what kind of educational institutions they have. I know, of course, that a good deal of the time is spent in indoctrination of the students in those institutions. But nonetheless we are told, by people who should know, that an extremely high level of scientific education is given to the students in the Soviet union. In the forthcoming days the contest in the world will probably not be decided on the battlefields of the world but will be decided by the extent to which one or the other of us can contribute more and more to the well-being of men and women everywhere in the world.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the hon. member know, even approximately, what is the percentage of the population in the United Kingdom attending universities as compared with the percentage say in Canada and in the United States? Does he know that percentage, however roughly?

Mr. Coldwell: No. I am going to rely on the figure given by the Leader of the Opposition this morning.

Mr. Macdonnell: Was that figure not showing how many were assisted? I am asking the other question. I was under the impression that the percentage in the United Kingdom is low as compared with ours.

Mr. Coldwell: If my hon. friend knows he can give that figure. I do not know the figure. I think it would be interesting if, when he rises to participate in the debate, —as I imagine he will—he would give us this figure, for frankly I do not know it. However, I know this. In the past number of years—the past 20 years at least—in the United Kingdom new universities have been chartered and new secondary schools have been built as well as grammar schools that are available to the boys and girls in districts that I knew as a lad. As a matter of fact, if I may give my own experience, I was obliged to travel every morning some 30 miles by train to school in order to get a grammar school education whereas today there are three grammar schools within easy reach, one within the borders of the area where I was born. I notice that they have much greater opportunities for both secondary education and university education now than then. As I say, however, I have not the percentage. I know that it is much easier for a boy or girl today to get a university education in the United Kingdom because there are so many more bursaries and scholarships available than in our country. Whereas some 30 years ago or more a young man or woman desiring a university education could work during the summer holiday period and often earn enough to get through, today, of course, with the increase in the cost of board, the cost of fees, books and so on, it is more difficult than it was years ago. But as I say, I have not the comparable figures that my hon. friend asks me to produce.

I am not going to say a great deal more because when the bill comes down we shall be able to find out exactly what the government has in mind. I am happy to know that the government intends to appoint a council that will be representative of all parts of Canada and of the citizens of Canada without regard to partisan considerations. That is as it should be. I am not going to make to the Prime Minister or to the government this afternoon any suggestions as to who should or should not be members of such a council. We welcome this resolution. We shall welcome the legislation when it comes down. We shall give it our consideration and, in the respects in which we think it is worthy of support,—and I believe generally that it will be worthy of support—we shall support it. This is something that we have needed for a long time. I am happy to see that at last we are going to get this forward step. On behalf of my colleagues as well as myself I welcome this resolution.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the Prime Minister this morning and to the other speakers who have dealt with the proposal that the Canada Council be appointed, I thought of what my father told me when I was a boy. I think he had read it from Hugh Walpole's writings. It went something like this: The whole secret of living is to be interested in one thing profoundly and in a thousand things well. My father in my early youth said to me, "I believe that is quite true and I would suggest that during your life you learn to be an apostle of abundant living." Mr. Chairman, I have consciously attempted to fulfil what my father suggested was a good way of life. As a consequence I have deliberately sought the art of diversified living. Here I must confess that it has been most delightful and that I have found that happiness which has come through knowing at least one thing profoundly and in being acquainted with a thousand things well.

I would take it that the meaning of that advice is the pursuit of culture. I listened carefully to what the Prime Minister said this morning and I deliberately asked him a question about the humanities in order to get exactly what was in his mind with regard to the matter. From what he said I believe that the thing which I have consciously attempted to do was to set out to find culture. I do not profess to be cultured. I am afraid that I have missed it by a good long way. However, there are many things that I appreciate of the finer things of life. I also agree that we in this country, should do everything we possibly can to nourish and to sustain the arts, to borrow words used by the Prime Minister in his speech this morning, and to encourage everybody in our land to try to find that art of diversified and abundant living. It is satisfying, it is zestful; it makes people happy and it makes them understand one another much better than they have ever understood one another before.

I remember a journey which I took quite a number of years ago before the time of common travel by aeroplane. I found myself in the middle of a desert in the state of Nevada in the United States. Nightfall came on. We had been travelling across the trackless wastes for many hours without seeing anything but an occasional sign of life. Finally we came to what later proved to be an oasis. We were invited in to spend the evening by the people who lived in the home there. To our delight we discovered something that has remained with us, or at least it has with me, over all these years. I discovered a marvellous family. It was a family poor in this world's goods, struggling to make a living, not certain of the future or of the security that so many of us seek. However, I found that it had a well-stocked library that had been gathered together at great pains and great cost, perhaps through the sacrifice of other things. In the home I saw a piano and other musical instruments. I saw the children performing on them for our entertainment that night. They were self-taught or practically so, the mother and father having given every encouragement to the development of musical talent.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in the course of the evening, as I listened to their entertainment and as I listened to the stimulating conversation that went on amongst the members of that family and with others, I could not help coming to the conclusion that here in the middle of a desert, isolated from all of the advantages that people normally enjoy these days, we found real culture. Here we found happiness and abundant living. I could not help but conclude also, as I listened to what went on today, that it was not government subsidized. It grew spontaneously out of a desire to excel, to develop. I must say, Mr. Chairman, to me it was stimulating because of the very spontaneity with which it came about. It was done by individuals for their own enlightenment, their own progress, and for the entertainment and delight of their fellow men as they came by. They were veritably dwellers by the side of the road where the race of men go by, not in great numbers; but it was a delight, I tell you, to spend an evening with these people.

I am thinking also of the southern negro of the United States. Nobody can ever claim that those people enjoyed many amenities of life; no one ever thought of subsidizing them or of giving them government assistance in the development of their culture. Just the same, Mr. Chairman, the negroes of the south did, by their won spontaneity and their own hard work, develop a culture that stimulated such great men as Stephen Foster in the writing of his operettas and those lovely songs. Then, there are the negro spirituals and the blues. Some of us do not like the blues, but there are a good many intellectuals who do. Jazz, all of these things, originated with the negro in the southern states. Some of us do not like jazz, perhaps, but I know a great many intellectuals who do and who get a great deal of satisfaction out of it. Mr. Chairman, the negro developed his culture out of his sufferings, out of his triumphs, out of his hard life, and it came as a spontaneous expression of that which was in him. He did not need any encouragement by endowment from the government of the United States to do it, and it enriched the life of the United States as it has enriched the lives of people all over the world.

I am thinking also of the Eskimo of the far north. I read a good deal about the Eskimo, I have talked to people who have worked amongst them, doctors and nurses of the United States who years ago first went amongst the Eskimo in Alaska to try to help those people into a better way of life. Many of those doctors and nurses confessed to me that they had learned from the Eskimo more than they had ever known about culture. They confessed that the Eskimo had developed one of the highest cultures known to civilization. They did it by their own hard work, out of the inspiration within their own souls to excel, to achieve, to develop skills. They did not need any government subsidization to do it. Therefore, I have to wonder just what we are doing when we suggest the setting up of a Canada Council for the purpose of buying culture, subsidizing culture. Mr. Chairman, you cannot buy culture; you cannot get it through the expenditure of money alone. There has to be the will on the part of the people to develop their skills and achievements. Let us remember that culture is the sum total of the achievements in the physical, the mental, the spiritual, the scientific, the artistic fields. There has to be that will and it seems to me that depends to a very large degree upon heart education. We can accomplish that sort of thing. If you mean, by a Canada Council to encourage and sustain and nourish the arts, helping our Canadian people to understand through needs of the heart, then perhaps some of us might change our views in regard to it.

This morning the Prime Minister spoke of the needs of cultural education. I do not look upon them as needs at all; I think they are desires, and that is all they are. We all desire to see greater achievements in all of these wonderful fields that enrich our life and make it worth while and make it zestful, but they are not really needs by any means. I say we have to consider this whole matter in that light.

I want to pay a tribute to the voluntary bodies that have encouraged and sponsored the arts over the years, bodies like the dominion drama festival, the little theatre movement, the various foundations sponsored by philanthropic people in this land and in other lands. I think they have done a splendid job; but, Mr. Chairman, what has been achieved certainly is not a discredit to the people of Canada, is it? Not by any means.

If we take careful stock of what has been accomplished by the Canadian people in relation to our population we shall find that we have not lagged behind other countries in culture. I have in mind journeys that I have taken through the province of Quebec. I have been in homes where the people have been completely isolated for years from very much connection with the people outside. I refer to the back concessions of the province. I have found real culture in those families, with great devotion to family life, devotion to their religion, devotion to the soil and their country. These things inspired them to develop. When I sat on the front verandas of some of those homes, beautifully whitewashed and kept clean as they were, and watched the family on a Sunday afternoon working together doing splendid things such as wonderful handiwork, singing songs, developing skills and using them, I could not help thinking that there we had a spontaneous expression of the desires and the wills and the hopes. That amounts to culture. That is what it is. And so they too, the families of the country, have done much to help to achieve the standards of culture that we have achieved in this country.

When we speak about the need or the necessity of government subsidization I have wondered, what about Shakespeare, one of the greatest writers of all time, the greatest dramatist. Did he have to depend upon subsidy? Not by any means. He had to depend upon the patronage of Essex and upon what he could get from the Globe theatre, but he developed just the same, and became the greatest writer of all time in the field of drama.

What about some of our great Canadians? What about Raymond Massey? What about Mary Pickford and various others who have become leaders in the field of drama? I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that these people are only representative of many others who have excelled, and they did not have to depend upon government subsidy by any means. They achieved what they did through hard work and through the patronage of people who were prepared to pay for what they had to give. Certainly, I say that what we have achieved has been true culture, and it is no discredit to us as a country.

This morning the Prime Minister mentioned what had been accomplished in other countries. He mentioned what they have done in Great Britain and he also mentioned what the United States had accomplished.

He suggested that there were certain reasons why the United States did not have a counterpart to the Canada Council. He suggested that in the United States there were a great many philanthropists and wealthy people who became patrons of the arts and scientists. I am going to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that if we had in our country more people of material substance I am quite satisfied that they would be just as generous as the people in the United States have been, but one of the great reasons why we do not have as many wealthy people here, and I think we should begin looking into this, is that we have followed taxation policies that have taken the material substance away from people who would be patrons of the arts and sciences and have left them with little or nothing with which to endow. It is high time we began to take a careful look at what the real effects of our taxation policies have been.

I think we sometimes appear to be a little too anxious. It should be remembered we are still a young country and we have plenty of time in which to develop. I am not suggesting by any means that we lag behind in the development of our arts and sciences but I do think there are priorities as I said the other day; and it seems to me that one of those priorities for claims on any money there is available to be spent is the situation of those people in our country who are forced to live below the borderline of poverty, the old age pensioners, those who are in receipt of war veterans' allowance and other pensioners. I do not think for one moment that it is going to help an old age pensioner to be cultured prior to the time he is given something to eat. Does the government think, for example, that having culture before we give him something to eat will help him to better appreciate what it means to starve?

I say we ought to be giving greater consideration to those priorities. Old age pensioners constitute one of those priorities and another important one is cancer research. Cancer is one of the great killers and we have found no remedy for it. We ought to devote our energy and resources to finding a cure. I am going to hang my head in shame if we say to the people of this country, "We cannot afford to do these things but we can afford to put up $50 million or $100 million for the purpose of bringing culture to you people." That is putting it in a direct form and those words express exactly the way I feel about this.

I do not for one moment feel that it is unwise to have such a thing as a Canada Council eventually for the development of the arts, letters and sciences. As I have already said, I am devoted to discovering expressions of art through diversified living and all the joys it brings; but I do not know for certain that this is the time for it to emerge as a priority and I doubt very much that this is so.

Let me make it abundantly clear, however, that I find myself if not in complete agreement, at least in substantial agreement, with the second part of the Prime Minister's resolution. Anyone who takes the trouble to examine into the needs of our universities, school divisions and municipalities cannot help but agree with what the Prime Minister said this morning concerning these needs. Not only are our universities overcrowded now but they face an extremely dark future unless something is done to help them achieve the physical plan that is required. The enrolment in our universities is going to be multiplied three or four times prior to 1980. There will be a tremendous influx of students who were the children born just at the end of the war. Within a very few years the universities will not have the physical facilities necessary to take care of this additional enrolment. The burden of supplying this huge capital outlay is too great for the municipalities and school divisions of the provinces to meet. Some means must be found by which they can be assisted.

I know what it means to support children in schools of higher education. I have two children attending university today, one in his third year in the school of medicine and one in second year arts. I have no hesitation in saying it is a heavy drain on the pocketbook as many of you will have experienced. These are not the only children I have sent to university but these two are attending simultaneously. I often think how fortunate I am to be in a position to send them because I know of a great many deserving students whose worthy parents have not been able to send them to school.

The son of a neighbour of mine recently graduated with an outstanding record from one of the local high schools. This worthy young man should have been granted an opportunity of going to university but he was not able to attend simply because his parents did not have sufficient money and he could not find a means of raising it. Worthy students like him should not be deprived of a higher education for monetary reasons and should be given the highest education they are prepared to accept, because every time we graduate a student and equip him with skills and degrees we have enriched not only his life but our nation, and at the same time have given impetus to his desire to achieve and excel, which means so much in the development of any country.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I approve of what the hon. member has said but I am wondering if he realizes that he is urging in this particular area a large measure of state subsidization?

Mr. Low: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I realize that, and that is exactly the point to which I am coming in this connection, but I think this is quite a different matter from what I read in connection with the first part of the resolution. What I read about in the first part of the resolution will affect comparatively few people and will give direct comfort and enjoyment to comparatively few. What I am talking about at this time is something that will help many people and we have accepted that principle, of course. The fact that one accepts the principle of subsidization for a purpose that is universal does not mean that one has also to accept the principle where the results will not be universal, and so I have to distinguish between them.

If I may proceed, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that I am not certain in my mind that it is necessary to set up the Canada

Council for the second purpose. The fact is that we already have institutions and mechanisms in the country with which to deal with this sort of thing, that is improvements in university education, improvements in capital equipment at the university and so on, without the establishment of a Canada Council. Is it necessary for us to multiply our institutions every time we try to help a worthy cause? I say that if the government had wanted to do so they could easily have made this money available to the universities and the provinces that are charged under our constitution with the responsibility of providing education for our people. It is not necessary to have a Canada Council to do that.

I would like to see this help given to the universities, municipalities and the provinces in order that they may carry their burdens. As the Leader of the Opposition so aptly said this morning, the Canada Council proposal is not necessary; this is only chipping away at the block, and a mighty small chip it is too. We will have to see to it that our provinces and municipalities are provided with a fairer share of the government's revenue, and when this is done they will look after education and will do it well. When this government takes that view of things and is seized with the importance of decentralization in these matters, then I am satisfied they will begin to see the truth ahead of them and will be able to find their way through the shoals of the difficulty we face. This resolution does not point the way and it will not provide a lasting solution and it is because I feel that way about it that I speak with some feeling.

I would like to say, in bringing my remarks to a close, I feel that this is not the time to implement the demand that has been made quite vocal by a few people in our country to set up the Canada Council and endow it as is suggested, but that I believe it would be wise for us to scrutinize most carefully the policy under which it will be set up. I agree with what the Prime Minister said this morning in the house in regard to having men and women of absolute integrity head the Canada Council. I do not think that we can be too careful about that. I believe that we must make certain that we place in those positions now men and women of complete honesty of purpose. Why do I say that? Because, Mr. Chairman, we have had such things as this set up before, perhaps not internally, but I notice in the Massey report that the writers of that report suggest that this Canada Council will be the national counterpart of UNESCO. May I suggest that the original purpose for which UNESCO was set up was perhaps praiseworthy, and its objectives were praiseworthy, but I am going to say to you that men and women of dishonesty of purpose got hold of it and they have made use of it as an instrument of subversion and brainwashing. Some of the people who escaped from this country who were suspect in the field of communism found their way into UNESCO and were given places of importance and authority. May I point out that for this reason there sometimes are dangers in these concepts, dangers which we do not see or guard against. One of those dangers is that an instrument of this kind, although it can be an instrument of good, can be made, on the other hand, if it falls into the wrong hands, an instrument of evil. That is to say, we have to be very careful. I go along with the Prime Minister and others in saying that we must make certain if we are to go along with the Canada Council people that we see to it that people of absolute integrity and honesty of purpose, people free of any entanglements in these suspect movements, are put into those positions.

I want to see the bill and give it very careful study. I would issue a word of warning that we ought not to rush headlong into this thing without a careful study because when we go to the country the people are going to ask us why we rushed into this thing and put up $100 million for it and at the same time said that we could not help those people who have been living at or below the borderline cases which I have seen. I am going to reserve my decision as to whether or not I shall support the bill.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, on this matter I could not disagree more with my hon. friend to my left, the hon. member for Peace River, than I could disagree with anyone on this particular issue.

Mr. Blackmore: We expected that from you.

Mr. Knight: I take that as a compliment.

Mr. Blackmore: You may look at it that way, but I do not.

Mr. Knight: May I continue after these interruptions. My hon. friend says that he is against the setting up of this Canada Council because for one thing it has been set up too soon. I had intended to say in opening my remarks that my criticism would be that it has been set up much too late.

Mr. Low: I said it was a matter of priorities.

Mr. Knight: I submit that it should have been set up long ago. I am in complete agreement with the Social Credit leader when he says that he would like to see more assistance and more money given to the municipalities with which to carry on their purposes, including the provision of educational facilities, but I am not at all convinced that, if the Canada Council is not set up, a corresponding amount of money will be given for that purpose. So I am prepared to accept the setting up of this Canada Council as a step in the right direction.

While I am talking about my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party I may as well take up this question of UNESCO which he has just mentioned. This UNESCO is not the bogey he seems to think it is. My hon. friends seem to be constantly worrying that they will find communists under the bed, and they are always looking for them.

Mr. Blackmore: You do not have to look for them.

Mr. Knight: I would suggest that if my hon. friend's assertion is right, and if some communists have got into UNESCO, as they got into other places, one of the ways to have seen that that would not happen was for Canada to have taken the proper action under the UNESCO charter. That charter is now ten years old and we were one of the original signatories. I believe that at the original meeting it was agreed or certainly it was understood when the people who signed that charter went home to their respective countries, that a national commission on UNESCO was going to be set up. For some strange reason that national commission was not set up.

One reason why I am in favour of the setting up of this Canada Council is that although the Prime Minister did not mention it this morning I understand he is following along the general lines of the Massey commission report. If he is, that would involve, not the setting up, as I have pleaded with the Prime Minister on many occasions to set up, of a national commission on UNESCO; it would mean that the Canada Council which he proposes to set up would be in effect, or an advisory committee to that council would be in effect, this national commission to UNESCO, something for which I have long pleaded. If I am mistaken the Prime Minister can correct me; if I am right he can corroborate what I have said.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I just wish to clarify what the hon. gentleman is saying. If he will read the provisions with respect to the establishment of UNESCO he will find that this kind of body could not be a national commission of the kind envisaged as one of the alternatives under UNESCO, but many countries have convened national conferences prior to the UNESCO meetings. The bill will provide that the government can delegate to the council the responsibility for the convening of these conferences that do comply with the provisions of the UNESCO charter.

Mr. Knight: I am glad to have that bit of information. I have given it as my opinion that Canada has not filled its commitments to UNESCO in order to take advantage of it. I think that has been a disadvantage, not only to the other national members of UNESCO but to Canada, which has been the chief loser. Since the setting up of UNESCO Canada has done very little to take part in the original scheme except to send year after year whenever conferences were held delegates of a sort. In saying that I cast no reflection upon the hon. member for Victoria. I have criticized the government for their choice of people to send to these conferences. Generally they have been civil servants connected with the Department of External Affairs, having their headquarters at Ottawa. They go to these conferences and return and the people in the rest of the country know nothing about it except when they see a notice in the newspaper saying that they have been there and have come back.

Now that, to me, was not the carrying out of the original intention. These people, on a national commission or on the Canada Council, should be people who are interested, first of all, in the matter in hand. They should be chosen on a geographical basis. They should be delegates like my hon. friend the member for Victoria B.C. (Mr. Fairey)—men of his type, not civil servants connected with any department of government, and by that method the UNESCO ideal—by which I mean not only the promotion of national culture but the promotion of culture and understanding throughout the world among educated people who have the responsibility for doing a lot of the thinking of the world—would thereby be promoted and strengthened. That is my idea of the function of UNESCO; it is an institution that may be and should be a society for the promotion of sound ideals, peace and understanding.

I was glad to hear the announcement that the Prime Minister has made. There were one or two things which my hon. friend from Peace River said in which I could not see any sense. He talked about Shakespeare, and indicated that there was a Shakespeare in the world without the aid of a Canada Council. Of course there was. But how many Shakespeares have we had? One every three or four hundred years, I suppose. My hon. friend did admit that Shakespeare did not simply come from nowhere; he said he had a patron who gave him an opportunity to achieve what he did and I suggest that what the government is doing now is going to provide an opportunity for many unfound Shakespeares to be,—not Shakespeares, of course, but I think my meaning is fairly clear. In other words, if in the past these advantages of which I have been speaking have been for a privileged few; my plea is that they should now be extended to the many. That is the point I would like to make.

I am not going to say very much about the council itself because I do not know what is going to happen until I see the bill, but I am going on to express one or two general ideas on the subject. I had intended to defer these remarks until the bill was discussed, but since others have expressed opinions I will make them now. I said at the beginning of my speech that my original criticism would be that the government's action is not too soon but that it is too late. I do not mean by that that it is irrevocably too late; I do not mean it in the sense that any particular damage has been done. Nevertheless I do think we have been wasting an opportunity of doing something we should have done years ago. There has been no action. I expected action in 1955 when I had the good fortune—I do not know why they chose me—to attend a meeting together with some of the educators in this country at a special council; I think it was a council of the humanities held in Ottawa early in 1955. There I heard one of the finest speeches I have ever heard the Prime Minister make and we all came out of the banquet held after that conference thinking: "We are going to get it; it's in the bag". I am not, of course, a mind reader, and I cannot ask the Prime Minister to disclose what was in his mind at the time, but we all felt it was in the Prime Minister's mind in 1955 to bring in some legislation similar to that which is being brought in now. Certain friends of mine, particularly in university circles in my city, were keenly disappointed that the speech from the throne that year contained generally almost as little as it does this year, and that there was in particular no mention in it of a Canada Council. However, it is in the speech from the throne this year, and I am glad of it.

I think the time has come when we should have some scheme of the kind proposed by the government. After all, we are a pioneer country. We have been in the earlier stages of our development and we have been concerned, probably of necessity, with material things; we had to dig the stones and cut the stumps, and I think we have perhaps failed to develop our human capabilities as efficiently as we have developed our material and natural resources. For some reason Canada stands alone in this. We have shown a strange hesitation and diffidence in artistic and literary fields. In the early stages, at least, we have been imitative. Perhaps this is because we are a nation of immigrants; we have come here imbued with ideas which are connected with the countries from which we came.

And so our culture and the folklore of which one of my hon. friends has spoken has really been the culture of the French Canadian race which has been established so long on the banks of the St. Lawrence river. My hon. friend has paid tribute to that culture, and I do, too. But the rest of the country is not getting any benefit from it. It is an individual culture of people who meet together to enjoy their little dramatic performances or whatever else they arrange. I would like to see that sort of thing spread across this whole nation and if that is to be done we shall need some medium through which it can be spread.

Now we are learning, as the Prime Minister has said, that we must depend on ourselves. We have begun to realize that art and literature must draw upon the Canadian scene if we are to have a national culture of any distinctiveness, and surely the creation of this Canada Council will inspire, encourage and create a climate in which this kind of thing can take place.

Mr. Fulton: What kind of thing?

Mr. Knight: My hon. friend can make his speech, with such inspiration as he possesses, after I have finished.

Mr. Fulton: I will.

Mr. Knight: Now I would like to paraphrase something I said some time ago because I think it is, perhaps, worthy of a reference even if I was the author.

> Perhaps our pioneer preoccupation with primitive things or perhaps our progress towards our own independence and in material wealth has been so swift that our appreciation of Canadian greatness and the capabilities of her people has not kept pace. We ourselves are at last discovering that there is as much drama in the lives of the native Canadians as a basis for literature as there is in other people's lives. Our artists are beginning at last to realize that there is as much beauty in a prairie sunset or in the Quebec woods as there is in a European scene which it was once conventional to portray upon canvas.
> And I pay here my tribute to the great advance made by French Canadian culture.
> Investment in the promotion of Canadian arts—for as such I see the setting up of this Canada Council—would add to the enjoyment, the education and the culture of all Canadian people.

I can subscribe to that today just as well as on the day on which I said the words just quoted. One phase that I think is important is that some people who have had some opportunities to allow their genius to grow have been drawn away from us by the lure of extra monetary reward in the United States, and that has meant a great national loss to us. They have been drawn away by the lack in Canada of high monetary reward and the lack of an opportunity to practice their profession under good conditions at home.

The Canada Council can do for the humanities and the arts what the national research council has done for the sciences. To my mind, the humanities have been neglected. I have always maintained that and I still do so. As far as specialization is concerned, I should like to say this to the government if I may presume to advise them. When they are looking for men for the foreign service, when they are looking for men to administer departments at home, I say to the government that the best and soundest education with which these people can start is an education in the humanities. I hope that it will then happen that these young men so equipped by their studies of the humanities will be able to take advantage of government scholarships so that they may be trained in those functions for which the government wants to make use of them later.

These are ideas that I have upon the question. There has been opposition. We have seen an example of it here today from the leader of the Social Credit party and their former leader, the senior member of that group. Personally I cannot understand their attitude. No man has ever accused me of communist tendencies or even near communist tendencies. If they did I would repudiate them as I have repudiated the communists publicly. Communists have opposed me in every election in which I have run and not even my hon. friends will find a communist under my bed.

I do not know what this fear is based upon. Perhaps it may be based upon fear of interference by governments with our intellectual freedom. Let us admit that there is a risk, but even if that is so we will have to take the risk. We cannot hold back progress forever because somebody suspects something about a communist having infiltrated or being mixed up with an organization. If we are going to abandon all our good works because a handful of communists may get into these organizations we are not going to progress very far. We cannot hold back on account of fear.

It surely will be admitted that there has been no interference with intellectual freedom produced by the federal grants to our universities. If there is, I have never even heard a suspicion or a word about it. I have never even heard the subject mentioned. As far as I know, the federal authorities impose no conditions with regard to the spending of the money which they hand to the universities. I am not going to deal further with that argument.

I of course have claimed with respect to other types of education that there would be absolutely no interference in the curriculum or the administration of education where such grants were received, but that is not my subject today. I think there would be equal risk in taking money for the sponsorship of education or the sponsorship of culture—I do not like the word "culture" —from a private institution. I must say that I am glad that from now on the existence of drama festivals is not going to have to depend upon grants from the liquor interests of this country, something that we have seen happen in the past. Mind you, I do not wish to discourage the giving of grants by private industries or private philanthropists, but now we have got a medium through which these grants can be assigned to the place or places where they are most needed. I hope that this plan will not only not stop the intention to give such grants but will be an inspiration for private industry or philanthropists to put more money into a good cause.

Another disadvantage I can see with respect to private grants is that such grants are liable to come with some strings attached, although perhaps not very substantial strings. However, I can see that some firm that uses a great number of engineers, for instance, would pour money into a university or other institution of learning with the hope at least—and I would not be surprised that they would express it—that the money would be used to produce men whose services they could then use with great profit. I think that is natural. In other words, these grants would be made to students in a specialized field.

I have been saying for 12 years, and perhaps I do not need to tell hon. members again, that what we want is national sponsorship and effort. Another thing that occurs to me is that we need steady and continuous support of this sort of thing and not a spasmodic effort such as perhaps would be the result of private givings. A firm might give a quarter of a million dollars this year but you might not get any more for years to come. When we have a basis of continuous support we may hope to get somewhere.

I have already spoken much longer than I had expected to but the hon. member for Peace River will have to take the responsibility for my wearying him to this extent. I am thinking now of how this council may be a potential means for the granting of scholarships. Throughout my life I have had a steady connection with the land that gave me birth. I have visited it a good many times and have kept in touch with people there, now, alas, too few. I have been convinced that no country in the world has made a finer contribution to its young people than has Great Britain so far as scholarships are concerned. Whether the figure is 70 per cent or 75 per cent is immaterial. My recollection is that in 1955 75 per cent of the students in the British universities were taking their studies with government support—

Mr. Fulton: Seventy-four per cent.

Mr. Knight: —and that 70 per cent of the total amount of money spent by the universities in Great Britain was provided by the government. That still does not clear up the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Fulton: Seventy-four per cent is the exact percentage.

Mr. Knight: The arts council in Great Britain has been a great success. There is no doubt about that. From the point of view of my philosophy and the philosophy of this C.C.F. group one important feature that I like is that bright young people, no matter what their financial circumstances, are provided with an opportunity to obtain an education. May I say that these scholarships have been given on only one basis, the basis of merit. They have a rigid system of competitive examinations, and it is a particular source of satisfaction to me that bright children of what are sometimes called humble families, who never could have hoped to get to university on their own resources, have been helped to go there and as a result Great Britain has the advantage of some of the brightest minds in that country. Their plan has brought benefits to many.

I said before that perhaps it is our newness that has been the cause of the disastrous neglect of the humanities and the social sciences. The government has been much more generous with purely scientific research. The need for defence programs may have had something to do with it. I am sure it has something to do with that tendency. We may be excused perhaps for being more impressed by the need for preserving our lives than by the need for the enrichment of our living. In my opinion we shall be obliged to strike a balance; and I think we can have some realization of both aims.

(Translation):

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say to indicate my support, modest as it might be, of the measure introduced this afternoon by the government. Somebody said this morning that it has been brought up rather abruptly; yet, everyone had heard about it for quite some time, had read much about it in the newspapers, so that members of this house should have expected that one day or the other, they would be called upon to consider this measure. Indeed, everyone had plenty of time to get ready, judging from the very interesting speeches I have heard here this afternoon.

I am convinced that the first concern of the government will not be, as our Conservative friends seem to fear, to appoint a Liberal as chairman of this council, just because he is a Liberal.

Too well do I know the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his government to dread a political appointment to that position. I am always amused when my hon. friends opposite express fear of political influence in government appointments.

I have a pretty fair knowledge of political history since I have been sitting for already 30 years either in this house or in the provincial legislature; I know too well that party considerations are foremost in the minds of my hon. friends opposite when they are in power. The old story of the mote in one's brother's eye seems to apply in this case. Mr. Chairman . . .

Mr. Van Horne: You do not believe that it is the primary concern of the Liberal party?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It has not been half as much the concern of the Liberal party as it has been that of the Conservative party throughout its history. If the hon. member would only read history, instead of taking up time to interrupt me, he would know a lot more about it and he would be able to speak far more intelligently than he does now.

Mr. Chairman, I felt that it was fitting to express a French Canadian point of view here this afternoon. I know some who would have been far better qualified than I am. Nevertheless, I have summoned forth all my courage in order to say something interesting, even though there may be some who will not find my remarks to their liking.

Canada Council

The Canada Council, to my mind is timely. We could hardly have had it a hundred years ago. We could hardly have had it even twenty-five years ago because we were not yet ready for it.

Character and mentality must have reached maturity in certain fields before talent can find self-expression. Such endeavours should not be attempted too early. Consequently, I do believe that this measure is timely.

As regards French-speaking Canadians, it is true that our development in the arts has been gradual. I am thinking here of drama, music and the humanities. However I pay special tribute to commercial and classical colleges for the good education they have given us in these three fields, especially in that of the humanities. Quite often in the course of controversies in newspapers and magazines, some writers who do not see the use of studying dead languages blame our seminaries for clinging to the teaching of Greek and Latin. However, knowing languages and specially the roots of the French language, our educators are well aware that, in order to have a good knowledge of French, one must also have a knowledge of Greek and Latin roots. Even for English-speaking people, specially those whose origin goes back to Normandy, it is certain that the knowledge of Greek and Latin roots is a great help to anyone who wishes to understand and speak English really well.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, we should pay a well-deserved tribute to our classical colleges for continuing to teach the so-called dead languages, and be grateful to them for developing among French Canadians able talents which would probably have remained dormant. It is in the seminaries and the classical colleges that we see certain talents blossom out thanks to the vigilant and solicitous care of teachers in our classical colleges, thanks to the attention they give to the education of youth, and especially, to their great learning.

The mention of a few names should be sufficient. For instance in my district, that of Mgr. Camille Roy, and in the Montreal district those of Canons Chartier and Groulx, are examples in support of my statement. There are others, of course, but those are the three which come to my mind at this time. Those people are educators who have helped a great number of French Canadians gain a high degree of proficiency in the dramatic arts. More recently, there has been Rev. Father Legault, who trained the famous Compagnons de Saint-Laurent, a group that has won medals in all Canadian festivals and from which have come such distinguished actors as Gascon, Coutu and Groulx.

We even had, in the theatre, French Canadian actors whose great talents have enabled them to grace the English stage. I shall mention only one, Paul Dupuis, who for years played on the stage in London. He is now back in Montreal and we have been very pleased to welcome him. Here is a man with a latin culture, with a French culture, who, nonetheless, has brought enjoyment, relaxation and satisfaction to a great number of English people who saw him on the stage or on films, or heard him on the radio.

I could mention a host of other artists, people like Plamondon, Jobin, Mercier, Simoneau, the Alaries and I take care not to forget a name for ever famous, a name whose renown has never been surpassed in the whole world, that of Madame Albani.

Ladies and Gentlemen—

Mr. Chairman, excuse me, it's a force of habit. Elections are coming and this most likely explains my lapsus linguae.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the French Canadian people will be pleased at the establishment of the Canada Council. I easily imagine that somewhere certain clouds will show up, bearing the words: "Keep watch upon autonomy, federal government should not interfere with education, and if song, the drama, the fiddle and the piano are part of education, there is danger that the federal government will interfere in the field of education."

I do not fear at all the interference of the federal government in the field of education; I can say so, I think, without causing offence to anyone, even the staunchest partisans of provincial autonomy.

I do not see either any danger in the payment, to universities, of grants such as have been offered by the Right Hon. Prime Minister in the speech he delivered not long ago. It is therefore my contention that the universities of the province of Quebec should accept those grants. I do not know why they did refuse them. They have no doubt their reasons; they may have excellent arguments but I think that we have, in the person of the Prime Minister and of the present members of his cabinet, strong enough arguments and a consistent enough record to be in a position to tell them that their fears are groundless. Universities should accept those grants which would help them go on with their magnificent work in the field to which they have devoted their efforts for such a long time in order to ensure the ever-growing success of education in the province of Quebec.

Oh, as somebody has said, I do know that the primary school may seem to be the solid foundation for the education of our young French Canadians. However, there is not only one stone in a building; there are several and all must be placed solidly and normally on top of one another, not only in the field of university education but also in the fields of primary and secondary education. When our universities and colleges need money, no autonomist outcry will be strong, powerful or sincere enough to prevent them from accepting the grants which the federal government wishes to make without any condition whatever.

A moment ago I was listening to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) exchange a few pleasantries with regard to the danger of communist infiltration in this council which the federal government proposes to establish. I am convinced that we can make progress in the arts, social sciences and the humanities without any danger of communist deviation. I do know for a fact that the communist leaders a few years ago had asked some musicians to change their style of composition because it was not close enough to materialistic ideals. I do know too that certain historians or certain scientists such as Lysenko, have attempted to destroy some theories such as the Mendelian theory since they went against communist ideology and more especially communist dialectics. I hardly think that that is a danger at the present time in this country with regard to the Council which the federal government proposes to establish, since our leaders are not communists but good democrats. I know also that Canadians are at present sufficiently warned against communist dangers, possibly not all but most dangers, so that there will always be among us people who are sufficiently wide awake to prevent such an infiltration in a Council such as this.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I would not have felt it to be unavoidable that the hon. member for Peace River and I should disagree as much on what he said this afternoon as we usually do on matters of financial discussion, but such was in fact the case. Yet there was one thing he said with which I found myself greatly in sympathy. In fact, there were two things. He said that you cannot buy culture. With that statement we can all agree.

Incidentally, I agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon in wishing that we could get another word. The word "culture" seems to have become highbrow. I have been looking up the dictionary to see whether we could get another word for it. There is a definition which is not so exciting but which satisfies me much better; I refer to the expression "intellectual development". Incidentally, I was glad to hear the interesting definition of the word "humanities" that the Prime Minister gave us this morning, because it is not a word that carries its own meaning with it. I think it is well that we should have it in our minds.

The other thing in which I agree with the hon. member for Peace River is this. He seemed to fear, and I think it is a valid fear, that by stepping in with government funds we might blunt individual effort. I am quite sure that is not the intention at all, and I hope it will be possible to avoid completely such a danger because as we look about I think we shall agree that we find a good many instances in the world where a very high state of true culture has been arrived at with precious little money.

I was interested in what the Prime Minister said this morning, that in France, even before the revolution, they had the matter very much in their minds. I propose to read just a sentence from a speech made years ago by Sir James Barrie to the students at St. Andrews University. It is in praise of the Scots and, perhaps before reading it, I had better say I can do it without embarrassment because I myself am only 25 per cent genuine Scottish. He was speaking to the students and he was talking about the universities, and then he added this. I find it very interesting and I find it very true, because we all know that education in Scotland, largely due to the efforts of that very controversial character, John Knox, got right down to the grass roots, so to speak. This is what Barrie had to say to the students whom he was addressing, as recorded in a little book called "Courage". He said:

> You come of a race of men the very wind of whose name has swept to the ultimate seas. Remember—
> "Heaven doth with us as we with torches do,
> Not light them for themselves . . ."

Then he adds this:

> Mighty are the universities of Scotland, and they will prevail. But even in your highest exaltations never forget that there are not four, but five. The greatest of them is the poor, proud homes you come out of, which said so long ago: "There shall be education in this land." She, not St. Andrews, is the oldest university in Scotland, and all the other are her whelps.

We will all agree that effort should not be blunted. I find myself sometimes questioning a little the tremendous obstacles that are pictured as facing the individual seeking education unless he is assisted by scholarships. I do not entirely accept that. I think there are a very great many people who can still do it for themselves, but I do remember this. I remember when I myself was an undergraduate and had to go out for five months each summer to get the wherewithal to come back next winter. I remember that a man who was himself a real scholar, not just a make-believe, said "We will never have real scholars in this country while students have to take six months of the year away from their studies in order to get the means to come back to their studies."

I have always remembered that. I think it is true; and therefore, while I repeat that the doors will always be open to any man of sufficient energy—and of course genius triumphs over everything—nevertheless legislation and our ordinary way of life have to try to deal with those of us who are about the average. I think therefore we are entitled to take anxious thought to facilitate people in their efforts to reach university.

I want to say a word or two about universities. Of course it is commonplace to say that all of us who are concerned with university administration are greatly perplexed and sometimes even alarmed at the stories we have heard of the impending flood that is going to descend on us before long. One occasionally gets qualifications to that statement. I have run into two or three industrialists who have said to me, "You know, we have a lot of people working in our plants and doing jobs for which they do not need a full engineering course; not that the engineering course hurts them, but the jobs could be done very adequately by people with considerably less technical training." It is probably well known here that in the province of Ontario, at any rate, considerable progress has been made in setting up those technical schools. I think I am correct in saying there are four or five of them now, and the intention is to develop them still further.

Another stretching of our resources which is possible is the use of present buildings, using them not on a 4-hour or 5-hour a day basis, but on a 12-hour basis and 12 months of the year. I believe that studies to that end are going forward and that no doubt will affect the situation considerably.

I now want to ask two or three questions which the Prime Minister will perhaps answer later. We have been given very interesting and impressive figures as to the increase in the university population but that, of course, as has been pointed out, implies a very much larger increase in the population of secondary schools, that is to say a grade below. If we are going to have twice as many in the universities I presume that means we are going to have far more than twice as many in our secondary schools. I would like the Prime Minister to tell us something about that and whether that problem has been taken into account, because it seems to me it will add vastly to the responsibilities of the universities themselves.

I noted also what the Prime Minister had to say about the limitation on the percentage of federal grant money which was to go into the construction of any one building, and that leads me to ask a broader question. I am reading now from paragraph (b):

> The council shall establish a fund to be called the university capital grants fund, to which shall be credited the sum of $50 million, to be paid to the council by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund.

I take it that it is correct to say that in the past, apart perhaps from some cases of special buildings, for example astronomy or other special purpose buildings which were really federal buildings located on university grounds, any capital assistance to universities has come almost wholly from the provinces. That is true, I think, of the university with which I am connected; and the question I wish to ask is where will the provinces come in in connection with these construction projects? Although I am subject to correction, of course, I got the impression as I listened to the Prime Minister this morning that the question of construction would be a matter between the university itself and this university capital grants fund.

The Prime Minister looks doubtful and perhaps he is going to correct that, but in any event I shall continue with my question and it is this. The council establishes this fund which will be called the university capital grants fund; that I take it is just a convenient means of crediting a separate fund. I am not quite clear in my own mind how far the council goes in decisions with regard to the nature of buildings, whether it is entirely a matter for the university, or whether the province comes in in any way. I think that will indicate the question in my mind, and perhaps it can be answered later on when the Prime Minister will no doubt have other questions to answer, too.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution passes I want to express support for the important step it represents. I think the provision is not adequate, considering the problem confronting us, but having recognized the need for some action I know it will be possible for the government to increase the amount. I think the proposal that we should establish a Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences is one which hon. members in this house should support.

I was interested in the comments made by the Prime Minister to the effect that we should look forward not only to Canadians going abroad but to people from other lands coming to Canada. I am thinking of Terrance Gabora of Mikado, Saskatchewan. His grandparents came to Canada from the Ukraine at the beginning of the century and homesteaded out in the Canora district. At a very early age the grandson displayed an interest in the violin. His classmates and neighbours always received a great deal of pleasure every time this young chap had an opportunity of playing his instrument. At university he continued to devote time to his music and won a scholarship which took him to Paris and then to Vienna. He is now back in Austria in the general area where his grandparents and great grandparents lived. Last autumn he and his charming wife Gail Craig, who is a very accomplished singer, made a tour of the small communities in Saskatchewan that Terrance knew as a boy, and it gave our people a great lift to have these young Canadians coming back as such accomplished artists.

But the point I want to make is that the relatively poor people of Austria are providing a scholarship for this young Canadian to enable him to continue perfecting his art as a violinist, and I think most Canadians would agree that with our great resources we should not expect charity from the people of Austria to assist our young musicians to continue their studies.

When I think of these young people with their wonderful gifts I am disturbed about the prospects of their having to go to countries other than Canada in order to make a living, and I am hoping that the establishment of a Canada Council will result in encouraging many more young people like the Gaboras to go abroad to study. I also hope we will make plans to see that there is a place in the Canadian scene for such people when they have completed their training. I hope that a much larger number will be able to study abroad in addition to those who benefit from the generosity of people like Sir Cecil Rhodes.

This matter is perhaps of more interest to us in this parliament because the hon. member for Greenwood many years ago was a Rhodes scholar, as was the hon. member for St. Paul's, the hon. member for Kamloops and the Minister of Fisheries. They were all selected by the appropriate committees as the outstanding male students of the year, and had the privilege of three or four years of study in a very interesting centre of the world. I think we should look forward to a much larger number of young Canadians having the opportunities which these hon. members had when they were somewhat younger than they are today. I believe we should also make funds available so that students from other countries may come to Canada.

In the discussion on this resolution I do not think enough attention has been focused on the serious crisis that confronts us in Canada in connection with maintaining our universities. I have before me the November 17, 1956, issue of the Financial Post, and in it I find an interesting report on the conference held in Ottawa last November. The Prime Minister made a reference to it, and I would like to comment on the dispatch written by J. B. McGeachy, the associate editor. I realize that the hon. member for Lethbridge has accused Mr. McGeachy of using the facilities of the C.B.C. to put across communist propaganda, but I do not think there is anything in this article with which the hon. member would seriously quarrel.

Mr. Blackmore: Perhaps he is mending his ways a little.

Mr. Nicholson: I do not think the hon. member for Lethbridge will quarrel with the claim of Mr. McGeachy contained in the first paragraph of the report:

> Canadian universities are starved for funds, supported in too niggardly a fashion by both governments and private givers. Their staffs are overworked and underpaid. Their buildings and equipment are inadequate or soon will be. They have too few students who qualify intellectually and too many who don't.

Mr. McGeachy goes on to present some disturbing statistics. He estimates that 25 out of every 100 pupils in Canadian schools are mentally capable of deriving benefit from higher education, but points out that only 7 out of every 100 actually reach university. He explains this is a figure well below the United States average and still further below the Soviet level.

> Of the seven only five belong to the abler 25 per cent minority.
> In other words, two of the seven (or about 30 per cent of enrolment in the freshman year) come from the 75 per cent majority who would be classified as not suitable candidates for university degrees.

I suggest that this is a very serious Canadian problem, when we only have 5 of the 25 students in Canadian schools who have the mental qualifications permitted to proceed to university, while the other 20 are denied that right.

Mr. McGeachy says that everyone will accept, that it is not necessary, even desirable, that all the brightest minds of any era should go to university. He mentioned Henry Ford, Bernard Shaw and Sir Winston Churchill; none of them ever attended university. He suggests probably they would have flunked because of excessive originality. I think there is no good reason why 20 out of 25 students in our schools who might become doctors, dentists or engineers, or take any other courses, should be denied the right to proceed to university.

Mr. McGeachy mentions Dr. MacKenzie, president of the University of British Columbia, who is one of the three university chiefs who tackled the financial problem in addresses, the other two being Principal Cyril James of McGill and Monsignor H. J. Somers of St. Francis Xavier. A good deal of space is devoted to the speeches of these three, but I will not take time to discuss them at the moment. It so happens that in the same issue of the Financial Post there is an article, the fourth in a series on Russia, by the editor, Ronald McEachern, this one dealing with education. I am sure the hon. member for Lethbridge will not suggest that the editor of the Financial Post is a communist or is trying to put across communist propaganda. I think that we should look at what Mr. McEachern says.

> The tallest building in Europe is Moscow's university.
> It isn't only tall. It's an enormous place stretching over a big land area.

He goes on to describe the laboratories, lecture halls, and various places of interest. The article continues:

> Professors are heroes in Soviet society and the head of a university department is paid as much as the head of a big industry or a senior government official. Those are symbolic facts. Because the biggest industry in the Soviet today is education—not just education for children, youths and maidens, but education as a continuing process for adults.
> About one fourth of the whole Soviet nation is studying—studying full-time in schools or engaged in formal part-time educational activity. About 30 million are in primary and secondary schools. About 2 million are in advanced specialist and technical schools. Another 2 million are in universities. And about 50 million adults were last year formally participating in some kind of education through night schools, university extension courses, and so forth.
> For a nation which only 40 years ago was about half completely illiterate, this is quite an achievement.

Then he gives some other figures which are worth looking at. He gives the percentage in the universities in the U.S.S.R., Canada and the United States. In Canada, according to Mr. McEachern, we have 4.9 university students per thousand population; in the United States, 15, and in the U.S.S.R. 19.6. The hon. member for Greenwood asked my leader earlier today about the figures for the United Kingdom. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did not have those figures available, but I contacted our bureau of statistics and found that they had figures for the United Kingdom. Their figures for Canada for 1953-54 were a bit lower than those given by Mr. McEachern. Our bureau gave our percentage in 1953-54 as 4.2, and in the same year the percentage in the United Kingdom as 1.6.

He explained that in the United Kingdom quite a large number of students go to technical schools which are not included in the university statistics but I submit that we should have a look at these figures, 1.6 students per thousand in the United Kingdom and 4.2 or 4.9—we have two different sets of figures—for Canada, 15 for the United States and 19.6 for the U.S.S.R.

The hon. member for Saskatoon and the leader of this party stressed the fact that a much higher percentage of students in the United Kingdom than in Canada receive financial assistance. However, since only 1.6 per cent of your total population get to university, the fact that a larger percentage of those receive financial assistance than is the case in Canada does not get around the fact that a very large number of students in the United Kingdom never get a chance to go to university.

Mr. McEachern in this very interesting article on education in Russia is saying what others have said. Many hon. members heard the speech delivered by Mr. J. S. Duncan, then chairman and president of Massey-Harris-Ferguson Limited, when he spoke to the Canadian Club last year. A most interesting section of his speech was his discussion on education. He told us about his visit to the University of Moscow, and he was quite as extravagant as was Mr. McEachern when he described the central building as being 32 stories high with two other buildings 20 stories high on either side, and about their clearing away of 1100 acres of the slums in Moscow to build their university. He told about the accommodation for 8,000 students in residence and the meeting hall for 5,000.

Mr. Duncan then told us about visiting the Stalin works in Moscow. He joked about the name of the works, saying that he was not sure whether now it might be the Khrushchev works or the Bulganin works. He said that 40,000 men and women worked there, and that 10,000 or one-quarter of them, after working an 8-hour day, came back at 6.30 and studied until 10.30, three nights a week. Both Mr. McEachern and Mr. Duncan stress the fact that every place you went there was a feeling that education was going to be of great help. Mr. McEachern pointed out:

> People of the western world may not like the creed that Soviet students are taught. We may find abhorrent some of the objectives of this giant educational machine.
> But any candid look at the Soviet today demands attention to this phenomenon which is in many respects the most important activity in the U.S.S.R. today.

The getting of higher education is the best hope a Soviet citizen has of achieving an agreeable way of life and winning honour in the eyes of his fellow men.

There is a driving dedication to the idea of education as the most desirable of attainments that has seldom been equalled in any society unless perhaps in Scotland in the mid-19th century.

I think we have to recognize that the Canadian scene has changed a great deal since the act of confederation assigned responsibilities to the federal and provincial governments. At the time of confederation no one anticipated that the airplane, radio and television would change the complexion of our country as they have done, and certain responsibilities were given to the provinces without thinking very far into the future. But I think when we realize now—and these figures have been compiled by the Canadian Bank of Commerce—that out of every tax dollar we pay 12 cents to the municipality, 14 cents to the province and 74 cents to Ottawa it is fairly obvious that the provinces and municipalities are not able to cope with present-day demands in the field of university training.

I think it is also obvious that the Canadian people, when they turn in their tax dollars, seem to agree that the Minister of Finance should be placed in a position where he can have a very large surplus, though municipal and provincial governments have been turned out by electors who felt that the 12 or 14 cents out of each dollar that was made available were not being wisely spent. It seems to me that there is not a great deal of interest in how we spend the 74 cents.

However, I believe the fact that the federal government is spending so much money and providing such attractive returns to people in government service, or to people who are engaged in cost-price contracts for government projects, is having this effect; that our universities are finding it very difficult to retain personnel. It is also very difficult to encourage our students in high schools to proceed to university.

During the recess I visited one of the establishments on the mid-Canada line at Cranberry Portage, and while I was there I met the trustees of the school. This is typical of the problem which is being encountered. The principal was being paid $3,200 a year. If he would give up his job, change his profession and take a job on the construction project, accepting the lowest rate paid, he would get his board and room—and better board and better accommodation than was ever available to him in Cranberry Portage—free, and he would have at least $500 more than he would be getting as a school principal. The work he would have to do would not be more difficult than teaching. It would consist of washing dishes, peeling potatoes and other such tasks, all very necessary for the running of any establishment, but it does not require a university training for a man to be able to learn this type of job quickly.

I know a boy from my constituency who instead of going to university served an apprenticeship as a machinist. After five years he emerged as a very well qualified machinist. I am sure he is a very good worker, but his friends who went to university are aware of the fact that by the time they have finished their studies they have spent a great deal more but he will be earning very considerably more than they; in fact he was able to pay income taxes last year on an income of over $8,000 and in the last calendar year his best return for one month was over $800.

Members may ask what this young man does in order to get that sort of salary. He is working up in the Uranium City area doing a very important service which the Canadian taxpayers are going to settle for in the long run. But if one young Canadian is able to look forward to receiving $8,000 a year without going to a university, it discourages his friends from going into debt for a few years to attend university.

Many people in this country are seriously concerned about this problem. On this point I would refer if I may to an article entitled "Science and Mathematics Teaching in our Secondary Schools" by Mr. Garnet T. Page, general manager and secretary of the chemical institute of Canada. Mr. Page points out in this article that this is a national problem. I am not going to take the time of the house by reading the article, but the author has some suggestions to make as to how the situation may be remedied; what professional technical societies can do, what industry can do, what governments can do. He closes by saying that this involves a question of survival. I think it is plain that if we are going to spend $200 million on the building of a mid-Canada line as part of our defence against communism, we must also take all possible steps to increase the numbers of young students who go on to a university level of education.

Dr. Page has also written an article on education and professional manpower in the Soviet union. It is obvious in the light of the very large number of technically trained people turned out every year in the Soviet union that it is not going to be very long before these people go into the underdeveloped areas of the world to help the people in these areas fight the battle against poverty, disease and ignorance; and I think we should be prepared to make a more generous allowance for the very important objectives outlined in this resolution than has so far been proposed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Greenwood asked two questions in the course of his remarks, the second of which was, what will be the position of the provinces in connection with the construction projects for which funds may be available through the council.

It is not intended that the Canada Council should initiate any building program. It is going to have a fund available, and universities will come to the council and say, "We have a certain project which we want to realize, a project that will further the general objectives of the Canada Council, and we would like to have a grant from this fund". The council will have the responsibility of examining the project which is brought forth, and if they come to the conclusion that it is really a capital expansion project that will further the general objectives of the council they will have the responsibility of deciding whether that is one of the things to which they should contribute 50 per cent of the cost.

But the university authorities will not go to the council unless they are prepared to finance the other 50 per cent of the cost in some other way, either through a grant by the province or through donations or subscriptions from private individuals or out of reserves, if it is possible for universities to accumulate reserves. There is no intention of substituting the council for the governing bodies of the universities in the responsibility for deciding what expansion they should try to make in their capital facilities for the promotion of the studies of the humanities, social sciences or appropriate studies for the progress of artistic development.

I am not sure that I understood exactly what the second question was; I believe it asked for statistical information with regard to the student population in secondary schools and the number who might be expected to go to universities.

I have not that statistical information, because we took it for granted that with the growing population of Canada the estimates that had been made by the university people themselves as to what their problem was going to be were sufficient to make it advisable at least, if not necessary, for the government and parliament to take some serious notice of their warning that a serious situation was developing and required prompt attention.

I will endeavour to get the statistical information from the dominion bureau of statistics though, of course, it is not something with respect to which we feel at great ease in inquiring about too directly. Secondary education is part of the educational system under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, and there are some places where it is resented that any close attention should be paid by the federal authorities to the way in which the provincial authorities are discharging their responsibilities in that field.

There will be opportunities, of course, for many more contributions to the discussion of this important problem when the bill is before the house for second reading and for study in committee, and perhaps now that we have had these general views expressed—

Mr. Fulton: Not a chance.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If the hon. gentleman feels that he would prefer to make a speech on the resolution before seeing the bill we will be quite prepared to listen to it, but I had thought that possibly members would like to have the bill at the earliest possible moment so their discussion would be adapted to the exact proposals the bill will contain, and so they might not feel that they would have to repeat themselves at the later stage when they will have the bill in their possession.

Mr. Fulton: The Prime Minister's speech on the resolution was so informative as to the position of the right hon. gentleman that other speeches are called for before we get the bill.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the principles involved, but I believe there is one matter which should be raised at this stage rather than later. First of all may I say that I enjoyed greatly the Prime Minister's discussion of the problem of the encouragement of the arts and sciences in Canada. It was the sort of speech one would expect from a man of his classical training, a type of training which is still prevalent in the province of Quebec and which seems to be lapsing in some other parts of the world.

Like him, I am one who is concerned about the place of the humanities, as they are called for lack of a better word. There is ample support for the application of knowledge to material things and well-being through technological education and that kind of thing, but we must not overlook the need for the growth of the capacity to understand ourselves and society at the same time we achieve greater control and power over material things.

What I want to bring to the Prime Minister's attention is briefly this. The resolution contains three items, and I assume they will all be incorporated and discussed as one bill. That seems to me to raise a problem which is quite difficult. There are three distinct ideas. The first is that of the council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences. I think a council of that kind will commend itself generally. How it might be established and with how much money it might be endowed might be subjects giving rise to very different opinions.

It seems to me that if the bill set up the council and gave it the capacity to act, to receive money from the public funds and to receive private funds, as the Prime Minister has suggested it might have, then you would have done one thing which carries out one idea. But the second paragraph of the resolution then goes on to provide $50 million for purposes not limited to the immediate requirements of a council of that kind but for the encouragement of the arts and sciences, for scholarships and for other purposes. The amount and its purposes seem to me to be a second distinct idea which might very well be dealt with as a question of supply and granting of funds to the council which has been established by law.

Then there is a third string to this well-equipped bow, namely that the council shall establish a fund to be called the university capital grants fund. There another $50 million is appropriated for a quite distinct purpose, and one which might give rise to considerations very different from those raised by the first two parts of the resolution.

I am not expressing opinions at this stage, but it is quite conceivable that one would wish to support some aspect of these three matters and not others, and if the whole bill comes forward as a government measure it seems to me it will be rather difficult for hon. members who hold differing opinions on different aspects of this matter to express them in any intelligent way.

Therefore I ask the Prime Minister to consider when the bill is introduced—I assume it has been prepared already—whether the first item might not constitute the bill, and the question of voting funds be separated from the bill so the judgment of the house can be expressed correctly on these items.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That matter was considered, and I will say at once to the committee that the reason we felt there should be an endowment provided in the same bill is that we want to get the right kind of people to act on this council. We wanted them to have the assurance that it was something serious, and that they were going to have at the very outset an endowment fund that would lead them to believe they were going to have the funds required to carry out this important task in the interests of the Canadian people.

With respect to the third portion, the university grants fund, the bill will provide that they can make these grants for capital purposes in furtherance of the general objectives of the council, and it will be a matter for the consideration of the house as to where and how the universities will be able to carry on the basic work with respect to this intellectual development, to use the term suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood. If, as I believe, there will have to be an expansion of the capital equipment in the form of buildings and other capital equipment to enable the universities to do their part in this intellectual development, then it seems that the council might be the appropriate body to make the allocation of such funds as would be available from the vote of parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised at the Prime Minister suggesting that the only way he can get sufficiently satisfactory members of the council is to give them an endowment of $50 million, the income from which they could then administer.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I did not say that was the only way, but I thought that would be a desirable way to convince them that it was a serious and very useful undertaking in the interests of the people that they were being asked to perform.

Mr. Fulton: I will accept the Prime Minister's modification of his earlier statement that he thought that was the only way in which he could convince them.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The hon. gentleman misunderstood me if he understood me to say that I thought that was the only way. The record will show whether or not I am right in my recollection of what I said.

Mr. Fulton: Will the hon. gentleman say "one way in which to convince them"? Whatever the hon. gentleman said, it seemed to me inherent that somehow or other a large capital fund was necessary in order to persuade the gentlemen he had in mind to serve as trustees or members of this council. That is a proposition with which I am in entire disagreement because I should think, in fact I am quite convinced of it, that if the objectives of the Canada Council as envisaged by the government are worthy ones, Canadians will be found to serve on that council whether the claim of the council for $50 million of capital is by way of annual grant by parliament or some modification as between the two methods. If the objectives are worthy, people can be found to serve upon the council.

But inherent in the proposal in this resolution are a number of issues which have not been dealt with and which I think must be dealt with before this committee is called upon to express its opinion for or against the resolution. With the idea that it is expedient to encourage the arts, humanities and social sciences I am quite certain no one in this house will be in disagreement. But as to the methods by which that encouragement should be provided I think there is room for a measure of disagreement, and particularly as to the methods by which the government proposes to further that encouragement, as embodied in the resolution now before the house.

There are two operative parts of the resolution, namely the one to provide an endowment of $50 million for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and sciences, and the other to provide a capital sum of $50 million for contribution to the capital costs of universities. It is with the second branch of the proposal that I should like to deal first. I do not suppose that anyone in this house would disagree—in fact I am quite certain of it—with the statement that our universities in Canada are faced with increasing difficulty with respect to providing the capital plant and equipment with which to carry on their job of higher education. To that extent no one can be opposed to measures which will contribute to the solution of that problem for our universities. But by the same token no one can deny the fact that this is but one aspect of the whole educational problem in Canada.

I would imagine the Prime Minister would agree with me when I say that one of the reasons this measure is presented to the house at this time is that it is generally agreed that over the next 11 years—I think that is the figure by common agreement—the population of Canadian universities is expected to increase by some 100 per cent. That situation is going to present an enormous problem to our universities in terms of physical plant and equipment just to accommodate, house and provide the facilities for teaching that increased university population, not only with respect to the arts, letters and sciences, but with respect to the engineering faculties particularly, including the provision of laboratories and so on. To that extent it is undeniable that some such measure as this to provide funds for the universities to meet the demands made upon them is essential.

We surely cannot lose sight of the fact that this is but one aspect of the general educational problem today. If, Mr. Chairman, as is the case, the population of our universities is going to increase to such an extent as to make this demand, that increase is but the result of the fact that our primary school population is going to increase by a number far and away beyond that increase in university population. I should think it would probably increase by something like 400 per cent to 500 per cent. We therefore must face the fact that this measure to provide $50 million for the provision of capital plant and equipment for universities does not go anywhere in dealing with the far more fundamental problem of how we are going to enable the provinces and municipalities to meet the increased costs which are going to be presented to them by the increase in the school population.

One is therefore left with this question. Why does this government single out one aspect, and one aspect only, of the educational problem in Canada today, namely the university problem, for a partial measure of remedy, and to that extent increase the problem of the provinces and the municipalities in dealing with their responsibility of providing the plant and facilities for primary education? If it is right that the federal government should make grants to university education, why is it not right that the federal government should offer some measure of assistance to the provinces and the municipalities in providing for their much greater and more pressing demand, namely the provision of plant and facilities in the field of primary education?

On that subject the right hon. gentleman is entirely silent. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that he is silent because he realizes that you cannot divorce one aspect of the field of education from the other. This whole situation is inescapably and irretrievably bound up in the question of fiscal relations between the dominion and the province. Because this government refuses to face that larger problem the Prime Minister is silent as to the question which I have just voiced.

It now being five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, this might be an opportune time to adjourn this discussion.

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report progress and request leave to sit later this day or next sitting, as the case may be?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF ANNUAL VACATIONS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to provide for annual vacations with pay for employees.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it would seem that today parliament is facing the fact that there is more to life than its material aspects. Some hon. members might feel that we are making a sharp turn in switching from a discussion of cultural matters to a bill having to do with an aspect of industrial relations. However, I suggest that the matters are not unrelated. We have been dealing with the fact that it is desirable that a portion of the wealth we produce might be dedicated to the arts, humanities and social sciences. We now turn to legislation which seeks to lay down the principle that those who toil are entitled to time off for rest and recreation.

Bill No. 2, which is now before this House of Commons, is a bill which seeks to provide all workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction with a minimum of two weeks' vacation with pay after one year's employment. There are other details covered in the bill which I shall come to in the course of my remarks, but that is the general principle contained in this bill: two weeks' annual vacation with pay to all employees under federal labour jurisdiction after one year of employment.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, Bill No. 2, is very similar to Bill No. 211 of last year, even as Bill No. 3, the next one on the order paper having to do with statutory holidays with pay, is similar to Bill No. 441 of last year. Indeed, the only difference between Bill No. 2, which is now before us, and Bill No. 211 of last year is a change in the title and the consequent change with regard to one word that appears throughout the bill.

Last year I gave to Bill No. 211 the title, "Canada Annual Holidays With Pay Act". I propose to change that title now so it will read, "Canada Annual Vacations With Pay Act". The reason for that change, Mr. Speaker, is to avoid any confusion between annual vacations with pay and statutory holidays with pay. These terms appear in collective agreements and in various items of legislation across the country, and in some instances confusion does arise when the word "holiday" is used both with respect to the annual week or two that a person gets off and with respect to statutory holidays such as New Years' day, Good Friday, Christmas, and so on. Therefore I suggest that we could avoid this confusion by using the term "annual vacations" to cover the provisions set out in this bill and by using the term "statutory holidays" to cover the holidays with pay referred to in Bill No. 3.

Since I have changed the wording of the title, using "vacations" instead of "holidays", I have made a corresponding change wherever the word "holidays" appeared in Bill No. 211 of last year. The only other change, of course, is the change of the effective date. Bill No. 211 did not get passed last year, so one has to change the date in this bill to make it come into effect this year. I make these comments in case anyone has compared this bill with the bill of last year. There are no changes of substance; indeed, there are no changes other than the ones to which I have referred.

I believe hon. members generally will agree with the proposition I made last year when I submitted this bill to the house, that it is becoming pretty generally recognized that the working people of this country are entitled to a decent annual vacation, and that they are entitled to have that vacation with their regular remuneration so they can enjoy it.

It is not many years since large numbers of our workers went through the whole of their lives without enjoying vacations with pay, but it is a matter of gratitude that we have moved from that situation considerably. Now, in collective agreements and by virtue of the legislation in a number of the provinces, a very large number of our people do get annual vacations with pay. However, there are still many who do not get such vacations, and there are many who do not get an annual vacation of the length which is specified in this bill, namely at least two weeks every year. Since it has been established in the minds of our people that it is a good thing, that it is right for our people to have annual vacations with pay, we feel very strongly that this should be made a matter of legislation in so far as this parliament has legislative authority.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that for many years the trade union movement has been struggling to win this point, namely the right of workers to annual vacations with pay. The trade union movement carries on that struggle, as it has done for many years, on two fronts. On the one hand it seeks collective agreements which include proper and adequate vacation provisions, but in addition it is seeking for vacations with pay as a matter of legislation. The trade union movement has for years sought legislation on this point.

The trade unions of this country, along with those of us in this house who press for this kind of legislation, recognize that labour matters in Canada come under two jurisdictions. There are over five million workers in Canada, the greater number of whom are covered by provincial labour jurisdiction. Only about 400,000—but it is a substantial number—are under federal labour jurisdiction. It is with respect to these 400,000 under federal labour jurisdiction that this legislation deals. However, Mr. Speaker, in addition to providing coverage for those who come under federal labour jurisdiction, legislation of this kind does lay down a principle, does give a lead to the provinces that we hope will hasten the day when it will be a matter of universal practice that all our Canadian people are provided with adequate vacations with adequate pay so they might enjoy the advantages of such vacations.

I made reference to the fact that there is some legislation in this field in a number of the provinces. I gave a general summary of the provincial picture last year. So far as I can ascertain there has been no change in legislation since that time, though in the case of one province legislation which had been passed at that time has since come into effect. The result is that at the present time there are six provinces in Canada in which there is general legislation regarding vacations with pay. By "general legislation" I mean legislation that covers most of the workers in the province. In addition to these six, there is one other province that has some kind of legislation in this field. That one other province provides vacations with pay for two groups of workers, namely those in mining and construction.

Perhaps it would be well once again to summarize briefly the position of these seven provinces. The six that have general legislation are British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec. Two of these provinces, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, provide what this bill seeks, namely two weeks' vacation after one year of employment. The other four, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, provide for only one week's vacation after one year's employment.

Last year when I spoke on this matter my friend the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) regretted that I had not paid the appropriate tribute to the province of Ontario for having been the first province, as indeed it was, to introduce vacations with pay legislation. I am glad to pay Ontario that tribute which I neglected to include in my remarks last year; but I am afraid I must at the same time point out that although Ontario was the first to put such legislation on the statute books it has not improved it in any way since that time, and it still provides for only one week's vacation after one year's employment; whereas two other provinces in Canada, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, have gone further and provided for two weeks' vacation with pay after one year's service. I hope Ontario, which had the honour of putting the first legislation of this kind on the statute books, will soon bring that legislation up to date.

I should add that two of the provinces that provide for only one week after one year, namely Alberta and Manitoba, do provide for two weeks' vacation with pay later on. In the case of Alberta two weeks' vacation with pay comes after two years' employment, and in the case of Manitoba it comes after three years' employment. To complete the picture the seventh province, the one that has limited coverage in this field, is the province of New Brunswick, where there is provision for one week's vacation with pay after one year to those engaged in the mining and construction industries.

That summary of the picture in the provinces indicates that in seven out of ten provinces—and this brings to mind a formula which the Minister of National Health and Welfare will recognize—some provision for vacation with pay is made, and those seven certainly represent not only a substantial majority of the provinces but a substantial majority of the population of Canada. In that regard I might point out that the provinces have moved pretty far in the direction of making it a matter of law that workers are to have adequate vacations with pay, but I would also point out that this bill which I presented last year and which I present again this year matches the best of the provisions in any of the provincial legislation, in that it provides for two weeks' vacation with pay after one year.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that in this respect my bill is exactly in line with the proposals made for a number of years by the labour movement in this country, proposals carried forward by the new Canadian Labour Congress when it was organized as a result of the merger last year. That request for federal legislation providing for two weeks' vacation with pay after one year's employment is one of the requests the Canadian Labour Congress makes to the government and the parliament of this country.

This bill has in it a provision which makes it clear that it supersedes any collective agreement or arrangement of any kind that provides for less than two weeks' vacation with pay after one year. It also has a provision that it does not interfere with any arrangement that is better than that provided in this bill.

Once again I would point out that although I have tried to do the responsible thing and present a bill which has worked out full details, including arrangements for the administration of a provision such as this, I hope hon. members of the house will recognize that on second reading we are debating the principle of this measure, and that we will not divide over some of the details of the administration. If the bill receives approval on second reading, which I hope it will, it will be my purpose to move its reference to the committee on industrial relations, where details of administration and arrangements for carrying out the principle might be considered and even altered or amended; but I would hope that on second reading the house would be prepared in this year 1957 to go along with the basic principle that the working people in this country are entitled after one year's employment to two weeks' vacation with pay.

One of the arguments that is sometimes put up against legislation of this kind is that it should be left to collective bargaining. Mr. Speaker, that is an argument that can be found on the pages of Hansard across the years. Whenever the government is dragging its feet; whenever the government is moving slowly in the labour field with respect to any particular matter, it says, "Leave this to collective bargaining". But the day comes when the government recognizes that the things that have been won by collective bargaining have to be established and held by legislative pegs. The day comes when the government recognizes that the unorganized deserve protection as well, and in that day the government actually supports measures which in years or decades gone by it said should be left to collective bargaining.

The labour movement is clear on this matter; it knows you have to fight for these things on both fronts. So the labour movement of this country does its best to win these things at the collective bargaining table, and the labour movement also seeks to protect these things by getting legislation both at the provincial level and here at the federal level. I hope this year, now that the Canadian Labour Congress is nearly a year old and is well established as a part of the life of this country, and now that hon. members have had more time to think over the principle involved in this legislation, in view of the fact that it was presented last year, it will receive the support of the house as a whole.

One of the arguments put up last year by the Minister of Labour in discussing this bill was to the effect that a very large percentage of workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction already have two weeks' vacation with pay, and therefore this legislation would not affect very many people. In support of that proposition the minister gave us certain tables which were placed on the pages of Hansard, but of course tables and figures always bear looking into. As a matter of fact the tables the minister gave in support of the contention he made in my view actually support our contention that legislation in this field is needed in order to extend the benefit of two weeks' vacation with pay to a large number of employees under federal labour jurisdiction who do not now have this protection.

While it is true, according to the tables, that a very large percentage of the employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction do receive annual holidays with pay, in most cases they have to wait for a longer time than is set out in this bill. Actually only 46.7 per cent of the employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction now enjoy two weeks' holidays with pay after one year's employment. That means that this bill if it is adopted will extend this privilege of two weeks' vacation with pay after one year to something over 50 per cent of those covered by federal labour jurisdiction.

Even that figure of 46.7 per cent is somewhat misleading, because it is an over-all figure, and in the categories included in arriving at that percentage are three groups who might be referred to as preferred groups, namely those employed in air transport, in banks and in certain government enterprises. According to the tables presented by the minister last year these three groups all have two weeks' vacation with pay after one year to the extent of 100 per cent. Therefore if you remove those three preferred categories and look at the rest of the employees covered in the table given by the minister last year you will find with respect to the rest that only 35 per cent now enjoy two weeks' vacation with pay after one year's employment.

Therefore the bill is something more than an academic exercise, something more than the simple laying down of the principle of vacations with pay, important though that may be. It is a bill which would actually extend the privilege of two weeks' vacation with pay after one year of employment to a large number of employees.

Because this bill represents the best that now obtains in many provinces of this country; because it implements the request made to the government and to parliament by the Canadian Labour Congress, and because I believe it is in keeping with the thinking of the Canadian people today that with our wealth and our capacity for production our workers should have time off for rest and recreation, I urge that this house support Bill No. 2, calling as it does for a minimum of two weeks' annual vacation with pay after one year's employment for all workers under federal labour jurisdiction.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in anticipation of this particular bill coming up at this time it was pointed out that the Minister of Labour was absent on public business, and has been so absent for the past few days. I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat what he said at this particular juncture of the discussion of the bill a year ago, as I think the hon. member who has introduced the bill has fairly well given most of the facts in connection with the matter under discussion. I would not want to try to reinterpret the figures he mentioned, though I think he rather minimized the number of persons who do have benefits similar to those proposed in the bill.

Mrs. Fairclough: He used the minister's own figures.

Mr. Harris: Excuse me if I may go on. While it is quite true that approximately 47 per cent of the workers of Canada are presently enjoying benefits such as would be conferred by the bill as presented, the fact of the matter is that another 46 per cent do enjoy similar benefits after a longer period of service with the company for which they are working, up to I think three years' employment instead of one.

As I say, I do not wish to engage in any dispute about the facts. However, I would not think the house would like to go forward with the discussion without the Minister of Labour being in position to say something. I am quite aware of the fact that he deliberately put a great many tables on the record last year in order to aid discussion of the principle of the bill. In concluding his remarks at that time he gave certain reasons why he could not approve of the bill. I would like to suggest to the house that we proceed to another item of business, having in mind the fact that almost eight months or perhaps ten months have gone by since that discussion and it may well be that the Minister of Labour would like to add something to the remarks he made at that time.

It is not intended to suggest that he told me that he intended to do so, but I have reason to believe that he keeps these things in mind at all times and, as I say, might very well wish to add to the discussion of the bill. Therefore, unless there is any objection, I would hope we could allow this matter to stand for the moment by a motion to adjourn the debate.

[Mr. Knowles.]

On motion of Mr. Harris the debate was adjourned.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF STATUTORY HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to provide for pay for statutory holidays for employees and for pay for work performed on statutory holidays.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 3 is a companion bill to the one we were discussing just a moment ago, and even as I offered no objection to the course suggested by the Minister of Finance with respect to Bill No. 2, I would have no objection if he asked the house to do the same with respect to this bill if discussion is not concluded before this hour expires. I was aware, of course, of the absence of the Minister of Labour on public business, but it did seem to me that it would be a good idea to have the propositions contained in both these bills laid before the house early in the session so thought might be given to them, in the hope that the bills might be approved before this session ends.

I have already made some remarks in connection with the previous bill which relate to this one. Even as the other bill provided that all workers under federal labour jurisdiction should have at least two weeks' annual vacation with pay, so this bill provides that all workers in Canada who come under federal jurisdiction should have at least eight statutory holidays with pay a year.

The eight statutory holidays set out in the bill are those one would expect to be there, as they are holidays which are common to all the provinces of Canada. As set out in one of the clauses of the bill they are: New Year's day, Good Friday, Victoria day, July 1, Labour day, Thanksgiving day, Remembrance day and Christmas day. The bill provides that all employees under federal labour jurisdiction shall be given these eight days off work with their full or regular pay for that day. It provides also that if any employee is required to work on any of these eight days he is to receive his regular pay for that day, which he would get if he were not working, plus double time for working on that day.

This bill, like Bill No. 2, has in it a clause which makes it clear that it supersedes any provision in any agreement or arrangement that is less favourable to the employee than the provisions of the bill, but that it does not affect any provision or arrangement which is better than what is set out in this bill.

There are various other details in the bill, but I hardly think I need to go into them now except to point out that in this bill, as in the other one, I have tried to present to the House of Commons not just a resolution or an expression of principle but the fact that this kind of arrangement can be worked out in precise detail. The bill is fully drawn, and by accepting it parliament will make this principle of statutory holidays with pay along with annual vacations with pay the law of this country.

The provision of annual vacations with pay and the provision of statutory holidays with pay are both reasonably new. There are still in our midst many people who have known in years gone by what it was not to get statutory holidays with pay. Today there are many who do not get those holidays with pay, or if they do the benefits are much less than we feel they should be.

Again I would point out that what is sought in this bill is in line with the request made to the federal government and to this parliament by the Canadian Labour Congress, and I hope serious consideration will be given to what this bill seeks.

Actually for some time the idea of statutory holidays with pay has been established for those who are known as salaried employees, those who are paid by the month, and we feel that this principle should be extended to all workers in this country. With respect to this phase of labour policy I may point out that the provinces are not as advanced as they are in the matter of annual vacations with pay. As a matter of fact there are very few provinces which make adequate provision, or even very specific provision, for statutory holidays with pay. In most instances it is simply a matter of some incidental provision tucked away in a minimum wage act or legislation of that kind.

Nevertheless, if one does ferret out sections of various provincial statutes that bear on these matters one discovers that there is some statutory holiday provision on the statute books of six provinces, namely British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. In some of these provinces the legislation merely states that certain days shall be recognized as statutory or public holidays. I regret to say that in the provinces which go only that far no provision is made for the payment of overtime rates to employees who may have to work on those days, nor is there any provision that they should receive pay if they do not work.

There are some provinces which go beyond this first step of declaring that certain days shall be holidays, and which provide what the rate of pay shall be for an employee who is required to work on a public or statutory holiday. That rate of pay varies from straight time to time and a half in the provinces which legislate on that point. There is only one province which takes the third step of providing that, on these holidays, in addition to the prescribed rate of pay for those who must work, those who are not required to work on these statutory holidays should also get paid their regular wages. The one province which goes all the way in this matter is the province of Saskatchewan, where eight statutory holidays are set out; and in that province workers must receive their pay in respect of these holidays even if they are not required to work. If they do work they are to receive, according to the legislation of that province, a rate of pay at a premium of time and a half in addition to their regular pay for that day.

However, surveying the picture again and using statistics which one obtains from the efficient statisticians in the Department of Labour, I discovered that those people who do get paid for statutory holidays, not so much by reason of legislation as by reason of collective ageeements, do fare much better in terms of rates of pay than would seem to be indicated by such legislation as we now have. One set of tables which I obtained from the Department of Labour indicates that of those people who get paid for statutory holidays—and in these instances one is thinking of all employees across Canada, not just of employees under federal jurisdiction—32.9 per cent receive premium rates of double time. In addition to that, 39.1 per cent receive premium rates of more than double time. That seems to me to add up to about 72 per cent of those who receive pay for working on statutory holidays whose premium rate amounts to double time or better.

I do not want these figures to be misleading. I cannot seem to find any figures which indicate the percentage of our workers who get paid in respect of statutory holidays. All I can find is this set of figures which indicates that of those who do get paid a very large percentage are paid a premium rate of double time or better. In most instances that is because of provisions in collective agreements, but at any rate the principle that there should be statutory holidays with pay is becoming fairly well recognized and in addition, I suggest, the principle is becoming recognized that those who are required to work on a statutory holiday should get a substantial premium rate. Hence my bill proposes that the premium rate should be double time in addition to regular pay for that day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am free to admit that in recommending this piece of legislation I must use a slightly different argument from the one I used in respect of my earlier proposal. In the case of annual vacations with pay I suggested that the provinces have moved along a bit—seven of them have some kind of legislation on that subject—and that it was time the federal government got into the picture and established federal legislation in that field. In this instance the provinces have not moved very far yet. The trade union movement has made progress in seeking to get this question of statutory holidays incorporated into collective agreements, and I think here is an instance where the federal government could give a lead to the provinces.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I return to the remarks I made when I began at five o'clock. This is a very interesting day in the House of Commons. We have been thinking all day in terms of life as being more than meat. We have been thinking of the fact that men live not by bread alone. We have been facing the fact that a proportion of our wealth should be used to encourage the creative capacities of our people. We have been thinking in terms of a portion of our wealth being used to encourage the arts, humanities and social sciences for the benefit of mankind. I suggest it is not inappropriate that on the same day we have been discussing these matters there should be before the House of Commons these two bills which seek to establish the principle that those who engage in toil and undergo the drudgery of manual work in this country are entitled to time off, entitled to recreation, and entitled to receive pay in respect of the time they are off work whether on annual vacation or statutory holidays.

I have no objection to the Minister of Finance proposing that our handling of this bill should follow the same course he suggested with regard to the other, but I hope that as a result of the study of these two bills by the Minister of Labour and the House of Commons, both pieces of legislation will appear on the statute books before this session ends so that our workers under federal jurisdiction will have as their right eight statutory holidays each year, with appropriate pay in respect of those holidays, and likewise two weeks' vacation with pay each year.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, needless to say I support the arguments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do believe it would be unfair at this time either to talk the bills out or to force a decision on them in the absence of the Minister of Labour. I believe they are too important, and after the minister gets a chance to look at them it might not be a bad idea for the industrial relations committee to be set up to examine them and get the opinions of organized labour on the desirability of such legislation. I think the matter is too important to rush it in any way, and we should take our time and make a careful examination. I believe the Minister of Finance would be well advised to take the same course with this bill as he did with the last one.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to both hon. gentlemen for the suggestion that the matter might go over. I am fortified in asking that this might be done by reading what the Minister of Labour said at the conclusion of his remarks on a similar bill a year ago. I think I can quote his remarks without offending him in any way. He said as found at page 6264 of Hansard of July 20, 1956:

> . . . I can tell my hon. friend that my department will continue to study that matter.

That is, the principle of the bill.

> The possible need for legislation such as the bill presents will be looked into. I welcome the fact that the hon. member has brought the matter before the house at the present time—

Then he went on to say why at that time he could not support the bill. I take this to mean that the Minister of Labour intended to make and has since made a study of not only the principle but the details of the bill which was similar to the one now before us.

I should like, however, to comment on just a few points made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think he has been very modest and moderate in what he has said, but it should not be thought that there are not statutory holidays with pay at the present time. Nor should the impression be taken from what he said that this government—and I must say he did not press this point—has not been most careful about labour legislation in Canada.

I am not going to speak of our past record in the labour field but he knows, as every other hon. member does, that our record has been such that we have commanded support from labour people over a great many years, much more than in the case of any other party. However, the bill does present, as the former one did, a conclusion to a certain class of collective bargaining, if you will, so that if passed it would move into a certain area of advantage all those persons who for one reason or another do not now enjoy this benefit, whether by choice, whether by inability to negotiate for it or perhaps for reasons of preference for other benefits on their own part. I am not sure what it might be.

I am quite satisfied from reading what the Minister of Labour said that he had at that time and I know has since given careful consideration to the principle involved in the bill. I know in this case, which I did not in the former, that he does intend to make some remarks on this subject at a fairly early time. Therefore under these conditions I gratefully accept the suggestion made and move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Harris the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The business under public bills having been exhausted, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

CANADA COUNCIL

PROVISION FOR ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE ARTS, HUMANITIES AND SOCIAL SCIENCES

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East)—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences and further to provide inter alia that

(a) the Minister of Finance may, out of the consolidated revenue fund, pay to the Council the sum of fifty million dollars to constitute an endowment fund for the purposes of the act, and

(b) the council shall establish a fund to be called the university capital grants fund, to which shall be credited the sum of fifty million dollars, to be paid to the council by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock I was about to make a small contribution to this discussion. I realize there is not too much we can do in a concrete way with respect to this subject at the resolution stage. However, while there seemed to be general agreement during the course of the discussion this afternoon on the desirability of establishing a Canada Council, there was some doubt whether this was the suitable time for the establishment of such a council. As I recall, several hon. members raised that particular point.

During recent years I have been quite interested in the activities of several voluntary groups that have been operating in the field of the promotion of research and interest in the arts, humanities and social sciences. Only the other day the annual reports of the humanities research council and the social science research council came into my hands. I was very interested to find in these reports that the secretary treasurer, who in each case is Dr. John Robbins, emphasized the fact that during the past two years it had become increasingly difficult to provide sufficient funds to meet the research scholarship program that has been carried on for a considerable number of years now by both these bodies.

In 1951 the Massey report was brought down in the house, and it made no bones about recommending the desirability and necessity of the establishment of a Canada Council to encourage interest in the arts, humanities and sciences. That same report also emphasized the fact that one of the purposes of such a council—this was not the only recommendation in this respect—would be to encourage the development of a national culture.

Up until that time the funds for the activities carried on by the two organizations to which I have referred had largely been obtained from United States sources, in one case the Rockefeller grants and in the other case the Carnegie fellowships. During 16 years of operation the social science research council, for example, had received some $600,000 in grants from the Rockefeller foundation. By contrast, contributions from private Canadian foundations during that period of 16 years only totalled $30,000.

Two years ago the two bodies reached a crisis because the authorities managing the Rockefeller foundation indicated that they were no longer willing to support this activity in Canada.

That introduced a real crisis into the activities of voluntary groups. It was only after considerable extra trouble that they were able to persuade these United States sources of funds to carry on with their work, and then only on the guarantee that an equivalent amount would be subscribed from Canadian sources.

In reference to the humanities council, I believe it was Mr. Walter Gordon, who was active at the time and still is in compiling economic data concerning the future prospects of Canada, who was prevailed upon to undertake the solicitation of such funds from private sources. I merely mention these details. I am sorry that I have not the reports before me at the moment; I could have quoted directly from them. But what I have said gives a general summary of the situation. I mention these details to point out that there is a real urgency at the present time, at least with regard with these two important fields of activity, that some additional financial sustenance be obtained with which to carry on this important work.

