On that measure, which has been so widely approved throughout Canada, I will mention my belief that the national conference of Canadian universities, having undertaken to act as a distributing agent of those grants, should immediately start an inquiry to determine the various needs of each university, aside from construction projects. As it is now, the plan calls for the distribution of the grants on a per capita basis of the student population. These per capita grants undoubtedly will constitute a great factor in the development of our universities, but it is also evident that some universities are not in quite the same position as others, either because of local conditions or because of their growing influence, which calls for a more extensive and faster development.

I am not suggesting that grants should be given on a discriminatory basis, but simply that a study should be made with a view to extending on a rational basis, some additional help to institutions that are capable of absolutely proving their need of money for new equipment or additional personnel, for instance.

The speech from the throne also mentioned that a measure will be placed before the house for the purpose of renewing, on a revised and increased basis, the federal program of amounts to provincial governments in aid of technical and vocational training. This is another item which could be administered by a new youth department. Everybody knows how useful technical and vocational training has been in Canada since the inception of the Roger plan. Incidentally, is it not a little strange that the skin of certain provincial governments is not so tender when it comes time to accepting federal grants in this particular field of education? Is it that they consider technical and vocational training so much less important than university training, or is it an effort to continue an established tradition, hoping that people of particular provinces will not notice the inconsistency of their attitude? Whatever the reason is, this plan is accepted even by the most discriminatory province and I heartily support it, because it is aimed at bettering the conditions of life of the working classes who are the active nucleus of our free enterprise system.

There are many other points in the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, that are of high interest to all Canadian people. I only wanted to emphasize a few points which I consider of prime importance to the country at large and to my constitutents in particular. Briefly, I think the present session has started out under very good auspices. Canada is near the top with respect to influence in international affairs. The economic outlook of the country is better than ever, both in view of our growing activities and a stable economy, and we can say that there is nothing to fear in the future as long as our administrators will make it their duty to pave the way for our future leaders. Nevertheless, those bright prospects, most of which have been emphasized in the Gordon preliminary report, will not materialize unless we start immediately to implement some measures to make sure that the great majority of Canadian citizens will benefit from those gifts of nature.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the few remarks I wanted to submit very humbly to the house.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in hearing some of the observations made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, by reason of the fact that he may have an opportunity to vote for the increase in the old age pension and possibly the increase in the family allowance which he has indicated he thinks is necessary. So far as his observations concerning a national health plan are concerned, I would point out that it is most unfortunate that this government has such little confidence in the scheme itself that it has not proposed to make it possible for those provinces which have indicated they wish to share in it to have at least the opportunity of discovering whether or not the plan will work.

It is so often the case that "the best-laid schemes o' mice an' men gang aft agley". It was my intention to speak of some of the questions that my own people regard as vital in their particular orbit. I am thinking of specific problems in connection with dredging and fishing; old age pensioners' problems; customs and revenue problems, and certain others about which people in my constituency approach me from time to time. However, in today's Globe and Mail I found an article which gives me a great deal of concern. It is probable that it would be viewed with considerable alarm by the people in British Columbia if there were any truth to the matter, and I have every reason to believe that the article is quite accurate. The article appears in the column headed "B.C. Letter" and is found on the financial page of the Globe and Mail of Monday, January 14, 1957. The article is entitled "Forest Industry Woes Affect Whole Economy" and was written from Vancouver by Nigel Dunn. The first paragraph reads:

British Columbia's vital forest industry is in trouble. It is suffering from the effects of an increasingly sticky market; and it can expect to suffer more from the demands of labour.

A good many people of course are all too frequently inclined to blame labour for most of our ills, but history has proven that in my province labour and management have made a habit of resolving their difficulties to the mutual satisfaction of both, and I am sure this will be the case in this instance as well. However, further down in the report we find this notation:

British Columbia's forest industry is a $500 million a year operation. It employs more than 50,000 men. . . . In addition to the many big companies whose capitalization is counted in tens of millions of dollars, there are more than 1,000 small logging companies whose existence depends completely on the prosperity of the major producers for which they work.

If by reason of the fact that we have lost our export markets, or if the forestry industry in British Columbia is curtailed in any other way, it will be more serious, as far as the people of my province are concerned, than the rail strike which we have just experienced. I venture to say it would not only be much more serious but would be viewed with considerably more alarm. The article goes on to say:

British Columbia is losing its lumber markets abroad as a result of the prosperity which it has helped to create. Its important British market is shrinking alarmingly because of skyrocketing ocean freight rates.

We find the responsibility rests completely with this government in the establishment of freight rates to and from ports of entry in British Columbia. This is a difficulty which only this government can resolve, and if our market is shrinking as this article indicates then I would say this government has the responsibility to look into this question immediately in order to see if something can be done concerning the high freight rates we are subjected to in ocean navigation. The article continues:

Its United States market—the biggest single buyer of British Columbia forest products—has been cut back because of United States credit restrictions on home construction.

I am fully aware that it is impossible for us as Canadians to determine what should be the credit restrictions in the United States. However, I am also aware that this government was advised a year or more ago by many hon. members in this house that we were becoming altogether too dependent on United States markets, and that this dependency would some day put us in a difficult economic condition if we should lose those markets. Apparently we are reaching that point today. The fact is that our government has put all its eggs into one basket in the export field.

As recently as last week the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) indicated to the chamber of commerce in Portland, Oregon, that the people of the United States would be expected to buy more goods from Canada so we could have a better balance of trade. The very fact that this government through its economic policy has made it impossible and impractical to keep the market we did have with Great Britain and other European countries has had the effect of denying to us as British Columbians and as Canadians the business we normally should have which would keep in operation our great forest industry.

The article says further:

Ocean freight rates are only part of the reason for the decline in the usual $60 million worth of lumber imported by Britain from British Columbia. . . . The 25 per cent decline in house building estimated to result in the United States this year is expected to decrease even more British Columbia's exports south of the border in 1957.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I can only re-emphasize what I drew to your attention earlier, and I trust through you to the government, that it is necessary for us to find markets other than in the United States to dispose of the products that we develop in Canada. Further along the article says:

> Domestic markets are not much more promising. Credit restrictions in Canada are expected to reduce home building by 20 per cent from the 1956 total of 125,000 and the effect of this will hit British Columbia directly and hard.

In substantiation of this very same statement, Mr. Speaker, I found in the Maclean Building Guide for November, 1956, an article in which Stewart Bates, president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, forecasts a 10-year wait for the next housing boom "unless housing costs could be reduced to bring in more homeowners in the lower income levels, or unless more older parts of cities could be made obsolete."

I would say the question of declaring more old homes obsolete and the request which was made by me last year that this government should see to it that more cheaper homes are built for those in lower income brackets are not only desirable from an economic point of view but also desirable because such action would give people better and more decent living accommodation. The article in the Globe and Mail continues:

> Spokesmen for the forest industry are facing their problems with a mixture of resignation and pessimism and aggressive optimism.

That optimism, I may say, is typical of people in British Columbia. Certainly that is so of the aggressiveness, because we are people who believe in getting things done, and I trust that this government will take action to see that something will be done in this respect. The article goes on:

> They are resigned to the loss of the European markets and feel there is virtually no hope of regaining them.

And that, Mr. Speaker is a terrible situation when you consider the value of the logging and forestry industry in my province, to think we who have this great abundance of forest products can find no hope in the future of selling them to the United Kingdom or other European markets. The article carries on:

> But they are confident that they can find new uses for wood products and the industry is conducting research on a scale never before realized. Some are talking about producing disposable clothing made of wood treated to look like expensive fabric, yet costing a fraction of conventional cloth. The industry is looking far into the future for stability.

Mr. Speaker, it would be presumptuous of me to suggest that members of the government do not have the time to look into articles such as this, to read them and have their attention drawn to them. However, I do not believe it is presumptuous on my part when I say that the Gordon commission report has absolutely nothing in it insofar as the British Columbia forest products industry is concerned. In the preliminary report we find only one mention of it, and that does not apply to British Columbia alone. It says: "Forestry research should be actively encouraged." Just research, you will notice. It says nothing about markets, nothing whatsoever with regard to the building of houses with this particular product that we possess in such abundance in my province and which we must use, which we must dispose of if we are going to maintain the high rate of business activity that we have experienced in the past few years.

Certainly today when I listened to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and later to the Minister of National Health and Welfare I could not help but think when I compared their remarks with what I found in the Gordon commission's report that possibly British Columbia was a land foreign to the rest of Canada in many ways, and I do urge this government and particularly all those members of parliament who come from areas in which forestry is a vital industry that they should give a good deal of thought to this matter, since forests are one of our greatest resources and should be developed to the maximum extent possible.

Another question that has held the attention and interest of the nation as a whole is the Canadian Pacific rail strike which we are all pleased, I am sure, to note has been brought to a temporary close. Disputes between management and labour are all too common today, Mr. Speaker, especially when they involve utilities whether privately or publicly owned. I am sure that the people of this country feel it is high time that we should take certain steps to see to it that the problem of strikes and walkouts is resolved, and that they should not be subjected to any further inconvenience of this kind.

I would draw to your attention, sir, that there is one very important factor that must not be overlooked with regard to this matter. I have read a great number of newspaper articles dealing with the strike, and almost without exception the daily newspapers across Canada blame the union for going on strike. I would probably be one of the first to agree that the union should not have gone on strike if this were the result of automation and if automation were the only factor that was involved, but such is not the case. The question which bothered the union was the factor of safety; and I submit for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, and for that of other hon. members of this house that the only way the firemen had of bringing the safety factor to the attention of this country was by the union declaring a strike. If the union had not gone on strike and we had had a rash of accidents, who would have condemned them first? Would it not have been you and I, and the hon. members of this house and the people in this country? They would have said, "Why did not the union go on strike? They knew what the safety factors were. They knew what was involved." But no; the newspapers in this country have taken it upon themselves to condemn without a fair hearing, certainly without a complete hearing.

It may be that this committee which has been set up by the Prime Minister will discover that the firemen are not required on the freight diesels or on the yard switch engines, and if such is the case it will probably seem unfortunate that the firemen chose the moment they did for going on strike. However, the proof of whether they are right or wrong must remain to be seen. Mr. Speaker, the blame does not rest with the union nor with management. They were using the only recourse which was open to them, one that is traditional, namely either to go on strike or to have a lock-out. This is a remedy which may be laid down in law; certainly it is not illegal.

However, in my view the government was at fault because when it became apparent that the union was definitely going on strike, with all the harmful effects on the economy of this country, the government should have called a halt and, before the strike ever happened, instituted a board, possibly made up of a representative of the union, a representative of the management and another appointed by the government in council, to determine whether the union was right in its claim having to do with the safety factor, or whether the management was right in its claim that the union was at fault. That is the responsibility of government. That is the responsibility this government shirked, Mr. Speaker. That problem, too, is the responsibility that the official opposition shirked, since it behooves the opposition in this country, if they have any idea how a problem may be solved, to urge their solution firmly upon the government of the day.

I contend that thousands, or possibly millions, across this country will agree with me when I say that the government failed in its responsibility. Certainly it was late in making up its mind, though "better late than never" is possibly a good adage. I submit that we should not prorogue or adjourn parliament until such time as we have brought in labour legislation which will prevent such lock-outs or stoppages of work or strikes in the future. That is what the people of Canada expect us to do, certainly not to permit the continuation of strikes or lock-outs at the leisure or pleasure of certain groups. I am not criticizing the union for the stand it took, nor am I criticizing management; the union was simply exercising its inherent legal right. However, I do submit that the government was at fault for failing to take action when it should have done so.

There is another matter which gives me a great deal of concern and which has assumed quite alarming proportions, and I refer to the plight of the small businessman, the number of business failures. I read a short time ago from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail to the effect that 1,000 small loggers would be affected by the policy announced by this government, and that this policy might result in the closing up of a number of small loggers.

On more than one occasion I have brought to the attention of the house the number of failures occurring in small businesses, particularly family-owned businesses, the small store on the corner, and others.

If, as is claimed so often by big business, the little man on the corner was inefficient, if he did not use proper appliances in his business, then I could appreciate that he might be pushed out of business; but I am sure if you go into a small store on the corner or any other place you will find that place is being kept just as clean, that it carries the same quality of merchandise, that the same type of scales are used, that the same electric cash register is being operated and similar counter displays are being used as are used by the supermarket. Yet men of that type are being forced out of business.

Many times the owners of the big supermarkets are the wholesale houses, and I wonder whether there is a deliberate or unwitting attempt to get rid of the small businessman. From time to time I ask myself certain questions to discover whether that is the case. Is it possible that there is a hidden combine, more vicious because it is hidden and because one cannot discover a real combine? I ask myself why it is that in the metropolitan area of Vancouver the wholesalers who own the supermarkets use a different method of operation when a little man is concerned. I ask myself if it is a coincidence that the wholesalers in a matter of one, two or more weeks should have decided that the small businessmen must give them post-dated cheques in blank.

The man buying goods does not know whether he is going to get the goods, but he must hand over a blank cheque to be filled in by the wholesaler. Surely what is being done is illegal, the requesting of post-dated cheques for goods not yet received. If for some reason a cheque is returned marked "n.s.f."—the little man does not always have the same amount of credit available as has the big man—I wonder if it is a coincidence that the little fellow is charged ½ of 1 per cent interest per week. Those are the kind of things which suggest to me that it is more than coincidence when they occur in such a short period of time.

Frequently I refer to the products of Procter and Gamble and Lever Brothers. I ask myself if it is a coincidence that Lever Brothers should charge $6.80 a case for soap one week, raise the price the following week to $7, an increase of 20 cents a case, and then have the same price rise by Procter and Gamble. Is it a coincidence that the next time there is a price fluctuation Procter and Gamble should raise their prices first and then within a week's time we see the Lever Brothers following suit?

Is it a coincidence that these soap companies should be buying their ingredients at exactly the same price week after week and month after month, yet have their prices fluctuate suddenly within a matter of weeks? I wonder if this is because the soap companies who have been investigated under the combines act have decided that it would be good business to turn out many different products in order to fill up the shelves of the stores and carry on all kinds of promotional schemes to sell them. We find that when Blue Cheer goes up in price one week the other soap company will bring out Breeze or something else and put it up in price. So many different products are brought out that it is almost impossible to charge the soap companies with carrying on a combine because the products that are changed in price are similar products bearing different names.

When I see these products on the shelves in such great numbers, or see them advertised in the newspapers, I wonder if the research branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce has ever attempted to establish the truth of the claims made by the soap companies. I wonder whether the housewife should not have that sort of protection.

Then when I go to check the shelves of these stores I quite often find a can marked "20 fluid ounces". I ask myself what "fluid" means and just what amount of solid matter is contained in the can. I wonder whether we in this house or the housewife realize that many times a wholesaler or manufacturer will decide that in order to sell a particular product at a particular price they will put out a special brand with a particular label on it containing a special pack for a particular company. In so doing, if it is 20 fluid ounces, how many ounces of pure solid food have they? Indeed, it would be interesting to go to the various markets across this country, pick up cans of the same commodity or similar commodities such as peaches, and actually weigh the solid content within each can, even though the can is marked "20 fluid ounces". If these huge markets, these big supermarkets, can get the manufacturers to label their own brands so they can sell them at a particular price, then it is a simple matter indeed for the supermarket to undersell the little man on the corner. The only person who does not know the truth of the matter, that she is not getting as much in solid food content, can easily be the housewife who shops around for her commodities.

There is another situation that is extremely hard, I might say, on the little businessman. I refer to this question of tight money. The squeeze is on. Who is it on? We on the Pacific coast find that it is on the little businessman particularly. For instance in my own area we find that five small businesses went bankrupt in the last few months. In that same area we find two big supermarkets, one in the process of being built at the present time and another one which has opened its doors, although probably not in the same line of business; I will admit that at this moment. But incidentally this is what I discovered. It is a matter of money for these little fellows.

Here is a typical case. I discussed the question with one of the owners of one of these bankrupt businesses, and this is what she had to say:

> When a one-third down payment was compulsory we were able to compete as we always sold quality and built our business on service. We had to dissolve our business because of the "no-money down" policy and credit denied us.

A small merchant has no large amounts of money in reserve. He cannot sell shares in his business. He has not a revolving credit plan. He has not the Industrial Acceptance Corporation to look after his customers. He has not the General Motors Acceptance Corporation to look after and assist his customers in the purchase of his goods. He is on the spot.

I have a typical case in which a ladies ready to wear owner had made a habit or practice in the early summer, when he would get in his Christmas stock, of going to the bank and borrowing some $5,000 or $10,000 with which to carry his stock until after the Christmas sales. He would get a three-month note and he would renew it.

This chap's note became due on November 2 of last year. He went to the bank to renew it, and they told him to sell his bonds.

He had bonds, and he was compelled to sell them. He could not renew his note. He was indebted to the bank. He took a loss on his bonds. Let us see what he received for them. He had $250 of 3 per cent bonds maturing in 1960. He sold at $96.15 and realized $240.37. The interest was $2.93. He had $200 in 3 per cent bonds maturing in 1962. He sold at 94⅜ and realized $188.75. The interest was $1.34. He had $1,000 in 3 per cent bonds maturing in 1963. He sold at 93⅜ and realized $933.75. The interest was $1.73. He had $4,250 in 3 per cent bonds maturing in 1966. He sold at 92⅜ and realized $3,925.93. The interest was $17.80. They were Dominion of Canada government bonds.

The total cost of those bonds was $5,700. He received $5,288.80 plus interest of $23.80, or a total of $5,312.60. In other words he had invested in the Dominion of Canada, but he was told that he could not hold those bonds, that he had to sell them; and he had to take a loss of $387.40. That is what the tight money policy did to this little fellow. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have indeed reached a shameful position in this country when we cannot use Dominion of Canada bonds for security purposes. Certainly when we sold the bonds to these people we did not intimate to them that they would not be worth 100 cents on the dollar when Canada's economy was at the highest point in its history.

The tight money policy of this government, Mr. Speaker, is crucifying, condemning and killing the little man in this country. The small businessman is being hurt unnecessarily to the advantage of the select and the elect few. Possibly I would say in this instance that I could be wrong in my supposition, but this is what I find in the I.A.C. Merit News for December, 1956. Hon. members of this house will recall that I have spoken on this free credit idea that we have had so much of in past years. This is what this pamphlet had to say:

Retail Credit

Let's face it. We've all been putting some paper on our books with a hope and a promise. Some of us have even been on a sort of credit binge during the last couple of years and it is now time for sobering up. Too much credit has been far more responsible than too little credit for business difficulties and failures.

What kind of credit? It is the kind I have decried in this house from time to time; the kind that indicated that the little man could sell for no money down; the kind we permitted in this country; the free use of money and credit in terms of money. The article continues:

In the last four years the number of vehicles sold has not changed very much, but the terms on which they have been sold have weakened substantially. And this in a time when more people were employed, earning more money than ever before in our history.

Perhaps we should ask ourselves if the public really demanded this easing of terms—or if it was forced upon them through sales pressure, advertising and other channels—and so became the accepted thing to do in the minds of all parties interested in the transaction.

Later the pamphlet goes on to say this, and I would ask hon. members of the house to note it:

Another point too, is that a great variety of businesses are competing today for the consumer's credit dollar.

There is no competition for goods, Mr. Speaker; there is competition for a credit dollar between these bigger companies and they are gradually putting the little man out of business, either wittingly or unwittingly, either in the sense of the hidden combine or by any other means they see fit. I know big business have said, and there is no refuting it, that the finest thing they can have beside them is a small businessman, because it helps their business. They want him there. They want him kept. But unwittingly they are putting him out of business, and we are permitting it by allowing these people to advertise goods for sale with no money down. It is at this point that our tight money policy should be enforced. It is at this point where it should be necessary for the individual to show his responsibility by putting some money down. We should not permit the continued use of this unrestricted credit.

As I indicated, earlier, Mr. Speaker, there are many other topics I wished to touch upon, particularly old age pensions. I hope when that legislation is introduced or some other opportune time presents itself, it will be my privilege to speak to the matter.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): The opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of speaking to this House of Commons on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is appreciated by all of us in western Canada. It is an opportunity for me to present the views of the great constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek, and also to make a few observations on the state of the nation, as it is called to the south of us. Congratulations would, of necessity, be in order to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the splendid address. The contributions they made were appreciated by all members of this house, and that appreciation has been voiced by them.

So far as we Liberals are concerned, that is what we expect of other Liberals. We expect not the common but the uncommon; we expect nothing mediocre; we expect the extraordinary, not the ordinary, and that is what the Liberals who sit in this house endeavour to present. I would, therefore, like to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. They are a source of pride to each and every one of us.

By their deeds we shall know them. Since it was my privilege to speak in this house last year I think everyone will agree that progress has been made in Canada. Not all the difficulties have been solved, but I think no one will disagree with the statement that progress has been made. This is a better country in which to live than it was last year. If that is true, and I think you will all agree that it is, then we must have had a government and government policies that made that possible. With the help of all, including the opposition, I am sure that next year, when at least the government and all its members will be back again, perhaps in greater numbers, the people of Canada will again agree that progress has been made in this country. How can Liberal policies have a different effect? What else could you expect from policies that, through experience, have been proven to be adaptable to the needs of the Canadian people and which will bring Canada to the heights that every Canadian expects?

My constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek is, as you all know, predominantly agricultural. In every session I have endeavoured to present to you some of the good things that come from that constituency. However, agriculture is not the only means by which the people of the constituency make a living. We have a great number of labouring people who make a great contribution to the welfare of Canada. We have railway people, and there are two divisional points in the constituency, Swift Current itself and Shaunavon. The people in that area are almost entirely dependent upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, so you would expect them to be happy that a solution was found to the rail strike which was so detrimental not only to that area of western Canada but to all areas in Canada dependent upon that great service organization. Irrespective of the motives for that strike it has been settled, and I was pleased that all members of the opposition congratulated the government on the form of the settlement and the fact that it was settled without compulsion. May it ever be that all strikes in this country when they originate—perhaps one could call them the penalties of democracy but I would rather call them one of the rights of democracy, that any individual organization in the country has the right to strike because any time that right does not exist then in my opinion we no longer have a democracy—will be settled without compulsion. We in western Canada are grateful to the government for promoting a settlement of the strike.

I am more familiar, Mr. Speaker, with agriculture than with any other activity, because I have lived with it practically all my life. I consider it, as perhaps all of you consider the occupation in which you are engaged, as one of the most important contributions to the welfare of the country. I would submit that in the great economic expansion of Canada the most important industry in Canada was agriculture. Let us never accept the idea that we can depend on all the other industries for our advancement and leave agriculture on its own. It seems to be inherent in human nature that we take agriculture for granted. As a result it is necessary for agriculture, throughout the years, to make appeals to governments for assistance.

We often wonder why that is so. Why is it necessary for agriculture to apply for assistance to the Canadian government or other governments in the world? It should be the other way around; every other industry in Canada should be making the appeals that agriculture is making, because agriculture should be in the preferred position. Agriculture should never have to appeal, shall we say, or go in a begging manner to the government of Canada or the government of any other country.

I am trying to tell this parliament that the people of this country cannot exist without agriculture. All flesh is grass, and from grass everything in the form of flesh is originated. If you took grass out of existence, if it refused to grow for even one year, there would be no life in existence any longer. The importance of agriculture is not at any time overemphasized. It is more important than any other vocation, and I do not wish to deprecate any other vocation. It is more important than any other business, and the same holds true in regard to any other endeavour or any other profession or any corporation or any government. Without agriculture there could be no existence.

Have you noted this, that wherever new settlement takes place, whether it is in a new country or within an area, the first thought is not whether we shall have business, not whether there shall be lawyers—as necessary as they are, and they have been referred to in this house—the first thought is for the planting of the seed because that is the seed of life. Surely it is of primary importance to all the people. As I have so often stated, we should not place agriculture in a position where it is neglected, because upon the welfare of agriculture depends your nation's security; that is your cheapest insurance, to keep agriculture in a prosperous condition.

We all know that agriculture has expanded also in various parts of the country and many agriculturists have done well. We know also that in other areas other forms of agriculture have not done so well. This is the condition that we, as a government, are endeavouring to correct. I am tired, Mr. Speaker, of hearing people, as I sometimes do, refer to the rich farmers. Well, if there are rich farmers they are not in my district. There are some of them who have done better than others, but there are no Cadillacs in my part of the country. The people are glad to have any kind of automobile which they can operate. There are no trips to Florida by the people in my part of the country.

But why should there not be? Why should not farmers have a right to go to Florida and own Cadillacs? This right is given to every other occupation in Canada; every other profession takes that right upon itself. If anyone hears of a farmer having a Cadillac it seems that is an offence against the country, or against nature or against the professions. He has the same right to have a Cadillac but he does not have it. Therefore we would like to suggest that the farmers have expended their greatest efforts to remain in existence, have expended all of their time and all their overtime to make it possible for the people of Canada and of other countries to have food at lower costs than they should have paid.

That is the only reason Canadian farmers are coming to parliament, or to the government, for assistance. They are coming to the government for assistance because over the years the people have paid lower prices for their food than would permit the farmers to continue in farming. What is the alternative? There is no other alternative but for the farmers to come to the government for assistance and to encourage the government to formulate policies that will assist the industry. Why should that be? I ask any person in this House of Commons, why should that be? Why should agriculture ever since I have been associated with it be in the position that it has had to appeal for subsidies and legislation and government operations and so on in order to sustain itself?

Well, the farmers are going to do something about it before the whole economy of the country is completely changed and consider that the economy can get along without agriculture. It is my hope that before that happens the people of this country will be sufficiently sympathetic to make that result possible without the actions that other people have it within their power to take to correct their conditions, actions that the farmers do not have within their power. As I mentioned before, with the exception of the larger farmers, who in Canada other than the fishermen have a lower standard of living than the farmer? Yet many things have been done to encourage the farmers and make it possible for them to exist and to make a living comparable with other industries and with other people in Canada.

I have endeavoured to outline the situation in my immediate area, but I do not think it is prevalent everywhere. It may sound like a paradox, but the difficulty in my particular area is that we lack production and have lacked it throughout the years. These people who have overproduction, who have granaries bursting with wheat, who have sufficient credit to carry on and have credit facilities available to them, are in a position where we do not have to worry about them except to help them to sell their grain. We should give our real sympathy to the individual who has not that surplus of grain.

I refer to the ordinary, every-day farmer who is endeavouring to make his living without mining the soil, without taking everything out of the soil and not putting anything back, the small farmer who is trying to make a living for his family and who, by his sweat and toil expended throughout his lifetime, has tried to maintain himself on the land in an effort to supply the people of Canada and other countries with food at below cost. Therefore I would suggest that if we are to remedy that condition, and perhaps it is within our means to partly remedy it, some action should be taken. We are endeavouring, and we shall endeavour, to recommend policies that will bring about that result.

We know the trend in western Canada is toward larger farms. The Gordon commission suggested that farms will be still larger in the future, but they will also be more efficient. The same thing will happen as happened in other economies; other provision will have to be made for those who cannot be accommodated within their industry. What this government has endeavoured to do is to have an economy that will absorb those people in whatever occupation of life they may be, be it the forests, the mines or the farms; to absorb them, as it is absorbing them, in other industries in which they can make their living.

No government in the world can guarantee me that I am going to make my living in the profession in which I am working, or the vocation or occupation. The government cannot do that, but it can formulate policies and have an economy that will make it possible for all the people to make their living within whatever form of economy is in existence in the country at the particular time. That is what this government is endeavouring to do.

We are now suggesting to you what the price of food should be. If you were paying the price for food that you should pay, that is the consumers of this country as well as in other countries, then it would not be necessary for the farmers to come to the government for assistance, or to have laws enacted to protect them. If the people of this country and of the world will pay the farmers the price they should receive for the food they produce, then we will not come to the government begging for assistance. I think that is a fair deal.

Why is it that when we go to buy an automobile we do not question the price? They tell us what the price is. We do not haggle over it; we do not argue about it. All things being equal, we either take it or leave it; but when it comes to food we tramp the streets—at least my wife does—looking for the cheapest food. I am trying to train her out of that and to look for the most expensive food, but thus far I have not been successful in doing it. That is the point. When it comes to food we try to get it at the lowest price. In other things, television sets or automobiles, or anything you wish to mention, we ask no questions; we take it home if we have the money.

I would like to suggest to you that the subsidies that are asked for by farmers are merely compensation for the discount the public has received in the price of food throughout the years. If anyone has any other explanation for it, well, I would be glad to hear it. Therefore if you will pay farmers $2.20 let us say, instead of the $1.75 you have been paying during the years from 1944 to 1953, he will not need help. And do not think it is $1.75, because the farmer does not receive that. He receives a maximum of about $1.55, because the $1.75 includes freight; and when the grade is lower, say grade 4, 5 or 6, he receives $1 or less for that wheat. If you will pay $2.20, instead of $1.75 f.o.b. Fort William, which is the fair price he should have been receiving during the past 10 years; instead of 78 cents for oats, 98 cents for oats; instead of $1.16 for barley, $1.45 for barley; instead of $1.95 for rye, $2.45 for rye; instead of $3.65 for flax, $4.59; instead of $18.50 for steers, $23.27; instead of $23.94 for hogs, $30.12; instead of $19.49 for sheep, $24.51; instead of 48 cents for grade A eggs, 57 cents, we will never come here to the House of Commons and ask you for a thing. I think that is a fair deal. How many bidders do we get on the deal? What do you offer? That is the situation.

Unfortunately, farmers are not in a position where they can demand things as other occupational groups do. We recently had a strike. Even in Saskatchewan, where we have a state-controlled and operated bus system, we had a strike a few years ago. People in Canada have the right to strike if they do not think they are receiving their fair share or a just wage, or for any other cause. But how can the farmer strike? He cannot do a thing about it. He can have his unions, and then through political agitation or some other type of agitation they disappear. That has been proven in the past, and the farmers have no one to speak for them except their representatives in the House of Commons, the grass roots representatives who come from Saskatchewan, and by those I mean the Liberal representatives because the other groups from the province of Saskatchewan who are supposed to represent the farmers are not the grass roots; they are the quack grass roots.

I would suggest to the people of western Canada that it is the real grass roots that produce something in abundance, that produce the revenue for the farmers. In other words they are the people who are listened to. The proof that the people of Canada have not been listening to Saskatchewan is the fact that the majority of the representatives from Saskatchewan during the past few years have not been true representatives of the people. In other words they are the enemies of the government, and if the government represents the people of Canada, then they must be the enemies of the people. At least that is the way it looks to me. If the people of western Canada wish to have representation that would be of value here in eastern Canada and in this parliament, they should do something about it.

The government has been doing something about it. Instead of having our farm unions come here to present their case, the representatives of the people have been trying to do it here in this house. I would suggest that any time the farmers of western Canada do not think that their representatives have been doing it sufficiently well they should themselves come here to Ottawa. They have the same right as anyone else to come here. We have seen people from different organizations who thought they had a grievance walk up and down in front of the House of Commons. The farmers have the same right; why should they not have it? This government is as partial and sympathetic to them as to anyone else; therefore I would advise them to come whenever they think they can make an appeal to the government that will be more effective, and whenever they have any wrong they think should be corrected. They can present it to their own seat of government, and they have the same right to do so as the people in any democratic country.

The government has been endeavouring to correct the difficulties existing among the farmers. The government has made operative policies to stabilize agriculture and to encourage co-operatives. Incidentally, I might say there is no problem for which farmers cannot find a solution in their co-operatives. In fact they could get along fairly well even without representatives because they have the solution right in their own hands, providing someone does not disturb the co-operatives. Throughout the years the farmers have been able to solve their own difficulties through the co-operatives. The federal government has encouraged co-operatives, as did the former government in Saskatchewan and as the present one in turn is doing. In their efforts to assist the farmers the federal government has operated a wheat board on behalf of the farmers of western Canada, and has taken it upon itself not only to promote the wheat board but to extend it for five years. It has supported the international wheat agreements and provided loans to foreign countries to purchase Canadian grain. It has also instituted floor prices on wheat, oats, barley, hogs, butter and eggs. It has originated the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, and has paid out over $1 billion in subsidies to farmers in the past decade as has been pointed out in an issue of the Western Producer printed in Saskatoon a year or two ago. It has made the Canadian farm loan board operative and promoted the P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A., and it is now thinking of crop insurance as far as it is applicable to western Canada. It has also progressively abolished tariffs and removed the duty on farm machinery and supplies. It has negotiated trade agreements with 73 countries of the world.

Why have these considerations been necessary? They have been necessary for the reason I stated at the beginning of my remarks, because the public has been paying less than the cost of production to the farmers of western Canada, and there is no alternative except to have the government promote, advocate and originate policies that will compensate the farmers for the difference between what they actually receive and what they really should receive, something that will help meet what the price should have been in the first place. Agriculture has to be supported because circumstances over which it has no control prevent it from sustaining itself.

What are the demands of farmers today? They demand policies that will enable them to produce without government assistance, and that is a reasonable request. The farmers ask, how high can floor prices be advanced without instituting production controls? No one has ever given them an answer. The farmers are also asking, can a parity price be established without acreage control? No one in this House of Commons has answered that question. The only body to have answered it is the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. The vice president of the wheat pool said that if you instituted parity prices as promulgated or formulated by certain farm organizations, then you would have to establish it at between 65 and 85 per cent of parity or the farmers would go hog wild on production.

If the farmers want parity prices under which to reduce their acreage to the extent of the wheat that can be absorbed in this country—because you cannot expect the 16 million people in Canada to pay the difference —they should have the right to vote for that, and we will give them consideration on that basis. If they wish to produce one hog instead of three to come under a parity price structure they should have the right to vote on that.

However, they must also take into consideration that by doing so they will be reducing the entire economy of Canada, the gross national product of the country, because if you reduce your acreage and production from 500 million to 150 million bushels then Canada has lost the difference between the value to be received from the 150 million and the revenue to be received from 500 million, and perhaps that is not in the best interests of the national economy. For this reason the farmers will not vote for parity prices under that system, but they have a right to express their opinion through a vote on control and acreage reductions, the same as a union has the right to express its opinion concerning whether or not a strike vote should be taken.

I would therefore suggest to the farmers that policies be originated which are acceptable to the rest of the people of Canada, including the members of this house; because if they cannot accept them then they are wasting their time. The recommendations of the Gordon commission concerning wheat are in the public eye at the moment. These could be considered, if the farmers would accept the consequences and dangers particularly as they relate to the wheat board, the economy of Canada and their own economy.

What the farmers want are stabilized prices for their production. They want crop insurance for those years when there are no crops. They want unemployment insurance to be extended to farm labour, and they want every effort to be expended in an effort to sell their produce. They want more storage for their grain and equalized freight rates so they are not penalized because of where they live.

Incidentally, if this can be thrown in, I might point out that farmers want the other amenities of life which are enjoyed by approximately 75 per cent of the people of Canada. In other words, in our part of the country in order to keep up to date I think we should have some of the modern conveniences and pleasures of life. We in the southwest also want a television station so we can enjoy the educational benefits of programs and in order that the cultural advantages television provides to the other people in Canada will not pass us by. The farmers want no more and no less than the same security and standard of living enjoyed by those in other occupations.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we commend the government for having created an economy that can absorb those whom agriculture cannot accommodate.

I would point out, however, that not all our troubles are due to circumstances such as I have described. Some of our troubles in the west are due to politics, and I would like to dwell on that subject for a moment because if there is any place in Canada where political disunity exists and has existed throughout the years with harmful effects it is among the farmers in western Canada. There is an old saying to the effect that united we stand and divided we fall. Well, if we in western Canada have fallen it has been through division, it has been through political disunity, and it has been because individuals have proclaimed that their election was more important than the welfare of western Canada.

During the last 30 years have we not had an example of the futility of divided strength, when splinter political parties say, "Elect me and I will correct the difficulties that exist in western Canada." It is interesting to note that none of the difficulties have been corrected, at least according to what the disunited opposition members of parliament tell us. They constantly tell us that nothing has been accomplished as a result of their efforts. They bemoan the fact that they have been here year after year telling the government what should be done, and nothing has happened as a result of their pleas. I can only observe that they must have made an extremely poor job of it if they have been unable to convince any other person in the whole of the country that the situation in western Canada is as they have described it. I suggest to them that they go back home and tell the people there that they have been a complete failure in representing western Canada. They have gone among the people there and suggested that fighters be sent here; that is what they told them.

Mr. Blackmore: What about the maritimes?

Mr. Studer: Well, if they are fighters and if they have fought for something, where is it? They point out in every speech they make that they have been unable to accomplish anything for western Canada. A prime example is the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), the "Quebec is ripe for communism" member from Burnaby-Coquitlam. He was a pathetic example as he stood in the House of Commons just two days ago and wept over the plight of the people in his constituency. He does not need to weep; he merely needs to be told to go back to his constituency and tell the people there to send a representative to the parliament of Canada who will speak on behalf of his people and who will be believed by the rest of the people of Canada.

So far he has not done so. So far none of the others have done so. There is no sense in my standing here weeping floods of tears over the plight of the old age pensioners if it does not cost me anything. If I have never produced a single nickel's worth of wealth in the world it is easy for me to ask other people to make their contributions. I would suggest to them that if they produced some wealth to distribute for the benefit and welfare of the people of Canada instead of teaching the children of Canada socialism in their schools, it would be better for us all. Because that is what they have been doing, teaching socialism to the children in western Canada; and if they have not been doing so they have not been doing their duty as socialists.

So, Mr. Speaker, all our difficulties are not due to climatic conditions or to the policies of the government. I was interested the other day in hearing the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) try to explain the difference between Social Credit and socialist credit, and I would suggest to him that his explanation why there is Social Credit is not genuine. The reason there is Social Credit is that 50, 60 or 70 per cent of the Social Credit members here sit under that title because they were not qualified to be Liberal candidates at previous elections, and in order to be elected to the House of Commons they formulated the hodge-podge of discarded political theories that all the civilizations in the world threw away long ago. They have been playing with the discards out of the deck for so many years that they do not know what a new deck is. They have been playing neulo with the discards and there are no face cards in the discards; all the face cards are on the government side of the house. They are relegated to playing neulo in this political game. They are a party of Rosicrucian technocrats with hellfire and brimstone and applesauce; with a policy that was spawned in some other country and which grew to maturity, if you could ever call it that, in the foothills of Alberta. What a discredited organization they are. Did you read the recent Commission's report in New Zealand, where there was a Social Credit government of what Social Credit is?

They claim they have a monopoly of political righteousness. Without referring to any individual I would say they have a monopoly of hypocrisy, because they originated politics and in doing so they caused all areas of western Canada to suffer for the sake of their political expediency. They are the jokesters of the House of Commons and, Mr. Speaker, though I could use some other words, I would just like to ask where is the $25 they were supposed to have had in Alberta as a result of the Aberhart administration. The people of Alberta got it, but not from the Social Credit organization. They got it from the Liberals. They got it from the Liberals through family allowances, through the same organization and the same policies every one of them had voted against to defeat the government on February 10, 1944.

It was a sin against humanity to deprive the mothers of western Canada of these family allowance benefits by trying to defeat the government on a policy of that kind. Even the Conservatives had the good sense not to do this. The Social Crediters should go out in western Canada and confess their sins and tell the people about the crimes they have committed in the name of humanity. Instead they imagine that they have a halo and that they have a dispensation to promote socialist credit throughout the country. That would destroy this country as quickly as socialism, because the whole policy is dependent on state control. I challenge them to deny it, these so-called professors of freedom.

An hon. Member: I deny it.

Mr. Studer: They cannot expect their policies to operate without having state control, and they know it. That is why it was thrown out in New Zealand. And what about the press censorship? That was the first thing the province of Alberta enacted when Social Credit obtained power, so the people could not determine what that government was doing. What about their sterilization laws? I do not see anything in the Bible that says we should incorporate this in any of our laws throughout the country. It is the only province in Canada that has sterilization laws. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) or for some other constituency was telling us that Major Douglas, who invented socialist credit, came out to Alberta and disappeared overnight. Why? The hon. member explained that he went because he had a difference of opinion with the Premier of Alberta. That is not why he went. When the sterilization laws came into existence, or anticipating them, he knew what was good for him.

I suggest that when socialist credit comes into existence it will not be necessary, because there will be no people left in Canada. Even I would go—head for the ocean and swim for it if I had to—as Major Douglas would, before I would place myself under the jurisdiction of such a sterilization law. I understand that the insane people would be affected by it, and that a board would be set up. But how can the blind lead the blind? How can a lunatic determine who is sane? No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we want social or socialist credit in this country. I would suggest to the members of that party that they were originally Liberals in Alberta, and that they should come back to the fold and make a contribution to the welfare of the people of Canada.

We have, also, some remnants of the socialist party left in Saskatchewan. If they are not a disillusioned party no one has ever been disillusioned. They heaped abuse upon the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) because he left the party, but he was merely a precursor of the inevitable, a St. John the Baptist; because, following him, in September or October they all gathered in Winnipeg.

What was the result? At the same time the communists were tearing down Stalin the socialists at Winnipeg were taking the ground from under Karl Marx. What have they left? The Liberal policy. Therefore I suggest to them that they should leave their policy, forget all about their particular theories which make no contribution to the welfare of Canada, and associate themselves with the new, growing and great Conservative party which only can provide an alternative to the Liberal party and to the government.

At the same time we congratulate them on their new leader. If he does as well for himself in Saskatchewan as he did for himself in Prince Albert no doubt he will do well for himself elsewhere. It is always necessary when you have leaders to have a few followers, and there has been no dearth of leaders in the Conservative party. There has, however, been a scarcity of followers; and when they have as many followers as leaders then, some time in the hazy future, they might have a government. In the meantime we wish them well.

So, in conclusion, we observe that there are some good things in Canada. More good things have come to the people of Canada in these past years than in any socialist credit, Socialist, or Conservative country anywhere in the world, and the people of Canada are not going to throw that away in the vain hope of finding something as good or better given to them by any of the other political parties. We invite the people of Canada to join with the Liberals and go forward, as the Gordon commission has outlined, to greater prospects of peace, happiness and well-being in the great world of tomorrow.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, along with many other members who have taken part in the debate on the speech from the throne I wish to commend the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply for the manner in which they handled their difficult assignment. Considering the meagreness of the throne speech with which they had to work, I think they did very well. I wish to declare publicly my allegiance to our Conservative party leader and the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the House of Commons. I also wish to say that we in the Conservative party are looking forward to the day when John will be prime minister of Canada.

Mr. Hees: That's our boy.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): We in Bruce county are very proud of the fact that our leader has such strong ties with us, and that his mother is a Bruce county girl. The last resting place of two of his grandparents is to be found in a beautiful rustic setting in the cemetery at Tiverton, nine miles from my home town of Kincardine.

It is my happy lot, Mr. Speaker, to be chosen to represent the good people of Bruce county in the House of Commons. When I say "good people" I mean it in every sense of the word. They are mostly descendants of pioneers who settled there 100 or more years ago. The names of these pioneers have passed down from generation to generation. If you will pardon a personal note, I wish to say that our son is the fourth generation on the farm that my grandfather operated over 100 years ago. In addition to the descendants of these early pioneers we have many people who have chosen Bruce as an ideal place in which to live and raise a family.

Bruce county is well up to the top in production of dairy products, beef and hogs in the province of Ontario. Bruce county, as I have stated before, has approximately 300 miles of shoreline bordering on the blue waters of lake Huron and Georgian bay. We have an ever-growing business in summer visitors, both from Canada and the United States of America. Many visitors, after experiencing the friendly atmosphere of our people and seeing the beautiful sunsets over lake Huron, which are known over the world, decide at once that they wish to come back every summer for their vacation.

We have many nice towns and villages in Bruce, all ideal places for anyone to live. We have good schools, good churches, good stores and good roads. Some of the towns and villages have industries, some large and some small. Many of these industries have been located in Bruce for a great number of years, while a few are of more recent growth.

Irrespective of the facts I have given concerning Bruce, there is a growing discontent among the citizens. The farmers are in the squeeze between falling farm prices and the ever-increasing cost of production. Because of the increased size of farms due to mechanization, their sons and daughters must leave home to find jobs, mostly in the cities. In some of our towns and villages we have factory buildings that are closed. Over the last decade the population of Canada has increased rapidly, but Bruce county has not shared in that increase.

According to the preliminary report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects it is expected that Canada's population will reach 26 million in 1980. On page 66, paragraph 11, these words are to be found:

> It seems probable that the demand for secondary manufacturers will be at about the same rate as the anticipated increase in the gross national product. In this event the total demand by 1980 may be three times what it is at present.

The question here arises, is Bruce county going to get its share of that secondary manufacturing increase? On page 3, paragraph 7, of the Gordon report you will find these words:

Throughout our work we have made a number of general assumptions on which all our forecasts are predicated. Of overriding significance in the world today is the fact that two great powers, the United States and the Soviet union, both possess weapons of mass destruction in such quantity that their use might destroy organized society throughout the world. Other countries may well acquire an armament of similarly frightening power before many years are over, and this would add to the potential danger. Within a few years intercontinental missiles with nuclear warheads will be in existence, capable at a single blow of crippling, if not completely destroying, any city, no matter how large. A single hydrogen weapon, for example, could devastate and make uninhabitable an area approximately 50 miles wide and 200 miles long. Such an area, stretching along the shores of lake Ontario, might extend from Hamilton at one end to Kingston at the other, and include within its orbit Toronto, Oshawa, Port Hope and Belleville. A similar area along the St. Lawrence might run from the Ontario-Quebec border to Quebec city and contaminate with radioactive fall-out all the cities, towns and villages in between, including the entire population of Montreal. These are among the new facts of life and death in this nuclear age.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this in itself is reason enough for all governments to encourage decentralization of industry. On February 21, 1956, civil defence co-ordinator F. F. Worthington had this to say in Belleville, Ontario:

If I were a dictator in this country I would ban cities of more than 50,000 population and order Toronto and Montreal to stop growing.

Mr. Worthington said the expense of decentralization was nothing compared to saving lives of people or the life of the country. Sweden, he said, was limiting cities to 25,000 population. There are many ways and means of encouraging decentralization rather than by direct orders of any dictator. The report of a special committee of the Ontario legislature on air pollution and smoke control was tabled on March 15, 1956, by the chairman, A. H. Cowling. It had this to say in part:

It is estimated that smoke and smog in their various forms cost the people of this province about $120 million a year. It is also a fact that air pollution does have a detrimental effect on the physical and mental health, the efficiency and well-being of people who must exist in it.

Air pollution affects every citizen, the report states. Depending upon his activity, each individual inhales from 8,000 to 16,000 quarts of air per day. Great attention is being paid to the purity of food and water supplies, but very little has been done yet about the vital air supply.

For generations, we have been content to inhale several thousand gallons of contaminated air every day.

Air, like water, is a limited natural resource. It has taken us a long time to realize that there is a limit to the amount of man's garbage the air can absorb and still be suitable for living in. We have come to the conclusion that air pollution is a serious, dangerous and costly curse to civilized living.

Industrial areas, of course, are the most affected. In this respect the air pollution problem is most serious in Toronto, where it is estimated to cost people of the area at least $60 million a year. Based on studies made in the United States and the United Kingdom, the report estimates that polluted air costs every person in the Toronto area an average of $40 a year, and that the average cost per person across Ontario is in excess of $20 a year.

The old-fashioned idea was that a smoking chimney is a sign of full lunch pails and of prosperity.

So states the report. It continues:

Today, however, it is an indication of waste, of bad manners, and of a source of unnecessary dirt and work for the housewife.

It may also be a sign of full hospital beds. Air pollution does have a detrimental effect on the physical and mental health, the efficiency and well-being of people who must exist in it.

There is considerable evidence to indicate that it is one of the causes for the growing incidence of lung cancer.

It certainly predisposes the individual to other respiratory illnesses and to cardiac trouble, and makes his recovery protracted, or his complaint chronic.

It can cause sudden death and has produced many episodes throughout the world which have resulted in large numbers of fatalities.

On the other hand, deaths from cancer of the trachea, lung and bronchus, from cancer of all kinds and from pneumonia and bronchitis are unexpectedly low in the rural areas and in Ontario municipalities with population less than 15,000.

The London Free Press in an editorial dated May 12, 1955, had this to say:

Too much concentration in a few larger cities will make for a situation such as in Australia, where nearly half the population is to be found in a few great cities. It has not been a healthy development. This must be avoided if at all possible in Ontario and in Canada.

J. V. McAree, a noted columnist, writing in the Globe and Mail, had this to say about traffic congestion in Toronto:

To wait fifteen minutes or more while crowded cars go by is a daily experience to tens of thousands. But we think that instead of blaming the Toronto transport commission, we in Toronto should realize that we are paying a price for living in a metropolitan city. What we are suffering every person in a big city suffers. There is no escape from it except possibly to move to a smaller town.

Mr. Speaker, I do not say that any government should force an industry to locate in any certain area, but I do say very emphatically that provincial and federal governments should encourage the decentralization of industry by improving the services which they, the governments, are responsible for, such as transportation facilities by road, water and rail, and cheaper electric power for outlying districts. I hope the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, considers well the resolution that was passed at the annual convention of the Ontario municipal electrical association held in Toronto early in 1956. That resolution asked the commission to consider taking steps that would eventually lead to an equalization of wholesale power rates to all municipalities in the province.

Mr. Speaker, concerning transportation by water, I wish to state that we in Bruce county have many locations where harbour facilities are crying for attention. Money is spent occasionally in small amounts, mostly for repairs, and in some cases the money spent does not bring any benefit whatsoever. As I stated before, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport should get together to formulate a plan of long-term improvements. By doing so they would save much of the money that is now being spent foolishly.

To the Minister of Transport I wish to say that the railway situation in Bruce is, to say the least, unsatisfactory. Down through the years the hard-working, industrious citizens of Bruce have paid their share of the C.N.R. deficits and in return received poorer and poorer service. Owing to this poorer service some business to the rail lines was lost, and of late years the C.N.R. has talked of curtailing the service we now have. I plead with the Minister of Transport to see that we not only hold the service we have but in addition receive improved service. It will be a sorrowful day if the good citizens of Bruce continue to be sacrificed on the altar of centralization.

As the Minister of Finance has the privilege of representing part of Bruce county, I feel that I am quite in order in drawing to his attention our hopes for a brighter industrial future.

I am very sorry that the Gordon commission did not recognize the seriousness of the problem of centralization, as I am sure there are many other districts with problems similar to those we have in Bruce. I am also disappointed that the throne speech did not deal more with health insurance, increased pensions to the aged and needy, the blind and the veterans. These increases are due owing to the higher cost of living and inflation, and they will probably be produced before the next election as election propaganda.

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, in order to acknowledge the principle of bilingualism in the house I should like to say a few words in the English language. First may I extend my compliments to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. May I extend the compliments of the season to all the members of the house. I should like to wish a victorious come-back to all members after the next election, but we must let the interests of the nation come first. Hence I shall leave the choice to Providence.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the recent C.P.R. strike has again given rise to the grave worries that beset the minds of all every time we witness a labour dispute of some importance.

We might even say that if labour problems are of concern to the public at large, it is more because those problems are a threat to people's comfort than because people are anxious to work efficiently for the establishment of true social justice. Politicians in particular work hard to preserve the sympathy of the workers but it is apparent that the politician fears the worker more than he understands him. There is promotion of economic liberalism in all its forms; the virtues of private enterprise are rightfully extolled but we forget to give it a heart. We are afraid to see the worker throw himself into a dangerous socialism which often leads to communism, but we forget that capital, which is heartless, is one of the main causes responsible for that threat. Economic liberalism, which is based on the inexorable law of supply and demand, leads to competition. In the face of this taskmaster, the only course open to the worker is the labour union, whose main force resides in the threat to strike. If ever the day comes when workers will no longer have the right to strike, we shall no longer have democracy.

Whether or not some strikes are just, whether or not they serve the ambitions of some individuals, it is not up to us here to decide. However, we who are responsible for the commonweal have a duty to improve the social climate that brings about these strikes. Every finished product coming out of a factory is the fruit of the harmonious union of two main factors, namely capital and labour.

In the social field, instead of close cooperation between capital and labour, we have a conflict of two groups from which originate misunderstandings between the main parties as they both remain obstinately attached to their own particular ideas, as well as misunderstandings among other groups of anxious bystanders who measure the repercussions of these disputes by the yardstick of their own interests. There is great talk of rights but little or no talk of obligations. Let capital have compassion and help the worker lose his own rancour. In his Magna Carta of labour, the encyclical Quadragesimo Anno, the text quoted being from page 140, Five Great Encyclicals, the Paulist Press, 1945, Pius XI has clearly defined the role of capital and labour. He declares among other things in this encyclical:

> It is therefore entirely false to ascribe the results of their combined efforts to either party alone; and it is flagrantly unjust that either should deny the efficacy of the other and seize all the profits.

This encyclical which is the social gospel of right-thinking conservatives nonetheless recognizes the right of capital to a reasonable profit but also claims for the worker a family salary which takes into account both the cost of living and of services rendered. This is where, to my mind, the state should intervene to protect the family which is the basic cell of society. A family allowance proportionate to the number of children must restore the family budget. It is a fact that the same salary for the same work can at once be a reasonable salary for a bachelor and the small family and a totally inadequate one for the father of a large family.

It is true that the multiplication of social measures leads to state socialism, but some are indispensable for the preservation of a social balance, and family allowances are, to my mind, the most essential legislation.

Immigration is called upon to people our country, whereas we should preach a higher birthrate which would enable the large family to prosper as it should. The hon. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) has said and rightly that he had greater confidence in Canadian babies than in immigrants for peopling our country. I hope he will draw the logical conclusion of his convictions and agree to a raise in family allowances, which is essential if Canadian babies are to multiply. I have asked every year in this house and I am insisting upon it again—that the government make family allowances proportionate to the cost of living. If a minimum rate of $5 was thought absolutely necessary in 1945 for this allowance, why do we tolerate that it should fall to $3.25 in 1957, as a result of the constant rise of living costs?

On every occasion when we advocated an increase of family allowances, we have been met with an easy answer about the lack of money.

When the time comes to appropriate billions of dollars for national defence, for the Colombo plan, for our contributions to NATO, and for some justifiable assistance to the Hungarian people, the government is soft-hearted. However, when the family is at stake, financial considerations are uppermost in its mind.

With the $400 million surplus of this year's budget, added to the $22 million we are about to dispose of as a free gift, family allowances could be doubled for the next ten years without an increase of a single cent in taxes. We are fed up with the financial argument. This government is far too generous in the fields assigned exclusively to the provinces by our constitution to act as a poor relation when the vital interests of the family are at stake.

I hope that the government will change the Family Allowances Act so that the allowance may be paid for dependent students as long as they are going on with their studies. I hope also that the government will do away with the inconsistent law which allows the deduction of only $150 to parents whose children receive the allowance. This is levying a tax on social legislation itself and take back with one hand what is given by the other. This money comes from taxes and to tax it is to levy a tax on a tax.

Let us place the family first. We will thus discharge our duties more surely and thus contribute to remove the dangers which threaten our world.

On the international level, in every country, in the heart of every human society and in the individual himself, we find the same universal "sore"; the world is dying from a lack of generosity. If we were as keen about charity as we are about our rights, the world would not need so many guns.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): There are many things in the throne speech, Mr. Speaker, that indicate the government proposes to introduce legislation that we welcome, such as the establishment of the Canada Council, the implication that there are going to be increased grants to universities, and the suggestion that a committee of the Senate be established to deal with conservation and the development of agricultural land in Canada. While these things are commendable and are welcomed by us, we find on an examination of the throne speech that there is a complete lack of proposals for the introduction of legislation that will meet the needs of many Canadians who require assistance and consideration at this time.

I have been searching for a reason, Mr. Speaker, as to why the throne speech is so barren of this legislation that most of us had a right to expect and which I think a good many of the Canadian people were expecting. I think I have come to the correct conclusion. I have come to the opinion that the government considers the official opposition no menace to its continued existence, and on that account we have this address with rather scanty proposals for legislation at this session.

I sympathize sincerely with the opposition, which contains a group of men of unquestioned integrity, many of them good friends of ours, genial and hard-working. But in the present circumstances in Canada they operate under a very severe handicap. I would say that they are a group of gentlemen who are frustrated in their efforts to do good by the strait-jacket of the circumstances that exist in Canada today.

If they adopt concrete proposals that go to the right, they lose popular support. If they develop some concrete proposals that go to the left, they find themselves in our camp. They are, therefore, in very difficult circumstances. Generally speaking I believe that is the reason they find it necessary to sit on the fence on most major issues, and to date have not proposed an alternative program. As our leader said some days ago, you cannot suggest to the Canadian people that you are an alternative to the present government unless you have an alternative program. I sympathize with them because it is most difficult for them to provide an alternative program to the program of the government of the day.

I said that was why they were reduced to sitting on the fence on risky and major issues. It was for that reason their leader did not take a definite stand on the strike issue. It is for that reason they are constantly required to speak in ambiguous terms. They cannot help it; the circumstances in Canada force that upon them. It is for that reason their major policy at the moment is one of directing questions to the cabinet on the orders of the day on matters, on many occasions, of little consequence.

I do not blame these hon. gentlemen for that approach. They are confined to that approach by the fact that the Progressive Conservative party, under the conditions that exist in Canada at this time, is a species that will be extinct in 10 years. I feel sorry for these gentlemen because some of them are good members. I may say the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) would make a good member of this group with a little polishing up on economics. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) would be a welcome addition. He is considered by some a secret C.C.F.'er. There are a number of other members in the group whose objectives in broad outline are the same as ours or those of any other hon. member who wishes to represent the people and see some improvement in Canadian conditions; that is, they wish to do well by the Canadian people, but—

Mr. Hodgson: Why did you change your policy?

Mr. Herridge: Because I saw the light.

Mr. Hodgson: It is not the Regina manifesto you are talking about.

Mr. Herridge: They simply cannot produce an alternative policy to that of the Liberal government under conditions that exist in Canada at this time. It is for that reason I say that the situation in Canada is developing under which this group offers an alternative policy to that of the government in power. We have a different basic philosophy and we have concrete proposals to put before the house and the country, namely democratic socialism.

I will admit that the party has a new leader, who no doubt will do his best. Mind you, they have a certain advantage over us in that respect, because the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party is a master of propaganda. His public relations organization, which has constant contacts with the press; his knowledge of the use of the radio and photographs at home, when they are appropriate, are such—and I admit it—that if the Leader of the Opposition were to burp tomorrow in the outer recesses of Afghanistan it would be known around the world in 24 hours. Mr. Speaker, under present conditions that will not elect a party that finds it impossible to produce an alternative program to that of the Liberal party at this time.

I say we have an alternative program. Our fundamental objective in Canada at this time is the development and conservation of our human and natural resources. We see this problem as a whole. I cannot deal at length with our program tonight to indicate that we do have a basic program in opposition to the government in power. We believe that under present economic and social conditions in Canada we have to look at our problems as a whole from a national point of view. That is why we believe in basic planning. We believe in the enlargement of the sector of public ownership in this country. We believe that a great number of these developments will not be undertaken to the advantage of the Canadian people unless they are at least promoted and developed as a result of federal government co-operation with the provincial governments concerned, whether it is development in the maritimes, the building of the South Saskatchewan dam or the building of the necessary dams in the development of the Columbia.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): You had better watch out or they will take over your timber limits.

Mr. Herridge: In addition to that we believe in genuine free enterprise. We believe in providing opportunities for legitimate competitive free enterprise and for the development and extension of co-operative ownership in this country. We believe in the use of Canadian capital for the development of Canadian natural resources. We believe we have a program that would make this possible under present conditions, and make it unnecessary to bring into this country such large imports of United States and other capital at this time. We believe in a national development investment board for that purpose, so that investment could be directed to the best social advantage. We believe in a national investment and development bank.

We believe that if the federal government used its powers in relation to the use of the national credit and mobilized the national savings under a national investment board, whether they are corporate or personal, we could do a great deal to build these things which are required in Canada with Canadian savings and resources. In addition we believe it is very necessary that there should be a revision of special exemptions to corporations, and we also believe there must be an increase in corporation taxes and higher income taxes. We say that frankly. We do not believe in making proposals for social welfare improvements without at the same time coming out frankly and saying we have to get the money to do these things, and we suggest where we should get it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the possibilities in the revision of exemptions given to corporations in Canada at the present time and the possibilities in higher income taxes. In support of that argument I wish to read briefly some figures which have been obtained from the dominion bureau of statistics and the Bank of Canada. When these figures are given let no one say that we cannot consider the needs of old age pensioners, disability pensioners and others in the country at this time. Between 1946 and 1955 there was a total of $6,940 million in undistributed corporate profits in Canada. In addition, between 1946 and 1955 the total depreciation allowances permitted corporations amounted to $11,214 million, and the total of corporation internally-generated funds amounted to $1,854 million. During that same period we had a net direct foreign investment in Canada of $2,119 million.

We are all concerned about the cost of living, and without doubt the cost of living is caused primarily by the excessive amount of direct foreign investment in Canada and competition for materials and labour. It is almost a direct result of heavy investment spending. I suggest in that connection our fiscal policies are radically different from those of the government. They are possibly policies that the official opposition would not advance, because they do not believe in taking this sort of action. Therefore under these circumstances we suggest there can be a legitimate increase in corporation taxes and higher income taxes, and there should be a revision of corporate exemptions. From these two sources we would obtain tremendous assets to give effect to some of the things we propose.

We now come to the cost of living. The government to date has a restricted money policy. I want to bring to the attention of the house an article that I happened to be reading this evening. It will be found in the January 19 issue of Saturday Night. Apparently the Minister of National Revenue recently addressed a meeting in Toronto with respect to this question. This is what the article has to say with reference to the minister's remarks:

> Dr. McCann could have given the students something better to think about by discussing, not the inevitability of tight money in inflationary times, but the relationship of economic development, inflation and credit controls that are not selective.
>
> Credit restraint that is non-selective, however, is a clumsy, perhaps even a dangerous weapon against inflation. It has proved to be far from the delicate mechanism that economists talked about a few years ago.
>
> When there is too much demand for too little money, the available funds flow inevitably into the most profitable channels.

That is our objection to the present credit controls. The article goes on:

> More often than not, the most profitable uses of money are also the most productive ones, from a business viewpoint. But while productive, these may not be the most imperative social uses. Unable to borrow, for example, builders are unable to put up as many houses and buyers must take on the extra load of higher interest rates; municipalities must either delay building the schools and other services they need or shoulder a heavier burden of debt.
>
> If credit must be controlled, it seems necessary that it also be rationed. Dr. McCann and his colleagues should do some serious thinking about credit in terms of distribution as well as restriction.

Personally I think those are extremely sound observations. Our credit restrictions should not be such as to prevent the building of houses, the provision of services required by municipalities, or those things that are required socially at this time. Our credit restrictions should be such that those projects do not suffer from whatever credit restrictions are necessary. It is because we take this point of view that we believe we are sound in urging the program we present to this house and to the country.

We have heard a great deal about prosperity, and without a doubt there is a general measure of prosperity in Canada at the present time, and there has been for some years; but there are many Canadians who at this moment do not enjoy that prosperity, and those Canadians are overlooked in the proposals contained in the throne speech. Because we believe our fiscal policies are alternative policies to those of the government and that they are sound because they are based on the theory that two and two make four, we say certain things can be done by this government to meet the needs of the people of this country at this time.

It is for that reason we advocate increased old age security, increased old age assistance and a reduction of the qualification age. We realize this would cost the country more money, but on the basis of the corporate profits paid out during the last 10 years, on the basis of the undistributed dividends, on the basis of total exemptions of corporations and on the basis of over $2 billion being spent for defence, surely no one could reasonably argue that if we sit down and try to redistribute the wealth of this country at this time in such a manner as to give all fair shares, we cannot do what is necessary for our older citizens. We say that if we want to we can give them $75 a month without question.

In that connection I also want to bring to the attention of the house what I consider an injustice. Judges, civil servants and other persons who receive various types of pensions from the federal government are allowed to leave Canada and continue to receive their pensions. In the case of persons receiving old age security or assistance they can leave Canada only for a period of three months. If they are not away for a longer period than three months I understand they are able to collect their cheques covering the period they were absent, but for not more than three months in any one year.

Surely these senior citizens who pioneered in this country have as much right to go to California or to the south in the winter because of their health or in order to overcome severe climatic conditions that exist in their districts as have judges and other federal pensioners. I think that is most unjust, and I urge the government when it introduces the measure to increase old age pensions to give consideration to permitting old age pensioners to enjoy the same rights with respect to leaving Canada as are enjoyed by other pensioners of the federal government.

Because of our belief in our sound fiscal policies simply through a proper redistribution of the wealth that now exists, we continue to urge a national health insurance plan, not a hospital plan but a total health insurance plan that will provide for hospital services, medical attention, drugs and the other clinical services that are necessary at this time.

We also continue to urge, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did the other day, the necessity for a national industrial pension scheme. I brought this up in the house at the last two sessions, and I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South has mentioned it for 10 years in succession to my knowledge. This is a scheme that requires only government administration and coordination. It will cost the government very little more than at present. We ask the government to give consideration to establishing a national industrial pension scheme so the workers employed in various industries in this country will have freedom of movement in labour, will be able to go from one plant to another instead of being chained to one plant by any present pension scheme after paying for more than five years because of the fear of losing their pension rights and so on.

We believe there should be greater provision for low cost housing. That will cost the government some money. I shall not deal with it at length at this time, but we in this group see no reason at all why we should not be giving these benefits to needy Canadians on the basis of the gross production of the country.

I want to refer briefly to the Legion brief which was presented to the cabinet by the dominion officers of the Legion on November 9. We all know the Canadian Legion and the other senior veterans associations are responsible organizations who are in touch with conditions as they concern veterans across this country through provincial commands, zones and local branches. I am pleased to see, Mr. Speaker, that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs is listening intently to what I have to say.

The Legion brief dealt largely with suggested amendments to the Pension Act and to the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I believe the Legion representatives presented excellent arguments and evidence in the brief, and it is my opinion that the veterans affairs committee should be established immediately to give consideration to these representations from the Canadian Legion and other bodies. In fact, it is the opinion of this group that the veterans affairs committee should be a permanent committee.

I do not intend to deal at length with this brief. I support the proposals because I have read the brief. I know the circumstances they refer to, and I believe their requests are fair, sound and within the capacity of the Canadian people to meet financially.

In their representations the Legion urge that section 13 (1) (a) of the Pension Act be amended so that where a pension applicant who served in an actual theatre of war is found to have a disability resulting from an injury or a disease not recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment, such injury or disease shall be presumed to have occurred or had its inception subsequent to enlistment. I know that is a difficult question, but the number of veterans affected by this amendment would be relatively small, and I urge the government to give consideration to this proposal because there is an injustice done to some veterans under the present legislation.

The Legion also urges revision of the rates for dependent parents, and recommends that the pension of dependent parents be restored to the former position whereby the rate for one parent was equal to the rate for a widow, with a more adequate additional amount than at present provided where there are two dependent parents. I know the parliamentary assistant realizes this is a recurring problem for the Canadian pension commission and those responsible for the administration of this act. The Legion then asks for an increased pension to certain dependent parents, and recommends that section 38 of the Pension Act be amended so that a dependent parent of a deceased member of the forces would become eligible for the maximum rate on the remarriage of the pensioned widow, even though pension is still being paid on account of a child or children of the deceased serviceman.

There is a further resolution here that I am not at all surprised to see in which they recommend that all disability pensions when granted should become effective from the date of application; but in order to allay fears of excessive awards going back to the first world war, jeopardizing the chances of the applicant, they append the following saving clause, namely that this provision should not apply to claims granted prior to January 1, 1946 and that no retroactive payments shall be made for a period prior to that date. I think that is a very reasonable and modest request as a result of my experience with the operation of that section of the act at the present time.

They also recommend that in order to obviate all possibility of future diversion of war pensions, section 24(3) of the act be amended to bind the Crown specifically so that a pension cannot be attached in any circumstances.

Then they come to the veterans who served in the first world war in the United Kingdom, and who are presently denied certain rights. They recommend that these veterans who saw service in the United Kingdom or with other allied governments should be brought within the provisions of section 13 of the act in the same way as those who were in Newfoundland at the time of enlistment.

Later they go on to the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I give credit to the government that the later amendments to the War Veterans' Allowance Act brought great benefits to many veterans, and I know from personal knowledge that they have been appreciated by many people who were able to take advantage of those amendments. I raise this point because our legislation has, generally speaking, been good. These are recommendations by the Canadian Legion as a result of their experience in the administration of these acts in recent years. In the light of this experience the Canadian Legion has recommended that ceilings on total permissible incomes under the War Veterans' Allowance Act be increased to $1,200 per year for the single recipient and $2,000 per year for the married recipient. The Legion also recommends that the married rate of war veterans allowance be increased from $108 per month to $120 a month. That was the point of major dispute when the act was before the veterans affairs committee some two or three years ago.

Further, the Legion recommends that Canadian veterans of the first world war whose overseas service was restricted to the United Kingdom be eligible for war veterans allowance provided that such service be at least one year in duration. That clause "one year in duration" has been added, very sensibly I think because at times there is evidence that the veteran was posted to Great Britain on service, frequently against his will. There are very few of these veterans who served in England in the first world war alive today, and the granting of this request of the Canadian Legion would not mean a very large expenditure on the part of the government. I would urge that further consideration be given to this question.

Later they come to the question of the widows of allied ex-servicemen and urge that they be granted war veterans allowances where the recipient died before completing 20 years' residence in Canada, providing:

(a) That the effective date of her eligibility be 20 years after the husband's arrival to take up permanent residence in Canada;
(b) That the widow herself has completed 20 years' residence in Canada, and
(c) That the husband and wife were both otherwise eligible.

There follows another clause which I think is a very necessary amendment to the act, and that is the recommendation which deals with the permissible equity in the value of the house which a veteran may own. The present figure is $6,000. The Canadian Legion has considered this matter very carefully and recommends that the permissible equity value of the house in which a recipient of war veterans allowance resides be increased from $6,000 to $9,000.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that deals with these recommendations. I have not taken time to elaborate on them. I do not think that is necessary. But I do ask the government on behalf of this group to give consideration to establishing a veterans affairs committee as soon as possible, and permitting the Legion and other organizations to present their evidence and their arguments before that committee. I am confident of this; that if the members of the committee recognize the validity of the evidence and the arguments, and appreciate the situation of many of the veterans in this country on whose behalf the Legion speaks, we shall have some very appropriate amendments to the Canadian Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Before leaving this matter of veterans affairs I would like to refer briefly to the question of small holdings. In my opinion the most successful housing program undertaken by this government has been by the Department of Veterans Affairs under the small holdings section of the Veterans' Land Act. Unfortunately, as I have mentioned I think in eight previous years in this house, veterans are in many cases unable to take advantage of this excellent legislation because of the acreage requirements. I understand at least three acres of land are required to qualify if the land is not valued at $500 an acre or less, but that it is possible to obtain qualification in respect of 1.6 acres if the land is valued at $500 or more.

I know one veteran who has a piece of property just 1.56 acres in size. He does not qualify under the small holdings provision of the Veterans' Land Act. I do urge reconsideration of this acreage requirement in order that we may meet the needs of veterans in many parts of Canada, particularly in British Columbia, where it is difficult to get these larger areas of land such as three acres and so on. In order that no veteran should be prevented from taking advantage of the act the acreage requirements in my opinion should be reduced to half an acre. In my own constituency there are nearly 400 veterans who are denied an opportunity to take advantage of the act by the present acreage requirements, men who would be able to take advantage of it if the requirement was reduced to half an acre. If the position is as serious as this in the constituency I have the honour to represent, similar circumstances must exist in many other ridings in Canada, and I urge the government to give consideration to this question.

Mr. Speaker, I just wish to make a few remarks with reference to international affairs. Since the house adjourned in August I have had the opportunity of visiting England, Belgium and France, and while there I took every opportunity to investigate the administration of the various departments of government; to discuss matters with labour people and industrialists; to visit housing developments in Britain and France, and to see many other interesting things.

I had the opportunity while in France of visiting all the Canadian fronts of the first world war. I have a particular and personal interest in those fronts, and while I was there I had occasion to see the Canadian war memorials now under the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I have no hesitation in saying that the war memorial at Vimy is the finest war memorial in France or Belgium. It is magnificent in design, in conception and in location, and I must pay a tribute to the officials of the department and their gardener assistants in France for the excellent way in which the gardens are kept, for the landscaping, and the administration in general. The administration of war memorials in Belgium and France is a credit to the Canadian people.

In addition, I had the opportunity to look at some housing developments in France which I thought were very ugly indeed. I cannot understand how people like the French, who have developed such magnificent architecture in centuries past, can now be constructing such ugly and uninteresting housing developments. I saw development after development without any particular design at all, with houses like boxes, built of cement and ugly in the extreme, apparently built with only one object in view, to house as many people as possible within a certain space.

I returned to England and had the opportunity to sit in the House of Commons during the major portion of the debate on the Suez issue. I must say that I received every courtesy from members of all parties and members of the House of Lords whom I had the opportunity to meet. I sat there and listened to that interesting debate, and I was particularly struck with one thing. I talked to members of the house, members of the upper house and other persons I met generally, and travelled around a great deal. What struck me particularly was the basic stability and underlying cohesion of the British people, regardless of the great division of opinion on a most serious and important matter; an underlying stability and cohesion that kept the nation, shall I say, united in principle although divided on a particular issue, an issue of such serious moment that it could have split apart other nations we know.

I was particularly pleased with the very high quality of the debate in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords, and I must say that as an Anglican I was delighted to hear the Archbishop of Canterbury say what he thought about the Suez issue. He was very vigorous in the expression of his opinion about that issue; he was chivied a bit afterwards by three or four noble lords who spoke after him, and he rose on three or four occasions to defend what he had said. But regardless of the deep division there is a tremendous respect for the elected representatives of the people in Great Britain and no one, whether they were on the government side of the benches or the Labour side, questioned anyone's motives. All that was questioned was the action that was undertaken.

I see that my time is disappearing very quickly and I must hurry along. I had the opportunity to go to the United Nations as a parliamentary observer. I think that is an excellent arrangement. Apparently ours is the only government that does it exactly in that way, and anyone who takes full advantage of the opportunity provided as a parliamentary observer at the United Nations must find it a fruitful and useful experience.

I must take this opportunity to compliment the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his work at the United Nations in recent months. It is recognized throughout the world, and Canada's prestige is particularly high at this time. I spoke to representatives of other nations, and whether they agree with us completely about this or that Canada is recognized as a country without any exterior ambitions, able to look upon these questions in a very objective manner. I have no hesitation in paying my tribute to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the magnificent job he has done in recent months.

However, having said that I find that there is some division in the Liberal party. This party is united on this issue. I find there is one section of the Liberal party that has what I would term a duplex, reversible international policy. I want to read a Canadian Press dispatch of November 9, 1956. The heading is, "Thatcher Lauds Eden's Actions", and it is in these words:

> Ross Thatcher, member of parliament for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, says Prime Minister Sir Anthony Eden may have saved the Middle East from communism by moving forces into Egypt.
>
> The former C.C.F. member, now Liberal candidate for Assiniboia in the next federal election, said Wednesday Eden "by halting the antics of a sawdust Hitler may well have saved the Middle East from communism.
>
> "Canadians generally are proud of the part taken by Lester Pearson in the United Nations in bringing about a cease-fire. It is quite possible that in so doing he has prevented a third world war."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is my duty to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Herridge: Have I permission to finish one sentence or so?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: I want to say that here we have the hon. member congratulating both sides. It is obvious he has no greater understanding of Liberal policy than he had of C.C.F. policy when he was a member of this group.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, custom and tradition have given a great flexibility to the debate on the address in reply. That is why I shall take this opportunity to express personal opinions on special problems, especially those of particular concern to the people I have the honour to represent in this house.

Before going into the main part of my remarks, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The well prepared speeches they have made reflect their knowledge of politics and of the problems of the day. Their constituents have reason to be proud of the choice they made at the last general election, a choice which they will no doubt renew with pleasure at the next election.

The agricultural class and the working class share about equally in the economic activity of the constituency of Lake St. John. Generally speaking we are quite happy about our lot. The Aluminum Company of Canada which, together with the pulp and paper industry, is responsible for the industrialization of the district, has just undertaken works of immense magnitude on the Peribonca river, in the northern part of the constituency, in order to develop hydroelectric power to the extent of 700,000 horsepower. 1,500 men are already gainfully employed there and it is assumed that before the end of the summer this figure will have more than doubled. Before that project is completed, lines of vats for the production of aluminum will be erected at Ile Maligne so that the production of aluminum ingots in this locality should be equal to that of Arvida which is at present the greatest aluminum producing centre. It means that the working class is justified in hoping for a high level of employment and for reasonable salaries but, even though full employment brings prosperity to all sections of our economy, the situation of the farmer remains unstable and unsatisfactory.

Agriculture is a section of our Canadian economy to which the government must give particular attention; I am glad to see that the speech from the throne provides greater encouragement for agriculture.

On January 9, in the course of this debate, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has shown that he is well aware of the situation of our Quebec farmers and of the importance, to the Canadian economy, of our agricultural element. That is the reason why the Senate investigation proposed by the government cannot but bring beneficial results for agriculture as a whole as well as an improvement of economic conditions for our farmers.

Meanwhile, a good way to help the farmers, as well as the workers with large families, would be to increase the rate of family allowances.

We are indebted to the Right Honourable Mackenzie King and to the liberal party for this excellent social legislation. I do not know of any other social measure offering as many advantages as the Family Allowances Act; it is the one that helps the largest number of Canadians.

Since 1945, the cost of living has increased substantially, so that the original value of the allowances has sharply decreased.

We are now facing a serious threat of inflation, which causes more concern to those who come under a measure of such a high social value.

I have received requests from several hundreds of my constituents who are asking the government to increase the rate of family allowances.

I support these requests, Mr. Speaker, for I know they are rightful requests. If the government could double those amounts it would be a very good thing, but the least that can be done is to give these social dividends the buying power they had in 1945.

Ever since I became a member of this house I have taken a keen interest in unemployment insurance. As a matter of fact, at the first session of the last parliament I asked that our bushworkers come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I thought that the need for protection was greatest for those who are the most exposed to fluctuations in the labour market. That is why I did not hesitate to speak on their behalf in this house. And it was not in vain, since on April 1, 1950, bushworkers could qualify as all other workers.

When the law was revised, in 1955, I advocated the abrogation of the seasonal regulations concerning that class of workers. I wish to thank the authorities of the commission who saw fit to grant my request and the request which was made, the same day, by my colleague from Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais).

The purpose of the revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act was to extend its application to a larger number of people, and to increase the amount of the benefits. We have achieved our goal in part, but I thought I should make a suggestion to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) in order to improve the lot of those who want to avail themselves of it to a larger extent.

Amendments to the act voted early last session had the effect of assimilating the rate of seasonal benefits to the rate of ordinary benefits and to extend to ten weeks the minimum period during which an unemployed person is entitled to receive such payments during the off season. When bringing in these amendments, the legislators had mainly in mind the human side of the question; this is why I too want to suggest that seasonal benefits should begin to be paid as from early December; a construction worker generally becomes unemployed at the end of November and such amendment as I just proposed would enable our unemployed to receive unemployment benefits before the Christmas and New Year holidays. What a comfort it would be to those people who are already in a plight after losing their jobs to receive benefits enabling them to buy at least the bare necessities of life at that time of the year!

Each of us still remembers with anxiety the events of last fall, when Israel, France and England, each in turn, invaded Egypt. Upon this occasion, our Prime Minister and our representatives in the United Nations played a most important part and history will recognize that Canada, in proposing the creation of an international police force, found the formula which prevented another world war. I must say that I was very proud of the firm attitude of our Prime Minister. His words and his deeds proved to the world that our country was an independent and sovereign country and that, consequently, it could take its own responsibilities and its own attitudes.

Afterwards, an incident occurred which emphasized a national weakness, namely the absence of a distinctive national flag. Hon. members will recall the refusal of Colonel Nasser to approve the presence of a Canadian battalion because the flag of that regiment contained a union jack which could lead to confusion with the British flag.

I have brought up this question of a flag two or three times in this house but, in view of its importance, I want to raise it again.

On December 9, 1953, seconding a motion introduced by my colleague from Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), I made the following statements which I would like to repeat today:

> We have achieved national unity through the efforts of the Liberal party and of those who have been its leaders for the past 50 years. It is also under Liberal administrations, and more particularly through the efforts of our present leaders, that our country progressed through the various stages that led to complete sovereignty and independence. The logical consequence of our previous moves would therefore be to endow our country with a distinctive national flag.
>
> There has been much thought of national unity. To my mind there is nothing more important for the furtherance of that national unity than a flag which, in every circumstance, should serve as a rallying sign for all Canadians. Every citizen of this country is proud of belonging to this great Canadian nation of ours. The best way to give concrete form to this pride is to adopt an exclusive Canadian symbol.
>
> Certain timorous individuals, more imperialistic than Canadian, fear that by doing away with the union jack we will weaken the ties that bind us to the commonwealth. To them I would say that the strength of the whole is the sum total of the strength of the parts. In any event these people should now understand that sentimental links are a thing of the past so far as Canada is concerned and that if we remain in the commonwealth it is because we find it to be in our interest, to begin with, as well as in the common interest of the free peoples and of the cause of world peace.

The present Prime Minister has stated on various occasions that he is favourable to the adoption of a truly distinctive flag, but he believes, wisely, in my opinion, that the taking of such a step must not be a matter for controversies sufficiently bitter to prejudice national unity.

Last Tuesday when the house opened, he said something which has given me an idea which I would like to pass on to the government. In congratulating the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. Prime Minister said:

> I extend to the Leader of the Opposition our sincere good wishes in his new position and I wish to assure him quite seriously that I will be ready at all times to discuss with him in advance matters which need not be controversial on party lines and about which national unity might perhaps be best served by solutions that we could all recommend to those whom we represent in parliament.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the choice of a truly distinctive national flag should not be a controversial matter in Canada. That is why I am suggesting a conference of the four party leaders; if there are still some Canadians who do not favour a distinctive national flag, I say that the duty of the party leaders is to direct and guide public opinion.

Such a consultation would acquaint us with the opinion of the different party leaders and, I am sure, would bring about a unanimous feeling on a question so essential to Canadian sovereignty and to the independence of our beautiful and great country.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the population has heard with the greatest satisfaction about the settlement of the Canadian Pacific strike.

I wish to congratulate the hon. Prime Minister for his part in the negotiations. He has shown that, in this field, as well as in many others, he is a true leader for the Canadian nation. I am sure that, when the time comes, Canada will show him its appreciation.

(Text):

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It was indeed gratifying to note the spirit with which the mover of the address went out of his way to say a few words in the French language, thus recognizing the importance of the two languages in this country.

As I rise to speak in this debate let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, as I remind this house, that unemployment is still the No. 1 problem in my riding. While the government stubbornly refuses to build the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge or to even divert some repair work to our only foundry, thousands of men are idle. Many of them do not have enough insurance stamps to benefit from the badly regulated and directed unemployment insurance commission. In the midst of the mythical and invisible prosperity, in the maritimes at least, of which the mover and seconder of the address boasted, stark misery, suffering and hardship are seen on every hand. The hon. member for Gloucester, the seconder of the address, unless he is much more misinformed than I think he is, is well aware of the hardships of his people, and his smug indifference to their plight must astound this house as it indeed astounds the people of his riding. He leaves me no alternative but to agree with many people in his riding that the hon. member would make a good baby sitter, but he is no representative of his people.

Undoubtedly this hon. member feels that so long as his people live in misery, want and hardship, the Liberal propaganda machine can again scare them into voting Liberal by making threats, at which the hon. member is an expert, that to vote anything but Liberal will mean the loss of widows' allowances, family allowances, old age pensions and so on. It is indeed a most fortunate omen that recent Conservative victories in the maritime provinces have killed this myth once and for all. Our people will no longer vote Liberal because of the fear,—instilled by crooked, dishonest Liberal propaganda—of losing their pensions. The flagrant swinging of this club has for years been the No. 1 tactic of the Liberal propaganda machine. More and more our people are awakening from their past indifference in federal politics and realizing how badly, how inefficiently and how wastefully this country is being governed. They are realizing how much worse off our citizens in this country are than they would be if we had a good federal government. They are realizing as never before that a freshly dedicated, conscious government must take over.

As we reach this inescapable conclusion we cannot escape the stark fact that only the Conservative party offers an alternative to this present dead, dormant and decadent administration. Never before in our history have our people been more aware that Canada has been putting up with half measures of the prosperity, security, and standard of living which would now be ours if only we had a good federal government, one dedicated to the welfare of the Canadian people, first and foremost; one more prepared to listen to the will of the Canadian people than the dictates of Colonel Nasser; one willing to give full opportunity to all the sections of our country and all of our people.

Let me just spend one minute on this tight money policy. In order to cure possible inflationary tendencies in central Canada, the government increases the economic depression already existing in the maritime provinces. This forces the small businessman to turn to the high-interest money lender, and the prices of many goods go up. Household appliances, cars and heavy equipment formerly financed by notes at the bank at reasonable rates of 5 per cent or 6 per cent are now being financed by finance companies at 16 per cent, 24 per cent and in some cases 50 per cent.

Is this government acting in collusion with the finance companies? Why do they overlook the fact that inflation results from the scarcity of labour or materials or both? In my riding at the present time one-fourth of the labour force is out of work, and many who are still employed are working for starvation wages in certain areas of my riding. One firm pays less than $30 a week for 10 hours a day, six days a week.

In the midst of prosperity we remain poor and provincial governments are crippled. Projects like Beechwood suffer. Municipalities, church bodies, school boards, towns and villages see their plans for providing urgently needed services dissolved while their people suffer for want of work, food, shelter and fuel. If ever we saw a government legislate a section of our country into deeper and deeper depression, we are seeing it now as we look across the floor of this house at the prima donnas of the Liberal tight money policy, as they pursue it and as they apply it.

Let me say a word about farming. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has indeed earned every epithet the farmers of my area and across Canada may be levelling at him. Personally I like the Minister of Agriculture. Although he stretches like an elastic band the credulity of our people when he speaks, he seems to be a good joker. How I wish he were also a good Minister of Agriculture. I wish we had a Minister of Agriculture who would at least take the trouble to come down to our riding and see the pitiful condition in which the farmers of Madawaska county find themselves. If he did, he would resign. This is no idle statement. If my friendly enemies on the other side of the floor should think otherwise, let me mention only one case.

Hon. members will recall the much-publicized aid to the potato growers for which we fought so long and worked so hard. Here are the results of that aid. The Liberal propaganda about it cost many times more than the amount of the aid itself. You will recall that in approving the plan to help our potato farmers, $500,000 was voted. But by the time this indolent government got the plan into operation, do you know how much aid was actually received? Let me refresh your memory. There was $5,000 actually spent, and $495,000 never reached our farmers. Is there any doubt now that this program was for publicity only and Liberal votes, not for help for our still hard-pressed farmers? This bird-brained saboteur of New Brunswick, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), and the baby sitter from Gloucester cannot deny these figures because they were given to me by the department itself in a letter from the deputy minister. Only 9,100 barrels of potatoes were marketed under this plan, and only $5,000 in aid was expended. This is indeed a far cry, Mr. Speaker, from the Liberal bragging about $500,000 worth of assistance. One per cent of the amount got to the hard pressed farmers.

I was talking today to some very good Liberal farmers in Carleton county. Let me tell you that these farmers recalled how a few years ago 100 cargoes of potatoes would be shipped to Cuba. But that was before this government put an import duty on sugar, and as a result of retaliation by the Cuban government they now import less than one cargo of potatoes a year.

Mr. Gardiner: It was the Bennett government that did that.

Mr. Van Horne: False. Senator Pirie was not a senator during that regime. I can assure you that he was one of the men from New Brunswick, and a Liberal at that, who rose in the Senate and objected when it was adopted, and said publicly for everyone to hear that this was having a crucifying effect on the potato farmers of New Brunswick. If the farmers in my riding had a minister of agriculture things might be different. We want to know where he is; we never see him; we never even see his shadow.

Mr. Gardiner: I have been all over the province.

Mr. Van Horne: In my area we have a farm loan board, and it is a farce. First of all, the comfort-seeking investigators will not lower themselves to make an investigation of an application in winter time. Oh, no; it is too cold; they might get their feet wet; and our farmers have to need the money when it is convenient for the officials of the board to investigate their applications. Our farmers in Madawaska county and in the St. Quentin area speak French only. They do not understand, let alone speak, English. Why do you insist on sending investigators who speak not a word of French? However, these matters could be endured if only the loans were made, but one application after another is turned down, in many cases without even the semblance of an investigation being made.

Why cannot this government have more faith in our farmers, and why can it not smarten up and give to those farmers the consideration that it gives to foreigners? Why is it that unemployment insurance is refused to our farmers and our farmers' helpers? Our farmers keep complaining that they cannot keep hired men on their farms, and the reasons are not hard to find. The federal government chase our farm help away by their stupid refusal to make them eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. Who will deny that these men are the men who need unemployment insurance benefits the most? They work 14 hours a day in the summertime and have to lie idle for many months during the winter time. I ask you, what is your idea of justice? Of course, I realize that as long as we have the present misfit as Minister of Labour our farmers and our farm help will continue to be unjustly treated.

I speak, Mr. Speaker, for the forgotten people of this country, and it is high time this government stood up and took notice. The same situation applies to farmers who earn a living cutting pulpwood on their lands. They are denied unemployment insurance benefits. They work the hardest and under the worst conditions, but get the least. Unemployment insurance acts like a mythical life insurance company which would require a person to die four or five times before his widow could collect the insurance.

Another point I would like to bring up this evening is this. The north shore of New Brunswick is without air services. At the present time, in view of the budworm-spraying program, several good air strips are in operation. Very little would be needed to convert one of those landing strips, such as the one on the plateau above Robinsonville, into a first-class air field. Our people demand that the government convert this field into an airport and let the Maritime Central Airways, or Trans-Canada Air Lines, provide regular air service from this point. I mention this area because it would cost comparatively little to convert the present air strip into a first-class airport. The work has already been partly done. Next summer it will be able to accommodate something like 50 or 60 airplanes at a time, and there is no reason whatever why one of those air strips, particularly the one above Robinsonville, because it is the handiest to all points in the area, could not be converted into a first-class airport. In view of the work already done the cost would be small.

By the way, what does the government intend to do about the pitiable state of some of our airports? The airports at Sydney, at Quebec city and at so many other places are as dull and drab as is the Minister of Transport himself. The dining service at these terminals is getting worse. It would appear that short-order cooks discharged from some of our lumber camps for inefficiency have taken over the catering at these airports. I ask, why is it that the meal service at terminals cannot approximate the meal service on the Canadian National Railways, for instance, or the dining service so much appreciated at terminals in Europe?

In the field of foreign policy Canada has, in the past months, with its subservient acceptance of Colonel Nasser's dictates, with the minister's cocky boasting, with the ridiculous attitude he has adopted toward Nasser's slightest wishes, slipped and slipped badly. Indeed, our Secretary of State for External Affairs has given the impression that Canada has become a little bulldog in a bow tie. I recall what the New York Daily Mirror said not so long ago in very plain terms:

> Come on, Mr. Pearson, no one in our country challenges Canada's greatness or sovereignty. Let us continue the world's finest example of international friendship in equality and mutual respect—with no backbiting.

I can assure this house and all the people of all countries that we in Canada resent this backbiting on the part of our minister and our government, and this nauseating kowtowing to Nasser's slightest wishes, just as much as the people of the other countries resent them.

Canada's entire military organization is replete with names denoting royal affiliations and traditions. To prevent the 17-year old untrained soldiers of the Queen's Own Rifles from seeing their families before being forced to leave for Egypt, and then to keep them stranded and in bounds in Halifax for weeks just because of the Nasser-Pearson partnership, with Pearson the junior and order-taking partner, is nothing short of an insupportable insult to all our troops and to the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: You are insulting your own party.

[Mr. Van Horne.]

(Translation):

Mr. Van Horne: You will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to deal in French with a few problems concerning particularly the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) who, I am sorry to say, has just left the house, and the negligent way in which he directs his department. I understand perfectly, of course, that the minister is so full of himself and so possessed with the burning desire to see his picture in the papers, that he no longer finds the time to look after his own responsibilities. I urge him most energetically to forget his selfish and narrow-minded attitude and to think of our invalids, of the mothers of our families, of our children, of our older citizens who have been so cruelly abused by the federal government for the last few years. When you reach 65, you still have to be poor to receive a miserable pension of $40 and you have to be most careful about remaining poor not to lose it. How can one believe in justice if one remembers that the cost of living has almost doubled over the last ten years but the government still refuses to increase pensions and family allowances in a way which would be commensurate with this rise in the cost of living? Do you think that our pensioners can work miracles and live on $40 a month when even your statistics show that it takes at least $87.50 a month for a person to live?

The pension to disabled persons is as unjust as ever. I know hundreds of men unable to walk and consequently unable to earn their living, who cannot obtain this pension, little as it is. As I said, one has to be practically dead to obtain it and remain so to keep receiving it. In fact, unless our people can prove that the sole reason for which they are not dead is that they cannot afford funeral expenses, they are unable to obtain that pension. If, perchance, one succeeds in obtaining this pension, one loses it as soon as one enters the hospital or a rest home, that is at the very moment when it is most needed. If the minister calls that justice I suggest to him quite sincerely to go back to school.

Moreover, can the minister tell us what he has against children of unknown parents, so as to refuse to pay allowances to the institutions where they are kept at a heavy cost and sacrifice?

The minister is so infatuated with himself and is so fond of having his picture taken, of facing cameras, that he is no more aware of the suffering and of the hardship he is inflicting upon thousands of our unfortunate citizens. His crime is the more horrible considering that his victims are, mostly, children, disabled people, mothers of families. The minister has only one thing to do: resign from his post. If he wants to chase cameras throughout the world, let him do so at his own expense, and not at the expense of the neglected citizens of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I was just speaking about the Minister of National Health and Welfare—

Mr. Byrne: Reading about him, you mean.

Mr. Van Horne: —and saying that if the Kodak kid spent half as much time looking after his department as he spends chasing cameras all over creation we would have a better department.

Last October I spent a few weeks travelling from capital to capital in Europe studying the social security systems operating in several countries, and in particular I studied the national hospitalization plan of the United Kingdom. I look across the floor of this house and I fix my regard on the minister. I ask him now as I will ask him again and again, what is wrong with his department and what is wrong with him? Is he going to sit there and proclaim that the Canadian people just do not deserve the same advantages as do our kinsmen in Great Britain, for instance? I visited doctors, nurses and hospitals and talked to patients. There is no escaping the fact that a crushing burden borne with such patience by our people in Canada has been lifted from the people of Great Britain in ridding themselves of hospital and doctor bills.

When I see dying people in Canada refused admittance to hospitals because they have not been able to pay their last hospital bill, and when I consider the vast improvement in the health of the English people and the many benefits of the system as it works in Britain I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that nothing short of the indifference of the Canadian government is responsible for not having established a similar system in Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Van Horne: Would you mind waiting until I am finished, sir?

Mr. Herridge: Not at all.

Mr. Van Horne: One of the greatest tragedies in Canada is the failure of so many of our people to realize how badly we are governed. Under our National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and under the direction of a government interested in the welfare of the people, housing could become a solved problem; but the facts show in no uncertain way that countless thousands of Canadians are denied the right of owning a home for one or more of the following reasons.

1. The loan cannot be obtained. Stupid, overbearing and discriminatory regulations prevent loans being made in many areas where they are most needed, and the tight money policy stops the money-lending agencies from making loans.

2. The down payment is too high. Why cannot this government get off its high horse and adopt the United States housing plan, under which down payments are waived entirely for veterans and where the sum of $400 or $500 constitutes the down payment for a house costing from $10,000 to $12,000, as compared with the down payment of $3,000 or $4,000 required here to purchase a similar house? Our people have been so misgoverned and ill-treated for so long that they simply do not have the $3,000 or $4,000 needed for a down payment under the government plan, and our people with large families on limited incomes who need housing the most are pushed aside and denied the right to own their own homes.

3. Loan values are not permitted for houses already built. Here again, why cannot this government adopt the United States attitude and recognize that by its present stupid policy the government is making houses impossible to purchase because sufficiently large loans on them just are not available? The result is that our people who already have homes see their equity diminish and sometimes disappear as they are unable not only to sell their houses but must accept prices which cut out or reduce their interest or equity in them.

4. The present regulations and standards are unreasonable, and the interest rates are unreasonably high.

These wrongs can be righted without costing the government one cent. This is not a hand-out; this is a money-making proposition for the government. The government is making millions each year on the present loans, and this in spite of the costly palace which serves as headquarters for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the terrific overhead and expense incurred in the running of this department.

In 1954 the government cleared over $14 million on these loans; in 1955, over $16 million. The profits are going up all the time. Is this not sufficient proof that the government can do better, and in regard to housing, as in regard to so many other things, place the Canadian people in the same position in which the United States government places its people? How stupid can this government get? Think of the cruelty of which you are guilty as you prevent hundreds of thousands of good Canadian families from owning their own homes. This government has much to answer for, and it cannot escape the moral obligations confronting it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to dwell for a moment on maritime rights, particularly as they relate to the report of the Gordon commission. Some progress has been achieved in having this government recognize the seriousness of the depressed economic situation in the maritime provinces. The premier of my province has emerged as the foremost champion of the long-ignored maritime rights. Never before have Canadians as a whole been so keenly aware that this country cannot and should not exist on the basis where one part enjoys a degree of prosperity, however meagre, while the Atlantic provinces are pushed aside and forgotten by this government.

Canadians are shocked to learn, for instance, of the government's recent gift of $35 million to India to build a hydroelectric project—not that we oppose foreign aid—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Van Horne: —while it still refuses to even endorse our note for $45 million to build the Beechwood project. I am not opposed nor do I think anyone could be opposed to foreign aid commensurate with Canada's position as a leading nation of the world, but we elected a government to look after the needs of Canada, and that is what we expect this government to do as its first consideration. Canadians are shocked to see government advertising proclaim that it will build 10 new bridges over the St. Lawrence, while it has stubbornly refused a miserly little bridge across the Restigouche river at Campbellton.

All our newspapers appear unanimous in their expressed opinion that remedial measures are needed to help equalize opportunities and the standard of living in the maritimes with the level of semi-prosperity that exists in central Canada. The Prime Minister himself has on several occasions acknowledged the backward and depressed economic conditions in the maritimes, and several ministers of the crown have confirmed this view. Therefore our problem at this time is not so much to acquaint this government with the conditions that exist, since we have finally succeeded in penetrating the thick wall of stubbornness, apart from a couple of saboteurs of New Brunswick whose blind stupidity prevents them from helping New Brunswick. The government realizes the conditions as they exist in the maritime provinces. In other words the first stage has been overcome, but our great problem now is to get this lazy and indolent government to move, to take action, to take the steps necessary to equalize the economic opportunity of all sections of our country, to give the maritimes justice and good government, which we have never received from this administration.

But now the escape tactic of the government has changed. Previously they said everything was fine in the maritimes; previously the government was blind. Now the escape tactic is: "Tell us how we can help you?" Now, Mr. Speaker, just who is this government trying to fool? Has it the effrontery to stand here and tell us in the maritimes that we have not stated, again and again, what our needs are and what measures must be adopted to equalize our economic situation and advantages with those of upper Canada. From that first day, the first day of confederation, the day on which so many of our forefathers flew the flag at half mast, our representatives of the maritimes, apart from those who were blinded and silenced by this trained seal, safe seat somewhere Liberal subservience, have risen and spoken for the maritimes.

At the time of confederation, as an inducement to influence the maritimes to enter confederation, the Chignecto canal was to be the No. 1 project to help New Brunswick and Nova Scotia maintain their transportation advantages in regard to their advantageous pre-confederation trading position and to help overcome the back-seat trading position they had to accept as they entered confederation.

I will not repeat all the statements I made last year concerning the Chignecto canal, but briefly it would permit a whole new industrial expansion program to come about in the areas adjacent to the canal, and would give New Brunswick and Nova Scotia the advantage of cheaper transportation. Transportation in the maritime provinces is as much a stumbling block to progress as lack of power. We demand, as we have demanded over the years, drastic reductions in transportation rates to the full extent needed to permit competition by maritime producers and manufacturers in confederation-made markets. We demand action, and we demand it now. We demand a whole, new and complete revision of our freight rates act. In other words, we have demanded and we demand again a new deal for the maritime provinces.

Power has long held us up. Even today the pulp mill at Dalhousie is held up for lack of power. Every day opportunities to develop our mines are lost because of lack of power. Let us look at what this government did and what it is doing regarding the position at Beechwood. If ever a government went out of its way to give a province a slap in the face, to reduce its federal Minister of Labour to a choreboy of the cabinet, to insult a province, it was when this government refused to sign our note to let us borrow money at a lower rate of interest to build the Beechwood power project. We did not ask for one cent; we asked for a signature only. But we got insults instead, and this at a time, Mr. Speaker, when hundreds of millions were being given away to build power projects in other countries.

Lack of capital for our industrial development has also held us up for a long time, and don't think for one minute that the industrial development bank does more than render lip service in the maritime provinces. Why does the government not adopt the United States attitude and help out? The industrial development bank could become an effective means of helping the maritimes, but at present it is failing miserably.

A word about the Gordon commission. I hear Liberal members complain that the Gordon commission is making statements that the government should pay people to move out of the maritimes. Well, Mr. Gordon, very reluctantly I suppose, came to the conclusion and was so convinced that this government would do nothing for the maritime provinces that the least it could do was to buy tickets for those who wanted to leave. What other alternative did Mr. Gordon have? Why get up and blame him for telling the truth? He confirms what has been said time and time again. It is a fact. The report said that the average income in this region continued to lag behind the average for the rest of Canada. In 1955 average income per family was 31 per cent below the average for the other six provinces and, the report continues, there is a disparity of 37 per cent on a per capita basis. The fact remains, the report says, that living standards are lower in the Atlantic provinces than in the rest of Canada, and that it is in everyone's interest to reduce this differential.

I feel this government has now been told what it has always refused to believe. Mr. Gordon says in this report that it is not suggested that this assistance should be affected by hand-outs or ad hoc projects. Surely when New Brunswick asked the government for the endorsement of its note we were not asking for a hand-out. "They are as unpalatable", Mr. Gordon says, "to the recipient as to those who must foot the bill", to quote the report.

> What is required is a positive and comprehensive approach to the problems of the Atlantic region. With this as the objective it is suggested that the people of Canada as a whole may be willing to assist the people of the Atlantic provinces in discovering, developing and making the best use of resources in that area.
>
> If it should turn out that there is not the necessary combination of resources in sufficient quantity to permit a substantial rise in the standard of living in the Atlantic region generous assistance should be given to those people who might wish to move to other parts of Canada where there might be greater opportunities.

I could think of a few people who might very well take that advice. The hon. member for Charlotte, for instance; maybe he will take that advice or the advice of Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland, who incidentally happens to be a Liberal. He said:

> Every year that passes, no matter how we strive, no matter what risks we take or what gambles we risk—every year that passes leaves us relatively weaker compared with the rest of Canada.
>
> How long can this go on? The people will be sucked irresistibly into richer and more attractive parts of Canada. We are not willing to lie down and die on the Atlantic coast. We shall kick up such a devil of a row that we shall make them ashamed.

He added some hopeful words at that time. Premier Smallwood prophesied that the Gordon commission would produce a new charter for the Atlantic provinces and that confederation would begin to mean just and equal treatment for the Atlantic provinces.

There was the prophecy and the Gordon report is the reality. As one of the newspapers said, "We say thank you very much, Mr. Gordon—thank you for nothing; we knew all about it before you said those things".

Mr. Speaker, I see my time is about up. There are a few more subjects I would like to discuss. I have not approached the subject of unemployment insurance, which in my riding and in many sections of this country continues to be one horrible mess. We see big families whose fathers work at seasonal jobs, jobs that do not give them the required number of stamps, and I have visited families in distress because of this; I have seen them time and time again. I have brought hon. members of this house to visit families where there were no fires in the house and where an orange crate was used as a cupboard, often with very little in it and sometimes nothing at all, simply because these people lacked two weeks of stamps. They have to eke out a living as best they can, simply because this government has refused to give them unemployment insurance benefits. Why call it unemployment insurance if it is not going to be that?

It is not the fault of these people. I speak today for the suffering people of this country of whom this government is not aware, judging by its actions and especially with regard to unemployment insurance. I am sorry the Minister of Labour is not here in his place tonight, because I have a few things to say when he is here and I will wait until he comes into the house before saying them.

An hon. Member: He will be here.

Mr. Van Horne: I will wait till he comes. There can be no doubt in anyone's mind that the people of the country expect more of the unemployment insurance commission than it is doing with over $950 million in reserve. Surely methods can be adopted to reduce the number of weeks required to obtain unemployment insurance. What possible reason can you give? I look across the floor at this baby sitter, the hon. member for Gloucester, and I know full well the conditions that exist in his riding, and how the people are suffering. I ask, "Why are you hoarding this money?" Why is the government not taking steps?

Mr. Robichaud: We are not buying anything.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, I call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Van Horne: Certainly.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member has eulogized the British national health scheme. If the present government introduced such a scheme, would his party support it?

Mr. Van Horne: I will say this. You read the manifesto of the Conservative party.

Mr. Lesage: You say nothing.

Mr. Van Horne: You know very well that the Conservative party has for many years past advocated and pleaded for a system of national hospitalization which would—

Mr. Lesage: Oh, oh.

Mr. Van Horne: This misfit minister of the neglected Eskimos should wait until I finish my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Van Horne: We stand for good government, and we will give good government after June 17 next. I must say I am not through my remarks. I am calling it ten o'clock. I adjourn the debate.

Mr. Speaker: In fairness to the hon. member I must say to him that I have been informed by the deputy clerk that his time expired at 10.01, and that was just prior to the time the hon. member for Kootenay West asked him a question.

Mr. Knowles: Which he did not answer.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 15, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO GIVE PREFERENCE TO BILINGUAL CANDIDATES

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Girard: The purpose of this bill is to grant a certain preference to bilingual competitors for appointment as the result of civil service examinations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to amend the Representation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

(Translation):

Mr. Girard: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to change the electoral designation of Lapointe to that of Jonquiere-Kenogami-Arvida.

(Text):

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—NATIONAL ENERGY AUTHORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does he agree with the suggestion of the Gordon commission respecting the need for the establishment of a national energy authority as set out on page 57 of the report? Will he also say whether in his view there is any probability at this time, in view of the strong recommendation made by the commission in that regard, of the implementation of that section of the report?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have never considered the matter. The decision would be a matter for the government rather than for one minister, and I do not care to express an opinion at this time.

IMMIGRATION

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES—HANDLING OF SPONSORED CASES BY VIENNA OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, of which I have given him notice. Will the minister comment on the statement in the Financial Post issue of January 12 that the Canadian visa office in Vienna is now handling only "sponsored" or "special" cases of the Hungarian refugees?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that statement is substantially correct. Late in December I gave instructions that only sponsored cases should be handled in the office in Vienna and that the selection of other people to come to Canada should be made by teams going into the camps. If you will permit me to give an explanation, sir, I think perhaps hon. members would be interested to know why I gave that instruction. About that time it was beginning to be apparent that some of the latest arrivals in Austria from Hungary, by coming direct to the office in Vienna, were getting ahead of others in the queue. It seemed to me that those who had been waiting longest in the camps should have at least an equal opportunity to come. I thought it was much better to have the general selection done in the camps, and that is what is being done now for the movement in February.

HOUSING

AVAILABILITY OF FEDERAL LOANS FOR GROUP UNITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister advise whether, during the year 1957, contractors and builders will be able to secure loans for the purpose of building homes in groups of, say, 20 to 25? If so, from what source?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that the facilities under the National Housing Act will be in operation in 1957 just as heretofore. There will be some difference in the matter of degree but the facilities of the act will be available.

Mr. Starr: Am I to understand that the minister advises the house that these builders will be able to secure loans during 1957 for the building of homes in groups of, say, 20 to 25?

Mr. Winters: I anticipate that they will. It is a matter of selective credit. The banks and lending institutions will determine to whom credit will be awarded. But as I say, the facilities of the act will be available throughout 1957.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

STATEMENT ON POSITION OF EMPLOYEES RELIEF AND INSURANCE ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): On Thursday last the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) directed some questions to me concerning the Canadian government railway employees' relief and insurance association.

I have made inquiries of the management of the Canadian National Railways and all I can say is that the railway company is continuing to make the payroll deductions that it made formerly, but any questions regarding the status of the association would have to be directed to the association, which is, of course, an organization of the employees.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? From that statement am I to understand that the deductions are continuing to be made for both the health and the insurance angles of the scheme or just for insurance alone?

Mr. Marler: My understanding is that the deductions are in respect of payments to be made by the employees to the association.

Mrs. Fairclough: The same as previously?

Mr. Marler: The same as before.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS MINIMUM PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received, since the end of the regular session of last year, representations on behalf of the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways, whose pensions are limited to the $25 a month, for an increase in the amount of the pension? Has further consideration been given to this matter or will such further consideration be given by the minister or by the government?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that, offhand, I am unable to say whether or not written representations have been received. I shall have to look into my files and see whether any have come to hand.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT WITH STATE OF MAINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister been successful in negotiating with the state of Maine a reciprocal agreement with regard to unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, not yet, but progress is being made.

FISHERIES

REFERENCE TO REPORTED CONFERENCE IN HAMBURG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In the press this morning it is reported that Canada will participate in an international fishing gear conference in Hamburg next October. Is that report correct? If so, would the minister explain to the house just what is the main purpose of that conference?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I am sorry I did not see the press account and I am also sorry I did not know about the conference, but I will find out.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

NEWSPRINT—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO INCREASED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? In view of the recent increases in the price of newsprint will the minister ask the restrictive trade practices commission to investigate the circumstances of these increases and determine whether there are any elements of price fixing or restraint of trade?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I shall be glad to make a statement upon that subject tomorrow.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I am happy to join members on both sides of the house, Mr. Speaker, in congratulating the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Apart from the interesting subject matter and the eloquent delivery of the speeches, I was particularly struck by the fact that Canadians from different ethnic groups addressed the house in both official languages. In my opinion the effort made by these hon. members, as well as by many hon. members on both sides of the house, to master both the official languages of our country, is the best guarantee and the best proof that Canada can and will become truly bilingual. I feel also, Mr. Speaker, that if we use all the means at our disposal for keeping the respective languages and cultures and traditions in their purest possible form, then a richer and more profound Canadian culture embodying the best of both ethnic groups can and will evolve.

For almost a year now, Mr. Speaker, it has been my great privilege to work relatively closely with the Department of External Affairs and to study and observe, perhaps more closely than I would otherwise have done, the extraordinary evolution that has taken place in the world over the last half century. As a result of this evolution, there has arisen a greater interdependence amongst states and from this has equally arisen a totally new concept of what international relations must be if the world is to continue to exist and world peace is to be achieved. This concept of modern international relationships has been clearly written in the charter of the United Nations which, as you know, has been signed and ratified by some 80 nations in the world.

Personally, I am convinced that in spite of the weaknesses that are attributed to the United Nations, international conflicts even at this time can best be resolved and world peace accomplished through the medium of a body which is relatively independent and collectively free of any particular interest in the different international issues at stake. As hon. members know the United Nations charter prevents it from using the authority and the power that it might require to solve international problems effectively and quickly. The granting of much greater power and much greater authority to the United Nations could be interpreted as a step towards world government. Perhaps the time has not yet come to take such a step, and yet perhaps the time is rapidly approaching when such a step will have to be taken.

Two things strike me very forcibly in looking back over the events of late 1956, and in which perhaps we can foresee things to come. The first of these is the unprecedented power and strength of world opinion, so forcibly expressed at the United Nations not so long ago. The second is the accompanying general feeling of despair and indignation because the world was made to witness, and is still being made to witness, horrible crimes committed by the U.S.S.R. in Hungary without being able to lift a finger to stop the atrocious crime of genocide against the Hungarians. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, world opinion has become more than ever before an extremely important factor in the relationship of states, to which no state, no matter how powerful, can afford now to be indifferent.

As you know, the formulation and expression of world opinion are the direct result of the functioning of United Nations as a world forum. The interest and the solicitude of states to what is happening in other parts of the world, replacing the indifference and the isolationism of other generations, are also a direct result of the remarkable but unfortunately largely unpublicized achievements of the United Nations in the economic, social, humanitarian and cultural fields, which are certainly the true, solid infrastructure, not only of the United Nations, but of world peace as well.

I cannot help but feel, Mr. Speaker, that the Hungarian tragedy, as witnessed and judged by the United Nations, has eloquently revealed the shocking dangers of the United Nations' fundamental weakness. It has brought into clear and proper focus the fact that if the United Nations is to continue to survive, then it shall have to take the necessary steps and the necessary measures to avoid a repetition of acts which are not only contrary to the charter of the United Nations but are contrary to the elementary and basic principles of humanity and justice. More than ever before the world looks toward the United Nations to solve efficiently international conflicts, and it expresses very bitter disappointment and disapproval whenever the United Nations fails to act quickly and promptly; and yet the very people who deplore the weaknesses of the United Nations are the very ones who are the most hesitant to give to the United Nations the power and the authority it requires to act decisively.

At the present time the United Nations is in an intolerable position. It will have to move either forward or backward. If it moves backward and the United Nations collapses, then to my mind it is world suicide. If it moves forward and acquires the necessary authority and power to act decisively, then it entails a loss of some part of our conception of national sovereignty. The question that the peoples of the world have to answer even at this time is what price they are willing to pay for world peace, and for the maximum amount of international justice and security for all nations, large and small.

I do not propose at this time, Mr. Speaker, to go into any details of the current international situation. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), in the emergency session, made a complete report on that situation and yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I believe, brought the house up to date on developments since that time; but I should like to say a few words on the Department of External Affairs. In order not to be accused of grossly lacking in modesty, may I remind hon. members that a parliamentary assistant is not a bona fide member of the department to which he is attached. I cannot therefore claim any credit for the excellent work that is now being done by the department.

During the past year I have had the privilege of attending several international gatherings and I feel quite convinced that very few Canadians indeed realize the esteem in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Department of External Affairs are held abroad, nor do Canadians generally realize the extent to which nations from all parts of the world look to Canada for guidance and support in international affairs. Surely this fact can be interpreted as a very nice compliment to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to his department, but from this fact we must also infer a great and growing responsibility for Canada.

The Department of External Affairs, as you know, is a relatively young one and it is now in the throes of rapid expansion. The demands that have been made for foreign service officers to fill necessary posts abroad, for the several truce commissions where Canadian participation could not be refused and more particularly to fill the ranks of the numerous divisions in the department, are so great that there is a danger the department may become understaffed. In spite of the fact that efforts have been made to encourage young men to enter the department, it has been extremely difficult if not impossible to get them in sufficient numbers and of sufficient quality to maintain the high standards of representation for which Canada is noted.

Fortunately it is not too difficult to find the reason for the present shortage of qualified candidates. To my mind the remuneration being offered is not commensurate with the training, the capacity and even the sacrifices that are demanded of a foreign service officer. Without labouring the point, I would suggest that if the government wishes to maintain its high standard of foreign service officers first of all by retaining the service officers they now have in the department and by acquiring additional qualified candidates, then I believe the government shall have to bring the remuneration now being offered into line with what is being paid to people of equal capacity and equal training working in other fields of our economy.

One of the first problems I encountered upon entering the department was a very abnormal delay in the translation of important speeches and documents arising in the department. On making inquiry it was found that the translation staff in the department was severely undermanned. Since then the Secretary of State has authorized additional translators for the department but as yet it has been impossible to find additional translators. Not because there are no translators available in Canada but rather because the remuneration that is being offered is not sufficient to encourage persons to apply for the position. What is true in the Department of External Affairs may be equally true in other fields and in other departments, and I would suggest that an inquiry into this field might be useful and timely if we wish to maintain the high standard of personnel we now have in government services.

Mr. Speaker, there is one last subject upon which I would like to say a few words. Just recently the preliminary report of the Gordon commission was published. This, of course, is a study of the numerous suggestions made over the years as to which way the government might go in order to achieve Canada's full economic potential. In conjunction with this report I should like to make a few very general remarks which could be interpreted as being a different aspect of the same thing.

It appears to me somehow that although Canadians generally realize that the economic, social and political changes which are taking place in the world today have a direct and important bearing upon our economy they sometimes act individually as though Canada were a self-sufficient island completely independent and secure from world economic trends. They seem to think also that although foreign economic policy may be an interesting academic exercise it really cannot affect our economic potential as guaranteed by our incalculable natural resources. I am afraid the bitter truth is that if Canadians generally do not have the moral strength or the moral courage to adapt our economy to world economic trends and if we are not prepared to face present and future economic problems in an energetic, imaginative and selfless effort to solve them, then we are not going to achieve the economic potential on which we are counting so much even now.

I presume I shall be accused in many quarters of being a pessimist, but this again is relatively unimportant if sufficient public attention can be paid to the warning signs that are now beginning to appear on our economic front. Among some of those warning signs I think we should certainly count the increasing foreign competition which is already beginning to be felt in our country, particularly from West Germany and Japan. I think it would be most unwise indeed not to envisage greater competition from a greater number of countries abroad in the future.

As we all know, the imposition of higher tariffs to protect particular industry and prices is not the answer to the problem of competition simply because we are not a self-sufficient country and must count on imports and exports as an integral part of our economy. As we know, the imposition of higher tariffs in Canada would result immediately in the imposition of higher tariffs by other countries and the subsequent decrease in our exports would seriously affect our national economy.

The solution of this problem has to be sought elsewhere and it seems to me that in accepting the advantages of a free enterprise system one must also be ready to accept the responsibilities that go with it. The problem of competition facing particular industries should be seen, studied and solved by the industries themselves as part of that responsibility. Industry in Canada has grown to its present importance by standing on its own two feet and solving its own problems. To my mind that is not only the best, but it is the only way of solving these problems if we are to continue enjoying the free enterprise system in Canada.

Another aspect of the problem of our expanding economy is the difficulty in maintaining a balance between our increasing national production and our population. In certain quarters of this country immigration is looked upon as a source of dislocation of personnel if not of unemployment in Canada. However I feel sure that Canadians generally have the moral strength and conviction to understand and to endure the local and temporary discomforts created by immigration simply because our expanding economy demands a greater labour force and a greater home market.

Inflation is another economic problem that must be faced squarely by the Canadian public, as Mr. Muir has pointed out in the report of the Royal Bank of Canada. Methods of controlling inflation such as increasing the interest rate of bank loans, restriction of credit and any other methods of maintaining a healthy balance between available goods and the Canadian purchasing power are bound to be unpopular and give rise to a great deal of criticism and complaint. Yet everyone knows that without these economic disciplinary measures our promising Canadian future can very well be seriously jeopardized.

In the present economic situation, where there is a strong tendency toward inflation and where there is at the same time a large budgetary surplus, I feel that the best way of continuing to combat inflation and of continuing to help the general economy of the country is by engaging in the construction of essential national projects such as the St. Lawrence seaway. While I am on this subject, I should very much like to congratulate the government, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier and the St. Lawrence seaway authority on the very efficient manner in which they are carrying out what is certainly one of the greatest projects in the world.

As an important corollary to the St. Lawrence seaway, I would suggest that the project proposed by my predecessor in 1937, authorized and even started by the government, and subsequently postponed because of the second world war, be now continued. As hon. members will recall, this project called for the building of a seaway from the St. Lawrence river at Sorel along the Richelieu river to lake Champlain and across lake Champlain and down the Hudson river to New York. The United States would, of course, look after the American side of the particular project. I do not believe I need insist very much on the importance of this seaway, and although I am merely mentioning the project at this time I should like to give fair warning that I at least will do all I can to see the project put into effect as soon as possible because I believe sincerely that not only is it justified but to my mind it is an essential economic development for Canada as well as for the Richelieu river area.

Mr. Speaker, as you can see I am not really a pessimist. On the contrary, I have the greatest hopes for Canada's future. However, I do feel that if we are to reach our objective all Canadians, individually and collectively, will have to face and assume their respective responsibilities. Among these responsibilities there is one which is fundamental and yet which is sometimes ignored. It is this, that no particular interest of any one particular group of our economic life can justify endangering the common good.

As an example of what I mean, may I say that in settling the recent C.P.R. strike the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was the true champion of the common good, but I firmly believe that the fundamental responsibility was not the Prime Minister's. The common good in that particular instance was the direct responsibility of the C.P.R. and the firemen's union. They should have been able to solve their problem and come to some settlement by themselves on the strength of the responsibility that they both have to the Canadian people.

Perhaps I can make my point a little more forcibly by reminding hon. members that the persistent danger of communism is an economic one arising from ideologies which are the antithesis of our democratic form of life and our free enterprise system. If communism does not soon crumble, as we all hope it will, then sooner or later we shall have to compete economically with a form of government which recognizes no rights of individuals or groups of individuals but which channels all the energy, all the labour, all the genius, all the wealth to the exclusive use of a state which is not responsible to the people of that state. We shall also have to compete equally with state monopolies which are geared to the highest capacity of production and in which the only labour code that exists is maximum working hours for the least possible pay.

I think it would be a disastrous mistake to underestimate the dangers of an economic war with communism under those conditions. It may not be very pleasant but I think that perhaps it might be a very useful exercise to reflect seriously on these considerations in order to stop what I am afraid is a growing tendency toward materialism and toward self-centredness in the different fields of our economic, social and political life. God has been extremely generous to Canada. He has given Canada everything we possibly need to make our country a strong, prosperous and happy country in which to live. But what we do with these God-given gifts is to my mind the direct and personal responsibility of each Canadian and each group of Canadians as well as that of the government.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing the address in reply to the speeech from the throne and the amendment moved thereto by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the light of the fact that we are approaching a general election in the Dominion of Canada, and everything that has been said in the course of the debate so far has been, I think it is fair to say, said in the light of that fact. We were reminded of the fact that an election is imminent in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself in which he replied to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and in which the right hon. gentleman left no doubt that an election would shortly be upon us. We were reminded of it by, amongst other speakers, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) in what I think I may fairly call a rather ungenerous and certainly very over-optimistic speech in which he made certain forecasts as to the results of that election, particularly in western Canada.

I do not wish to criticize the hon. member for being optimistic with respect to the fortunes of his own party but I think it is necessary to say that his forecasts will not be realized. It was significant that, in making his forecasts of success, he confined his attention exclusively to western Canada. I suppose that the reason is obvious in that to date his party has had some limited success in the provincial sphere in that part of the country, but the fact was very conspicuous that he did not make any forecast east of the great lakes. The hon. gentleman based his forecasts on the statement, as he put it, that his party was a party of principle.

I base my forecast of the lack of success of the Social Credit party on the fact that the people of Canada will realize that the situation that led to the success of that party in the provincial field is not duplicated in any sense in the national field. I also base it on the fact that Social Credit principles most certainly are not being applied by the provincial governments which bear that name. Inasmuch as the hon. gentleman has made it clear that the appeal of the party nationally will be on the basis of Social Credit principles, I forecast that the appeal will be rejected because the people of Canada are not interested in Social Credit principles as enunciated by Social Credit spokesmen.

I make my forecast also on the basis that the Conservative party is a party founded on principles which established this nation, which are valid today and which are being restated and given fresh meaning under the dynamic leadership of the new Leader of the Opposition who is himself a western Canadian who knows and understands the true application of those principles to western Canada as well as to the whole of the nation. Under that leadership, with that dynamic reassertion of Conservative principles, the people of Canada will respond from west to east and will turn in increasing numbers to the Conservative party, rejecting the principles which the Social Credit party put forward.

I base my approach, however, to the fact of an election much more on the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) than on that of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). It is with respect to government policies and actions that we have phrased the motion of non-confidence that was moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on January 9. It is with some aspects of that motion of non-confidence and the contrasting position of the two parties—I refer to the government party and the Conservative party—that I wish to deal today.

The motion of non-confidence reads as follows:

> We respectfully represent that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national and international problems and their disregard of the rights of parliament, are not entitled to the confidence of this house, and have lost the confidence of the people of Canada.

There are two particular things I want to mention as being issues in an election and as being facts which this house and this country will never lose sight of. The first is the conduct of the government over the years, culminating in its actions during the pipeline debate last year, when not only the supremacy of parliament but the very continuance of parliament itself as an effective instrument in our democratic process, and the very principle of responsible parliamentary government, were threatened with extinction.

The second thing that the house and the country will never forget—and should never forget—is the unsatisfactory record and attitude of this government over the years with respect to the British commonwealth of nations, culminating in the casting of a vote in the United Nations General Assembly last November on the side of the United States and Soviet Russia and against our oldest friends, France and the United Kingdom.

The attitude of the government is also mirrored in the words of the Prime Minister on November 26 when he described the government of the United Kingdom as amongst the "supermen of Europe" and when by his words, he placed that government and the government of France in the same category as that of the communist aggressors.

Mr. Speaker, not all the honeyed words used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) yesterday, in an obvious attempt to restore the situation and to persuade the people of Canada to forget that attitude on the part of the government, can ever remove the impression created with respect to the attitude of this government or remove from the minds of the Canadian people proof of where this government stands with respect to the British commonwealth of nations.

On the first point—with respect to the conduct and attitude of this government towards the supremacy of parliament and responsible parliamentary government—not much more needs to be done than merely to remind ourselves of the facts and the issues involved. Over the years we have seen a constant process of attack by erosion on the principles of the supremacy of parliament. It is not the supermen of Europe in this field that should concern us but rather the would-be supermen of Canada who would supplant responsible parliamentary government by cabinet dictatorship.

We saw the process brought to a peak in the defence production bill of 1955 when the rule and dictatorship of one man would have been substituted for parliamentary government. That attempt was not successful but it was carried forward and culminated in the conduct of the government during the pipe-line debate of 1956 where, for the first time in the history of a free parliament under our system, we saw an attempt to throttle debate before debate had even begun. We saw an attack on the principle of responsible parliamentary government to which the members of the government will pay lip service. They will tell the people of Canada, "Of course we believe in the principle of the supremacy of parliament and responsible parliamentary government." But the people of Canada realize that you can have responsible parliamentary government—that is that a government can be held responsible by and to parliament—only when parliament has the opportunity to examine and to discuss the government's proposals and actions. Here we saw a deliberate move, supported by the Liberal majority and the Social Credit party in this house—and supported by the Social Credit unanimously on every occasion but one—to prevent parliament from discharging its function and duty of examining the government's proposals.

Mr. Studer: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. member a question?

An hon. Member: Wait till he has finished.

Mr. Studer: Did not the socialists introduce right at the beginning of that debate a resolution to prevent the matter from coming before this House of Commons? Did they not do that right after the beginning of the debate?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Studer: I think you will find that they did, if you will look at the record.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fulton: Today we see the same attitude reflected in the words of the Prime Minister, namely the attitude that discussion counts for nothing, that parliament has no right to discuss because, after all, all that matters is the will of the majority, a majority subservient to the government and doing exactly what the government tells it to do.

The government's position is that the merits of an issue are irrelevant, immaterial and should not be discussed. Everything will be decided by the vote. Why bother to discuss it? Let us have the vote now: that is exactly what the government said last session and it is what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other day. After the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) had in a masterful speech exposed some of the issues before this house, issues which will be before the people of the country, what was the Prime Minister's answer? He said, oh, you may criticize but that does not matter because shortly we shall go through the process of "counting noses" and then all the issues will be decided.

The constitution, the rules of parliament, precedents, unwritten laws and even written laws, the merits of the situation count for nothing, and the only thing that counts in the minds of this government is the noses of the majority.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman think the minority should decide?

Mr. Bell: You wanted the minority to decide on the strike.

Mr. Fulton: You see, Mr. Speaker, it is by remarks such as that that it is made so clear that the government, and especially the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), do not have the faintest understanding of the essence of parliamentary government. Of course we do not say the minority should decide, but we do say the minority has rights. We say the minority has the right of discussion. The minister and the government say there is no right of discussion; all that matters is the number of noses that are going to be evident on the side of the government. Of course, one can understand how they would arrive at that line of action because you see over there supporting them, unfortunately, so many members who are content to be deprived of the right of discussion and who are content apparently to abide by whatever the government says should be done.

The moment the government has said what it wants, they say: let us have a vote. We hear the chant: "question, question. Let us have a vote. There is no right of discussion. Discussion is irrelevant and unimportant, because if the government says it should be so, then of course it should be so and we are content to vote without discussion." All that matters, therefore, is the process of counting noses.

That process has been carried on and the rights of parliament denied and overridden to such an extent, Mr. Speaker, that we have now very nearly reached the point of no return beyond which it will be difficult indeed, if not impossible, to restore the principle of the supremacy of parliament and of responsible parliamentary government. The people of Canada here face a very serious issue, a domestic crisis every bit as important as the international crises which have occupied so much of our attention. There is only one solution to that crisis and that is to remove from office a government which denies the supremacy of parliament, is not willing to accept the principle of responsible parliamentary government, and to replace it by a government which is dedicated to the preservation of this principle as the Conservative party and its leader are dedicated.

The second issue which is before the country is the attitude of this government with regard to the British commonwealth. It was interesting to observe yesterday, on what I might almost call commonwealth day, the attempts by government spokesmen to remove the unfortunate, indeed the disastrous, impressions created by their conduct and their words last November. We see a picture of a government desperately trying to make amends; a government as aware as we are that an election is facing them shortly, and trying to remove that impression. It is no wonder they do so because they know all the damage that their conduct and their words have done to their support in the country. We saw the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) praise the commonwealth, praise the United Kingdom and tell the house how there may have been temporary differences of opinion but these really only strengthened the bond; how they knew all along the government of the United Kingdom, however its individual actions may be judged, is nevertheless dedicated to peace.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), after he had finished his travelogue, was at pains to impress upon the house how everywhere he went in Asia, with every government representative with whom he had discussions and in the villages where he went, he was at pains to impress upon the people the dedication of the United Kingdom government to peace, and the progress that had been made under the aegis of the government of that country.

Unfortunately, from the government's point of view, from Canada's point of view and the world's point of view, you cannot turn on the stream of unity and co-operation and then turn if off again like a tap. The stream is based on continuous understanding, continuous sympathy and the continued maintenance of mutual interests and must be kept flowing or it will dry up. It cannot be turned off and on again like a tap.

This government cannot thus easily repair the damage done by their actions and by the Prime Minister's words last year when he lumped together the governments of the United Kingdom and France in the same category of aggressors as the communist governments of Russia and the other socialist soviet republics. Remember the Prime Minister's words in that regard on November 26. Having referred to the governments of the United Kingdom and France, he went on to say, as recorded at page 20 of Hansard for that date:

> I have been scandalized more than once by the attitude of the larger powers, the big powers as we call them, who have all too frequently treated the charter of the United Nations as an instrument with which to regiment smaller nations—

Including in those words the governments of the United Kingdom and of France,—

Mr. Pickersgill: And the United States.

Mr. Fulton: —one of them a government which the Secretary of State for External Affairs was at pains yesterday to point out had built for itself a glorious tradition—that is what he called it—of bringing to a state of independence, self-government and autonomy, nations which have never known that condition before. That is the government which the Prime Minister on November 26 categorized with the aggressors of Europe, "the supermen of Europe."

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to observe that in all of the reasons given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday, as to the things which now mean so much to Canada in the commonwealth and the things which should unite us in the commonwealth, it was interesting that in all this panegyric which they sang yesterday, there was not one mention of that factor which we always understood to be at the centre of commonwealth unity, and that is, loyalty to the crown. There was no mention in either of those speeches yesterday of the principle of loyalty to the crown, to the monarchy which, as I understand it, is the central theme and uniting factor of the commonwealth.

The government's action against the United Kingdom and France was previously justified on the basis that there was danger in the Suez situation of the commonwealth splitting; that it could not stand the pressures created by the action then taken. Later on that was denied by Mr. Casey in Australia. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) then modified his statement as to what he had meant. He said that he had referred exclusively to the Asian members of the commonwealth. Well, now, unfortunately, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has shown himself to be prone to rather loose terminology in this connection. It will be recalled that at one stage, after the fighting had begun, he said, referring to the commonwealth, that it was on the verge of dissolution and he further said that "was not an exaggerated observation". He is guilty of several contradictions in this matter.

Since that time, after being contradicted himself by the Australian spokesman, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said he was referring exclusively to the Asian members of the commonwealth. Shortly thereafter the prime minister of Ceylon, who was interviewed at the United Nations where he was while all these discussions were going on, said, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of December 3, that he thought Mr. Pearson's commons statement was "rather an exaggeration".

Then it will be recalled that yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs repeated in this house the same thing, namely, that the separatist pressures were tremendous and that he felt it had been quite possible that the commonwealth might split up. He was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) whether that had not been denied by the governments of Ceylon and India and he replied that it had been denied by the prime minister of Ceylon, but that he had been informed by the very highest authority in the government of India that there had been danger of India leaving the commonwealth. Well, sir, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is contradicted there by no less a person than the prime minister of India himself who, speaking in Ottawa, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of December 24, said—and the reporter, Mr. Hume, says that these are Mr. Nehru's own words:

> India wishes, quite clearly, to have her commonwealth association continued; there are so many disruptive tendencies in the world that I am not prepared to break up any kind of association or bridge that there is. I never thought India's commonwealth association should be broken, despite grave differences of opinion.

He went on to say that some important people in India suggested the commonwealth association was doing no good. He continued:

> We discussed the question in our congress recently and we are firmly of the opinion that we wish our association with the commonwealth to continue. In spite of differences within the commonwealth, we felt that it is a helpful association in the larger causes of peace in the world.

Now, there is the prime minister of India speaking and saying that he never thought they should get out of the commonwealth. And yet, the Secretary of State for External Affairs only yesterday told us that he was informed by the highest authority in the government of India that they had been in danger of withdrawing. What have we? Have we a completely inaccurate statement, or does the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggest that there is a higher authority than the prime minister? Can it possibly be, Mr. Speaker, that the eulogy given to him by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) in this house the other day has already gone to his head? Does he think there are higher authorities in government than the prime minister? For that is the only inference we can draw from his statement, unless we are to believe that notwithstanding having been corrected, he still persists in a deliberate inaccuracy and misrepresentation.

Other unfortunate effects which flowed from the government's action last November, and which are now obvious to the Canadian people, in addition to the damage that it did to the principle of commonwealth solidarity, have been, of course, to place Canada in a position where she must accept dictation from Nasser in Egypt. This the government still persists in denying in spite of the most obvious facts which prove it, such as that Canada's original intention as to the type of troops she should send was not allowed to be fulfilled, and also by the comments made by authoritative sources elsewhere. I have here the New York Sunday Times of January 13, which contains an article by Thomas J. Hamilton. The article is headed:

> United Nations Suez Intervention Restores Status Quo
>
> Nasser Is Still In Full Control Of The Canal With His Future Terms For Operation Unchanged

The correspondent is reporting on the discussion at the United Nations and says as follows:

> But the friends of Britain, France and Israel insist that practically every decision has been in accord with Egyptian demands.

He is referring to the decision with regard to the clearing of the canal and the role of United Nations emergency force. He continues:

> This, they say, is illustrated both by the handling of the United Nations emergency force and the salvage operation. Egypt, despite denials, is exerting her veto on the countries participating in the emergency force, as witness the fact that Canada, which sponsored the idea, has been allowed to contribute only non-combat troops.
>
> As Egypt demanded, the force has been withdrawn from the Suez canal zone, permitting the complete establishment of Egyptian control. Egyptian troops are advancing into the Sinai peninsula behind the United Nations force, and will soon re-establish Colonel Nasser's control there, leaving the United Nations force to act only as a buffer between the Egyptian and Israeli troops.
>
> According to a spokesman for Mr. Hammarskjold, the general assembly, not Egypt, will decide when the United Nations force is to be withdrawn. But Mr. Hammarskjold's insistence upon respecting the "sovereign rights" of Egypt increases the probability that the assembly will tell the force to leave whenever Egypt says so.

So it is undeniable, Mr. Speaker, if one faces facts, that the result of the government's action has been to place Canada, along with other countries, in the position of having to accept the dictation of Egypt, thus making it very unlikely that there will be a satisfactory over-all settlement of the dispute which gave rise to this whole situation.

That, then, is the damage that has been done,—damage to the commonwealth, damage to the possibility of an over-all satisfactory solution to the Middle East question—done by the unfortunate acts of this government. But the damage has been done; and although it is essential that we understand the basis upon which we now rest, it is still more important to look forward and to discuss ways and means of repairing that damage. This is going to involve work, not more pious platitudes such as we heard yesterday from the two government spokesmen who were concerned not so much to tell us what they were going to do, as to try to pretend that no damage had been caused by the government's unfortunate action.

To repair the damage is going to require work. Why should we not have the Quebec conference that was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition last November? The Prime Minister has not given a single reason why it should not be held. He dismissed it with another series of generalities. Unfortunately, we have not heard from the government any positive proposals in this respect. We are back where we have been for many years because, of course, our quarrel with the government with regard to its attitude to the commonwealth does not stem only from the time of the Suez crisis; it antedates it by many years.

Our quarrel with the government is that they have done nothing for years beyond paying lip service to the idea of the commonwealth. They have indulged in vague generalities, they have made no positive contribution and they have made no earnest or consistent attempt to institute a series of commonwealth discussions which would be designed to arrive at common objectives and a common understanding and common approaches to these world problems, and especially to arrive at these common approaches before the problems reach disaster proportions. It is no wonder therefore that the Suez explosion caught us all unawares.

There had been a conference not very long before that, the last commonwealth prime ministers' conference. You will remember the strenuous effort we on this side made, first of all to get the Prime Minister at least to see to it that there was an agenda and that Canada was going over there prepared to engage in serious discussions in regard to the matters that would come before the conference, but this was not done. No such thing occurred to the Prime Minister's mind. He was going over there for a nice trip. That was at the time when Cyprus was in danger of becoming an explosive area; it was at a time when the whole Middle Eastern situation was brewing.

The Prime Minister returned from the conference and you will remember how strenuously we pressed him to give us a report concerning what was discussed and what was decided. We were interested in knowing if anything at all had been said about Cyprus or about the Middle East. No. He reported he had lunch with Mr. Nehru and they had a pleasant time at the conference. They had issued a nice communique and there had been a feeling of good will and good relations had been established. That is all we got out of the Prime Minister because that is all the Prime Minister went over there to do.

We have pointed out for years that no international association will mean anything nor can it mean anything unless the members of the association and particularly the senior members such as Canada intend that it should mean something and intend to make it work. This business of saying the commonwealth is a force for world peace and that Canada's position in foreign affairs and in international relationships is influenced in large measure by the fact that she is a member of the commonwealth and her membership in the commonwealth is something desirable to maintain, is simply to voice meaningless platitudes unless the government does something, first to decide what it is the commonwealth should mean in world affairs and in our own national interest, and then does some work to make it realize those things.

In our view the preservation of the commonwealth is a matter of interest to all of Canada and not just something to which we have a sentimental attachment. It is a matter of vital national concern to all parts of Canada and to all peoples in Canada to an equal degree because it is based upon and has at its centre the monarch, the crown. This is the very centre and core of our national existence and our form of government as a constitutional and monarchial democracy. It is essential to us also because as a member of the commonwealth we can have a wider influence in international affairs, a fuller being if you like, than we would ever have as a separate nation.

It is important to us, Mr. Speaker, also because it is more than ever essential that there should be a strong and united commonwealth as a factor in the preservation of world peace. I was not at all satisfied and I am sure many hon. members were not fully satisfied, indeed they must have been deeply disturbed, by the readiness yesterday of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to write off the commonwealth as a factor in the preservation of world peace, when he said in effect there is only one country in the western world in a position to discharge truly worldwide responsibilities today, the United States. Sir, we believe that the commonwealth, if recreated and built into that force which it could and should be, is also in a position to discharge worldwide responsibilities and is also in a position to exercise worldwide influence. As Mr. Menzies of Australia said when discussing the last commonwealth prime ministers' conference and his dissatisfaction with what had been done and particularly his dissatisfaction with the communique that had been issued, "A statement of that kind should and could carry the moral authority that the commonwealth should possess. I think the world needs the force of judgment that the commonwealth has."

We are in complete agreement with those words. The commonwealth will not possess that moral authority and certainly will not possess that physical authority unless some work is done to recreate it and to give to it the meaning which it should have. This certainly will not be accomplished by the words and attitudes of the Prime Minister of last November and the actions of the government at that time. It certainly will not be achieved by the inaction and pious platitudes which is all we can get from the government today.

We are therefore left with certain questions which emerge from this whole situation. First, what is the government's policy with regard to the United Nations emergency force? We were told yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he believed we should work toward the creation of a permanent United Nations force; but the country was told by the other secretary of state for external affairs who is presently officially the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that it is impractical to have a permanent United Nations force. He did admit to an honest difference of opinion with the Prime Minister on that score but we did not realize that, having just returned from this tour he undertook, he would so deliberately and definitely state a view contrary to that expressed officially on behalf of the government in the house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Who is the Secretary of State for External Affairs? What is the policy of the government?

Mr. Rowe: You had better get together.

Mr. Fulton: Surely the people of Canada are entitled to know that and the people of Canada are particularly entitled to know what is the policy of this government with respect to Canada's component in the present United Nations emergency force in Egypt. Is it to be just what Nasser says? Is it to be withdrawn just when Nasser says it is to be withdrawn? Is it to do only that which Nasser says it is to do? What does the government of Canada feel about that? And if they reply that these things should be decided by the United Nations, what recommendations are they going to make to the United Nations on the basis of which a decision will be taken? Are we to accept the fact that not only the Canadian government but the United Nations general assembly with the consent of the Canadian government is to have its decisions made by the dictator of Egypt?

The next question, and it is really the larger question, is this. What does this government propose to do to restore and maintain commonwealth unity? Yesterday we heard the words of the government ministers telling us what importance they attach to the recreation of commonwealth unity but we heard nothing except words. We have heard nothing but words for years; we have seen no action. We made a concrete suggestion in November with a view to the restoration of both commonwealth unity and the Atlantic alliance—the holding of a conference in Quebec. That was only one suggestion, but even that suggestion has been rejected, and nothing, absolutely nothing, has been offered in its stead.

Mr. Speaker, we are left in the position that, with respect to this whole question of the most vital and fundamental of Canada's interests in world affairs, the government has nothing to offer. Its actions and the words of its Prime Minister have been a disaster and have weakened our position. On this issue, as on the issue of parliamentary supremacy, I have no doubt what will be the verdict of the Canadian people in the next election.

(Translation):

Mr. Joseph Fontaine (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to extend my warmest congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I congratulate them particularly for having spoken with such eloquence a tongue which is not their mother tongue. We have there an example of good understanding and of bilingualism which should be appreciated and practiced more often.

I wish also to extend my congratulations to the new Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the high position which has been bestowed upon him after so many efforts on his part and in spite of the little support he got from the delegates of my province. It is not every party leader who can get a unanimous vote on a first try, it is not everybody who can be elected by acclamation. Be that as it may, I extend to him my most sincere wishes and I hope he may remain for a long time the leader of his party and the Leader of the Opposition.

I would like now, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words on the social security legislation which the Canadian people enjoy thanks to the initiative and the concern of the Liberal government, and more particularly on the subject of old age pensions. Canadians everywhere have asked that the old age pension now enjoyed by people 70 years old and over be increased by $10 to $20.

We must realize that this old age security legislation has not been enacted to take care of all the needs of the recipient, but rather to help and assist our older citizens in general. However there is nothing to prevent our provincial government, as it is done in other provinces, from adding $10 or $20 to the $40 now granted by the federal government.

It is clear that we must do all we can to help those unfortunates who, having toiled all their lives, find themselves without any means of support.

I realize, as do all hon. members, that this amount of $40 is not sufficient and that, were it possible to increase it, it would provide our older people with greater comfort and security. On the other hand, though I am not opposed to this increase, I do think that it would be preferable to extend the scope of the legislation by extending its benefits to a greater number of old people.

I have often noticed in my constituency, that many people aged 60 and over who, for reasons of health or physical disability, are obliged to quit work, of their own volition or at the request of their employers, are, in most cases, in a very poor financial situation, they have difficulty in meeting their vital obligations during the period extending between 60 and 65, with regard to which our social security legislation provides no security at all. Briefly, this is the plan I suggest. At the present time, the federal government is, without a means test, paying the full amount of the old age pension from the age of 70 on. From 65 to 70, the pension is paid to those who can meet the means test, half the required sum being provided by the federal government and the other half by the provinces concerned. I suggest that those old age pensions entirely provided by the federal government be paid from the age of 65 years on, while pensions paid to the poor old people by the federal government and the provinces be paid when these people reach the age of 60. By extending in this way the scope of the legislation, instead of by increasing the pension, we would be doing service to a larger number of people. In other words, by lowering the age of eligibility by five years the present legislation would be made more efficient than would be the case were the amount of pension merely increased, an increase which by the way could be met by the provinces.

With regard to family allowances, I am of the opinion that the time has come for the government to make a serious study of the possibility of increasing them. This increase, a necessary one, would be such as to improve the standard of living of Canadian families and more particularly of larger families. As was pointed out the other day by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) the cost of living has gone up tremendously over the past ten years, but the needs have not diminished. We should increase the means of providing for the needs of our children in proportion to the increased expense involved. For my part, I suggest that these allowances be increased in proportion to the increase in the cost of living, that is for example by paying $6, $9 and $12.

From the field of social security I now pass to that of agriculture. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of representing a constituency which has been particularly blessed by Providence, because of the fact that it is situated in the richest area of the province of Quebec, an area which is well suited to all types of farming and which is called the Richelieu valley.

By far the greatest number of farmers of my constituency carry out specialized farming, more particularly sugar beet production which, in the course of the last year, has brought in a revenue of over half a million dollars in my district. They have also carried on tomato-growing on a large scale, the produce being shipped to metropolitan markets as well as to rural canning plants.

May I be allowed by the way to congratulate the co-operative canneries on the excellence of their organization which has greatly contributed to the improvement of the lot of our farmers. In this regard, I would feel remiss in my duty were I not to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) most sincerely for the precious aid which he has provided the poultry farmers of my district. A poultry experimental station constructed at St. Damase in 1945 has just undergone considerable changes. The extension of the building and the construction of immense refrigerating rooms allow that co-operative to improve its commercial position, not only on the local market but also on the international market. The poultry co-operative of St. Damase is considered by experts to be one of the largest and most modern in the country. That achievement was made possible by the co-operation of the federal Department of Agriculture. Besides being a monument to the credit of our agricultural class, it will contribute greatly to the constant improvement of the agricultural economy of our area.

Before passing on to another subject, I should like to say a few words on butter. The price support given us by the federal government for a number of years was highly advantageous to us of the dairy industry.

Having always considered agriculture as the basis of a successful economy, the federal government took the initiative of authorizing the Minister of Agriculture to help our agricultural class by means of grants and price support enactments, being convinced that such legislation would primarily promote the interests of the country at large.

Indeed, experience has shown us that when agriculture is prosperous in a country, all classes of society benefit from it. The dairy industry in general and, in particular, the milk producers shipping their milk to creameries and cheese factories were saved from bankruptcy by the act on the support of the price of butter. That act is unquestionably the one that rendered the greatest service to our agricultural class and particularly, I might add, to the farmers of my province, because the dairy industry remains the main source of income of the Quebec farmers.

According to our legislation, Canadian farmers can benefit from the act until its expiration in May, 1958. I urge the Minister of Agriculture to extend the duration of this act for an indefinite period, because I dare say our dairy industry was saved by the price support enactment and it is most important that it be maintained in force. I would even say that this act protects not only the producer but also the consumer. It has the dual effect of preventing the exaggerated speculation that was carried on in connection with our dairy products. It is not surprising that the speculators should have focussed their attention on butter in particular. Everybody remembers that, before the enactment of that measure, producers during the season of plenty, were paid ridiculous prices for their products which brought them no profit and, most of the time, left them with a deficit. On the other hand, in winter time when production slows down, the price of butter was going up every day and the consumers had to pay excessive prices for that product. Speculators were thus in a position to gain unlimited profits on a product which, after all, brought no profit at all to the producers in most cases.

Mr. Speaker, this problem has been solved by our act on the support of butter prices and it is very important, in fact essential, that our farmers should never again have to put up with situations such as that.

The need for this beneficial measure continues to be felt; therefore, I can only wish, —I know beforehand that this wish will be met,—that the government will go on with that policy which has been so profitable and which is more and more appreciated by our farmers.

Mr. Speaker, another subject dealing with agriculture and also of a vital importance for our specialized farmers is the question of the great metropolitan market of Montreal. This matter concerns more particularly the producers specialized in horticulture who live around the city of Montreal. The development of the metropolitan market is at present underway. Construction was begun last spring and this project will soon be completed if all the authorities concerned give their support and the necessary financial assistance to those in charge of that undertaking. The city of Montreal considers this project as most important and it has already paid a generous contribution. An amount of one million dollars has also been granted by the government of my province. I wish here to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture for his generous co-operation. Since this market will not be exclusively a local market but also an interprovincial market, I feel that the federal government should contribute to such an undertaking which, I repeat, is of vital importance for agriculture, and especially for the producers specialized in horticulture.

Mr. Speaker, horticulturists are the victims of undue speculation; it is essential that federal authorities should help this category of producers as they have done for the dairy farmers. Otherwise, we will be faced with the disappearance of these specialists in horticulture. I do believe that the federal authorities should act and make a substantial grant for this project, a grant at least matching the amount the province of Quebec has agreed to pay to this organization.

Mr. Speaker, as the time allotted to me does not permit my informing this house in detail of the record I have before me, and which proves that the federal authorities would be well advised in helping to carry out this plan, I shall just advance a few arguments that will justify my remarks at this time. The Montreal market is a receiving and distributing centre for the fruit and vegetable trade, not only on a local and provincial basis, but on a national and even international scale. The Montreal market is the main distribution centre for fruit and vegetables in Canada. In 1952, arrivals of these commodities on the Montreal market by rail only amounted to 18,951 carloads, coming from eight Canadian provinces, eleven foreign countries and thirty-four American states. These figures are taken from a report on arrivals of fruit and vegetables on Canadian markets, published in 1952 by the marketing division of the federal Department of Agriculture in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne mentions a proposed amendment extending the scope of the Municipal Grants Act to authorize the payment of grants in lieu of taxes on federal property in municipalities where such property benefits from municipal services. The government deserves congratulations for including this project in the speech from the throne. The grants will, in most cases, be of great help to the municipalities, and bring some relief to taxpayers. Due to the rapid expansion of house construction in Canada since the war, our municipalities have been faced with serious problems which in most cases they cannot solve without the help of the federal and provincial governments. As far as I am concerned, I am glad that this project will be submitted to the hon. members for approval during this session.

May I say just a few words about grants to universities? I will merely state that I share the view of the hon. member from Hull (Mr. Caron). An unconditional grant to all the universities is not in itself undue interference in the field of education. If foreign millionaires are allowed to make a gift to our universities and to our classical colleges, why should we not grant the same privilege to the federal government? It is sheer demagogy to hold the opposite view. Besides, our people from Quebec, just as the people of other provinces, have contributed to the consolidated revenue fund from which those amounts are drawn. Why should we not benefit from it, as others do, rather than seek to keep to ourselves, in a special reserve, for the sake of so-called autonomy? Are not the people of Quebec Canadians just like the people of the other provinces?

I am just about through with the few remarks I had planned to make. However I would not like to sit down without telling the hon. Prime Minister of the satisfaction of our people concerning the excellent administration of the affairs of his government —our government—and because of what he has himself contributed to the country since he has become our leader. But what is still more admirable is the fact that not only is our prime minister respected and admired by his opponents but the leaders of foreign countries look upon him as a first-rate statesman, one worthy of their confidence.

It is not my business to discuss foreign affairs, but since the world seems to be unanimous about the excellent part played by Canada in the United Nations and in NATO through our minister for external affairs (Mr. Pearson), I can only join the members who spoke before me, to offer him sincere and well deserved compliments and to wish that Providence will long preserve men of such value.

If I had the time, I could analyse the moral and economic condition in which people of other countries are living—and I could even say people of all countries—and I am convinced, in the present situation, that there could be, in any case, only one conclusion, which is that today, in 1957, it is rewarding to be able to call ourselves Canadians.

(Text):

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I almost hesitate to say so but it is twenty years this year since I first sat in a legislative assembly. During those years I think it is perhaps safe to say that I have always taken somewhat of a relish in being able to heave as sharply pointed bricks as possible at the various governments opposite whom I have sat during that time. But periodically during that time the governments which I have opposed have—inadvertently, of course—done something of which I have approved; and always, when they have done that, I have found myself hesitant in attack, a still small voice, as someone said, crying "fiddlesticks". This morning, as I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), that still small voice was extremely vocal within me.

This government has done in the past and undoubtedly will do in the future many things for which they merit severe criticism and attack. But in order to make our attacks effective when we make them, I think we should be careful not to attack on the wrong occasion or for the wrong thing. During the special session of parliament I did not take part in the debate because there appeared no necessity for my doing so. The government's actions were those I thought were in the interest of Canada, and I imagined that they would have plenty of people to support those actions in the house.

I listened at that time with great interest to the speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). In the past I have not always agreed with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Sometimes I think he has fallen far short of what we should expect of Canada's principal international spokesman. However, I think it is only fair to say that on that occasion I think no intelligent Canadian could really have quarrelled with what he had to tell us. He spoke obviously as a man deeply anxious over a critical and dangerous situation, not in any boastful manner, recounting the efforts of himself and his colleagues to deal with an appalling world situation. I also think it is fair to say that he expressed at that time a deep concern over the tragic cleavage that had taken place between Canada and her two oldest allies.

I think those things should be said because this morning and during the special session suggestions were made that, in the course followed by the government at that time, Canada had in some way betrayed the commonwealth that Canada had in some way scorned and affronted our oldest allies. It seems to me to be an extraordinary situation that Canadians can stand up in this parliament and suggest that, because a strain was put upon the relationship within the commonwealth—not by Canada or not by any action of Canada's—we are to blame for that strain.

I found the speech made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) this morning most interesting. As a matter of fact I felt as though it had great anthropological interest, I might even say biological interest, because it struck me that it was the same sort of interest that would have been aroused if one were to encounter on the streets of Ottawa mastodons or dinosaurs from the dim and distant past. In the course of the hon. member's remarks it became quite obvious that in the view of the official opposition there is only one nation in the world which has the right to sovereignty and that is the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that he deplored the actions of Mr. Dag Hammarskjold in insisting that the sovereign rights of Egypt should be respected. Apparently that is outrageous. Because we do not like Mr. Nasser, because we do not like some of the things he has done, because we consider—probably quite rightly—that he is a rather hardboiled dictator, we are to take the position that the sovereign rights of the country that he happens to rule can be flouted at will.

We were told this morning that the main strains were placed on the commonwealth by the action taken by the Canadian government. In the first place I think perhaps we are flattering ourselves in thinking that the Canadian government was quite such a decisive factor in the situation. In the second place, I could not help feeling this morning—as I felt on an earlier occasion during the special session—that there are members of the official opposition whose conception of the commonwealth of nations is rigidly confined to members of the nations of European stock, and that the idea that such new members as India, Pakistan and Ceylon should be consulted, that their views should be considered, is something entirely foreign to that concept.

During the special session I was interested not only to hear what the Prime Minister of Canada had to say with regard to the world situation but also in the extraordinary reactions that were aroused by his statements. His statements were repeated again or quoted this morning by the hon. member for Kamloops in an extremely deprecatory manner, as I recall it. On one occasion the Prime Minister remarked that he had often been scandalized by the actions of the great powers in the United Nations. My criticism of the Prime Minister would be that he then said something that should have been said long before, that he waited until he was exasperated to say something that should have been said earlier in measured and more magisterial terms. There is not an intelligent student of public affairs in the world today who has not been painfully conscious of that scandalous attitude and action of the great powers to which the Prime Minister referred.

He also had a remark to make with regard to the supermen of Europe. That apparently is something that should not be said, but all history supports that statement. The sooner we of the Caucasian races remember that the last 300 years carry an almost unbroken history of pillage, rapine, and bloody suppression of all non-European people with whom we came in contact, the sooner we shall be prepared to live at peace with the human race. While we may want to forget that nasty skeleton in our cupboard or clothe it with the myth of the white man's burden, let us not make any mistake about this fact: the peoples of Asia and of Africa have not forgotten. An attitude of humility with regard to the deplorable record of our ancestors and, indeed, of some of our contemporaries of the European races would be in order today.

Again, my criticism of the Prime Minister would be that he said this in a moment of exasperation when it should have been said again and again by the spokesman of such countries of Canada, which, while inhabited by people of European stock, had itself to break loose from that control and rule by the supermen of Europe.

No, Mr. Speaker; I do not think those are things for which either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs is to be blamed or criticized. Nor are they statements for which I think any Canadian should feel the need to apologize.

But I have noted, sir, in this present session that apparently we are beginning to move away from that rather forthright position. I think that is a tragedy because I am sure there are many Canadians, like myself, who feel that during those critical days in November of last year Canada, for the first time, emerged from the shadows and became a definite international entity with clearly defined features rather than remaining, as we had hitherto, a rather vague, shadowy figure, obscured in the mists of a sort of general amiability. I am sorry to note by the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and indeed by that of the Prime Minister also in this session, that they appear to be retreating from that firm position. I suppose it is a case of coming events casting their shadows before them.

It may be true, as the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) suggested, that government spokesmen feel there has been an antagonism to the attitude taken by this government during the world crisis last fall. Undoubtedly there has been some antagonism. I suppose that in the constituency I represent there are more people of immediately British origin than in any other part of the Dominion of Canada. There are, moreover, amongst those people probably a larger proportion of people coming from those social brackets in Britain which would normally adopt an extremely conservative and rather imperialistic point of view. It is true that amongst my constituents there are a number who would wax just as indignant as the hon. member for Kamloops and his colleagues in this house. There are also a significant number of others who, like myself, feel sorry and grieved that the nation of which we are natives should have been betrayed in that particular instance, betrayed from the position of international probity which had been built up over the last decade or two.

I would suggest to the members of this government that it would be better to run the risk of losing a certain measure of support throughout the country and to maintain that solid, unequivocal attitude which was presented to us during the special session of the house. We should remember also that we should not confuse the people of Britain with a small group which, for the time being, happens to be in control of the destinies of that country. Not for nothing did two ministers of the crown resign in the face of the incalculable follies committed their government. Not for nothing did every responsible organ of public opinion in Great Britain condemn and deplore what was being done. We in Canada shall not be discharging the responsibility of friendship for the people of Britain unless we speak with an unequivocal voice in support of this element in Britain, the most intelligent, the best informed, who have deplored the train of events which took place last fall and which will have in the future incalculable results for the unfortunate people of Great Britain. I should like to see our government, as I say, maintain that solid position which it assumed during the crisis of last fall at the United Nations, and not pay attention to the possible unpopularity in certain quarters that will be coming because of that position.

I think we must be careful not to condone follies when the fool is a beloved fool; not to condone evil on the doctrine that good might have come out of evil. Good never comes out of evil. Men, women and children were killed; their lives destroyed and their homes broken. No matter what the purpose may have been, that in itself was an evil action. If we are going to assume a position in the world commensurate with our material power, then we have to be prepared to continue condemning evil, reprobating folly whoever may commit it.

I think, sir, while these events of the past have been important in two regards, one in placing Canada firmly before the world in a certain posture and the other in revealing to us the political thinking of the various sections of the Canadian community, what is more important is what is to take place in the future. I was interested yesterday to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggesting that we must work towards a permanent United Nations force. I hope when that proposal is carried into effect that perhaps the procedure that was followed in the setting up of the emergency force may be borne in mind, because to me one of the most significant aspects of the establishment of the United Nations emergency force was that it was action on the part of the small, medium-sized nations of this world, behaving I think somewhat in the spirit of the Prime Minister's condemnation of the great powers of the world, in a spirit of impatience with these great powers who can never refrain from grinding their own axes.

I should like to see such a permanent force remain as a force contributed to by the small and medium sized powers of the world because then it could be a force that would not be embroiled in the power politics of one or the other of the larger powers in the world today. I think there is something else we can do now as a result of recent events. I think there can be no question that the appalling series of events in Hungary has struck a blow at the Soviet union that perhaps no one can as yet assess. In my opinion it has completely altered the military picture of the world because not only can the Soviet union now no longer rely on the peoples and the armed forces of satellite nations in the event of a conflict, they have been informed in unmistakable terms that these will be enemies within their gates. I think we should take advantage of that situation. It seems to me that here is a case where some hard-hearted bargaining could be done with the communist world. I cannot believe that the men in the Kremlin today are very anxious to continue to have these potential enemies ready to stab them in the back if they got involved in a war. It seems to me that the part of wisdom for them would be, and I do not think you should consider they are without wisdom, to relinquish their hold over these satellite states under an agreement whereby they become a neutral belt between the west and the east. I think that will have possibilities also of solving one of the sore spots in the world today, one of the trouble spots that may well cause great concern to the rest of the world, and that is divided Germany.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at one o'clock I was in the middle of discussing some of the possible after effects in Hungary, pointing out that the events there dealt a shattering blow to the position of the Soviet union, and might well have altered the military realities on the continent of Europe and, as a consequence, may have provided us with an opportunity—and when I say "us" I am speaking of the west—for some hard bargaining with our communist opponents. I suggested it was hardly likely that the rulers of the Soviet union would care very much longer to maintain their control, with great difficulty, over populations which they now realize they could not trust in time of international war and that, therefore, they might be prepared to relinquish that control in return for some mutual guarantee of a neutralized area; and that included in this opportunity was one of the difficult and dangerous spots in the world, namely, the divided German nation.

Most observers from Germany seem to be of the opinion that after the next election, which I believe takes place this fall, the social party of Germany will undoubtedly assume office in Western Germany. They have been committed for many years now to a neutralist position as a means of achieving what is the great desire of all the German people, namely, the reunification of Germany. I believe that here again is a possibility for some hard bargaining with our communist opponents, because, if Hungary were the tough spot for them, East Germany will be a much tougher spot and sooner or later they are going to face the same sort of thing in East Germany that they faced in Hungary. Now is the time for us to be making these proposals of withdrawal of forces from central Europe by both sides and mutual guarantees of neutrality to that area as a means of building some sort of cordon sanitaire between the two great blocs in the world today. I think also that the United Nations has a much more significant role to play in the Middle East than it has been able to play hitherto. It is well enough that we have the United Nations force there now, from which we may hope to develop some sort of stability, from a military point of view, in that area; but I believe that precisely the same argument should apply to the United Nations that one often hears applied to NATO; that the military commitments of the United Nations are not nearly enough, and that the economic functions of the world today should gradually supersede the purely military functions of that organization, and that the Middle East is the area that most cryingly needs some sort of organization and leadership for the development of the area for the benefit of the inhabitants of that part of the world.

It is a tragic circumstance that much of the potential wealth of the world in the form of the oil deposits of the Middle East, the oil deposits upon which the wealth of almost the whole of western Europe depends, and on which indeed our own economy depends to a like degree, should come from an area in which the local inhabitants have heretofore had no chance whatever to share in the wealth. It seems to me that one of the tasks that lie before the United Nations is to give offers of economic aid, offers of skilled assistance, in return for certain commitments on the part of the authorities in those areas so that the revenues derived from the sales of the oil shall be devoted to the raising of the living standards of those people and not merely to be ostentatiously displayed by some of the ruling group. There, I think, is an area in which the United Nations should be playing a very decisive role, which will require perhaps some rethinking with regard to sovereignty. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I think very soon the world is going to have to take another look at this question of sovereignty, as to just how far any people are to be allowed to conduct their affairs without regard to the rest of the world, rethinking as to the possibility of relinquishing certain aspects of our sovereignty to a greater degree, and as to the value that might well accrue from some world authority to have control of oil surpluses, of food surpluses, of uranium material supplies in such a manner that their use can be directed throughout the world where they are badly needed today.

I know that that is a theory that does not meet with much approval from those perhaps whose feeling of nationalism is beginning to rise; perhaps even our own feeling of rising nationalism may be in opposition to such a view, but I would hope that in Canada at least we realize the necessity for some co-operation with the rest of the world, even at the expense of what we have in the past considered our own personal sovereignty over our wealth and our resources.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn for just a moment to the question of the railway strike which, although it is settled for the time being, is, of course, in the issues involved, not finally settled yet. I think there is perhaps a symptom of a situation which may well become much more general in the near future. I am not in a position to judge the rights or the wrongs of that particular dispute. I do not know anything about the safety factors involved; I do not know anything about the economic gains to accrue to the company by following the policy they wish to follow; but I do suggest that it is probably part and parcel of a serious development in industry with which we are going to have to cope in the near future.

This morning the Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Cardin) mentioned some of the possible economic problems that we may be going to face, and I think this is one of them. There will be no question about it, a market controlled economy, plus an automated industry, spells, without any doubt whatever, serious difficulties in the near future, and we are going to have to cope with it. I would suggest, of course, that we have a certain leeway; that even the vast productive potential of modern industry can be utilized for some time in satisfying the needs of areas of the world that need development; but sooner or later the problem is going to be on our doorstep, and it is time we were thinking about it. We are not going to be able to solve it merely by slogans about freedom of enterprise, property rights, and so on. It is going to be hard facts of human life, and we shall have to deal with them in conjunction with peoples in the rest of the world who start off ideologically, perhaps, where we finish. In the future that, I think, is going to be perhaps the most important role that we as Canadians can play in a new developing world, leading away peacefully and easily from the old rigid style of market economy to the new co-operative outlook which must prevail throughout the world if we are to avoid disasters in the future.

(Translation):

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the subject of bilingualism in this house and in Canada. We were told last week that national unity would be strengthened by the hon. member's efforts to speak French in the house. It may be, Mr. Speaker, but I doubt it.

In listening to some of my colleagues' attempts to speak French, Mr. Speaker, I thought we might paraphrase a well known saying: "It's wonderful, but it is not French". I can recall, Mr. Speaker, my very first attempt to speak French, more than forty years ago. My comrades and I had attempted to speak French to some French people but, to our surprise what we thought was French, they thought was English. All the same, Mr. Speaker, we did find school ma'ams who possibly helped us learn the language—even several languages—while we were counting bottles in the cellar in the company of Gabrielle, Cecile, or whatever their names were. In circumstances such as these, Mr. Speaker, one learns the language, and other things too. But I assure you that—

An hon. Member: Tell us about the other things.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): —I have forgotten all I had learned.

I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, to prove to you that national unity will never be built on the abominable French I am speaking at this time.

(Text):

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You are doing well.

An hon. Member: Very well.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Seriously, though, I do want to suggest to our French-speaking colleagues that they should not consider, when those of us who do not speak French fail to make the effort, that we are in any way being disrespectful to the French language or to the rights of our fellow French-speaking Canadians.

Mr. Dufresne: I do not think any one ever thought that.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is diffidence on our part and I am afraid that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and others who have expressed the hope that eventually this will become a bilingual chamber will have to rest content with the fact that the majority of their non-French-speaking colleagues are inescapably uncivilized and barbaric and that we shall never learn to use the French language effectively.

Mr. Lionel Bertrand (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments in the discussion in order to fulfil a task entrusted to me by the blind of the province of Quebec and which I accepted willingly because for several years I have been associated with their group, namely the Friendly Society for the Blind, Societe Amicale des Aveugles, which has its headquarters in Montreal. The honorary patrons and directors of this society are well known in philanthropic circles and the group is also proud of its sound executive. Its managing director, Mr. H. A. Meilleur, who is well seconded by his wife, lost his sight in an accident when still young. He is for the society a living inspiration of courage and perseverance.

For several years I have been placing on the order paper of the House of Commons a resolution recommending the abolition of the means test in the case of blind persons, but it has not had the honour of being thoroughly discussed. As have some other members, I have often called the government's attention to this matter and although many welcome amendments have been made to the act in the last few years, the blind still consider that the means test should be abolished for the simple reason that it paralyses their productive possibilities and greatly limits their initiative.

I have before me booklets containing the signatures of 1,289 members of the Friendly Society for the Blind, all of them blind persons, from nearly 500 cities and villages of the province and which I intend to pass on to the government. These booklets, prepared by the blind themselves, need no further explanation than their title, "A petition from the blind to the federal government of Canada for the abolition of the means test in the case of blind persons".

The blind of Quebec have gone further. They have tried to show that on the provincial level public opinion endorses their request and each one has agreed to obtain in his own locality the signatures of at least 25 people, including those of the parish priest and the mayor. They have achieved the difficult task of gathering in the other volumes which are before me the signatures of 40,000 people, which represent a clearly expressed opinion. If the blind had set out to obtain a million signatures, they would easily have succeeded, for no one can remain indifferent to the physical and moral hardships of the blind; most of us recognize that sound health and a good eyesight are among the greatest blessings of life.

The signatories of the petition declare that the means test has the following adverse effects: (a) It reduces the blind's desire to work and makes them increasingly idle. (b) It forces the blind and their families to adopt a lower standard of living than any other group in Canada. (c) It interferes with the family life of the blind because it encourages husband and wife to live under separate roofs in the fear of seeing their pension reduced. (d) The blind man becomes a permanent burden on the state notwithstanding the fact that, being normally gifted and capable, he could, if he were granted blindness compensation, earn a greater part of his own living as well as contribute to the welfare of his country.

I believe, as so many people have said before me, that there is no greater disability for a human being than blindness. Indeed, at least 80 per cent of human activity depends upon the precious gift of sight. Work normally requires sight, as do reading and travel to perfect oneself. There is not one moment of the day when to move about, to make a living, to amuse ourselves as well as to protect ourselves against the danger of modern life, we do not count upon the so strong and yet so delicate organ of sight which gives us light instead of darkness.

True, blindness does not deprive the individual of all his faculties or productive possibilities, but only too often it paralyses or neutralises them. Precisely because his life is spent in darkness the blind must always rely on the help of someone. No wonder that, in this endless night, he should sometimes give in to discouragement. That is why it is so important not to snuff out the human ideal in his heart, but on the contrary to revive it constantly.

I am proud that my country looks after the blind. I say with great pleasure that my country is taking care of the blind by increasing allowances which enable them to meet their basic needs. The blind are certainly satisfied with that, but the means test is becoming in their view, and I feel that they are right, an injustice which they think should be corrected.

Personally, I do not like the word "pension"; I would rather have used in the case of the blind the words "blindness compensation" which, I think, would be much more appropriate. So it is important that the blind do not suffer from an inferiority complex toward those who can see. It is important to raise their sense of human dignity, to give them a social rank, and to free them from the unbearable thought that they are a burden for their families and society.

The blind person is a human being: like every one of us he has a family and his home obligations are heavier than ours because of his blindness. His cost of living is higher than ours. His normal living expenses are much higher. He cannot benefit from sales because he cannot be aware of them and when he goes shopping he needs a helper whom he must pay. If he wants to commute, to go to church or to see a doctor, or even to earn a living by soliciting or by selling certain articles, he has to have a guide to whom he must pay a salary. Being sightless he finds himself more than others involved in mishaps which entail higher expenses for his clothing and the maintenance of his home. Because he is blind he will even be abused in some quarters. And since blindness is often a cause of ill health he has to pay higher bills for medical supplies and services.