Canada Council

This is not the first time the Canadian government has encouraged research or has participated in the promotion of what we call culture in this country. Admittedly the participation in that respect has been much less than has been the participation in the promotion of the activities of the national research council. Recognizing the need for stimulation of scientific research during world war I, the government of Canada established the national research council. That was a body which was largely devoted to research in the arts of war. In this day and age after two tragic world wars, when we are much more concerned about promoting the pursuits and the arts of peace, I think it is high time that we did something in this tangible form represented by the establishment of the Canada Council.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I want to raise one or two questions. I think the committee stage is the time to raise them. Whenever government assumes responsibility in activities of this kind there is always reason to be somewhat suspicious and to have certain reservations. Of course the only guarantee that public corruption will be avoided is some assurance that parliament will be able to maintain eternal vigilance over the activity of this body. When we have the bill before us, Mr. Chairman, I trust we shall find that it indicates that parliament is going to have some continuing control over the functions of the Canada Council.

In presenting this legislation to the committee today the Prime Minister made vague references to the personnel who will be making up the council, and he stressed the point that political partisanship would be avoided in the selection of the people who make up the council. With that point I heartily agree. I am just wondering how the appointments are going to be made. Will they be made by the governor in council, by order in council, or will they be made in consultation with the voluntary groups which are already operating in this important field of Canadian activity?

This afternoon the suggestion was put forward that this is going to mark a new era in the development of the arts, humanities, letters and social sciences. I think that is going a bit too far. Actually we have already come a long way in what we might call the cultural field. There are any number of voluntary groups which are operating in this area. They have established strong committees of their own. I imagine that the money that is provided through the grant that will come from parliament or from this house will be administered largely through the voluntary committees already operating in the field.

It also seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that these groups should be in an excellent position to make recommendations concerning the people best qualified to serve Canada as members of the Canada Council. I have in mind one excellent representative from this area of activity. I have already mentioned his name. I refer to Dr. John Robbins, who for the past few years has been engaged in the important work of compiling or revising the Encyclopaedia Canadiana.

Here is a man who has been intimately associated with the whole field of the arts, letters, humanities and sciences in Canada. I understand that his work is coming to a conclusion very shortly. I feel that he would make an ideal chairman for this particular body. He is from the keystone province of Canada. Being a Manitoban, he is representative of all influences in the Canadian body politic, and I am sure is eminently qualified in all respects.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall continue with the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

INDIAN AFFAIRS—FEDERAL PAYMENTS, SARNIA, ONT.

Question No. 6—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

What amount, if any, was paid by the federal government to the city of Sarnia for work or services of any kind in connection with the Sarnia Indian reserve for the year 1956?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

	Questions
Water supplied to council house, etc.	$ 113.37
Fire calls	375.00
Sarnia board of education (tuition)	1,862.22
Sarnia separate school board (tuition)	280.00
	$2,630.59

VANCOUVER, B.C.—COST OF TUNNEL

Question No. 31—Mr. Hahn:

1. What is the estimated cost of the tunnel from the federal building under construction in Vancouver to the Canadian Pacific Railway station in that city?
2. How is the cost being shared?
3. What purpose is the tunnel to serve?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

1. Amount of contract $1,140,000.

2. Total cost is being borne by the Department of Public Works.

3. To provide underground transportation for mail between the Canadian Pacific Railway station and the new federal building.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 21, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSING

N.H.A. LOANS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform hon. members of the decision to increase the maximum interest rate on insured loans under part I of the National Housing Act from 5½ per cent to 6 per cent. A similar increase of one-half of 1 per cent will take place with respect to the rates applicable to other types of loans under the act.

The statute authorizes the governor in council to fix the maximum rate of interest that may be charged for various types of loans. In respect of insured mortgage loans, the interest rate cannot exceed the yield on long-term government securities, plus 2¼ per cent as of the time the rate is fixed.

The National Housing Act maximum rate was increased from 5¼ per cent to 5½ per cent in March last year. During 1956, and particularly in the later months, the large capital investment program has increased the competition for investable funds and general interest rates have risen. In face of this exceedingly great demand for funds, the flow of mortgage moneys to housing particularly under the National Housing Act has diminished in the last quarter of 1956 and the rate of house building has reflected this. The program for the year 1956 was nevertheless impressive. There was a new record of 135,000 completions. More than 125,000 homes were started and there were 70,000 houses under construction on January 1, 1957.

The present increase in the National Housing Act interest rate is designed to place would-be borrowers under the act in a better position to compete for a fair share of available mortgage funds in the year ahead.

The new rates will have application to all undertakings to insure that will be issued by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on and after tomorrow, January 22, 1957.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What effect does the minister expect from the announcement he has just made with regard to the construction of houses in Canada this year? What number of starts and what number of completions does the department expect this year?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, it is a little early in the year to give a specific forecast but I do anticipate that funds will be encouraged to enter the field of housing which were not being made available for borrowers, particularly under the National Housing Act. I anticipate that banks and other lending institutions will now be encouraged to make more loans under that act.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. Has the minister's department not made an estimate of the number of starts and completions in the housing field which will take place this year?

Mr. Winters: We try to ensure that there will be a high level of house building activity. That is part of government policy and this step is designed to ensure that there will be a high level of house building activity through 1957.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. Are we entitled to assume, in view of the increase of almost 10 per cent in mortgage interest rates, that this is the government method of helping low income groups to own their own homes?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, it is an attempt on the part of the government to make it easier for people of modest income to acquire cheaper money than is available to them in the conventional lending markets and, moreover, to acquire houses with lower down payments.

IMMIGRATION

C. G. HANNA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON APPEAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he has any further report to give the house regarding the appeal of Christian G. Hanna to become domiciled in this country?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the appeal has yet been dealt with, and I cannot give a statement today.

[Later:]

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Does he not consider that in this case humanitarian considerations should have priority over departmental adherence to the letter of the law being stubbornly upheld? This is the type of question in which I submit the minister might well give consideration to those humanitarian things that affect mankind. I should like to suggest further that in view of the United Nations having taken this matter under advisement—according to the press of today which reports an interview with Dr. Humphrey—and regardless of any decision that is made, this man should not be moved out of Canada until the United Nations has had an opportunity to consider the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I had always understood that the hon. gentlemen objected to government by order in council. We are carrying out the law made by this parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has power under the act to do by order in council that which is sought. When the minister talks about adhering to the law of the land, let me tell him that two courts have decided in other cases that he has not done that.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has no power; the power resides in the governor in council. The hon. gentleman knows that as well as anyone else.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is not that an order in council?

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Does not the minister have the power or the right—he has exercised it on other occasions—to submit to the governor in council an order for their consideration and approval?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, sir. I quite frequently do that when I consider there is real merit in a case.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister mean that he has decided there is no merit in this case?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that an appeal is before the department and to the best of my knowledge it has not been decided. I think it would be quite improper for me to say anything more until a decision has been rendered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are prejudging the case.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister indicate when the appeal is likely to be heard?

Mr. Pickersgill: I presume today.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—SITUATION ON HOBBEMA RESERVE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the minister please explain to the house why over 100 persons who have lived all their lives on the Hobbema Indian reserve south of Edmonton have now been notified that they must leave that reservation? If they must leave, what is being done to ensure that these unfortunate families will have homes to live in and incomes to sustain them in the future? Is the minister prepared to recommend to parliament an amendment to the Indian Act to prevent such expulsions in the future?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that there has been an extraordinary amount of interest in this case, particularly in Alberta, and I hope hon. members will bear with me if I give a somewhat lengthy explanation of the circumstances surrounding it.

It will be recalled that at the time the Indian Act was amended in 1951 this parliament saw fit to make provision for the establishment of band lists and for a procedure which would settle once and for all who were Indians and therefore entitled to live on the reserves which had been set aside for Indians. There were a number of long standing disputes as to the status of individuals who had been living on Indian reserves.

I believe that this case in the Samson band at Hobbema is the last of the outstanding cases to be settled. My information is that 27 protests, as is provided for under the act, were made by Indians living on the reserve who were questioning the right of other persons living on that reserve to remain there on the ground that those persons were not Indians within the meaning of the act. One hundred and seven individuals were involved.

The matter was considered by a commissioner, who made a report. The registrar examined the report and all the other relevant information and came to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that those persons were not Indians within the meaning of the act, and never had been Indians within the meaning of the act, and were therefore not entitled to live on this reserve which was set up exclusively for Indians within the meaning of the act, and which belonged to those Indians, and for whom the minister was acting in trust.

Now, there is a provision in the act for an appeal to the courts against the decision of the registrar. I have found it somewhat difficult to understand why this appeal was not entered immediately the decision of the registrar was made known because, if it had been, the department would have continued to treat these people as Indians until such time at least as the appeal had been disposed of. Because an appeal was not entered we had no choice but to assume that the decision of the registrar had been accepted.

In fact, the department has not taken any steps to have these people moved from the reserve; it has not denied them relief or anything normally given to Indians. The only thing which has been done has been to withhold the share of any payments of moneys belonging to the band for distribution among members of the band and I think this was the only course we could possibly have taken unless and until the case is brought before the courts.

It does seem to me it would be a very extraordinary procedure for the government to recommend, or for parliament to take, action now while there is a provision in the law for a decision to be made by the courts, or to legislate before an appeal has been taken and a final decision reached. After all, what is involved here is not something which belongs to the government or to the people of Canada generally; it is something that belongs to a particular band of Indians, and for this parliament or for anybody else to say, in an arbitrary manner, that a certain number of people should or should not be considered to belong to that band, when a procedure is already laid down by statute for the purpose of making this determination, would appear to me to be an extraordinary course of action.

It seems to me the only thing we can do is to wait until February 6. If an appeal has not been entered for that date, we can then give consideration to what course it may be desirable to take. I sincerely hope that an appeal will be entered. Unfortunately, that question does not lie within the power of the minister to decide; it is solely a matter for the aggrieved parties to decide for themselves.

The second question asked by the hon. gentleman was whether I could say what would be done for these people should they have to leave the reserve. That seems to be a hypothetical question, and it will certainly remain one at least until the 6th of February and, if an appeal is entered, for some considerable time after that. I do not think it would be proper at this time to try to give a definite answer with regard to a situation that may never arise. As to whether there would require to be some kind of legislation in certain eventualities, I feel the same answer must apply. I should like to repeat, I sincerely hope that an appeal will be entered against the decision of the registrar, that this matter will be determined before a judge, and that the law will be allowed to operate in the manner laid down by parliament.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the minister a supplementary question? In view of the important issues involved in this and possibly—I only say "possibly"—in similar cases, would the department consider providing counsel for the Indians if they should indicate a desire to appeal?

Mr. Pickersgill: In this particular case the Indians have retained a lawyer in Calgary who has made certain representations not only to the minister but to the Prime Minister and, for all I know, to other members of the government as well. I would be very happy to make that correspondence public if anyone would like to see it. I believe that there is no question but that they have counsel and the counsel they chose. I do not think there is any difficulty in that regard at all.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the minister comment on week-end news reports to the effect that Ontario is giving consideration to the government's hospital insurance program? Can the minister say whether the current interest is in the proposals as outlined a year ago or whether changes in those plans are being proposed?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asked a somewhat similar question in general terms last Monday. I would direct his attention to my reply of that date. I believe that at this time I can say no more.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

NORTH BATTLEFORD—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is it the intention of his department to proceed with the building of the post office in the city of North Battleford this summer?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, do you wish me to answer a question of that nature now?

Mr. Speaker: I am always put on the spot when a minister asks me if I wish him to answer a question. He has full right to answer whatever he pleases or not to answer at all. Under past practice a question of this type is not put at this time because it is not of an urgent or national character and, in addition, can be asked when the estimates of the Department of Public Works are before the committee of supply.

Mr. Fulton: It might have a bearing on the election date.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Isn't that clever!

EDUCATION

TRAINING FACILITIES FOR SCIENTISTS, ENGINEERS, ETC.—ASSISTANCE TO UNIVERSITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the government intend to assist the universities in providing the greatly enlarged training facilities that will be needed to train the greatly increased numbers of scientists, engineers, doctors and dentists, of which this country is so critically short today, so that we may avoid a continuance of that shortage?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government's intentions so far as they have been crystallized in decisions have already been announced to the house, and that procedure will be followed when other decisions are reached.

Mr. Hees: Was not the government's decision in this regard announced on Friday by the Prime Minister when he announced there would be no assistance given to the universities except to provide extra training facilities for the arts and humanities?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If my hon. friend is of the opinion that he was given on Friday the answer to the question put this morning, I cannot see why he repeats it.

Mr. Hees: In reply to the Prime Minister's answer may I say this. It was my impression that he said that no extra facilities would be provided except for the humanities. I am trying to clear up the question as to the sciences and engineering.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I hope my hon. friend will not lose too much sleep over his wrong impression.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the matter to which the hon. gentleman refers is one which is under consideration in the committee of the whole. When the matter is debated there again he may stand up and speak as often as he wishes for thirty minutes at a time.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—REVALUATION OF BOND PORTFOLIOS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it correct that, by a recent order in council, the Bank of Canada has been ordered to revalue its bond portfolios on an amortized cost basis instead of a market value basis as formerly? If so, will the chartered banks be forced to do the same thing with respect to their portfolios of dominion and provincial bonds?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nesbitt: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question in view of his answer. Can the minister give an opinion as to the effect on Canada's monetary policy?

Mr. Harris: Offhand, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what effect it will have on the monetary policy. I shall be glad to look at it and give an answer on my estimates if we reach that point.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, arising out of his last answer. With respect to monetary policy does the government pass orders in council of which the Minister of Finance does not know the effect? I find it difficult to believe that it does so. Would the minister care to reconsider his last answer and now tell us what the effect is?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, of course we do not take action without being aware of the general implications involved. Perhaps my answer to the hon. member for Oxford might have been a little bit more forthcoming than it was. The effect on monetary policy, if any, was so little that it was not a factor in the decision. If my answer was not that clear, I must apologize for it. But I am quite sure that the effect on the monetary policy was such that, as I say, it was not a factor in the decision which was made for other reasons.

POSSIBLE CONFLICT BETWEEN CREDIT RESTRICTIONS AND HOUSING LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister not consider that there is a conflict between the government policy, announced this morning by the Minister of Public Works, of encouraging the banks to make long-term loans in connection with housing, and the policy of the Bank of Canada to persuade the chartered banks to curtail their term loans?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): The policy of the Bank of Canada with respect to term credit has been, for over a year I think, to restrict the growth of credit at the rate that it was then proceeding. This has been the policy since October, or a little earlier, in 1955. That does not mean that it is a straight curtailment of credit. It is a curtailment of the rate of growth at that time. I think that we have been successful in restraining that growth to the point where credit is still growing though at a more modest rate. Therefore, I do not see any particular conflict.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Is the minister aware that the governor of the Bank of Canada informed the banking and commerce committee a few months ago that he made representations to the chartered banks to curtail a particular form of credit which was long-term credit.

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Does he not consider that the National Housing Act loans come under that category?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I do not have in mind the particular phraseology used by the governor of the Bank of Canada but I agree that although the purpose was to apply credit restrictions to long-term loaning, nevertheless I think that the governor of the Bank of Canada would not want the application of any policy to be such that one could say there was rank discrimination in any particular form of credit granting.

TABLING OF ESTIMATES AND DELIVERY OF BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the reference made a moment ago by the Minister of Finance to his estimates, is he in a position to tell the house when the estimates for the next fiscal year will be tabled? Can he also tell the house when he intends to bring down his budget?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): These are, of course, questions which should not be answered, but I propose to do so by saying that the estimates will be tabled either tomorrow or Wednesday and the budget I hope will be delivered some time before dissolution.

Mr. Knowles: Is that another of those forthcoming answers the minister sometimes makes?

TRANSPORT

ABANDONMENT OF NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILWAY LINE, CORNWALL-OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Albert Lavigne (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has any consideration been given to service for municipalities affected by the abandonment of the New York Central railway line between Cornwall and Ottawa?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question, Mr. Speaker, but I have been unable to ascertain all the facts necessary in order to reply to it. I shall therefore hope to do so tomorrow.

GRAIN

FLAX AND RYE—REQUEST FOR MARKETING UNDER WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government given serious consideration to including the marketing of flax and rye under the complete jurisdiction of the Canadian wheat board in view of the fact that farm organizations continue to press for this being done?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government has given serious consideration to this question. It is obvious that any action by this government would have to be preceded by action in each of the provinces concerned for the same reason that similar concurrent legislation was required in the marketing of oats and barley. Wheat is the only grain that moves to export markets in sufficient volume to give the government complete jurisdiction over its marketing. Whether it would be wise to attempt to take the step suggested by my hon. friend is debatable. There are opinions on both sides. In the light of the information the government has at this time it does not propose to take action now.

SHIPPING

PILOT BOAT ACCIDENT, SAINT JOHN—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the pilot boat disaster in Saint John harbour. A question was asked on Friday as to what consideration had been given by the government to an inquiry. I ask him whether he is now in a position to answer, and in particular whether in view of the circumstances this is not one case in which there ought to be of necessity an open inquiry so that all the matters in issue, and the circumstances, could be fully considered and known and brought to the attention of the public.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I thought that I had made it clear the other day in answer to a question that I thought a public inquiry would be necessary and would be held. Unfortunately I have not received a report from the officer of the department who went to Saint John. I understand that the report now has come to hand and I hope to have its contents later today. However, I am not in a position to say more than I said when the question was asked on Friday.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Shaw.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in many of the Liberal speeches during this session it has been easy to detect an attempt on their part to portray themselves as great admirers of the United Kingdom and of the commonwealth. Obviously the actions of the government during the Suez crisis last fall, in which Canada was one of the leaders in the attack on the United Kingdom and on France, have received criticism from Canadians from coast to coast. It would appear that the government and its supporters are now attempting so hard to escape from the consequences of this earlier stand.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Of course, the leadership in the adoption of such a stand was taken by the Prime Minister of Canada. His attitude is very accurately summed up by an editorial in the Chicago Tribune, that paper which for many years has been the leader in bitter, unfair and malicious attacks on the United Kingdom. I have here a report dated December 6, 1956 in which the Chicago Tribune, concerning the attitude of the Canadian Prime Minister on the Suez crisis, has this to say:

> The Chicago Tribune, commenting on Prime Minister St. Laurent's statement in the House of Commons on the Middle East crisis, says editorially it represents an "encouraging growth of the isolationist spirit in . . . unexpected quarters."

This dispatch goes on to say:

> The Tribune in a November 29 editorial quotes the Prime Minister's remarks that "the era when the supermen of Europe could govern the whold world is coming pretty close to the end."

The editorial concludes with this comment:

> An American official could not have put the case better.

In January of 1957 we have had this great conversion on the other side of the house. There are no more sneers at proposals on this side and no more statements like "ready aye ready" such as were used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in November and at least in talk the government is now showing some concern for the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth.

Mr. Pickersgill: We always did.

Mr. Green: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that it would be far more impressive if the government took some practical steps to turn such talk into deeds. For example, why could not the government bring in a bill right away to waive the interest on the United Kingdom loan? The Prime Minister was asked about this on January 11 as reported at page 120 of Hansard. The question was:

> Could he tell the house if the government has made any undertaking with regard to the proposed waiver of $22 million in interest charges due by the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister in his reply pointed out that under the agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom the United Kingdom was entitled to a waiver of the interest on this loan under three conditions. One was that it was found necessary, having regard to the gold and foreign exchange reserves of the United Kingdom; second, that the international monetary fund certified to certain specified conditions regarding United Kingdom balance of payments statistics; and the third, that any other country which has made a loan with similar conditions is also waiving the interest agreement which of course referred to a loan made about the same time by the United States. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> Early in December of last year the United Kingdom formally requested a waiver of the interest which would be due on the 31st of December, 1956.

He intimated that the question was under consideration by the government but concluded his answer with these words:

> In the meantime the United Kingdom has paid the instalment of principal amounting to $15½ million which was due on December 31 and has, I understand, set aside in an account in the Bank of Canada the amount of interest, this to be held by the Bank of Canada until a decision has been reached whether or not there will be a waiver of interest granted by all those who have similar loans.

Now, the United States have found that there is some defect in the agreement they have with the United Kingdom, as a result of which that government must get further authority from congress before a waiver of interest on the United States loan can be put into effect, and apparently Canada is once again just tagging along behind the United States. There is no reason why Canada could not act independently. The government could bring in a measure to waive the payment of this interest if it saw fit to do so. Probably there is little doubt that eventually the United States will take such action and then the Canadian government will have to act and will waive the interest under the agreement. Why on earth could not a step of this kind be taken right now without waiting for a lead from Washington? Such action would be the sort of thing that would encourage the United Kingdom. It would encourage not only the government but also the people and it would give some hope to the people of Canada that this government is not pursuing its policy of criticism of the United Kingdom.

The Vancouver Province carried an excellent editorial concerning this very question on December 6 and I am going to quote the final paragraphs because they sum up the situation very clearly:

> Twenty-two million extra Canadian dollars in the British treasury would not, by themselves be enough to stave off bankruptcy.
> But if Ottawa were to leave them there, by waiving the interest payment off its own hook, without waiting to see what Washington was going to do, there would be other benefits.
> One would be a boost for British confidence,—and there is psychology involved in every financial crisis as well as economics.
> Another would be to set an example to the United States Congress, which is all too likely, in the present mood of American opinion, to be reluctant to do anything for the British, even when it is in the clear interest of the United States.

The editorial concludes:

> In fact, why shouldn't Ottawa lead instead of follow?

Other actions that the government could take would be to express openly some concern and a degree of understanding with respect to Britain's difficulties in such places as Cyprus and Aden. The Canadian government failed to do that over the seizure of the Suez last summer, taking the position that what happened in the Suez was none of our business. One direct result is that today about one-fifth of the troops actually in that area are Canadians. Canada was very directly concerned last summer but the government refused to acknowledge it.

Then when the British and French moved into the Suez the blow that hurt the most came from Canada. When I refer to a blow I mean the statements made by government leaders and the actions of Canada in the United Nations and the speech made by the Prime Minister in this house at the emergency session. The Canadian people would have acted very differently, Mr. Speaker, and would have at least withheld judgment. The Canadian people were and they are today entitled to have a stand taken by their government on questions like this, just as on other questions, which reflects their beliefs and their aspirations. This government has been in office for so long and is so arrogant that the ministers think they know best what Canadians should believe.

The ministers pursue their own pet ideas. Let me give an example; the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs rushing to side with the Asian members of the commonwealth on the Suez issue. The Canadian people would not have done that, although having the most friendly feelings for these fellow nations of the commonwealth. Had the Canadian people been making the decision at that time they would not have rushed to side with the Asian nations.

Just the other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs again tried to leave the impression that such action had saved the commonwealth. I was rather surprised that he should take that stand again because I think it shows he has a guilty conscience and is trying to justify the actions taken last fall by making the claim that they helped to save the commonwealth. Prime Minister Nehru was here last month and had something to say about the suggestion that the commonwealth was in danger of breaking up. I quote from a dispatch of December 5, 1956 as follows:

The commonwealth, Mr. Nehru emphasized, had suffered a severe shock in the Middle East crisis and has survived it.

"This," he said, "did not lead us to think that the commonwealth association was not good enough or should be broken. I never thought so in spite of the grave differences of opinion."

The prime minister of Ceylon was quoted on December 2, 1956 as having said at the United Nations:

Prime Minister Solomon Bandaranaike of Ceylon, interviewed at the UN, said he thought Mr. Pearson's commons statement was "rather an exaggeration." He said that there is more than mere sentiment linking the commonwealth countries together, as they were linked by a common way of life, the democratic way.

There has never been any doubt as to where Pakistan stands in the commonwealth. I point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), his Secretary of State for External Affairs, and other members of the cabinet that these Asian members of the commonwealth would have far more respect for Canada if Canada had taken a stand such as would have been taken by the Canadian people themselves rather than to try to curry favour with the Asian nations by running along with them. So much for that particular subject.

I should like now to say a word about the speech from the throne, more particularly about what we do not find in that speech. It mentions about ten measures which are to be brought in and apparently they are the only ones the government considers to be of importance at this session; at any rate the only ones the government feels must be dealt with by the house this spring. I think all will agree with me when I say that it is a very light legislative program. In the 21 years I have been here I do not remember any program which was as light as the one we now have before us. It is evident that the government is coasting instead of endeavouring to deal with difficult problems.

This would seem to be another sign of their arrogance. It shows the low value they place on parliament. It shows that the ministers believe they are the masters of the Canadian people rather than their servants. As an example, I would mention four problems which should be dealt with.

In the first place, a policy should be adopted and legislation brought down to enable the government to co-operate with the provinces in the development of power and other resources which might be considered as self-liquidating projects. This could be described as a joint investment program. One example is the development of power on the Saint John river. For a long time New Brunswick has been suggesting to the dominion government that it should back the provincial bonds or give similar financial support in order that this project might proceed on a large scale rather than the small scale which has been undertaken by the province alone.

The Saint John river is an international river, as is the Columbia. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) will be expecting me to refer to the Columbia later on. Two years ago the government took a licensing control over international rivers and I believe it has some responsibility for helping to bring about development on these rivers.

The Gordon commission report contains a recommendation along these lines. I am not going to read the extract in full, but it commences at the foot of page 103 and is to be found in the section dealing with the Atlantic provinces. The commission point out that there are a number of problems which require substantial capital expenditures, and the report continues.

These include the provision of additional power resources in New Brunswick and the various suggestions for improving transportation facilities which have been referred to previously. In part at least, some of these might be self-liquidating.

Mr. Gordon and his fellow commissioners go on to say:

. . . the desirability of granting some measure of capital assistance towards the construction of public projects, including improved transportation facilities, in the Atlantic provinces is apparent. Specifically it is suggested that the federal government should agree to contribute a fixed sum per annum for capital assistance for a term of years, on the understanding that the initiative in the actual allocation of these funds, including the determination of priorities should come from the Atlantic provinces themselves. Under this proposal, some kind of joint capital projects commission would be established with an appropriate staff.

There are plans for large developments on the Columbia river in British Columbia and, as the minister knows, the ultimate cost of these undertakings will be about $1,000 million. The main development consisting of a dam and power plant at Mica Creek could be commenced if it were known just how that work is to be done.

Mr. Lesage: The engineering studies will take at least another year.

Mr. Green: The engineering studies may take at least a year to complete but something must be done to bring about finality as to how the work is to be completed, and the situation today is that nobody knows.

Several proposals have been made. One is that the Puget Sound utilities council, which is a United States organization, should come in and do at least part of the work, but this would give a foreign country considerable control over the river in Canada. Another is that a private company should do the work. This would mean additional cost and if that company were the British Columbia Electric it would mean a monopoly over quite an area in the province. The third suggestion is that the province of British Columbia should do it, but that province is not in a position to finance projects to the extent of $1,000 million. The final suggestion is that there should be a joint undertaking by the dominion and the province, co-operating much along the lines of the suggestion with regard to the Saint John river. Now the minister himself conferred with Premier Bennett last summer concerning Columbia river developments, and I have here the press release which followed. We find these words.

It was agreed that in the circumstances it is of the utmost importance for the future development of the province to ensure that the largest possible amount of power is derived from the hydro electric possibilities that are present, and that this be done at the lowest possible cost.

There can be no doubt that the cheapest way in which this work could be done would be by co-operation between the dominion and the province. In this way money could be raised at a lower rate of interest, and I do urge upon the government that this policy should be adopted; that there should be finality now and legislation brought down which would make it possible for the dominion government to participate.

In connection with the Columbia river may I point out to the minister that fears have been expressed in British Columbia that in the negotiations which are about to take place with the United States government Canada will be prepared to bargain away some of the rights which we now have under article 2 of the boundary waters treaty of 1909. There has already been a great delay in connection with this matter. The announcement that these negotiations were to take place was made by the minister on May 23 of last year but just the other day, on January 9, he told a questioner in the house that no definite date had been settled. Someone, either here or in Washington, is dragging his feet in connection with these negotiations.

However, under the boundary waters treaty Canada has the right to divert water from the Kootenay to the Columbia and from the Columbia to the Fraser without the United States government being entitled to protest. That right only comes to us because the United States itself insisted on including a provision to this effect in the treaty of 1909, when it favoured the United States, and I hope the minister and his advisers are not prepared now to go down to Washington and bargain away the rights which belong to us under that treaty.

The second problem which I suggest should be faced this session is Canada's lack of a deep-sea fleet. I am not going to discuss this question in any detail today; I will just say this: the government has allowed the deep-sea fleet under the Canadian flag to disintegrate. There are still only 17 deep-sea cargo vessels, which represent a total tonnage of less than 100,000 tons, and out of this number eight are Canadian National Steamships. It is true there are some 90 wartime vessels on the United Kingdom registry, but I understand that about 20 of these have been sold this year, so that in a matter of a few months that number will be down to about seventy. These vessels are under United Kingdom control; they are not manned by Canadians. Some of them were requisitioned for service in connection with the Suez canal by the United Kingdom government.

Canadian-registered ships are practically off the high seas at the present time. One result is that supplies and equipment for Canada's forces in the Middle East have to be carried in foreign bottoms; there are no Canadian ships available to carry them. In order to carry Canadian troops and their equipment to the Middle East, what do we do? We strip the Magnificent, Canada's principal naval vessel, built at a cost of millions of dollars. That vessel had to be stripped—I presume at a cost of more millions of dollars—in order that she could act as a troop carrier.

Next year or, at the latest, by the opening of navigation in 1959 the St. Lawrence seaway will be ready for use. There will not be one Canadian deep-sea vessel to use it unless some policy is quickly adopted by the Canadian government. Other nations are preparing for this opening. Germany has been building vessels for that service. But at the present time there are no Canadian or American vessels available. The Americans have moved to meet the situation. I have here the year-end summary of the federal maritime board. The chairman of that board, Mr. Clarence G. Morse, had this to say with regard to shipping through the seaway:

Additional ocean transportation service on essential U.S. foreign trade routes is expected under operating-differential subsidy agreements. In February 1956 the ocean routes between the great lakes and St. Lawrence river ports of the United States and ports of western Europe were declared essential to the trade and economy of the nation, and the size and type of ships and frequency of service required was determined by the maritime administration.

Mr. Morse goes on to point out that three American shipping companies are taking advantage of that provision, also that the route through the great lakes to the Caribbean is to be declared essential. Thus, when the seaway is opened there will be American vessels to use it, but all Canadian freight through great lakes ports will have to be carried by foreign vessels.

Mr. Marler: I suppose the hon. member means overseas traffic?

Mr. Green: Yes, deep-sea traffic. The present position illustrates so clearly the folly of delay. I point out once again to the minister and to the government that there must be a policy and legislation which will ensure a nucleus of modern deep-sea cargo vessels owned and manned by Canadian citizens and operated under Canadian registry.

The third and fourth questions which in my opinion should be dealt with at this session affect the Canadian people directly, and for that reason they are even more important than the subjects I have already mentioned. One is legislation for veterans and the other is welfare legislation, including old age security, old age assistance and pensions for the blind.

With regard to the veterans there was practically no legislation last session. At that time we were given the excuse that the government was waiting for the resolutions from the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion which was held in Vancouver in June. Those resolutions have, of course, been available now for many months. Furthermore, the cabinet met the dominion executive of the Legion in November, and once again recommendations were made for improvements in veterans legislation. Nevertheless, there is not one word in the speech from the throne about any such legislation being introduced.

Some of these particular matters are of great importance to the veterans of Canada. Let us consider, for example, the subject of pensions. The Legion have asked that there should be an increase in pension rates to correspond with the increase in the cost of living. Then they ask, once again, that where a disability has not been recorded on enlistment there should be a presumption that, should it develop subsequently, it did arise while the veteran was in the service even though the doctors may suggest a pre-enlistment origin.

Another point which should be dealt with this session is the removal of the provision which affects marriages by veterans of the first war. Any who were married since May 1, 1954, can receive no payment for their wives. This deadline should have been wiped out long ago. The practice has been to lift it from time to time, that is, to put it ahead, but evidently there is to be no such action this year.

Turning to war veterans allowances, the Legion has asked again that the ceilings on permissive income be raised to $1,200 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man and that the married rate be raised from $108 to $120. These again are changes which should have been made a long time ago, and I cannot understand the attitude of the government in failing to take some step to meet this need at the present time. The equity in a home allowed to a recipient of war veterans allowance should be increased from $6,000 to $8,000 or $9,000 to be in line with the values of homes at the present time. These are all changes which should not have to wait but apparently there is to be no legislation until 1958.

I believe that parliament is shirking its duty in not dealing with these veterans' problems now. We are all at fault. Members on all sides of the house will be criticized for the failure to bring down legislation along these lines, and I hope that the government will change its mind and see that something is done before dissolution.

The final question I wish to place before the house as calling for action this year is the matter of welfare legislation involving, for example, our senior citizens and those Canadians who have the misfortune to be blind. I believe that very real hardship is being suffered by thousands of such Canadians across this land. Their pensions have never been sufficient to enable them to live decently. Their pensions have represented merely an existence. Now, with the great decrease in the value of money, these payments have fallen far below the existence level.

In a few provinces some help is given by the provincial governments. I know that is true in my own province of British Columbia. But obviously the time has come for a general increase. Someone may say: Well, how is it going to be paid? I believe that these increases could be paid out of the large surplus. Apparently the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is expecting a surplus of from $300 million to $400 million. Such increases could also be paid by means of a larger levy. I believe the people of Canada would be perfectly willing to pay more taxes in order to increase the payments going to these worthy Canadians.

Unless action is taken this session there can be no improvement until the fall or perhaps 1958. Meanwhile these older Canadians and the blind will continue to suffer. In my opinion that will be tragic and a very direct result of the failure of the government to act now.

It is not going to be good enough for the Minister of Finance to make an announcement in March or early in April that something is to be done about old age and blind pensions at a later date. Action should be taken now. Legislation should be placed on the statute books during the present session.

On these four questions, the joint development of power projects, re-establishing the Canadian deep sea fleet, legislation for veterans and welfare legislation, the government as yet is offering no leadership. On these questions the speech from the throne is just one big blank. Evidently this session is going to last for another two and a half to three months.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harris: Why look at me?

Mr. Green: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) laughs. I do not know whether that means it will last for a longer or shorter time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will not do anything to lengthen it.

Mr. Green: In any event, it is generally understood that we will be here for another two and a half to three months. I suggest that the government bestir itself and deal with these problems. There is no reason why these and other problems should be shelved. They should be dealt with this spring, and I can assure you that if they are not the new government which will take over this fall will deal with them promptly and effectively.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why do you want them settled in the meantime?

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the resumption of this debate I want to congratulate most sincerely the two hon. gentlemen who initiated the debate by moving and seconding the address in reply. It is pleasant to welcome these two hon. members to the ranks of those who in past sessions have had the privilege of performing this important duty. I assure both hon. gentlemen that in the opinion of their colleagues in the house they each performed their duties in the highest traditions of this house.

This session opened, Mr. Speaker, under the shadow of very serious events in the international field. The so-called Suez situation is only one of the serious matters of international importance facing the free world today. On the domestic scene there was also the shadow of the stoppage of work on the Canadian Pacific railway. Fortunately the international situation has not developed as adversely as very well might have happened, and while matters of international policy are still of extreme concern we can at least take heart from the fact that since the brief special session of parliament last fall the situation has improved considerably rather than the reverse.

The situation with respect to the Canadian Pacific railway strike is, of course, even more favourable. That strike has become, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) predicted it would become, a part of the industrial history of this country. We are now discussing the traditional address in reply with the more serious aspects of that work stoppage attended to.

The amendment to the address in reply moved by the official opposition calls, I believe, for at least some passing reference, particularly the strange choice of words adopted in framing that amendment. As it appears on page 30 of Hansard of January 9, it respectfully represents to His Excellency that his advisers, by reason of their indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in the face of serious national and international problems, have lost the confidence of the house and of the country.

Let us look at the record very briefly to see whether or not hon. members opposite have tried to suggest any real reason why they should select such words as "indifference", "inertia" and "lack of leadership". Take, for example, the question of the Suez problem and the international situation generally.

Has any hon. gentleman opposite suggested that the Canadian representatives at the United Nations showed an indifference to these problems or showed any inertia in dealing with them? Canada's initiative is recognized by every other country in the world, friend or foe, but the official opposition chooses to suggest—contrary to the clear record—that the government has been indifferent and inert.

Only this morning it was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), somewhat in criticism of the government, that at the present time one-fifth of the membership of the United Nations emergency force is made up of Canadian soldiers. I ask the hon. gentleman this question: are those Canadian soldiers there because of indifference and inertia on the part of the Canadian government? I suggest that the opposite is the case. I suggest that the hon. member must be either in favour of the government's policy or against it. I suggest that a reading of his speech will justify the presumption by the people of Canada that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and the party of which he is a distinguished member in this house are against the present policy of the Canadian government in attempting to participate in United Nations action to maintain peace and order in the Middle East and throughout the world.

Let us now look at the record in so far as the Canadian Pacific Railway strike is concerned. That strike was a matter of tremendous importance to practically every section of this country. It was of importance to business men, to farmers and to all those engaged in productive activity in this country. Have hon. members of the official opposition suggested that there was any inertia or indifference in the government's handling of this problem?

Mr. Montgomery: Yes; they have.

Mr. Hodgson: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Montgomery: There certainly was inertia.

Mr. Hodgson: If the Prime Minister had done in the first place, before the strike happened, the very thing he did in the end there would have been no strike at all.

Mr. Dickey: I am glad to hear the hon. members opposite take that attitude. Let us look at the record. I do not know whether or not hon. members who have been interrupting me believe in the principle of collective bargaining in this country.

Mr. Montgomery: We certainly do.

Mr. Dickey: What happened was that the process of collective bargaining was followed and it was found to be impossible for the two sides to reach a settlement of their differences, even with the active assistance of the Department of Labour and the government represented by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). The strike was called and it took place. The government took action to try to get the parties together and to narrow the differences that were separating them. This action was taken in order to get a resumption of railway service under way at the earliest possible date. Do hon. members opposite suggest that the days of conferences and negotiation which brought about a resumption of rail service and a submission of the remaining points of difference to a board of inquiry to be set up by the government came about because of indifference and inertia? If that is so, they certainly are showing a real lack of appreciation of the activities that went on.

The settlement of the differences in so far as they could be settled and the agreement to have the remaining differences submitted to a tribunal for study and report came about solely as a result of the initiative of the Prime Minister. The result that was achieved is a tribute to his understanding of the position of both sides and to his policy of bringing them together and reducing the area of difference to a point where each side could agree upon a cessation of the strike and resumption of rail service on grounds that were satisfactory to each of them. This result will go down in the industrial history of Canada as a great achievement on the part of the Prime Minister and the government, and one which was brought about by hard, patient and excellent work on the part of those who were engaged in the negotiations, including management, labour and government.

One of the extraordinary things about this choice of language—"indifference, inertia and lack of leadership"—is that in fact the only group in this house to which those words can be properly ascribed is the official opposition. The leading members of the other two opposition groups have pointed that fact out to their colleagues in opposition in no uncertain terms. It has not been left to the members on this side of the house to bring this matter to public attention.

The official opposition in this session has clearly shown sings of most marked indifference, inertia and lack of leadership. They have always been waiting for the government to announce its policy with regard to this or that, and then they would say what was in their minds. That was said clearly, Mr. Speaker, by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) both inside and outside of this house with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway strike. He said: "When the government acts, we will then let our position be known". The government has acted and the strike has come to an end. Has the Leader of the Opposition or any member of the official opposition mentioned that fact since the settlement? Not at all. We and the Canadian people are still completely in the dark as to what the position of the official opposition was with respect to that important matter or what they would or could have done about it.

An excellent example of the attitude that the members of the official opposition are taking is the speech of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) in this debate on Thursday. It was the same kind of hodge podge that the hon. member gives to this house whenever he rises in his place to speak. He repeated the old song that he sang so often inside and outside this house last year, namely that the government was an old and tired gang. As reported at page 340 of Hansard he said this:

> It is high time that this old gang this tired, worn-out old gang, this group who are ready to move to that rest home down the hall . . . were permitted to go there; . . .

I would have thought the hon. member for Broadview and his colleagues in the official opposition, in the light of recent history of their party and also in the light of recent events in this house, would have given up that particular line of argument because everyone knows which party has been showing signs of fatigue, being old and tired, and with members who are looking for somewhere else to go.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we in Ottawa have been experiencing over the last 10 days or so very severe winter weather. That has been true of other parts of the country. In my province of Nova Scotia there have been, since the last days of December, a succession of very severe and damaging storms. These storms have interfered with transportation services and have caused great difficulties for a number of people. The portion of the population which has particularly suffered has been the shore fishermen who, in order to carry out their work, have to maintain wharves and fish houses right along the shore and have to keep stored in exposed locations their lobster traps, boats, nets, and other equipment. These storms, most exceptional in their character, have caused a great deal of damage in the fishing villages of Halifax county and other counties along the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia.

As hon. members know, we in this parliament, as a result of the initiative of the government, have provided means whereby certain of the gear and other accoutrements of the fishermen can be insured against losses of this nature at very favourable rates. Unfortunately many of the fishermen have not taken full advantage of these insurance procedures. In addition the losses which have recently been sustained, particularly in villages such as Prospect and east and west Dover and other villages in Halifax county, have been of such a nature that they would not all have been covered by this insurance in any event. That situation has created a good deal of hardship and a great deal of difficulty for the fishermen who have suffered such severe reverses.

The Department of Public Works which provides public wharves, breakwaters and other facilities for the fishing industry will, of course, study the situation, will repair damage to protective works and wharves wherever public structures have suffered damage and will be prepared to provide wherever possible and where required additional protection, the need for which has been made obvious by these recent storms. The question of some relief or assistance for those who have suffered losses in this connection is a matter which must first of all be dealt with by the provincial authorities. I have received a number of inquiries from interested people in my constituency about this matter. I have had to reply to them that applications for relief or assistance for the repair and replacement of damaged wharves, fish houses, lobster traps and the like must go in the first instance to the provincial authorities. Then, if the provincial authorities find that the amount of damage and its widespread character is such that it is an emergency beyond the capacity of the province to cope with adequately, the province could, if it saw fit, take the step of applying to the federal government for assistance.

The provincial government, having responsibility for property and civil rights within the province, is the sole judge of the extent of damage and the kind of disaster which has taken place. If they, in the exercise of their constitutional responsibilities, find that there is a disaster which requires and justifies national participation then I am sure their official application to the government on that basis would receive consideration on its merits.

That has been the pattern which has been established over the years for dealing with like matters and the normal pattern would, I am sure, be faithfully carried out in this respect.

Turning to something which is a little more hopeful, I wish to make some reference to the extent of winter port activity through the port of Halifax. The expansion of both import and export trade which has gone on under the policies of this government over the past few years has resulted in a very satisfactory and heartening expansion of the trade through the port of Halifax both in summer and in winter. Of course our winter traffic is particularly heavy. This is the season of the year when our facilities are taxed to their utmost. The harbours board and the Department of Transport have over the years taken a great interest in providing as rapidly as they can the facilities which are required in the port of Halifax. We are very happy with the important construction activities which have been going on in the port of Halifax over the years and at the present time. However, one aspect of the provision of facilities which has not kept pace with the expanding business by any means is the grain handling capacity. The provision of the extra belts for more rapid loading of ships at the grain berths which are now provided is essential. The harbours board had made provision for funds to provide these belts and it had been hoped that they would be in operation for this shipping season. Unfortunately the steel strike and other matters delayed installation of these belts and this has had to be put off until next spring.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that consideration should be given and favourable action speedily taken to provide additional grain berths through the construction of new galleries so that there will be at least three additional grain berths available for grain boats entering Halifax during the next winter.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to a question which is of considerable interest to Halifax and Dartmouth and one that is of national interest as well. That is the question of housing and the redevelopment of urban areas. The record of house building in Canada since the second world war is, I think, an excellent one indeed. We were faced at the end of the war with a very severe post-war shortage of housing and priority naturally had to be given to the provision as rapidly as possible of new homes to meet the demands of returning servicemen and the demands of the ordinary civilian population who had been forced to put up with shared accommodation and the like during the war years.

In recent weeks there has been some criticism by hon. members opposite on the matter of the provision of housing and the operation of the National Housing Act. I do not quite know how they would expect to have the preceding records of completion that have been made over the past few years continued uninterrupted particularly at a time when the economy of this country is straining in every direction and when it is not to be expected that we can do all the things we want to do or all the things that need to be done at the same time. However, in spite of the suggestions from hon. gentlemen opposite that we are facing an extremely difficult problem in this regard, I am sure that the eventual housing record for this year and succeeding years will be a highly satisfactory and creditable one indeed. In the next year or so we may not make as much progress as we have in the last couple of years in overcoming the backlog, but I am sure we will have almost total success in keeping up with new demands.

I suggest this is a time, Mr. Speaker, when those in charge of our cities and towns should take the opportunity of having a look at the extremely important question of urban redevelopment and renewal; in other words community planning. We have all seen the excellent attractive new sections that have been added both within the borders of our cities and towns and immediately outside of them in post-war years. These have been priority projects because they provided new housing without any complications for the rehousing of people who had already been accommodated, but I feel that now the emphasis should be shifted and under the leadership of the provincial authorities and with the co-operation of the federal authorities the municipal governments should take a very careful look at community planning and should make arrangements to participate to the ultimate of their abilities in redevelopment and rehousing.

The redevelopment of cities is made necessary not only by the houses and other buildings that have been caught up with by deterioriation and obsolescence; I believe we have a tendency to pay too much attention to that side of the problem. The necessity also comes from our requirements to meet new demands that are being made upon the hearts of our urban areas and by the changes and increases in automobile traffic, the growing needs of business and industry and the changing patterns of living within our cities. Private owners in the normal course will make their own individual decisions as to improvement of properties and changes in the use of those properties, but with the changing pattern of life in cities there often arise circumstances where unfavourable conditions in an area or the unfavourable nature of surrounding properties discourage individual initiative and as a result an entire area can be condemned to a gradual and slow process of deterioration until it reaches the ultimate status of a slum. The economic losses to the owners of these properties, the loss of tax revenue and the staggering cost in terms of the waste of human resources which accompanies this result is becoming more and more obvious even in the cities and towns of Canada which are relatively new and which by European standards are certainly very young indeed. The only answer to this problem is action by public authority for the redevelopment of areas which have come to experience this degeneration.

The machinery for this redevelopment exists but I think that too little use of it has been made up until now. The legislation passed by this parliament in this field is far-reaching and I believe it provides excellent means whereby municipal governments can tackle this task with resultant advantage to themselves as municipalities and to the great benefit of their citizens generally. The obstacles to be overcome are local resistance which arises out of short-sightedness and ideas of false economy. We are all too prone to recognize the immediate expenditures involved in projects of this nature and to lose sight of the very real economic and human benefits that can be achieved over a period of years. The National Housing Act as it was amended at the last session provides first of all for the planning of redevelopment and renewal in any urban area in Canada. Under the act Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may make grants for the purpose of carrying out surveys of housing conditions and urban studies. These studies may be of a general nature or they may be related to specific conditions or problems. Out of these studies can be produced a basic plan for community development in any municipality.

While there has been a growing interest in redevelopment on the part of the municipalities of Canada, the full advantages available have not been recognized. I am glad to say that Halifax is one Canadian city that has participated in one of these studies which has not yet been completed. The Halifax study which should be completed this spring provides for a survey by Professor Gordon Stevenson of the rehousing requirements of residents of blighted areas which require clearance and the re-use of the cleared lands.

Seventy-five per cent of the estimated cost up to a maximum of $12,000 is borne by this government, with the city being responsible for the remaining 25 per cent.

Mr. Nicholson: What about the provinces? Is there a cost sharing arrangement? Does the province share in the profit?

Mr. Dickey: The province would have no share of the cost, but under this particular study the province could have an important share in the redevelopment and re-use of the land after the site is cleared.

The same type of study is being conducted in Saint John, New Brunswick with a more extensive study being undertaken in Toronto. Two separate studies are being performed in Winnipeg. All of these studies receive similar assistance from this government. A study is also being carried on in Vancouver. I suggest that many other cities and towns in Canada could obtain valuable assistance from studies of this kind and I suggest that they give serious thought to participating in such studies.

While a study of this nature is an essential first step, the real difficulty arises when consideration is given to implementing the recommendations of a study. Action in this connection is provided by the act by way of a partnership between the federal and provincial governments or, alternatively, between the federal government and the municipality with provincial agreement in that kind of arrangement. Under this partnership the federal government may pay one-half of the gross cost of acquiring and clearing the area selected as a result of a study. The land can then be used by the municipality for its highest and best use. That is to say, it can be used for a low-rental project, for medium rental projects, for high rental, for public, commercial or industrial use, or the best combination of them. This is the change in the act which was brought about last year and I believe it makes these redevelopment proposals much more attractive to municipalities. It is a sensible change in that it makes land available for its highest and best use.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation can participate in redevelopment under any one of these plans provided for by the act through the joint financing of low-rental housing projects, limited dividend projects and the like. It is also possible that private enterprise can be welcomed to participate in one of these redevelopment plans in an appropriate way.

Redevelopment does not simply mean the demolition and rebuilding of an area. It means first of all the making of a plan, second, the demolition and clearing of the area selected; third, the taking of measures to prevent further blighting of the area and surrounding areas; and, fourth, the re-use of the land for its best use as decided by the municipality.

The advantages of these proposals are well summarized in a study made by the city of Toronto in 1956 of urban renewal. It points out that to the resident the advantages are the removal of overcrowded and unsanitary accommodation and its replacement by a wide range of dwellings in houses and apartments within or beyond the city limits and at prices or rents which are reasonable, or re-housing in the same area.

To the industrialist it provides sites to suit industries that need a central location, with adequate parking and loading facilities, efficient transportation of materials and products and good transit service for employees.

To the businessman it offers commercial districts expanded at logical locations, with ample parking facilities laid out for customers', clients', and office workers' convenience.

To the individual affected it offers areas where clearance and rebuilding or improvement projects are sponsored by the city, equitable treatment and fair prices to property owners.

Then to the city council and all citizens it offers economy through the re-use of valuable but blighted areas, with an orderly plan of civic spending.

I have just caught your eye, Mr. Speaker, and I realize that my time is up. I want to conclude by saying that I hope the city of Halifax will take advantage of this study which I have mentioned and go forward to a sensible project for the re-use of land which may be selected by the city. I hope the town of Dartmouth and other cities and towns right across Canada will take advantage of these facilities for civic improvement.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, as I rise at this time to take part in the debate on the subamendment now before the house I should like to call your attention to a paragraph which appears in the speech from the throne and which reads:

> Excellent progress is being made in our national economic development. Expansion is evident in every part of Canada. Rapid strides are being made in opening up and utilizing our natural resources and in our industrial and urban growth. Employment has reached unprecedented levels. Once again we have been blessed with good crops. External trade was considerably greater last year than during any previous year. Canadians in almost every part of the country have been enjoying the benefits of this invigorating economic climate.

The only trouble is that anyone living in the maritimes would not recognize that as an outline of the economic situation in the part of the country in which he is living. As a matter of fact when I read it I was almost led to believe that somewhere in the government there must be an official of the type that used to exist in czarist Russia and whose job it was to go in advance when the czar was making a trip to brighten up the villages along the route so that the czar would be led to believe that everything was fine in his kingdom. In this case it is not the monarch who is being fooled; if anyone is being fooled it is the general public.

At best there appears to be a lack of understanding of the situation in which the four Atlantic provinces find themselves. At the very worst it may be that the government has concluded that the voice of the maritimes in the affairs of the nation has decreased to a low point and that politically the Atlantic provinces are no longer important and no government needs to seek their support. Reading this over I notice that the only reference in which they indicate that every prospect is not rosy is where they say: "Canadians in almost every part of the country have been enjoying the benefits of this invigorating economic climate." It is the one word "almost". Ten per cent of our population and four of our provinces have been passed over with that reference—"almost".

[Mr. Dickey.]

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, further on in the speech from the throne this statement is found:

> The preliminary report of the royal commission on economic prospects has been received and will shortly be laid before you.

As hon. members know, we now have this preliminary report and I would like to refer to it briefly. I think the report of the Gordon commission will serve a very useful purpose in focussing the attention of, I hope, all the Canadian people on the urgent need for a complete new deal for the Atlantic provinces. In this connection I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) on the very excellent and astute observations he made with regard to this subject during the course of his speech in this debate a few days ago. My nature is to be generous and I regret, therefore, that my generosity cannot be strained to the point of congratulating the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Dickey) with regard to his references to the Gordon commission and the plight of the maritimes generally. I regret that shortness of time did not allow him to reach that point: I expect he would have done so had he not reached the limit of the period allotted to him.

When the Atlantic provinces entered confederation they entered it in the belief that they would retain most of the many benefits which they had already built up for themselves as colonies. They were led to believe that in addition the colonies, by uniting together, would receive further mutual benefits. One of the chief advantages which were to accrue from confederation was the greater ease of defence of British North America. They were also led to believe that the larger unit would prove to be a more efficient economy, providing a higher standard of living for all its members.

What did the Atlantic provinces find on entering confederation—when it was too late? They found that tariffs for the whole country seemed to be set with only rare consideration for the effect such tariffs would have on the Atlantic provinces. As a result the Atlantic provinces found that their normal channels of trade north and south had virtually been completely cut off and that their trade and commerce had been forced into an unnatural channel east and west.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. gentleman speaking for the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees)?

Mr. MacLean: No, I am speaking for myself and the people I represent. The hon. member for Broadview is quite able to represent his own constituency.

Mr. Harris: I was asked about inconsistency this morning.

Mr. Montgomery: You don't have to go further than your own government to find it.

Mr. MacLean: The Atlantic provinces, after entering confederation, find that the cost of transportation services from and to markets in central Canada from which they were supposed to benefit has become so prohibitively high that most of the industries of the maritimes are unable to carry the load.

Incidentally, when this family got together the maritime provinces were astonished to find that one of the ambitions of the two biggest members of the family was, shortly afterwards, to make vast land grabs from the rich northern lands, acquisitions which were bought and paid for by all the members of the family, without making any reasonable compensation in respect of the maritimes' share of those lands. I was astonished to find, sometime ago, that since confederation—since the time when Upper and Lower Canada—New Brunswick and Nova Scotia joined this partnership,—Quebec and Ontario have taken unto themselves a land mass greater in extent than all the territory in eastern Europe which came into Russian hands during and after the second world war. Of course I am not suggesting for one moment that the two situations are comparable. Nevertheless, it is a fact that this great territory containing many rich natural resources has contributed greatly to the wealth of the provinces concerned since it has been taken over, while the increasing population accruing to the provinces concerned has also given them a much greater voice in the affairs of the nation.

It should be remembered that at the time of confederation the Atlantic provinces were perhaps the most prosperous of any in British North America. Their population was growing, their industries were multiplying and their influence increasing. Since that time, however, the progress they were making has not continued. If one were to construct a graph of almost any activity in the maritimes—industrial production, trade, increase of population or anything else—one would find that there had been a sharp falling off after confederation.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, when proceedings were interrupted for lunch at one o'clock I was pointing out that the economy of the maritimes before confederation had been improving constantly and that in almost all fields there was a marked falling off in these activities coincidental with confederation. In another regard the maritime provinces find themselves in a less advantageous position, and increasingly so as the years go by. I refer to the weight of their voice in the affairs of the nation. At the time of confederation the maritime provinces were represented in this chamber by 43 members out of a total of 206, or more than 20 per cent of the total. At the present time these same three provinces are represented by 26 members out of a total membership of 265 or just under 10 per cent. The political influence of the maritime provinces has, therefore, declined more than half from what it was at the time of confederation.

The Gordon commission studied carefully, I think, conditions as they found them in the maritimes and have made a fairly objective report on what they discovered. To my way of thinking the report is not intended to be a forecast of what the potentialities of the maritimes are in reality but rather an observation on the facts as they are and have been over the last number of years. They project that state of affairs into the future pointing out the conditions that the maritime provinces may find themselves faced with by 1980, and their forecast is a gloomy one indeed.

It is not, as I said, a forecast of our real potentialities but rather a matter of pointing out and turning the spotlight on the neglect which the maritime provinces have suffered at the hand of every government since confederation in varying degree. I do not suggest that the ills we find ourselves undergoing at the present time are solely the responsibility of the present government. That is not the case. But nevertheless the fact cannot be denied that here and now this government is responsible and has been responsible for more than 20 years. They will be responsible for a few more months at least. Time is running out both for the economy of the maritime provinces and for the government. I believe the people of the maritime provinces are rapidly realizing that it is not in their interests to support continuously any government of any party that persists in ignoring the problems of the maritimes which are for the most part artificial ones and in my opinion almost wholly curable.

We in the maritimes think it is only fair to expect that certain things should be done and done promptly. We feel we should demand that they be done at the earliest possible moment. One injustice from which the maritime provinces are suffering at the present time arises from the fact that the benefits to which they were entitled under the Maritime Freight Rates Act have been almost entirely nullified by the horizontal increases in freight rates which have taken place over the years. It is essential that the government take action immediately to amend the Martime Freight Rates Act to restore the benefits which the act originally contained.

We also feel that consideration should be given immediately and action taken to correct some of the injustices we are suffering as the result of the Canadian tariff at the present time. In this connection the Gordon commission recommends that the tariff should be studied continuously and adjustments made as circumstances require. To quote briefly, they say as found at page 73 of their report:

> In fact we would advocate a continuing re-examination of the tariff having in mind continually changing industrial conditions, products and technology.

In that regard there is an anomaly in the tariff structure which is of vital interest to the maritime provinces, especially Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I refer to the tariff on potatoes entering the United States from Canada and the tariff on United States potatoes entering Canada. When the present tariff was set up the tariff on United States potatoes was pretty much an academic question because in those days the trade was almost entirely from north to south. But now the situation has changed and we find a condition under which maritime potatoes have to find markets in the United States over a tariff of 35 cents a hundred-weight, and that on a quota. When the quota is reached the duty is doubled on any potatoes allowed to enter that country. On the other hand, United States potatoes come into Canada duty free except during six weeks each year. That is a situation which should, I strongly believe, be rectified immediately.

I have made a few suggestions and I intend to make more. In my opinion encouragement should be given to the fishing industry in the maritime provinces. Medical research at the present time seems to indicate that marine foods have a beneficial effect on one's diet, especially in relation to certain degenerative diseases, including heart disease. If it should be proven that this is an actual fact, it would be an opportunity for great stimulation of the fisheries so that the people of the country would have the benefit of including a greater amount of the products of the sea in their diets to the advantage not only of the fishing industry but of the health of the Canadian people as well.

Again, in this country there is a continual process of cannibalization of small industries by larger industries. We in the maritimes suffer especially from this procedure whereby large corporations buy out small competitors for the express purpose of closing them down. That is a process from which we in the maritimes have suffered for years. We have very few large corporations which are in a position to turn the tables on their competitors in the rest of Canada. I believe that a study of the situation should be made with the idea of finding means of preventing this procedure which I think runs contrary to our belief in free competition and free enterprise. For the most part these industries that have been bought up in the maritimes and closed down are, for their own size and their own area, healthy businesses which would continue to grow indefinitely if merely left to themselves to do so.

I also think that greater attention should be given to finding markets for the products of the maritimes, especially markets in other parts of the world. We are by nature a marine people. Before confederation we were an important marine area, taking an important part in the shipping business of the world. This business disappeared completely. But if markets were found in other parts of the world for more of our maritime products, this action might not only stimulate the business of the maritimes but it might create a new industry, that of the merchant marine again, for maritime enterprise.

These are modest requests. I sincerely believe that all reasonable Canadians would think that they are not extravagant, especially if they had the opportunity of going to the maritimes and seeing the situation for themselves. I should like to think that every member of this house, in the course of a parliament, would take the opportunity of travelling as widely as possible in this country so that he might see for himself the problems that face certain segments of our economy. I think that statement is applicable to all members. I should like to see a member from Newfoundland take the opportunity of coming to Ottawa via the Yukon on some occasions, and vice versa.

The Gordon commission has done great service to the maritimes in pointing out the difficulties under which we labour. It makes a great number of what I consider to be sound recommendations in many other fields to which I do not wish to refer specifically at the present time. But I believe it has done a disservice to the maritimes—the four Atlantic provinces—in that it grossly underestimates the potential of that area.

We have great possibilities in the Atlantic provinces. We have great mineral wealth which has not yet been exploited or explored.

It must be realized that the Atlantic provinces include not only the three maritime provinces but Newfoundland and Labrador as well. We have great reserves of coal. We have a good climate most of the time. There is a possibility—though it is only a possibility—that oil may be discovered in the maritimes in the near future. We have a fisheries industry that could be greatly expanded under favourable conditions. We are a "natural" as far as merchant shipping is concerned. Our agricultural potential has not been exploited to the extent of half of its possibilities. The agricultural production of the maritimes could be at least doubled merely by increasing production under favourable marketing conditions which would allow farmers to operate in a more efficient manner, giving them the funds wherewith they could further mechanize their operations and buy an optimum amount of commercial fertilizer and other such things.

We have still a considerable potential of hydroelectric power which might be developed. There again Newfoundland and Labrador should not be forgotten. There is also a possibility of generating electric power from the tides, as has already been done in France. In the maritimes the tides are even higher than they are in the part of France where this development is under way.

To maritimers it would seem reasonable that a greater percentage of the iron ore from Labrador should be processed in Sydney rather than in Pittsburgh. We feel that there is a future for heavy industry in the maritimes. We know that many European countries which are well managed and which have less in the way of resources than have we enjoy at least as high a standard of living as and, in many regards, a much higher standard of living than that which now exists in the maritime provinces.

We have an integrated population. We have a tradition of higher education. We have built up a culture which is peculiar to ourselves and of which we are extremely proud. It is a culture that we in the maritimes feel that the rest of Canada cannot obtain even for $100 million.

It seems to me that we have two choices. We can either bring our needs to the attention of the government so forcibly that they will be no longer neglected or we can go on unquestioningly and everlastingly supporting this government. If we do that, I should like to warn that we might get to the place—although I do not believe so—where the only thing we could look forward to would be a one-way ticket from the maritimes to some other part of Canada. In that connection I should like to warn that only a very few maritimers receiving such free transportation would find that their destination was the red chamber.

This government has been proud of the record it has set in many matters. I should like to point out that in the last year and a half it has created a new record. It has exceeded Rip Van Winkle's record by about a year and a half. It seems completely oblivious of the problems under which we in the maritimes are labouring.

I feel strongly that we have a great future if given the opportunity, and I think all maritimers and Newfoundlanders will agree with me in that sentiment. We may realize that future even in spite of present government policies if they are not rectified. We are trying our best to lift ourselves up by the bootstraps by such endeavours as APEC, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. But if these conditions are not rectified and if we fail, there may come a time when we must resort to the suggestion that is often hinted at by the premier of Newfoundland, namely that we might consider secession from the union.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rubbish.

Mr. MacLean: I do not think that time will ever come. I have enough faith in the maritimes and in the Atlantic provinces to believe that we have a great future and that we shall realize that future. But the task will be much easier if we are given reasonable assistance by this government, if our problems are recognized as problems which concern the nation as a whole and if it is recognized that our demands are reasonable ones. If that is done I see for the maritimers a great future, a future which will accommodate the natural increase in our population, a future which will give us a standard of living comparable to the rest of Canada.

In closing I remind you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the government, that we in the maritimes feel that we have built up our own way of life which economic conditions should not be allowed to destroy. We do not wish to emigrate again.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in the tradition of this house I would like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

May I take this opportunity of extending congratulations to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) both on his appointment as leader of the opposition and on his election as chief of the Conservative party. Long may he reign in those two respective capacities.

I have had, Mr. Speaker, the advantage of hearing and reading several of the interesting addresses from different members of the house on the subject of foreign affairs. I thought this afternoon I might advance a few ideas on that subject.

Last September I had the opportunity of visiting Europe and a few countries therein, in particular Greece and Israel. On another occasion I should like to discuss Greece and the Cyprus problem.

I admit that a short visit does not make one an expert, but at least it does indicate interest in the Middle East.

Today I would like to make a few remarks about the commonwealth and its relations, the question of the Middle East, and to advance certain considerations which I think may properly be reconsidered when we are talking about a solution for the Middle East and its problems.

The crisis in world affairs has been a long time in the making. The breakup of the nineteenth century followed the great events of the first world war and the Russian revolution. I think it is fair to say that since these two events we can hardly say we have had the advantage of peace because from these experiences have come two grave issues. The first is the rise of nationalism in the Afro-Asian world; the second, I think, is the rejection of leadership by the white and by the western nations which have up until now played a great stabilizing role in that area.

New political systems are replacing old. Certainly among the most important, on the one hand, we have the Soviet union, China and its satellites; on the other hand, the American-Anglo-French alliance. But during all these vast changes throughout the past 50 years it seems to me the most important and the most interesting thing to note is the emergence of the commonwealth as we know it today. The commonwealth as we know it today is unique because it alone bridges the gulf between the old empires of the west and the new nationalisms of the east. It is also unique because it has brought together in a form of unity the whites and those whom we like to call non-whites. Indians, Pakistanis, Australians and Canadians find the commonwealth a remarkable instrument for maintaining intimate relations that the normal contact with nations might not provide.

It seems to me that the Canadian contribution to the growth of the commonwealth has been pre-eminent. Indeed we could argue that if the commonwealth is preserved today as a continuing political fact it is because Canadian leaders in the past 50 years have been working towards greater and greater national independence from imperial decisions. There might have been no commonwealth in 1956 if those great ex-prime ministers, such as the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, leader of the Conservative party during his time, and the late prime minister Mackenzie King, leader of the Liberal party during his time, and other leaders of Canadian political parties had not realized that the success of the commonwealth depended upon obtaining the right to decide questions for ourselves. Had we adopted the extreme Conservative viewpoint of imperial relations, about which we hear so much today, there might not have been a commonwealth today.

In that connection it seems to me also that Liberal policy may be expressed in the fact that it reflects the day to day changes in the world and could be put in these words: that the members of the commonwealth desired in modern terms to maintain unity without subordination and co-ordination only by consent and in association under the crown. Again I say that the extreme Conservative doctrine of commonwealth relations would ultimately defeat itself. Such arguments might have won a debate only to have lost a system.

What bearing does all this have on recent events in the Middle East? I think it means that Canadians find themselves in the present-day world subject to pressures from many different directions, such as the cold war, commonwealth loyalties and interests, relations with the United States, the security system of NATO and, let us face it, an over-all interest in human welfare.

All these things make Canadians think of their place in the world and of their obligations to other states. It is because these influences are so complex that no single explanation can describe the important decision we took a few weeks ago. To be definite, we abstained from the resolution demanding British and French withdrawal from the Suez because we felt that we had to state a moral position with respect to Anglo-French action, while at the same time we did not and could not condemn a fellow member of the commonwealth for actions which were the result of deep and understandable provocation.

Moreover, Canadian initiative in helping to establish the United Nations emergency force provided a timely face-saving device by which the United Kingdom and France were able to change their minds at the very moment that the United Nations offered some machinery to help resolve the problem that gave rise to the action in the first place.

To say that Canada was anti-British in those critical days is either naïve or perverse, because as a result of Canada's action we now have the moral and political right to ask those states, which regard the Anglo-French action as tragic, to accept our plan for an emergency force along with its objectives.

I will accept the interpretation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when he says there was a moment in November when the differences between certain members of the commonwealth and the United Kingdom were so grave as to bring the commonwealth into some kind of short-run jeopardy.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Macnaughton: At the same time I should say I have always considered the commonwealth sufficiently elastic to suffer shocks of this magnitude and even greater. The commonwealth could not be great if it could not sustain great troubles.

I should like to spend a moment, with your permission, on the Israeli action in the Sinai peninsula and consider possible future solutions of the Suez trouble and the trouble with Israel-Egypt and the other Arab states.

Perhaps at this time a word of history might be of use. Israel came into being in 1948. The British government withdrew as a mandatory power at that time. The existing population consisting of Jews and Arabs in Palestine, upon the withdrawal of the British mandate, had to determine what form of jurisdiction would persist. The 1947 resolution of the United Nations in effect proposed partition into two sections, a section with a Jewish majority and a section with an Arab majority. The Arabs rejected in toto this idea of partition. On May 14, 1948 the British withdrew and on May 15 the state of Israel was declared by the Jews residing in that section of Palestine.

I do not think any serious person will deny that the Jews of Palestine could not sit idly by in the face of the fact that the Arabs would not tolerate the creation of the Jewish state. Israel was declared a state in 1948 and the result has been that since that time a state of war existed during 1948 and 1949 until the armistice agreements were signed with Israel by all the Arab nations, with the exception of Iraq. From these events has devolved a long train of contention in Arab-Israeli relations since 1949.

On the human side of this situation there are tragic consequences. We have the flight of the Arab refugees, and since that question alone remains the largest single difficulty in the way of settlement between the Arab states and Israel perhaps you would allow me to spend a few moments on it. The record shows that in 1948 there were 800,000 Arabs living in Palestine. At the time of the creation of the new state of Israel there remained 200,000 Arabs; 650,000 Arabs left Palestine, or the state of Israel as we know it today, and became so-called refugees in the Gaza strip, in Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. I think we should ask the question why these Arabs left. The evidence is there to show that the Israeli authorities urged them to stay and as a matter of fact there are 213,000 Arabs inside the state of Israel at the present time who "never had it so good." In other words, 25 per cent, in effect, did stay within the state. The others were induced to leave by the fear of war, by panic, by propaganda and by the promises of the Arab leaders themselves in the different Arab states that if they would leave the state of Israel for a matter of two weeks it would be only a short time until the Israeli were thrown into the sea, and that after that had taken place the Arab refugees could then return and take over their lands and properties. In fact, their leaders said, "Flee for your lives and return as victors". Unfortunately for the refugees that did not happen, and far from being defeated, the Israeli defeated the Arab states. One strip which was not captured at the time of the signing of the armistice was the Gaza strip and this marked the beginning of the creation of this problem.

Since 1948 all the inducements of Great Britain, France and the United States to resettle these Arab refugees have amounted to nothing; all the funds which have been raised by way of capital grants to assist in the resettlement, restoration and rehabilitation of these refugees have amounted to nothing. Only the United Nations relief organizations have been of material help in maintaining the existence of these poor people. In the last seven years the Arab refugees have continually insisted on returning to that section of the Middle East heretofore called Palestine, but we are apt to forget that during the past seven years Israel has taken within its borders over 800,000 Jewish refugees who left everything behind them including their assets and property and came penniless to the new state. Israel on more than one occasion has declared for compensation and the resettlement of these refugees. It would appear that the Arabs refused because so long as the refugees are unabsorbed they remain a political leverage to gain the sympathy of the world and a means of preventing peace with Israel.

I would like to deal briefly with Israel's action in the Sinai peninsula two months ago. I think it is public knowledge that for the last seven years there have been a series of raids, reprisals, killings, propaganda statements and counter-statements. Although I do not wish to sit in judgment on either side I believe there are certain facts which should be brought to the attention of the house. These facts, I admit, are advanced by the Israelis and they carry considerable weight with me.

In the first place the Arab states have been preparing for the day when they could jointly destroy Israel and throw its people into the sea. The evidence for this is to be found in the radio broadcasts and in the book recently published by Nasser himself. In the second place, during the month of September 1955 we in this country heard of the sale of large quantities of arms by the Soviet union to Egypt, obviously for use against the state of Israel. In 1956 we saw the decline of British power and influence in the state of Jordan with the expulsion of Glubb Pasha, and I may say in passing that Glubb Pasha did his best to keep a state of peace existing between the state of Jordan and the state of Israel. Nasser's subsequent success in creating a unified military command along with Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, thereby hemming in Israel with the object of destroying Israel, has created great concern in that area. We will recall that the difficulty of the Israeli government in securing arms to counteract the weight of Soviet gifts and sales of arms to Egypt and Syria was another source of discord. And last but not least, the training by ex-Nazi and Soviet advisers in the art of massacre and annihilation pushed matters forward to such an extent that Israeli statesmen had to take a definite step.

I ask the question, therefore, what should a responsible Israeli statesman have done in the face of the open threats that had been made by every Arab leader over a period of years and that were now backed up by Soviet arms and by a new Egyptian-Jordanian-Syrian joint command?

The Egyptians have openly stated that the armistice agreement of 1948 did not end the state of war. On these grounds the Egyptians barred Israeli ships from the Suez canal and fortified the straits of Aqaba to prevent Israeli ships reaching its only port on the Red sea, namely Elath.

In that connection it might be of interest to examine the legality of Egypt's possession of the islands at the entrance to the Red sea. I think you will find they were leased by Saudi-Arabia to Egypt and the legal title of Saudi-Arabia to them is open to serious doubt.

All of these facts are public knowledge and I do not need to repeat them in order to make my point. Again I would ask the question, what should Israel have done? She is the only state in the Middle East unable to get a treaty of friendship and alliance with any great power. She has good friends, but in the game of power politics neither the United Nations nor the great powers are ready to apply measures for the protection of Israel's security.

It seems to me that these are some of the reasons why Israel moved into Sinai during October last. I think it is axiomatic that no prospective victim, whether an individual or a state, need sit and wait until the enemy is upon him.

It is not worth winning the sympathy of the world by an act of extreme forbearance at the risk of losing your life. It seems to me that this is an act which reasonable men under similar circumstances would have committed.

All of this is now past history and we have practical problems to solve. We must help to solve them as Canadians, as members of the United Nations, as the senior partner in the commonwealth and as a friend of the United States.

Already we have made a major contribution in the leadership of a program to establish and to operate the United Nations emergency force. Our view of that force, as expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), a view that appears in the November 2 resolution of the general assembly, is that the cease fire would be accompanied by a program of settlement.

Perhaps I might digress for just a moment. It seems to me that the problem in the Middle East is this: First, we had to stop the fighting; second, we have to clear the Suez; third, we have to bring a solution to the over-all general problems. We have stopped the fighting and I hope we are in the process of clearing the Suez although I have grave doubts about it.

But the third sphere of influence still persists, the need of an over-all settlement. I do not see how you can divide these three sections; they have to be taken together. If there is no over-all settlement negotiated, and I submit this will be difficult, it must be imposed by the great powers. Without an over-all settlement, anything else that we might do would not amount to very much.

Any other conception of United Nations activity would, it seems to me, be hard to accept. As a Canadian I could not tolerate the tragic humiliation of Anglo-French power and interests unless there were a lasting compensation of satisfaction for their vital interests in that area, namely some suitable machinery to protect the Suez from unilateral Egyptian control, and reasonable assurance that British and western interests in the Persian gulf are not going to be the subject of perpetual Arab cold and hot warfare.

Equally it would be a sad day for Canadian responsibility for the emergency force if its tasks were over the moment the Israeli were thrown back to the 1949 armistice line. This could never have been the intention of wiser heads in the general assembly. It must have been foreseen at that time that the status quo which caused all these troubles could never be reasserted and that instead some new ideas must be accepted by the assembly and supported by the great powers to bring a lasting peace with justice to all peoples in that region.

Mr. Churchill: Does not the resolution most recently passed by the United Nations restore the status quo by urging the army of Israel to withdraw from the Gaza strip?

Mr. Macnaughton: I only know what I have read in the reports in the press as of Saturday and this morning. I have not had an opportunity to see the actual resolution and decide whether it does or does not. My position is that there can be no settlement of the Middle East situation until the great powers enforce an over-all solution. They have the power to do it and I think the time has come for them to do it. As you probably know, at the United Nations 5 per cent for it is better than no per cent at all.

It is true that long-term settlements are difficult to plan and envisage, but there are some very important and immediate problems with which it seems to me the United Nations and the great powers should deal in relation to Israel, Egypt and the Arab states. I should like to list these for analysis.

I maintain that the necessity for the recognition of Israel as a state and working part of the Middle East should now be decided. I maintain that we must give recognition to the state of Israel and remove therefrom the threats to her security. By that I mean the elimination of border raids, the stopping or calling off of the economic blockade by the Arab states, the refusal of passage to Israeli ships through the Suez and a guarantee of open access through the Red sea and the gulf of Aqaba.

Since so much contention surrounds the future of the Gaza strip I maintain that it should not be returned to Egypt. It never was a part of Egyptian sovereignty. It points at the heart of Israel and in the past has been the location of raids against that country. It forms no part of the Egyptian economy and it is not needed for the security of Egypt.

I maintain also that the refugee problem should be broached in the spirit of constructive statesmanship. The cost of resettlement of those refugees in the Gaza strip and in other Arab states could be shared by the United Nations and the great powers as well as by Israel itself. There is plenty of land in the surrounding Arab states, as a short visit to the area would indicate clearly, on which these refugees could be settled to their benefit as well as the future benefit of the countries in which they are settled.

There is another point of important economic consequence and I refer of course to the Johnston plan for the settlement of the Jordanian water dispute. It is hard for us who live in a country like Canada to realize the importance of water to other countries. Water is the lifeblood of the economy of this area. Water is going to waste in the Jordan river and the Jordan lakes because of a refusal to use it and distribute it among the countries that need it. There is no reason why a settlement of the Jordanian water dispute, which is so important to Israel and Jordan, should not be included in an over-all settlement.

This is a time of trouble not only for the Arabs but for all of us. The Middle East is caught in serious pressure moves and plays which makes it all the more important for the United Nations and countries with experience in the Middle East to urge the Arab people to consider their long-range needs and the great burdens they bear, by refusing to use their energies to resolve their real problems, rather than to dissipate their energies in hatred of a neighbouring state.

Israel can offer a great deal to its neighbours in the way of technical skill, idealism and standards of public responsibility. The Arab nations can offer Israel a sense of kinship with the Middle East, for after all the Jewish people have been in existence for some 5,000 years and originally came from that part of the world. The Arab nations can offer Israel a market for its products and they can also contribute part of their culture from the Levant to the culture which is rapidly rising in the new Hebrew society.

In the Middle East the level of economic development is far behind the rate required for adequate living standards for the majority of the people. A regional capital and technical assistance plan would be a contribution of the first magnitude to the development of stability in the Middle East. I am sure that Israel could contribute to this plan its share by way of brains, experience and devotion which would form a counterpart to the capital to be provided by the western and other nations of the United Nations.

Some students of the British mandate and its future in Palestine had hoped that one day

British Palestine would form another dominion in our commonwealth.

I think it is obvious that this hope is now gone, but this does not mean that the commonwealth should now abandon Israel.

Canada, as the senior partner in that commonwealth, may find itself performing a great historic function in its present role of influence between Israel and her Arab neighbours—a function that could bring deep and lasting benefit not only to Israel but to the Middle East and to all mankind.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with some urgent problems which face a great many citizens of Canada at this time. A little later, I wish to make some references affecting the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). It seems to me that at this time the parliament of Canada should initiate legislation to increase old age pensions, to increase the family allowances, to provide for a system of health insurance for Canadians, to provide legislation to improve the position of veterans in this country, to provide legislation to enable the municipalities to discharge their important responsibilities, and to provide legislation which would enable the agriculture industry to share in the great wealth that is being produced in this nation.

Mr. McIvor: And reduce taxes.

Mr. Argue: There can be no question but that Canada today is producing tremendous wealth. The gross national product, which stood at some $12 billion in 1946, had increased to nearly $30 billion by 1956, an increase of roughly two and a half times in ten years. In the light of this tremendous production of wealth it seems to me that the government should no longer hesitate to provide legislation such as would enable all Canadians to share in this production.

We already have some important social security legislation on the statute books of this nation. A Liberal government has been in power for many years and it has been the lot of the Liberal government to introduce such legislation as old age pensions, family allowances, grants to hospitals, legislation to continue the Canadian wheat board and so on, and I give the government every credit that is due to it for having presented such legislation to the House of Commons. To the extent that the Liberal party can take credit for these measures I give them credit too, but I feel that members of the C.C.F. party have also over many years played an important part pioneering in this field and in building up public opinion to demand such legislation. The government, while presenting legislation at different times to improve the lot of certain Canadians, has, I am afraid, not been doing so primarily with the object of helping the people affected. The overriding consideration which guides the Liberal party today is to do those things that it hopes will bring votes when election day comes around; anything that may be done to help the old age pensioners or improve family allowances or assist in any of these important matters is done as a secondary consideration. I think this contention can readily be proved.

The last time old age pensions were increased in this country was in April 1949 when they were increased to the present figure of $40 a month. Since 1949, inflation and the ever-increasing cost of living have taken away a substantial part of the pension in terms of the 1949 dollar. What has happened to the old age pension because of inflation, because of policies followed by this government, has happened to the family allowance legislation. I believe the Family Allowances Act is one of the best pieces of legislation that has been placed on the statute books of this country. But every month since that legislation came into effect the government has stood idly by while inflation, the rising cost of living, has eaten away a considerable part of the purchasing power of that allowance until today the purchasing power of the allowance cheque is probably 40 per cent less than it was in 1944 when the act was first brought in. Thus the government, while bringing forward legislation from time to time to help certain people of this country, has stood aside while inflation, like a thief in the night, has robbed them of something that should be there and which should be protected. The very government that brought in family allowance legislation has demonstrated to the people of Canada since 1944 that its overriding purpose, its guiding purpose, at that time was not to help Canadian families—though it did do that—but to endeavour to win the 1945 election.

They won that election, albeit by a very narrow margin, since when the government has been content not only to do nothing about improving the family allowances but to allow them to deteriorate and wither away.

Today there is a great deal of talk about a health program. Well, talk of a health program is no novelty in the Liberal party. They have been talking about it in this country since 1919 and since that time successive Liberal governments have used the hope of a health insurance plan as a means of garnering votes. But they have so far done very little about it, and today parliament is in an unhappy position because of the government's policy. The government has said to Premier Frost of Ontario: "We are voluntarily giving you the power of veto; we are giving you the power to prevent Canadians in other provinces getting a health insurance plan because we will not give the plan to Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia until Ontario and some other provinces agree to come in." The conclusion seems unavoidable that there seems little hope at this moment of any provincial Liberal government in this country agreeing to participate in this plan. If and when the people of Canada ever have a health insurance program it will only be because public opinion has put pressure on the Liberal party both here in the federal parliament and in the various provinces to agree at long last to do something about their promises and pledges of 1919.

We hear a lot of talk about an election now. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) announced this morning that the election would definitely be held this year and that his budget will be brought in, he expects, just before the dissolution. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the government is mentioning dissolution from time to time and the possibility of an election at an early date for one main reason—to condition the mass of Canadians to the prospect of an early election, because this government is just as fearful of an election campaign today as it has been in past election years. They would like to have an election date early so that the rural constituencies, who are important in numbers even if they are no longer considered by the government to be important economically, will not have a chance to participate by way of attending public meetings and taking a full part in the election —an opportunity which would be open to them if the election were held at a more convenient time.

So the government is hoping now, with public opinion running against it, to sandwich in an election at an early date in order that opposition parties generally will not have the advantage of a strenuous campaign during which they could take the issues adequately before the public in the constituencies to which I have referred.

The government is apparently doing nothing or very little to solve the problems affecting municipalities. As a matter of fact, the general policies of the government are designed to make it harder for municipal governments to provide adequate services. Municipalities find it more difficult now to finance the construction of public buildings and streets and providing sewer and water works. Almost weekly the cost of financing municipal ventures goes up. The government's so-called tight money policy is a policy that is hurting the ordinary Canadian. It is hurting the municipalities, it is hurting the people who want to build homes, but it is not hurting the great corporations of this country that have adequate finances within their corporations to undertake most of their capital expenditures or which are in a monopoly position and are able to pass on to the consumer through higher retail prices any additional cost that may now be entailed in financing capital expenditures.

I submit that the Liberal party by its record is no longer a liberal party. It is a party of the status quo. It is a party of vested interests. It is a party which gives something to the ordinary Canadian most reluctantly. It amuses me when Liberal speakers get up and embrace the C.C.F. Winnipeg declaration of principles adopted at our national convention last year and assert that the C.C.F. has abandoned its principles and has become a liberal party. I venture to say that not a single Liberal member who has made such a statement has read the Winnipeg declaration because in it they will find the greatest castigation possible of the Liberal party and the policies it follows. I quote one short paragraph from page 1:

> In spite of great economic expansion, large sections of our people do not benefit adequately from the increased wealth produced. Greater wealth and economic power continue to be concentrated in the hands of a relatively few private corporations.

Listen to this.

> The gap between those at the bottom and those at the top of the economic scale has widened.

It is interesting to hear Liberal members stand up and agree that their policies have been such a dismal failure and that the gap between the people at the bottom of the ladder and those at the top is widening at this time.

There is a whole industry in this nation that is sick and almost in danger of dying because of the policies followed at times by the government and because at other times of lack of policies and adequate action. I refer, of course, to the agricultural industry. It is true there has been some improvement in recent months. It is true that recently there has been some increase in farm cash income. That increase has been brought about mainly because of increased exports of grain. But before hon. members opposite conclude too hastily that all is well with the agricultural industry, I suggest that they read the statements being made by prominent agricultural people, people associated with the farmers' union, the interprovincial farm union council and the wheat pool organization. I should like them to read some of the statements made recently by J. H. Wesson, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. In such statements they will find that agricultural leaders across the nation are more concerned with the plight of the agricultural industry at this time than they have ever been at any time since the end of the war, and well they might be.

I have here the Economic Annalist published by the marketing service of the Department of Agriculture. It takes as the base period for the cost of production index for farmers and as the base period for the prices of agricultural products the years 1935 to 1939 as equalling 100. Since that time the economists have plotted the changes in the index of prices of agricultural products and the changes in the index of the farmers' cost of production.