As far as family life is concerned there is no doubt that blindness is the cause of higher expenses. There are very few blind people in Canada who earn enough to take care of themselves. Most blind people cannot live on the monthly allowance they receive, and they must of necessity do some other paying work. Do not think that by abolishing the means test you would make the life of the blind much easier. No, sir. Because nowadays, even if in some cases industry employs blind people, the blind person is not normally expected to work in a factory. He can only perform certain manual tasks which involve no accident hazards, inside duties which are mostly routine or certain work of canvassing which he cannot do without the help of a guide or a companion. That is what he does, not the year round but during certain periods depending on whether the kind of article he deals in or from which he draws an income can be marketed. If he is in receipt of the pension he must always make sure not to earn more than the few hundred dollars allowed under the act, for if he goes over the maximum amount of allowable income his pension is lowered and often withdrawn altogether. The few hundred dollars that a blind person may earn annually only means the difference between want and comfort.

It seems inconceivable that a blind single person is able to live on a total of $18.45 a week—$480 he is allowed to earn and his pension of $480. It is inconceivable that the wife of a blind man, who is the mother of several children and who is working to feed her family, should see the pension of her husband lowered as soon as she is earning $21 weekly and totally cancelled as soon as she earns $30 weekly. It is inconceivable that a man whose wife is blind should see her pension lowered as soon as he is earning $21 weekly and totally cancelled as soon as he is earning $30 weekly. It is even more difficult to understand when you consider that in such a case the law makes it compulsory for this husband to pay from his own salary wages to someone who can see to take care of his wife and his home while he is away.

Thus the blind person has continually some cause for concern. If he has worries about his pension we will not even be in a position to defend his cause by himself. And inspection will always be for him a perpetual nightmare, something awful to bear. I have in this respect statements which leave no doubt.

I can see only one solution: the abolition of the means test. This might result in a few hundred thousand dollars of additional compensation. Nowadays, as soon as he is 70 years old, the blind can draw his old age pension and then he is not subject to any investigation whatsoever. I am told that some 400 blind people pass every year from one law to the other. According to statistical figures, in 1955 some 8,000 blind persons were receiving a blindness pension, which meant an expense of $3 million for the federal treasury and of $1 million for the provinces.

There are in this country some 10,000 blind persons who could benefit from a national law or on whose behalf could be made the helpful gesture of giving them a full life. No more restraint. The blind would have ahead of him a wide open road to his endeavours. He can produce. He would no longer be a useless piece of machinery with limited activity. He would earn more, which would be one worry less. His earnings would be better, which would mean comfort for his family and for himself a revenue producing hobby. He would thus contribute to the progress of his country and the remuneration which he would receive could be considered to be a tribute paid by the nation in order to enable him to be useful to his country like every other citizen, in spite of his handicap.

At the international workers conference held at Oxford in 1949 and at which were represented all the countries in the world except those from behind the iron curtain, and notably competent representatives from the United Nations and UNESCO, the following resolution was adopted:

> Special economic provisions should be made for blind people in order to give them work and to allow them to contribute in every way to the economic and social life of the community. Every nation should provide its blind citizens with at least a minimum subsistence standard, equal in every case, so as to compensate for the increased cost of living brought about by blindness.

In November 1956 the Canadian Catholic conference, of which all archbishops and bishops in Canada are members, made the following statement:

> In so far as material prosperity is concerned the state must not be expected to continue forever the payment of various subsidies or grants. Rather it should be expected to create those economic conditions whereby every citizen could be assured of an opportunity to provide for his own needs and those of his family.

I therefore think that the state should provide the blind people with a blindness compensation, leaving them entirely free to earn their own living and to become useful citizens. When the government notices that the mining industry, agriculture or any other segment of the national economy is in danger it provides for grants and subsidies to set matters right. In the case of blind people the state should provide them with an opportunity of producing, of contributing in this way to the progress of the nation instead of leaving them in depressed circumstances. This situation is so distressing that they are asking the authorities to put an end to it by putting an end to the means test which, in the case of the blind, is almost condemnable.

I know that the present government has done everything to help the low salaried classes, the poor and forsaken members of our society. It is proud of its record, and justly so. Another opportunity is provided now for the government to help one class of people which, to my mind, is the most unhappy of all. The representations which I have just made on behalf of the blind people of the province of Quebec are similar to those which other groups in other provinces and even in the national field have made, I am told, directly to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). All I am asking him to do is to look once more upon this side of the question. Everybody in this country knows how fair the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in dealing with problems of social security and how anxious he is to complement what is already being done in this field. Here is another opportunity along that line. I have confidence in him. I have confidence in the government and I know that these recommendations will not fall on deaf ears.

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to join with previous speakers in extending heartiest congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the address in reply for the manner in which they have acquitted themselves of their tasks.

(Text):

The member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) certainly deserves special congratulations on the magnificent effort he made during his speech when he spoke in my mother tongue for several minutes. He made himself perfectly clear and would with a little practice no doubt become fully bilingual.

(Translation):

As for the member from Gloucester, who, with the greatest of ease, switched from one of Canada's official languages to the other, he certainly proved to the house and to the whole country the importance of bilingualism for all Canadians, and perhaps more particularly for members of parliament, its absolute necessity. I offer him my sincerest congratulations.

(Text):

It is now my duty, Mr. Speaker, and a most pleasant one at that, to pay my respects to my new leader, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and to offer him my respectful congratulations upon his elevation to the leadership of the Conservative party to which I have the honour to belong. I sincerely hope that with the help of Providence he will long retain the strength, the health and the vitality for which he is known. His undeniable talents, his forceful personality, his recognized experience, his deep sincerity and love of work which have characterized his already fruitful public career have led him to the position of great responsibility which he is now assuming with the dignity and efficiency that all members of this house have long since recognized. In short, he is well qualified for the heavy task entrusted to him.

As leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition for the last few days and leader of the great Conservative party for about a month, he has already asserted himself before the Canadian people as a statesman of great stature, as a national and international figure respected by all and one who will no doubt become the next prime minister of Canada after the forthcoming general election.

I wish to express to him publicly my deep admiration and to congratulate him ardently on the excellent manner in which he expresses himself when he speaks in my native tongue. Now that he has overcome his timidity and in view of the success he has achieved when speaking in French—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I never thought he was timid.

Mr. Dufresne: —he can without fear converse with my French-speaking fellow citizens who I am sure will give him a hearty welcome and strong support.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I do not at all propose to deal today with all the subjects contained in the speech from the throne. I shall therefore confine my comments to the international situation, to the strike of the C.P.R. employees, certain parts of our social legislation and the desire expressed in the speech from the throne, to increase grants to universities. In regard to university grants, I shall have the privilege of discussing them when the bill is before us.

The free world horizon, Mr. Speaker, is still heavy with dark clouds which may at any moment give off a destructive and deadly rain. International communism has not given up its infamous schemes for subduing, by the most revolting means, those who still believe, and rightly so, in liberty and democracy. The recent tragic happenings in Hungary, which have struck horror in the hearts of all Canadians without exception, and all peoples of the free world prove to what extent world freedom is threatened by communist imperialism. The nameless atrocities wrought upon the Hungarian people, and its tenacious and heroic stand against a powerful aggressor, we should take as a salutary lesson. It is our duty to resort to every legal and democratic means at our disposal to stop, in our own country, the expansion of a fiendish ideology which means the slow but certain death of all freedom.

If there is a steady increase of applications to enter Canada from people imprisoned behind the iron curtain, it is because Canada is being recognized as the promised land, the country of the future, where until now the words freedom and democracy have kept their real meaning.

It is absolutely necessary that we legislate in such a way as to preserve, before the other nations of the world, the enviable reputation we have acquired. The present apparent difficulties in Canada's communist party are a mere pretext for the reorganization of that nefarious movement. It seems evident that this reorganization will lead to a more extensive and efficient propaganda. Those traitors to their country will be more active than ever; they will try to introduce, right here in Canada, the improved methods of the Kremlin, to overthrow the democratic regime which has been set up by the will of the people.

In the face of the ever-threatening danger that lies in wait for us, efficient measures must be taken and the lawmakers whose responsibility it is to protect the people whom they represent should do all that is required to provide for all contingencies.

We have no right, in the face of that very real danger, to indulge in apathy or indifference. We owe it to ourselves to take action.

Therefore, I suggest to this government to enact, at this session, even before going to the people to solicit a renewal of their term of office, an act to prevent the spread of the subversive doctrine which is called communism.

In my opinion, there is only one real and efficient way to deal with this constant threat and to check Moscow's fiendish ambition to conquer the whole world and reduce it to slavery, and that is to outlaw communism. When all countries which still honour the democratic way of life have understood their duty in this respect, Moscow will have to change its attitude, and no longer will we have to pity the lot of those who, every day, are victims of those traitors, those turncoats, and I will even say of those murderers.

Our main concern should be to prepare Canada's future by guaranteeing to those who will come after us that priceless heritage which is freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I should like now to make a few suggestions and recommendations regarding the recent strike in the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, over a period of ten days, has cost to thousands of workers a loss of more than seven million dollars in wages, and to the company itself about 14 million dollars in revenue.

I believe that the government did not discharge its duty when it failed to establish, in its Department of Labour, an organization designed to devise appropriate methods to meet that modern trend which is called automation, and to protect workers against the loss of their jobs.

The problem of automation did not come up only two weeks ago, for diesel engines did not suddenly appear from a clear sky in yards or on trains.

Little by little a change has been taking place, and for several years we have seen the old steam engines disappear to be replaced by diesels.

About 800 diesel engines are operated today by the Canadian Pacific and three or four years from now, according to experts in this field, the 2,500-odd old steam engines will have completely vanished.

Progress cannot be fought or halted, I am sure; but what has the government done in order to avoid the disastrous consequences that have been felt during the recent strike of the Canadian Pacific, which has fortunately been stopped, though it is far from being finally settled.

It is high time that the government consider this serious problem of automation, which has also come up on the National Railways. As a matter of fact, I read a few days ago in a Montreal paper that 112 employees of the Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland would be laid off because of the change-over from steam to diesel engines.

So, Mr. Speaker, these so-called experts of the department concerned should be put to work without delay, and these out-of-date methods which have been used for every problem which has cropped up in the last 15 years should be set aside. The time has come for a reform in the Department of Labour. Times have changed. Machines have been improved and modernized, and it is time too, that the government modernize its negotiation and conciliation machinery in order to do justice to all concerned.

A policy of wait-and-see and non-interference such as that followed by this government is out of place in a country like Canada which is advancing with giant strides.

Mr. Speaker, last November the cost of living index in Canada reached an all-time high for this country. And, at a time when the Canadian people are still hard-pressed to balance the family budget, the government is piling up huge surpluses. There is something wrong there indeed. In his forthcoming statement the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) will most likely tell us that not only has the government managed to balance its budget, but that it even has a surplus of several hundred millions. This will be indeed an optimistic statement on the eve of a general election.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

Everyone will recognize however that if the government is able to announce surpluses of several hundred millions, it can only mean that it has been levying on the people of Canada, in other words on the taxpayers, so many more millions than were actually needed for the administration of the affairs of our country. If, as some rumours have it, the government has no intention of relieving the taxpayer from the heavy taxes that are imposed on him, it is its duty to return to the people, in some manner, those amounts it has overcharged in the form of taxes.

It is said that taxes are levied upon the people to be returned in some other form, which is a very fundamental of a true democracy. A government is not a business which has to pile up profits.

Indeed, in the face of such a situation, and on the eve of general elections, the Liberal government will no doubt want to attract the vote of the electorate.

It is more than ever time that the government pity the lot of what we have closest at heart in Canada, our human capital.

Since I have been sitting in this house, Mr. Speaker, I have not let a session go by without advocating a substantial increase in old age pensions and family allowances. Unlike the members who sit on the other side of the house, I did not wait for the last session of parliament to make those requests.

I wish to say again that the amount of $40 paid to our senior citizens who have no other income, is clearly insufficient in view of the high cost of living. It is quite impossible for a person eligible for this pension and who has to manage with nothing else but that meager allowance, to get shelter, clothing, and food, and to avail himself of the medical care which is usually needed at that age. This contention is true not only in the case of those whom death has not yet separated, but also in the case of those men and women who, because they have no relatives, seek shelter in our religious institutions which so generously devote themselves to the safeguard and upkeep of the older people who are homeless or who have no relatives. For those religious institutions, as well as for every Canadian citizen, the cost of living has been ever increasing, and it is only through numerous privations and sacrifices that they manage to avoid bankruptcy. This disaster would have certainly occurred in the case of several of them, without the generous grants made by our provincial government.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that by drawing from those huge surpluses, it will be possible to alleviate the burden of our older citizens, who have so largely contributed during their lives, to the expansion and prosperity of Canada.

The same thing applies to family allowances. I repeat what I have said so many times, either in this house or outside. At their present level, and in view of the fact the cost of living has been increasing ever since they were set up, family allowances no longer perform the function for which they were created, and it is more than ever time to proceed to a just and fair adjustment.

In asking for these adjustments I voice more particularly the wishes of those who elected me as their representative in this house and who, for the most part, are members of large families. I say that by protecting the family, which is a sacred institution, we will be protecting the whole community.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a member of this house who does not know that, due to the increasingly centralizing policy of the federal government, our municipal governments, especially in these last few years, have been facing great financial difficulties.

As a rule, I am against a system of grants from the federal government in exchange for services rendered by the municipalities. I believe that the government should set an example and discharge its responsibilities in the same way as any other taxpayer living in a municipality. I am therefore opposed to grants. I favour especially the payment of taxes by the federal government to municipalities on the basis of the municipal assessment. Besides, that is the law which applies to all the ratepayers of my municipality, and those of all municipalities in Canada.

I should thus like to underline the situation of the city of Quebec which comprises the constituency I have the honour to represent here. During the financial year 1953-1954, whereas any ratepayer paid $1.50 per hundred dollars of assessment, the federal government held buildings and properties in Quebec city which were assessed by the municipality at $26,158,584.

In other words if, at that time, the government had paid at the same rate as every other taxpayer, it would have remitted an amount of $392,378.76 by way of municipal taxes.

However, until this year, the city of Quebec has received only the sum of $47,000 from the federal government by way of municipal taxes, or grants, as they are called by the federal government. Some time later, a block on the site of which I hope the new post office of Quebec will shortly be erected, was destroyed by a fire, and the town thereby lost the $45,000 in municipal taxes it had received until then. In other words between the $47,000 paid in grants by the federal government to the city of Quebec, and this sum of $45,000 which has been a total loss to the municipality, there was just $2,000 left for the city treasury.

Mr. Speaker, the amounts I have just mentioned cover only the municipal assessment, that is the tax that any other citizen has to pay; they do not at all include services such as snow removal and water-works. The federal government still owes the city of Quebec a sum of $200,000 for snow removal, that is $1.60 per $100 of municipal assessment.

How is it that the federal government puts itself in a privileged situation when it should be setting an example to the citizens of this country? How is it that religious institutions and church councils pay the snow removal tax to the city of Quebec while the federal government consistently refuses to discharge that obligation. In fact last December—at the end of December if I remember correctly—the Quebec municipal council decided to take proceedings against the federal government to recover the said amount of $200,000 to which it is entitled.

The strangest thing about it, however, is that for many years the city of Quebec has been providing federal government buildings with regular municipal services and supplying water to the National Harbours Board. The National Harbours Board resells that water to different maritime companies, in Quebec harbour, at 50 cents a thousand gallons. Yet, it is said that the National Harbours Board, another government institution, owes more than $900,000 to the city of Quebec (almost one million dollars in water rates) a sum which it consistently refuses to pay. Moreover, everybody—at least everybody living in Quebec—knows that proceedings have been instituted for the collection of that sum.

That is the fine example given by the federal government to the rest of the country. It is supplied with water for its own buildings in Quebec city; the National Harbours Board uses the water of the city of Quebec, for which it refuses to pay and, even worse, it resells that water to navigation companies whose ships come into our port. And the National Harbours Board loses no time in taking proceedings against navigation companies which do not pay.

I can hardly understand such an attitude on the part of the federal government when the government of the province of Quebec, which also has buildings in the city, pays taxes and pays for waterworks and snow removal. In fact, I believe that the last bill paid by the provincial government to the city of Quebec for snow removal amounted, for this year, to $108,000.

This condition is not limited to the city of Quebec; the same situation exists in the little town of Quebec West, which I have the honour of representing. They have tried, by every means at their disposal, to get paid for snow removal and for other services offered by the city to the federal government but the federal government has consistently refused to pay. Today, probably for the purpose of compensating this heavy debt owing to the city of Quebec and to Quebec West, the federal government speaks about increasing the grants already given.

I want to be fair and I should say that for the past two years, as of 1954, federal grants to the city of Quebec, which formerly amounted to $47,000, were increased to $80,000, but that amount hardly represents a fifth of the municipal assessment of the various buildings belonging to the federal government in the city of Quebec. If the federal government was assessed on the same basis as any other ratepayer of the city, it would pay more than $400,000, because the assessment has gone up since 1954 and, according to the assessment roll for the financial year 1956-1957, its buildings and properties have a total value of $27,775,000.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the government will realize the need for helping the city of Quebec, the capital of my province, and at the same time all municipalities which, as a result of that system of grants invented by the federal government, are faced with dire financial difficulties.

The Quebec government recently made a yearly $250,000 grant to the city of Quebec in order to help it to balance its budget over the next ten years. To this grant must be added the taxes which it pays to the city of Quebec, plus the cost of snow removal, plus the water tax, which it also pays. By way of comparison let us point out that the federal government has been paying about $80,000 for the past two years whereas, to be exactly on the same footing as every other taxpayer in Quebec, it should be paying over $400,000 yearly.

Those are the few observations that I wanted to offer today, Mr. Speaker. I have done so in all sincerity and I hope that the government which is still presiding over the destinies of this country will understand the need for helping the municipalities to the extent that they must be helped.

Mr. Speaker, I thank all my colleagues for the particular attention they have paid me, and I hope that the government will receive in the spirit in which they have been given the representations and recommendations which I have had the honour of presenting to the house today.

(Text):

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks I wish to join so many others who have extended felicitations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the very excellent manner in which they discharged their duties. I know it is more or less a recognized custom, followed, I think, generally by all parties, thus to congratulate the mover and seconder of this address; but I base my congratulations, Mr. Speaker, not upon any custom or tradition that may attach to the matter but upon the fact that each of those hon. members acquitted himself admirably and made a very real contribution to this debate. Since they come from widely separated parts of the country, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona from the west, and the hon. member for Gloucester from the east, they have shown clearly by the excellence of their addresses that there is an amplitude of talent among the younger Canadians—I use the term comparatively, of course—in public life today who will be the leaders tomorrow. I think that is something that augurs well for the future of this country.

It is, I know, Mr. Speaker, a matter of real regret to all of us that the Hon. George Drew, after years of arduous public service, has been compelled for reasons of health to retire from the leadership of his party and from his membership in this house. I should like to wish him well in the future and I think we shall all join in that wish.

I take this opportunity, however, to offer my congratulations to the new leader of the official opposition upon his elevation to that responsible post. Whether he is, as his new followers proclaim, and as the previous speaker in effect so confidently asserted a few moments ago, the long awaited genuine Moses who will lead the party out of the political wilderness into the promised land is, of course, quite another matter and I am afraid that that is very much dependent upon whether he has the ability of the original Moses to work miracles. I know he will undoubtedly attempt some vigorous smiting upon the rock of Canadian public opinion which has proved so singularly obdurate to the efforts of his predecessors; but I gather from the latest Tory platform he will be using very much the same old rod.

One feature of the speech from the throne, it seems to me, is that it demonstrates that we are advancing steadily along the path of full national maturity. The establishment of a Canada Council for the arts, humanities and social sciences, to give a new impetus to the development of Canadian—and I hope distinctively Canadian—scholarship and culture is a strong indication of this. And I approve wholeheartedly the proposed substantial increase in grants to Canadian universities. In this day a country which neglects its institutions of higher learning will inevitably consign itself to national weakness and obscurity, and it may well be to national ruin.

In this connection I should like to make just two observations. First, I hope that the system of allocating these grants according to the respective provincial populations will be abandoned in favour of an allocation based upon the number of university students in each province. In my own province of Nova Scotia a widespread regard for learning and a deep appreciation of its worth bring a relatively high percentage of our population to our universities. In addition, however, the fine reputation which those universities enjoy draws large numbers of enrolments from beyond our borders, so that the proportion of students to the total provincial population becomes, of course, correspondingly greater and in effect, therefore, the current system of allocation of grants among the provinces, based, as it is, upon the total populations of those provinces rather than upon their relative student population, it seems to me, has the effect of penalizing our Nova Scotia universities for those very standards of excellence which are their pride and which they should be most strongly encouraged to maintain.

My second observation in this field ought properly to be addressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) who is absent at the moment. In fact, it arises indirectly out of a speech delivered by him at my alma mater, Acadia University, some months ago. Although I was not present I am informed that the minister very eloquently stressed the value of higher education and pointed out the need to foster its pursuit.

The high level of employment opportunity obtaining in this country under the beneficent policies of the present government enables many young Canadians, whose parents would otherwise find it difficult or impossible to meet the expense, to attend college by working during their vacations and in numerous cases by taking part time employment during the term. By and large students with the ambition and energy to do this are of the most desirable type and deserve every encouragement in their efforts.

The student is subject to taxation upon his earned income in exactly the same manner as anybody else but in addition, if he earns $750 or very slightly more in any one year, a modest enough sum today, a parent assisting him through college loses the benefit of even the small taxation exemption of $400 of income allowed that parent in respect of the student.

A friend of mine who is engaged in assisting his sons through college happened to hear the minister speak at Acadia and suggested to me at a much later date that the tax situation I have outlined calls for a generous revision to provide a stronger incentive for such young people to attend college and for their parents to send them. My friend added that it gave the minister an excellent chance to practise what he had been preaching. I accordingly recommend this matter to the careful and I hope sympathetic consideration of the Minister of Finance.

The proposal contained in the speech from the throne to renew on a revised and increased basis the federal program of grants to provincial governments in aid of technical and vocational training is a thoroughly commendable one. The training of skilled workmen is essential for the continuing development of this country and indeed it is forecast in the preliminary report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects to which I shall make further reference that the present shortage in this connection is likely to continue indefinitely. Thus the recipient of such training stands in a strong position with regard to employment opportunity, a position infinitely stronger than that of the unskilled labourer.

Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that in my opinion there is a very real need for a vocational training school in my home town of Amherst, a leading industrial centre of the maritimes. If such a school were located there it would serve not only that town but all the other communities in my constituency. Although the location of these schools is primarily a matter for the provincial government I hope the proposed increase in federal aid for technical and vocational training may in some measure hasten the establishment of such a school in Amherst.

As the speech from the throne noted, parliament met under the shadow, now removed, of the railway strike. I shall say nothing more concerning this than that its speedy settlement with no element of compulsion is a signal tribute to the tact, patience and fair-mindedness of the Prime Minister in pursuing, successfully as it has turned out, every reasonable avenue toward a peaceful and voluntary solution. It is unfortunate, of course, that now we on the government side of the house shall never know what the members of the official opposition really wanted by way of that direct governmental action for which they so stridently clamoured at the beginning of the session. However, I do not think they know either.

The speech from the throne stated that the preliminary report of the royal commission on the economic prospects of Canada, the Gordon commission, would shortly be laid before us, and it is now in our hands. In general it forecasts for Canada as a whole that great and brilliant future which we all hope and pray she will enjoy. The prophecies for 1980 including a population of over 26½ millions, a gross national product triple that of today, an average individual income two-thirds again as much as at present, must gladden the heart of every Canadian. However, I need hardly say that the section of the report to which I turned with most interest is that dealing with the Atlantic provinces and their special problems.

I gather from what certain speakers have let fall in this debate that they consider the report, in so far as it deals with the Atlantic provinces, unexpectedly pessimistic. I do not regard it in that light; I think rather that it is a frank recognition and preliminary appraisal of problems and difficulties which we all know, or certainly all of us from the Atlantic provinces know, have confronted our section of the country for many years.

It is not news, for example, that although real income per capita in the maritimes over the past 30 years has increased at a higher rate than the average for the other provinces of Canada, the average income in the Atlantic provinces remains less than it is in the other six provinces. It is not news that the Nova Scotia coal industry so vital in the economy of the province in spite of a degree of improvement during the last two years faces a difficult and uncertain future; that our agriculture, as indeed agriculture elsewhere in Canada and abroad, has failed to attain the level of prosperity enjoyed by other sectors of the economy; that for the Atlantic provinces the problem of freight rates and transportation is a thorny and formidable one. None of these things is news. But I think the report by implication at least places squarely before us and clearly emphasizes the fact that the problems of the Atlantic provinces are not merely the concern of those provinces only; they are properly the concern of all Canada to be grappled with accordingly. How bright can the whole Canadian picture be if a substantial part remains in shadow?

At the time of confederation and for a considerable period thereafter, the maritime provinces were fully as prosperous as Ontario and Quebec. For this reason, perhaps, the founding fathers failed to envisage a situation in which the general economy of any one region would begin to lag substantially behind that of the remainder of the country, and failed to devise and embody in the British North America Act any specific provisions to cope with such a situation if it should occur. When it did occur, as it began to do well before the turn of the century, it was only slowly and fitfully that the realization dawned that there was a definite responsibility upon the Canadian nation as a whole to try to correct, in some substantial degree at least, any serious economic imbalance of its various segments.

Such measures as the Maritime Freight Rates Act, the coal subventions, the assistance in moving feed grains from west to east, the adjustments in provincial grants—these were and are indications of a gradually awakening sense of that responsibility; but it cannot yet be said that that responsibility has been elevated, as it should be, to the status of a comprehensive and permanent national policy. This preliminary report of the Gordon commission, in its discussion of the Atlantic provinces and their peculiar problems, indicates, to my mind, that the time has come for the adoption of precisely such a broad national policy. Without a wider measure of federal participation in the solving of their problems, the Atlantic provinces can hardly hope to launch any really satisfactory offensive against those problems.

Does not the report in its optimism with regard to the rest of Canada and its future show clearly that now, far more than ever before, the economic, financial, and industrial resources of the country as a whole are or are imminently becoming entirely adequate for the task, admittedly not a light one, of implementing such a broad policy as I have mentioned? I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that pre-eminent and much maligned architect of Canadian economic expansion, a man who never thinks in small terms, if, having read this report, they do not believe that the resources of the Canadian nation are fully equal to this task, without undue strain upon or injustice to any of the more favoured provinces.

If Canada is to achieve a true and balanced greatness that task must be not only undertaken but accomplished. It must be undertaken in the light of the statement on page 99 of the report, that what is required for the reduction in the differential between living standards in the Atlantic provinces and those in the rest of Canada—the report points out that it is in everyone's interest to reduce this differential—is not ad hoc projects and handouts but a positive and comprehensive approach to the problem of the Atlantic region. With that statement I agree, subject to the reservation that there are numerous specific projects in the Atlantic provinces which although their benefits might not extend equally to all parts of the region or might even affect only a small area could and should properly be undertaken as part of a sweeping program of improvement for the whole region.

I think the tenor of the report regarding the approach to the problems of the Atlantic provinces is consonant with certain remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to the Canadian Congress of Labour in April last, I believe in Toronto. On that occasion the Prime Minister said:

> In some areas, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, efforts on what we might call economic redevelopment seem to be desirable. During this past year in meeting with provincial governments I have been impressed with the readiness of representatives from other parts of the country to realize that special measures should perhaps be taken to improve the economy of the Atlantic provinces.
>
> This merits and is receiving attention from many of us; however, the initiative and the ideas, the energies and determination to accomplish this redevelopment cannot originate in other parts of Canada, they must come from the Atlantic area itself. It will then be for us elsewhere to co-operate and help to make such ideas and efforts fruitful in providing better opportunities for workers in those areas.

I believe that those statements of the Prime Minister if properly considered and acted upon can be taken as a first brief draft of a new economic Magna Carta for the Atlantic provinces. That the initiative, the ideas, the energy and the determination should come from those provinces themselves is entirely reasonable, but I suggest that the various provincial governments should not be regarded as the only channels for proposing action. Such a body as the Atlantic provinces economic council, which is already showing itself capable of rendering signal services to the Atlantic region, might well be made, perhaps with federal representation added for the purpose, an official clearing house for the appraisal and evaluation of projects laid before it from any source and the recommendation or otherwise of such projects for attention in the proper operative quarter. Any broad program such as I have mentioned for the strengthening of the economy of the Atlantic region must certainly have among its major objectives the improvement and stabilization of the Nova Scotia coal industry and of agriculture.

When I speak of the Nova Scotia coal industry it is with the realization that our national life consists of far more than the stolid economic facts which reports such as the one I have been mentioning necessarily make their chief concern. My thoughts turn to the great and tragic calamity which befell the town of Springhill in my constituency at the beginning of last November when a shattering and fiery explosion in one of the two coal mines which are the chief and only important industry of the town brought on a disaster ranking among the worst in Canadian mining history. The story is well known across the country because it received great publicity, but nonetheless I think it is only fitting that in my first speech in this chamber during this session I should make reference to it and express the emotions of shock, horror, sorrow and sympathy which I shared in common with everyone in Cumberland county and Nova Scotia and, I am sure, with all other Canadians at the news of the disaster and ultimately the loss of some two score lives.

Very vividly I remember those days, first when it seemed that not a miner of all those in the pit would emerge alive and later when, through the desperate, death-scorning exertions of the rescue crews and the resourcefulness of the trapped men themselves, the greater number of those below finally reached the surface in safety.

Courage was the common attribute, among rescued and rescuer alike. I have had the honour, as have others, of making representations to the Department of the Secretary of State concerning the recognition of outstanding feats of leadership, daring and determination during those dreadful hours. It is my sincere hope and expectation that fitting awards will be made. They will honour, not only those on whom they may be personally bestowed but the many others who took part in the stirring rescue, and indeed all the citizens of the stricken and valiant town who so uniformly revealed in the face of catastrophe and grief the most admirable qualities of composure and unwavering fortitude. I add only that these people are Canadians, the finest of Canadians, who, in the struggle to maintain that industry upon which their livelihood depends, merit fully the attention and assistance of the government of this vast, rich and rapidly developing country, which is their country also.

The special study on the Nova Scotia coal industry, which is to be published separately for the Gordon commission, I assume will set forth in much greater detail than is done in the preliminary report the difficulties facing the industry as well as all the available and feasible means of combatting them. Later in the session there will no doubt be an opportunity to discuss the subject at length in this chamber, presumably on the estimates of the dominion coal board. At the present time I wish to pursue it only to the extent of placing on record my approval of the recommendation in the preliminary report that special subsidies be made available for Nova Scotia coal used to generate thermal power in the Atlantic region. This is not a new proposition; it has been vigorously advocated in the maritimes. In my opinion a reasonable scheme of subsidization for Nova Scotia coal so used would mean a substantial increase in the available market for such coal as well as cheaper electric power for the whole region, which is an urgent need.

I realize of course that even the maximum possible enlargement of this outlet for Nova Scotia coal would by no means provide the complete answer to the industry's marketing needs. Obviously it would not, and there must be no relaxation of efforts to assist the industry to maintain or increase its outlets beyond the Atlantic region, whether in central Canada or elsewhere. Nonetheless, a significant expansion of the market for Nova Scotia coal for the generation of thermal power in the Atlantic region would be of substantial assistance to the industry.

I am the more interested in the recommendation I have mentioned because if it were carried out in conjunction with the proposal contained in the Christie report, published a couple of years back, for an interprovincial grid system covering most of the maritimes, the town of Springhill, being near the geographical centre of the whole area concerned and producing steam coal of excellent quality would, it seems to me, be a natural site for a central pithead power station.

With regard to agriculture, Mr. Speaker, the Senate committee which was envisaged in the speech from the throne to consider what should be done to make better use of land for agriculture ought to accomplish distinctly valuable results. I assume that its inquiry will include not only the question of making better use of land for agriculture but also the question of taking entirely out of agricultural production marginal and submarginal lands which are fundamentally unfit for efficient farming. I recall that in the budget debate of last year I raised this point with regard to the maritime provinces, stating that the logical course there would be in most instances to apply such lands to reforestation, and I suggested joint federal-provincial participation in a program directed to that end. I should like to say now that I think my suggestion is worthy of serious consideration by the proposed Senate committee.

I wish to make one more point regarding agriculture, Mr. Speaker, before I resume my seat. I should like to submit, as I have done frequently in the past, that the assistance afforded by this government in the movement of feed grains from the west to eastern Canada, and particularly to the Atlantic region, should be given the status of a permanent national policy. I should like further to submit that in view of the rise in freight rates the assistance provided should be made such as to restore in full the benefit it originally gave.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Menard (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I would like to join with other honourable members in offering my congratulations to the members for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who have respectively moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Their views were expressed objectively and brilliantly, and we must congratulate them on having spoken in both official languages of this country.

Now, I would first like to offer my respectful compliments to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). As a Canadian, I express the wish that for many years to come he retain his health, an assurance of peace and happiness not only to the Canadian people but to every nation in the world who owe so much to the eminent part he has played on the international scene.

It is with great pleasure that I take this first opportunity to congratulate the Prime Minister on the success obtained by him in helping to solve the Canadian Pacific strike. I must also congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on the great part he has played at the United Nations during the Suez canal crisis. Canada's intervention on this occasion will go down in history. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is also entitled to his share of congratulations for the goodwill journey he has just accomplished in Asia.

Looking upon Canada's ever growing prestige throughout the world one cannot help noticing that this prestige has been increased by the extremely wise foreign policy followed by the present government. In the event of a crisis such as the Suez canal crisis of last fall, it is comforting for the whole people to be able to count on the devotion and statesmanlike qualities of those who are at the head of the Canadian Liberal party.

I must say that I am happy to be a supporter of such a dynamic and enterprising government, a government which is desirous of favouring, by every means at its disposal, the perfect development of our natural resources which, at this time, still have an unlimited value.

In my own constituency, which comprises the counties of St. Jean, Iberville and Napierville, I think that we have widely benefited from the prosperity which our country generally enjoys at this time. If the gross national product now exceeds 29 billion dollars I am happy to say that everybody in my constituency, producers, manufacturers, tradesmen, farmers and workers have contributed more than their share in attaining this very high figure which is the envy of every other nation in the world. Mr. Speaker, at this time the construction of a new post office which will be named the Alcide Côté building is well under way. I hope that the opening or blessing of this building will provide an opportunity for members of the cabinet and other honourable members to visit my constituents who, I am sure, would be greatly honoured by such a token of consideration.

Since the opening of the College Militaire Royal at St. Johns by His Excellency the Governor General, great progress has been accomplished.

At this establishment a number of new buildings are almost completed. I am also aware that other improvements and additions no less important will be carried out in the near future.

Ever since my election to this house, I have endeavoured—and still do—to make this new bilingual school for officers of all arms an institution which will be a credit to the whole of Canada, by the quality of its training as well as by its material aspects.

Aware of the rich military record of the St. Johns area, and wishing to maintain that special character to the area, our government acted wisely in establishing there the preliminary training school for all establishments of the Royal Canadian Air Force. Thus, all young people of both sexes enlisting in the R.C.A.F., must make a stay of at least five weeks at the St. Johns station before being posted to other Canadian training or service bases. That training school has its own airport where a private company is entrusted at the present time with the repairs of motor aircraft. Because of the adoption of the turbo-jet aircraft, whose number increases constantly and which in the not too distant future will replace the ordinary piston engine aircraft, I believe that the extension of the runways at St. Johns airport is now a must, in order to allow that company to continue carrying out repairs and maintenance of the latest aircraft models in St. Johns. Incidentally, I wish to point out that we have in my constituency expert and skilled labour. That progress is illustrated by the fact that in the past ten years this important company, one of the best equipped in the country for that type of work, has increased its staff from 40 to 460 employees.

Moreover, from a strategic point of view, military authorities recognize St. Johns airport, because of its proximity to the city of Montreal, like the base at St. Hubert, as indispensable to better protect the island of Montreal. All the more reason then to carry out the extension of the runways so that aircraft of all types may have access to St. Johns airport.

I am pleased to point out that the property sold to the city of St. Johns by the federal government about ten years ago, is already occupied by two industries employing more than 350 people. Part of the property is taken up by the arts and trades school. A municipal stadium has also been built there and a large area reserved for a civic centre. I therefore thank sincerely those who have co-operated directly or indirectly to all this progress in my constituency; they have all my gratitude.

Mr. Speaker, among several important projects, there are two in my constituency which I have particularly at heart. One concerns the dredging of the Richelieu river channel to a depth of 14 feet. That project was put under way back in 1938 through the building of the dam at Fryer island, which was carried out that same year. It seems that the last war was the main cause of the interruption of the works, but I believe that it is time now to continue and complete this important undertaking.

As regards the other project which I favour, it has to do with the building of a canal of a total length of about 14 miles to connect St. Johns and Laprairie as well as the St. Lawrence seaway with the Richelieu river.

This new waterway would allow ships to travel between New York and Montreal, or the great lakes, and thus avoid a distance of more than a thousand miles. I am convinced that the construction and maintenance costs of such a canal would be perfectly justified since heavy shipments of all kinds of goods could be carried through that new waterway.

At the national level, I believe that the two greatest achievements of this government have been the construction of the trans-Canada pipe line and the St. Lawrence seaway project. By themselves, these two undertakings show in no uncertain way that our present leaders are eager to achieve national economic unity.

In all fields, Canada is asserting itself more and more among other older and more populated nations. One cannot emphasize too much the creditable achievements of Canadian delegations throughout the world, for the enhancement of Canada's prestige.

This country, which certain people were pleased to refer to as "a few acres of snow", has had a phenomenal expansion through the unceasing work of our hardy pioneers, explorers, technicians and enlightened businessmen. Let us thank Providence for so many blessings.

From the Atlantic to the Pacific, throughout our country, and even up to the confines of the Arctic, this intense development has been made possible through a systematic organization of transport and communications by land, sea and air. Very few countries, in proportion to their population, can boast of such achievements. The economic future of our country is now secure thanks precisely to the efficient policies advocated by the Liberal government, strengthened by the confidence and the sincere support of all classes of society.

Thanks to the efficient leadership of our Right Hon. Prime Minister, the St. Lawrence Seaway project will very soon become a reality. This gigantic masterpiece of engineering will bring us a new potential of electrical energy which will promote the development of the surrounding districts. Navigation facilities on the rivers and the ocean will now be extended right to the heart of our country.

Is not our Prime Minister himself, by his dynamic personality and his sense of organization, a true symbol of energy? His personal energy could well be compared to that new source of energy made possible by and resulting from the St. Lawrence Seaway project. One can rightly give him a large part of the credit, since he is responsible for this undertaking.

Let us rejoice at having as leader of the Canadian government a man so eminently qualified to guide the destinies of this country. May God give him long life so that Canada may benefit for a long time from his broad experience. I also wish that he will be able to keep counting upon his present valuable and devoted colleagues, in the best interests of the Canadian nation.

When listening to the speech from the throne, I have been very happy to see, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian government which has done much for our farmers in eastern Canada, proposes to establish a senate committee for the purpose of increasing, through scientific means, the agricultural output of this area.

I wish to assure my friends, the farmers of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, that I am going to follow very closely the most important work of this committee, so as to make all possible benefits available to them, because no one has a keener desire than I have of seeing them happier and more prosperous.

I also wish to join the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) who, in his speech of January 10 last, urged the government to increase family allowances. The young people we are helping today are the men of tomorrow.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, let me once again express my sincere thanks to my electors for the honour they have conferred upon me by choosing me as their representative in this Canadian parliament. (Text):

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who initiated this debate by moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Representing as I do a constituency adjoining that of the mover, I was naturally glad to hear him make favourable reference to and acknowledgment of the accomplishments in our community of Edmonton and in the province of Alberta generally.

Let me begin, Mr. Speaker, by saying what an inspiring task it is for us to be able to rise in our places in this chamber and, without any fear or hindrance, conscientiously express our opinions. That is something I intend to do. I think it is good that we should contemplate this freedom, because it sums up very well the purpose of parliament and the history and destiny of this nation. There is conclusive evidence that in the world struggle between our way of life and the regimented way of life the greatest advantage we have is our political freedom. This advantage, I am sure, has restrained many of the uncommitted people in the world from giving credence to the charge that our democracy acts only for the few and that parliament does not represent the will of the people.

This consideration leads me to conclude that we as members have an outstanding task ahead of us. A complete awareness of our responsibilities as members means more than giving lip service to humanity. It means showing our practical concern for the advancement of those political concepts held by our people, and providing our country and all sectors of our society with well-being. Unfortunately this is not the case today.

Perhaps all this sounds like the obvious, but I say it for this reason. It seems to me that much of what has been said thus far by government supporters consists of complimentary remarks with respect to the past accomplishments and record of this government. Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada are not interested in platitudes. Of that fact I am sure. They are too greatly concerned with the bread and butter issues which dominate their daily life. That being so, they insist that we, their representatives, do something and come to grips with these problems.

I am not accusing individuals or this government of being indifferent to this concept, but why have we not read in the speech from the throne or heard from government spokesmen what policies this government proposes in order to resolve the acute problems of burdensome taxation which the people of Canada have been carrying for such a long time; inflation; the ever-increasing costs of living; the insecurity and frustration which face our aged, the handicapped, the blind and the veterans? What about our debt, personal, municipal and national? What about the problem of the municipalities pressed to the wall by acute financial problems? What about the discriminatory freight rates which hit hardest at the province from which I come and which inflict hardship on everyone located there? What about the dilemma in which the working man finds himself in his efforts to provide security for his family in the face of ever-mounting costs of living? How about the farmer's problem and the dilemma of the small businessman?

Of course, limitation of time will prevent me from discussing all these problems in detail. However, I am sure that many of my colleagues will elaborate on them. I therefore propose to speak on the need for solutions to those problems that are upon us at this time with terrible urgency. We live in challenging times, and there are very serious problems that face this nation and our people. What about the heavy tax levies with which the people of Canada are burdened? Our present taxation polices make it virtually impossible for people to save. Our present taxation policies make it impossible for people to pay cash for the things they need in order to sustain a proper standard of living. Our present taxation policies are paralysing the incentive and the initiative of our people.

Is it any wonder that instalment credit buying in our country has reached an all-time high? What is instalment credit buying if not a symptom of insufficient purchasing power in the hands of our people, much of which has been arbitrarily removed by the taxation policies of the Liberal government, necessitating the people plunging themselves into debt when they buy. At a time when there is every evidence that some tax relief is essential to offset the credit squeeze the present government persists in denying such tax relief.

The point I make is simple. The continuation of high taxation will result in decreased production and a continuation of inflation. In addition, Mr. Speaker, we all know that when taxes become burdensome, as they are today, they become inflationary. The heavy load of the various taxes incorporated into the prices of goods has raised those prices to an all-time high. In my opinion hidden taxes are a major source of our inflationary problems. In this connection may I quote from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of June 12, 1956. It is entitled, "Hidden Taxes Rob us Blind".

> Loudest wails by the taxpayers are usually reserved for the amounts they have to cough up in personal income tax, but the truth is that indirect taxes take nearly twice as much from them during the course of a year.
>
> The 1955-56 breakdown on federal revenues showed a total of $1,180 millions from personal income tax, and a return to the government of $2,028,400,000 from all indirect taxes.
>
> Writing in the current issue of Liberty magazine, Fred Edge, a Toronto newspaper man who sometimes corresponds for the Tribune, points out that Ottawa's tax bite goes on everything from diaper pins to coffins. He gives some examples including $450 excise and sales taxes on a $2,600 automobile; $3.16 for provincial and dominion governments on a bottle of Canadian-made rye that is worth 84 cents; $87 on a $350 electric range and 17 cents on each package of cigarettes, or $62.05 a year at the rate of a package a day. In his article Mr. Edge makes a number of points that the Tribune has hammered home for several years—for example, he advises retailers to show the amount of hidden taxes concealed in a selling price so that the blame may be assigned to the government rather than to the merchants, and he complains about the viciousness of tax on tax and cites the case of a new suit made of imported material on which there is a $5 customs duty. As the suit passes through various hands in reaching the customer, there is a 10 per cent retail sales tax on a 10 per cent wholesale sales tax on a 10 per cent excise tax on the $5 customs duty charged on $30 worth of imported material. Mr. Edge comments: "Besides this pyramiding of the original customs duty, each successive sales tax pyramids similarly on preceding sales taxes."

The statement is made that hidden tax revenue is higher now than ever before in Canada's history, and one of the most revealing statements with which most taxpayers are familiar by now is that the automobile industry in Canada turned over $172 million to the dominion government in sales and excise taxes on new cars—taxes paid by the customers—and yet the total payroll of the automobile industry was $154 million, which is $18 million less than the taxes total.

All this is going on, Mr. Speaker, at a time when the federal government is raking in a huge budgetary surplus. The article goes on:

Under the present Liberal-socialist government there is no escaping these heavy taxes, direct and indirect, and there is certainly no demonstrated application of economy by a government that is heavy with 20 years of power. As Mr. Edge wound up his article: "The government last year pocketed roughly $1 million on the hidden sales tax on coffins."

No fair-minded Canadian resents paying a fair share of taxes to enable the government to function properly, but taxing all of the people all of the time has become a habit of the Liberal government. Tax, spend and be re-elected; get in and stay in; never mind the little taxpayer. That is the motto of this government today. The jungle of taxation has invaded every single field of human endeavour and resulted in the greatest centralization of power the people of Canada have ever had. Income tax, corporate tax, excise tax, sales tax, direct taxes and indirect taxes—the ruthlessness of this taxation system is seen in the fact that last year the government hauled in hidden sales taxes on coffins a sum totalling $1 million.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that every single Canadian, every labourer in Canada, works several months each year to sustain our oversized government. Of course, the question arises, but where are we going to get the money to pay for the expenditures of the federal government? The answer is simple; by economizing and instituting stringency and frugality into every government department. Is it morally right that the experts in the financial department of this government should cry to the high heavens that it is immoral for people to spend more than they earn, yet this government does nothing about trimming its own colossal spending spree? One of the most fallacious arguments of the orthodox financiers is that the government can obtain high revenues only if it has high taxation. A law of economics provides, and there are many examples, that as long as there is improved consumer demand for goods and services in our country, and this is the case today, the government can obtain high revenues with reasonable taxation by reason of the turnover created by this very consumer demand.

[Mr. Holowach.]

Let me just illustrate my point. In 1954 the United States government slashed taxes by some $7 billion. Did that result in a depression? Did that result in insufficient revenues to the government so it could not function properly? On the contrary, it resulted in the greatest spurt in the economy of that country. It resulted in added revenues to the government. Incidentally, much of that prosperity in the United States spilled over into our economy by way of capital investment in our natural resources development. Suffice it to mention the remarkable recovery of the republic of West Germany. A few years ago she stood among the bankrupt nations of the world, amidst the rubble of bankruptcy. Today West Germany stands as an example of economic stability. The lesson to be learned is that by economizing and making drastic cuts in the taxation laws Germany has achieved this enviable position. The need for substantial tax reductions is widespread and acknowledged.

In a news letter issued by the department of economic development of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in December reference is made to a poll conducted by the Canadian institute of public opinion. I quote:

To check on the mood of the people in a pre-election period the Canadian institute of public opinion asked this question on taxes:

"Do you consider the amount of federal income tax which you have, or your husband has, to pay as too high, about right or too low?"

The answers showed that across the country 62 per cent of Canadians felt that federal income taxes were too high at this time. Thirty-three per cent said they were about right and 5 per cent were noncommittal.

Sir, we Social Crediters in parliament have consistently advocated and we shall continue to propose that a complete overhaul of our taxation system and its laws be undertaken immediately. We urge clarification of the interpretation of many of our existing laws respecting taxation. We urge that those taxes which are restrictive to consumption and productive free enterprise be reduced or abolished as a stimulus to greater consumption and production.

What about the mounting debt of our nation? Canada's gross national debt stood at $3,710,610,592 as of March 31, 1939. It rose to the colossal figure of $17 billion as of March 31, 1952. In 1956 it reached the staggering figure of over $19 billion. Mr. Speaker, is this not a matter of serious concern to every Canadian and to the members of parliament? If we add to this gross national debt the personal debt of our people, the municipality and provincial debts, we have a debt picture such as no other nation of 16 million has ever had in its history.

In all fairness, the people of Canada ask, is this an example of the businesslike efficient management which the people are entitled to have in their senior government? It is a situation, I believe, which should alarm even the most unwary. Clearly it is a situation which alarms every thoughtful Canadian, when he learns that between the fiscal years 1868 and 1953, $8,045,608,184.29 of his taxes went to pay the interest charges on the national debt. The source of my information is page 1067 of Hansard of January 13, 1954, where a question appearing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) was answered officially. To comprehend the implication of such a huge debt is to consider that approximately $500 million of the taxpayers' money is required yearly to pay the interest charges alone. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if any private enterprise, any private business in Canada, imitated even remotely the fiscal policies of this government, it could not very long survive.

Well, what should we do? We have not to look very far for an answer. Look at what is being accomplished in the province of Alberta under a Social Credit administration. In 1935 Alberta stood in the midst of a depression and was actually economically bankrupt. The treasury was empty. Previous Liberal and U.F.A. governments left us an inheritance of $167 million of debt. A population of fewer than a million was left with that debt. At that time it took 51 cents out of every dollar collected by our treasury to pay the interest on the debt; and to add insult to injury Ottawa declared our province credit unworthy. We were financially boycotted.

What were we to do? We started putting our affairs in order by implementing the Social Credit principle that a nation cannot tax or borrow itself into prosperity. We accepted the precept that the establishment and preservation of justice and equity for all men calls for a stop to the strangling power of debt. Armed with this belief, and with the most careful type of economizing, we overcame the difficult situation. Today Albertans point with pride to the fact that we are the only province in Canada that in 21 years has not borrowed one cent. In addition we have repaid the major bulk of that debt, and for all practical purposes today we are virtually debt-free, another first for Alberta.

Sir, Social Credit members have consistently pointed to the need for a progressive reduction and eventual liquidation of the public debt. There are, of course, many other areas of national importance in which progressive thinking is required at the federal level. What is the present government doing to alleviate the precarious financial position of municipal governments throughout the country?

Mr. Byrne: What is Alberta doing?

Mr. Holowach: I will tell you right away. On November 23, 1956, the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities urged the federal government to call a federal-provincial-municipal conference to discuss acute problems in municipal finance. In their brief of 25 pages they pointed out the financial plight of municipalities as being, and I quote——a matter of national concern and as such should be regarded as a matter of national importance.

Are we to take it that the proposed legislation outlined in the speech from the throne is the Liberal answer to this serious problem, a proposal which says that the Liberal government has finally agreed to pay municipal taxes on crown property in certain municipalities?

One of the most erroneous concepts that is being spread is that the financial problems of municipalities are local problems or provincial problems. Let the provinces solve them. That is passing the buck. That is a concept from the dark ages. Inasmuch as the federal government constitutionally has jurisdiction over monetary policies, the problem connected with municipal finances can only be resolved by a realistic monetary policy at the national level.

During the discussion on the tax rental agreement we fought for a more generous return to the provinces of their own money not only in order to restore stability to them but to enable them to give municipal aid, ensure a proper balance among the three levels of government, to promote decentralization; but no, the federal government is not happy unless it retains 75 cents out of every dollar collected in taxes. I referred to the need for a more equitable distribution of the national revenue. In The Ensign of March 24, 1956, there appears a reprint of an article from the Toronto Telegram. I quote:

> The plain fact is that while the federal government's needs and costs have increased, provincial and municipal governments have been receiving less and less of the tax dollar. In 1930 the dominion government took 40.5 per cent, while provincial governments received 20.2 per cent and municipal governments 39.3 per cent. Compare this with 70.9 per cent for the dominion in 1951, 17.2 per cent for the provinces, and 11.9 per cent for the municipalities.

Today the Liberal government at Ottawa collects over 75 cents of every tax dollar in our country, leaving only 25 cents of that tax dollar for the provincial and municipal governments. We Social Crediters resent these problems, not only because there is no valid excuse for their existence in our wealthy country but also because we are concerned that if they are left unresolved they will whittle away the independence and incentive of our people. Because they have been left unresolved, these problems little by little are undermining confidence in our way of life. They are forcing our citizenry more and more to accept dependence on an all-powerful central government here at Ottawa.

In spite of these serious problems, Mr. Speaker, the government continues to drum to the country the theme of unprecedented prosperity. "You never had it so good," they say to the people. "Why look at the gross national product; it has reached the $30 billion mark". So what? Naturally we are glad that production is on the increase in Canada, but what difference does it make whether our gross national product reaches the $30 billion, $50 billion or $100 billion mark? The acid test of real prosperity and an enlightened civilization is the financial distribution of that increased wealth. The government has not succeeded in doing this.

What about the aged, the blind, the veterans and the handicapped? Are they sharing in this increased wealth? I refer to these people because if there is any element in our population deserving of special consideration it is our aged, our handicapped and our veterans. In 1951 when their security pension became operative, our gross national product was over $21 billion, and in 1955 it rose to over $26 billion. Today it is close to the $30 billion mark. Why have these people not shared in the increased wealth? What about the dilemma which faces our farmers, who are penalized by uncertainty and reduced incomes for having produced great abundance? What does the government intend to do to correct this basic ill?

[Mr. Holowach.]

What about the small businessman in our communities? The present tight money squeeze deliberately designed by the government to curb expansion has hit him the hardest. This credit squeeze, the hoisting of bank interest rates, has dried up the last available source of bank credit to small businessmen. Previously a small businessman could not borrow all he needed even at high rates of interest, but at the present time with credit slammed shut his case becomes practically hopeless. Canada needs to expand and requires capital with which to do so. We urge that aid to the small businessmen be increased, not destroyed or entirely removed.

What about the coal miners of Nova Scotia and the textile workers who have been suffering chronic unemployment? What about the lumbermen who are facing a similar problem? Are they sharing in our increased prosperity? The truth is that a difference exists between progress and real prosperity. Our present prosperity is artificial; real prosperity results only when the now splendidly rising trend of production is made financially available to all those who need it within our country and abroad.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish also to call attention to a situation which has aroused the people of my constituency and every fair-minded Canadian in the country. I refer to the fact that treaty Indians are now being ordered off the Hobbema reserve in Alberta. This has occurred elsewhere as well, and can result only in untold hardship for these native people. Last session I had occasion during consideration of the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to speak of Indian affairs, and at that time I emphasized the fact that Indians should be given a new deal and that this government should do something new and live up to its obligations to the Indians. We all know the Canadian Indians are not only the most poorly fed, poorly housed and poorly clothed of any people in Canada but as demonstrated by the evictions to which I referred they are also the most insecure even on their own reservation. It is time for the minister and his department to show responsibility and take substantial action to amend or change the present laws which permit the expulsion of Indians from their sanctuaries.

Does it make sense that innocent men, women and children are asked to pay the penalty for acts committed by their fathers or grandfathers? What we have demonstrated in these heartless expulsions is nothing less than a blind insensibility to the human needs of these Indian people. Is it not thought-provoking that on the one hand we welcome Hungarian refugees to this country —and may I add that we are glad to have them with us, because Canada can absorb many people—yet on the other hand evict these native people from their reservations? We welcome the newcomer but evict the old comer, as it were. It is my sincere hope that the minister will recognize this injustice and will act favourably to change the law in order to prohibit further evictions.

Before concluding my remarks I wish to make a brief comment concerning the sub-amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) and seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). That amendment reads as follows:

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "the rights of parliament" the following words:

"and by reason of their failure to announce legislation establishing a comprehensive and nation-wide program of health insurance, with provision for provincial participation."

We intend to support this amendment. We do so because of the importance of the subject with which it deals. On many occasions Social Crediters have emphasized their conviction that there is no greater asset to any nation than the health of its people. This being so, every effort must be made individually by our citizens and collectively through government programs to achieve the highest national standards of health and well-being.

As we see it, the national health program should have as its objective making it possible for every citizen of Canada, irrespective of means, to obtain hospitalization, dental and optical services, coupled with a sound health education emphasizing preventive measures. Such a health scheme would develop rapidly and become broader as production and national development make it possible to widen its scope in order to avoid an avalanche of taxes, and without plaguing the nation with embarrassments which would arise from the implementation of such a scheme before adequate trained personnel, hospital and clinical facilities were available.

On the basis of what we read and hear respecting a national health insurance program as envisioned by the C.C.F. party, let me emphasize that the Social Crediters differ on the basic fundamental approach to this vital undertaking. We oppose the centralization of control. Our approach and our program recognizes (1) a fair share of individual responsibility; (2) that emphasis must be placed on preventive medicine, that is keeping people well; (3) that patients should have a choice of doctors and the program should guarantee no regimentation of medical personnel or hospitals; (4) that the program must be devised by joint co-operation of the municipal, provincial and federal governments; (5) that the administration should rest with the provincial and municipal governments and (6) that adequate federal subsidies must be available in order to keep costs down.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to congratulate both the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the motion upon which this debate is based. They both carried out their responsibilities with distinction to themselves and with credit to their respective constituencies. May I just add the comment that the excellent address of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona might have been improved to an even greater extent if he had referred to that land of greater opportunity on which the future prospects, prosperity and growth of Edmonton will largely depend, namely the Canadian north.

I know that hon. members of this house regardless of party are glad to join in welcoming back the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has just returned from a most successful tour of 15 countries in Asia and Australasia. Accompanied by Mrs. Martin and a capable staff the minister accomplished a strenuous and challenging diplomatic mission in masterful fashion. All must agree that the minister's conduct everywhere reflected great credit on Canada and on what this nation represents in world affairs. I am sure also that Canadians appreciated the very able press coverage of the entire journey provided by the Southam news service through its correspondent Douglas Leiterman.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare upon his arrival in Ottawa was quick to admit that his good-will mission was made much easier by the visits made to Asian countries by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries. Canadians are respected everywhere, not only because of the high calibre of public men who travel to these important parts of the world but also because it is realized that Canada has no selfish ambitions, that Canadians want peace and have shown themselves to be trusted mediators in disputes between large nations or powers.

I wish to commend also the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for his tireless humanitarian efforts to find sanctuary in this country for as many valiant Hungarians as this country can absorb. His mission to Austria by air before Christmas caught the imagination of all Canadians, and impressed the country with the energy and ability of this young cabinet minister. In this connection I want to draw attention to the splendid work of the officials of his department in welcoming and placing in employment those Hungarians who have been transported thus far to Canada. In particular I wish to pay tribute to Mr. Bird, the district superintendent of immigration at Vancouver, and his assistants who worked night and day, faithfully and diligently, to encourage and rehabilitate these deserving newcomers to our country.

I want to take advantage of this opening debate of the session to deal with some of the pressing transportation problems in the Yukon. Before I do so I think it would be appropriate to say something about the transportation situation nationally. I am sure all hon. members of the house rejoiced that a formula had been found by which the Canadian Pacific Railway strike was brought to an end. The Prime Minister and Minister of Labour are to be commended upon their mediation efforts to bring about a settlement without having to resort to any kind of compulsory arbitration.

At this critical time in the opening up of the Canadian north the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects has chosen to ignore in its preliminary report the very existence of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. No mention whatever is made by the Gordon commission of any transportation problem, whether it be railway extensions from British Columbia or Alberta, additional highway facilities, or other assistance to the mining industry in the north. Even in the case of national population figures the two northern territories are definitely excluded, just as their problems and possibilities are excluded from the report itself.

Surely no Canadian can look upon this preliminary report and feel otherwise than that the commission has failed to discharge its primary duty and obligation. With the eyes of the world fastened at the present time on the potential greatness of our northern areas it is obvious that the Gordon commission by its silence on this subject has shown a wilful lack of that sort of vision and understanding which made possible the creation and growth of Canada itself. May we still cherish the hope that the commission's report in its final form will remedy this fundamental weakness and correct what appears to be a total disregard of an area which may well be the future economic salvation of the continent.

In any event the federal government should not hesitate to prove to the rest of the world that Canada does not neglect her northern areas and her northern heritage. I might say that the people of the Yukon have the utmost confidence in the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I want to commend him for his constructive and understanding approach to the many and varied problems which come under his jurisdiction. I know the minister realizes that the people residing in the north are pioneering the country and paving the way for additional development, and are entitled to the best service, assistance and encouragement the federal government can provide.

To get back to this matter of northern transportation, a glance at the map of northern Canada will serve to show the great benefit and value of an all-weather road from the Yukon across to the Mackenzie river delta and the site of the new Aklavik. I propose to dwell upon the subject of roads in the north, because if the resources of the territories are to be developed it is surely the duty of the federal government to use all possible means to build and maintain proper road communications. Up to the present time the federal government road program in the north has been far from adequate, and has been steadily lacking in awareness of the vital necessity for the accelerated construction of roads which will assist in opening up this important part of Canada.

In this connection I may say that the federal government has seen fit to establish a new road policy in the Yukon to take effect from April 1, 1957. I understand that under this new policy the entire cost of construction of development roads in the territory will be borne by the federal government, and in addition 85 per cent of the cost of the maintenance of those roads will be the responsibility of the federal government, the other 15 per cent to be borne by the territorial government.

Just at this point I might say that the previous financial agreement between the federal government and the territorial government will expire on March 31 of this year. A new agreement will then come into effect. The agreement presently in force has most certainly failed to meet the present needs of this fast-developing territory because of the shortsighted, penny-pinching attitude of those people in the department who formulated the policy contained in the agreement when it was drawn up about five years ago. It is to be hoped that improved vision and better understanding will be displayed in connection with the drafting of the new fiscal arrangements.

It is imperative that this new arrangement be not passed strictly on population figures, as is the case with similar agreements with the provinces. In the case of the Yukon it should be based on a different formula, one more applicable to the special conditions in that area.

It is obvious that in a part of Canada where the land area is so large and the population is so small and scattered as in the Yukon it is neither a sound nor fair basis for these payments to be measured by the population yardstick only. Undoubtedly it should be the sole responsibility of the federal government, not the territorial government, to provide all capital expenditures required to maintain and advance our economic position in the north, when one considers that the federal government receives all the revenue now derived from the exploitation of the natural resources in the territory. The territorial government has its hands full to take care of its own administrative problems with the revenue it now receives. One thing is certain. The federal government will eventually reap the future benefits of any investments they make in the north at this time.

Again on the subject of road transportation in the north, Mr. Speaker, in the Yukon Territory we have seen how the Alaska highway, the Haines cut-off road, the Atlin road, the roads to Mayo and Dawson and the Canol road have made the southern half of the territory accessible to prospectors and developers. As a result many important deposits of nickel-copper, silver-lead-zinc and asbestos and other minerals have been discovered, which undoubtedly will add greatly to the wealth of the Yukon Territory and of Canada and provide a livelihood for many workers in the future. In the last few years the prospector and the exploration companies have advanced into the northern half of the territory with most encouraging results. I might add that the northern part of the Yukon Territory and the adjoining part of the Northwest Territories are considered by those people who know these things to be very favourable for the deposition of oil and gas as well as other minerals.

It should be remembered that the first oil field in Canada, apart from the pioneer production in southwestern Ontario, was discovered at Norman Wells, which is in this favourable area adjoining the northern part of the Yukon Territory. I have no doubt that the persistence which these oil explorers are known to possess, their skill and the money which they are willing to venture will lead to the discovery of further oil fields in this area.

This all leads to the point of my talk, which is that we should do everything possible to assist this northern development and exploratory work. The essential way in which this can be done is by improving the transportation facilities. In recent months we have heard much about the distant early warning line and what an important part the Arctic areas of Canada are playing and are going to play in the defence of North America. Judging from stories which have been published in the press, I think it is safe to say that a considerable tonnage of freight is being and will be required in the construction and maintenance of these defence facilities.

At present freight can be taken into the Arctic only by water during the very short navigation season, either down the Mackenzie river or around Alaska by the Bering sea. Much of it has been taken in by airlift, and this is very expensive. Some can be taken in overland when the ground is frozen. The latter two methods are very expensive or more difficult than would be the case if we had an all-weather road to the Arctic coast.

Aklavik on the delta of the Mackenzie river in the Northwest Territories is only about 750 miles by road from tidewater and a 12-month port on the Pacific coast at Skagway, Alaska, or Haines, Alaska. About 350 miles of this road are already built. The first 110 miles is covered by the White Pass railway from Skagway to Whitehorse, or it is 259 miles from Haines, Alaska, to Whitehorse via the Haines cut-off and the Alaska highway. The next 260 miles is covered by the all-weather road from Whitehorse to Mayo or Dawson.

A further glance at the map will show that Aklavik is almost due north of Skagway, Haines, Whitehorse, Dawson, and Mayo, and that the Peel river which rises in the northern part of the Yukon Territory cuts through the Mackenzie mountains before it joins the Mackenzie river at the delta near Aklavik. We thus are provided with a natural pass from the Yukon Territory to the Mackenzie river delta by means of the valley of the Peel river. Once through the Mackenzie mountains the road might swing over to Arctic Red river where it could cross the Mackenzie river and thence on to the new site of Aklavik.

A road starting from a suitable point on the Whitehorse-Mayo-Dawson road at or near Dawson City or Mayo, depending on the results of a survey to determine the feasibility of these routes, and proceeding to Aklavik via the Peel river would assist materially in the exploration and development of the mineral resources of this part of Canada and in providing the quickest, cheapest and most dependable all-weather transportation route to the western Arctic coast.

I think the government of Canada should take note of this fact and begin to assemble further detailed information on this route at once. I strongly advocate that a sufficient sum of money be placed in the estimates of the northern affairs department to cover the cost of a location survey to enable early commencement of actual construction to be made without wasting any more precious time. A preliminary aerial survey should be undertaken as early next spring as weather conditions permit.

According to my information, the proposed route of the road starting at or near Dawson City or Mayo would traverse one of the most highly mineralized areas on the North American continent including oil and gas. Several years ago a geologist working in the north gave me his opinion that the greatest reservoir of oil on this continent is to be found in the area stretching between Dawson and Aklavik. In his view the major producing oil fields in Alberta of Pembina, Leduc and Redwater were merely fringe or marginal pools compared to the possibilities of this northern reservoir.

It is obvious what great benefit such a road would bring to the people residing in the Mackenzie river delta, as well as providing the necessary facilities for the maintenance of the distant early warning line. In addition, such a road would afford the people of that area year-round access to a port at tidewater on the Pacific at or near Skagway or Haines, Alaska.

The peoples of the delta naturally need to stockpile their food, provisions and other material for many months each year, and to provide heated storage and so forth to carry them through the long winters. As every hon. member will realize, this means an added burden inasmuch as it increases substantially the cost of living in that area. The proposed all-weather road would enable merchants and others to bring in necessary provisions regularly, and would largely do away with the need to stockpile. The road would be one of the most important projects that could be undertaken to promote the economic welfare and stability of the northern Mackenzie river district, as well as the northern Yukon areas. In fact it would be nothing less than culpable neglect on the part of the government to sidestep further this highly significant and very practical measure.

During the past few years a considerable sum of money has been spent on oil exploratory work by the Peel Plateau Exploration Company in the Eagle Plain area north of Dawson City in the vicinity of the Porcupine river. Supplies are taken into this area by tractor train from Dawson City during the winter months, following the proposed route of an all-weather road through the valley of the Peel river to Aklavik, Northwest Territories. To foster and encourage mineral exploration along the route suggested, I think it is only fair and reasonable to expect that the federal government will assist the exploration company in maintaining a winter tractor road to Eagle Plain. If our north country is to be opened and developed in the way it should be, the federal government should assist the companies and individuals who are willing to risk capital in such ventures, especially in areas which are favourable to mineral development.

The new policy of the federal government to provide development roads to promising mineral areas is a good step forward, but all depends upon how such a policy works out in practice. Heretofore the federal slogan has been, "You show us that you have a producing operation and we will provide a road". Properly to open the Yukon, road development in the territory is of prime importance. Development of its mineral resources has been retarded throughout the years by the lack of roads, the result of a lack of administrative vision.

In the case of the Vangorda creek base metal deposits along the Pelly river, Prospectors Airways Company alone has expended approximately $900,000 on developing this project in the initial stages. During the past three years the federal government has expended about $5,000 for the maintenance of the Canol road from Johnsons crossing to the Pelly river, and approximately $50,000 for the survey of a projected road from Carmacks to the Prospectors Airways Company property and on to Ross river. I am told that a portion of this $50,000 was spent in an unsuccessful attempt to provide temporary access roads from the property to Ross river, a tributary of the Pelly river. The road provided was useless for the purposes intended because a temporary road was not completed, and the project appears to have been shelved.

I would therefore suggest to the minister that early consideration be given by his department to the commencement of construction of this vitally important road as soon as possible, as I firmly believe that the Pelly river-Canol road sector has reached this stage. The initial development gamble has been taken by Prospectors Airways Company and Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company. Developments of sufficient magnitude as to be classed as ore bodies elsewhere have been found, and it is now up to the federal government to encourage the continuous exploration of this area, as well as other areas, by providing adequate development roads. If advantage of this opportunity is not taken at once while hope runs high in this promising area, new ventures may not develop because of strangling transportation costs. Timing is extremely important in any financial venture, and it is especially pertinent to mine financing.

It might be well to point out at this stage to those not too familiar with mineral exploration that the most difficult money to raise in any development program is the initial expenditure to test a promising geological speculation. A high element of risk is involved, and most financiers want some tangible proof before they enter the picture. If the showing proves to have promise as a mineralized deposit, no lack of development capital exists nowadays to turn the potential into profit.

The arrangement with the federal government on the Canol road promised a maximum of $2,500 a year for maintenance, provided the company expended $2,500 a year. When it is considered that this sum was to provide for the maintenance of 150 miles of gravel road, including 21 timber bridges and 40 culverts, it can be seen how niggardly this assistance is. The Canol road is considered by company geologists and mining companies to be one of the most important mining exploration roads in the Yukon Territory. It not only provides the only eastern access to the large Pelly-MacMillan-Hess river systems, but is the only road that cross-cuts from east to west the large northwest trending mountain belts which contain the most potential mineral and fuel resources in the Yukon.

During the past three years, five important mineral finds have been located at Vangorda creek, Big Salmon lake, Ketza river, Quiet lake and the Northwest Territories-Yukon boundary. It is doubtful if any of those deposits would have been located if it had not been for the access provided by the Canol road. The rehabilitation of this road is a must for the mining development of the eastern Yukon. The indifference of those responsible for the maintenance of this asset is difficult to understand. Here is an invaluable development road built at a cost, I understand, of $30 million, which was presented free to the Canadian people by the American government 11 years ago. As far as is known, no maintenance has been provided by the federal or territorial governments during that time with the exception of the paltry sum I have previously mentioned. For the lack of a few thousand dollars a year spent in upkeep during the period, large sections have been rendered useless to wheeled traffic by water damage to bridges and culverts. Prospectors Airways Company has kept the first 150 miles from the Alaska highway to the Canol road barely passable to wheeled vehicles by the expenditure of approximately $10,000 during the past two years. All this amount was spent on bridges and culverts. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has reimbursed the company for half this sum.

It is reported that a recent estimate was prepared at the instigation of the present Yukon commissioner for the rehabilitation of this section of the road, and the sum of $100,000 was recommended. This and similar sums for its continued maintenance should be a charge on the people of Canada as a whole for the development of their natural resources. It should not be a stop-gap or emergency measure doled out as a sop to this or that mining company. It should form part of a long-range program for the development of the north. It is useless to argue, as has been done in the past, that the road is a territorial responsibility. The territory's meager funds are not sufficient for such work and are urgently needed elsewhere.

The people of the Yukon would like to know why the federal government has refused in the past to recognize the existence of the Canol road, if only to correct the impression that it was a wartime mistake, that it came from nowhere and goes nowhere, and that it should best be officially buried. A quick glance at a map of Canada should convince anyone of the strategic importance of the road as well. It is the only road that connects two of the largest river systems in Canada, namely the Mackenzie and the Yukon. With the accent on northern hemispherical defence it might serve as an important supply line to D.E.W. line stations as well.

I wish to refer for a few minutes to the important matter of the Haines cut-off road. This road was built at the cost of many millions of dollars by the United States during the second world war and was handed over to Canada at the conclusion of hostilities. The road is 159 miles in length and extends from Haines, Alaska, at tidewater to Haines Junction, Yukon, where it connects with the Alaska highway at mile 1,016. This is a first-class gravel road with the exception of 40 miles on the Alaska side, which is black-topped. The Canadian portion of the highway is maintained in excellent condition for approximately seven months each year by the northwest highway system. This particular road is of vital importance to the future development of certain sections of the Yukon and Alaska.

My understanding is that representations have been made to this government to keep the road open during the winter months. From what I have gathered it is estimated that the cost of capital equipment required to maintain the road in winter months would be approximately $300,000. It seems to be the opinion of those responsible for keeping the road closed during part of the year that it would be difficult to keep it open. To me this seems utter nonsense. Heavy snow conditions along this road actually obtain for a stretch of between 14 and 16 miles only. This portion extends from mile post 40 as far as mile post 56. On the Valdez road in Alaska the snowfall is about twice as heavy as that along the Haines cut-off road, yet no great difficulty has been experienced in keeping open the Valdez road. I have talked with officials in charge of this operation and they feel that, in comparison, the Haines road is a minor snow removal problem.

If the resources of the north are to be developed it is surely the duty of the federal government to employ all possible means to construct and maintain proper road communications. Official thinking here in Ottawa has in the past fallen far short of meeting the real problem. There has not been the necessary vision on the part of officials to grasp the requirements of the situation. I realize there has been some opposition from certain quarters, but it is opposition that is dictated entirely by self-interest. The only way to open up this north country is by competitive routes which will be conducive to development.

I should like to ask the minister now—I am sorry he is not in his seat—why is the government ignoring the wishes of the people whom this important road will serve? Surely both governments can get together to solve this pressing problem by assuming their respective shares of the costs involved. The costs are not large, but the returns eventually will be great, as it will be as much to the advantage of the Yukon as to Alaska.

On this same subject of transportation I want to say something about air freight rates and their application to the Yukon and to the north generally. This age in which we live is the air age, and no country in the world stands to gain as much as Canada from efficient and economical air transport. In Canada no part stands to benefit so much from air transport as the Yukon and Northwest Territories. But what is the actual story? In 1937 Canada was carrying more air cargo than any other nation in the world, and most of this was carried in the north. By 1951, however, Canada accounted for no more than 1 per cent of the world's total volume of airborne freight.

What is the reason for this tremendous decline? In my view the main answer is that air freight rates are prohibitive. As stated in an article appearing in the Globe and Mail last year:

> Canada's air cargo is a service designed more for carrying small and precious merchandise like cut flowers, caviar and mink.

We can never hope to fully develop a country by imposing air freight rates that are exorbitant. This fact has been amply demonstrated in other parts of Canada, and in other countries as well. It is evident that what we need is more competition for the available air traffic dollar. We need more men who are air minded, opportunity minded and competition minded.

Canadian Pacific Airlines, I may say, has given good service into the Yukon and is apparently prepared to lower rates between Whitehorse, Mayo and Dawson provided that landing facilities at Mayo and Dawson are improved to provide for the operation of heavier aircraft. By making use of larger aircraft the company reasons that air freight rates into the Yukon can be lowered substantially. In spite of the fact that I have brought this matter to the attention of the appropriate government departments here on many occasions, practically nothing has happened. The present landing fields at Mayo and Dawson are hazardous to use, and only good fortune has prevented the occurrence thus far of a disaster to planes using these fields. Several years ago sites for new airfields were surveyed at Mayo and in the neighbourhood of Dawson, but this represents all the progress that can be reported to date.

I have devoted some time to this matter of air and road transportation. Important as these factors are to the fullest development of the north country I want to emphasize, nevertheless, that there cannot be completely satisfactory results without railways and other improved communications. I have mentioned on various occasions that the ferries along the Whitehorse-Mayo-Dawson road operating over the Yukon river, Pelly river and Stewart river should be replaced by permanent bridges as soon as possible. The existing ferry services are clearly inadequate and form a distinct bottleneck for traffic along this route.

I am convinced that the construction and maintenance of highways and bridges in the Yukon territory most definitely should be the sole responsibility of the federal government. Heretofore the policy has been that the territorial government, as well as the mining companies, were required to participate in these costs. In my opinion, and the opinion of many others, this was a ridiculous situation. It was nonsense to expect anybody other than the federal government to assume these capital outlays. I am pleased that the minister took cognizance of this fact when the policy relating to highway and bridge construction was recently formulated. This was, most certainly, a step forward in the right direction.

While on the subject of bridges, I trust the minister will give favourable consideration to placing in the estimates a sufficient sum to finance the replacement of the Crooked creek bridge at mile 209 on the Whitehorse-Dawson-Mayo road, so that actual construction can commence this spring or early summer. Surveys and investigations should be instituted at once to determine suitable sites for permanent bridges over the Yukon, Pelly and Stewart rivers along the Whitehorse-Mayo-Dawson road to expedite early construction of these most urgent projects without undue delay. The 60-mile road from Dawson to the Alaska-Yukon border is of the utmost importance to the Dawson district. Can the minister tell me whether or not this road will be constructed according to the same standards as those which apply to the Whitehorse-Dawson road? This road connects with the Taylor highway at the Alaska boundary which highway, in turn, connects with the Alaska highway at Forty Mile, Alaska.

I travelled over this highway last fall and found it to be very scenic. If this road were constructed according to the same standards as the Whitehorse-Mayo-Dawson road I am sure it would attract many tourists to Dawson City, one of the most historic and interesting spots on this continent. This project should receive every consideration from this government, as it is a tourist attraction of the first order.

I also wish to say something, Mr. Speaker, about the Alaska highway. One of the great hazards on this road is the dust problem. This hazard has resulted in a considerable loss of life. The highway is maintained in excellent condition by the northwest highway system at a substantial cost. I believe the time has come now for the immediate black-topping of this road, especially in places where the road does not need to be rerouted. Such action would result in a great increase in road traffic and reduce the cost of maintenance to a point where the government would get a return on its investment.

There is another matter of great economic significance to the mining industry of the Yukon to which I wish to draw the attention of the government, particularly the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I refer to the unnecessary and unjustified gold export tax in its application to the Placer gold mining industry of the Yukon. This is an imposition that at its present rate fastens a heavy and unfair burden on this important northern industry. At one time, about the turn of the present century, there may have been some sensible basis for imposing such a tax, but conditions since those days have drastically changed. Gold output is down, costs of mining have greatly increased, while the price of gold has remained for years at $35 per ounce in U.S. funds. I am not asking that this tax be abolished. As I pointed out in my remarks to the house on this same subject last June 11, the gold export tax should be reduced in line with the royalty rates obtaining under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. In this connection I want to bring out the following points:

1. The change in this tax rate that I am proposing should be made will not require any legislative enactment but merely a change in the regulations under the act.

2. If the tax rate is maintained it is liable to result in a serious curtailment of placer gold mining in the Yukon.

3. By bringing the placer gold export tax into line with the levy on quartz mining, the government would be giving practical encouragement to an industry which provides important employment to Canadians in our most northerly communities.

Once again I urge upon the government that remedial action be taken on this matter at the first opportunity.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that if the federal government gives leadership and assistance along the lines I have mentioned the Yukon Territory will offer a vast area of challenge to pioneering enterprise seeking new mining frontiers in Canada. Other and older nations may be ahead of Canada in the matter of population and economic development, but there is one fundamental difference distinguishing their present position from that of this country. It is that we in Canada still have frontiers to roll back as well as untouched areas to develop. Nothing gives such a dynamic drive to national progress anywhere as the prospect of new land to be opened up to settlement and development.

In Canada our great remaining frontier is in the north. We who are particularly close to the north, who have lived and grown with its people and its problems, are convinced of its wonderful opportunities and of the fact that the Canadian north is a vast storehouse of energy sources and mineral wealth. There can be no finer career for any young Canadian today than to take an active part in the development of our northern territories.

At one time the lure of the north was the special attraction felt by some for faraway and lonely places where life could be lived close to nature, free from many of the problems and distractions connected with living in large centres of population. To some it was an opportunity to get away from it all. That is not so today. In these times the lure of the north is something quite different. It is the lure of discovering new mineral assets in one of the few remaining unexplored areas of the free world. The lure of creating new communications, new communities, of building roads and industries and working cheerfully and constructively with fellow Canadians to bring into being not only a new land but a new way of life is a work that will add immeasurably to Canada's resources and to its greatness as a nation.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to express my sympathy to the hon. members for Edmonton-Strathcona and Gloucester for being confronted with a speech about which so little could be said. It ignores the basic problems of such a large percentage of the Canadian people that it is not easy to understand why we have to be confronted with such a speech in this important year. However, the hon. members were honoured by the Prime Minister in being selected to move and second the address in reply, and I am sure both of them did the very best they could under the circumstances.

I would like to confine my remarks to the problems confronting our farm people in Canada. The Gordon commission preliminary report points up the problem which has been developing for some years, but which has been ignored by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce in particular. This report indicates that since 1946 our farm population has dropped from 25 per cent of the total population to just over 15 per cent, and the forecast is that during the next 25 years the farm percentage of the population of Canada will drop to 7.6 per cent of the total.

Although I have a farm background, I am prepared to accept the fact that fewer people can produce more food, but I think it is very disturbing that in this day and age, with one billion people in the world who have never had one good meal, it is proposed that we should place a fence around Canada. We will allow in only a trickle of immigrants, and we will refuse to produce additional food for starving people throughout the world.

The commission assumes that the present government is going to continue in office for some time; that there is not likely to be any change in the policies of this government regarding responsibility for hungry people throughout the world. Since there is not to be any change in the policy, it is proposed that we are not going to do anything about the building of the Saskatchewan river dam. The commission suggests there is no point in producing more food if we are not going to dispose of it. Apparently it is not expected that any real effort is going to be made to move Canadian foodstuffs into other countries where people are going hungry, where they are willing to accept Canadian foodstuffs in return for goods which they can supply. Therefore I say it is disturbing that in the year 1957 we apparently have a government that is ignoring the needs of a very large sector of our people, except for the fact that they are going to be starved off our farms and people from the maritimes might get a little help in coming to central areas of Canada. The farmers in the other parts of Canada will just have to stay and starve it out.

We have had a good deal of discussion in this house from time to time regarding the general position of agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce have argued that the Canadian farmer is very prosperous. The Minister of Trade and Commerce gives the impression that any farmer who wants to can drive a new car; he can have all his debts paid; he can have a year's supply of grain on his farm without worrying about cash advances. But the opinion of Liberals throughout the country is not unanimous. I notice that the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was at a convention at Viscount last fall, and the farmers who were at that convention apparently did not accept the point of view of the Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member for Rosthern gave them some pretty foolish advice, as follows:

Walter Tucker, M.P. for Rosthern, who addressed the meeting, said that he believed the resolutions, to be submitted to the provincial convention in Regina, would prove much more effective if they adhered to established Liberal principles.

But the advice of the hon. member for Rosthern apparently did not have any effect on the people who were there, because immediately they proceeded to pass a resolution asking that an interim payment of at least 10 cents a bushel on the 1955-56 crop be made to the farmers at the earliest possible date. That was last October. It was not in keeping with traditional Liberal policy. Here we are into January, and still no action has been taken. The next resolution was significant:

The convention also urged the federal government to seriously consider adopting and enforcing policies to give the farmers a fair share of the national income.

Well, certainly the farmers out in the Rosthern constituency were not convinced that they were getting a fair share of the national income.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes.

Mr. Blackmore: Did they ask for advance payments on the grain stored on the farms?

Mr. Nicholson: No, they just wanted to have an interim payment on the 1955-56 grain crop. This was an interim payment.

Mr. Blackmore: On grain already delivered?

Mr. Nicholson: On grain already delivered; they wanted an interim payment immediately. This was last October. They have not been given a cent. The Minister of Agriculture was at this convention in Regina. Here is a story from the Star-Phoenix of November 5, 1956. The heading reads:

Farmers Getting Parity Now, Gardiner Tells Liberal Confab

Canadian farmers are receiving parity prices now, Agriculture Minister James G. Gardiner told delegates to the Saskatchewan Liberal association convention in the hotel Saskatchewan Saturday.

Well, apparently he did not share the views of the farmers out there, but by the time the minister came back to Ottawa to meet the delegates to the federal-provincial convention he must have met a good deal of criticism in the west, because he did change his tune considerably. He told the delegates here about an interesting conversation he had had at a meeting in Saskatchewan. He said a woman came up to him and said:

"I have not slept for three nights, I have been worrying. We did not need a bank loan last year, but we do need one this year."

"I have been worrying about how we were going to meet our accounts which come due in November" and this was the latter part of October. She said "Now I am going to go to sleep tonight and we will get the money in due course." And I said to her "Well, you know some people have been doing some talking about interest. I would not be too sure that you will be able to get the money at 5 per cent." She said "I do not care whether the interest is 5 per cent, 7 per cent or 8 per cent. We need the money for two or three months. By that time we can deliver a little wheat, we will be able to pay it back and whatever we have to pay, we are ready to pay it. It is money we need at present."

Does the minister realize how many people are in the same position as this woman at this time? I submit that when a farm woman says she does not care whether she is required to pay 5 per cent, 7 per cent or 8 per cent she is in the same position as those unfortunate Canadians who go to the small loan companies and pay 26 per cent, 36 per cent or even 56 per cent because they are desperate. The fact that the minister told this important conference that the situation was not as it was some time ago is quite significant. The minister also said:

This desire for cash is one of the greatest desires there is among farmers and the difficulty to get cash is one of the greatest problems particularly among wheat farmers in the west.

Well, I wish the Minister of Agriculture would say those things in the house, and I wish he would say them to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would like hon. members to listen to this statement. The Minister of Agriculture said:

I know there was a great deal of criticism of the old plan we had prior to the last war of paying the farmer $5 to take a man and pay a man $5 to take the job, but we did have a plan of that kind at one time, and I think that one of the things that would make young people more anxious to stay on the farm than anything else, would be to do something that would get labour into the farming communities wherever we have to bring it from.

Perhaps the people we are bringing in from Hungary would be considered, as well as people we could bring from the Netherlands and other places. The plan formulated a few years ago by the Minister of Agriculture under which young men and women were recruited to work on farms for $5 a month and the farmers received $5 a month is apparently being considered by him now, but I submit that the farmers of this country do not want charity. They want their industry to receive the consideration it deserves.

When the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Masse) spoke the other evening he had something to say about the opinions that have been expressed outside of the house from time to time concerning the problems confronting agriculture. I recommend that hon. members read his remarks. He pointed out that the position of farmers in Quebec is improving a great deal. In 1954 some 860 farmers in Quebec were able to pay income tax, compared with 750 the year before.

Interestingly enough I intended to use the same statistics, but in a slightly different connection. I am now going to quote from this same book my hon. friend had, entitled "Taxation Statistics—1956". This is published by the Minister of National Revenue and on page 9 you will find that in the year 1954 some 39,480 farmers in Canada paid income tax.

I suggest that hon. members reflect on these figures. Out of a total of 601,622 farm families in Canada, 39,480 paid income tax in 1954. The disturbing feature of this is that the number of farmers who paid income tax dropped from 69,200 the previous year. While our economy is so buoyant that the speech from the throne devoted two paragraphs to describing the prosperity of Canada, this most ancient and important industry has deteriorated to the point that the number of farmers who pay income tax in Canada dropped in one year's time from 69,200 to 39,480.

The percentage of the total income tax paid by the farmers also dropped from 2.06 per cent to 1.05 per cent. The Gordon commission reports that our farm population is dropping; whereas it was formerly 25 per cent of the total, this year it is down to 15 per cent. I do not have the exact figure for 1954, but it would be somewhere between 15 and 20 per cent. I submit there is something radically wrong with an industry when the people engaged in that industry are able to pay only 1.5 per cent of the total income tax of the nation.

I find that the highest paid group in the country were the consulting engineers. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is well acquainted with this classification. The average income for consulting engineers has risen to $12,059, the lawyers are a close second with an average income of $11,925, and the medical doctors are third with an average income of $11,891. For the last two or three years these three groups have been very close. The lawyers come first one year, and then the doctors and then the engineers. Apparently the order in which they occur this year is engineers, lawyers and doctors. The farmer, of course, is away down near the bottom of the list. Even the farmers who were able to pay income tax had an average income of only $3,525. This is based on the figure I mentioned before, the 39,480 farmers who paid income tax.

Let us have a look at the picture across Canada. I am going to use the figures that appear in the book on taxation statistics, and also some figures which the bureau supplied to the agriculture committee last year regarding the number of cars on Canadian farms, according to the 1951 census. In Newfoundland there were less than 100 farmers who were able to pay income tax, and the total number of farmers residing there and owning cars was not reported. In Prince Edward Island less than 100 farmers paid income tax out of a total of 10,243 farmers reported to be living there, and, only 4,100 had cars. I submit that the owning of a car and the ability to pay income tax are two important criteria in determining whether or not people are prosperous, in view of the fact that today you can go to practically any used car lot in Ottawa and for $10 down drive away a reasonably good used car.

Mr. Knight: That is not the end of it.

Mr. Argue: The rest is paid on credit.

Mr. Nicholson: That is not the end of it, but $10 will take it away and the fact is that farmers are so poor they cannot even get the $10 required in order to take it home. That is an indication of their situation.

Mr. Knight: Some dealers might pay them $10 to take the cars home.

Mr. Nicholson: In Nova Scotia 210 farmers paid income tax out of a possible total of 24,000 farmers, and only 6,900 of those farmers owned cars. The farmers in New Brunswick were not paying much income tax a year ago; out of a possible total of 28,000 farmers 210 paid income tax and only 7,900 owned cars. In Quebec, as my hon. friend said, 860 farmers paid income tax out of a possible total of 133,000. How can any farm member from Quebec stand up and say farm conditions are improving when only 860 farmers out of a total of 133,000 paid income tax and only 41,600 cars were on Quebec farms?

In Ontario out of a total of 159,000 farmers only 11,600 paid income tax, and 114,000 Ontario farmers had cars. In Manitoba 2,070 paid income tax out of 47,000, and there were 32,000 who had automobiles. In the province of Saskatchewan there were 12,500 who paid income tax in 1954 compared with 31,000 the previous year out of 90,000, with 62,000 having automobiles. In Alberta 9,650 paid income tax out of 76,216, and 46,000 were driving automobiles. In British Columbia there were 2,120 farmers paying income tax out of 26,530, and there were 12,500 with automobiles.

With one-half of one per cent to 8 per cent of the farmers in Canada in the different provinces able to pay income tax, it is suggested to me that here is an industry which is sick. The only proposal offered is that it be put out of business, to get the farmers off the farms in the maritime provinces and bring them up to central Canada to increase the hazards there. It is suggested that those provinces with histories of which every Canadian should be proud should be abandoned. Our farming people in the west are up against the same proposition.

The arrears of taxes also indicate what is happening. There are some 14 rural municipalities either partly or entirely within my constituency. The arrears of taxes during the past three years have gone up from $805,000 to $1,308,000 to $1,773,000. These municipalities are managed by very efficient citizens who have been selected by their neighbours on a non-partisan basis. They are doing their very best to maintain local services, roads, bridges and schools, but when arrears are rolling up in this way it is not surprising that a woman should come to the Minister of Agriculture at a meeting and point out that a year ago they were not so desperate but this year they are in very bad shape.

If all the other sectors of our economy were in trouble we might accept this. During the thirties our farm people did tighten their belts. They knew we had a depression, and they accepted the fact that the depression was world-wide. But we are not prepared to accept this situation now and do nothing as the hon. member for Rosthern suggested to farmers at Viscount. We are going to stand up and insist that the farmers at Viscount were expressing the opinions of farmers in all parts of Canada when they said they wanted a fair share of the national income.

The bureau of statistics weekly bulletin of January 11 has just reached me, and I find on page 3 that labour income in Canada has reached new peaks. I am all for that, because I realize that if the farmer is to sell his products there must be a working force in Canada that is able to get a fair share of the national income. As the people in the country through their organizations have been able to get a little larger piece of the national pie I for one have no desire to complain about their position. Although they are getting a larger share than they ever had before they are not getting their fair share.

I have two releases from the united automobile workers, one of which deals with what happens when an increase is granted in the price of steel. When an increase of $7.50 per ton was granted the increase in wages would have warranted an increase of only $2.50 per ton, but the steel companies took advantage of the fact that they were giving an increase in wages. This release states:

When U.S. Steel signed its 1955 wage contract, its prices were already so high that it was making profits one-third larger than in 1953, the best previous year in its history, and 73 per cent above its average profits of the 7 post-war years (excluding 1952, the year of the long strike). U.S. Steel's profits after taxes when it signed the contract were double the average of the post-war years.

It goes on to say that U.S. Steel could have cut their price by $7.50 per ton and still had a better balance sheet than they ever had prior to the war. In its weekly bulletins the bureau of statistics brings us most disturbing information regarding how corporation profits are rolling up larger and larger. Here are the figures with regard to the increase in corporation profits after taxes of some of the better known companies. Back in 1946 Imperial Oil had net profits after taxes of something over $17 million; by 1954 those profits had jumped to $49 million, an increase of 184 per cent. Last year they took another jump of 25 per cent to bring the profits up to $62 million at the end of 1955.

In 1946 the Aluminum Company of Canada were satisfied with profits after taxes of $11,581,000, but those profits had increased to $33,155,000 by 1954, and to $48,193,000 by 1955. British American Oil Company satisfied their stockholders in 1946 with net profits of $3,319,000, but by 1954 those profits were up to $18,159,000 and by 1955 to $20,613,000. Industrial Acceptance Corporation indicates where the real money is being made. In 1946 their profits were $253,542; in 1954 those profits had increased to $6,837,000; and in 1955 to $7,394,000. Loblaw Groceterias showed an increase in profits from $4 million to $5 million.

Canada Packers and Silverwood Dairies, both of which companies are a little closer to the grass roots farmer, showed considerable increases from 1946. MacMillan and Bloedel showed an increase from $12,400,000 to $18,738,000. Western Plywood showed an increase from $473,892 in 1954 to $1,112,000 in 1955; Canadian Industries Limited from $2,041,000 to $6,455,000; Goodyear Tire from $2,476,000 to $4,398,000; Atlas Steel from $226,409 to $2,091,000; Ford Motor from $14,243,000 to $20,729,000; Dominion Foundries, $3,068,000 to $5,471,000; Steel Company of Canada, $13,231,000 to $21,819,000; St. Lawrence Corporation, from $4,451,000 to $7,063,000; Dominion Tar and Chemical from $1,875,000 to $3,802,000; C.P.R. from $29,826,000 to $44,032,000. These last figures are profits in 1954 and 1955, after taxes.

Is it any wonder that our 600,000 farm families in Canada are discouraged and annoyed when they see their position in our economy deteriorating from year to year, and also see the profits of these larger corporations increasing year by year?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, before dinner I was trying to establish the fact that the farmers, who have comprised such an important sector of our economy since confederation, have been receiving an unfair share of our national income, and I mentioned that from my point of view immediate consideration must be given to this problem. I think I should admit that farmers all over the world have had difficulty in organizing themselves so they could claim a fair share of the wealth in the various countries, but when the Canadian Federation of Agriculture appeared before the banking and commerce committee last year this organization, which is very sympathetic to the present administration, was asked what was being done in other countries. Dr. Hope, their economist, was asked this question by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

> In your study of agricultural policy in other nations do you know of any advanced nations which do less in the way of support prices and other policies for agriculture than is done by our country?

Dr. Hope replied:

> No, I do not know of any country that does less.

When I spoke about conditions in other countries last year I made some critical remarks about the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce for their failure to make available up to date information regarding what is happening in other countries. I must pay a compliment to the Minister of Agriculture for seeing to it that his officials paid some attention to my critical comments. The issue for December, 1956, of Agriculture Abroad has some very interesting articles on agricultural policy in Argentina, Egypt, France, Germany, Mexico, Poland and a number of other countries.

I am sorry that time will not allow extensive references to what is happening in other countries, but in Argentina apparently they are providing for a subsidy of about 36 cents per bushel for wheat. In France they are facing up to the problem of the small farmer being squeezed out of existence. There is a very interesting section on France. It points out that they made a profit of about 78 cents a bushel on wheat imported into France compared with a loss of $1.40 to $1.48 sustained by France a year ago. They also point out that the price for wheat in France this year is to be $2.93 a bushel. Then there is a substantial subsidy for barley of 43 to 49 cents a bushel. I think anyone reading the reports on agriculture in these different countries must recognize the fact that our farmers cannot possibly survive in a world where all these important countries are doing so much for their farmers.

I have here the soil bank program of the United States, and I find that on a typical 200 acre farm there—their farms are much smaller—the farmer is encouraged to take 30 acres of land out of wheat, and if he will co-operate he will be paid $23 an acre for every acre he does not plant to wheat. I know a great many farmers in the west who would be very glad to settle for $23 an acre for every acre they did not plant to wheat. The United States supplies information regarding the decreasing share of the consumer dollar that the farmer receives. Back in 1946 the farmer received 52 per cent of the consumer dollar spent for food. That figure dropped to 51 per cent, 50 per cent, 46 per cent, until now it is down to 45 per cent. But in the United States, as in Canada, I think it is pretty obvious that the farmers themselves are going to have a look at the diminishing share of the national income that is received.

I do not want to make these critical comments without telling the government how to solve the problem, and here is the solution in seven very simple stages. First, a system of parity prices should be provided. I cannot take time to explain the details, but I think every member has received from Jake Schultz a memorandum entitled "Parity Prices, The Basic Solution for Agriculture." Mr. Schultz is a former president of the interprovincial farm union council. I suggest that every member should read this very carefully prepared submission.

Second, national marketing boards should be established to provide stability in the assembling, processing and marketing of our main agricultural products. Third, a board of livestock commissioners should be established to provide scientific grading standards and to prevent the ruinous fluctuations in livestock prices. Fourth, export-import boards should be established to expand the sale of agricultural products through international commodity agreements. Fifth, a system of box car allocation should be provided so that farmers would be permitted to deliver their grain to the elevator of their choice.

May I say in passing that while I was home we received cheques from the wheat pool at the rate of 2½ cents a bushel by way of dividends for the wheat we had delivered to our own organization. At the annual meeting of the local wheat pool committee I asked the director how much additional could have been paid to the farmers if they had handled their fair share of all the wheat that was drawn to the elevators in Saskatchewan. After a minute's reflection he said they would have had the same cost for taxes, the same salaries for the elevator agents and the same payments for insurance, so their overhead would have remained about the same, and that they would have been able to pay about 5 cents per bushel if they could have handled all the grain which normally would have come to their elevators provided the farmers had been able to deliver their grain to their own elevator rather than to the elevator of the opposition. I think anyone who considers the matter will agree that it is reasonable to give the farmer the privilege of hauling his own grain to the elevator of his choice.

My sixth point is very important and I am sorry I do not have time to develop it. I suggest that we should double the pensions for the aged, blind and totally disabled and also the family allowances, so more Canadians would be able to purchase additional food, food which we have and which they require if they are to live as they should live. I hope every member of parliament will read the letter which came in the mail this morning from Mr. Guy Jean of Montreal, who represents the institute of political action. He was prompted to write this letter after a member for one of the Quebec ridings suggested in his speech the other day that family allowances should be increased.

I think we should not forget that the prime minister we had when family allowances were introduced was a bachelor who had no idea of the cost of raising a family. He was also the prime minister when we had long discussions about increasing old age pensions. I think in this day and age, the fact having been established that family allowances are politically popular and economically feasible, we should be prepared to give to the children of Canada the same percentage of our total national income in 1957 that we did in the '40's when we first passed this popular legislation. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned the other day, if we will provide the same percentage of our gross national product to the old age pensioners we will be able to double, without any strain on our economy, the present pensions which are being paid.

My seventh point calls for the establishment of a world food bank with a view to raising the low levels of food production and consumption and fighting chronic malnutrition; relieving famine and other emergency situations; counteracting excessive price fluctuations, and promoting the rational disposal of intermittent agricultural surpluses.

I am sorry I have not time in which to develop this last point. I was greatly disappointed to read in the report of the economic and social council of the United Nations that the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs took such a reactionary view when this matter was before the economic and social council. We have been spending fabulous amounts in trying to fight the threat of communism. The amount we are spending for FAO is a pitiful performance. I find that we are reducing our expenditures from $323,000 to $297,000. We are giving 2 cents per person per year as part of our contribution to fight the challenge contained in the fact that two-thirds of the world's people are facing starvation, and here the parliamentary assistant makes a long speech pointing out how unreasonable are these proposals made by FAO in connection with the establishment of a world food bank.

I submit that it is not good enough for us to spend $34 million as our contribution to the Colombo plan and 2 cents per person per year as our contribution to FAO when we are spending these other large amounts. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and of Defence Production is buying on a cost-plus basis everything that goes into our defence production, and no one is losing anything. Yet he is trying to keep our farmers producing food on a cost-minus basis. I think we are losing friends all over the world by our policy of refusing to cultivate our land and refusing to produce food in order to try to get it to the hungry people in other parts of the world.

It is true enough that we give 2 cents per person per year to FAO and that we spend $34 million as part of our Colombo plan contribution. But the Colombo plan contribution is a small percentage of Canada's gross national product. I do not think we can adopt the point of view suggested in the report of the Gordon commission, namely that the people of Canada can expect to increase their standards of living by 75 per cent in the next 25 years, and yet refuse to face the fact that two-thirds of the world's people are going to be left in poverty and are going to be obliged to live without assistance in fighting ignorance, disease and hunger.

I suggest that Canada should reverse its program and should send to these international conferences someone other than representatives who are going to speak against the establishment of a world food bank.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join the previous speakers in extending sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. There is no doubt, at least as far as I am concerned, that the respective electors of these hon. members will have every reason to be proud of their representatives.

The speech from the throne deals with many subjects which are all interesting. There is one however which seems to be of prime importance in the eyes of the government since nearly half of that important document has been devoted to it. I refer to the position of Canada with respect to world conditions.

Since I wish to limit my remarks to a single question, for the time being at least, I thought I would deal with a question related to that problem and which I consider very important. I mean the eventual representation of Canada at the Holy See in Rome.

Besides, for a good many years a great number of the electors I have the pleasure and the privilege of representing in this house have been good enough to let me know their views on that subject. Now it so happens that all were in favour of such representation. It is indeed a pleasure for me to lay their views before this house.

I do not think that there is one Canadian province where certain individuals, certain patriotic, religious or other groups have not expressed a similar opinion. On the other hand, I know that in those same provinces other individuals and other similar groups have expressed an opposite view. Which means of course that we have there a much debated and debatable problem whose solution is not self-evident but must be looked for in a cool and objective way, according to the best interests of the Canadian nation.

In foreign countries, Canada maintains 46 diplomatic posts filled either by an ambassador, a minister or a high commissioner, together with a great number of consuls, attachés, commercial representatives, various officers, and so on. For the year 1956-57, according to the estimates voted in this house last year, the cost of maintaining these posts, alone, including salaries, amounted to $7,210,961.

On the other hand, 46 foreign countries maintain here a similar diplomatic representation whose cost is likely just as high. These figures, reporting the number of countries as well as the expenses, give us an idea of the importance attached by various states, Canada included, to their diplomatic representation.

Besides, especially in recent years our policy, domestic as well as foreign, is established with due regard for the international situation. It is no doubt with this in mind that the Canadian government, besides maintaining permanent diplomatic representatives, very often sends itinerant diplomats, in most cases a member of the cabinet, to some remote corner of the world. It thus once again emphasizes the importance of going abroad to gather useful information, to make known what we believe should be known and also no doubt to disguise what we want to keep to ourselves.

There are in the world posts of superior strategic value where information of vital importance is concentrated or which constitute a source of such information. Such posts are just as so many cross-roads where the diplomats of almost every country come into contact. It so happens that one of these posts is in the Vatican state of Rome. Here are some facts and figures which show the importance of this post. The Holy See sends diplomatic representatives to 41 countries among which are France, Germany, India, Italy and Spain, plus several apostolic delegates of which one is here, in Canada.

On the other hand there are in the Vatican state 45 diplomatic missions among which are to be found missions from some of the greatest countries in the world such as Great Britain, France, Germany, India and Spain. Certain countries which do not even deem it necessary to send representatives to Canada have representatives to the Holy See. And even the most powerful of all countries, the United States had personal representatives under three successive presidents, who felt this to be a most pressing need after diplomatic relations had been severed with the Vatican state.

Still Canada has not as yet thought it necessary to have its own representative in this world centre of a diplomacy of the highest standards.

I hope that no one will suggest that we cannot have a diplomatic representative there because the Pope happens to be the religious head of the church. In that case we could hardly maintain diplomatic representation in the United Kingdom where the supreme head of the nation is also the supreme head of the established church. In any event, no impartial person has ever suggested that the Pope, even when he was unjustly dispossessed, has not always been and still is not the uncontested sovereign of a temporal state, small of course, but quite real and which has its own autonomous and sovereign government. It is precisely because this state is very small in area and because its leader has no territorial ambition whatever that the other states should feel reassured with regard to the objectivity of the information they may gather there as well as to the impartiality and independence with which would be greeted suggestions or proposals they might wish to submit. We are thus protected against certain interested manœuvres which may have been quite common in the Middle Ages or during the Renaissance, when the popes not only had to manage the church but also had the duty, like the leaders of other states of that time, to protect and defend the temporal kingdom committed to their care.

Furthermore, if it is feared in some quarters, that if we have a representative at the Vatican, we must share the religious belief of the Holy Father, does it mean that we necessarily share the beliefs of the leaders of communist countries where we do have representatives? Why then the double standard? A narrow, inconsiderate one with regard to a sovereign who, beyond any doubt, wants peace and order in the world, and a generous and broad-minded one in dealing with the leaders of countries, which, no less surely, for they themselves say it and prove it—want trouble, discord, and misery in the world, the better to establish their barbaric domination and their godless materialism, destructive of the freedom and happiness of peoples.

Thirty-two of our 46 missions abroad are headed by ambassadors, two of them being in iron curtain countries, i.e., in the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia. We have also ministers in two other communist countries, Poland and Czechoslovakia. Until last year, we maintained for years an embassy in the Argentine, while the president of that country was trying hard, and sometimes by ignoble means, to foil the legitimate religious or national aspirations of the Argentine people.

To follow through a comparison between the leaders of those countries I just mentioned and the admirable man who is now presiding over the destinies of Vatican City, would be an insult to the intelligence of honourable members, and I do not want to press it any further.

It might be enough to say that Canada should not be deprived of the great advantage of having a representative in such a highly accredited place. In support of this case, I shall quote the views of a member of this house who was then an ordinary representative—though, please the Lord, he was far from ordinary—and who is now a minister in the present government. Moreover, he is a man of superior intellect, in whom the government had the greatest confidence and who is therefore often entrusted with most delicate missions abroad. I mean the honourable minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and shall to this effect, quote an issue of The Ensign published in 1950.

(Text):

Canada is losing information by not having a diplomatic representative at the Vatican, says James Sinclair, parliamentary assistant to Finance Minister Abbott and Liberal member of parliament for Coast-Capilano, B.C. Mr. Sinclair expressed his views in a letter of support to a Catholic Women's League subdivision in Vancouver and to various Protestant groups who oppose the appointment.

Following is the text of Mr. Sinclair's letter:

The Catholic church is fighting communism wherever it exists, and it has no hesitation in accrediting representatives to even the communist governments, so that they may have all possible information. I met the Vatican's representative in Yugoslavia, and learned more from him about the country than I did from any other diplomatic representative in Belgrade.

This, and other experiences, have led me to the belief that Canada is losing information by not having a diplomatic representative at the Vatican. Almost every European nation, Protestant and Catholic, has such representation.

In Canada, where we are comparatively new to the necessity for diplomatic representation, the problem has been discussed almost entirely on religious grounds, and if an appointment were made at this present time, a large proportion of our people would regard it as a religious appointment, and so be strongly opposed to it. Public discussion of this situation, however, will bring about a better understanding, which might eventually lead us to have a representation in the Vatican, as does Protestant England.

(Translation):

If the minister has changed his mind, I have no doubt that he will want to inform the house about it.

For those who closely follow international events, there is no doubt that the last three or four sovereigns of the Vatican were diplomats of a high order, dedicated to the welfare and happiness of peoples, irrespective of their religious beliefs. It should be noted those great leaders, fearless and blameless, have on many occasions condemned false or dangerous principles and denounced unjust or nefarious attitudes while carefully avoiding to direct their attacks against the countries or their leaders in particular.

What about the special qualities of the great statesman who, for the past 18 years, has been presiding over the destinies of that city? Severe and demanding when he, himself, is concerned, he is full of compassion and indulgence for others. Placed on neutral ground between two clans of opposite ideological concepts, he does not fear from time to time to raise his serene voice to tell the ones that atheism, under whatever form it appears, is a baneful doctrine for humanity and, to the others, that there can be no compromise with evil. In these troubled times, how gratifying it would be, not only to listen to that voice from the centre of St. Peter square, but also to hear its repercussions in the very sumptuous halls of NATO and UNO. To the list of the most influential statesmen of the world which the Prime Minister gave us in this house last Wednesday, the 9th of January, I would gladly add the name of His Holiness, Pope Pius XII, and I would even place it at the head of the list. One cannot help but have a deep feeling of admiration on reading the speech made by Pope Pius XII in September, 1954, on the problem of A.B.C. warfare, as well as his Christmas speech of 1955 on peace, not to mention the one he made last Christmas. Where, anywhere in the world, could one find a more enlightened, more objective, more sincere and disinterested propagandist? I can understand how, on March 1, 1955, the Ottawa Journal could write the following in its editorial page:

(Text):

A Great Pope

Tomorrow in Rome Eugenio Pacelli, Pius XII, will observe his 79th birthday and his 16th year as Pope.

The whole free world, all at any rate in the tradition of Christian-Judaeo civilization, will send congratulations.

For Pius XII has been more than a great Pontiff of Rome; his character and moral and intellectual leadership have undoubtedly influenced all areas of the earth where spiritual values remain.

There are those who hold that Pope Pius has been the greatest Roman Pontiff since Gregory the Great. Certainly no other pope since the year when Leo went out to meet Atilla has faced more difficulties courageously, and none won more respect from men of different faiths.

"The Pope—how many divisions has he"? asked Stalin. Yet Stalin was to learn that spiritual and moral forces exist mightier in the long run than divisions of steel.

(Translation):

I cannot refrain from mentioning here a news item published in Le Devoir of March 12, 1956, reporting a statement by senator Barkley, former vice-president of the United States, who had this to say about His Holiness Pope Pius XII:

I do not believe that there has been a greater force working for peace and democracy in the world than he has been.

Such testimonies tell us why the majority of the great statesmen of the world are proud and honoured to visit him and seek his advice.

Indeed I have collected at random, in newspapers, a few pictures showing statesmen who seem proud and happy to have been photographed with our Holy Father the Pope on the occasion of a visit at the Vatican. For example, in the Montreal Gazette of April 11, 1956, there is a picture of none other than the secretary general of the United Nations Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, who is photographed with His Holiness Pope Pius XII. The legend read as follows:

(Text):

United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold visits Pope Pius XII at the Vatican during the diplomat's Rome stopover on the way to seek a peaceful settlement of Middle East hostilities. The Pontiff gave his blessing to Hammarskjold's mission complicated by renewed Israel-Arab border fighting.

(Translation):

And at the bottom of another photograph reproduced in Le Droit of October 4, 1956, I read the following:

Received by the Holy Father: Senator Wishart McLea Robertson, Speaker of the Senate of Canada, and Mrs. Robertson, have been received on September 25, in a private audience granted by His Holiness Pope Pius XII, at his pontifical villa of Castelgandolfo.

Opinions have been expressed to the effect that the diplomatic channels that we are now using in our relations with the Vatican, that is the British embassy of Whitehall, were suitable and sufficient. Why should we proceed in such a way? Are we not a full grown nation since the statute of Westminster? Why allow a country which is our equal and our competitor in many fields, to look after our affairs while our prestige and our interests are at stake? If such a procedure is advisable in the case of the Vatican, it should also be proper in relation to the other countries. Let us then do away with our embassies, let us stop sending our ministers around the world, and let us limit their trips to visits to the British Isles.

Would it be a matter of money? If so, we certainly should remember that there are moral and spiritual values for which we are never paying too high a price, because they are priceless.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like the Anglo Protestant element of our population to realize, once and for all, that if the reiterated request for a representative of Canada to the Vatican is coming mainly from the Catholic and French province this does not mean that this province wants absolutely this representative to be a Catholic French Canadian.

We understand very well that this diplomat would represent Canada as a whole, as a country, and I would have no objection to his being either from French or English extraction, either Catholic or Protestant. He would only have to be a worthy citizen, well qualified, of irreproachable public character, and he should be able to do credit to our beautiful and great country, and to serve it well.

I would not like to conclude these few remarks without mentioning a matter, on which I have come back every year since I have had the advantage to sit in this house, I mean the raising of family allowances.

It would probably be appropriate to recall first of all that family allowances are and must remain an addition to family income. As a matter of fact, I believe this was the spirit of the legislation when it was voted in 1944. Nevertheless, this additional contribution was considered a minimum at that time, we are admittedly today far from this minimum, since to all practical purposes, the value of the dollar is scarcely more than half of what it was twelve years ago. My colleague for Lapointe (Mr. Girard) yesterday rightly called to our mind the essential part played by the family in the community.

On more than one occasion, in this house and elsewhere, I have attempted to establish the truth of the old saying "a community is only as good as the families in it". And if it is true that an individual needs to have a minimum of earthly goods to practise virtue, it is equally true that a family needs a minimum of revenue and adequate material conditions, for it is the source from which the individual must draw during the most important years of his life. The individual will never be but what his family made him.

I know that strong pressures are exerted in order that all social allowances be increased. It seems to me however that the case of families is more tragic and more urgent than all others. Indeed, if in the case of other assisted people difficulties due to the increase in the cost of living have increased twofold, these difficulties have been multiplied by 4, 6, 8 and even 10 on account of the number of children.

That is why it is most urgent to increase the rate of assistance in this field first, and to find out later what can be done in the other fields.

I urge therefore the hon. minister of National Health and Welfare and the government, to restore, during this session, the original value of this excellent social measure that was adopted in 1944, by doubling, or by increasing substantially the rate of family allowances.

(Text):

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, first let me congratulate the mover, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), and the seconder, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), on their excellent addresses made in reply to the speech from the throne. They certainly did a splendid job considering what they had to work with. I took particular notice of and listened very attentively to the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. He gave an extremely vivid account of the growth of the city of Edmonton, and he may well be proud of the constituency he has the honour to represent. I believe it is one of the fastest growing cities in Canada, if not the fastest growing. Not only is it surrounded by a multitude of oil wells but it serves as a springboard for travel both by road and air to the far north.

I hope I am not yet too ancient, Mr. Speaker, but I can well remember visiting Edmonton with my parents in 1909. At that time Edmonton and Strathcona were separate towns and there were only two high level bridges crossing the river. One was the C.P.R. bridge and the other was for vehicles. Most crossings at that time were made by ferries pulled with a chain. I say again the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona can be justifiably proud of representing a riding which is an example for other Canadian cities to emulate.

I wish to express at this time how surprised and deeply grieved I was when informed of the resignation of Hon. George Drew, leader of the great national Conservative party. I am sure the contributions he has made here will be greatly missed, and the House of Commons will be the poorer for his absence. When we look back and realize the number of our colleagues in this house who have passed on in the not too distant past we are reminded again of the intense strain of public life.

Perhaps nothing could be more illustrative of this than the recent resignation of Sir Anthony Eden. Though criticized by many people in the past in his own country of Great Britain and within his own party, Sir Anthony has proven from time to time that he was right; and I believe when history is written the historians will agree that he was again right in regard to the Middle East. Perhaps it will not be long until the people of the free world will be slapping Sir Anthony on the back for the action he took in regard to the Suez crisis.

Casting aside our personal thoughts or feelings, I think we must all admit that the action taken by the British and French governments in the Middle East has awakened the United Nations from a talking assembly, which no doubt it would have continued to be, to an active body truly representative of the free world. Too often in the past its members have sat idly by while the Russian communist regime spread its propaganda and influence all across the Middle East.

I am indeed happy, Mr. Speaker, to have as my leader at this time John Diefenbaker, a man who is internationally as well as nationally known, a man who enjoys the respect of nearly all the people of Canada, a man who has contributed much to the debates in this house and who will, I am sure, contribute much to government policy in future years, and I trust those years will extend far into the future.

This has been a very quiet session so far; indeed, how could it be otherwise? If you examine the throne speech mathematically it is obvious that nothing from nothing leaves nothing. It tells nothing of the past, offers no suggestions for the present and holds nothing for the future. Because the throne speech is so vague it is necessary for most hon. members to speak concerning the constituencies they represent, and I propose to do the same.

I am proud to be the representative of that grand old constituency of Leeds. On the south it is bounded by the great waterway of the St. Lawrence river, and contains within its boundaries all the Thousand islands. On the west and north it is bounded by the Rideau waterway. During the past summer I visited the St. Lawrence seaway development. It is tremendous in magnitude and the engineering skill involved is most wonderful, but I would like tonight to take the minds of my listeners back to the time when the Rideau waterway was constructed, between 1827 and 1832.

I believe it was a much more difficult task to construct the Rideau waterway than to build the St. Lawrence seaway. We must realize that the waterway was built by Colonel By through absolute wilderness. No means of communication of any kind had been established, and the project was completed in the unbelievably short period of six years. It was 123 miles in length and consisted of 47 locks. It may surprise some hon. members to know that this waterway cost only $2,500,000. This amount would barely cover the construction at Jones Falls today. Jones Falls is in my own constituency, and there is a dam there which is 60 feet high. How was it constructed? They did not have derricks nor cranes. Those stones were put in place by hand labour. The canal was dug and constructed not with the modern steam shovels we have today, not with the huge tractor trailers that are now available, but by manual labour employing the wheelbarrow and the ox.

I speak of the Rideau waterway because approximately half its total length of 123 miles is in my constituency. I notice according to Hansard that some years ago certain hon. members of this house, who I am sure were not from eastern Ontario, seemed to be of the opinion that the Rideau canal should be discontinued. What a foolish idea. I may say that there are 53 lakes connected by the Rideau waterway located in the counties of Frontenac, Leeds and Lanark. This is a tremendous tourist attraction. You may talk about the Rocky mountains, Jasper park and so on, but I say to hon. members they should come down to Leeds county and they will see something practically as good for tired eyes to look at.

At this time I should like to deal with some of the problems we are facing in Brockville, my county town. During the past 15 years the population of Brockville has increased by 50 per cent. I feel that we are entitled to more consideration from the federal government, because we have had very little in past years. The population is 15,000 at the present time, with another 3,000 in the adjoining township which is in the process of being annexed. Yet we have a railway station which is not adequate in any sense for a town of that size.

The industrial development of the area is increasing by leaps and bounds. Parke Davis opened a large plant in the north of the city; Automatic Electric have increased their plant; Phillips Electric have increased their plant materially; Du Pont to the east have spent several millions of dollars and are planning another project which will cost in the neighbourhood of $8 million or $9 million. Surely we are entitled to more consideration.

Our post office is outdated, and federal offices are scattered all over the town. The excuse of the government for not starting and completing a federal building is that they want to wait until the town has been rezoned so they will know where to place the building. I may tell the house and the Minister of Public Works—I am sorry he is not in his seat—that the city has been rezoned, which rezoning has been approved by the municipal board. The city fathers are ready to cooperate with the government and the Department of Public Works. I am sure their representative would be welcomed by the city council if he came down to lay out the work. I hope the minister will provide for this building in his estimates this session. Let us get on with the job. There is no excuse now that the city has been rezoned. Everything is in readiness for a start on the building.

I should like to say a few words in regard to our veterans. I listened to what the hon. member for Lanark had to say about some of these veterans. I believe he is right, as this is something which has been advocated by branches of the Legion across this country. I agree with the submission that no veteran who served in Great Britain in the first world war for a year or more should be refused the same consideration as those who served in a theatre of war. It was through no fault of their own that these men did not see active service. They were held in Great Britain for other purposes. Their intentions when they enlisted were good, and they should receive the same consideration as other veterans.

I should like also to bring up the question of veterans who have received aid under the Veterans' Land Act. There are very few of these veterans left. Some of these men have been paying on their mortgages for many years but have been unable to pay them off because of sickness and misfortune. Many of these men are in their late sixties or early seventies and, as I say, there are only a few of them left. Surely the department could now give them a clean sheet, a clear deed to their property, so that in the sunset of their lives they may live in peace without having this debt staring them in the face. Surely they have earned that consideration.

As far as old age pensions are concerned, it would appear that many government supporters are advocating an increase this session. If $40 a month is enough at the present time, then $40 a month was too much when the act was first put into force. If $40 was enough then, it is inadequate at the present time with the increased cost of living. Now that an increase has been advocated by many Liberal members I would not be surprised—I believe my colleagues agree with me—if the minister brought down an increase in old age security payments, this being an election year.

Then a word with regard to pensions for the blind. I know we all have sympathy for these people. Because of their blindness it costs these people more to live than it costs the average man or woman. I submit that they should have more consideration from the minister. They should be allowed to earn what they can without it interfering in any way with the small pensions they are receiving.

As for health insurance, we all know the stand this party takes on that. The Liberal party took their stand in 1919, and they have taken their stand again in every election since that time. Apparently after the election this matter goes unheeded. It would appear that the only way the people of Canada can receive any consideration in the matter of health insurance is to have a change of government.

As my constituency is 50 per cent rural I would be remiss in my duty if I did not take up this evening some of the problems that confront our farmers at the present time. We hear a great deal from members to our left concerning the problems of the west with respect to wheat, but I can assure the house that we have problems in the east. When the committee on agriculture met last session I was dismayed that the request of the concentrated milk producers to put their case before that committee was refused. The chairman of the committee said the terms of reference of the committee did not permit them to present their brief. The hon. member for Brant-Haldimand and I argued very strenuously that they should be permitted to present their brief on that occasion, but we were overruled. I know that some of the Liberal members who represent agricultural constituencies felt very keenly about the matter, but apparently because the problems of the concentrated milk producers did not pertain to wheat they were barred from entering the committee room.

There was an announcement in the speech from the throne of the setting up of a Senate committee to study the benefits that would be derived from an extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to include all Canada, so the residents of many submarginal farms might be moved to better locations where their incomes could be much increased. All I can say about the dairy farmers of eastern Ontario is that they are nearly all submarginal as far as their net income is concerned.

I have noticed that the Minister of Agriculture, together with many of his colleagues, has persistently said that the income of farmers has increased, but you never hear him say a word about net income. He never says a word about expenditure increasing much faster than the prices of the products that are produced. In fact the prices of the products produced have decreased very much since 1951 and 1952. During the war our farmers accepted the government's statements in good faith when they told the farmers to go easy, not to say a word then, to take what was offered them and the government would be good to them after the war. The farmers of eastern Canada know just how good the government has been when it has allowed dairy products to come into our markets from New Zealand, and have not protected us from the actions of the United States.

You know, Mr. Speaker, our good friends to the south do not hesitate to impose tariffs, quotas and what have you when there is an overabundance of agricultural products in that country. But no, we must be friendly; we must be good children. We must accept everything they do and not make any reply whatsoever. I can tell you that our farmers are getting tired of the situation and fed up with the prices they are receiving at the present time. They are not being asked to move off their farms to better farms. In fact there are many 100, 200 and 300 acre farms in my own constituency at the present time, hundreds of them, where the land is lying idle. Why? Because many of these farmers can obtain higher remuneration by working in industrial plants. Many of them are getting too old to carry on their agricultural activities any longer, and with the present level of prices they cannot ask their sons to stay at home.

In my county, which traditionally has been a cheese producing district for many years, production decreased in 1955 by nearly 1 million pounds. Some may say that perhaps the milk has gone into other channels but that is not so, because one of our concentrated milk plants which enjoyed a patronage of around 800 a short time ago is now down to less than 500 patrons. Why? Simply because farms are idle. Most of the farmers are living on these farms because it would take all they would receive for their farms, machinery and cattle to buy a house in a town or city.

I was much impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton when he spoke about the farm loan act. When that act was amended last year we were all hopeful that it would be easier for farmers and prospective buyers of farms to obtain more money on farm mortgages. I can assure you that it is hard for a farmer to borrow more money on a farm mortgage at the present time. Money which was formerly available to farmers by way of loans has completely dried up. Thirty or forty years ago people were looking for places to invest their money. That is not so today.

I cannot understand how it is that any person working in an industry, any civil servant or what have you, who is receiving a fair income, can borrow money on a home to the extent of 90 per cent of its appraised value while the farmer can only borrow up to 65 per cent, and even at that it seems to have been difficult for the farmer to do so during the past year. I have instances in my own constituency, just as the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton has in his, in which loans on farms I knew were well worth far more than the appraised value were turned down by the farm loan board. Why I do not know.

The excuse has been offered to me that their revenue was not high enough. In some instances the money that farmers in my constituency were seeking was simply for the purpose of making their farms more remunerative. If the farm loan board officials and the government consider that a man working in industry with his two hands and who has no capital investment is a security risk much superior to the man with a farm worth $10,000 or $15,000 and having another $10,000 worth of cattle and equipment, there is something wrong and it is high time the government did something about it.

I am not going to take too long this evening, but during his speech the hon. member for Macleod made some prophecies regarding the Conservative party west of the great lakes. He made the prophecy that the Conservative party would come back after the next election with fewer members west of the great lakes than they have at the present time. With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few prophecies, and I do not believe that I will have to go too far out on the limb in doing so. I prophesy that the Social Credit party will not elect a member east of the Manitoba border, and that nearly all their candidates will lose their deposits. I will also make a prophecy that they will not elect a member east of the Alberta border. I am not saying that they will not do so west of that border, but I am sure their representation there will be decreased.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members of this house to the constituency of Prince Albert. Sir Wilfrid Laurier represented that famed constituency in the year 1896. Right Hon. Mackenzie King represented it in the years 1926, 1930, 1935 and 1940.

Mr. Ellis: And he was beaten by the C.C.F. in 1945.

Mr. Stanton: I will make one more prediction and it is this. The good people of the constituency of Prince Albert will have a third prime minister of Canada as their representative after the next election.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I associate myself with the previous speakers in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply. The honourable members for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) made excellent speeches which justify the honour bestowed upon them by the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet.

Then too, I should feel remiss if, at the beginning of my remarks, I failed to congratulate the new leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), for the confidence shown in him by the members and supporters of his party, and by reason of which he now bears the heavy responsibility of leading the forces of the official opposition in this house.

Under our parliamentary system we are allowed to disagree on the means of achieving the greatness of our country and the welfare of our fellow citizens. However the relations I have had with my colleagues in this house ever since I have come to it have been such as to convince me that each and everyone of us here, of whatever political persuasion he may be, is resolved to work towards the greatness of this country and to discharge his responsibilities to the best of his ability.

I would also like to avail myself of this opportunity, at the beginning of the new year, to offer my best wishes to all my colleagues and to the people of the constituency of Dollard, whom I have the honour to represent.

A great many of the opposition speakers who have spoken before me have stated that the speech from the throne read by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada at the opening of the session contained nothing or almost nothing. I cannot but think, when I hear that statement, that there are none so deaf as those who do not want to hear and none so blind as those who do not want to see. For my part, I have heard the speech from the throne in the other house and, later on, I took the trouble of reading it very carefully. I do not hesitate to say that this speech was very rich in proposals of national interest and that when its contents have been adopted by this house, it will promote an ever greater well-being for the population of Canada, ensure the maintenance of our economic and cultural development and be highly beneficial to the population which we represent. At the very beginning of the speech from the throne, we find that the government is eager to maintain the basic unity of the commonwealth and the reality of the western alliance. The Prime Minister, as well as the members of his cabinet, have proven and still prove to us that these words are not empty words. The close ties which link the Prime Minister to the prime ministers of the other member nations of the commonwealth, and the visits which have been exchanged during the last few years, and more particularly the last few weeks, when the prime minister of India came here to meet the Prime Minister of our country, prove this fact beyond the shadow of a doubt. While in certain cases they may have slight differences of opinion, they all agree on the goal which must be pursued by the association within the commonwealth. That goal is to safeguard the freedom of people, as well as the economic freedom of the member countries of the commonwealth.

The commonwealth association is made up of nations which are free, which enjoy full sovereignty, but have decided from their own free will, to unite in pursuing the goal I have just mentioned. The tour of Asia which the minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has just accomplished, is further evidence of the view I just stated, and I take this opportunity to offer hearty congratulations to the Minister of National Health and Welfare for having been such a good ambassador for our country, as well as an agent of peace and freedom for the commonwealth partnership.

The speech from the throne also mentions that Canadian military personnel is participating in the United Nations Emergency Force, which was suggested by Canada at the General Assembly of the United Nations, and here I would like, not only in my own name, but on behalf of my constituents of Dollard county, whose reaction was unanimous, to proffer our most sincere thanks and congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who, at one of the most crucial moments for world peace, took upon himself to suggest what, to my mind, silenced the guns in the Middle East and prevented disaster from spreading to the whole world.

We remember with emotion that, when nearly everybody was saying that war was unavoidable, the Canadian representative at the United Nations devised a formula agreeable to all concerned, and that within a few days his suggestion had not only brought hostilities to an end in that part of the world but had removed the risk of another world war which had been hanging over us for several weeks. The Secretary of State for External Affairs had long been known as a great politician and a great diplomat, and he showed himself on that occasion the champion of peace.

At the very moment when trouble was brewing in the Middle East something still more terrible was happening behind the iron curtain, when a courageous and stout-hearted people, in a united effort, decided to cast off the yoke of dictatorship, barbarism and godlessness. This spontaneous gesture of a freedom-loving people will have world-wide consequences which can perhaps hardly be properly assessed at this time but will be felt perhaps sooner than we think. As mentioned in Time magazine of January 7, only later will it be possible to appraise the consequences of the action taken by the people. However the effects of this action on European politics and military forces are extraordinary. That people, unarmed and lacking practically everything, immobilized almost 80 Russian divisions, thus proving to the world that in a world-wide conflict the masters of the Kremlin cannot rely entirely upon an army reduced by them to slavery.

The action taken by the Hungarian people is the cause of all the waverings evidenced at the present time by the masters of the Kremlin. It also brought the world to the realization that the smiles by Khrushchev and Bulganin in the last few months were nothing but hypocrisy and humbug. By their barbarian military repression of this uprising for freedom on the part of the Hungarian people, the Russian communists and their leaders in particular have lost immense prestige throughout the world and among the partisans of the communist ideology. Thus since the barbarian repression of innocents with the help of Russian tanks, we have seen throughout the world thousands and thousands of communist militants leave the ranks of that movement. That action has also demonstrated that it is impossible for the Russian communist party to suppress liberty entirely and to brainwash youths to make them into machines of the state believing in no spiritual or moral values. That action equally demonstrated to the world that peoples and individuals have a deep-rooted need of truth that no method whatever can suppress and that is why all the nations of the world should be thankful to that people and should take every means possible to help those who left their family and their country to flee the vengeance of the masters of the communist party in the Kremlin.

The speech from the throne shows that Canada played its part and continues to do so to prove its gratitude to that people, by assisting through the Red Cross or otherwise those who still suffer in Hungary and the others who have come to establish themselves in our vast and rich country. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) went in person to Austria to see for himself the needs of the refugees and consider the most appropriate and quickest way to help them and to facilitate their entry into Canada.

Already thousands of Hungarian refugees have reached our country and we shall welcome thousands of others in the near future. Each and every one of us in Canada who have enjoyed for generations living in a free and prosperous country, which has not experienced the anguish of war and the yoke of dictature, must warmly welcome those who so gallantly fought for the freedom and the safeguard of their faith.

When Christ came on earth, he taught us the great principle of love and charity. He urged us to practise charity, saying: "Love one another, give drink to those who thirst, and food to those who hunger." The Hungarian refugees who are coming to this country not only are our brothers, but they are also the champions of our way of life since they have fought for freedom, which we cherish so much. They are entitled to our respect, and I am convinced that, like the Canadian government, each and every one of the citizens of our country will take pleasure in welcoming them and assisting them. While I was speaking about the Hungarian refugees, I happened to mention our country which is so prosperous, so large, and so endowed with natural resources. The fact is even mentioned in the speech from the throne in these words. I quote:

> Excellent progress is being made in our national economic development. Expansion is evident in every part of Canada . . . employment has reached unprecedented levels.

To sum up, Canadian production as well as national revenue are reaching unprecedented heights, a fact which is not without worrying the government because of the danger of inflation which seems to follow upon the overly rapid development we are undergoing. To overcome this danger of inflation which threatens to bring about serious economic consequences, the government is of the opinion that we continue to take some steps designed to check inflation by restricting credit in this country. It is because of this that I would like to make a request on behalf of my constituents from Dollard. In my constituency there are hundreds of industries and an even larger number of tradesmen and contractors, and I would like to ask the government to continue to protect them in every possible way. This protection is especially necessary to small tradesmen and manufacturers as a safeguard against calamitous inflation. I have no doubt that the members of the Canadian government have no wish to see these people discontinue their activities and that they will see to it that necessary steps are taken to prevent them from undergoing too serious difficulties in the conduct of their business. In his speech on the address in reply, the leader of the opposition obviously made reference to the strike which was at that time paralysing one of the two large railways in this country, a strike which threatened to provoke serious trouble. However, instead of putting forward a solution, the leader of the opposition contented himself with saying, as is recorded in Hansard, volume 100, No. 3, page 26:

> What does the government do? It continues its policy of being resolute in irresolution.

The Prime Minister answered then and I am quoting again from the same volume, page 36:

> I can assure the hon. gentleman that my colleagues and I have not been inactive and that the remaining stumbling block has been narrowed very considerably.

Then the Prime Minister expressed what he believed to be acceptable to all, while not interfering with the democratic rights of each of the parties involved.

Time has shown that he was right as he was able to announce to the great satisfaction of the house and of the country that the strike had ended and that both parties to the dispute had accepted his proposal. In fact, one cannot more adequately express the feelings of the house and of Canada than was done by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) after the Prime Minister had announced the end of the strike, when he said:

> We, too, express satisfaction that there has been no compulsion; free men in a free society, bargaining freely, have achieved the result. I am glad there was no compulsion exercised against either party in this dispute. I am sure the people of Canada will welcome the announcement made by the Prime Minister. I wish to congratulate all those who have participated in bringing about this satisfactory result.

If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who sits on the opposition side, saw fit to express such feelings I can, with all the more reason, sitting as I do on the government side, rejoice with the people of Canada which placed its confidence in the attitude of the Prime Minister throughout this crisis. I wish to congratulate him for his reasonable stand in the settlement of this strike and for the remarkable results he has achieved.

Through the voice of the governor general, the government has announced in the speech from the throne an amendment extending the scope of the Municipal Grants Act to authorize the payment of grants in lieu of taxes on federal property in all municipalities where such property receives normal municipal services.

I had the opportunity to read several editorials published by various papers throughout the country, and everybody will agree with me that the legislation was welcomed by the people and the municipalities who will benefit thereby. With the expansion experienced by most municipalities in the past few years, in the industrial, commercial and housing fields, the municipal councils had to face growing needs which had to be paid for in a short period of years. The municipalities had to build sewers, streets, sidewalks, and finally guarantee all the relevant services. Most municipalities who have known such developments have a real need of money and this measure announced by the government will greatly help the municipalities that have federal buildings on their territory. In the county which I have the honour to represent, and more particularly in the city of St. Laurent, the government has erected public buildings and I know that this legislation will be welcomed by the municipal authorities of this town which is one of the most progressive in this country.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to a part of the speech from the throne which, if it cannot but be of some concern for the Canadian people, is something to be enthusiastic over for a man of my generation who has the advantage of representing a county where the average age is young. I refer to the measure for the establishment of a Canada council for the arts, humanities and social sciences, which will certainly give a new impetus to the development of Canadian scholarship and culture.

Speaking of Canadian culture, I would like to mention an article published in the January 1957 issue of Esquire and written by one of the contributors to that magazine, Mr. Gerald Kersh. Like many others, I was surprised to read in that magazine, which usually gives good publicity to our country, that article by Mr. Kersh which suggests that an important part of the Canadian people, namely the French Canadians, have no culture and are all but uncivilized.

I would not mention it, if it was not that this magazine is read by millions of people, in Canada as well as in the United States.

I was told, too, that the manager of this magazine has apologized to the authorities of the province I come from, and I appreciate it, but since these apologies have not been as widely publicized as the article, I fear that I would not be fulfilling my duty, not as a French Canadian, but as a Canadian, if I failed to call attention to this matter.

In his article, Mr. Kersh infers that we have no culture at all, that we Canadian citizens of French origin have produced nothing in the field of literature, music, painting or any other field. He holds also that, in the field of culinary art, the only dish that we have succeeded in inventing is pea-soup. He insinuates also that our language is very poor and he seems bent on describing us as a group of cave-dwellers. That article goes so far, Mr. Speaker, that when I started reading it I thought that it was a formidable joke; I thought that its author was trying to caricature us. If it is a joke, Mr. Speaker, it is in very bad taste, and if it is a caricature, it is badly done for it bears no resemblance to those it attempts to describe.

Mr. Kersh goes further and strikes at the very foundation of society, the family. He tells us that if we shut in for the winter a couple of Canadians of French origin, we shall find the following spring two or three little Canadians. Nothing could be viler. Our society, as I said, is based precisely on the family. Nothing is more sacred. I cannot understand a man like Mr. Kersh jeering at it. We are rightly proud of our large families. They constitute one of the greatest values and riches of the Canadian nation. When Mr. Kersh tells us that there is no cuisine in the province of Quebec, the facts belie that because it is recognized, not only throughout Canada, but also in the United States and even abroad that in the province of Quebec, and in the cities of Montreal and Quebec in particular, there are numerous places where dishes are the best and the most varied.

As regards our culture, it is easy to prove that, while we are a young nation, our culture is in full development. We are proud of the men the nation has produced in the fields of literature, arts, sciences or politics. Among the latter there are few Canadians more completely and thoroughly cultured than the present Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent whose mother was a great Canadian woman of Irish origin and whose father was a French Canadian. He was also so fortunate as to be brought up in Canada, in the province where I was born. At the beginning of my remarks concerning Mr. Kersh's article, I stated that I was moved to criticize these remarks which, to say the least, are quite unkind not so much because I am a Canadian of French origin but because I am a Canadian citizen. In attacking French culture he was also attacking Canadian culture since the people of Canada, even though its members may differ as to origin, and even though each group may have retained its own traditions, nonetheless forms one people. In spite of this diversity and because of it we have acquired a distinctly Canadian culture which, if it is allowed to come to fruition is called upon to be rich and to be capable not only of identifying a nation, but of serving it and of being also of service to the peoples of the world because of the development of our country and of the increasing influence which we wield in the councils of nations. It is up to us to enrich that purely Canadian culture in order to be worthy of our mission and so to be able fully to avail ourselves of the spiritual and even of the material values which Providence has dispensed to us. In that sense, I am firmly convinced that the bill for the establishment of a Canadian council for the arts, humanities and social sciences will mean an important progress. That is why I congratulate the Prime Minister who conceived this project as well as the members of the government for their contribution to its inception.

(Text):

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me particular pleasure at this time to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) on the brilliant manner in which he discharged his duty in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Translation):

I congratulate also the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the honourable member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). He has discharged himself of his task with a distinction which honours the constituency he represents, as well as his province. I have been much impressed by his remarks about higher education in Acadia. There will never be enough praise for the heroism of those who, until today, have been mainly responsible for the maintenance of the cause of the Acadians in their small country. Today, the federal government wants to increase its assistance to the Canadian universities. Our Acadian educational institutions will accept these grants from the government, confident that this new contribution will hasten in our part of the country a greater cultural development, and a wider influence of our Acadian ethnical group. The French fact in Canada has a right to exist throughout the country. However, experience has shown that it is in the federal charter that the minorities of the country have most often found a guarantee of that right. Instead of considering the influence of a central government as a threat to their rights, the minorities have many times had cause to rejoice in having turned towards it. Such was the case for instance in connection with radio broadcasting. Such will be the case in connection with television. I am therefore happy at this time to congratulate this government for wanting to increase the grants to the universities of this country.

Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to point out the seriousness of the situation which until a few days ago was of great concern to all Canadians. By this I mean the strike which brought to a standstill the operations of one of our great railways. If it is true that this strike has now ended because of the spirit of co-operation shown by all interested parties, I believe that it is well to mention more particularly the conciliatory role played by the Prime Minister of Canada during these talks which brought about a solution to the strike.

I believe that all Canadians appreciate the outstanding part taken by the Prime Minister in these serious circumstances.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it would be appropriate, I think, to mention here the satisfaction felt by all the members of this house at the return of the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). The message of good will which he has carried throughout the world, in the name of the people and of the government of Canada, will no doubt contribute to enhance, in the eyes of the other nations of the world, the already enviable prestige of Canada. We are therefore happy to express to the hon. minister our feeling of high appreciation for his distinguished services to his country.

I should also mention the part played by the hon. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) who acted on behalf of our country in order to help the unfortunate Hungarian people. There was a humanitarian deed in the best Christian spirit. Canada has been enhanced by this action. The Canadian people must express all its gratitude to the man who represented this country so well in this circumstance.

(Text):

On January 8 I was pleased to hear during the reading of the speech from the throne of the government's proposals to recommend in the Senate the establishment of a committee—

. . . to consider what should be done to make better use of land for agriculture and thus to contribute more effectively to the improvement of agricultural production and the incomes of those engaged in it.

I know that all are conscious of the present condition, whereby farmers today are not receiving their proportionate share of the national revenue. I listened with interest the other day to the remarks made in this house by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, and I want to commend at this time the interest the hon. member has always shown in agriculture, particularly in regard to agricultural conditions in our own province of New Brunswick. At all times he has proven to be a strong advocate of more government assistance and support to New Brunswick farmers, and I have often shared his views in this respect. In his speech the other day, however, I felt the hon. member was being inconsistent when he took a critical view of the government's proposal to recommend the establishment of an agricultural study committee.

We are all aware that the farming population of our province, together with the farming population of the rest of the country, is not receiving an equitable return for its efforts. I am sure everyone, including the members of the government, will agree with the hon. member's contention that our farmers are hard-working people, that they are clever and no less backward than the rest of their fellow citizens, and that many of them are most successful in their undertakings; but we must not forget that agriculture is also a science and as such is open to a scientific approach in both the fields of production and marketing. I have no doubt that this is the thought the government has in mind when seeking plans which will assure our farming people a fair and equitable return for the job performed.

The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton further stated that what farmers in New Brunswick need is a market for their produce. I am quite in agreement with him on this matter, but might I be permitted to make another suggestion in this regard. Would not the readiest market available to maritime farmers be the maritime market itself? When we consider that we import between 60 and 65 per cent of the foodstuffs for our own local requirements this would appear to be the logical goal we should strive to achieve.

Pursuant to that matter I would like to express a view which I have already expressed in this house. This agriculture committee could properly seek ways and means to establish freezing and processing plants at points in farming areas, thus enabling the maritime farmers themselves to secure this ready market, for most of the food commodities we need can be produced at home.

I am not of the opinion that the main source of our difficulties in relation to the maritime farm economy lies in the lack of soil fertility. I believe, on the contrary, that when properly cultivated our land is generally good, fertile land which can yield all the vital things we need for our own sustenance. I feel, therefore, there is a definite need for a committee such as was proposed in the speech from the throne on January 8, and I am looking forward with great hope that the task it will perform will mark a turning point in the farm economy of our country and more particularly in the maritime farm economy.

Again referring to the remarks made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton in this house last week, there is one point on which I might say that I am in some agreement with him. I am now speaking of his reference to the inefficiency of the Canadian farm loan board to cope fully with the credit needs of the Canadian farmers. There is a growing feeling of dissatisfaction toward the rigid attitude of this board in its appraisal of the credit requirements and actual assets of farm properties. It is no longer being considered by the majority of farmers as a farm loan institution, but merely as just another loan institution. Statistics could be produced to bear out that tendency. Between March 31, 1956, and December 31, 1956, the Canadian farm loan board received 64 applications from New Brunswick, 39 of which were approved, for a total of $149,700.

If we consider that farming is New Brunswick's chief industry, and if we also consider the number of farms in the province and the necessity of rehabilitating many of them, we must admit that these figures are not very impressive. I would suggest to the Department of Finance that they reconsider the terms and regulations now governing the operations of the Canadian farm loan board with a view to rendering them more flexible and more adequate to meet the requirements of those farmers who rely upon the facilities of this board for financial assistance.

However, we should not assume that the federal Department of Agriculture is solely responsible for the welfare of our farm population, and I would like to point out that under our constitution the welfare of our farmers is also the responsibility of the provincial authorities. In recognizing this responsibility I would hope that our provincial governments across Canada, including the government of New Brunswick, would realize they are not relieved of the responsibility of giving some assistance in matters of loan financing.

Referring to the fishing industry, I should like to say that in relation to the maritime economy it is next in importance to the farming industry. In a general way I think it is right to say that our fishermen had a comparatively good year in 1956. This is particularly true of lobster fishermen, who form the majority of the fishermen in my own constituency of Kent. In this regard I should like to quote from a Moncton Times editorial dated December 8, 1956, concerning this matter:

> Nature evidently beamed with favour on the lobster fishermen of New Brunswick during the respective open seasons around this province's coastlines in 1956. For this became known when the reports were submitted to the conference of federal fisheries officers just concluded in Moncton. "A decided increase" in the lobster catch is how district protection officer A. A. Robichaud summarized the over-all outcome of the various lobstering seasons this year.
>
> For the fishermen of Westmorland and Kent counties, as well as others actively associated with or interested in this lucrative branch of the fisheries industry, the season, both in regard to catch and landed values, was one that again reflected increases. The crustaceans garnered from the fishing grounds in the Northumberland strait between Point Sapin, N.B., and River Phillip, N.S., totalled in volume 5,919,700 pounds and brought the fishermen a total revenue of $1,810,193.
>
> This is the fourth successive year that an improvement in both catch and value has been recorded. It compared with the respective figures for 1955 of 5,299,000 pounds valued at $1,657,245; of those for 1954 of 3,067,700 pounds valued at $1,306,272, and those of 1953 of 4,133,200 pounds valued at $1,243,603.

And again:

> From the standpoint of volume, it would appear that the stricter surveillance of the lobster grounds by augmented numbers of fisheries protection officers these past few years has had some effect in reducing the depredations of poachers as well as other illegal fishing methods. And the education program stressing conservation measures, which has been carried on during the past four years, has also had a beneficial effect in nurturing the valuable lobster population off the shores of this province.
>
> The lobster fishery forms an important part of the economy of the eastern, northern and southern coastal areas of New Brunswick. It provides the fishermen with a considerable part of their annual income, and it is a matter of much satisfaction to see this increasing.

In my estimation that editorial gives a fairly comprehensive account of the situation inasmuch as it applies to the Kent county lobster industry. There seems to exist sufficient evidence of a healthful note of optimism for the future of that industry. Apart from that encouraging factor is also the prospect for many fishermen of unemployment insurance benefits which will become available next year to the fishing industry. This should prove of valuable assistance during the winter months, when the income of fishermen in my district is at its lowest level.

I was interested in reading on January 8 a press report stating that the Department of Fisheries plans to reseed the oyster fishing grounds in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In regard to this matter I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Moncton Transcript of January 10, and which very adequately sums up the situation. It relates the history of the disease which depleted our oyster grounds during the course of the past few years. It states:

In fact the experts have estimated that 90 per cent of the oyster stocks in the affected waters have been destroyed by natural mortalities over that comparatively short period of 1955 and 1956. This devastation, of course, caused not only a decided reduction in the volume of the shellfish garnered but also in the landed values.

The biologists found the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia oyster grounds had been swept by a disease similar to that which all but ruined the long-famed beds in Prince Edward Island between 35 and 40 years ago. So it is from the island's now prolific producing waters that disease-resistant bivalves will be transplanted to bring about the rehabilitation of the depleted oyster fishing grounds of the mainland provinces.

There seems no doubt but the method of rehabilitation will prove equally as successful in the present instances as was the case in restoring the Prince Edward Island beds some years ago. It will, of course, take several years before the process shall have completely eradicated the disease which has been depleting the oysters. In all, the plan will see 10,000 barrels of P.E.I. disease-resistant bivalves planted in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia fishing grounds over the ensuing three years, with the 1957 transplant totalling 1,500 barrels to be made in May and June.

The federal government officials merit commendation in taking timely action towards the restoration of this fishery which in past years has been a valuable one to the fishermen of this and the other maritime provinces. Research has dictated that the oyster beds would rehabilitate themselves naturally within a period of 10 to 15 years, but the department's action gives recognition to the fact that it is unnecessary to deprive fishermen of this source of income for so long a period.

I wish to associate myself with the concluding words of that article, and also congratulate the Department of Fisheries for the active action being taken in this matter. I express the hope also that as a result of these activities we shall see the oyster beds of Kent county brought back to their former production which meant so much to the income of our local fishermen.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this debate tomorrow.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK— NEW BRUNSWICK LOANS

Question No. 13—Mr. Van Horne:

1. Did the industrial development bank make loans in New Brunswick in 1956?
2. If so, how many loans were made and what was the amount of each loan?
3. How many applications for loans were made?
4. What percentage of the loans applied for were granted?

Answer by: Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance):

1, 2, 3, and 4. The only information of government record is contained in the annual report of the industrial development bank which shows that loans to the amount of $1,346,000 were authorized in the province of New Brunswick in the fiscal year ended September 30, 1956.

SUEZ CRISIS—EGYPTIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO CANADA

Question No. 16—Mr. Poulin:

Did the prime minister of Egypt or his government, during the Suez crisis last fall, make representations to the Canadian government concerning (a) the uniform to be worn by a group of Canadian servicemen about to join the international police force; (b) the flag such group would fly?

Answer by: Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

(a) No. (b) No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 16, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE EARL OF ATHLONE

TRIBUTE TO FORMER GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of this house and all Canadians of our generation who have vivid personal recollections of Canada's all-out war effort during the first half of the forties were grieved to hear this morning of the death of the right hon. the Earl of Athlone.

As governor general of Canada through the most hazardous years of the war, the Earl of Athlone won the confidence and the affection of the Canadian people from coast to coast. The Earl of Athlone entered on his high office in the dark days of 1940 when the future of civilization might seem to have been at stake. Throughout the following anxious years until his departure in the spring of 1946 His Excellency performed the complex and difficult duties of governor general with tact, with zeal and with distinction. From the first the Earl and the Princess Alice threw themselves wholeheartedly into the life and problems of our country. By their wide travels over Canada, by the warm-hearted way in which they greeted thousands upon thousands of Canadians and by the active interest which they took in every phase of Canadian life in wartime, in our armed forces, in munitions plants, in hospitals and in countless other directions, they did all that was in their power to help promote the feeling of national unity so essential to a total war effort.

The Earl of Athlone had had a long and admirable career of public service before he came to Canada. As a young officer, he had served with distinction in the campaigns both in Matabeleland and in South Africa. It was indeed his devotion to his duty as a soldier which prevented him from coming to Canada as governor general in 1914, when he was appointed to that office by His Majesty King George the Fifth. Instead, he went to France, again to serve with distinction in Britain's armed forces.

Throughout his long career, and particularly as governor general of Canada, he showed an exceptional appreciation of the manner in which the commonwealth of nations was developing as a free association of independent nations, bound together by a common loyalty. In his speeches he frequently interpreted that development with sympathy and skill.

No one could have shown greater pride in the part which Canada played in the war, and in the place which Canada had earned by her efforts among the united nations, than did the Earl of Athlone in his many public addresses as governor general of this country.

Each time I have had the pleasure of meeting the Earl of Athlone and Princess Alice since 1946, and I have had the privilege of doing so on several occasions, they never failed to show continued interest in Canadian events and developments. I know too that many other Canadians who have had the privilege of meeting them have had the same experience.

The passing of the Earl of Athlone will be widely mourned throughout Canada, as throughout all the commonwealth. He will long be remembered for the ability and devotion with which he performed the duties of his high office at a most critical time in the history of our country and of the civilized world.

I would like, supported by the Leader of the Opposition, to suggest that as a tribute to the memory of this great public servant of his sovereign, of Canada, and of the commonwealth, and as a mark of our deep sympathy with Her Royal Highness the Princess Alice, with our beloved Queen and with all the members of the royal family we stand together for a moment of silence and mournful reflection on their bereavement.

(Whereupon the members rose and observed a period of silence.)

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—INFLUENCE ON INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) with regard to the much discussed and all-important, though I must admit somewhat technical, question of interest rates. I wish to ask him a question based on what he said on November 27 last, and I read briefly from what he then said, as reported at page 47 of Hansard:

It is not the action of the Bank of Canada which is causing the rise in interest rates, it is the demand on the money supply both in business and in government circles; and the Bank of Canada interest rate is only a reflection of the increased interest rates in the money market.

And again:

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Macdonnell: I will ask the question in due course. Then he said:

When it is said that the Bank of Canada rate was increased and thereby other rates were increased, it is just merely putting the cart before the horse because it is the reverse.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: There seem to be many speakers in this house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): And this is a time when it is not proper for speeches to be made.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, having laid the foundation for my question, does the Minister of Finance not think—

An hon. Member: You have laid a foundation for a 10-storey building.

Mr. Rowe: If hon. members across the way kept quiet they would understand the question.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the minister not agree that the interest rates in the money market, of which he says the Bank of Canada rate is only a reflection, are themselves affected by the Bank of Canada's own action in buying and selling bonds in the open market, and that therefore the Bank of Canada does influence interest rates?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for repeating what I said; it is very seldom that I find myself an authority on anything. But it is only just what he said, Mr. Speaker; it seems to me that most members of the Tory party start with the foundation of the Liberal party and then see whether they cannot get somewhere after that.

Mr. Ferguson: If we used the foundations of your party we would never get anywhere.

Mr. Harris: I think I can answer the question very simply by saying that I have no change to make in the statement I made then, though it was in answer to a question during the question period. I would be glad to discuss it in greater detail later at the appropriate time. However, since it is a matter of interest and since my hon. friend has gone to some trouble to look for my remarks on the subject, may I say there is no question at all that the interest rate, the rediscount rate, of the Bank of Canada, which was increased, my recollection is, in August 1955, followed after a steady increase in interest rates which had extended over six months prior to that. To that extent and for that reason I gave the answer in November that the increased discount rate is merely a reflection of the increased demand for money in the money market which led to an increased interest rate.

Now then, it may be that when the Bank of Canada increases its interest rate certain persons may ascribe to it—that is, the increase in rate—reasons why they in turn should increase their interest rates. That does not at the same time admit that there is any validity for certain interest increases for that reason alone and I think that probably is what my hon. friend had in mind.

Mr. Macdonnell: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I like to use moderate language but I think the minister, as he did last autumn, is simply not answering. I would like to refer the minister to what the governor of the Bank of Canada said at page 383 of the proceedings of last year—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Macdonnell: —and I think the minister will find that it is entirely in disagreement with what he said. I would also like to remind the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. gentleman has had time enough to lay a long foundation and frame a long question and unless he wants to ask a supplementary question at this time I do not think he should do so by laying down another long foundation.

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, to return to my previous question, may I ask the Minister of Finance this question. Is the minister persisting in his previous statement that the Bank of Canada has no influence on interest rates?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I have never said that the Bank of Canada had no influence on interest rates. My recollection is that that question was asked of me in a different form by the hon. member for Greenwood a month or so ago and that I did not make any answer which would indicate that the Bank of Canada could not influence interest rates. As a matter of fact, it could do so. He knows that and I think everyone else knows it.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In that connection, would the minister outline what powers the Bank of Canada has to do other than control the quantity of credit? What power has it to allocate credit? What power has it to give advice and to apply pressure to private business, if that course is being followed? I ask the minister whether the government has abdicated to the Bank of Canada its rights, its authority, and its responsibility to do things that are not justified by the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I have said already this afternoon that I intended to make some rather extended remarks about this matter. But in anticipation of doing that, I think I should answer my hon. friend by reminding him that I told his acting leader, in answer to a similar question some months ago, that if he would only read the Bank of Canada Act he would get the answer to his question.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of the advice I received from the Minister of Finance on that occasion, Mr. Speaker, I might ask a supplementary question. Does the government approve of the Bank of Canada's decision to restrict credit independent of collateral and, as my leader has suggested, thereby more or less controlling business generally?

Mr. Harris: I am afraid I do not quite understand that question, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Have you read the Bank of Canada Act?

Mr. Harris: I have read the Bank of Canada Act several times.

Mr. Rowe: May I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he might read the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. Harris: I have done so.

[Later:]

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood. If the minister wishes the house to understand that the Bank of Canada is a follower rather than a leader, what steps is the government taking to meet the inflationary trend at this time?

Mr. Harris: Once again, Mr. Speaker, I must say I am gratified that hon. members of the opposition are now agreeing that we have an inflationary problem. There was a time not so long ago when they questioned the things that were being done. I can only assure my hon. friend that to the best of my ability in the course of this session I shall deliver quite a long speech on this particular subject in order to try to tell them the answer to that question.

[Later:]

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Are the chartered banks of Canada authorized or advised by the Bank of Canada to charge different rates of interest to different borrowers?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTED DIFFICULTY RESPECTING MUNICIPAL DEBENTURE ISSUES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware of the difficulties that municipalities are experiencing in their endeavour to sell debentures, and the high rate of interest that they are forced to pay on the sale of these debentures which are issued for the purpose of necessary construction of schools, water works and other municipal projects?

If so, is the government considering making money more readily available to municipalities at a low rate of interest?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): My recollection is that the municipal governments of Canada borrowed more money in 1956 than they did in any previous year. That fact does not lead one to conclude that they are having difficulty in getting money. It is true, however, that they had to pay the high interest rate for raising the money already discussed this afternoon.

Mr. Starr: Is the minister aware of the fact that certain municipalities in the Ottawa area have been trying to sell debentures and have been willing to pay the 5 per cent interest but have not been able to sell them yet, and that the same situation is being experienced by other municipalities throughout the country at the present time?

Mr. Harris: I do not get communications from the municipalities telling me all their particular difficulties. If there are some which cannot borrow money unless they pay 5 per cent, I presume that what I said on November 27 still obtains, namely that if the elected representatives feel that the work they are undertaking is necessary and essential and therefore one which should be gone ahead with despite interest rates, no doubt they will take the step of borrowing at that rate. If, on the other hand, they feel that they can postpone it because of the cost, they will do so. That is one manner in which we are trying to prolong the present boom.

Mr. Starr: May I just point out to the minister that the works—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Starr: —which the municipal governments have in contemplation are absolutely necessary. Such things as schools and projects in connection with water supplies are necessary. Does not the minister think that the extra interest is an overburden to municipal home owners if they could have made available by this government loans with a low interest rate?

An hon. Member: No answer.

HOUSING

N.H.A. LOANS—REQUEST THAT INTEREST RATES BE NOT INCREASED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris)? Perhaps I would direct it to the Minister of Finance even if the Minister of Public Works were here. In view of the continuing need of money for housing and the already high cost of interest payments, and in the light of the Canadian Press report this morning—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —will the government take steps to see that National Housing Act money is made available for housing construction without an increase in the interest rate?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the house would expect me to leave that question to be answered by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Finance not feel that this question of money being made available for housing rather than for some other projects is a matter of over-all government financial policy on which he as the Minister of Finance should have something to say?

Mr. Harris: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I will have something to say about it, but in consultation with the Minister of Public Works and my colleagues.

[Mr. Harris.]

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and in his absence perhaps the parliamentary assistant could answer. In fact, there are two questions. Can the minister inform the house as to the date when it is now expected that the Trans-Canada pipe line will be completed to Winnipeg and Emerson? Has consideration been given to any extension of the date of repayment of the $8 million loan—

Some hon. Members: Eighty million.

Mr. Castleden: —yes, the $80 million loan to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines beyond April 1, 1957?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister the question will be taken as notice.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING MARITIME PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. What is the attitude of the government in regard to the Gordon commission's recommendations that the government pay the cost of relocation for people who wish to move away from the neglected maritime provinces?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): My impression of some of the reports made by several newspapers with respect to that aspect of the Gordon commission report is that they are quite inaccurate. The suggestion, as I read it in the report, is that everything possible should be done to bring the economic activity of the Atlantic region up to a point where the standards of living there will be very much nearer those of the most favoured regions in Canada. If after doing so it should appear that the resources of the area are not sufficient to accomplish that for all those who are in the area, and some of them wish to remove for that reason to other areas, I take it that the suggestion is that there should be consideration given to assisting them in making that move. But that is only in the event that all possible ways of making the best possible use of the resources of the area and to the fullest possible extent have proved insufficient to raise the standards of living of the people in the area close enough to those of the people of the most favoured regions in the country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Van Horne: A supplementary question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Two leaders.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that everybody in the government seems to deny the paternity of this report and is running away from it, would the government consider giving us a revised statement as to the portions with which they agree?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, when this government appoints a commission to inquire into and report on a certain situation it makes no effort whatsoever to dictate to the commission what its recommendations shall be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We are claiming the paternity of the idea of establishing the commission and the commission itself is entitled to the paternity of all recommendations in its report.

Mr. Van Horne: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. When will his government start to move and do something for the maritime provinces?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The government has been moving at such a pace that no other party in this country has been able to keep up with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the widespread clamour in his own province for the South Saskatchewan dam, does the minister agree with the specific recommendation in the Gordon report, and I quote these words:

> . . . cautions the government against proceeding with the construction of substantial irrigation projects, as these tend to result in overproduction of agricultural products.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I have never associated the building of the South Saskatchewan dam with only irrigation projects. I think other objectives are much more important even than that.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question. Since the tabling of the Gordon commission report, has the minister made any representations to his colleagues that the South Saskatchewan dam be proceeded with?

Mr. Gardiner: I think the members of the government will agree that if I were to recite to this house all the representations I make to members of the government and the government with regard to the South Saskatchewan, it would take up most of the session.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister tell the house how effective the representations have been, and whether there is any intention to go ahead this year?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been given serious consideration, and I can only repeat what I have said a number of times. As soon as I can, with conviction, come to the house and say I feel that the expenditure is a proper expenditure of the taxpayers' money in the interests of Canada generally, I will do so. It is, I think, quite a borderline case. There are a great many projects that would be beneficial projects, but there is the responsibility on the government of determining and then recommending to parliament that we honestly believe the expenditure we propose is an expenditure that will add more to the Canadian economy than the interest and amortization charges will take out of the Canadian economy, and we have not yet arrived at that conclusion about the South Saskatchewan dam.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question? Has he considered this matter further since the tabling of the royal commission report?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Not in any special way; but the matter is one that, because of what my colleague has said, is ever present in the considerations of the members of this government.

Mr. Argue: We would like some action.

POWER

SAINT JOHN RIVER DEVELOPMENT—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL CO-OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As part of the government's program to assist the maritime provinces to help themselves and increase their standards of living, does the Prime Minister intend to assist the premier of New Brunswick by backing his power development bonds so that he can develop power on the Saint John river which is urgently needed in that area?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The premier of New Brunswick and the people of New Brunswick will require no backing of their bonds for the Beechwood development. With respect to other developments, there have been no reports submitted that would establish that there is prepared a project that would have economic possibilities and economic results. That is being carefully considered and when it is demonstrated that there can be use made of water power if sufficient can be obtained to make it an economic proposition or that there can be thermoelectric power produced with the use of coal in the Atlantic region, then if the province of New Brunswick requires assistance to bring that about their request for assistance will be given very sympathetic consideration because I think it is in the interests of the economy of the whole of Canada to have no depressed areas in Canada.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask a supplementary question. What excuse has the government for refusing over the past two years to accede to Premier Hugh John Flemming's request for assistance to back his power development?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I think I am better informed of the attitude of the government of Canada and of the government of New Brunswick than is my hon. friend. I have been having conferences with the prime minister of New Brunswick ever since he became prime minister.

Mr. Hees: And you turned him down flat.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I have not turned him down flat. As soon as they bring forward a scheme which can be studied to determine whether it has economic possibilities and which is apt really to stimulate the economy of the region it will receive careful consideration, and that matter is still being studied by the advisers of the government of New Brunswick.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I ask a supplementary question? May we expect a decision on this before the next election?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): You can expect a decision on it just as soon as there is put before us by the government and people of New Brunswick a scheme that can be studied as to its economic merits.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Bell: Does the Prime Minister deny the fact that on at least three occasions we have put forward such schemes?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do most positively deny that there has ever been put forward the kind of scheme that could be implemented along the lines I have mentioned. There have been general suggestions that they should get aid, and with those general suggestions we agree, but there has never been put forward any specific proposition that could be recommended to parliament as one that would really stimulate the economy of the Atlantic region in a fashion that would be beneficial to the whole economy of Canada.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): May I put a supplementary question? Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that the development of the Beechwood proposition on the Saint John river is not a sound and economic proposition, and one that does not stimulate the growth and prosperity of Canada?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): On the contrary, it has been found sufficiently sound to be financed without assistance from the federal treasury.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Are the Prime Minister and his government going back to the days of the thirties when Mackenzie King made the statement that there would not be a single nickel given to the provinces?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do not know of anyone unless it be the hon. member himself—and I do not think he is doing so—who is asking for a nickel.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED SPEECH BY MR. DULLES — INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I ask a question of the Prime Minister. Dispatches published in the Ottawa newspapers yesterday afternoon contained reports of statements attributed to United States Secretary of State Dulles made, I think, before a committee of the United States Senate. He is reported as having said the United States could not go into partnership with Britain and France in any Middle East plan. Then follows this quotation, which appears to be a verbatim report:

> I cannot think of anything that would more surely turn the area over to international communism than to go in there hand in hand with Britain and France.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether that amazing statement is also the viewpoint of the Canadian government and, if not, whether the Prime Minister will dissociate Canada from any such statement.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Canada does not have to be dissociated from statements made by foreign ministers of other nations, and if that were the viewpoint of Canada it would be stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada.

Mr. Green: Does the Prime Minister not think Canada should take some stand on this question, if for no other reason than to further co-operation among the United Kingdom, France and the United States?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Canada is not required to take a stand on every newspaper report, that aims to be sensational, of things said outside Canada by the statesmen of other countries.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

NEWSPRINT—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO INCREASED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask the Minister of Justice for the statement which, since he is on his feet, he is probably now going to make.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, namely the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, asked me the following question:

> In view of the recent increases in the price of newsprint will the minister ask the restrictive trade practices commission to investigate the circumstances of these increases and determine whether there are any elements of price fixing or restraint of trade?

By way of reply to that question may I say that since it is the practice of the director under the Combines Investigation Act to consider notable price changes with a view to making sure that they are not the product of collusion, it is not necessary for me as minister to ask the director to investigate the price changes in newsprint to which my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred in his question. If there is any reason to suspect collusion, the director conducts an inquiry, but as the hon. members know, it is contrary to the usual practice to disclose whether such an inquiry is being conducted until the report is presented.

At this point I think I should emphasize the fact that the combines branch, of course, has no authority to regulate prices. Its function is to investigate those situations in which there is reason to believe that the firms in an industry are co-operating to keep prices above the level which current market forces would support. In a time of stationary or falling costs and demand, a general and uniform price increase would be regarded with suspicion. In the present time of rising costs and strong demand, such increases may be explained on the basis of ordinary market behaviour and are not in themselves evidence of collusion. On the basis of these price changes, therefore, the director does not feel he would be warranted in conducting an investigation.

When the director does not see fit to begin an inquiry on his own initiative, I can, of course, direct him to do so; but for the same reasons that he has given, I see no justification for taking such a course.

I think I should also say that no requests for an inquiry have been received by my department from any United States authorities.

SUGAR

REFERENCE TO REPORTED INCREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Seeing that the wholesale price of sugar has risen sharply again in the last week, would the minister please inform the house whether this rise is the result of unfair practices or whether it should be due only to the world shortage?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In accordance with the practice to which I referred just a moment ago of noting price changes in various markets, the combines branch has been observing recent increases in the price of refined sugar. These price increases appear to be directly related to increases in the cost of raw sugar. It would appear that some variation exists in the degree to which the refiners in eastern Canada have increased their refined sugar prices. It would also appear that world raw sugar prices which started to advance in early November have advanced more rapidly and to a significantly greater degree than have the selling prices charged by the refiners. The combines branch does not, therefore, regard these present increases in refined sugar prices as significant in relation to the anti-combines legislation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister say whether a study has been made of the price changes, samples of which I sent across to him in the November session, showing a strange coincidence as to time and amount of increases by various sugar companies across Canada?

Mr. Garson: As I said on that previous occasion, Mr. Speaker, the information which my hon. friend sent across to us was no news at all to our department. We had had those figures probably before my hon. friend had them and have studied them as we do in all of these cases. When he refers to the strange coincidence in the prices, may I say that in this reply I have endeavoured not to draw too close attention to the inaccuracy of that assertion by my words:

. . . some variation exists in the degree to which the refiners in eastern Canada have increased their refined sugar prices.

In other words, they have not all reflected this increase to the same extent. But in order to give the house some impression, quantitatively, of the difference I might cite the case of one of the refineries. It is shown that the laid down cost of raw sugar in Montreal on November 1, 1956, was $5.04 per hundred pounds. On January 11, 1957, that had gone up $2.89 per hundred pounds to $7.93. This same concern has increased its net selling price of refined sugar during the same period by $2.42, or in other words some 46¾ cents less than the increase in the price of its raw sugar.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister another supplementary question? Is he aware of the fact that the Manitoba Sugar Company, whose raw supplies are sugar beets grown in Manitoba, which they had last fall, has also raised its price by a similar amount?

Mr. Garson: Yes, and I presume my hon. friend will probably recall from his economics course in university, if he took one, that where the price of goods of this sort is fixed on the world market, and the cost at which the competitors of the Manitoba Sugar Company can lay down sugar in Canada rises to a certain level, then it is possible for Canadian companies, it seems to me, with complete propriety to charge the going price for their sugar, in the same way they would have to take a lower price if the world price went down.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I also learned in university that the combines legislation of this country was effective, but I now discover it is not.

Mr. Garson: With regard to that, I think the animadversion which my hon. friend has just put forward is unwarranted. As I pointed out before, the combines investigation branch does not purport, and has not power, to regulate prices. My hon. friend knows that in peacetime only a provincial legislature can authorize such a course. All the branch has power to do is to prevent collusion, and where there are market conditions which more than explain the increase in price it is quite difficult to suspect collusion.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): May I ask a supplementary question? Would the minister inform the house if the Manitoba refinery not only refines beet sugar but raw sugar?

Mr. Garson: I presume by that my hon. friend means raw cane sugar?

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): That is right.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid I cannot accurately answer that. I know that at the time the company was organized it was entirely for the purpose of refining beet sugar. Whether or not the machinery could be adapted to the refining of cane sugar or whether they do, I do not know.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—DECISION OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant and perhaps he would take it as notice. It is in connection with the international waters between the United States and Canada and the recent decision by the United States supreme court permitting an extra flow of some 8,000 cubic feet per second through the Chicago drainage system. I ask the question in view of the fact that only recently President Eisenhower made a statement that he would not permit more water to go through that drainage system. Perhaps in making a statement the minister would comment on how it became possible for the United States supreme court to determine the flow of water through that system since it was our understanding, from a statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that this was a matter for the international joint commission.