In 1946, with a gross national product of $12 billion, the index of farm products was 204 and the index for the cost of production was 157. In other words, in 1946 prices for agricultural products had a 30 per cent greater purchasing power in terms of the farmers' cost of production than they had in the late 1930's. In 1956 there is an entirely different picture. Prices for agricultural products have gone up little in the ten year period. They have gone up to 232.5 while the cost of production index has gone up to 254, that is now beyond the index of prices of agricultural commodities. Therefore, according to the economists in the Department of Agriculture who publish the Economic Annalist, the purchasing power of agricultural commodities today is 9 per cent lower than the purchasing power in the years 1935 to 1939.

What a condemnation that is of the Minister of Agriculture and the Liberal government, which took office in 1935, that since that time over a period of 22 years have allowed agriculture to drift into a position where the purchasing power of agricultural commodities today is worth less than it was in the dark depression days of 1935 to 1939! Our farmers did not expect this to happen. The government presented the Agricultural Prices Support Act to the House of Commons toward the end of the war and they wrote into the act these words:

> The board shall endeavour . . . to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

They promptly forgot their many promises to the farmers and the people of Canada generally and allowed agriculture to drift into its present very sorry state. We have a Minister of Agriculture all right, and I see by the public accounts that he is quite a traveller.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a generous remark.

Mr. Argue: He travelled to such an extent that his expenses were twice as high as those of any other cabinet minister. With all this travelling I do not know where he went because he seemed to spend nearly all his time in Ottawa or the province of Saskatchewan. However, in spite of his travelling apparently he has failed to discover that Canada's agricultural policies are among the poorest of any nation anywhere in the world. Only Canada fails to provide a system of adequate support prices. Where was the Minister of Agriculture last fall? I do not think he was in Ottawa too often.

An hon. Member: In Alberta.

Mr. Argue: In Alberta, yes, and in Saskatchewan, tramping around western Canada.

Mr. Hansell: Mending fences.

Mr. Argue: Mending broken Liberal fences, and there are lots of them. They are breaking down all over western Canada. The minister was out there lining up the old Jimmy Gardiner political machine. It is pretty rusty and in a bad state of repair in many places, but the minister says it is good for one more run and he is going to make the best use of it he can. If a stranger had come to Saskatchewan last fall not knowing who the Minister of Agriculture was, I am sure that from looking at the Leader-Post and other daily newspapers he would have thought that the minister was a paid organizer for the Saskatchewan Liberal party and had never been east of Fort William.

The minister said a lot of things about agricultural problems. When he was asked what the farmers should do about the tremendous surplus that some of them had on their farms, his general attitude was: Do not worry, fellows; I have been through the United States and they have got a big drought down there. Apparently he has taken to sun-gazing because he has been saying that sooner or later a drought is going to come to western Canada. His attitude to the surplus grain problem is this. He says to the farmers: Do not worry; I know you are broke because you have got too much wheat but sooner or later there will be a couple of dry years and you will sell your wheat and you will then be broke because you no longer have any wheat. In the meantime he goes along, as I say, oiling up his defunct and discredited political machine.

I have in my hand the very excellent brief presented by the interprovincial farm union council and the Canadian Labour Congress to the government of Canada on December 5, 1956 expressing concern at the state of the agricultural industry and the substantial unemployment in the farm implement industry. I think this brief demonstrates that farm organizations and labour organizations can co-operate with each other and that they should do so; that their interests are not opposed one to the other but rather that they have a common interest in securing a decent standard of living for the working people of this nation, whether they work on the farms or in the industries.

We had some extremely interesting information given to us about this conference. It was given to the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson), the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) and me by Chris. Hansen, the president of the Saskatchewan Farmers Union. He told of the interview they had had with the cabinet when they were presenting this brief. It was a committee of the cabinet meeting the Canadian Labour Congress and the Interprovincial Farm Union Council. The meeting was presided over by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in the chair. Mr. Hansen informed us that they had had what they felt was a very good hearing, that the hearing seemed to be about over and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was about ready to adjourn the meeting when the Minister of Agriculture pipes up and says, "Well, I heard a lot this afternoon about falling farm income, but I have just come back from western Canada and I saw no sign out there of a falling in farm income". He said, "I had no complaint from any farmer in the west about a drop in farm income except from one who said his income had now fallen off to the point that he had to sell his aeroplane". That from the Minister of Agriculture! The Minister of Agriculture makes such a ridiculous statement to a conference discussing an extremely important matter.

We have heard a great deal in this house about the western farmers going to Florida and California for the winter. If one or two per cent should get there, why not? It seems to me that the Liberals opposite think it is a crime if a farmer should ever get the chance to take a holiday. They like to create the impression in eastern Canada, apparently, that the farmers out west all leave the farm in the winter. The Minister of Agriculture now is determined to create the impression that at the present time the farmers in the west have lots of money, that they are hopping around from one piece of land to another in an aeroplane. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that illustration shows just how low this government has fallen in its attitude toward the farmers of this nation.

I was invited to take part in a panel discussion that was to take place at the Saskatchewan Farmers Union convention in Saskatoon in mid-December last. There was to be representation from each political party. I was glad to accept. However, a few days after I had accepted the invitation, I received a telegram from the president saying that the panel was off and that he would send me a letter of explanation which would follow. I have the letter here. I am not going to read all of it but it says in part as follows:

> However, in order for the panel to be of value it was necessary that we have a representation from the Liberal party present to speak on behalf of the present government. Since originally contacting you we have made several attempts to have a representative of the government take part in the panel but in each case they have refused.

I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture no longer has the courage to confront a meeting sponsored by a bona fide farm organization in western Canada to discuss in public, with representatives of other political parties, his discredited agricultural program. Apparently he does not dare to come to such a meeting. I should be quite happy, Mr. Speaker, to discuss with the Minister of Agriculture on a public platform anywhere in this nation, at a meeting sponsored by a farm organization, the way his policies and those of his government are undermining and destroying the agricultural industry of this nation and forcing thousands of farmers to leave their homes in discouragement because they are unable to make ends meet.

The Minister of Agriculture was in Saskatchewan. He did not spend all his time in his home constituency. He came down into Assiniboia constituency and to other constituencies in western Canada. The Jimmy Gardiner political machine was prepared to go into Assiniboia and to take things over in an important way, because the Minister of Agriculture was quite happy to come to a convention where they chose as their political candidate somebody who has acquired a reputation for transferring from one political party to another. I would not call him a second-hand candidate. He has become a third-hand political candidate. Prior to that convention there was a great deal of speculation as to where the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) would run. Many constituencies in this country were mentioned as possibilities. But I notice there seemed to be unanimous agreement of opinion that there was one constituency in this country above all others that hon. member would never contest, namely his own constituency of Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. Rather than stand there for election, he would leave that constituency.

If the Liberal party think, as they may, that they have found a new recruit who has embraced Liberal principles, they should never forget the timing of his leaving the independent group and going across the floor. It was not during or before the last Saskatchewan provincial election. It was after the election. It was after the political demise of the independent provincial candidate, one Dick Lillicoe in the constituency of Moose Jaw. He was not able to make the grade and so the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre felt that there was no hope in that constituency as an independent and that therefore he would be obliged to look elsewhere. Apparently the Social Credit party had taken such a shellacking in that election that he found it impossible to adopt their principles. So he has gone into the Liberal party.

He has made a speech in this house already this session. In it did he deal with the things about which the Liberals are talking in this house at this time such as improvement in social security legislation? Did he ask for measures to help the farmers of western Canada and the people of Saskatchewan? No; he did not do that. He said that anybody who has not enough money now, in this inflationary time, to make a substantial payment when he is getting something on credit should be forced to pay at least one-quarter or one-third down. Then he said that if the Minister of Finance should decide on a tax reduction for the people of this country, they should not be given it now; in other words, they should be given a glance at the carrot and perhaps a little whiff of the aroma but in order to taste the carrot he would force them to wait a three-year or a five-year period, presumably so that the carrot could be used all over again for the same purpose in another election. I do not believe the people of Canada will fall for that political bait.

I notice that the hon. member was out to Vancouver not too long ago. He made a speech out there or at least he had a press interview, parts of which he has denied subsequently; but I am not going to refer to any of the parts that have been amended and changed. According to the press report he had this to say about the Prime Minister:

> Mr. Thatcher predicted Prime Minister St. Laurent will "ride the election and retire six months after" . . .

There we have, from a Liberal member, a statement that the Prime Minister is going into this election under what are patently false colours, that his intentions are camouflaged and that he is hiding from the people of Canada his intention to resign as leader of the Liberal party within six months after the election.

I do not believe that the Prime Minister has those intentions. I believe if he heads the Liberal party in this election that in his own mind he will sincerely intend to stay in office a sufficient length of time to see the proposals which he makes placed in legislative form. But according to the member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre the Prime Minister of this country will face the Canadian people in an act of deceit and deception. The hon. member can explain that.

Then the article goes on to state that the hon. member predicted after the Prime Minister retires he will leave the government in the hands of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Fisheries. Then listen to this: ". . . whom he described as the most brilliant man in the house." Well, now apparently the Prime Minister is a second rater and is playing second fiddle to the most brilliant member in the House of Commons, the Minister of Fisheries. We have heard nothing previously about his ability from the government side of the house, but according to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre the most brilliant man is now sitting in the second row.

Then as to the leadership of the Liberal party, the hon. member says that the Minister of Fisheries will be the Prime Minister within 10 years anyway. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare probably has aspirations in that direction. The name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has been mentioned in that connection as one who might make a suitable Prime Minister. The name of the Minister of Finance has been mentioned often by those who say he is an excellent political strategist. The name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration used to be mentioned but I have not heard it mentioned lately. However, I have not seen the name of the Minister of Fisheries mentioned at all, but according to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre if the Minister of Finance should become leader of the Liberal party, and some day the prime minister, he will not hold the position long because the Minister of Fisheries will be breathing on his neck and it will not be long until he becomes prime minister and takes over from the Minister of Finance.

Then, to further ridicule in a somewhat indirect way the Prime Minister and government of this country, the hon. member had this to say in relation to Premier Bennett of British Columbia. He said that he had met Mr. Bennett twice and was impressed with his obvious ability. The hon. member said

Premier Bennett struck him as being a pretty able Canadian. He said that in British Columbia the Social Credit have been doing some rather sensible things and seemed to be giving a good business government. Every time the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre stands up in this house he tries to tell us why this government is not following good business practices. He has found a good business government in British Columbia but not here. I wonder why he has been cuddling up to Social Credit out in British Columbia. He says he has been offered the leadership of the Social Credit party in Saskatchewan on a number of occasions. I have heard conflicting reports about that. Apparently he wants to remain in the good graces of the Social Credit party so that if he needs another escape route at any time he will have it open and he can apply for admission to the Social Credit party.

In order to show that no Social Credit member would be fooled by these reports the leader of the Social Credit group, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), had to set the record straight. In a report in the Western Producer dated October 25, 1956 the leader of the Social Credit group said that the Social Credit leadership in Saskatchewan never was offered to Ross Thatcher, Moose Jaw M.P.

I noticed that the Prime Minister, in his speech at the opening of the house, defended the government's support price under butter. I have often said, and I repeat, that I believe the government support price on butter is one of the best pieces of agricultural legislation the government has in effect and the only support price that works adequately. There is one person in this house, however, who does not like the support price on butter. Only one member of parliament has ever said that the farmers who milk cows, who ship cream to get a few dollars to pay the grocery bills, to send the children to school, to buy clothing for the family, are getting too much for a can of cream. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre said on February 10 last as recorded at page 1076 of Hansard:

> I think the government's butter policy is short-sighted and economically unwise.

I am pleased that the Prime Minister has defended this policy against someone who now sits with his own party. I am afraid that from the record the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre is just as much a misfit today as he has ever been, that his ideas are just about as far removed from those of Liberalism as the ox cart is from the atomic age.

I believe that agriculture needs legislation at this time to improve its position. I suggest that this is the time, at this session, for the government to introduce a system of parity prices for agricultural products; and the interim and final payments on the 1955 crop should be announced at a very early date. I suggest that advance payments and farm storage for grain should be made part of the permanent legislation of this country, and that the government should inaugurate a system of crop insurance for agriculture. The prairie farm assistance maximum payment of $500 in 1939 is today worth only about $200 because of inflation. Now is the time to at least double the prairie farm assistance.

I suggest that in the field of social security payments the government should increase old age pensions to at least $65 to everyone reaching the age of 65; that family allowances should be increased to at least the point of restoring their 1944 value which would require an increase of 60 per cent. I believe the government should announce now a health program which can be implemented by all those provinces presently willing to adopt such a program. I suggest further that in order to alleviate the position of the municipalities the government should change its financial policy and its credit restrictions to enable the municipality to borrow money to finance essential works, and at a rate not greater than 4 per cent. The government should provide assistance for an adequate road program in this country.

These are some of the things Canadians need. We can afford them. Our wealth production is 2½ times that of 1946. Instead of being content with the social security program and a farm program which is much worse than it was in 1946, I suggest that legislation should be advanced to improve the position even beyond the level of 1946. I suggest that at this time Canada should be doing more in international affairs to help the underprivileged of the world. I think we are in an excellent position to promote democracy and to help stem the advancing tide of communism by providing a greater number of technicians to underdeveloped countries; by providing more support for the Colombo plan and the United Nations organization; by at times taking whatever quantity of food may be necessary from our great surplus to prevent famine in the countries of Asia and Africa and other distressed areas of the world. I suggest the people of Canada are generous and that they are prepared to play a more important part in providing assistance to the underprivileged people of the world. I suggest that Canadians generally would agree with the statement, which I paraphrase, made by the C.C.F. national convention in 1956, namely, that we will not rest content until every person in this land and in all other lands is able to enjoy equality and freedom, a sense of human dignity and an opportunity to live a rich and meaningful life as a citizen of a free and peaceful world. I suggest that is an objective for 1957 to which every Canadian might direct his energy and ability.

Mr. A. B. Weselak (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, may I, like those hon. members who have preceded me in this debate, extend my heartiest congratulations to the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna), and to the seconder, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) for the splendid and capable manner in which they discharged the respective duties assigned to them. May I also extend my heartiest congratulations to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) on his elevation to the position of leader of the official opposition. We in western Canada take pride in that one of our number has been selected to fill this high post.

The speech from the throne reflects the conditions under which parliament met for this current session. Serious problems faced the world in the international sphere, and at home we were in the midst of a serious railway strike which had thrown 67,000 people out of work and had tied up thousands of miles of railway track.

The greater part of the constituency of Springfield, which I have the honour to represent, is served by the Canadian Pacific Railway; and while alternative service is generally available by trucks and buses, nevertheless the strike did result in the complete stoppage of grain deliveries to elevators which now are practically always filled. It probably would not have been so serious to us if the farmers in that particular area had had reasonably good crops over the last three years, and if they had received a reasonable amount of cash over that period. This, however, was not the case. The financial position of these farmers can be readily appreciated when it is noted that the average yield in my immediate area for the 1954-55 crop year was 9½ bushels per acre as compared with a long-term average yield of 19.7 bushels.

In the crop year 1955-56, on a quota of 3 bushels to an acre, practically all the grain in the district was cleared out. This year a reasonably good crop was harvested, though considerable difficulty was experienced in gathering it in due to wet weather and frost, which resulted in increased expense, loss of yield and also deterioration of grade due to moisture and frost; therefore the prospect of a lengthy tie-up of rail facilities did not appeal to the people in that area.

I think we all appreciate the struggle labour has had in the past century to achieve the right to organize and also to obtain the right to strike, which is its most effective weapon when all other mediums fail. If one has this appreciation it is difficult to state that this right which has been earned through suffering and privation should be arbitrarily taken away from any group in our labour force. On the other hand the right to strike, particularly when the strike is of the nature of the recent railway strike, must be exercised with responsibility by the leaders of union groups and by the rank and file and therefore, as I have said, it must be carefully exercised. Abuse of this right could very well result in public opinion becoming such that in certain spheres of activity within the country the right would be restricted or in fact taken away, as it has been in some jurisdictions, in the public interest. We certainly hope this will never be necessary in relation to the railroads, and it will not be necessary if organized labour continues to face up to its responsibility.

Management, too, has an overriding responsibility to the public to negotiate in good faith, particularly since where railways are involved there exists the responsibility to take into consideration the public interest and welfare. We in western Canada are particularly affected when events such as the recent strike occur. We are dependent solely upon rail transportation in many areas; and even in areas with alternative service we depend upon rail transportation for manufactured goods from the industrial areas of the east to meet our needs and we depend almost wholly upon rail transportation for the export of our production both of grain and of animals.

Our farmers and local businessmen are having a difficult enough time at present without being subjected to the further losses which naturally flow from such an event. It was therefore reasonable to expect that farm and political leaders of western Canada did not take kindly to the strike and expressed opinions which were critical of it. The people of western Canada, however, were not prepared to settle this matter and have trains operating at any price. Since 1945, according to the Gordon report, the railways have been granted permission to introduce horizontal increases in freight rates on eight separate occasions in order to offset increases in their operating costs. The adjustments which have been allowed total an increase of somewhat more than 100 per cent over the rates prevailing in 1945.

It is common knowledge that these increases do not affect Ontario and Quebec, where alternative transportation facilities exist, to the extent that they affect the economies of the maritimes and the western provinces. Any increase in freight rates increases the cost of production and the cost of living on the prairies, since prairie consumers must pay the freight on incoming goods. Increases in freight rates also reduce the gross income of western producers, since the cost of freight on produce shipped to eastern markets or ports of export are also deducted from the prices paid to producers for their product. The net result is that costs are increased, revenues reduced and net incomes seriously affected.

Representatives of farm organizations and of provincial governments appearing before the board of transport commissioners in freight rate hearings have insisted on economies in railway operation, and have insisted upon proof from the railway in justification of increased costs. Therefore the attitude of many people in western Canada is that if economies can be effected without prejudice to the general public, the railways should be required and permitted to effect such economies.

As we all know, the issue over which the strike was called was the question of whether firemen should be retained in yard and freight diesels. The railways contended that on diesel engines firemen were not required for their operation, and therefore their services should be dispensed with in all except passenger locomotives. The union on the other hand contended that firemen in the cabs of these engines were essential to public safety. The matter of public safety is one in which the general public of Canada has a definite interest; therefore there appeared to be some merit in the firemen's case.

If firemen are not needed for these purposes it would be ridiculous for the railways to keep these men in the cab. On the other hand, if the safety of the public is endangered the price to be paid for this safety factor is inconsequential compared to the possible loss of life, equipment and freight. The issue had to be resolved, and resolved it was, through the mediation and untiring efforts of the right hon. Prime Minister, who was able to bring the parties together and bring them to common ground, where finally both parties agreed to submit the issue to an investigating body for analysis and determination. The findings of this board should determine the matter as between the parties, and should remove from the public mind the doubt which exists there as to whether, from a safety point of view, firemen should be removed from the cabs of these locomotives or retained.

The Conservative amendment accuses the government of indifference, inertia and lack of leadership. The settlement of this strike by the right hon. Prime Minister in my view, and I think in the view of most Canadians, refutes this charge and shows that the leader of this government is not indifferent to the welfare of the people of Canada; shows not inertia but aggressiveness; not lack of leadership but outstanding leadership in times of considerable difficulty.

Before leaving the question of railways and freight rates I should like to make one more point. The preliminary report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, commonly known as the Gordon report, suggests among other things that additional revenues to meet rising costs of railway operation might be obtained in the future by increasing the statutory rates on grain.

Obviously the reference is to the Crowsnest pass agreement of 1897, in which the C.P.R. agreed, in return for a cash subsidy of $3,404,702 and a grant by the British Columbia government of 3,602,000 acres of land, to reduce the rate on grain and flour by 3 cents per hundredweight from the prairies to the head of the lakes. Subsequently, in 1927, this rate was extended to Pacific coast ports. As an alternative the Gordon report suggests that the railways be paid a subsidy in lieu of increased rates on grain being transported to the lakehead or Pacific coast ports.

There is no suggestion by the government that it has any intention of repealing the legislation which incorporates the Crowsnest pass agreement rates; nevertheless there seems to be some public support for this as the result of certain statements made in the past by railway officials and others that these rates are responsible for some of the financial difficulties experienced by the railways. The mere fact that these rates were set approximately 60 years ago does not necessarily imply that they are not still profitable, and there is plenty of reliable evidence to show that these rates are profitable to the railways.

We have only to go to the report of the Turgeon royal commission of 1950-51, where a detailed study was made of these rates, to find authoritative evidence in support of the statement that they are profitable. The report of the commission reads in part:

> Much time has been taken to consider whether it has been established that the Crowsnest pass rates hitherto exempt from the burden of general freight rate increases, should now be made subject to them. As above stated the removal of this exemption is asked for principally on the ground that it casts an unfair burden on shippers of other commodities. This argument seems plausible in theory but an examination of all the facts involved shows that it is not well founded. There is really not much to be said against these rates in respect of their effect upon the railways.

We must remember that when the agreement was entered into, production of grain on the prairie provinces was about 35 million bushels per year. Today it is about one billion bushels, and naturally the unit cost of transportation falls with increased volume. In addition, technical advances in railroading since 1897 have resulted in an increase in the capacity of box cars from 60,000 to 120,000 pounds; handling of cars is automatic; trains are longer and motive power much more efficient, all resulting in lower cost of operation per unit bushel transported.

Apart from the Turgeon report we have only to go to the C.P.R. itself for further evidence, for early in 1956 in sworn testimony given before the board of transport commissioners Mr. Kenneth H. Brink, research officer of the C.P.R. stated "normally we depend on a good grain year for good net earnings". If a good grain year contributes to good net earnings, obviously such grains are not hauled at a loss but at a good profit under the Crowsnest rates; therefore no change in rates or subsidy in lieu thereof is justified.

If one examines the accounts of the C.P.R. as contained in their annual report he finds under the heading of land surplus account a cumulative surplus of $101,685,263, and finds that in the year 1954 net revenues from this account amounted to $9,406,406. In its recent campaign for higher freight rates and the abrogation of the Crowsnest pass agreement the C.P.R. has constantly sought to withhold from the railway end of its business the other income and land surplus accounts, and contrary to the statutes creating and endowing the C.P.R. it has arbitrarily divided its accounts in this manner since 1946.

When the railway was built through western Canada, by an agreement in December of 1880 the C.P.R. was given a cash grant of $25 million and 25 million acres of land fairly fit for settlement. The money in the land surplus account of the C.P.R., in violation of the statute, is kept apart by the railway from its operating accounts. This money is income derived in one form or another from land given to the C.P.R. by this parliament and the province of British Columbia. The purpose for which the land was given, as stated in the law, is to complete, equip, maintain and operate the railway in perpetuity.

To summarize, all available evidence indicates that the Crowsnest rates are profitable; that increasing, substantial revenues are received by the railway from lands granted in western Canada, and therefore charges that these rates undermine the operations of the railway are unfounded and unfair and should be ignored. The railways feel that if they could abrogate this agreement and raise the rates on grain and flour by 100 per cent as they have been raised on many other commodities they would gain from $70 million to $80 million a year at the expense of the western farmer.

Members from other parts of Canada may wonder at the strong and determined resistance of the west towards any change in these rates. This resistance is fully justified, and I hope my remarks here today will contribute toward a better understanding of this problem. The Canadian Pacific Railway through its propaganda has confused the thinking of many Canadians in this respect, and one has only to read the editorials of many leading eastern papers to see the extent to which it has succeeded. The Canadian National Railways to my knowledge have never complained of any losses accruing to them as a result of the Crowsnest pass rates.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) almost wholly embraces and speaks with general approval of the Gordon commission's recommendations.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege, if the hon. member will read my speech he will see that there were five specific topics only, so let there be no sweeping generalizations, please.

Mr. Weselak: In April of 1954 his party colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), spoke strongly in this house in favour of Crowsnest pass rates on grain and flour, and the Winnipeg Free Press on April 14, 1954, had this to say editorially regarding the remarks of the Winnipeg member:

Mr. Churchill's unqualified commitment in favour of Crowsnest rates is welcome. However he should realize that in so speaking he was in so far as the Liberal party is concerned preaching to the converted.

Only one political party has opposed Crowsnest pass rates and presented itself to the electorate on a policy of repealing the statute and nullifying the agreement. That party is Mr. Churchill's party—the Conservative party. The Conservative party did so in 1925 and 1926. Mr. Meighen, then Conservative leader, declared that the Crowsnest pass agreement is a "special privilege". Likewise under Conservative direction an attempt was made to abolish Crowsnest pass rates at the 1919 special session called to deal with railway legislation.

In 1919, the Crowsnest pass agreement was saved by the Liberal party through the instrumentality of the late Senator Robert "Bob" Watson of Portage la Prairie. In 1925 and 1926 the electorate at large saved the Crowsnest pass rates by rejecting the Conservative party and electing the Liberal party.

Mr. Churchill will make a real contribution if he undertakes missionary work in behalf of the agreement in his own party.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Gordon commission's suggestion that statutory rates on grain could be increased, or that the government could provide in lieu thereof a form of subsidy, can only be based upon an assumption, which in fact does not exist, that the statutory rates are not profitable to the railways, when in fact they are, as shown not only by the findings of the Turgeon commission but by the evidence of one of their own research officers.

I hope I have made it clear that the existence of these rates does not constitute a hand-out to the western grain growers at the expense of other sectors of the economy. In this respect grain growers are paying their own way and in fact providing a profitable source of revenue to the railways.

A substantial part of the speech from the throne is devoted to Canada's participation in international affairs. This is as it should be, for while the official opposition may state that the government is not entitled to the confidence of the Canadian people by reason of its indifference, inertia and lack of leadership in serious international problems, the record of the government shows that the contrary is true in actual fact. We have only to examine the work done since the last war in connection with the formation and promotion of NATO by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to find an excellent example of co-operation and leadership in international matters. Is it likely that Canada's foreign minister would have been selected as one of the "three wise men" of NATO, to review its policies, if Canada had not in the past shown leadership in these matters?

In the sphere of international trade Canada has been a staunch supporter of the principles of GATT, and has constantly led in the fight toward the reduction and removal of trade barriers.

I had the privilege, Mr. Speaker, of attending the pre-Christmas session of the United Nations, and as a result of my experience I can certainly agree with Grant Dexter who, writing from New York on November 26, 1956, to the Winnipeg Free Press, states that his first impression on coming to United Nations headquarters and mixing with peoples of all nationalities was one of surprise and pleasure, and that Canada is almost a magic word at the United Nations. He reports that Canadian prestige is very high there because of the part Canada had played in halting the fighting in the Middle East and in creating a United Nations police force.

He goes on to point out that there is more to it than just this; that this was not Canada's first major contribution; that over the past 11 years Canada has made innumerable outstanding contributions to the constitution and development of the United Nations. He cites as examples the fact that three Canadians—Norman Robertson, presently high commissioner at London; Louis Rasminsky, now of the Bank of Canada, and the late Hume Wrong, for some years Canadian ambassador at Washington, rewrote the economic sections of the United Nations charter at San Francisco at the time the charter was born.

He further mentions that in 1947 and 1948, when Israel was created and the first conflict with the Arab states broke out, the Canadian government was one of the leading peacemakers. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs, then undersecretary of state, was on the committee which brought about the settlement which endured until just recently. It was partly in recognition of his outstanding service in this regard that Mr. Pearson became president of the United Nations, after becoming minister for external affairs.

He also cites the fact that last year the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as head of the Canadian delegation while the minister for external affairs was engaged on NATO business succeeded in breaking down the antagonism which had prevented admission of new members to the United Nations. As a result of his efforts 16 new members, including Ireland and Italy, were added. Four new members were accepted this year, proving that once broken the old rigidity is unlikely to return.

Mr. Dexter goes on to point out, Mr. Speaker, that veteran delegates to the United Nations said there have been few such occasions in the history of that organization as that when our minister reversed the headlong course of the Middle East debate, turning it from destructive to constructive purposes; and he adds that when President Eisenhower took the time on election day to telephone the Prime Minister at Ottawa to thank him for what Canada had done at the United Nations he was reflecting the feelings of all United Nations members outside the Soviet bloc.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's resolution has not solved the basic problems which caused the Middle East explosion, but it helped to stem the deterioration of a highly dangerous situation, brought about a cessation of hostilities and created a more favourable atmosphere in which to set in motion the peacemaking powers of the United Nations.

Apart from Canada's leadership in and contribution to NATO and the United Nations, the Prime Minister during the life of this parliament made a world tour in an effort to create a better understanding of Canada among the nations of the world. This has been followed by the recent commonwealth tour of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which will also contribute a great deal toward a better understanding of one another by the commonwealth peoples.

Reports indicate, Mr. Speaker, that there are now 8,500 Hungarian refugees in Canada; that by the end of February this number will be increased to 14,000, and that in the spring when employment opportunities are better another 10,000 will arrive in this country. In this humanitarian work Canada has a creditable record, and a great deal of credit is to be given to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for his personal attention and concern in this regard when he himself went to Austria to supervise the removal of these unfortunate people and the simplification of immigration processes.

It is encouraging to note that estimates of immigration for the year 1956 will exceed the 1955 figure, and that a very substantial rise in immigration is forecast for 1957. It is my opinion, and the opinion of many people in this country, that immigration should be encouraged; therefore the expected rise in these projected figures is welcome.

The speech from the throne makes reference to the excellent progress which is being made in our national development and this, sir, is not an exaggeration. I am pleased to say that we in Manitoba have shared in this development. Preliminary reports indicate that Manitoba manufacturers in 1956 produced a record of $625 million, as compared with $527 million in 1955. Retail sales increased by 7 to 10 per cent; carloadings in the western division by 37.7 per cent; mineral and oil production from $61 million to $65 million, and farm cash income for the first nine months of the year from $120 million in 1954 and 1955 to $143 million in 1956, attributable in great part to increased loadings of wheat.

One of the most dramatic events in the developing economy of Manitoba has been the decision of the International Nickel Company to start on the $175 million nickel project in the Mystery lake and Moak lake areas of Northern Manitoba. This mine is scheduled to go into production in 1960 and will be the world's second largest nickel operation, second only to International Nickel's operations in the Sudbury area. This project brings along with it development of the Grand Rapids power site, which will add to the energy sources of the province. In my own constituency the Lithium Corporation of Canada has begun operation of a lithium mine in the Cat lake area, and has plans for a mill in the vicinity. In the same area a copper mine is also in the early phases of development.

In connection with the Moak and Mystery lakes development, I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the government of Manitoba for their part in bringing this matter to a favourable conclusion, and in particular to the premier of Manitoba, the minister of mines and the former provincial treasurer, Mr. R. D. Turner. These men worked unceasingly with officials of the company in the interests of the province to make this project become a reality.

We are pleased, Mr. Speaker, in my province to see developments such as I have described both provincially and nationally, but our pleasure is dampened when we recognize that a certain sector of our economy which, while recently showing some improvement, is not fully sharing the prosperity of the country. I refer to the agricultural people of Canada.

The speech from the throne recognizes this problem, and recognizes the need for long-term planning and bold imaginative measures to establish Canadian agriculture on a sound economic basis. The establishment of a committee to consider what should be done to make better use of land for agriculture in the light of the benefits we have obtained from the operation of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is a welcome step in this direction and should contribute toward a solution of the problem.

This, however, is not the complete answer, and unfortunately the Gordon report does not contribute a great deal toward a solution of the problem.

The solution certainly does not lie in curbing and discouraging production. It does not lie, as suggested in the Gordon report, in a negative approach such as the curtailment of prairie farm assistance payments to discourage use of lands where there has been a high record of crop failure, an indirect way of squeezing farmers off farms. It lies in a positive approach to the problem as suggested in the speech from the throne, through such things as relocation of farm population from submarginal lands with government assistance, encouraged diversification of farm production, extension of farm credit for capital purposes, and a more extended use of the Agricultural Prices Support Act to guarantee the farmer a reasonable return pricewise for the goods he produces. The recommendations in the report are worthy of study, but should be scrutinized very carefully before any attempt is made to implement some of them.

I should like to say a few words about the reference in the speech from the throne to continuation of the Canadian wheat board as the sole marketing agency for western wheat, oats and barley. As stated in the Gordon report, this method of marketing wheat and coarse grains is generally accepted by the grain growers of western Canada, and its establishment was the result of many years of consistent effort on the part of the farmers to obtain orderly and stable marketing of their grains. This system of marketing, not surprisingly, has been the subject of some attack by certain groups in western Canada, and this can be expected when periods of congestion exist such as we have recently experienced. In 1955 the Canadian Chamber of Commerce went so far as to pass a resolution condemning agricultural marketing through government agencies. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that such a resolution is not in accord with a great weight of farm thinking, particularly in so far as the marketing of wheat, oats and barley is concerned.

The continuance of this legislation is a must. Its importance can best be illustrated by the fact that economists estimate that if today marketing of wheat were to be taken from the jurisdiction of the wheat board and turned over to the trade the market price of No. 1 Northern would not be $1.69 at Fort William and $1.71 at Vancouver, but likely somewhere between 80 and 90 cents per bushel. It is true that the grain trade would take the grain off the farms, but at half its present price. This legislation should be continued, and no doubt will receive the unanimous support of the house.

A great deal has been said recently in the house and in the press regarding the needs of our senior citizens, who in times of difficulty and hardship did so much to make this country what it is today. My concern, Mr. Speaker, is not so much for those who have other sources of income or for those whose financial position is such that with the present pension they can get along quite well. My concern is for those who for a variety of reasons, many beyond their own control, find themselves, particularly in our towns and cities, trying to maintain themselves on $40 per month. It would be a very nice thing to give an across the board increase to all pensioners, but if this is not feasible or practical I would certainly urge the government, either with or without the assistance of the provinces, to make further allowances at least to our old age and blind pensioners who need such assistance.

It is hardly necessary to point out that with the increased cost of living in Canada the present pensions, in those cases where individuals are solely dependent upon them, are inadequate and do not meet present day needs. In this respect I might also point out that the regulations governing disability pensions should be reviewed by federal and provincial authorities, as there is considerable doubt in my mind whether these regulations reflect the intention and the mood of parliament at the time the act was passed.

The proposal contained in the speech from the throne to authorize the payment of grants in lieu of taxes on federal property in all municipalities where such property receives normal municipal services will be most welcome to municipal councils, and will help to relieve some of the financial difficulties in municipalities affected.

In this house last session I urged the Minister of Finance to give consideration to removal of the sales tax on repairs and replacements for heavy equipment used by municipalities. These expenditures by municipalities run into substantial sums. I hope he is keeping this matter in mind as he works on his present budget.

The establishment of the Canada Council is in keeping with the growth of Canada, and more extended assistance to university students and to the universities themselves through increased grants will help fill a need which is seriously felt at the present time by all universities.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, one has only to compare statements made by the leader of the official opposition in and out of the house in recent days with those of members of the government on current issues, both national and international to determine whether the allegations of indifference, inertia and lack of leadership apply to the government or to the official opposition. In my opinion these words neatly describe the official opposition, and my vote on the amendment will so indicate.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I find myself in the position of having to choose a few subjects from a rather lengthy list of what I consider to be very important issues now before us. The fact that I direct attention to these specific problems does not necessarily mean that the others are of a lesser importance, nor does it imply that they will be neglected. It is my hope that we will have the opportunity in other debates to make observations in connection with these problems that are facing various parts of our country and various groups of our Canadian citizens.

Last month I received a very kind invitation to attend the annual Christmas dinner of one of the senior citizens' associations in my riding. There were possibly 200 people in attendance, representing a considerable part of our population, a group that has given of its strength and abilities in the building of our great nation. As I looked at the audience on that occasion I thought of the sacrifices that had been made as they endeavoured to make their contribution to this country. I thought of the labours performed, the hardships that had been endured, the tears and the sorrows and the joys which had been theirs as they paved the way for succeeding generations. Then I thought of the conditions under which many of those whom they represented are required to live, and I must confess that I felt ashamed.

In the speech from the throne there is a very interesting paragraph which I should like to read. It is in these words:

> Indeed our economic expansion has been so rapid that it has put a serious strain upon the supply of various types of labour and materials needed for the many projects which are being put in hand. The corresponding competition to borrow savings to finance all these projects has brought about an increase in interest rates. Increases in the volume of money and credit have had to be carefully limited in order to check inflationary tendencies and the financial policies of my government have also been directed to counteract these same tendencies.

The previous paragraph refers as well to the expansion of our economy and to the prosperity we are enjoying at the present time. But I wonder whether we should not ask the recipients of old age pensions whether they are in agreement with the statement in the speech from the throne which I have just read. When they are required to live as they are on a very meagre pittance, I do not think they would be overly impressed with statements regarding the wonderful expansion of our economy and the high degree of prosperity that the Canadian people are enjoying.

Nor do I think the recipients of the war veterans allowance would be overly impressed with that same statement when they as well, especially those who have not the opportunity of supplementing their income in any other way, are required to live on the present rates that obtain in this particular category.

I would ask the blind citizens of Canada whether they can appreciate the splendid development that is taking place in our economy and the high degree of prosperity we enjoy. I would ask them if they are sharing in it. I think they would be in a position in which they would be forced to say that they did not know anything about it, that they hardly knew what we were talking about in this particular instance.

We think of the disabled. Yes, we even think of the man who was once considered to be in the middle income brackets. No matter which of these people we might talk to, I think they would all join in saying they could not appreciate statements such as those, because they themselves were not able to enjoy these good things that should be provided for every citizen of this great country of ours.

In his speech in this debate my leader, the hon. member for Peace River, gave the definition of inflation as too many dollars chasing too few goods. If we asked these people whether they had too many dollars I think they would be constrained to say that, as far as they were concerned, they did not have enough dollars to buy even the necessities of life, let alone those things which possibly would contribute to their welfare and bring a more abundant and easier life for them.

Is $40 per month the best we can do for the senior citizens of Canada? I do not think it is necessary to remind ourselves in this house of the constantly increasing costs of living. That reminder has been given. It should not be necessary to refer to the decreased value of the dollar in terms of purchasing power. That fact as well has been brought to the attention of the house. Yet with the increased national production, the increasing wages and salaries, these people to whom I have referred remain on an extremely low plane as far as living is concerned. They are not privileged to enjoy these things that others are able to secure.

I should like to refer to a resolution that was passed at the annual British Columbia Social Credit convention in regard to this particular matter, namely the old age pension. The resolution is as follows.

> Whereas the national government has implemented an old age pension plan that pays $40 monthly to all Canadians at age seventy years; and
> Whereas the present pension payments are inadequate and provincial governments are compelled to augment these payments;
> Therefore be it resolved that the national pensions be increased by at least $20 per month.

In advocating the increase in pensions, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the provincial government of British Columbia has also indicated its willingness and readiness to continue with the supplementary payments it has been making to the recipients of old age pension and to others in that category.

When we consider these representations and also the voices that have been raised in this house—not only those of opposition members but of government supporters as well—I think this government should give immediate consideration to increasing the pensions in order to bring them more into line with the present cost of living. As I say, with all the government supporters calling so loudly, and with the publicity that is being given to their requests, I think possibly the government should be ready to accede to these requests and demands even though it may be that, as some have said, the matter could become one of political expediency because of the forthcoming election.

I wonder whether as many government supporters as have done so would have spoken on this matter and would have made those recommendations if they had not, somehow, had an idea or an inkling that something would be forthcoming before the conclusion of this session. Over the week end the Prime Minister was reported over the radio as saying that the government supporters had not been tipped off at all in connection with anything along this line. Be that as it may, I would suggest that they would hardly all go in opposition to government policy, in view of the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce warned them all to toe the party line and said that if they were willing to do so the Liberal party would be in power for a good many years to come. We hope the government will give consideration to these requests that have been made.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Red Deer puts before us a motion of censure of this government for its unwillingness to meet the challenge and bring in legislation which would take care of many of these important matters. I should like to speak on other matters in connection with health and welfare and these other problems, but I just mention them now; then later on we shall have the opportunity of referring to them more adequately.

The brief presented to the government by the Canadian Legion again calls attention to some of those problems that are very real to the veterans of Canada. Among the recommendations we find those dealing with war veterans allowance and pensions. Right now I should like to express my wholehearted support of those recommendations, and the support of this group in connection with these matters that are so vital to the veterans of Canada. I think the government should deal with them. I think they should stop this process of procrastination and should take a realistic look at these matters and bring them into line with the demands of the present day.

I am also reminded of requests that have been made on behalf of the blind citizens of Canada for a special allowance, free of means test, to pay for those services which are essential for the blind such as guiding services, etc. These matters have been brought to the attention of the government and the minister in other days. I trust they will be receiving the sympathetic consideration of the department. What I say for those I could say for the others, such as those who are on superannuation and whose income at the present time is far less than that which is necessary to maintain a respectable standard of living.

I should now like to turn to the matter of agriculture. The problems of the farmers in central and eastern Canada can best be discussed, I believe, by the representatives of those sectors. I have the privilege of representing one of the main agricultural areas in British Columbia. Because of that fact I intend to concern myself in this discussion with problems peculiar to my own province. I think they are problems to which this government is giving scant attention, if any. However, along with what I say with regard to the agricultural problems of British Columbia, I should also like to emphasize the need for agricultural policies generally applicable to all parts of Canada, wherever the need may arise. I suggest that this government have failed to appreciate the necessity for such a program of agricultural policies. They seem to be content with more or less a piecemeal set-up. I would suggest today that a policy should be drafted which would be applicable right across this nation of ours.

We have made a request for the extension of the P.F.R.A. benefits to the province of British Columbia. I believe it was last year that my colleague the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke recommended that it be changed from the prairie farm rehabilitation program to the national farm rehabilitation program. I believe if that were to be done it would increase the scope and expand the benefits of this program so it would be of assistance to farmers right across the country.

The government of the province of British Columbia has sought to obtain from the government consideration of these problems on a national scale. Farm organizations have called for such a program. However, the Minister of Agriculture still insists that this cannot be expanded, that it cannot be changed into a national rehabilitation program, but that if we have projects which we believe are worthy of consideration they should be submitted individually and judged on their own merits. Here again I would suggest that rather than have a piecemeal proposition we should have an over-all program which could be applied in any part of the country where such need arose. The extension of the P.F.R.A. to include British Columbia would be of incalculable value to the farmers of that province.

I would also like to call attention to the matter of river bank erosion. This to me seems to be a very serious problem. It is a problem which is always with us in the Fraser valley because conditions are not improving very much. This is a problem which is continuing to be of very serious concern to those who live in Fraser valley. We think of the great Fraser river and its tremendous importance to the economy of British Columbia. Besides being of special value in connection with the fishing industry, being the greatest salmon river on the continent, it is designed to be a major factor in the development of industry all the way from Hope to the sea. In addition, if ways and means can be found to protect the salmon industry, the Fraser could also be a vast source of power.

This same mighty Fraser is a source of concern as well, for not only has the Fraser valley suffered serious floods but in addition hundreds of acres of the very best agricultural land have been lost through the process of erosion. I have in my hand the interim report of the investigation into measures for flood control in the Fraser river basin. This report makes reference to this particular situation, but I do not think it presents a very full picture. On page 60 of this interim report we find these words:

> There are considerable areas of river bank throughout the lower Fraser valley which are subject to erosion. Some of these areas have been protected in part by rock riprap. The channel of the Fraser river from Hope to the sea is unstable and the main thread of the stream changes position from time to time.
> In addition bank erosion is aggravated by navigation in certain reaches of the river particularly where small high-powered craft travel close to the banks. Further study of bank erosion is warranted.

I say that does not do justice to the problems, because they are of greater magnitude than would be indicated by a reading of this report. There was, however, one matter in which I was interested; that is the reference to bank erosion being aggravated by navigation. I remember in other days when I was dealing with this matter, and brought it to the attention of the minister, the report of the engineers was to the effect that this did not enter into the picture at all. However, it is being recognized in this interim report.

Until approximately 25 years ago the federal government apparently assumed full responsibility in this particular matter. During that period they diked the slough mouths, did river clearance and rocked the river banks. However, following that period they began to pay one-third of the cost of similar works together with the province of British Columbia, the municipality, or the district in which the work was done. It was being shared equally. Following the disastrous flood in 1948, due to an agreement between the federal and provincial governments, after completion of work done by the Fraser valley diking board and dissolution of the board in 1950 the federal government would not share any additional cost for any section of the diking and rock work which had been done by the Fraser valley diking board.

Now we are in the position where the federal Department of Public Works have made it clear that they will not be prepared to contribute anything to the maintenance of work which has already been done. They will still give consideration to new work, but I believe this is a shortsighted policy because we have here an investment of hundreds of thousands of dollars; I suppose actually it would run into several millions. Now the federal government is not going to contribute anything to the maintenance of that work, thereby jeopardizing the entire investment in river bank protection. Here again I think a national policy is essential.

If the farmers of these areas are to go forward with their work with confidence they are going to have to be assured that some assistance will be given in these circumstances. In order to assist in a plan for this type of work I believe it is essential that the provincial and municipal governments know exactly what the federal government is willing to do in the way of assistance. It might be possible that the P.F.R.A. could be expanded to include this type of operation. Here again all attempts on the part of the provincial authorities to obtain any commitment have failed.

I would suggest, in view of the jurisdiction granted the federal government under the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act and Fisheries Act, it seems only reasonable that the responsibility in connection with these problems should be fully recognized and accepted by this government. It has been suggested, and I think this suggestion is fair, that this kind of work should be shared possibly on a 60-30-10 basis, 60 per cent being paid by the federal government, 30 per cent by the provincial authorities and 10 per cent by the district or municipality involved. I think this is a major problem to our farmers, and one of those problems which has been plaguing those who seek to produce the food for the nation.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that there are many other problems involving the farming communities of our province. Possibly I could mention some of them to indicate that there is still a great deal to be done in the matter of legislation which will assist our farmers in facing their great problems.

Let us consider the matter of continually rising freight rates. We all know that during the past several months interim increases have been granted to the railways, and these seriously affect those who have to obtain feed grains in my province. We all remember that freight rate assistance was reduced by approximately 50 per cent, bringing it down to about $5.50 per ton. With increasing freight rates the farmers of my area and other districts are being faced with problems and obstacles that appear almost insurmountable.

A resolution was passed by the British Columbia federation of agriculture at their twenty-third annual convention held in November, 1956. This has to do with feed freight assistance, and I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to this resolution just in case he has any idea in mind of further reducing freight assistance. The resolution is as follows:

> Whereas the freight assistance policy of the government of Canada amounting to $5.50 per ton basis Vancouver, New Westminster points is of great value to the stock and poultry feeders of British Columbia and eastern Canada; and
> Whereas the livestock feeding industry needs to procure its feed requirements at the lowest possible cost, and
> Whereas the livestock feeders in the prairie provinces are able to procure their feed grains at a much lower price than the feeders in British Columbia or eastern Canada due to the abundance of grain that moves outside of the Canadian wheat board;
> Therefore be it resolved that this 23rd annual convention of the British Columbia federation of agriculture petition the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to request the freight assistance policy of the government of Canada be continued and made permanent.

This was the recommendation of the British Columbia federation of agriculture, and I trust it will be kept in mind by the Minister of Agriculture in the event that he has any thought of further reducing freight assistance. There is also the problem posed by the lopsided tariff structure that we have at the present time. I am not going to deal with this matter at length, except to point out that it is high time the government took a serious look at this particular situation which is most unfair to the producers in my province and other provinces as well. The matter of dressed poultry and the matter of the tariff on potatoes are problems which the government should review thoroughly with a view to bringing in measures that are more in keeping with what is right and fair for Canadian producers.

On a number of occasions requests have been made for parity prices for agricultural products. I would like to refer just briefly to a resolution which was passed at the second annual convention of the farmers' union of British Columbia. This convention was held in Mission City late last fall. In the preamble the resolution calls attention to the fact that prices for Canadian industry generally have been protected for a great many years, whereas the agricultural industry has never had price protection. The resolution then goes on to state:

> . . . the farm unions are taking the stand that as long as industry has price protection, farmers are justified in expecting the same treatment and are asking the government of Canada to implement the following proposals to gain equality for farmers:
> (1) To institute a price support program for agricultural products, as has been done in many other countries, and thus establish a fair or parity relationship between farm prices and other prices, and eliminate the existing economic inequality between unprotected agriculture and protected industry;
> (2) That such parity price system apply to all farm products sold on the home market, and the portion that has to be exported should be protected by floor prices and sold at world prices;
> (3) That such a price support program for agriculture be established by raising the price of farm products to a parity level through federal government deficiency payments, rather than by raising tariffs on imported products;

Those are three of the recommendations contained in this particular resolution. I am not going to take time to read the others, but I would just like to call attention to these and to state that I give my support to them on behalf of the agricultural industry. British Columbia agriculture has been completely neglected as far as this government is concerned, and the amendment to the amendment presented by the hon. member for Red Deer calls attention to this glaring inconsistency. I would say that this amendment should receive the wholehearted support of this house.

I have a very few minutes left at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to make a few observations with regard to external affairs. As has been pointed out, this subject received considerable attention in the speech from the throne. There are many aspects of Canada's foreign policy with which I would like to deal, but of course time will not permit my doing so. Although some may agree with the policies followed by the government, there are many who are greatly perturbed at the course of international events over the past several months, especially with regard to the recent crisis in the United Nations and the question as to the adequacy of the United Nations to courageously and impartially deal with the various situations confronting it.

The Suez situation has been rather fully discussed during the course of this debate. The stand taken by the British and French has been criticized by some and supported by other hon members, while others have taken what might be described as a middle of the road position; but it would seem to me the more light that is shed on this particular matter the greater will be our understanding of the British and French position.

I have in my hand reports of speeches that have been made by different individuals which support the British and French stand, and state that the action taken by the British and French governments in relation to the Suez canal will be thoroughly vindicated by historians in the future.

I have here the report of a speech by James Cromwell, former United States ambassador to Canada, who referred to the British-French intervention. He said that by so doing they blocked Russia's program for conquest in the Middle East, and also revealed to the world Russia's plans to gain control in the east. Many other statements have been made, but I have not time to place them all on the record.

We now find that even though the United States took the stand it did, at the present time it is stating that it is prepared to take almost the identical position in case of certain eventualities in the future. I know that was denied by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who said they were prepared to move only when they had been requested by the nations concerned. The January 14 issue of Newsweek, dealing with policy briefing in the United States, stated that Mr. Dulles went on to make certain points, one being:

> That if such an outbreak threatened, the administration would go to the United Nations, but that Mr. Eisenhower wants "freedom to act unilaterally if necessary".

That would indicate that the United States is prepared to take the very same action in certain eventualities as the British and French took back in the critical days of last fall. The statement has been made that the Canadian people are much in favour of the stand taken by this federal government and by our own delegation to the United Nations, indicating that public opinion is in opposition to the position taken by the British and French governments. The same issue of Newsweek contains this paragraph:

> The American people overwhelmingly support President Eisenhower's request that congress immediately vote him stand-by powers to send U.S. troops into the Middle East. For Americans believe, in the main, that such a big stick policy will help preserve peace by putting Russia on notice that the U.S. will tolerate no red expansion into the Arab states.

So we find that in the United States there is the recognition of a certain situation which may arise, when action comparable to that taken by the British and French would be advisable on the part of their own government.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Much has been said about Canadian action at the United Nations relative to this particular matter, and it has been stated that the position of the Canadian delegation was that they wanted to save the commonwealth. In view of certain statements which were made in this house not too long ago by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, one wonders to what extent they are desirous of saving the commonwealth. It will be noticed that they do not refer very often to the British commonwealth, possibly following the course set by Madam Pandit when she said that they do not refer to the British commonwealth but to the commonwealth. Perhaps that is the concept of this government in regard to this matter at the present time.

The over-all situation has brought me to a position where I must back up, as it were, from the position I took some time ago when I commended the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare for their work at the United Nations. I must register a protest now, which will somehow take the edge off the complimentary remarks I made on a previous occasion.

I do not believe the people of Canada can go along with the position taken by our delegation at the United Nations on some of these very serious matters. Therefore I would suggest that our foreign policy be reviewed in the light of these situations. Underneath our whole foreign policy there must be not only a recognition of exterior influences, there must be a recognition of underlying principles. I would suggest that we must press for the adoption of these basic principles in international affairs, that each nation must be recognized as sovereign within its own territory, and must be ready to respect the sovereignty of all other nations. There must also be organized international co-operation to enforce these obligations. We believe that Canada can make its most effective contribution toward the implementation of that principle while within the British commonwealth of nations. We should resist any and all efforts to weaken or sever those ties.

We believe as well in the concept of foreign trade. Canada should be ready to trade with all nations of the world on the basis of a mutually satisfactory exchange of goods and services, provided each nation will open up its ports to export-import traders and provided that in those countries where all production is under government monopoly the foreign importer shall be allowed to buy any product on the same terms as the government concerned.

In conclusion, we would encourage a world-wide program of tariff reduction, and urge that Canada work with all other nations for the achievement of convertibility of currencies by each nation stabilizing its own currency, so that at all times there may be a balance between effective purchasing power and the aggregate of prices and goods available for sale; and that the volume of money in each country be expanded only at the rate at which production and trade expand. I submit these observations for the consideration of the house. There are other observations I wanted to make, but I shall have to reserve them for another occasion.

(Translation):

Mr. Georges Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). Not only did they deal in a masterly way with the problems of our times, and present a realistic picture of their respective constituencies, one in Alberta and the other in New Brunswick, but they did not fail to speak in support of national unity, in accordance with Liberal party policy, and as had been done by great leaders such as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King and the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. I was proud to hear my good friend, the hon. member from Edmonton-Strathcona, speak French because, as he sits beside me in this house, I have often had the opportunity to help him practise that language which he now speaks with an ease worthy of the efforts he made. I have no doubt that the electors of Edmonton-Strathcona are proud to be so well represented by their member.

The Prime Minister was particularly fortunate in his choice of a true Acadian as seconder of the address in reply. Here we have a member of that race which "knows not how to die" because it remains conscious of its role in a greater and more varied Canada, moulded in mutual respect based on mutual understanding, a perfect factor of national unity.

Mr. Speaker, as did many other hon. members, I would now like to speak of social security and more particularly of family allowances. These are so welcome to the large families of my constituency that I have been asked to make representations to have the basic rate increased. I would like however, before I do so, to go back for a moment on the history of the legislation enacted in this regard, originating from the statutes of 1944-1945, chapter 40, entitled "an act to provide for family allowances", providing for the paying of allowances for each child residing in Canada as follows: from birth to 6 years of age: $5.00 a month; from 6 to 10 years: $6.00 a month; from 10 to 13 years: $7.00 a month; from 13 to 16 years: $8.00 a month.

The above-mentioned act, which was passed during the 1944-45 session contained, however, under clause 3, a reservation to the effect that the allowance rate be reduced by $1 for the fifth child; by $2 for the sixth and seventh, and by $3 for the eighth and every following child. This proviso which was prejudicial to large families was probably the result of the insidious and unfair campaign launched by a group of people who, over the years, have dwindled to nothing and who, at that time, referred to family allowances as the "Quebec baby bonus". Future events were to show those people that they were behind the times in their social thinking for, in 1957, we find that Ontario is the province with the greatest number of children eligible for family allowances and that, due allowance being made for the population of the different provinces, Newfoundland is the province with the highest amount in family allowances.

In its 1949 legislation, chapter 17 of the statutes for that year, this government amended the act in repealing the proviso I mentioned, which had the effect of putting on an equal footing all Canadian children, whether they were from families of five children or of fifteen children. The large family had won its case. If the Liberal government of 1944-45, under the leadership of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, can take credit for initiating family allowances, that great social legislation, in the highest sense of the word, the Liberal government of 1949, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister, deserves the congratulations of the Canadian people for dealing fairly with the large family. With regard to this point, I do not think that quantity is prejudicial to quality, otherwise the member now speaking could not be proud to be the tenth of a family of twelve, several of whom are now efficiently pursuing the object pursued by their old mother now 72 years old, who is still living in the contentment of duty done with regard to her country, the greatest asset of which always remains its human capital.

The budget for the fiscal year 1945 appropriated for family allowances the large amount of $190 million. It was the first time in the history of this country that the Canadian mother was getting these allowances. In the fiscal year 1949, which saw the repeal of that proviso and of the decreasing rate, the amount of $284 million was set aside in the budget for family allowances. In the budget of the current 1956 fiscal year the amount of $399,240,000 is set aside for that purpose. Those who claim that family allowances have remained what they were in 1945 do not take into account the adjustment made in 1949 with the repeal of the proviso which was in the 1944-45 act nor the above figures which show the increase in the amount paid under family allowances, with due allowance for the increase in the Canadian population.

In the light of actual facts, I think the subamendment introduced on January 17 by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) moving a vote of non-confidence with regard to the Government, mainly in respect of social security legislation, is hardly logical, especially so when I think that during the 1944-45 session at the opening of which the Liberal government of the day had announced the institution of family allowances in the speech from the throne, his political group voted against this very government. In fact, the speech from the throne read by His Excellency the Earl of Athlone, then governor general of Canada, on January 29, 1944, contained as can be seen on page 2 of Hansard the following passage:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve the establishment of a measure introducing family allowances.

On January 28, 1944, the then hon. member for Dorchester, Mr. Leonard Tremblay, moved the adoption of the address which contained the aforementioned paragraph about family allowances. On February 10, 1954, Mr. Tremblay's motion on the address was put to a vote and, among the 21 members who then voted against that motion, I find, at page 380 of Hansard, the name of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) alongside the names of the other members of his political party who joined hands, for the occasion, with the members of the C.C.F. party, these same good Samaritans who would like today to wrest from the Liberal party the credit for being the first to advocate family allowances.

I see in the subamendment a sign of that habit of plagiarism prevalent among many members of the opposition who, frustrated by their failure to understand the needs of the population as early as the many Liberal governments which have been in power since confederation and especially since the advent of social security for Canadians of all ages and all classes, indulge in barren criticisms and take no account of the various aspects of that question. For a long time Canadians from all parts of this country have shown that they reject the tenets of an abject socialism or those of a retrograde and backward conservatism. They look upon the Liberal party as a middle-of-the-road party, having regard to the anticipated results of those various tendencies and that is why they have given that party their confidence, and rightly so, and will do so again, I hope, at the next opportunity.

I have always said and, I go on saying to my electors, especially to those who have a tendency to minimize the achievements of the Liberal administration in the field of social security that it was the Liberal party which enacted our social security legislation in Canada, which later improved that legislation and will continue to do so when the time comes and the opportunity arises.

Mr. Speaker, I believe, as do my electors of Roberval constituency, that the time has come, in 1957, to appropriate more money for social security benefits, particularly in the matter of family allowances. Twelve years have gone by since the enactment of that legislation and eight years since the last adjustment in 1949. Since then the cost of living has constantly increased so that family allowance benefits have correspondingly suffered a loss in buying power. I would therefore humbly ask the government to give the matter particular attention. I will be so bold as to express the hope that it will see to it that family allowance benefits be revised upward to as high a figure as possible. I am expecting a pleasant surprise in this regard when the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) brings down his budget following a special recommendation from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Speaker, before going on to another matter, I would like to ask the government to set at $400, instead of $150 as is the case at present, the income tax exemption provided for in the case of each child receiving family allowances. In so doing the government would put everybody in the same position, from the point of view of income tax and once again would prove the very great importance it attaches to human capital, the most valuable form of our wealth, the greatest of all, that which, providing it is accompanied by a modicum of material goods, has made Canada a country where life is particularly pleasant because of the security it provides.

I would not like to conclude, Mr. Speaker, without putting to the government a suggestion which it might find far-fetched but which, in my humble opinion, would be of very great assistance to the future development of this country. This suggestion relates to the personal income tax.

Income tax has meant tapping hitherto unused savings. The economy of this country has benefited from this use of hitherto unproductive money, money which is now at the service of progress, thanks to the distribution which is carried out by the government throughout Canada, to mention only that aspect of the matter.

Canadians who, formerly approved the selfish principle of holding back while hoping to receive, have now learned to give something in order to get something. The transition between those two states of mind was achieved in the course of fifteen years, so that now Canadians agree at least to consider the income tax as a necessary evil. Since 1940, the year when this federal tax was restored, many citizens did not file any income tax reports and many now have to perpetuate the errors, originally made in their favor, which now prevents them from expanding their undertakings as they should. That has given rise to secret hoarding of money which does not contribute to the economy of the country and which prevents the establishment of many undertakings. This initial tax evasion, besides causing worries and giving rise to other frauds in order to justify the first one, affects a great number of Canadians who would like to make a better contribution to the development of their country. Add to that the fear of income tax investigators, unnecessary borrowings at the bank for the sole purpose of better concealing the facts—which has the effect of paralysing the credit of many Canadians who would greatly need it to maintain their business, or to expand it, or to set up new business undertakings, and you have an idea of the problem caused by the haunting obsession of the original false return. Thus, the economy of the country is partly paralysed, because I do not think I am wrong in stating that the gross figure of the national business would be increased by 2 billion a year if the government declared a general amnesty for all Canadians who have filed income tax reports prior to 1957. In this way, everyone would begin from scratch without worrying about the past, but they would feel the need of making their reports in the future knowing what the consequences could be. I think that in so doing the government would lose on current claims but would gain very much in the future in revenue accruing from personal income tax.

There is a "maquis", a secret resistance movement against income tax. This movement undermines our national economy and is a major obstacle in the way of capital formation for small industries which would be likely to develop our smaller communities, and even our rural communities. Highly satisfactory manpower can be found there, but at the present time there are few openings save for common labourers who live from day to day since in their community there are no small industries capable of absorbing them.

A general amnesty of this type, by freeing so much hidden or unproductive capital, might prove the starting point of wide development of small industries in our smaller communities and, especially in semi-rural districts, would ensure progress and prosperity. This thawing out of capital in these areas will bring about a development which will make for decentralization of industry and population in this country. I am convinced, being in the confidence of a large number of business men, that such an amnesty would touch off a general economic expansion in every part of this country.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my congratulations to the many which have already been proferred to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am particularly pleased to do this as the mover, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, comes from my own province and took advantage of his opportunity to say something about the great developments taking place in the province of Alberta.

I was very relieved when the firemen's strike on the C.P.R. ended during the first week end of the present session. The dislocation and the economic loss caused by the strike were particularly evident in southern Alberta, and in that area there was almost universal indignation that the strike had been allowed to take place. It is a matter of astonishment to me that the government did not take the action it eventually did some 10 days before, and stop the strike before it began. It could have taken such action just as well before January 2 as 10 days later, and thus have saved railway and other workers millions in lost wages and the C.P.R. and the general economy a great many more millions.

The only reasons I can see why the government did not take action before the strike started were irresolution, weakness and timidity. The government failed to face up to its responsibility to ensure that a large part of this country should continue to have vital transportation facilities. Instead of leading the country, as is its responsibility, it quite evidently waited to follow public opinion, and follow it at a great distance. Thus I think the government is directly responsible for the loss which has taken place as a result of the strike.

On several occasions in past years I have made a plea in the house for the blind people of Canada. I have said and would like to repeat that of all our social security measures, those to help the blind are the most niggardly, considering the magnitude of the disability from which these people suffer. This year the Canadian council of the blind and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind have a one-point program for improved legislation. It is for a special allowance free of the means test to help cover the day to day cost of blindness. I urge the government most strongly to institute such an allowance at the present session.

The need for such an allowance is self-evident. There are unavoidable expenses accompanying blindness, expenses for guiding, for taxis to and from work and anywhere else that a blind person may have to go. All this places the blind person at a great disadvantage economically compared with his sighted fellow citizen. That, of course, is apart altogether from the fact that the blind person's disability bars him from employment in most fields of activity.

The matter to which I wish to devote most of my time is that of the expulsion of Indians from their reserves. I spoke at some length on it last year when amendments to the Indian Act were under consideration. At that time the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration denied that any Indians were being expelled from their reserves. He said that if anyone was being expelled he was not an Indian and thus had no right to be on the reserve. His remarks are to be found at page 5178 of Hansard of June 17 of last year, when replying to some remarks I had made. I will not take the time of the house to read them.

This is nothing more than a form of evasion as far as this matter is concerned. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona asked some questions this morning in connection with a large expulsion now taking place in Alberta at the Hobbema reserve. He asked this question: "Will the minister please explain to the house why over 100 persons who have lived all their lives on the Hobbema Indian reserve ... have now been notified that they must leave that reservation?"

To that question the minister replied that everything that is being done is being done under the Indian Act, thereby apparently implying that he had no responsibility. Then he went on to say that an appeal to the courts is provided for, and that the government should not take any action until the appeal is heard. Once more this is evading the question and evading the responsibility of the government in connection with the matter.

As a matter of fact, for some considerable time past the minister has been referring to the act as an excuse for not taking any action with regard to this matter. He said he was not on the committee which considered this legislation, and that he was not a member of the parliament which passed it. He said those who were on the committee and were in that parliament are the ones responsible, thus seeking to give to the Indians and to the people of Canada as a whole the general idea that any responsibility there may be for the inhumane expulsions which are now taking place is not on his shoulders, at any rate, but is in fact on other people, presumably those of us in the opposition as well as the other members of the house. He does this in spite of the fact that many of us fought vigorously to prevent the sections being written into the act under which the Indians are being expelled from the reserves.

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is doing the same thing, only I would say that he is doing this even more unfairly than is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I find that he was out in Alberta not very long ago and was questioned in connection with the expulsion of these Indians from their reserves. After following the same line as that which I have indicated, saying that everything was done under the act and blaming the Indians themselves, in fact, this is what he says as reported in the Calgary Herald of January 19:

"In the first place, the government is not forcing these 118 Indians off the reserve," said the minister.

That is the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

"The initiative was taken by a group of Indians themselves . . ."

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has followed that same line, namely that if there is any responsibility it is on the Indians, that they are at fault and that the government is not at fault. He completely neglects to say that while the action may have been started because of protests from Indians, to begin with, it is the government which carries it through, which brings the matter up before the registrar, which signs the order expelling them and so forth.

Then in this interview the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys went on to say this, as reported in the Calgary Herald:

> The minister pointed out that from 1946 to 1948 the need for changes in the Indian Act and a clear definition of the term "Indian", was studied by a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. Two of the Alberta members were J. H. Blackmore, Social Credit, Lethbridge, and D. S. Harkness, . . . Conservative, Calgary North.

In other words what the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys was trying to convey to the people of Alberta and the Indians was that if anybody was responsible, the hon. member for Lethbridge and myself were responsible for their plight. As I say, that is not only unfair but it is dishonest. I was going to say that I am surprised that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys should be employing tactics of that kind, but I am not too much surprised at it because they are in keeping with the sort of tactics he has employed frequently in the past.

Some hon. Members: Oh, yes.

Mr. Harkness: So far from my having any responsibility for the present section of the Indian Act under which these expulsions from the reserves are taking place, as the Minister of Finance well knows—he was the minister of citizenship and immigration at the time—both in the committee and in the house I fought vigorously to prevent the insertion of the definition which is in the Indian Act defining Indians and the provision with regard to deletions from band lists. I would think that ministers of the crown could at least be a little bit more honest in their presentations than to try to ascribe the opposite to the members on this side of the house.

The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona this morning went on to ask what would be done for these Indians if they left the reserve. He asked, "If they leave, what is being done to ensure that they will have homes to live in and incomes with which to sustain them in the future?" What is the answer of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to that question? He said it was a hypothetical question and that there was no call on him to answer hypothetical questions. In other words he apparently completely refuses to take any responsibility for the plight of these people, or to do anything to ensure that a great injustice is not done to them.

This whole matter has become a question of wide public concern in Alberta. Numerous newspaper articles and editorials have been written, all of them condemning the action being taken, and the government for taking it, in extremely strong terms. The general public in Alberta does not like the sort of thing that is going on there with regard to this expulsion matter and it does not like the attitude the government has taken, the evasion, the refusal to take any action and so on.

Briefly the situation is this. There are 118 Indians on the Hobbema reserve, which is about 40 miles south of Edmonton, who have been ordered to leave that reserve on which they or their ancestors have lived for upwards of 60 years and in some cases longer. This action is being taken under the Indian Act of 1951, the act upon which the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration places all the onus, if in his opinion there is any onus. The Indian Act of 1951 provides for an Indian register and that the names of all Indians entitled to receive treaty payments and so forth and to be looked upon as Indians must be on this register. It also provides for additions to and deletions from the register. There is a further provision that any 10 Indians may protest the inclusion of any person's name on their band list.

That is a bad provision, to begin with. Everyone knows how easy it is to get a petition signed. In the present case at the Hobbema reserve, where these 118 Indians are being excluded, one of the 10 Indians upon whose protest the government initiated that action was protesting against his own mother and therefore protesting against himself being a member of the band. The thing was just as ridiculous as that. He did not know what he was signing.

We had the same sort of thing in connection with another band, namely the Blackfoot band east of Calgary, where a petition of this sort was signed. Ten Indians signed it, and then they found that they were signing against themselves. Later 8 of the 10 insisted that their signatures be withdrawn, and they had a great deal of difficulty in getting the department to accept the fact that they had signed not knowing what they were signing, and so forth. But as I say, in this particular case you have a man apparently protesting against his own inclusion on the list. Of course he did not know what he was doing.

The propriety of instituting proceedings to expel Indians from a reserve under circumstances of that sort is questionable. I think it is quite apparent that such proceedings are not fair and are not just, considering the fact that the people are still largely illiterate, and frequently do not know what they are doing when they put their names to a piece of paper.

In addition to that, of course, this whole provision for having a certain number of Indians protest other Indians on the band list, thus starting the government to make moves to put those people off the band list, just invites difficulties and bad feeling of all kinds. It is a ready-made way of paying off grudges. If one Indian has a grudge against another he goes around with a petition and says, "Sign this, John" and "Sign this, Joe". He gets his petition signed, and then you have proceedings started to get rid of the particular Indian. It is a perfect way of causing trouble on a reserve, of dividing Indians one against another, and paying off grudges.

It is also a great way to encourage greed. In this particular case, on the Hobbema reserve oil was discovered. I think the estimated value of the oil in terms of the money which will come to the Indians is in the neighbourhood of $20 million; that is, the share of the 118 Indians would be upwards of $2 million. If the 118 are expelled there is $2 million more for the people remaining on the reserve, eventually to be divided up amongst them. At the present time they are receiving $25 a month each from oil revenue.

The act as it stands is an invitation for greedy people to try to force other people off the reserve and have more money for themselves. In other words it offends against what you might call real Christian ethics. The minister said, in answering these questions this morning, that this probably would be the last case. As a matter of fact it will be just the first of many cases. I am quite sure there is no provision in the act to make it the last case, and as a matter of fact the act lays down that any child born on the reserve can be protested for any period up to a year after its birth. There is also nothing to prevent any group of Indians protesting another group.

As far as this particular reserve is concerned, if this expulsion takes place the relatives of the people expelled will immediately protest against the persons who signed the petition and who got rid of their relatives on the reserve. Then you would have a sort of war of extermination on that reserve, and of course on other reserves, if a similar situation were to arise in which considerable assets were involved.

These provisions for deleting names from the band membership, taken in conjunction with the definition of an Indian found in sections 11 and 12 of the Indian Act, create a situation of complete unfairness, inequity and inhumanity, and the government has to initiate action to put an end to that situation immediately. The act refuses to recognize as an Indian four general classes of people; first, any one who, or whose ancestors, took scrip; second, certain cases of alleged illegitimacy; third, certain cases of alleged white blood; and fourth, for other technical reasons concerning band membership.

As long as those provisions remain in the Indian Act you will not have the Indian population of this country satisfied. They will be in a situation where they may never know when they will be forced off the reserve, and you will not have the white population believing a square deal is being given the aboriginal population.

The Indians on the Hobbema reserve are being expelled because it is alleged that three common ancestors of the 118 took scrip. Scrip was issued to the half-breeds or metis at the end of the first Riel rebellion and following the second rebellion; it was a payment of $120 or 120 acres of land, whichever was wished, and the scrip could be exchanged for land. Very frequently if a white man wanted certain lands he would go to an Indian and say "If you would like a bottle of whiskey or $10, put your name here". Then he would go to the authorities with this man, knowing he was an Indian, half-breed or metis, and the scrip was issued. The white man immediately took it over and went and got the land. That is what happened in a large number of cases.

When Sir John A. Macdonald issued scrip following the first Riel rebellion and found what had happened to most of it, he authorized its issuance a second time to the people who had been given it in the first place because they had lost their scrip, land, or whatever it was. In this particular case there is no clear proof that these three men actually did take scrip to begin with. The records on the matter are extremely confused and mixed. Whilst the government says the action taken against these 118 persons is as a result of Indian protest, the great majority of the people in that band of around 1,100 or 1,200 and the chief, all except a very small number of people, do not want these 118 people expelled; they want to keep them there.

In addition to that it was the government that produced the alleged case that scrip was issued, and they produced it first of all in the form of a document with a certain name on it. But when the matter first came up in 1954 they were not able to establish that the name here was the name of one of the ancestors; they dropped it, and then the government, not the Indians, revived it. They said they had found more proof, and brought this in the form of photostatic copies of documents showing the alleged issuance of scrip or certificates.

No matter how flimsy the evidence, once these actions are started the government—because it has a policy of decreasing the Indian population on the reserves by a policy of integration—proceeds to throw out as many Indians as it can from the reserves. As long as that policy is followed, and as long as the act exists in its present form, we are going to have these difficulties.

I have a good deal more to say on this subject. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I had been dealing with the expulsion of Indians from reserves, and I referred in particular to the case of the threatened eviction of 118 Indians from the Hobbema reserve in Alberta. I had pointed out that these Indians are being expelled because it is alleged that three of their common ancestors took scrip, a certificate which entitled metis or halfbreeds in the period prior to 1900 to a money grant or in lieu of that to a grant of land. I had also pointed out that the business of scrip had proved to be a fiasco.

Mr. Harris: Just a question, if I may. Does that apply to all those who are involved?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, so I understand. The great majority of the lands which were granted to these people of mixed Indian blood found their way into the hands of white men chiefly for very small payments, whisky or something of that sort. As a result of the recognition of the fact that the idea of scrip was a fiasco, an order in council was passed in 1901 which returned to Indian status any person whom the Indians of a particular band were willing to have back in the band, whether or not he had taken scrip.

That should have cleared the entire issue, and there should be no effort at this time to expel persons who have been on reservations since that time and have enjoyed Indian status. Their position should certainly be clear, but under the amendments made to the Indian Act in 1951 that is not the case. The action that was taken in 1901 to reinstate people with Indian status whether or not they had taken scrip is now being overturned and negatived, by the amendments made to the act in 1951. As has been well said, the sins—if they were sins—of the father are being visited on the children even unto the third and fourth generation.

The whole matter of scrip is one which at the present time is practically incapable of proof. Not one in a thousand or ten thousand of these people could read and write; therefore the scrip certificates bore nothing more than an X and a man's name. Many of these people of mixed blood and many Indians had two or three Indian names; some of them were possibly known by two or three different names which various white settlers had given to them. Now at this stage of the game, some 60 years later, it is virtually impossible to prove definitely that a man whose name is Johnson had an ancestor by the name of Johnny Johnson who took scrip. Nevertheless on extremely flimsy ground and the allegation that their ancestors took scrip, these people are being expelled.

The minister said this morning when he was answering certain questions with regard to this matter that he hoped the people concerned would appeal. He did not say in what way he hoped the appeal would turn out, and I would be inclined to suspect that he would hope the appeal would go against them. Thus he would have the excuse of a court decision for not taking any action in connection with these Indians.

In any event I can assure him that an appeal will be lodged. As a matter of fact funds are now being raised among certain white people and various Indian bands in order to finance the cost of an appeal. One reason an appeal was not launched sooner, as I think the minister well knows, is that requests had been made to him to make government or Indian band funds available to finance this appeal. This request was refused, and as a result this general appeal for funds is now proceeding. As a result of this an appeal will be launched.

I might say, however, that in view of the amendments that were made to the Indian Act last year the position of this appeal becomes much more difficult than previously was the case. Last year section 9 of the Indian Act was amended. This section is the part of the act which defines what an Indian is, and it was amended by adding the following as subsection 6:

> Where a decision of the registrar has been referred to a judge for review under this section, the burden of establishing that the decision of the registrar is erroneous is on the person who requested that the decision be so referred.

In other words the onus of proof is placed on the Indian, who has practically no means at his disposal to refute the allegation. For example, how can an Indian prove that his grandfather was not a white man, or that he did not have some white blood in him? How can he prove that his grandfather did not accept scrip, when all this confusion exists concerning the matter? Instead of the onus being placed on the department to prove that the person concerned is not an Indian, this amendment to the act places that onus on the poor Indian, who has little or no means of determining the facts. The position of the person being expelled from the reserve is rendered that much more difficult, and it is practically impossible for him to establish his case when it is taken on appeal to the district court.

As I said earlier, a great deal of public concern and indignation has been stirred up over this Hobbema case in the province of Alberta. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and other members of the government have received numerous letters of protest and petitions signed by members of church groups, farm unions and other organizations requesting that immediate action be taken to amend the Indian Act by deleting the present section dealing with the definition of an Indian, and preventing this apparent injustice taking place.

As the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration indicated this morning, both he and his government have refused to take any action whatever. They seem content to continue following the so-called policy of integration, which apparently was decided on when the present Minister of Finance was the minister of this department. In effect it amounts to a policy of getting rid of as many people as possible from the Indian reserves, no matter what the consequences may be to the individuals concerned in terms of suffering and hardship.

The widespread indignation aroused by this particular case is reflected in many articles and editorials in the Calgary newspapers. The Calgary Herald during the past week has had a series of front page articles dealing with this matter, from one of which I have quoted. These have served to apprise the general public of what was happening, and as a result more and more letters are pouring in to me and I am sure to the government asking that we prevent this completely unjustified action from taking place.

In addition the Calgary Albertan, which has been a steady and strong supporter of the federal Liberal government and party ever since I can remember, had an extremely strong editorial on the matter in its issue of Thursday, December 27, 1956. This was entitled "The Beam in Thine Own Eye" and reads:

> Canadians are given to righteous condemnation of racial persecution, particularly of the negro, as it happens in the southern United States and in South Africa. They continually thank God that they are not as other people, given to discrimination against human beings because of accident of birth or colour of skin.
> In this editorial we intend to show that Canadians in fact do discriminate, not only in their actions but in their laws, against a racial minority in their midst, and in a most brutal and unjustified manner which is different only in degree from that in South Africa.

This long editorial goes on to outline the apartheid policy in South Africa and points out that we have the same thing, perhaps to a lesser degree, in Canada as far as the treatment of Indians on reserves are concerned, particularly the Hobbema Indians. The editorial then continues:

> Now look at Canada.
> Late in the last century the Queen, through her Canadian government, entered into solemn treaty with the plains Indians. They surrendered their claims to this land, and in return she promised them that they and their heirs could live for all time on certain reserves and would receive certain annual benefits.
> As in South Africa, there had been considerable mixing of the races, and there was a sizeable metis or mixed blood population. As usually happens, the proud whites tended to ostracize these half-breeds but the Indians took them in.

They go on to point out that even if the ancestors of the people concerned were in this class, the people of Canada still have a responsibility toward them. Certainly as far as the treaties entered into with the Indians are concerned, they say those people shall be considered as Indians who have followed the Indian way of life. These people, even if they took scrip, whether or not they are of mixed blood, are entitled to be considered as Indians, and in fact have been considered as Indians for some 60 years. Now they are told they are not Indians and have to leave the only life they know, the only homes they have. They must give up the equity they have in their reserve which now amounts to a considerable figure. The editorial then ends up by saying:

> The Queen has broken her word given in solemn treaty. The Canadian government, instead of implementing constructive policies for the gradual emancipation of the Indians so they can take an honourable place in Canadian society, has a policy only of inspecting their ancestors for traces of illegitimacy, "white blood" or scrip, and then visiting its punishment on the third and fourth generation.
> Have Canadians a right to condemn what is going on in South Africa? Certainly they have, because it is wrong. Wrong should always be condemned, even at home.
> It would be bad if the welfare of Canada's Indians became a subject of political controversy. Yet the Liberal government's brutal attitude, its inability to appreciate and respect the public conscience in this matter, is one of those things which may incline some people to wonder whether it is not time for a change.

That is not a Conservative paper; that is a strong Liberal paper which speaks, I think very accurately, for the people of Alberta. They use the word "brutal" which I do not think is too strong a word to use; I think it is the right word. The treatment being given these people is brutal, it is inhuman, and it is the responsibility of the government to see that it is not continued. I call upon the government to cease immediately these expulsions and to provide amendments to the Indian Act at this present session to ensure that this state of affairs will end and that expulsions of this sort cannot and will not take place in the future.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I intend to follow the tradition set by many of my colleagues and congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address. I would add to those congratulations a fact that I know all hon. members realize, that these two young men are among the hardest working members of parliament.

I come from a place called Burnaby in British Columbia. Most of you have heard of it over the years, and you are going to continue to hear about it until the people I represent get what I have been asking for in this house over the years I have been here. Many times I have stood in my place and said to the government that the Burnaby area was the second largest area of population in my province. During those years I presented to this house one of the largest petitions ever brought to this House of Commons. Many of my people have written to the government and to members of parliament asking for the recognition which I think is their due. Each one of you knows that I am asking again for an independent television station in Burnaby.

On many occasions I have taken up the time of committees of this house in arguing against C.B.C. specialists and the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with what little ability I have, in regard to this matter. I have continually been brought up against the argument that no satellite or independent station was to be built within the A-contour of a C.B.C. station until the government changed its policy. Actually it was not government policy at all; the government were following out the views of the experts of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. That is what they employ those experts for.

Mr. Dunton has said to me dozens and dozens of times that I could not obtain this television station for my people because Burnaby was within the perimeter of CBUT. Then immediately after leaving the last television committee Mr. Dunton advised the government, and I say this with all respect to my colleague the hon. member for Victoria, that an independent satellite station of C.B.C. would be constructed in Victoria. Again with all respect to my colleague I must say that there can be no comparison between the two places of Burnaby and Victoria. Today Burnaby has almost 90,000 people, and I would be distressed to give the population of Victoria.

Mr. Harris: But it is so beautiful.

Mr. Goode: We have the second largest area of population in my province. It seems hard for members from British Columbia—I include the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, who has fought for me and with me on this matter—to convince civil servants in Ottawa that here are almost 90,000 people wanting something which they consider is their due. With the help of the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation we are met with excuses and more excuses. In conversation with the chairman in Vancouver I was told that we would have to wait for the Fowler commission report. How long did we wait for the Fowler commission report in regard to increasing the power of CKWX at the last meeting of the board of governors? How long did we wait for the Fowler commission report in regard to an independent television station in Victoria?

Of course we did not wait for it. It suited the C.B.C. at that time, as it would suit them at all times, to take these matters under their own consideration, disregarding the people of any province in doing things exactly in the way they wish to do them.

It is just about time, Mr. Speaker, that this great organization changed its policy. I do not argue with the organization itself and never have, or with the way in which they do business. I argue against their policy. Everything is not wrong with the C.B.C.; they do a lot of good things. In this case, though, I again stand in my place and demand that the C.B.C. give permission for a number of companies who reside both in Vancouver and in Burnaby to be allowed to spend their own money—and by money I mean something over a million dollars—to put into operation a station which almost every person in my riding desires.

I hope I do not have to rise in my place again and mention this matter. The idea of waiting for the Fowler report goes out the window, because the C.B.C. do everything they want to do except when somebody wants something they do not desire. Then and only then have we to wait for the Fowler report. In this case they say we must not have an independent station within the perimeter or A-contour of CBUT Vancouver, despite the fact that anyone with a television set on the lower mainland can watch channel 6 every night because it comes in just as strongly as CBUT.

If there was an effective reply to the argument I have tried to put up over the years, surely it is now going to fall down the drain, because the C.B.C. have been shown that the policy they have conducted over the years has turned against them. I have no argument with my colleague from Victoria, who has done so much to get a station for Victoria, but I in turn must speak up for my own people. We have put forward a petition in the house, as I have mentioned; I have stood on my feet in this place many times and asked for this station on behalf of my contituency. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam will support me, I am sure, when I say the majority of the people in Burnaby desire this service, and I ask the government once again if they will overrule this gentleman from the C.B.C. and allow Canadians to spend their own money in Canadian cities.

I have said many times—hon. members have heard me advance this argument on a dozen occasions—that if the C.B.C. service to the lower mainland were the only one we could get we could, I suppose, talk on the lines the hon. gentleman from Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) followed the other night, but we cannot argue in that way. In my own home in Burnaby I can receive sometimes three and often four stations from the United States and, as I have told this house so many times, Canadians in my province are going to KVOS in Bellingham and spending good Canadian money in order to impress the quality of Canadian goods upon Canadians. That is the situation, and there is no one either in this house or in C.B.C. who can argue against it.

In the last provincial election some gentlemen who were running for office spent many thousands of dollars buying time over KVOS, Bellingham, to explain their ideas to Canadians voting in a Canadian election, because they could not get time on CBUT. Perhaps it is proper that I should give notice, not only because I look terrible on television, but I give my word to this house now that I will never try to get a Canadian vote over a United States television station.

I do not want to prolong discussion of a subject which I have gone over so many times, but I would just say that the amount of Canadian money going into KVOS, Bellingham at the moment is something like $750,000 a year. That money would make rather a good profit for Canadian investors. There has been some talk at home—I think perhaps political talk—that I have represented certain interests in setting out the contentions I have presented in this chamber. I say that now because I heard "Hear, hear" from the C.C.F. benches. I say now that all I want as far as my riding is concerned is the right to have a licence for an independent television station, and then the four or five companies who wish to put up the station can have the government decide who is going to finance the undertaking. I do not have any idea who should get the licence for the station, and never have.