Will the minister also make a statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps now that the hon. gentleman has asked several questions he could let the minister answer some of them soon.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Would the minister comment on this question. Would our supreme court or any judicial body in this country be empowered to permit an extra flow of water to any part of Canada from these international waters?

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will be happy to take the hon. gentleman's question as notice and have an answer brought down as soon as possible.

INCOME TAX

RETIREMENT FUNDS—DEDUCTIONS BY SELF-EMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Is the Minister of Finance giving any consideration to changes in the Income Tax Act which would permit self-employed taxpayers to get the same deferment on personal contributions to retirement funds which now pertains to members of registered pension plans?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): This has been the subject of consideration and discussion in the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, for at least four years. I am sure that the answer should be that we are considering it.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): May I ask a supplementary question? Would the minister indicate whether it will be considered before the budget this year?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Speaker, I will not indicate that one way or the other.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

OTTAWA—INQUIRY AS TO ELECTRONIC SORTING DEVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether or not the electronic sorting machine which his department designed, and on which a million dollars has already been spent, is now in regular service in the Ottawa post office?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): I may be wrong, Mr. Speaker, but my understanding from the last report I had just a few weeks ago was that it was installed in Toronto and was undergoing testing there.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO CHARGE FOR ADMISSION TO AIRPORT BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I have not given notice of this question, but perhaps the Minister of Transport would get me the information. Has the Department of Transport authorized any of its employees to make a charge to the public for admission to any part of its transport administration buildings—I mean the upper part of airport buildings that sort of thing?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I know there are some airports where there is a deck to which the public is admitted on the payment of a small charge, I think 10 cents. This is quite common at airports on this side of the Atlantic and also in Europe. I cannot say what is the situation, for example, at Saskatoon or any place in particular. I would have to investigate the question to be able to give my hon. friend an answer.

SHIPPING

STATEMENT ON REGULATION OF MOTOR PROPELLED CRAFT ON INLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): On Monday the hon. member for Oxford asked a question concerning motor propelled craft on inland waters and I should like to give a reply to it now.

In order to obtain the opinions and suggestions of interested persons, a questionnaire was sent out to a large number of yacht clubs, power squadrons, canoe associations, fish and game clubs, provincial governments, manufacturers of boats, outboard motors, etc. and to editors of boating magazines, and to individuals who had expressed interest.

The replies to these questionnaires are now being analysed in the department, following which it is intended to call a meeting of representatives of organizations and other individuals who have expressed a wish to attend. It is hoped that as a result of this meeting it will be possible for the department to formulate the policy to be followed in the making of any new regulations.

In the meantime the minor waters navigation regulations, which provided a penalty for dangerous operation of motor vessels in the minor waters of Canada, have been amended to be effective in all Canadian waters and to increase the possible penalty from $200 to $500. The amended regulations cover the dangerous operation of any vessels or any water skis, surf boards, water sleds or other towed objects.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question arising out of the minister's answer. Is it expected that these regulations will be drawn up and be in effect for the coming spring and summer season?

Mr. Marler: I think that would be the expectation but I cannot at this time confirm it because it would depend on the result of the meetings with the organizations to which I have just referred.

PILOT BOAT ACCIDENT, SAINT JOHN—INQUIRY AS TO DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Has the minister any further information regarding his department's responsibility in connection with the unfortunate accident that occurred off Saint John harbour between a pilot vessel and a freighter on Monday which resulted in the loss of seven lives? Is an inquiry to be made and when will the results be made known?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to make any statement with regard to the responsibility of my department for this very unfortunate accident. I do not think anybody knows what are the facts; but I would like to tell the hon. gentleman that one of the senior officials of my department has gone to Saint John in order to make the necessary inquiry into the accident.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested last Thursday to hear certain remarks made by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Enfield). On that occasion he made the following statement, as reported at page 100 of Hansard:

> I know I can report very accurately that public opinion in my constituency, and I think everywhere in Canada, is enthusiastic in its acclaim of the stand taken by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this crisis.

The word "crisis" of course, Mr. Speaker, refers to the crisis and the situation in the Middle East. Now, while the hon. member for York-Scarborough may be very well satisfied as to the attitude of the people of Canada generally on this matter, I for one would like to tell him—and I am sure many hon. members will also tell him—that the people are by no means satisfied or content with the stand taken by the government on this matter. More than that, there are a great many questions in the public mind which remain unanswered. It is for this reason that during my time in this debate I wish to deal with three matters concerning the foreign policy of this country.

[Mr. Marler.]

The first of these matters is, what is the keystone of our foreign policy? Second, we should have a clarification of certain attitudes of the Canadian government toward the United Kingdom and the commonwealth generally. The third matter has to do with certain matters relating to the United Nations emergency force.

As I say, the first matter is, what is the keystone of our foreign policy? The day before yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) pointed out that there are four factors that influence our foreign policy, and I think no hon. member in this house would disagree that these are certainly the four most important factors. They were, as I recall them, our relationship with the United Nations; our relationship with the commonwealth; our relationship with NATO; and our relationship with the United States of America.

The question that naturally arises is this: Which of these four cornerstones is the keystone of our foreign policy? In other words, on which stone does the security of Canada chiefly stand, since security is the aim of foreign policy? If the government has decided which of these factors is the strongest in effecting our national security, is it not foolish to pursue activities in other fields of foreign affairs that undermine the keystone of our security? For example, just recently we have had a conflict, an obvious conflict, of interests in our foreign policy. We have had the government taking a certain stand in the United Nations which had a very adverse effect on two of our chief NATO partners, namely, the United Kingdom and France. In any event, the government has not made it clear, I am quite sure, on which stone of these four cornerstones our security chiefly stands, and that is something which should be made very clear because it is bound to happen—it happened last October and November and is bound to happen again—that we are going to be faced with the dilemma of which horse to ride, on which base of our foreign policy we are going to rely. We are going to have to make a choice sooner or later. The making of the choice caused a great deal of trouble and embarrassment to the government last fall and may do so again.

While it is quite true that all four of these factors are important, there must be one of these factors, or a combination of one and another, on which our foreign policy must chiefly rely for our own security. I think the government should make this very clear; I think the people of Canada want to know just what it is.

It is undoubtedly the view of many people in Canada that our foreign policy must have two aspects: the long run and the short run. With respect to the long run, we recognize the United Nations is a body designed to expand among all the nations of the world the rule of law, mutual understanding and trust, and we certainly agree that we should accept our responsibility in furthering the achievement of those ideals. But I think we all realize, Mr. Speaker, that at the moment the United Nations still leaves much to be desired with respect to effecting Canada's national security.

We have all seen what happened in the Hungarian situation. The Russian government has absolutely refused to obey the wishes of the United Nations, and certainly at the moment the United Nations has no permanent force with which to enforce its decisions, whether they be decisions of the security council or of the general assembly. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, in so far as the short run is concerned, we cannot rely at the moment for our immediate security on the United Nations. This is an ideal which we must work for in the long run. We must try to achieve the ideals of the United Nations but, for the short run, we must rely on other places for our national security, namely, NATO and the commonwealth. I for one, Mr. Speaker, do not feel that we should do anything in the United Nations or elsewhere which would undermine and destroy our partners in NATO and I think there is very little doubt about that because it is on these two organizations that our national security chiefly relies at the present time.

I have no doubt that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who, unfortunately, is not in his seat at the moment, will reply to these remarks and say: We cannot have any broad principles; we have to deal with each situation as it arises. No doubt he will say that. That may well be the truth, Mr. Speaker, but we still must have guiding general principles and objectives on which to base our foreign policy.

The second matter that I should like to deal with is that of clarification of certain attitudes of this government toward the United Kingdom and the commonwealth generally. For some time the emphasis of Canadian foreign policy seems to have been on the United Nations, and I would almost say that the United Nations would seem to be the cornerstone of our foreign policy. Maybe it is. We will anxiously await an answer from the government. Then, we have heard, of course, a lot about NATO and our relationships with the United States. We have heard very little for a long time about our relationship with the commonwealth except, Mr. Speaker, for the last few days, because I think the government has now realized that certain decisions that were made last fall, despite what the hon. member for York-Scarborough said about the activities of the government, are not popular in Canada generally with respect to the problem in the Near East and Middle East.

I bring this matter up because certain questions have arisen in the public mind as to what the attitude of this government really is to the commonwealth and the United Kingdom. In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the January 14, 1957 issue of Life magazine. I might say that I do not always by any means agree with editorials that appear in Life magazine or Time magazine, but nevertheless these are very large publications, with great sources of information at their disposal, and they are considered by many to be very reputable and authoritative magazines.

The editorial in Life magazine is headed:

Who Stopped the Suez Invasion?

In other words, why did France and Britain withdraw? I quote from the editorial:

As for Eden's motives, one among many was conclusive: he received a concrete threat that the British Commonwealth would be dissolved within a matter of hours—and dissolved permanently—unless the fighting was stopped. India and Ceylon were particularly insistent; Canada only a little less explicitly threatening.

That is the kind of thing, Mr. Speaker, that cannot help but raise doubts in the minds of the people of Canada. When a publication such as Life magazine, with great sources of information, comes out flatly with a statement like that, I think it most certainly should be replied to by this government; otherwise the people of Canada cannot help but entertain the gravest doubts concerning just what are the government's policies. I am sorry to say it, Mr. Speaker, but this article in Life magazine cannot help but be given certain support by the attitude the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) took in the house last November 26. The remarks made by the Prime Minister on that date have been referred to by many hon. members in this house. At that time he categorized the activities of the British and French in the same way in which Russian activities can be categorized and his now famous remarks about the supermen of Europe revealed the Prime Minister's ill-concealed delight concerning the trouble in which Britain and France found themselves. Such attitudes cannot help but give rise to editorials such as the one carried by Life magazine.

On November 26 last, the same date, in reply to a question which had been proposed by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) with respect to an exchange of correspondence between the Prime Minister and the then prime minister of Great Britain, the Right Hon. Sir Anthony Eden, the Prime Minister refused to disclose the content of his message. Finally as a result of questioning in the house the Prime Minister read the correspondence he had with the Right Hon. Sir Anthony Eden. The letter which was read into the record appears at page 23 of Hansard for November 26 last and I do not propose to take the time of the house by reading it now because hon. members can refer to it. It is quite clear from that letter, however, that the Prime Minister virtually requested Sir Anthony Eden not to give him permission to disclose the content of their exchange of correspondence. The reasons for this can best be judged by the people themselves when they read the record.

The reluctance of the Prime Minister concerning making public this exchange of correspondence is a very strange thing because President Eisenhower had no hesitation in making public the message he sent to the Right Hon. Sir Anthony Eden, but apparently the Canadian Prime Minister was not anxious to do so despite the fact that he denied there was a shred of truth in the alleged fact that he sent a stinging rebuke to Sir Anthony Eden over the activities of the British in the Suez area. For this reason one question must be uppermost in the minds of most people and it is this. Just what is Canada's position in relation to the commonwealth. Canada's support of the Asian bloc of the commonwealth as against the United Kingdom, which is one of our principal allies in NATO and one of the principal cornerstones of our immediate security in the world, suggests a conflict of interests on the part of Canada which cannot help but arouse suspicion, doubt and wonder in the public mind.

I would also like to deal with the matter of the United Nations emergency force. This is going to consume a number of minutes and I hope I will be able to complete my remarks in the remaining time allotted to me. Since the government of Canada has accepted credit for establishing this United Nations emergency force, the government must also accept the responsibility in very large measure for the results that have been achieved by this force.

The first question I would like to ask is this. What are the objectives of this force? I will briefly refer to the Canadian resolution of November 4 last which reads as follows:

> Requests, as a matter of priority, the secretary general to submit to it within 48 hours, a plan for the setting up, with the consent of the nations concerned, of an emergency international United Nations force to secure and supervise the cessation of hostilities in accordance with all the terms of the aforementioned resolution.

The words "aforementioned resolution", of course, refer to the cease-fire resolution and to its proposal at the United Nations. Has this resolution achieved its purpose? I would say yes; in one sense of the word and to the extent that the hostilities have ceased in Egypt, the United Kingdom and French forces have been withdrawn and fighting, at least for the moment, has stopped. But, and there is a very large "but", has not the plan which was submitted by the secretary general tended to do three things in addition to that? These are as follows: (1) To humiliate, cause loss of prestige and injury to the United Kingdom and France, two of our most important NATO allies. (2) To place Egypt in a position to dictate to the United Nations and thus greatly enhanced the prestige and power of Nasser in the near East—Nasser being the avowed enemy of the West. (3) As a result of the first two items I have mentioned it has made the ultimate solution of the mid East and near East problems just as difficult as they were before and in fact has probably rendered them more difficult, thus increasing the danger to world peace.

In this regard I would like to refer very briefly to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) yesterday in this house. I do not intend to repeat them because they can be found in Hansard of Tuesday, January 15 at page 236. It was very well pointed out by the hon. member that the United Nations force had unquestionably been subject to dictation from Egypt. I do not intend to repeat the hon. member's remarks because they have already been placed on the record, but I would point out they have not as yet been denied. However, there is another matter which I think is just as important a reference as that made by the hon. member for Kamloops. In his remarks the hon. member for Kamloops referred to a recent editorial in the New York Times and I would like to refer to a publication which a great many hon. members of this house receive. I refer to the Commentary on Foreign Affairs which is issued by the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I have in my hand the issue covering the period from September 15 to November 30, 1956. It refers to the situation in the Near East and at page 8 the following appears:

> There followed Mr. Hammarskjold's visit to Cairo to make practical arrangements about the stationing of the police force (now styled U.N.E.F.) about communications and supplies—and to discuss with President Nasser its functions and the measures to be taken for clearing the blocked canal. The original resolution of 2nd November had specifically stated that "upon the cease-fire being effective, steps be taken to reopen the Suez canal and restore secure freedom of navigation". In the proceedings on 7th November, however, when a further resolution was passed, the secretary-general committed himself to the idea that the general assembly "could not request the force to be stationed or operate on the territory of a given country without the consent of the government of that country", an idea for which there is no warrant in the U.N. charter. It meant, as indeed the secretary-general's report to the ordinary general assembly showed, that Colonel Nasser was virtually allowed to make his own conditions. Thus, first, Egypt laid down certain rules as to the composition of the force: no Canadian army regiments because their uniform and military appearance would look too much like British troops, no contingent from Pakistan as a signatory of the Baghdad Pact, and so on.

I cannot help but feel that this house and the people of Canada have been at least partially misled by the government with respect to the purpose of this force. I would like to refer to a speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on November 27, 1956 as reported at page 61 of Hansard. At that point the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

The function of this force which is now in being is to secure and supervise the cessation of hostilities, as I pointed out this morning, and carry out its task in accordance with directions received from the United Nations, not from any one member of the United Nations.

Further on he said:

The most important function is, of course, the policing of the zone between opposing forces in Egypt in order to prevent the recurrence, if possible, of the fighting.

He continued:

This force will stay in Egypt until the United Nations decides that its functions are discharged,—

And so on. Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs continues a little later, as found on page 61:

But that does not mean, as I understand it—and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, this has been made very clear in meetings of the advisory committee—that Egypt or any other government can determine by its own decision where the force is to operate, how it is to operate or when it must leave. Furthermore, the right of Egypt to consent to the admission of a United Nations force to its territory does not imply the necessity of consent to the admission of, or the right to reject, separate units or elements of that force. That is a stand, Mr. Speaker, which the Canadian representative on the advisory committee has taken.

Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs elaborates on that at some length. There is one thing that I think must be very clear to almost anyone and that is that the secretary general of the United Nations and apparently our Secretary of State for External Affairs have taken the attitude, and I think wrongly so as I will show in a moment, that the consent of Egypt had to be obtained to station troops there, that this consent was a mere something that just had to take place at one moment of time and that if they once got consent they could put a force into the country, put it wherever they liked and do what they liked. That, Mr. Speaker, is plainly ridiculous.

Consent obviously implies a continuing state of affairs, not just one isolated consent obtained from Egypt. It is a continuing consent that is required. In other words, if, after certain troops had arrived, Egypt had said that she did not approve of them, would not have the United Nations force there any more and withdrew her consent, in view of what has been said by Mr. Hammarskjold and our Secretary of State for External Affairs the United Nations could not do anything else except withdraw the force if it did not continue to suit Egypt.

I repeat that consent is a continuing state of affairs, not just one isolated incident where you say to somebody that they can go ahead and do something. Clearly that is not what happened at all. It would be ridiculous to suggest that consent meant anything else. The secretary general of the United Nations, so far as can be seen, did misinterpret the purpose of the United Nations resolution of November 2 when setting up his plan, thus placing Egypt in a very favoured position. The plan devised by the secretary general and indeed the whole attitude of the United Nations seemed to sympathize with Egypt and thus placed the United Nations in a position of adjudicating upon the rights and wrongs of the situation, which it most certainly should not have done under the terms of the resolution.

The United Kingdom, France and Israel removed their troops and obeyed the United Nations, and these countries now have little or no voice with regard to the disposition, make-up or anything else concerning this special emergency force whereas in fact Egypt most certainly does. I should like you to inform me, Mr. Speaker, how much time I have left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time will expire at 4.02.

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to show the members of the house in some detail how the secretary general of the United Nations has erred in his interpretation of the way in which this force was to be established and also how, as I have already mentioned, this house was more than slightly misled by the government as to the function and purpose of the force. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the original resolution passed by United Nations on the 2nd of November, 1956. I will not read the whole resolution. If any hon. members wish to get it, they can obtain it in the same way I did. I will read the cogent parts of it. The general assembly, after expressing its grave concern over developments in the Near East, went on to say:

1. Urges as a matter of priority that all parties now involved in hostilities in the area agree to an immediate cease-fire and, as part thereof, halt the movement of military forces and arms into the area;

2. Urges the parties to the armistice agreements promptly to withdraw all forces behind the armistice lines, to desist from raids across the armistice lines into neighbouring territory, and to observe scrupulously the provisions of the armistice agreements.

The armistice agreements referred to are the armistice agreements between Egypt and Israel made in the past. Then it goes on:

Urges that upon the cease fire being effective steps be taken to re-open the Suez canal and restore and secure freedom of navigation.

As I have already mentioned, Mr. Speaker, a couple of days later Canada introduced a resolution which I have already read but I will read it again as it is very short:

Requests, as a matter of priority, the secretary general to submit to it within 48 hours a plan for the setting up, with the consent of the nations concerned, of an emergency international United Nations force to secure and supervise the cessation of hostilities in accordance with all the terms of the aforementioned resolution.

Later on the secretary general of the United Nations submitted a report as to how the force would be made up, and I will refer to that in a moment. The final resolution which Canada supported is a rather lengthy one and it deals, of course, with the establishment of this force. There are two parts of it which I think are very cogent and should be referred to. They are found on page 2 of the resolution and this of course refers to the general assembly of the United Nations.

1. Express its approval of the guiding principles for the organization and functioning of the emergency international United Nations force as expounded in paragraphs 6 to 9 of the secretary general's report;

2. Concurs in the definition of the functions of the force as stated in paragraph 12 of the secretary general's report.

Then it goes on in more detail setting up the force, but the important parts are the two to which I have just referred. Let us see for a moment what paragraphs 6 to 9 and paragraph 12 of the secretary general's report contain. What they contain is very interesting indeed and certainly not what the people of Canada or hon. members of this house expected the function of the force would be. Paragraph 9 of the secretary general's report reads as follows:

Functioning, as it would, on the basis of a decision reached under the terms of the resolution "Uniting for Peace", the force, if established, would be limited in its operations to the extent that consent of the parties concerned is required under generally recognized international law. While the general assembly is enabled to establish the force with the consent of those parties which contribute units to the force, it could not request the force to be stationed or operate on the territory of a given country without the consent of the government of that country.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the interpretation that was objected to by the very capable and very able writer for the commonwealth parliamentary association. Then it goes on further and says:

The point just made permits the conclusion that the setting up of the force should not be guided by the needs which would have existed had the measure been considered as part of an enforcement action directed against a member country. There is an obvious difference between establishing the force in order to secure the cessation of hostilities, with a withdrawal of forces, and establishing such a force with a view to enforcing a withdrawal of forces. It follows that while the force is different in that, as in many other respects, from the observers of the truce supervision organization, it is, although para-military in nature, not a force with military objectives.

In other words, it is a military force if necessary, and I think, Mr. Speaker, you realize what will follow from that—not necessarily a military force. It is a very strange force indeed. It is interesting to note that the secretary general said that it was different from the observers of the truce supervision organization but it was not a force with military objectives.

Then, paragraph 12, which the United Nations general assembly also approved, is even more interesting. I will only read the last part of it. Perhaps I should read the whole paragraph so that I will not be accused of quoting something out of its context. Paragraph 12 reads as follows:

In the General Assembly resolution the terms of reference are as already stated "to secure the cessation of hostilities in accordance with all the terms" of the resolution of 2 November 1956. This resolution urges that "all parties now involved in hostilities in the area agree to an immediate cease-fire and as part thereof halt the movement of military forces and arms into the area"; and also "urges the parties to the armistice agreements promptly to withdraw all forces behind the armistice lines, to desist from raids across the armistice lines into neighbouring territory and to observe scrupulously the provisions of the armistice agreements."

These two provisions combined indicate that the functions of the United Nations force would be, when a cease-fire is being established, to enter Egyptian territory with the consent of the Egyptian government in order to help maintain quiet during and after the withdrawal of non-Egyptian troops and to secure compliance with the other terms established in the resolution of 2 November 1956.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how the secretary general could draw that conclusion from those two statements I do not know. But apparently he did. The paragraph continues:

The force obviously should have no rights other than those necessary for the execution of its functions, in co-operation with local authorities. It would be more than an observers' corps, but in no way a military force temporarily controlling the territory in which it is stationed; nor, moreover, should the force have military functions exceeding those necessary to secure peaceful conditions on the assumption that the parties to the conflict take all necessary steps for compliance with the recommendations of the general assembly.

Once again we have this situation: it is a military force, but it is not a military force. These terms were certainly never communicated generally to the people of this country; they were not conveyed in the remarks of the Prime Minister in the speech he made during the emergency session we had last fall, nor in the remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I do not think the impression was ever given that this force is not a military force at all and is, in fact, little more than an observer corps.

Just how the secretary general reached the conclusion he did, I do not know. I contend that the secretary general was wrong in saying that the consent of Egypt had to be obtained before this emergency force could be sent in. It is very interesting to read the resolution "Uniting for Peace" which was passed in the fall of 1950. The resolution is in two parts. After a long preamble it says:

A. Resolves that if the Security Council, because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members, fails to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in any case where there appears to be a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or an act of aggression, the general assembly shall consider the matter immediately with a view to making appropriate recommendations to members for collective measures, including in the case of a breach of the peace or act of aggression the use of armed force when necessary, to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Here was clearly a case of a breach of the peace, and in that case under the terms of the resolution it would certainly appear to me that there was clearly a case for the United Nations General Assembly to put troops in under any terms it saw fit. There is nothing in this resolution about asking the consent of the country concerned.

I know that the processes which go on at the United Nations are very complicated and that there may be other factors of which I am not aware which may affect the position. It is possible that this resolution itself relies on other things. If it does, I would like to hear an explanation.

A little further on there is a further paragraph B which deals with the establishment of a peace observation commission, as follows —I quote in part:

Upon the invitation or with the consent of the state into whose territory the commission would go, the general assembly or the interim commission when the assembly is not in session, may utilize the commission if the Security Council is not exercising the functions assigned to it by the Charter with respect to the matter in question. Decisions to utilize the commission shall be made on the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the members present and voting. The Security Council may also utilize the commission in accordance with its authority under the Charter.

It may just be possible, since the secretary general of the United Nations envisages this emergency force as a sort of observer corps rather than as a military force, that he presumes it cannot be sent into the country without consent; it may have suggested itself to the secretary general that since this force is in the nature, rather, of an observer corps it should come under the terms of paragraph B of the Uniting for Peace resolution which establishes the peace observation commission.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that an impression was generally received to the contrary. The resolution originally passed sets out that this was a force intended to go in and maintain order, and was not intended as an observer force. I cannot see how the secretary general of the United Nations could possibly have drawn the interpretation that it needed the consent of Egypt in order to function. If an explanation could be given to me I would be glad to know, because, Mr. Speaker, I must say this: that since this unhappy state of affairs has arisen in the world, the position of the Canadian government has been questioned at home and abroad particularly in the light of what I have already said, namely that I think this special force—the setting up and arrangement of this special force—has caused damage to Britain and France, our important allies in NATO, made Nasser cockier than ever and, ultimately, made the solution of the problem in the Middle East much more difficult, indeed, almost impossible. The whole question should be taken very seriously indeed. Why did not the government of this country foresee this unhappy trend of events which was to be expected if Nasser were put in the position of being able to dictate terms to the United Nations with respect to the emergency force?

It is quite understandable that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had to face grave and confusing problems. I think we would all agree that he was doing his level best with regard to the situation. Possibly he may have overlooked some of the factors which I have been bringing to your attention, but surely some of the high-priced help down there with him should not have overlooked them, and the only conclusion we can reach is that the Canadian delegation did not foresee these events, or else—and I would dislike to draw this conclusion—that the Canadian government was working with Egypt, the United States and others to the detriment of the United Kingdom and France.

All these matters that I have raised have caused much concern and worry to the people of this country and I think they require an answer. I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he returns from the United Nations, or alternatively the Prime Minister himself will deal at an early date with the points I have raised because these are questions of great public concern.

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, my first and pleasant task is to offer words of congratulation to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) on the competent job they did in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. May I at the same time extend congratulations to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on his elevation to the important office of leader of Her Majesty's official opposition. I know what a tremendous task he has undertaken, and I wish him well.

Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to devote the greater part of my time to a report on the activities of the Canadian delegation to the UNESCO conference which was held in New Delhi, but before doing so there are one or two matters which have been mentioned in the speech from the throne and on which I would like to offer some comments. After all, we are supposed to be debating the speech and the amendments to the motion and perhaps it is necessary to justify one's time here by doing just that. I am grateful for what the speech contains and hopeful for what it does not contain.

First of all, the fact that we are to amend the Municipal Grants Act will bring some relief and help to at least two of the three municipalities in my riding. The city of Victoria itself and the municipality of Esquimalt will get considerable relief in their municipal expenditures.

Then the longed-for establishment of the Canada Council is something which pleased me greatly because one of its duties or that of one of its committees is to undertake the task of acting as a national commission for UNESCO. It might interest hon. members to know that of the 80 member states of the UNESCO organization, until a few months ago only three were without a national commission.

Another point mentioned in the speech from the throne is the proposal to grant federal aid to technical education. For me that is the most significant item in the address. On every possible occasion, I think every time I have spoken in this house, I have urged that something be done for that class of workers who should comprise the skilled artisans. As I have pointed out on other occasions, in our training program there is a great gap between, on the one hand, general secondary education and, on the other hand, university education for those who are entering professional ranks. In between those two groups we have large numbers, in fact the vast bulk of our population, who ultimately are to provide the trained workers, the skilled workers, the artisans. The training facilities for them, up to now, have been extremely inadequate. I am therefore greatly pleased to note that the federal government is to increase the grants which formerly were given for this purpose.

While I rejoice that the universities are to be treated so generously, it is my hope that when the sum of money which is to be assigned to technical education is announced it will be equally generous, or at any rate generous enough to indicate that this problem is to receive significant attention. This perhaps might be a bombshell but it has always been my hope, and it still is, that some day the federal government will take over the complete responsibility for technical education, and that some day the federal government will build several technical colleges throughout this country so we may be given the opportunity to train the unskilled workers and make them into real artisans, and not be obliged to continue to rely on immigration for our trained supervisory personnel. Up to now that has been the rule in Canada. We need to give to our own Canadian people the opportunity to be trained to occupy those positions.

I know that in the preliminary report of the Gordon commission—and I know it is only a preliminary report—this subject is touched upon at pages 108 and 109, but there is not much there; it is treated rather casually. As a matter of fact, what is in it might just as well have been copied from any of the annual reports of the Department of Labour. In fact there is a fuller report in the latest issue which hon. members will have received, namely the annual report of the Department of Labour of March 31, 1956. It devotes several pages to this highly important matter. When the full report of the Gordon commission comes out I hope it will be found that they have given more adequate treatment to this subject and have made certain definite recommendations in that regard.

Since I mentioned immigration and the matter of immigrants, I think it is only fair that I should say a word about the activities of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and commend him for his prompt action in going to Austria and making arrangements for the early entry into Canada of such a vast number of Hungarian refugees. It was something that I think the whole country applauded when our minister acted so promptly, and I hope he will receive the necessary recognition.

We assembled for this session, some of us with difficulty, at the time of the C.P.R. strike. Our transportation system throughout the country being disrupted as it was, the economy of the whole nation was affected. It is encouraging to know that this strike is over. I think that has come about owing to the wisdom and foresight of our Prime Minister who no doubt used his charm as well as his tact in bringing together the parties to the dispute, and who was not hurried into precipitate action. We are all highly gratified that the matter has been settled in a way which we hope will become permanent.

Having said all that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to spend the rest of my time talking about the ninth general conference of UNESCO which was held, as I said before, in New Delhi, India. It was my good fortune to be a delegate from Canada to this conference. The conference was held in November and part of December. I wish to thank the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for giving me the opportunity to go there and increase my knowledge of other people, to widen my horizons and to join with my colleagues in making what I think was a significant contribution to the work of the association.

This association is one of the instruments of peace. UNESCO—the United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization—is ten years old. It now includes 80 member states. At the conference, which opened with 77, three new ones joined, namely Finland, Morocco and Tunisia, so now there are 80 member states. That fact is rather significant, when delegates from practically every nation in the world meet together and join in friendly discussion. It exists because its members believe that the way to peace is by fostering a more complete understanding of one another, and that this objective can be achieved through education, science and culture. When one attempts to assess the value of this vast and sprawling organization—and that is what it is—and is inclined to be critical of its apparent slow progress, one should remember that the road to peace is rough and thorny, and that the nations of the world have different traditions, different religions, different backgrounds and different customs; in fact, they are different. That fact is something to remember.

Here I want to say also that one of the important duties of the members of a delegation is to get to know the delegations from other countries. That is why so much importance is attributed to informal meetings, and we had many of them including group meetings at lunch time, in hotel rooms, at receptions, and informal consultations. That is where you get to know people. It is there that one gets to know that people have different approaches to the same problem, and learns to be tolerant. That is why I so greatly appreciated what the Prime Minister said in his speech on Wednesday last. You will find it Mr. Speaker, in Hansard of January 9 at page 33, at the top of the page in the left hand column:

> I think this is something that we all have had to learn. Human nature and the essential aspirations of human nature are very much the same all over the world, but the background against which you have to place the attitudes of different people must be the background of their own civilization. . . .

That statement touched a responsive chord, because it took me back to New Delhi and reminded me of the different races and the different people we met there and the strange —to us—attitudes that some of them took on some of the problems we were discussing. The delegates—and I should name them, of course—were as follows. We had Leonard W. Brockington as chairman, and I wish to say something more about that fascinating gentleman in a moment or two. As deputy chairman we had His Excellency Mr. Morley Scott, the Canadian high commissioner to Pakistan; Senator Donald Cameron, former director of extension of the University of Alberta and still the director of the Banff school of fine arts; Mr. Lionel Bertrand, the hon. member for Terrebonne, Quebec, and my colleague in this house, and myself. Let me say that there was absolutely no difference between the delegates and the alternates with respect to the duties which were involved. We shared the duties quite fairly among us.

The alternate delegates, then, were Mrs. Florence Bird, whom everyone knows under the name of Anne Francis, the distinguished radio and press commentator; Dr. Leon Lortie, one of the distinguished chemists from the University of Montreal; Professor Jean C. Falardeau, head of the social science department, University of Laval; Mr. Freeman Stewart, executive secretary of the Canadian education association and Mr. John Parkin, a distinguished Toronto architect and president of the Canada arts council. So you see, Mr. Speaker, the delegates were chosen, with the exception of myself, of course, rather wisely because they represented the various aspects of the work of UNESCO, the various sciences, arts and cultures.

Mr. Martin: So does the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Fairey: We also had with us Miss Mary Dench of the Department of External Affairs and Mr. Mel Clark, whom we called the financial watchdog from the Department of Trade and Commerce and who is now stationed in Geneva. Miss Dench has been responsible for some time for all UNESCO matters in the Department of External Affairs. She is a most competent person and an indefatigable worker. Sometimes I thought she should ease up and play a little bit but she would not do it. I would say this, that she contributed to a remarkable degree to whatever reputation for competence the Canadian delegation had. The same is true of Mel Clark. He knows his way about international conferences, and he had no hesitation in looking for new paths to information which would be of value to us. He is a very competent person.

Anyone who knows Morley Scott, who I am glad to say is a graduate of the University of British Columbia, will not expect me to say much more than that he was an admirable second in command. He was cool, shrewd and wise, and his advice was invaluable. Finally, we had that most charming person, the high commissioner to India, Mr. Escott Reid. He did everything imaginable for us to make our stay in India enjoyable. He saw to it by arranging luncheons, dinners and so on, that we met particular people, people from all over the world and particularly people from India; people we ought to get to know if we were going to do a good job. He finally gave a most illuminating briefing based upon his intimate knowledge of India and the Indian people. He is a great Canadian.

The government of India made splendid arrangements for the conference. They built, if you please, a special hall, a vast place called—I have to consult my notes to pronounce it—Vigyan Bhavan, which is in the form of a theatre with a large stage, a big proscenium arch and a vast sloping floor. Provision was made for simultaneous translation into the four official languages. In addition there were two large conference halls also equipped for simultaneous translation. There were also the committee rooms.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was a fascinating experience, and one is tempted to continue with a description of the people, of the many things we saw and places we visited, the sights and sounds of New Delhi and the surrounding district; all the things they have, but mostly the things they have not. However, I must report on the conference itself. We met as a delegation every morning and sometimes during the lunch hour to go over the agenda for the day, decide on the policy we would adopt, what was to be said and who would say it. We met frequently to report. We were all given special tasks; that is, the tasks of attending various meetings were divided amongst those whom we thought were most competent to attend particular discussions. For my sins I was allotted the exchange of persons, technical assistance and administration. Mr. Freeman Stewart, who is a distinguished educationist, was on elementary education; Mrs. Bird was on mass communication, and so on. We were dodging about from meeting to meeting as the various subjects came up for discussion.

First of all, at this conference there were a number of plenary sessions which all attended. Then after that the conference broke up into two main commissions, the administration commission of which I was a member along with several others, including Mr. Scott, Mr. Clark and others who came in as their subjects were called, and the program commission. You see, therefore, how simple the organization is; and it works simply, in that one group of people are discussing items which are proposed as projects for the ensuing two years and the other group are discussing how they are going to meet the expenditures. It is in these two commissions that the detailed work is done. I shall describe it, perhaps not fully but in a little more detail later.

I want to return now to the first plenary session and the first day or two. Here, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to give hon. members an idea of the atmosphere and the change of attitude one gets as one discusses various matters. The conference opened at the time of the Suez trouble, which has been discussed by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. It was not a happy time for us. We had practically no information. Every morning the Indian papers were full of scathing editorials condemning the British and the French. Everybody was rather tense, particularly when the conference opened with a speech by the Indian minister of education, who was not too kind in his remarks about what he called the aggressors. As hon. members know, at conferences of this kind the speeches of welcome are sometimes described as blah, blah, but these were not. They were rather nasty from our point of view, and particularly when member after member from the Latin American countries, Egypt, Brazil, the south Asian countries and Russia went one after the other to the podium and repeated the same stuff. We sat there and took it. It was not a very happy time for the United Kingdom delegation, for any of us for that matter. The point I am trying to make is that I am not blaming them one little bit. It was a time of tension, and people were speaking without too much thought.

However, the atmosphere was charged with something that should not have been present at a conference on education. It was recognized by some that this was no place for discussing the Suez matter. The place for that was in the United Nations itself, not in a conference supposed to be devoted to greater understanding through science, education and culture. Therefore it was in that atmosphere that the delegate for Canada was called upon. Of course Canada enjoys a great reputation. I am sure every hon. member in this house will agree that we enjoy that reputation because of the magnificent work of our Secretary of State for External Affairs. Although I do not like to say it in his presence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare also has contributed to it to a degree. There is no doubt about it, wherever you go in this world the name of Mike Pearson is known. It was because of that fact, and because of the unique position of our country, that when the delegate for Canada was called upon he had added importance.

So Mr. Leonard W. Brockington rose. Most of you know him and know what a fine speaker he is, with a wonderful command of English and a knowledge of how to put it together. Of course he looks a little imposing, because everybody knows he is crippled. He was helped to the podium, and the place was hushed. He made a magnificent speech. Well, perhaps I was prejudiced, because I arrived at a close friendship with him. I am positive that all who were there will agree that he raised the tone of the conference and brought it back to where it should be. If I might I should like to read just a couple of extracts from what he said. He commenced by paying the usual compliments and reciting the purpose for which UNESCO existed. Then he said, speaking about the tensions that then existed:

> Above all liberties, said one of the world's greatest voices, is the liberty to know, to utter and to argue freely according to conscience. Perhaps we can all take some comfort from the knowledge that even today no stronger criticism of the disputed policy of the British government, no freer or more vigorous denunciation of its dangers has anywhere been spoken or written than in famous British newspapers freely published in Britain itself, in public meetings freely assembled in Britain, in earnest debates freely held in a free British parliament and wherever men gather in Britain to hammer out the truth on the anvil of free discussion.

And I may say, and perhaps not without malice, that he emphasized the word "free" every time he used it. I have another extract and this will be the last although I had intended to read more. He said:

> We in Canada who are the beneficiaries of the gifts of so many other peoples believe that there is only one race in the world which is really important and that is the human race. We are determined to pay with reverence our debt to humanity.

While I pay this tribute to our leader, I do so because I am convinced that he prevented the conference from getting off to a bad start.

Because of our reputation much was expected of us, so much so that later, when the session was all over and it was decided to have a final plenary meeting, with one speaker to speak for each of the four groups of nations, all those who spoke English combined to request that Mr. Brockington be the speaker for the English-speaking peoples, and he then made another magnificent speech which was the envy of all and which has been demanded by the press of the world.

Another thing that perhaps stemmed from Canada's reputation, and perhaps from our own good work, was the fact that when they needed a rapporteur for the great and important program provision they asked Canada to supply one, and it was most competently dealt with by Senator Donald Cameron.

To give the house some idea of the importance of this and what our attitude to it should be, I should like to say something about the resolutions at one of the plenary sessions. The director general of the secretariat prepared a program which they proposed to put into effect in the succeeding two years, and alongside it they had the budget, which was an estimate of its cost. That was placed before the conference. It had already been circulated to member states, and we had the right either to amend it or to pass it. But then, out of the blue, came a resolution from the floor that the budget be increased by $1 million. It was already up to nearly $1 million, but the resolution from the floor was to the effect, just let us have another $1 million.

Now, we were astounded because we are not used to doing things that way. We usually want to know what it is for. By the way, France seconded it. The question was, why do this now? The secretary general has not asked for it. My attitude, as an old civil servant would be, no; let us decide whether we have something that is worth doing and then get the money for it, and not get the money first and try to find some way of spending it.

There was a long discussion, but it was passed. It was passed because of the principle of one nation, one vote. The vote of Monaco is just as strong as that of the United States, which pays 30 per cent of the total cost of the budget. I think Mr. Clarke, who is our financial adviser, told me before I left that the votes of those who supported the resolution were by people who paid only 15 per cent of the cost of the UNESCO program. However, it was passed immediately. I think there were 130-odd resolutions from the floor, all pressing various projects which were not in the program, and most of which were passed.

I said I was going to say a word or two about the two commissions. First of all there was the administrative commission which deals with all questions relating to the budget, the staff of the secretariat, the salaries and the financial and business administration of UNESCO organization. Then there was the program commission, which deals with all the projects, technical assistance, fundamental education, mass communication, all these things, and the individual projects all over the world. They decide which are valuable and which are not, and they pass them. At the end of the conference these two commissions meet together to try to get some kind of agreement between the two, and I may say that we did not get much agreement because so many projects were passed that the budget just would not meet them. It was then left to the executive to decide. I shall come to that again in a moment.

There is a belief in Canada and elsewhere that UNESCO needs overhaul. The attitude of Canada was that the administration was slack, and we emphasized need for greater efficiency. We stated that in all our work here we are used to expecting a reasonable degree of efficiency and integrity in everything we do with public funds, and we would like to see that in the UNESCO organization, but we were not quibbling particularly about the cost. We were prepared to be reasonably generous but we insisted that what funds were voted be wisely spent. We suggested, as did others, that UNESCO should concentrate on a few large projects. That does not necessarily mean two or three but a few well thought out projects which were designed to further the aim of UNESCO, which is mutual understanding, and not to dissipate its energies on a variety of projects all over the world. And so we either presented appropriate resolutions in the appropriate commission, or we supported those that were made by others.

The main resolutions for which we were responsible were first of all—and here I was going to use a slang expression but I will not use it in Hansard—

Mr. Martin: It is a good one.

Mr. Fairey: We did not get it through but we got a modification of it. We proposed that we call in a firm of business consultants to examine the procedures in the secretariat itself. This was not in any way criticism, because we know the difficulties; when you try to harmonize the views of representatives of 80 member countries, you have a job on your hands. And so we said, "You have existed for 10 years and it might be that somebody from outside might be able to point out more efficient ways of doing things"; but the secretary general did not buy that. He would not accept a firm of business consultants at all.

What we finally passed was a watered-down resolution. I must say that Mr. Clarke was mainly responsible for this one, although I had to do some of the talking on it. We finally got it through in this form. A number of business experts would be borrowed from a number of member states, not too many, who were not connected with the organization of UNESCO, and they would do this survey job on the secretariat.

I neglected to mention that the next conference two years hence will be held in Paris, and in all likelihood all future conferences will be held there because they now have a permanent home. There was much criticism throughout the conference concerning the cost of the new building which is nearing completion in Paris. The building apparently cost more than was estimated. Mr. Parkin, who was the delegate responsible for this subject, offered a good deal of criticism of the methods used in granting contracts and paying commissions and in authorizing extras. We did not get very far, but at any rate we let them know there were people watching it.

I have already told you there were over 100 resolutions from the floor, many of which referred to projects which could not possibly have been discussed in detail in a large conference although the sponsors insisted that these be discussed. Senator Cameron I think was responsible for a change, as program rapporteur. The procedure in future will be that when any country wishes to suggest a project as being worth while in the interests of the objectives of UNESCO it will send notice to the secretary at least six months prior to the next conference. Then, in order to satisfy those who want to speak from the floor, it was decided that any projects proposed in the conference itself should be discussed but passed on to the next conference two years hence. Although there were many other points, these of course are just the main ones. We were deluged with paper. I think each of us must have had a stack several inches high. This cost a lot of money, because each paper was published in four languages. Some suggestions were made in the program commission, if I may put it this way, to stop the avalanche of paper and simplify the procedure.

I have tried to build in your minds a certain attitude toward UNESCO in order to show that while we certainly believe its administration could be improved, we must also recognize the difficulties involved. These nations are scattered all over the world, and I might say we have a great deal to learn from those nations with which we are not too familiar. We can learn more from them than they can learn from us.

The question arises as to whether we wish to be considered as a country that is always critical, and as to whether we are too much concerned with efficiency. One gentleman with whom I spoke and whose name I shall not reveal said to me, "You Canadians are always talkings about efficiency and integrity. I am more concerned with good will and good relations". It occurs to me that perhaps he is right, and certainly you get that impression while attending one of these conferences. Is it not worth while that we and the other western nations tolerate some things we do not like very much for the sake of good will and improved relations?

Canada, I think, must decide between giving guarded support—I was going to say reluctant support but I do not mean quite that— and admitting that there are practices we cannot accept, agree to go along with them in the cause of ultimate peace. We must try to more fully understand the special problems of the poorer nations and recognize their attitudes toward them, which come as a result of their differing religious and cultural backgrounds; and we must go a little way in co-operating with them. To do this it would be necessary to publicize more fully the aims, objectives and methods of this loosely organized body which is UNESCO, and endeavour to have our people know more and understand more about it. It is therefore our duty to speak about it and support it on all occasions.

I do not know whether I should do this, but I am going to close on what might perhaps be considered an emotional note but one which I think is fundamental to our attitude in the continued and more enthusiastic support which we must give to UNESCO. It is to turn to that portion of the Bible where our Saviour summarizes the ten commandments into the well-known exhortation when he says.

> Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment.
> And the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

And this is significant:

> On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

There have been good men, the Christian missionaries, who have gone out from our western countries and done the best they could with the limited funds and materials at their disposal. Perhaps we as western nations, the have nations, might now consider ourselves lay missionaries and by our actions and our attitudes try to live up to the second portion of the exhortation, "Love thy neighbour as thyself".

Somewhere in the Bible, I think in Proverbs, there is a passage which goes something like this, "Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom. But with all thy getting get understanding." And so we complete the circle. That is what UNESCO is, an organization for mutual understanding.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I would like to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). I am sure the constituents who sent them here will be pleased to see that they were honoured in this way by the present government.

The speech from the throne this year does not offer very much to debate or to pass an opinion on which points to an early election. However, I would like to take this opportunity of bringing before the government certain things in the Selkirk constituency which could be corrected.

One great problem that farmers have today is that of getting sufficient cash with which to carry on. This situation has been made worse by the recent railway strike. Many farms still have grain lying out in the fields gradually deteriorating. I know of one farmer in my constituency who has oats lying in piles out in his fields. When he threshed and sold some of that grain it was graded 3CW; they were Rodney oats. They have been lying out in the fields since threshing time, and the only grade the crop could be given now would be No. 1 feed grain. The difference in price between the two grades I have mentioned is a matter of only a few cents per bushel, but this represents a great loss when you have a few thousand bushels to sell.

There are also certain points where the quota still is one bushel per acre. The farmers on whose behalf I am speaking are people who had no crop last year, or practically none. They are now facing a loss for a second year. At the beginning of the crop year the constituency did not have the grades that were required. The Department of Trade and Commerce or the wheat board wanted No. 3 wheat or malting barley, and we had practically none of those grades in the constituency. Therefore I hope the minister will not forget the interlake country, as the people there did not sell any grain last year and they should have the opportunity now to unload some grain. They have lots of No. 5 wheat and coarse grains. I was assured by the minister the other day that with the settlement of the railway strike these grains would move steadily. We have both the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. running through the interlake country, and they should be able to help put some money in the pockets of these farmers.

In parts of the interlake country the farmers derive their living raising cattle, and they complain bitterly about the fluctuations that take place in cattle prices from time to time. There is no guarantee that the farmer is not going to take a loss on his cattle, and I think some system of guaranteed prices is therefore required.

The same can be said of hogs. For instance, in October, 1953, hogs on the Winnipeg market were $30.44, which was a pretty good price. In 1954 they were down to $20.81, a drop of $10 in about ten months. In 1955 they were about the same, $20.54; in fact in December of 1955 they dropped as low as $19.72. On today's market in Winnipeg they are up again to $29. These fluctuations in price are not good for the producer, the packer or the consumer, and if some arrangement could be made whereby the farmers, through a system of guaranteed prices, could be protected against loss I think we would have a far more regular supply of hogs and cattle coming on the market.

On different occasions when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture have been considered I have talked about some form of marketing agency. When I came here in 1943 I talked about a livestock marketing board. Then I talked about a board of livestock commissioners. However, there always seemed to be some objection to that type of thing. Then there was the problem that such a plan would have to originate in the provinces. I think that is right; it has to start in the provinces. However, after raising cattle and a few hogs for 40 years in this country I am still convinced that we should have a livestock marketing organization, because it would have a steadying influence on the prices of livestock.

I admit that there are a lot of people against such a plan. However, I have turned the matter over in my mind, I have read about it and made inquiries about it, and I still think something has to be done to stabilize the livestock industry. Auction sales have been tried in different parts of the west but they do not appear to be too successful, and the results have not been what the farmers were trying to achieve.

I was a member of a committee in Manitoba that gave considerable study to the livestock marketing situation. The Manitoba livestock committee, under the chairmanship of the late Gordon Allison, put the reasons for a livestock marketing policy before the Manitoba farmers but, as I have already said, to be successful it would have to take in a very large territory. One province alone would not make it a success. At the very least you would have to have the three prairie provinces.

I would put forward these reasons in support of a livestock marketing policy. There should be such a policy in order to get more security and stability in the marketing of livestock. With a more stable livestock policy more people would raise livestock on the farms; hence there would be more consumption of grasses and legumes, which in turn would tie in with the conservation program in order that our soil might be built up with humus and organic matter. Erosion would also be checked. In this way we would keep the soil on our farms at home and not have it blow away.

Such a policy would in time build up our soil and enrich the country so we could turn it over to our heirs or those who follow us in as good or better shape than when we took over its care. This soil is a sacred trust. It is also our livelihood. If properly instituted, a sound livestock policy would better the position of the producer, the consumer and the packer; in fact it would increase the amount of livestock that would be processed. Breeders would stand to gain too, as they would have an expanded market for their livestock right at home. In fact we would have everything to gain and nothing to loose. Forty years' experience in the purebred livestock game has taught some of us that when commercial prices drop purebred prices drop accordingly, so if we can through a little effort get a more stable policy we will gain by what we have to sell commercially.

We are tied to a different economy today than in the horse and buggy days. We depend on tractors and power machinery to do the job, and the gas bills have to be met. It is a different story from when you could bring in your power in the form of horseflesh from the straw stack a week or two before seeding, when you had your power right there.

Such a policy would also expand our farming operations so we could use our young people on the farms, instead of forcing them to go to the cities to find work for the entire year.

When the St. Lawrence seaway is completed we will have refrigeration right on our doorstep at the head of the lakes, where ocean-going liners can pick up these products and distribute them anywhere in the world, for it is much cheaper to ship by water than by rail. We have airplanes now that can deliver goods in 24 hours anywhere in the world. We would be able to distribute these products more rapidly wherever people wanted them. Remember, two-thirds of the people in the world never go to bed at night feeling that they have had enough to eat, and in some countries there are always people who are starving for food.

I appeal to the minister again to give this matter further consideration; to see if it would not be possible to set up a small commission to look into it and decide whether it is possible to institute a livestock marketing system so that prices will be maintained and we will not have these fluctuations that sometimes take place from day to day. You may have a snowstorm on Monday and the price will go up, and then on Wednesday the price is away down. Fluctuations like that should not take place.

I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was here a minute ago, has any information to give the house regarding the Disabled Persons Act. I have spoken to the minister at different times and asked him if he was sure that every province was administering the act in the same way. I said that some provinces were very strict in their administration of the act while others seemed more human, although the minister had previously explained that the regulations were drawn up in co-operation with the provinces.

He also stated that a conference was to be held last October. I am wondering if that conference took place, and if he could tell us anything about the discussion; whether any new amendments have been proposed or arrangements made to improve the act. As it is today a man or woman has to be confined to bed or unable to put on their own clothes before deriving benefit under this act. I wish the minister would give more consideration to this problem, as there are many disabled people who cannot earn their bread and butter and who are unable to receive any benefit from the act. I voted for the act when it was brought in; I thought then we were getting an act which was going to help take care of people who could not earn their own living.

I do not wish to take the time of the house by dwelling further on the subject of old age pensions as most hon. members have already drawn the attention of the government to the need for an increase in the pension rate. I think that feeling is widespread in this house; people everywhere have been getting up and asking for increased old age pensions. When everybody is agreed, and the attention of the government has been drawn to this matter, then I think a reform is long overdue. The $40 which an aged citizen gets today has the value of only $20 compared with purchasing power in the past, and in the light of the continual rise in the cost of living which is taking place it is essential that the government should give immediate consideration to providing a decent living for those people who have helped to build the Canada that we inherit today.

Equally important is the subject of blind persons' pensions. A single blind person receives a pension of only $40 a month and, moreover, he is allowed to earn only another $40 before having the extra money deducted from his pension. These blind people are subject to the high cost of present day living in the same manner as those of us who are fortunate enough to have full sight, yet they do not receive any extra allowance for the extra cost that blindness imposes. Once again I appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to give serious consideration to the plight of the disabled person, the blind person and the old age pensioner. It appears that in our efforts to build a better Canada we are inclined to forget the people who need help most.

I would like also to take the opportunity at this time to draw the attention of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to the problem of Indians leaving the reserves and finding work around the towns. This is a development which I am sure everyone is delighted to see, but it does present problems which I think the minister should straighten out before they develop into a major difficulty. I know the minister is aware of the situation because I have talked to him about it, with particular regard to its effect upon the town of Selkirk.

This is what happens. The Indian comes to town and finds work. Naturally, he gets along all right while work is plentiful. However, there comes a time when work is scarce and he cannot find funds on which to keep going. Usually he applies to the Indian agent and gets rations with which to carry on until he finds another job. This job may last a month or six weeks, after which he draws rations again. The process can carry on for one year, at the end of which time he is directed to the town for relief because he has been in residence in the town—Selkirk, for example —for one year.

This is where the main problem arises. Does he cease to be the responsibility of the Indian affairs branch at this stage? Remember, he is still a treaty Indian. Will the Indian affairs branch reimburse the town for the rations they supply to the Indian while he is a resident, say, of Selkirk? The same problem arises in other directions, and I am still talking about the treaty Indian. Should he fall sick after his 12 months' residence in town, will the Indian affairs branch pay any hospital or doctors' bills incurred by him during his sickness, or is the town expected to assume this responsibility? There is also the problem presented when an Indian falls sick while he is away from the reserve or when he is working away from home. Only recently we had some discussion as to who was responsible for hospital bills incurred by Indians in the Selkirk constituency. In my way of reading the Indian Act the treaty Indian is a ward of the Canadian government and is the responsibility of the government.

I would think that an Indian who belongs to a band and who has a band number would be a treaty Indian and, as such, would be the responsibility of the Indian affairs branch. In the recommendations made to the house by the Indian committee of both houses, which sat for three years, it was suggested that all phases of the Indian affairs branch should fall under one head and not be divided up as at the present time. The recommendation reads as follows:

> . . . administrative improvements which could be effected without the revision of existing legislation and which, when put into effect, would remove some of the causes out of which arise grievances and complaints of many Indians. There are still some "administrative improvements" which your committee deems advisable. Your committee, therefore, again recommends that the administration of all aspects of Indian affairs be placed under one ministerial head.

I do not think that recommendation has ever been given any consideration. The minister, when he speaks on his estimates, will I am sure be able to answer these questions. The committee went even further and suggested that the director of the Indian affairs branch should be named a commissioner who should have the rank of deputy minister, and should have at least two assistant commissioners of whom one should be a Canadian of Indian descent. Perhaps in the near future the minister will have an opportunity of telling the house just how many of these recommendations have been acted upon, and what progress is being made to incorporate them into the Indian Act.

[Mr. Bryce.]

There is another question which presents considerable worry to the Indians, and that is the question of treaty rights and obligations. I talked about this on a previous occasion, because I think it is something that should be settled once and for all. This is something which was recommended by the Indian committee, and I quote the recommendation they made:

> That a commission in the nature of a claims commission be set up with the least possible delay, to inquire into the terms of all Indian treaties in order to discover and determine, definitely and finally, such rights and obligations as are therein involved and, further, to assess and settle finally and in a just and equitable manner all claims or grievances which have arisen thereunder.

I hope the minister will be able to do something about these various problems to which I have drawn his attention. At the time of my first trip to the north country in 1943, that is up to Norway House, the conditions of the Indians were in a deplorable state, but there has since then been remarkable improvement in many ways. The new hospital is a wonderful achievement, and I hope the improvement will continue.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe that one of the major domestic problems facing parliament this session is inflation. I also think some method must be found of bringing it under control. I look forward to hearing the statement which the Minister of Finance today promised to make on the subject at a later date.

There are many Canadians who are not particularly concerned about inflation, possibly because they do not realize the dangers inherent in the present situation, and also, probably, because the kind of inflation we have in Canada today is not of the extreme variety such as that which Germany experienced after world war I. Rather what we have in this country today is a sort of creeping inflation. But even though it is combined with rising standards of living and with widening opportunities in some cases, it is month by month gradually and insidiously eroding the value of our Canadian dollar.

Every hon. member realizes, I know, that in the past year Canada experienced one of her best years economically. When the final figures of production, consumption and prosperity are compiled I suppose they will show that, materially, Canada did better than any other nation in the world. Employment reached new levels in 1956. Our gross national product went up by leaps and bounds. Trade improved, wages increased and so on. In short, Canada has been literally bursting at the seams economically. Yet authorities who should know tell us that the very vigour of the economic boom has given rise to factors which, if not controlled, could wipe out many of the economic gains which we have experienced since the end of the war.

With such prosperity prevalent throughout the country, I suppose it is natural that the average man in the street does not worry too much about inflation. As a matter of fact, in the early years of an inflationary spiral most people rather like it. It offers jobs for everyone at steadily increasing wages. It offers increasing dollar values for property. It offers opportunities to make easy money by speculating in things of real value. Yet, Mr. Speaker, inflation is like a thief in the night. It hurts most those who can least afford to be hurt. It takes a substantial bite today out of the wages of every workingman in this country. It works great hardship on those who are trying to live on fixed incomes, because the value of their savings is gradually decreasing.

In the past 50 years many nations have travelled the road to inflation, and most of them have travelled it to disaster. It seems to me that this parliament should take every possible action at this session to make sure that Canada does not travel the same road to recession or to depression.

One of the most obvious danger signals is our cost of living index increase. The last figure I saw was for October, when the cost of living index was 120.3 as compared with 100 in 1949. It showed an increase of 3.4 points in the eleven months preceding October.

What is even more alarming, I think, is the prospect for the next six months. There are some who hope that the inflationary fires will burn out before any additional government action is necessary. Personally I think that hope is wishful thinking. Last year our investment program was roughly $8 billion. If I understand the situation correctly, the figure will be substantially higher during the current year. I think that fact will inevitably increase the demand for labour and materials, and will bring additional pressure on our general price levels.

I know that for many months, Mr. Speaker, our government has recognized the dangers, and that it has taken some action. In co-operation with the Bank of Canada it has adopted what is known or has come to be known as a tight money policy. I certainly do not set myself up as an economist but, as I understand it, the present tight money policy does not arise from a contraction of money or of bank credit. The supply of money is about the same as it was about a year ago. Central bank policy, in co-operation with our banks, has been directed toward maintaining the volume of money at the same level as that of a year ago, and restraining any further expansion of credit. With the supply of money limited and with the demand for it practically insatiable, naturally the law of supply and demand has come into effect and interest rates have gone up. I think hon. members on all sides of the house would agree that the higher interest rates have been at least partially effective in discouraging additional business expansion financed by bank credit.

Personally I support wholeheartedly the steps which have been taken so far by the government to deal with these inflationary tendencies. Every country in the western world, I think, has taken similar steps. I am quite sure that if my hon. friends in the Conservative party were sitting on the government side, they would take the same kind of action.

The primary purpose of the monetary measures taken by the Bank of Canada has been to extend the period of our boom and to protect the Canadian people against any economic bust. The rapidly rising interest rates, of course, have hurt in some quarters, but the hardships which they have inflicted are as nothing compared to what the hardships would be if this government adopted an easy money policy.

There are some fields which have been adversely affected. Housing and municipal finance have been mentioned. Perhaps there will have to be some adjustments in these fields. Naturally there have been complaints about this tight money policy from companies whose plans for expansion are hampered, but I think the government has put the over-all welfare of the nation ahead of political expediency in this particular instance. As a matter of fact it seems to me that there are indications today, and a good many of them, that the tight money policy of this government may have to be extended.

When the original Bank of Canada Act was formulated and designed, commercial banks extended most commercial credit. Today that is no longer the case in many instances. There are many other companies today which extend credit in large volume. I refer to finance companies, small loan companies, insurance companies, mortgage companies, credit unions and even government agencies.

It is quite true that an appeal has been made to these various organizations to restrict credit voluntarily, but I do not think such an appeal is adequate. Today there are many companies of the nature I have described which are still extending credit almost without limit. If inflation in Canada is to be controlled, I believe the government should set up a co-ordinated set of policies, principles and regulations which would govern all the various components of our financial system, and not the banks alone. Such a policy should be aimed at making our entire financial situation responsive to the actions of the Bank of Canada.

Perhaps I am wrong, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to me that there is another step which should be taken at the present time. Unless retail prices show some indication of stopping their upward spiral I believe the government must consider taking steps to curb credit at the retail level. A requirement of 25 per cent or 33⅓ per cent down on all credit sales would not be popular, but I think it would be effective in temporarily postponing the demand for automobiles, appliances, furniture and the like. It could help to curb consumer demand with a minimum of hardship to anyone.

There is yet another step I should like to see the government take. I cannot help feeling today, as I have felt for 10 years, that parliament is sometimes prone to spend money too easily. How can we expect Canadian businessmen and Canadian industry in this period of emergency to use restraint in spending if we in this parliament, on all sides, allow the expenses which we should control to increase by several hundreds of millions of dollars each year? I think it is obvious, that government demands for manpower, government demands for materials, are just as responsible for pushing up prices as are the demands of industry. It seems to me, therefore, that governments at all three levels, federal, provincial and municipal, during the next few months should set an example to industry and private citizens by keeping their spending at a practical minimum.

Mr. Nicholson: What about family allowances? What should we do about them?

Mr. Thatcher: I am always amazed at the ability of socialist theorists to offer destructive criticism.

Mr. Nicholson: Should we cut down family allowances?

Mr. Thatcher: Most economists, I think, would agree that one of the major contributing factors to inflation today is a shortage of manpower. Parliament would be accentuating that shortage of manpower if it adds to the number of civil servants unnecessarily. Perhaps no one in the house will agree with me, but I think during the present emergency the Minister of Finance might be wise to freeze the number of civil servants at its present level.

[Mr. Thatcher.]

What about tax policy? For many years in this house, as hon. members know, I have urged the Minister of Finance to bring about tax reductions, and I continue to believe that such a policy is desirable and urgent. I would be the first to admit that in this inflationary period perhaps this short-term picture has altered. Last March the minister budgeted, I think, for a surplus of $113 million. It seems now that the surplus will reach $300 million. Surely a large and substantial part of that surplus should be used for debt reduction, and I commend such a policy to the minister as being anti-inflationary.

What of the remainder of the surplus? Personally I say this with respect, I would rather the minister did not leave the balance of this surplus lying around because there are too many hon. members who can find ways of spending it. I should like to see, as I say—

An hon. Member: Too many old age pensioners now?

Mr. Thatcher: I shall tell my hon. friend that so far as the old age pensioners are concerned, they may be taken care of sooner than my hon. friend wishes.

Mr. Nicholson: What about the means test for old age pensions?

Mr. Thatcher: I am glad to talk about the means test. For 10 years now I have listened to C.C.F. members advocate the removal of the means test down here in Ottawa, yet out in Saskatchewan they have the most rigid means test in the whole world, on their supplementary allowance to pensioners.

Mr. Nicholson: Do you favour abolishing the means test?

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, I said that I favoured tax reduction if it is feasible at the moment. If economists tell us it is too dangerous to put this extra purchasing power into the hands of consumers at the present time, then I believe some method should be found to give the public the benefit of tax reduction on a postponed basis. Perhaps some kind of deferred savings certificate could be issued by the government which would not be redeemable for three years or five years.

I say that inflationary tendencies are not out of control in this country, but there are danger signals on the horizon. The Minister of Finance knows better than anyone that combating inflation is neither an easy task nor a popular one, but every Canadian will be adversely affected if parliament ignores the problem. In the period ahead we must look to the Minister of Finance for leadership, yet others must also accept their responsibilities. Industrialists and merchants must be moderate in their pricing policies; labour must be moderate in its demands for wage increases, and members of parliament must be moderate in the demands they make on the Minister of Finance for increased expenditures. If we give the minister that kind of co-operation I think we can hold inflation within bounds, reasonable bounds, during 1957. I hope the minister will consider the suggestions I have made, and I hope he may find some of them feasible.

Mr. Michener: I listened with great interest, Mr. Speaker, to the excellent speech we have just heard. I wonder if the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and who appears to identify the government of Canada with the Bank of Canada, could point out any action which the government of Canada, as distinguished from the Bank of Canada, has taken to deal with any inflationary trend about which he has talked?

Mr. Thatcher: I am a backbench member, and I would not suggest policy.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. This year the speech from the throne dealt mainly with foreign affairs, and the two speeches made in this house on Monday last by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare emphasized the importance of this subject.

There has been so much said during the emergency session and this session about the United Nations police force in Egypt that one wonders what magic wand the United Nations is going to use now to accomplish in the Middle East what the United Nations has dismally failed to accomplish in the past 10 years of its existence. If one is brutally frank he is forced to admit that the United Nations has been a dismal failure to date. It has not had any effective policy for dealing with the various problems that have affected the Middle East for many years. The problems of the Middle East are not new and they are not going to be solved overnight. This powder keg has been in existence for years. Various matters affecting the Middle East have been before the United Nations for years. The score to date is just nil.

I shall cite one instance, and that is the plight of the hundreds of thousands of Arab refugees. These people became refugees on the day the state of Israel came into being. Years after this event took place we still find hundreds of thousands of these unfortunate people who are not re-established or resettled. You will find them in the Arab states of Lebanon, Syria and Jordan. These refugees, with their families, are living under the most deplorable conditions of utter poverty. From time to time every member in this house has received pamphlets and literature outlining the plight of these unfortunate people. This matter has been before the United Nations time and time again, and nothing has been done.

In the three Arab countries you will find large settlements of these refugees living in the most squalid conditions in large camps along the road between Baalbeck and Damascus; you will find them scattered along the highway from Damascus to Amman and in the vicinity of Jericho, Jerusalem, and in other parts of the Arab states. This one problem has been a festering sore for years, well known to all members of the United Nations, yet no action has been taken.

There have also been the old questions of the Gaza strip, the boundary line, the right of Egypt to block and to prevent Israeli ships going through the canal. As I said, these problems affecting this part of the world have been before the United Nations for years and little if anything has been done. It seems to me that the United Nations has proved itself utterly incapable of dealing with these problems which have simply screamed to be settled; and today, after years of senseless and useless debate and passing resolutions that would stretch around the world, but taking no action, we are asked to base the hope for peace in the world on the action of the United Nations in sending a small police force to the Middle East.

The present force, we are told, is composed of about 5,500 men, of whom only some 1,100 are Canadians. To me, 20 per cent of the entire force seems rather a large percentage for Canada. If you take from these 5,500 men the administrative staff, the medical, the army service corps, the signallers, the engineers and all the other services that go to make up a modern army brigade today, you will have very few men left to carry out the so-called police duties.

At page 174 of Hansard the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> This has led to a demand in some quarters that somehow or other United Nations assembly should take action to enforce effectively its own recommendations. This of course ignores the fact that such compulsory enforcement procedure through the assembly is not in accordance with the terms of the charter as drafted.

That very clearly indicates that this small police force in Egypt has no authority to enforce anything. I would have liked very much if the Secretary of State for External Affairs had explained to the house in detail just what are the duties of this police force and what it has accomplished to date, if anything; and what military equipment this force has. I take it, if it is a police force, it is not to fight. What is it to do if it is attacked? What is it to do if fighting breaks out again between Israel and Egypt, or one of the other Arab states? How long is the force to remain there? I think the hon. member for Oxford clearly showed today that it is going to stay there just as long as Colonel Nasser will permit it to stay there.

What are the duties of this force as far as the canal is concerned? Can it be ordered out of Egypt at any time? And, of some importance to the Canadian taxpayers, what proportion of the entire cost of the more than 1,100 Canadian troops in Egypt is to be paid by Canada? The Secretary of State for External Affairs made very clear during the emergency session, and in his speech on Monday, that the police force is very restricted in its actions. He spoke on Monday. At page 175 of Hansard he tried to give the impression that the force had accomplished a great deal, and at page 176 he made this very significant statement:

> But even within these limitations the United Nations force can, I think, play an important part in bringing about an honourable and enduring political settlement in the Palestine and Suez area.

Well, it would have been more interesting if the minister had only enlarged upon that and shown how this police force, with its limited powers, is able to bring about a settlement of any kind.

There are many people in Canada who believe that if Britain and France had not acted in the Suez, Russia would have moved in and today Russia would have been in complete control of the canal and the Middle East. Many people feel that the action of France and Britain was necessary to preserve their very existence, an action necessary in view of the previous feeble actions of the United Nations and the United States.

What happened? The Canadian government turned its back on France and Britain, and was described by some as being very bitter and severe. The true feeling of the Canadian government was well expressed by the Prime Minister on page 20 of Hansard of the emergency session, when he made that statement and by the manner in which he made it. The statement is as follows:

> The era when the supermen of Europe could govern the whole world has and is coming pretty close to an end.

Well, I would like to tell the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs that in the part of eastern Ontario where I reside the vast majority of Canadian people do not agree with or approve of the sentiment expressed in the words uttered by the Prime Minister; nor do they agree with the action of the Canadian government in not supporting France and Britain. I had hoped that at some time either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs would tell the house and the country what, in their opinion, would have happened to the Suez canal and the Middle East if France and Britain had not acted. If the policy that the President of the United States recently submitted to congress had been declared earlier there would not, in my opinion, have been any crisis in the Middle East. Press despatches of today report the appearance of Secretary of State Dulles before a Senate committee, in which he said:

> State Secretary Dulles said today there would be "a very great likelihood" of United States troops fighting in the Middle East if congress rejects President Eisenhower's Middle East manifesto.

What they are pressing for is exactly the same action that France and Britain took. From the two speeches made on Monday by the two ministers one can judge that they have apparently seen the commonwealth in a new light, because it has been a long time, prior to Monday last, since anyone in this house has heard any minister of the crown make any complimentary remarks about the commonwealth. In fact it has been the usual practice of ministers to avoid any reference of any kind to the commonwealth, or to mention any of the benefits of the commonwealth to the entire world.

The speeches of the two ministers were remarkable in that they made some attempt to repair the damage done by the remarks of the Prime Minister in the emergency session. I do not think anybody is going to disagree with the remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He spoke in most glowing terms about the commonwealth, what Britain had done in granting independence and self-government to former colonies. He mentioned the names of certain nations which will soon be members of the commonwealth. In my opinion these remarks were a well-deserved tribute to the statesmen of the United Kingdom, who only such a short time ago were described and classified by the Prime Minister as aggressors and the supermen of Europe.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, not to be outdone by his colleague, also praised the commonwealth and several times during his speech lauded the work of the commonwealth in every way. I should like to read two passages from his speech, at page

186 of Hansard. In referring to various countries in Asia the minister said:

> I also told them that, as a member of the commonwealth, Canada felt that that instrument had in its very concept the opportunity of providing not only for the good of its constituents but for the welfare of all nations in the world, in Asia as well as elsewhere, who are prepared to understand its good intentions and purposes.

I congratulate the minister on having a view of that kind. He went on to say:

> But my judgment would be that, for the most part, those who at the present time have to do with the conduct of government in those great countries recognized that in the consultations of prime ministers, in the consultations of commonwealth foreign ministers and in the collaboration that takes place in the United Nations, the commonwealth serves as a valuable instrument in a world that needs to move closer and closer together rather than diverge on an increasing scale.

I also congratulate the minister on those sentiments; but both ministers in their glowing words about the commonwealth overlooked one certain factor that was aptly pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Kamloops, who indicated that not once in all the glowing references they made to the commonwealth did they mention the vital factor of the centre of commonwealth unity, loyalty to the crown.

In the speech from the throne there was no reference to any amendment to the Succession Duty Act, unless that reference was contained in the last few words where it mentioned that amendments to certain other acts would be submitted. I sincerely hope this act will be amended. It was mentioned last year in the speech from the throne, but no amendments were brought forward. In my opinion the present act should be revised in the light of changing economic conditions.

Conditions have changed considerably since the act was first introduced a long time ago. At the present time an estate of up to $50,000 is exempt from tax, but if the estate exceeds $50,000 it is taxable in its entirety. That appears most unfair to me, and I feel the exemption should be raised to at least $75,000 and this amount should be exempt from duty in any event. Every hon. member of this house who is a member of the legal profession knows from his own knowledge and has seen from his personal experience many instances of the effect of income tax and succession duties on income under wills or trusts, pensions, lump sum payments and other similar payments received by a surviving dependent, and are well aware of the hardship created.

One other matter in connection with succession duties is that of charitable bequests and charitable donations made within three years of the date of death, as well as unpaid subscriptions to charitable organizations. Many people feel that these should not be included in arriving at the value of an estate for the purpose of determining the initial rate of duty.

In regard to income tax, despite what has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I for one hope the Minister of Finance is going to raise the exemption of a married man to at least $3,000 and the exemption of a single person to at least $1,500, and consider a reasonable increase in exemptions for children. Everyone knows that inflation has greatly raised the cost of living, that municipal taxes have increased and that the price of everything the taxpayer has to buy is following an upward trend. The taxpayer is subject to many taxes which are hidden in the sale price tag.

The present exemption for children is only $150 in the case of a child in receipt of family allowance and $400 in the case of a child not receiving family allowance. How far will $400 a year go toward the support of a child over 16 years of age who is attending school or college? Even a casual examination of the prices of goods advertised in the newspapers today, including the prices of clothing, footwear and the other necessities of life, will indicate that an exemption of $400 is a small exemption indeed.

There is also the situation of many taxpayers who are living on fixed incomes. In many cases the income was fixed years ago when the dollar was worth a great deal more than it is worth today. The present rate of taxation and scale of exemption works a hardship on this type of taxpayer, and I suggest to the minister that he might well consider allowing an exemption of more than $500 to all taxpayers over the age of 65 years.

There was a short reference to agriculture in the speech from the throne which will not greatly encourage the Canadian farmer. The hon. member for Middlesex East very well placed the position of the farmer before the house in his remarks as recorded at page 85 of Hansard, when he showed that the Canadian farm economy is being exploited to provide markets for manufactured goods. Although Canada is a great producing nation many of our agricultural products are imported from abroad. Each year several million pounds of cheese are imported into Canada, fruit and vegetables are imported from the United States, tomatoes and tomato pulp are hauled across the ocean from Europe and then go by rail to marketing points where they compete with local products, although it is true we have certain tariffs that operate only on a seasonal basis.

For instance, last year many hon. members received representations from turkey producers concerning the importation of turkeys from the United States which undersell the local market. I have a large number of turkey producers in my district, and I have received letters concerning this situation. Representations were made to the Minister of Agriculture last year by turkey producers.

Ask any farmer in Ontario today who is engaged in mixed farming concerning the great increase in the cost of every article he must purchase for the operation of his farm, including the increases in labour costs and municipal taxes, and compare these increases with the prices of the products he has for sale. Every rural newspaper carries notices and reports of meetings of the fast-growing farmers' union held in every county throughout Ontario. No doubt many hon. members have attended these meetings and discovered that in many cases they could not find much fault with the arguments put forth by the farmers. The farmers want only their fair share of the income of the nation. As many hon. members have already observed, because this is an election year something may be done for Canadian farmers.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word or two in support of those hon. members who have spoken on behalf of the Canadian veteran. I have in my hand the brief presented to the government by the Legion, and there are one or two matters I would like to mention. The Legion has made extremely reasonable requests the granting of which in many cases would not increase government expenditure in any way. For instance, they ask for an increase in the permissible ceiling, which is not going to cost the federal treasury one cent. They simply ask that the ceilings on total permissible incomes under the War Veterans' Allowance Act be increased to $1,200 per year for the single recipient and $2,000 per year for the married recipient. They further ask that the married rate of the war veterans' allowance be increased from $108 per month to $120 per month. They also ask that Canadian veterans of world war I whose overseas service was restricted to the United Kingdom be eligible for war veterans' allowance. This request is also most reasonable and one that has been submitted to the minister on many occasions.

The only other request I wish to mention is that respecting the present equity value of the home in which a war veterans allowance recipient resides. Such a veteran is now permitted to have an equity of up to $6,000. Every hon. member knows, from his knowledge of the value of property in his own community, that $6,000 is a very low figure. The Legion asks that the figure be increased to $9,000. This again will not entail the outlay of one cent of public funds.

I realize that these requests have been made repeatedly to the minister, but I would point out to him that the present very cold spell means for many pensioners and veterans in receipt of war veterans allowance extra fuel, food and clothing which in many cases they can ill afford. The number of veterans who will receive a pension, if the pension is granted to veterans of world war I who served in England, is very small, and the amount of extra funds from the public treasury will not be very great. I sincerely hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs and his parliamentary assistant will take some action at this session of parliament to implement the very fair and reasonable recommendations contained in the brief presented to the government by the Legion last fall.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we call it 5.45?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: By virtue of the provisions of standing order 38, paragraph 3, I must put the question forthwith on the amendment to the amendment to the main motion.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs:

Aitken, Miss	Holowach
Argue	Johnson (Kindersley)
Balcer	Johnston (Bow River)
Barnett	Jones
Bell	Knight
Blackmore	Knowles
Blair	Leboe
Bryce	Lennard
Bryson	Low
Campbell	Macdonnell
Cardiff	MacLean
Casselman	McCullough (Moose Mountain)
Castleden	McGregor
Churchill	McLeod
Coldwell	Michener
Diefenbaker	Mitchell (London)
Dinsdale	Monteith
Dufresne	Murphy (Lambton West)
Ellis	Nesbitt
Fairclough, Mrs.	Nicholson
Ferguson	Nowlan
Fraser (Peterborough)	Pallett
Gillis	Patterson
Green	Pearkes
Hahn	Perron
Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace)	Quelch
Hansell	Regier
Harkness	Robinson (Bruce)
Hees	Rowe
Herridge	Shaw
Hodgson	Small

Smith (Battle River-Camrose)
Starr
Stewart (Winnipeg North)
Tustin
White (Hastings-Frontenac)
White (Middlesex East)
Yuill—69.

NAYS

Messrs:

Anderson
Applewhaite
Arsenault
Ashbourne
Balcom
Batten
Beaudry
Benidickson
Bennett
Blanchette
Boisvert
Boivin
Bonnier
Boucher
Bourget
Bourque
Breton
Brisson
Brown (Brantford)
Brown (Essex West)
Buchanan
Byrne
Cameron (High Park)
Cannon
Cardin
Caron
Carrick
Carter
Cavers
Cloutier
Crestohl
Dechene
Decore
Denis
Deschatelets
Deslieres
Dickey
Dumas
Dupuis
Enfield
Fairey
Fontaine
Gagnon
Gardiner
Garson
Gauthier (Lake St. John)
Gauthier (Nickel Belt)
Gauthier (Portneuf)
Gingras
Gingues
Girard
Goode
Gour (Russell)
Gourd (Chapleau)
Habel
Hardie
Harris
Harrison
Hellyer
Henderson
Hollingworth
Hosking
Houck
Huffman
Hunter
James
Jutras
Kickham
Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough)
Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare)
Laflamme
Lafontaine
Lapointe
Lavigne
Leduc (Gatineau)
Leduc (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle)
Leduc (Verdun)
Lefrançois
Lesage
Lusby
MacEachen
MacNaught
McCann
McCulloch (Pictou)
McIlraith
McIvor
McMillan
Maltais
Mang
Marler
Martin Masse
Matheson
Menard
Meunier
Michaud
Mitchell (Sudbury)
Monette
Murphy (Westmorland)
Pickersgill
Pinard
Pommer
Poulin
Power (Quebec South)
Power (St. John's West)
Proudfoot
Prudham
Purdy
Ratelle
Reinke
Richard (Ottawa East)
Richard (St. Maurice-Lafleche)
Richardson
Roberge
Robertson
Robichaud
Robinson (Simcoe East)
Rochefort
Rouleau
St. Laurent (Quebec East)
St. Laurent (Temiscouata)
Schneider
Simmons
Sinclair
Stuart (Charlotte)
Studer
Thatcher
Thibault
Tucker
Valois
Villeneuve
Weaver
Weir
Weselak
White (Waterloo South)—135.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment to the main motion lost.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Shaw the debate was adjourned.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

"H.M.C. DOCKYARD", HALIFAX—CIVILIAN PAYROLL

Question No. 2—Mr. Balcom:

What is the average total monthly payroll of the civilian employees, all branches, at H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, Nova Scotia?

Answer by: Mr. Hellyer, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Defence:

The average total monthly payroll for civilian employees paid through H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, is $1,160,450.

ALASKA HIGHWAY—CASUAL LABOUR

Question No. 17—Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many positions available for casual labour on the Alaska highway were authorized in each of the last five years?

2. What has been the average number of casuals employed during July and August in each year?

3. What is the total number of casuals hired each year during this five-year period?

4. Of the total number of casuals hired during the fiscal years 1954-55 and 1955-56, how many have had their employment terminated with the notation "not for rehire", or other similar recommendation?

Answer by: Mr. Hellyer, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Defence:

1. 1952, 419; 1953, 419; 1954, 419; 1955, 430; 1956, 550.

2. 1952, 360; 1953, 228; 1954, 393; 1955, 374; 1956, 379.

3. 1952, 551; 1953, 646; 1954, 552; 1955, 590; 1956, 604.

4. 1954-55, 71; 1955-56, 58.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 17, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE OF PRIME MINISTERS ON TRADE AND OTHER MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister what will be his attitude to the suggested conference of commonwealth prime ministers, which I understand is being placed before the various prime ministers by the new Prime Minister of Great Britain. Does he at this time consider, having regard to the possibility of the United Kingdom entering into a free trade arrangement with Europe, that at the same time something in the nature of a British commonwealth trade conference would be acceptable and indeed needful?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Would the hon. gentleman repeat the last words of his question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister not consider that in view of the possible adherence by the United Kingdom to a European free trade agreement, at this time something in the nature of a commonwealth trade conference in so far as Canada is concerned is not only requisite but needful?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): These conferences have always been very useful. We have had no information other than newspaper reports of any consideration being given at this time to an attempt to arrange a conference. Of course at this time it would be somewhat inconvenient. I have some legislative proposals that I hope to be able to submit to parliament, and I also hope to be able to be here when they are being discussed in parliament.

I can assure the hon. gentleman that, if there is a suggestion for a conference of representatives of the governments of the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries, the matter will be given very serious and careful consideration, because we do realize, as I think most Canadians do, the value of these exchanges of views and of the need to arrive at decisions which, of course, each government has to arrive at on its own responsibility, but which do all tend to the achievement of the same objective.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps the Prime Minister will also answer the other question: whether having regard to these economic developments in Europe he would give consideration to convening a commonwealth trade conference in order to assure and maintain Canada's trade.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker, at this time we would not consider that we should attempt to convene a conference on trade until we have further information as to what exactly are the problems the new government in the United Kingdom would consider as having top priority in discussion with the representatives of other commonwealth governments.

[Later:]

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister supplementary to the questions asked by my leader. In view of the fact that there is an indication that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom might desire a meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers and that he may also be going to Washington, would the Prime Minister consider requesting the convening of such a meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in Canada?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government would not consider at this moment substituting this action for what may be felt by the new Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to be the most urgent action that he should take. The government of Canada will co-operate wholeheartedly with the government of the United Kingdom in trying to arrange anything that may be felt there to be the most urgent matters that require to be dealt with.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statements made by both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, does the Prime Minister not think this country might take the initiative at this time?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister does not feel that this country should take the initiative to try to determine what should be the policy of the United Kingdom government. That we think is the responsibility, which I am sure will be discharged to the best of his ability, of the new Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

OIL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PLANS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF ALBERTA TAR SANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, make a statement to the house concerning the reports that the new Prime Minister of Great Britain has under consideration what is described as a dramatic plan for the development of the Alberta tar sands? I think reports indicate that copies of this plan, which is under study, have been submitted to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This would appear to be a very far-reaching development, and it would be of interest to the house and the country if either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce would explain just what is under way.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware the only communication we have had on the subject came from Mr. Carol Wilson, who was formerly general manager of the atomic energy commission of the United States and is now the president of a private firm. He wrote about a plan for developing the tar sands to meet the present oil shortage in Europe. There was nothing new in the letter that I could find, other than suggesting immediate development. He said he sent a copy to the then British ambassador in Washington. I answered the letter and said we were watching with interest the tar sands situation, but we felt that at the moment it is not a development that was justified by present prices for the product. We regard it as more in the nature of a reserve for the future. That is all I have heard on the subject. We have nothing whatever from the British government. As to whether that government is interested or not I have no information.

TRADE

JAPAN—REPORTED CEILING ON EXPORTS OF MANUFACTURED COTTON GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister comment on the news report that Japan is going to place more ceilings on the export of manufactured cotton goods to Canada? What is the purpose of such action? Is such action not likely to adversely affect the sale of Canadian goods to Japan?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the export of textiles from Japan to Canada is a matter that was discussed when I visited Japan a few months ago. The Japanese have about 5 per cent of our market for textiles, and we think it would be difficult for us to live with a larger proportion.

The ceiling that has been put on in Japan has been put on by the industry, and not at the request of the Canadian government. I think the action taken may have been in furtherance of the thought I left there that Japan should be willing to see their market for textiles in Canada grow gradually with the growth of the total market, rather than flood this country with textiles at any one time. That is all I can say about it. We have had no communication on the subject from Japan. I read the same article to which the hon. member is referring this morning, and that is really all I know about the situation.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I might ask a further supplementary question. Does the minister know whether any action will be taken subsequently to increase the ceilings, or are they placed on for an indefinite period?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, the ceilings were placed, not at the request of anyone here but rather because the industry in Japan thought that was the sound way to develop a continuing market in Canada. As far as purchases of wheat and barley by Japan are concerned, although I do not know whether or not my visit had anything to do with it, since the time of my visit exports of both grains have increased very considerably; in fact, we have a larger proportion of total Japanese imports of those two grains than we have ever had at any time.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Having regard to the failure of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to construct the pipe line to Winnipeg in accordance with its agreement, and the near approach of the deadline for completion of its financing, has the government made any new concession to the company or entered into any new agreement with the company since last June?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. I may say that the loan to Trans-Canada today amounts to a little less than $45 million, and we expect that sum to be repaid very shortly. After that, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited will be a private company and the government will not have any official information about what it is doing.