Turning to another subject, Mr. Speaker, may I support some of my colleagues in this house who have asked the government to consider an increase in pensions for senior citizens. I have about 7,000 of them in my riding, and I do not think for a moment that this subject should be put on a political basis. I do not think I should go home and say that the Liberals were the only people who asked for an increase, and I do not think C.C.F. members should start an auction sale at home with the object of influencing senior citizens' votes. I do not think any party in this house can either take credit, or discredit any other party, in regard to what we think about the amount of money paid to senior citizens in this country. I will make a wager now that there is not one member in this house who will say they are getting a sufficient monthly income; and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that when the session is finished each of us can go home and say, "We put through a raise for old age pensions. All of us did it, not just a few."

It seems there are a number of members on both sides of the house who have also supported an increase in family allowances. I do not know exactly if, as some hon. gentlemen have suggested, we put through a national health insurance scheme across the country and if we are going to increase old age pensions in addition whether all these things can be done at the same time. I frankly do not know; but I hope, Mr. Speaker, that if the money is available one of the things we should study is an increase in the family allowance for the young people in our constituencies. I do not think any party has the right to take credit for an increase, if there is an increase, when each of us in turn from all sides of the house has done his part in supporting and perhaps getting an increase in these two essential social services.

When I was at home, a week before I left I had a meeting with the war veterans in my riding. Their executive committee met me in Richmond and asked me to support an increase in the married rate of war veterans allowance from $108 to $120 a month. I do support it, and I hope something is done about it at this session. Also while I was home a number of builders and subdividers telephoned and wrote me with regard to unemployment in the building trade in my riding. I could not actually believe—I suppose that is the word—all the things they told me, and I asked them to go out and get evidence as to the conditions in the building trade; whether the lack of housing money was affecting the employment picture, and whether the banks were actually refusing money to all the builders in my riding.

I have here a number of letters from builders in Burnaby-Richmond. One comes from a well known gentleman by the name of Cecil Sharp, who is with Fraser Valley Lands in Richmond. I asked him to get in touch with all the banking interests in Vancouver and in my own riding, to see whether money was available for loans inasmuch as he had told me that his firm was almost going out of business because of lack of mortgage money. I think I have permission from him to mention the names of those about whom he has written me, and I want to put them on the record.

I know that today the Minister of Public Works announced an increase in the N.H.A. interest rate, but this is what some of the financial interests told Mr. Sharp when he visited them last week. He interviewed the mortgage manager of the Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada. Mr. Burke told him that good debentures were bringing from 5 per cent to 5.8 per cent, and that the interest rate would have to be raised to make it attractive to the life insurance companies to lend on N.H.A. mortgages. He also said they would not know anything further until the end of February or March.

The mortgage manager of the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company said his company was only interested in 7 per cent conventional loans. He said they had had one of their biggest years in 1956, when they placed over $5 million worth of mortgage money in British Columbia but only 33 N.H.A. loans. The mortgage manager of the Dominion Life Assurance Company told Mr. Sharp that Dominion in Vancouver had been cut 50 per cent over last year and were on a monthly quota. He told him they were only taking conventional loans at 7 per cent. When Mr. Moss, the manager of the Prudential Insurance Company of America, was interviewed by Mr. Sharp he said he was only interested in conventional loans at 6½ per cent.

I have a number of letters from builders in my riding, all telling a story of laying off experienced men whom they have employed over the years and trained in their method of building, until their staffs are now cut 50 per cent to 75 per cent. Some of these builders have gone out of business entirely. Whether 6 per cent N.H.A. money is going to be effective, whether the interest rate is enough, I do not know; but I hope the words spoken by the Minister of Public Works in the house this morning will at least keep these experienced crews working until the regular building season in Burnaby-Richmond starts early in March.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate now under way I should like first of all through you, sir, to thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the management of Trans-Canada Air Lines for their kind co-operation in enabling me to get home speedily on the death of my father. I appreciate their help very much. In the same vein, sir, to you, to the Prime Minister, certain members of the cabinet and a great many members of the House of Commons, may I express on behalf of my mother and family our great appreciation of the telegrams and letters sent to us on that very sad occasion. They were most welcome, and the expressions of sympathy and understanding were of great assistance to all members of our family.

At this stage of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne it may seem rather difficult to believe that there are still some things that have not yet been said and which we feel should be said. It is not my intention to emphasize or repeat in any way the requests made by other members with regard to the changes they feel are required in government policy and legislation. In only one way do I wish to add my voice to those of members of all parties who have asked the government to bring in at this session improvements in the legislation respecting allowances paid our senior citizens, our blind, our disabled and our veterans.

A great deal has been said already on this subject and, as I said, I am not going to go beyond what has been said except to add that I was most interested in the remarks made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. I want to say to him that if what he said is correct, if the Liberal party is a democracy and not a cabinet dictatorship, then why do they not bring in increased allowances? In the opinion of every member on this and the other side of the house the time is past when these allowances should have been increased.

There is one matter having to do with those of the low income groups about which I want to speak. I refer to the question of housing. There is still a very serious shortage of low rental housing for our aged citizens and those in the same income category. Until about eight years ago nothing whatsoever was being done on their behalf, but a start was made at that time. Some municipalities were interested and made land contributions. Some governments were interested and made grants up to one-third of the capital cost of non-profit housing on a low rental basis for our aged citizens.

Unfortunately there has never been any major effort made by the federal government to interest itself in this most serious problem. I want to give commendation where commendation is due. There is legislation which enables the Minister of Public Works to make a contribution through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to housing for our senior citizens by way of mortgage at an interest rate not greater than 1 per cent more than the rate paid by the government on its own borrowings. However, I feel we have now reached a point with respect to the serious problem of supplying low rental housing for our old age pensioners and others in the same category when there is not only a request but an insistent demand that the federal government show greater interest in the problem and make a greater contribution to its solution than providing mortgage facilities.

Some seven or eight years ago, with a grant of land from a municipality for the nominal sum of $1 and a capital grant of one-third from a provincial government, it was possible to provide good housing for a couple for approximately $22 a month. With the increased costs of construction I can say with authority that now, even with the land free from the municipality, a one-third grant from a provincial government and a mortgage loan from the federal government at 3¾ per cent, it is not possible to make a good home available for a couple for under $35 a month. I know whereof I speak in that regard.

At the pension rates we have in Canada people cannot afford to pay even $35 a month. The low income groups cannot do so. I believe it is only fair that the entire responsibility should not be left on the municipality and the provincial government. Instead, I think the federal government should give most serious consideration to matching the grants of the provincial governments in order that we can take care, on an increased scale, of the housing needs of our senior citizens. I hope the government will give some thought to the matter. But if they will not do so, Mr. Speaker, I would most certainly request that they do not put obstacles in the way of those who want to do something about the situation.

Unfortunately this government puts obstacles in the way of those who want to do something about giving good houses to our old age pensioners. Under the acts of the provincial legislature in their making of grants, and under the terms under which money can be borrowed from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, first of all it must be done by an incorporated company; it must be a non-profit company, and it must put up a certain amount of cash. But when you have churches such as the United Church in British Columbia, an organization such as the Swedish association in British Columbia, an organization such as New Vista in Burnaby and a fraternal organization like the Rotary club at Kelowna interested in this problem, the cash required must come through donations, and we find that as a general rule donations mostly come from the same source.

Those who are willing and able to give also expect that under the Income Tax Act the donations shall be allowable as charitable donations. Mr. Speaker, this government does not allow, under the Income Tax Act, deduction for purposes of income tax of donations to any non-profit, incorporated organization trying to meet the government's responsibility in supplying homes to old age pensioners and those in the same low income category. We know that. We have the ruling of the legal department of the Minister of National Revenue that such donations are not covered and cannot be covered.

That being the case, Mr. Speaker, surely it is not asking too much of the government that, if an amendment is required, they introduce at this session the required amendment in order to take care of the church and fraternal organizations that are trying to do the job that should be the responsibility of government. At least do not put obstacles in their way.

I would also ask you to note this fact, Mr. Speaker. The reason we are turned down by the legal department of the Minister of National Revenue is that we are operating a business. Mr. Speaker, I think there would be a revolution in this country if you tried to tell those who donate to the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., or the Salvation Army that they could not have exemption under the act because they are operating a business. They are all operating a business in connection with hotels and hostels, the renting of rooms, and doing a wonderful job; and they are sustained to a great extent by charitable donations, directly or indirectly, through the community chests and the red feather drives. Yet, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the provision of homes for the aged on a low rental basis, the government says, "You cannot have any exemption".

Just the other day we heard the Prime Minister tell us about the new Canada Council —that is a wonderful thing and something which is long overdue—and he emphasized the fact that provision would be made that donations given to this council for the advancement of culture and the arts would be exempt as charitable donations. Mr. Speaker, I agree with that course. But I say it is a confounded shame that the government should boast that they are going to make provision for the exemption of gifts for the advancement of culture and the arts, and refuse the same right for the building of homes for the aged of the Dominion of Canada. I certainly hope that something will be done about the situation. I am interested in the advancement of culture and the arts. Maybe I need some myself. But I am interested first of all in decent homes for those who have built our country, and the government should have the same interest.

To go on from that point, there is another matter I desire to raise. It may seem small, but to many it is important. I am extremely grateful that the Minister of Labour is in his seat, because I am certain he will take note of it. Under the British North America Act there are divisions of jurisdiction as between the federal government and the provincial governments. One of the responsibilities and jurisdictions of a provincial government is the enactment of legislation on hours of work. Legislation varies in the different provinces of Canada, but most of the provinces are interested in hours of work and they make laws as to how many hours it is lawful to work in a day and how many hours it is lawful to work in a week.

It always happens that law is behind what has become general practice and what is the demand of organized labour. But it seems to me only reasonable to suppose that any activities of the federal government or of any department under the federal government would be in line with the laws of the province, or would be of such a nature as not to discriminate against people if they want to live up to the laws of the province. Therefore through you, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Minister of Labour that I think it is wrong that the attitude of the unemployment insurance commission should be that if a person becomes tired of working too much overtime, finally rebels against working too much overtime, even above the trade union agreement and the law of the province, and quits the job because of the overtime, then when he makes application for unemployment insurance he should be told, "You are not eligible because you did not have a legitimate reason for quitting the job".

I know this applies in particular to one phase of operations. If a woman is single, works overtime and does not complain, then after being married if she does not want to work excessive overtime but wants to go home after work she is denied lawful hours. The unemployment insurance commission says "You are now married. You did not object to this overtime when you were single, so you have now no reason for quitting your job. You are not eligible for unemployment insurance".

Mr. Speaker, I assure the Minister of Labour that I am not talking through my hat. I have cases; I have decisions. I have on my desk one decision of the appeal board that such is the rule and such is the policy. I just want to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Labour that it is definitely wrong, and I sincerely hope he will interest himself in that one little phase of a large operation; because it is not only wrong in principle but is placing a burden on people who do not wish to work overtime but are forced to do so. If they quit their jobs they are not eligible for unemployment insurance. Surely in our country, in our provincial and our federal policies, our goal should be that everybody should work reasonable hours. As long as we have immigrants who want to come here and are told they cannot because we have no employment, then we should have a federal policy which coincides with provincial law on hours of work in a day or a week.

There is another subject which I will not discuss at any length because, as I said, I do not wish to take up too much time in this debate. It is an important subject. I merely wish to ask if and when this government is going to give at this session some information to the people of Canada and in particular to the people of British Columbia as to what government policy is going to be on major developments in regard to international rivers. It is not enough to read in the papers about surveys and studies. They may extend over many years, and the developments about which I have read recently perhaps will not be undertaken for 25 years. The problem of the Columbia river is of such a nature that there should be some indication by the government now as to government policy and co-operation between governments as to development of that great resource of British Columbia.

One of the great regrets in my years in public life is that we have to wait until the last moment to find out what a government has in mind. The speech from the throne was one of the most barren documents I have ever heard or read in my life. It gave no indication whatsoever to the common people as to what they might expect. We all know there is going to be an election this year, and the major guessing game which is going on across Canada today is trying to find out what is government strategy. To me it appears that the government strategy is to wait until we have been here a few weeks; then perhaps have the Minister of Finance bring down the budget; then ask for six months' interim supply, and then dissolve the house, when the members of parliament will have no right to discuss the people's business or to interrogate on government policy.

It will be a marvellous thing when we have true democracy in this country. That will be when we have a government that operates on principle and not on political election expediency. It has always been that way in the past but there is no reason why it should be that way in the future. There is no reason why a government should have to use a strategy for election purposes. In the same light there is no reason why an opposition should have to use parliament for election strategy purposes. Sometimes, however, the hands of the opposition are forced in trying to force the hands of the government.

Mr. Speaker, I opened by giving you the thanks of our family for your expression of sympathy on the death of my father. May I conclude with the final words that man, who was for 24 years in the British Columbia legislature, left as his epitaph. I think if we will guide ourselves, as government members or as opposition members, by these four lines we will have a greater Canada, more democratic and more honest elections:

> Not as a ladder from earth to heaven;
> Not as a witness to any creed.
> But simple service, simply given,
> To his own kind in their common need.

When parliament follows that rule we will have democracy.

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): The mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne deserve our sincere congratulations. Both these hon. members delivered very interesting speeches, and in so doing brought credit upon themselves and honour to their constituents. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona lived up to the trust placed in him by the Prime Minister. Although I was not present when the hon. member spoke I read his speech in Hansard and found it very interesting. I should like to congratulate him for having spoken in French as well. This is a mark of good will that is deeply appreciated by all Canadians of French descent. The hon. member for Gloucester is also deserving of my felicitations. His talent as a good speaker was already known in this house, and on this occasion his words were carefully chosen and were most interesting to read.

May I digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to tell the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, although he is not in the house and no member can ever be sure when he will be in the house—

Mr. Dufresne: We never know when you are in the house, either, because this is the first time you have spoken.

Mr. Habel: Speak for yourself. In answer to the hon. member for Quebec West I would only say this much, Mr. Speaker. We have had to listen to his ballyhoo for three or four years, but most likely after the next election we will not see him any more.

I was going to say, for the benefit of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska—I hope he will have occasion to read my words—that had he understood the speech of the hon. member who seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne he could have learned a lesson in politeness and reasoning. This lesson would have been very useful not only to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, but would have been of great benefit to the Conservative members who are so uneasy when the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska indulges in petty politics, trying to belittle not only hon. members in this house but even the ministers of the crown.

I know that some will cry, "Heavens, we are in a democracy". With that I fully agree; but we will have democracy only as long as opposition party members will criticize loyally the policies of the government, rather than trying to belittle men who enjoy the confidence not only of the electors they represent in this house but also of the majority of the people of this country. After all, what achieved the election of the great number of Liberal members who were returned to this house in 1953 if not the policies and the integrity of the right hon. Prime Minister and his cabinet? It is normal indeed that the opposition may differ in its opinion on ways and means, and it is the duty of the opposition to criticize where it is felt better things could be done; but why not suggest constructively rather than criticize destructively, as does the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska?

I think also of the hon. member for Broadview, a young man who appears to have had rather a fair schooling but who cannot participate in any debate without rehashing his old song "Tired Old Men" when he refers to the ministers. He seems to forget that the Tory party and government of Great Britain was led by a man much older than our Prime Minister but who on many occasions showed that he had more brains than many young would-be politicians like the hon. member for Broadview, who also appears to have forgotten that his father was born before him, and how lucky he is that this was so.

Mr. Speaker, if I mention these two hon. gentlemen it is not because I want this house to think for a moment that I hold a similar opinion of all members of the opposition. I have great respect for all hon. members in this house whatever party they belong to; and moreover, with regard to some who may have a slip of the tongue in the heat of a discussion, it is soon forgotten. But to a very few, and especially the two hon. members I have mentioned, I would say beware; for in the long run you will notice that you are not helping your own party by belittling men like those in the cabinet today. They have proven by deeds and not simply by mere words that the confidence placed in them in five elections has been justified; and should there be an election early this summer I am sure the Canadian people will return the same men to office.

You have a new leader, and I congratulate him on his appointment as such. Would it not be better for Conservatives to try to build up their party to be worthy of more confidence on the part of the Canadian public, rather than attempt to undermine men who have served so faithfully and so well not only the party to which they belong but the whole of Canada; and I would say even outside of Canada, for it is no secret that all the ministers who have represented us in other countries have been a credit to this nation. Please notice I said "nation" rather than referring to the party to which they belong, because when they are abroad they think and act on behalf of the nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of posing as a master in democracy but I did feel it my duty to make those few remarks in the hope that they might be useful. After all democracy will survive as long as public men respect authority, truth and justice and even the electorate.

Opposition parties seem to find the speech from the throne lacking in a sufficient number of new measures. I feel sure that, before the end of this session, we shall hear them say that what new legislation or changes are suggested will be only brought in because of a forthcoming general election. This of course, as I have said, is rather normal. Nevertheless, if I am any judge of public opinion, when the people of this country will be called upon to judge between actions and promises, it will give the government another vote of confidence. This vote of confidence will go to a government which possibly did not do all that was requested of it . . .

Mr. Dufresne: Certainly not.

Mr. Habel: . . . but which, I am convinced has done a lot and for the general good of everybody.

Mr. Speaker, the people I have the honour to represent here include farmers, settlers, professional men, merchants and all kinds of workers. The extent of the constituency of Cochrane is such that it is more an empire than a county. A rather extraordinary fact is that, from one end of the county of Cochrane to the other, various groups, whatever their origin, live in perfect harmony. The various classes of people live together in one happy family. When I see that happening in my constituency, I wonder why it cannot be the same the world over.

My constituents are appreciative of the work done by the present government to maintain peace in the world. They have the greatest respect for the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who plays such an important part on behalf of the government of Canada in international affairs.

Like many other Canadians, they would welcome a reduction in our national defence budget but they fully understand that, as long as communist Russia nourishes the same ambitious designs, we owe it to ourselves, and to future generations, to maintain a moral and spiritual force and even an armed force to provide for all emergencies.

In a speech I delivered before a social club, early last October, I stated my conviction that the majority of the people now behind the iron curtain are not communists, and I am still convinced this is so. A few weeks after that speech, Hungary was in a turmoil and this gallant nation would be today a free nation if Russian tanks and machine guns had not interfered with her freedom. How courageous this nation was to try to overcome such an intolerable situation. We must therefore welcome with open arms these refugees who suffered so much and whose only dream is to gain freedom.

There has been a spontaneous response to the appeal of the hon. minister of immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) just about everywhere in Canada. And I am proud to say that in the town of Kapuskasing, where I live, a committee has already been formed, which includes various religious confessions, to take care of the Hungarian families who might want to come there. His Excellency Mgr. Louis Lévesque, Bishop of the diocese of Hearst, asked that each parish manage to receive at least one family. This organization is doing fine and should the opportunity arise, these families will be welcomed with the best of attention.

The Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company, of Kapuskasing expressed its willingness to hire Hungarian workers. I imagine that those men will want to bring their families along with them. So although housing is at a premium in our town, the committee is busy finding dwellings for them.

It may be that, in a country as prosperous as Canada, there had to arise such tragic circumstances to make us realize and appreciate our security properly, from the spiritual as well as from the material point of view.

There may be people, though not many, who believe that we are doing more than our share in admitting all these refugees, but I hope that, when they understand what a blow these patriots dealt the Russian bear and communism, not only in Hungary, but in France, in Italy, as well as in all the countries where the devotees of communism have been a constant menace, they soon will change their minds.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a point on which I would like to say a few words. I shall do so by reviewing a situation that might be forgotten in times of prosperity, even with the best of intentions. I am speaking of taxation, of the income tax.

The opposition parties claim that the income tax is far too high, and that we must cut down expenses. Curiously enough, however, they dare not say where and how to cut them down.

Mr. Dufresne: We have told you already.

[Mr. Habel.]

Mr. Habel: Would they agree to a decrease in the national defence appropriation? I doubt it. Would they agree to a curtailment of social legislation benefits? Again I doubt it, especially before an election. Would they welcome a decrease in the amounts voted for public works? Judging by the requests made even by the opposition parties when the estimates of the public works department are before the house, those appropriations should be increased to satisfy them. Would they agree to cut the salaries of the civil servants who are surely not overpaid? Again I doubt it since they seem to take such an interest in them, especially before an election.

They talk about a surplus, as if we ought to be ashamed of it, forgetting that a surplus means that our country is even more prosperous than we could foresee.

Mr. Speaker, I am no socialist but I find that we are very fortunate to have a planned economy in Canada. Is not all this outcry about a possible surplus as well as about income tax simply a political shenanigan? For my part and I speak, I think, in the name of the majority of my electors, I would rather be in a position to pay income tax rather than go back to a depression such as we experienced under the Bennett administration.

Mr. Dufresne: Brought on by the previous administration.

Mr. Habel: I did not understand the hon. member's interruption.

Mr. Dufresne: A depression brought on by the former regime.

Mr. Habel: By people like you, opportunists who know not where to go. Yet, Mr. Bennett had promised . . .

Mr. Dufresne: It is not very convincing!

Mr. Habel: . . . a full lunch pail and at least $5 a day. Paying taxes when there is full employment, when we are enjoying as we do today a booming economy is not the worse of all evils.

During the economic depression, that is the years 1930 and 1937, the constituency I have the honour to represent today was nothing more than a pioneer settlement, and having then the honour and the task of representing that county at the provincial legislature in Toronto, I had there an experience that I would not want to go through again. Rather than suffer the misery of those years, the people of the constituency of Cochrane prefer by far to be subject to income tax when their income warrants it. During the last election campaign, some of the speakers who were supporting my conservative adversary, tried to discredit income tax. But the electors, particularly those who had known the depression years, still remembered what they had been through, and they did not refrain from interrupting those speakers to tell them that they would much rather pay income tax than go back to the unemployment relief or pittances of 20 cents a day.

No, Mr. Speaker, Canadians enjoy social laws and the administration of a democracy which serves the people. Therefore people understand too that the money for national defence, for social laws and family allowances, for old age pensions and pensions for the blind, the disabled, and the veterans; and the grants for hospital construction, and so on, has to come from taxes. And since he enjoys the benefits of a democracy with truly Christian social laws, the citizen of Canada also understands his obligations. And those who have to pay income tax do it, as a rule, willingly.

I would not have to dwell on this matter, except perhaps to say, incidentally, that it would be appropriate to study the situation as it is today, and with due regard to the high cost of living. For families and individuals alike, there may be reasons in favour of raising the basic exemption. Even if families receive children's allowances, the price of food, rent, clothing and our Canadian standard of living have increased to such extent that the present exemption must seem obsolete if it is not balanced by a quite considerable increase in social security benefits.

I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), on behalf of all those I represent here, if there is no way of increasing the basic exemption for bachelors to $1,500 and for a married couple to at least $2,500 and perhaps $3,000 if possible. It is true that we are speaking of health insurance, which, if voted, would mean further expense. But, until the provinces show enough interest in this project, such increase of basic exemptions would seem feasible to me.

As regards the possible surplus at the end of the fiscal year, part of it might be used to increase old age pensions, which would be a great help to a great number of my fellow citizens. On that point, Mr. Speaker, I would add that the provinces are very slow to give our older citizens the additional amount they might need. Yet, when the federal government undertook to pay $40 a month, the province of Ontario was thereby saved a very large sum of money which it could easily have used, at least in part, to pay an additional amount in case of need. For our older citizens who have no other means of support $40 a month is indeed insufficient. Provinces which are not as rich as Ontario pay such additional amounts, and it is hard to understand why that province shows such reluctance to do so.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I would like the government to increase not only these pensions but also family allowances, as suggested in many requests from my constituents. Since their inception these allowances have contributed to raise the standard of living of many families of modest means. An adjustment which would take into account a rise in the cost of living would have great moral value in a number of homes. I will even go so far as to say that it is absolutely necessary, because of the constant rise in the cost of living.

Another point on which I would like to touch, Mr. Speaker, if I have time, is the delicate matter of a truly distinctive Canadian national flag. There is nothing new in this as far as I am concerned. In 1939, when Their Majesties the King and Queen were visiting this country, I spoke in the legislative assembly in Toronto and deplored the fact that we were the only nation in the commonwealth that had no distinctive flag with which to greet its sovereigns. On this point, Mr. Speaker, I think that the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) is very valuable. His suggestion is that the leaders of the various parties here arrange for consultations in order to arrive at a solution so that this matter of a choice of the flag will not be a political bone of contention. After all, Mr. Speaker, this problem of a flag which is symbolic of the very heart of a nation, should be resolved by the various party leaders, and the Canadian people would be all the better for it.

I should also like to say a few words about the trans-Canada highway. In my constituency, the highway connecting the east and west boundaries is the only true trans-Canada highway at the present time. In 1941, the Ontario government, a Liberal government at the time, opened to traffic the 153-mile highway connecting Hearst and Geraldton, which gave us then a fully Canadian highway. Since then, that highway has brought in tourists and has been used for transportation generally. In fact, I would like a survey made of the number of heavy trucks using that highway. I am sure the government would be surprised at the ever growing number of its users. Who knows, such a survey might lead to an agreement with the provincial government whereby that highway would be considered as part of the trans-Canada highway, not only because of its importance from the commercial and touristic point of view, but specially from the point of view of national defence. Highway No. 11 is already in existence and useful; no one can ignore its importance from the point of view of national defence as well as for trade and tourism.

In this same connection, I wish to join with the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Gourd) to ask the Department of National Defence as well as the Department of Public Works to consider the possibility of connecting northwestern Quebec with northeastern Ontario. To connect Norembega, in Ontario, to La Reine, in Quebec, there remains only a distance of about 40 miles to complete that road. The soil is well suited for road construction. There would be perhaps a few bridges to build but, if the federal and provincial governments came to an agreement, the cost would be rather insignificant when one considers the usefulness of a road which would shorten considerably distances between Quebec, Montreal and western Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by thanking the house for its forbearance and by assuring the government that the population of my constituency has the greatest confidence in the future of our part of the country, especially now that we are sure to get natural gas, a most essential product to the early development of an area filled with prospects and minerals of high value. Owing to natural gas, we look to the future with hope. In a few years the constituency of Cochrane will be among the most prosperous constituencies in our province as well as in the country.

Now Mr. Speaker, the subamendment and the amendment constitute a non-confidence motion in the government; so, I don't have to tell you that, on behalf of my constituents, I will vote against those two motions. I trust that the present government, conscious of its responsibilities, will go on improving our social legislation every time the opportunity arises.

So Mr. Speaker, I believe that, should there be an election this year, the constituency will keep faith with the government which, for more than 20 years, has been leading our country with a touch that is envied by so many other nations as well as other political parties in our own country.

(Text):

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, there is no problem which concerns the Canadian people so much at the present time as that of the value of their dollars. To the man on the street the exercises of the Bank of Canada in tampering with the bank rate and the apparently fuzzy money policy are bewildering. The government's tight money policy, supposedly intended to control inflation, has only aggravated a serious situation. This is altogether too evident when one considers the difficulties of Canadian municipalities in financing their debenture issues. The whole unhappy business filters through the house construction industry and injures enterprises large and small all across the country.

It is being reflected not only in the decrease in the number of houses being built, but in its adverse effect on the small businessman who is experiencing difficulty in obtaining loans for his month to month operations. To cut a long story short, it is getting to the point where it is being reflected in higher prices all across the board. The rising cost of living is now exerting a real pressure on Canadian family budgets, and the house will await with real concern the statement promised by the Minister of Finance on this subject.

While on this subject of rising food prices I might mention that the Minister of Justice has not yet, I understand, declared his position with regard to the latest curse in merchandising, the gold bond stamp, the blue chip stamp or, in other words, the premium stamp. Retailers and retail organizations across the country are definitely opposed to this new gimmick which was introduced by one retail organization to beat the competition of all others in the same line of merchandising. It may rest with individual crown attorneys or with the provincial attorneys general to take action in this situation, but it would appear nevertheless that some leadership might be forthcoming from the federal government and the Minister of Justice.

These stamps by their very nature contribute to inflation, which is something that should concern the Minister of Finance as well as the Minister of Justice. The retail organization or association of Canada contends that the use of these stamps in a so-called give-away program only adds to the cost of doing business. The chain stores and others in competition operate on a very narrow margin of profit and depend entirely upon a vast volume of sales. Because of this narrow margin of profit these retail stores cannot afford to give away something for nothing. Consequently housewives are being duped day in and day out into believing they are gaining valuable premiums for nothing as they purchase family supplies.

Actually the contrary is the case. Ever since this stamp business was introduced the prices of many staple items of food have been edging higher and higher; in other words, prices have been increased to take care of the cost of the stamps and of the premiums that are given away when the shopper accumulates a sufficient number of stamps.

Before this merchandising curse spreads to the extent that it has spread in the United States and fastens itself upon the economy as a multi-million dollar leech, some government action should be taken to eradicate it altogether.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that action should be taken without delay. This is a most deceptive practice, but unfortunately many shoppers cannot see through the idea and have been sold on the notion that by obtaining these stamps when they purchase their grocery requirements they are actually getting something for nothing. I do not think any hon. member of this house, regardless of the party to which he belongs, would not agree that this is a practice which should be stopped, and I think it must be stopped at the highest government level without delay.

Mr. Speaker, since coming to this house in 1945 I, like many other members of the official opposition and others, have made proposals to the government concerning the plight of the municipalities across this country. As an illustration, we have urged that crown companies should be subject to taxation in the same way as any other industries in a municipality. The government through one of its senior ministers opposed that idea for several years and it was not until 1949 that a formula giving effect to our views was adopted, the same formula that was prescribed by me in the five years prior to its announcement.

It took repetition to have this idea accepted by the government and, Mr. Speaker, I make no apology tonight for again bringing to the attention of the government the plight of the municipalities. If the matter is as serious as we claim it is, and I am sure government members must know how serious it is, it bears repetition. We have advocated in the house that crown property in any municipality be subject to taxation. Some few years ago after considerable argument a 4 per cent fringe, so to speak, was put on, and if crown property amounted to that percentage of the total assessment there was payment in lieu of taxes. That was later reduced to 2 per cent, and I am happy that this year the 2 per cent has been removed so that crown property is wholly subject to taxation.

That is one very minor form of relief to which the municipalities are entitled, but it is still not enough because, as we have said over the years, the senior government is getting such a high proportion of the tax dollar that it is squeezing the junior governments to such an extent that municipal bodies find themselves today in a straitjacket, hardly able to raise enough revenue to do the necessary financing to take care of administration, schools, sewage disposal and all the services required by the people living in the municipality.

According to the dominion bureau of statistics, in 1939 the federal government received 48 cents of the tax dollar, the provincial governments 22.3 cents and the municipal governments 29.7 cents. At the present time the federal government has increased its share to 77 cents of the tax dollar while the provincial governments have been reduced to 12 cents and the poor cousins of the senior government, the municipal governments, have had their share reduced to 11 cents.

I think everyone will agree that it is actually at the municipal level that you get the most for the taxpayer's dollar, and it is most unfortunate that in our growing cities today home owners find their taxes are so high that they almost wonder whether or not they should have bought a home. Certainly in this day and age we do not find, as we did years ago, homes being constructed for rental purposes. That time has gone, and I do not expect it will ever come again.

I would urge the government to consider the idea we have advocated for several years, one that several members have put forward much more forcefully than I have ever been able to, namely that the sales tax that municipal governments have to pay should be abolished. No provincial government pays a sales tax. The municipal governments are in a more serious situation than even the provincial governments, and I submit in all fairness that is all the more reason why the sales tax on their purchases should be removed.

I had a telegram today from our city manager in the city of Sarnia containing the information that sales tax paid by the city in 1956 and by contractors working for the municipality amounted to $150,000. For a city the size of Sarnia that means less than $4 per head, but after all is said and done it is no small amount inasmuch as it is the home owner who has to bear the burden of all the financing that is necessary in a municipality. I hope this principle can be adopted during the present session and made applicable to every municipality throughout the country, because I do not know of a municipality that would not be very grateful for this much relief per capita by way of exemption from sales tax.

As hon. members are aware, in the United States municipal taxes on a home, for instance, are deductible from a person's income for income tax purposes. We have suggested before in the house that this principle be applied in Canada, and I urge that the government follow suit or at least consider the necessity for taking such action. It has worked out fairly well in the United States, and I think it is one measure we could adopt with profit and a great deal of satisfaction to the home owners of Canada.

I am going to speak for a moment about the Sarnia Indian reserve, inasmuch as I had a question on the order paper recently asking the amount of money paid to the city of Sarnia in the year 1956. My question was:

What amount, if any, was paid by the federal government to the city of Sarnia for work or services of any kind in connection with the Sarnia Indian reserve for the year 1956?

This was the answer given by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration:

Water supplied to council house, etc. ..	$ 113.37
Fire calls	375.00
Sarnia board of education (tuition)	1,862.22
Sarnia separate school board (tuition) .	280.00
	$2,630.59

I feel that this matter must be brought to the attention of the house and the government again, because we understand that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration now has the responsibility of determining what amount will be paid by the government for services to any Indian reserve. In a letter to me of October 31, 1955, concerning this matter and in reply to a letter I had written to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said:

My colleague, the Hon. Mr. Harris, has referred to me your letter of August 29 in connection with a request from the city of Sarnia for payment for services provided to the Indian reserve within the limits of the city.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, it will be of interest to hon. members to learn that this particular reserve is now actually in the process of being sold at a consideration of some $7 million, though it may take some time before the transaction is completed. Therefore you can appreciate that we are not dealing with a very small project. If the deal goes through it will be one of the largest real estate deals that has ever taken place, in fact I think the largest in Canada. This is Indian property, and it is within the confines of the city of Sarnia. The minister goes on to say:

The June 15, 1955, amendment of the Municipal Grants Act excluded Indian reserves from the definition of "federal property" and consequently it has been necessary to consider an alternative arrangement to enable payment for services provided by municipalities to Indian reserves. It is hoped that shortly we will be able to deal with claims from municipalities for such services, at which time the matter will be taken up with the clerk or the manager of the city of Sarnia.

The return I received showed that the amount paid to the city of Sarnia was $2,630.59 for 1956, but the telegram I had today from the city manager indicates that only $375 was paid to the Sarnia city treasury by the federal government in connection with the Sarnia Indian reserve. As a matter of fact the amount asked for by the city of Sarnia was in the neighbourhood of $27,000 per year for services rendered to the reserve, and the city contended that amount was rightfully owing to the city for such services.

I submit that in all fairness there is no reason whatsoever why veterans, young people and our older people should be obligated to pay for services amounting to $27,000 provided to this reserve, when realty sales have been made over the last two years at the rate of some $2,000 per acre and considerable acreage has been sold. Hence it is not working any hardship to those who are living on the reserve. I therefore think the government, in all fairness, should make it a policy across this country that where a municipality services an Indian reservation, that municipality should be reimbursed for any amount it has been required to spend for that purpose.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, with which I should like to deal for just a moment. Down in our section of western Ontario we have an extremely high-grade agricultural area specializing in cash crops in order to give a return commensurate with the capital investment in the property. We have farms in many areas down in western Ontario where land values are $200, $300 and $400 an acre.

The point I am making is this. Where these people must engage in specialized farming, it is necessary that these growers or producers obtain the necessary help at the necessary time. Down there we have early vegetable growers, sugar beet growers, fruit growers and so on. I know that last year the acreage in sugar beets was small and that the canners could have taken in a good deal more fruit and vegetables had the producers had available to them the necessary labour. However, it was not available.

In connection with the government's immigration policy, I think they will agree with me that a small portion of 1 per cent of the immigrants are capable of doing this sort of work, but there are people from various countries in Europe who can readily be trained. I would suggest that it should be the policy of the federal government to see that those in these specialized industries, such as the fruit and vegetable growers in Essex, the sugar beet growers and the tobacco growers, get the required help at the time they actually need it. It is no good to have this help coming in a week or two after it should have been there.

I hope and expect that the government's immigration policy, through the minister, will be such that the necessary labour to take care of the proper cultivating and harvesting of these crops will be made available in co-operation with organizations requiring this specialized help. I have, as I am sure have other members, a petition or resolution from the flue-cured tobacco growers and from other organizations sent to the government asking for specialized help to harvest their respective crops. I therefore hope the government will not handicap these producers and processors, but will do what is necessary so they may continue to survive as an important segment of our agricultural economy. They must not be handicapped by any policy or lack of policy of the government.

Another matter with which I wish to deal just briefly, Mr. Speaker, is this, and I think that every hon. member will agree with me that it has considerable merit. I refer now to the cases of war veterans who are petitioning the pension board for pensions. I say this because I want to relate one particular experience which causes me to bring this matter before the house. We have the case of a young chap who was on the Murmansk run, who prior to his enlistment, had been active athletically and who, for some four or five years or a little longer, I believe, was attempting to get a pension because of a certain disease which caused the loss of a leg and a couple of fingers. He had not been successful in obtaining any pension. As does every other hon. member, I appreciate the fact that it is not the responsibility of the pension board to produce the evidence that is to come before that board. They are a tribunal. However, I say this. I say that advocates or those in charge of producing the particular evidence in a particular case should be well versed as to what is necessary in order that the man's case gets a fair hearing.

This particular individual was not able to get a pension of any kind. It happened to be my good fortune to talk to a couple of senior members of my party, one of whom is now in the house. Through their co-operation we were able to give this matter a little more thought, with the result that we got in touch with some of the authorities in the London area. They were kind enough to come up to my house, and we discussed this man's case.

In this particular instance, Mr. Speaker, I am extremely happy to say that they had carefully prepared the evidence. In fact they had three top-class police officers from the Sarnia police department and two young lads who had been in service and who were able to corroborate the fact that this man had complained of his illness while he was in service. I happen to have had the pleasure of going down to London to hear the evidence when it was placed before the tribunal, and at the conclusion I could not help but feel that the man would be entitled to his pension.

I must pay a tribute of respect to those in that area who prepared the evidence in this case. It could not have been prepared better. The result was that the man received a 100 per cent pension. He also received a clothing allowance of $6 a month, I believe, and he gets another $720 a year as a helplessness allowance.

My point in bringing this matter to the attention of the house is simply this. This unfortunate young man who enlisted in His Majesty's service to serve his king and country waited five years for justice. He did not know what evidence was required in order to entitle him to a pension. When the proper evidence was submitted he obtained it without any hesitation. In all fairness to advocates in any place in Canada, and in fairness to the war veterans to whom we owe so much, I submit that the cases should be prepared, with all the available evidence, at the earliest opportunity, in order that the particular veteran may get what he is entitled to without being obliged to wait for four or five years.

In this particular case the man waited for five years. He had the evidence, and it could have been available. Had the evidence been presented some four or five years ago this war veteran would have had the same entitlement that he is getting today, or at least that he obtained beginning on October 1, 1955.

I do not make any apology for bringing this matter before the house, because I feel that undoubtedly there are many other cases in Canada where the same situation exists. If there is entitlement to a pension I hope that in the future those who are charged with the responsibility of presenting evidence on behalf of the veteran will see that the proper evidence is produced at the first hearing, and will not wait until four or five years have passed to produce it in order that, at that particular hearing, he may get the justice to which he was entitled a long time previously.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in closing I would like to say that our party have always felt that this 20-year requirement for old age assistance should be reduced to 10 years. I think the government should give consideration to that idea. I believe it was suggested at a recent provincial-federal welfare conference convened by the federal government that we have many new residents in this country who are making their contribution to Canada. There should be no quarrel with the idea that these people should be entitled to old age assistance without having to wait 20 years. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that 10 years is sufficient.

I do hope that during this session the government will take whatever action is necessary without delay to see that measures are introduced which will effectively curb inflation.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): I want to extend my hearty congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, not only because it is customary, but because they well deserve it. They admirably carried out a task which is less easy than it may seem, because not only does it require some knowledge of Canadian politics, but those who are chosen for this part generally get little advance information on the matters which are to be submitted to the house during the session. The mover and seconder are therefore to be commended because they have shown their ability to read the future, if I may say so, by their serious and profound description of certain aspects of the projects to be drawn to the attention of hon. members.

I also want to congratulate the government on the legislation mentioned in the speech from the throne, which will be considered during this session. I congratulate it not as a supporter but as a representative of a working class constituency, comprising also people of all classes.

It is not my intention to analyse all proposals that will be submitted to us but, on the other hand, it is my duty to underline some of them, more particularly those concerning the advancement of arts in our province and the subsidies granted to the universities of the various provinces.

The Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences will no doubt have a difficult task to accomplish. That task will consist of setting up an organization which will give our artists the opportunity to develop their talents on the national level. It should be admitted that 25 or 40 years ago our artists would not have been able to avail themselves of the advantages that the government is offering them now, because there were not enough of them at that time. However, at the present time we have a very great number of artists, French or English speaking, musicians, stage or motion picture actors.

While we are on the subject of motion pictures, and even though I am not sure I will have an opportunity of appearing before this future committee, I feel I should take this opportunity of putting forward the following suggestion. May I point out first that with regard to motion pictures, I was told recently that in Great Britain they are not allowed to import American pictures over and above a certain quota determined by the production of British films.

I do not know that we could establish a quota in this country. Our motion picture industry is developing, and I am told that steps are being taken to give considerable expansion to this very remunerative activity. Under those circumstances, I wonder whether it would be proper to limit the importation of American films to the number we would be allowed to export across the 45th parallel. That is a suggestion which comes at the appropriate moment since, I repeat, in certain quarters, we are getting ready to develop more fully our movie industry; it would be beneficial to us to find on the American market an outlet which would give that industry an opportunity to be on its own.

In the fields of music and drama, I believe that the only way to help our artists with due respect as usual for provincial autonomy, is to grant some subsidies to recognized institutions, which could distribute them to young artists in order to help them to create for themselves a career which would provide them with sufficient income so that they can devote all their time to it.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Dupuis: Already ten o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

IMMIGRATION

C. G. HANNA—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave, pursuant to standing order 26, to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the gross abuse of natural justice constituted by the methods followed at the hearing of the appeal of Christian George Hanna by an immigration appeal board in Vancouver, British Columbia, and the urgent necessity of suspending action in connection with the deportation of Mr. Hanna until his case has been fully considered and disposed of in accordance with proper and just procedures.

If I may, as to the urgency—

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think the other day the hon. gentleman objected to anything being said after such a motion had been submitted to the Speaker for his opinion.

Mr. Fulton: And I recall that on that occasion the Speaker said the matter of urgency might properly be the subject of reference, and there was in fact a reference to that question by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Speaker: I will first read the motion and see if I need any assistance. If I do, no doubt I will call upon the hon. gentleman. It strikes me on reading over the subject matter of the motion which the hon. member for Kamloops has submitted that, as a ground for the urgency of debate in this matter, he talks about the suspension of an action which is about to be taken with respect to the gentleman mentioned in the motion. Perhaps the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) could state whether or not there is an action contemplated having to do with the deportation of Mr. Hanna.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all I can state is what I hear on the radio and read in the press: that a gentleman who purports to be the solicitor for this person has applied to the supreme court of British Columbia, from which it would seem to me that the case is before the courts and, therefore, hardly an appropriate subject for debate in this house.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I could say what I was told by the solicitor?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: That following the process, which was called a hearing, before the immigration appeal board yesterday morning, the man was ordered to leave and was, according to my information at the time of the telephone call, in the process of being transported back to Port Alberni where the boat is lying in harbour and from which it is due to sail, I believe, tonight. Knowing the practice of the department in the past of disregarding notices of applications for writs of certiorari and their practice of trying to get people out of the country notwithstanding those notices having been served, unless the minister is able to state positively that this man will not be deported until after the case is heard, I submit there are grounds established by the wording of the motion for urgency of discussion and decision.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman talks about urgency of discussion and decision. The only decision we can arrive at is that we adjourn the house, and the debate is over. That is the only decision we can arrive at today. The overriding practice, of course, is that while the debate on the address is currently proceeding, motions under standing order 26 are not accepted, and that has been the case, as the hon. gentleman knows, for many years.

There is no doubt that the matter referred to in this motion is one which many members regard with a great deal of sympathy, but as for putting aside the debate on the address today in order to discuss this matter—one which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has alleged may be before the courts —I hesitate to do so.

One must not forget that there has been moved a subamendment to the amendment on the main motion, and that today and tomorrow, if we go on with the debate on the address, members who have spoken on the main motion or on the amendment may speak again on the subamendment which was moved a few days ago.

Mr. Fulton: On that particular question, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the purpose of a motion such as this is to enable the house to deal in a substantive manner with the subject matter complained of or brought to its attention. The only way that effective action can be taken in this instance is if we obtain from the minister, as a result of that process and discussion, an assurance that this man will not be sent out of Canada pending full and proper disposition of his case.

There is no way in the course of the speech from the throne debate in which that issue can be brought to a head. It can, I submit, only be brought to a head if you allow me to present this motion so that discussion can be directed towards that specific subject matter and the house can express its opinion and get a positive reaction and assurance from the minister on that basis. There is no way in the throne speech debate to bring about such a result. That is why it is urgent that that debate be adjourned.

Mr. Macdonnell: Without purporting to give an opinion on the rules, are we not in danger of forgetting that this is the high court of parliament and are there not occasions when we may take such action as will try to ensure that natural justice will be done and that a department of this government, which after all is subject to this house, shall not be allowed to disregard the procedures of the law of the land?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be no other means whereby a measure of justice can be secured for this man than through a motion such as has been moved by the hon. member for Kamloops. The situation is simply this. If discussion takes place on the speech from the throne debate there is no means whereby the minister may be required to answer in any way and whereby parliament can act in order to prevent anything in the nature of a tyrannical use of absolute power.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I suggest that whatever the merits of the Hanna case may be there is no other recourse. Unless this motion is allowed, then, whatever the courts may subsequently decide, this man may be spirited away and may be out of the jurisdiction and an injustice will have been done. Indeed, to a great degree this is similar to the Archer Shee case. Parliament must necessarily act in order to assure justice.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): In view of the interventions of so many gentlemen on the other side, I think possibly the hon. member for Kamloops will feel that the suggestion he made the other day is not of universal application. There seems to be one question about which it would be quite important to know what the facts are. It is suggested that the solicitor who has been giving information to the hon. member for Kamloops so that it might be used on the floor of the house has made an application to the supreme court of British Columbia for some kind of writ. I do not know whether or not that is a fact. I did not hear the radio reports this morning because I was still on a railway car. But if that is the case then though this may be the highest court of the land there is a positive rule that this highest court of the land has adopted and that is that matters sub judice before the ordinary courts of the land will not be debated here while they are before those courts.

When this is likened to other cases, it seems to me that the suggestion being made is that the department of immigration might be about to do something which was done by the Department of Justice presided over by Hon. Mr. Doherty in 1911 when Harry K. Thaw happened to be within the confines of this country and Mr. Doherty gave instructions, in spite of the proceedings that were before the court, to have him picked up like a chip and just tossed over the border. Nothing of that kind is contemplated here at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is not very much similarity between the Harry Thaw case and the present one.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It has never appealed to this government to follow the effective but extraordinary procedures that were adopted in 1911. Proceedings have been taking place in the manner prescribed by the statute and there is the suggestion—and perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops would be in a position to say whether or not this is so—that the solicitor who has been briefing him about this extraordinary case was applying to the courts of justice in the province of British Columbia where I assume that, if there are rights, they can be asserted and will get consideration from the judicial authority in the hon. gentleman's own province.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that I think we are losing sight of what this resolution really asks. I refer to "the urgent necessity of suspending action in connection with the deportation of Mr. Hanna until his case has been fully considered and disposed of in accordance with proper and just procedures". We have before us no information as to what is happening in the supreme court of British Columbia. However, we have before us information that this man is likely to be deported.

With regard to the matter of urgency may I say this, Mr. Speaker. The other day, when objection was taken to a motion that I made in this house, you were good enough to say that you would look into the matter because there was some doubt in your mind as to whether the debate on the address which is now proceeding ruled out the possibility of a debate on a matter of great urgency. I submit that this is a matter of urgency. I can understand the legal position of the department but I also understand that the final authority with regard to these cases rests with the minister. Here we are, as has already been said by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), sitting here as it were as the high court of parliament, the last court of appeal. We do not know what is happening in British Columbia. We do not know whether the supreme court has allowed the case to be made before it. We know nothing of these things except the word given us by the hon. member for Kamloops. I think the hon. member for Kamloops has a right to receive information on matters of any kind brought to him by anybody who approaches him with authentic information. I feel keenly and strongly that the minister and the government will make a serious mistake and will be looked upon as interfering with something touching human rights and fundamental freedoms if this debate is denied. Many members of the house have exhausted their right to speak in the debate on the speech from the throne and they may be vitally interested in speaking. I refer to such members as my friend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw). I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this request is in order and that it should be allowed.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I just add one word on the subject that the leader of the C.C.F. has mentioned, namely the attempt the other day to do what is being attempted today. I did not mention the matter at the time because of the answer which you gave to him. However, I want to stress what has always been the understanding of the house since I came here and, from what I can read, has been the understanding on all other occasions. On those occasions when we are in general debates, as on the address and the budget at least, if not others, and perhaps even motions to go into supply, if these particular items for discussion are before the house there is then an opportunity to debate any matter that any hon. member wishes to bring before the house. I admit that the question of relevancy sometimes enters into the matter with respect to a particular amendment. Nevertheless, I think it has been the ruling of every successive Speaker in this house that on those general occasions anything can be said by an hon. member and any particular matter can be debated. In other words, any person speaking this morning or this afternoon could advert to this subject and say what he wished with respect to what the government is doing. Since that is the case, I think the rule has always been interpreted in the matter of urgency with respect to a particular matter as a matter of urgency of debate. I am quite sure any member can take part this afternoon and speak on this subject. I feel that any other ruling by Your Honour, if I may say so with respect, would be almost a complete reversal of our previous understanding.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Before your decision is rendered, I should like to make a few observations on the argument advanced by the Minister of Finance. I thought the argument advanced by the Prime Minister was flimsy, but the flimsiest argument of all has been that put up by the Minister of Finance. Never has a debate on the speech from the throne or a budget debate been interrupted more often by the government itself than in the last few years. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, a score of members on this side of the house had expressed their opinions on the speech from the throne before this matter arose. It is either a matter of urgency or it is not.

An hon. Member: National emergency?

Mr. Rowe: It may not be to you, but it is to a lot of people throughout this country. The national honour of this country is at stake.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: Hon. members may laugh. You have a great country, but you like to keep it to yourself and just let in the persons you like. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should make a decision on this subject. The hon. member for Kamloops is quite within his rights in raising the matter. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, there are members who had exhausted their time on the speech from the throne before this emergency arose. The Prime Minister has chided the hon. member for Kamloops for obtaining information from the solicitor. If we in the official opposition did not obtain information from the press or from friends we would never get it because the government does not give us information. Never since confederation has there been a government that has hidden the facts more than this government has. All the way down the line there has been excuse after excuse. What have you to hide?

Why does the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration sit so smug and look so pale when he fears this matter is coming before parliament? Tell us why. It is either a matter of urgency or it is not. If you and I, Mr. Speaker, were in Mr. Hanna's place—God forbid we should be—we have both been embarrassed before but not to that extent—

Mr. Garson: Is this a discussion on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, or is it a stump speech?

Mr. Rowe: I would not like to take your judgment on that because I have heard your stump speeches and I never thought much of them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has provided me with ample assistance. I want to say that if the hon. gentleman and I were in Mr. Hanna's place, I am sure he would find a way of talking both of us out of it.

Mr. Rowe: I am not sure with this government in power.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the serious remarks made by various hon. members. One of these days I will suggest that standing order No. 26 be amended so that it will leave the entire responsibility for the decision as to urgency in the hands of the house and not put it upon one individual, namely the Speaker. Some hon. members have stressed the fact that the purpose of standing order No. 26 is to have decisions taken. My own interpretation of standing order No. 26 is that it is the one which replaced the old motion for adjournment which was moved in the middle of a debate whenever some member wanted to discuss a matter which had nothing to do with the motion proposed at the beginning of a sitting. Those who have read the old debates will recall that as a debate was proceeding on a certain specific motion and a member would go beyond the field of relevancy of that motion, someone would say you need a motion for adjournment. He would stand up and move it, and the hon. gentleman who had the floor could carry on speaking about a subject which had nothing to do with the motion which had been the subject of discussion at the beginning of that debate. Therefore, because of the abuses brought about by this system, they brought in standing order 26, which used to be standing order 31.

This house now has a vehicle to discuss matters of actuality, some things that arise which hon. members feel should be debated. The net result of it is after the debate has taken place and is concluded the house has to adjourn. It is not a substantive motion although it has been amended once; but the amendment was not voted on. At the end of the sitting the adjournment takes place.

Here is my difficulty. Hon. members will agree that whenever there was a motion to go into supply in the offing or a motion to go into ways and means—they were debatable in sessions prior to last session—whenever the debate on the budget was currently going on, whenever the address in reply was currently going on, I do not think any hon. members can state one specific case where a motion under standing order 26 has ever been allowed by my predecessors or by myself. If there is one I would like to have it cited to me.

The other day when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moved this type of motion it was a matter of great importance. I then told him that since we were entering the debate, if the Minister of Finance or any other minister had, under standing order 38(2), stood up on the first day or the second day and said, "Well, tomorrow we shall take up some other business", thereby postponing the continuance of the debate on the address to three, four, five or six days later than the next day—this is what I said on January 9, 1957, as recorded at page 23 of Hansard:

> I do not say that he should not be permitted to make his motion again.

I would have allowed the hon. gentleman's motion the following day if the minister on the eve of that day had announced by virtue of standing order 38(2) that he would postpone the debate on the address. Since that did not occur, and we were carrying on the debate on the address, full opportunity was given for a debate on the matter of urgency which was contained in the motion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

We have two more days for the debate on the address. Some hon. members claim they have exhausted their right to speak. Well, I have the list here before me of those who have spoken on the amendment, the subamendment and the main motion and there is no doubt that there is still a great deal of freedom for the purpose of discussing this matter.

Something has been said about obtaining information. Information may be obtained at question time. As a matter of fact I think the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes) asked some questions of the minister yesterday and the day before. The Leader of the Opposition has done so as well.

Now, if I do depart today from the previous practice of not allowing a motion under standing order 26 when the debate on the address is currently going on or a similar debate which affords great latitude I will not have justification for having refused the motion made the other day by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. What would prevent us from having a motion tomorrow on a subject which may be different? I have to oppose my own personal opinion as to the urgency of debate in this case but standing order 26 is so construed as to leave that responsibility upon myself. Because of the past practice, as I say, of previous Speakers and because of my own previous rulings I regret that I cannot accept the motion.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, may I point out that you have dealt with one matter of urgency, but is there not another matter of urgency before this house? This house has knowledge that a minister is proposing to take action which would defeat the course of justice. Do we have to sit here—

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There has been a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Greenwood and the minister wishes to rise on a question of privilege himself. I think that we ought to rally ourselves around the decision which I have just made. It may not be a decision which is satisfactory, but nevertheless it is one which I feel I have to make. It may be much more painful to myself perhaps than to any other members in this house. However, I feel that I should not depart from the previous practice which has been established over a period of many years. One of these days I may depart from it, but when I do I wish to be sure that I have had full opportunity to study the implications of a change in the practice.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, if this comes to a vote—

Mr. Speaker: There is no vote. I have made my ruling and there is no appeal.

[Later:]

C. G. HANNA—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT DEPORTATION WILL BE POSTPONED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister give the house assurance that Christian G. Hanna will not be deported from Canada until after the date of the application for the hearing of the writ which I understand is on February 1.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any other assurance than the assurance that there will be no departure from the law established by parliament and that every opportunity for the consideration of what should be the proper application of that law will be given.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that undertaking does not go anywhere at all. I wish to ask the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is an application before the court, according to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —the information I have. Will the Prime Minister give the undertaking that, until the courts decide, arbitrary practices will be discontinued in this case and this man will not be spirited out of the country so that he will be gone in any event and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration will be victorious.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There will be no arbitrary action. The hon. gentleman overlooks, or perhaps does not overlook, the fact that this man could not be deported otherwise than by being placed back on the ship from which he disembarked. I do not know what procedures we could take to hold that ship pending a decision by the courts as to whether or not the man could remain in Canada. I do not know what the facts are.

The hon. member for Kamloops has suggested that the ship is going to depart from Canada this evening. It may very well be that advantage is attempted to be taken of the fact that if the ship gets away without this man, whether the courts decide he can stay in Canada or not, there would be no physical possibility of having him leave Canada because I understand the ship has already visited many ports and at each one there has been a refusal to allow him to land because of the fact that he is not one who could be admitted according to the entry laws of the countries of those various ports.

There is no desire to spirit him away. There is no greater obligation on Canada to take this man who apparently asserts that he was born at sea. I do not know on what ship or under which flag he says he was born. That seems to be the difficulty. I personally have not gone into the facts of this case, but I have been told that there are no special grounds for the recommendation that he should be admitted into Canada except the ground that nobody else wants to take him in anywhere else. It may be that we have more vacant space in this country than in most other countries; it may be that could be urged as a reason why we should do what nobody else wants to do; but these are matters which I do not think should become a contest between political parties.

There can be varying views as to whether we should in this country take on that which nobody else wishes to have elsewhere. That may be the opinion of some but it would not be the opinion of all, I am quite sure, because this parliament has enacted immigration legislation. If the legislation were to be wide open and everybody who could put his foot on Canadian soil would be entitled to stay here because that had happened, then there would be no need for that legislation. I am sure that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is giving and has given consideration to all the alleged facts.

However, I have not personally gone into those facts and there certainly will be no attempt to spirit him away in order to avoid the consequences of any court decision. On the other hand, there should not be the sanction by opinion of hon. members of this house to the effect that he will have to stay here because the only place where he could have been put back would be no longer in Canadian waters. That is a consideration which must have some bearing on the proceedings and I would like to know, if the hon. member for Kamloops does know, whether or not there has been an application to the supreme court of British Columbia as was announced over the radio this morning.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, since I must do this by way of a question, if he is aware that the objection taken is not to the refusal to admit this man but that the refusal was based on an improper hearing which was not a hearing at all? No one is alleging, now, that the man is entitled to remain permanently; what is being alleged is that he is entitled to a proper hearing to determine whether or not he is admissible, and it is to determine that issue that an application for a writ of certiorari has been made. The application is returnable on the 1st of February, and the assurance asked for is that the man would remain in Canada until then so that the finding of the court on the 1st of February would have some effect with respect to his right of a hearing as to his admissibility.

I would therefore like to ask the Prime Minister a further question. Can he say whether, if, as I understand, assurances have been given that even though the ship may have left Canadian waters in the meantime, should Mr. Hanna be here and found to be non-admissible by judicial process, he will be returned at no cost to the ship, the right hon. gentleman would give an assurance in turn that this man will not be sent out of Canada before the courts can deal with his application?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Perhaps the hon. gentleman has different views, but I do not see how any arrangement could be made to return that man to the ship if the ship were not in Canadian waters.

Mr. Fulton: He could be sent on another ship.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We might perhaps charter a ship to go and meet the other ship in some port, but I do not think that is a proper procedure to suggest.

Mr. Fulton: The Prime Minister has misunderstood my question; I would hesitate to suggest he has done so deliberately. Can he say whether if an assurance has been given, as I understand it has been given to the immigration officials of Vancouver, that if Hanna should be found to be non-admissible then those interested in his application will see that he is returned to the ship at their expense, wherever it may be—they do not need to charter a ship to do that either—whether, if that undertaking has been given, it is not fair and reasonable to ask that the other undertaking I have mentioned should also be given?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If that kind of undertaking were given by persons who are interested in this case and who are in a position to implement that undertaking, it would be a matter which should receive serious consideration, but the first appearance would be that efforts are being made to keep this man in Canada by one means or another until there would be no possibility of his not remaining in Canada no matter what the findings of the court might be.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration? Does the minister consider that we in Canada have less of an obligation to admit this man than we had, some years ago, to admit a United States citizen with a criminal record who entered the country illegally, committed a crime after he had entered and was nevertheless allowed to remain here as a landed immigrant by virtue of an order in council?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that that rhetorical question was meant to be answered at all, but on the assumption that possibly it was, I would say, as I said the other day, that I can find no ground under the law which would permit the minister or any of his officials to admit this man to Canada at all. That is under the law made by this parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Why wouldn't you give him a proper hearing?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would just possess himself in peace till I have finished I would be delighted to answer his question. As I said, no one has been able to find any ground on which this man could satisfy the requirements of the immigration law, but I am told by my department since this debate began in the house that we have information that a summons has been served on the chief immigration officer in British Columbia. That means that this case is definitely before the courts, and therefore I do not think it would be proper for me to say anything further about it.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister give the house an assurance that this summons having been served and the matter being sub judice his department will regard itself as legally bound to take no steps in this matter until the question is disposed of, and undertake not to return Hanna to the ship?

Mr. Pickersgill: I will not give the house any legal opinion whatsoever.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister assure the house that he will abide by the law? No one has asked for a legal opinion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly, I will give an unqualified assurance that I will abide by the law.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister give an assurance that he will make no attempt to evade the consequences or the application of the law by having this man sent out of Canada before the law can be applied?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister's record is not a record of evasion at any time, and every hon. member of this house knows it.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): That is an evasion in itself.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he would inform the house of the composition of the appeal board which heard this case?

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot do so offhand, but I will be glad to answer that question tomorrow.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and a question of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. The two questions are related. My first question is directed to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. If the ship sails tonight and takes Mr. Hanna, will the reference to the supreme court of British Columbia be proceeded with and a decision handed down?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think that is a question that it would be in any way proper for me to answer, having regard to the fact that the case has already been taken before the courts. It is a hypothetical question in any case.

Mr. Low: My second question is directed to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Hanna case is apparently a case of a stateless person. Is there not some way of referring the case to some agency of the United Nations to deal with a matter of this kind so that this person will not have to be confined to a ship for the rest of his life? Is there anything we can do to have the reference made?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I assure my friend that I will be glad to give careful consideration to the implications of his question.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask one question? Does not the United Nations rule apply only to people in refugee camps? If this man cannot get into a refugee camp to be treated as a stateless person, where is he to go?

Mr. Martin: Statelessness is a problem that has been before the legal committee of the United Nations from time to time, but I would not want to give a ready answer to something to which I have not had a chance to give full consideration.

Mr. Low: What I wanted to find out was whether or not, since Canada is now involved up to the ears in this whole matter, somebody in the government might not be prepared to refer it to some agency of the United Nations in order to get the problem solved. It is a humanitarian question and all of us ought to be concerned about it.

Mr. Martin: I am sure the government is as concerned about it as anyone. My hon. friend will remember that Professor Humphrey, head of the human rights division of the United Nations, has already given some indication of interest in this matter, on behalf of the secretariat of the United Nations. However, I have not had a chance to really grasp the full implications of my hon. friend's question and I would not want to say any more now. I assure him the matter will be looked into, consistent with all the facts and our own obligations.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL AGENCY—INQUIRY RESPECTING RATIFICATION OF STATUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, can the minister of external affairs say whether enough nations have as yet ratified the statute of the international atomic energy agency to make it operative? Second, is the government considering bringing forward a motion for ratification on the part of Canada before this session of parliament has come to a conclusion? I ask this question because of press reports of a discussion of a somewhat similar nature at the United Nations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. In respect of the first part, my reply on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is that the international atomic energy agency will become operative when 18 of the signatory nations have deposited instruments of ratification. Among these 18 signatories must figure at least three of the following countries: France, United Kingdom, United States, the Soviet union, Canada. The United States, which is the depository government, has not advised us of the deposit of any instruments of ratification as yet. The government has no information that any of the signatories have as yet ratified the statute.

With respect to the second part of the question, as I indicated to my hon. friend before today's sitting, I am not in a position to give an answer. I have not yet had an opportunity on behalf of my colleague to discuss this matter with my colleagues. I shall ask that that part of the question be allowed to stand until I am in a position to give a definite reply.

SHIPPING

PILOT BOAT ACCIDENT, SAINT JOHN—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): On Friday the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) and yesterday the hon. leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked whether it was my intention to order a public inquiry in connection with the loss of the pilot boat in Saint John harbour.

I should like to inform the house that I have now received the report of the preliminary investigation made by Captain Graves of my department, and that I am taking the steps necessary in order to hold a formal investigation pursuant to the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the statement he has just made with respect to the public inquiry at Saint John and also with reference to my question on January 16 regarding that matter and also the department's responsibilities? Is the minister now prepared to say what immediate steps will be taken to replace the lost pilot vessel and what immediate precautions may be necessary to prevent in future any such sad accident?

Mr. Marler: In my understanding of the facts of the matter and of the shipping orders, there is no need for further precautions to be taken with regard to the operation of a pilot boat. With respect to the replacement of the pilot boat, I should like to tell the hon. gentleman that we are making arrangements to secure another and hope to have it available very shortly.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Will the Minister of Transport inform the house why members of the families of those lost on the vessel in the pilot service at Saint John were denied counsel at the preliminary closed hearing while the steamship company was represented by counsel, lawyer J. Paul Barry?

Mr. Marler: The purpose of the inquiry which was held in Saint John was purely and simply to determine what were the facts of the accident in order that it would be possible to decide whether or not a public inquiry should be held. I believe that counsel representing the pilots was present and I believe one other counsel was present, although I do not know whom he represented. But it was not a public inquiry. It was not an inquiry for the purpose of determining responsibility or guilt, and in point of fact there was no reason why anybody should have been represented at that inquiry.

TRANSPORT

STATEMENT ON ABANDONMENT OF NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILWAY LINE, CORNWALL-OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Lavigne) asked if consideration had been given to the question of transportation services to the municipalities affected by the abandonment of the New York Central line between Ottawa and Cornwall.

I find that by its order No. 90648, dated January 10, 1957, the board of transport commissioners on the application of the New York Central Railroad Company approved the abandonment of the line between Ottawa and Cornwall, provided that the abandonment would not take place earlier than February 15, 1957. This application was considered by the board at a public hearing held in Ottawa on December 12, 1956, at which interested parties were present or represented. In its judgment the board quotes textually the statement made at the public hearing by counsel for the railway company, which reads as follows:

> No provincial highway runs directly through the territory of the line, but the district and communities in question are well served by adequate all-weather roads which connect with provincial highway No. 31 which runs from Ottawa to Morrisburg and there meets provincial highway No. 2 to Cornwall. Daily truck service is provided between Cornwall and the villages of Crysler, Newington, Finch and Ottawa. Berwick is served by Taggart Trucking of Ottawa, Ontario, and Glengarry Transport of Alexandria. Crysler, Russell and Embrun are served by Taggart Trucking and Glengarry Transport. Crysler, Berwick, Newington, Finch and Cornwall are also served by Eamer Daye Transport Ltd. of Cornwall.

The judgment also notes that the freight handled on the line was negligible and, as the hon. member knows, there has been no passenger service on the line since the spring of 1954.

PENSIONS

STATEMENT ON CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS MINIMUM PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked if since the end of the regular session of last year I had received representations on behalf of the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways in receipt of pensions of $25 per month for an increase in the amount of the pension. The answer to that question is that I have received no such representations. The hon. member also asked if further consideration has been given to this matter or if it will be given by the minister or the government. Representations were made recently to the management of the Canadian National Railways that any smaller pension now payable by it should be increased to $60 per month, but no action has been taken and the matter has not been considered by the Minister of Transport or the government itself.

HEALTH INSURANCE

REPORTED MODIFICATION OF FEDERAL PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Are press reports correct that the government of Manitoba has offered to come into the federal government's health or hospital insurance plan provided coverage is extended to include cases of mental illness and tuberculosis?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the press reports to which my hon. friend directs my attention. I would want to see them first.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Can he say whether the government is considering extending the coverage provided in its plan so as to encourage more provinces to agree to it?

Mr. Martin: The government has not considered any modification in that particular or in any other particular. The proposal made by the federal government was a generous and comprehensive proposal, as was formerly acknowledged by the hon. gentleman. The government does not intend to include patients in tuberculosis and mental hospitals within the compass of its proposals for the simple reason that these are responsibilities now assumed by the provinces. In that particular we are following precisely the practice followed under the hospital insurance acts of Saskatchewan and British Columbia. With regard to tubercular and mental patients who receive treatment for their illness in general hospitals, they are included within the terms of the federal proposal.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a further supplementary question? Is the government afraid that by amending its proposals six provinces might agree and the federal government would then have to deliver the goods with respect to health insurance?

Mr. Martin: No, Mr. Speaker, the government is not afraid. My hon. friend's persistence in asking these questions reminds me, as I told him on another occasion, of a cheer leader who considers that every time a touchdown is scored he is the one who has scored the touchdown.

Mr. Knowles: You are in a position to score.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): May I ask a supplementary question? With respect to the offer made by the government to which the minister has referred, does the government propose to bring that offer to parliament to get the authority to make it and, if so, when?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend possibly has forgotten the terms of the proposal itself. The proposal contained a number of offers and with respect to those offers the federal government said that when six provinces representing a majority of the people of Canada had expressed their concurrence the federal government would take the necessary legislative steps to carry out its end of the matter. The federal government is not in any way retreating from these proposals. It stands by these proposals. When six provinces representing a majority of the people express their readiness to proceed, the federal government will act in accordance with the proposal it made last January as announced by the Prime Minister in the house and by myself when we were meeting with the provinces in another room in this building.

Mr. Michener: Perhaps I understand the offer better than the minister understood my question. I asked the minister whether or not the government proposed to ask parliament for authority to make any such offers to the provinces?

Mr. Martin: I cannot say any more than what I have said. I think if my hon. friend reads what I have said he will find that the question has been amply answered.

Mr. Fleming: The question is not answered. Another evasion.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the minister indicate what provinces have accepted the proposal and whether any of the provinces with Liberal governments have accepted the proposal?

Mr. Martin: The provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, in that order, and the province of Saskatchewan have accepted the proposal. I may say that the proposal is being actively considered by all provinces. I had a visit this morning from the premier of one province who discussed certain aspects of the problem.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government given any consideration to amending its own proposal so that the people of those provinces whose governments are prepared to go along with and accept the health program may be able to obtain the benefits of it?

Mr. Martin: I have already answered that question, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat my answer. The government has no intention of modifying the proposal that is made because, on analysis, that proposal will be found to be a most generous one. To my hon. friend who has asked this question I may say this. In view of the repetitious character of the question I have a suspicion that he would be most unhappy if we made any progress in this matter.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, no. You know better than that. You know that we have plugged for this measure for 20 years.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister why he continues to give the province of Ontario and others the veto over the policies of his own department.

Mr. Martin: I do not believe that is a fair observation, Mr. Speaker. I think all the provinces which are examining this proposal are doing so conscientiously and responsibly without exception, and that includes the province of Ontario.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the minister whether negotiations are now under way between this government and one or more of the provinces, not with regard to modifications as to the general area of coverage but as to the proportion of the population which it will be necessary to include under the scheme before it will be acceptable to the province?

Mr. Martin: I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that discussions have been under way between the federal government and some provinces and are under way now between the federal government and some provinces on matters which these provinces at this stage would prefer to be regarded as the subject of negotiation between the two governments.

Mr. Fulton: In other words, the minister is not able to say any more.

AIRPORTS

LONDON, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO INSTALLATION OF SURVEILLANCE RADAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I rather felt that we used considerable time in asking questions yesterday and today, but I want to ask one question of the Minister of Transport. Is the airport at London, Ontario, to be equipped with airport and airways surveillance radar as are the other main airports in Canada? If so, when will this radar be in operation?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer that question without inquiring and verifying the 15 stations at which the installation is to be made.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, January 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Shaw.

(Translation):

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, the house came very near missing the pleasure—or misfortune—of hearing me deal with a matter which, in the circumstances, should not be discussed at all in this house. I do not know the gentleman in question, nor am I acquainted with the facts which prevent him from entering Canada. One thing I do know, however, is that, as was stated on the other side of the house, the honour of our country is at stake. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the honour of six or seven countries is at stake, considering that those countries, for reasons unknown to me, refused to admit this man. I have always understood, even though I am not overly conversant with the rules of the house, that no question which is still sub judice can be discussed in the house. Though you do not need my official approval, Mr. Speaker, I might say that I fully share the opinion you expressed a moment ago and which, in the present circumstances, is certainly the most appropriate.

I would now like to continue the few remarks which I had intended to make with regard to the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I was dealing with the government's decision to establish a Canada Council for the encouragement of the arts, humanities and social sciences. I will dwell at length on this topic. It goes without saying that I do not intend to launch here into a detailed study of the matter, especially since my time is limited. Besides, I do not claim to have sufficient knowledge of all matters relating to the arts to justify my dealing with them at great length. However, I am sure that our artists will derive much benefit from the study which is to be made of the situation of the arts in this country. It should make for considerable progress in this field, it should allow our great Canadian artists to attain a very high standing in the fields of music, drama, motion pictures and others.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks I said that, like most Canadians, I am sure, I am appreciative of the legislation the government intends to submit to the house at this session, more particularly with regard to the increase in university grants.

Again because I have but little time at my disposal, I do not intend to take part in the controversy touched off by this liberality, this generosity on the part of the present government. On the other hand, it does appear evident, to me at least, that as regards provincial autonomy, the good faith of the government cannot be questioned. I am not aware that the universities which were able to accept those grants in the past have ever been obliged to change one solitary item in their curricula, to replace any professor or to make the smallest change in their educational system.

I take this opportunity of repeating here that I would support no political party whatever which would attempt to infringe on the autonomy of any province; I will go further and say that I would fight it with all my strength. The provinces enjoy certain rights which have been guaranteed by confederation. We want every one of them to be perfectly free to exercise those rights. I repeat that no government, no political party, will ever have my support, or that of most members of this house, if it were to infringe upon provincial autonomy.

This year the government proposes to increase grants to provincial governments, to help technical and vocational training in schools under their immediate jurisdiction. No one, I believe, sounded the alarm in the name of autonomy because of the acceptance of this money which contributed to the equipment and in many other ways to the teaching given in those institutions. So far no one has refused, neither in wartime nor since the end of the war, the grants paid to technical schools for the training of tradesmen who wanted to increase their knowledge in the various trades.

I also congratulate the government upon the establishment of a Senate committee to study the means of improving the use of lands for agricultural purposes in order to contribute more efficiently to the expansion of agricultural production and of the income of those engaged in agriculture. We should not be surprised at that proposal.

There are two classes of people for which the government, and more particularly the Liberal party, has done something. I am thinking of the working class and the agricultural class, so that this decision comes as no surprise to me.

The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) pointed out that we are not holding aloof from agriculture. He quoted figures showing the considerable expansion shown by agriculture in the past three or four years. Moreover, the price support of butter, which enables producers to sell that commodity at a reasonable price, is already evidence that the agricultural class is receiving particular consideration from this government. The government continues to prove it by entrusting the Senate with a special study designed to determine how best we can help farmers to develop the land, especially submarginal land.

As far as we, city dwellers, are concerned, we are equally grateful, as municipal authorities are bound to be also for the decision made by this government to submit to this house at this session a bill to amend and extend the scope of the Municipal Grants Act, with a view to authorizing the payment of grants in lieu of taxes on federal property in all municipalities where such property receives normal municipal services.

By this measure, the federal government proposes to give more to the municipalities, thus making it easier for them to solve some of their problems. No one will accuse this government of infringing upon the autonomy of municipalities because it helps them financially.

It is true also that this government has been thinking about all classes of society, as can be seen from the proposals to be made to this house. For instance, it proposes to improve again the situation of merchant seamen, of wheat producers and of people who depend on the production of furs in the far north. In the speech from the throne, several other advantageous measures are mentioned, to wit:

> Amendments of detail to a number of other acts will also be introduced.

Well, that opens the door to possibly a considerable number of sound and wise measures such as were always submitted by this government, and by the Liberal party, possibly to correct certain wrongs or at last to increase the benefits granted by these various acts now in effect.

Aware of all these achievements of the Liberal party, of everything that we have done in the past and of what probably will be done—even though I do not know exactly what parliament will do at this session—and, taking into account the legislation that will be enacted as well as all previous achievements, we are not afraid to face public opinion.

The other day I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker)—I wish to congratulate him for his nomination to that post even though his electoral prospects may not be very bright, not so much because of himself personally but because of the backward policies of the party he is leading—move an amendment in which he said that public opinion has turned against us and that the majority of Canadians will vote against this government at the next election. I wonder if the people of Canada will support a conservative program which does not contain a single constructive item. Will they hesitate to make a choice between a government which has brought prosperity to this country and another party—I mean the Conservative party—under whose regime we have known failure, hardship, depression and unemployment.

We are not surprised either by the generous attitude of this government towards Hungarian refugees. It has understood that charity knows no frontier, and has practised it wherever possible. When the fate of human beings is at stake, the Liberal party and this government have shown their eagerness to relieve the burden of the victims of pitiful situations such as the one experienced recently by Hungarians.

Canada also largely contributed financially to the Colombo plan, and she has given substantial assistance to all the distressed countries in the world. This is something we can be proud of. I do not think that anybody on the other side of the house could reproach us with what we have done in this field, and I do not believe that any well-meaning citizen could blame us for the assistance we have given to those various countries which know nothing but extreme poverty, and disasters of all kinds.

other countries, I think that now, as we have always done, we should more than ever welcome the requests which are now made by a large number of our citizens who in the past, have served our country, have contributed to its progress, and I mean particularly our needy older people. We have been told about a surplus of hundreds of millions, and we are shown that the future holds the promise of an expansion still greater than in the past. I feel therefore that the government should give serious consideration to the request which is now addressed to them by a large number of citizens, by the various members of all parties sitting in this house, with whom I join, to increase substantially the pension now being paid to our old people.

I wonder if it would not also be time to study thoroughly the matter of the help and assistance which should be given to that class of people who have passed 60 years of age. Because, as everyone knows, it is very hard for a man of 40, and even more so for a man of 50, to get a new job when he has lost the one he had. The economic pattern has changed. The days are no more when a man of 50 could actually get employment, when his services were required because of his experience. Nowadays things are different; it is quite a problem for a man of 50 or more to find a job. Therefore it seems to me that, in view of existing conditions, of the difficulties besetting the middle-aged worker when he is looking for an occupation yielding enough to live on, and considering this country's era of prosperity, it might be proper to amend the present act so as to grant our elderly people a pension when they are 60. Well, I shall be told, this will will cost additional millions of dollars. I am not blaming this government. It was this government, this party, which initiated all the social legislation from which the nation benefits, in spite of opposition from the other side of the house, and more particularly on the part of the Conservatives who thought family allowances absolutely anti social and opposed or tried to obstruct the passing of the old age pension; and lastly, every social security legislation we introduced was at first attacked by the party which today, with elections in the offing, want it improved.

I know that the present government and all successive Liberal administrations have given our people all they could. We also know that this government will put at our disposal all improvements we have the right to expect for those who are obliged to rely on these allowances. I am not finding fault with anybody but it seems to me that certain requests which are being made should be granted, taking into account—in the light of the forecasts of the author of the Gordon plan and of the great American economists, as well as those of our own prominent businessmen in the country—that we may be on the threshold of a decade of continued increased prosperity, and it is during such a period that we ought to help our people.

No doubt that this government will agree to increase old age pensions and, at the same time, family allowances. There is no need to tell you that heads of families could put those increases to good use by giving an education to their children and meeting certain family needs.

I am no prophet but I am optimistic enough to think that this government, when the next budget is brought down, will give us, not so much a surprise—for we are so used to fine gestures on their part—but, at all events, great pleasure by granting those requests which are being made to them by people in various parts of the country.

I would like now to touch lightly on the question of bilingualism, which has been brought before this house. I have no time to discuss all its implications and all its details, but, nevertheless, we will unquestionably have to recognize that there is a French achievement in Canada and that French is going to be spoken more and more.

It will be claimed in some quarters that that may be the cause of misunderstanding, of national disunity. Far from it. There are other countries with two official languages. In another country, Belgium, even three languages, Flemish, Walloon and French, are used to about the same extent. I do not think that Flemish seeks to dominate Walloon or that Walloon tries to displace French.

We are not interested in gaining the upper hand over those who speak only English. There is no question of our imposing French upon our English-speaking fellow citizens or upon those who speak nothing but English. The French language is not imposed, it asserts itself, for it is one of the two universal languages. For instance, a man who comes from any country, providing he speaks French and English, is sure to be understood all over the world. There is, therefore, no question, I repeat, of imposing French, because French asserts itself. But it should be understood that when France lost her colony in 1763, our forefathers, the pioneers of this land, fought to preserve their language and that we also are determined to defend it against all attacks.

But I would point out to my English-speaking fellow citizens that from the standpoints of industry, trade, personal advancement and even of the exchanges they may have with other countries, it is in their own interest to know both languages. Once those who are particularly opposed to our language understand that it is in their own interest to speak French—even though they may not care to do so through sentiment—if they are realistic and I believe they are, they will come to speak both languages, and this will be of great help to them in business as well as in their relations with individuals of Canada and elsewhere.

In concluding my remarks on that subject may I assure those who might entertain some doubts on that point that nobody in the province of Quebec, where most French-speaking Canadians are to be found, wants to hurt or to offend the feelings of those who do not speak our tongue. We want that clearly understood. I repeat that we want them to consider that it is in their own interest to speak French just as it is in our own interest to speak English. When they come to realize that this country is and will remain a bilingual country, we will have complete national unity. We will then be able to call ourselves Canadians from one end of the country to the other and we will be proud to speak both languages outside our country, to speak the languages of the pioneers, the language of the people who founded this country and the language of the people who gave it such an extraordinary economic development, I mean the English people and the French people, who kept on living and increasing in numbers in Canada.

A speech from the member for St. Mary would not be complete without a word about the Jacques Cartier bridge. Apparently I did not get the results I had expected, and that is why I again make to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) a request I have made time and time again, the abolition of tolls on that bridge. It is said that it cannot be done, in view of the fabulous sum of money derived from that source and the large expenses which are expected to be made. Besides, the consent of the provincial authorities would be required, and no request to that effect has been received so far from the provincial government, while the city of Montreal, which is the third party, has not yet expressed an official opinion on the matter. Therefore it might be difficult to get these tolls abolished before the three parties concerned come to an agreement. However something might be done for those who use that road, which should not be the responsibility of the federal government, as it comes under the municipal and provincial jurisdictions. That road serves a thickly populated area, if we take into account the thousands of people who live on the south shore. In the interest of those who come from Montreal and who have to cross to the south shore, because of this huge population, I believe that we should at least agree to abolish the toll now charged to the passengers in the various vehicles, and private cars. This would relieve to that extent the budget of workers, especially the thousands who are employed in Montreal. This would be only fair to the users of that bridge, and even to visiting strangers.

Mr. Dufresne: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Dupuis: Yes.

Mr. Dufresne: Is the amount charged on the bridge he is referring to fully turned over to the federal treasury?

Mr. Dupuis: It is not turned over to the federal treasury as such, but it goes into the till of the National Harbours Board. Then, if there is a deficit larger than such and such an amount, the city of Montreal and the provincial government contribute to make up that deficit at the rate of $150,000 a year. We could perhaps find means to turn back a substantial part of the revenue to the citizens of the city of Montreal as was done already on numerous occasions, and as the hon. member for Quebec West has been able to find out in connection with grants to the universities and in other fields.

Mr. Dufresne: No, it cannot be said that this money is given to the universities.

Mr. Dupuis: After all, it comes from the pocket of the same suit. Anyway, the Liberal party always shows generosity and understands the various needs of this country. Its generosity is not surprising.

Mr. Dufresne: It uses the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Dupuis: The hon. member for Quebec West may rest assured that the remainder of the profits from the Jacques Cartier bridge, after the deduction of administrative costs, is put to useful purposes.

Now I have no intention, obviously, of speaking on behalf of the Minister of Transport, nor of making any promise I would be unable to keep, nor of saying anything which I would be unable to prove. Still, I would like to close my remarks on this subject by saying that I was informed that the toll gates are to be placed at the south end of the bridge so that those people who cross it to go to the island of Sainte-Hélène will not have to pay to reach their own property. I will renew this request later, if need be.

At the request of those hon. members who represent south shore constituencies as well as constituencies on the island of Montreal itself a new lane has been built to speed traffic on the Jacques Cartier bridge. We are told that the National Harbours Board will soon add another.

I shall conclude now as my time is up. Again I congratulate the government upon its proposals at this time. Far be it from me to approve any policy which would tend to destroy the autonomy of the various provinces. I strongly support bilingualism in this country and I conclude by expressing the hope, which is more local in nature, that my request concerning the Jacques Cartier bridge particularly, will be well received. Oh! I was forgetting a matter of primary importance and that is the question of increasing old age pensions and family allowances. I hope the requests I have made on behalf of those I represent in this house will be heeded.

(Text):

Mr. James A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, as it has been the age-old custom on the part of members of this house, I also wish to express my congratulations to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) on their remarks and their contribution in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Considering the emptiness of the speech from the throne I feel they have done a very fine job in making something out of practically nothing. As it also has been the custom for members when speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to bring to the attention of this house matters concerning their own particular constituency, I intend also to direct part of my remarks to my constituency.

It has been a great privilege for me to represent the historic riding of Elgin since March 22, 1954. This constituency received its name from a former governor general of Canada, Earl Elgin. As I have pointed out before to members in this chamber, my constituency is approximately 50 per cent urban and 50 per cent rural, with the city of St. Thomas being the major urban centre. St. Thomas for many years was and is still known as the railroad city of Canada. It was and still is to my knowledge the only city in Canada which has six railroads running through it. Due to many changes in railroading during the past number of years the railroad repair shops in this city have practically disappeared and at the present time they are almost non-existent. During this change in railroading many former employees of the railroad shops have had to seek employment elsewhere. Due to our city council who had a vision to the future and progressive boards of trade headed by one of the top industrial commissioners in Canada, St. Thomas has been able to offset this change in industrial employment by attracting a large number of industries and many United States subsidiary firms.

To attract this type of industry a city must have among other things adequate housing accommodation. The city of St. Thomas never has gone all out in a large scale housing program at any time. However, it has endeavoured to provide housing accommodation to meet the demands of industry as industry required housing. In April 1956 the city made application to have erected some 35 rental housing units. This application was made to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and at that time a survey was made in the city of St. Thomas to determine the needs. It was shown that the needs were definite at the time of the original application. Mr. Speaker, it took from April last year until the first part of January this year to obtain the final approval from the Department of Public Works and from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. This means that it will be well on in the summer months before the housing units can be completed to the point where they can be occupied. It would appear to me that a project of this kind could have been processed in much less time and in fact could have been processed in time to give much needed employment to our local contractors during the slack winter months.

I am sure that the people of the city of St. Thomas and of the surrounding area are at last, after having received promises over a period of ten years, pleased to see the start of construction on the new federal building. There are many people who may regret to see that the old landmark of the present post office is being razed. However, we anticipate that the new building will bring beauty along with additional accommodation to the city and the surrounding area.

In offering suggestions to the Department of Public Works there are two more on which I wish to comment at this time. One is the method employed in letting the smaller public works contracts. I am speaking of contracts in the range of from $1,000 to $10,000. I have been given to understand that the method used is to ask at least two contractors to submit a price on the project. Then what usually happens is that these two contractors get their heads together and they both bid on the project. Possibly one says to the other, "I had the last public works contract, I am busy now, you take this one, and I will make my tender a little higher." If this method were practised generally all across Canada the cost to Canadian taxpayers would be many thousands of dollars. It would cost them much more than if these small projects were locally advertised and the local contractors given equal opportunity to bid on the contracts on a competitive basis.

Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) himself is guilty of party patronage in letting these contracts. I know through my direct dealings with him that he is sincerely endeavouring to run his department on a non-partisan basis. For the major public works needs those needs are considered on a merit basis, but when this authority is delegated to someone else down the party line it gets out of hand and some place, somewhere, somebody plays favouritism at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

My second suggestion to the Minister of Public Works is in connection with the letting of dredging contracts for the harbours of Port Stanley and Port Burwell. These two ports usually silt very badly during the winter and early spring, and on many occasions shipping is delayed for many days on the opening of the navigation season. The shipping is delayed because no contract has been let for harbour dredging and it is necessary to wait upon the Public Works Department to dredge a channel to let the boats come in. As this is an annual works project I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that contracts should be called earlier in the year so that the successful contractor would be in a position to start dredging as soon as the ice is out of the harbour.

In the 1955-56 season, when the dredging contracts were carried over, I believe there was less delay in spring dredging than in previous seasons when contracts were called for after spring soundings had been made and calculated.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to turn now to the subject of agriculture and bring to the attention of the house something of which we as agriculturists are very proud in our constituency. I may say that Elgin county is proud of the fact that it has within its boundaries a co-operative that has expanded in recent years to be the largest farmer owned co-operative of its kind in Ontario and possibly in Canada. It was in 1944 that a number of progressive farmers in the county got behind the idea of a co-operative movement for the buying and selling of their grain crops, feeds, fertilizers, eggs, lumber and building supplies, fuel, etc.

In mentioning the distinction which has been gained through having the largest co-operative of its kind, I would point out the great importance of what its growth has meant to St. Thomas and Elgin county in services for and by the farmers. A business turnover of nearly $4½ million each year for the last two years reflects the progress this industry has made. This growth can be translated into thousands and thousands of bushels of corn, soya beans, white beans, yellow eye beans, wheat, oats, barley seeds in variety, tens of thousands of tons of fertilizer and mixed feeds.

In 1955 over 900,000 bushels of corn were bought and sold through this co-op. This corn went mainly on the market as feed in competition with subsidized western feed grains. This co-operative is one of the few that returns all its patronage dividends to its farmer member shareholders as cash returns. In March of 1956, patronage dividends were returned to over 2,400 members to the amount of $88,000, and a total of over $500,000 has been returned as patronage dividends in 11 years of operation. This is a kind of farm service which has made Elgin Co-operative Services the largest farmer-owned buying and selling co-operative of its kind. With such a record of service its future would appear to be unlimited so long as Elgin county continues to have farmers and farm families of the type and calibre who have brought about this great development.

I bring this matter to the attention of this chamber and the government because I feel there are many other communities all across Canada which could benefit immensely by the government showing more initiative in lending support to assist co-operative organizations to become established on a sound financial basis. This would help in some measure to offset the increased cost of production.

I wish to turn now to another agricultural item which is very important in my riding, along the shores of lake Erie, and in other areas in Canada where people are able to grow tobacco. Tobacco is a very important item in the nation's economy at the present time. The Canadian government derives, on an average, $233 million a year in revenue from the industry if one includes property taxes, income taxes and excise tax on cigarettes, cigars and so on.

When cultivation of tobacco was first started in the early twenties, 1,000 acres was produced. The average yield per acre was 800 pounds. This has blossomed to an allocated acreage last year of 113,000 acres yielding between 160 and 170 million pounds with a market value around $70 million.

In keeping with this growth in the industry itself, the value of tobacco farm land has increased tremendously in recent years. Land which was worth between $30 and $40 an acre back in the twenties before tobacco was grown on it has increased in value in some areas to as much as $1,000 per acre. The increase in production which I have mentioned has also seen the average yield increase to about 1,400 pounds per acre. For the last two years the industry seems to have been undergoing a levelling-off process; the get-rich-quick day is gone. The price of land makes it unwise to invest between $100,000 and $150,000 in a first class tobacco farm, for it would take a lifetime to get the original investment back as things stand at present. Banking credit restrictions are "putting the squeeze" on the tobacco grower.

One thing that would improve the industry would be the lowering of the excise tax on cigarettes and other tobacco products. At the present time the farmer's return for every pack of cigarettes is about three cents. Manufacturers and distributors take about 12.5 cents and government revenues account for over 17.5 cents on every package selling to the consumer for 33 cents.

I wish to bring the attention of the house to the system under which tobacco is purchased at the present time. The tobacco market opens on a set day, but before that date the tobacco company graders have been to every tobacco farm and have looked over the tobacco each grower has to sell. The crops are graded, so the companies know exactly what tobacco is available before any price-setting meeting takes place. Since these companies know what a grower has to sell, they set a price before the buyer drives up the farmer's lane. The buyer offers his price, take it or leave it. He could be on the farm less than 10 minutes and then is gone. There is no time for the grower to make up his mind and no time to discuss what he himself thinks his crop is worth. If the grower wants an hour or so to think it over he stands to lose, for when the buyer returns he often offers from half a cent to three cents less than his original offer an hour before. No matter what happens, under the present set-up the grower stands to lose.

I should like to read into the record a letter published in the Rodney Mercury of January 16, 1957. I believe the writer of the letter expresses the feelings of the many hundreds of flue-cured tobacco growers under the present system. The letter was addressed to the editor of the paper and the writer signs himself, "A New Canadian Grower". The letter reads:

> In the past you showed great understanding of problems facing all the tobacco growers. Your editorials concerning tobacco buying practices were true voice of the growers. For this you deserve our sincere thanks. We hope in the future your paper will take the same stand in regard to our efforts to correct the present rotten situation.
> I am positive the people who helped to organize the Ontario flue-cured tobacco marketing association had the best intentions to protect the rights of both growers and buying companies. Unfortunately, it turned out to be of great service to the buying companies in cheating the grower.
> In our bylaws there are many restrictions, fines, obligations and fees imposed upon the grower members. Nothing of this kind is for the buyers. If there were any it would be disregarded by them anyway because they are the masters of the situation they created.
> The present grading and buying practices turned into a shameless situation robbing the grower of his hard-earned profit. Humiliation of the grower by the buyers during so-called marketing time reached its peak. God help the farmer who dares to show his dissatisfaction about the cheating he gets or refuses to sell his crop for the price the first buyer offers.
> No wonder the press representatives are not allowed to attend the meetings of the board. No wonder the grower members are kept in the dark in all the dealings of the board. No wonder the grower members are not informed about the findings of the federal government's investigation committee and its recommendations. Something is really wrong with the board.
> I am a new Canadian and I work hard to earn my living. I do not enjoy too many of those long hours of hard work, as an Elgin tobacco grower stated a few weeks ago in his letter to the editor. I would rather be in some resort with our chairman of the association vacationing. Unfortunately, I consider hard work as my obligation to my family and the community I have chosen.
> I believe the present situation in the marketing association would not exist if all the tobacco growers were Canadians of old standing, but I do not think only the new Canadians are to blame. In my opinion those of long standing should take the lead in correcting the present situation. I assure you new Canadians will gladly follow them. After all it would not be too polite for a new Canadian to reorganize in the country where he just warmed up his feet. Let's forget all the differences between us and unite in the efforts to do something about this association of ours.
> Our hopes are raised by the suggestions of the federal government for the changes in marketing control; the recent secret meetings of the growers in various parts of the country and the news that the petition asking the government to set up the marketing legislation will be circulated among us, are most welcome. I assure you my signature under this petition will be among thousands of others who feel that time has come for changes.

I would like to take this opportunity to ask the fellow growers to express their views in this paper. Let's write about our problem. Let's show the buyers how much we hate the present rotten business. I do not think they will be too happy reading it. And when the petition comes in to our district asking our government to step in, let's everyone sign it.

That letter is signed, as I said before, by "A New Canadian Grower". We know that the supreme court is still considering the merits of our farm products marketing act and as yet has not rendered its decision as to the validity of the act. Regardless of what the decision may be, I hope that the government, if it is still in power and not dissolved by that time, will give every assistance possible to the flue-cured tobacco growers to form a marketing association under farm products marketing legislation should they so wish and decide to do so.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1957-58

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1958, was presented by Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1956-57

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates (2) for the financial year ending March 31, 1957, was presented by Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Shaw.

Mr. T. J. Kickham (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with hon. members who have preceded me in this debate in extending my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) for the splendid contributions they have made in opening the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I wish first to express my thanks on behalf of the people of my county for the public works program carried on in my county and to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) for the new construction of the Georgetown railway wharf, and the construction of a new frost-proof potato warehouse on the wharf, replacing the now obsolete warehouse this coming season.

A great deal has been accomplished in the dredging of harbours, thus deepening the waterways to give sufficient draft for fishing boats to reach the wharves and also in new construction on breakwaters and wharves. All this work was necessary in order to assist fishermen and farmers in carrying on successfully their respective industries. There still remain numerous requests for similar work to be carried out at many fishing centres, and I am always fervently hoping and asking that those requests will be met through sufficient money appropriations. I realize, however, that we cannot expect to have everything done all at once, as a government can only spend money in keeping with their annual revenue from year to year. I can say to the minister that we are thankful for the recognition and the appreciation he has acknowledged of our need in regard to assisting fishermen and farmers in the prosecution of their daily pursuits.

Our farmers and fishermen suffer greatly because of the continuous freight rate tariff increases, and of course this applies to the four Atlantic provinces particularly because of our geographical location in Canada. Long hauls mean that we are without the truck transport competition enjoyed by the central provinces, with accompanying lower freight tariff rates to remedy this discrimination. I would suggest to the government that if they compensated the railways for the increases in freight tariff rates, amounting to over 100 per cent since 1945, especially on our major products such as coal, potatoes and fish, this action would assist the economy of the Atlantic provinces greatly.

As each of those three are bulky products and as the present freight rates bear heavily on those industries, I would also urge that the feed grain freight assistance as well as the Maritime Freight Rates Act be restored to its former effectiveness before the horizontal increase in freight rates took place. To my mind there is no better measure that the government could decide upon to assist the economy of the Atlantic provinces than to absorb a large portion of freight rate tariffs on our products going to central Canada. This would give us the most direct and immediate relief and the greatest encouragement, and would be equal to a blood transfusion to our economy. The ever-increasing freight rates are a terrific burden on us and do not allow us to compete on equal terms.

It has been said that any depressed area in Canada reflects itself on the whole economy of Canada. I believe this statement to be true. I believe I have suggested one obvious way of mitigating our economic difficulties, at least to some extent.

Many farmers in our province in need of funds to finance their farm operations find it most difficult to procure a loan through the Canadian farm loan board because of the high level of security required before a loan is approved. The Canadian Farm Loan Act has been in operation for the past 27 years and provides for only 14 per cent of all farm loans in Canada. The losses sustained since its inception have been insignificant. To assist farmers in acquiring loans the security required should be reduced by 25 per cent. If this were done, many applicants who are now ineligible could become qualified and could take advantage of the interest rates and amortization provisions for which the act provides. A decrease in the amount of security required, in line with my suggestion, would permit greater latitude to be exercised by the district supervisors and would give the act more flexibility. At present it is far too restrictive in character. It would seem that the length of time which elapses from the date of application until appraisals are made on the farm properties is entirely too long. Apparently some district offices are understaffed and, through no fault of the district supervisor, the applicant becomes frustrated because of the extremely long waiting period.

This Canadian farm loan board could be made the best loan agency in Canada, but it must cast off much of its security requirements. I trust that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) will broaden out this legislation and make its lending facilities reach out to supply the borrowing needs of many more farmers than it does at the present time.

I should like to say a word on veterans pensions. Many veterans who served in the first world war but who did not go beyond England are not eligible for the war veterans allowance. The same thing applies in the second world war in respect of veterans who did not serve outside of Canada and Newfoundland. Some of those veterans voluntarily would have gone overseas but, because of special qualifications, they were retained in Canada. They are now denied war veterans allowance by our legislation.

My suggestion to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) is to grant to all veterans reaching the age of 60 years $40 per month, in the same way as all citizens reaching the age of 70 automatically receive $40 per month. Forty dollars per month should be of great assistance to many veterans who find themselves in distressing financial circumstances.

Our fishing industry is most important in my province. The provincial and federal departments concerned are co-operating in splendid work in research and applying scientific methods to the catching of fish and also to the manner of processing the fish.

I should like to see the cold storage and refrigeration legislation broadened so that packers and processors would become eligible to receive subsidies for the construction of refrigeration plants. Refrigeration is now an absolute necessity and if the packers and processors were given assistance they would be able to provide this necessity. Often they are unable to provide refrigeration out of their own resources, and any assistance granted is of benefit to each individual fisherman.

Before concluding my remarks I wish to thank the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) and his parliamentary assistant (Mr. MacNaught) for the splendid work they did at my request in allowing quahaugs to be removed from polluted waters in Queen's county, transferred to the beaches of King's county for cleansing purposes and reclaimed for processing in King's county. I am not going into detail about the difficulties the minister met, but I do know there were many barriers to hurdle because of health regulations both in Canada and the United States. In this respect we had the fullest co-operation from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I shall defer any further remarks on fisheries until the minister's estimates are before the committee.

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I am very happy to have the privilege of taking part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, particularly at the present time when I am given the opportunity of supporting the subamendment which was so capably presented to this house last Thursday by my colleague the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw). This subamendment criticized the government for failing to take effective action to stop the continuous rise in the cost of living; secondly, the failure of the government to lay down and follow policies under which the Canadian farmers and other primary producers can enjoy an equitable share of the prosperity which Canada can achieve; thirdly, the failure of the government to bring old age pensions and other social security payments into line with the present cost of living.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I propose to deal with a few of the many problems which are confronting men and women engaged in our basic industry, agriculture, and to suggest to the government a few steps which, if the government is truly interested in the well-being of this industry, can be taken to relieve the situation in which farmers across Canada now find themselves. Since coming down here we have been made very conscious of the fact we are going to ask the people across Canada very soon to again choose the government they wish to manage the affairs of our great country for another four or five years. Since that is the case, now is the time for each and every one of us in this house to do a little reflecting. We should ask ourselves a few very simple questions such as these: Have we in the past years done our best to serve our constituents and the people across Canada as they deserve to be served? Have we seen to it that all phases of our economy have been fairly treated or have we permitted some sectors of our economy to suffer?

As to the last question, Mr. Speaker, we in this group feel that many segments of our economy have been badly treated. It is interesting to read the glowing accounts of our national prosperity but it is very difficult to reconcile this rosy picture with the true state of affairs found in the agricultural industry, especially when we find approximately 18 per cent of the people who are engaged in agriculture in Canada receiving less than 7 per cent of the national income. However, we cannot find any evidence in the speech from the throne that it is the intention of the present government to do anything about this situation. It is true that this matter has been causing great concern throughout Canada. In fact, the supporters of the present government, the delegates who attended the Alberta Liberal association convention at Calgary in November of last year, expressed their dissatisfaction with the federal agriculture policy, if it could be called a policy, which has been followed over the years. According to press reports this convention asked for a system of parity prices on farm products, and also urged the government towards greater efforts to find markets for our grain and other agriculture products.

This convention passed a resolution urging the government to provide long-term loans to young farmers. Another resolution which was passed at this particular convention deals with the equalization of floor prices for hogs as between the eastern and Pacific coast markets. I am given to understand that a good percentage of the delegates attending the convention represented the agriculture industry of Alberta and one delegate used these words in describing his position. "Farmers are clinched; they cannot move. The government tells us we are prospering but everyone is in debt." In order to prove my statement that these delegates who are supporting the Liberal party are concerned and are unhappy about the situation as it now exists may I cite the fact they said "that something must be done about agriculture policy if we wish to elect Liberal members in the west".

Now, Mr. Speaker, these requests I have mentioned have been a part of the agriculture program of the Social Credit party down through the years. Even though we have advocated these policies in this house, the government has not seen fit to do anything about them. Last summer, for example, to give you one illustration, we received the assurance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that after the end of the crop year, July 31, he would see to it that attempts would be made to ensure that those points in the west which were on a low quota basis would be given a preference in the new crop year. I wish to be fair in this matter. I do not wish to blame the Canadian wheat board at all for the chaotic conditions that exist in the marketing of wheat in the west. Even though the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is reported to have made this statement while attending a meeting in southern Alberta: that the Canadian wheat board was the sole control of the marketing of wheat I am not prepared to accept that statement. The Minister of Agriculture knows full well that the Canadian wheat board can market our wheat only within the confines of the faulty marketing policies of the present Liberal government and the financial policies adopted by the government as well.

Last summer we had the privilege of sitting in on the hearings of the agricultural committee at which the Canadian Pacific Railway was in attendance. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Pacific Railway must stand condemned for a part of the situation which now exists on the western prairies as far as grain marketing is concerned. I feel that the Canadian Pacific Railway deliberately failed to co-operate last spring with the then transport controller. I can find little evidence, Mr. Speaker, that the same railway has tried very seriously to do anything about relieving the situation that is found on the Canadian Pacific lines in western Canada at the present time.

I have followed the marketing of grain in my riding very closely and I have found many points which were on a 5-bushel quota had not completed their 2-bushel quota at the end of the crop year, July 31, 1956. On the other hand, I know of points in western Canada which were on an 8-bushel quota on July 31 of last year and have now achieved a completed 3-bushel quota. I have been in constant touch with the Canadian wheat board with regard to this situation, since it affects farmers in my riding, and I just wish to read briefly from a letter which I received in November from a leading official of the Canadian wheat board. He had this to say:

> I would point out that both railways have materially increased their car supply in the shipping of grain during the period from August 1 up to present. From August 1 to October 31, the C.P.R. has supplied 43,830 cars as compared to 28,415 last year; the C.N.R. has supplied 41,598 cars as compared to 29,278 last year. However, notwithstanding the fact that the C.P.R. have increased their supply by approximately 15,000, the C.N.R. have increased their cars by approximately 12,000, but the total number of cars supplied by each road is just about equal when you take into consideration that about 57 per cent of the grain that we have for shipment is located on the C.P.R., with about 43 per cent on the C.N.R. You will appreciate that, as long as the C.N.R. continues to match the C.P.R. supply the stations on the C.N.R. will be in better shape than those on the C.P.R.

In other words, just as long as this government refuses to appoint a new transport controller with the power to direct orderly and equitable marketing of grain in the west this situation will continue and the farmers living along the C.P.R. lines will continue to be discriminated against.

I know that some attempts have been made to justify this situation. Several reasons have been advanced. Most of the reasons which have been advanced have been decidedly weak. Perhaps one of the most prevalent reasons is the need of wheat of a particular quality; that shipping orders are given for a certain grade of wheat. That argument does not stand up when you look at two points not more than 10 miles apart. The wheat marketed at these two points is in most instances of the same quality and grade. Therefore, that argument must necessarily fall down.

In closing this matter, Mr. Speaker, may I say I do feel that the government should do something immediately to see that the Canadian Pacific Railway takes immediate steps to put into the west the same percentage of cars as the C.N.R. They should do something about trying to catch up with the man-made lapse of six weeks last spring. As I pointed out a moment or so ago, the situation in the west continues to be serious. In the west low quotas mean that the farmers are unable to market their grain. It means that they are unable to get cash money to pay their taxes and to do other things. We are told that one of the reasons that there is such a glut of wheat in the west is that there is a surplus of grain throughout the world. At this time I wish to refer to a short article which is entitled, "How Big Is The Surplus?" It deals with the surplus of wheat as it exists in the world today and reads as follows:

> The present large stocks of wheat are a serious impediment to the ready marketing of new production. They are regarded gloomily by governments, farmers and business people in the export countries. The Canadian Bank of Commerce recently termed the wheat carryover as "astronomical".
> There is no doubt that under our pattern of trade and distribution the situation is serious but the volume is inclined to impress us beyond its real proportions. We see the 1½ billion bushel world carryover as almost the equivalent to the entire normal export figure for a one and a-half year period.
> We overlook the fact that the world's population is also astronomical. There are over 2½ billion people and in terms of food reserves we have only 36 pounds of wheat per person. In the United States, where flour consumption is moderate, 190 pounds of wheat a year per person is consumed.
> For much of the world population wheat is unobtainable but the annual consumption is in the neighbourhood of 6 billion bushels. A 1½ billion bushel surplus is the equivalent to a three-months supply for this wheat-eating section.
> Awkward as carryovers may be to world trade, a 90-day reserve supply of such an important food commodity does not seem unreasonable.

I say, Mr. Speaker, few livestock men would care to operate on a narrower basis as far as basic food reserves are concerned. The article goes on to say:

> The human race should be able to design an economy that would permit it to carry some assurance against emergency food depletion without causing a marketing breakdown and penalizing the producer.

I mentioned a short while ago that 18 per cent of the people of Canada are engaged in the basic industry of agriculture and they receive less than 7 per cent of the national income. There are many reasons for this. Perhaps one of the reasons for the present condition in which farmers find themselves is that the farmers of Canada are perhaps the only major wheat exporting people in the world who are operating in a purely unprotected market as far as the selling of their products is concerned. The farmers of Canada are finding themselves entwined in a terrific cost-price squeeze. That is perhaps true to some extent of farmers throughout the whole world.

Here I have a short article which gives the over-all position of the farmers throughout some of the major countries of the world. I find that in the period from January 1, 1953 to the end of the first three months of 1956 the over-all position of the farmers in these countries followed a pattern. In Australia the over-all position of farmers declined 15 per cent; in Canada in that period the position of farmers declined 19 per cent; in Finland the over-all position was up 23 per cent; in West Germany, up 11 per cent; Japan, up 4 per cent; in the Netherlands down 5 per cent; and in the United States down 16 per cent.

I wish to point out that as far as the farmers in Canada are concerned their position declined 19 per cent, more than in any other country shown in this set of figures. This is a sad picture, but it is true. I have never heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) get up on the floor of this house and give a convincing argument against the statement that agriculture in Canada is in a deplorable condition. I am looking forward with interest to his doing so at some time during the present session. I would like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) why he has permitted our basic industry to dip down to such low economic levels. This situation, if allowed to continue, will eventually lead to the complete collapse of our food producing industry. I know that in our own area local government bodies along with businessmen and others who are associated with the farmers are finding it increasingly difficult to carry on as a result of this ever-decreasing income.

In my own municipality of Vermilion river arrears of taxes have risen to the startling figure of $609,715. This means that 36 per cent of all the parcels of land in that municipal district are in arrears of taxes. In the municipal district of Wainwright, which is south of my municipality, a similar condition exists. Arrears of taxes in 1955 had accumulated in that municipality to $267,077 with 108 parcels of land under tax recovery.

Mr. Byrne: Provincial taxes are too high.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Forget about that. You do not know about that or you would not speak that way. The reason for the great increase in tax arrears in these two municipal districts must be obvious to all, even to my hon. friend the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). It simply means that the farmers of these districts do not have the cash with which to pay their taxes. I know of many farmers who for the first time since the depression years have had to forgo the payment of their annual taxes.

I now wish to spend a few moments on a matter which is of concern in this house. It is the unfairness of the present existing floor prices on hogs. When one considers that 90 per cent of the hogs exported from Alberta in 1955 found their way to markets in British Columbia and that it costs only $1 per hundredweight to ship a hog from Edmonton to Vancouver, how can the Minister of Agriculture justify the wide spread in the floor prices on hogs that exists between the Edmonton and the eastern markets of Toronto and Montreal? The floor price for Edmonton is $18.50 per hundredweight and $23 per hundredweight on the Toronto-Montreal market. Surely if there is any justice at all in the differential of floor prices for hogs across Canada or any justice at all for this spread the minister would establish a floor of $22 per hundredweight on the Edmonton market.

The farmers of Alberta raise good hogs. They would raise more if they were assured of a fair return for their labours. The drastic reduction in the number of hogs raised in Alberta last year was a direct consequence of the unstable markets that existed the previous year. At one time Great Britain was a large importer of Canadian pork products, but for reasons best known to the present administration the market has presently disappeared.

I wish to go back to the year 1935 when this present administration took over. That year we exported to Great Britain over one million hogs. In 1940, just at the beginning of the war, we were exporting to Great Britain over 2,800,000 hogs. I am prepared to admit that during the war period there was some increase in the demand for Canadian hogs. At the end of 1945 we exported to Great Britain 3,600,000 hogs. By 1950, five years after the close of the war, the British market had slipped from a high of 3,600,000 to just slightly over 600,000 hogs. Five years later in 1955 we exported to Great Britain 53 hogs. Up until the end of July last year we had not sold Britain one pound of pork products. Surely there is something wrong with the marketing policies of a government which allows such a situation to develop.

I would like to comment briefly on the operation of the agricultural prices support board. The story has been spread across Canada that the operation of this board has cost the taxpayers of Canada a tremendous amount of money. The board was established in 1946. Since 1946 the administration of the agricultural prices support board has cost the people of Canada $89 million. The greatest part of this amount, $70 million, was spent in paying the loss to the farmers of Saskatchewan by reason of the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak in 1952.

The remainder over a ten-year period was allocated in this manner: $8.5 million for cost of butter support since 1949; $6.7 million for apples; and $2 million for potatoes. The other support items are relatively small, not including the foot-and-mouth crisis. In the ten-year period price supports have cost the treasury of Canada less than $2 million per year or about 15 cents per person in Canada per year. That certainly is not an extravagant amount to guarantee to the farmers of Canada support prices.

I turn now to the figures of the bureau of statistics, using as a base the period 1943 to 1945. The estimated parity price on butter in 1956 is 71.6 cents per pound. The average marketing price of first grade butter during the past year was 58.6 cents. As far as hogs are concerned, using the same period, the average market price for B-1 hogs across Canada was $25.98, parity $28.87 per cwt. Grade "A" (large) eggs, per dozen in Montreal parity 71.4 cents; the average market price only 58 cents.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it is high time the Minister of Agriculture gave serious consideration to bringing the Agricultural Prices Support Act in line with the parity established for the base period 1943-1945.

At the commencement of this address I suggested that I would request the government to give very serious consideration to certain proposals which I feel would help relieve the crushing burden now borne by Canadian agriculture. I would like to see the present government take immediate action with regard to certain proposals:

1. A system of cash advances on farm-stored grain, payment of these advances to be administered by some agency other than the Canadian wheat board, and the cost of administration to be borne by the government.

2. Immediate action to be taken toward the extension of permanent government-owned storage facilities and the renewal of the policy of encouraging the use of temporary off-site storage facilities to enable farmers to deliver their grain.

3. Introduction of an aggressive and realistic foreign sales policy as far as our agricultural products are concerned.

4. Opening of a thorough investigation into the merits of the two-price system of marketing our agricultural products with a view to establishing a parity price for all agricultural products.

5. The marketing of flax and rye to be handled by the Canadian wheat board.

6. Equalization of the floor prices paid on hogs all across Canada and a raising of these prices to bring them in line with estimated parity using the period 1943-1945 as the base period.

7. Amendments to be introduced to the Farm Loan Act to make this act of some use to young men wishing to enter the agriculture industry.

8. The enactment of an all-risk insurance plan which will assure the farmers of Canada a just income in case of crop failure or some other disaster.

9. The acceptance of sterling and the currency of other lands to stimulate trade with those countries, and

10. The immediate appointment of a transport controller with power to see that there is an equitable distribution of box cars in the west at all times.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the remarks of my colleague for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) and other members of this group in support of their plea for further assistance to the senior citizens of this country, and to make one observation concerning the C.P.R. strike.

This strike meant a nine-day delay with regard to the movement of grain along the C.P.R. lines. I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) to use whatever influence they may have toward seeing that grain movement along the C.P.R. system be accelerated as much as possible so that farmers delivering grain at C.P.R. points will not have to suffer any more than necessary as a consequence of this strike.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I understand it is not customary for the mover or seconder of the address to speak again during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am informed, however, that as a vote on the first subamendment has been taken, and as a second subamendment has been moved and is presently before us for consideration, it is in order for me to speak again.

Two major problems directly affecting the province of New Brunswick and, I could say, the Atlantic provinces, have been a topic of important discussion during the present debate. One was the recently published preliminary report of the Gordon commission and the other was the question of power development in New Brunswick.

It is not my intention to review what has been said by opposition members with regard to the Gordon commission's preliminary report on the Atlantic provinces. As expected, the report devoted a special section to the problems and difficulties with which people living in the Atlantic provinces must contend.

Notwithstanding the fact that our average incomes continue to lag behind the average for the rest of Canada, we cannot deny that in the maritimes per capita net incomes have increased by 94 per cent between 1926 and 1955, as compared with an average increase of 80 per cent for the six other provinces.

We all admit that living standards in the Atlantic provinces are lower than in the rest of Canada, and it is our duty as representatives of that region to make a positive and comprehensive approach to our problems. It is not, Mr. Speaker, by painting gloomy pictures of our situation, by crying havoc or despair and by destructive criticism such as we have heard from opposition members that we will contribute to improving our condition or overcome our difficulties.

A number of newspapers and even some men in public life have passed a quick judgment or have expressed their disappointment with respect to certain recommendations contained in this preliminary report of the Gordon commission. Some have been expert enough to extract single sentences and deduce from these their own conclusions. Some have been insulted, scandalized by the suggestion that the government pay the cost of relocation for people who may wish to move away from the maritimes to other areas, and a few, I am sorry to say, must have expressed their opinion without even reading the report.

Constructive suggestions are being made which, I am sure, will receive serious consideration from this government and, I could also add, from provincial and municipal levels. It is a well-recognized fact that inadequacies do exist in our transportation facilities, and appropriate measures should be taken in order to provide solutions. The Gordon report suggests that the "whole question of an improved but integrated system of transportation in the Atlantic region should be examined carefully and in detail, proper consideration being given to the cost involved in providing any new facilities and to the losses being incurred in the operation of existing services". The commission goes further and suggests that "this should be the subject of a special inquiry which will also include in its terms of reference re-examination of the present effects of the Maritime Freight Rates Act". The report urges that this proposed inquiry be undertaken promptly and, upon its completion, that the measures required to improve the present situation should be taken without delay.

Among other suggestions is that of an expanded program of geological surveys, and that of a land use classification scheme coupled with the provision of assistance to people who may be willing to move to other areas and re-establish themselves in other industries. Suggestions are also being made with reference to our coal industry, and I wish to quote from page 103 of the report, paragraph 13:

> We suggest therefore that the emphasis of the present subsidy arrangements should be modified in order to give priority to the greatest possible use of Nova Scotia coal in this region.
> We believe that changes in the present subsidy arrangements should include incentives designed to encourage the use of Nova Scotia coal in the generation of thermal power in the Atlantic region.

The use of coal for thermal power should in the future prove to be the main solution to our maritime problems. It will provide work for our miners and power for our industries. Let us be logical. Let us be realistic in our thinking and in our admission of problems and facts with which we must contend. Can we in reality expect the same living standards to prevail throughout our country from coast to coast? Are the living standards in the states of Maine and Vermont comparable to those of California or some of the most industrialized states of our American neighbours? Are the living standards of the Normandy coast of France comparable to the existing conditions along the Mediterranean shores?

What we require, Mr. Speaker, as I have said earlier, is a positive and comprehensive approach to the problem facing us in the Atlantic provinces. We have heard remarks expressed in the house by some opposition members which, if taken seriously, would lead every one of us to leave at once our maritime regions for other parts of Canada.

Let us face facts. We do have in many areas many sections of our Atantic provinces, certain settlements, certain groups, which should never have been allowed to establish themselves in those remote regions where no government assistance, not even substantial hand-outs, could provide the type of living standards which would bring these groups up to a fair basis with other people in the most favoured regions in the country.

What is the actual situation in New Brunswick? I should like to quote a few paragraphs from the annual New Year's message to his people of the premier of New Brunswick, as taken from the Telegraph-Journal of December 31, 1956.

> Premier Hugh John Flemming expressed confidence in his annual New Year's message to the people of New Brunswick that 1957 will be "a year of outstanding achievement" for the province.

Further on there are these words:

> I see no reason why I should qualify or subtract from that prediction in any way since, month by month and week by week, everyone in this province has been conscious of living in a new and vigorous atmosphere of enterprise and well-being. This feeling of ours has been strongly supported by statistics. For instance, the index figure for employment in the province was 111.4 in September, 1955. In September, 1956, the figure had risen to 116.7.

Again he says:

Upon the basis of statistics for the first three quarters of 1956 we are entitled to predict that 1957 will be a year of outstanding achievement.

He goes on further and enumerates some of the industries which have started in New Brunswick. He says:

Private industry has invested many millions of dollars in new plant capacity in our province. One of the largest long lumber mills in our history is about to go into production in the Saint John area. Expansion of pulp and paper capacity has also gone forward. All major manufacturing industries have been very active. Smaller plants and new industries have, perhaps, shown the greatest expansion of all. The frozen foods processing industry, new to our province, will soon have two new units in production.

In this case, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize the fact that if these two new plants will soon be in existence it is due to assistance from the federal treasury. Speaking about Camp Gagetown, he says:

Another favourable factor has been the progress made at Camp Gagetown by the Department of National Defence. This great project will provide further support to the economy of the province during 1957. The addition of a new community at Oromocto is proceeding satisfactorily with the co-operation of defence, provincial and local authorities.

What a contrast, Mr. Speaker, with the gloomy and depressed picture presented to the house only a few days ago by some opposition members. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has described the Gordon commission report as a doleful report. Let us hear what his premier, Premier Stanfield of Nova Scotia, has to say about it. I quote from an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal under date of January 19, 1957. The article is headed, "Stanfield Sees Value for N.S. in Gordon Report." Listen to this:

Premier Stanfield said yesterday it would be "unfortunate" if Nova Scotians "summarily dismissed" Gordon commission recommendations because of suggestions that under certain conditions maritimers be assisted to leave the area.

In a prepared statement outlining his reaction to commission findings, he said Nova Scotians do not consider "shipment of maritimers" westward is the answer, but some of the suggestions "may prove valuable and should be examined on their merits".

"The report calls the attention of the whole of Canada to our problems", he said. "Living standards are lower here than they are in the rest of Canada. Some Nova Scotians think this statement shows us in a poor light, but I think it is the simple truth. Most of us have been saying it for a long time."

He said the commission is to be commended for "seeking answers to our problems".

Statements have been made in the house with regard to power developments in New Brunswick. I feel that the people of New Brunswick and the people of Canada as a whole are entitled to have placed before them all the facts regarding federal and provincial exchange of views in connection with this power development so essential to New Brunswick's economy.

On September 28, 1950, the governments of Canada and the United States made a joint reference to the international joint commission under the boundary waters treaty of 1909. The purpose of the reference was (a) to determine whether the waters of the Saint John could be more beneficially conserved and regulated; (b) to recommend projects to this end; and (c) to indicate how various interests may be affected and what should be done.

Under date of April 6, 1953 the engineering board made an interim report and the commission itself transmitted this report to the governments on January 27, 1954, and the report was made public on October 28 of the same year. The board's report indicates that the early steps are required to increase the generating facilities in New Brunswick and Maine. It suggested a solution valid to 1961, namely, interconnection of existing power systems in the area, development of Beechwood and provision of about 600,000 acre-feet of storage in the Saint John river basin above Grand Falls.

As agreed between the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the premier of New Brunswick, on December 14 and 15, 1954, senior federal officials, in conjunction with the New Brunswick commissioners and their advisers, made an on the spot investigation of the proposed hydro developments on the Saint John river. Almost a year later, in October, 1955, I will admit that the premier of New Brunswick sought to ascertain whether federal financial assistance could be made available to New Brunswick for a ten year program of power development.

On January 26, 1956, as reported at page 558 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources (Mr. Lesage) the following question:

Has the government given consideration to the possibility of co-operating in the over-all power development of the Saint John river system in New Brunswick?

The minister, in answering my question, advised the house that ever since the early plans for further development of power on the upper Saint John river began about ten years ago the federal government had been in close touch with the situation. In concluding his remarks the minister stated that in letters to him and the Prime Minister under date of October 20, 1955, the premier of New Brunswick said, and I quote again from page

558 of Hansard, that "New Brunswick would like to submit a suitable memorandum in connection with the matter mentioned at an early date."

On November 1, 1955, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources replied that "such a supplementary memorandum from you covering the specific matters you have in mind would be of great assistance to me." We all know, and this has been made public, that on January 30, 1956, Premier Flemming's proposals were received in Ottawa. They were alternative proposals suggesting that (a) the federal government advance funds for the hydro developments of the Saint John at the prevailing rate of interest of long term government of Canada bonds, the amount required being $89 million in 11 years plus $30 million to develop the Canadian share of the river, or that the federal government advance on the same terms $211 million for hydro and thermal developments in New Brunswick. Following receipt of this proposal the federal government asked the government of New Brunswick for certain data with regard to certain difficulties in ascertaining whether 600,000 acre feet of essential storage can be made available for the further development of Beechwood. It has been made very clear that this storage is essential for the development amounting to $119 million on the Saint John river as suggested in Premier Flemming's first proposal.

Most of us have listened to charge after charge against this government by members of the opposition to the effect that Ottawa has refused to endorse New Brunswick's note for Beechwood, that Ottawa has turned us down flat and a number of similar accusations to that effect.

These two alternative proposals, Mr. Speaker, make it clear that Premier Flemming is not asking the federal government to endorse New Brunswick's note for the construction of Beechwood. The premier of New Brunswick wants more than an endorsement for Beechwood, but he is asking the federal government for financial assistance for the total capital requirements of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission amounting to $211 million.

Following receipt of these proposals, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, knowing that no agreements or arrangements had been made for storage with the province of Quebec and the state of Maine, and realizing that the developments suggested were not feasible without the assurance of a provision for 600,000 acre feet of water storage, wrote to Premier Flemming pointing out whether such storage could be provided on the Tobique river for further development of Beechwood as suggested in his proposal.

On January 17, last week, as reported at page 338 of Hansard the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in a question to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), clarified the situation by saying this:

> Is the hon. member aware that we are still waiting for the data on the possible storage on the Tobique river that we were promised by the government of New Brunswick some months ago in order to be in a position to make a decision on the request of that government?

This, Mr. Speaker, is the situation. These are the facts which should be made known to the people of New Brunswick and to the people of Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), as reported at page 296 of Hansard of January 16, said this:

> I do most positively deny that there has ever been put forward the kind of scheme that could be implemented along the lines I have mentioned. There have been general suggestions, that they should get aid, and with those general suggestions we agree, but there has never been put forward any specific proposition that could be recommended to parliament as one that would really stimulate the economy of the Atlantic region in a fashion that would be beneficial to the whole economy of Canada.

As stated in Premier Flemming's New Year's message, there has been notable and continuous progress in the mining industry of the province during the past year. I have more confidence in the present premier of New Brunswick than have most of New Brunswick's opposition members, if we are to judge them by their statements regarding the miserable and depressed condition of our population. As long as New Brunswick's premier recognizes that another factor most favourable to our provincial economy has been the progress made at Camp Gagetown by the Department of National Defence, and as long as our premier admits with all frankness that this great project will provide further support to the economy of the province during 1957, unlike the opposition members I have enough confidence in the sincerity of our premier to believe that he will assist the growth of mining in New Brunswick to secure for our people a maximum of benefit.

I have enough confidence and faith in the future of New Brunswick to believe that the lack of electrical power will not be detrimental to our advancement and to the proper development of our natural resources. Federal authorities in co-operation with the provincial government will see to it that everything possible is done to derive the full benefits from the resources placed at our disposal by Divine Providence. But the federal government must have the information they have requested before they can give further consideration to the proposals from the province of New Brunswick.

I have now reached the third point of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. During the third session of this parliament I chose to ignore the vicious and false accusations made against me in this house and on the radio by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne). On January 14 the same hon. member, in a speech again noted for substituting abuse for argument and exaggeration for emphasis, saw fit to carry on with new accusations in language not worthy of a member of this parliament. Again I had decided to ignore those attacks and charges. The hon. member may accuse me of being a baby-sitter and an untrue representative of my people but, Mr. Speaker, I want him to know that I am not ashamed of having to baby-sit for my family of nine children. My sincere hope is that I can bring them up to be good citizens of Canada and that they at all times will be polite to their neighbours and never use the type of language and tactics so familiar to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska.

As a representative of my people, I am not ashamed of my actions in this house and at home. My electors know that I have at heart the welfare and well-being of all my constituents. The charges made by the hon. member reflect not only on individual members but on all members of this house, irrespective of their party. I want to quote from an article entitled "Report from Parliament Hill—J. C. Van Horne, Member Parliament" which appeared in the Campbellton Graphic of January 17, 1957. I shall read part of it:

To begin with, I am vexed and put out to see what is going on in Ottawa this week. Here we are with thousands of people, not only in my riding but all over the country, out of work, and here we are with a crippling transportation strike on our hands, and what does the government do: it puts on cocktail parties and receptions. When will this government realize that the people did not put it in office to have fun and parties, but to render good government to the people. With our problems mounting day by day, with suffering and hardship and want the lot of far too many of our people, our government knocks off work—

Listen to this.

—to have fun. What a set-up! Apart from the Governor General's reception Tuesday night I have refused all other invitations in protest against a government which cares too little for the people and too much for frivolity.

An hon. Member: Who invited him.

Mr. Robichaud: I do not know whether any other members of this house have received such invitations to cocktail parties and receptions from this government. Maybe, Mr. Speaker, a special invitation was sent to the hon. member because the government knows of his close connection with places where cocktails are served. After all, his statement is that he refused all other invitations than that to the Governor General's reception on Tuesday night. From what we know in this house the reception was on Monday night, the day before the house opened.

Mr. Sinclair: He must have had his cocktails first.

Mr. Robichaud: Listen to this. The article farther on continues as follows:

This week I placed upon the table of the house my resolution to build the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge. I am determined to get a yes or no answer, and I hope to force this matter to a vote at the earliest date. I want to know, and I am sure all our people feel the same way, just where the government fits. The Conservative party fellows are behind the bridge 100 per cent, so are the Social Crediters and the C.C.F.ers, but the Liberals just don't want to get off the fence and say yes or no. And this is why they will do this year, as they did last year,—

Listen to this.

—everything possible to postpone a vote and the debate on this resolution.

Well, after having been in this house for over one session the hon. member does not even know that the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge is an interprovincial bridge and both the province of Quebec and the province of New Brunswick refused to co-operate when the federal government made the announcement that they were prepared to go ahead with their share of the bridge.

Farther on he deals with the C.P.R. strike and I should like to quote one part:

I wish I had time to explain fully the firemen's case in this article but you may be assured that in my opinion, as in the opinion of our party, the C.P.R. management is alone responsible for this strike, and they are the ones who should be blamed, and not the unions who have acted, and are acting in good faith all along.

At last we know the Tory policy on the C.P.R. strike. Now, we have it wide open and I hope that the leader of the party will make a declaration supporting what has been said by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska.

I have here the Campbellton Tribune for January 16, 1957 which carries the heading, "M.P. Flays Government; Asks New Deal for New Brunswick." This article reads in part as follows:

Few people were in the house when he started his speech, but within minutes the Liberal members moved cautiously to their seats.

I know that quite a few members on the opposite side moved out because there were only nine Tory members in the house when he spoke, including the hon. member.

Then, this article states:

His speech comprised an overall new deal plan for the maritimes, and for justice and social security and welfare plans for the people of Canada as a whole. Among the first to congratulate Mr. Van Horne was John Diefenbaker, the new leader, who praised the speech as "outstanding in every respect".

Well, Mr. Speaker, I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to make a statement in this house that he approved the speech made by the hon. member in every respect. I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to make a statement in this house to confirm what the member has said about the C.P.R. management.

Mr. Van Horne: Are you still against increasing family allowances?

Some hon. Members: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Van Horne: You are indeed the baby sitter of the Liberal party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind hon. members that the member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Robichaud: I am sorry, but I could not hear the objections raised by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. If I had I would be glad to reply to them. I feel that, as representatives in this house, it is our duty to have an apology made by the hon. member for the charges which he has made and which are a reflection upon every member. If he does not see fit to make it on the floor of this house, at least he should write to these two newspapers and apologize for the misstatements.

Mr. Van Horne: I apologize for nothing.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I hope, Mr. Speaker, it will now be in order for me to direct the attention of the house to the speech from the throne which is the subject of the debate before us. I notice that this year special emphasis was placed on the subject of external affairs in the speech from the throne. Half of the subject matter of that speech is devoted to Canadian foreign relations. To underline the importance of the subject the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Cardin) have all participated in the debate and have dealt with matters concerning the department. No other cabinet ministers have taken part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is obvious therefore, that the government is paying particular attention to the subject of external affairs this year because of the critical world situation or because of the closeness of an election and the great dissatisfaction in Canada with the government's action at the time of the Suez crisis.

I think the latter is the correct explanation for this extraordinary state of affairs. I note also that the speech from the throne and the addresses of the two ministers whom I have mentioned have placed special emphasis on the commonwealth of nations. The speech from the throne uses this sentence, and I quote:

> My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the basic unity of the commonwealth . . .

This is indeed an unusual sentence. No such reference to the commonwealth appears in any speech from the throne from 1949 to the present time. Here and there in the preceding sessions casual reference was made to the commonwealth in those years in which commonwealth conferences were being held but this is the first occasion since 1949 on which the commonwealth has received special attention in the speech from the throne. Hon. members will note the phraseology.

> My ministers remain convinced of the need to maintain the basic unity of the commonwealth . . .

The sentence should read as follows: My ministers, and particularly the minister of external affairs, have suddenly discovered the British commonwealth of nations. Heretofore they have been only half conscious of its existence and have made little or no effort to maintain the basic unity of the commonwealth or even mention the subject. Now, in this year of 1957, the Secretary of State for External Affairs devoted a great portion of his speech on January 14 to the commonwealth. He sang its praises; he acknowledged its importance in the world. He considered that it is the first of four factors that influence Canada's foreign policy. He emphasized the necessity of strengthening the commonwealth. Of course, this gave him an opportunity of referring to the alleged break in the commonwealth that he keeps telling us almost occurred at the time of the Suez crisis. This has been one of the major propaganda efforts of the minister. He has placed himself in the position of the saviour of the commonwealth and has implied that, as a result of Canada's action at the United Nations in November under his direction, the Asian members of the commonwealth were retained within this great organization.

Although sufficient evidence has been produced from the statements of the Prime Ministers of Ceylon and India that they did not entertain any idea of withdrawing from the commonwealth, nevertheless the minister and some of his followers on the government side persist in proclaiming him as the man who saved the commonwealth. I was interested in noting that the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the course of his speech, in which he also emphasized the value of the commonwealth, failed to pay any tribute to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This was an unfortunate oversight because the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his speech expressed his gratitude to the Minister of National Health and Welfare for his activities in strengthening the commonwealth among the Asian members, during the course of his tour of the Far East. I judge from this that the Minister of National Health and Welfare found no evidence of the alleged disruption of the commonwealth which has so possessed the mind of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I note that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in his discussions with our friends in the Far East, told them something about the history of Canada and its relations with the United States, and fell into the same error that the Minister of National Defence did last year, an inaccuracy with regard to our history. The Minister of National Health and Welfare told the people whom he met in the Far East that with respect to the United States—and these are his words—we have "side by side over 140 years lived in peace". Well, I think he is overlooking the fact that during the period from the war of 1812-14 to 1870 relations between Canada and the United States and between Great Britain and the United States were often very strained; that there was considerable difficulty in maintaining the peace; that armed forays were made into Canada by Fenian raiders; that the militia was called out on several occasions to resist them and that the last raid was made in 1870. During the course of those earlier years strenuous efforts were made by the Canadian government to retain in Canada formations of the British army to give us protection. For the benefit of the Minister of National Health and Welfare I shall read to him a small portion of a letter addressed by the Prime Minister of Canada in 1870 to the appropriate cabinet minister in England. Sir John A. Macdonald wrote as follows:

> The withdrawal of the troops from Canada is, I think with you, a most unwise and shortsighted proceeding. At this moment we are in daily expectation of a formidable Fenian invasion, unrepressed by the United States government, and connived at by their subordinate officials.

Therefore let us put the date for the peaceful relations between our country and our great neighbour to the south at 1870, which is not 140 years.

In his remarks the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that it was necessary, because of recent events, to make a reassessment of the principles which have underlined our policy and the factors that influence them. He then went on to list the four principal factors of Canadian foreign policy and he placed them in this order: the commonwealth, the United Nations, NATO and the United States of America. He placed his greatest emphasis upon the United Nations and, strangely enough, I thought that his discussion of the United Nations was really the swan song of that organization. He mentioned the gap between responsible and irresponsible membership, the impossibility of compulsory enforcement of United Nations proposals, the growing tendency to force through the assembly impractical and unreasonable resolutions merely by voting power and the development of the group or bloc veto in the assembly which may result, as he said, in that body becoming as ineffective as the security council; and, finally, that the United Nations provides no substitute for the national policies of its members.

This leads me to wonder whether, with these doubts in his mind, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is wise in attempting to create the impression that Canada's foreign policy depends to such a great extent on the United Nations. If that body is no more effective than the minister has pointed out, it is indeed a slender reed on which Canada is leaning in the difficult task of attempting to provide national security and a stable and enduring peace throughout the world.

I think the time has come when we should examine the value of the United Nations as it is constituted at the present time. I think it is the height of folly to place so much dependence on an organization which in the last 10 years has failed to keep the peace, which is its main purpose, and which recently has been shown to be unable to enforce its will as expressed by resolutions of the assembly.

I think it is just nonsense to suggest that the cease-fire which was procured at the Suez canal was the result of resolutions passed by the United Nations. I think that that cease-fire and the withdrawal of the British and French forces were brought about chiefly by the pressure exerted upon Britain and France by the United States.

The United Nations has recently passed a resolution requiring the state of Israel to withdraw its armed forces from the areas formerly held by Egypt, the Gaza strip and the gulf of Aqaba. If the state of Israel does withdraw her forces from those areas it will be because of the economic sanctions applied to Israel by the United States. I draw the attention of the house to an article appearing in the New York Times of January 20, which reads in part as follows:

> Israel was expecting from $25 million to $30 million in grants in aid from the United States this year. She was also planning a $75 million loan from the export-import bank. After the Sinai campaign grants in aid were stopped and there is no word yet that they will be resumed. There is also no commitment on the loan.

I just wonder whether that would have a greater effect on the state of Israel than a resolution passed by the United Nations.

We have recently heard a great deal about the effectiveness of the United Nations in marshalling public opinion. The parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke in the house on January 15 and expressed, I judge, the point of view of the department and of the minister. He said that he was impressed by the unprecedented power and strength of world opinion which was so forcibly expressed at the United Nations not so long ago. He then went on to say, as recorded at page 229 of Hansard:

> World opinion has become more than ever before an extremely important factor in the relationship of states, to which no state, no matter how powerful, can afford now to be indifferent.

If world opinion is as powerful a force as this, why was it so ineffective with regard to the disaster that befell the people in Hungary? What effect did world opinion have on Russia during that terrible crisis? The answer is absolutely none at all. If world opinion is such a powerful force, why has it been necessary during the last few years to establish such military alliances as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Baghdad pact? If it is so powerful, why do we have to spend half of our annual budget for military defence? Why does the United States have to maintain the largest strategic bombing force in the world, with air bases on every continent? Why must we have a stockpile of atom and hydrogen bombs? Why must we spend millions in providing great radar lines in northern Canada? If world opinion is such a powerful force to maintain peace, why is it necessary periodically for the United States to enunciate such policies as containment and massive retaliation? Why is it necessary for the proclamation of the Eisenhower doctrine with regard to the Middle East? If world opinion, as expressed through the United Nations, is such a powerful force, as so many people are telling us, why are all these defensive preparations necessary, why not just another resolution of the United Nations? The answer, of course, is that the belief in the power of world opinion is merely a delusion. The United Nations, as constituted at the present time, can exert only moral suasion. Each nation is a sovereign body. No nation is bound by international law except on its own consent. There is no effective sanction, either military or economic, at the disposal of the United Nations to apply to members who fail to abide by decisions of that organization. Now being tried is an experiment in the use of a method more effective than a resolution made by the United Nations. This is being done by means of the emergency force which is operating on the boundary between Egypt and Israel.

A United Nations police force has been the subject of discussion in many circles for the last ten years. Of course when the minister for external affairs proposed such a force at the United Nations assembly in November it was hailed as a stroke of inventive genius. The Canadian propaganda machine which functions at the United Nations made the most of this opportunity by impressing upon Canadians by means of television, radio and newspaper articles that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was a statesman unparalleled in the history of the world. Disillusionment followed very closely after this momentous discovery, when it became evident that Colonel Nasser had the final word as to the nature of the force, its disposition and the length of its stay on Egyptian soil. Even now, when opinion is in favour of the United Nations police force occupying the Gaza strip and other disputed territories on the border of Israel, Egypt objects to this use of the emergency force.

The latest resolution passed by the United Nations and therefore, so we are led to believe, expressing the power of world opinion, simply insists that Israel withdraw entirely from the disputed area and that a return be made to the status quo. No permanent solution between Israel and her neighbours is in sight. Although this represents a very unpropitious beginning for a United Nations military force, the minister of external affairs is now advocating the provision by members of the United Nations of forces which would be available when the necessity arose to institute international police action. This is what he said on page 177 of Hansard of January 14:

> The kind of force we have in mind would be designed to meet situations calling for action, intermediate if you like, between the passing of resolutions and the fighting of a war, and which might incidentally have the effect of reducing the risks of the latter. It would not, however, as I see it, be expected to operate in an area where fighting was actually in progress; it would be preventive and restoratory rather than punitive or belligerent.

The minister is fond of adjectives, uses them skilfully and bemuses us by his use of them. I find it difficult to visualize forces of this nature being used in the intermediate period between the passing of resolutions by the United Nations and the actual outbreak of war. If the United Nations police force, which is now in the mind of the minister, is no better equipped for offensive or defensive action than the present force now serving in the Middle East, I would think that any member of the United Nations which committed troops abroad under such circumstances would simply be giving hostages to fortune. Without effective support from air, armour and artillery, an infantry police force armed only with rifles, machine guns and mortars is not much more than an enlarged observer corps.

I would like to ask the minister in what area of the world he would see such an international police force stationed. If this is an effective way of dealing with threats to western democracy from Russia would he suggest that a United Nations police force be stationed in Germany, and that the United States and British divisions be recalled, along with the Canadian forces? If we believe all the propaganda to which we have been subjected during the last few months the NATO alliance is obviously unnecessary, and we should place our reliance upon the great power of public opinion expressed by resolutions supported by a majority vote in the United Nations assembly and assisted by a lightly armed infantry force on the borders between hostile states.

I suggest that to base Canada's foreign policy upon the United Nations as our main shield and our main defence against war is nothing short of folly. Until the United Nations has become a much more powerful body than it is at the present time; until the nations of the world are prepared to submit to the rule of law, and until the United Nations is able effectively to enforce its decisions, we are making a great mistake in placing too much reliance on this organization for the preservation of peace.

I submit that the minister must reappraise Canada's foreign policies and rearrange in his thinking the four factors on which he states our policy is based. I am of the opinion that the four factors should be arranged in this order: first, the commonwealth; second, NATO; third, the United States of America; and fourth, the United Nations. This, of course, means relying upon military alliances, the age-old method of protection for states which in themselves are not powerful enough to resist any foreign threat. Military alliances have not brought about lasting peace, but have served from time to time to postpone war and on the outbreak of conflict to provide collective security for the members of the alliance.

There is no immediate prospect of establishing permanent peace in the world. This will only be achieved when some sort of world government is established. No possibility of world government exists at the present time because of the lack of uniformity among the systems of government in the various nations of the world. Dictatorships, oligarchies and democracies can find no common basis for agreement. That leaves us with no alternative except the maintenance of military alliances among the democracies, with the hope perhaps of establishing closer political ties among those nations whose philosophies of life and whose systems of government are similar.

Therefore it is obvious that for the security of Canada—and that is the main function of the Department of External Affairs—our greatest reliance should be placed upon our membership in the British commonwealth, our association with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and our close ties with our powerful neighbour to the south. Every effort should be made by Canada to strengthen the commonwealth and to strengthen the bond between the commonwealth and the United States.

Had this conception of Canada's foreign policy been uppermost in the mind of the minister of external affairs last November I doubt very much if he would have abstained from voting at the United Nations assembly. Abstaining from a vote is an important action in the United Nations assembly. One of the senior civil servants in the Department of External Affairs a few years ago explained the meaning of abstention in the following words:

> To abstain is not a neutral act with no policy implications, not a simple statement of lack of knowledge; it is a definite political act with definable political connotations.

The minister's abstention on the occasion of the vote in November was a definite political act which made a choice between making common cause with the commonwealth and becoming a satellite of the United States. I would direct your attention to a very interesting book entitled "Canada in World Affairs" by B. S. Keirstead, which examines Canada's external relations during the period 1951-53. He deals with the subject which I am now discussing, and on page 44 points out that with regard to Canadian interests abroad the first thing in which we are interested is stable and enduring peace with, as a corollary, security against attack, provision for security directed toward a strong bargaining position for the negotiation of a settlement.

Later, on pages 239 and 240, he deals with the subject of the commonwealth, and is not altogether sympathetic with the policies of the Department of External Affairs which were pursued in those years and which, as far as I can gather, are being followed at the present time. There is a short quotation here which I think may be of interest. The writer says:

> The countries of the commonwealth have a unique organization. With different languages, religions, and national cultures, they share a common political tradition, a common set of moral and political values, and a common habit of mind in the face of political problems. This common habit of mind is one of moderation, of compromise, of negotiation, of give and take. While no common foreign policy is possible, if one means by that an agreed course of action on every issue, anything that might strengthen the presentation of the commonwealth habit of thought would surely be a contribution to world peace. If this is what is meant by closer commonwealth collaboration in foreign policy, and it is all that it is possible to mean, then it does make sense to ask if the extreme official caution in Canada and the sensitivity to anything that might even appear to make Canadian policy depend on London has been justified. After all, if the choice is between making common cause with London occasionally (and New Delhi, Canberra, Colombo, and others) and becoming a satellite of the United States, anyone who values, or even has valued, Canadian independence ought not to have difficulty in seeing where the danger lies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have suggested the order of the factors upon which I think Canada should place its reliance, dealing with the factors originally enunciated by the minister for external affairs, I should think now that he has seen the light, we would be in agreement concerning the commonwealth. After all, why should there ever have been any separation from the commonwealth on the part of Canada? Our roots have never been cut from the homelands from which the two great races of this country have sprung, and in those difficult periods of the twentieth century when vital decisions had to be made, in 1914 and 1939, there was no serious difference of opinion among the Canadian people as to what should be their decisions. We were not disturbed, or waiting to see what Washington would say with regard to what action we should take. Nor was it a question simply of saying "Ready, aye ready" as the minister tries to imply. It was because of our common background of thought and belief that we faced the problems that confronted the world in those two wars in the way we did, and were ready to defend the cause of freedom and democracy.

The second factor, Mr. Speaker, is our relation with NATO. It is a military alliance, but what is the alternative to a military alliance in so far as we are able to discover at this stage of world development? It is a strong military alliance in which we place our greatest hope. If we did not have the benefit of that alliance we would be in grave danger. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the minister of external affairs should place much more emphasis in this house on the subject of NATO than he does.

The propaganda machinery which is consistently telling us about the minister's speeches at the United Nations does not seem to operate at all with regard to NATO conferences, with the result that NATO is a relatively unknown quantity among Canadians. This is true to such an extent that in the last two years, when representatives of this House of Commons and of the other house have gone to a conference attended by representatives from all the other members of the NATO alliance, certain people have poked fun at the expedition and called it a junket and a joyride at the expense of the people of Canada.

On the contrary, that type of consultation and conference is, I think, essential. If the NATO alliance is to be maintained there must be understanding among the members of NATO and exchanges of opinion from time to time. I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who willingly look forward to a broader basis for NATO, and I have spoken in this house with regard to the suggestion that an Atlantic alliance might be established as the next step forward in the development of relations among the nations, an alliance which would comprise those nations bordering on the Atlantic who have similar systems of government, a similar background and the capacity for joining together much more closely than in the past in order to make themselves secure in a very insecure world.

The third factor on which we must place our reliance is of course, Mr. Speaker, the United States of America; not in the position of a blind follower of the United States but as a partner in our own right, with the power to influence United States opinion. We have to be extremely careful at the present time about our relationship with the United States. We have been reading in the papers recently about the new policy announced there, and it is interesting to note that Mr. Dulles has been telling us what might happen in the event of trouble. The Globe and Mail of Saturday, January 19, reports what Mr. Dulles said before a Senate committee, and I quote his words:

> If we got into war we'd expect to get help from 42 nations with whom we have collective security agreements.

Then he went on to say with regard to consultation:

> The United States ought not to have its polices fixed by consultations and agreements with other nations.

Well, Mr. Speaker, much was said in November about the lack of consultation. Now we are informed by this great power that consultation is perhaps not necessary. What position is Canada in? We have United States troops living in our country; we have United States air bases on the soil of Canada. Are we immediately committed in the event the United States takes some action? The closest relationship with the United States is naturally essential to our safety; but, Mr. Speaker, it must be a relationship entered into with ourselves as a partner.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that consideration should be given to these factors in the order in which I have presented them, and I think it would be wise for the House of Commons and the minister for external affairs to take a second look at the policy which was placed before us for consideration the other day. Where does the United Nations come in? I place it at the bottom of the list, not because I think it is completely ineffective; that is not so. The United Nations is an essential part of man's struggle toward securing peace and order in the world. It is at present ineffective, as we know, as an instrument for ensuring and maintaining peace but it has, nevertheless, to be maintained as an organization; indeed, it has to be strengthened in the light of recent events. The weakness of that body should surely be known to all, and it is because we recognize that weakness, I maintain, that we should not place our full reliance upon the United Nations alone.

We must regard these things in the proper order, the commonwealth, NATO, the United States of America, and after that we should play our full part in the United Nations in order to make it an effective force for the peace we would like to see in the world. But to establish it as the basis of our foreign policy would be, I think, to delude our people. We cannot expect to have peace in the world simply by way of resolutions passed at the United Nations. In this difficult twentieth century, in this period in which we are living in fear of a very destructive war, we must place our reliance upon our known friends, upon our known means of protecting ourselves. It is only as we do that and emphasize these aspects first that we can safely go on to deal with the United Nations and endeavour through that body to reach the solution that everybody in the world hopes for, with the exception perhaps of some of the communist countries.

I do not think there is any doubt in anybody's mind that the average man in the world wants peace. He does not want to be shot at or killed. He is not interested in the destruction of war. He wants peace. But how is it to be obtained? Let us not delude ourselves into thinking that it can be obtained by an organization whose only effective function at the present time is to determine by a majority vote what resolutions shall be passed at that assembly. The marshalling of public opinion that we hear so much about these days has not been an effective factor in maintaining peace. It is all to the good. We want public opinion marshalled. We want these things brought out into the open. Nations that are oppressed or suffering should be heard.

It is a good thing that in the United Nations all nations of the world there assembled can talk about the disaster that befell the Hungarian people. That shows to them and to all of us everywhere the evil in the world that is represented by communist Russia. But to base our foreign policy on the United Nations as our mainstay is, I think, wholly wrong. We must revise our thinking and start with these other factors in our minds. We must strengthen the commonwealth, strengthen NATO, strengthen the tie with the United States of America, and then from that point use our influence in the United Nations.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question before he sits down?

Mr. Churchill: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre feel that if Canada were to place the United Nations at the bottom of the list that that would be an effective way of making the United Nations a more effective instrument in the achievement of world peace?

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps I have used an inappropriate term in speaking of the bottom of the list. I should have said that every attention should be given to the United Nations. However, it is a question of emphasis; and in our anxiety to make the United Nations an effective force in the world we should not neglect our connection with the commonwealth, the effectiveness of the military NATO alliance and our close relation with the United States.

Mr. Martin: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Would he not agree that perhaps none, in any case certainly few others, have worked harder for the strength and the usefulness of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization than my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: The Secretary of State for External Affairs may have worked to the limit of his ability for NATO. I was not suggesting that he had not. I was suggesting that our propaganda machinery was emphasizing more the work of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and, on occasion, of the Minister of National Health and Welfare at the United Nations, and neglecting to give us information with regard to NATO.

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join hon. members of the house in congratulating the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do not intend to be very long, because my conviction is that Liberal legislation is very good.

Such testimony from a Liberal member will not surprise anyone, but if I mention it I do so because of the obvious approval of the official opposition, the Progressive Conservative party. Indeed, I have read carefully the program of the Conservative party at its last convention, and I have found that as a whole it constitutes the best appraisement of Liberal legislation in this country. The biggest difference is that the Progressive Conservative party will need about $7 billion or $8 billion to realize their program, instead of $5 billion which is the present budget. One may hope that by 1965 or before the Liberal party will be able to fulfil such an ideal social program.

As there is nothing very controversial in present politics, I should like to say a few words on a subject that should appeal to all members of the house without regard to party lines. I refer to the project of simultaneous translation of speeches in the House of Commons in both official languages of this country. I am sure of finding a sympathetic reception for such a proposal which will please greatly nearly one-third of the members of the house and as many as 5 million people of French descent in this country. We all know that at the United Nations and in many private organizations simultaneous translation is widely used. On May 22, 1956, the Junior Chamber of Commerce of Canada, embracing almost 25,000 members, presented a brief to the Speaker of this house recommending such a system for the House of Commons.

May I add that on the east side of the Ottawa river 4 million people speak French, and the great majority of them are unable to follow the debates of the house when they come here to visit us. Two years ago, Mr. Speaker, I received in Ottawa 200 farmers and their wives from my constituency, and I was sorry that they were unable to follow the debates from their seats in the galleries. My conviction is that the most important way to promote national unity is to permit a good understanding of the other language. The United Nations organization would have been impossible without simultaneous translation, and all French Canadians going to New York to attend the United Nations meetings come back with the idea that such a system should be in use in the House of Commons.

We should admit that the present system of acoustics is far from being perfect. It is maintained at great cost but it could be replaced with better results so far as hearing is concerned by one system of individual earphones. These earphones could be utilized for both acoustics and simultaneous translation purposes. Here are a few figures on the cost of the present sound system in the chamber:

Original cost of installation	$33,529
Annual rental of equipment	7,500
Operation and maintenance yearly ..	20,000

The wiring was done by public works personnel, and the cost is not readily available. In the brief of the Canadian Junior Chamber of Commerce already mentioned I see that the cost of installation of a simultaneous translation system in the House of Commons is estimated at $6,272. This means that the installation and operating cost of such a system would be less than for the one we already have and it would give much better results and satisfaction to members in general as well as to the public.

I have in my hand some information about the cost of earphones for public seats at the United Nations. It is approximately $15 per seat. As there are 626 seats in the galleries of this chamber, the total cost for earphones for all the public seats would be $9,390. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I know this parliament is very sensitive to the prerogatives and rights of parliament. I personally feel that parliament is right in defending those rights, because parliament is the means by which good democracy may function. But I think the first condition for a good parliament is that all speakers be understood in their own language when it is possible. I think it is not very good for a parliament that a third of the members speak for the ceilings, for the walls, or just for the press. I believe it should be the right of everyone to be understood in his own language and to hear and speak in his own language.

We feel here that when we speak French this house is not interested. I do not think I will be disagreeable to my English speaking colleagues when I say this. If the situation were reversed and they were in our position, with a third of this house speaking English and we, two-thirds, speaking only French, I feel sure that the third you would represent would ask strongly for simultaneous translation.

One day I heard a minister say that the members from the province of Quebec did not seem much interested in the legislation of this country outside the province of Quebec. I admit that there seems to be some truth in that observation. However, I think one of the main reasons is the fact that 75 members are obliged to follow the speeches in another language. As we live in a democracy, under a democratic system in which we believe, and which we want to defend, with a parliament that we want to protect, I believe we should have a system that permits everybody to hear and to speak in his own language and not be obliged to speak just for the walls, for the ceilings or for the press. I think we have a right to have that opportunity. When I say that I assure you that it is not from a nationalistic point of view; it is simply on the basis of a democratic system which we want to preserve and which we cherish.

This year I intend to present a resolution on this matter. If I speak on this question in the debate on the speech from the throne it is simply because I want to direct the minds of hon. members to this question which, for us, is extremely important. I have heard the comments made by French speaking members of this house. If you want to be fair to this important minority, I think something should be done. Actually 25 or 30 years after the invention of this system of sound reproduction and simultaneous translation which was used at the first United Nations meetings, I think it is time something should be done in this house. I was told that the actual system of sound reproduction could be installed at small cost, and could be so organized that it would provide simultaneous translation.

On the day I come back with a resolution on simultaneous translation in this house I hope I shall receive approval and sympathy from all sides of this house. Starting from the principle that varied cultures constitute a national enrichment, I think there is no better place than the House of Commons to demonstrate the value of such a principle.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, as this debate progresses it becomes increasingly more difficult to discuss a problem that has not already had some degree of consideration. But because I come from a part of the country which is almost solely dependent on agriculture, and also because I am interested in and concerned about the general agricultural picture in this country, I feel that at this time I have no alternative but to take this opportunity to bring before this house and this government once again, as I have attempted to do on previous occasions, the serious situation and the unfortunate position in which Canadian agriculture and in particular western agriculture finds itself at the moment, even at the risk of repeating many of the arguments that have already been made.

Certainly since I have been in this house, Mr. Speaker, and for many years prior to my coming here, innumerable speeches have been made by members of this party and others not only in pointing out to the government the serious deterioration that is steadily taking place in this unfortunate industry, but repeatedly warning this government of the inevitable and serious consequences that will result unless the government accepts its share of the responsibility for bringing about a solution of this extremely distressing problem. As a matter of fact, agricultural producers in the part of the country from which I come are suspicious that, because of the inaction on the part of the government to implement an agricultural policy, this government has in effect abandoned agriculture, that they have written it off as being something that is unnecessary in so far as the economic welfare of this country is concerned.

I say that in all seriousness. We have the refusal of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce to attend meetings of western farm organizations called especially to discuss current agricultural problems, after special requests had been made of these two responsible members of the government to attend. The fact that they refused to attend and, as a matter of fact, on one occasion refused to allow any other responsible member of this government to attend and speak on behalf of Liberal agricultural policies in this country, only strengthens and adds to that suspicion. I suggest that the government has some responsibility in respect to the over-all agriculture policy of this country, and I am going to say quite frankly that the farmers are not blameless. In all fairness I must say that the farmers themselves also have some responsibility for trying to bring about a solution of their own problems.

I want to say to this house, and to this government in particular, that we must bear this point in mind. Farmers are unable to discharge their responsibilities outside of the framework of a comprehensive and realistic federal agriculture policy. I think the time is long overdue for the government to take a realistic view of this whole situation. They have to get down and grapple with this situation. The time is overdue when they can pass the buck, as they have done over the past number of years. The time is past when they are able to say to the farmer that the reason he is not getting his fair share of the national income is that he has failed to accept his responsibility for the situation in which he finds himself today.

I hope, before I am finished, to be able to shed a little light on this subject and discredit a few of the fallacious arguments this government has been able to sell to Canadian agriculture. In spite of the government's pronouncements to the contrary; in spite of the very optimistic and irresponsible speeches that have been made throughout the country, especially in western Canada, by the Minister of Agriculture, to the effect that agriculture is not experiencing any distress, agriculture is declining at an alarming rate.

It is not my intention on this occasion to repeat all the arguments proving that contention, but I should like to draw the attention of the government to a statement made on January 2 last by Mr. Jack Wesson, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, and a man whom I am sure has the confidence not only of everyone in this house but of everyone connected with western agriculture. He said the farmer had reached the point, because of the so-called cost-price squeeze, where he is placed in an impossible position. Then again I should like to quote very briefly from a publication of the Searle Grain Company, a publication which by no stretch of the imagination could be considered a friend of the farmer. They had this to say in an issue of last fall, at a time when they were talking about the farmers' position regarding the disparity between his cost of production and the price which he receives for the products he markets:

> . . . it now costs the prairie farmer $2.31.3 to buy what one dollar would buy in 1935-39. This means, therefore, that the $1.40 initial wheat payment is worth only 60.5 cents in 1935-39 value of money, basis No. 1 Northern Fort William, or at the average country elevator point it is worth approximately 52½ cents a bushel.

I am not going to belabour the house with more statistics, but I should like to produce one more bit of significant evidence in regard to the position of agriculture in the west. It is a statement of tax accounts in a larger school unit in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I can say without boasting that I represent possibly one of the best agricultural areas in western Canada in so far as agricultural revenue is concerned. I feel it is a deplorable state of affairs that out of the total tax levy in that school unit, amounting to some $368,000, some $246,000 was still outstanding as of December 31.

Here again we have a clear indication of the economic stress that is being imposed on agriculture producers in that area because of the shortcomings of federal agricultural policy. What I have quoted is indeed significant, because it is a well known fact that farmers will pay their taxes if at all possible since they know they cannot put off indefinitely the day of retribution if these taxes are not paid.

Yet rather than recognize the seriousness of the situation by facing the fact that the Canadian economy is composed of one large unit, and all phases must be geared to the general welfare and prosperity of the whole economy, the best the government can do is advocate a do nothing policy. They carelessly disregard the distress, both economic and social, that results from such an attitude. The best they can do is say if the farmer cannot make a go of it on the farm, let him quit and move to town. It seems to me the best that could be said for the present agricultural policy of this government is that it is a series of unintelligent ad hoc pieces of mumbo-jumbo designed to avert, from week to week, chaos in the agriculture industry. In other words, they believe in the survival of the fittest to the extent that they would sacrifice the farmer, and possibly more important they would sacrifice the family farm, to a system of centrally-owned corporate farms. It is a rather cold and heartless approach, because as I said a moment ago it disregards completely not only the economic implications but, equally important, the social and moral implications of the matter.

Rather than attempt to get at the root of the problem; rather than attempt to take some responsibility for the situation, they simply say that the farmer is unable to maintain his position because of several very obvious reasons. I think, by and large the farmers are getting sick and tired of being told by this government that the reason they cannot make good on the land is that they are inefficient; that they must operate a more economic unit, that they must diversify their agricultural operations. Then, when these arguments have been exhausted, the farmer is told he is unable to maintain his position in the industry because labour is asking for too much money, and the wages which labour is receiving in those industries on which the farmer depends for his production needs are driving up the costs of production beyond all reasonable levels.

Then, Mr. Speaker, in order to clinch the argument once and for all, in the face of the clamour from agriculture for a system of parity prices that would give agriculture a parity income with other groups in this country, the government then says that people would never agree because a higher support price, or a parity price, would only victimize the consumer; and so the government does nothing.

I think we should take a look at some of these fallacious arguments that are being put forward as the reasons the farmer finds himself in his present position. I should like to ask the house this question. Is it true that the farmer is inefficient? What do you mean by "efficiency"? In 1950 the agricultural industry of this country received 11 per cent of the national income. Since 1950, in the span of six short years, we in the agricultural industry have lost 150,000 farm operators. But in the last six years the farmers of Canada have been condemned for producing surpluses. Apparently, if you carry this argument to its logical conclusion, the more efficient agriculture becomes the poorer it becomes, because in 1956, in spite of the fact that agriculture had lost 150,000 workers, the farmers received only 6 per cent of the national income. Therefore I think we have to look farther than the question of efficiency to find the answer to the farmer's problem.

On the other hand, it is a question of what is meant by efficiency. There is not too much inefficiency in the manner and the methods by which farmers are carrying on their operations today, but I think efficiency means something else. I think an agricultural program can be more efficient if it is diversified. If we are to solve our problems in this country it is right and proper for farmers to diversify their operations, especially in western Canada. There is no question about it, Mr. Speaker; the people of this country and elsewhere eat things other than wheat. Therefore I am sure most farmers will agree that it would be advantageous to them if they did undertake a greater degree of diversification in their agricultural operations.

What is this government doing to further diversification and to help the farmer to diversify? Recently and over the years we in Saskatchewan have been clamouring for the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam. If this government really wants to see the farmers diversify their operations, if the government really thinks it is a desirable goal to be reached, I can think of nothing it could do that would assist that diversification in a very large sector of Saskatchewan than the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam, or giving assistance to the building of it.

We have the Minister of Agriculture again stating that the best he can do is to warn this government and the people of Saskatchewan that there is going to be a series of drought years. At the same time when there is something concrete this government could do, namely build the South Saskatchewan river dam that would irrigate a large area, nothing is done. In other words, apparently they would like to see the farmers suffer as they did back in the 1930's rather than assist them to combat those disastrous conditions. That is why we in this party have advocated a system of parity prices to enable the farmers to enter into a program of capital expenditure leading to diversification.

To diversify means that you must spend a great deal of money, not only in capital expansion but in costly operational changes. Therefore we are asking the government to implement a system of parity prices so that if diversification takes place necessitating a shift in the methods of farming, at least the cost of production will bear a fair relationship to the returns farmers get for the things they offer for sale, and in addition the farmer would be assured that his capital expenditure would not be in jeopardy. No other industry in this country would think of going into any kind of business unless it was assured that its capital investment was going to be protected.

Certainly we were all quite amazed at the submission of the Canadian Pacific Railway, this greatest of all advocates of free enterprise, which admitted publicly that there is no longer any place in our economy for risk. They said in effect that they honestly believed the taxpayers of Canada should underwrite the capital expenditure of that company. Not only should the people of this country guarantee the company a minimum return on their capital investment, but they also want the people of this country to guarantee a return of 4.71 per cent on their investment. Therefore we in the agricultural industry now feel more justified than ever in making the modest request that all we want is to be assured that we will get back only our costs of production.

May I say something about the argument put forward that the consumer would be victimized by a system of parity prices. Again I am going to quote Mr. Jack Wesson and other wheat pool officials, who told this country that if today the farmers of Canada gave their wheat to the millers of this country for nothing it would decrease the price of bread by only 3 cents a loaf. I do not think anybody can seriously contend that by giving the farmer a fair return on what he produces it would unduly victimize the consumer.

Possibly something should be said about the argument that high wages in industry is one of the reasons the farmers are being deprived of a fair standard of living. I am not going to stand here and say that labour is blameless. I will be one of the first to admit that possibly labour has rather limited objectives because of misunderstandings in many instances and in other instances because of circumstances. I think it is shameful, Mr. Speaker, that this government should use the misunderstandings that exist between labour and the farmer as a wedge to drive these two segments of our population farther and farther apart, when there is no foundation for those tactics.

I would like to place on record a few figures which I have in connection with labour's part in pushing up the prices of farm machinery. In 1946 the value of farm machinery produced in Canada was $65 million. In that same year labour received for the production of that machinery $25 million. I admit that in 1955, nine or ten years later, the labour bill had jumped to $50 million from $25 million, but in that same year the production which came off the end of the assembly lines, for which labour received $50 million, had jumped from $65 million to $171 million. In other words, in 1946 labour received 40 per cent of the value of the machinery produced, while in 1955 it only received 29.4 per cent.

Let me put it this way. In 1946 one worker in a given time produced one combine, but in 1955 the same labourer in the same period of time was able to produce one and a half combines. In really simple terms it means that for making one combine in 1946 he received $1,456, and in 1955 for making one and a half combines he only received $1,740, when in reality, equated against what he received in 1946, he should have received $2,176.

There is another aspect to this question which I should like to bring to the attention of the house. Just recently we were told that farm machinery had gone up in price because steel had gone up $5 a ton. I have made a few calculations as to how many tons of steel are in an ordinary combine. There are about three or three and a half tons of steel. You do not have to be much of a mathematician to multiply three by five; it comes to $15. When a farmer buys the machine after the increase of $5 a ton for steel he pays for it at a rate of increase of 7 per cent. If you calculate 7 per cent of $6,000, which is the price of the combine, it does not come to $15; it comes to $420. Let no one say that the wage earner is responsible for the distress in which we find the agricultural industry today.

Well, then, what is the trouble? Certainly it is not because we are not selling wheat, because over and over again in the last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce informed everybody in this country that we are selling more wheat than we have ever sold in recent years. Therefore the farmer cannot place the blame for his position on the fact that we are not selling grain. I will have to agree that we are selling more grain. As a matter of fact last year we sold 85 million bushels more wheat than we did in any of the last 35 years, with the exception of five years.

No; that is not the problem which is causing the farmer such distress. Then we must ask ourselves what is the problem. The problem seems to be this, that there is a wide disparity between the farmer's cost of production on the one hand and the price he receives for what he produces on the other. This is what is commonly known as the cost-price squeeze. There is no other answer.

I think I have pointed out, in quoting the story about the combine, one of the reasons for this cost-price squeeze. The latest statistics available show that the 25 companies on whom farmers depend for their production needs have had their profits increased in the last seven years by over 400 per cent. Profits go up and up and the farmer's income goes down and down. That is why we have asked for parity prices. I was rather amazed, as were also a great many people in my part of the country, to read the account of the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture just before Christmas at the Liberal convention in the city of Regina. He said at that convention, if you mean by parity a fair relationship between production costs and what you receive for the products you grow, then we already have it. He started in to compute his kind of parity on the basis of 65 per cent to 85 per cent.

I wonder what the Minister of Agriculture is trying to tell the farmers. Is he trying to tell them that they are not deserving of 100 per cent parity? He is in effect saying that they are second-class citizens; that they do not deserve anything better than 65 per cent of justice. I would not be very much surprised if before long we in Saskatchewan or in western Canada find ourselves walking into a restaurant and being told to go to the back, where we will find a sign "Authorized by the Minister of Agriculture" and stating "This room reserved for farmers, who are to receive just 65 per cent of what everybody else is served out in front." I expect that some day the minister will be advocating that they put a car on the back of the train with another sign saying "For farmers only; 65 per cent service."

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bryson: I should like to tell the hon. member who is interjecting that those are the kind of statements that prompted a great many people to walk out of the convention of the Liberal party in the city of Regina in absolute disgust at what the minister had told them.

I am glad there is one responsible member of the government who seems to take a different view of this question of agriculture. I hold in my hand a statement made by none other than the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. McCubbin), speaking to a farmers' union meeting in the province of Ontario last November 8. From the article it would appear that the farmers at that meeting had the parliamentary assistant on the griddle, because he admitted that while he had not voted for the parity price resolution presented in this house last year, if it ever was presented again he would vote for it. Then to make those farmers really feel good he volunteered the information that if anybody moved a motion to increase the premium on grade A hogs to $4 he would support that as well. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he should immediately replace the Minister of Agriculture by handing over that portfolio to the parliamentary assistant.

For a few moments I should like to direct the attention of this house to another conspiracy this government is carrying on against the western farmer. I refer of course to the increase in the interest rates that we find occurring all across the country. In the handling of grain and the marketing of grain the elevator companies are obliged to borrow tremendous sums of money. Now, because of the increase in interest rates, it is going to cost many more millions of dollars in handling charges than it did last year. Those handling charges are going to be paid by the wheat board and, in turn, they will be handed back to the farmer to pay; there is no one else to whom they can be passed.

I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, how the Minister of Finance can believe that raising the interest charges on money borrowed for the production of new wealth in this country necessarily lends itself to inflation. The other day the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Mang) was very anxious to inform this house about all the things the government had done for farmers, and he mentioned in particular the large amount of money the government had paid on behalf of the farmers by way of storage charges. But he did not tell this house that though they paid the farmers several million dollars in lieu of storage charges, they immediately increased interest rates and took most of the money away from them.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended to say something about box car allocation. because that issue has become so confused of late that no one really knows what is the situation, but I am going to leave that subject until another occasion. In conclusion I would just like to say this. It is going to take more than dry weather to solve the farmers' problems, and the quicker the government gets that kind of thinking out of its head the better. I implore this government to immediately accept its duties and responsibilities toward agriculture in this country, and I can give the assurance that if that is done it will have the wholehearted support of every farmer in Canada.

Mr. Harris: I think I understood the hon. member to say that having granted a subsidy —around $33 million, I believe it was—for the storage of grain at a certain time of the year the government "turned round and took it away". Would the hon. member please tell me in what manner we did that?

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Speaker, I was making reference to the raising of the interest rates.