Mr. Michener: That would be a relief to the government.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member does not intend to ask a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for St. Paul's I think I should recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Nowlan: I am sorry.

[Later:]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) asked me two questions. The first question reads:

Can the minister inform the house as to the date when it is now expected that the Trans-Canada pipe line will be completed to Winnipeg and Emerson?

I am informed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited that it is expected the line will be completed to Winnipeg by late August or early September. With regard to Emerson, there are at this time no plans to build a line south from Winnipeg to Emerson.

The second question reads:

Has consideration been given to any extension of the date of repayment of the $80 million loan to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines beyond April 1, 1957?

The answer is no.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the statement that there are no plans for building the line from Winnipeg to Emerson indicate that there has been a change in the plans of the government, or of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, with respect to the export of natural gas?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It has no meaning except that Trans-Canada is not at this time making plans to build the pipe line south from Winnipeg to Emerson.

Inquiries of the Ministry

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh; here comes a speech.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): He has been waiting for this opportunity.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the number of Liberal members who are joining us in asking for an increase in old age pensions, may the people of Canada assume there will be such an increase before this year's general election? What amount of increase does the government have in mind?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is too mature in politics to not know that if the government proposed to take a particular course it would not be in answer to any of his questions.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that there are many people in Canada, old people particularly, who are greatly disappointed that such an increase was not indicated in this year's speech from the throne?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the government is aware, as is indeed every hon. member of this house, that there are instances of need, but this government feels satisfied that the people of Canada generally know that it has taken the lead in these matters and in accordance with capacity is prepared to do so again.

[Later:]

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance supplementary to the question asked of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the minister's opinion has the financial capacity of this government reached such a position as referred to by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that it is able to give an increase to those on the old age pension?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Annually the Minister of Finance makes a statement on the financial affairs of the government and its capabilities. I expect to be doing that some time during this session.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL PARKS

GRAND PRÉ—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS FOR PURCHASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can the minister advise the house of the state of the negotiations between his department and the Société de l'Assomption and the Dominion Atlantic Railway with respect to the acquisition of the Dominion Atlantic park at Grand Pré?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the conditions covering the purchase of the park itself from the Dominion Atlantic Railway have been agreed upon and the same is true with respect to the purchase of the museum from the Société de l'Assomption. I have been authorized by my colleagues to enter into agreements with the society and the company for the purchase. As soon as this is done the Grand Pré park will be proclaimed a national historic park.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PAYMENT OF PREVAILING RATES TO CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AT DOCKYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. Upon what basis are wages paid to civilians employed at H.M.C. dockyards in the country? Do these wages and working conditions conform to prevailing rates in industry in the different parts of the country?

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question correctly it is whether wages at each H.M.C. dockyard conform to prevailing rates. They conform to the general prevailing rates in the area.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REPORTED REDUCTION OF GRADINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister inform the house if orders have been given to grain elevator companies to hold down the grades on wheat and, if so, by whom the orders were issued?

[Mr. Harris.]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The grades of wheat are set by the standards board, which is made up largely of producer representation. Those grades are established at the beginning of the crop year, and no one can change the standards thereafter.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question. Is the minister aware that wheat grading No. 3 in November is now grading No. 4? I have some concrete evidence on that which I could submit.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, I am not aware of that and I do not believe it. I think my hon. friend had better stick to questions on subjects he understands.

[Later:]

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house if any changes have been made in the grain act as to quality requirements which would justify the lower grading of western wheat, both in local elevator storage and newly delivered grain? If not, can the minister account for such degrading taking place in western Canada?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There have been no changes in the grading regulations or the grain act. There have been no changes in the inspection staff of the board of grain commissioners. Anyone who is doubtful about the grade he is given at an elevator can send a sample to the inspection department at Winnipeg. He has always had this privilege. In this way he can obtain an official grade which will be based on the grades established by the standards board to which I referred earlier.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): May I ask the minister whether or not he has received any notification from elevator line companies of the degrading of grain in elevator storage?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would have to examine the files of the department to make sure, but nothing has come to my personal attention in the nature of a communication of that kind.

FREIGHT RATES

MARITIME FREIGHT RATES ACT—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the government any plans for revising the Maritime Freight Rates Act to bring it in line with the intentions of 1927, which were to enable the maritime producers to compete in central Canadian markets?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): All I can say is that the matter is under consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM—INVITATION TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has an invitation been given or is one contemplated to the new Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to visit Canada during his intended visit to the United States?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with what has always been the practice, if and when there is an acceptance of an invitation to the British prime minister to visit Washington, an invitation to visit Canada will be extended to him, and I hope his engagements will make it possible for him to accept such an invitation.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT POLICY IN RELATION TO INFLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he give the house the benefit of his opinion as to whether or not the policies of this government have created a position of inflation in this country at the present time?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my fee for that opinion would be quite heavy. I do not think I will offer it free.

Mr. Pallett: May I ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that he is already receiving quite a substantial fee from the Canadian people for this service?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That fee is for other services, sir.

REQUIREMENT FOR CASH DEPOSITS BY STOCKBROKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. The minister is no doubt aware that a firm of stockbrokers, R. Moat and Company of Montreal, was recently declared bankrupt, exposing hundreds of clients to serious losses. Can the minister inform the house whether stockbrokers, like banks and insurance companies, are obliged to make substantial cash deposits with the superintendent of insurance or another branch of government as a safeguard against such contingencies?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): My immediate answer would be that I am not aware of any, but perhaps I had better check the record and see. I will make a statement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO BROADCASTING OF QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Have any requests been received from radio broadcasting or television stations to make use of the question period in the House of Commons as a sort of quiz program for the benefit and amusement of the general public?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of any such requests, but if they be made I think, perhaps, the results would be more entertaining than informative.

BRIDGES

NUNS' ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Transport inform the house when construction is expected to begin on the Nuns' island bridge in the Montreal area?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I am afraid I have not the information available at the moment. I will have to make inquiries.

AIR TRANSPORT

ARRANGEMENTS FOR EMERGENCY LANDINGS IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Could the Minister of Transport say whether, under whatever arrangement has been made between Canada and Mexico with regard to the flight of Guest Air Lines, any regulation requires the pilot to land in the United States should one or more of the engines cease to operate?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I know of no such provision in the bilateral agreement between the two countries, but I would have to examine the position in order to see whether anything in the agreement might bear the interpretation which the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Then I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce this. If such an event occurred during the operation of one of the T.C.A. planes would the pilot land his machine for repairs?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In case of any difficulty in the air the pilot has the right under our bilateral agreements to land at any airport. Which airport he would use would depend, naturally, on the pilot's own discretion. There is no requirement that he should land, but he can land at any airport if he decides to do so.

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if the royal commission on broadcasting has yet submitted its report and, if so, when copies may be available. If not, may I ask when the government expects the report to be submitted?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The report has not been submitted, but I know the commission is proceeding as expeditiously as possible. No date has been fixed for the submission of the report to the government, but as soon as it is completed and has been regularly submitted to His Excellency the Governor General it will be the endeavour of the government to make copies available to members of the house as quickly as arrangements can be made to do so.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that there was adopted this morning, and it has been approved by His Excellency the Governor General, an order in council setting up a royal commission to deal with the matters that it was agreed would be referred to a royal commission in connection with the dispute between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the union of locomotive firemen and enginemen. I have not yet had certified copies, but as soon as the material work can be done copies will be transmitted to the Clerk of the house for tabling. Perhaps in view of the general interest in this matter hon. members would like me to read the text of the order in council into the record. If that is desired I would be prepared to do so at once.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It reads as follows:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report from the Prime Minister stating that in order to provide for settlement of the dispute between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, which gave rise to a cessation of operations on the railway in January, 1957, it is desirable to appoint a commission under part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire into and report upon the unresolved issues in the dispute.

The committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, advise:

1. That:

The Honourable Mr. Justice Roy Lindsay Kellock, puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada,

The Honourable Mr. Justice Campbell C. McLaurin, chief justice of the trial division of the supreme court of Alberta, and be appointed commissioners under part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire into and report upon all matters they deem necessary in order to answer, and to answer the following questions:

The Honourable Mr. Justice Jean Martineau, puisne judge of the court of Queen's bench for Quebec

(a) Are firemen (or firemen helpers) required on diesel locomotives in freight and yard service of the Canadian Pacific Railway, including the eastern, prairie and Pacific regions and the Quebec Central and Dominion Atlantic railways?

(b) If not, what terms and conditions, which would be fair to the firemen, to those who use the railway, to the railway company, and to its other employees, should be observed by the railway for the purpose of protecting firemen now in its employ against the consequences of the loss of such employment and seniority therein?

(c) Should the provisions in the present agreements between the railway company and the brotherhood concerning "arbitraries" and the "mountain differential" be maintained, dropped or modified, and if in the opinion of the commission they should be modified, how and to what extent?

2. That the Hon. Mr. Justice Kellock be chairman of the commission;

3. That the commissioners be authorized to exercise all the powers conferred upon them by section 11 of the Inquiries Act;—

That section authorizes them to engage counsel, experts or clerks, the staff they may require for the performance of their duties.

4. That the commissioners be authorized to secure technical advice and assistance from the members and staff of the board of transport commissioners and from any other board, commission, agency or department of the government of Canada;

5. That the commissioners be authorized to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as they may require at rates of remuneration and reimbursement to be approved by the treasury board;

6. That the commissioners adopt such procedure and methods as they may from time to time deem expedient for the proper conduct of the inquiry and sit at such times and places as they decide from time to time; and

7. That the commissioners report to the governor in council.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us will be very happy with the choice of personnel for the commission. Mr. Justice Kellock has attained for himself a reputation as a skilled chairman of commissions and one whose judgment can be trusted. The other judges bear similar reputations. I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question. Were the terms of reference submitted to the railway company and to the union? If not, I would suggest that even at this date consideration be given to the submission of the terms to both parties.

While the decision of the commission will not be binding on either party, I suggest that the submission of the terms of reference to both parties will at least ensure greater hope of acceptance of the decision by the parties. In other words, all the matters in issue should be covered by the terms of reference, and even at this stage I suggest if that has not been done the Prime Minister might consider it.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The terms of reference were not submitted to the railway or to the union. I personally attended the meetings at which the memorandum which I tabled in announcing the resumption of service was agreed upon and signed, and I received a full explanation from both parties as to what they considered were the matters that should receive consideration by the commission. I think the order in council has been drawn in the widest possible terms to cover everything that was envisaged in the agreement that was reached between the parties.

The leader of the opposition will remember that all these things were written into the agreement or are to be written into the agreement to be signed for the resumption of service, and are to be the subject of renegotiation. With respect to those that are referred to in this order in council setting up the royal commission, we have purposely not confined them to answering the questions that were discussed before me but have made the terms of reference cover all matters into which the commissioners may deem it necessary to inquire.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is pretty wide.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It is left to the commissioners to decide, upon representations that will be made to them by the representatives of the railway and of the unions, what matters it is important to look at in order to arrive at the proper answers to the questions they want to have decided. I think it is preferable to leave it in that form, and to leave it to the commissioners to determine what are all the matters that it is important for them to inquire into and report upon in order to arrive at the proper answers.

When the Leader of the Opposition reads the terms of the order in council I think he will find that it would have been difficult to have made it more inclusive, and that any attempt to define particularly what they should do would have been restrictive rather than otherwise.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): While the Prime Minister is explaining this order in council, I wonder if he would indicate whether or not the findings of this royal commission in so far as they relate to the safety problem would be binding on the board of transport commissioners, whose responsibility I understand that to be, or whether the board of transport commissioners would have to deal with the matter afterwards.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, Mr. Speaker, the only binding force behind the findings of the commission will be the force of public opinion, and what we think is just as impressive a royal commission of this number of persons as could be selected. It will not destroy the jurisdiction given to the board of transport commissioners to deal with any application that may be made to them at any time with respect to any safety matters concerning any kind of operation of the railway; that is a statutory provision that confers jurisdiction upon the board whenever any Canadian sees fit to invoke the exercise of that jurisdiction. But I would imagine that so far as the answers to all of these questions go, their effect upon decisions that might be required of the board of transport commissioners will be very considerable unless other facts than those which would appear to have been presented had to be considered. I am sure if the hon. gentleman were a member of the board of transport commissioners that is the attitude he would take, and I think he can assume that those who are members of the board of transport commissioners would take the same attitude.

Mr. Michener: Would the Prime Minister make the same observation with respect to the royal commission known as the Gordon commission?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The royal commission known as the Gordon commission was not asked to answer any specific questions but to make a broad survey. This survey has been made and I expect, with regard to a number of points, there will be controversies, controversies that will be in the interests of the proper consideration of the problems that are apt to arise. I am sure that here again the hon. gentleman will agree with me that anything that focuses and stimulates public interest in matters of public concern is a good thing for the proper handling, in a democratic way, of the affairs of the country.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the order in council contains—because if so I missed it—a time limit for the report?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker; and the hon. gentleman will see, if he refers to the document that was signed, that it was suggested they commence immediately and that they report not later than October 1, 1957. In transmitting to the members of the commission the provisions under which they will operate, it is my intention to convey to them that suggestion made in the agreement between the parties, and to inform them that the government concurs in the suggestion.

[Later:]

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that he kept secret the findings of the Gordon commission report from this house and the public for over five weeks after its receipt, will the Prime Minister assure the house that in the unlikely event he is still prime minister he will release the findings of the commission on the diesel problem immediately they are received?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The Prime Minister kept nothing secret. As soon as the report was received an order in council was prepared and submitted to His Excellency the Governor General, as is required by constitutional practice, and instructions were given to have the two versions of the report printed just as quickly as possible. We hoped it would have been possible to make them public before the end of the year, but that proved to be impossible. We did not think it would be proper, even had it been possible to get them by January 3 or January 4, to have them published two or three days before parliament was meeting. We felt that unless there would be some substantial advantage in having them published before the meeting of parliament, parliamentarians would prefer that they be communicated to them before they were communicated to the press and made public. It was for that reason that we asked the printer to be sure and have them ready so they could be tabled and published at the earliest possible moment after parliament met. I did say that I thought it would be preferable not to have them given out at the same time as the new Leader of the Opposition was making his first speech in parliament, because we did not want the hon. gentleman who has asked the question, or any other hon. gentleman, to suggest that we had endeavoured to blanket the report of the speech the new Leader of the Opposition was to make in parliament.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister now give the house the assurance requested, that there will not be a similar five weeks' delay in the case of the findings of the commission on the diesel problem?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The Prime Minister will give the house the assurance that he will discharge his responsibilities to the best of his ability.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further question to the Prime Minister in relation to his answer about the royal commission on the railway settlement. Does the Prime Minister consider that the terms of reference of the commission would allow the commission to make recommendations to the governor in council that might lie beyond what could be included in an agreement between the company and the union, if the evidence they received made the commissioners feel that was a desirable thing for them to do?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, Mr. Speaker, I would be very surprised if the commission went beyond the requirements of the order in council. If they came to the conclusion that they had received information that was of such importance that they should discuss it and make representations about it, well, I suppose that would be a matter that would be within their discretion. The order in council does not tell them that they must not say anything that is not absolutely required to answer the questions, but I would be surprised if those gentlemen went beyond the task that appears to be assigned to them by the order in council.

CRIMINAL LAW

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTS OF ROYAL COMMISSIONS ON INSANITY AND SEX OFFENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? In view of the fact that about two years ago two royal commissions were set up under the chairmanship of the chief justice of the high court of Ontario to look into the matter of insanity as a defence to various crimes and the problem of sex offenders, how soon may we expect a report from either or both of those commissions?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question I may say that we have one of the reports, and it is being translated into the French language. As soon as the copies of both the English and French texts are available they will be tabled. With regard to the other commission—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Garson: The first commission had to do with insanity as a defence to charges of criminal responsibility. The second one, the one which is still outstanding, has to do with criminal sexual psychopaths. That has not yet come to hand, and on my last checking with the chief justice he rather hesitated to state any definite period within which it was likely to come, but I am hopeful it may be before prorogation.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS MINIMUM PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether he is yet in a position to answer my two questions of Tuesday concerning retired employees of the Canadian National Railways whose pensions are limited to $25 a month? Has he received any further representations concerning this matter? Whether or not such representations have been received, will further consideration be given to the plight of these retired employees?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I promise the hon. gentleman I will give him an answer just as soon as it is possible for me to do so.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to the consideration of certain matters which I deem to be of vital consequence at this time I should like to refer briefly to a newspaper report of yesterday, a report which was referred to before the orders of the day were called today, respecting the development of the Alberta tar sands.

After reading that report I could not help but feel that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys did by omission, if in no other manner, leave the impression with the uninformed that the government of Alberta and the Alberta research council had had nothing to do with the development of this area. Such an impression is completely divorced from the fact. I shall not deal with this matter further at this time, but later on we shall have a good deal to say about it.

On Monday, January 14, Mr. Speaker, we watched and listened with a good deal of interest when the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) addressed this house.

Mr. Ellis: Singing his swan song.

Mr. Shaw: It was a speech liberally garnished with what the newspapers at one time called "Studerisms".

An hon. Member: Stupidisms.

Mr. Shaw: Someone interjected "stupidisms"; that is not an expression I coined. We listened and laughed, but we also do that when we listen to and watch Mickey Mouse and Bugs Bunny. First we intended passing off what he said, but for one or two reasons I find it necessary to give some consideration to it. In the first place I wonder if he did keynote the Liberal campaign for the next election in the course of that speech. That would be quite possible to my way of thinking, because it would be then the type of campaign which the Liberals carried on in both British Columbia and Alberta during the last two provincial elections, campaigns consisting in the main of insinuations, innuendoes and inferences designed to cast doubt and suspicion if indeed they did not result in complete character assassination. We all know that all their charges, if one could call them that, were considered by an impartial royal commission and none was found to be true.

Mr. Byrne: Not in British Columbia.

Mr. Shaw: I am talking about Alberta, and what I say would be equally true in British Columbia. It was the same type of campaign, completely divorced from fact and truth.

Mr. Byrne: In British Columbia the statements have been found to be correct.

Mr. Shaw: Page 207 of Hansard is stained with expressions which seem to me to be completely foreign to the record of a democratic institution. We associate such words as "hypocrite" with the language used by those who support a political philosophy which is causing us our greatest concern in the international sphere, and which constitutes the greatest threat to the peace, security and happiness of democratic thinking people. I feel rather sad that one whom I believe is capable of better things should use such expressions. I find that such expressions—and let us remember they were used in this house and directed at those of us who sit here as Social Crediters—usually can be attributed to one who finds it completely impossible to answer by argument and the presentation of evidence. Such expressions usually come from those who are afraid, and who see before them the early twilight of a short and possibly uneventful political career. I say again that we very much regret their use.

However, there are one or two rather amusing things in connection with that same matter. First let us consider the expression "splinter group". The hon. member said we were a small splinter group, a chip off the Liberal block. Well, I say to him if that small chip can be described by such words as "hypocrites" and "jokesters" what words would he use to describe the entire block itself? I am waiting to hear that. Later on toward the end of his references to us he invited the Social Crediters to come back into the fold, despite the fact that he described us as hypocrites and jokesters. Does he mean to tell us that the Liberal party has deteriorated to the point where even if a small number of hypocrites and jokesters were brought into it this would bring back to it an air of respectability? Perhaps he can answer that question some time.

Mr. Nicholson: He does not have a word to say today.

Mr. Shaw: I am not going to make further reference to that particular part of his speech, Mr. Speaker, but I will say again that language of this kind surely has no place in the records of this house. But let me tell him just one other thing. After all, if we are jokesters and hypocrites as he says we are, it is interesting to remember that each and every Social Credit member sitting here was chosen in preference to the Liberal candidate who ran against him.

Early in his speech the hon. member gave considerable thought, or I should not put it that way; rather he occupied considerable time dealing with agriculture. I have analysed what he said and it amounts to this. Farmers are having difficulties and there are three reasons for it. The first is themselves, the second is the consuming public other than farmers, and the third, those people who did not send Liberal members from every constituency in western Canada. That is what the hon. member's reasoning narrowed down to, and I confess I was amazed at the suggestion that non-Liberal members from western Canada, small in number as they are, could actually prevent the government with its overwhelming majority doing for the western farmers those things which are considered necessary in order to bring stability to their industry. The hon. member as much as admitted that the Liberals who come from western Canada are such poor salesmen that they cannot sell to their government with its overwhelming majority those things which they deem essential for western agriculture.

The hon. member did admit there were a few things wrong and his admission was in these words; what the farmers want are stabilized prices and full production. The hon. member of whom I am speaking and every other Liberal member of this house from time to time over the past number of years has been given ample opportunity to support opposition motions, resolutions and amendments designed to achieve those results, yet look at their record. It is always on the pretext that it is a want of confidence motion, that the poor government will be defeated if it is carried, that the hon. member refuses to vote against such motions, resolutions and amendments. In other words the hon. member says, "My party ahead of the welfare of my people". That is just what it amounts to.

An hon. Member: What does it amount to out in Alberta?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. member said the farmers want crop insurance for those years when there are no crops. He has had ample opportunity to support propositions advanced by us with a view to bringing about that end, but again the record is the same. He said the farmers want unemployment insurance to be extended to farm labour, and the same applies there. He said the farmers want more storage for their grain and equalized freight rates so they are not penalized because of where they live. There has been ample opportunity over the years during which he and his colleagues have occupied seats in this house to support measures designed to bring about those results, but in all cases the record is the same; "the safety of my party and the position it occupies in the house ahead of the welfare of those whom I should be prepared to jeopardize my own position to help."

Mr. Studer: Could I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Speaker, I object to any interruption.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I advise hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor may not of course be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. member said, "May I answer you?" No, he may not, because it is my time. Why waste time?

Mr. Lesage: He said, "May I ask a question?"

An hon. Member: What do you know about it?

Mr. Lesage: I heard it.

Mr. Ellis: How many speakers are there in the house?

Mr. Shaw: Shall I proceed?

An hon. Member: With what?

Mr. Shaw: Reference was made by the hon. member to another matter, and I feel it essential that I also make reference to it. For what reason or for what purpose or with what fear I am not certain, but he referred to the so-called sterilization law. He did not say so, but he definitely left the impression that this legislation had been sponsored by the Alberta Social Credit government and put on the statute books during their tenure of office. That is not true.

Mr. Studer: There were amendments.

Mr. Shaw: That legislation was put on the statute books of Alberta by the government which preceded the present government. That legislation was endorsed by the legislative assembly of the province. It came into being as a consequence of widespread requests. It has been used most sparingly and with tremendous care, and applies only to the mentally ill and then only where treatment has failed. Administration is under a medical board with representation from women's organizations. The consent of relatives is necessary. I emphasize that it applies only to the mentally ill when treatment has failed. Why the hon. member said that if he came under the jurisdiction of such legislation he would immediately jump in the ocean and start swimming remains for him to explain.

I wish to make only one other reference to the speech of the hon. member. I do not know that I can figure out what this means, as it is really a confusion of words. As far as I know it has not been corrected. Nevertheless I am going to read it as it appears on page 207 of Hansard of January 14. The hon. member is reported as having said:

> Did you read the recent commission's report in New Zealand, where there was a Social Credit government of what Social Credit is?

I am not suggesting that he was not mistaken or misquoted—perhaps it was taken down incorrectly—but that is as it appears. I know what he was referring to. He was referring to a dispatch which came out of New Zealand written by Douglas Leiterman of the Ottawa bureau of the Southam news service, I believe dated December 27, 1956. I am rather surprised that he did not have that dispatch before him.

The dispatch referred to a royal commission which had been set up to examine into monetary policy and so on. Of course if one had gone back to read of the events leading up to it and had read the evidence, as I have, he would know that the commission had been set up for one purpose only, to try to destroy the Social Credit movement in that country, a movement which had been able to secure 14 per cent of the national vote in the 1954 election.

The heading of this dispatch is all wrong because it says "Royal commission killed Social Credit." No royal commission can kill Social Credit; no inquiry can kill Social Credit. Hearings have been held here, but with what result? There has been a steady increase in the membership and growth and strength of the movement. It will interest the hon. member to know that never has the New Zealand association had a larger membership than it has now, never has it been in a better financial position.

Then the next headline is, "Nobody even laughs at it anymore." I can remember the days when there was much laughter in this country, but people laughed only when we were weak. They quit laughing when they realized that as a force in the affairs of this nation we were no longer a joke. If it is true that nobody laughs any more we can take that as one of the best signs based on our experience in Canada.

There is another thing I want to mention about this dispatch. Is our next election going to be characterized by guided political missiles? I understand that the Minister of National Health and Welfare went on a rather lengthy tour. Fine; I support the idea. He was cementing friendly relations, which is a good and admirable objective. He participated in Colombo plan discussions, which was an admirable thing. It was also admirable that he should take other people along, some to publicize his trip.

However, to the extent that Canadian taxpayers may have in any way financed Mr. Leiterman's trip, even if only by providing free transportation, I object. I object to that sort of thing because the report is designed deliberately for one purpose and one purpose only at this time, on the eve of an election. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has demonstrated the purpose for which it is to be used. I object as a Canadian taxpayer and as a Social Crediter to having any part of my taxes used, if such were the case, to finance any part of a newspaperman's flight from here to other countries of the earth if this sort of thing might be the purpose behind it.

Knowing the Minister of National Health and Welfare as I do, I realize that he probably knew nothing about this. He was thinking in terms of the great sphere of international politics, not national politics. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare would be the first to object to this sort of thing. Maybe someone in the government will inform me whether Mr. Leiterman received free transportation or anything else by way of service and so on which would be charged back to the Canadian taxpayer. I would like to know. Free transportation must be included, because we the taxpayers must finance the cost of the Canadian aircraft which was used and the many thousands of gallons of gasoline which were consumed.

Reference was made by my leader to the effect upon the present economy of the present system of credit controls. The thing which has surprised me is the condemnation which has come from many quarters of this country of the way in which this particular policy has been applied. One of the most interesting editorials I have read came out in Saint John on October 24. It was included in The Fundy Fisherman. This editorial states:

> In announcing another raise in the bank rate last week the Bank of Canada showed an utter disregard for public opinion here in the east and the strong protests that have come from the different parts of Canada against high interest rates, which protests the Bank of Canada simply ignored. This is about the sixth time that bank rates have been increased in little more than a year and now . . . the people of Canada are being saddled with the highest interest rates that have been paid in over a quarter of a century.

Let me just go on to read a significant assertion like this:

> The directors of the Bank of Canada have never given any sensible reason for their action.

Further down it says:

> The different regions of Canada are represented on the board of the bank but it appears that these directors have nothing to say—they are all as "mum as an oyster".

Later the article goes on:

> It seems to be clearly a case of taxes being imposed on citizens without representation.

And still further on:

> The cost of living is inflated by abnormal interest rates in the same way as it is by extra taxes.

Then the article stresses this:

> No inflation exists in this part of Canada.

I do not know whether that is a statement of fact, but considering all the reports which have come to us from that part of Canada, reports given to us in this house, it is suggested that there is a substantial element of truth in this statement. I quote again from this editorial:

> The people of the eastern provinces are a careful and saving people and have invested many hundreds of millions of dollars in bonds of different kinds, especially bonds of our various governments, federal and provincial. We have many large and small investors, especially the latter, all of whom have bought these bonds in good faith.
>
> Just consider where these bondholders stand now. Their losses are appalling, all owing to the Bank of Canada's action in raising interest rates to the highest level in the generation. Millions untold have been lost by small investors who can ill afford to shoulder such losses.
>
> Government bonds that were sold to investors at par are now worth in the market place between 80 and 85 cents on the dollar. It may be all right to say that if the people who invested their savings hold their bonds until they come due 15 or 20 years hence they will be redeemed at par, but tens of thousands of investors cannot wait. They have children to educate with their savings, hospital bills to pay and possibly a house under construction and many other obligations to meet.

Further on still the article continues:

> Bonds to finance new projects such as we have now under way in the maritimes are next to impossible to sell, except at a great discount, which makes the cost of the money derived from the bonds far too high a cost for the venture capital that is absolutely necessary for these new enterprises.

The editorial concludes by saying this:

> A trail of lost hopes and wreckage is bound to follow in the wake of a usurious bank rate as far as our maritime provinces are concerned.

Mr. Speaker, that is only one of the editorials which have appeared in publications in various parts of Canada. Another significant aspect of the subject is this, that such controls are actually not proving effective. Pick up almost any newspaper any day and you will find a list of many commodities, many of them in daily use, the prices of which have again moved up. This policy is not proving effective; in fact it is making it difficult if not impossible to carry out other aspects of government policy such as housing. Some of the most devastating charges have been made with respect to the effect of this policy upon Canadian housing. The Minister of Public Works is, on the one hand, endeavouring to expand his house-building program to meet urgent needs, while on the other hand the policy of the Bank of Canada is making it virtually impossible for the program to succeed.

Thus it goes on. The whole situation is in fact developing into one where we find an irresistible force working against an immovable object. Let hon. members figure out what the consequences of that may be. That is the position into which we are rapidly moving now because of the blanket application of the credit restriction policy.

Surely the responsible minister of the government will have something to say about the suggestion which came from the leader of this group with respect to the application of selective credit controls.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer for a moment to the subject of old age pensions. Call it our welfare program if you like. It is highly significant that after a number of years so many supporters of the government, Liberal members, should now be standing here and urging an increase in the basic pensions payable to our people. That is fine. I sometimes wonder why some of them did not start a long time ago, and I am certain in my own mind that they would not be doing it now if they had not been given a tip-off on certain proposed action on the part of the government.

If the government is going to act, I might ask why was such intention not set out in the speech from the throne. The answer to that is easy. The government will say that it did not really intend, at the time it brought down the speech, to take any action along these lines; but all the speeches from Liberal members have persuaded them that it is in the public interest. I can just hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare making the announcement; I can see his speech as though it had already been prepared.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we shall support such a proposition; in fact, we have urged it for years. The $40 basic pension paid now is not worth as much as the $20 when it was first paid in my province in 1929. In the most recent cost of living index it is reported that food is one of the commodities which have contributed toward the further increase in living costs. The situation, as we have pointed out for so long, is desperate. In only three provinces in Canada have pension recipients received any additional income since this $40 basic pension was brought into operation. In Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia the pensioners secure substantially more than the basic $40, and there is not a Liberal government in any one of those three provinces.

An hon. Member: Thank God.

Mr. Studer: You are using Liberal money.

Mr. Shaw: That is an indication of just how thorough the hon. member's knowledge of the whole situation is. There is no section of Canada which has contributed more to the welfare of this nation or to our national economy than the province of Alberta. They have paid for more than this government has ever given or is ever likely to hand back to the people of that province.

Mr. Studer: Then distribute it.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Speaker, without the provinces there would be no Canada as such. The strength of this nation has come from the provinces and what has been done within the provinces. Sometimes I wonder why it is that over the years the national government has wormed its way more and more into the activities and fields of provincial jurisdiction. Is it so they could hand back a pittance, a few dollars, to the provinces and then claim credit for everything that was being done in the provinces.

We have seen that in connection with hospital construction. True, the national government is contributing toward hospital construction, but you could not build one hospital with what they give. The municipalities bear part of the burden. Ottawa says, "We will hand this much back to you if the provincial governments will match it dollar for dollar". They are giving us nothing. They are handing back to us part of what they have taken from us.

Nothing in this day and age, Mr. Speaker, short of an additional $20 a month to the recipients of old age security, a purely federal responsibility, will suffice. Nothing short of authorization to the provincial governments to increase the basic pension under the Old Age Assistance Act by $20 will suffice. There will still be some fringe difficulties, but at least we will be recognizing a need and we will be assuming our responsibility to our pioneer citizens.

I am going to move an amendment, Mr. Speaker, but before doing so may I suggest that there are people who will give lip service to certain propositions but who are strangely absent when it comes to a question of giving their open support. We feel that the members of this house should be given the opportunity to show clearly where they stand. For that reason I move, seconded by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smith):

> That the amendment be amended by inserting after the word "parliament" the following words:
> "and, by reason of their failure to take effective action to stop the continuous rise in the cost of living; their failure to lay down and follow policies under which Canadian farmers and other primary producers can enjoy an equitable share of the prosperity which Canada can achieve; and their failure to bring old age pensions and other social security payments into line with the present cost of living."

Here is a great opportunity—

An hon. Member: Contradictory.

Mr. Shaw: —for members of the house to face up to things in a practical manner. Some Liberal is going to say that this is a want of confidence motion. Well, what if it is; what if we defeat them? Their days are numbered anyway. Why let them suffer longer? Let us put them out in the interests of those who are crying for our consideration. I should like to know where the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek will stand on this amendment.

Mr. Studer: At least I will produce some of the money you are willing to spend.

Mr. Shaw: You know, Mr. Speaker, we can say this for the hon. member. As I said earlier, like Mickey Mouse or Bugs Bunny he can give us plenty of cause to laugh.

Mr. Studer: Like Aberhart.

Mr. Shaw: We are certain that those who desire to do so can manufacture some good reason for not supporting our amendment. It will be nothing new.

Mr. Studer: The government of Alberta will not support an opposition member's motion.

Mr. Wylie: Oh, you keep quiet.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. member is always ready to speak about Alberta, even though he has not yet demonstrated a knowledge of what is going on there, though he is close enough to the province that he should know.

Mr. Studer: Nothing is going on there.

Mr. Shaw: Speaking of Alberta, I am going to give the hon. member a suggestion. He is looking for advice, and I presume he is looking for election issues. Undoubtedly he would like some good advice for the next federal election.

Mr. Studer: Where would I get it?

Mr. Shaw: Do not make the mistake that was made in the last provincial election. In my riding the president of the Alberta Liberal association went on the air and urged the electorate to support the president of the Alberta Progressive Conservative association, who happened to be a candidate in that constituency. It was one of the most fantastic things I have ever witnessed. I do not blame the Conservative candidate for accepting their support. I do not blame him for going on the air and thanking the president of the Alberta Liberal association for having done that. I think he felt that he owed them something.

I say to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek that instead of bothering and worrying himself over things about which he has not much knowledge, he should concentrate on trying to resolve some of these situations. Possibly Liberal candidates in western Canada may then become more acceptable to the general electorate. I trust that our amendment will secure the support of the entire house. I think members of the house generally would be thanked by a large cross section of the Canadian public.

Mr. Albert Lavigne (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) who so ably moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Translation):

I also wish to congratulate sincerely the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who fulfilled his task so well in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

(Text):

To the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) I offer my sincere congratulations on his success within his party. I wish also to pay tribute to my predecessor who so ably represented the county of Stormont for close to 20 years and who today, as an employee of this government, is administering the business of the St. Lawrence seaway in a most efficient manner. We in Stormont are proud of his achievements, and I am sure that all Canadians will remember him for many years to come.

I am happy to note in the throne speech that it is the intention of the government to come to the aid of municipalities by authorizing payments of grants in lieu of taxes on federal properties receiving normal municipal services. I am sure the electors of Stormont who will benefit by this legislation will be forever grateful to this government.

I should like to thank the members of the house in the name of the people of my riding for passing legislation that will bring about favourable changes in the county of Stormont and the city of Cornwall. I am referring to the St. Lawrence seaway development that will bring to our boundaries ocean navigation and a power potential which, along with our labour pool and the future availability of natural gas delivered by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, will make this area most advantageous for the establishment of industries which, I am sure, will find in our municipality co-operation and advantages unknown elsewhere.

I want to congratulate the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour for their efforts in settling the recent railway strike.

In the northern part of the county of Stormont we have a group of people who earn their living by means of mixed farming, most of their products finding a market in the cities of Cornwall and Montreal. However, the county is known especially for the quantity and quality of its cheese production. For many years Stormont has been one of the chief cheese-producing counties in Ontario, and from recent reports it is still in that category. In the matter of quality I should like to refer to the achievements of Mr. Harold Montgomery, who for the past two years has won trophies emblematic of the best entries in a commonwealth-wide competition. To the south we have the development of the St. Lawrence river and the power project, which stretches from the eastern extremity to the western boundary of the county.

We are in an area of great activity and prosperity. We have great confidence in the future development of our county. However, we find, like all other places which have experienced rapid development, that we lack certain transportation facilities which will be needed if we are to keep pace with our industrial potential. I am referring, Mr. Speaker, to airport and certain harbour facilities which will be urgently needed in this area.

I have no intention of dealing with the problems of all the industries in Cornwall and the surrounding area. May I acquaint you with the industries in this area and their products so you may know of the contribution which is being made to the national economy. Courtaulds (Canada) Limited manufacturer of rayon, artificial silk, and tenasco, a relatively new product that goes into the manufacture of tires and other allied products. We have the Howard Smith Paper Mills, Canadian Industries Limited, with whose products I think you are all familiar, Dominion Tar and Chemical "no-co-rode pipe", Kemkall-Bishop, citric acid, T.C.F., transparent cellulose film, Howards & Sons, chemicals, and many others whose products are sold locally.

In the city of Cornwall we have an important branch of the cotton industry. We have established in Cornwall Canadian Cottons and Dundas Mills, and more recently Dundas annex. Employed in this industry are an important number of citizens who have to work under the fear of a lay-off and under conditions inferior to others, because the industry has to compete with imports from subsidized and cheap labour countries.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to appeal, on behalf of the people who are employed in the cotton industry, to the government so they may live and work without fear of a lay-off at unexpected times, and so they may have better working conditions. I hope this matter will be given serious consideration and, if we are responsible for this situation let us rectify it so the cotton mill employees may enjoy the same privileges and the same security enjoyed in other industries.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, in deference to representations which have been made to me by a group of my constituents, I feel I should deal with the question of family allowances, a social security measure instituted by a Liberal government in 1945, and one whose benefits are well known.

In answer to those who insist upon a new increase in the basic allowance, I might say that the Liberal party having put forward this social security measure twelve years ago will know how to improve it in due course. However, the question is not without its importance since family allowances at the present time take up $400,000,000 out of the total annual budget.

Family allowances have not only raised the standard of living of our people, more particularly that of our large families, but they have stimulated Canadian economy by increasing the purchasing power of an incalculable number of Canadians without, on the other hand, constituting too heavy a load on taxpayers as a whole.

Since the institution of family allowances Canadians, especially those of the working classes, are better clothed, better fed and better housed. Moreover, the intellectual level of our people, thanks to greater educational possibilities, has been notably increased. It's all to the credit of the people of Canada, in the way of national culture.

It cannot be denied that the cost of living has greatly increased since 1945, when family allowances were brought in. Since then, there have been constant adjustments in wages and prices in general so it would probably be time to think of a new adjustment of family allowances.

Consequently, so that family allowances might again have the purchasing power they had in 1945, I urge the government to raise the amounts, and I do so on behalf of large families, which, as is well known, are not always the most privileged but are nonetheless the human potential on which rests the future of Canada. The government is duty-bound to think first of the human person whose natural surrounding is the family, the cell of society.

I should be very glad if that adjustment were made at this session and I do hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will be able to implement that request from a representative who is mindful of the welfare of the families of his constituency.

(Text):

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, since the appearance of the Gordon report a few days ago it has been seriously studied in all parts of the country. It represents a great deal of work, both on the part of the members of the commission and also by those who submitted briefs and who appeared before the commission. The report gives us an opportunity to have a look into what we might expect to see happen here in Canada during the next 25 years.

The main purpose of the government in setting up this commission and in having it make its report just before a general election is to attempt to create in the minds of the public the idea that all the good things which the report forecasts will take place in the next 25 years, and will take place only if this government is returned to office.

Mr. Lesage: It is the only way.

Mr. Hees: The report has been made close enough to the general election with the purpose in mind that the government can slip and slide around the tricky questions, and thus avoid answering whether it intends to implement any of the proposals contained in the report. Instead it can simply indicate during the election campaign that if the Liberal government is returned to office all of these things, and I mean all of them, will come to pass.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this report is mainly political. It is, in short terms, election bait. It is a desperate attempt on the part of the government to cover up the many things which the government knows it should have done and has not done, by dangling before the eyes of the voting public the attractive vision of things which can be expected to come to pass some time in the next 25 years. It is going to be put to the voting public by liberal speakers on platforms from one end of this country to the other that all they have to do is vote Liberal, re-elect this government, and these things will be done immediately.

I think, however, Mr. Speaker, that the voting public has become wise to the Liberal techniques. They know that what they are going to hear is nothing but the usual tripe, and that there is no basis in fact for what they are going to be told. The Liberal party will find in the next election that this form of approach falls like a lead balloon.

Now, of course, Mr. Speaker, anything that is detrimental to the government, such as its tight money policy, has been conveniently left out of this report. The fact that this policy is hamstringing the construction industry and denying to young married couples the homes they so desperately need in which to bring up their families, has been conveniently forgotten. There is also no mention of the fact that a great deal of unemployment and many bankruptcies have been caused by this stupid policy which the government has insisted on pursuing.

Now, of course, it is well known that the chairman, Mr. Gordon, will soon be rewarded for the political chore which he has performed so well by being invited into the cabinet. Very soon we can expect him to take his place beside the other members of the cabinet as the new minister of defence production. The plan, of course, is that he will soon take over the complete portfolio of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that is the bait that was used. It is too bad; I am sorry his term of office will be cut so short, because it is pretty well recognized by those who observe political matters closely that the term of office of this government will end on June 17 next.

Mr. Bennett: Did you see the Gallup poll?

Mr. Hees: One thing this report does tell us is that during the next 25 years the consumption of power in this country will increase by three times. Because this government has no power or energy policy, this report has been very careful not to make any embarrassing suggestions of a specific kind as to what the government could and should do in order to assist the provinces develop this greatly enlarged quantity of power that will be needed. Since there is also no mention of any proposed legislation in the speech from the throne which will assist the provinces to develop power and natural resources within their borders, we must expect for the next few months a continuation of the government's do nothing, hope and grope policy in this regard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you might well ask at this point, what should the government do? In New Brunswick it should start immediately —it should have started a long time ago—to assist Premier Hugh John Flemming to develop the half million potential horsepower on the Saint John river by backing his power development bonds and enabling him to obtain the money which he needs at a considerably lower rate of interest.

Mr. Lesage: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: Is the hon. member aware that we are still waiting for the data on the possible storage on the Tobique river that we were promised by the government of New Brunswick some months ago in order to be in a position to make a decision on the request of that government?

Mr. Hees: My information is that you have had information on that subject for a long time.

Mr. Lesage: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hees: We differ. My information is that you have it.

Mr. Lesage: I have not received it. I am the one who would know, and I have not received it.

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, we shall just have to agree to disagree, because my information is completely different.

Mr. Lesage: I am the one who is supposed to receive it.

Mr. Hees: You are supposed to, but you do not seem to know.

Mr. Lesage: I have not received anything.

Mr. Hees: As I was saying before I was so rudely interrupted, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is hard to be rude to the hon. member.

Mr. Hees: This policy would not cost the government one penny, and it would save the taxpayers of New Brunswick several million dollars a year.

Mr. Lesage: There is no definite project.

Mr. Hees: It would also help the premier of New Brunswick to produce power, which is badly needed; to attract industries to his province; and to enable that province to smelt their newly-found ores. This new power, which must be produced in the near future, will provide many thousands of additional jobs for the people of New Brunswick, and it will materially increase the standard of living of the people in that province.

However, Mr. Speaker, it has become very clear that this government is not interested in helping a Conservative government industrialize a province which badly needs industries. It might help the present government of New Brunswick stay in office and that, in the view of the federal Liberal government, is something which must be avoided at all costs. This is simply a return to the King doctrine of 1930, when he proclaimed that he would not give a five-cent piece to any province which had a Conservative government. Today we see the King doctrine of 1930 brought up to date. This is the St. Laurent doctrine of 1957; no help to any province that is not a Liberal province.

Mr. Nesbitt: He will not be helping many.

Mr. Hees: He will not be helping many. If Premier Campbell gets up his nerve and calls an election in Manitoba there will be one less. I will make a bet with any Liberal member that when that election does take place, Duff Roblin will become the premier of Manitoba, and all you will have left will be Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. You are going to lose Prince Edward Island pretty soon. After that the Liberal party will be able to refer to Newfoundland as the island stronghold. That is all you will have, and it will not be long before you will lose that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would you like to make a little bet about that?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: You must have a lot of money.

Mr. Hees: Similar assistance to what I have suggested for New Brunswick would be of great help to the people of Saskatchewan in building the South Saskatchewan dam, which has been on the books for so long but which has been held up because the present federal government has refused to give any assistance whatsoever to the government of Saskatchewan. This dam will make possible half a million acres of irrigated land, and will transform the present half million acres of marginal wheat land into market garden crop land. It will be of great benefit to the province of Saskatchewan. It will also make available more than a quarter of a million horsepower of cheap hydroelectric power, which will make it possible to bring industries to Saskatchewan to diversify the economy of that province, and increase greatly the standard of living of the people there.

Is this government interested in making these things possible? Of course not, because in Saskatchewan there is a C.C.F. government, and if this help were made available it might help that government stay in power. As far as the Liberal government in Ottawa is concerned that must be avoided at all costs.

Then out in British Columbia this kind of assistance would be of great help in aiding them to build the Mica dam on the Columbia river. That dam will produce a million and a half horsepower of badly needed hydroelectric power. In 10 years British Columbia will be short of electric power; it will be short of all types of power unless something is done to produce additional power immediately. It will take eight years of engineering to build the Mica dam; therefore there are only two years of leeway to avoid a serious power shortage in British Columbia, which would hamstring the industrial progress of that province.

Mr. Lesage: Engineering studies are going on now.

Mr. Hees: I ask, has this government proffered any assistance to the province of British Columbia?

Mr. Lesage: We have given them engineering service and we are still giving it.

Mr. Hees: What about backing their power bonds?

Mr. Lesage: That is a stage we have not reached.

Mr. Hees: Are you going to back their power bonds?

Mr. Lesage: This is government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. Hees: That is the kind of answer we get. That is typical of this government.

Mr. Lesage: What help could be given up to now has been given.

Mr. Hees: The government say that in the future, when it is convenient, they will announce to the house what they are going to do. In other words we are going to do nothing, but we just do not like to say so; that is all. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is about time this government stopped playing politics with power development—

Mr. Lesage: That is what you are doing.

Mr. Hees: —and went ahead with a national development policy which would give assistance to provinces to develop power and other natural resources within their borders; helping the provinces to get ahead and help themselves and increase the standards of living of their own people.

Mr. Lesage: You had better go and talk to Duplessis about that.

Mr. Hees: Turning now to another subject, what is the attitude of this government toward the welfare of the people? I think that question can be best answered by looking at the treatment the old age pensioner in Canada is receiving today. In 1950 this parliament, and I underline the words "this parliament" and not the government, decided to give the old age pensioner $40 to buy the goods and services which they desperately needed in order to carry on after the age of 70, and this was voted for by every hon. member of this house.

There is no magic in the figure $40. It was decided upon because at that time it would buy a certain quantity of the necessities of life, and it was that quantity of those necessities of life which this parliament decided to make available to the old age pensioner. Today you need $47 to buy exactly the same quantity of goods and services that you could buy for $40 in 1950. In other words the pension today, in terms of what it would buy in 1950, is worth only $33. This means that the standard of living of those relying on the old age pension has materially decreased. We in the opposition have pleaded year after year for an increase in the old age pension, and have brought up actual cases by which we demonstrated to the government the needs of the old age pensioners. The government showed nothing but callous disregard for these people. Now the government has suddenly come to the realization that they are facing an election, and with it has come the equally startling realization that old age pensioners have votes.

Mr. Dufresne: Everybody is talking about that now.

Mr. Hees: They have done nothing about it in the past because old age pensioners are unable to organize themselves and bring pressure to bear on the government, but old age pensioners do not have to be organized in an election. They simply go to the ballot box and mark an X. That is what this government are afraid of, so what have they decided to do? They have definitely decided to increase the old age pension, and my estimate is that the pension is going to be increased to something like $55 before this election. Mark my words, that is going to be done; and it will not be done through any love of the old age pensioner but simply because the government are afraid to go into the election and face the ire of those whom they have callously disregarded over the past three or four years.

Mr. Dufresne: It will be done out of love for the Liberal party.

Mr. Knowles: To what amount does the hon. member think the pension should be increased?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, this kind of philosophy that leads the government to take action only through fear of what will happen to them in an election if they do not take that action demonstrates clearly the political bankruptcy of this stumbling, bumbling, fumbling group of men who call themselves the government of Canada and whose only policy is the policy of hope and grope. It is high time that this old gang, this tired, worn-out old gang, this group who are ready to move to that rest home down the hall—

Mr. Lesage: Thank you, George.

Mr. Hees: —were permitted to go there; and because of the magnanimity of the Conservative party we will take you all into consideration for posts in the Senate when we kick you out on June 17, because that is where you have been preparing yourselves to go.

An hon. Member: What a dream.

Mr. Hees: It is about time this government, this weary group of men, were replaced by a Conservative government whose first consideration is always going to be for the welfare of—

Mr. Pickersgill: Themselves.

Mr. Hees: —the people all the time, and not just before an election. In addition, a Conservative government will implement the national development policy which we spelled out in this house at the last session—

Mr. Pickersgill: In that wonderful platform of yours.

Mr. Hees: —and which will assist in the development of power and natural resources. Cheap power will be made available in that way. The Conservative government will also introduce the sensible taxation policies which we have enunciated in this house previously, and which are completely contrary to the taxation policies of this present government. These policies will induce Canadians and those from other lands to invest their money in building secondary industries in every part of this country. These secondary industries will process a far larger proportion of our raw materials, materials which today, with the complete approval of this government, we are shipping out of the country to feed factories in foreign lands, and provide employment and profits which should belong to Canada.

We will build an industrial nation, where this government is perfectly satisfied to see this country remain primarily a producer of raw materials. We in the Conservative party believe that Canadian men and women, working in Canadian factories, can produce finished articles just as well as British, American, Dutch, French, German or any other workmen, working in factories in their own countries, with the Canadian raw materials which we so gladly supply to them. We also believe that an aggressive selling effort on the part of Canadians generally, led by this government, will enable Canadians to obtain a large part of the world's export markets.

Our national development policy and our industrial expansion policy will make possible jobs for all Canadians who wish to work at steadily increasing rates of pay. They will make possible increased social security payments on a sound economic basis by enlarging the sources which pay for social security. They will make it possible to bring to this country many thousands of additional people with exceptional skills and talents to fill jobs which there are not enough Canadians to fill because, with an industrial expansion of this kind, we are going to need many more people than we have or can supply ourselves. This increased population will broaden the tax base and make it possible to lower the burden on individual taxpayers. In other words, Mr. Speaker, these policies will enable this country to develop to its full potential.

In conclusion I just want to say this. On June 17 next I have a birthday, and it gives me great pleasure in contemplation to realize that in addition to celebrating my own birthday on that date, I and all members of my party that evening are going to be able to celebrate the birthday of the next Conservative government.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, I hesitated to interrupt the hon. gentleman in his bedtime story, but I wonder if he would now permit me to ask a question.

Mr. Hees: Certainly.

Mr. Goode: Would he tell me the date on which the British Columbia government asked the federal government to guarantee power bonds to build the Mica dam?

Mr. Hees: I do not know the date, but I know very well they are very anxious to have that kind of assistance.

Mr. Goode: They did not ask for it. Will he tell me if the British Columbia government have offered to back their power bonds?

Mr. Hees: If the Social Credit premier of British Columbia has not asked for that kind of assistance, he is even sillier than I thought he was.

Mr. Lesage: That is your judgment.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in common with other hon. members who have preceded me in this debate I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply upon their fine contributions to this debate. I am sure their constituents had every reason to appreciate the distinction with which the important task assigned to them was discharged.

I believe that we as representatives of the people of Canada are in position to express gratification over the continued economic expansion of this nation, an expansion which is likely to bring increasing material rewards and provide cultural and spiritual opportunities for an ever-growing number of Canadians. I noted that yesterday in his excellent address the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre pointed out that one of the chief domestic problems in this country was the problem of inflation. It is interesting to remember that for a 20-year period prior to 1940 the chief preoccupation of all democratic assemblies in every part of the world was the problem of deflation or mass unemployment.

I think at the present time we have every justification for feeling that the concentrated research and efforts made to overcome the problem of mass unemployment have yielded great results, and that in Canada in the future we are not likely to face this type of terrible dislocation. If that is so, I venture to suggest that in the future this parliament will show a growing concern that the fruits of our economic abundance shall be more fully shared by all classes and regions of this country.

Gross national product, net national product, national income, disposal income; all these are growing beyond the wildest expectations, and as aggregate measures of our national welfare are quoted to show that Canadians are better off than ever before. However, we are not representatives of economic aggregates, we are representatives of people. Although we rejoice at the general growth in our economy, we would be derelict in our duty and responsibility if we did not take measures to guarantee that all classes and regions of the country share in the general prosperity.

I wish at this point to express my appreciation to the government and especially to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour for bringing an end to the railway strike. The settlement was reached through the process of mediation and within the procedures of free collective bargaining. I am glad the government refrained from imposing a settlement in this situation. However, although the settlement of the strike makes us all breathe easier, there are still issues remaining resulting from this important national incident.

It seems to me that the railway strike has focused attention on a very important aspect of collective bargaining, namely the relationship between free collective bargaining and the public interest or national welfare. We in this country believe in the process of free collective bargaining. We believe that employers and employees should settle their disputes by negotiation, mediation or ultimately through inflicting economic losses on the other party through a strike or lockout. These procedures are at the very root of our conception of free collective bargaining. Indeed in the United States those assumptions were explicitly written in the first Wagner act.

It would be a bad thing for free labour and free enterprise in this country if the procedures of collective bargaining were impaired or destroyed. At the same time, what made this strike so important in the field of collective bargaining was the feeling that in some way the national welfare or the public health and safety of the nation were threatened. As I said at the outset, the conflict presented by this strike was in a sense a conflict between the continued exercise of free collective bargaining and the interests of the nation as those interests are reflected in the health and welfare of its citizens.

In this case because of the intervention of the Prime Minister the strike did not move to its final conclusion, nor was there any imposition of compulsory arbitration. Nevertheless the issue still remains, and it seems to me that when the passion and prejudice of a strike of this kind disappear the whole problem of the emergency or the public welfare aspect should become the subject of investigation by the industrial relations committee of this house.

Other states, particularly in the United States, have made some effort to deal with the emergency aspect. I refer in particular to legislation of the state of New Jersey. In that legislation definite procedures are laid down setting forth the method by which the state can cope with emergency disputes. One of the real problems in this whole area is to define what is actually an emergency dispute, in other words what type of dispute threatens the public interest and the health and welfare of the nation.

Under the New Jersey act a 60-day cooling and mediation period is provided for, including hearings, in connection with all labour disputes in "public utilities." Of course that phrase is subject to very broad definition. Seizure and compulsory arbitration may be invoked if any strike, work stoppage or lockout in the opinion of the governor might result in the failure to continue the operation of a public utility and threaten the public interest, health and welfare.

It is very difficult to define exactly what strike will actually threaten public interest, health and welfare. Certainly every strike involves economic losses. In many strikes involving non-public utilities there are very grave and heavy economic losses. As an illustration of the difficulty of defining the nature of public emergency I should like to refer to a strike which occurred in New Jersey in 1947, when the employees of the Bell Telephone system went on strike and completely interrupted the telephone service. The attorney general of New Jersey stated:

> It is of course axiomatic that the telephone service is essential in the life of present-day civilization.

Later the supreme court of New Jersey agreed that in the economic and social life of today a method of communication such as the telephone was a vital and indispensable essential to the health, safety and welfare of the public. On the other hand, in the state of Massachusetts the governor, who at that time had a very outstanding labour management committee, asked an opinion of this body and they held that the absence of the telephone service would not jeopardize the public health and public safety.

The first problem in this particular area is to determine just what type of strike is involved, the magnitude of the economic loss and whether the extent of the inconvenience caused to the public would be such as to impair the public health and safety. I have not heard or read of any serious effort in this particular dispute to set forth the elements of what truly constitutes a national emergency arising from a labour dispute.

There has been a great deal said in this house and elsewhere both for and against the imposition of compulsory arbitration, and in discussing compulsory arbitration it seems to me the first consideration is the effect that compulsory arbitration is likely to have on collective bargaining itself. The best studies made of the experience in New Jersey reflect the opinion that instead of making agreement through negotiation easier, compulsory arbitration makes negotiation more difficult for both parties and undermines to some extent the process of collective bargaining. This is because, first of all, the disputants prepare for arbitration rather than for negotiation. The second reason—and all agree on this; labour, management and state—is that any reasonable effort made to reach a settlement by one party is usually taken by the other as a basis for bringing the dispute to arbitration in order to get a better settlement.

In Canada we have a set of rules applicable to collective bargaining in general, but no special set of rules which apply to both public utilities and emergency disputes. The whole area is very clouded and subject to a great deal of confusion. My own opinion is that it is not a healthy situation in the field of collective bargaining to have uncertainty with regard to the method of settling such disputes, and to have the whole argument reaching the Prime Minister's office where only the prestige and the skill of the Prime Minister himself can be used to provide the final momentum in settling difficulties of this nature.

I can think of no better subject for study by the industrial relations committee of this house than this problem of emergency disputes and the best possible procedure that can be used to settle them, consistent with the preservation of the best interests of free collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker, many members of this house have already referred to the royal commission on economic prospects, and its report has become the subject of discussion all over Canada. It has been of particular interest to the Atlantic region, because many people from the Atlantic provinces felt that this commission would do for Canada what the Rowell-Sirois commission did for this country at an earlier period. The Rowell-Sirois commission, I believe, presented an economic and moral defence for the present fiscal arrangements and the present welfare community which has strengthened and made possible the continuation of the federation in this country.

It was my own feeling that the Gordon commission would attempt to set forth a particular program of economic redevelopment in the Atlantic provinces combined with a series of policy recommendations that could become the basis of legislative action by this parliament. The royal commission does recognize the necessity of such an approach to the problems of the Atlantic region. It states as follows:

> What is required is a positive and comprehensive approach to the problems of the Atlantic region. With this as an objective it is suggested that the people of Canada as a whole might be willing to assist the people of the Atlantic provinces in discovering, developing and making the best use of resources in that area.

It is very hard to make fair comment on the suggestions in this section of the report in the absence of the supporting studies of the commission and, in particular, in the absence of the analyses which guided the commissioners in reaching their conclusions. I am particularly interested in awaiting the study and contribution by Dr. Howland on the regional aspects of Canada's economic development. However, I believe general disappointment was felt that the Gordon commission had failed to present at this stage a general program for maritime economic development.

The expectations of many, including myself, were not realized in this report. There is no integrated program for maritime redevelopment; there is no examination of the commercial and monetary policies pursued by the government that might have a favourable or adverse effect on the economy of the Atlantic region. And finally, there are no recommendations for stimulating the private sector of the economy in the Atlantic region. I have a feeling that the commission, for some reason, is out of step with the objectives of the Atlantic provinces economic council, which is now beginning a very comprehensive effort to solve some of the problems of the maritime region.

I hope the commissioners, who yet have to complete their final report, will remedy what seems to me to be a very vital deficiency in the preliminary report, namely the absence of a comprehensive and integrated program which might form the basis of maritime recovery.

Nevertheless there are one or two things mentioned in the commission's report which might form the basis for some discussion. The commission recommends the setting up of a capital projects commission to which the federal government would be expected to make annual contributions, and from which might be expected to evolve recommendations as to how public projects should be developed in the Atlantic region.

I cannot comment for the province of Newfoundland or, indeed, for any other province, but it seems to me that in the field of public projects the Atlantic region, or at least the province of Nova Scotia, has made the greatest headway. The federal government has already provided substantial capital assistance to public projects which merited consideration, among them the Canso causeway, the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry and other schemes that come to mind. The suggestion of the commission would, it seems to me, simply make more formal the arrangement which already exists, and is likely to lead to difficulties in reconciling the various needs and requirements of the four governments who would form the group in the capital projects commission.

The commission itself lays great stress on the problem of transportation, and calls for a trunk highway system in the Atlantic region. Here again, in the field of road building and the provision of important links in our transportation system, to which I have already referred, considerable progress has been made in the Atlantic region.

One problem mentioned by the Gordon commission was the inadequacy of the present transportation arrangements between North Sydney and Port aux Basques and the alleged bottleneck that exists in the transport of freight between Port aux Basques and North Sydney. I have had occasion already to suggest to the Department of Transport that an alternative steamship service be established between the Avalon peninsula and Port Hawkesbury on Cape Breton island. As you know, the construction of the Canso causeway has resulted in the creation of an all-year port at Port Hawkesbury, and its outstanding possibilities could be used in the setting up of this alternative steamship service. I realize that the commission suggested that the alternative service might be set up between Halifax and St. John's, but I am sure the members from Halifax will generously allow this steamship service to be rerouted to my constituency.

The commission placed great emphasis on the lower income levels that exist in the Atlantic area, and it is true that the level of income is lower in that area than in the rest of Canada. The commission goes on to suggest that several methods could be adopted to overcome this disparity in income levels, and one of the final suggestions made reads as follows:

> Any serious attempt to raise income levels in the Atlantic provinces will soon break down into consideration of a series of problems which must be dealt with separately and individually.

Then it suggests that among the problems are matters which come within the general administrative competence of the federal government or its agencies, on which favourable decisions could provide some modest measure of assistance to one or other of the Atlantic provinces. I have a modest measure to propose to the government which I think will go some distance toward overcoming the disparity in incomes that now exists as between certain workers in the Atlantic region and in other parts of Canada. I refer to the prevailing rate employees of the federal government, particularly on the island of Cape Breton. I understand that under the procedure now in existence the Department of Labour strikes the prevailing rate that should be paid to federal employees, based on surveys, and then its recommendation is made to the various government departments.

I have in mind, for example, the employees at the Cape Breton highlands national park, Louisburg park, Point Edward naval base and, in the province of New Brunswick, the employees at Camp Gagetown. The employees in Cape Breton highlands national park receive an hourly compensation 30 to 35 per cent below the compensation paid to equivalent workers in the province of British Columbia. This is so because the general wage level is lower in that area than in the province of British Columbia.

This policy of paying the prevailing rates accommodates itself to the lower wage rates existing in certain parts of Canada. I cannot see why we cannot pay a uniform rate to these employees as we do to civil servants and railway employees despite their location in the country. I believe the government should seriously consider paying a uniform rate to all prevailing rate employees in Canada. The uniform rate could be the equivalent of an average rate struck for the whole country, or the equivalent of the maximum rate existing in any particular labour market.

I know there are certain arguments in defence of the present policy. There are certain formidable arguments against it. For myself, I believe that our common Canadian citizenship should be a much more important factor in determining the rate of pay for government employees than our accidental presence in any particular labour market at any given moment. I urge the government to give serious consideration to the problem of prevailing rate employees, and to make an effort in this modest way to overcome some of the disparities that exist in income levels as between the Atlantic region and other parts of Canada.

I want to refer for a moment to the very welcome announcement made by the Prime Minister that a special study is to be undertaken of the problem of land use in this country. I have no doubt that such a study will inevitably lead to a consideration of the general economic forces determining the level of income for the farmers and the agricultural class of Canada. I am sure this opportunity so provided will result in a much wider understanding of some of the economic problems that are involved in getting higher incomes for the farmers of Canada. I must say that my own experience has been that on no other subject is there so much misunderstanding and confusion as there is on the economics of agriculture, and particularly the almost irreconcilable views that exist between the economists of agriculture and the philosophers of agriculture. I hope this opportunity will permit a meeting of minds between the economists and the philosophers, so that some agreed policy can be followed with wide public support that will provide to those who wish to farm a return commensurate to that of people in other occupations in Canada.

I had the opportunity just before leaving for Ottawa to have a discussion with the executive of the Inverness county farmers' association, and these men asked me to put forward two matters in the House of Commons. I believe the government intends to continue its present policy with respect to assistance on the movement of feed grains to eastern Canada. This policy has been of considerable advantage to the farmers of Nova Scotia, and they wish to have it continued as a permanent policy of the government.

The second problem brought to my attention is a problem that has been mentioned in the house before, and which has to do with the conservation of agricultural lands, particularly along the rivers of my constituency. There are many acres of valuable meadow land now being carried away because there is no provision by which the federal government, the provincial governments and the owners themselves can co-operate in a policy of conservation. I believe this is an immediate problem, and that it does not require the extended deliberations of a Senate committee to have some arrangements by which we shall conserve some of the best meadow land, certainly in my part of Canada and I am sure the same applies to other parts as well.

I have been interested in the discussions which have taken place on the subject of social security, and in particular the suggestions made in the house that the old age security payment be increased. I wish to assure my colleagues in the house that I have not been tipped off by the government or by anybody else as to the probable course of action that is to be followed in this matter. I prefer to be tipped off by the feeling of my own constituents, and in this case I can honestly say that of all the areas of need there is none which gets a greater response among the citizens of my constituency than any proposal to assist in a greater measure the older citizens of this country.

I would remind the house that the persons who are now in receipt of old age security in Canada are persons who were subject, in the course of their working and earning lives, to some of the greatest depressions and dislocations in our economy, and in many cases they are those who worked without the protection of improved legislation and without the protection of trade unions; whose earning capacity, certainly in their working years was much less than the earning capacity of their fellow citizens today. Here is one place where I feel that the usual sympathy with which this government treats those citizens can be very usefully employed.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, and I want to say this in conclusion, that the chief reproach made against this government by the official opposition has been a reproach that it is lacking in leadership, that the Prime Minister and his ministers have failed to provide the necessary leadership in this country. Each member of the house, and each citizen of this country, will wish to decide for himself the confidence he places in this government. For myself I believe that the Prime Minister in his magnificent intervention in the Suez debate, and later in the debate on the address in reply, has shown himself to be a leader in the proper sense of leadership, that is leadership tempered by wisdom and long experience; and his understanding and vigour in the solution of the railway strike were, to me, considerable evidence of leadership.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs certainly needs no recommendations from any member of this house. His real leadership in the United Nations has earned the respect of all countries of the world, and he has shown himself to be a skilful and resourceful champion of peace in a manner that achieves practical results. Recently all of us were grieved and saddened at the very horrible events which occurred in Hungary, and in the press of this country there were admonitions and fears that the government would not respond properly to this challenge. I noticed recently that the editorial writers, from whom it is often difficult to extract any praise, have given the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration considerable praise and approval for the manner in which he has responded to this problem. Finally the Minister of National Health and Welfare has returned from a mission which again shows the manner in which the government is working to protect the interests of this country at home and abroad.

In the light of these few instances which I have cited, and there are others which could be mentioned, this government is certainly deserving of the confidence of the house; and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I will not hit the headlines by announcing that I intend to support the government in all the votes precipitated by this debate.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, like other speakers who have preceded me I must express my disappointment with the omissions from the throne speech of such important subjects as old age pensions, blind pensions, national health grants and so forth. But in spite of that I was rather pleased that it included one item which I was very anxious to see brought into effect; that is the extension of the Municipal Grants Act. I would like to compliment the minister for introducing it at this time. To my mind it meets a moral and legal responsibility of the government which they have evaded for many years. In spite of that, I would like to offer one or two criticisms of the act. I hate to look a gift horse in the mouth but to my mind grants, while welcome, are not the solution to municipal-federal relations in this field.

Many years ago the union of British Columbia municipalities condemned grants in aid in general as a very unsatisfactory way to recompense a municipality for any service rendered, on the ground that those grants can and do vary from year to year, and they can be withheld or increased or decreased at the whim of the government. It almost reminds you of a mother trying to train her child by offering candy; a little more if he is better and a little less if he is not, and so on, forgetting that eventually he will become an adult.

That is the trouble with the federal government. The municipalities are just as capable of handling their own affairs and finances as the federal government is in its field. I feel, therefore, that the federal government is not the body which should determine the value of the service given by the municipalities. I do not suppose this grant will have any relationship to that service, because the federal government is not in a position to assess it. Therefore I suggest that the municipality should make the assessment. For that reason the federal government should take full responsibility for all municipal taxes on all federal properties within the municipalities, just as any other taxpayer or any businessman has to do. In this way the municipalities could budget properly which cannot be done with the uncertain type of grants in aid. The government then would be assuming a responsibility which to my mind they have been evading for many, many years.

I was going to talk a little about agriculture this afternoon. When I mention agriculture most of you will immediately think of wheat, but I wish to remind hon. members that there are other important branches of agriculture, such as cattle and dairying, and so on. There is also what the government seems to regard as the Cinderella of the farm groups, and I refer to the fruit and vegetable growing industries. The Cinderella group is waiting at the present moment to try on a glass slipper. It may prove that it will be the right size. I refer to the provincial royal commission which is starting to work in British Columbia at the present time. They are going to investigate the problems affecting the fruit and vegetable industry of that province, but not of the whole of Canada. I hope when the investigation is finished and the recommendations are made the story will have the same happy ending as the original Cinderella fairy tale.

I regret that the federal government could not see its way clear to join with our province in establishing a federal-provincial royal commission so the benefits of that commission could have been extended to other fruit and vegetable growing areas of Canada. In spite of the failure of the government to enter into a royal commission pact, the Minister of Agriculture has promised that he will give full support in supplying data and other information for the use of this commission. When those data have been submitted and the findings of the commission have been made we want sympathetic assistance from the federal government at the time it will be needed, because I am satisfied that the findings will include matters affecting the federal government, such as freight rates, tariffs, dumping, export policies, and so on.

I have not the time today to go into details, but I can assure the minister that these subjects will be and must be adjusted satisfactorily before we can restore a healthy economic condition to our fruit and vegetable industry. I would point out that the growers are not asking for charity; they are merely asking for a chance to acquire their fair share of the national income, which they certainly are not getting at the present time. As I pointed out to the house once or twice, their economic burden has been greatly increased by the loss of very valuable fruit trees which were killed by frost last year and one or two years before that. It will take many years to re-establish the trees on those farms so they will again be profitable to the growers.

Personally I feel that both the federal and provincial governments should have offered assistance to the fruit growers to help them through their period of difficulty, but so far neither government has done so, with the exception of the help given by the federal government to veterans whose farms had been ruined by frost. The federal government has started to try to help the veterans. How far it will go I do not know, but it has started.

As the royal commission is now starting to work on the problems of the fruit farmers, I will not take up the time of the house to discuss the matter in any detail at this time; but I should like to suggest to the minister that in future representatives of the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada as a whole be invited to appear before the agriculture committee of the house so the minister can hear from the operators and from the managers of the various organizations what the farm problems really are.

That is now done each year by the wheat growers. I support the wheat growers in their request to place before the government what they expect from the government. On the other hand, the fruit and vegetable growers are never invited to appear before the committee. As far as the committee is concerned it does not know that the fruit and vegetable growers exist. I would urge the minister to give them a chance to do this in the future. If it is done they can have their problems discussed. If it had been done in the past I am satisfied that the acute conditions in which they find themselves today could have been alleviated.

May I make one more suggestion to the minister. I am always pleased to praise the experimental farms in our province. They do good work on culture, on pruning, on farm practices and the use of by-products, but I should like to see the work extended. I should like to see another department to deal with marketing, transportation, packing and other matters vitally affecting the industry, placed under the experimental farms. The government could help immeasurably by adding a division to look after marketing, transportation and other problems of the fruit grower. The information obtained through an impartial and scientific study of marketing problems could be passed on to the fruit growers and it would be invaluable to them. Finally I would ask the minister to carry out his promise to give federal support to the investigation now taking place into the fruit industry of British Columbia.

I should like to deal briefly with the veterans. Their problem has been somewhat alleviated by the presentations made in this house by various veteran members, from time to time, but they have not all been ironed out. That is why I should like to draw the attention of the house to a copy of the Legionary which most hon. members must have received last week. I would ask the minister to study the excellent brief that the Canadian Legion recently presented to the cabinet. I do not intend to repeat the presentation here, but I do wish to endorse it. This brief was prepared by men who know the cost of war, who know that the present dangers may lead to war, who offered their lives for their country, and many of whom bear the scars of battle to this day. A brief prepared by such men deserves the closest study and attention by the government. I trust the cabinet realizes that and will act accordingly.

These men have made a close study of pensions as a whole, and have produced interesting comparisons of the increases in industrial compensation for services rendered since 1920 and the increases in war veterans pensions in the same period. I hope the minister will study the table. It is most interesting. One recommendation, if accepted, would solve a very difficult problem. I refer to the veteran who has difficulty in establishing his claim after neglecting for many years to make the claim. Oftentimes he is turned down on the ground that the injury or disease was of pre-enlistment origin. The Legion claim, and to my mind quite rightly, that the government through its officials, doctors and others, puts each recruit through a very comprehensive and rigorous examination, and when the recruit is finally accepted it is presumed, or should be presumed, that he is physically fit and in a healthy condition. I agree with the Legion when they claim that the government should, for pension purposes, abide by the findings of their own medical examiners at the time of enlistment.

I should like to read the recommendation covering this:

> The Canadian Legion therefore recommends:
> That section 13 (1) (a) of the Pension Act be amended so that, where a pension applicant who served in an actual theatre of war is found to have a disability resulting from an injury or a disease not recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment, such injury or disease shall be presumed to have occurred or had its inception subsequent to enlistment.

I think that is a very fair request. Most of their requests are on similar lines. I would mention one or two. One is:

> That the ceilings on total permissible incomes under the War Veterans' Allowance Act be increased to $1,200 per year for the single recipient and $2,000 per year for the married recipient.

Another is:

> That the married rate of war veterans allowance be increased from $108 per month to $120 per month.

A further one is:

> That Canadian veterans of world war I whose overseas service was restricted to the United Kingdom be eligible for war veterans allowance, provided that such service be at least one year in duration.

I will read just one more:

> That widows of allied ex-servicemen be granted war veterans allowance in cases where the husband died before completing 20 years' residence in Canada, provided:
> (a) that the effective date of her eligibility be 20 years after the husband's arrival to take up permanent residence in Canada;
> (b) that the widow herself has completed 20 years' residence in Canada, and
> (c) that the husband and wife were both otherwise eligible.

I would pass on these recommendations of the Legion to the minister and the cabinet. I think they are modest and deserving and the Legion is not asking for anything more than the country as a whole is willing to give them. There are other recommendations, but I do not have time to go into them more fully. I sincerely hope the minister will do his utmost to put that brief into effect in order to carry out the wishes not only of the returned men alone but of every Canadian who feels obliged to the returned men for the service rendered on his behalf in protecting his home.

Before concluding I should like to mention old age and blind pensions. Like other hon. members of this house I have recently received numerous letters pleading with me as a member to do something on their behalf and outlining the difficulty they have in making ends meet. I am not going into the details of these problems, because you know them as well as I do; but they are serious problems, particularly those of the blind pensioners who have a severe handicap to begin with, plus the handicap imposed upon them by the small amount of their pension cheques.

The suggestion that the increase be made this year has already received support from all sides of the house, the Liberals, the official opposition, the Social Crediters and members of the C.C.F. party, and in addition it has the wholehearted support of all Canadians; for the need of a decent and satisfactory old age and blind pension is well known to every one of us. The least we can do is to keep on urging the government to assume this responsibility and alleviate the misery of these blind and old people by giving them a reasonable standard of living. Some of them cannot possibly get by on the present pension, and live on the charity of friends and relations. In many cases their lives are shortened because they do not have the wherewithal to buy sufficient sustenance. They are another group who, like the veterans, are deserving of a fairer share of our national economy. The aged are the pioneers who laid the groundwork which enabled our economy to reach its present standard; therefore to my mind they have a rightful claim to a far larger portion of the national economy which they helped to create.

I do not feel I am asking for too much when I request that immediate consideration be given to these matters. Do not use this as bait to gain votes at the election, because that will lose for you many friends. I am now referring to the minister or the cabinet, whichever you like, but I would urge in the name of common humanity and common justice that you immediately increase both the old age and blind pensions.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): It gives me a great deal of pleasure to follow a fellow countryman in this debate, a young man who was born in the north of Ireland and travelled across the Atlantic and across this country as far as Edmonton from where he was sent back here to serve her most gracious majesty; who has told her that we dearly love her and are going to do what we can to maintain Canada as a leading nation. I congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) on his splendid speech. I also would like to congratulate the other Irishman who seconded the motion. While the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) is not altogether an Irishman he nevertheless has the honest look of one, and he did his part, too.

I would like to welcome to this house a group of very important persons, eight new page boys. I would like to tell them and those who are veteran page boys that we will treat them well and do our part for them, and they can feel at home with us.

I would now like to pay my tribute to a great Canadian who lived in Ottawa and who passed on last week. He was a classmate of mine over 60 years ago. I refer, of course, to Dr. John Woodside. He is held in very high respect and received the highest honours Canada could give him through the church and church councils. He was a man noted for his dignity, for his ability and for his kindness, and I pay my tribute to him.

I also wish to pay my tribute to a young man, the hon. member for Quebec East—

Mr. Dufresne: West?

Mr. McIvor:—whom we call the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Dufresne: If you are speaking about me may I point out that I am from Quebec West.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): No, he is not speaking about you at all.

Mr. McIvor: If the hon. member who is interrupting has imagination keen enough to suppose that he could take the place of the one of whom I am speaking, then he is welcome to it.

When the Prime Minister came into this house and served as the minister of justice I understood he had a drop of Irish blood in him because his mother was Irish, and I think he started out in the right way. He did not make a big splash at the beginning, but later he blazed a trail that has brought credit to Canada. In the last few days I have been somewhat tickled, Mr. Speaker, to hear the way the Prime Minister has been able to answer with dignity those questions that are honest requests for information; and when he is asked questions by those who seek to put something over on him he certainly lets them have it from the shoulder. At those times his face becomes a little redder, and although some call it righteous indignation I just say it's the Irish coming out in him.

The speech from the throne is a splendid pre-election speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIvor: This is true, because it is built on the three pillars on which the Liberal party always builds, namely—

Mr. Ellis: Doing nothing.

Mr. McIvor: Liberty, unity and security. Even the leader of the C.C.F. said it had three good things in it. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat said there was one good thing in it. Even the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis)—

Mr. Ellis: Oh, no.

Mr. McIvor: —after criticizing it admitted there were some good things in it, and to my way of thinking there are many good things contained in this speech. I do not think anybody would say the establishment of a Canada Council, giving them the green light to go ahead, is not a good thing. Surely no one would say that the giving of grants to Canadian universities is not a good thing. If anyone said that helping the municipalities is not a good thing then I would say something is the matter with his upper story and he had better start to think things over again. The speech from the throne deals with almost every aspect of our economy. In addition to those things I have mentioned it refers to aid to agriculture and fishing, and the dividing into two parts of the national museum. I congratulate the government on the advice they have given to the Governor General in bringing down this speech.

I have a word to say concerning strikes. I know something about them, because I can remember stopping a strike on one occasion when a group of men employed in the same type of job I worked at for 15 cents an hour were considering striking.

An hon. Member: You were overpaid.

Mr. McIvor: Someone said, "Let us strike". There were 200 or more of us. I said, "I am not going to strike, because I have nothing to strike on. I have only enough to pay my board for a week, and I have to save enough to see myself through next winter. I am not going to strike; let us organize instead". As a result a committee met the builders' council, and an increase of 15 to 25 cents an hour was granted later on.

I should like to refer again to the hon. member for Regina City; he is a big fellow, and I know he will not mind. When the strike was on he said the government was doing nothing, that they were sitting back waiting for something to turn up. If this strike has settled anything, it has settled two things.

First, the government, especially three members in the persons of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Trade and Commerce went all out in their efforts to settle the strike. The second thing this strike has shown is that the Canadian Pacific and the union officials are reasonable men who believe in co-operation.

I should like to offer a little advice, which I hope will be passed on to them. The C.P.R. officials, the C.N.R. officials and the officials of the Canadian Labour Congress would do well to get together and co-operate so there will never be another strike. They should realize the loss of business there has been because of the competition from highway and water transport. They must co-operate; they must work together.

I submit that strikes can be eliminated in three ways; first, by honest co-operation; second, by giving the men a share in the profits. This has worked out quite well in two places in Fort William, and if it works in Fort William it will work in Regina. The third way by which strikes could be eliminated would be by the application of the golden rule. This is the sure way. When you have that you have happy people working together.

I should like to say a word about northwestern Ontario. I remember when I first came down here I was told that all we had at the head of the lakes were big trees, big rocks, summer resorts and 40 below temperatures, all things that did not mean very much to the rest of Canada. That has all been changed. I would refer hon. members to Trade and Commerce magazine, and an article which appears on page 17 dealing with northwestern Ontario. This article indicates that nearly $400 million is to be spent in the expansion of primary industries of forest and mine and the development of electric power. It indicates that there is unprecedented growth all over northwestern Ontario. The government of the province of Ontario, under the leadership of Premier Frost, have certainly taken off their coats and gone to work in northwestern Ontario. Even though they are Conservatives they are doing a good job.

Fort William is leading in the development of northwestern Ontario. At the beginning of the year the Abitibi people announced they were going to expend $20 million in additions to their pulp and paper mill, and it is expected the expenditure will go beyond that. A gentleman came up from Quebec to manage the Great Lakes company, and it is noted that under his leadership they will erect the largest paper mill in the world. The first announcement was that there would be an expenditure of $40 million, but it is now indicated that the expenditure will be $80 million. They will have the largest wood yard in the world at Fort William.

Activities at Canada Car are becoming more steady all the time. They have had one million accident-free hours, which indicates co-operation between the workers and the management. They have received a contract for 250 diesel buses for the Montreal tramways commission. Just think what that will mean to a city which is growing by leaps and bounds.

Our city council supported the Hungarian committee and has agreed to receive refugees. We are very proud of that. Donald Clark and Sons, who purchased the Great Lakes sawmill, which has been idle for some time, have indicated that they will make available several houses in which workers used to be housed. These have been turned over, and according to word I received from the city clerk are being used to take care of refugees. We appreciate that very much.

We hear a great deal about the government going to the bow-wows. I hardly think that is so, because so many people outside of this country want to come to Canada. I will refer only to one group because of their characteristics. Four thousand Scotsmen every month want to come to Canada. Scotsmen are supposed to be sane and steady, with an eye for the future. Yet in the face of that fact an hon. member over there is likely to get up and say that we are going to the bow-wows.

Mr. Ferguson: If the Liberal government stays in power.

Mr. McIvor: It will not be out of power in my time, and I expect to live to be 100. I should like to tell the Minister of Finance how he can spend some cash. We have an old rink in Fort William which was purchased by the government and made into an armoury. It was a wooden building which had not been painted for 20 years, so you can imagine its condition. When I was showing the sights to visitors to Fort William I never took them there. We need a federal building, because the unemployment office is hard pressed for space. These people are located in the old post office. Under my late friend, Hon. Dr. Manion, a new post office was built and I had the job of putting somebody in the old building. I could not get anybody but a beer parlor to go in; then finally we handed it over to the Salvation Army for a rental of $1 per year. They were there for seven years.

The building was then taken back from the Salvation Army. I did not like it, but I do not say many bad words about the government because I want them to measure up.

They certainly did measure up. They gave enough for a down payment on a new building, $2,600 which will provide a place for the army. Therefore the Minister of Finance can spend some money along that line.

There are two other things about which the government can do something and which I have been advocating for the past four years. One is pensions for veterans. I have quoted several cases of men who were in the front trenches for four Christmas dinners. When they came back they were discontented and not at all like themselves, and they found it hard to settle down. I say that men who were in the trenches that long should receive a pension at 60 years without a means test. These men gave their best; they risked everything. A lot of them did not come back. These men deserve an old age pension without a means test at 60 years.

Another thing I have been advocating and which I have referred to previously is the case of the civil servant who has been on a small salary and has been retired. I have a resolution on the order paper which reads:

That in the opinion of this house the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to increase the pensions of civil servants who were retired when salaries were low, so as to bring such pensions more in line with the present.

I have visited some of these homes, and it is a pitiable thing to see. They are clean and tidy and in fine shape, but the people living in them certainly do not get three meals a day as I do. I will not say any more on this subject because it will be dealt with again in a full dress debate. I have spoken to the hon. Minister of Finance, and he has assured me of that.

I remember that before the last election I had a resolution on the order paper for three years in succession asking for pensions for the handicapped. This request was well supported by everybody, especially by some hon. members who have since gone to the Senate. The government did not wait until this session to grant those pensions; they did it immediately after the election, and I am expecting that right after this election the civil servants will receive their increased pensions and also that the veterans will get their old age pensions at 60. I would like to speak for the blind, but that matter will come up again on the budget.

Before closing I would like to congratulate the government on the steady way in which they are doing things and on the reputation they enjoy in the country. We will be happy to welcome anybody either on this side of the house or on the other side, after the next election, to tell us just how all these things should be done.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your courtesy in allowing me to carry on.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate all the complimentary things the hon. member has said regarding the Irish. My forefathers came to this country from Ireland around 150 years ago and I consider myself a Canadian equal, almost, to any Canadian except for the redskins who were here before us.

I believe we members come to the House of Commons for the purpose of speaking our minds on the various subjects in which we should be interested, touching the welfare of our constituents and the well-being of Canada. Within the last few months the nations of the world have been confronted with some of the most momentous problems they have ever had to face. Nobody will deny that we have been close to global war, war which, had it occurred, would have brought unpredictable consequences.

We here in Canada belong to a very grand body of well-wishing people called the United Nations. We also belong to another community called the commonwealth of nations, the British commonwealth. If we had always had the type of man who was not too prone to forget what that word "British" means, we would have had today a commonwealth of united nations at which no country in the world would dare to shake a mailed fist. We were on the verge of having a commonwealth of nations which had within its orbit every raw material necessary to support the greatest combined group of countries in this world, a commonwealth containing Australia, New Zealand, the Malay States, South Africa, Canada and the British Isles.