Mr. Argue: It costs the wheat board more money to finance the crop.

Mr. Harris: What rates are raised to the western farmer?

Mr. Bryson: The interest rates are raised, which means that the grain handling companies in western Canada have to pay more in interest on the money they have to borrow to handle and market farmers' grain.

Mr. Argue: And the farmer gets less per bushel for his wheat.

Mr. Harris: When was that raise effective?

Mr. Argue: During this crop season.

Mr. Knowles: You are doing it all the time.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, the town of Westville, in Pictou county, Nova Scotia, was incorporated in 1894. It has a population of 4,300 as shown in the last census. Since its founding by miners of Scottish and Irish descent who were the forefathers of its present people the town was built and developed, and is solely dependent on the operation of its mines to maintain and stabilize its economy.

The miners of Westville have long been noted for many sterling qualities, the main one being that throughout the years Westville mines have consistently operated without strikes or tie-ups. The highest production was maintained consistent with operating conditions, and labour relations between management and the men was always of the highest order. These desirable features do not just happen, and the very valid reason for them is the stability of the men, the thriftiness of their families, pride in the ownership of their own homes and active participation in church and community life in general, all of which qualities have been handed down to them from past generations. It is a known fact that the percentage of miners who own their homes in the town of Westville exceeds 80 per cent, which is probably double or more than that of any other mining town in eastern Canada.

Today, with the mines closed except for minor operations of removing pillars from existing slopes, these people who saved their money and built their own homes, primarily without government assistance of any kind, now find their town bankrupt because they have no work and they are unable to pay their taxes. They are faced with the closing of their schools, which will result in uneducated children, the deterioration of their water, impaired sanitary facilities and other services, and the loss of their homes and churches.

The town of Westville has underneath its limits a proven quantity of at least eight million tons of the best coal in Pictou county, if not in the province of Nova Scotia. Unfortunately, to mine this deposit economically requires an estimated expenditure of approximately $2,500,000. If such an expenditure were made, not only would a highly mechanized and modern mine be available if required for a national emergency, but also the Canadian citizens of Westville could look forward to the future feeling secure that they could maintain their homes and town.

In view of world conditions today it is felt that development of this mine is necessary to help guarantee the full use of our production facilities should a major war break out. This in itself would warrant government action now. In addition, it is a known fact that two other Pictou county mines, now active in a small way, will be depleted and closed within the next three years. A new mine development would absorb these men when their present jobs are closed out.

It is presently contemplated to double the size of the existing power plant at Trenton and, in fact, materials have been ordered for this purpose. When this installation is completed its daily coal requirements will exceed the entire output of the only remaining mine in the county which can carry on operations for an indefinite period. This alone would warrant a new development now to ensure our other plants of continued operations.

On behalf of the people of Westville I urge the government of Nova Scotia to assist in the opening of a new mine in that town. I feel that the government of Canada should be prepared to assist, too, if so requested by the operating company and the government of Nova Scotia. Money made available for this purpose would not be a gift or donation; it would be a sound investment in the good people of Westville for the benefit of all Canada.

Furthermore, my request is substantiated by the Gordon commission report, which states that only modern mechanized mines can hope to remain in operation, and that government assistance to maritime industry is most essential. In view of these facts, and the bankrupt position of the town of Westville today, I urge that immediate action be taken to assure these people that their present position is of a temporary nature, and that the governments of Nova Scotia and of Canada are prepared to lend temporary aid as I have just suggested.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne is the product of a lazy, complacent, smug government. The speech from the throne is the product of a man convinced of the effectiveness of the Uncle Louis legend, so convinced that the old black magic spell can be weaved over the electors again in June of 1957 that he can treat the house and the people of the country with contempt. Not a single major problem has been offensively attacked in the speech from the throne. It is quite apparent, Mr. Speaker, that it is the intention of the government, if at all possible, to ensure that this is the quietest session on record, so that when they dip into their magic bag and bring forth the biggest election bribe in history there will be nothing to detract from the screaming headlines from coast to coast.

What are the problems that face us today? What are the problems they ignore in the hope that they will not have to answer? First, at home a large group comprising our elder citizens, the veterans and the blind, all dependent upon fixed incomes, are facing an ever-increasing cost of living. Second, the municipalities are placed in a taxation straitjacket and find themselves squeezed between the demands for services of an ever-increasing population and an airtight tax formula devised by the government in order to ensure centralization of power here in Ottawa. Third, there is the tremendous threat from without to be faced by a Canadian government tied to the apron strings of a floundering giant in Washington.

What does the government offer in the speech from the throne? To the old age pensioners, to the veterans, to the blind, they offer arts and culture. To the municipalities they offer a few measly dollars in the form of taxation on government buildings across the country. To the cause of world peace they offer a phony kind of conviction of the need to maintain the basic unity of the commonwealth, and their sympathy for the poor Hungarians.

Are these the answers of a government seized with the vision of the next 25 years set out for us in the Gordon report? I am afraid not, Mr. Speaker; and I am sure the people of Canada will give the answer to the ignoring of these salient facts of life during this year. Here was a golden opportunity to take care of great and growing needs without sacrificing a campaign against inflation.

Everyone knows that the $40 a month paid to an old age pensioner has a purchasing power of about $25 today. These people are in real need. Here is an opportunity to put the plan on a sound actuarial basis. Up to the moment we have taken increasing amounts from the general fund in addition to the percentage levy against personal income and corporation income. Here is a chance to fix an amount which will finally take care of this plan for the future, a chance to fix a percentage without taking any greater amount from the individual taxpayer's pocket.

Yet to date the government has failed to recognize the dire need of these people. If there is a real and inherent desire to help old age pensioners, the veterans and the blind, surely without waiting for this grand health plan about which we have been hearing since 1919, I believe, the government could institute at this time without financial assistance from the provinces a plan which would ensure that adequate medical and hospital care was available to those in receipt of old age, veterans and blind pensions. This would be a step which would prove sincerity on the part of the government with respect to its desire to implement protection for all.

The veterans have submitted a brief to the government which indicates that since 1925 the ratio of payment of pensions in disability cases as compared with wages has fallen behind at least 25 per cent. Surely this is also an indication of need. Their request for an increase of one-third would only place these people in the same position they were at the time they were granted the privileges they now have. Perhaps I should not have used the word "privileges"; perhaps I should have said the rights for which they so gallantly fought.

Then we come to the problem of the municipalities. Perhaps I might refer to page 6394 of Hansard of July 24, 1956, where I quoted from a brief prepared by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities covering the period 1930 to 1951 which, at pages 31 and 32, has this to say:

> Between 1939 and 1951, federal government revenues per capita rose from $45.33 to $270.68. In the same interval, provincial government revenues per capita in Canada rose from $21.10 to $65.68, while municipal government revenues rose by a lesser amount from $28.07 to $45.49.

During the period from 1939 to 1951 the federal government has been able to increase its take on a per capita basis nine times, while the municipalities have only been able to increase their take by 50 per cent. The brief went on to say:

> Municipal governments, relying upon less flexible revenue sources than the federal and provincial governments, have become increasingly dependent on grants and subsidies of other governments; otherwise they will be unable to finance the local services and responsibilities traditionally falling within their jurisdiction.

There seems to be a complete lack of understanding by the government of the problems facing the municipalities. There is a great deal of publicity about the wonderful job the government has been doing in bringing people to Canada, but there has been a complete failure to realize that for each person arriving here government on the lower level must immediately provide all the services and facilities required for streets, water, sewers and education. Yet the revenue agency which dips its hand in the pocket of the newcomer when he receives his first pay cheque is the federal treasury.

I would remind hon. members opposite that Mr. Frost of Ontario has pointed out very strongly that the revenue sources of this government could not exist without millions and millions of dollars being spent in development costs within his province. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in this case as well if it is intended to indicate sincerity in connection with this problem, there are avenues of approach still open for this government.

We hear a great deal about education. When we talk about it we are told that we must be careful about what we say because of course that is a provincial matter, and that if we are going to deal with it we must set up some type of council in order to namby-pamby over the matter or we must see that the money is placed in trust somewhere where it will be available at a proper time for some provincial authority to take. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that if that is not bribery of the electors of a province, I have never seen it. But if there is true sincerity about the question of education, there is really no great problem, Mr. Speaker.

If this government is prepared to sit around the table with the provincial authorities and see that the tax base is adjusted so that additional amounts will be placed in the hands of provincial governments, then I say we can trust Mr. Frost to see that the schools of Ontario get the money. If they would like to add a little percentage abatement to their income tax plan for the province of Quebec, I am quite sure Mr. Duplessis will see that the schools get the money. This is again an indication that here is a government that must extract every last bit of favourable publicity out of every dollar, regardless of the consequence.

I might say that there must be other ways in which to assist the municipalities and still ensure that problems of provincial and federal jurisdiction are recognized. The problem they face is a demand for ever higher interest rates on their debentures in order to build facilities that are required for this increasing population. Yet I heard what was said by the Minister of Finance the other day. He answered a question by saying this: If the proposition is important enough I expect they will agree to pay the additional amount and get the money, but if they decide that it is not important enough I guess they will postpone it. Mr. Speaker, how do you postpone the building of necessary educational facilities? How do you postpone the necessary services that are required for houses from coast to coast for the hundreds of thousands of people who are coming to this country? What a facetious answer for the minister to give.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if this government really wanted to do something it could do so. Maybe the Minister of Public Works might have some ideas to suggest. He is increasing the interest rate on C.M.H.C. loans and he thinks there is going to be a great deal more money available to get that nice little increase. We have seen the Minister of Finance by remote control affect interest rates from one end of the country to the other. I am wondering if those two ministers could not get together and suggest to the financial institutions—just suggest, you know; it has been an effective method so far—that perhaps they might balance their portfolios; that if they are going to get X dollars out of our guaranteed C.M.H.C. funds they might be obliged to advance X dollars at 4 per cent or 4½ per cent on the debentures backed by the people who constitute the backbone of the country and the municipalities.

It might only be a suggestion, but suggestions apparently have been taken in the past and they have worked out not too badly. It could work out just in the way the municipalities are trying to solve their own problems. When it comes time to build a new subdivision of homes they have had to say to the developers: We want the homes, but if you want the permits to build the homes you will be obliged to bring us X number of dollars of industrial building to our community. I think there are other methods this government could use if they really had the sincere purpose of solving this problem.

I wonder what we are going to do about the threat from without. I wonder what we are going to do about re-establishing—I think that was the word used—the commonwealth and all it has meant to this country. I am reminded that the Prime Minister went to a prime ministers' conference last year. When he was questioned in the house about what he thought about commonwealth prime ministers' conferences, as reported at page 7325 of Hansard of August 9, 1956, he said this:

> I have never felt that time was wasted. While there are no specific agreements reached I have always felt that the time was well spent and did serve to keep us as close as possible together.

I wonder how successful he feels he has been now that we have had the episode at Suez, Mr. Speaker. I wonder how well he understood the problems that were being created at the very time he was taking part in the conference. We have had here, Mr. Speaker, indications that the Secretary of State for External Affairs feels that his country has a great role to play in re-establishing this connection. But the other day when I asked the Prime Minister in the house whether he might consider taking the initiative in having a conference convened he said this:

> No, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister does not feel that this country should take the initiative to try to determine what should be the policy of the United Kingdom government.

That quotation is to be found at page 323 of Hansard. We are not asking that the Prime Minister take over the policy of the United Kingdom government. I am going to use again the term I used previously. If there is sincerity in this government, if there is a true desire to re-establish this relationship, then it is about time this country took the initiative. If we have grown up—and for the last 20 years we have been told that the whole evolution of commonwealth relations as far as we are concerned has been part of our growing up—it is time we called a conference. It is time we held one down in Quebec city. It is time we gave some indication that we are prepared to play a leading role in maintaining what was the greatest agency for the promotion of peace in the world.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we over here still believe in it, notwithstanding anything that has taken place in the last few months. I believe the vast majority of the people who support the party to your right, Mr. Speaker, believe in it too. I can only ask them, does their government believe in it, and has it practised it for the last 20 years?

No, Mr. Speaker; this speech from the throne has come in like the lamb and I am sure the whole plan is that the government, after the budget presentation, will go out like the lion. However, I believe we should give them fair warning that the people of this country have been bribed once too often before election day. This year there will be no effective overtime appeal; it will take more than that.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): May I join with other hon. members, Mr. Speaker, in congratulating the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The way in which these two gentlemen acquitted themselves has brought credit not only to them and to this house but also to the constituencies which they represent.

I am very well acquainted with the mover, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, whose constituency is adjacent to that of mine and with whom I share the same office in this House of Commons. The other day someone said that he is one of the hardest working members in this house, and I wish to assure you that this is correct. I wish also to give him credit for having made an attempt to speak in the French language. It is difficult for some members from the west, who may not have the same opportunity as eastern members to learn the two languages, but we do hope that all the members of the house will endeavour to master French since it is one of the official languages. If we cannot do that we can hope that at least our children, who will one day represent Canada, will be able to do so.

I should like also to congratulate the new leader of the Progressive Conservative party. The responsibility which faces him is great. He has the responsibility not only of being the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition and criticizing the government, but also of offering alternatives. At the same time he is expected to revitalize his party. Although I am a Liberal, I wish him well in his task of building up the Conservative party in Canada, because I am one of those who believe in the two party system if democracy is to work.

With reference to these splinter groups, at least you can say that the C.C.F. party is socialist, has a certain program and endeavours to follow it. However, since the Winnipeg convention, at which time they chucked out the Regina manifesto, I do not know whether they are any longer necessary in Canada, because I feel they are getting closer to the Liberals. In any event, one thing you can say about the socialists is that they have a certain definite platform and they endeavour to follow it.

When it comes to the other splinter group, the Social Crediters, it is a different matter. They will do anything; they will twist and turn; they will rock and roll; they will offer $25; they will endeavour to muzzle the press if they can, and whenever it suits their convenience, to put something across. As I say, I do sincerely believe, and I am sure a lot of other members who belong to the same political party I do believe, that the best way in which democracy can work in Canada is through the two party system. It is for that reason I do, in all sincerity, wish the new leader of the Conservative party every success—not too much success—in building up a strong Conservative party in this country.

During the course of this debate there have been a considerable number of references to the desire for an increase in social security payments. Reference was made to the desirability of increasing old age pensions as well as pensions for the blind. I think we should recognize this because it is quite clear that the buying power of these payments, especially with reference to old age pensions, has decreased very considerably in recent years. An increased pension to our old-timers contributes to the support and self respect of these pioneers and at the same time gives relief to the younger Canadians who have elderly dependents. I realize we are being confronted with huge expenditures, especially in the field of national defence. We all realize that social security without national security would be meaningless, especially where freedom was affected, but I do hope the government will be able to see its way clear to granting some increase, especially for the blind and for our older citizens.

Now I should like to draw to the attention of this house, Mr. Speaker, what I consider to be an injustice to the province of Alberta from which I come. I am, of course, referring to freight rates. I have spoken about this matter before, I am doing so now, and I shall continue to do so as long as I am a member representing the people of Alberta. I feel that Alberta is being discriminated against by the railway companies. We in Alberta do appreciate, and I appreciate, the fact that the geography of our country is such that it raises difficult problems with regard to rail transportation. Some of these problems are difficult to overcome, and it is not easy to eliminate the discrimination. However, I believe that with regard to freight rates, Alberta is a clear example of injustice.

Hon. members will recall that in 1951 a royal commission, after having studied the problem for some two years and after receiving a great deal of evidence with regard to the problems of transportation, issued a voluminous report. I believe it contains some 200,000 words. Certain recommendations were made. One of the main purposes in setting up this commission to study the problem of rail transportation was to endeavour to equalize freight rates across Canada. As I say there are problems, and will forever be problems, in such a vast country as ours, especially at this time when our population is relatively small. The commission endeavoured, however, to listen very carefully to the representations made on behalf of Saskatchewan and Alberta in particular. I think the house will appreciate the fact that because Alberta and Saskatchewan are so far removed from the markets, and we have not a self-sustaining population, if agriculture is to survive it is necessary that the cost of production be kept as low as possible.

One very important complaint that has been raised time and time again over the years by the province of Alberta in particular has been the cost of moving many classes of goods that are shipped from the east to our province. It costs less to transport goods from Toronto to Vancouver than it does to transport them from Toronto to Edmonton, though there are an additional 600 miles of very difficult terrain that the railways have to go over.

The reason the railways gave the special concessions or low rates was ostensibly to meet water transportation competition. However, the Turgeon royal commission, after having heard representations made by Alberta in this regard, recommended that parliament amend the Railway Act to provide that when the railways inaugurated low rates from eastern Canada to the west coast and from the west coast to eastern Canada to compete with water transportation, then the rates at intermediary points should not exceed the rate to the coast by more than one-third. In other words it was known as the one and one-third rule. It was felt that the one and one-third rule recommended by the Turgeon royal commission on transportation brought real relief from what we in Alberta felt was a long-suffered discrimination against our manufacturing and processing industries, as well as our distributors and consumers as a whole.

Although the finding of the Turgeon royal commission, that is the one and one-third rule, was incorporated into statute by this parliament, the railways were determined to prevent its operation, with the result that this rule was destined to be shortlived. There appears to be a conflict between the Railway Act containing the one and one-third provisions and the Transport Act, under which the rate-making system of agreed charges was established in 1938.

The railways took advantage of the situation and the practice of making competitive rates on transcontinental traffic, for example between Montreal and Vancouver, was abandoned in favour of the agreed charges, and once again Alberta and western Saskatchewan were restored to the long and short haul discrimination against which these areas fought for many years. In fact a new royal commission was set up known as the royal commission on agreed charges. The finding of this commission was to refuse to recommend the enactment of legislation which would make agreed charges subject to the one and one-third rule, and that of course is the situation today.

Let me bring out, Mr. Speaker, by quoting certain figures just to what extent we in Alberta are being discriminated against with regard to freight rates. If you were to take commodities such as plate or sheet steel and ship them to Vancouver from Hamilton the cost per hundredweight, provided you shipped 100,000 pounds, would be $1.10. The cost of the shipment from Hamilton to Calgary would be $2.46 per hundredweight, or more than twice as much. In other words it would be cheaper in this case to haul the plate or sheet from Hamilton to Vancouver and from Vancouver back to Calgary than to ship it direct from Hamilton to Calgary.

Let me give you another example of canned goods from southern Ontario. The cost per hundredweight to Vancouver is $1.80. The cost to Calgary is $2.30. The cost of shipping anti-freeze from Montreal to Vancouver is $2; the cost of shipping it from Montreal to Calgary is $2.70. The cost of shipping wire rope from Toronto or Montreal to Vancouver is $1.30 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping it from Toronto or Montreal to Calgary is $2.80, or more than twice as much. Do not forget that there are 600 miles between Calgary and Vancouver. The cost of shipping paints from Toronto or Montreal to Vancouver is $2.25. The cost of shipping them to Calgary from those points is $3.35.

Take margarine. The cost of shipping margarine from Toronto to Vancouver is $2.85 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping it from Toronto to Calgary is $3.77 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping cheese from southern Ontario to Vancouver is $2.90 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping it to Calgary is $3.50 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping corn oil and syrup from Port Credit to Vancouver is $1.90 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping it to Calgary is $3.56 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping steel piles from Sault Ste. Marie to Vancouver is $1.25 per hundredweight. The cost of shipping it to Calgary is $2.51 per hundredweight, more than double.

Will you call it six o'clock now, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock I was endeavouring to point out to the house the great difference in freight rates from Quebec and Ontario to Vancouver as compared with the rates to Calgary and Edmonton. In many cases the freight rate on certain commodities is more than double between Edmonton or Calgary and Montreal as compared with the Montreal-Vancouver rate. We do not begrudge this advantage being given to Vancouver, but it is quite clear that agreed charges, to which I have made reference, are simply a new type of discrimination by the railway companies, especially against Alberta and western Canada. This affects the movement of materials, goods and manufactures, and it certainly has hampered the development of industry in that area and its competition with eastern Canada, more especially any effort it might make to obtain access to the large British Columbia market.

The fact is that these rates have tended to discourage a number of firms opening up new plants in that part of the west. As an example I can cite the case of a certain company in Vancouver manufacturing steel drums and tanks for the Alberta oil industry. This company bought a plant site in Edmonton on the strength of the reduction in the cost of steel plate brought about by the application of the one and one-third rule to which I made reference. However, the application of the agreed charge method of rate-making caused this project to be abandoned.

There has been a recent increase in freight rates, but this increase does not affect the agreed charges though it does affect Alberta and western Saskatchewan. Those parts of the country will have to bear the brunt of the new hoist in freight rates. As one observer has pointed out, agreed charges discriminate by wiping out competition, yet they were introduced to meet competition. It is felt that agreed charges should depend on actual and not potential competition. I submit that the cost of railway transportation should be such as to enable all parts of Canada to develop industrially. At the present time Alberta is being penalized, especially as far as the establishment of secondary industries is concerned.

The house will probably remember that the Turgeon commission made a recommendation, which was implemented by statute, that the railways be granted $7 million to reduce the cost of the long haul by way of the great lakes. This bridge subsidy now appears to be merely a lump payment to the railroads and has no effect upon Alberta and Saskatchewan. People will point to the Crowsnest pass rates and argue that those were to benefit the Alberta farmers. The Crowsnest pass rates are not affected by freight rate increases, but the whole purpose of those rates was to hold down the cost of transportation in order to help Canadian wheat compete in world markets. Those rates benefit the whole Canadian economy by their effect on the balance of trade, not just the grain farmer in western Canada.

Having said that in connection with freight rates and what I consider to be an injustice to the province of Alberta, I should like now to deal with another matter. There exists in Canada today certain abusive practices which I feel should be looked into, and I refer to the sending of parcels of food and clothing to people behind the iron curtain in the U.S.S.R. Hon. members will realize that after the second world war many people from behind the iron curtain entered Canada as political refugees, leaving behind them mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters or close friends. They were happy to come to this land of freedom and opportunity, and realizing the condition and plight of their relatives and friends behind the iron curtain in the U.S.S.R. they were anxious to give them some assistance by way of food and clothing.

During the last number of months certain so-called legal agencies have been established across Canada with the primary purpose of sending such parcels of food and clothing from Canada to the U.S.S.R. What I want to do is point out just what it costs to send these parcels to the Soviet union through these so-called legal agencies. I have information that if merchandise to the value of $12 is sent from Canada the following costs are incurred:

Merchandise cost	$12.00
U.S.S.R. fee, 10 per cent	1.20
U.S.S.R. customs duty	7.40
U.S.S.R. inspection fee	1.51
U.S.S.R. invoice fee	.66
	$22.77
Fee 1 per cent	.23
Service charge	7.50
Fumigation	1.00
Parcel post	5.00
	$36.50
Guarantee fee	1.79
Notification fee	.18
Total	$38.47

The practice is to deduct the cost of the parcel in order to show that it is a gift of these agencies. On examining these figures we find that from this parcel the needy person will receive goods to the value of $12, the U.S.S.R. will receive $10.77, the agency in Canada will receive $12.70 and the post office will get $3, not $5 as charged.

I am one who takes exception to this type of benevolence. I am not opposed to the sending of these gifts to needy people behind the iron curtain, but I feel that in the first instance the U.S.S.R. should not charge the customs duties and other charges which they impose. If they do, why should these charges and duties be collected on Canadian soil? It is clear from the figures I have just quoted that the misery of the people in the Soviet union, brought about by communist policies, is being exploited by these so-called agencies in Canada, not only to fatten themselves but at the same time to finance the resources of the U.S.S.R.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter the government should look into. As I pointed out, I am not opposed to the sending of these parcels to these unfortunate people in the U.S.S.R., but I am opposed to the Canadian people being exploited and, at the same time, directly assisting the government of the Soviet union.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I feel very honoured to once again take the opportunity of speaking in this house on behalf of the people whom I represent. I like to feel, sir, that I speak for the common people who cannot be here to speak for themselves. Sir, whether I am correct or not I feel that this chamber has been shrouded by a cloud ever since last year, when the pipe-line debate was in progress. I feel that something has been done to democracy which it is going to take a lifetime to correct. I feel that this all-powerful party across the way has, in one fell swoop, done to democracy what the communists could never do to a free parliament; I think that is the sort of atmosphere which prevails is this house.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I can only come to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party tried to do what Macbeth suggested when, according to Shakespeare, he said: "If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly." I feel that this Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, has caused an injury to parliament which it will take a lifetime to heal. I speak for myself, and I can only say this; that in parliament I have great respect for the rules and also for the privileges affecting hon. members of this house. I can only say, sir, that I want each and every privilege afforded me according to the rights and customary procedures of parliament. I want that, and nothing less.

Having said that I would like to turn to the remarks made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) before the dinner hour. He was commenting on our declaration of principle as a C.C.F. party at the national C.C.F. convention in Winnipeg, and I need only say this. Neither he nor anyone else need worry about the C.C.F. party changing its policies in order to bring justice and equality into the political and economic life of the people of this country. We have not deviated from our first program early in the thirties. In this country we have a political democracy, but it was suspended in the pipe-line debate—

An hon. Member: By your party.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —but not an economic democracy which is the right of free people. Whether or not it is going to be the privilege of the C.C.F. party to bring to the Canadian people an economic system under which they will share equally and fairly in the progress made in this country, I can assure the hon. member for Vegreville that rather than the Liberal party filling the need in Canada to give these things to the Canadian people, we have had a growing gap between the rich and the strong and the weak and the underprivileged in this country. The monopolists in this country today have taken away any kind of competition in sales and prices to the consumer.

Equally the little people, the farmers, white-collar workers and people in the street, the common people, are finding it more difficult to share in the prosperity of this country. The prosperity which has been talked about is going to swell the profits of the big corporations. I say to the hon. member for Vegreville and to those in the Liberal party who think the C.C.F. has deviated from its program, that there will be in the membership of this party many dedicated men and women who will come to parliament in order to secure for the people of Canada what is their just due in this rich and prosperous country of ours.

I followed closely what the hon. member for Vegreville said in respect of freight rates, and he used very excellent arguments in respect of the load with which western residents, and farmers in particular, will be saddled by reason of the new rates allowed by the transport board. I wish to point out that this is another case of the cost of living rising higher and higher. Of course the common people, the wage earners and the farmers, do not share in the prosperity afforded to the big corporations of this country.

The Canadian consumer debt is increasing at an alarming rate. I have here a clipping from a recent newspaper headed "Consumer Debt in Canada Hits New Peak Level". The quotation reads:

> The amount of money owing by Canadian consumers for the things they bought on time rose to a record $2,395,000,000.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it can make nobody in this country happy to learn that the common people have increasingly to go out and buy on credit in order to have a decent standard of living. It must be a heyday in these prosperous times—so-called by the Liberal party—for those people who charge enormous rates of interest in respect of goods bought by consumers on time.

Dr. Mutchmor, writing in an article I read the other day, said that it is a continual rat race by the common people of this country to keep pace with the increase in the cost of living. Yet at the same time many of the prices paid to the farmers and those who produce foodstuffs for our consumption bear no relation at all to what the consumer has to pay. I quote from the issue of the Toronto Star of January 7: "Farm Product Index Declines by 2·1 Per Cent". On the other hand net corporation profits—I do not want to list them; they can be found anywhere in the financial reports of these companies—have continued to increase. The Gazette of September 3, 1956, had this to say:

> Net earnings of Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited, after taxes, for the first half of this year showed an increase to 62 per cent over the comparable 1955 figure at an estimated $12,030,686, the company reveals in an interim report.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, there is in this country need for a political party such as the C.C.F. I do not think you can play on both sides of the game; either you fight for the common people in order that they may share in the country's prosperity by way of improved wages and better farm returns, or you give your support to these profiteering companies as the Liberal party has seen fit to do.

I want to point out that it is rumoured in the corridors of this chamber that the Liberals, generally speaking, want an early election. They feel this all-powerful government has the next election in the bag, and that may well be. Then we have the fact that the pockets of the government are filled with about half a billion dollars with which they can play Santa Claus to the people of the country. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, it only means that the government has seen fit to overtax many people and, furthermore, that little has been done to help the people who need help. I do not forget and I do not think the people of Canada forget that this government is largely responsible for the increased cost of living, and they have been aided and abetted by other parties in this house. They took off price controls early in the post-war years. Since that time we have seen the cost of living go up and up.

Nothing has been done to help our old age pensioners during this period of inflation. So today I say I will join with others in the house if the government see fit to increase old age pensions so these older people can live in decency and security. I believe the old age pension should be increased to $65 and be payable at the age of 65, so these people may live in some kind of decency in the face of the present cost of living.

I hope, too, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal government, even if it is a deathbed repentance before the next general election, will see fit to increase blind pensions. There came to my desk today a brief from the blind pensioners' association asking that something be done for them, and I feel the government should do something in that regard.

I also want to say something with respect to the veterans of the first and second great wars. As I understand it, under section 227 of the Pension Act regulations there is provision that the pension commission should rule in favour of the veteran, and that the onus should not be on him to prove his disability in order to get a pension. Therefore I hope the government, now that it has all this money available, will see to it that the veterans of our first and second great wars are given the pensions that are their just due. In this respect it seems to me that the government has been pretty niggardly in not giving such pensions when there is real justification for them. In my opinion the fact that veterans have gone into the services, have been examined by five or six medical specialists and classed as A-1, have then come out of the services with a P-5 category and have had no entitlement to pension is a disgrace to this country. Many of these veterans can do nothing else than look up their case histories. Therefore I hope the government will give due consideration to my words in this regard.

I want to turn now to agriculture, the segment of our economy with which I am most familiar and which, of course, is predominant in my constituency. The farmers of western Canada and, indeed, throughout Canada are in a cost-price squeeze today. The freight rates mentioned by the hon. member for Vegreville apply to the farmers in my constituency, and indeed to all western people. The farmers have to pay for machinery manufactured in eastern Canada and then shipped to the western provinces. They have to pay for everything they need to produce what they sell, and they are caught both ways.

When the board of transport commissioners allowed the first interim increase in freight rates it was to me a blow to western agriculture. They then allowed on top of that a subsequent 4 per cent increase, and I understand that the total increase of 15 per cent requested is probably going to be granted. But when one looks at the record of the Canadian Pacific Railway I cannot see how the government can justify the pyramiding of freight rates, particularly when the load is mainly on western Canada.

I have here Canadian Pacific Railway figures taken from their annual report. They show that in the year 1939 the railway had a debt of $228 million and a reserve of $39 million. In 1950 it had a debt of $86 million and a reserve of $525 million, in 1953 a debt of $75 million and a reserve of $576,657,000, in 1954 a debt of $72 million and a reserve of $608,789,000. By 1955 it had reduced its debt from a high of $228 million in 1939 to $89,795,283, and had a reserve of $640,061,081. On the basis of these figures I cannot see how the board of transport commissioners was justified in placing additional freight costs on the western farmer when he is already overburdened with such costs.

I notice that some of the cabinet ministers have expressed different viewpoints with respect to agriculture. Those of us in the house who try to fight for a fair deal for agriculture through the establishment of parity prices for the main farm commodities cannot understand why there should be such a diversity of opinion on the part of government officials. However, I am led to believe that there is perhaps a reason for this situation. It may well be that members of the government are trying to confuse the minds of the farmers with respect to the fight for parity. I have here a report that appeared in the Leader-Post of November 5, 1956. It is headed, "Gardiner Says Parity Received", and it quotes him as saying:

> We ought to have parity, you say. If you mean by that costs of production in relation to returns, we have it now.

That was on November 5, 1956. On December 4, 1956, an article appeared in the Globe and Mail headed, "Canada Shuns Farm Price Parity, Gardiner Reveals to Conference." Then I have a report that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 7, 1956, headed, "Harris Opposed to Permanent Price Supports." I have another that appeared in the Producer of November 8, 1956, headed, "McCubbin Promises Support Parity Prices Motion if Presented Again."

Here we have the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture all taking different viewpoints on parity prices. At one time the Minister of Agriculture says we have it, and at another time he says the government shuns it. The truth is that we have never had parity prices for agriculture in Canada, and I have never seen such a conglomeration of misrepresentation and confusion. I can only say it is the worst witches' brew I have ever seen.

I do not believe the government has any intention of implementing parity prices for agriculture. The situation is serious because of the cost-price squeeze facing western agriculture. From figures taken from the bureau of statistics Canadian statistical review of the past year we find that in the year 1955 the net income of farmers from farm operations was $1,454 million. It dropped to that figure from a high in 1951 of $2,155 million. The portion of the national income which the farmers received in 1951 was 12.6 per cent, and it had dropped to a low of 7.1 per cent in 1955. Equally, net income in terms of 1946 constant dollars dropped from $2,306 real income in 1951 to $1,674 in 1955.

This may not mean too much to some members of the house, but it means that western farmers are in such a cost-price squeeze today that hundreds of them are leaving their farms. They cannot see any way out, because unless this government is prepared to institute some type of parity prices for agriculture, they cannot meet the cost-price squeeze that is facing them.

I should like now, Mr. Speaker, to turn to the Gordon commission and its report, and say something with respect to its suggestions with regard to agriculture. I can only believe that the report of the Gordon commission in respect of some aspects of the future for agriculture in Canada and its recommendations were made only after the most cursory of investigations into the problems of agriculture and its future. To me some of them are silly, undesirable and completely unworkable.

I refer now to the recommendations the commission made with respect to the handling of wheat. The commission apparently recommends that the Canadian wheat board should set quotas on individual farm production in western Canada. I heartily disagree with this recommendation, for these reasons. First, it would be quite impractical, if not completely impossible, to make any reliable estimates of what the farmers are going to grow. The vagaries of the weather have such an effect on production of the western wheat crop that I do not think it would be possible for the Canadian wheat board to make any reliable estimate of what would be produced. In the second place—and I believe this is much more important—by setting the quotas for western wheat production it would give to our competitors abroad and to possible purchasers abroad of Canadian wheat some idea as to whether or not Canada was under pressure in having to sell her wheat crop.

I believe the policy I have advocated since 1945 would be a more realistic policy for this government to follow. It seems to me there are too many inconsistencies in what has been proposed by the Gordon commission. I believe the government should undertake, as I have advocated since 1945, to set up in Canada the principle of the ever-normal granary. By that I mean this government would see to it that there possibly be stored in this country, under proper long-term storage, a billion bushels of wheat for any emergency that might arise.

If that kind of program were followed I believe we then could have, under Canadian wheat board marketing policy which we have today, real and genuine orderly marketing of the western wheat crop. I believe it would encourage long-term trading agreements with potential purchasers of Canadian wheat. It would add stability to the western wheat agriculture economy. Hence I most sincerely recommend that suggestion to the government. As I understand it now, we have about half a billion bushels or a little better of storage capacity today.

I would therefore make three definite recommendations to the government in respect of agriculture. First, I recommend the establishment of guaranteed parity prices to producers for the main farm commodities. My second recommendation is that they set up a dominion-provincial drainage and conservation authority in order to undertake far-reaching drainage and land utilization schemes, such schemes to have adequate federal financial participation. My third recommendation is storage payments on government-approved farm-stored grain, such a plan to be co-ordinated with an ever-normal granary plan to provide for total storage of one billion bushels of grain if necessary. I believe the implementation of these recommendations I have made is necessary if we are to protect the family farm in western Canada.

I should now like to turn for a moment or two to my own constituency of Moose Mountain. I have never before in this house availed myself of the opportunity to speak in particular about my constituency, which I am extremely proud to represent. I believe it is one of the finest constituencies in Canada, if not the finest. I understand that the largest centre, the former town of Estevan, is just now being incorporated into a city. We have there, of course, the tremendous oil growth and the population growth of that city. I want to give thanks to the former postmaster general for the fact that the federal government is building a post office in Estevan. When the former postmaster general, Mr. Cote, was minister, I had occasion to rise in the house and make the recommendation that a new federal building be constructed in the city of Estevan. After the minister had recovered and was convalescing he was kind enough to write to me and say that he would take my representations into consideration. I am happy to say that the government have seen fit to build that post office, and I wish to thank them for doing so.

Located in the centre of my constituency we have the beautiful Moose Mountain provincial park, abounding in game and wildlife of all kinds. In the lakes there is extremely attractive fishing. It is the delight of sportsmen from all over the world, and many American people come up there to enjoy a holiday.

We have also the Bienfait coal mines. About one-fifth of all the coal mined in Canada comes from that area. We also have a brick plant, which is a crown corporation, producing beautiful brick for all that area. As a matter of fact they are shipping to all points in Canada. There is also being built a large electric power generating plant. Already it is the site of a large generating plant to serve the southern part of the province, but a new one is being built at Souris river which will cost in the neighbourhood of $40 million.

I am equally proud to say that my constituency is the centre of perhaps one of the largest purebred beef cattle sections of Canada. In that area some of the finest cattle in the world are bred. Last, but not least, it is the centre of the tremendous oil boom in that province. Almost from one end of my constituency to the other an oil play is taking place. Many press reports have described this oil play as fabulous and incredible, comparing it with what took place in Texas some years ago. This has meant that we have many new people who are welcome in my constituency. It has also meant new industries for my constituency. But equally, it has brought new problems and it has intensified some of the old ones. I refer particularly to the urban and municipal financing of services.

In the villages of Bienfait and Oxbow, in the city of Estevan and in many other villages and towns in my constituency we have found that with the influx of increased population and with the very narrow base of taxation which these urban and municipal governments have, it is increasingly difficult for these municipalities to give services to the new population or to the people that were there before. I would therefore suggest to the government that they undertake to set up some form of fund by means of which these municipalities can get loans at 2 per cent or 2½ per cent interest on long-term amortization plans. I think this is one of the crucial problems facing all small governments throughout the country. I therefore make that suggestion to the government.

As I say, the other main problem facing my constituency is the cost-price squeeze facing my farmers. I hope the government will not turn a deaf ear to some of the representations I have made. I hope they will take into consideration the program which I have suggested should be implemented for agriculture. Unless this is done I am convinced that the family farm in western Canada is going into liquidation. I am convinced that more and more people will leave the farms. I therefore plead with this government to try to implement the program I have outlined here tonight.

Mr. N. C. Schneider (Waterloo North): I wish to avail myself of this opportunity in the debate on the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, to mention a few matters of special concern to my constituents in the riding of Waterloo North. I am here to present their views and opinions, and this I propose to do in as few words as possible.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

I am pleased to report general prosperity in Waterloo North. The twin cities of Kitchener-Waterloo and the town of Elmira are enjoying a high degree of employment, with figures showing a slight improvement over last year. These cities are highly industrialized, and Kitchener has become the rubber centre of Canada. My first duty in presenting the problems of my people is to report the continued deterioration of the rubber footwear industry.

While it is true that I have reported high employment in my riding, it is also true that a serious loss is being inflicted on Canada's economy by the laying off of hundreds, or I should say thousands, of skilled footwear makers, including workers at the four additional factories in the province of Quebec at Granby, St. Jerome, Lachine and Acton Vale. The three large plants which for many years manufactured rubber footwear in my riding have been reduced to two as a result of the closing of the Goodrich footwear division, which was moved to Quebec and has since closed operations there. The two remaining footwear plants are operating on a reduced basis, and one of these has added a foam rubber plant so the extensive steam plant may be kept in use. The other remaining plant is geared almost entirely to footwear, and the inroads of Asiatic imports is slowly but surely robbing these two remaining plants of their Canadian outlet.

I do not believe in endless repetition of this complaint regarding the unfair competition of Hong Kong and other Asiatic low wage products, but 7 cents to 15 cents per hour as compared to standard wages prevailing in Canada is unfair, and if continued will surely eliminate Canadian production. It would be a sad day indeed for Canadians if, in the event of war, we were forced to depend on an Asiatic or any other country for such highly essential articles as rubber footwear. With a high priority in wartime, rubber footwear is a necessity to farmers, miners, fishermen, lumbermen, the armed forces and every citizen.

In early December the tariff board held a hearing in Ottawa at which seven submissions were presented by manufacturers, labour organizations, a consumers' association, importers and foreign producers. I attended this hearing, and I feel that it accomplished its purpose by bringing out all the facts, and should be a great help in solving this ever-increasing problem.

Another problem presented to my constituents is the continued deterioration of our Canadian button industry. The inroads of Puerto Rican imports have almost eliminated this once important and busy industry in Canada.

Of the three button factories in Kitchener, one has recently declared its bankruptcy and the other two are in difficulties because the large volume lines, the plastics, are being imported from Puerto Rico at prices below Canadian costs. Puerto Rico, as a part of the United States, is classed as a most-favoured nation, but we feel that wage rates in that country gives those producers an unfair advantage. In addition, I understand that the operators in that country pay no income tax. I again appeal to the Department of Finance and the Department of Trade and Commerce to place some much-needed control on these imports, either by a reduced quota or a fair value for duty purposes based on Canadian costs plus a fair profit, so these two Canadian secondary industries will not be entirely eliminated.

To do my full duty in representing my people I must also bring to this house the appeals of many of the old age pensioners. In this debate we have heard no denial by anyone of the fact that the present pension of $40 per month is insufficient to supply the bare necessities of life today. Many suggestions involving the means test are offered regarding this national service to our senior citizens. It is most desirable that the means test be avoided in old age pensions, and the plan should not place any indignity on the deserving applicant. My own people feel that our province of Ontario has failed them in not paying a supplemental allowance. Though the wealthiest province in Canada, Ontario has done very little compared to British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Ontario's assistance involves a voluntary contribution by the municipality, and everyone agrees that municipalities are already overburdened.

I must present also the appeals of our blind citizens, and their requests for the elimination of the means test as applied to payments to our sightless handicapped citizens. It costs money to be blind, and I feel that the means test as presently applied definitely discourages the blind from making greater efforts to support themselves.

Speaking for my agricultural constituents, I wish to remind the Department of Agriculture of the excellent brief submitted last week by the dairy groups of Waterloo county asking for consideration of the continuance of the butter support plan, with the costs of handling and storage added when government stocks of butter are released to the trade. They also requested the development of high standards for grades of butter and other dairy products, a protective device or a floor price under skim milk powder, and the placing of the product under the Export and Import Permits Act. They ask also for legislation that will facilitate producers' organizations in co-operating in the orderly marketing of products on an interprovincial basis, and for assistance to the cheese producers to meet unfavourable trends that may occur in their present markets.

I see no indication that Canadians have changed their habit of eating three meals each day. Most Canadian families offer a prayer of thanks and gratitude for each meal. Do we think also of the lonely hours spent by the farmer who plowed the land to grow the wheat to produce our daily bread? When we enjoy a glass of refreshing, health-building milk or a serving of cream or cheese do we think of the regularly scheduled hours of milking which face the dairy farmer twice each day, and not five days per week but seven days per week? When we spread a serving of good dairy or creamery butter, do we think of the long hours required in the care of a good herd of dairy cows? I mention these things in the hope that the farmer-producer may receive proper recognition of his important place in our economy, and be given a fair return for his labour.

In conclusion I wish to associate myself with those who have congratulated the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the hon. member for Gloucester well deserved the praise of this house on their sensible and well-considered speeches.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): In preparing my thoughts for what I was going to say tonight, Mr. Speaker, I was reminded of a little tribute which I have wanted to pay in this house almost since the day I came to Ottawa. I think I should do so now. I wish to remark on the unusual courtesy and kindness of the Ottawa taxi drivers.

As one who has been in most of the cities of Canada and many of those of the United States, and used taxicabs in each one of them, I have found that while they may be a very efficient method of transportation, the drivers do not go out of their way to look after one as an individual. I have been tremendously impressed with the difference here in Ottawa. They meet us at the station; they carry our bags up the stairs at home, and this last is an unusual factor which I do think deserves recognition from those of us who come to this city from outside. Incidentally, I may say it is probably a very profitable operation for the taxi driver, because the tips one gives here in Ottawa are considerably larger in proportion to those one is tempted to give in any other city of which I know.

The Gordon commission report on the economic prospects of Canada over the next 25 years contains some interesting statistics for all of us who live in the cities of Canada. The commission found:

> Canada has been becoming an increasingly urban country and this trend will continue. In 1951, 62 per cent of the population lived in metropolitan areas or in other cities, towns or villages with more than 1,000 people. By 1980 that proportion may rise to 80 per cent. Over the same period the proportion of the population living in metropolitan and urban areas of more than 100,000 people may rise from 36 per cent to 56 per cent.

Translated into actual population figures, the commission estimated that by 1980 the population of Canada's 15 metropolitan areas will be some 12 million people, as compared with 5.2 million at our last census. When we turn to Montreal, with which perhaps I am more familiar than with the other metropolitan areas of Canada, we find that while the Gordon commission has not published a particular estimate for that city, other authoritative figures place our population by 1980 at over 3½ million, which is an increase of more than 1¼ million above the present figure.

Let me turn again to the Gordon report to obtain further background for what I am going to say. It forecasts that there will be a steady decrease in the number of hours we will work each week, so the present average of just over 41 hours will be reduced by 1980 to just over 34 working hours per week. It is probable, too, that we shall have a good deal more money to spend because, to quote the report:

> By 1980 the average Canadian, after paying income tax, will have about two-thirds again as much net income for his own use as he had in 1955.

I would say in parenthesis, Mr. Speaker, that the Gordon commission is apparently forecasting a Conservative government, because we certainly have indication that the attitude of the present administration is to do nothing except follow up increased income with increased income taxes.

Encouraging as these estimates may be, they foreshadow the further growth of a problem which is already a major one in most of our cities in Canada, and nowhere more so than in our city of Montreal. I refer to the problem of traffic. The figures forecast a tremendous increase in the nature and the extent of that problem over the next 25 years. That is because, first, we have an increasing concentration of our population in and around the major urban centres of Canada. Second, we have an absolute growth in the number of people who are living in those areas.

Third, we have an increase in their spare time, which will be reflected in additional travelling and additional movement around the city itself. Fourth and finally, I think we can expect that the increased income which is forecast will be reflected in increased automobile ownership, as people move from no car to one car and as our families become more and more two-car families where now they operate only a single automobile.

Take as one example Montreal, which is Canada's largest city—and by all indications it is destined to remain so—situated on an island contiguous to other islands. It faces across the St. Lawrence river another area promising, upon the completion of the seaway, to be one of the most prosperous urban areas in Canada if not in the world. The free circulation of traffic, its smooth movement without delay not only throughout the city but across the water barrier which surrounds the city, becomes not only a municipal concern, not only a provincial concern, but a problem of national importance in which, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, the federal government should have a very direct and immediate interest.

While I have used Montreal as an example, Mr. Speaker, I make these observations on traffic not only in respect of our city but in respect of all the other metropolitan areas across this country which are faced with this problem and which are going to have to solve it, if it is to be solved, through the expenditure of immense amounts of money.

Let me turn to the area which I am using as an example. We find ourselves in Montreal in the midst of a mighty and dynamic metropolitan region which stretches southward to the United States border, westward to the Ontario border, northward in to the Laurentians and eastward to the Richelieu river and beyond. Like all the other major cities of Canada, all this surrounding area which is contiguous to the city itself is a part of its region. The city lives, breathes and has its being only as it engages in commerce and interchange of people and business with the metropolitan region surrounding it. As this great heartland of ours grows and flourishes —and I think that future is destined for it— there is going to be an ever greater and more difficult traffic problem throughout the entire area. The co-ordination of this traffic will be the first concern, obviously, of any municipal government or any metropolitan regional government which is established. Once established it will, with the financial help of the provincial government, probably be competent to deal with the arterial roads which run through it and which bind its economic activities to the rest of the region. But even with a full measure of provincial help no local authority can cope with the many water crossings which this network of arterial roads would require. What demands are likely to be made in the future, and what are the requirements at the present time?

Engineering experts have calculated that it will take a tunnel perhaps seven or eight miles in length to take trains as well as automobiles under the St. Lawrence river, and that this would cost approximately $175 million. I do not propose to quarrel with the cost, though it does seem rather high at this point. I do not even propose to quarrel with the proposed length of the tunnel, though I think we should remember when considering a problem such as this the experience of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the Rockies, where they found that spiral tunnels in which the railroad mounted around and above itself enabled them to bring the road out at a point almost immediately above that at which it entered the mountain. I think that is something which might well be considered by those who are giving this problem engineering study.

Be that as it may, we have a cost estimate of some $175 million in order to provide a tunnel to allow train traffic to go underneath the St. Lawrence river and thus remove it from continued interference with the seaway. That in turn would enable the Victoria and the C.P.R. bridges to be converted to traffic use alone. Since the gradient for autos could be much steeper the ends could be raised, especially the south end, to enable it to clear the seaway and thus eliminate another problem which currently is facing us in that area. We also have the promise of the Minister of Transport to deliver a new bridge to Montreal called the Nuns' island bridge, and I shall deal with this subsequently.

With the situation as presently outlined, and with another proposed bridge to the north upon which it is expected the provincial government will embark in the spring, we would still require two additional bridges to the east and west ends of the island, and these might be constructed with the help of the province. On the basis of present-day automobile ownership and traffic count, with these extra bridges and tunnels we would then be almost competent to handle today's traffic. I think I should underline and mark well that I am referring to today's requirements and not those of the future.

Let us look a little into the future. As I have pointed out before, it is estimated that there will be a population increase of about 1½ million in that area by 1980. It is estimated also that motor car registration will increase by about 20,000 a year. This means that in addition to today's traffic, by 1981 there will be an additional 500,000 cars to contend with. We can add to that the increase in the surrounding areas which will rise as the seaway is completed and as industry moves in with its buildings and plans.

This is a clear indication that unless we build well beyond today's requirements we are going to be facing bridge congestion and the blocking of traffic circulation on an even greater scale than at the present time. In order to deal with future requirements we would need at least four more bridges across the St. Lawrence, elevated to clear the seaway traffic, as well as other bridges to the north connecting with the arterial roads.

The cost of such a program is stupendous. Taking the cost of the seven or eight mile tunnel at $175 million, and $90 million each for four elevated bridges which would total $360 million, we arrive at a grand total of $535 million. Then there would be another $300 million to pay for the bridges to connect with the expressways, which would make a grand total of $835 million or close to $1 billion as Montreal's share in providing what would be necessary to deal with the expanding problem of Canadian traffic.

This figure of $835 million to cover the bridges and their immediate connections is obviously impossible of attainment even by such a great metropolis as the city of Montreal. Viewing provincial finances for as short a period as 20 years, it would appear to be even beyond the capacity of the province. If these problems are to be solved it means that they must be considered a responsibility of the federal government. I think I have outlined previously some of the reasons why traffic should be the concern of the federal government as well as the provinces and the municipalities.

In order to arrive at a basis of comparison as to how the federal government might deal with a situation like this we could perhaps turn to the experience of the United States, where at the last session of congress there was created a federal highway administration charged with the building of some 41,000 miles of roads and crossroads to be free of traffic intersections and devoted only to the fast and efficient movement of traffic in the area. They propose to spend some $50 billion in the next 13 years, or approximately $4 billion a year.

One of the major goals of this program is the elimination of traffic congestion in and around big cities by taking the traffic over, under or around the cities by means of bridges, tunnels and underpasses. On the basis of this $50 billion being spread over some 13 years it is expected the United States government will be contributing some $3.2 billion annually by 1965.

Let us relate that to the Canadian picture. On the basis of the relationship between the gross national product of Canada, which is approximately $28.5 billion, and that of the United States, which is about $409 billion, the proportionate amount for us to spend on highways would be some $223 million a year. On the basis of the relationship between our populations, about 16 million in Canada and 167 million in the United States, the proportionate amount would be some $317.5 million a year. Averaging these two figures, which would perhaps give us the truest comparison, we find that the amount would be approximately $270 million if we were to equal the present program of the United States government in highway construction in proportion to our gross national product and our population.

Now let us take a look at just what this government has actually done, and is doing, in this field. The government has acknowledged its responsibility to provide at least some measure of assistance for highway construction across the country by its contribution under the trans-Canada highway plan. In 1955-56 the contributions under this plan were just over $16 million. In the current year they amount to some $30 million. I noticed in the estimates today that another $30 million is proposed for the coming year. To this we must add the construction expenditures by the government itself in connection with providing links in the trans-Canada highway in its own parks. This comes to about $11 million in the current year.

Thus we arrive at a total expenditure for this highway program on the part of the present federal government of about $41 million, and we can use that as a basis of comparison with the $270 million which would be the logical expenditure by this government if it wished to institute a national program of highway development comparable for our country with that undertaken in the United States, and which they feel they can successfully underwrite.

Obviously not even a major part of that amount would be spent in the Montreal area, but if we take our fair share along with Dogberry and Tumbletown, wherever they may be—I use those names so nobody will accuse me of comparing our city with any other—we would receive approximately $38 million a year were such a program instituted.

Mr. Lesage: The premier of your province would not allow you to take it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am dealing, Mr. Speaker, with the federal house, and I have not yet reached the point where I receive any instructions from the premier of my province.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but he would not take the money.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I would just love to see any one of the gentlemen on the treasury bench really get down to this question and deal honestly with the premiers of our Canadian provinces and, more particularly, with the premier of Quebec, respecting their views, taking cognizance of local conditions and making a sincere attempt to co-operate with them. They would be very surprised, Mr. Speaker, at just how quickly their money would be taken if they had any sincere desire to give it without an abundance of strings attached.

Mr. Lesage: There are no strings attached to trans-Canada highway money.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I have set this plan forward, Mr. Speaker, as an example of the imaginative thinking which I believe is required by the government at the present time in this field of national development. One could go ahead and use many other illustrations; one could find many other fields in which similar action is necessary, but I think this suggestion which I have put forward parallels the attitude of governments which existed in the past, and which helped us to build this country and bring it forward with great strides in a short period of time. I refer, of course, to the time when we were building railroads and canals and when, with federal government assistance, projects which could never have been envisaged either as private or even as provincial projects came into being.

We have reached a point at which traffic in our major cities is strangling the commerce of those cities in a way we have not known before. The federal government, with its tendency to grasp for itself such a large proportion of the tax dollar, has left neither the municipalities nor the provinces with sufficient revenue to deal unaided with this particular problem and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is high time this government proceeded to do something adequate about the situation.

Let us ask ourselves for a moment what this Liberal government has done or what it is proposing to do. How much money has been contributed, for example, toward the situation in Montreal, which I have outlined, to help in the construction of arterial roads, tunnels and bridges? It has agreed to compensate us for the impairment of traffic caused by the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway by raising one end of the Mercier bridge and the Jacques Cartier bridge, and installing alternate lift bridges at the end of the Victoria bridge. This so-called generosity on the part of the government is intended to restore us to the position in which we were, and we know what that means; choked bridges, highways blocked for miles, helicopters reporting minute by minute news of the blockage, waste of gasoline and waste of time.

It is true we have been promised an additional bridge at Nuns' island at a cost of some $80 million in view of the additional circulation of traffic which is expected to result from activity alongside the seaway, but this project, again, is related to immediate traffic, and it is going to leave us, when completed, in much the position that we are in now.

I wonder, too, Mr. Speaker, whether there is not some contingency in connection with this promised bridge. Before the federal election in 1949 this Liberal government promised a rail and traffic tunnel under the St. Lawrence which was at that time to have cost $80 million or $90 million; the present figure is $175 million. And this present Liberal government was to have paid two-thirds of the cost of this tunnel. There were big headlines in the Montreal newspapers—I read some of them to the Minister of Transport last year—about this statement, this promise of the government. But once the elections were over it was explained that the building of this tunnel was contingent upon the province of Quebec going ahead with power development in the vicinity of the Victoria bridge. We still have not got the tunnel, and last year when it was drawn to the minister's attention he spoke in such a way that we have not even got the promise any more.

When we turn to the promised Nuns' island bridge I think we are right in being a little disturbed. About a year ago we were left with the impression that the construction of the bridge was imminent. We proceeded to a point where the Minister of Transport issued, under date of August 17, 1955, a statement on the development of facilities for the movement of motor traffic between the island of Montreal and the south shore. In that statement the minister said:

> . . . the government has decided that it would be in the general interest if the building of a new bridge, with four traffic lanes, connecting the Montreal north shore with the mainland on the south shore were to be undertaken forthwith. Accordingly, instructions have been given to the national harbours board to retain the services of competent engineers to design a bridge to cross the St. Lawrence river over Nuns' island and to take, in co-operation with the provincial government and with the municipal authorities concerned, such further steps as are necessary for the building of this bridge. Legislation for these purposes will be recommended to parliament at its next session.

Let me repeat that last sentence.

> Legislation for these purposes will be recommended to parliament at its next session.

I have studied with great care the proceedings of the last session of parliament. I have gone through the index, I have searched in every possible place, and there is no legislation whatsoever relating directly to this proposed bridge. There is no specific indication whatsoever that the government has any intention of proceeding with the construction of the bridge.

I think we should realize that the last major project of this kind, the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal, was authorized by legislation in this house because it was a matter of joint municipal, provincial and federal concern, and that therefore it would be expected that legislation would be introduced in the house if the government planned to proceed with this project. The fact that they have not introduced such legislation, as so clearly promised in the words of the minister's own statement on August 17, 1955, seems to me to indicate that this also is a project which is contingent upon some other matter.

Only a day or two ago I asked the Minister of Transport when he planned to begin construction of this bridge, and in effect his answer was that he did not quite know, that they hoped to begin some of the approaches this spring. But he cannot begin the approaches and he cannot proceed, as I understand it, until such time as he has got legislation through the house. I suggest most strongly that even if it is a year late, he now make good the promise contained in his statement that he would take action.

I should like finally to touch for a moment on a project which I think might be considered by the government that would be of some considerable benefit to the national development of Canada. I refer to the taking of a national inventory of our natural resources right across the country from coast to coast and the correlation of this information in one particular department where it can be kept up to date. The members of the Gordon commission in their own way have taken an inventory of our economic resources, but we find that we have throughout the country, as we all know, immense natural resources which have been assessed by the provinces but the information on which has not been brought together at one central point.

The federal government have made a start in that connection with their inventory of forest resources under which, in co-operation with the provinces on a fifty-fifty basis, they are taking a complete inventory of the forest resources of our country, but I think that could be extended. As we proceed with the development of the country and as we ask industry, commerce and business to put their money on the line for development, I think we could assist them in making their plans and assist in the development of the country if we were to provide for them such a centralized inventory and study of the great natural resources of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we call it 9.30?

Mr. Dufresne: Nine twenty-nine and a half.

Mr. Speaker: The Clerk tells me that according to his watch it is now 9.30. Therefore it is my duty, by virtue of the provisions of standing order 38, paragraph 4, to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put the question on the amendment to the amendment and on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment to the main motion lost. The question now is on the amendment to the main motion. All those who are in favour of the amendment to the main motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed to the amendment to the main motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members. I note that the whip of the party to my right and the whip of the party to my left, of the official opposition, indicate to me they consider that their members are called in for the purpose of this division. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore I will put the question now. The question is on the amendment to the main motion.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL GALLERY PURCHASES, 1956

Question No. 5—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. Were any paintings purchased by or for the national art gallery in the year 1956?
2. If so, who were the artists and what were the amounts paid in each case?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. Yes.
2. See table below.

SESSIONAL PAPER 107 B

Question No. 33—Mr. Hees:

What was the total cost in connection with sessional paper number 107B, tabled in pursuance of an order of the house passed on June 20, 1956?

Answer by: Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises that this cost is estimated at $1,750.00.

GORDON COMMISSION COSTS

Question No. 34—Mr. Hees:

1. What is the total cost in connection with the Gordon commission up to January 1, 1957?
2. What civil servants, if any, were seconded by the government to work for the commission, and for what length of time has each of them worked?
3. Is the remuneration of such civil servants being paid as part of the Gordon commission inquiry expenses for such time as they were working for the commission?
4. What annual salary as civil servants is paid to each of the said civil servants?

Answer by: Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance):

1. $712,549.73.

2, 3 and 4. The annual salaries of civil servants seconded to work for the commission were paid from their departmental appropriations and were not charged to the expenses of the commission except in the case of Mr. P. Garceau whose salary was charged to the commission. The cost of terminable allowances was charged to the expenses of the commission.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 23, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FINANCE

EXCISE TAX—REPORTED ACTION BY BRITISH COLUMBIA CAR DEALERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister give his opinion on the resolution passed by the British Columbia car dealers, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of January 22, to refuse to accept any more 1957 model cars from manufacturers until the federal budget, with possible cuts in the 10 per cent excise tax, is handed down; which situation, if it developed in the rest of Canada, could result in a major tie-up of the Canadian automobile industry?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would not want what I say to be taken as any indication of any budgetary action that one might have in mind. The motor car dealers of Canada have intimated in each of the past three years that they would like the government to find a way of avoiding the loss which they suffer when the tax is reduced. There have been a great many conversations between ourselves and the motor car dealers and the manufacturers' association. The last one was the week before last when several alternative methods of dealing with the problem were discussed with the representatives of the motor car dealers. Whether the action taken by the British Columbia branch of the motor car dealers has been taken in ignorance of these discussions or whether it has been taken as a result of the discussions, I do not know at the moment.

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE TAX REDUCTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's generous spending policy as shown by the estimates, can he inform the house whether or not he will have any generosity left to deal with the matter of tax reductions?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I only want to answer, sir, by pointing out that I think this is the first voice that has been raised on the other side in favour of tax reductions.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO INCREASED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of Justice but I understand that the Minister of Finance is acting for him in his absence. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the items in this morning's papers reporting that five of the major oil companies in Canada yesterday announced price increases in gasoline and fuel oil of about a cent a gallon at the wholesale level? Will the minister consider ordering an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act with a view to determining whether or not there is a combine which resulted in these price increases being announced at the same time?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Acting Minister of Justice): When the Minister of Justice knew he would be absent today he asked me to answer any questions that might be directed to him. I am quite sure, however, that the house would not expect me to answer this question because he usually makes fairly detailed answers to questions on the Combines Investigation Act, and I am sure he will answer this one in that manner when he returns.

EGGS

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATION OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In his absence perhaps his parliamentary assistant might answer it. What has happened to the government floor price on eggs? Has it become inoperative?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I am quite aware of the situation involved in the question asked by the hon. member for Huron. I can assure him that the agricultural prices support board has the matter in hand and we hope that everything will be straightened away within a reasonable length of time.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. Is he aware that in western Ontario counties the primary producer is getting 28 cents to 30 cents a dozen for grade A eggs at country delivery points?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I am well aware of these facts and I hope the situation will be straightened out.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

SASKATOON—REPORTED CONSTRUCTION OF ARMOURY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): In view of press reports that an armoury or, indeed, armouries are to be built in the province of Saskatchewan this year and in view of the urgent representations I have had from the mayor and city council of my city, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if a building for Saskatoon is contemplated at this time?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I can say to the hon. member that ever since I visited his city and looked over the situation with respect to the armoury at Saskatoon I have had the matter under active consideration and it is being considered now.

Mr. Knight: It is a desperate situation.

CANADA COUNCIL

INQUIRY AS TO SELECTION OF CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of press reports stating that Mr. Mackenzie, Dr. Sidney Smith and Mr. Brooke Claxton are all being considered by the government for the position of chairman of the Canada Council, has the government arrived at any decision as to who the chairman might be?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): When a Canada Council has been provided for by legislation the government will announce the names of the members of that council and it will not take it very long to make the selection.

IMMIGRATION

C. G. HANNA—COMPOSITION OF APPEAL BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Yesterday the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration undertook to give an answer to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich as to the composition of the appeal board which sat on the hearing of the case of Christian George Hanna. Can the minister answer the question now?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yes, sir. The appeal board consisted of Mr. P. W. Bird, superintendent of immigration, Vancouver, Mr. D. R. Henderson, supervisor of placement services, and Mr. H. D. Peters, Pacific district inspector, who are all members of a panel of persons that, under the authority given to me by parliament, has been established for the purpose of constituting appeal boards from time to time when they are required.

Mr. Fulton: Is it not a fact that the special inquiry officer from whose decision the appeal was taken was also a member of the Pacific district office and was appointed as special inquiry officer by Mr. Bird, the chairman of the so-called appeal board?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, that is very probably true.

[Later:]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has any disposition been made of the unfortunate Hanna case or has any decision been arrived at or is the minister in a position to give the house one of his enlightening statements in this respect?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot do much to enlighten the house. The case is before the courts.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister received the report of the board which was mentioned a few moments ago? The press report indicated that it was on its way down and that the vessel was waiting until the minister should have made a decision. Has that report been received and is it before the minister?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that the hon. gentleman's facts are hopelessly out of date. I have, of course, received the report of the special inquiry officer.

Mr. Fulton: I am talking about the report of the board.

Mr. Pickersgill: The board simply dismissed the appeal and that is all there was to it.

Mr. Fulton: We are getting information gradually.

[Later:]

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister say where Mr. Hanna is at the present time? If he is on the ship, has the ship already sailed?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I do not think I can say for sure where Mr. Hanna is at the present time; but I am informed he is not on the ship and I am also informed that the ship has sailed.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration another supplementary question which I have been turning over in my mind since the last answer he gave the house. In view of the fact that the ship has sailed and Mr. Hanna is now in Canada, what is his position and what can be done about it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I presume, sir, that that is something the courts will decide.

[Later:]

C. G. HANNA—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGAL PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is the minister aware of any other or further legal proceedings which have been taken in the Hanna case with which the house is not acquainted?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am not quite sure with what the house may be acquainted, but this case is before the courts and I do not think it would be appropriate for me to attempt to describe what is going on before the courts.

Mr. Michener: That scarcely seems to be a complete answer to the question which I intended; it was the existence of legal proceedings about which I was inquiring. For example, has any writ of habeas corpus been served upon the department of immigration with respect to Mr. Hanna?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am informed that a writ—I think the hon. gentleman understands these things better than I do and I understand that a writ is not served on a department but on a person—has been served on the superintendent of immigration in Vancouver.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister care to indicate what response was made to the writ?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I would not.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—FREIGHT RATES AND TRANSPORTATION SURVEY, MARITIME PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government any intention of implementing a survey of freight rates and transportation in the maritime provinces, as recommended by the Gordon commission?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when that matter has been decided it will be announced in the house.

Mr. Van Horne: Has the government any intention of starting an expanded program of geological survey work in the maritimes, as also recommended by the Gordon commission? Has the government any intention of following the Gordon commission's recommendations to increase federal purchases for defence and other purposes in the maritime provinces or is the government going to do as it has always done in the past and do nothing?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, the government has no intention of answering questions based on such erroneous assertions.

Mr. Van Horne: You have no intention of doing anything.

GRAIN

OATS—INQUIRY AS TO NEW "SHIELD" VARIETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister comment on the new variety of oats known as "Shield" which is said to be smut resistant and which, according to the Globe and Mail of yesterday, has been licensed for sale in Canada? Could the minister say whether this new variety is suitable for western Canada and, if so, whether any seed will be made available in the prairie provinces?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question a few moments ago and I communicated with an officer of the Department of Agriculture, who tells me that "Shield" is the name given to a rust resistant and smut resistant variety of oats which has been bred specifically for areas in eastern Canada where early maturity is of great importance. It is being distributed to farmers in northern and eastern Ontario and northwestern and western Quebec. The present varieties of oats, notably Garry and Rodney, recently released by the Department of Agriculture are serving the needs of farmers in western Canada.

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER INTERIM PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising from the number of requests for information received in the last couple of days as to when it is expected the wheat board will make a further interim payment. I would like to know whether or not the minister would be able to indicate approximately when it is expected that a decision would be made in this regard.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that I am not able to give any information at this time. The matter has been called to the attention of the wheat board but no recommendation has been received as yet from the wheat board.

BRIDGES

BURLINGTON, ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works. What progress has been made on plans to construct a new low-level bridge over the Burlington channel?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge there have been no new developments with respect to this matter since we last discussed it in this house.

Mr. Lennard: A year ago.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRAINING OF GERMAN AIRMEN—SALE OF JET TRAINING PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, or perhaps the house leader would rather answer it. Is it going to be possible for the house to have a discussion on the proposal to train German pilots in Canada and the recently reported rather large sale of Canadian jet training planes to the West German government?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I presume those matters, along with many other matters affecting the Department of National Defence, will be the subject of discussion when the department's estimates are being considered.

MIDDLE EAST—LOCATION AND ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister inform the house where the Canadian troops serving with the United Nations police force in the Middle East are now stationed and could he give us a report of their activities?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I could not give the hon. member a detailed report at the moment as to where they are stationed. Their activities are pretty well indicated by the nature of the troops—engineers, signallers and various services. I would be glad to make a statement, if the hon. member wishes it, when I have detailed information.

[Later:]

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence. Are we to understand that the minister is not aware whether the Canadian troops are in Egypt, Israel or the Gaza strip, or scattered somewhere around the eastern Mediterranean?

An hon. Member: Are they in Asia or Africa?

Mr. Campney: I do not think any reasonable person would make any such deduction at all.

Mr. Churchill: Well, where are they?

WATER RESOURCES

UPPER THAMES VALLEY AUTHORITY—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED COMPLETION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of several recent press reports concerning the likelihood of the completion of the upper Thames valley authority in western Ontario, has the minister any comment to make?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): May I take this question as notice and give an answer tomorrow?

CRIMINAL LAW

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and I understand the Minister of Finance has indicated he is answering for him. In view of the continuing threat to young children, could the minister not put a firecracker under the chief justice of the supreme court of Ontario, trial division, in order to obtain his report on sex criminals at the earliest possible date?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the high officers the hon. member has mentioned do not need firecrackers to discharge properly their duties to the public.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As a supplementary question, would the minister ascertain if the government has asked the chief justice for his report or has indicated that they desire it at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. Harris: Yes, I will, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION RESPECTING NOVEL "TEN NORTH FREDERICK"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): The Minister of National Revenue indicated he intended to read the novel "Ten North Frederick" to see if it should be banned from sale in Canada. Has he read the novel, and what is his decision?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The book is not yet in this country, unless it has been brought in privately, so I have not read it.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister not aware that the book has been on sale at Ottawa book stands for the past month?

Mr. McCann: No, I do not frequent or patronize the places that sell that type of literature.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he refuses to read the book which he said he was going to read and decide whether it is salacious literature, in view of the fact that when I just sent him over a complimentary copy of the book he threw it on the floor.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I rather think the page boy dropped it instead of placing it on my desk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: No, he did not. You threw it on the floor; you refused to take it.

Mr. McCann: In any event I will read the book when it is brought to my attention officially by the people in my department.

Mr. Hees: You will have to pick it up off the floor, then.

Mr. McCann: I am not going to waste my time reading these things for fun, nor do I frequent or patronize the places where such books are sold. If that is the policy of the hon. gentleman in order that he may have an opportunity to fire questions over here, it is certainly not mine.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I want to know what the minister meant when he informed the press conference that he intended to read the book. Evidently he did not intend to do what he said he would do.

Mr. McCann: I have had no press conference with anybody.

Mr. Hees: Then how did the Journal get hold of the story?

Mr. McCann: Pardon?

Mr. Hees: Then how did the report get in the Journal?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, I was telephoned at my home on Saturday last by a representative of the Canadian Press and asked about this book and if I had read it, and my simple answer was that I had never heard of it.

Mr. Sinclair: Have you any pictures you want to distribute too, George?

Mr. Hees: That is all you can understand, Jimmy.

TELEVISION

BONAVENTURE AND GASPE—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the government, or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, any plan to provide television service to the Bonaventure and Gaspe areas in eastern Quebec and to the adjoining sections of northern New Brunswick?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government, pending the report and the recommendations of the royal commission on broadcasting, is unchanged. Under this policy the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been authorized to develop the national television system and to establish television production centres at Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax. Also under this policy, licences are granted elsewhere to private applicants with the aim of extending service as widely as possible. If private stations are established in the Bonaventure and Gaspe areas, or in any other adjoining areas, the corporation will provide programs to them by means of television recordings if networks are impractical.

The C.B.C. has submitted proposals to the royal commission to increase the television coverage in areas where private stations are not established. Any such plans will have to be left in abeyance until the commission reports and parliament has a chance to study and act on its recommendations.

TRANSPORT

FERRY "CABOT STRAIT"—INQUIRY AS TO REFLOATING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the acting minister of transport. Can the minister inform the house what progress is being made in attempts to refloat the ferry boat Cabot Strait and also would he comment on the adequacy of any temporary substitute service which has been provided?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport and his parliamentary assistant are absent today. I shall be glad to call the question to the minister's attention.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR ENFORCEMENT BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, in view of a short telegram which I received from the president of the parents' action league in Hamilton, I should like to address a question to the acting minister of justice. With the indulgence of the house I should like to read the telegram. It reads:

Provinces not strictly enforcing the Criminal Code—

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman will please not read the telegram.

Mr. Reinke: Can the minister comment on whether there are any steps which the federal government might be able to take to ensure a more rigid enforcement by the provincial governments of the Criminal Code, in view of the representations I have received and the tragedies in the past few days?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I shall draw the question to the attention of the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED $8 MILLION ELECTION FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is there anything, sir, in the private boasting by some Liberal members that your party has over $8 million with which to fight the next election?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to answer in the house questions of that character from the hon. gentleman.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE—LAMPREY MENACE IN GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister tell the house whether he intends to set up the fisheries committee this year? Will he also tell the house whether there is any attack on the lamprey menace in any of the great lakes besides lake Superior?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I do not convene the committee on marine and fisheries. If the chairman of the committee chooses to call them, the officers and scientists of my department will, of course, appear before it.

The new international commission on the great lakes fisheries has now started its work and I should think we should wait until it files its first annual report to parliament on the work it has done before we discuss it in committee.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; I probably did not make clear the last part of my previous question. Is there to be an attack on the lamprey menace in any of the great lakes besides lake Superior?

Mr. Sinclair: I understand the commission has now laid out its work program for the coming year which includes completion of the work in lake Superior and commencement of the work in lake Michigan on the United States side and lake Huron on the Canadian side.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT AS TO DELAY IN TRANSLATING COMMITTEE REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, January 18, the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne) asked me whether steps had been taken to expedite the translation into French of committee reports, so as to avoid the six to seven weeks' delay which is said to have occurred in former years.

To answer his question I should first inform him that, as he no doubt knows, the bureau for translations has to carry out the specific duties which are assigned to it by virtue of the legislation under which it was set up. Now those duties consist in providing service to the various departments of the federal government as well as to both houses of parliament. In other words, it has to give such translation services as are required by those federal administrative agencies as well as those required by the House of Commons or the Senate.

With this qualification, I am pleased to inform him, however, that steps have in fact been taken to expedite the translation of committee reports, and that five translators have been added to the personnel of that particular division. I hope, as he does, that as a result of those arrangements the work will be speeded up.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—STATEMENT BY PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on January 18 the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) asked me the following question:

In view of the recent announcement which has been made of President Eisenhower's recommendation to congress of a large appropriation of over $1 million with respect to the Passamaquoddy project, would the government make a statement on Canada's up-to-date position with respect to this development in New Brunswick?

As the hon. member knows, a joint reference on the Passamaquoddy bay project was submitted by the government of Canada and the United States to the international joint commission on August 2, 1956. Subsequently, the commission set up two boards—an engineering board and a fisheries board—with instructions that they should commence studies and investigations without delay. In order that our sections of the boards could start work immediately, certain moneys were set aside from the allocations made to the Canadian section of the commission for the present fiscal year ending in March 1957.

In accordance with the agreement reached by Canada and the United States, the Canadian share for the studies will be $300,000 spread over three years. The required amount of $100,000 for 1957-58 is being asked for in the main estimates of this department for the forthcoming fiscal year.

TRADE

GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN INTERNATIONAL FAIR, MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house whether the government plans to participate in the international trade fair scheduled for Montreal this year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that matter is still under consideration.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. R. F. L. Hanna for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself, as others have done, of this opportunity to say a few words in this debate. It would be difficult for me to address myself entirely to those subjects which are outlined in the speech from the throne because there is not very much in that speech that is of real importance to most of the people of Canada, and those subjects which are outlined in that speech have been amply dealt with by other members of this party and by other members of the house.

I think the speech itself is probably more noteworthy for the lack of interest it shows in the common people of Canada than for any other reason. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that there was no mention in the speech—no indication whatever—that the people of Canada would receive some relief from the tremendous burden of taxation which they have borne so patiently for so long. There was no mention that they might receive any relief whatever through a lowering of the ever-increasing cost of living, nor was there any suggestion that any assistance will be given to the old age pensioners or to those in receipt of family allowances. I mention these two things together, Mr. Speaker, because it has been quite evident during this debate that most of the Liberal party members in the house have given the impression—whether because this may be election year or not—that there would be an increase in these two items, namely old age pensions and family allowances. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, and if at a later date we find that the government has finally condescended to make an increase with regard to these two items, then I would say to you that that would be one of the most dishonourable things that could occur, because if the government can make, and intends to make, an increase in these two allowances now, then they could have made such an increase last year and the year before. The fact that they have held it up until an election year and deprived these people who are in dire need of assistance of receiving these benefits is, I think, a very despicable thing. There are surely other and more honourable ways the government can employ in order to get votes than the use of this underhanded method, and such bad treatment of a group of deserving people for the sake of party advantage.

Still with reference to the speech from the throne, I notice also that no reference was made to any increased allowances for disabled veterans, for disabled persons or for the blind; the speech from the throne was notorious for these, as well as for a great many other omissions. A moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned old age pensions and family allowances. They could very well have been increased. It is not my intention at this moment to delve deeper into that question, but I just bring it to the attention of the house to remind members that there is a need, and that Canada can well afford to take care of it, together with other problems which are so pressing today.

It is common knowledge that Canada on a per capita basis is the richest country in the world. We have a national product at present of over $29,800 million which is expected to reach the $30 billion mark and, maybe, pass that. Thus it cannot be said that this country is unable to afford the expenditure. In fact, Mr. Speaker, members on the Liberal side of the house have persistently boasted of the great advances which have been made in Canada since their party has been in power.

True, the wealth of Canada has materially increased but I say now that although the over-all gross national product has increased by leaps and bounds the average citizen has not shared in that prosperity to the same extent as those in the higher income brackets. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the tremendous increase in the national product is not as a result of the federal government's policies but as a result of the efforts put forth by the provinces of Canada.

I want to bring a few things to the attention of the house in an endeavour to prove what I have just said. I was impressed with the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) when he referred to the high freight rates that western Canada and the maritime provinces have to pay and the unfairness of that situation. He pointed out that we in western Canada were at the very peak of the railway rate structure. He pointed out that because of that fact our industrial progress had been hindered. He pointed out that agriculture in the west was being penalized because of this unfair procedure. But the thing he did not point out is that the very government which he supports and has supported over the years is responsible for these unjust freight rates.

It is true that during the time in office of the government the one and one-third rule was put into effect. We in the west had been paying freight rates as much as 200 per cent higher than the freight rates on goods shipped to the west coast under the transcontinental schedule. The rates were brought down so that we paid no more than 33⅓ per cent more than other parts of Canada.

Then under this government, and this is one of the things that the hon. member for Vegreville forgot to say in his speech, the agreed charges were put into effect which permitted the railways to by-pass the one and one-third rule. It was no secret that this would be done because the railways said it was going to be done. It should not be forgotten too when some advocate a so-called two-party system, a system including Liberals and Conservatives only, that at that time it was the Conservative party that fought tooth and nail to have the one and one-third rule done away with and the old rates re-established.

Where would the people of the maritimes and the people of western Canada be if we only had the two old line parties looking after the welfare of the people of Canada?

They would get a much worse deal than they are getting now. I must say that fact was acknowledged by the member for Vegreville when he spoke the other day although I again remind him that he is a member of the very party that is responsible for the conditions we have had over the last few years. Certainly it is clear that the policies of the government are not responsible for the progress that has been made over the years which has brought our national production up to close to $30 billion.

Let me give another example of how the government has hindered progress in Canada rather than advancing it. Mention was made the other day in the house of the tar sand development in western Canada. During the last war when there was danger of a cutting off of gas and oil from the Persian gulf the government did make some effort to develop the tar sands of western Canada which contains one of the largest known deposits of oil in the world estimated at over 200 billion barrels.

But as soon as it was found that there was no great danger of a shortage during the war period the government ceased its operations and efforts to develop that industry further. Nothing was done by anyone else except the province of Alberta until the other day when, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, January 16, 1957 the new prime minister of Great Britain, Mr. Macmillan, indicated that the British government was making plans to develop the great oil resources of Alberta. This is what the report has to say:

> Ottawa enthusiasm stirred today at the possibility of new action to free the 200 billion barrels of oil in the tar sands of northern Alberta.

Yes, they were stirred again. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys was asked by the newspaper what this Liberal government was doing about the matter and in his reply he gave the impression that the federal government had been continuously active in conducting further research when, of course, nothing could be further from the truth. The article reports the minister as saying:

> He said his department was conducting experiments with promising results. Even with existing methods the cost of fuel extracted from the sands would be close to that of well production, it was estimated.

As a matter of fact, nothing is being done. On January 17 a question was put to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in the house with respect to the matter and this is what he had to say, as found at page 324 of Hansard. Actually his statement was closer to the truth.

> I answered the letter—

A letter from the president of a private firm interested in developing the tar sands.

> —and said we were watching with interest the tar sands situation, but we felt that at the moment it is not a development that was justified by present prices for the product.

That is a contradiction of what the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys said. The Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to say:

> We regard it as more in the nature of a reserve for the future. That is all I have heard on the subject. We have nothing whatever from the British government. As to whether that government is interested or not I have no information.

That is what the federal government is doing to develop possibly one of the greatest industries in all of Canada, in fact, in the whole world. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that they have been doing nothing at all. The government of the province of Alberta has been doing something. It has perfected the extraction methods to the point where commercial companies are now willing to come into the picture. According to a report in the Western Producer of Thursday, January 17, the Royalite Oil Company Limited is planning to spend $50 million in the further development of the tar sands. In addition, the British government is also taking a keen interest.

Once again the provinces are the ones who are entirely responsible for the development of the Dominion of Canada and not the federal government. We see that some of the greatest development in this country is carried on by the province of Alberta, as was indicated by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Hanna) the other day. I want to commend him on the way he praised the development of industrialization in Alberta. Of course he did not praise the Alberta government but that must have been in his thoughts.

The province of Alberta has made the greatest progress toward industrial development of any province in western Canada, and it certainly does not have a Liberal but a Social Credit government. The next province to show wonderful progress is the province of British Columbia, and it too is under a Social Credit government. They have made outstanding progress. Once again the federal government is not responsible for that progress. In fact, there again they hindered development—

An hon. Member: They bucked them.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —and, as is indicated by one of the members, they bucked them wherever they had the opportunity to do so. One of the other provinces that has made an outstanding record in industrial development is the province of Quebec. If you asked Premier Duplessis what share the federal government had in that industrialization and that promotion, I am sure he would tell you in no uncertain terms that it was not the federal government that was responsible for it.

Then there is the province of Ontario which is a great industrial province. I must say that probably the federal government has given Ontario more encouragement and more assistance than it has given to all the other provinces put together.

There is one thing, though, Mr. Speaker, for which this government can take credit, and I want to give them full credit for it. It is this. If there is any inflation in this country, they are responsible for it. I am not so sure that there is any real inflation, in the real scientific definition of the word. According to the general interpretation of the word "inflation", it means too much money after too few goods. But with a gross national product of close to $30 billion, I do not think that could be said to be the situation in this instance. When you take into consideration the tremendous amount of credit buying and the tremendous number of people who are continually going into debt in order to get money with which to buy the bare necessities of life, I think it can hardly be said that there is too much money after too few goods.

No, Mr. Speaker; inflation comes from the ever-increasing prices, a situation which is a direct result of the policy of this government. One of the outstanding examples is the announcement made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) just yesterday when he said he was going to make it easier for those in the middle income brackets to find money with which to build houses by raising the interest rate. How he is going to make it easier is going to be a mystery. Certainly those people who can afford to pay more for the money they get will probably be able to get that money. But the majority of people who are in need of houses are not those people who have incomes of $7,000, $8,000, $10,000 and $15,000 a year. It is those people in the smaller brackets who just cannot afford to pay any higher rate of interest than they have been paying in the past who are going to be affected.

The government's first step in this so-called inflation race was when they set a rate of 3½ per cent for their short-term treasury bills. That was government policy. Then, of course, the Bank of Canada were forced to set their discount rate at 3½ per cent. They had no alternative. That was a direct result of government policy. Then the chartered banks—and this was another indirect if not direct result of the government's policy—had their cash reserve requirements raised from 8 per cent to a 15 per cent liquid reserve. Then the chartered banks immediately were forced to raise their interest rates and so they have raised them to 6 per cent and 7 per cent and in some cases up to 8 per cent, depending on the security which the individual has.

Under this so-called assistance by the federal government we find that big businesses and people who have money do not find it difficult to get possession of the money which they require. In most of those instances the large oil companies or other similar organizations—I do not pick them out particularly—with their credit behind them and the way they have of putting costs into prices, can afford to get this higher priced money. Hence they are not finding much difficulty. But under the system of this government in permitting interest rates and prices to climb, the little man has a great deal of difficulty in getting the amount of money that he needs in order to carry on his business. The small family firms are indeed finding it difficult and the small farms are finding it difficult. If that is the assistance that the federal government is giving to the little man—and I think it is—to about 75 per cent of the population of this country, I say that it is not too much to be proud of.

Certainly it cannot be said that the wage earner, the white collar earner, is overly prosperous during these times. I think it will be agreed by all hon. members in this house that after the ordinary working man receives his cheque and has paid his monthly accounts he has very little left, that the majority of the people are in the same predicament and that, as a result of this insufficiency of funds with which to carry on, they find themselves so far in debt that they will not get out of it for the next 25 years or 30 years.

I now want to speak for a few minutes about this high cost of living because I think that is one of the places where the government could and should do something. Not only has the price index risen up to the present time but it is continuing its upward trend. I have here an extract from the Western Producer of January 10, which deals in part with this matter. The heading is "Living Costs at New High Despite Food Price Drop". It reads in part as follows:

> Although there was a substantial drop in the price of food, the Canadian consumer price index increased fractionally in November to a record 120.4, the third straight month a new high has been reached.
> The index is based on 1949 prices equalling 100. In November a year ago the figure was 116.9.

Then further down the article goes on to say this:

> The composite index of Canadian farm products prices at terminal markets declined 2.1 per cent from 212.4 to 208.9. The field products index dropped 0.7 per cent from 165.2 to 164.1, and the animal products index eased from 259.6 to 251.7.
> The decline in the farm products index reflected lower prices for both field and animal products. The field products index declined due largely to lower prices for most grains and eastern potatoes. Substantially lower prices for hogs, coupled with lesser decreases for eggs, western steers and eastern cheesemilk, caused the drop in the animal products index.

From that article I think it is clear that the people who are raising these foods are not the ones who are receiving the benefit. While we have prices continually rising, the costs of those things which people need in order to live, namely farm products, are continually going down.

One of the other things which must be brought to the attention of the house, Mr. Speaker, is the tight-money policy of this government. That policy is reflected in the increased debt and credit buying of the nation. Last year the credit buying was the highest since September of 1955 when it reached $342 million.

I should like to quote from a publication of the dominion bureau of statistics, the Canadian Statistical Review. It says here that in the year 1941 the combined cash retail sales and credit retail sales amounted to—I shall read the table, which is as follows:

Year	Per Cent Cash Retail Sales	Per Cent Credit Retail Sales
1949	73.5	26.5
1951	71.6	28.4
1952	68.4	31.6
1953	64.6	35.4
1954	65.4	34.6
1955	63.7	36.4

This shows that the cash retail sales continually declined and the credit retail sales continued to increase. Had it not been for the extended credit buying that has prevailed in this country, this country would have been in a much worse position than it is right now.

I should like, for a moment, to deal with a problem more local in nature, and that is the problem of Banff national park. As everyone in this house knows, Banff national park is the greatest national park in Canada; in fact, it is the greatest national park on the North American continent. It has the greatest population of any national park in Canada. In fact, it has a greater population than all the other parks in western Canada. When we in this house speak of some government assistance to the national parks, we always hear the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) say the government is spending much more money on the national parks than it ever receives. This might be true. Although the government receives hundreds of thousands of dollars from the two dollar payment for every car that passes through the park gates, that is not the only contribution that the national parks, and particularly Banff, are making towards the progress and prosperity of this country. These tourists who come to Banff national park, or the other national parks in Canada, leave millions and millions of dollars in this country of which every Canadian receives a share. You cannot, therefore, judge the contribution the national park has made merely by saying that so much money was obtained at the park gates.

One of the things I want to bring to the attention of the government, and particularly the minister, is that when improvements are made or buildings constructed in the town of Banff then I believe the people of Banff have every right to have closer co-operation from this government because everything that is done in that park has a personal effect on the people there. I wish to give the government credit for the fact that in the last two or three years there has been much closer co-operation, and particularly in the last two or three months. This is as it should be, and it must continue to improve. If it does not the minister is not only going to hear from the people of Banff, but he will hear from their member in this house as well.

Let me say a word about the new developments that are taking place in Banff and and why it is so necessary that there be closer co-operation in that respect. Within the last few months the government decided to instal a new water and sewage system, or at least to improve the one that is there. There has been a very good water system in Banff and it has been there for years. These people have paid for it through the taxes that were levied. The government suddenly decided, without any consultation with the people of Banff, that they should put in a system which would be large enough to take care of all the tourists that might come to the park, and there are many thousands of them. The cost of this system would be shared, 50 per cent by the federal government and 50 per cent by the people of Banff. This decision was taken without any consultation with the people of Banff, but they are the ones who have to pay 50 per cent of the bills. The people never knew a thing about it until the rates were increased and their 50% share of the increased rates amount to more than we in Calgary have to pay for equal services.

I know the minister will say that the government, by contributing 50 per cent, is going far beyond what is really required. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government should pay at least 75 per cent of that increased cost because the 2,500 people in Banff should not be expected to carry 50 per cent of the cost of a water and sewage system which will take care of all the tourists who go there for three or four months per year. Lest anyone think I am exaggerating the picture I should like to quote from a letter from the Banff advisory council. Some of the moneys that have been spent in Banff national park are out of all reason; the workmanship is poor and the general construction is not what it should be. I am going to read from a section of this letter from the advisory council to the minister, and I am not doing it behind his back because he knows about it. This letter is dated November 20, 1956. It reads in part as follows:

> The council desires to thank you for your courtesy and for the pains that you have evidently taken to present the department's case from its point of view. They much regret, however, that they are unable to accept, in many cases, the conclusions reached by the department as it seems to them that the facts are not capable of substantiating them.

Then, in another paragraph I find this:

> Not having been supplied with any figures which could be checked and verified the council is at a great disadvantage and is not in a position to comment authoritatively on the manner by which the present sewer and water system has been evaluated; but such evaluation would have to take into account the sums expended on installation, repair and maintenance as shown by the department's records, but what the record would not show is the percentage of total cost covering bad workmanship, wasted material and ill-advised planning. This, of course, extends over a long period of time and it would be absurd to attempt any investigation at this late date, but even in the last few years catch basins have been installed at considerable expense and in a short time have been buried under new sidewalks and rendered useless, others have been placed in locations where it was impossible for them to function. Other similar cases of waste of public funds could be cited. Such expense appears on the records, but there is nothing to show the disparity between actual cost and what the work should have cost had it been performed in a workmanlike manner.

Then, the concluding paragraph reads as follows:

> Under these circumstances, therefore, the council feels that it cannot approve either of the new schedule of rates or of the manner in which it was put into effect. They also strongly urge that, in the future, no changes in tax or licence schedules be made without opportunity being afforded the parks residents, through their representatives, to investigate them and discuss them with the department and further that all major projects of construction or maintenance shall be open for competitive tender and that the citizens shall have the right to appoint a qualified inspector with authority to insure the carrying out of any project in a workmanlike and satisfactory manner. The council feels that if the residents of the parks are to pay for all improvements they have the right to demand that they shall be consulted before such improvements are undertaken and to specify the manner in which they shall be done.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

I point that out to show you that, to a large extent, federal government expenditures in national parks have been wasted. The projects have not been completed in a workmanlike manner and there has been a lack of planning. I say to the minister, therefore, that when things are being done in Banff national park the people, through their advisory council, should be fully consulted. These contracts should be let by tender and not be carried on by patronage.

I have not very much time left and I should have liked to deal extensively with the question of agriculture. However, my time has passed so rapidly that I will not have much opportunity to do that. Nevertheless, I wish to say that this is one of the great industries in western Canada, and in other parts of Canada as well, that has been neglected by this government. The ever increasing costs of agricultural production have made it almost impossible for them to stay out of debt; in fact, it has not been able to keep them out of debt. We as Social Crediters are firmly convinced that agricultural prices should be based on parity, and that there should be some recognition of this by the federal government in the policies which they pursue in order that the farmers of western Canada will be given some fair share of the national income.

When we consider the prices which farmers get for the goods they sell as compared with the goods which they are forced to buy we find that at the end of the calendar year, or their fiscal year, they have very little left to carry on. I would like to recommend to the government one of the things mentioned in the Gordon royal commission report, namely, that the government consider this session giving farmers cash payments for wheat stored on the farm. I know the royal commission suggested that cash payments should be given to the farmers for wheat stored on the farm in relation to the quota, but I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is not good enough. Farmers should be given more than a cash payment within the quota limit. They should be given cash payments sufficient to ensure that they will have moneys to carry on during the year or at least enough to keep them out of their ever-increasing debt.

I can only say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the consensus in this house, certainly of farm members, is borne out in the message given on January 4 by Mr. A. T. Baker in a broadcast on behalf of the Alberta Wheat Pool. This is what he said in part:

> It is a serious matter, however, that we in agriculture find ourselves in a state of semidepression while nearly all other sections of the nation are enjoying record prosperity. With clear heads and common sense we must seek a solution to the problem of our unfortunate relegation to the bottom of the economic structure.

It seems to me that short paragraph of Mr. Baker's address pretty well sums up the position in which western agriculture finds itself.

I would like to deal at great length with the agricultural problem. I have my notes before me but the time has slipped away. I can assure you though that when this question comes before the house again we shall have something to say about it. There are other problems too that are of major importance in my constituency. The declining of the coal industry is one of them. The question of labour is another. There are many more that I should like to deal with at greater length than I have found it possible to do in the short time that is available to me on this occasion.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Prince): Mr. Speaker, may I through you, sir, extend to the mover (Mr. Hanna) and the seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne my warmest congratulations on the very excellent manner in which they discharged their duties. My congratulations at this time are all the more sincere because I recall that about 10 years ago I had the honour of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I wish at this time to congratulate the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Kickham) on the excellent speech he made yesterday. The fact that he made that speech, talked about and discussed many of the important problems that affect Prince Edward Island at this time, makes it unnecessary for me to talk at any great length now.

There is one matter, however, that is causing our farmers, more particularly our potato farmers, much concern at this time, namely, the unfair tariff arrangements on potatoes that exist at the present time between Canada and the United States. About two years ago I spoke on this problem in this house. At that time I advanced reasons why I thought this unjust tariff should be renegotiated. I do not intend to put on the record now any of the arguments I used then. I understand, however, that an application has been made to GATT for permission to renegotiate the tariff agreement between Canada and the United States and that such permission has been granted. I hope that the tariff experts of Canada and the United States, if they have not already done so, will soon get together and try to work out a more equitable tariff arrangement on potatoes.

I intend now to discuss for a few moments the preliminary report of the Gordon commission on Canada's economic prospects, more particularly as it applies to the maritimes. It is unfortunate, I think, that this report has received such unfavourable press reports, particularly in the maritime newspapers. These reports seem to deal with the negative aspects of the report and ignore all the good suggestions that the report contains. I think the report must be considered as a whole and not have parts picked out of context and commented on. In my opinion, the report contains much that is good and much that will be of lasting benefit to the maritimes if carried out with the utmost co-operation of all parties concerned.

The most important problem of the maritimes is that of transportation, the problem of getting products of the farm and the sea to market. I am glad, therefore, that the commission has devoted a substantial part of its report to the problem of transportation.

The report says in paragraph 8 at page 101:

> It seems evident that the transportation facilities of the Atlantic region are in need of improvement but it was not possible for us to undertake the kind of detailed study of the problem necessary in order to make positive proposals about the most appropriate measures which should be taken in order to provide solutions.

I doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether any brief presented to any economic commission during the last 50 years from persons in the maritime provinces has not contained some reference to transportation. It is our most important problem.

Mr. Van Horne: And the government has done nothing about it.

Mr. MacNaught: The commission therefore recommends—and I agree very much with this recommendation—

Mr. Van Horne: And the government has done nothing.

Mr. MacNaught: The commission suggests that this should be the subject of a special inquiry which should also include in its terms of reference a re-examination of the present effects of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. The Maritime Freight Rates Act was passed in 1927, I think, and has had a very beneficial result on the economy of the maritime provinces since that time. Many of the good and beneficial effects of the act, however, have been nullified or whittled away by the horizontal increases that have taken place in freight rates during the last 10 years. I was most pleased, therefore, to see this recommendation in the report. It is one of the recommendations that the commission suggests should be carried out as soon as possible. I therefore urge the government to lose no time in appointing a commission to look into our transportation problems and more particularly the effects the horizontal increases in freight rates have had on the beneficial effects of the Maritime Freight Rates Act during the last ten years.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to comment on the speech from the throne I feel I must add my congratulations to those which have been extended to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the able manner in which they discharged their respective duties. Although there has been a wide discussion on the speech from the throne in the limited number of days that we have been given to deal with it, there is not very much to discuss in the speech from the throne. It appears to be somewhat of a pre-election document filled with empty generalities and probably preceding the bringing down of a handout budget before voting day next June, which will in all likelihood be arranged so that we will have even less time to discuss the budget than we have had to discuss the speech from the throne.

I am sure that a great many people throughout the country have been disappointed by the contents of the throne speech. There is very little mention in it of the real problems which confront the people. Farmers throughout the country are disturbed. They find themselves in a steadily declining position and have become the most marginal group in Canada. In comparison with other industries those engaged in agriculture justifiably feel they are forgotten people. The costs of production have been steadily increasing and no other industry in Canada has a smaller margin of profit before taxes. In fact, other industries have almost double what the farmers have by way of return before income taxes. This does not seem to concern the government although it concerns almost everyone else in Canada. The government seems to be following its normal course of smug complacency. In fact, hon. members on the government side of the house do not seem to be very interested in the speech from the throne; very few of the ministers have spoken on it and very few of them even bother to remain in the house to listen to the comments of those who do wish to enter into this debate. The members of the government have been in power for so long a time that they have grown satisfied with themselves and nothing seems to matter to them as long as it does not involve them.

Mr. Lennard: See them smiling even now.

Mr. Rowe: Governments are like machines and when they have been in power for a long time they wear out and become obsolete.

Mr. Pickersgill: Some wear out faster than others.

Mr. Rowe: That comment came from one of the younger members, who has less experience in the cabinet; but he has only to look at his colleagues and examine their tired appearance in order to realize that this government is wearing out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Your government wore out in about six weeks.

Mr. Rowe: The Liberal government is indeed worn out. Indeed if democracy is to survive we must have alternative governments. Never was Canada more in need of an alternative government than she is at the present time. This government has been in power for so long that the people of Canada are becoming alarmed at its attitude. It is no mere figure of speech to say that the complacency of this government is now recognized by everyone. They would surely even admit that political expediency has been their watchword down through the years.

Mr. Lennard: They are getting pretty rusty.

Mr. Rowe: No government with such a vast majority can remain in power for a long period of time without growing, as they have grown, arrogant and contemptuous of parliament itself, showing utter disregard of questions of importance that are directed to them, and they are applauded by a host of followers. And they never receive more applause than when they give the emptiest and smartest answers in order to curtail interruptions. In fact, only the other day one hon. member said that the members on that side of the house were being criticized and indeed even the cabinet ministers were being condemned. Apparently it is a serious thing to members of the Liberal government when cabinet ministers are criticized by members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. Lennard: How terrible!

Mr. Rowe: The view is that these men have been in power for so long that they should not be attacked and nothing should be said that would show disrespect toward them. Indeed, it is not just a case of showing disrespect; it is a matter of casting doubt concerning their type of intelligence. We have watched changes occur on that side of the house and as the comedian said in the old adage, "What a difference just a few years make." I have seen a few changes over the years.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Why don't you refer it to a committee?

Mr. Rowe: And my hon. friend who interrupts me has, too. In fact, I have seen a lot of changes take place in him. When he first came into this house he was careful and cautious as a skilful engineer should be, but since he has engineered the house for so long he is growing reckless and is tossing caution to the winds. Such changes come over a man when he has been in power too long.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are speaking from experience?

Mr. Rowe: No, but I know one whom you followed very closely in the house. He grew so accustomed to being considered right that he could hardly contain himself and almost felt that he should consult with the spirits.

Mr. Speaker, governments grow that way, independent of party, and the trends which I have observed myself have been observed by many Canadians who view them with alarm. In fact, they are viewed with alarm by almost everyone who is not on the payroll, and since the government has put almost everyone on the payroll it would appear likely that those who have been forgotten will be put on the payroll before next June.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps you could remind us of a few.

Mr. Rowe: You have put so many on the payroll since I have been here and since you have occupied your present post that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to discover those who have not been so honoured and even he would be hard put to remind you of any because political expediency has been your watchword, too.

These are serious times in the history of mankind, in the history of the commonwealth and in the history of world affairs, but this government sits smugly by and reveals very little evidence of concern for these twisting trends that we observe. I repeat, Mr. Speaker: oh what a change a few years have made! I can recall a time in this house when we had to be extremely careful not to appear to be too closely tied to the motherland. I remember listening to statesmen on the other side of the house tell us that there was nothing left of our bond with the motherland except a fine silken thread which you could hardly see trembling across the ocean. Even that gossamer tie has been weakened since that time.

I can recall, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you can too,—coming as you do from the county I come from you must have similar ideas about such relationships—when our boys were fighting the most desperate battle in history some years ago we were told that we did not have room in this vast country to develop airfields even if they were to be paid for by the motherland for fear of the political repercussions they might create in this country. It was decided to let old England pay her own way in addition to all the burdens she was carrying. We had no room to build airfields in the wide open spaces of Prince Albert from where comes the new leader of this party.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What air field did Britain pay for?

Mr. Rowe: You would not let them pay for any because you would not let them in here at all. No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has interrupted has, since that time, given vast areas to the United States, following the old policy of "we must not provoke her—we must not provoke our neighbour to the south" even though we quietly, slowly and silently ignore our relationship with the commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, when this government goes to the country it will have to answer for some of these trends which have been developing so conspicuously in the natural life and character of this country by reason of its long and tedious control of affairs in Canada. I know there are those who disregard these issues. There is nothing more dangerous in a long era of prosperity. The Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that even if we are buying to an extent of well over a billion dollars more than we are selling to the United States, that is a sort of prosperity. Ask the farmers in Simcoe and other areas what they think of that. It won't work. They have been buying iron and steel products that the United States has made out of our raw iron ore. Yes, the attitude seems to be that we must not provoke the United States even if they ask for investigations with regard to the prices we fix for our goods, should we increase the price of any of our forest products, newsprint or other exports which, of course, has been done. But for the sturdy attitude of the Conservative government of the province of Ontario they would have ordered the private books of firms in order to question our right to put a price on anything we have to sell.

It is true that in the meantime the prices of these articles have increased, like the prices of everything else—85 per cent in the last 12 years—but there was no howl from Canada when they took our iron ore and made it into iron and steel products and increased the price of those by 114 per cent in the same period. It is true we sell to a great market—one and a quarter billion dollars' worth of forest products go to the United States. But we buy $1,490 million worth of iron products in exchange, though we only sell them about $136 million worth of the raw iron ore.

What is there in the speech from the throne which would give any consolation to the young engineer or to the mothers and fathers in this country who wonder what possibilities their children have before them? Sure, we have heard a great deal about the arts, the sciences and the humanities, and the council that is being set up, and the millions that are going to be spent on this project. That is all to the good. But cannot the government shake itself loose from its lethargy and realize that more scientists and engineers educated in our universities have gone to the United States in the last two years than in any other two years since confederation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not true.

Mr. Rowe: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would rather take the evidence I have than the reckless interruptions of the minister—

An hon. Member: What is your evidence?

Mr. Rowe: —because, Mr. Speaker, that process has been going on for the last two years. I might suggest to the minister that since the government has control of radio and television along with other government monopolies, he might well give consideration to carrying out some scientific research into education, and to investigating more carefully what is being put on in these television programs, because our children now are learning to cheat before they are old enough to talk. I do not know what the next generation may be like. I like excitement as much as anyone else, and even though this government has become so slow and sluggish and old and tired that they cannot accustom themselves to anything new, I would urge them to give some study to what they are putting on television that is exciting our youth, encouraging them to run up the alleyways and highways and engage in all sorts of crime and adventure—activities which stem in some cases, and have been proven in the courts to stem in some cases—from what they have seen in these government-controlled pictures displaying the arts, social sciences and humanities.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to review our trade situation; I realize there will be a budget brought down. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) smiles at that. Mr. Speaker, it must be a great feeling to be able to take from the people more money than has ever been taken from them since confederation, and spend more money than ever before, to raise interest on mortgages to an all-time high record and still have the largest surplus we have had since confederation and a hidden surplus as large as the one that is visible. Never was a government more prepared for an election than this government. We shall have an election next summer that will make all the others fade into insignificance. I have seen a lot of elections in my time. I have seen a lot of pork barrels packed with Liberal expediencies, but certainly I expect to see one next summer bulging over, filled with the gravy from the gravy train that the government has been riding on for so long, all taken from the taxpayers in the last five years—close to $1 billion more than they need. Then the government wonders why our farmers and our labour men are dissatisfied; why the people who have not benefited from all this are asking whether they can afford to keep their child at a university.

Then, to satisfy the bigger fellows and ensure their future, the government raises interest rates on about 80 per cent of the people of Canada and keeps taxes high to prevent them spending too much on boots or shoes for the babies, or to prevent the universities improving their facilities for the study of the arts and social sciences in Canada.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, this government is again embarked on an unhappy, slippery way, sliding more all the time. You have only to look at the number of vacant seats across the chamber during the debate on the speech from the throne to know that the majority of their members do not care what happens as long as it doesn't happen to them.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): How many were there on your side when you started to speak?

Mr. Rowe: I think there are a great many more on this side now than were on yours when I started. I thank you for the compliment. At least when I speak my members come in. When you speak most of yours go out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Servile followers.

Mr. Rowe: I am not making this speech in any slap-happy—

Mr. Pickersgill: Slap-dash.

Mr. Rowe: You are a better judge of slap-dash than any man in parliament. I am not trying to make a slap-happy speech, or use any of the minister of immigration's slapdashery before this house. I am trying to bring to the attention of the government some features that it seems to be impossible to instil into their minds. We have an able leader, Mr. Speaker, and we have a strong party but our party may not need to win the election on its own merits. This country will be so tired of an old and weary government that pays no attention to these fundamentals that the government will automatically defeat itself.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): How long ago is it that you were a member of the government?

Mr. Rowe: That is when you were pretty much of a Conservative up in Fort William. That is why we employed you as our engineer to build elevators, and you did a good job.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Twenty-seven years ago.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Once more.

Mr. Rowe: These are not issues that can be brushed aside by the glib and clumsy interruptions of my hon. friends to your right. These are issues that concern the heart and soul of Canada. These are issues that concern the hope and security of this country. In all the years I have sat in parliament, Mr. Speaker, never have I been more ashamed of Canada's position within the British commonwealth than I have been during the last six months. There are hon. members in the house and I know there are those who sit to your right who will believe what I say but will not dare to speak. No man is more apt with honeyed words of praise for the commonwealth than the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). No man can say nicer things about our relationship. No man can express himself at the United Nations more eloquently than he can by an almost dangerous silence.

Where are we going, Mr. Speaker, so far as the commonwealth is concerned? What is our policy? Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) tell us? No, he cannot tell us.

Mr. Cardiff: The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) might.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of National Health and Welfare might.

Mr. Lennard: But he will not.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, the commonwealth of nations has been the greatest, the most successful experiment in human relationships of anything the world has ever known. Never in the history of this great old globe has an experiment been tried, tested and proven successful for more centuries than the British commonwealth of nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rowe: Yes, Mr. Speaker, my friends to the right will applaud and will give lip service.

Mr. Lennard: And they cut their throats a month ago.

Mr. Rowe: But when the chips are down, as the saying goes, when their leaders are almost crippled under the burden of responsibility, when the nation that has been the beacon light of hope and security down through the centuries, the nation that took the lead in 1914, the nation that took the lead in 1939, the nation that was almost brought to her knees before our great friends to the south entered those wars, when that nation is in trouble, when its leaders are struggling for support, what do we do?

Mr. Lennard: We sold them out.

Mr. Rowe: The little nation of Australia, not nearly as large as Canada, was not consulted, was not so proud that they had to be consulted first. Oh no. But our Secretary of State for External Affairs, much as he loves the old land and praises it with honeyed words, could not stand with them because he thought he should have been consulted. Now he supports the United States of America which says that it does not want to be consulted. He opposed Britain for going into the Suez and he supports the United States of America when the government of that country asks congress: Now that we have got Britain kicked out, can we go in?

He opposed Britain because Britain said that, if allowed to do so, it would stay there until there were signs of peace and the dangers of war in that area were eliminated. He opposes them for taking that stand. Yet he supports the United States of America when its government asks permission from congress to go in there but says it will not go in until Nasser asks them to come. Britain and France told the United States of America that Russia was sending technical advisers, weapons and machinery to support the Arab countries which had threatened to eliminate Israel but even so the United States said: You must get out. Now the United States wants to go in there but is not going to go in without permission even though the whole road from Bulgaria to the North sea is plugged with Russian troops and equipment.

Do these facts not shock or shake this government?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Rowe: Do the members of the government think that because they talk the most and travel the most of any cabinet ministers since confederation they know everything about the whole world? Never had we had such talkers and travellers as we have in the present government. They travel around the world. I do not mind the expense, Mr. Speaker. I have had travelling expenses that I paid myself and I know what they amounted to. The taxpayers of Canada are so accustomed to paying high taxes and watching reckless expenditure that even the money spent by these travelling cabinet ministers does not seem to disturb them. In fact, some of the farmers in my district would have spent more if they had had the opportunity.

But, Mr. Speaker, where do we stand? Where are we headed? Is the commonwealth worth anything or not?

Mr. Lennard: You would not think so, to hear them.

Mr. Rowe: Are we supposed to be a partner in the commonwealth? Do we pose in election campaigns and at Lions club meetings as the senior partner? Do we shove our chests out and say we are the brightest gem in Her Majesty's crown? Are we that great? Then, boys, England expects every man to do his duty. The commonwealth expects that the senior partner will be the senior partner in trial as well as in triumph. Where are we headed? There is no question that we are either in the commonwealth or we are not in it. If we are not in it, we will depend on the dollar sign and the dollar bloc or we will have to depend on communism and the Soviet bloc.

Do not sell the commonwealth short. I know there are those in the government who will applaud. I know there are those who are from the old land. I know there are those from every country in the world who are being assimilated in Canada and who realize that the British commonwealth of nations is the greatest assembly, the greatest partnership, the world has ever known. Whether they are Ukrainians, Czechoslovakians, Austrians, Poles, Netherlanders, no matter from where they have come, they are here because of the British commonwealth of nations.

There is no greater Liberal fetish, no greater Liberal delusion than the delusion of those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, in pretending that we who sit to your left are clinging to the old strings of colonialism, that the British commonwealth is only for the sheltered few and that they are the champions of Canada's present status. A quarter of a century ago, Mr. Speaker, I heard in this parliament some of the members on that side bragging that they had won this status for Canada. Yes, I heard the late minister of justice and the late prime minister boasting that they had won it. You would have thought to hear them on the hustings that the only status Canada had was a status with a Liberal tag on it.

Who won this status for Canada? Who won our independence? We are grown up. As has been said in years gone by, certainly we are daughters in our mother's house but we have been mistress in our own for a long time. Canada is an independent country. She was not made independent within the British commonwealth. Her independence made her allegiance to the old land that much stronger.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, you know very well, as do many other hon. members on all sides of this house who served in the first great war, that this status was won for Canada from 1914 to 1918, when 60,000 Canadians paid the price. When the late Sir Robert Borden signed the treaty of Versailles, Canada signed as an independent nation. Her status was not won in 1926 at the conference attended by the Liberal statesman of that day. Her status was won between 1914 and 1918. When Sir Robert Borden signed that treaty of Versailles he said in this parliament that the tears rolled down his cheeks because as he signed the treaty for Canada as an independent nation he felt he was signing it with the blood of those who slept in Flanders fields rather than with the ink that was used a few years ago by Liberal politicians.

Mr. Speaker, we have a part to play and we have a responsibility. Again I say this: Do not let anyone sell this great institution short. The Canadian people will not allow any government to forfeit the great chance we have to become still greater in the British commonwealth of nations. Ever since I was a small boy I have heard it said that the sun never sets on the British empire, that it comprises one-quarter of the world. I just checked up here recently and found out the facts. Despite those facts there are those who sit back and say it is too bad, but the old land is through; that the commonwealth has lost her place in the sun; that we now will look north or south. Those sitting on the government benches have allowed over the last 20 years another dangerous trend to develop, so that about 70 per cent of our business is now done with the United States of America.

Stop and think of the matter. Never in the history of human relations and trade relations has any nation gambled as Canada has done. No other nation in the world has ever put so many of her trade eggs in the one basket. Yet, Mr. Speaker, some of the grandfathers and fathers of those young hecklers across the floor to your right, in the years gone by fought an election to have commercial union with the United States of America, and again in 1911. In 1925 I remember so well what happened. The Minister of Finance—he is not in the house; he is still in Montreal—some years ago said, "We do not believe in a brick for brick policy with the United States. We believe in countervailing duties. We will raise our tariffs when the United States raise their tariffs. We will have a countervailing system". In other words we will send our fiscal responsibilities and prerogatives down to Washington and will do what they do. Then a few years later the leader said, "We should like to raise tariffs against the United States of America with this trade coming in as it is, but we must not provoke the United States".

He said we must not provoke them. It would be too bad to provoke them. Mr. Speaker, since before you and I were born, every year consistently we have sold more to the old land, than we have bought from her. I spoke about the British commonwealth covering 25 per cent of the world area. She has more than that percentage of the world trade. Twenty-seven per cent of all exports of the free world today are coming from the British commonwealth of nations. Thirty-one per cent of all the imports are used by the British commonwealth of nations. This government are turning their eyes to Washington, afraid to provoke them, saying where they lead we will follow, even though they are condemning Britain for the same course, condemning Britain on the left hand and following the United States in an even more radical course on the right hand. Mr. Speaker, it is a spectacle that would be a comedy if it was not bordering on a national tragedy.

Mr. Speaker, what we should be doing and what our statesmen should be doing is this. I have no criticism for them at all for travelling; in fact for all they do at home they might as well be travelling. I would rather see the Minister of National Health and Welfare travelling, whether he is talking to bewhiskered men in Ceylon or wherever it might be. I am proud to see him travelling and gaining knowledge of world affairs.

But, Mr. Speaker, I say that we should not sell this commonwealth short. Instead of looking to Washington we should be giving study to our part in the British commonwealth of nations, and how we can unite with western Europe. The hope of civilization rests more with the British commonwealth of nations united with western Europe than it does with the United Nations organization that can be defeated by those it is trying to control. Western Europe and the commonwealth combined, despite what some people think about the sterling bloc, today control 59 per cent of all the exports of the world and 65 per cent of all the imports. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is very glib with interruptions. If these figures startle him, let him deny them. If he were in his place he would probably say they cannot be true. Did the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration question them?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did.

Mr. Rowe: I am not here to educate the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. He has been around here for a long time, and he should have learned more.

Mr. Pickersgill: The figures probably came from the Tory statistical office.

Mr. Rowe: The United Kingdom herself has given us a favourable trade balance down through the years. Britain imports 70 per cent of all she buys from western Europe and the commonwealth. She is playing her part as a partner. I think it is high time we played our part as a senior partner. My leader has asked repeatedly for a commonwealth conference. Before he became leader of this party he asked for one, and he has done so since. One of the first things he did when he became leader was to urge that we should have a British commonwealth conference. We have pleaded with this government for one. The answer has been no. The Prime Minister has said it is not convenient for him now. The ex-prime minister of the United Kingdom has gone out of public life perhaps for good, broken physically and almost broken-hearted. But no; we have no time for a conference. The new leader has come into office facing an economic crisis. The nation has been brought almost to her knees economically. On the floor of the House of Commons pleas have been made that the commonwealth nations should get together; that we should have a restudy of the matter; that we should bring this subject of international trade before the conference and find out, after careful study of this all-important subject, where we stand and what we might do.

I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, and neither are you, whether, when we are confronted with a situation such as this we can arrange to change the picture overnight. But before I resume my seat I say in all sincerity that we as a senior member of the commonwealth, independent of party, race or creed, should be ashamed to sit idly by and see develop a situation and a trend that threaten the economic soundness of the greatest institution, the greatest organization, the greatest and most successful experiment in human relations that world history has ever recorded, one that has shaped the pattern of the United Nations. The failure of the United Nations to follow that pattern has been responsible for its greatest lack of success.

Mr. Speaker, if this government are so sure of returning to power I urge upon them that, if they are interested in the generations that are yet to come, they have some research undertaken but not by a Gordon commission. Do not pick somebody whom you are going to make a cabinet minister to tell you how to win the next election by telling people that by 1980 they will be so happy that they will not have to work at all, that they will eat more, drink more and have more fun.

We do not need that in Canada. We want someone who will look into this and find out if Canada is a senior partner of the British commonwealth, and if she is playing her part as such. I do not like to think, Mr. Speaker, that our people have to go to the United States for jobs fabricating our raw resources to be sold back to us. I do not like to depend on the whims of Washington. I do not like to have our international affairs guided by our glib-tongued twin travellers in external affairs who follow the United States of America. I would rather that even when they have a little doubt they would follow the motherland that has given leadership to the world down through the years and, Mr. Speaker, could give even stronger leadership in the future if she were supported by her partners. Combined with her partners she can still be the greatest nation in the world; separated from them she will fall apart, and then we will have to line up either with the Yankee dollar or Soviet dictatorship.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): When the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, speaks in this house, Mr. Speaker, I am sure he is aware of the admiration and friendship that all hon. members have for him. But I would not want this tribute to be construed as meaning that one always agrees with what he says. Certainly there are occasions in this house when one wonders whether the hon. gentleman is not seeking to make an effective debating speech rather than have us take all the things he says with too much seriousness.

An hon. Member: Now, now, careful.

Mr. Martin: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not seriously believe there is anyone in this house, and I am sure he does not for a moment think there is any political group to your right or to your left, Mr. Speaker, that does not wholly subscribe to the view that the commonwealth is an instrument for good in this world and that it must be preserved. One would have thought we had long passed the day when it would be possible to seek to divide public opinion in this country on the question of allegiance to the commonwealth.

Mr. Lennard: The British commonwealth.

Mr. Martin: The British commonwealth. One would have thought also that we had passed the time when anyone could seriously assert that any responsible political group in this country did not recognize, particularly in view of the interdependent character of our world and the critical nature of the current international situation, the value of the British commonwealth of nations.

It is because we have heard in this debate a number of speeches suggesting that a serious divergence has taken place between the government, on the one hand, and certain groups in opposition on the other in respect of the commonwealth's value that I rise today as one member of this house to affirm strongly that the thesis of the speech to which we have just listened cannot be supported by any policy or declaration made by the government or by any responsible group of citizens in Canada. On what does the hon. gentleman rely for the statement he makes that we have reached in Canada a critical situation regarding our appreciation of the commonwealth? On what does he rely to suggest that anything that has transpired in this country during the last few months indicates that the government of this country does not share the view of most Canadians that the commonwealth is an institution for good and for peace in the world?

I believe we must understand what is the nature of the commonwealth if we are to deal successfully with the kind of statement to which we have just listened. Does it rest on the ground that one constituent member of the commonwealth must be regarded as not having any faith in the commonwealth because, in a matter of some importance, it has sought to take a course that was not wholly consistent with the course taken by another member of that commonwealth? Does it mean that the commonwealth association precludes freedom of decision and judgment on the part of any of its constituents? If that is the thesis of the hon. gentleman, for whom I have the highest personal regard, as he knows, then I must say to him that that concept of the commonwealth is one that is now long out of date.

Mr. Rowe: No one knows better than you that that is not the concept.

Mr. Martin: We will not forget that in 1919 it was a Conservative prime minister, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who took serious issue at a prime ministers' conference—

Mr. Knowles: Was not Sir Robert Borden prime minister in 1919?

Mr. Martin: I am sorry, it was 1921; I thank my hon. friend for correcting the year. Mr. Meighen was attending an imperial conference in London in 1921 when he took the lead in denouncing the Anglo-Japanese alliance—

Mr. Rowe: That is the independence of which I speak.

Mr. Martin: The hon. gentleman is now recanting his position.

Mr. Rowe: I told you before that you were setting up straw men. That is the position I took.

Mr. Martin: Let me finish my remarks; then you can ask me any questions and I shall try to answer them. Mr. Meighen took the position that the Anglo-Japanese alliance was not in the interests of commonwealth unity and inimical to commonwealth-United States relations; that it was not an instrument for easing the tension that then prevailed between friendly nations; that it was not calculated to provide unity in the British Empire. Is one to argue that the prime minister of that day was not entitled to have an independent, Canadian point of view? Will anyone suggest in all seriousness that Mr. Meighen had a less appreciative concept of the commonwealth than the hon. gentleman who has just spoken?

I endeavoured when I was in Australia, speaking of the commonwealth and explaining our position, to describe my view of the commonwealth in these terms. I suspect that it represents the evolutionary character and quality of the commonwealth as it is understood today. I said:

> Like all human institutions, the commonwealth is changing and will continue to change.

If anyone challenges that observation I would ask him to read the famous speech of Lord Milner, than whom there was certainly no greater protagonist of the empire and commonwealth.

Mr. Rowe: I never challenged that.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says he does not challenge that, and that is a very important admission because of what is to follow.

Mr. Rowe: You are putting up straw men.

Mr. Martin: I continued:

> That, I suggest, has been one of the secrets of its success. It has grown and developed out of what was once a colonial empire, to become a free association of sovereign nations, made up of men and women of many races and colours and creeds but all united by their allegiance to a common crown and by their belief in the validity of the democratic process.
> The right of each member to determine for itself its attitude towards important international issues is basic to our concept of the commonwealth.
> It would be a distortion of the truth to say that our views on all important matters have always been identical. Variations in approach and emphasis are to be expected between nations that are situated in various quarters of the globe. But that is surely one of the strengths of this family association of ours—that we are able to speak frankly and thoughtfully to one another and not be misunderstood. In this way, we have in our informal and effective manner been able to get many things done and to demonstrate in the quality of our relationship the type of true international co-operation that should be the objective of all who, through the United Nations and other instruments of co-operative action, seek to build a world at peace.

That was and is my understanding of the character, the intentions and the purpose of the commonwealth.

Mr. Rowe: That was mine 30 years ago.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says that was his about 30 years ago. I am glad to know that, but it certainly was not the view he stated a few moments ago.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, yes; you were not listening.

Mr. Martin: I emphasize that the reason I expressed these views was that I was speaking in a sister country of the commonwealth at a time when the strains on all were great, and when all commonwealth members had not taken the same course in the United Nations in respect of the action of one of the important constituents of that commonwealth. An Australian newspaper, the day after, quoted approvingly this conception of the commonwealth and said its very essence consisted in that it afforded to its members the opportunity of freedom of judgment, and that that privilege could be compared with the totalitarian restrictions that did not permit under any circumstances any deviation. This is the strength of the commonwealth of nations, and I say I do not think one promotes the interests of this free association of nations by suggesting that because there have been disagreements, or shadings of disagreements, these should be regarded as an indication of a desire to destroy the unity of an instrument which at this time is one of the essentials for the peace of the world.

Mr. Lennard: What about supermen?

Mr. Martin: Now, my hon. friend says we should not sell the commonwealth short. He has not given any arguments to support the justification for that interpolation.

Mr. Lennard: You certainly did last fall.

Mr. Martin: He put a rhetorical question to this house, and by the character of the question seeks to leave the impression that the government had sold the commonwealth short. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, with confidence that on the record there is—

Mr. Lennard: On the record, yes.

Mr. Martin: —no evidence to support that kind of statement or impression.

Mr. Lennard: What about the supermen?

Mr. Martin: What is the commonwealth made of? The commonwealth, inter alia, consists of the United Kingdom, of Canada, of Australia, of New Zealand and of South Africa. It includes among others those great Asian nations of India, Ceylon and Pakistan. Do we strengthen the commonwealth by suggesting to those Asian nations in particular that because they take certain courses they are contributing to the disruption and the disunity of the commonwealth? I have had the opportunity of talking, and talking seriously, to the prime ministers of all these commonwealth countries in Asia, and I can say with confidence that I am sure if that was the view of the commonwealth generally held, it would be a view that would not be fully subscribed to by all of them.

The commonwealth is an instrument for good, not only in America, not only in Europe but in Asia, and I doubt very much whether we strengthen it in these areas by suggesting, as was suggested just now, that a difference of opinion among members of the commonwealth is to be construed as evidence of or as a desire to disrupt this important grouping of nations.

The prime minister of India said the British commonwealth was important because it was made up of independent, sovereign nations bound together by certain common factors; a common appreciation of the value of individual freedom; an appreciation of the individual as being more important than the state; and an appreciation of the value of the parliamentary processes. These are some of the important links of the commonwealth, and to suggest now that it is predicated on the fact that we must agree on everything is to suggest something that is so out of date that one wonders whether it is necessary to spend much time by way of reply to a thesis that suggests the opposite.

It is only because words such as those we have heard are calculated to do more harm than good that I, as one member of this house, feel that I should take issue with what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has been very glib in misconstruing what I said, but I will not let him say in this house that my remarks were calculated to do more harm than good. He was a mighty flatterer in his original compliments, in saying what he did, and now he is suggesting that my remarks were calculated to do more harm than good in this house. May I assure you, sir, that I was not talking about differences. I emphasized the independence we have had ever since the days of Sir Robert Borden, and I also emphasized the need for a conference, on which the minister has not touched.

Mr. Martin: I would not want for one moment to use words the hon. gentleman might find personally offensive, because the hon. gentleman is not the kind of man who deliberately seeks to do anything but good. But what I did say was that his speech today, notwithstanding what his intention may be, was not in my judgment calculated to strengthen the very organizations which he espouses so strongly.

Mr. Fulton: What about the Prime Minister's speech of November 26, when he talked about supermen?

Mr. Martin: Will anyone deny that the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Fulton: What about that?

Mr. Van Horne: What did he mean by that?

Mr. Martin: Something was said about supermen. I do not know what is meant by that.

Mr. Fulton: You were away.

Mr. Van Horne: We do not, either.

Mr. Martin: If by that is meant we are trying to pit white against coloured I say that, too, is not in the interests of preserving the unity of the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Fulton: Was that what the Prime Minister was trying to do?

Mr. Martin: Is there not another aspect of this that is important?

Mr. Van Horne: That is what we are talking about.

Mr. Martin: The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom—

Mr. Cardiff: On a point of order, who on this side said anything about colour?

Mr. Lennard: The Prime Minister did.

Mr. Martin: The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, in a speech he made the other day in the United Kingdom, said that one of the purposes of his administration would be to strengthen the Anglo-American alliance, as he called it. I am sure that all of us, aware of the tensions that prevail in the world at this time, recognize that the welfare of the freedom-loving nations depends on the existence of that alliance as well as on the association of all free nations of the world.

The hon. gentleman suggested by implication in his speech, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) who spoke yesterday, that not only were we seeking to bring about a disunity of the commonwealth—

Mr. Lennard: You have already done that.

Mr. Martin: —but we were also seeking to add to this disunity closer association with the United States.

Mr. Lennard: You are just trying to mend the fences now.

Mr. Martin: The Secretary of State for External Affairs said at the special session that Canada was a messenger boy for no country, that we were capable of arriving at independent judgments—

Mr. Lennard: Sometimes we doubt that.

Mr. Martin: —within the terms of the reference extended to us as a free, independent nation within the commonwealth of nations. He said not only were we not the messenger boy for any one country, but that by our policies and our attitudes over the past half decade we have indicated that where there were differences between ourselves and the United States we did not hesitate to firmly express our opinions and our intentions.

I would say that to seek to suggest that as a result of the course we have taken in respect of the matter of recent date we have thereby sought to move closer to the United States than to the commonwealth is not in harmony with the facts, and moreover is not in itself calculated to promote the kind of relations that should exist between Canada and Great Britain on the one hand and Canada and the United States on the other. Neither is it calculated to promote our position if we serve any purpose at all as a bridge between friendly nations, nor is it calculated to promote the very objective the British prime minister said it was one of his determinations to seek to do, to improve relations between the United States and Great Britain.

We have indicated from time to time at the United Nations and elsewhere a difference in point of view not only with Great Britain but with the United States and with other countries; and because we have expressed these differences, has that in any way alienated us in our associations, or in our friendships, or in our determination to do all we can to strengthen the existence of freedom by our association and collaboration with the United Kingdom, the United States, France and with other freedom-loving countries? The time surely is at hand when we all should realize that not only is it important that there should be the most cordial of relations between Great Britain on the one hand and the United States on the other, but that there should be a similar relationship among all the freedom-loving countries of the world.

The peace of the world at this time largely depends upon the collaboration of the United Kingdom and the United States, but it also depends upon the association for common purposes of all the freedom-loving nations of the world, and that includes the United States. Is it wrong for us, the country that is the closest neighbour of the United States, a country that has lived in relative peace with the United States for almost 150 years, to take advantage from time to time of an opportunity to affirm the peaceful intentions of the policies of the United States? When we do so, are we in any way giving evidence of less interest on our part in the commonwealth, or less appreciation of the value of the United Kingdom as one important member of that commonwealth?

Surely in this critical day when the free world finds itself, as was expressed by the President of the United States, "confronted with situations of the most serious kind", it does not seem proper for any hon. member of this house to suggest that by its policies the government of Canada is seeking to destroy the unity of the commonwealth and thereby impairing the relations that should prevail between the United Kingdom and the United States.

The hon. gentleman said we have grown up; he said that Canada is independent. If the hon. gentleman means that, and I am sure on reflection he really does mean that, surely his pronouncements should be predicated accordingly. As he himself said, a distinguished prime minister and leader of his own party played a great part at Versailles at the end of the first world war in giving expression to the new sense of nationhood which this country had acquired as a result of the heroism of her sons in that war. An independent nation within the commonwealth acts in accordance with what it conceives to be the interests of itself, of the commonwealth and of the peace of the world; and, Mr. Speaker, no other motive can be attributed to the policies of those who sit on your right in this house at this time.

It was suggested yesterday that we were giving too much support to the United Nations. I am not aware that we on this side of the house have ever said that the only consideration in our foreign policy had to do with the United Nations, but I was a little surprised when I heard the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, in what I thought was a failure on his part to appreciate the true present nature of the United Nations. I thought most of the people in this country supported those who spoke for this nation at San Francisco in 1945, when we affixed our signature to the charter of the United Nations and joined with Great Britain and the United States and other freedom-loving nations of the world in seeking by that instrument to set up for the second time in 25 years an organization by which we hoped to minimize the occasions of war and provide for our world some semblance of tranquility in order.

The signature of the prime minister of Canada was attached to the charter of the United Nations in the presence of representatives of the opposition. I well remember the late Mr. Gordon Graydon's views, and he was present at the signing of the charter in San Francisco. He was one of the staunchest friends of the United Nations and strongly supported the obligations that flowed from our signature to its charter. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will remember that at the preparatory commission of the United Nations in the fall of 1945 Mr. Graydon spoke about the value of the United Nations as it was then understood in Canada.

The view he gave then is still the view of this government and I believe of the majority in this house and in this country. There was no suggestion by him, nor is there any suggestion now by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the United Nations is a perfect organization, that it has so developed its processes of adjudication and conciliation or that its constitution is such that it is capable of dealing finally and effectively with every problem in international life today. What Mr. Graydon said and what we say now, as the President of the United States said yesterday and as Mr. Harold Macmillan, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom said a year ago in the United Nations, is that this organization with all its faults and with all the frustrations that have attended its operations in 10 years, represents for all of us in the long term the best hope for mankind.

The fact that it has not been possible to implement article 43 and give it, as an hon. member suggested yesterday, the kind of sanction necessary to make its legislative effort effective is not because of any fault of Canada, nor is it the fault of the United States or of the United Kingdom. If the United Nations has not yet achieved the powers involved in the kind of sanction that would make this organization fully effective, for example, in the case of Hungary, the fault lies at the doorstep not of any country in the free world but of the Soviet union, which has consistently refused to give effect to the implications of article 43. To say that the United Nations is one of the cornerstones of our foreign policy is not to suggest that we believe it to be a perfect instrument or organization; it is certainly no justification for the view that we have abandoned the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or that we have abandoned reliance on the potential and actual value of the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Churchill, as prime minister of the United Kingdom, had much to do with the setting up of the United Nations. He and Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Mackenzie King, among others, played a great part in the inception of that organization and no one would suggest that because Mr. Churchill had been disposed to act as he did he was anxious to see the liquidation of the empire in which he found so much to be admired. To suggest that we have abandoned our other obligations in the commonwealth or under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is to suggest something that is simply not in harmony with the facts. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said he knew that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was a confirmed believer in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He acknowledged that in answer to a question I put to him at the end of his speech.

Mr. Churchill: I did not say anything about his being a confirmed believer. I said he had applied himself—

Mr. Martin: But it was said that he was not vigorously extending his views to the public of Canada on the value of this organization. I do not know of anyone in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization who consistently, year after year, month after month and day after day, has done so much to promote, integrate and strengthen that organization as the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was he not one of three men selected by his own colleagues in NATO to seek additional ways of strengthening that organization as an instrument not of aggression but of defence against possible aggression from any quarter?

No, Mr. Speaker; we were forced to give support to the idea of NATO not because we lacked faith in the United Nations, not because we lacked faith in the commonwealth, but because it was not possible in the United Nations to get the amount of force collectivized for given situations which we considered vitally necessary. And this was the result of the attitude which the Soviet union took as late as 1947, and in which it has persisted ever since. That was why the North Atlantic Treaty Organization came into being. It was not because we did not have an appreciation of the United Nations as a force for good and peace in the world; it was not because we deprecated the value of the commonwealth. It was simply because we recognized that because of the character of the world as we found it then, and as it is now, there was no other course open to us. It is wrong to suggest that because we now give support to the United Nations that is our only concern. No man does himself justice when he says that because of our advocacy of the United Nations we have lost faith in any other association of nations with which we have had close collaboration.

Mr. Rowe: Why not call a conference?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says why not call a conference? The British commonwealth of nations is an organization of closely-knit members who have so much in common, and these links are essential for holding together those nations in the commonwealth and outside who recognize the nature of the gulf between themselves and those countries controlled by communism, or dominated by the Soviet union or by any other group of communist countries. Mr. Speaker, it is not desirable in my judgment if we would ease existing tensions; it is not in my judgment in the interest of the unity that prevails among commonwealth members and between close allies such as the United States, to suggest that our policies in the past months have been directed to purposes that would destroy the commonwealth or the friendship we have with certain countries whose existence or power is essential at this time for the preservation not only of the commonwealth, not only of the United States, not only of India but of all free peoples throughout the world.

Mr. Michener: Will the minister permit a question? I shall be very brief. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the minister may not have covered the point which I would like to raise with him. In putting a value on these relationships—and I think the house agrees with that—he does not seem to have dealt with this difficulty . . .

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Michener: Does the minister not see some conflict between our relationship with our commonwealth friends and the action the government took in using the United Nations as an alternative; and was the choice of the United Nations not the choice of an imperfect instrument for the job that had to be done?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is a better student than I am of the charter of the United Nations, and I am sure he knows that the course taken by us was taken in full conformity with the solemn obligation we gave when we signed that charter.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in the closing minutes of what is probably the last debate on the speech from the throne in this parliament, I intend to speak about the economic condition of the people in the area of that part of Canada which I have the honour to represent.

Today many of the producers in that part of Canada are bankrupt, and the people in the communities and cities are facing an economic slump. I wish to discuss this matter very briefly, and to close in time to give the government an opportunity to reply to an amendment I propose to move at the close of my remarks.

The cause of the economic conditions in that part of Canada is the extent to which the cost of living has been allowed to rise in recent years, seriously affecting the producers' operating costs. Each year costs of operation of the agricultural producers have spiralled until today, with decreasing returns, they are facing bankruptcy, as I have said. Every other business in Canada affected by increasing costs of operation merely passes on those increased costs in the form of increased prices to the consumer.

The Liberal government is solely responsible for the present spiral in the cost of living. I well recall when in the years following world war II the government proposed to lift price controls. We pleaded with them to leave the controls in force. We told them that if they took off price controls costs of living and costs of operation would spiral, and we would have an inflationary result in Canada that would ultimately bring about the ruination of the country. They replied, "Oh, well, there is nothing to fear; there may be a few increases in the cost of living, but the law of supply and demand will soon operate and competition will come into play in such a way as to level off everything".

There has been no levelling off. The cost of living and the cost of operating have continued to increase year by year over the past 10 years. Either there is no competition, or the so-called law of supply and demand is not operating.

What I wish to emphasize, however, is that in Canada there is one industry which cannot pass on its increased costs of production to the consumer, and that industry is agriculture. No business can long continue to operate when its costs of operation are greater than the returns to the industry. In support of what I have said I am going to quote the words of the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool when he recently referred to the condition of the farmers in the prairie area. At that time he said:

> The price he received for his grain and other agricultural products was too low to keep the average farmer out of debt. . . . The result is that many farmers are dipping into reserves to keep going while other farmers are accumulating debts which will be extremely difficult to pay at present prices.

Here is the ominous part of the whole situation. What of the future? Nothing has been done, nothing is being done to prevent the cost spiral from continuing. He went on to point out:

> The disparity between costs and prices will in all probability continue to have a serious effect on farm people throughout the coming year.

It is because of the emergency facing these farmers that I rise at this time to protest the existing situation and the do nothing policy of the present government. In fact it is even worse than that. As evidence of what is happening, may I say that young, efficient farmers by the hundreds are selling out and leaving the farms even in the very constituency of the Minister of Agriculture, who was sent here 20 years ago to take care of agriculture and look after that industry for Canada. A more deliberate ruination of agriculture can scarcely be imagined.

Since the government are responsible for this condition, one would have thought that at least they would have introduced some measures to alleviate the situation. At least a parity price program could have been introduced which would have maintained a proper relationship between the selling prices of the farmers' goods and their income on the one hand and their costs on the other. Then the farmer could survive. But the government has left the farmer to the mercies of a cost-price squeeze.

Agriculture is one industry which cannot control its sales or prices, and a parity price program is imperative if agriculture is to survive. The Liberal government and private Liberal members from Saskatchewan as well as the other prairie provinces, have always voted against a parity price program, and the prairie farmer is being left in a bankrupt state. Last year when cash advances were needed Liberal members voted against them. The government has failed to provide interior government storage for surplus grain in order to prevent spoilage, permit farm deliveries and give relief to the producers. The government has refused to do anything.

What contribution has the Minister of Agriculture made? In the face of the present deplorable condition of agriculture, for which he is responsible as minister, he continues to give the impression in the east and the west that farmers in the prairie areas are well off, in spite of every evidence to the contrary; and the minister knows it. He has not only failed to protect agriculture but has left agriculture open to the dangers of inflation. This misrepresentation of the actual conditions of the farmers of the west can only be described as one of the greatest betrayals of agriculture the history of Canada has ever known.

Millions of bushels of grain are wasting on the prairies. Millions of bushels of grain are piled in heaps or in bins open to the weather. If storage had been provided when the surplus accumulated this waste could have been prevented. This is the situation we have at a time when a billion people in Asia and Africa are hungry, people whose good will we need so badly. If the government had spent one-tenth of what it has spent on armaments, many of which are obsolete, on the feeding of these people and the promotion of peace we could have relieved the situation of the farmers and helped agriculture. The government continues to spend almost $2 billion a year on armaments and less than one-tenth of that amount in trying to promote peace and create good will.

In view of the fact that agriculture must have parity prices I move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell), the following amendment:

> That the motion be amended by adding the following words to the said address:
> "We regret, however, that Your Excellency's advisers seem to favour a flexible price support program, the effect of which is to leave the agricultural industry in a state of uncertainty and insecurity; we also regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take the necessary steps to establish a system of parity prices for agricultural products at levels to ensure 100 per cent parity of income for agricultural producers."

Mr. R. E. Reinke (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion to speak very briefly on two or three matters that are of paramount interest to myself, to the people of my constituency and to Canada as a whole. First of all may I sincerely congratulate the mover (Mr. Hanna) and seconder (Mr. Robichaud) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both these hon. gentlemen lived up to past traditions in that respect.

One of my reasons for speaking at this time is to pay tribute to my friend the late Mr. Ross, former member for Hamilton East. I know that when parliament assembled last November the usual eulogies were expressed, but I do wish to pay my respects on behalf of the people of his constituency and of Hamilton. Mr. Ross was one of those persons who very seldom spoke in the house, but our people back home appreciated a quality in him which was much more important, that of getting things done. I wish he could have been here yesterday when the estimates were tabled to see the results of some of his endeavours. I wish to thank the Minister of Public Works and the government for their understanding of our problems in Hamilton and their confidence in the future of our expanding city.

This year, according to the 1957-58 estimates just tabled, the Department of Public Works will be spending $1,700,000 for harbour improvements and developments. These expenditures have been brought about to a great degree by the tenacity with which the late Mr. Ross represented Hamilton East. For the information of hon. members I might also add that while this large amount is to be spent in Hamilton, the benefits will be felt throughout the surrounding area over the next few years. Hamilton is the hub of shipping for this area. We rank third in all Canada for tonnage shipped. It is the hub for such cities as Niagara Falls, St. Catharines, Guelph and so on. Once again, as I have said, we have broken the tonnage record for Hamilton.

I now wish to say just a word about another matter of great importance. Many members of this house have spoken about an increase in pension for the old age pensioner. I have subscribed to this measure from the day I first arrived here, and I am pleased that this worth-while cause has caught fire. This is a problem of interest to everyone. We all expect to be senior citizens some day. The welfare of our senior citizens is everyone's business. Life expectancy is increasing, so it is becoming more and more necessary that greater attention be paid to this group. I believe an increase at this time will greatly enhance the opportunity for full employment, in which the government has always been interested. It will put more money in circulation, will cause more goods to be consumed in Canada, and will contribute toward a more orderly distribution.

I do not believe that by increasing the old age pension any incentive to thrift or economy will be lost. On the contrary, every dollar paid to old age pensioners will be spent on goods and services, and will help create a better standard of living for others. It is indeed demoralizing in our economic and social system to have one group of people live under stringent circumstances. I realize, of course, that an increase in the old age pension will present a problem to our government. According to our estimates, just tabled, family allowance payments in 1957-58 will amount to $412,265,000; old age security payments for 1957-58 will amount to $392,536,000, making nearly $805 million for these two important items alone.

An increase of $20 per month would bring our expenditure for old age security to nearly $600 million, or the two combined to nearly $1 billion, almost 20 per cent of our total budget. But I believe most Canadian citizens are anxious to pay for these allowances, and when I say "most" I include persons in both high and low income brackets. I have not had one complaint about the 2 per cent deduction added to personal income tax for this purpose, and if necessary I am sure the average person would gladly pay 3 per cent to give our older folks a better life.

I feel, however, that some of our provinces have been rather shoddy in their approach to this problem of assistance to our aged. I believe that people today are expecting more in the way of security, and are prepared and anxious to pay for it. In an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of yesterday I notice that reference is made to the new tax-free pensions in Germany. I have not time to read the article now, but just briefly it indicates that under present economic conditions there, a man retiring after 40 years of work would get a tax-free pension of up to $110 a month, the equivalent in purchasing power of about $220 here. The amount would increase in the case of inflation. The opposition socialists say the plan does not go far enough. Of course I suppose socialists, like our friends opposite, are the same anywhere in the world. It seems to me that this is a comprehensive type of plan and one which we probably could not extend that far.

On a former occasion, Mr. Speaker, I spoke rather elaborately about the national health insurance plan. I do not propose to deal with that matter at this time, except to say that in view of the generous proposal made by this government for a plan which will cover all Canadians I think it is a shame that at least one of the two larger provinces does not accept the proposal. I hope the people of Canada, and particularly those in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, realize that without this acceptance by one or the other of these largest provinces we cannot have a majority of Canadians participating, and the rest of Canada is to suffer as a result.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY PAYMENTS, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 26—Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. How much has been paid by the federal government to the government of Nova Scotia under the Trans-Canada Highway Act?
2. Has the government of Nova Scotia signed a new agreement under the 1956 amendment to the act?
3. If so, (a) on what date; (b) what route is specified; (c) what "gap" has been designated?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

1. $1,097,639.31 to January 12, 1957.
2. Yes.
3. (a) September 4, 1956.

(b) Generally from the New Brunswick-Nova Scotia border to Oxford; thence via route 4 to Sutherland river; thence via Merigomish, Arisaig and Antigonish to the strait of Canso, crossing the strait via the causeway to Port Hastings; and thence via Whycocomagh and Baddeck to the Newfoundland ferry terminal at North Sydney. The trans-Canada highway in Nova Scotia shall also include that portion of highway from the junction of the West River-Pictou road at route 4, to Pictou, and thence to the Prince Edward Island ferry terminal at Caribou.

(c) No "gap" section has been designated to date.

SUEZ CRISIS—EGYPTIAN REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING EMERGENCY FORCE

Question No. 42—Mr. Poulin:

Does the Canadian government have any information to the effect that, during the Suez crisis last fall, the prime minister of Egypt, or someone on his behalf or on behalf of his government, made representations through diplomatic channels or otherwise, including the United Nations Organization and the officer commanding the international police force, concerning (a) the uniform to be worn by a group of Canadian servicemen about to join the international police force; (b) the flag such group would fly?

Answer by: Mr. Cardin, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

The answer to both these questions is "No". We have been informed that during the discussions last November, between the Secretary General of the United Nations and the government of Egypt, reference was made to the similarity in the uniform worn by Canadian troops to that worn by British forces, as a possible source of misunderstanding on the part of the Egyptian public. There were no representations, however, that Canadian troops participating in the United Nations emergency force would wear anything but their own uniforms together with the distinctive arm bands and headgear that were to be worn by all members of UNEF. Also, on the question of flags, there have been no representations to the Canadian government by or on behalf of the government of Egypt. The force as a whole, of course, operates under the United Nations flag, which is flown at the various headquarters and camps. National flags are, however, also flown on appropriate occasions and regulations governing this practice are being formalized by the United Nations authorities.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—TAX COLLECTIONS

Question No. 55—Mr. Holowach:

What was the total amount of (a) income taxes; (b) succession duties, collected from Indians on reserves for the years 1953, 1954 and 1955?

Answer by: Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue):

No statistical information available.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the following members, namely: Messrs. Ashbourne, Bertrand, Blair, Boivin, Bonnier, Brown (Brantford), Bryson, Campbell, Cardiff, Charlton, Dechene, Dickey, Fairclough, Mrs., Fairey, Fontaine, Gauthier (Nickel Belt), Gingras, Girard, Gour (Russell), Habel, Hansell, Healy, Hodgson, Houck, Howe (Wellington-Huron), Huffman, James, Johnson (Kindersley), Kickham, Langlois (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere), Leduc (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle), Lefrançois, MacEachen, Maltais, Mang, McGregor, McIvor, McWilliam, Patterson, Pommer, Rea, Regier, Robinson (Bruce), Rochefort, Schneider, Simmons, Small, Smith (York North), Stanton, Stick, Thibault, Weaver, Wylie and Zaplitny will act as members on the part of this house on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house has appointed Messrs. Bertrand, Bourque, Brown (Essex West), Castleden, Coldwell, Dechene, Dinsdale, Fairey, Fraser (St. John's East), Fraser (Peterborough), Gingues, Gourd (Chapleau), Habel, Hamilton (York West), Hansell, Hellyer, Henderson, Hosking, Howe (Wellington-Huron), Hunter, Jones, Jutras, Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare), Knight, LaCroix, Leduc (Gatineau), Legare, Lennard, McCulloch (Pictou), McGregor, McWilliam, Philpott, Pickersgill, Ratelle, Reinke, Robinson (Bruce), Shaw, Small, Smith (York North), Smith (Battle River-Camrose), Thibault, Tucker, Weselak and White (Middlesex East), a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house has appointed Miss Aitken, Messrs. Buchanan, Caron, Castleden, Ferguson, Gauthier (Nickel Belt), Gingues, Gour (Russell), Hardie, Harkness, MacNaught, Mang, Masse, McGregor, Michaud, Monette, Pommer, Richard (Ottawa East), Shipley, Mrs., Simmons, Stewart (Winnipeg North), Stick, White (Hastings-Frontenac), and Yuill, to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the parliamentary restaurant, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

UNITED STATES DISPOSAL POLICY—PROTESTS BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the report of a speech he made last evening at the Seigniory club with regard to what was described as the rough disposal policy of the United States? It had to do with the fire sale, give-away policy with respect to agricultural products and in particular wheat.

I should like to ask the minister this question. When was the last protest made to the United States against this type of disposal program, which violates GATT and the resolution of FAO, and what reply was received to that latest protest? Was the protest in writing? If so, would the minister table that protest and the reply?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the two governments have appointed a continuing committee of senior civil servants of both governments to deal with these matters. The committee meets from time to time. I think the last meeting was some two or three weeks ago. Protests are filed through that committee, and sometimes remedial action is taken. Protests, I may say, are sometimes filed in both directions. In any event we find that committee has been useful as a means of conveying our protests, and has had some effect in discouraging certain policies to which we in Canada take strong objection. There is nothing to table. We do not file our protests in writing; we file them through the committee.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the minister say what changes have been made in consequence of the complaints that have been made to the United States government through this committee? Would the minister also say what is being done so that Canada may recover her position as the leading exporter of wheat, a position which has been seriously endangered as a result of United States action?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, to discuss in parliament the subject matters that are dealt with by the committee would be to destroy the usefulness of the committee.

An hon. Member: What usefulness?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not know that it is particularly in the public interest to discuss the kind of transactions we object to. Certain transactions we do object to; but to single them out and discuss them on the floor of the house would, as I say, seriously prejudice the future of the continuing committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I might follow up that matter I should like to do so. The making of an announcement outside of the house is much worse than making it in the house. I wanted to get particulars. Possibly I shall direct my question to the Prime Minister in order to get information on this matter. I ask him whether when he last met President Eisenhower and brought to the President's attention the serious situation brought about by the trade balance between Canada and the United States, which caused shock to the President when he found it out, he also let the President know how utterly unjust and unfair it is for the United States to carry on this disposal policy to the detriment of fair competition on the part of Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I cannot assure the hon. gentleman that I used the language he has just used in his question, but I did make it quite clear to the President that we endeavour to have as good relations as possible with his great country in trade policies as well as in other policies, and I found that he was disposed to do everything he could under the circumstances to conserve that state of good relations and the feeling among the populations of the two countries that we were endeavouring to be of as great help to each other as possible.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Has the Canadian government considered any new policies for the disposal of Canadian wheat, such as accepting local currency, as I understand the United States is doing in the case of India in connection with a contract for the sale of 120 million bushels of wheat over a three-year period?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): In spite of our admiration for our neighbours to the south there are some of their policies we do not take as examples of proper policies for Canada.

Mr. Argue: The question is this. Is the Canadian government considering any additional policies for the sale of Canadian wheat other than the current policy of accepting dollars?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The Canadian government is always considering what policies will be the most effective, and it is continuing to do so. As soon as there is any important change decided upon it will be announced to the house.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of his answer to the Leader of the Opposition. He said in his answer that he thought this question was of little public interest. Does he think there is anything of greater public interest to the producers whose sales are being adversely affected by these unfair trade practices being put into effect by the United States?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member failed to understand my answer, and I am not surprised.

Mr. Hees: I am sure I did not fail to understand, and if I did would the Minister of Trade and Commerce please give his answer again so I can understand it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My hon. friend can read it in Hansard tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce supplementary to the question asked by my leader. I will have to take my chance, Mr. Speaker, with respect to whether I understood his answers any better than the hon. member for Broadview. Is the minister now stating as government policy that it is no longer in the public interest to let the people of the country know what case is being put forward on their behalf in negotiations with foreign powers on trade matters?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): What exactly did the minister mean when he answered the question originally?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I seem to have satisfied the hon. leader who asked the question. I thought that was doing fairly well.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the minister that he did not satisfy me any more than he has satisfied me on previous occasions, but I am getting so used to the usual government mumbo-jumbo with respect to answering questions that I did not pursue it.

[Later:]

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, at whatever risk I do so. Did the minister not say that in view of the fact that there was a committee of civil servants considering this particular question it was not desirable that the matter should be discussed or information given in the house?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, that is correct. The committee meets in camera, and to discuss any matter that has been referred to the committee would impair and probably destroy its future usefulness.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does that leave us in the situation that whenever a committee of civil servants is appointed to discuss a matter, we in this house must regard it as something that we cannot discuss?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, is that an urgent question to be put on the orders of the day?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: It is most important.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I suggest to you, sir, that the rules you used to apply should continue to be applied in the case of questions that are put on the orders of the day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —does the Prime Minister not believe that parliament has a right to hear? Is everything to be hidden under the new policy or the continuation of the old one that is being followed—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Questions for one hour every day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —by the government, of concealing all information that it does not want parliament or the people to have? I do protest against the suggestion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that when a matter is submitted to civil servants it shall not be submitted to parliament.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If the hon. gentleman reads what was being talked about before he rose and reads his own remarks, he will find how inappropriate they are to what has been the subject of discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are very appropriate. Hide everything. That is the game.

HEALTH INSURANCE

REPORTED PROSPECTIVE INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION BY ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare based on a long-distance phone call from Toronto just a few minutes ago. Is the minister aware that this afternoon's edition of the Toronto Telegram carries a report that on Monday Premier Frost will make an announcement, and that on Tuesday he will introduce legislation implementing Ontario's agreement with Ottawa with respect to the federal government's hospitalization insurance program? Is the minister aware that this report says that certain modifications have been made in the proposal put forward by the federal government last year? Can the minister comment on this report now that it is out in public?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): At first I thought my hon. friend was going to say that Premier Frost had telephoned him. I am relieved to know that the undoubted friendly qualities of my hon. friend do not extend that far. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Parkdale has just come to me to give notice of his desire to ask the same question.

Mr. Hees: Why not ask the question for him?

Mr. Martin: I am not aware of such a story except from what I have been told by the two hon. gentlemen. I can only say now that there has been correspondence between the premier of Ontario and the Prime Minister of Canada in this matter and that there have been discussions between Premier Frost and myself, between his officials and our officials, and that as a result the premier of Ontario did write to inquire whether or not a particular plan that he had in mind would come, in our judgment, within the scope of the federal proposals which were made to the provinces in the matter of a diagnostic and hospital insurance program.

At the end of his letter the premier asked that the communications between the two governments in this matter should not be disclosed until mutual arrangements for disclosure had been made. Until Premier Frost and I have made arrangements for the disclosure of this correspondence I would not feel that I could disclose the correspondence to the house, but I can say, without in any way revealing the contents of this correspondence, that if the premier of Ontario is prepared to do what he has indicated, then it would seem that we have made substantial progress toward the acceptance of the proposal made by the federal government.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. In the light of the hopeful announcement he has now made, is the minister still as strong as he was last year in his adherence to the principle of universal coverage in any hospital insurance program? He will recall that he had our strong support last year in his adherence to that principle.

Mr. Martin: I think, having in mind the pursuit of this desirable objective, my hon. friend ought to restrain his curiosity until the disclosures have been made.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister another supplementary question. Are similar discussions in progress between this government and other provincial governments, such as the government of Manitoba?

Mr. Martin: As I said the other day, most of the provinces have, in my judgment, seriously examined and are seriously examining the proposal we put forward. One premier, as I indicated a short time ago, was in Ottawa only the day before yesterday, partly in this connection. I myself have had discussions with a number of premiers and ministers of health and these discussions are continuing.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR FREE VOTE IN HOUSE ON INCREASED PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to either the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the throne speech debate has now been disposed of, and since many members on the government side of the house advocated increases in old age security payments and family allowances, will the government now make it possible for the house to have a free vote on whether or not it is the desire of the people of Canada to have pensions and family allowances increased?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think I should answer that question. I think it would be an extremely bad precedent for the government to ask the house by a free vote to take the responsibility, which is the government's, to recommend what should be done in respect of the expenditure of public funds.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PETERBOROUGH—INQUIRY AS TO USE OF OLD POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is any department of the government going to use the old post office building in Peterborough? If not, what is the government going to do with that vacant building?

Mr. Knowles: It will be used as Liberal headquarters in the next election.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): May I take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker?

POULTRY

REQUEST FOR MODIFICATION OF INSPECTION REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware that the health of animals inspection regulation requiring a minimum of 10,000 birds per week is being exploited to advantage by three large poultry processing plants in British Columbia, who are labelling their product "H of A approved" and in so doing are even now capturing the poultry market in that province by implying that smaller plants do not meet federal health standards despite the fact that their standards of health inspection are equal to or surpass federal requirements? If so, will the minister immediately consider modifying such regulations and allow all processing plants meeting such health requirements to label their products "H of A approved"?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was handed this question just as I came into the house. I can only say I was not aware of all the things happening that are mentioned in the question.

The facts are that in all these matters we have inspectors in plants that carry on export trade in the commodities concerned. We have no authority to have similar inspections made in other, smaller plants that buy and sell practically all their products within a province. There is no inspector put in plants by the health of animals branch, until they have been approved under provincial health requirements. Therefore any "H of A approved" marking that is put on the products is put on following provincial inspection.

In other words these must be plants that are approved by the provincial authority as putting up the products under conditions set by the provincial health regulations, and that part of it is taken care of before we enter into inspection at all. Our inspection and marking indicates that it has been checked by our people, and is to satisfy the regulations in connection with export. All the other matters having to do with the smaller plants concern the provincial authority.

Mr. Hahn: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the inspection in these plants is particularly for export purposes, and since the product is being used in the domestic market, would the minister therefore approve of the provincial body allowing the domestic use of the same "H of A approved" stamp in the small provincial plants?

Mr. Gardiner: As I understand it that is a matter that is pretty well taken in hand by the persons who import the products. They insist on inspection being made by the federal authority in connection with products they import; but the choice is made not by this government but rather by the individual operators of the packing plants, whether they process poultry or some other product; and if they do intend to export then they apply for inspection on the part of our authorities. If they do not intend to export they do not apply for federal inspection.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF INDOOR ATHLETIC TRACK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and I regret that I did not have an opportunity to give him notice in advance. During the present reconstruction of Minto armouries in Winnipeg, will consideration be given by the Department of National Defence to providing an indoor track for athletic purposes, in view of the department's emphasis on the value of track and field athletics and their general physical fitness programs?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take the question as notice. I do not know just what the detailed plans for the armoury are in that regard.

AGRICULTURE

PRODUCER MARKETING BOARDS—JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, but as he is not in his seat I would direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the supreme court has now passed judgment in respect to farm marketing boards, can the minister say whether it will be within the jurisdiction and competence of a province to allow producer marketing boards to be set up with policies designed to equalize returns to producers?

While he is answering that question I would also like him to answer a further one. In view of the majority decision of the supreme court on this question, can the minister say whether in his opinion it will be necessary for federal legislation to be introduced in order that producers may have the power to set up marketing boards which cover products going into interprovincial trade?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): When I was minister of justice I was cautioned that it was not proper to give legal opinions from my place in parliament, especially in connection with such a question as this which has to do with the interpretation of a judgment rendered on a reference that was made at the request of provincial authorities. I think it would be quite improper for me to attempt to say what will be the jurisdiction of the provinces now. They have had an answer from the court to the questions which they submitted, and I think it is for them to take the responsibility of determining to what extent it defines their proper jurisdiction in that field.

As to what may or may not be done in the way of federal legislation, that will depend upon representations we may receive from the provincial governments which are interested in the matter, and if we do receive them we will consider them very attentively.

EGGS

REPORTED EFFECT OF FEDERAL FINANCIAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that his tight money policy has contributed to the present confused situation in the egg market in western Ontario?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I have heard a good many things said about the tight money policy, but this is the first time it has been applied to eggs. However, I know that eggs are a very important source of income to farmers of western Ontario. However, I will look into the question.

Mr. Monteith: I wish to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that more eggs are on the market today than last year, and that bankers will not make secured loans to dealers in amounts sufficient to enable them to put these eggs in storage? The net result is causing confusion at all stages of the industry and resulting in prices being paid which are less than floor prices.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): In view of the fact that I have been dealing with that matter for the last three or four days—

Mr. Monteith: I addressed my question to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Gardiner: This may also bring an answer from him. As a matter of fact eggs are marketed in two different forms. The one form is fresh eggs and the other form is oil-dipped fresh eggs. We are prepared to take delivery of oil-dipped fresh eggs from western Ontario or from any other place at the price which has been established under the plan which has been operating for the last five or six years. That word has gone forward to the persons concerned in the western part of Ontario within the last hour.

Mr. Monteith: I would still like an answer to my supplementary question, that there are more eggs on the market this year and that dealers are not able to borrow sufficient money to put those eggs in storage, as has been done in previous years. What is the Minister of Finance going to do, in view of his advice to the Bank of Canada concerning the loaning of money?

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Mr. Harris: I believe that the Minister of Agriculture has cleared up the question very well.

Mr. Monteith: I do not think he did.

Mr. Harris: I think he did, with respect. In any event I promised a moment ago that I would look into the matter and if there is anything I need to do to supplement the answer made by the Minister of Agriculture, I will do it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WORKING DAYS LOST THROUGH ILLNESS AND INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister inform the house as to the total number of man working days lost through illness, as a supplement to the information that 1,261,400 man working days were lost through industrial disputes in 1956, which information was just released as the preliminary figure by the information branch of his department? And is the total time lost through illness also lower than that of previous recent years, as is the figure for time lost through industrial disputes?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have just had a very hasty glance at this question, which I received a few moments ago. I doubt very much if my department has any precise information as to the number of man working hours lost through illness. I will look into the matter. If there is anything useful which can be obtained I shall answer the question at an early date.

AIRPORTS

LONDON, ONT.—STATEMENT AS TO INSTALLATION OF SURVEILLANCE RADAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Middlesex East asked if the airport at London, Ontario, is to be equipped with surveillance radar as are the other main airports in Canada. The answer is that surveillance radar is to be installed at Halifax, Moncton, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, North Bay, lakehead, Winnipeg, Kenora, Saskatoon, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver. London will be within the range of the installation at Toronto.

[Later:]

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Were any representations or suggestions made by the airport authorities at London or by the city of London that surveillance radar be installed at London? Is he also aware that the latest issue of the Monetary Times reported that London was going to be one of the airports at which such an installation would be made?

Mr. Marler: As far as the first part of the question is concerned, the answer is that I can recall no representations of that kind having been made by the airport committee at London. So far as the location of the surveillance radar units is concerned, I may say that the location is decided by the technical advisers of my department and not by the Monetary Times.

TRANSPORT

FERRY "CABOT STRAIT"—STATEMENT AS TO REFLOATING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Queens inquired as to what progress was being made in efforts to refloat the S. S. Cabot Strait, and also asked for comment on the adequacy of the substitute service provided.

I am advised by the management of the Canadian National Railways that salvage operations are under way but that the vessel has not yet been refloated. With regard to substitute service, the management advises that the motor vessel Nonia is operating in place of the disabled ship, and daily service has not been interrupted. The management considers daily service adequate, and has pointed out that last winter there was only a tri-weekly service.

I think I should add for the information of the house that the stranding of the Cabot Strait occurred in extremely severe weather conditions. Gales were blowing up to 100 miles an hour, and there was a very heavy snowstorm and almost zero visibility.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REFERENCE TO REQUEST OF CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Did the minister notice that the Canadian Labour Congress in its brief to the government yesterday—I believe he was there and heard it—asked for an increase in the old age pension to $65 a month? Will the minister keep this figure in mind when he drafts the bill increasing old age pensions, which he will be presenting later this session?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have already dealt with that question, but the Minister of National Health and Welfare also heard the Canadian Labour Congress commend the government for the steps it has taken in the introduction of its proposal for a system of hospital insurance.

Mr. Knowles: The congress also called for a comprehensive program of health insurance, and for action without further delay.

FRUIT

CANNED PEACHES—INQUIRY AS TO SHORTAGE OF CANADIAN PRODUCT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would he inform the house whether there is or is not a shortage of Canadian canned peaches at the present time?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I will have to take notice of the question.

Mr. Pallett: May I ask a supplementary question. When the minister ascertains what the situation is, will he also ascertain why we are being served American canned peaches in the parliamentary restaurant?

OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE ON BUDGET BEFORE DISSOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Finance whether he, both as Minister of Finance and as house leader, is in a position to give assurance that if, as we expect, a budget is introduced at this session the house will be given an opportunity to debate it and express an opinion on it before dissolution?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): The progress we have been making, with the long question periods of the past ten days, has made me wonder whether we will ever reach the budget.

Mr. Lennard: It just depends when you bring it down.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is, of course, entitled to wonder as he likes, but I wonder if he would answer the question.

Mr. Harris: If a budget is delivered during this session of parliament it will not be within the next few days anyway; therefore the matter is not urgent. In any event, I think my record as house leader would lead the opposition to agree with me that I always extend the courtesy of giving them advance notice of what will be done.

Mr. Fulton: In the light of the precedents of other years, would the minister say we should take it from his answer that he is going to change that precedent, because we have not regarded it as proper or courteous when on former occasions the budget was introduced and no opportunity was given to debate it.

Mr. Harris: I have heard the observations, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED STUDY OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING WITH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would be prepared to make a statement to the house concerning the remarks he is reported to have made yesterday to the Canadian Labour Congress regarding a study of collective bargaining between the government and civil servants. May we take it from what the Prime Minister is reported to have said yesterday that this matter will be given a new look, and that it will be studied further?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this is not the sort of question that should be asked upon the orders of the day. However, I will state to my hon. friend, though I do not want to start another debate, that most of these questions are not asked for the purpose of obtaining information but for the purpose of endeavouring—

Mr. Knowles: I protest. My question was asked to obtain information that I think should be given to the House of Commons.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I am not referring to this question, but most of them seem to have been more in the way of attempts to get us to agree with criticism that is implied in the question, and I do not think that is urgent or proper in questions on the orders of the day.

[Mr. Lennard.]

I made the statement, and it is my personal position, that I have always felt that collective bargaining did not meet the constitutional practice of our system with respect to the civil service. When I heard that some form of collective bargaining was in operation—I do not know how far it goes—in the United Kingdom, I asked that further information be obtained as to what it was and how it works. That is as far as I went.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise because I take exception to the categorical manner in which the Prime Minister has spoken with respect to questions which some of us on this side of the house have asked. I feel that I at least have asked questions for the purpose of getting information, and I resent his statement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER ON ASKING OF QUESTIONS

Mr. Speaker: I think I am in duty bound to say something about the manner in which questions are being asked. I am sure there is on the part of hon. members a sincere desire to observe the rules. Standing order 39 (1) reads as follows:

> 39. (1) Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and from other members, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house, in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same; and in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

Citation 297 of Beauchesne's third edition is to the following effect:

> 297. A certain number of oral questions are permitted in practice by members, without notice, before the orders of the day are called; but these are merely allowed by courtesy in connection with the business of the house or with very urgent and important matters of public concern. They are always brief, no debate being permitted, and the replies are as concise as possible. The minister interrogated may reply at once or may direct that the usual notice be given. Such questions are governed by the same rules of order as questions of which notice has been given.

Therefore, if oral questions are to be governed by the same rules of order as questions of which notice has been given, they are subject to the following rule found in standing order 39 (1), the last part of which I will read again:

> . . . but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same; and in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

There are other citations in Beauchesne which further explain what the practice should be. I should like to cite citation 311, which reads as follows:

311. Although there may be no debate on an answer, further questions, within due limits, may be addressed to the minister as may be necessary for the elucidation of the answers that have been given. The extent to which supplementary questions may be asked is in the discretion of the Speaker.

After a minister has answered a question asked by a member when the orders of the day are called, no discussion of any kind should take place.

Then it goes on to cite a statement by Mr. Speaker Lowther in 1915 which I will not read to this house, but it is there for hon. members to consult. Citation 295 gives the details of the various rulings that have been made by my predecessors on questions asked from time to time over the years. I would also mention citations 296, 298, 299, 300, 301 and 302.

Last year I made a statement with regard to questions after having made a study of the matter, and it was my hope that the statement I made then, which was lengthy, would be the last one that I should be obliged to make. See Journals, Friday, 16th March, 1956, pages 299-305. I think it is obvious to any hon. gentleman that we may be departing from the requirements of the rules as they actually exit. I believe hon. members will agree, and this is my own view, that at question time I have been so lenient that some hon. members may have felt justified in addressing to me serious reproaches for my lack of vigilance at that stage of the proceedings. I am not going to divulge private conversations, but certain members on both sides of the house have often told me that at question time they were "getting away with murder".

They know what the rules are. We all know what they are. We also know how much more entertaining it may be to have more latitude than the rules allow. But the rules as they stand are the rules I must apply, no matter how much perhaps I personally should like to see another system established. The only way the rules can be changed is by the house itself through a committee on procedure, which would recommend certain changes and have them debated. If hon. members do not like this type of procedure—I refer to the one that is provided for—they may take the steps that are necessary to have it changed. See Beauchesne's third edition, citations 9 and 10.

What I have said today does not apply to any questions that have been asked today in particular. My remarks are not addressed to any hon. member in particular. I am not admonishing the house. I am not reprimanding anyone. I am just speaking in general as to the manner in which we have conducted ourselves, and I include members of the opposition and members of the government as well. The rules are to the effect that the replies must be concise and should not include any more facts than are necessary to give the reply. The rule applies to the question and it applies to the reply. I include myself in the remarks I have been making, because I perhaps should have been more vigilant in the interpretation and observance of the rules.

Having in mind the ambition that we all have to respect our rules, let us resolve that if we do not like them we shall change them in the manner which is provided under our rules. Let us hope we can carry on from here. I hope we may have interesting question periods just the same, but that we shall keep within the rules.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

EXCHEQUER COURT JUDGMENTS

Motion No. 1—Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of the judgment of the Exchequer Court of Canada in case No. 73805 between the Minister of National Revenue, appellant, and the Publishers' Guild of Canada Limited, respondent; and also a copy of the judgment of the Exchequer Court of Canada in case No. 78533 between the Publishers' Guild of Canada Limited, appellant, and the Minister of National Revenue, respondent.

Mr. Harris: The Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Speaker, is unavoidably absent for a short time. Perhaps this could stand until the next day when it would be called.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

BANK OF CANADA—PRESS PUBLICITY

Motion No. 2—Mr. Hees:

For a copy of all directives, instructions, press releases, etc., issued by the Bank of Canada, and of all public statements or speeches by the governor of the bank, since September 1, 1956.