These territories are rich in tin, wheat, cattle, metals and minerals of every type the world requires. All were to be found within the British commonwealth. We had the desire to help the wide world before we had set our own house in order. If we had done what we should all have been striving to do; if this had been accomplished; if we had worked more with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations; if we had speeded up our efforts, we could have gone to New York as members of the United Nations with a solid bloc of our people, speaking various languages but with a common purpose. We could have put our shoulders to the wheel and the combined effort would have made a tremendous difference to the whole United Nations set-up.

The two great nations of the world which have settled in Canada, and of whose people Canada is so proud, are France and the British Isles, England, Ireland and Scotland.

Alongside these are, fortunately, a good sprinkling of the right type of people who came to these shores from other countries such as Germany, Italy and Holland. We are proud of the type of men who are called Canadians today, workers, men of vision, men who want this Canada of ours to have a population sufficient to become a real power in world affairs.

But a problem comes up in the United Nations, and what do we find? We find, to my chagrin and shame, that the representatives of Canada appointed by this government are going in with the group who are not closely knit with us. Some members of this group are, indeed, very far from us. The Russians are far away. The United States is not knit to us; it is near. They soon tell us they stand, alone, when the time comes for them to do so. Our representatives at the United Nations did not take the position: we are sorry; we know you must have had some good reason for this tremendous move in sending British and French troops to Egypt.

Oh, no. They did not take the sympathetic stand which one member of a family usually does with regard to another, even if the latter had stubbed his toe, as happens on some occasions. This attitude could have been taken and should have been taken. Our representative at the United Nations was glad to stand in with the Russians and the United States in condemnation of the two mother countries of this Canada of ours.

I am speaking my own mind and voicing my own opinions when I make this assertion, but many, many Canadians right across this country are ashamed from the tops of their hats to their shoes, over the action which was taken on behalf of Canada by Canada's representatives. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is a very great man; he is a highly educated man; he has handled himself and the affairs of Canada is a most masterly manner. But he should have kept his tongue in his cheek at the United Nations meetings when his own flesh and blood were up against the situation that confronted the great statesmen of the British Isles. They believed it was necessary to go into Egypt to save their very lives and the lives of the people of France. It was not simply an individual who took that step. It was thought out more carefully than the Secretary of State for External Affairs thought out some of the statements he made at the United Nations. People do not send thousands of men to probable death unless it is the last straw.

For my part, I would have loved to see the French and British troops go right into Cairo and kick this dictator, Nasser, right into Russia where he belongs. That is my opinion. You are going to have to do something like that before this situation is cleared up. We now have the President of the United States telling us that he is going to do it when it suits him. I will tell you when he will do it. He will do it the minute that the oil needed by the United States is cut off, and he will not notify anybody.

If we are going on as we are our soldiers will be going to a war started by the United States and will be marching down Sparks street to the tune of Yankee Doodle. Yes, sir, the Yanks are coming. We will be cheered when we clear these people out of Egypt who are upsetting the entire equilibrium of this world, supported as they are by Russian munitions. When we liberate the people of Egypt the Yanks will be cheered and we will be included if we just keep going on as we are. That is not a very happy thought.

When France and England decided what they were going to do and did it Australia and New Zealand said: We are with you. I do not believe there is a man or woman in the House of Commons today who fears that if the British and French had gone on into Egypt the Russians would have dared to send any more munitions or any human beings anywhere in the Near East.

I saw some cartoons recently that were published in a leading Cairo paper prior to the people of Israel going into Egypt. One cartoon depicted a high, military shoe with a spur on it kicking a man with a pronounced Jewish expression on his face under the chin, kicking him out of the Near East. Another one from a leading Cairo daily paper showed a long knife dripping with blood and a chicken representing the people of Palestine with an incision in its throat and an agonized look. I am sure these cartoons were widely acclaimed by many people in Egypt who thought this great puppet and upstart, this imbecile ass, Nasser, would lead the Egyptians to conquer the world.

Nobody had the nerve to put their foot down two or three years ago when Nasser stopped the ships of Israel from going through the Suez canal, a waterway supposed to be open to all nations of the world. There is no doubt that the President of the United States knew of that situation. In my opinion, we have acquiesced in his requests for too long. British troops were taken away from the Suez canal. That was a nice, friendly gesture. They knew in their hearts that the right thing to do was to keep those troops there. But no, for the sake of a pacifist move and because certain people would not face the realities of life these troops were removed from the canal area.

Lots of us will not face realities. Many times we do not do the right thing when we should and then we are confronted with an impossible situation. Let me tell you that the situation in the Near East prior to the British and French going into Egypt was an impossible one. It was not something you could fool with. What happened? At terrific expense the British and French moved in and then through the efforts of the representatives of the Canadian people at the United Nations and the efforts of the United States, not the little nations, the British and French were convinced that they should pull out for the sake of the peace of the world.

We are told that there are members of the British commonwealth who say they are going to withdraw from the commonwealth unless we let the Russians and the Egyptians run the better two-thirds of the empire. Well, if that is the kind of people they are the sooner they get out of the British commonwealth the better. Oh yes, my words are not ultra-diplomatic but they are the truth.

An hon. Member: Tory policy?

Mr. Ferguson: It may not be Tory policy but it is Julian Ferguson's policy. Where did the shoe pinch? It pinched on the continent of Europe and in England because of the oil situation. We in this country have grown fat on two wars. We do not know much about the shoe pinching but the people of the continent of Europe do. By withdrawing our troops from the Suez canal area we put the Egyptian people and this dictator in a position to block the canal, a world water passage. We did not threaten him in any way, shape or form with immediate action and carry it out if he did not permit the small, newly established nation of Israel to transport its products up and down the canal. No, we did not. Their voice was too small to be heard by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

The time to voice our opinion on behalf of these people was at the right place, at the right time and for justifiable reasons. We had the justifiable reasons. When we go to the United Nations do we always have to be so diplomatic that we cannot express our views and what our hearts dictate? Must we turn on the friend who will forget our action, not resent it and still be our friend? It is the kind of deed where you kick a friend because you know he is a friend and is not going to put up much of a row about it and will say: Oh well, he did not mean it.

Sir Anthony Eden and men of his calibre are saying, Oh, well, they did not mean it. Let me say to you that they did not need to do it. Our action has been misconstrued all over the face of the world to the detriment of the British commonwealth of nations and to the detriment of the free world.

It has been an incentive for a man like Nasser who tries to borrow money with one hand and who hits the donor with the other. It is the case of the dog that bites the hand that is feeding him. We are listening to that man. Here in Canada we are very proud of our regiment called the Queen's Own Rifles. We have every right to be proud of that regiment; they are the men who have defended the freedom of this country. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested with a great deal of pride that Canada would send troops to help keep the peace. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) who knew the great record of that famous regiment said, no doubt with pride, we are going to send a famous Canadian regiment, the Queen's Own Rifles. What happened? Let us face the facts. The Queen's Own Rifles were never sent because a puppet, a communist, a mean despicably-thinking man, a man who wants to cut the chicken's neck, said no.

I will say this about that Israel's chicken's neck; it is as good a neck as our neck, the neck to which Sir Winston Churchill referred. It was some neck when the hordes from Israel tore into Egypt. It was some neck and some chicken and the people of Egypt realize that today. They have $500,000 less in material that was shipped to them from Russia. Unfortunately at the present time the people of Israel are feeding 10,000 prisoners. If there is much more nonsense from that dictator I would certainly advocate that the people of Israel take another sock at them and clean them up properly. Do not let us just go home; in a few days let us not forget where the people of this country came from and where they started or how hard the battle was for our people to get in the position where we the people living in Canada today can say we have the most prosperous and progressive country in the world. It did not just grow on a tree, and we in the House of Commons had very little to do with putting us in the prosperous condition in which we are today and from which we are able to progress. We have been rather small contributors over the last 150 years. You have got to see just how much the last 20 years has contributed to the development of Canada. Let us go back a little further and give those people who hewed their homes out of the forests of this country the credit which they deserve. Let us try to unite the British commonwealth of nations. Let us try to stick together. Let us foster gatherings of representatives of all those nations. In the various parts of the empire let them know that we are with them. Let them know that we seek for them to be with us, and let them know that we stand together. There is no nation in the world would dare to try to put anything over on us. We would sleep a lot more soundly at night than we may sleep if the British commonwealth of nations is broken or if we neglect our old friends who fought with us in the last war and the first war. We had the Japanese and we had the Italians in the first war. In the last war they were our enemies.

That great nation of France was invaded by the destroying German hordes. They are the people who stood with us and lost hundreds of thousands of men in the first war. In the one battle they lost 250,000 of the flower of the nation, one battle, 24 hours. It takes centuries to recover that kind of blood and that kind of manpower. Do not let us forget that. We had every right to say to our old friend France—and I say our old friend because I know France has been our tried and true friend and the tried and true friend of the British Isles. If Canada had cabled and said we are with you and with your country, and has asked for volunteers for an army to help to defend the decision of the British government, you would get thousands of real Canadians as volunteers. But there would be a lot of them who would be reluctant to march behind the tune of a Yankee bugle.

While I am on my feet I just want to say a word about prosperity and about that terrific calamity which occurred in the United Nations due to the attitude of the government's representative. In various parts of Canada, particularly up in my own part of the country, we have people seeking to get roofs over their heads and to get out of the boarding houses and, in the case of young people, to get away from the old folks' home and to build homes of their own. Now, we talk about prosperity. All right. We have now reached, under the management of this government over the past 20 years, a prosperity in which you cannot pay for a home in 10 years. It takes 30 years, if ever. We have now reached a position where you cannot borrow the money necessary for a newly married couple to build a home and get a roof over their heads. The government tells us you can buy a house, or they have been telling us that for a long time. They say all you have to do is go to the bank. After a lot of bickering and talking the banks have finally admitted that they will not make any more money available to young people to build houses.

Now, the manager of a bank operating in the town of Collingwood, where I come from, tells me, and I have asked the question several times, that they are not lending any more money for this purpose. That is prosperity. We are trying to curb that kind of prosperity. Let us curb something but do not curb the ability of people to get a roof over their heads. Let us scratch our heads so that we can get a thought as to how to overcome that obstacle, the obstacle of providing homes for the people of Canada. On the one hand we say, bring in immigrants, and I am heartily in accord with that. However, I hope they bring in men who are able to build houses and men who can lend money to the man who can only pay a reasonable amount down on a new home, so that he can proceed to build a new house. This condition exists across the country. People are not able to buy houses.

In the prosperity of today people are mortgaged to the hilt. The merchants in the smaller communities are finding business is not so good and when you inquire into it you find that the people are working but they are so heavily mortgaged that they will need to increase their wages before they are able to pay for the things which they are entitled to here in Canada such as refrigerators, electric stoves and automobiles. The average man who is willing to work should be able to have some of these commodities; they are not just luxuries, they are necessities. The automobile which you could buy in this country 12 years ago for $1,100 is now costing $2,600. The good home that you could buy for $5,000 is now costing $25,000. The bird cages which you are now getting are costing $15,000. When the young family move into a home now they get a warning, do not have any children because you will have to keep them out in the garage; there is no accommodation for them in the place. There is a living room, a bedroom and a kitchen. You could not swing a cat in it. It sells for $12,000 to $15,000. Well, that is prosperity. We must say something more than that we have prosperity. Unfortunately, people have learned to lean on the government to such an extent that the government finds itself in the position of having to be a guide and an aid to the great masses of Canada. We have the old age pension and unemployment insurance. Now there is talk of shorter working hours and more pay. Then, the commission the other day came out and said, "Boys, a few years from now you are going to get $100 a week instead of $35 or $40. I had a carpenter working for me last week in Collingwood, doing some alteration on a building I own. He said, "Mr. J., we are going to have more employment in 25 years. Did you see where we are going to get $100 a week?" Well, I think I would have refrained from making that kind of statement if I had been on the commission. We all remember the difficult times we have gone through; all Canadians remember them. I do not know of any finer election statement that can be made prior to an election than that Canada is to have 25 years of uninterrupted prosperity. Unfortunately, the people of Canada are naive enough to believe statements of that kind.

The poor young fellow—he was a married man—who worked for me spoke of $100 a week and a 35-hour week. What a place to live in! I hope it comes true, but I would just as soon have $50 a week and be out of debt and pay for my home in 10 years rather than 30 years, and buy an automobile for $1,100 instead of paying $2,600 for almost the same kind of automobile. That is prosperity, all right, gentlemen; but we have to watch what we are doing. According to the press, the United States is paying two-thirds of its income on security. I do not know whether those figures include any money for the security of Canada; but if we keep on following them as we are doing we may have to look to them for money for our own security. We may have to ask, do you mind cutting us in on some of that because we have gone so far along the line that we cannot look after ourselves? We cannot even stand by our friends.

I should now like to deal with immigration. Since I have been in the House of Commons I have watched the various ministers of immigration. Shortly after the war this subject came up and the minister told us at that time that we needed immigrants. He said, "Canada is expanding, but we are short of ships". Well, we brought farmers out here, or men who said they were farmers. Many of them were school teachers, bookkeepers, nurses and so forth. They could not speak our language and had to learn it. After they had been here for one year they went back to their own vocations of life. I know a doctor and his wife from Rumania and Austria who served a sentence of one year washing dishes in Gravenhurst sanatorium. This graduate physician is now practising in Toronto. He will be able to tell his children when they grow up that his sentence was to come into this great country of ours, under the then existing immigration laws, and serve his term of one year washing dishes in the Gravenhurst sanatorium. That is the penalty that he had to pay. He will be able to say, "Son, are you not proud you are a Canadian, but I hope when you are old enough, and if you are able to reach parliament as a Canadian citizen, you will not penalize the people who want to come to this great country by making dishwashers out of doctors".

We have a trickle of immigrants coming to this country. There is a shortage of every kind of skilled labour in this country. I advertised in the Star and Telegram for two weeks for domestic help. I received three replies. All three admitted when I got in touch with them that they could not do the job but they just wanted to see what kind of job it might be. That is a reality. What is driving prices up? There is not enough good skilled labour to make labour properly competitive, and labour should be competitive. Efficiency increases in that way. Ever since the war this government has dilly dallied on the immigration question, which is one of the most vital questions in a growing country. We do not want farmers only; we want artisans of all kind, competent, honest, willing workers. We must plan the conditions under which they can be brought here under which they can be handled. We must have a strong and brainy, intelligent man in charge of the department to carry out the duties of that department in that manner. We do not want a man in charge of the department of immigration in this country who is criticized by the law society of the country; we do not want that type of man. He must be a competent and capable leader, and an exceedingly good businessman. He must be capable of co-operating with all other departments. The department of immigration is not the smallest of all the departments of a nation of 15 million people.

In the year 1957 in this great country of ours we have foreign capital developing this country so that our people continue to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. That is Liberal prosperity. I say that Canada is enjoying the greatest era of a certain type of prosperity that it has ever enjoyed. Millions of dollars are coming in from the United States, from Switzerland, from Germany, from England and from France. They are pouring in to develop our resources simply to give our people jobs, but in very few instances are they providing the cream of the profit to keep our people living over and above the old age pension. That is what we must have. We must have something more than the satisfaction of saying to a man, at the end of your efforts do not forget that you can get $40 a month to keep yourself in comfort here in Canada.

While I am on this subject may I say—I am speaking for myself—I think $40 a month is a disgrace. It is something we should not let happen. It could be changed quite easily. If an increase were proposed by this government it could be passed in 15 minutes, unanimously, I hope, to put the aged people, who served this country so well, in a position to have a slight degree of comfort in the final years of their lives so that they would not be seeking food in garbage cans when they are not depending on their families to look after them and feed them.

Every member of parliament knows how much the cost of living has increased. What effort has been made by the government to increase by a fraction the old age pension? Members of parliament know the price of automobiles as well as anybody in Canada knows it and we know the price of roast beef; not everyone does because they cannot afford it. We know that the price of food, clothing and housing is going up. Has this government stopped in its tracks and said, "This is going to be difficult. There is one group of people whom we cannot neglect any longer". I refer to the people who helped Canada become the great nation she is, the people who cannot now fend for themselves. I am speaking on behalf of every old mother who produced great Canadians for the future who is now hobbling along the street in ill health forced to live in a cold and bleak home in the city of Toronto, Montreal or elsewhere, eking out an existence on $40 a month, when we all know in our hearts that this sum is not adequate.

I am not asking for a luxury but for an increase that is long overdue. This is something that should be done without further procrastination, without further debate or political promises, long before the election—now.

Mr. Speaker, I have simply voiced my opinion here today on some subjects which are of great concern to me personally.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the very beginning to associate myself with the very fine and well deserved tributes which have been paid to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne in recognition of the excellent manner in which they have discharged their duties. By the high order of their speeches and the manner in which they were delivered they have enhanced the tradition of this chamber and reflected credit both on themselves and on their constituencies.

The speech from the throne refers to many matters which are of particular interest to my province and to my constituency. Apart from international affairs and economic developments which directly concern all Canadians from coast to coast there are three items dealing with education which show that the government recognizes both the vital necessity of attaining the maximum development of our human resources and the problems associated with it. The proposals to set up a Canada council for the arts, humanities and sciences, to double the grants for universities and to increase and improve grants for vocational and technical education will be heartily welcomed in my province and I believe by right thinking people in all parts of Canada. The extension of the scope of municipal grants, the plan to set up a Senate committee for the better use of land for agriculture and the proposed revision of the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act to provide a better scale of benefits to disabled seamen and the dependents of deceased seamen are three other measures of special interest to Newfoundland and to my own constituents. There will be opportunities for more extended remarks when these measures are brought before the house. At this time I wish merely to enumerate them and to commend the government for putting them on the agenda for this session.

Another item of special interest to all Canadians and particularly to the Atlantic provinces is the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects commonly known as the Gordon report. I do not think we should criticize this report too hastily; after all, it is merely a compilation of facts and deductions. Some of the conclusions reached may be disappointing to us and possibly disagreeable but I feel we must accept the report as an honest appraisal of present economic trends and the results that are likely to ensue if these trends are permitted to continue throughout the next quarter century. We are not required to agree with the opinions expressed nor with the assumptions on which they are based; after all, they could very well be mistaken. At best they can hardly be expected to be more accurate than a long-term weather forecast. We should not therefore accept the predicted results as inevitable; rather, we must see to it that the necessary action is taken in time to prevent those results, which we consider undesirable, from taking place.

In compiling a report of this kind and particularly when formulating recommendations or policy based on the findings, care must be exercised to make certain that purely material and economic considerations are not permitted to override human considerations and the over-all national interest. For example, the report confirms the fact that in the Atlantic provinces per capita and per family annual incomes are some 30 plus per cent lower than the national average. This tremendous discrepancy is rendered still worse by the fact that the cost of living in the Atlantic provinces is considerably higher than the national average. In my own province of Newfoundland this gap is at its widest.

What is the answer to this situation? On a purely material and economic basis the solution could be to encourage a movement of the population from the Atlantic provinces to the central provinces and it should be borne in mind that this sort of migration on a voluntary basis has always existed. But would any sane person maintain that it would be in the national interest to have the Atlantic provinces completely denuded? Where then should the line be drawn? What does the national interest demand? Surely the national interest demands that measures be taken to close the gaps in annual income and the cost of living so that material living standards in the Atlantic provinces will compare more favourably with the rest of Canada. This does not necessarily mean handouts but it does mean, first and foremost, that ways must be found and the necessary assistance must be provided to enable the people of the Atlantic provinces to raise their own living standards through their own efforts by developing their own resources to the maximum.

It would appear that present credit restrictions tend to retard the industrial development of the Atlantic provinces more than that of other parts of Canada thus producing the greatest effect where it is least needed. No one can deny the necessity of credit restrictions and other measures to offset the present danger of inflation, but what seems to be required is a more flexible way of applying them so that developments may be restricted in those areas where its contribution to inflation is greatest, and permitted or even encouraged in other areas where its effect will be slight. In this way the effects of anti-inflationary measures will be distributed more evenly throughout the nation. It should be borne in mind that the differential in individual annual income and living costs between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada is due to some extent to the fact that confederation changed their flow of trade from its normal and natural direction of north and south and compelled it to flow in the unnatural direction of east and west.

It can therefore be regarded as a price which the Atlantic provinces have been paying to make the concept of a Canadian nation a reality. The relative effects of this imposed disadvantage upon living standards and industrial and economic development have increased over the years and now represent a very real sacrifice on the part of the people of the Atlantic provinces. True it is a sacrifice which must be made in the national interest, but it is also one which benefits other parts of Canada and for that reason is entitled to recognition and compensation.

Whatever compensation resulted from the Maritime Freight Rates Act has been completely nullified by the recent freight increases, and simple justice demands that steps be taken to restore the maritime freight rates assistance to its original proportions.

We all know that our railways serve a purpose that is far more important than any economic consideration. Actually their east-west direction makes them economic monstrosities, but that east-west direction is essential to the national interest because it is our railways more than anything else that bind us together in a nation and make possible our political independence and economic autonomy as well as our economic growth and development.

The primary function of our railways is to integrate the different industrial sections of every province into a single provincial economy, and also to integrate the different provincial economies into a national economy. As far as Newfoundland is concerned, the Canadian National Railways are not performing either of these functions and will never be able to perform them as long as they maintain their present pattern.

We all want our railways systems to be operated as far as possible in accordance with sound business practices. I use this qualification because purely dollar considerations must not be permitted to take precedence over the over-all national interest and basic human needs. Since the railways are not basically sound enterprises within themselves as economic units, and since they have other functions even more important than the economic, I believe it would be better if they were regarded as public utilities. Certainly it would be better in Newfoundland.

The railways could be used as an effective instrument in equalizing the cost of living in different parts of Canada. In Newfoundland the Canadian National Railways create inequalities in living costs and make existing ones even worse. On Friday last my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), placed on Hansard at page 136 figures to illustrate how the recent freight increase of 11 per cent has resulted in an actual freight increase of 64 per cent to the consignee at St. John's, Newfoundland. I am not going to repeat what he so clearly and concisely stated but I want to give my unqualified support to everything he said. I wish also to add my plea to his that the government of Canada adjust the rates of payment under the policy of freight assistance on western grains and mill feeds shipped to eastern Canada in order to bring these rates once more in line with the 1956 rate increases.

Before I leave this subject of railways I must once again, as I have done on several previous occasions, raise my voice in this chamber in protest against the lack of passenger accommodation provided by Canadian National Railways on their Placentia bay service. I have brought this condition to the attention of the Canadian National Railways management repeatedly over the past six years and it has been consistently ignored.

Every time I travel on the M/V Burin I am scandalized at the conditions which the travelling public are forced to put up with in this part of my riding. Picture women and children being forced to sit up all night in stormy weather huddled together on a bench in a tiny dining room or sitting on their luggage in a narrow corridor because there is no place for them to lie down. This prime example of man's inhumanity to man is a disgrace, not only to Canadian National Railways but to Canada. It makes me ashamed that the half million dollars required for a new ship should be regarded as being of more importance than human beings. It makes my blood boil to see a crown company treating human beings, and Newfoundlanders at that, with less consideration than one would normally give to dumb animals. Not only has this situation been permitted to continue, but it has steadily worsened for six long years, and I plead with the government to bring pressure to bear on the Canadian National Railways to have it corrected immediately.

I would ask the government also to give sympathetic consideration to the plight of those railway employees who have received notice of the termination of their employment. Some of these employees are over 50 years of age and are practically unemployable elsewhere. Furthermore, many of them stand to lose their pension rights which they have accumulated over a long period of satisfactory service. Apart altogether from the terms of union, it is our Christian duty to see that their livelihood is not jeopardized because people are always more important than things. Therefore I urge the government to remove the suspense which has been hanging over the heads of these employees since 1949 by having their positions clearly defined so that they will know exactly where they stand.

Last Monday we were privileged to hear two excellent speeches—one by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who has done so much to raise Canada's prestige among the nations of the world, and the other by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) who has just returned from a tour of Asia and Australasia where he has rendered outstanding service in building up mutual understanding and good friendly relations between Canada and the free nations of the east.

In both these great speeches the underlying theme was the importance of the human individual; that the individual worth of every human being for himself alone as a person should be recognized irrespective of colour, race or class; that human rights and human dignity should be preserved and maintained and along with human needs be given priority over every other consideration. This is the basic foundation of our western civilization. Our allegiance to those values marks the fundamental difference between western democracy and other forms of government. It is also the cornerstone of true liberal philosophy, and it is within this framework that we must examine the recommendations contained in the Gordon report and formulate future policy. There must be this fundamental consistency between our domestic policy on the one hand and our foreign policy on the other. While encouraging and assisting other nations in their efforts to correct the adverse effects of so-called colonialism we must take care we do not permit another brand of colonialism to develop within our own borders. The idea behind the Colombo plan is a noble conception which deserves our fullest support.

This concept would be still further enhanced and its effects as a moral force would be multiplied many times over by the concurrent existence of a Colombo type plan for the underdeveloped areas of our own nation. Such a program is necessary for the maximum development of the fishing industry not only of Newfoundland but of all the Atlantic provinces, which industry must in my opinion be developed in an orderly manner as a single unit and not as a number of separate small industries fighting among themselves and competing with each other.

No thinking person would maintain that it is in the best interests of Canada or of the world to permit this vast treasure house of self-perpetuating wealth to remain underdeveloped or undeveloped, particularly at a time when four-fifths of the people of the world are underfed and undernourished. Maximum development of the fishing industry is a responsibility which we owe to the rest of the world, and it can come about only by the co-ordinated efforts of private industry, provincial governments and the federal government working together as a team with a passion and a plan.

We can be justly proud, Mr. Speaker, that many of the nations are today looking to Canada for moral leadership. In meeting that challenge let us never forget that peace can never be created by organizations or alliances, however lofty or worthy their motives. If peace is to exist at all on this planet it must first be created in the human heart, and the national interest of Canada demands that all our efforts be directed toward this primary objective.

Mr. Charles Yuill (Jasper-Edson): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the compliments which have been paid to the mover and seconder of the speech from the throne. I think they did a very creditable job in discharging this very important duty.

The settlement of the railway strike is, I think, something that should give us all a reason for feeling very happy. A terrific mental and economic strain has been lifted from the minds of the people of Canada, not only those who were directly connected with the strike but also those communities which were the innocent victims of its effects. I am sure that with this return to normality they will all be breathing more easily.

With regard to the speech from the throne itself I think that we as ordinary members look to it in anticipation of finding something there that will be beneficial, first of all, to the public of Canada as a whole. Then, I suppose, in a more selfish manner we look at it to see whether it presents some ray of hope for those in our constituencies whose welfare we have the responsibility of safeguarding. As one of the members from an agricultural area I regret I can see nothing in the speech from the throne which throws out any fresh ray of hope to the people whom I represent. As usual, of course, the farmer is caught in the cost-price squeeze; he must sell everything on an uncontrolled market and buy everything back on a controlled market. From what I see in the speech from the throne there is not the slightest indication that this government is even remotely interested in trying to do anything for the farmer. Because of the huge surplus of grain and the inability of this government to sell it, the farmers have had to seek alternative means of bolstering up their economy. They have had to diversify their efforts by trying to raise cattle or hogs or poultry; or they have been producing eggs as a means of supplementing their revenue and seeking some reasonable equation between the ever increasing cost of production and the revenue that accrues from their untiring efforts.

Let us consider, for example, the problem with regard to egg production and the instability of the prices that prevail by examining the poultry products market report of August 31, 1956, and, again, the report for November 16. We find that the major marketing centres such as Vancouver, Calgary, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal show a most marked variation in price between August 28 and November 16. On the earlier date the average price for "A" (large) eggs in those centres was 53 cents a dozen, and in a matter of about ten weeks—or on November 16—it was 36 cents a dozen, a difference of 17 cents a dozen.

Again, taking the report of August 28, we find the pricespread to the producer between "A" (large) and "A" (medium) eggs in the markets quoted varied from four cents in Calgary to 17 cents in Toronto. Similarly, the spread between "A" (medium) and grade "B" varied from two cents a dozen at Montreal to 20 cents at Calgary.

I think that such glaring differences in price between the various marketing centres is not very indicative of an orderly marketing system and I believe the government could very well do something to help stabilize these prices. I do suggest that the 38 cents "floor price" on grade "A" (large) eggs should be given to the producer, not to the wholesaler. I think it should be a guarantee to the producer that that will be his minimum sale price for grade "A" eggs. The wholesaler has a chance to get his own profit. He has the right to increase his price by 14 cents a dozen, which I think would give him a very good margin.

Again, taking the poultry business, in some areas of the country it is a very important industry and I would say particularly so in the case of sections of British Columbia. In the poultry business there has been perhaps the greatest drop in prices of any phase of the agricultural industry. To take my own community as a criterion, the price of turkeys was 20 cents a pound cheaper in 1956 than in 1955. In 1955 grade A turkeys were bringing 53 cents a pound. In 1956 they were bringing 33 cents a pound. It is quite true that there was an increase in the production of turkeys and poultry in general but I think one depressing effect was the number of turkeys imported from the United States. I think that had a very depressing effect upon the normal markets of British Columbia particularly and in an indirect way it affected our own Alberta markets.

When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), as of February 1, 1955, saw fit to remove the subsidy of $5 a ton on feed wheat or feed in general shipped to the people of British Columbia I think he posed an economic problem there that has not been solved up to this time. From the viewpoint of the Canadian economy I believe the minister could very well be classified as being penny wise and pound foolish.

We in Alberta suffered the loss of a large part of the British Columbia market basically, I presume, because of little or no opposition to United States turkeys coming into British Columbia and again perhaps of the freight differential we lost very heavily so far as our normally good market in Vancouver is concerned.

Let us take another phase of this diversified industry and look at the situation with respect to hogs. According to the Livestock and Meat Trade Reports we find that the average price of hogs at four major marketing centres, Toronto, Winnipeg, Moose Jaw and Calgary, for the first nine months of 1955 was $23.06 a hundredweight. For the first nine months of 1956 the average price was $22.75 a hundredweight. Taking the five year average for the years 1951 to 1955 inclusive, we find that the price was $27.70 a hundredweight. This indicates considerable shrinking in hog prices in the last two years.

I think it is quite obvious that the floor price of $18.25 existing in Alberta today is not compatible with the cost of production and I believe it should be raised. There is one way that I believe the government could help the producer of hogs quite materially and at the same time it would have an overall desirable effect. I suggest that the government should double the bonuses paid on the top two grades of hogs.

Turning to the cattle industry, never in the history of Canada has there been more production of beef than in 1956. In spite of that we are becoming a net importer of beef. In my opinion there are two reasons for that. First, there is the natural and rapid growth of the country. Coupled with that is the fact that on a per capita basis we are becoming greater eaters of beef. One would imagine that because we are producing more and the demand is greater the price of beef would strengthen as a consequence, but I do not think that holds true. If you look at the Livestock and Meat Trade Reports you will see that the average price of good steers at Toronto for the first ten months of 1956 was $19.32 a hundredweight and $18.25 at Winnipeg. From the Livestock Market Review we find that the average price at Toronto for the years 1951 to 1955 inclusive was $24.40 and $23.19 at Winnipeg. This indicates quite a substantial difference. The high price in 1956 was reached in August and then the price started to recede. Prices went down and down until the end of the year.

There are one or two suggestions I might make that I think would be beneficial and in the interests of everyone concerned, not only the producer but the consumer as well. I believe the time has come when beef should be sold according to its true value. I believe it would be in the interests of everyone concerned for beef to be rail graded in the same way as pork. There are so many cases where the producer brings an animal to the packing plant or stock yard and the buyer of the "critter", particularly if it is an off type, must play it safe. He may be buying the animal for a packing plant or somebody else. But as a consequence he always tips the grade balance in favour of himself or the person for whom he is buying with the result that the producer is unduly penalized.

I do not think you can blame anybody particularly. It may be regarded perhaps as the normal course of good business but I am sure that the packing plant together with everybody else is interested in seeing that the producer gets a fair price for his commodity. I strongly urge the government to give serious consideration to bring about what seems to me to be a most equitable method of selling the farmer's commodity so as to arrive at a realistic basis where the farmer will receive value for the produce he delivers.

There are many things I should like to speak about. I think that my colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), has made it very clear where we stand on the question of pensions, and there should be no doubt in anybody's mind about our position. The other day my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach), was discussing certain problems of the municipalities and asked what the government was going to do. There was an interjection from across the floor by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) who asked what Alberta was doing. I know, and everyone else knows that had my colleague from Edmonton yesterday had time he could have answered that quite realistically. But because of the time element he was not in a position to answer. As one who has been associated with school administration for 25 years and as mayor of Barrhead for almost 12 years, I think that perhaps I am qualified to answer on behalf of my colleague from Edmonton East. I have here, I would imagine, around 180 statements which deal specifically with the amounts of grants, direct and indirect broken down to show how these grants affected the economy of these municipal districts by village, town, city, rural municipality or county.

If the hon. gentleman asked his question in sincerity I believe I can give him an answer which would give him at least some reasonable peace of mind. I have heard him interject so often that I find it very hard to accept that his is an honest question. For his benefit, and the benefit of the others who seem to have lost their sense of balance to quite a degree, I would like to give you a few figures. First of all, he said what are you doing in Alberta to help the municipalities? Let us put it this way. In the last seven years the government of the province of Alberta has provided direct and indirect assistance by way of grants to the tune of $311,710,812. Well, I suppose that with that kind of reasoning which goes behind these stupid questions that would not be accepted. I would like to go a little further and break it down in terms which I hope are productive of happiness or peace of mind.

I have here, as I said before, records based on 1955 performance. In the case of the city of Calgary and the city of Edmonton, I do not have them for 1955 but I have them for the last five years, 1951 to 1955 inclusive. Take the city of Edmonton, the largest city we have; the city of Edmonton received through grants in the last five years $40,942,541. On top of that they borrowed from the provincial treasury, at interest rates ranging from 2 and the maximum of 3½ per cent, the amount of $57,292,900. In the case of the city of Edmonton, through these two mediums they received $98,235,441. I suppose, in the minds of some people here, that is no assistance whatever. Take the city of Calgary. They received in direct and indirect assistance $27,681,017. They, again, were able to dip into the provincial coffers to the tune of $55,791,680 in low interest money; or a combined amount of $83,472,697.

I do not think that I should have to go any further, but just in case my hon. friend is over curious, I would like to go a little further. Take, for instance, the city of Lethbridge, a comparatively small city. They received in direct grants $247,322.89, in indirect grants they received $1,013,325.67, or a net total grant of $1,260,648.56, or 40·36 per cent of their total revenue.

My hon. friend may be interested in rural municipal districts. I am going to start with the one which surrounds my own town of Barrhead, known as Barrhead municipal district No. 106. In this case they received $158,575.02 in direct grants, and in indirect grants they received $364,246.40, or a total grant of $522,821.42, or half a million dollars of assistance in one municipality. The government of Alberta produced for them 68·60 per cent of every revenue dollar they needed to operate. Then, neighbours of mine, people who are supposed to know better get up and tell you our government does nothing for our people out there. Take again a neighbouring municipality like Lac Ste. Anne. They received a direct grant amounting to $209,919.88 and an indirect grant amounting to $373,192.53 or again over half a million dollars, the total being $583,112.41 or in this case 63·44 per cent of their entire needs. So on it goes. You can go right down the line. Take Leduc, the municipal district of Leduc. They received in direct grants $308,405.03, and in indirect grants $429,310.03, or a total of almost three-quarters of a million dollars, $737,715.06.

To take the municipal district of Sturgeon river, municipal district No. 90, they received a total of $645,399.80, or the equivalent of 52·96 per cent of their total revenue.

I come next to counties. First of all, let us take the county of Grande Prairie, No. 1 which is away up in the north part of our province. They received the sum of $509,793.20 in direct grants and $74,202.58 in indirect grants, or a total of $583,995.78. The percentage is 54.75.

I come next to the villages. I have here a village with a tax levy of $9,328. They received in joint direct and indirect grants $16,774.84, or 64.26 per cent. The village of Lougheed, a very small village, received a total of $10,129.87 in direct and indirect grants, or 44.74 per cent. Take the village of Girouxville. Many of the Edmonton members will know what I am talking about. They received combined grants of $21,328, or 57.26 per cent of their revenue from the province as direct and indirect grants without strings attached.

Take the village of Caroline, which is a very small village. They received a total of $33,842.73. Their total village levy was $9,498.44. They received 78.08 per cent of their necessary revenue from direct and indirect taxes from the province.

I now come to the towns and I would like to start at home. I believe charity always begins at home. Take the town of Barrhead. We had a tax levy of $74,145. We received in direct and indirect grants $114,942.40, or 60.79 per cent of our total requirements. Take the town of Edson, another town in my constituency. These are not foreign towns to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). They know these places as well as I do. The town of Edson received $22,346.66 in direct grants and $211,659.74 in indirect grants, or a total of $234,006.40, or 69.45 per cent of their total requirements. And so it goes. The town of St. Paul received a grand total of $96,462.83, or 40.80 per cent of their requirements. Another town pretty well down in the southern part of the province, the town of Rocky Mountain House, received in direct and indirect grants the sum of $96,315.66, or 57.97 per cent. The town of McMurray, away up to the north, received $44,524.09, or 55.36 per cent. The town of Lac la Biche, which is well known to some hon. members from Alberta, received $124,011.52 in grants, or the equivalent of 71.87 per cent. I have more here and I would be happy to make them available to my hon. friend if he so desires, because I really feel that if he has the desire to know the truth—well, they say the truth shall make you free—I would like to contribute to his peace of mind.

I think one of the tragedies of our society is that people who are usually decent in so many ways seem to allow their minds to be so poisoned by political bias that they lose their sense of common decency. They lose their vision and their sense of justice and fair play to their neighbours. I would suggest that, in future when they have any funny questions to ask, at least they be sensible and ask them honestly. "Seek and ye shall find". If you want to know something you will find the answer in Alberta.

So far as the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek is concerned, I think he is a living example of a frustrated Liberal. For years he has accepted blindly the fact that he was serving a benevolent government, but he has suddenly awakened to the realization that he is paying lip service, at least, to a government that has filched away from him piece by piece his right to live as a successful producer in this wonderful country of ours. I think that when a man has his eyes opened perhaps it is understandable that he becomes frustrated. Perhaps in the final analysis he should be more critical and sensitive because there is nothing that adds as much to confusion as a frustrated Liberal living in a socialist community. He should be more pitied than censured.

(Translation):

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with previous speakers in this debate in offering my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Hanna and Mr. Robichaud). The high level of both their speeches and the ideas they have expressed give a real measure of their talent.

The debate on the address affords the hon. members of this house an opportunity to point out to the government the needs of their constituencies and the situation of the people they represent here. This is an invaluable opportunity for Canadians to draw up an inventory of their resources and to contribute to the strength, the stability and the security of Canada.

We live in a period of prosperity when each working man has a well paid job and is able to provide a decent living for his family. However such prosperity is not the result of chance but an effect of the wise policies of our leaders. It is through their foresight that Canada has enjoyed such an industrial and commercial expansion and has been able to provide a high standard of living.

If anything went wrong, if workers had trouble finding a job, the blame would immediately be placed on the government, and it would be held responsible for any such economic slump.

I remember quite well that, at the session of 1955, I listened in this house to a debate on seasonal unemployment then prevailing. We then heard gloomy, pessimistic forecasts of a drab future for our country. However, through the unremitting efforts of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and of the members of his cabinet, thanks to their foresight, business recovered at such a terrific pace that, today, all Canadians are enjoying an enviable degree of comfort and security.

When all goes well, we tend to forget the hand that supplies us with comfort and ease, and I feel it would be appropriate today to congratulate the government for what it has done in every field to give Canadians what they are now enjoying.

I want to thank particularly the Right Honourable Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and all members of the cabinet for their prompt settlement of the railway strike which was gripping Canada only a few days ago. In the riding of Montreal-Papineau, which I have the honour to represent here, there are a great many employees of this railway company, and all of them thank Providence for guiding our leaders in the wise steps they took to put an end to this strike which would have affected their home, their welfare and their security.

The speech from the throne states a most interesting legislative program for this session, but I will limit myself to commenting on only a few of its proposals.

The government announces grants to municipalities covering federal properties on their territories. Thus, Montreal, the metropolis of Canada, will receive about one million.

The government deserves congratulations for realizing that services supplied by municipalities such as the building and maintenance of sidewalks, sewers, as well as fire protection and waterworks, are now very expensive, and that the provision of such services together with the labour required, represents heavy expenditures. The solution to this problem is timely and the citizens of Montreal, for their part, are properly appreciative of this government measure which will lighten by that much the taxpayer's burden or thus helping Montreal to make improvements.

The speech from the throne also mentioned increased subsidies to provincial governments to help technical and professional training and, as we all know, this legislation which was introduced in 1937 has been improved from year to year and all the citizens who attended those schools have contributed substantially their efforts to the industrial life of Canada.

Now that industrial development requires ever increasing numbers of qualified workers, this government help will provide industry with needed personnel and as a result of this specialized and experienced manpower this country will enjoy larger revenues.

The province of Quebec for its part has always accepted these grants without endangering its autonomy and, according to figures given by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Enfield), during the year 1955-1956 my province received $2,952,000 in educational grants without demur.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the central government is the best possible instrument for developing and encouraging this technical and vocational training since it is in a position to know generally what is going on in this country in this regard. It can see what area least benefits from this training, everybody knows that if we want to have trained manpower in equal numbers everywhere, we must help with this training, improve it and perfect it.

In the province of Quebec officials have accepted that point of view, for they have always drawn these grants without protest but without however making it too well known to the public. The citizens of Quebec are satisfied with the situation and the heads of families of my constituency whose sons I have directed towards these schools are glad that their sons can enjoy a better education than they have received themselves, and placed in a position to make a good living. However, the generosity of the government is not restricted to technical and vocational training; it also extends to university training. This offer of assistance to universities has provoked much comment in the province of Quebec where it is argued that education is a provincial responsibility and not a federal one. I wonder however where this argument would lead us to if it were discussed to a logical end. Technical and vocational training which I just mentioned is also part of education, and yet the province of Quebec accepts federal grants in that field. If those grants are good and acceptable for certain schools, why would they not be so in the case of universties? Is it because the grants to universities would be more widely publicized than those to technical and vocational training?

In offering grants to universities, is the federal government trying to dictate what should be taught, or does it give these grants unconditionally? It offers them unconditionally to help universities with their financial problems so that their development may keep pace with our industrial development.

According to the dictionary and the authors, to educate is to train, to instruct a child, a person, or it is the process or manner of training and instructing a person. In giving grants to our universities the government of Canada does not impose on them any training program; nor does it suggest such a thing. It lets the universities free to do as they see fit, in order that these grants be put to the best possible use. Moreover I contend that these grants to our universities meet the views of the Massey Commission, which recommended the establishment of such grants to develop a culture in our young country. The culture of a people cannot be assessed in dollars and cents, but it is felt in the way of life of that people. If the federal government were to do nothing in that field, future generations would denounce it for its slackness and its inertia in not developing among our people a truly Canadian culture.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, a people without culture is to be pitied, and is difficult to get along with, because nothing beautiful or great can interest such a people. The life of a nation cannot be restricted to sports alone; there has to be an elite leading an intellectual life and imparting science and thought to the rest of the population. This elite should lead the people, and the eyes of the nations are upon it.

Our universities are schools for thought and higher learning, and if students are still not educated when they graduate, they will produce nothing for the community.

A university does not take its students from the cradle on, but at a more mature age in order to mould their thoughts, enrich their minds and give them a wealth of knowledge and science which they will radiate wherever they go. And these well-balanced, well-formed minds, full of intellectual scientific, literary, artistic and other concepts will mould a people's culture.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the government for offering these grants to the universities. This money will help in their development. My special thanks go to the Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who has arranged for the universities of the province of Quebec which have consented to be parties to these agreements to retain the right to these grants, which will be held for them until such time as they may be in a position to use them.

Before closing my remarks I would like to deal with another matter which some of my colleagues have raised, that is with the increase in family allowances and old age pensions. The Liberal government has instituted a social security program which is a credit to Canada. Those who have benefited from this program have been better off for it. Today our young people are better educated, more active, better clothed, our schools have more pupils than ever thanks to the help extended by the government to the parents of these children. These young people, when they leave school, are better able to face life. They are a source of great wealth to the nation.

As regards old people, in connection with the increase of the cost of living, the amount that they draw at this time insures a certain amount of security but does not preclude all worries.

Consequently, I wish the government would increase the rates of these social security benefits as soon as the finances of the country will allow it and without further increasing taxes.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to reiterate to the Prime Minister of this country and leader of the Liberal party the sincere appreciation of the voters of the Papineau constituency, whether they be French, English, Italian, Ukrainian or of any other racial origin. Each and everyone admires the way in which he administers the affairs of the country both from the national and international point of view, as it brings them security and comfort. They have not lost confidence in him and will continue to consider him the great artisan of national unity in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in the pleasant custom and congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) upon their remarks in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It was not my pleasure to hear them speak owing to my being at the United Nations, but I read their remarks with interest. When doing so the thought occurred to me that they both might qualify as very good cooks because they seriously endeavoured to make a palatable dish out of a very sorry mess of pottage.

It is sometimes customary when speaking in this particular debate for hon. members to enlarge to the house upon information with respect to their own ridings. However, as the population of the county of Peel has doubled approximately in the last five years and as its ideal location and climate must be well known throughout this land of ours, I am sure the people of my county will understand when I do not deal specifically with their individual problems. The county of Peel is both agricultural and industrial and therefore they feel that the situation that confronts Peel confronts the whole country and for that reason it is not necessary to specifically enumerate the matters affecting that county at this time.

In referring to the speech from the throne I find it rather difficult to envisage that it has been given on behalf of a government which for years has been saying that this is a country with a boom economy, built on a sound foundation and that Canada and Canadians together make up the greatest combination on the face of the earth; that in this land of plenty we should each year set our sights a little higher than the year before. To me the speech from the throne indicates a new influence in the government ranks, an influence of people who have never been too successful in their own business affairs, an influence of people who were never in business, an influence of people who have very little if any confidence in the ability of Canadians to develop this country without interference from the government.

It seems to me that an attempt has been made to resolve some of the differences within government ranks by the age-old theory that when things are not going too well within a country, or within a party in this particular instance, attention should be directed elsewhere. I suggest to you that within the ranks of the government there is a decidely sharp conflict, a conflict between those who are pessimistic failures and those who are optimistic realists. In order to resolve these differences they have highlighted the external affairs aspect.

I suggest that at this time the government should make the frank admission that for many years in the future the position in external affairs is going to be one of point and counterpoint, that the world situation will be unsettled for some time to come. Why do not those who sit to your right admit that when the British commonwealth influence was dominant in world affairs, that when the British commonwealth assumed its position of responsibility, with all the consequences inherent in that responsibility, the world situation was relatively stable and the world was relatively at peace. Why does not the government, those who sit temporarily to your right, admit that there is now a nation of strength which will not properly assume that responsibility. Until it can be made to do so times will be unsettled, and for some time.

Why does not the government take as its No. 1 objective the restoration of the position of the commonwealth in the world, and having done that then turn its attention to the development and strengthening of this country within its own boundaries. But then you have the contention within the party ranks of the government between the pessimists and the realists. May I quote one paragraph from the speech from the throne as follows:

> Indeed our economic expansion has been so rapid that it has put a serious strain upon the supply of various types of labour and materials needed for the many projects which are being put in hand. The corresponding competition to borrow savings to finance all these projects has brought about an increase in interest rates. Increases in the volume of money and credit have had to be carefully limited in order to check inflationary tendencies and the financial policies of my government have also been directed to counteract these same tendencies.

I underline the method that the government appears to be using, "The financial policies of my government have also been directed to counteract these same tendencies." No word about the increase of labour and materials which is the positive approach and the approach that increases the spending and the standard of living of Canadians; no, only the juggling of figures which represent finance at the higher level. There is control by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and the governor of the Bank of Canada, who earns a salary of $50,000 a year. What can they know of the concern of the common man who wants to buy something on credit or borrow enough to buy a house, or of the businessman who has geared his business to a certain level over the years and now finds that the normal means of financing are closed to him. What do they know about the bonus mortgages that have been brought about by their actions, actions which are short-sighted, pessimistic and unrealistic, actions which tend to highlight in the people's eyes a situation brought about by too much government interference in business.

The Minister of Finance blandly says that someone must get hurt; he blandly says that municipalities must not spend money. I remind him that municipal representatives are also elected, but for a shorter term, and I suggest that therefore they are nearer to the sense of the people than he is himself. I suggest also to him that this theory of his of not spending money is not shared or practised by his colleagues.

Any person will tell you that when a plant is growing and steps are taken to stunt that growth artificially the plant will be hurt as a result. The minister is trying to apply the age-old custom used in China to make women's feet more attractive by binding them. He wants to make the economy of this country more attractive to us all, and he is binding it. The result in China was, of course, that the people were crippled. I suggest the result here will be the same. I ask the members of this house and the people of Canada: Do we wish to rely on the judgment of Harris and Coyne or should we rely on the judgment of the farmers, the businessmen large and small, the consumers, the local bank managers and all those others who are actually in touch with the day-to-day commerce of the country?

I would point out at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has not yet admitted that these steps proposed by the Minister of Finance

(Mr. Harris) are necessary, and there seems to be a significant omission in this regard from many government statements. It was significant, also, that the Gordon commission, made up of people well recommended by this government, completely omitted any reference to an inflationary economy.

I leave that point, Mr. Speaker, and would like to refer to the reference in the speech from the throne to a capital fund for universities. This, so far as it goes, is I suppose a sop of some sort but I think the sights should be set a little higher. Many years ago when it was proposed that students who went to secondary schools should not have to pay their way, the proposal was laughed at. I think, as this is a national question, that the government should show leadership along the lines that no student should have to pay a fee in order to go to a university. The standard of admission should not be financial ability to pay but rather the student's academic ability, and this end can be accomplished in a number of ways. One might be the setting up of a sort of loan fund recoverable through the extra income tax that university graduates are shown to pay in a national economy. Leadership must be displayed in this regard, but perhaps it is asking a little too much to suggest that leadership be shown by this government in any field.

While we are discussing universities, I think encouragement should be given to efforts to pay professors and teachers a salary commensurate with their abilities and responsibilities. We cannot do that under a tight money policy, of course, but there should be a concerted effort either by private individuals or by government to ensure that the high calibre of those who serve these institutions as teachers or professors is maintained.

It has been said that in this country there are enough houses for everybody and that the housing industry is going to slacken off a little this year. I wonder if anyone has ever compiled a list showing the number of requests made by people who wish to have houses but refused because they were unable to meet the requirements of the National Housing Act? This act was conceived, I suppose, to help provide houses for people from the working class upward. It has looked after the "upward" category fairly well but so far it has neglected the working class. The standards of qualification under that act are higher than the average income for Canada and it seems to me that some steps might well be taken to make houses available under the conditions of that act to those who have previously been disqualified under its provisions, and I do earnestly suggest to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) that during the few months left in his tenure of office these difficulties should be removed. If he does not wish to amend the act in that regard I suggest that there are other amendments that could be made in order to provide housing on sound financing with minimum down payments under systems that have been in use for years in other countries.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, about the fact that the government may now pay municipal taxes. So they are going to give the municipalities a few dollars on the buildings while public fiscal policy takes many hundreds of dollars away from them in increased interest charges. The government never seems quite to round off the picture. They have not yet gone to the length of permitting a complete rebate of sales tax on buildings and supplies used for education purposes; they fail to recognize—or perhaps they have not the ability to do so—that it is of little use assisting municipalities in one way while at the same time taking resources back from them in another. Perhaps they have adopted the Social Credit policy of keeping the money in circulation as long as it goes round in government hands continually.

Mr. Speaker, before I close my remarks I do earnestly hope that someone from the government will tell us which of the two factions over there is going to dictate policy for the next few months in which they will enjoy office. I think the public are concerned and an explanation is certainly indicated. The speech from the throne has clearly shown that there is a division and I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that someone will clarify this position for us.

(Translation):

Mr. David Gourd (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I may seem a little tardy, but I believe it is my duty to say a few words in connection with the speech from the throne.

I would like first to congratulate the honourable member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) for the brilliant and tactful manner in which he accomplished the delicate task of moving the address in reply. I am also very happy indeed to voice my appreciation to the honourable member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who has so ably seconded the mover.

The speech from the throne reveals that, on the whole, Canada is enjoying a very high level of prosperity. As a matter of fact, it would be enough to travel abroad, to visit other countries, to find out how privileged we are to live in Canada and where the people enjoy so much affluence and freedom. Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the members of the opposition that such conditions are due to the good administration of the Liberal government. I would like to tell them how privileged we are in Canada to have as leaders men of such ability, of such skill to administer and develop this country. These men have given proof of their skill at the United Nations, at NATO, in the meetings at Geneva, New Delhi, etc., as well as during the negotiation of trade treaties, and that is why the voice of Canada is one of the most respected in the world.

While reading a few paragraphs from the report of the Gordon commission, I noted the forecast that the population of Canada will probably double within 25 years. Of course that depends on the development of this country, and if there is one area which should be developed and settled it is my constituency of Chapleau with all its great farm lands and natural resources.

First of all, the federal and provincial governments will have to agree on building roads and railways there; if, for instance, a road was built branching off the present Canadian National line, from a point between Senneterre and La Reine, and as far as James bay, that is a stretch of about 225 miles, it would be possible to open up the northwestern part of Quebec, and establish there several parishes, because the soil is very fertile, and this would only facilitate the development of mines, hydro power, and forest resources. To further this northern expansion, a new railway trunk would have to be built which would branch off the new line now being built towards Chibougamau close to Cedar Rapid or Beattyville, as far as Matagami lake, a run of about 50 miles. This would give companies a chance to erect a paper mill which would help develop this new country covered with beautiful forests, and filled with minerals of all kinds. That is the type of development this country needs to increase its population and supply it with employment. This is so true that, although the construction of the railway from Barraute to Chibougamau has not yet been completed the population has already substantially increased. New parishes are already being established, those for instance at Bachelor lake, Opemiska, and there is even talk of others being founded north of Chibougamau.

Moreover, the federal and provincial governments should get together to help the federated co-operative build a slaughter house and a cold-storage, and also to help the companies that would like to build refineries and paper mills. My observations are based on statistics and on past experience because, when I came to Abitibi, there was only a handful of families, and there are now there at least 250,000 people.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to miss this opportunity to repeat, in connection with our national security, that a road should be opened between Norembega, in the province of Ontario, and the town of La Reine in the province of Quebec, a distance of only 47 miles. It is inconceivable that the Ontario government should overlook the necessity of building that road which, besides being beneficial to the province, would open the way to the settlement of many new parishes and provide a link between the two provinces, and promote the tourist trade in northwestern Quebec and northern Ontario. I could mention another road section whose development, by the Department of National Defence, would unquestionably be both necessary and urgent. I refer to the construction of a road connecting Casey, where the National Defence department has built a very important airport, to the radar station of Parent, a distance of about 25 miles. The cost of construction would certainly not exceed $12,000 to $15,000 per mile and the population of Parent and the surrounding district would thus be provided with an outlet.

I wish also to take this opportunity to ask our devoted Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to urge the government to grant the old age pension without the means test from the age of 65. This would spare us heavy administrative expenses and would be fairer to the people concerned. I would also like to ask him to increase family allowances. I can tell you that they are most useful in helping the families of my constituency in sending their children to school and in facing the rising cost of living. It would only be fair and reasonable to increase the rate of allowances. It would also be fair and proper to increase disabled persons' pension.

Mr. Speaker, you will no doubt pardon my obstinacy in again referring to the necessity for our country to be represented in the Vatican state along with almost every country in the world. It is with pleasure that I find myself in agreement with certain hon. members who understand that Canada is important enough to all points of view to have its own ambassador and not have to be represented by other countries, as it is the case now. To my mind it would be easy to arrive at an agreement in this matter and it would be in the interest of this country as a whole.

I would not want to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, without mentioning, as I did in my previous speeches, the need for a distinctive Canadian flag. I support the suggestion made by the hon. member from Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) that the leaders of all parties in the house come to an agreement on the choice of that flag. I am sure that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in discussing this matter with party leaders, will find with them a practical and just solution, which will be a credit to our great country, Canada.

(Text):

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, may I first endorse the words of congratulations that my leader conveyed to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the motion in reply.

In looking over the domestic scene I think one must agree that the greatest problem with which we are faced is this problem of inflation, and I would couple with it the related problem of the economic farm crisis in Canada. That has a good deal of importance to the people in the prairie west from which I come. It is sometimes called the farm cost-price squeeze.

I do not propose here to discuss the causes of inflation; that would serve no particular purpose. However, I do wish to plead the case of some of those who have been and who are affected by it. I shall also say a word or two about the only prescription for that particular disease with which the government has come forward, and it is indeed more than a prescription because the medicine itself has been forced upon us. I mean, of course, the manipulation of the interest rates upwards. Admittedly there has been a great expansion and great productivity. No one can shut his eyes to that. However, there are those who would sum up those two terms in the single word prosperity; with that I would take issue because surely there must be in the meaning of that word "prosperity" some element of general human happiness and contentment, and there must be some trickling down through the economic strata, all the strata of society, some benefit from our natural production, some equity if you like, in the sharing of the wealth which people produce. A real prosperity, as I say, would entail the sharing of some of this so-called prosperity by everyone in the country. But if this is prosperity it is an uneven prosperity. This government has no machinery, as far as I can see here, for a solution of this problem. It appears as hopeless in the face of inflation as its twin the last Conservative government appeared in the face of deflation, inflation and deflation being two sides of the same coin.

When I said that the government was helpless in bringing forward a solution, perhaps I gave the government too much credit. Wealth is being syphoned off, of course, by vested interests, and indeed the government may justly be said to be aiding and abetting that particular process. And by what devices? There are many that I would mention but those which come to my mind readily are things like accelerated depreciation, depletion allowances, or by allowing the 20 per cent deduction from the income taxes in respect of the amounts of their profit from corporation dividends. That I have always thought to be particularly unjust. I know the motive behind it but I think it is time it was removed. Then there is the other one which usually irritates me; that is the ceiling on the contribution to the old age pension fund. Those who have a high income and reach the ceiling pay no more towards the old age pension part of the income tax than those who are on very modest income.

I do not think that prosperity is the word for this whirlwind of borrowing and spending in which we are all caught up, and which does leave a good deal of wreckage in its path. I have thought of the effects of inflation upon the farmer. The farmer is the forgotten man, I think, in Canada; at least that is the way we feel about it in western Canada. Not only has there been a steady decline over the years in the price of his produce, but there has been a corresponding, and perhaps even faster, rise in the cost of production and the cost of the machinery which he uses. The agricultural industry is declining. There is no doubt about it and I think it is a misfortune. I do not know whether we are prepared to go into the tinsel and glittering atomic age with almost complete urban living. It is a good thing to have good sound people on good sound and prosperous family farms. I am a city member, of course, but I am well aware of the extent to which the prosperity of the city and town is bound up with the prosperity of the farmers who surround that particular city or town.

It occurs to me to say that Mr. Walker, who is the secretary of the retail merchants association, said in the year end statement not too long ago that 250 small private businesses had disappeared through bankruptcy in Saskatchewan in the year 1956. Those were private enterprise businesses, and my laissez faire friends across the way say it is just too bad but there is nothing that can be done about it. The prosperity of those people was predicated directly on the prosperity of the farmer. It also occurs to me to say what a howl of glee would have gone up on the part of my free enterprise friends if these had been publicly owned, perhaps Saskatchewan government owned projects, and in their opinion, would have been all the proof you need that you cannot have successful public enterprise. These were small private enterprises and as far as we in the C.C.F. are concerned we would have liked to have seen those little private enterprises continue to live and continue to be successful.

The result of inflation felt most in the average Canadian home is, of course, the cost of living. Someone told me the other day—I have no documentary proof of it—that one-third of the money value of the gross national product was due to the increase in prices. The rise in cost is followed, justly enough, by a demand for increased wages. We have, therefore, this spiral; up and up it goes and, if I may paraphrase a nursery rhyme, where it ends nobody knows. Those who suffer most are those who are on fixed incomes. When one thinks of the purchasing power of the dollar of an old age pension nowadays as compared to the same power at the time when the old age pension was initiated, one realizes that we have not come very far in the direction of giving security to our old people, because the purchasing power of the dollar has been destroyed. The value of people's life savings has been cut in half. Each one of us knows that, in regard to the life insurance we undertook in our early years, if we have to cash it in—and I say it is a sad commentary upon this so-called prosperity that many less fortunate people are cashing them in in order to provide themselves with the daily necessities of life—we only receive about half what we had some reason to expect. The same thing is true, of course, of government bonds. That forsooth is prosperity. If that is prosperity, may I repeat, it is a very uneven one.

In family allowances, of course, we hear the same thing. I am in favour of family allowances; I am a believer in old age pensions. We in this group have perhaps contributed something to the acquiring of these things. I shall not go into that. Then, there is the matter of hospital costs. Medical costs are going up and up so that—I was going to say for the average man but we will not put it that way—for the people below average in income the thing is getting to be almost impossible. It is true that in our own province and in other provinces there are hospital schemes that do relieve the situation.

I notice that even Liberal members are asking for an increase in the old age pension. I take hope. I think that may be a favourable omen because, if my hon. friends across the way will excuse me, I do not think they would be embarrassing their own government to such an extent by talking on old age pensions if they had not some pretty good idea that a rise in such pensions was coming. I do not know what amount will be forthcoming. However, I would urge upon the government that if my case is a good one, it be answered, and if this thing called prosperity is to be evened up for all strata of society, the government will be compelled in the very name of justice itself to bring forth an increased security program for old age pensioners, for the recipients of family allowances, for blind pensioners, for pensioners of all kinds, so that the augmented pension will have some resemblance in purchasing power to the pension when it was first given. Personally, I would like to see a real increase and if we can get at least those amounts restored to the original purchasing power it would at least be a step in the right direction.

I would urge upon the government with regard to what I have said about medical and hospital services that they proceed to initiate at least something of the scheme which they have been promising us ever since 1919. Well, I have perhaps said enough on that subject in the time at my disposal.

I would like to say something on the effects of the remedy for inflation proposed. Before I do that may I quote from a clipping that I hold in my hand, which contains a statement on the increased cost of living. Perhaps I might document it. This information was supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics. There is a comment on it in an editorial as follows:

> More significantly, the index—

Of course, that is the index of living costs.

> —rose 3.4 points from March 1 to October 1, recording increases in five of the intervening months. This sudden spurt upwards in the index is but another evidence of the inflationary pressures which now are bedevilling the Canadian economy more than at any time since the early Korean war period of 1950-51.

I was going on to say that I should like to mention some of the effects of the government remedy. There is some doubt in a great many minds as to whether the remedy is actually effective or, if it is effective at all, whether it is sufficiently extended. I am no economist. I notice that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) took the position this afternoon that a man should not talk about something unless he knows a good deal about the subject about which he is talking.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is when it helps.

Mr. Knight: It helps, yes. I wish I had time to tell my hon. friend a little story about that. One slippery night I was walking from the House of Commons down the sidewalk in Ottawa and I was going past a beer parlour about eleven o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knight: "Past", I said. It was about eleven o'clock at night and the boys were coming out in various stages of intoxication. Just at that particular point, in the light of an open doorway, my foot slipped on the glare ice and I fell and bumped my head. The boys came out and picked me up. As you do on such occasions when you slip on an orange peel or something, you say something particularly foolish and I said, "A man does not have to be drunk tonight to fall on the ice". "No", this fellow said, "but it helps". My hon. friend the minister corrected our young colleague, the Conservative member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), for being so brash as to dare to bring to the attention of the government something in which his people are interested. Perhaps, in spite of my hon. friend's superior knowledge, as an expert on most issues, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris had the right conception of what the function of a member of parliament should be.

Well, to get back to my speech—there is no time for stories—I would like to mention how the effect of this government's cure, namely, the rise in interest rates, affects the ordinary people that I know. The first thing I have noticed is that it is driving more and more people into the clutches of the money lenders, since people are attempting to square up their debts at an exorbitant rate of interest. I have noticed an increase in instalment buying. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) probably knows the figure, but the last figure of consumer credit I had was $2,400 million, and that in a period of prosperity. May I ask, what kind of prosperity is that?

I was going to say a word or two to the Minister of Trade and Commerce about the statement of an expert in his particular field. I refer to a statement, I think it is the yearly annual statement of the president of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. Muir. He said this, as reported by the Montreal Gazette on January 11:

> It would seem, therefore, to be at least open to doubt whether the present facilities and techniques available to our monetary authorities are sufficiently wide in scope to deal with present-day problems of credit control. The classical weapon—upward movement of interest rates, largely through commercial banks—may by itself prove an impotent policy. It may be taking too positive a view of a distant scene, but it would at least appear that, in order to be fair and in order to achieve the best results, our monetary and credit control may have to embrace a wider area of our financial world than it now does.

There, I submit, is the evidence of the expert.

There are one or two other classes of people affected by this high rate of interest. The increasing of the interest rate does help to redistribute money. Well, it does transfer money from the pocket of the borrower, who has little money to spare, to the pockets of the lender, who has more. It adds to the difficulties of a man trying to finance the building of a house. Was it only today, or was it yesterday, that we had the interpretation by the Canadian Press of a statement made in this house by the Minister of Public Works? I hold the Canadian Press dispatch in my hand. It reads as follows:

> The government may soon move to boost the interest rate ceiling under the National Housing Act to encourage a greater flow of mortgage money for house building, it was learned today.

The minister was questioned on that. I do not recall that he gave a satisfactory answer; but the possibility is those young people who are trying to establish a home—by the way, it is almost impossible to get money on a modest home basis—would perhaps be faced with the payment of six per cent as an interest rate. This high rate of interest cripples the small businessmen. The large corporations can get along and do their own financing because they use depreciation and various other methods. I am thinking particularly of the big retail stores which are actually turning themselves into finance companies because they find it much more profitable to sell on credit than for cash. Their real profits are derived from the finance side of their business. It is true that they are able to lower the price of goods somewhat and by this method they squeeze the smaller stores out of business. I should not be surprised if some of the 250 businesses that went bankrupt in the province of Saskatchewan did so as a result of being hurt by that particular thing.

Turning from the individual for a moment I would like to ask about interest rates. Here we have municipalities which even before the increase in interest rates were at their wit's end to obtain funds to keep their schools in operation and to extend sewer and water facilities, and they have been forced to borrow money. My own city of Saskatoon had to pay 5¼ per cent interest in order to carry on in supplying essential services. There is no distinction, and you would not expect any, since private capital is involved, between the rate which is charged to people who are putting in luxury items and those who are concerned with essential services. Those involved with luxuries make more profit and are able to pay a higher interest rate and so they are able to obtain the money. This is something concerning which the government should take action, but of course the government will not do anything about it because it does not believe at all in economic planning.

I now wish to say a word or two about a matter that is very dear to the hearts of people in my particular part of the province. I am referring, of course, to the proposed, for that is all it is up to this moment, South Saskatchewan river development scheme. I was disappointed as I have been disappointed before by the adamant statement of the Prime Minister, which leads me to believe we will get no action concerning this project even in this election year. I shall be interested to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) when he mounts the hustings in the province of Saskatchewan. He has contradicted the Prime Minister on other occasions. I remember reading a report of an occasion when both my hon. friend and the Prime Minister appeared on a platform one evening in the city of Regina. The Prime Minister said quite honestly what he has repeated here in recent days that nothing would be done about the dam and five minutes afterwards the Minister of Agriculture addressing the same audience proceeded to offer some hope and encouragement to the assembly that the project would be built, and this was done in the presence of the Prime Minister himself. Judging from the statement made today I suspect the matter will not be trotted out even in this election year, unless it be by the Minister of Agriculture.

I want to draw to the attention of the house this report with which fault has already been found in several quarters. I refer to the preliminary report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, commonly called the Gordon report. There is a very adverse report there with respect to irrigation. On page 27 of the report the following appears:

> We suggest that substantial irrigation projects, while desirable from the standpoint of local areas, could be harmful rather than helpful to farmers in the aggregate.

The first thing I want to point out is that the South Saskatchewan river scheme is not solely an irrigation development, for the question of power is involved. Even if the statement on irrigation were correct, the scheme cannot be judged on the basis of benefit or practicability in regard to irrigation alone. The statement is most contradictory because previously in discussing agriculture at page 26 the report says:

> Demand will continue to rise for foods which can be produced profitably within a more intensive pattern of land use than is presently practised in Canada. This will be true as farmers move toward more meat production and higher output of poultry and eggs.

The report also refers to some form of fodder rotation to assist us in changing from a purely wheat economy. Anyone who lives in my part of the country and in the district to the southwest knows very well there is no security for the prairie wheat farmer in switching to mixed farming in that particular area. As far as I am concerned, I believe irrigation is the means of bringing about the kind of security the report mentions, and more than that it would provide the increased population to consume some of the food which would result from the implementation of the recommendations in the report. The population would be further augmented by the attraction to the province of those industries which would naturally follow upon irrigation, proof of which can be found in the southern part of the province of Alberta where you have sugar refineries, canning plants and the beef finishing industry. There you have the ideal situation that can develop on a dry belt in the prairie provinces. My second appeal to the government is to pay no attention to this part of the report but to proceed with the irrigation scheme.

There is one other matter with which I should like to deal before I resume my seat and although it may be considered a small matter by some hon. members of this house it deeply concerns the people of my constituency. Not too long ago the town of Sutherland, a railroad town on the outskirts of Saskatoon, amalgamated with the larger city. Naturally we got busy to try to get mail delivery service for that new part of the city. Well, after long delays the matter got under way, surveys were made and certain conditions were laid down. We were told that the city would have to mark the streets and name them and that 90 per cent of the people would have to write in giving their names and addresses under the new set-up, and I am told this has now been accomplished. When I recently inquired about the matter I was told that although we had fulfilled those conditions 90 per cent of the people had not yet advised that they have receptacles set up to receive the mail when it is brought around. I must say, sir, I know many people in the larger city of Saskatoon that have not yet established receptacles. For the last 30 years I have been receiving my own mail in my milk box although perhaps I should not admit that in the presence of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lapointe). I think it is time to stop this dilly-dallying and shilly-shallying—they are both good words and they rhyme—and get on with the task so that when the weather is a little warmer the mail will be brought around. Most people lived in hope of having mail service established before the cold weather set in. Although it is hard for our good postmen to deliver in cold weather it is, after all, their work, and if the service were established it would mean only one man would go to the post office instead of the 30 or 40 who now have to go daily. Let us proceed with the matter and complete it. Surely it will have been completed before the election at least.

One other subject with which I want to deal is one of which I am particularly fond. I have noticed the measures granting aid to education that have been foreshadowed in the speech from the throne. May I say I welcome them and I have no intention of debating them here because the proper place to debate them is when the legislation is brought into the house. However, it did occur to me that I might refer to a couple of statements that have been made, one contained in the speech of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) and one in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I know the rules of the house would preclude my using those quotations at a time when the legislation was being considered. I referred first to the speech of the hon. member for Gloucester who discussed in both French and English—it is a pleasure for me to be able to understand both languages and I shall perhaps give quotations in both because I have a particular reason for so doing—this matter in some detail. You know, the hon. member for Gloucester and some of his confreres are coming along; they are making progress. Here is a man who believes in his heart that this legislation would be a good thing, not just because the government is proposing to bring it in. The hon. member is reported on page 4 of the translation of Hansard of January 8 as having said:

> We recognize that the rapid growth of our country requires a similar development of our universities and we approve without any reservation the financial participation of the state as long as the federal government does not intend to interfere in the field of education, . . .

Then we have that rhyme that we always have from some of my friends across the way. There is no one in this house who is more insistent than I, that the administration and curriculum of education should be completely within provincial jurisdiction. Then he goes on further and refers to financial assistance as constituting another means of safeguarding our cultural economy. He then went on in praise of the government and said:

> It recognizes the increased demands brought about by our national evolution. It therefore proposes to revise once more and to increase subsidies and subventions to provincial governments to assist them in providing technical and vocational training for our young people.

So the hon. member is in complete accord with grants to universities; he is in complete accord with grants to technical schools; he is in complete accord with grants for technical training. I should like to turn for a moment to the part of the hon. member's speech which he made in French and in which he used a very significant word. I was not too familiar with the meaning of the French word but I do know my Latin and I think I know what lacuna means when I read the following quotation:

(Translation):

> May I be permitted to point out one of the problems facing our municipalities, the seriousness of which is constantly increasing from year to year.

(Text):

What is the significance of the words "une lacune"? Here we have the hon. member unconsciously using that word. It was a word that came to his mind. What does it mean? I did not look it up in the dictionary but I know what "lacuna" means. It means a void, a blank, a spot that has to be filled.

Mr. Harris: A gap in the night.

Mr. Knowles: Do not "Harris" him.

Mr. Knight: I would say that there is indeed une lacune. It is a commonly used phrase and it is significant that my hon. friend used it because it has a special connotation in regard to education. Combler les lacunes de son éducation. My hon. friend would like to see that gap filled. Of course he expressed the pious hope that it will not be filled by financial support from the federal government. Oh, dear me, he must not suggest that. However, he says that it will be filled.

May I return for a moment to the English translation of the same speech, because the majority of hon. members will understand it a little better when it is given in that language. We find the hon. member returning to the wars. After pointing out that there is une lacune in this educational system, that there is this void, this blank spot, he goes on to say:

> In my constituency of Gloucester, for instance, the population of 60,000 inhabitants has to provide primary education to some 15,000 children. The high cost of building and maintaining our schools, as well as teachers' salaries require direct taxation, far beyond the taxpayers' ability to pay.

Then there is the pious declaration again that the federal government must not be permitted to assist in any way, no, not now. However, I think the hon. member is changing his mind and seems to be progressing, because he went on to say:

This should be dealt with exclusively by our provincial legislatures, and it is up to the municipalities to insist upon the distribution by the provincial governments of a larger share of the subsidies granted the provinces by the federal government.

There is not too much difference between us. I wonder if this little thing that lies between my hon. friend and myself, and I respect his opinions, is not more political than constitutional. I think we will let it go at that.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) dealt with a somewhat related matter and became rather heated because his motives had been questioned. He was talking about the federal government considering the granting of direct aid to the municipalities in order to help them provide the necessary services, and he is reported on page 35 of Hansard of January 9 as saying:

No matter what precautions we try to take to avoid it being done there will be some who would affirm, if you were going to do something about municipal government, that we were aiming at destroying the Catholic religion and the French language in the province of Quebec. Could anything be more silly, more groundless than that?

I hope I shall live long enough, and I hope the Prime Minister will too, to see the day when he will be willing and will dare to say that the idea that financial aid to the provinces for the purpose of education would ipso facto mean federal control over education is also silly. My time is about up but I have one concluding sentence. If it is a personal one I hope you will forgive me. Surely there is no man in this house, I do not care what his racial origin or religion may be, who can say that I have been anything but sincere in my belief that if we grant the provinces sufficient funds that there can be across this country not equal education but equal opportunity for education. It is all right for some of the provinces. I take it the province of Ontario can finance its own education. I am pleased to see that the premier of Quebec has given large sums to the support of education in his own province. But nobody who comes from the province of New Brunswick or the province of Nova Scotia, for instance, would say that those provinces can afford to give their children an equal opportunity for education such as can be given by some of the richer provinces of which we think but which I have no time to name. Surely, no one would believe that, and I do hope that my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) for whom I have the highest respect—now that he has come to those three things; suddenly he has come to the ditch, the lacuna, the void that should be filled—that he himself will be an advocate that something should be done about it.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few comments in this debate may I first of all be allowed to offer my sincere appreciation to the Prime Minister for his happy and tactful choice of the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In asking a representative from the western prairies in the person of the genial Irish Canadian from Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), and the lively and active young member for Gloucester in the maritimes (Mr. Robichaud), to undertake this important parliamentary duty, the Prime Minister has once again demonstrated his broad and deep concern, and recognition of, the fact that Canadians are one family. He has again underlined by this generous gesture the necessity of unity for the future happiness and prosperity of the Canadian people. Allow me to offer my best wishes and congratulations to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the hon. member for Gloucester on the splendid performance of their duties.

Coming from Saskatchewan as I do, I wish also to congratulate the new leader of the official opposition. Though he was not born on the western prairies, as I was, nevertheless, like our politically and physically indestructible Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), he came to Saskatchewan at an early age and has given all his life and all his talents to that great province. I may also add another word. There are some members in this house who have been honoured by the red man of this country by being made Indian chiefs. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I have both had this honour conferred upon us, and so have some other members of this house. Thus, in addition to my political congratulations, as one chief to another I offer him my good wishes.

An hon. Member: And how.

Mr. Mang: It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that every speech from the throne must cover a variety of subjects and that any comment on it cannot help but follow much the same pattern. The speech from the throne is, as a rule, divided into three main parts. It covers the international scene; it deals secondly with the national picture and the progress of the economy of the nation as a whole; and, thirdly, it brings to light and deals with conditions in particular areas of Canada, attempting to fit the program of these particular areas into the Canadian scene as a whole.

In this present session, as has already been pointed out by other speakers, a great deal of emphasis is placed on the international scene. The reason for this is, I think, obvious. In this modern world no nation can long remain prosperous and happy by itself alone. Indeed, it is becoming increasingly evident that what other nations do, either politically or economically, affects the life and happiness of every Canadian citizen. Speaking as a prairie westerner, I need cite only one example to give one minor illustration. Between 70 and 80 per cent of our wheat must find an export market. In consequence of this the agricultural policies of all our 80 customer nations throughout the world will affect the marketing of our product, while the agricultural policies of our competitors such as the United States and Argentina, by their disposal and sales decisions, will also affect the life of every Canadian in western Canada.

Last year this parliament in its wisdom granted some $32 million to the farmers of western Canada in an attempt to assist them in their problem of storing the surplus crops which had been produced, and in making that grant every taxpayer in Canada was affected. We appreciate the assistance very much because it did mean something like seven cents a bushel to us. That is to us in the west another illustration of the effect that this interdependence of nations throughout the world economy can have for all of us. Not only what happens in the field of trade but events in the field of politics mean that our interest is bound up with the world interest and the interest of every other nation.

What happened, for instance, in Suez and Hungary recently has affected Canada as well as the rest of the world. Little did we dream last September that we would be host to thousands upon thousands of Hungarian refugees at the present time. While I am drawing attention to this phase of international developments in recent weeks and months, and while I am mentioning the refugee Hungarians, I would just like to say that I saw some of the work done by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) in bringing some of these refugees over to this country. That was shortly before I left to attend this session.

The first arrival of Hungarian refugees at Regina was the occasion of a very warm reception. I was very interested in attending this occasion, on the evening of their arrival, because there is in my constituency of Qu'Appelle a large community of Hungarian people who went there at the turn of the century and who have since contributed much to the economy of that particular area as, indeed, they have contributed to that of other areas in Saskatchewan. I mention that to indicate that we should welcome these people from Hungary most wholeheartedly, as was done on that occasion. Many people from this community in my area were at the welcoming reception and took part through interpreters and also in a more tangible way, having gathered finances, in helping to establish these people in this country.

A further reason for mentioning this at this time is that I think it shows that Saskatchewan has taken to heart the words of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration just before he left for Europe when he admonished the communities of Canada to render every possible assistance in the placement and welcoming of these Hungarian patriots when they arrived here. Saskatchewan is doing this in a very commendable way.

There was one item on the agenda that evening that was most impressive. At one stage of the proceedings the chairman of the welcoming reception called upon the Hungarian patriots to rise and sing for us the Hungarian national anthem. By the time they had come to the second stanza of the anthem their emotions were very evident. Tears began to flow and at the end of their stirring rendition of the anthem the silence was such as to move all those present. We followed by singing God Save the Queen, and looking at the faces of these new Canadians I could see a spirit that will, I am sure, contribute a great deal to the progress of Canada, and when the time arrives for them to become Canadians I am sure they will make a great contribution to our national life.

I spoke to many of these people. They were from all classes of society. I spoke to engineers, mechanics, labourers, tailors, farmers and housewives. It seemed that a cross-section of the people of Hungary had been brought to our country and would be of great benefit to us. I noted in the paper today that of all the hundreds who have come here there are only about 35 who have not yet been placed in employment.

May I say a word or two about the recent railway strike that affected my constituency as I am sure it did every other constituency in Canada. For the past few years we have been very anxious to get our products off the farms into a saleable position. In our particular area we have a good many shipping points where some millions of bushels of grain are produced. Before I came here for this session I had telephone calls and interviews with people who urged me to do what I could to bring to bear the sentiments of the farmers of Qu'Appelle constituency in order that the strike might be settled speedily.

I think that the government and particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) are to be congratulated on the manner in which this unfortunate and expensive interruption in the nation's economic life was dealt with. It is not easy for a third party to step in and intervene in the affairs of two stubborn disputants. Everyone will agree that it would have been a very unhappy situation if parliament had been forced to intervene in the matter. Even if it had become necessary to settle the strike and interruption of railway service through legislative action by using the machinery of parliament and introducing the element of compulsion, I do not think that the resumption of service could have been achieved more quickly and certainly not as satisfactorily.

As all of us know, parliament met on Tuesday and by Friday afternoon a solution to the deadlock was announced. Legislative action would have brought about ill will as well as throwing the matter into politics, which was to be avoided at all costs. Such a course would have caused confusion of the issues, confusion of the public mind and would have given birth to recrimination and disunity among Canadians.

Once again the Prime Minister has proven his ability to put immediate issues in their proper perspective and arrive at a reasonable solution. To solve the difficulty in this way and to have the ability to bring about a compromise in such a manner is nothing short of genius on the part of any individual. When the Prime Minister was created an honorary chief of the Great Plains Indians at Fort Qu'Appelle some years ago, an event at which I was happy to attend, he was named wise counsellor. I submit to hon. members that no Canadian deserves that title more or carries it with greater dignity.

Perhaps this may afford me an opportunity to say a few words with respect to the attitude of farmers and consumers in general. With regard to economic dislocations caused by disputes between corporations and labour organizations in the modern economic set-up in the world and in this country, I think we have come to the point where we must take a very hard look at the justification for break-downs such as strikes cause. In our highly organized society of today, whether in this country or any other, if one group however small—and this was illustrated by the recent strike—uses the power of its organization in order to attain its ends in a way that does not always indicate the highest sense of social responsibility, shall I say, I believe it will bring about a reaction on the part of those sections of society which are not as powerfully organized as the corporations or the labour unions. Because of the very nature of his occupation and also because of his temperament, the farmer is not in a position to organize and assert his economic strength. On account of the very nature of the way in which farmers earn their living and the very nature of the temperament of the individual farmer, it is not possible for them to marshal their economic strength and bring themselves to the point of economic welfare in the way that other sections of the community can.

The consumer is in much the same position. By the very nature of the consumer population in any country they cannot be organized to assert their economic rights and negotiate by means of ultimatum. Corporations can negotiate, and do very often bring negotiations to the point where they can issue an ultimatum and say either you come to terms with us as a corporation or we will close down and throw you out of employment. On the other hand, powerful labour organizations can also issue ultimatums and say, unless you meet our conditions and our demands we will not conform to an agreement. Now, that is nothing short of a shooting war in the economy of a nation. That attitude, I think, is in time going to bring about a reaction with which the public is going to deal in a way which is not desirable in a democracy.

Mr. Argue: Who is threatening whom?

Mr. Mang: Both corporations and labour must be made to realize their social responsibilities in any demands which one makes upon the other, and could require eventually legislative action through parliament in order to safeguard the interests of the economy at large.

There are a few things which I would like to bring out with respect to my own particular area. We are a very diversified farming area. We have no industries except one small oil can industry employing 10 men in Rocanville. We have a small oil field at Wapella, Saskatchewan, but outside that we are entirely engaged in farming. The farming conditions vary in that constituency perhaps as in no other area of Saskatchewan. In the eastern part we have a very high cattle population, the highest in Saskatchewan per section of land. Therefore, we derive a good deal of our livelihood from that. In the extreme western part we have some of the farmers on the plains of Regina who produce over 100,000 bushels of wheat. In between we have a section engaged entirely in mixed farming producing milk and cream as well as grain. In general we are a very prosperous area.

Mr. Argue: Not the farmers.

Mr. Mang: In general. We have produced the highest crops that have ever been produced. As a matter of fact farmers in some parts of my area have averaged 40 bushels per acre. We have what you so often have heard discussed in this house, namely a cash shortage, but that does not mean—

Mr. Argue: The farmers have everything but money; you are right.

Mr. Mang: —we are bankrupt. If you were to travel through that area you would find that in general taxes have been paid at reasonable levels. We find that we own one-toned cars, two-toned cars, three-toned cars, and we drive good automobiles. We have new combines and trucks and we have paid mortgages; we are in a fairly good financial position. But we do have a cash shortage and that is attributable to various factors.

I do not want any of my C.C.F. friends to go out and say, as they will, that I have presented a rosy picture to this house. However, I do think that it is about time to raise some other angles of the cash shortage situation. We have always in western Canada been short of cash for one simple reason, that we are a very aggressive, very energetic, and very go-ahead people; as soon as we get some money we re-invest it, enlarge our holdings, buy better machinery; and while we may not have much money in the bank we do build up very fine farms and live a reasonably contented life.

We are proceeding with electrification, which will assist to a degree in the cash shortage situation. It costs money. It costs $2,000 or $3,000 to fully equip yourself with electrical conveniences of this modern day.

Mr. Argue: How much does it cost for a combine?

Mr. Mang: Combines and machinery have been purchased and we are paying for them the same as anyone else in the economy of our country is paying for any goods which he buys. You buy a television set on time for 10 per cent down and in time you pay for it. We make our purchases and on the whole we do meet our commitments.