SPECIAL U.N. FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Motion No. 4—Mr. Knowles (for Mr. Coldwell):

For a copy of the text of the Canadian government's reply to the questionnaire circulated to member governments, by the Secretary General of the United Nations as authorized by resolution 923(x) of the general assembly, December 9, 1955, regarding the question of the establishment of a special United Nations fund for economic development.

Education

EDUCATION

PROVISION OF NATIONAL SCHOLARSHIPS AND BURSARIES

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level who are in financial need in so far as the subject matter of this resolution is within the competence of parliament.

He said: I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to again sponsor this resolution, which has as its objective the assistance to university students in financial need by means of bursaries and scholarships. I should like to say at this time how very much I appreciate the widespread support I received in the house last year when this resolution came up for the first time. I suppose that is as it should be, because this particular crusade is essentially non-partisan. I should like also to compliment the national federation of Canadian university students for the untiring work they have done in this regard, and I would think the work in which they have persevered throughout the years will soon bear fruit.

There seems to be a considerable amount of confusion in the minds of many people about the responsibility for education in this country, and I should like to take a few minutes to point out in what ways the various jurisdictions enter into the picture. One often hears it said that the federal government of the United States does more for education than does the federal government of this country. This only serves to show up the peculiar nature of Canada, and why a policy that can be followed in the United States cannot necessarily be followed in this country. By the Quebec Act the French speaking population of Canada received certain rights. One of those rights was complete control over the education of their children. This clause was enshrined in the British North America Act, and the federal government must be very careful that its jurisdiction does not impinge on provincial jurisdiction in matters of general education.

I have cited the case of the province of Quebec, but I think I could mention any other province. I feel sure that in my own province of Ontario the provincial authorities would be very much upset, and would quickly object, if it were seen that there was any alleged interference with this exclusive provincial jurisdiction. As a result, Mr. Speaker, we may rule out the possibility of federal assistance to education on a general scale. However, there are certain special fields where the federal government does have jurisdiction and where the federal government may assist the provinces. It is interesting to note even here that, although the federal government does have jurisdiction, nevertheless the administrative control in fact comes under the provincial authority.

As I said, for many years federal assistance has been given in certain specific fields of education; for example, in technical education; in education for youth; in education in sciences, and for veterans. Hon. members will recall that last year I dealt with the legislation for veterans at considerable length, and indicated what an outstanding success it had been in this country. I need only point out to the house that on page 267 of the estimates for 1957-58, tabled on Tuesday last, the vocational schools assistance program calls for an expenditure this year of $7 million, which is up from $2 million last year. I understand that agreements will be signed with the different provinces calling for the expenditures of $40 million, which will consist of $25 million for capital expenditures and $15 million for operational expenditures over a five-year period.

Hon. members will see that what I am advocating today is not revolutionary. It is something we have been doing for some time, and that is why I am urging this house to increase this form of assistance. Hon. members will recall that last year I thought the best way of handling this matter was through a form of student aid, and that this should be done by means of grants handled through the Department of Labour. By this method needy students are assisted by committees on awards located at the different universities. These committees usually consist of several members from the provincial governments as well as a representative from the universities and a representative from the federal Department of Labour which, as I say, administers the grants for the federal government. This, then, will assure the greatest control by the provinces, which is as it should be.

This has worked out very successfully in the past, and on perusing the estimates for this year I note that an amount of $571,950 for student aid is included in youth training. This figure has not been increased over last year, and I can only conclude that undergraduate bursaries and scholarships may well come within the ambit of the proposed Canada Council which is being set up by legislation during this session.

I studied carefully the speech of the Prime Minister on Friday, January 18, concerning the proposed Canada Council, and though I did not find any specific reference to undergraduate scholarships I would gather that such is implicit in this legislation. As I understand it, an endowment fund of $50 million is to be set up, and the income from this fund used to provide scholarships and bursaries for graduate students. At the bottom of page 396 of Hansard for January 18, 1957, the Prime Minister said:

> The income will nevertheless be quite substantial and will be continually devoted to the continuance of scholarships, grants, loans and awards in the fields of the arts, humanities and social sciences.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I think it is implicit in the remarks of the Prime Minister, or in the legislation itself, that not only the best graduate students but also the undergraduate students will be assisted in this regard. It is, therefore, not within my province today to state how the money should be expended; suffice it to say that the number of bursaries and scholarships to undergraduate students in the past has been woefully inadequate. I think we are now in the fortunate position of setting up a council which will be able to arrest this trend and provide the much needed assistance for undergraduate students. Therefore I should like to congratulate the government most heartily on bringing the council into effect this year. Many people besides myself will be vitally interested to see the role that the Council will play in the matter of providing bursaries and scholarships to undergraduate students.

I should like to take a few minutes today to put on the record a few facts which I think show the great need for the assistance I have been advocating. I believe this can best be done by comparing the amount of assistance given to universities and to students in the United Kingdom, in the United States and in Canada. It is well known that students in Great Britain have been assisted by means of bursaries and scholarships for years, and the method of distributing those bursaries and scholarships has been through the University Grants Committee. Indeed, in the United Kingdom the national government provides 70.4 per cent of the current university revenues.

In the United States the system is different from that of the United Kingdom, in that there are two types of universities. There are the privately controlled universities such as Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Dartmouth and Duke; and there are the state universities such as Ohio State, Michigan State, and so on. In the former universities 63 per cent of the total income is derived from private sources, whereas the state universities, which are in effect responsible for two-thirds of higher education, receive 70.8 per cent of their total income from government sources, a figure almost identical with that of the United Kingdom.

It is interesting to learn, however, that in Canada only 40 per cent of university incomes are received from government grants, and even in the western provinces where the universities more closely approximate what they have in the United States in state universities, the grants from governmental sources do not total more than 50 per cent of the total income.

With regard to scholarships specifically, it is estimated that in 1955, 72.9 per cent of all students registered in British universities were the recipients of scholarships and bursaries in some form or another. In other words, Mr. Speaker, in the United Kingdom it is possible for a student who has the necessary intelligence to go through university assisted by scholarships and grants. In the United States things work out rather differently, but the fees payable at state universities are considerably lower than the fees payable at Canadian universities because of the substantial state grants. In addition, it is estimated that more than 20 per cent of the students attending the so-called privately controlled universities receive assistance in the form of scholarships and bursaries to the extent of paying their tuition fees. In other words, it may be concluded that in the United States three-quarters of all the students receive assistance either directly or indirectly in going through university.

Of course it should be of interest to everyone in this house to know what happens in the Soviet union. I am informed that at the Russian universities tuition fees are so low that everyone can attend and, furthermore, that 90 per cent of the Russian students are assisted by monthly living allowances during their courses in their state universities. And of course in the Scandinavian countries, unless things have changed in the last few years, no tuition fees are paid by the students.

In Canada, it is estimated reliably that not more than 14 per cent of Canadian university students receive assistance by means of bursaries and scholarships. Surely this statistic alone is adequate proof that the need in Canada is almost desperate, and that it should be the function of the Canada Council to wrestle with and find a solution to this problem.

In Canada both the federal and provincial governments must do more. It is estimated, for example, that provincial grants to universities in 1954 comprised less than 3 per cent of the total provincial expenditures or, to put it another way, amounted to less than one-tenth of the provincial expenditures on roads. It is my impression that provincial governments are doing more this year. Surely it is incumbent upon this parliament within its limited function—but a very important function, I submit, Mr. Speaker—to revise drastically upwards by one means or another our assistance to universities, and particularly our assistance in the line of bursaries and scholarships.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in French to my French-speaking fellow citizens and particularly to those of my colleagues who represent Quebec constituencies.

I would ask them to support this resolution of mine because I sincerely think that it is one of the best means of promoting national unity in Canada.

Before introducing and explaining my resolution, I want to make it clear that I am among those who recognize that the provinces have competent jurisdiction in the field of education. That is the case in the province of Ontario as well as in all the provinces which stand guard jealously over their rights in the field of education.

I know that French Canadians are proud of their language, their customs and their traditions. They are right in feeling as they do, and I congratulate them on that score. In order to maintain this character, French Canadians mean to keep control of education, in so far as it concerns them. I recognize that fact, as indeed my resolution shows. I am also convinced that most Canadians, French and English speaking, recognize it too.

I am looking forward to a better future when we shall have an active exchange of students, students who will think first and foremost as Canadians.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) on the few words he said in French. I shall now pursue my comments in a language which is familiar to me and perhaps also to other members.

Mr. Knowles: Hear! Hear!

(Text):

Mr. Michener: I would like to say how interesting I found the remarks of the hon. member for York Centre on his second presentation of this motion. It is a subject of great current interest. In fact, if a member had come into the house during the hon. gentleman's speech without having heard the order called he might have been in some doubt as to which order on the order paper was under discussion, because we had the experience a day or two ago of hearing the Prime Minister indicate that a council would be set up and that it was the intention of the government to ask parliament for $50 million as an endowment for that council, largely for the purpose of establishing scholarships.

It is perhaps a matter of judgment, Mr. Speaker, as to whether one should address one's remarks to this subject at this time or wait for the other debate which is indicated on the order paper. I have been in some doubt on that subject. It is a question of which is the cart and which is the horse in this case. Perhaps one might say, as the hon. member for York Centre has priority in time, that at least if the government is the cart it is a pushcart being pushed by its backbenchers in this case. The lead has not come from the front.

This motion is qualified by three very interesting words which appear at the end, and I shall read the last line:

> . . . in so far as the subject matter of this resolution is within the competence of parliament.

I propose to speak briefly on this subject under three headings. The first is the general need of scholarships for university students; second, the capacity of the federal government to provide funds for such purposes; third, I propose to deal with the question of the competence of parliament which is implicit in the motion itself.

Concerning the question of need, I think every hon. member of this house has a fair appreciation of the needs of the Canadian universities. They have been the subject of a great deal of discussion in the press and of many conferences in the least year or two, and on many occasions they have been the subject of discussions in this house. So there can be no doubt in the minds of hon. members of this house concerning the needs of Canadian universities if they are to fulfil their function in the years ahead. We are in a forecasting mood these days. We have been looking ahead; we see the possibility of a great increase in the number of students attending universities and are aware of the needs of the universities in expanding their facilities. This resolution, however, primarily directs itself to the needs of the students themselves.

I think it would be a contribution to the debate if I called your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a paper which was delivered in this city a few months ago at the national conference of Canadian universities called on the subject of Canada's crisis in higher education. One paper was delivered by Dr. R. W. B. Jackson and Dr. W. G. Fleming, both of the department of national research of the Ontario College of Education. The subject of the paper was "Who goes to university?". On page two these gentlemen posed the problem in the following terms:

> The question "Who should go to university?" implies an unrealized ideal—a discrepancy between what should be and what is. For just as it is obvious that our universities come very far from attracting and retaining all the young people with aptitudes, interests, and traits of character needed to profit from a university education, it is equally apparent that many of those now enrolled in our universities lack the qualifications for success. The failure rates now prevailing—30 per cent is common—are intolerable even in an economy as wealthy as ours.

Following considerable discussion of the subject they arrived at conclusions which are far from satisfactory, but perhaps they are the best that could be given from the knowledge which is available. This is the first conclusion recorded on page 25:

> . . . we may summarize the findings about "Who Goes to University" in this way. We really know appallingly little about our university students, in general or in particular.

I think that is a rather grave admission in these times of attempts to deal rationally with and make adequate plans for the future. The second conclusion is as follows:

> The little we do know all points to the inescapable conclusion that we are extremely wasteful of our limited resources of human talent; we may be utilizing little more than one-quarter, perhaps at most one-third, of the talents of our gifted young men and women.

To my mind that is another extremely serious statement. The third conclusion reads:

> We must secure more information before we can do any sensible planning, and we must be prepared to pay the cost in time, effort, and money.

This section of the paper concludes:

> Finally, if we are short of trained personnel, it is our own fault. The intellectual and other abilities are present in sufficient quantity in every generation; we not only fail to use them, we fail even to recognize them.

There, I think, is the justification of the need for more scholarships on a broad basis in Canada to make use of the available abilities of this generation which, as indicated in the statement I read, are not being given the opportunities and advantages which with our democratic philosophy and ideals we recognize as the right of every citizen in equal measure. It is the democratic ideal, which we have demonstrated in elementary education, to give equal opportunity to all students. In fact it has been made compulsory for students to attend school to an age which almost completes high school education. That principle of equality which is the background of our political system, and our concept of freedom and government should also extend to university education. Opportunity should be made available along the lines I have indicated.

The next question is, what are the needs of the students themselves? We have had some very interesting help on this subject. All hon. members have received the brief to which my hon. friend referred, presented by the national federation of Canadian university students. The one I hold in my hand is dated January 25, 1956. It is now a year old, but it shows very careful consideration by the people who ought to know of what it costs to attend university and what the prospects are for a young man or woman who is not fortunate enough to have family backing which will assure him the means to complete a year or two or three of higher education.

This document, signed by Mr. Peter G. Martin and Mr. Harry Arthurs, may have been brought up to date, but it is a clear indication from the students that it is not now possible with the current costs of university education for an ordinary person to earn and pay his own way through university. Certainly some will do it. I recall very well that when I was attending the University of Alberta there was a young man in attendance who was the envy of us all. He was an enterprising sort of fellow who went out selling Wearever aluminum products in the summer and always came back with $1,000 or $1,500 in cash which was more than he needed in those days to pay his tuition and expenses for a year at the university.

The best evidence we have today is that on the average the student who works to good advantage during the summer will make $600 net and will return to university with that sum, which he can put toward his costs; but it does not begin to cover the entire expense. The average cost of a year at university is $1,200, and that ranges from $900 in some of the smaller colleges to $1,400 at McGill. Depending on private support as it does, McGill has, I think, higher tuition fees than most universities. The student who averages $600 net has a shortage of approximately $600. Although one might say to a student, "You are an enterprising young man in a country of vast opportunity. You can make your own way through and if necessary stay at work for a year and save enough to go to university for three years in succession," it does not work out that way in practice.

The challenge to make the best use of the abilities of our young people is a grave one. I agree completely with the proposition that in Canada we should have scholarships based on ability, which will ensure that all young men and women who have the capacity for higher education shall have an opportunity to obtain it. I could cite many other documents in support of the proposition, but I think it is generally accepted.

The next point is the capacity of the federal government to provide funds for a comprehensive system of scholarships. University students in their federation asked for 2,500 annual awards, each tenable for four years, at a cost of approximately $5.5 million a year, a very modest beginning. The scope of scholarships which exist today is substantially in excess of that figure, and we are now setting aside a substantial sum of money, though not large within the figures with which the federal government deals. There is no question when one considers the real taxation, the amount of money which our expanding economy produces, and the surplus which is produced by the taxation level maintained by this parliament and this government, that the sums are available.

This year the estimates which have just been tabled called for an expenditure of $5 billion, more than was ever spent in one year except in the year of highest expenditure during the war, 1943-44, when the estimates ran to something like $5,400 million. That is a sum which I think we will be asked to exceed this year when all the supplementary estimates are in. I dare say the Minister of Finance will undertake to find that sum on a balanced basis. There is no question of the capacity of the federal treasury to meet these educational demands.

The further point which I wish to make is that which the hon. member raises in his motion, the competence of the federal authority to enter into this field. Of course that is a serious question. The basic document is the British North America Act. In section 91 it deals with the matters under federal jurisdiction. Section 91 does not mention education. The nearest approach to it is the section dealing with the establishment of penitentiaries, which has nothing remotely to do with education. Then in section 92 the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures are dealt with. Education is not there, for the simple reason that education was so definitely a matter of provincial concern and so jealously guarded by the provinces which entered into confederation that they made a special section 93 for education which says:

> In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education . . .

Then there are some provisos which do not affect the argument which I wish to make on that point. There is the scheme of confederation. It has been recognized. I see an instance of it right here in the letter which has been submitted to the members. The Canadian school trustees' association wrote to all members of parliament in April, 1956, and I shall read one sentence of their letter, as follows:

> This year a delegation proposed to present a brief to the cabinet based on that report. Unfortunately the Prime Minister has declined to receive the delegation as he contends that education is a provincial matter.

I propose to present a question to the house. How can this need be filled within the concept of our confederation? I for one do not wish to shatter any of the rights of the provinces in the educational field. That was clearly written into the constitution. Those rights are very jealously prized, particularly by the province of Quebec, and certainly I believe this house should pay every respect to that feeling on the part of the provinces in their control over education.

As the hon. member for York Centre said, the government has taken a fairly active part in educational matters in the past. It is worth while to take a look at the pattern of this. First, there was support for the various scholarships with which we are all familiar. Some 55,000 veterans enjoyed federal assistance in secondary and undergraduate education. Of these, 44,000 were in the universities for more than a year, all with federal funds. That apparently was not regarded as a serious inroad into provincial jurisdiction.

Then we have the dominion-provincial vocational training scheme to which the hon. member has referred. It is interesting to note that in 1952-53 there were 6,000 trainees in the province of Quebec, 1,500 in the province of Ontario, and 1,500 in all the other provinces, making a total of 9,000 who were receiving training which must be considered as educational training at the expense of the federal treasury. But that of course was under agreement between the provinces and the federal government, voluntarily entered into; it was not unilateral action. It was in a different category than the proposals which are apparently anticipated in the establishment of the Canada Council.

Then in addition there are the scholarships granted annually by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The Department of National Defence has a good many scholarships under the defence research board. The Department of Trade and Commerce also has some, more particularly the national research council which offered in 1955-56 a total of 267 scholarships for a total of $336,000. This year there are 250 summer research scholarships of $800 each for teachers of engineering and natural science.

We have a precedent here for the expenditure of federal funds in the provision of educational scholarships. The hon. member has not proposed any scheme, he has simply recommended that scholarships be founded. The question arises, why does not the present government make these expenditures for these scholarships by means of direct grants to the provinces without any strings attached except that they are to be grants for educational purposes? The other question is this. Could these scholarships be arranged by agreement with the provinces so as to preserve the principle which I have said we should not treat lightly?

What is the answer to the first question of why the government in its own measure, which we will be discussing presently, does not propose to provide these scholarships for the provinces by a lump sum grant for scholarship purposes, trusting the provincial governments, which are responsible to the electorate, to carry them out satisfactorily? The grants proposed are to be made to the Canada council to be set up and they are to be administered by them. Therefore an intermediary is placed between the federal treasury and the recipients of the scholarships. If the scheme of confederation is to be observed, surely these payments should be made to the provinces for the same purposes or be made under agreement with the provinces so that there is no question of federal interference in educational matters.

This is only part of what is necessary in Canada. We know that the need for scholarships is great. We also know that the needs of secondary and primary education are even greater. The problem is of such proportions that I suggest to the house that the answer to my question why the government does not authorize grants for education directly to the provincial authorities is that by doing so the federal government admits that it has been withholding from the provinces by overcentralization of revenues funds which they should have to carry out their responsibilities. It would be a clear admission if the federal government said to the provinces today: Here is $200 million for educational purposes, which you need, and gave it to them voluntarily.

A payment given voluntarily for education without any strings could not be considered a breach of the constitution but it would be an admission that the overcentralization that has continued since the provinces gave up their taxing authority under stress of war has been continued to the disadvantage of the provinces in carrying out their very essential and necessary functions.

My conclusion, Mr. Speaker, is that I support the idea of the resolution and will vote for it. However, I have very definite reservations as to the method by which this obvious need is to be met. I have explained those reservations. I think it is the duty of the federal authority not to impinge. When there are ways in which education can be assisted from the federal treasury, if it must be so assisted, which are within the principles of division of authority and responsibility and are acceptable, then certainly we should not do these things in ways which are not acceptable to any of the provinces of Canada.

I am sorry that we are in a position where the federal treasury has all the money and the provincial treasuries are not able to meet their responsibilities. It would be simpler if they were because then those governments, responsible to the same electorates, would undertake to discharge their responsibilities. They have every bit as much appreciation of the needs of education at the primary, secondary and university levels as we in the federal field have. As I say, I am sorry that they are not in a position to do so.

We on this side of the house have urged the government to look a little more realistically at the division of taxing authority and not to be so niggardly in their dealings with the provinces. The surpluses that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is able to produce could well be devoted to giving the provinces an area in which they could raise educational funds. But in the circumstances that exist, and that is what we must look at because these things are urgent, I agree that as the money is here and the need is there it is only logical that they should be brought together. The reservation I have is as to the method.

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) upon the introduction of the resolution now before the house. I believe that last year the hon. member introduced a similar resolution and I was pleased to notice that it received widespread support from both sides of the house. While I have not had time to prepare adequately the reasons why I am very much in favour of the resolution, nevertheless I should like to take this opportunity of making a brief statement endorsing the resolution wholeheartedly.

It is needless to point out that under our constitution the field of education is a matter which comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces. In view of this, I am glad to note that the resolution is worded in such a manner that the legislation asked for is only such as will be within the competence of parliament.

Education

The resolution asks that the government consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level.

Although I do not pose as a constitutional lawyer, I can see nothing wrong in a constitutional way with this parliament voting to enact legislation providing for national scholarships; nor can I see any threat to the constitution or any invasion of provincial rights by the government instituting legislation of this kind.

I was very interested in the remarks just made by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener). With much of his speech I am in agreement but I cannot agree with him when he is fearful of an invasion of provincial rights in a matter of this kind. While I do not believe in handouts by governments and in making it too easy for the youth of our nation to find their way in the world, I nonetheless support the resolution wholeheartedly and without qualification. I believe it to be only right that the government of Canada and parliament should endeavour at all times to create the widest possible opportunities for the young people of Canada. I further believe it to be a principle of good government and a principle of Liberalism to provide as nearly as possible an equality of opportunity in the realm of higher education. If equality of opportunity across the nation is to be a watchword and a principle to guide us, then by all means the federal government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide for national scholarships and bursaries.

There is no need for me, Mr. Speaker, to outline the lack of professionally trained personnel in Canada. I believe that every member of the house knows that our resources of adequately trained people are very much limited. Professionally trained personnel are not available in sufficient numbers and our shortage of mechanical and electrical engineers is something that is constituting somewhat of a threat to the development and growth of Canada. Our shortage of qualified teachers and our shortage of doctors and dentists are also things which are quite obvious to all of us.

What concerns me is that the average working man and woman in Canada is really unable to provide his or her children with a university education, despite the fact that these children are able to earn a considerable amount of money during summer vacations at jobs of their own and thus to help themselves as much as possible. A system of national scholarships and busaries would, in my opinion, greatly aid in overcoming this state of affairs.

I believe, without hesitation, that every young person who has the capacity and the desire to train himself for one of the professions which I have already mentioned, or indeed for anything requiring higher education, should be able to do so regardless of his or her means. If any such person is prevented from doing this solely because of lack of financial resources, I believe it is a tragedy for Canada and that we should do our best to remedy such a situation.

Mr. Speaker, on numerous occasions I have put my views on record with respect to this matter, but I believe this is the first opportunity I have had in this house to do so. I cannot but call to mind a certain family whom I know in the city of Brantford. The son is a medical student at a great Canadian university. His father is a working man and is really not able to afford to maintain him there. The son works and earns money during the summer months and on every other possible occasion, in order to assist in paying for his education. The mother has gone out and has done char work. She is employed in cleaning several business establishments and several law offices in Brantford. Her husband helps her. All of the money they earn and all the money that their son earns during the summer recess—indeed all the money that they can put together from mortgaging their house and other means—is used to educate the young man at the university, and an extremely brilliant student he is. These heroic sacrifices are being made in my community and in many others in order that some of our young people can take the place in life that they desire to take.

I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a brief to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects submitted by the national scholarship committee of the national committee of Canadian university students. On page 11 of this brief there is a quotation from Dr. F. Cyril James, principal and vice-chancellor of McGill university:

> A young Canadian from a family of modest circumstances has less chance of getting a university education today than a youth in any other country with which I am familiar.

I wonder if this statement could be true. If it is true, I think it is up to us who sit in this chamber to do something about it. Nevertheless, one thing is clear and that is that there are not enough opportunities to obtain a university education in Canada. I am told that only 4 per cent of those who start the first grade in Canadian public schools ever graduate from university. The brief of which I have spoken also points out that as many as 54 per cent of those who abandon education at any stage do so for financial reasons. The brief asks for the institution of bursaries and scholarships in the form of awards of $2,500 tenable for four years so that a total of about 10,000 Canadian students would benefit in each year in the amount of about $500.

For the reasons I have given and in order to create more nearly equal opportunities for the youth of Canada of whom all members of parliament, I know, are proud, I feel that I must support this resolution. If I recollect correctly, I read somewhere quite recently that all the money spent by the government in providing educational facilities for veterans in the last great war has been paid back by the recipients in income taxes. That is something that may or may not be true but it is something to keep in mind while discussing this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot add anything more to what I have said. I have made only a few brief remarks and I do not think I need to say any more. I should certainly be pleased to see this matter given full and careful consideration by the government.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, it is only with the greatest reluctance that I repeat myself although I know there is a psychological principle involved, namely that repetition finally has some effect. Of course, much depends upon the type of audience you have. I am not suggesting that the members of this house are such an audience but I may say that there are in this country people who need to be told over and over again about the values and the importance of education to Canada.

I said that I did not want to repeat myself. I have just discovered that on January 26, 1956 I spoke at great length on this particular situation. Today I do not propose to go into any detail of statistics or of methods but I think that I can add a word or two to what I have said previously about the general principle of the resolution. I am prepared to take the sponsor's word for it that, when he talks about these scholarships, he has in mind both graduate and undergraduate scholarships.

When I heard that this resolution was up for consideration today, I had some doubt in my mind that it would be accepted as being in order. I am glad that it has been so accepted. Of course, the fact is that legislation has already been foreshadowed—and it will be discussed in this house—which will provide the necessary machinery and arrangements by which these scholarships will be granted. The government, in the terms of the resolution, has considered the advisability of introducing such a resolution. I am glad that the consideration of such has been fruitful. If I may I should like to quote from page 579 of Hansard of January 26, 1956, where I am reported as saying as follows:

> I say I am glad that a member who supports the government brought in the resolution. I honour him for it and I wish him luck with it. It may be a good sign. Let us hope it is of some significance. Let us hope that something will be done.

Well, something is going to be done. There is no one in this house more happy about that than I am.

If I might digress for a moment from my general topic I would say that I think these private members' resolutions, irrespective of what side of the house they come from, are of inestimable value. After all, legislation is often based upon public opinion. If by means of a private member's resolution any idea of importance to this nation may be publicized and popularized throughout the country, then I am all for it. I think my friends on the other side are coming along in matters of education. I know that is not fair to some of them because some of them have come along just as far as I have, indeed farther, over the years. But I cannot help recalling the first time that I introduced a resolution in this house concerning federal aid to education. I was met with raised eyebrows and with wonder. They stood aghast that such a thing should be mentioned in the federal house. Is this, they said, not a matter completely within the jurisdiction of the provinces? My answer, of course, was yes. No one could agree more that matters of administration, matters of the choice of curricula for education are the concern only of the provinces. But I shall have a word to say about that later.

In the meantime the government has brought into this house a resolution preceding legislation which when passed, and I am sure it will be, will set up the machinery to do the very thing for which this notice of motion asks. It is true that it is couched in the devious language which convention dictates and the necessity for which must be a mystery to the average layman. We now wait that legislation, and we await it with interest and, so far as I am concerned, with joy.

Nevertheless, since this resolution has been introduced today I want to assure my hon. friend of my complete and whole-hearted support for his thesis. As I say, since legislation will come, and since there will be an opportunity at that time to discuss it, I am not going to discuss that legislation in its detail now. I, personally, would interpret such a discussion as being out of order. It is, as I said, a source of great satisfaction to me that the people of this country at long last, and finally those in this house, have shown some concern about the educational facilities of our country.

I have talked about these private members' resolutions. I say my Liberal friends may have come along in their thinking on this subject. A moment ago I forgot to mention that when I brought in either the first or the second such resolution, one of my friends, who sits opposite to me, and who happens to be a neighbour of mine from a geographical point of view, was kind enough to say that any private member introducing a private member's resolution on this subject was doing so for political purposes and that I, personally, was bringing this one in with the deliberate intention of deceiving the public. I do not know whether the same hon. friend over there would like to make the same accusation against the hon. member who introduced this resolution. I am quite sure his colleague would not now, and I emphasize the word "now", make such an accusation, I venture to say, even against me. So, as I say, we are getting along a bit.

Lately there has been a great recognition that this sort of thing is constitutional. I will not go into the arguments advanced by my hon. friend the member for St. Paul's a moment ago, but I agree with them to a large extent. As I say, no one agrees more than do I that these vital things, that the program of education in each particular province, must be the sole prerogative of the people inside that province. But why in the world, if that province has not the financial resources to give the children within that province an equal opportunity of education with the children in other provinces, should we not be allowed to assist them in promoting the type of education that they, not the federal government, want to see tried. I said something the other day to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) about that lacuna, that void, which will exist in the system of education even after this legislation has been passed. I shall not repeat it here. We shall have the opportunity to do that on another resolution which follows closely in the wake of this one.

We should consider this, that the results of such education, its efficiency and its scope, have a tremendous effect not only upon the provinces but upon the nation as a whole. In these days of fast transportation people are not stuck in any particular province. They are travelling all over the country and they are having an influence upon the whole of the country. Think of the educationists in the province of Nova Scotia who have been so famous in that they have disseminated education of a high quality throughout the country. In the early pioneering days of the west our professors came from that multi-university province which is penalized today by that very efficiency and that very demand for education because of the method by which the university grants are distributed, namely the per capita method. We find such a percentage demand for university education in Nova Scotia that that ultimately reduces the amount per student almost to half what it is in some other provinces.

May I say this province has schools of a type that are not available in the other provinces, professional schools if you like to call them, and I think there are none of those, for example, in the province of Newfoundland. You get an influx, therefore, from the other provinces into Nova Scotia with the result that Nova Scotia is penalized in regard to the amount of the grant per student attending their schools of higher learning.

I was saying that provincial education, no matter what type it is, must be a type prescribed by the people themselves, and that the province—this is the repetition, Mr. Speaker, in which I have been saying it is necessary to indulge—let me say that the whole nation is affected by the efficiency of the education in each one of these provinces. We have come to the conclusion that we must develop our human resources just as we have the inclination—perhaps not from as good a motive—to develop our natural heritage. These human resources are those fine young men and women who are your children and mine. We have come to recognize that if we are to develop to the full extent our natural heritage and to develop it for the good of future generations, then amongst this still small population of ours there must be the leaven or the yeast of developed minds.

Our urge toward this end has been stimulated—and I do not think it is the best of motives—by the rivalry of the example of others. I need not point out to you the magnitude of the efforts in regard to scholarships that have been made by certain eastern European countries with whose ideologies we do not agree and who are anxious to prove that their whole system is superior to ours. I remember quoting last year a startling statement by Mr. Burke Stannard—perhaps I can find it. Incidentally, he may be surprised to know, if he does me the honour to read this speech, that I knew him very well as a little boy. He made this statement in that startling argument:

> In 1918, Russia had one university for every 1.5 million population; Canada had one for every 315,000. Today, Russia has one university student for every 150 population; Canada has one for every 250.

Mr. Stannard's article was published in the Financial Post on December 18, 1954. This is the situation we find in our country of Canada which calls itself progressive.

Well, I said those nations, and particularly Russia, have a great system of scholarships, much greater than any foreshadowed in any legislation that is for the moment proposed here. Yes, and some friendly nations, too, whose ideas in general are akin to our own, have left us far behind in this particular matter. Seventy-five per cent—I think this figure has been bandied about; the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) may not endorse the figure for he insists it is 74 per cent, but we shall let it go for the moment—seventy-five per cent of all students attending British universities do so with government assistance of some kind or other, and the majority of that assistance is in the form of scholarships. It is equally true that 70 per cent of all the expenditure of universities in the British Isles is provided by the state. Having in mind the success of their system, I would urge that the scholarships advocated here be granted—and note this carefully because I think it is important—be granted upon the basis of need plus ability, not on the basis of need, not on the basis of ability, but on the basis of need plus ability.

I was intrigued a bit by the last speaker, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown), who quite unconsciously used the term "the working man". You could see back of his thinking there is the tradition that because a man's father is a working man he has no chance to go through university. He cannot go to university perchance because his father worked. Well, there is a big principle, a big idea behind that. We are changing all that now. "Nous avons changé tout cela", said Molière in the play "Le médecin malgré lui". It will change more and never again will it be part of our language to say that a boy did not go to school, he did not go to university because his father was a working man. Those who are philosophers might think that over. There must, of course, be no distinction in regard to the stratum or the position that students occupy in society, in the granting of assistance to them. Hon. members would expect that remark to come from me. The finest brains are not necessarily found in any stratum of society.

It is most important that students of ability, whose parents could never hope to send them to university or to maintain them at a university, should have the opportunity to attend. Nowadays ability to learn and aptitude for learning are easily discoverable by scientific methods quite early in life. Clever and hard-working students are recognized under the British system by their methods there, and once recognized are encouraged toward further advance by a system of what is called "free places" in higher schools, and are the recipients of the scholarships such as are envisaged by my hon. friend. In Britain students are often chosen by competitive examination. Thus the best brains of the country are retained in the service of the nation and in the service of their fellow men.

When I was talking a little while ago about the educational results in the provinces I was thinking of a Quebecois, or a man from Saskatchewan or from Manitoba or British Columbia. He gets his education here or there but he is fundamentally a Canadian, and by his ability is the country of Canada judged.

I do not know enough about the British system, either of its merits or of its demerits, if it has any of the latter, to debate it in detail here, but I would urge those who are responsible for the award of those scholarships which are envisaged here to examine the machinery I have described, when they are setting up the system of scholarship awards in Canada.

I am glad, sir, that it appears in the projected giving of scholarships some attention will be paid to the humanities. When I say "attention" I mean extra attention. In the past there has been a tendency to favour the sciences, and that tendency perhaps has been natural enough in a country that has found it necessary to develop defence programs where men of science are in particular demand. It is natural, too, in a country which has set out to develop its great natural resources. I have no quarrel with scholarships in the scientific field; in fact I would urge an increase. But I think there should be a balance. Scholarships are scanty enough in our country, goodness knows, and I look with pleasure upon their being increased no matter for what educational purpose, but I think we should have that balance.

Let me say categorically it is my belief there is no better basis for an education, even for those who are later going to enter the field of specialization, than a broad grounding in the humanities, known sometimes, Mr. Speaker, as a liberal education. With this increase in national scholarships there will be a corresponding need for assistance to universities in order that those universities shall be able to provide the increased facilities which will come from increased enrolment owing to the scholarships.

I need not explain to this house that I have always pleaded for greater equality of opportunity in education. I must confess that for the most part my thinking did relate largely to the primary and secondary schools. Such equality of opportunity could extend—nay, would extend—to all those who are attending school. If all children had that opportunity it would extend to all the mass of secondary students who would be available for the granting of the scholarships envisaged in this resolution.

Although I could have made a better case today by quoting a great many authorities on education, of which I am not one, I have up to this point expressed my own thoughts. After I had already made up my mind what I might say this afternoon there came into my hands a brochure which I would recommend that all hon. members of this house read. The documented arguments for the granting of university scholarships have been presented in a masterly and convincing fashion in this little booklet by experts in the field of education. The booklet is entitled, "The university teacher and the crisis of higher education in Canada," and it was presented as a brief to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects by the Canadian Association of University Teachers. I am going to follow my announced intention not to quote from the authorities this afternoon but I would hope that the people in this house who are interested in this subject would read the arguments and recommendations contained in this brief. I have perhaps a particular interest in its because the chairman of the association which issued this report is Dr. V. C. Fowke who is a professor of economics at the University of Saskatchewan situated in my own constituency of Saskatoon. My purpose in mentioning the booklet is simply to recommend a study of it to all those who are interested.

I am well aware that in the matter of intelligence Providence has not distributed its bounty with an even hand. I am also well aware that there are many whose capabilities do not lie in the direction of higher education but who nevertheless make a very successful and happy life in other fields. As one who has struggled with high school students for a part of his life at least I am also well aware that there are those who are not prepared to do the work necessary for the attainment of higher education and sometimes for the attainment of even an elementary education. One has to come to a decision here, but putting these things together let me say at once that I am not prepared to ask the nation to subsidize the cost of attendance at schools of higher learning of those who either cannot or will not put forth the necessary effort to take advantage of such an opportunity when it is presented to them. But concerning those who have the ability, that is an entirely different matter. To those who have any marked degree of capacity to learn combined with a willingness to work, let us be generous. Let us be generous almost to a fault, not just for their own sakes, but for the benefit of future generations, and for the benefit of a future Canada which they will make great in proportion to how well they are equipped to create it.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): It is with much pleasure that I support the resolution on scholarships introduced in the house on January 26 of the last regular session and reintroduced today by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth). I would also commend him for his efforts in presenting this resolution at a time when all across this country there is a growing interest in the need for and the needs of education, at a time when more than a little concern is being expressed by those whose duty and responsibility it is to administer systems and institutions of learning so essential to the progress of this country, at a time when those who have need for trained personnel are finding that the supply in many fields is far too short. Many have expressed quiet concern while others have been more pronounced in their opinions as to the current problems in education as well as the difficulties which will need attention in the immediate future both at the high school, technical school and university levels.

Within recent months there has been great emphasis placed on the need for more graduates in the professional fields. I do not believe that the position has been overstated. The need is great and I suspect that it will be so for some time. Indeed it may be a good omen that our economy has so expanded as to demand such large numbers of technical and professional graduates, but at the same time it must be admitted that such a demand may not be an indication of strength if the facilities for supplying that demand are not present, or not capable of being provided.

But while we do live in an economy where vocational training and professional faculties are vital and essential, and while we know that these faculties will have to be expanded to meet our growing technical needs, we must remember that something more than the practical must be taught if higher education is to make the contribution which a democracy such as Canada will demand of it. I am not trying to lessen the importance of the need nor the value of the science courses when I say that we could take all the science courses out of our universities and there would still be a place for the university in Canadian society. Education is not only a preparation for making a living, but also for living a life. We must be careful not to introduce economic conscription into our educational system at the expense of the real meaning and the real need for education in its broader sense. This is one of the reasons why I welcomed the resolution dealing with the Canada Council and aid to universities introduced by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) a few days ago.

We live in a land which over a period of a few years has become industrialized to a comparatively high level. Today there is need for more trained personnel in nearly every field. Without doubt this is true in the various fields of applied science and in all those where technical knowledge is essential. Dr. O. M. Solandt, former president of the defence research board, in speaking to the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association two years ago said:

> If we are to remain free we must contribute more and more to the scientific advances of the free world; if we are to remain prosperous we must do the research and development that will enable us to produce more and better goods more cheaply in order to compete effectively in world markets.

This statement coming from such a prominent Canadian scientist merits the attention of all Canadians who attempt to envisage the possibilities and potentialities of this great land.

In the development of the material side of our economy, the individual and his development must not be obscured. It has been said that the wealth of a nation depends upon production and that in turn production depends upon the available quantity of different raw materials plus the labour involved in producing goods for which there are profitable markets. I suppose all of us would agree that this is not a complete definition of national wealth, but in whatever definition modern economists might give for national wealth, materials and labour would be prominent. These two must go together if there is to be production. It might well be said that these two are so interdependent upon each other that they are of equal importance and yet I believe that in a land where there is a high potential source of labour and a high potential source of material, the source of labour, whether that labour be unskilled, semi-skilled, skilled or professional, must have precedence for its existence and for its improvement.

I should like to quote Protagoras, that great Greek philosopher of the third century B.C., and an older contemporary of Socrates. I quote him for two reasons; first, because the statement which I want to use is attributed to him, and second, because in a discussion on the present means of education it may be appropriate to quote the man who is recorded by history as being the first to teach for payment. Protagoras said:

> Man is the measure of all things.

One of the problems of our time is to reconcile the dignity of man with the technical achievements of modern society. The real measure of a modern industry is its power to preserve our human values while adding to our material heritage. We must remember that man is not just another link in the productive chain, he is the very reason for its existence.

In this day it might be well to ponder why it is that such large sums of money are spent to refine our natural resources by government and industry when so much of the attempt to improve our human resources is left to individual effort. So I would like to have as a characteristic of any scholarship program which may be in existence now or which may come into being as a result of this or any other resolution, equality of opportunity for assistance in the arts and humanities as well as in the sciences.

May I turn now to another phase of this problem. Generally Canadians are aware that under the British North America Act education is essentially the responsibility of the provinces. I believe it was a wise decision then and I consider it to be a wise decision today, almost a century later. I do not think that a centrally controlled system of education would be a good thing for a country like Canada. However, this is not the time to discuss the merits or demerits of such a system. Suffice it to say that while I believe that the practice of education should be within the jurisdiction of the provinces, I also believe that as our national life becomes more complex, as our interprovincial relations and dependencies lead us toward a unity in multiplicity, and as provincial standards in any phase of living must have an effect on similar standards for the nation as a whole so a responsibility which is essentially provincial may have a national aspect which will demand attention.

At this time I do not propose to project this argument beyond the limitations of the present resolution. I think that such scholarships as this resolution envisages would do much to offer encouragement to those who are handicapped by conditions of geography and finance, to decrease our losses in wasted brain power, and to conserve and develop those human resources of talent and ability which Canada will need in the years which lie ahead. And so the second characteristic of the program suggested by this resolution that I would welcome would be that such scholarships be open to students from all regions of Canada and that they be tenable at any Canadian university, always provided that the student is able to satisfy the entrance requirements of the university of his choice.

In a scholarship program I should also like to see provision made for those who pursue education courses at university or in teacher training institutions. I know that in all provinces efforts are being made to attract young men and women into the teaching profession, and while there are other important factors affecting the low rate of recruitment, encouragement should be given where possible. The teaching profession must not only perpetuate itself by preparing those who will later enter the profession, but must prepare those who will go on to study in other fields in our higher institutions of learning. I believe that a successful effort to place within the day schools of this country teachers who are qualified will do much to decrease the tremendous waste indicated by the large numbers who fail to reach the standard during the first year of university.

In many provinces of Canada there is a desperate need for qualified teachers. It is noteworthy that while many university faculties have been overcrowded teacher training institutions have been operating with less than the numbers which they could normally accommodate. In 1953 there were 142 institutions in Canada for the training of teachers. The reported enrolment capacity was 16,260 while the actual enrolment was 12,424. In other words, at a time when the demands for recruitment to the teaching profession is urgent, our teacher training institutions are operating at 76 per cent capacity. In the Atlantic provinces these institutions operated at 57 per cent of the possible total enrolment.

In my own province of Newfoundland the shortage of teachers is something more than serious; it is critical and alarming. There are not nearly enough trained people to staff our schools and even after employing those who are not qualified there are still schools, particularly in the outlying areas, where no teacher supply has been possible. The situation would be further aggravated if the teacher load were reduced to thirty pupils per teacher.

On Wednesday of last week a conference was called in St. John's to discuss the various phases of this problem in a very serious minded manner. Public concern was well emphasized by the presence at that conference of many who, although not directly engaged in the field of education, recognize that in the regional development of our province education must play an important role. Regardless of statements that we have heard floating around about the maritimes in the last few days, we in Newfoundland have been there for over 460 years and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we will be there for a long time yet. But if Newfoundland is to occupy the place in the Canadian federation which I think it is capable of occupying we will need to develop not only the natural resources of the area but also the human resources by providing schools that will develop independent thinking based on knowledge of the past, understanding of the present and good judgment about the future. To do this we will need not only the encouragement and assistance of scholarship programs, the Canada Council, university aid and vocational training but also the assistance of any other sources which may be available to us.

In recent months there has been evidenced a great deal of interest in the progress being made in other countries in education, particularly in the different fields of applied science. There is very little need to repeat here statistics dealing with university enrolment in other countries. They have already been presented to the house over the past few months. It is a good thing that we know what others are doing and I think it is important that we should know what others are doing but I suggest that the really important comparison is not to compare what Canada is doing now with what other countries are doing but to compare what we are doing now with what we need to do in this country to satisfy our requirements for national defence, to maintain our position in the community of nations, and for the development of our own country to the limits of which it is capable.

A comparatively new word has come into the English language, Mr. Speaker, that word being automation. I suppose we could define it as the process in industry by which production is operated, regulated and continued automatically. In a country such as Canada, with its present industrial development and its future potential, one would expect that we should look forward and anticipate the advantages which automation has to offer. Some fear that such a process will result in further unemployment. I do not believe that such need be the case. True it is that there may be less demand for unskilled labour but I believe there will be many more opportunities for better employment available to those who are qualified to take them.

The efforts of the provinces and the federal government under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which has been in effect for the last 18 years, have been commendable. The continuation and extension of the schedule will not only do much to provide the many technicians Canada will need in the years that lie ahead but will do much to eliminate the waste in that segment of our youth who have the ability to engage in technical pursuits but are hindered by financial or other reasons from acquiring those skills which industry will demand of them.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say again that I support the purpose of the resolution as I would support the purpose of any resolution tending toward the fuller development of the mental, physical and spiritual values of the people of the country, for I believe that it is by such development that we will be able to produce Canadians who are strong and sound individuals and at the same time individuals who are sound and strong Canadians. I believe that it is by such development that Canada will be able to produce that type of Canadian who will work more effectively in the society in which he lives and at the same time live more abundantly in the society in which he works.

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be able to take part this afternoon in a debate on such a worthy resolution as the one now before us which the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) saw fit to present to the house again this year. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by former speakers in the debate, and with many of the arguments advanced in support of the resolution I agree entirely. However, I was particularly impressed with one reservation respecting the resolution advanced by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener), and I must say that I think the particular reservation he made in his speech is one worthy of great concern.

I wish to commend also the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) for again speaking at such great length on a problem which has for years been very close to his heart. We look upon the resolution as one actually twofold in its purpose. First, it proposes to enable university students now in attendance at universities across Canada and who find themselves unable to continue their studies because of a shortage of funds to be able to continue. Second, it proposes to provide funds which will be used for worthy graduates from our secondary schools who also find themselves with insufficient funds to embark upon university studies.

The resolution is indeed pertinent at this session in view of the proposed government legislation along the same lines. For far too long we have had too many people in Canada giving pious lip service to the saying that Canada is a land of equal opportunity for all. As one travels across Canada and as one listens to the speeches delivered in the house by hon. members from various parts of the country, one cannot help but realize that Canada does not offer equal opportunities for all. This is particularly true in the field of education.

I was impressed with the remarks of one hon. member this afternoon when he pointed out that down through the years educators from the province of Nova Scotia have been leaving that province, going to other provinces of the dominion and offering their services as educators. That is quite true, and perhaps as a result education has suffered somewhat in the province of Nova Scotia. On the other hand, we in other parts of Canada have gained considerably from the talents these people have brought to other parts of the country, particularly western Canada.

The matter of scholarships and bursaries has given the government of the province of Alberta great concern over the past years. That government has already embarked upon a co-operative scheme involving the province and divisional and other school boards throughout Alberta for the purpose of giving bursaries and scholarships to graduates of our high schools in Alberta to encourage them to enter the faculty of education in our province.

The shortage of teachers throughout Canada has already been mentioned. From my own school district, a district for which I worked many years, we have in attendance in the faculty of education at Edmonton this year 16 former students. Out of this number of 16 students in the faculty of education, only one happens to be a man. I am not for one moment discounting the value of ladies in the teaching profession. However, I feel that any profession, particularly that of education, requires the help at least of a certain number of men.

I have already mentioned the bursaries and scholarships which the provincial government and the school divisions are jointly providing for graduates of our high schools in Alberta who enter the field of education. The province of Alberta a few years ago established what was known as the students assistance act. This act provides to university students scholarships which will entitle them to enter any faculty at our university. Again, our province has seen fit to establish what is called a revolving fund. Students desiring to enter the University of Alberta can borrow from this fund an amount equal to $400 a year. This amount of $400 a year is given to the students at a low rate of interest. Since it is a revolving fund the students, upon graduation, are expected to pay the money which they borrowed from the fund back to it. The money is paid back in annual payments of $200 commencing at the end of the first complete year after graduation. I feel that we in Alberta have gone a long way towards encouraging the graduates of our high schools to enter our university. On the other hand, I recognize that limits are to be found in provincial revenue available for this purpose and that perhaps we have gone about as far as we can go. Certainly we in Alberta would readily accept the assistance of the federal government in this connection.

We are continually reminded, Mr. Speaker, in this house, through the press and over the radio that the U.S.S.R. is going all-out in the matter of encouraging the young people of that country to enter the institutions of higher learning. We are informed that this encouragement is particularly strong in the field of engineering and in other associated scientific courses. We are spending billions of dollars each year to maintain a defensive war machine to protect the free world from communist aggression. With this expenditure I have little quarrel but I do feel that we must also give increasing attention to the educational development of our young people so that we shall have in Canada an enlightened group of young people who are not only capable of matching the wits and the minds of the young people of the communist world but who are willing and able to take leadership in the establishment of a truly free world where peace and goodwill will reign eternally.

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I extend my sincere congratulations to the two members who have spoken a few words in the French language. I wish to congratulate them not in the name of the French Canadians whom I represent in the house but in the name of all Canadians in the country because the country as a whole shares in common the two precious cultures of our national character.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I have been listening attentively to the speeches which have just been delivered in support of the resolution now before the house. Though each and every one of the speakers carefully pointed out that he would favour the introduction of such legislation only in so far as it would respect provincial rights in matters of education, I must admit that, as far as I could see, they gave no reason why we should believe that those exclusive provincial rights in the field of education could really be respected in the implementation of this resolution. Nevertheless I do want to pay tribute to its sponsor. He does indicate that he only wishes to attain his objective, as he spells out in his resolution:

. . . in so far as it falls within the competence of parliament.

Those words are to be found at the end of the resolution itself and may be said to provide cause for repeating the latin saying: in cauda venenum.

That condition is one of the reasons, and the main reason, so far as I am concerned, for opposing the resolution since it does not offer sufficient guarantees as to how it might be achieved without impairment of exclusive provincial jurisdiction in matters of education.

Of course each of the speakers carefully pointed out his personal desire to respect those rights. That is also, I believe, the intention of the sponsor of the resolution. Still I think that if we enter the field of education, one reserved to the provinces, we have no means of knowing what, in ten or fifteen years time, will have become of all the good intentions of those people who stated their desire to respect those rights.

Along with the hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me, I recognize the crying need which is apparent throughout our country for an increase in revenue for educational purposes. I believe that on this point even the most resolute champions of provincial rights, who deny that the federal government has any right whatever in this field, will recognize the tremendous requirements of this country with regard to education. That is no justification however for the federal government to enter the educational field.

One, or even two hon. members, one on each side of the house, advanced the argument that the whole of Canada was affected by education which is provided in any given province. Now that is one of the arguments which, to my mind, were taken from the Massey Commission Report and which have been advanced in support of the theory that universities are of general national interest, a fact which has allowed the federal government to interfere in university education as it is doing now.

Let us take the same argument, let us apply it to primary education; we will then be able to adduce the very same reasons in support of the theory that primary education has national consequences. Let us take all the fields reserved to the provinces by our constitution. It can always be claimed that everything that a province does may have repercussions on the nation as a whole, an argument which will bring us, little by little, to the taking over of each and every provincial prerogative.

Since we are all agreed on the necessity of aiding education, why do we not return to the provinces the taxation rights which were borrowed from them, and thus enable them, according to the terms of the constitution, to meet their commitments, which they have, in fact, no thought of denying in the matter of education.

Then again, of course, it could be claimed that it is not so in the case of the poor provinces since they might not be in a position to meet their educational obligations without federal help, and because the federal government keeps those taxation fields it has borrowed in order to help those very provinces. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I am far from convinced that the rights which have not been returned to the provinces are being used solely to help the poorer provinces. I am very hopeful, along with every hon. member in this house, that the day may come when representatives of the provincial governments and of the federal government may meet around a table and settle once and for all this problem of taxation rights, which is at the basis of all problems connected with education submitted to the federal government, so that provinces may enjoy rights which are really theirs and each and everyone of them may, according to the spirit of the constitution, meet the obligations placed upon it by the constitution. It would then be possible not only to take into account the needs of the poorer provinces, but also to restore to the others those powers which are exclusively theirs according to our constitution. It would solve this recurrent problem, one that will crop up once again when we will be called upon to discuss legislation providing for university grants or the trans-Canada highway, or the Unemployment Insurance Act, where there has been federal government interference.

As long as the federal government continues to interfere in provincial matters, we will be faced with the same problem, that of the resdistribution of taxation powers. We must ensure that at each level of civil authority the proper body is in a position to meet its obligations with sufficient funds. We will then no longer see a central government plagued with a surfeit of money while those really in need of revenue are deprived of the means to meet their obligations. We will no longer hear this government say: "Well, the state must now look after education since the provinces are not in a position to meet the cost" because they would have been deprived of their taxation powers.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was a little surprised this afternoon to hear some hon. members draw comparisons with the educational system of Russia.

It might be true that in Russia more money is spent on certain forms of education than in Canada. I rather think, however, that if Canada were to resort to the same means, abolishing private enterprise and chopping off heads, etc., we might solve all our educational problems. But that is hardly a fair comparison. I do not think, in fact, that hon. members really wished to set up Russia as an example of what should be done in the educational field, because the means employed in that country are a denial of those sacred rights which we seek to promote through education.

I will now bring my remarks to a close. I shall have further opportunity to deal with this topic when we will take up the matter of university grants, one closely connected with the resolution we are discussing this afternoon.

I congratulate the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) on the spirit in which he moved his resolution, because I really believe that he sincerely wishes to bring a solution to a need which everyone recognizes but, neither in his resolution nor in the speeches made this afternoon, can I see how, in supporting his motion, we can preserve the exclusive rights of the provinces in that field.

(Text):

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): The encouraging part of a discussion of this kind, to me, is the growing interest that is being displayed on all sides of the house in the subject of education. Very often the political pundits dwell on the notion that it takes a long time for democracy to respond to a critical situation in the body politic. I am sure it is encouraging to note that even where we have a government that is as well insulated from the impact of public opinion as is the present Canadian government, there is a gradual response to what has been described by many authorities on the subject as a crisis in education.

We have before us, under the title of "Notices of Motion", no less than two resolutions from private members dealing with the important subject of education. We have also a resolution from the government itself which parallels very closely the subject matter provided for discussion by this resolution put forward by one of the back benchers supporting the government, the hon. member for York Centre. The third resolution is the regular resolution we have had on the subject of federal aid for education sponsored by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight).

It is quite obvious that there is a growing need in this country for a comprehensive examination of the problem of education in general. Not only is the interest growing in this chamber but during recent months we have had repeated representations from various educational bodies outside of this chamber. The national conference of Canadian universities has been urgent in bringing recommendations to bear upon all hon. members of parliament. The teachers' federation, in equally strong terms, makes reference to the problem. Most encouraging, however, is the new interest of leaders of industry and business in the needs of education today. Admittedly this interest arises largely from the crisis, if I may use that word again, that is occurring in connection with the shortage of technicians. Down through the years industry and business has not assisted in an overly generous way in meeting the problems of education, particularly on the higher level. In the past few months, especially last fall, they have demonstrated in no uncertain way that they regard the present situation in Canada as a real crisis. They are moving in a fairly rapid way to come to grips with the problem.

The resolution which we have before us this afternoon deals with only a small phase of the difficulty. As I read it, Mr. Speaker, it is asking the government to consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level who are in financial need. Now, that meets one small segment of the difficulty; but what we are faced with today is a crisis in education at all levels. The Canadian population is increasing and we are moving towards an industrial economy. There are very rapid changes taking place in the Canadian way of life. We are moving towards a more complex type of society. It automatically follows that new skills and new knowledge are required in order to heal the schisms that tend to flourish during a period of rapid social change and during a period of rapid movement to a more complex society.

Related to the problem of education on the university level is the problem of education on the elementary and high school level. It is quite true that a major difficulty in the lack of sufficient recruits for our universities and colleges is the economic and financial difficulty. However, there is also the factor of lack of incentive and this is something that has to be dealt with on the lower levels of our education system, the elementary and high school levels. It is only recently that our school systems in the various provinces have introduced any form of vocational guidance program. One of the encouraging improvements in the approach to education on these lower levels, I feel, is the establishment in the province of Ontario, for example, of a separate vocational guidance program within the general public school program.

I am sure most hon. members, when they look back on their own educational experience, will agree that it was a process of groping and hoping; it was a hit or miss approach to the selection of some vocation, and very often time and money were wasted in arriving at the final niche in which we were to pursue our life's work. That problem is being met on the elementary level. This has a very particular bearing on the new need in an industrial society for hundreds, indeed thousands, of technicians. We have methods of testing now, intelligence tests, aptitude tests, which, within reasonable limits, make it possible for a student graduating from our high school program to determine whether he would serve most usefully by taking a university course in one of the professions or by moving on to training in the technical schools. With regard to the latter, unfortunately we do not have the type of technical schools in this country that will be needed to supply the training for this type of technician qualified to do the job in a technological civilization.

While I for one welcome the resolution, may I say it deals only with a very small part of the total problem that has been thrust upon us by the very rapid changes that have taken place in Canada and in every other country of the western world in the past 10 years. It will help, but the suggestion I am putting before the house this afternoon is that the time has come in Canada when we need a co-ordinated and a comprehensive examination of the education situation that has now reached the proportions of a crisis.

There is another aspect of education that we sometimes ignore, that is just as important as the high school level or the university level. I refer to the growing significance of the adult education program in this country. Up to the present moment this work has largely been carried on, on a voluntary basis, by the Canadian Association for Adult Education, an association that has made rapid strides in recent years, and has made a very worth-while contribution to the general solution of our educational problem. In recent years some provinces have been taking an increasing interest in this growing educational need through their adult education departments and also through their university extension departments. But here again, Mr. Speaker, is an area of education that is going to grow very rapidly in its demands with the passing years. For example, we shall be faced in the next 20 years, if we are to draw conclusions from the findings of the Gordon commission, with a work situation where we shall have decreasing hours of work and a rising standard of living. That means we shall be faced with the problem of leisure time, what to do with the leisure hours that will be at our disposal as the work week gradually decreases as the result of automation, improved productivity in the industrial process, and so forth. This increased leisure time will constitute a real educational challenge to the nation. If we use the new-found leisure time arising from an increased standard of living in a constructive, a positive and a creative way it will add immeasurably to the enrichment of the lives of Canadians. On the other hand, if we fail to meet this challenge of adult education then, of course, it will lead to a situation of frustration.

Some years ago a social scientist of some repute Thorstein Veblen wrote a book entitled, "The Theory of the Leisure Class". The basic thesis of his book was that it is from the leisure classes that the new ideas, the creative ideas, have emerged. Formerly, before the advent of machinery, the numbers of the leisure class were restricted to the landed aristocracy and to a very small segment of the population. Today, we are faced with a rapid expansion in that particular segment of the population. I say that is something that this parliament and all the representatives of the people, maybe more especially on the provincial level, will have to give heed to.

The criticism is often made when we discuss education in this house that we are dealing with a subject that has not much significance for a large portion of the population. The senior citizens, for example, are particularly mentioned in this regard. I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the most useful part of the adult education movement has been the programs carried on among our senior citizens, the formation of second mile clubs. The idea that once a man reached the age of retirement he had nothing else to do but to retire to an institution for senior citizens and there vegetate for the rest of his days, is a notion that is rapidly passing away. While the theory is still far too prevalent, here is a group who have enjoyed long years of life, who have acquired considerable experience during their earthly pilgrimage, who could, if the opportunity were afforded, rather than merely existing in their latter days enter into a new and a rich experience of living.

I mention this broader approach to the problem because, while we are dealing in this resolution with a very small segment of the difficulty, namely, the provision of scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level, I think that a limited program of this kind—and I am making the reservation, of course, that out of our discussion of the Canada Council and the legislation that will be forthcoming we might be dealing in a more comprehensive way with this situation —I say that our resolution merely touches the fringe of the crisis in education.

Looking at it from the standpoint of the resolution we have before us, perhaps the most beneficial use to which bursaries and scholarships can be put at this stage is in assisting in the training of teachers. Already two hon. members who have spoken in this discussion this afternoon have dealt with the teacher shortage on all levels of our educational system as a main point in their remarks. This shortage is critical at the elementary and high school levels. I do not have to dwell on that aspect of the difficulty. In all parts of Canada there is a problem of adequately staffing our schools with qualified teacher personnel. I think it was Dean Gendron of Ottawa University who said, in a recent discussion of this question, that in the next five years 1,124 new professors will be required in the field of pure and applied science alone. That is just one small area of the whole educational field. If we are going to begin to cope with the crisis in education the first and primary need is for an adequate number of properly trained teacher personnel.

Why is it difficult to obtain teachers? That is a big subject in itself. Certainly it is because of the problem that the resolution attempts to deal with, namely that students who would otherwise enter university in preparation for the teaching profession are unable to do so because they do not have the necessary financial wherewithal. A great many of our teachers come from the rural areas and it is in the rural areas of the country that the greatest difficulty is found in providing higher education to the young people.

Another reason is the depressed salary schedules. This subject has been discussed recently in rather influential quarters. Mr. Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, in his annual statement dealt at some length with the matter of depressed salary schedules in the teaching profession and the effect they have in discouraging the recruitment of our young people for this profession. There is the prestige factor, too. One expression comes to my mind and it has been used with sufficient frequency that it has almost become an adage: "Those who can, do; those who cannot, teach". It contains a derogatory implication as far as the teaching profession is concerned.

Of course we all know the story of the professor who was nicknamed "Sanka" by his students. This story always draws a laugh from an audience which suggests there is an underlying attitude of derogation toward the teaching profession. Perhaps I may be permitted to repeat the story. A professor was given the nickname Sanka by his students. He did not understand the meaning of the word because it was foreign to him until one day he noticed the slogan on a can of Sanka coffee which said, "98 per cent of the energy has been removed from the bean". That is one factor which discourages an increased interest on the part of our young people in the teaching profession.

The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smith) said there is a tendency for the male of the species to shy clear of the teaching profession and I believe this is true. Perhaps one of the reasons for the continuing chronic shortage of teacher personnel is the fact that the ladies have a greater tendency to become matrimonial casualties and thus are taken out of circulation. It is not the recognized thing for men to enter the teaching profession in the numbers required to meet the demand. I could go on speaking about this particular subject at some length because I think it is one of the major problems of education today. We have a shortage of money facilities and personnel right down the line but until we have an adequately trained teacher force to deal with all the aspects of this problem then we will not be able to cope with what has been described by responsible people in all walks of life today as a crisis in education. This resolution might well be designed to encourage an increased interest in teacher training facilities and activities.

With the present trend toward bigness and centralization on all sides as we move toward a complex industrial society there is a growing tendency to neglect the smaller institutions of learning. Reference has been made to the outstanding contributions to education which have come from our maritime provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am surrounded by maritime members who are saying "Hear, hear" and I think I am right when I say that most of these institutions are small institutions.

Mr. Nowlan: They are smaller in quantity but not in quality.

Mr. Dinsdale: An hon. member says they are smaller in quantity but not in quality and that is just the point I was about to make. By preserving that smallness in size they have been able to preserve the fundamental emphasis in education. In some of our larger provincial universities the campus population is moving upward to 10,000, 15,000, 20,000 and 25,000 students, and when we are faced with numbers of those proportions I think the essence of the educational process tends to be missed. I might be prejudiced in this regard because my own teaching experience and my own college experience for that matter was pretty well restricted to one of the finest smaller liberal arts colleges in this country, a college which maintains a student body of around 300 to 400.

Mr. Nicholson: That wouldn't be Brandon College, would it?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, you are correct. Brandon College retains the close personal relationship between instructor and student that is necessary if we are going to have a truly educated person. The smaller colleges face financial problems which are on a proportionate basis, perhaps even greater than those faced by the larger universities. They tend to be ignored completely in grants made by large foundations, and this applies particularly to the smaller liberal arts institutions. They are neglected by governments too. For example, I have the latest financial statement of Brandon College and am surprised to discover that the provincial grant to that institution, which was established at $22,500 in 1938, still remains at the same level almost 20 years later notwithstanding the increases which have occurred in the cost of living and so forth. That grant still remains at that relatively insignificant level.

It suggests that the province of Manitoba is not able adequately to support this important educational work being carried on by an institution of this nature. I could support my argument by pointing out some of the illustrious graduates of Brandon College.

An hon. Member: Premier Douglas.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan and Douglas Campbell of Manitoba. Then there is Mr. Grant Dexter of the press gallery and the late J. C. Bowen, who was lieutenant governor of Alberta.

Mr. Nicholson: Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Dinsdale: And the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). This is the type of person who emerges from the background of a liberal arts influence of this kind. This is the heart and soul of our educational process. It is in these smaller institutions that our teachers are largely trained. As the government is taking an increasing interest in this problem, as is industry and business also, I do hope that the importance of the liberal arts institution will not be ignored.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, we are living in a day of complexity. There is a tendency away from the university emphasis in institutions of higher education toward multiversity. With the growing number of faculties required to supply new skills and knowledge in the type of society in which we live, we are faced with a series of mutual unintelligibilities in connection with the various new areas of knowledge where each body of knowledge is building up its own separate jargon, its own gobbledegook.

The heart of our educational system is the teaching profession and the source of teacher training needed to cope with the problems of today is the small liberal arts institution. This idea is summed up in words, I believe of Tennyson, although I cannot be sure of the source, who said:

> Let knowledge grow from more to more,
> But more of reverence in us dwell;
> That mind and soul, according well,
> May make one music as before;
> But vaster.

Mr. McIvor: Would the hon. member permit a question? It has been acknowledged by professors whom I have known that the influence of the small college is far greater upon the future life of a student than that of the large university.

Mr. Dinsdale: I agree heartily with that observation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks this evening I should like to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) who has again presented this resolution to the House of Commons for discussion.

Mr. Castleden: The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) did it 12 years ago.

Mr. Cavers: I realize that the hon. member for Saskatoon has on several occasions, on the speech from the throne and again today, spoken about federal aid to education.

Mr. Castleden: Twelve years ago.

Mr. Cavers: I was not here that long ago so I am not able to recall that far. However, I know that he is an outstanding educationist in his part of the country. The hon. member for York Centre is a young man of outstanding attainments who comes from an area which would be expected to direct its undergraduates to one of the larger universities of Canada. But I am sure that in presenting his resolution he is motivated by the genuine desire to advance education and universities in all parts of Canada.

I feel I have a right and an obligation to speak on the resolution, the purpose of which is to provide national scholarships and bursaries at the university level for students who are in financial need. In 1930 I was one of those who had enrolled in a university course. But in that year I had the misfortune to lose my father and I had to decide whether I would continue the university course or pursue my studies in the law. I left the university at that time and continued in a legal course. Therefore I feel that from a practical standpoint I should say something on the subject.

This afternoon the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) placed his finger on the principle involved in the discussion when he referred to the pith of the argument being "equality of opportunity". The basis of my argument is that we should make available to all young Canadian students who have the aptitude and the desire for further university training the opportunity to pursue the study of their choice in whatever course they desire to continue, whether it be English and history, political science and economics, modern languages, the sciences, medicine, dentistry or the law.

While I speak in support of the resolution for the adoption of national scholarships and bursaries, I do not feel that we should do away with the opportunity for students to help themselves. There is a great need for students to work hard, indeed, to work very hard in order to earn the financial resources to assist in obtaining a university education. I think that not only must the student work hard at the course of his choice in order that he may attain high standards but that it is not a bad thing that he should be required to work hard in some type of physical or business activity. The beneficial effects of part-time summer employment or work during the Christmas holidays are manifold. In my opinion the appreciation of money earned is advantageous to the student and there is the pride of achievement in having assisted oneself in one's work at the university.

We have heard today something of the obligations and problems that arise from the constitutional standpoint. Canada's federal structure has placed within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures the right to deal with matters of education but I feel that it is rather matters of the curriculum of study and administration of schools that were meant to be under the jurisdiction of the provinces than the question of financial assistance. There are real problems to be overcome in the matter of jurisdiction when we discuss any scheme of scholarships or bursaries for students at the university level. I accept all these considerations but I still feel there is an urgent need from the point of view of the students of future years.

It seems to me that we must have a national system of scholarships similar to that blueprinted or outlined in the recommendations of the Massey royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences submitted in 1951. In that report the recommendation was made that federal aid to education, particularly to students who desire to pursue a university career, would be advantageous to the country.

There exists at the present time a long-term shortage of professionally trained personnel. I realize also, as has been mentioned by previous speakers, that all Canadians cannot attend university. Some by reason of inclination and others by reason of natural aptitude are not suited to attend university, but for those who have the desire, for those who have the mental and natural aptitude, every opportunity should be given to pursue a career for which they have been professionally trained.

I am informed by many businessmen that such people are needed in their businesses and that the availability of such personnel is inadequate to meet present day needs. One firm in five anticipated a serious shortage of trained personnel in the years 1954 to 1956. One in four business firms have said that they are short of personnel at the present time. In addition to business administration courses that are required by many young Canadians, mechanical and electrical engineers are in the shortest supply. A survey conducted about two years ago indicated that 39 per cent of electrical appliance manufacturing firms in Canada and 31 per cent of the chemical, oil and petroleum firms felt that their needs could not be satisfied by reason of lack of graduates or inadequately trained graduates for the particular purpose for which they were required.

The steel and iron industries throughout this country which require skilled employees of a particular type have felt the pinch. They are hard pressed for trained engineers. In recent years we in Canada have been in the forefront in the development of atomic energy. Scientists, technicians, research employees, are required to continue the work that has already been set up. I am informed that skilled personnel have had to be brought in from our neighbours to the south in order to provide some of the skill, knowledge and expert opinion that is required in connection with this branch of work. I feel that our universities should be in a position adequately to supply the needs of our atomic energy development by providing qualified personnel to fill the need. Canadian industry is suffering from its inability to find trained people to do the jobs that need to be done.

Then, as has been so well said during the afternoon by the member for Humber-St. George's, one of the important phases of university training is that of providing qualified teachers. There is a greater shortage of qualified teachers in Canada today. My view is that the fundamental necessity in all teaching is that our young people should be provided with adequate teachers. In order to provide adequate teachers we must provide adequate salaries for those persons who are trained in that vocation. The teacher shortage will perpetuate the shortage of trained technicians. I think this is so particularly in the sciences. If we have not adequate well-trained teachers we cannot hope to produce the type of skilled research scientist that is required in this country.

I come to the question of the cost of education which was mentioned earlier today. In recent years education has become more costly than it was 25 years ago, largely because of the necessity for increasing the salaries of professors and the increased costs of upkeep in carrying on the universities of the country. In some of the professional courses we find that the cost of instruments alone in one year runs as high as $350. The cost of textbooks and tuition in the university ranges from $350 to $450 or $500 a year. The average student attending university must be reasonably well clothed. I suggest that decent clothing is not available for much less than $150 a year. Those students who are not able to reside in the particular university centre that they might desire to attend have living expenses for a school term of eight months. I suggest that under present circumstances these will not amount to less than $500. The average requirement for educational costs would therefore be from $1,500 to $1,800 per student per annum. The student also has difficulty in providing for himself part of the cost of this training.

A survey made at the University of Alberta about five years ago indicated that the average male university student earns about 51 per cent of the cost of his yearly course or in the neighbourhood of $800 out of the required $1,500. The female students are able to earn much less than are the male students. In the survey it has been estimated that the female student is in a position to earn about 40 per cent of the cost of her university training or in the neighbourhood of $600 per year. It will thus be seen that the student is short approximately $600 to $800 per annum.

While I said that it was right and proper that students should work—and work hard—in summer vacations and during Christmas holidays, I think that part-time work during the student's school term seriously interferes with studies in any course. To that consideration I add the worry and financial anxiety which accompanies any shortage in funds and which does not assist the student in any way. Rather, I suggest that it detracts a great deal from the attention which the student might give to his work. When interviewed on this subject Dr. Sidney Smith, president of the University of Toronto, stated that he thought there was a greater financial drain on those students who came from other than university centres than upon those whose homes were in the university centres which they desired to attend. Dr. Smith had this to say:

> It will be increasingly difficult for the boy in Swastika and Sioux Lookout to enrol . . . It will be a tragedy if universities become places where only the students who live near them are able to attend.

I suggest that is not the sort of thing that we desire in Canada.

It may be said that already a considerable amount of money is available for scholarships and bursaries throughout this country. I should like to compliment those foundations, clubs and organizations which desire to assist worthy students in furthering their university courses. The Edward Blake Memorial scholarships, the I.O.D.E. scholarships, the university women's clubs, the Massey foundation and the Leonard foundation are only a few of the bursaries which have assisted many worthy students in their scholastic pursuits. But unfortunately these scholarships or bursaries do not go far enough. The average sum which is available is comparatively small. It is an insufficient portion of the student's requirements or total expenses. This situation is likely to have a tantalizing effect upon the student who, having a smaller amount available to him, will feel that he is unable to pursue further the course of his choice.

Then there is the need to assist not only the brilliant student but the very good student. There are some students who would take first place and therefore would be awarded a scholarship. But there are still those very good students who might come second or third and who would not be able to avail themselves of the opportunity to accept the present scholarships.

It is my submission that scholarships, to be worth while, must be paid in the average of $500 to $600 per annum. I take this opportunity of complimenting the government upon the introduction of legislation a few days ago to set up the Canada Council. I feel that is the vehicle which can provide scholarships of this kind in order that needy students, worthy students, may have an opportunity to pursue their courses.

I should like to bring to the attention of this house another point which occurred to me and which I think is a very serious problem to be confronted, that is the psychological barrier which is placed across the minds of needy students, those who might feel that they have no right to aspire to higher education because of the fact that they come from ordinary homes. Students of any station should aspire to the highest standard of education, if they have the ability and the desire to do so. I have read the manuscript which the students federation prepared for submission to the national scholarship committee. In reading that brief I noted that on one instance certain students of high standing who might have qualified for scholarships had not applied to avail themselves of the scholarships that were offered for competition. They were not aware of the fact that they had the right to apply for these scholarships. They were not aware of the proper method of application. I feel we must overcome the inferiority complex of some students who might feel that they should not aspire to a higher education.

I am not aware of the proportion of Canadian university students receiving aid in comparison with those receiving aid in other countries. However, I have had the opportunity of reading the brief submitted by the national federation of Canadian university students. In their brief they had this to say, and I quote:

> The proportion of all Canadian university students who receive assistance in some form or another is only about 15 per cent. In Great Britain, on the other hand, the corresponding figure is almost 75 per cent. Moreover in 1938, 14 per cent of Canadian university students received scholarships; thus we have made little progress in this respect in the last 17 years. In Britain at the present time a worthy student can obtain grants to cover the cost of both tuition and maintenance if the income of his parents is below a certain figure. In France education is virtually a state responsibility throughout. In the United States both Wisconsin and California make higher education of the best quality freely available to their residents.

I feel that in other countries, some older and some wealthier countries than our own, students are receiving aid. If we are to develop the young people of this country, and in so doing develop the national fibre of our own country, if we are to make this country a better place in which to live, then it is desirable that we should provide our students with adequate and sufficient scholarships and bursaries in order that they might assist themselves to make better citizens of themselves.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to join hon. members in all parties, Mr. Speaker, in paying tribute to my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) who I feel is rightly regarded as the dean of education in this chamber. Being generous he welcomes this resolution being introduced again this year by the youthful member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth). While there are not any members in the house apparently who are speaking against this resolution, it does give individual members an opportunity to speak about this very important question. I must say I cannot generate very much enthusiasm for it myself. I think it is unfortunate that the means test is suggested now in Canada for assistance on the university level. A long time ago I thought we had accepted the principle that education should be provided free to all who were capable of acquiring an education.

I think that, just as elementary education was necessary at the time of confederation, so university education is necessary now. It should be provided for those who are competent to take it. There is another weakness that is rather important. I think the suggestion that we crowd a great many more students into our universities, without first making some adequate provision for university facilities and adequate compensation for those who are teaching, is putting the cart before the horse. Nevertheless, I do want to thank the hon. member for giving us an additional opportunity to discuss this important question.

The policies of the government nowadays point up the need for education. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) recruits high school graduates for air force personnel. He is quite prepared to spend $60,000 on training a young chap who has finished high school to fly a jet plane. I am not complaining about the expenditure of $60,000. But I think it is unfair to ask my friends down in Newfoundland to stand the cost of elementary and high school training up to the point where the youth leaves high school, and then for the federal government to come along and spend $60,000 so quickly.

The Minister of National Defence told us last June that he had spent $24 million on the "velvet glove". He pointed out there had been 400 scientists and specialists from industry and the forces who had acquired a good deal of practical experience in the field of air to air guided missiles. Since that time I have read that we have written off our investment in this particular field. Apparently there is no one who becomes excited about the expenditure of $24 million on a project of this sort which is then designated as an unpractical project.

Some time ago the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) told us we will have spent $120 million on the CF-105 before it is off the assembly line. But if these machines are to be used we have to have young Canadians who have been able to go to public school and high school as well as university. Last year my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) asked the Minister of National Defence how much we were spending on the training of cadets to qualify for officers in the army, air force and navy. The reply was $3 million to $4 million for 1954; over $4 million in 1955; and $4.5 million in 1956. My colleague said that appeared to be about $30,000 per cadet. The minister replied, "Yes, that is about correct". He explained that costs have gone up. I submit that if the taxpayers of Canada are able to spend $30,000 to train cadets, somehow or other we have to share with the provinces and the municipalities the essential expenditures which have to be incurred before we are able to make use of our personnel in this sort of category.

Apparently, we are not short of funds in Canada, judging by some of the figures I have mentioned. Last year I received an answer to a question regarding our expenditures in Canada for tobacco, liquor and education. In 1954 we spent $475 million on tobacco, $865 million on liquor, but only $581 million on education. It is a matter for pretty serious reflection when our per capita expenditures are $31.26 on tobacco, $56.92 on liquor and $40.26 on education.

The other day when discussing the Canada Council resolution I mentioned the percentage of the tax dollar which the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities spent. Members are always flattered when colleagues, particularly colleagues of other parties, ask them a few days later about their material and their sources, and I must thank the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Holowach) for paying close enough attention to my remarks to ask the question. I now wish to inform him that the Bank of Commerce commercial letter of March 1953 is my source. It gives a table showing the total Canadian tax revenue of the federal, provincial and municipal authorities. I have added these up and I find that the federal government gets 74 cents out of the dollar, the provincial governments get 15 cents and the municipal authorities, 11 cents. I was quoting from memory the other day. There has been a slight variation from year to year. I have not given the exact fractions. These are for the year 1951. I might mention that if you go back to 1939 you will find a fifty-fifty split. At that time we just gave the federal government about 50 cents out of every dollar. The municipalities fared a little better then. They had about 30 cents and the provinces about 20 cents of each tax dollar.

I have confirmed these figures by reference to the Bank of Canada statistical summary financial supplement for 1955. The 1954 figures naturally show much larger amounts collected by the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalites. They also show a distribution that makes it very difficult for the municipalities and the provinces. On the 1954 figures the federal government—I am making my calculations from the Bank of Canada figures—received about 70 cents out of each tax dollar, the provinces 16 cents and the municipalities 14 cents. You still have only 30 cents to be divided between the municipalities and the provinces. The government at Ottawa gets 70 cents. I submit that it is physically impossible for our municipal and provincial authorities to get the wherewithal to meet the crisis in the field of education.

I am indebted to a number of sources for a good deal of help. Like other hon. members, I want to refer to the very interesting conference which was held in Ottawa in November when the Canadian universities met to discuss Canada's crisis in higher education. It is significant that the Prime Minister rated this meeting high enough to take time off to speak and to intimate that his government was prepared to take action. While action has been taken, it is much too little and, of course, it is much too late but it is better than nothing at all. It does recognize that there is a problem. I was particularly interested in some of the papers. I hold in my hand one from the director of extension of the Unversity of Montreal, one by the president of St. Francis Xavier and another one by Dr. Burchard of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the alma mater of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and one on the problems of securing staff. All these papers deserve the most careful consideration by hon. members and by all who are interested in the question of education.

I would like to make a few references to the paper by President Norman MacKenzie of the University of British Columbia. Dr. MacKenzie is a product of Dalhousie. He was President of the University of New Brunswick before the Minister of Labour, and now is president of the University of British Columbia. He presented some figures in connection with the percentage of the Canadian students who go on to take higher university work. He mentions that it would appear that between 25 per cent and 33 per cent of the population have the capacity for higher education, and goes on to say:

> At the present time 7.2 per cent of the appropriate age group, 18 to 21 inclusive, are in our Canadian universities.

Is that not something to think about? Although between 25 and 33 per cent of the population have the capacity, we permit only 7.2 to proceed to university. I think I should say that although I have been to university myself, all who have been there readily recognize that you can get a university degree and still be very ignorant about a great many things. A great many who never get to university make an outstanding contribution to society also, but anyone who has been to university would consider that he had missed something if that right had been denied him. When only 7.2 of the appropriate age group in Canada are permitted to go to university it is a pretty serious situation. According to Dr. MacKenzie the figures for Russia are 19.6 per thousand of the population. For the United States the figure is 15 per thousand and for Canada it is 4.9 per thousand. The 7.2 figure would be of the appropriate age group. Dr. MacKenzie points out that if we are really to face this problem, instead of having 80,000 enrolled in universities, as we have today, we should have between 240,000 and 315,000. By 1980, if our population goes up we should have between 375,000 and 490,000. If the provinces and the municipalities are not able to find the wherewithal now to maintain adequately the establishments that are supposed to house 80,000 and pay the salaries, how are we going to find facilities and personnel to teach 240,000? Dr. MacKenzie points out:

> I realize that statistics are among the most misleading materials with which human beings can work but while I do not propose to comment upon these figures, I suggest that there is plenty of food for thought in them.

The other day I had the Financial Post for November 17, 1956, and I made reference to an article on Russia by Ronald McEachern, the editor of the paper. Dr. McEachern mentioned that:

> Soviet universities are hard to get into. A few prize-winners in the secondary schools go direct into university without examination. Of the remainder, around 60 per cent are flunked in their university entrance exams.
> The graduate of a soviet university has about 50 per cent more formal hours of instruction behind him than the Canadian graduate.

He mentions that of all the Canadians who enter university here a little over 20 per cent survive through graduation. In Russia about 14 per cent survive and in the United States about 13 per cent. He mentions that in 1955 the Russian universities graduated about 120,000 scientists and engineers compared to about 70,000 in the United States universities. Mr. McEachern points out that there are two angles which must be associated with this fact. First, the magnitude of the Soviet economy is about one-third that of the United States so relatively the Soviet production of scientists and engineers is about five times that of the United States.

Mr. McEachern includes an interesting paragraph about a young chap who was studying at the University of Leningrad. This young man was 27 years of age and not only did he speak English very well but when he was speaking to someone from the United States he spoke as an American would and when he spoke to someone from Great Britain he spoke as people in that country do. Apparently he was somewhat puzzled by the Canadian accent. He said, "You speak just like the Americans but you are all Canadians." All the subjects of Her Majesty whom he had met previously used the Oxford expression of the English language. Here is a chap who not only spoke his own language but had been encouraged to speak English as it is used in both Great Britain and the United States, and in addition he had been trained to speak Italian, Spanish, French, German and some other languages. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if it is possible in a country like the Soviet union to recruit such a large percentage of young people and send them to university and train them in various fields there is no good reason for a rich country like Canada failing to grapple with the problem and leaving it to be dealt with by the municipalities and the provinces.

I am also indebted to the Canadian school trustees' association for the research work they have done under the direction of Dr. M. E. LaZerte. In the study entitled "School Finance in Canada—1955" Dr. LaZerte points out that education is a very different matter from what it was not so long ago when log schools were erected at a very low cost. Even in the last 25 years in the province of Saskatchewan log school houses were built with grants of $100 or $200 from the provincial government. The settlers cut their lumber out of the logs with whip saws and made desks. That sort of school accommodation is not good enough in this day and age. Dr. LaZerte also points out that school children are no longer being educated to live for the rest of their lives in one small community. They are being educated as citizens not only of their own province but of the country and the world.

I heard the speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) at the Canadian Club luncheon today and I was greatly interested in the fact that the minister has been able to travel over 40,000 miles since we saw him here last year. The fact that he has been able to travel to so many countries makes it important that people such as those who provided his education should not be handicapped in educating children who live in the depressed areas of Canada and are not able to attend university if the price received for the produce of the farm is not adequate. I think we have to recognize the fact that the citizen of today is a citizen of the world and he must not be handicapped because he lives in a depressed area.

In this study there is a table that gives information regarding the cost per pupil of education in the various provinces of Canada. It is surprising to find a variation from a low of $86.11 in Newfoundland to a high of $292.58 in British Columbia. The per capita cost again shows a wide variation. The high is British Columbia, Saskatchewan is second, Alberta is third, Ontario is fourth, New Brunswick is fifth, Manitoba is sixth, Nova Scotia is seventh, Quebec is eighth, Newfoundland is ninth and Prince Edward Island is tenth. Again we have a variation from $45.34 per person in British Columbia to a low of $16.84 in Prince Edward Island. There is also a table giving some information regarding the relative prosperity in different parts of Canada. Questions such as the following ones were asked: Do you have a telephone? Have you an automobile? Did you have a radio in 1952 when you had to buy a radio licence? Questions such as these indicated whether or not people were too poor to afford a radio.

Another table shows the personal income by provinces, indicating the ratio. In Ontario we have a rather high average. Ontario had an average of 123 per cent. British Columbia had 120 per cent, Alberta 93 per cent, Saskatchewan 78 per cent and we come down to 53 per cent in Newfoundland and 54 per cent in Prince