Besides investing the money which we receive we also have not quite become accustomed to the wheat board's system of marketing grain. In the years previous we, as farmers, used to be able to ship a carload of grain, and when that grain was shipped it was not very long before we received our $2,000 or $3,000 for it. We would then meet our commitments and take care of any of our purchases in that way. Now, under the wheat board's system of handling our grain, we as farmers have decided to pool our prices. There is no such a thing as No. 3 bringing a certain price in the fall and No. 3 bringing a certain price in the spring. We have instituted and agreed upon an orderly system of marketing, and I am glad to say that the preliminary report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects says, in connection with wheat in its first sentence, that it seems clear from the evidence presented that the method of marketing wheat and coarse grain to the Canadian wheat board is well accepted and established and that the majority opinion is strongly in favour of continuing it. But in backing this pooling system of selling our grain it has brought with it a price which we have to pay, and that is this. If the board handles our grain we are now in a position where we have sometimes to exercise a great deal of patience in bringing our grain into the marketing position because, according to our permit books, we are allotted a one-bushel quota, a two-bushel quota, a three-bushel quota and so on. On a 200-acre cultivated farm a one-bushel quota will bring you $200. You hear this every place: What can I do with $200?

Mr. Argue: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mang: That stems out of our system of marketing and handling our grain.

Mr. Argue: No; the price of wheat is too low.

Mr. Mang: In addition, very often there is a disparity which cannot be helped. I refer to the difference in allotment as between stations. One station may have a three-bushel quota, another station may have a two-bushel quota and a third station may have a one-bushel quota. That is done because there are varying grades and in order to meet its foreign sales commitments the wheat board must be in a position to call for the kind of grain for which it has a sale, No. 3, No. 4, No. 5 or No. 6, as the case may be. Then, you have the people at station A who are on a three-bushel quota talking about it. They say, "Oh, we have a three-bushel quota; we are not too badly off". The one-bushel quota point will not take very kindly to that, and you have those annoyances and those difficulties that stem out of the way in which we market our grain.

We have to come to the point in western Canada where we must be prepared to pool our deliveries as we are pooling our prices; that is, that certain sections will receive certain quotas while other sections may receive less or more. But over the years it is the determination of the wheat board, in so far as it is humanly possible, to deal equitably with everyone.

Another reason for cash shortage is that we are entering, and have come very rapidly, particularly in the last 10 years, into an era of mechanization. Thirty years ago we used to grow both our power, in the form of horses, and also our fuel, the feed for the horses to work our land. We did not require actual cash. But now, the motive power, the power we use in cultivating our farms, requires a good deal of cash. The tractor will not reproduce itself. Our fuel consists of gasoline, and both of these things demand cash payments. Therefore, in order to build our production we are in the position where we must have a continuous flow of cash. If we get some cash it is applied immediately and I admit that we are continuously out of cash.

Mr. Argue: That is why we want cash advances.

Mr. Mang: What assistance it will be to get advances in one lump sum is perhaps something that will have to be considered. I mean cash advances on the farm in lieu of cash advances at the bank, which we now have, and which thousands upon thousands of farmers are using very satisfactorily.

Mr. Argue: The United States farmer gets a cash advance of $2 a bushel.

Mr. Mang: Yes. By the way, the United States policies are tending to come to a more flexible program than the one they have been employing. They are trying to get back to the Canadian system just as fast as they can.

Mr. Argue: Not at all.

Mr. Mang: And reduce their 88 million acres down to 55 million acres.

Mr. Argue: They get $17 an acre for taking wheat out of production.

Mr. Mang: Yes, and what price do they have to pay for that? They have to specify a certain definite acreage. If they have four quarters of land and they want to come under the scheme and take part of the benefits they must specify the northwest quarter, or whatever the land is, and take it out over a period of time. If it is turned over to reforestation, then they have to sign a contract that runs from 10 to 15 years in order to participate in the scheme.

Mr. Argue: The price of $17 an acre is a pretty good price.

Mr. Mang: Not all United States farmers are going in for that. They are trying; they are doing their very best, but with some difficulty, to get down from the 88 million acres they used to have to the 55 million acres, which is what they had before the war. On the other hand, we in Canada must have a flexible agricultural program because we have held our acreage down to around 24 million acres.

I must hurry along. Our agricultural policy in Canada is a flexible one, as it must be, because the very nature of our climate, upon which we depend for our production in western Canada, demands it. Here again I should like to refer to the commission's preliminary report. I want hon. members to listen to this. The first sentence in paragraph 2 on wheat reads:

> The surplus of wheat in Canada at present does not seem to have arisen out of the procedures used to market the crop. It has resulted primarily from weather conditions.

I think everyone will agree with that. We in western Canada know how our weather conditions fluctuate. We had in 1937 or 1938 an average crop of two and one-half bushels per acre. We climbed steadily until we reached a peak of 27 bushels per acre, and last year we had an average production of 23 bushels an acre. But that does not mean that these good crops will continue. Never before in the history of the production of grain in western Canada have we had years such as those we have had in the last few years. These years of high yields may very well come to an end. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has repeatedly drawn the attention of the farmers of western Canada to the danger of crop failures.

Mr. Argue: Hoping for a drought.

Mr. Mang: We are not hoping for a drought, but on Sunday of this week President Eisenhower left on a trip through the drought-striken states of the United States, all the way from Texas to Dakota, to examine for himself the results of the drought that goes back as far as seven years. This drought is now at the Canadian border. I know that certain sections of the press and that certain people engaged in politics like to make light of that, but that disaster has struck before and it could strike again. If that time comes we should be in very severe difficulty.

I am not too happy when I hear this constant nagging on the part of certain people in western Canada, and a few of them are even sent down here. They are constantly nagging this parliament into policies which would be rigid and fixed and not flexible. The time may come when we shall need the good offices of the government of Canada to help us out of our difficulties.

Mr. Argue: That is right now.

Mr. Mang: If we have two successive crop failures in western Canada due to the weather it will mean stark and naked disaster because we have built up our—

Mr. Argue: With no crop insurance scheme it surely will.

Mr. Mang: You take television; you are good on that. We have built up our standard of living and our standard of social security on the western plains in the last 10 years, our social security program, our electrification program, our telephone system and our radio system, and we are now going into a grid system, to the point where we have built up for ourselves collectively and individually as high a standard of living as we can possibly afford to have at the present time. If we should have a drought great changes would take place. If any hon. member wishes to get a picture of what happens in a drought all he has to do is to read the January 14 issue of Newsweek and he will get a complete story of it. This drought has been in existence in Texas and has marched up through the United States and is now on the border of Canada. The hon. member for Lethbridge told me that his average crop this year was nine bushels to the acre. Now then, at this price and with our cost of production imagine what this will mean.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): We should build the South Saskatchewan river dam, then.

Mr. Ellis: How about building the South Saskatchewan river dam?

Mr. Mang: The hon. member's position with regard to the dam is well known. I will tell you one sure way of retarding that program in central Saskatchewan. It would be to put a lake two-thirds the size of lake Erie right in the heart of the province that could be used for various things I will not mention now. The more this parliament and this government are nagged with respect to the development of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Ellis: Is that a threat?

Mr. Mang: —the further back you will set progress.

Mr. Ellis: Intimidation.

[Mr. Mang.]

Mr. Mang: It is largely due to irresponsible statements—

Mr. Argue: From the minister.

Mr. Mang: —from hon. members from the west that progress has been retarded. You are doing a disservice the same way you are doing in connection with the wheat board. In that regard you are constantly emphasizing that the wheat board is not selling enough wheat. Certain hon. members from the west belonging to a certain political party continually repeat that not enough is being done and in this way those who are doing so are undermining—

Mr. Ellis: We are blaming the government.

Mr. Mang: —the faith of the western people in the efficacy of the wheat board.

Mr. Argue: That is garbage.

Mr. Mang: The sooner those tactics are dropped the sooner will we be assured of the continuation of the wheat board.

Mr. Ellis: We will see how you vote on our motion.

Mr. Mang: I have had many distracting interruptions—

Mr. Ellis: Do you agree with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that we already have parity prices?

Mr. Habel: Did you hear about Regina?

Mr. Mang: I would like someone in that group which is so vocal to make a close study of what they actually mean by parity prices. You know, one of our greatest difficulties in the west is this element of disunity and this intrusion of agitators into economics, and the spearhead of that is the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Argue: There is always room for one dentist.

Mr. Mang: These policies—I just forget what the question was.

An hon. Member: Lose your page?

Mr. Mang: No, I did not lose the page.

Mr. Ellis: Do you agree with the Minister of Agriculture in his statement to the effect that we have parity prices now?

Mr. Gardiner: I never made any such statement.

Mr. Mang: No one defines parity, but anyone who studies the situation means by parity a standard of living equal to that enjoyed by those people engaged in occupations other than farming, and any parity price adjustment that will eventually be worked out must take into account that attitude toward parity prices.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the previous speakers who have taken part in this throne speech debate in extending my congratulations to the mover, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), and the seconder, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), on the fine contribution they have made and the manner in which they discharged their responsibilities in this debate. However, I cannot with the same enthusiasm extend congratulations to the authors of the throne speech, because I have come to the conclusion that many problems affecting the people of Canada have not been considered or dealt with in the presentation of the speech.

I do, however, wish to say that the grants to municipalities, which the government proposes to pay in lieu of taxes for federal property and buildings located within the boundaries of municipalities, and which require necessary municipal services, is a most welcome aspect of the throne speech. If we are to assume that the intention of the government is to pay grants in lieu of taxes on the normal assessment of any particular municipality, it would mean that the property located in the city of Oshawa, as an example, would annually bring an additional $40,000 in revenue to that municipality.

This matter has been continually advocated by members from this side of the house for many years and proposals have been submitted to the government in this respect. I, personally, have brought this matter to the attention of the government on a number of occasions. Unfortunately these proposals are either rejected at once or are heard in stony silence by the government. Instead of taking immediate action on sound proposals such as this, this government has a tendency to postpone action for four or five years. In my opinion, financial matters in respect to municipalities are not matters to be delayed but rather are of sufficient importance to be acted upon immediately.

The approximately 4,000 municipalities in Canada have had difficulties in raising money for necesary services and capital expenditures for quite some time. This pressure on the municipalities is getting more acute year by year. We are told that Canada leads the world in industrial expansion; that Canada is booming. We are also told that our productive capacity, our national income and our output of goods are rising to dizzy heights undreamed of even a decade ago. But for what reason do we work, save and invest, except to raise our family and individual standard of good living? These are the very things we expect our municipalities to provide—hospitals, schools, community services and comfortable, well-protected homes, well supplied with power, water and sewage systems in keeping with a progressive civilization.

But what is the situation today? The fact is that we are lagging behind in all these things. We are not getting the benefits of this boom because our municipal governments are being denied a fair share of the Canadian tax dollar. This situation is the result of the federal government's policy of monopolizing the major share of the tax dollars raised by all governments. The federal government is most reluctant to relinquish some of the taxing powers that were enjoyed previously by the provinces and the municipalities. This question of taxing power is most unfair and unjust. The result is that a heavy burden has been placed on the small home owner in the Dominion of Canada.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the federal government is loath to part with even a slight portion of their share of the tax dollar in order to relieve the small home owner, but seems rather to enjoy and jealously hoard this taxing power within its scope. There is no question as to the heavy real estate tax burden that is now being borne by the small home owner of every municipality in order to pay for the many services that municipal councils are called upon to supply. The municipalities of all our provinces face the same problems. It does not really matter by what name we call them, whether it be townships, cities, towns or villages. In the long run they are all part of a level of government which is just as essential to the federal principle as are the provinces or the government of Canada. It would be a real catastrophe if a time should come when they are forced into obscurity or insignificance by any other level of government. This seems to me to be the real danger of the centralization of so many functions and powers of government here in Ottawa. It would also be a calamity if the municipalities were forced by sheer necessity of every day problems to so increase the tax load that home owning becomes in Canada a mark either of great wealth or of economic folly.

I wish to remind this house that no less than 80 per cent of municipal taxation is borne by real estate. According to the latest figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics we find that in 1939 the tax dollar was shared as follows: The federal government received 48 cents; the provincial government, 22.3 cents; and the municipal government 29.7 cents. At the present time the federal government has increased its share to 77 cents of the tax dollar; the provincial government has been reduced to 12 cents; and the poor cousin of the senior governments, the municipality, receives 11 cents.

The Canadian tax dollar represents the total amount of all tax collections at the levels of the three authorities which under our Canadian federal system have the responsibility in the matter of the expenditure of public funds. In the past number of years the federal government has encroached upon the Canadian tax dollar to an extent never before envisaged. I may be asked what the federal government should do immediately and constructively to help to meet this critical situation but I do not have to go far to find an answer.

In the first place there must be a rebalancing of the taxation powers between the federal government on the one hand and the provinces and the municipalities on the other. In other words, the central government must learn, in the same way that we all must learn in our private lives, to get along on less. Taxation must be reduced, particularly the federal share of the Canadian tax dollar which must be brought within reason to allow the municipalities to levy taxes which are at least close to being in keeping with the increased demands on their resources.

We must remember that there is only so much money in the budget and if one member of a family takes more than he needs the others must suffer. I do not advocate that we all should share equally, but it does seem to me to make sense that each should participate in the family finances, not according to his strength, size or power but according to his needs as agreed upon in family council.

Since world war II municipalities everywhere have experienced a tremendous growth in population. They have experienced expansion in every phase of community life. The result has been that they have been burdened by the problem of raising funds to supply the various necessary services which include such important things as schools, waterworks, sewers and water mains. For these very necessary services the municipalities must sell debentures in order to raise capital. They try to do this at as low a rate of interest as possible.

The present bond market situation poses some very serious problems for municipalities which are obliged to raise increasingly large sums of money by debenture financing. Interest rates which have risen sharply in the past 18 months reflect the general scarcity of funds for investment purposes. The prospects of a downward trend, while unpredictable even within the near future, do not appear evident for some time to come, and especially as long as present economic conditions continue.

This situation appears to have developed as a result of the substantially high level of capital investment that has been and is being experienced in Canada within recent years at least, which has brought into play competing forces for the available supply of funds both in this area and in the general area of consumer demands.

With a view to easing this situation the monetary authorities, through various means at their disposal, have made it increasingly difficult to borrow money through the medium of forcing upward adjustment of interest rates.

This action has been taken undoubtedly in the interests of the economy of the country as a whole and it is inevitable under such circumstances that some groups or segments of the economy are affected more seriously than others. Municipalities are in this category.

Municipalities at the present time have to compete for borrowings against other securities which suffer less from the impact of a monetary condition of this kind such as private corporations which are able to offer securities at high interest rates because the net cost after taxation is only about half of the actual interest paid.

In addition they are able to offer other inducements to potential investors such as through dividend participation, stocks, warrants, etc. The unfortunate effect of this on municipalities at least is that under present market conditions they are obliged to pay a higher rate of interest on their borrowings than their actual credit warrants.

Quite recently, as reported in the Oshawa Times-Gazette of Friday, January 11, 1957, over which the headline read "Tight money policy hits city finances", a meeting was held of the Oshawa city council in conjunction with the public utilities commission and the board of education of that city. It was reported that a debenture issue in the amount of $1,600,000 will be placed on the market within the next week and a close watch will be maintained in the bond market for an opportunity to market a further issue to cover the expenditure already made. This meeting was called at the request of the board of education to discuss the financing difficulties confronting the board of education and the public utilities commission building programs. It was pointed out that an immediate addition to the water works would have to be made and that water supply problems were at a critical point during the summer of 1956 and only the unusually cool season prevented major water shortages.

The board of education is faced with a program of five new schools and they advised this meeting that $1,250,000 is needed immediately for one secondary and one elementary school which are being planned for this year. What interest rate will have to be paid in the present competitive market it is hard to say, but there is no doubt that it will be high and difficulty may be experienced in the sale of these bonds.

The most disturbing feature of the whole situation is that the investment market does not appear to make any particular distinction between municipal and other corporate borrowers. Everything must be competitive. Because of that, the very interests which cried the loudest when muncipalities got into trouble through excessive borrowings and high interest rates in the thirties are now contributing to what might conceivably develop into a similar situation again in some areas at least. In any event they are not doing anything to alleviate the situation. The question is what, if anything, can or should the municipalities do about the situation.

The unfortunate part is that many services of municipal governments cannot be postponed, even with the best will and intentions of the authorities concerned. Children cannot go without schools nor can people exist without the basic amenities of life, such as sewer and water mains. The result of the present situation means that the 4,000-odd municipalities in Canada will have to pay additional millions of dollars in increased rates of interest to supply these necessary services, which in turn will be an additional burden on the small home owner in the municipality.

It has been suggested time and time again to this government by these hard-pressed municipalities which I have mentioned that the federal government establish a fund from which municipalities could borrow money at a low rate of interest in order to institute these necessary programs. I urge the government, Mr. Speaker, to give this matter very serious consideration without any postponement. The time has come for immediate and decisive action in order to help these hard-pressed municipalities. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is an acknowledged principle of our way of life that the strong must help the weak and that the rich must assist the poor. If these principles are adhered to I am sure that a great deal of the difficulty which now presents itself to the basic governments in our country could be alleviated.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the automobile excise tax for a few moments.

Although I have referred to the excise tax on automobiles in a number of previous speeches I have made in this house, and have also asked questions on the orders of the day, I feel it is necessary for me to bring this matter again to the attention of parliament.

This tax has readily been acknowledged by everyone as an unnecessary tax ever since it was instituted as a luxury tax, and at the present time it is most unsound. The automobile is now a basic necessity. At the present time a person buying an automobile pays $165 luxury tax when the automobile costs $2,500, though in the majority of cases the car is purchased for the purpose of driving to work. Also included in this price is another $165 in sales tax. To more than eight people out of ten a car is an absolute necessity.

To quote from a speech made by William A. Wecker, President of the Canadian Automobile Chamber of Commerce and President and General Manager of General Motors of Canada Limited, on August 28, 1956:

> The history of our industrial development will record that much credit for our great progress in recent years is due to the automotive industry and the transportation provided by motor cars and trucks. Without them our economic life would remain narrow and restricted. It is unfair to tax as a luxury an item that makes such a contribution to our economy.
>
> At the same time this discriminatory tax has a disruptive effect on our industry's efforts to provide an increasing measure of employment stability.

Two years ago, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out in this house that the loss of revenue from the decrease of the excise tax would not be very much, if any. I am sure that after the tax was cut by five per cent two years ago it was found that the additional revenue from the 10 per cent sales tax and the increased number of people employed who were eligible for income tax has more than made up the loss of revenue from the five per cent cut in excise tax.

The same thing would apply at the present time, and I urge the minister to give this matter his most earnest consideration. During the year 1955 the purchasers of new cars and trucks paid $172,189,762 in sales and excise tax.

Another very important matter in this connection is the application of tax reduction or removal on cars in the hands of dealers. At the present time the sales and excise taxes on passenger cars are collected by the manufacturer before the car goes to the dealer for sale to the customer. This method is most unfair to all, and in effect treats these cars still in the salesroom and waiting to be sold as though they had actually been sold while the higher tax levels were in effect.

I bring this matter once again to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and hope that because of the representations which have been made by the automobile dealers in Canada he will give it his serious consideration and remedy this most unfair method of collecting taxes on automobiles.

Mr. J. R. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to join with previous speakers in extending felicitations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I congratulate them upon the excellence of their material, and at the same time I must confess to envying them both a little for the ease with which they expressed themselves.

It is not my intention to delay the house with extensive comments on the various items of legislation mentioned in the speech from the throne. However, I do wish to make some brief references to matters of special interest to those in the constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough which I have been privileged to represent in this house since 1936. I hope that I can make up by sincerity of purpose for what I may lack in oratory.

Antigonish and Guysborough counties have one very definite thing in common—both have very long stretches of seacoast, and in both counties many of our residents depend for their livelihood upon the products of the sea. The first part fo my remarks will therefore deal with those things which affect our fishermen and the fishing industry generally.

First of all, may I compliment our able Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) for putting into effect, recently, legislation benefiting our fishermen. I refer to the insurance coverage for fishing boats, nets, traps and other fishing equipment which has already been of great assistance to the fishermen; also to the more recent step of extending unemployment insurance benefits to our fishermen.

In speaking in this house on March 16, 1953, I stressed, along with other matters, the need for insurance for fishermen against storm losses, and unemployment insurance coverage for farmers and fishermen. It is gratifying to note that for our fishermen at any rate these protections have now become a reality. Perhaps at a later date our farmers will also be brought under the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

At this point I am also going to reiterate other suggestions which I made on March 16, 1953, and in fact, as far back as 1948. These have to do with a search and rescue service and improved aids to navigation. True, some steps have been taken by our capable Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) in connection with the first named, by the establishing of a helicopter-equipped service. This, of course, will take several years to bring to completion, but it is certainly a step in the right direction. I hope that we will soon see this type of service put into operation along the maritime coast. In my constituency within recent months a tragedy occurred off the coast of Canso, resulting in the loss of several lives, which could conceivably have been averted if a more up-to-date coast-guard service had been available.

The second item of improved aids to navigation is something about which I feel very deeply. I appreciate what our fishermen go through as they leave their home ports during the fall and winter months long before daylight for the fishing grounds. Their return trip is plagued only too often with fog, rain, snow, sleet, along with nightfall, and they must often pin their hopes for a safe arrival upon the navigational aids provided by the Department of Transport. In my opinion these aids are often too sparsely distributed and of a kind not best suited to the fishermen's need.

Quite frequently in this regard the judgment of departmental officials overweighs that of the fishermen who from bitter practical experience are in a better position to know what types of aids will prove most advantageous. In making representations to departmental officials in this respect I find their stock reply, in some instances, is that the aid requested is not needed, though, to repeat, I believe the fishermen to be the best judges in the specific localities where they operate. Other replies are either that the materials for such aids are in short supply, or else that there are no funds available.

I do not want to be too hard on these departmental officials nor upon the government but, as I have said, I feel very strongly for our fishermen and I contend that more money could and should be made available to provide these necessary navigational aids.

The fishing industry on the Atlantic coast will be greatly heartened by the action of President Eisenhower in turning down the recommendation of the United States tariff board concerning the tariff on Canadian fish entering the New England market. I am sure this was not done without considerable interest being displayed by our Canadian government, and we in the east are grateful to all concerned.

At this point I might be permitted to refer, as previous speakers have done, to the recently published preliminary report of the Gordon commission on the Canadian economy, and particularly to that part which deals with the Atlantic provinces. The commission indicates that there is much doubt whether anything can be done to improve the lot of the maritimers other than by helping them to buy one-way tickets to greener pastures in upper Canada. I have some suggestions as to what could be done to encourage our fishermen to remain at home and improve their earning capacity. What our fishermen lack, in my opinion, are certain facilities whereby they can increase their catch and steady markets where it can be disposed of at a reasonable price. By navigational aids such as I have already mentioned, by freight rate revisions and by expenditures on wharves, breakwaters and dredging our fishermen could increase their earning capacity and do so without too great a hardship.

In this connection I am going to bring to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) some improvements which are very much needed in the fishing centres of Antigonish-Guysborough, improvements which would be more welcomed by our fishermen than any dole or transportation allowance such as the Gordon commission report suggests. Speaking offhand, I would list the following points where public works would be welcomed and are necessary: Arisaig, Malignant Cove, Livingstone Cove, South Lake, Morristown, Bayfield, Barrio's Beach, Cape Jack, Havre Boucher, St. Francis Harbour, Boylston, Peas Brook, Canso, Little Dover, Port Felix, Charles Cove, Larry's River, New Harbour, Drum Head, Isaac's Harbour, Liscomb, Marie Joseph and Ecum Secum.

All of these have been brought to the attention of the Department of Public Works at one time or another while I have had the honour to represent Antigonish-Guysborough, now nearly 21 years. Undoubtedly the increased activity which would develop in our fishing industry would be very considerable if public works would improve the facilities at these fishing points.

I should like to turn now to the farming industry of Nova Scotia. On December 13 last most of the Nova Scotia members of parliament met with representatives of the Nova Scotia federation of agriculture in Truro. This meeting was quite informal and the discussions covered a variety of subjects dealing with matters of most interest to our farming communities.

One thing stressed by the federation representatives was the need of what they referred to as a protection policy. They did not explain as fully as I would have liked just what they had in mind, but I presume it refers to a stability which would result from a more reasonably balanced relationship between farm prices and farm costs. It is true that farmers, like other consumers, must buy many articles of daily living on a protected market while they must sell their products on an open market. I have no pretensions to being an authority on economics, agricultural or otherwise, but I should like to see something done to ease this imbalance experienced by our farmers. I may add that I am satisfied that if any government can thus bring added prosperity to our farming population this Liberal government can and will do it.

There are various measures which can assist, directly or indirectly, in providing better returns for our farmers and I should like to comment briefly upon some of them. I welcome the appointing of a Senate committee to review the problem of submarginal lands in eastern Canada. In my constituency, where most of our farms lie close to the sea, it is only to be expected that the land is not particularly fertile, especially so when one realizes that much of this land has been tilled for several hundred years. I believe that the results of this study will be truly helpful to our marginal farmers, directing their energies towards the best use and conservation of the land. I hope too that erosion problems, land drainage and reforestation will be included as topics for study by the committee.

Within the last year or two, community pasturage programs have been initiated in Nova Scotia and it is hoped that this will be further developed to the benefit of our cattle and sheep farmers.

One matter I wish to mention is the benefit to our farmers of the feed freight assistance policy initiated by this federal government. I would urge that this policy be maintained and, indeed, be placed on a permanent basis.

With regard to freight rates, the situation today is that the Maritime Freight Rates Act is no longer helping maritime producers. Increases in freight rates have been so frequent in recent years that the time has come for a complete revision of the act if we are to enjoy any of the assistance envisioned by the act at its inception. I cannot emphasize too strongly to the government the need for such a revision and with the least possible delay.

The welfare of our farming communities is affected by the buying power of the people generally. When old age pensions and family allowances were first introduced by the Liberal government of prime minister Mackenzie King, the amounts decided upon were governed in great part by the purchasing power they represented, and certainly during the years that have intervened this added purchasing power has been a boon to all phases of Canadian life. However, with the passing of years the purchasing power of the dollar has gradually dwindled, and nowhere is it more evident than in its application to these pensions. I believe I am correct in estimating that by far the greatest part of these pensions goes for increased food costs, and to the degree that this is true at least I should like to see these pensions increased to restore to them the buying power which was originally intended.

It was good news to hear that federal grants to universities are to be increased and that vocational and technical schools will also profit from the government's recognition of the contribution being made by education to the development of Canada. I would express the hope, however, along with other hon. members, that the system of allocating the grants to universities will be changed to a more equitable basis as between province and province. The province of Nova Scotia now suffers in this respect from the fact that such a large percentage of its population endeavours to attend our halls of higher learning.

In my home town of Antigonish we have the university of St. Francis Xavier where many students come from other countries, attracted by the studies in co-operative methods and adult education in which our university has pioneered. We have, indeed, a miniature commonwealth of nations in our midst. Students from India, Pakistan, Bermuda, South America, the United States and even from far away Kenya colony come to St. Francis Xavier to join with our own Canadian students in the pursuit of knowledge. I know I speak for the governors of the university when I express to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) their thanks as well as my own for his warm interest in matters academic.

Upon reading the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, one cannot but be impressed by the remarkable strides forward that Canada has made both in economic expansion and in its position as a world nation during the past number of years under a far-sighted Liberal government. For our younger Canadians especially there are now no bounds to the avenues open to them, and who would dare to forecast the future that awaits them?

I should like to conclude these remarks with an excerpt from a speech made by former prime minister W. L. Mackenzie King, in Kingston on June 7, 1941, words which seem particularly applicable to Canadians of this era. He said:

> In a country like Canada, every man is more or less the architect of his own fortune. Our great public men have become the architects of our country's future, without regard to birth or race or class. Intelligence, industry and integrity are the basic qualities by which they have achieved this goal, qualities to be had by any Canadian who has the will to persevere.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the resolution standing in the name of the Prime Minister with respect to the Canada Council; then, second reading of the Canadian Wheat Board Act; then, the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Justice; then, the resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FERRY SERVICE, CAMPBELLTON, N.B.-CROSS POINT, QUE.

Question No. 14—Mr. Van Horne:

1. Is an annual subsidy paid to Captain Romeo Allard in connection with the operation of a ferry service during the summer months from Campbellton, New Brunswick to Cross Point, Quebec?
2. If so, what is the annual amount paid?
3. What is the total amount paid to date?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport):

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

FERRY SERVICE, DALHOUSIE, N.B.-MIGUASHA, QUE.

Question No. 15—Mr. Van Horne:

1. Is an annual subsidy or grant paid to Captain Romeo Allard in connection with the operation of a ferry service from Dalhousie, New Brunswick to Miguasha, Quebec?
2. If so, how much is being paid annually?
3. What has been the total amount paid to date?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport):

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

FISHERMEN'S INDEMNITY FUND, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 25—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou):

1. How many fishermen in Nova Scotia qualified for benefits under the fishermen's indemnity fund during 1956, and what was the total amount of benefits paid?
2. Have any claims been received in respect of losses suffered in 1957 and if so, how many have been paid?

Answer by: Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries):

(1) Thirty-five fishermen insured under the fishermen's indemnity plan suffered losses of or damage to their fishing vessels during 1956. Eighteen of these have been paid indemnities totalling $14,662.41. In the other 17 cases, 14 of which occurred during the last two days of December, settlement is pending.

One hundred and ninety-two lobster fishermen whose traps were insured under the plan received indemnities totalling $28,267.75.

(2) One total loss reported but claim not yet received. No claims for lobster trap losses in 1957 have been received to date.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 18, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of the rather optimistic statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday that the amount of old age pensions might be increased. Can the Prime Minister assure the house that any increase in that regard to meet the continuing depreciated value of the dollar will be extended to the superannuation payments to retired civil servants, members of the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition is a little bit premature in expressing his curiosity about what will be the decisions of the government and the recommendations it will make to parliament. I can assure him that all matters of public interest receive careful consideration, and when decisions have been reached they are announced in the forms that are traditional in constitutional assemblies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I then ask the Prime Minister whether the interpretation placed on the optimistic words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday is well founded because, after all, the minister chose to indicate that something was going to be done; and he having indicated that, certainly I think I have the right to ask whether similar treatment is going to be extended to those whom I have mentioned that find themselves in a serious plight.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The hon. gentleman heard the minister's words and he is entitled to whatever interpretation he feels he should put upon them. I am not going to attempt to interpret them at this time because I do not think that would be proper.

[Later:]

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the answer he gave to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. Is it not true that an indication has been given to Liberal members that an increase will be put through and was the suggestion not made that they make speeches asking for an increase for use in the election campaign?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

C. G. HANNA—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR ENTRY TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether Christian G. Hanna has been permitted to land in Canada, and is the minister prepared to give further consideration to his desire to become a resident of this country?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that a lawyer in British Columbia has applied for a writ of habeas corpus, addressed to the master of the vessel on which this man is, and the application for the writ is to be heard, I believe, today. We thought it desirable to have my department represented by counsel as an observer.

EAST ASIA—POLICY REGARDING ADMISSIBILITY OF IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Could the minister inform the house if an agreement has been reached between Canada and East Asian governments on future policy in regard to admitting immigrants from those countries to Canada?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): If the hon. member's question relates to the revision of the agreement with India, that matter is still under negotiation and I hope will be settled very shortly.

OLD ORDER AMISH SETTLERS—REPORTED REFUSAL TO ADMIT FROM UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Would the minister clarify the situation regarding the subject matter of a news report from Washington, D.C., to the effect that a group of Old Order Amish settlers from the United States who had planned to buy farms and settle in Prince Edward Island have had their applications for entry into Canada rejected?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As far as I know there has been no such group. There was an individual case of one of these people who was not able to satisfy the immigration requirements.

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES—INQUIRY AS TO RETURN TO HOMELAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I think my question is quite timely in view of the publicity in the United States that several refugees from Hungary have been returned. May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if any of these immigrants to Canada have been returned and, if so, how many and for what reason?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, sir. We gave an undertaking we would not return any of these people to Austria, and it is the custom of the present government of Canada to keep its word.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING COMBINES LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has yet had time to consider that portion of the Gordon commission report which suggests that further study be given to the whole question of combines legislation and if so whether he has had an opportunity to make a decision and whether it is likely that some such inquiry will be made in the near future.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SENTENCES TO JUVENILE OFFENDERS—CLIFFORD WILLIAMS CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice and I regret not having sent him notice of my intention to do so, although I do not think he will need it. Could the minister report any progress on his efforts to prevent juvenile offenders from being sentenced to Canadian penitentiaries and also can he report any progress or advise as to the present status of the Clifford Williams case?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Well, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the second question first I might say the Clifford Williams case, in view of the representations which have been made, has been under almost constant consideration by my colleague the Solicitor General since the matter was raised in this house and I believe that Mr. Williams will be released as soon as his degree of rehabilitation warrants that course.

With regard to the first question, I think I should take my hon. friend's question as notice.

SHIPPING

PILOT BOAT ACCIDENT, SAINT JOHN—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister assure the house that a full scale public inquiry will be conducted in connection with the most serious loss of life as a result of the sinking of the pilot boat outside Saint John harbour?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a preliminary investigation has been made by one of the senior officials of my department. I have not yet received his report but unless his report discloses reasons which would seem to make such an inquiry unnecessary it would be my intention to order an inquiry as soon as I have had an opportunity of seeing the report to which I have just referred.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

ONTARIO—ACTION TO BE TAKEN CONCERNING FLUE-CURED TOBACCO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the government planning any action as the result of the report of the restrictive trade practices commission concerning the production, purchase and sale of flue-cured tobacco in Ontario?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government has that report under active consideration at the present time, but we have not yet reached an opinion which would require to be communicated to the house.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ACTION TO PROHIBIT ENTRY OF SALACIOUS LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister advise what action is being taken and what orders, if any, have been given to customs officers at the border between the United States and Canada to stop the entry of salacious and indecent literature into Canada?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter which comes under section 1201 of the Customs Act which will be continuously applied as it has been for years. As you know, the procedure is that when salacious literature of any kind seeks entry at a port it is sent on here to Ottawa where it is reviewed and a decision is made concerning whether or not it comes within the prohibition in section 1201.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is that rule strictly adhered to and carried out?

Mr. McCann: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): May I ask who reviews it here?

Mr. McCann: There is a committee of the department which makes the first review, and it is then passed on to the deputy minister, and the final decision is made by the minister.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. This question of salacious literature is a question of continuing interest in the country. When a particular publication is sent to Ottawa for review, is its import prevented while that review takes place? I would also like to invite the minister to present to the house at a later date information as to how many prosecutions have taken place and what results have been obtained.

Mr. McCann: With reference to the first question, the invoiced goods would be retained if there were any quantity at the port of entry, and a sample would be sent on to Ottawa. In the meantime entry is prohibited entirely. With reference to the second question, I shall take it as notice.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, while not committing myself at the moment to any general views on censorship, in view of the fact that a voluntary committee of some sort has been operating in Ottawa in the scrutiny of various publications at places where these things are sold, would the minister inform me if that committee has any authority from the dominion government or anyone else to prevent people from displaying such literature upon their counters?

Mr. McCann: There are two different sets of circumstances involved in that question. The matter of entry into Canada of literature which is sexual or salacious comes under the Department of National Revenue, customs; the matter of literature which is on sale in stores and which is circulated through the Post Office Department comes within the jurisdiction of that department. I presume that any prosecutions made are probably made in the first instance because the mails are being used for the circulation and transportation of such literature and would come under some other regulation with respect to the exposure and sale. That does not have to do with the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Knight: Apparently the minister did not hear my question, at least he did not answer it. I asked specifically if the voluntary committee or committees which I understand are operating in Ottawa at the moment in examining certain types of literature at the places where such items are sold have any authority from anyone to say to the dealer that he must not exhibit such publications for sale.

Mr. McCann: I am unable to answer that question because I do not know under what authority that committee acts. If it is a voluntary committee I would think that it has no authority and should bring any such matters to the attention of whatever department is concerned, either the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise, or the Post Office Department.

[Later:]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ACTION TO PROHIBIT ENTRY OF SALACIOUS LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): I would like, Mr. Speaker, to address a question to the Postmaster General.

What precautions, if any, are taken by the Post Office Department to prevent entry into Canada of salacious and indecent literature?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department does not set itself up as a censoring body. Such literature, or objects in parcels, found to be passing through the mails would be stopped, and are not delivered should the matter come to the attention of the post office. The literature would be destroyed and so would certain objects for whose carriage the mails are being used. But there is no body in the Post Office Department which is set up particularly to exercise censorship of the mails. It must be understood that most of this type of material would arrive under seal and could not be observed by the post office unless the parcel or envelope were opened. In many cases this is done at the port of entry by the customs officers in the normal exercise of their duties, and when it is found to be that type of material it is then referred to the Post Office Department and we do the investigation as to the source and the addressee.

[Later:]

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General another question. Does the minister intend to rid us of that mass of literature and propaganda which clutters our postal boxes every day and comes from the Russian embassy?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will allow me, as Postmaster General, to open his mail, particularly his first class mail which is sealed and stamped, I shall be very happy to make sure that no propaganda reaches him.

Mr. Dufresne: Another question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister keep an eye on the Russian embassy's propaganda which we receive every day in sealed envelopes? The hon. minister knows perfectly well what I mean.

(Text):

AIR TRANSPORT

STATEMENT ON ARRANGEMENTS FOR EMERGENCY LANDINGS IN UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) asked whether the bilateral agreement between Canada and Mexico required a pilot to land in the United States should one or more of his engines fail to operate. The answer to the question is that the bilateral agreement contains no such requirement.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): May I address a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport with regard to the arrangements made when planes fly from Canada to a foreign country across another foreign country? In the event of motors going out of commission or other mechanical trouble, and the aircraft being required to land, are the passengers obliged to stay in the plane?

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I think that question involves the regulations of the country in which the plane would be compelled to land. I think I should tell the hon. member that practically all the western nations permit aircraft to land when they are in distress. I take it, however, that entry into that country is provided for by its own immigration laws.

BRIDGES

NUNS' ISLAND—STATEMENT ON COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace (Mr. Hamilton) asked if I could inform the house when construction is expected to begin on the Nuns' island bridge in the Montreal area.

I have made inquiries of the national harbours board and it is not possible to specify the date when construction is expected to begin but the board advises that the surveys and the preparation of plans have reached a point which will permit tenders to be called this spring for the first stage of the construction of the bridge.

FINANCE

STATEMENT ON REQUIREMENT FOR CASH DEPOSITS BY STOCKBROKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) asked the Minister of Finance whether stockbrokers are required to maintain deposits with the superintendent of insurance, the Department of Finance or with the Bank of Canada as required in the case of banks or insurance companies.

No deposits are required by the federal government from stockbrokers or investment dealers, but a large number of these are provincially incorporated and all are subject to the various securities commissions provided by the laws of a number of the provincial governments.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

INQUIRY RESPECTING STUDY OF REDISTRIBUTION BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Secretary of State? Can the Secretary of State tell us what is the present position with respect to the study of redistribution recommended by the committee on privileges and elections the year before last? Is the minister aware that redistribution by an independent commission has now been effected by the province of Manitoba? Will something be done about this matter by this parliament at this session?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the factual report which the committee asked the government to prepare was sent to me at the end of the last session. It was not tabled then because it was received in the dying days of the session. I do not think it will be the view of the government that this matter should be considered this year by the committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State? In the light of the view frequently expressed by the former member for Quebec South and others that redistribution should be studied well in advance of the decennial redistribution, why does the government not feel that something should be done about this matter at this session rather than leaving it until closer to the actual time of the next decennial redistribution?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, do you think that is a question that should be asked on the orders of the day? It seems to me we are taking a great deal of time with matters that are not urgent and that do not seem to be directly suggested for the purpose of really eliciting information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are not getting very much.

Mr. Knowles: Does that prevent the Secretary of State from answering my question?

Mr. Speaker: I think great latitude has been taken by hon. members who have been asking questions. There is a great tendency on the part of hon. members to initiate miniature debates on certain matters at question time, but I have always felt, especially recently, that as long as the house bears with the type of question that is being asked and ministers provide the replies it is better to leave it at that without any intervention on my part. But any hon. member who takes an honest look at the rules will see that our question period transgresses the rules as they are today and as they perhaps should be applied. If they were applied the question period would be a very short period indeed.

(Translation):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO DELAY IN TRANSLATING COMMITTEE REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State. Would the minister tell us if steps have been taken this year to expedite the translation into French of committee reports, so as to avoid the six to seven weeks' delay which occurred in former years?

Mr. Robichaud: You were hardly ever here; how can you know about it?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will treat the question as a notice. I will check whether the delay of which my hon. friend complains has in fact occurred, and shall inform the house of my findings.

(Text):

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent announcement which has been made of President Eisenhower's recommendation to congress of a large appropriation of over $1 million with respect to the Passamaquoddy project, will the government make a statement on Canada's up-to-date position with respect to this development in New Brunswick?

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure the hon. member desires to have as complete an answer to the question as possible. I shall be happy to take it as notice.

CANADA COUNCIL

PROVISION FOR ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE ARTS, HUMANITIES AND SOCIAL SCIENCES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences and further to provide inter alia that

(a) the Minister of Finance may, out of the consolidated revenue fund, pay to the council the sum of fifty million dollars to constitute an endowment fund for the purposes of the act, and

(b) the council shall establish a fund to be called the university capital grants fund, to which shall be credited the sum of fifty million dollars, to be paid to the council by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Canada Council

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, I believe that this resolution for the establishment of a Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences represents not only the considered views of this government but the clearly expressed wishes and hopes of hon. members on both sides of the house and of practically all thoughtful Canadians who are really concerned about the future welfare of this country. The submissions presented to the Massey commission, the recommendation of that commission in this respect and the numerous requests received by the government over past years have clearly, I think, shown that there is widespread public support for the creation of this Canada council.

I need not remind you, Mr. Chairman, in any detail how, through the co-operation of private enterprise with the wisdom of successive governments, the economic regions and the diversified political entities whose bias at the time of Confederation often inclined towards the south rather than eastward and westward, have been brought together into one body politic and economic in which we take pride, as I think we are entitled to do. Nor need I remind you at length that the parts of this whole are so articulated together that each can move quite freely, serving and nourishing the whole nation with its own particular skills and its own particular identity. But I think all will agree that any body in any nation must, as it grows, develop its own spirit as it develops its spiritual strength.

In Canada our spiritual growth must naturally be drawn from the traditional cultures of the two peoples that mainly make up the Canadian nation and from the cultures that many other groups have brought to us. I do not want to give the impression that, in establishing a Canada Council, we are proposing the creation of some essentially strange and experimental body of a kind that has not been seen before. It is true that the council itself will be new, but the work which it is to encourage and assist has been continuing for generations, indeed, through most of Canada's history in one form or another.

I shall not attempt to emphasize the great value of the work which has been done, and is being done, by the Canadian universities in the field of the humanities and social sciences. I think the signs of this work are all around us; they are in the press, in the magazines, in the learned journals, on the radio, even on television, and I think it is true to say that many members in this house are themselves living examples of the devotion of our university teachers. Indeed, there are moments in debate, you know, when one might feel that our universities have sharpened the wits of hon. gentlemen opposite to perhaps too fine an edge!

In the field of the fine arts, and also in that of the humanities and social sciences, we in Canada have many voluntary societies whose devotion, either wholly or in part, to what will be the objectives of the Canadian council is also a matter in which we can take a special pride. I refer to organizations like the Royal Canadian Institute, l'Association Canadienne-Française pour l'avancement des sciences, the Royal Canadian Academy of the Arts, the Royal Society of Canada, the Canadian Writers' Foundation, the Canadian Social Science Research Council and the more recently formed Humanities Association of Canada. These, and many others, have made and will continue to make their valuable contribution to our spiritual development. We must also remember that much is done not only by national organizations but by provincial and local bodies which have similar objects and which stimulate and nourish this development in our smaller communities from which so many of our artists and learned scholars have come. It is from smaller societies of this kind that many of us have had our first opportunity to see, to hear and to learn of the treasures of the mind, which in later years we have come to value so highly. All these organizations, whether national, provincial or local, frequently work under conditions of extreme difficulty, even though it has been found possible for some of these national organizations to receive modest government subsidies. Many of them, however, must depend upon the relatively small contributions which, in many cases, are all their members can afford and many, for instance, lack secretarial help to pursue their aims effectively, and they do not have sufficient funds to provide this help.

There is, of course, a limit to what voluntary associations can be expected to do. The contributions made by our own universities and voluntary organizations, our artistic and scientific groups to our cultural development would have been impossible without the role played by some devoted individuals.

Culture, of course, does reside primarily in individuals. Our artists and humanists and social scientists, very often with little means but great devotion, are entitled to the credit for the progress we have made in this field, and our gratitude also must go to the great number of young Canadians who have decided to enter into those careers without the expectation of as high monetary rewards as they could have secured in other professions, and must go also to their parents who have provided for their studies, often at the cost of great sacrifices.

Up to the present time relatively little has been done in Canada in the form of financial contributions from governments or from munificent individuals for the encouragement of the arts, the humanities and social sciences. Without minimizing the active interest of a few individuals and the assistance of private foundations, it must be recognized that up to the present time the main source of such encouragement in Canada has come from other countries. In this respect I think many of us share the view expressed in the Massey report that "we have not much right to be proud of our record as patrons of the arts".

Our scholars and our students have had to rely mainly on foreign sources for grants-in-aid and for scholarships. The Nuffield foundation in the United Kingdom; the Carnegie, the Rockefeller, the Ford, and other foundations in the United States have been of great assistance. Foreign governments, especially the British and the French, have offered quite a large number of scholarships to Canadians. These foreign donations and gifts are good in themselves and I think we all hope they will be continued in the future; but many of us feel, I am sure, that this too exclusive reliance on the generosity of others is not worthy of our real power and does not exemplify our real sense of values. Moreover, it is generally felt that more financial assistance is now urgently needed if our nation is to continue to make progress in the arts, the humanities and the social sciences.

Well, the duty of modern government to assist the arts within its borders is one which has already been recognized in many countries with older cultures than ours. I think it is worth our taking some note of this; because in countries with a longer history a national culture has had a longer time to take root and flourish, and in those countries the days when farmlands and cities had to be carved by men's hands from the forests and the wild lands are now remote, and the liberal arts have been able to develop in relative prosperity, even though that prosperity may often have been enjoyed in the past by only a fortunate few.

Perhaps I might take a moment to give a brief picture of what the government in the United Kingdom has been doing to nourish and sustain the arts in that country. A small beginning was made in 1940 with the formation of the committee—later called a council—for the encouragement of music and the arts, or C.E.M.A., as it became known. This was first financed by a modest grant of £25,000 made available by the Pilgrim Trust. Its first object was to finance the expansion of voluntary bodies devoted to fostering the arts. As its work developed and because of the immediate response it aroused in time of war, the government of the United Kingdom provided £50,000 to match private donations. In 1942 the government's board of education took over full responsibility for its financing, and in 1946, under a royal charter, it became the arts council of Great Britain, responsible to and financed by the treasury. It consists of 16 persons and is not a department of government.

We should, I think, note that in the year ended March 31, 1956, it made expenditures for the encouragement of music, drama, art, poetry and other like activities totalling over £614,000 or approximately $2 million.

Unlike the United Kingdom, the support of the arts in France is a direct concern of the government itself, and in particular of the ministry of education and Beaux-Arts. Through this ministry the government offers scholarships, sends university professors abroad to study and supports such world-famous and ancient organizations as La Comédie Française and the Paris opera. Many other older countries support the arts from public funds and I am told that the West German bundestag has a committee on cultural affairs, though I am not recommending that as an example to be followed in this parliament.

Some people may feel that we in the new world might examine with profit, in determining what course we ourselves should follow in Canada, what is done to encourage and support the arts, humanities and social sciences in our neighbour to the south. Many may point out that the United States government has not found it necessary to provide much direct support for such pursuits and yet certainly the arts flourish in the great metropolitan centres of the United States and certainly the people of that country have every reason to be proud of their learned men in the humanities and the social sciences. Moreover, there seems to be an adequate system of scholarships for those young Americans wishing to specialize in those fields. Why then, these people may well ask, should federal support be necessary here in Canada?

Well, there is, I think, an essential difference. It is a difference which arises from the tremendous wealth of the United States and of many wealthy citizens and corporate bodies which exist there. In a number of cases where some of this wealth has concentrated in the hands of one man or one family a wise provision was made whereby the money could be used to help and to stimulate those things which the possessor of a large fortune had come to recognize to be of lasting value to American society. And so the names of men already famous have become even better known through the existence of organizations such as the Rockefeller foundation, the Carnegie trust and the Ford foundation, to name only a few. We here in Canada have ourselves benefited on occasion from the munificence of these organizations, but I think the time has come for us to depend in future somewhat more upon ourselves.

Such benevolent organizations as we do have in Canada which can assist and do assist the arts, humanities and social sciences do not seem to dispose of funds on a sufficiently large scale to provide the level of assistance that is needed if Canada is to maintain its place with other nations in these matters. I think all will agree that that is important not only for the individual enjoyment of life but for the cohesion between these people which can be stimulated and brought about by the appreciation and enjoyment of that which is done in each one of these countries. I am sure that many will agree that the time has come when we must try to hold our own in cultural affairs. It would be one of the objectives of the council to arrange for the representation of Canadian arts, humanities and social sciences in other countries and I think that is required if we wish to continue to benefit from what is provided elsewhere.

Here again we may perhaps examine briefly what is done by other nations to ensure that their arts are widely represented and understood abroad.

In the United Kingdom there exists the British council founded in 1934 and granted a royal charter in 1940 to develop closer cultural relations with other countries and to promote a wider knowledge abroad of British life, thought and artistic and scientific achievements. This organization is financed almost entirely from public funds, and in the year 1955-56 its expenditures were over £2,800,000 or approximately $8 million. In France the projection of French culture abroad is carried out by a section of the ministry of foreign affairs and has been so accomplished for very many years. I understand this section has officers abroad in 62 different countries and that its work has been going on since even before the revolution of 1789.

After these few brief indications of how the need for what is envisaged for Canada in this resolution is recognized as existing elsewhere, I think I should turn to what our particular requirements in Canada may be. We cannot, I think, do better for this purpose than look to the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences. It was one of the purposes of this commission to discover and report on what these needs might be. In those parts of its recommendations concerned with the creation and functions of the Canada council the report speaks of the "parallel obligations" which it suggests the government should assume in fostering the arts, humanities and social sciences. By "parallel" it means obligations similar to those which the government and parliament has undertaken to assist study and research in the physical and natural sciences, both pure science and applied science, in medicine and in engineering. These obligations to the Canadian people are already carried out in large part by the national research council. The report expresses the view that assistance should be given to students of the humanities and recommends specifically that the Canada council should be given funds for the establishment and maintenance of scholarships for post graduate students of Canadian universities in the humanities, social sciences and even law. Comparative law, you know, is of great value not only in the settlement of disputes between individuals, but I think it is also of great value in bringing about the goal of the recognition of the international law that should be followed by civilized nations.

The commission also recommends the provision of funds for mature and advanced work in these fields. Indeed, I believe that this is one of the greatest needs in our country which the Canada council will be asked to meet. No one who is familiar with the problems of these disciplines within our universities can fail to recognize the requirement for encouragement and assistance through a system of scholarships for the young men and women who will be the future historians, philosophers and economists of Canada, and I believe that no one who has given thought to these problems would wish otherwise than that such a system of scholarships should be administered where possible through existing organizations and by a council of distinguished men and women made as free as possible of government interference by an endowment which it will be their responsibility to administer wisely and for the general good. I shall have something more to say about the financing of the council in a moment.

It is also equally important to my mind, Mr. Chairman, that some form of assistance and encouragement should be given to the creative artists in Canada. As the report of the royal commission points out, many of them are not students in the ordinary sense of the word and often are not enrolled in our universities. Nevertheless they can make and they do make a valuable and enduring contribution to Canada and I think they deserve to be encouraged. I need hardly remind hon. members that our lives would be much poorer were it not for our musicians who bring us the enjoyment of our great orchestras and choral societies. I think that many of us would feel that something would be lost from the Christmas season if we were to lose the annual performance by the Toronto symphony orchestra and the Mendelssohn choir of Handel's Messiah, and our Canadian homes would not be so pleasant to live in if the walls were not brightened by the works of Canadian painters, although many of us cannot afford them in any other form than in reproductions; and life would be less pleasant and less civilized in this country were it not for the presence of theatre houses such as Le Théâtre du Nouveau-Monde, and perhaps—especially in recent years—for the successes of the courageous venture at Stratford, Ontario which has given the name of Shakespeare's birthplace a new and a Canadian significance.

Many of the actors who appear in these companies, and who delight us regularly, although perhaps not uniformly, on the radio and television, first learned their craft through the opportunity provided by the dominion drama festival and by the little theatre movement throughout Canada.

It is obvious that much has already been done. I think it is clear that we do have talented artists and I think it is time that more scope and more opportunity should be afforded to them. Many people perhaps are not aware of the great difficulties under which some of these ventures labour, or are not aware of the time and devotion given by the voluntary organizations which support them. Probably a little assistance to such organizations might go a long way. Not only will some financial help assist in removing some of the nagging deficits under which such organizations work, but it will also be I think heart-warming to them when they see that their achievements are recognized and appreciated.

It will, therefore, be for the Canada council to meet as best it can, on a national scale, the most pressing needs of such organizations and also to make awards to our outstanding artists and young people of real promise to enable them better to pursue those arts which give so much stimulating enjoyment and which do in a real sense enrich our lives. All scholars, like all artists, flourish by an interchange of ideas among themselves within Canada. However, we must recognize that ideas are international and that the arts are not bounded by the confines of any one country. This was, I think, clearly indicated in the report of the Massey royal commission when it recommended scholarships to enable Canadians to study in other countries and suggested that there should be an exchange which would bring students from other countries to work in Canada.

I consider that it is of great importance in the world in which we live that our better students should have an opportunity while studying to observe the life and manners of the people of other nations. It seems to me it is equally important that we should bring students from other countries to see how we in Canada live, and to sit at the feet of some of our learned men. All that will help us to realize, when we are forming our opinions about the attitudes and conduct of other people, that there are different backgrounds against which they must be appraised and judged, and that the attitude which would be proper with a United States or Canadian background may not necessarily be the proper attitude for one whose traditional civilization is older, different and I think quite respectable.

Through the Canadian government overseas awards, substantial sums in blocked currency have been expended to date to send Canadians to study abroad. I believe that perhaps this scheme might well be extended and include a provision to bring foreign students and artists to Canada. It is from these young people that many of the future leaders in many walks of life will come. Therefore, I believe that the knowledge and understanding which these exchanges would bring about might be a significant force for peace in our own society.

There is also a need for our artists to perform in foreign countries and for their creative works to be seen, heard and enjoyed outside of Canada. These people and their works would indeed in a sense be ambassadors of a part of Canadian life which I think it would be helpful to have more fully represented in other countries. After all, we are essentially of the same make-up and our objectives, our aspirations, are much the same in whatever country we live. I think the more we can be made to realize the importance of intellectual brotherhood the more apt we are to conclude that conflicts between nations are really unnecessary.

Canada Council

These I consider to be the most immediate needs which Canada has for the encouragement of her arts, humanities and social sciences. We have, therefore, to consider how these requirements can be best fulfilled. I believe that hon. members will agree that a federal department of the fine arts, or some such governmental authority, is not the best answer to the problem. Nothing, I think, could be more detrimental to our real purpose if we were to limit or hamper the work of organizations already in existence by superimposing some central authority which could not have the experience and the knowledge in a particular field which existing societies already possess.

I do not believe that the liberal arts can or should be controlled or directed by the state if they are to remain healthy and continue to flourish. The scholar and the artist, like the scientist, require the wide horizon of freedom as the only border within which they can do their best work. The organizations and the individuals do need some assistance and encouragement in the tasks already in hand. It is this encouragement to perform the tasks already in hand which it should be our purpose to provide, but without any undue interference.

There is another urgent need which will partially be met by the adoption of this resolution and by the creation of the Canada council. That has to do with the capital requirements of our universities. The Gordon report states that universities will require substantial capital grants, if they are to take care of the very large increase in the anticipated enrolment. It is estimated that capital expenditure of about $1 billion will be required for these purposes over the period of the next 25 years. This means that universities will have to spend about $40 million per annum on the average to provide for capital expansion. And at a national conference on "Canada's Crisis in Higher Education" held in Ottawa last November the representatives of the universities of Canada expressed through a resolution adopted unanimously:

> Their considered opinion that it was their urgent duty to warn the people of Canada that the problem of universities has become an emergency of national concern to the certain disadvantage of our progress and standing as a nation, and can only be solved by the energetic and immediate assistance and co-operation of all governments in Canada, of business and industry and of private benefactors.

It seems to me that the Canadian government and the Canadian parliament should not ignore such a serious warning and should be prepared to make a contribution, which can be made through the Canada council to meet this emergency.

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Our main object in recommending the establishment of the Canada council is to provide some assistance to universities, to the arts, humanities and social sciences as well as to students in those fields without attempting in any way to control their activities or to tamper with their freedom. Governments should, I feel, support the cultural development of the nation but not attempt to control it. This sector of our national life perhaps more than any other must rely on the efficiency of private initiative.

It is our intention that this council should be composed of distinguished men and women who will represent the cultures and regions of Canada—men and women whose interest in and devotion to the universities, the arts and social sciences will induce them to serve on a voluntary basis. Thus we hope that their views and the measures which they will recommend will be as freely given as will be their services. Our wish is that the Canada council should be a body as free from state control as it is prudent for anybody entrusted with public funds to be. It is not to the government that this council is to look for control and direction, though of course it will be free to consult when occasion may arise, with appropriate government departments with which it may, in certain fields, wish to establish a measure of co-operation.

But it is under what I think will be the discerning eye of those people throughout this country who interest themselves in these matters that the council will in effect conduct its work. Hence it will report annually to the representatives of those people in this house where there will be, I am sure, a continuing and freely expressed interest in its stewardship.

I trust that our intention that the council shall be largely independent and shall have a wide measure of autonomy will be made clear by the methods which are proposed for financing its work. It is, in effect, to be endowed with freedom to carry on its work in the light of its own wisdom and with the advice of existing organizations whose co-operation it may wish to enlist as, in its turn, it may help them.

It is with this in mind that we ask for an endowment fund of $50 million to be provided from the consolidated revenue fund. From this sum the council will be permitted to use income after investment, but not the capital. The income only will be available for disbursement. The income will nevertheless be quite substantial and will be continually devoted to the continuance of scholarships, grants, loans and awards in the fields of the arts, humanities and social sciences. The bill will provide that the council shall be assisted by an investment committee; it will not be confined in its investments to the trustee restrictions which exist in Canadian legislation. It will be the council's duty, with the assistance of this investment committee, to make the wisest possible investment of this endowment in order to secure from it as much income as they and the investment committee think can be secured with safety from the capital.

I anticipate that a large part of these income funds will be administered through existing organizations which have objects similar to those of the council itself. However this may be, the council itself will be solely responsible to parliament for utilizing the funds at its disposal in such a way that the maximum benefit to the country as a whole will result.

We shall also be asking parliament to provide from the consolidated revenue fund a further sum of $50 million to be known as "The University Capital Grants Fund" to be distributed by the council as a contribution toward the financing of specific building projects of which it may approve in the furthering of its general objectives to the extent of not more than 50 per cent in any one case, the contributions to be expended over a period of years—not necessarily in equal instalments of an equal fraction each year but by apportionment generally, to the institutions of the various provinces in proportion to their population. That would not mean that the institutions of one province could not get in one, two or three years, the portion of the fund that would be allocated to them because of the population of their province while others might not for one, two, three or four years be prepared to match or to ask that their institutions' funds be matched from this fund.

Although these two financial provisions will help to meet our most immediate needs, they will not meet, and are not intended to meet, all our requirements. The federal government does not feel that it should be the sole patron of the arts, the humanities and the social sciences or the only source of capital for the universities. Provincial governments have clear and important responsibilities in those fields and I am sure they will want to assume an increasing share of the financial assistance which is required. I also feel that private industry and private persons of means will feel that they have definite financial responsibilities in this respect in compensation for the advantages which will have accrued to them from the Canadian economy. There is evidence that they are already more aware than ever before of this moral obligation to their fellow citizens and that they also realize more concretely that in the long run, at least, their own prosperity, or the prosperity of the organizations they have set up, will depend to a large extent on the expansion of our universities and on our cultural progress.

However, it has not been easy up to now for them to know how, to whom and for what specific purpose assistance could best be provided. There was no proper channel to ensure that donations would be utilized most effectively and it would have been both costly and very wasteful for each industry or private benefactor willing to provide assistance to set up in each case a special foundation for that purpose.

In establishing the council as an autonomous body, our intention is also to fill that gap and to provide an adequate channel which will have, I hope, the complete confidence of private industry and private benefactors and which they will feel they can use to administer and distribute the assistance they want to make available. We are proposing, therefore, that the council be authorized to accept gifts and bequests from private sources and to dispose of them according to the terms, if any, determined by the donors.

With this provision we are convinced that the contribution made by the government through the Canada council to foster our cultural development will not prevent private contributions but, on the contrary, will provide a new opportunity for private benefactors to make donations and to feel that their money will be well spent for worthwhile purposes. It will be our endeavour to compose the council of such persons as will give that confidence to the Canadian public generally, and I can assure the house that there will be no considerations of partisan politics that will influence us in the choice of those who will make up the council. I trust that private individuals will find it in their hearts to assist in the requirements to be met by the council because, although it may seem that these are large appropriations to be made out of the consolidated revenue fund, I feel and I am sure many in the house will feel that much more than the revenue from $50 million could, with advantage, be used for the purposes for which the council will be set up. I also feel that the availability of $50 million to match other contributions to the capital expansion of Canadian universities will leave it necessary that very much more be obtained from other sources, either provincial and municipal governmental bodies or individuals or private organizations.

It has been reported that the nazi leader, Hermann Goering, said many years ago that whenever he heard the word "culture" he reached for his pistol. This statement may have been fairly representative of a condition of human society against which we fought and won a long and costly war. Now that war is over. But I think we must recognize that our western civilizations, upon which we base all our hopes for the future, are founded to a large extent upon the arts, humanities and social sciences as well as upon material progress and development and that these civilizations may be in some jeopardy from an ideology that threatens to destroy them.

I have used the word "culture", perhaps not for the first time in what I have had to say. It is a word which has been subject to a great deal of misunderstanding and, indeed, to misinterpretation. Since it is a word that has become linked to the name of the Canada council, perhaps I might be permitted to say what I believe it means when used in that sense. I believe that in that sense culture is simply an ability to enjoy those things which succeeding generations of thoughtful men have agreed provide the most profound and lasting pleasures of the mind.

In the past men and institutions of great wealth and power have provided means by which these pleasures could be created so that they might enjoy them. They were men who recognized things of great and abiding value. They were men who, incidentally, also knew the value of gold coins.

In the past these pleasures were often reserved to the fortunate few who could afford them. In a modern society men of such wealth and power have almost disappeared, and it must be recognized that it is more difficult to amass great fortunes than it was when there was no conception of income taxes, excess profits taxes and things of that kind. But at the same time we recognize that the wealth of the mind expressed in the arts, humanities and social sciences is not a private prerogative but may rightfully belong to all people who wish to seek for it. Therefore it seems to me that governments have a duty to assume some responsibility of providing not control and direction of the arts but leadership in making available the assistance which is so greatly needed. I trust that parliament is prepared to have that duty assumed by the national government and will feel, as we do, that it can best be discharged through an organism such as that which will be provided in the bill which, if this house sees fit, will follow the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Low: Before the Leader of the Opposition speaks, I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister one question. I was very much interested in his statement but he did not make clear to us exactly what he meant when he used the term "humanities". I think it would be useful to us in the debate if we knew exactly what he has reference to when he uses the term "humanities".

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): What I refer to is the study and, I hope as a result of the study, the acquired knowledge of the treasures that have been provided by the experience, studies and philosophies of past generations. When I say "past generations" I mean the generations that have succeeded each other for many thousands of years in the world. I mean that general knowledge of proper human behaviour that results from the accumulated experience of mankind since history has commenced to be written and not those special things that prepare for the exercise of a special avocation or profession. I mean the general broadening and training of the human mind so that the human individual whose mind it is may have as great benefit as one can derive from the accumulation of lore and knowledge over the centuries.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, before dealing with the remarks of the Prime Minister I feel it only proper that I should register a very strong objection to what took place yesterday afternoon when all of us were anticipating that the debate in reply to the speech from the throne would be continued and the question whether or not the government enjoyed the confidence of the house would be determined. The present debate was brought on without any knowledge being given in advance. While the government has a perfect right to do that, if it so chooses, I think it is far from being in keeping with that relationship which must prevail as between the government and the opposition if each of us has as his purpose the effective and orderly debate of issues properly arranged for in advance.

Having said that, may I express the hope that similar tactics will not be followed in the future. After all, tactics like those deny that spirit of co-operation which I for one wish to be representative of my responsibility in the opposition toward public questions that come before this house.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I think all of us will be in general agreement with the philosophical and learned discussion with which the Prime Minister has introduced this necessary phase in our development, namely the creation of a Canada council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences.

As he concluded I could not but be in full agreement with him when he spoke of the meaning of the social sciences, the humanities and the need for their expansion, their development and encouragement if mankind is to achieve that life which consists of the better things of the past, the accumulated wisdom of the ages and which also, having full regard for the need for technological advance, believes that there is something more to life and to man than that which can be found in a test tube. In other words, the objective which this measure has in mind is one that will receive general encouragement. It is predicated on the fact that life is more than push-button and scientific. It does not disavow the need for scientific advance; it emphasizes that need if we are to take our place in the world competition we face today as communism directs the mind of its youth to scientific knowledge to the end that it may be used only for the destruction of freedom not only within their own country but elsewhere in the world.

The Prime Minister mentioned the effect of education and the need for education. But one must never lose sight of the fact that if education becomes state-controlled and directed and if the objective becomes primarily the state, the brotherhood of man and the achievement of peace become obliterated and man becomes simply a person whose purpose in life is to carry out the dictates of the state and to emphasize the needs of the state.

I remember so well hearing H. G. Wells in 1920, following the first war, say that the only hope for mankind is education. In the intervening years we found that Germany, with a remarkable system of education, did not build for peace. Rather we found that, because of the state, education became a simple instrument of the state for the purposes and aims of the state. This fact becomes of particular interest to us here in Canada when we recall that in the wisdom of those who brought together this confederation, education was placed exclusively under the jurisdiction of the provinces. One sometimes wonders whether or not the fathers of confederation were able to look forward into the days ahead and, with prescience and the power of prophecy that is denied to most of us, could see the day when in parts of Europe and also in parts of Asia education would become exclusively in the power and control of those who are in charge of the state where it becomes in fact not an instrument of peace but a means of destruction.

As the Prime Minister philosophically dealt with the question of education in general and emphasized the need for the humanities receiving fair and reasonable consideration, I could not but think that we in other provinces might learn something from the universities in the province of Quebec which, throughout the years, have given to the humanities that emphasis which has had its effect in the enrichment of the minds of those who have attended those universities and which has provided education for a life rather than primarily for a living.

Having mentioned those generalities, I now come to a discussion of the setting up of this council, the purpose of which is to enrich Canada by providing and assuring the continuance of the nourishing influences of intellectual and artistic development, the development of the mind, the preservation of the great things of the past. All of these things were referred to in the report of the Massey commission. I am not going to tire the committee by long quotations but I have some questions arising out of the recommendations made by that commission and which are now being departed from in the resolution before this committee. I intend to ask certain questions as to why these changes were made and what the purpose was for the alteration in the general scheme enunciated by that commission.

The council will have the distribution of $50 million among the universities for the expansion of buildings and the purchase of equipment over the next ten years; and this amount will be additional to the $16 million to be granted to the universities through the national conference of Canadian universities. It is also to be provided with an endowment of $50 million, the income from which will be earmarked for the support of the arts and humanities. No one can possibly argue that there is not a need for action; it is long overdue. Everywhere in this country our universities find themselves denatured—almost emasculated—by the lack of funds with which to carry on the expansion which is necessary today and which will become more necessary as the years go by.

We find the same problem in secondary education and also in primary education. The multiplication of educational responsibility affects the municipality as well as the province. We see the continued increase in the numbers of potential secondary students, and that increase in turn will increase the number of those who will enter universities, however much their restrictive practices might deny all who desire to enter university the opportunity of doing so. This brings into relief the whole problem of our national financing, and the fact that today the provinces and the municipalities are denied their fair share of the national taxation dollar.

What is envisaged here will simply postpone the day. The whole question of dominion-provincial relations will have to be faced; for the provinces and the municipalities more and more find themselves hampered and hamstrung by the failure of this government to face this major problem.

However estimable the purpose is, and however proper is the need in view, we simply postpone again facing the problem that must be faced in this country, a problem that cannot be faced by bits and pieces, but which must be faced at an early date.

I mentioned the need of Canadian universities. The need is becoming greater as the days go by. A survey was recently made to ascertain the degree to which universities in other parts of the world are dependent on grants from the state. In Great Britain 73.6 per cent of college income is from government grants. In the United States it is 58.6 per cent, and in Canada it is 42 per cent. More and more young and worthy students are being denied admission to university because they are unable to meet the ever-rising costs of tuition. In Canadian universities, of the total income today, or until the recent increase announced by the Prime Minister in November, 30 per cent comes from student fees. In the United Kingdom it is 10.7 per cent and in the United States it is 21.4 per cent. Unless action is taken to meet that situation it cannot but result in many outstanding and potential leaders in the sciences, in the arts, and in all the different phases of living, being denied an education; for more and more tuition rates are being raised and worthy students are finding greater and greater difficulty in proceeding to senior education.

That brings out one other phase, namely, the question of providing scholarships. In British universities and colleges 72 per cent of the students registered receive financial assistance from scholarships or bursaries. The income from the $50 million endowment, if invested at 3½ per cent, will amount to only $1,750,000, a small amount when compared with the need of providing financial assistance through scholarships and bursaries. In Canada today only 14 per cent of the students receive that assistance.

Then, too, as far as the universities are concerned there is the tremendous magnetic influence of scientific organizations and of business on the staffs of universities. University professors in general are notoriously underpaid in comparison with other professions. There is a shortage of university teachers. According to the estimate made at the recent national conference on manpower held at St. Andrews, New Brunswick, there is a shortage of some 3,700 teachers at the present time. There is a need for the expansion of facilities, buildings and the like, in universities. Will this need be met by the amount set up here as an endowment fund? I ask that and point out, as the Prime Minister did, that the Gordon commission estimated that in the next 25 years Canadian universities would have to spend over $1 billion in the provision of new facilities and the like. All these facts compel us to ask ourselves whether some action should be taken.

Should there be a Canada council? Well, I think, generally speaking—and I know of no serious opposition to it—people as a whole are very much in favour of a Canada council. Indeed, the question has been asked on numerous occasions since 1951, why has the government delayed so long in the setting up of this council? Some of us have come to the conclusion that this council was in much the same position as the Canada medal. When questions were asked as to when it would be set up, invariably the answer was that there were difficulties in the way. One naturally asks this question, when were those difficulties resolved? What has taken place recently that has changed the government's diffidence and delay since 1951?

The recommendation made was this, and I shall quote only a part of it:

> That a body be created to be known as the Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, letters, humanities and social sciences to stimulate and to help voluntary organizations within these fields, to foster Canada's cultural relations abroad, to perform the functions of a national commission for UNESCO, and to devise and administer a system of scholarships as recommended in chapter XXII.

However, there is also a further portion of this section on page 377 of the report which deserves to be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister and the government and it is this:

> We should also consider it a misfortune if this Canada Council became in any sense a department of government, but we realize that since this body will be spending public money it must be in an effective manner responsible to the government and hence to parliament.

I ask these questions at this time because the bill is not before us. This gives us an opportunity to ask questions and to ascertain the general plan the government has in mind. I also point out that there is no suggestion anywhere in this report that the method should be the setting up of an endowment fund consisting of a bulk sum. The sum of $50 million will be taken and placed in a fund this year. Was that method chosen because of the fact that the government this year has a surplus which is embarrassing and has provided this means of taking away a portion of it? Why was not the recommendation of the Massey commission followed? This commission brought forth a report that met with universal acceptance. At page 382 the following recommendation is made with regard to financing:

> The development of the council's work would naturally depend upon the extent to which it would be able to satisfy with wisdom and moderation a real public need, and, if successful in this, we do not doubt that there would be public support of parliamentary action in making adequate funds available to it. We do not find it possible to propose specific sums; we should, however, imagine that the council would find it possible to perform its varied duties effectively with an annual budget which would constitute a very slight charge upon all members of the Canadian population. We venture to believe that our fellow-citizens would find this investment modest in relation to the returns which, we are confident, they could reasonably expect.

Why were these changes made? Having regard to the fact that this endowment will provide only approximately $1,375,000 for the purpose of expanding the facilities of universities and for the provision of scholarships and the like, and especially in view of the estimate of the Gordon commission that in turn reinforced the earlier representations made by the university committee as to the tremendous future demands if our higher educational system is to be preserved to a degree commensurate with Canada's national and international responsibility, why was the recommendation made by the Massey commission departed from?

In committee it is not the object, as I see it, to have hon. members make lengthy speeches. We are here for the purpose of securing information. Then, having before us the bill in question, we are able to deal with it in particular, section by section, and examine into its purposes on the basis of the information we have obtained. As far as the setting up of the council and its objectives are concerned, this represents something that has been generally asked for and I think the Prime Minister owes it to the committee and to the country to outline the reasons which brought about these changes which while not representing a change in direction are of more significance than meets the eye.

The Prime Minister also dealt with the personnel of this body and said it would be free of any partisan consideration. What the Prime Minister envisages is both laudable and necessary, but I would ask him whether or not there is any foundation for what is generally believed to be the course which the government has in mind, that the chairman of this committee will be one who was connected with this government over the years. However estimable that gentleman is, and may I say I have a high regard for him, his appointment would not result in a complete divorcement from any suggestion of the possibility of government influence. I say that the chairman of this body should be one who in no way possible will be subject to any suggestion that in the slightest degree the council might be subject to outside influences. Following any other course would, in my opinion, strike a blow at the validity and prestige of this council even before it became operative.

The Prime Minister also spoke in strong support of the need of private individuals and organizations to make their contributions to the endowment fund to be administered by this council. He referred to various foundations in the United States such as the Carnegie trust, the Rockefeller foundation, the Ford foundation and the Mellon foundation. These foundations were set up in those halcyon days, which the Prime Minister himself has not forgotten, because he spoke of that time when income tax and corporation taxes and the like were non-existent. There are many today who have amassed wealth who might be inclined to do their part in contributing to this endowment if encouragement was given to them. I think it is a most desirable end that funds be made available but I am thinking now of this one particular phase of the use of those funds to provide scholarships. I would ask the Prime Minister if in order to encourage and ensure an increasing flow of private bequests consideration has been given to the deductibility to a large extent of amounts so contributed in determining the net valuation of estates for succession duty purposes. If we want to encourage contributions of such funds to ensure that sufficient money will be available, then I ask the Prime Minister to consider if the government does not have a responsibility to make possible by way of encouraging legislation the deduction of bequests to this endowment fund. These are but one or two of the questions which I have to ask. Later on when these questions have been answered we will be in a position to discuss various other phases of this resolution.

Again I say that the objective in the setting up of the council must receive the support of all. However, we want to know why there was such a manifest departure from the general plan which is set out in detail by the Massey commission after sitting for a very considerable length of time and being representative of outstanding Canadians. We want to know why the recommendations have been disallowed and why it has seemed expedient not to include them in the general purview of the resolution.

Canada Council

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): May I say a word or two about the questions which the hon. gentleman has raised. The last question I understand had to do with the character of the council in respect of the deductibility for income tax purposes and for succession duty purposes. I think that that is amply provided for in the terms of the bill in the form in which it will be introduced after the resolution has been discussed.

As to the suggestion that there is a fundamental change in the recommendations of the Massey commission, I do not consider that there is any change at all. I think perhaps we are going somewhat further than they ventured to recommend. We felt that it would be very desirable that the council be able to plan for a number of years. In establishing scholarships for instance you cannot rely merely on the income of one year. In establishing a scholarship you create a situation which has continuing responsibilities. We felt that it would be very desirable to have the council in a position where it would have a certain income upon which it could count year after year. The accounts are to be subject to audit by the Auditor General, and there is required to be submitted to parliament each year a full report of the activities of the council.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Prime Minister if the bill spells out precisely the formula which is to guide the Canada council in the distribution of the proceeds of the second $50 million endowment fund among the universities for construction purposes?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The terms are not determined in full detail, but it is provided that the contribution on the part of the council will not be more than 50 per cent of the cost of the building or the equipment being provided, and it will be for the kind of buildings required to carry out the objectives for which the council is established. If buildings are required for other purposes in the university they should be provided for otherwise than through the Canada council, the objective of which is to foster these developments of studies in the humanities, social sciences and arts. For instance, if an engineering faculty were required in a university it would be expected that those who are dependent upon the sufficiency and numbers and proper training of engineers would themselves do, as I understand they have done quite recently for a faculty of engineering of the University of Ottawa, pledge themselves to substantial contributions to that end.

The council would not under the terms of the bill make contributions out of this fund to other capital expansion than that required to further the general objects for which the council is established. It would be provided that the total would be allocated in proportion to the respective population of the provinces and would be available for disbursement during a period of years. That would not mean that each year each province would have to receive its part of its total proportion because, as I said, it may very well be that in one province the institutions of that province would in two or three years receive the whole of what they might be entitled to receive for the full period, while in others it might be two or three or five years before they would take any portion of the fund which would be attributable to them in relation to their population.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Chairman, this is an occasion when I can rise in my place on behalf of all those associated with me—and this is also my personal view—to give a hearty welcome to this resolution. My only criticism with regard to the introduction of the resolution at this time is that it should have come a couple of years earlier. We have been most anxious to see the Canada Council established because we believe it is high time that these proposals—which will be elaborated when the bill is under discussion, and with regard to which we shall be glad to ask questions—should come before us and give Canada the impetus which is necessary in order to bring to our country a better system of higher education, at least. I would like to say immediately that federal aid is not needed only for the universities of our country; the burden of education in our high schools and secondary schools as well as in the primary schools is becoming one which the provinces, and local municipalities and the local school boards cannot bear without more assistance.

However, this is a step in the right direction. In the times in which we live it is essential that we should be producing in our country groups of young men and women who can promote the scientific advancement of our land and who can contribute to building a better cultural atmosphere in the nation in which we live.

We are a pioneer country, and possibly because of that we have not yet achieved those cultural amenities which one finds widespread in the older-established nations. A few nights ago I was watching television, and while I am not a television enthusiast—perhaps I am old fashioned in that respect; I still prefer the spoken word and the music I hear on the radio—I was nevertheless struck very forcibly by one of the C.B.C. programs recording the opening of the opera house in Austria. The opera was one that was written at the time of the Napoleonic wars when the Austrian people were struggling against tyranny and oppression, and it was undoubtedly meant to bring before the people of Austria once again the fact that in recent times there was also a struggle against tyranny and oppression.

But that is not, wholly, what struck my attention. It was the fact that here we had a small country, just emerging into freedom after being occupied by warring powers, which was endeavouring at the outset to re-establish those cultural activities for which that little country—for such it is, today—has long been famous: music, opera, drama. I compared that with the attitude in our own country where, up to the present time, we have not as a nation set aside sufficient from our productive achievements to build up in our midst a cultural life deserving of the country in which we live.

In making that criticism, however, I do remember how much the Broadcasting Corporation, for example, since it was established nearly 30 years ago through the old broadcasting commission, has done to improve the taste and the education of our people.

When I was in Europe this year I noticed that in the major cities of France, of Germany and of Switzerland, and even in small countries such as Norway, one found either municipal theatres or a national theatre. Even in Oslo one found a fine national theatre, and this in a country whose population is only equal to the population of the province of Ontario.

I am very happy indeed to see this Canada Council established and this is one of my reasons for being so—because I believe it will contribute to the building up in our country of these amenities which will help to fill the leisure periods of the Canadian people in the future and contribute to our social and cultural development.

I have often been impressed by the fact that the older countries have inherited a very rich legacy of paintings, music, drama, poetry and literature from bygone days. What we are going to do as a nation today was indeed once done by the patrons who took under their wings the great writers, artists, poets and musicians of the past. When the Prime Minister referred this morning to that very lovely piece of music, Handel's Messiah, I remembered, of course, that Handel could not have written his beautiful works—The Creation and the other oratorios—had he not been under the patronage of the king in his generation. Nor am I forgetting that our rich legacy of literature, which has come down to us from the time of the first Queen Elizabeth, was largely developed by reason of the fact that each one of the writers and artists of those days was under the protection of a patron who maintained him and enabled him to make his contribution to the literature, music or other arts of the time. The ancient church itself promoted art and, in bygone days, even the sciences to some extent.

That pattern disappeared with the coming of the industrial revolution when our leaders turned their thoughts to economic development and material matters rather than to the building up of cultural activities and the expansion of the cultural heritage, but we find that in recent times almost every country has taken some steps to re-establish this tradition, though on somewhat different lines. England, in particular, has done a great deal in this respect, and we were told this morning what the people of the United Kingdom have done in the last ten or 15 years. At the end of the thirties a small grant of £25,000 was made to assist in the development of music and the arts in the United Kingdom. That has gradually grown to a large sum until today you find the subsidization of a theatre like the Old Vic or a ballet company like Sadlers Wells ballet and the Sadlers Wells theatre and so on.

May I say again by way of tribute to the C.B.C. and its television activities that I do not think I have enjoyed anything as much for a long, long time as I did an evening about three weeks ago when I sat and watched enthralled the beautiful dancing of the Canadian dancers in Swan Lake. It was indeed a delight and I hope that we may see that kind of program repeated on television over and over again. I should like to say the same thing about the Stratford enterprise. I have not had the opportunity of going to Stratford. However, the night before last I saw one of the dramas that had been done at Stratford and while it perhaps was not a drama that would appeal to a very wide group of Canadians nonetheless it was beautifully staged and beautifully acted.

I say to the Prime Minister and the government that I hope that as time passes the parliament of Canada will give assistance to projects of these descriptions so that we may build up within our country the drama, the music and, indeed, the art. I am not one of those who criticize the national gallery for acquiring for the people of Canada some of the beautiful pictures that were painted by the masters of the past. I think that those appropriations are well worth while. After all, we can spend hundreds of millions of dollars in the building of armaments which are obsolete in some instances even before they come off the assembly line, but when we acquire a beautiful picture, when we build up a beautiful ballet company, when we build up drama, when we encourage literature, we are doing something that is not of passing interest but will remain in the hearts and minds of our people not only in this generation but for generations to come.

Through the Stratford theatre, through the musical organizations in Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, through the various dramatic productions of the C.B.C. and many drama leagues, we have unearthed in this country over the past few years talent that we did not know existed until very recently. That, I say, is a major gain for Canada, a gain not to be expressed in dollars and cents but a gain in our cultural level that will pay rich dividends in the days to come. I wanted to say these things at the outset of my remarks this afternoon.

We are very pleased indeed that the government has set up this council and that it is appropriating substantial sums for the development of our universities. I agree that today the building of our universities is essential to the future well-being of Canada. We are a country with tremendous resources that will eventually be developed, and with the coming of new skills, with the coming of automation, it is more than ever necessary that we shall have a group of young men and young women well educated and well trained in order that they may give of their best to the development of these great resources under the new plans and with the new machines and so on that are going to be at the disposal of the nation within a very short time indeed.

What we invest today in our schools, in our colleges, in our universities, is an investment in the future. I have been rather disturbed at times—I understand that the reason of course is shortage of funds—to see reports in the newspapers of some of our new schools being deprived of some of the facilities that modern schools require. I am thinking of auditoria where students may assemble, where they may enjoy good music, where they may participate in dramatics and so on. I say I know the reason why these facilities have been curtailed or eliminated in the plans for many of our new schools but I think it is a mistake because these institutions are being built not for today or tomorrow but for a long time to come.

When I was overseas and had the opportunity to visit some of our NATO installations in Europe I was pleased indeed to see the schools that were being built there for the very large number of Canadian children who are temporary exiles from our country. I did not know, of course, that there were such large numbers of them until I saw them. We have something like 13,000 troops overseas matched by something like 13,000 women and children. Those children are entitled to the very best that we can give them so that they can come back and enter into our schools, our colleges and our life later on. I was pleased to see that there were either assembly auditoria in these schools or if they were not in the schools then adjacent to them there would be a gymnasium or a cinema where the children overseas can assemble and participate in the kind of activities that I believe are a part of a modern education for the children of our land.

We need more facilities. We need more university facilities. When I visit some of the universities of the country and see the temporary buildings that are being used today I realize that they must be replaced with buildings which will be functional and which will afford our young men and women the opportunities that they need. Not only do we need the buildings but we need to give opportunities for our young men and women to benefit from these institutions. As has already been said today, with the increased university fees many of our younger men and women who have the ability are being denied the right that they should have to a full education because they or their parents cannot afford to meet the costs of university education.

The Leader of the Opposition gave some figures today as to the number of young people in Britain who are being educated in the colleges and universities largely at public expense through bursaries and scholarships. I believe that the number is something over 70 per cent. I think he said 72 per cent. I thought it was about 75 per cent. But I was told over and over again when I was in the United Kingdom both last year and two years ago that today no boy or girl of ability can be denied the education which his or her ability demands because of economic circumstances, that through the system of bursaries and scholarships young men and young women coming from the most humble of homes economically can proceed to a university education. That is as it should be.

We have been told that in some fields of modern education we are being outstripped by Russia and her satellites. I do not know

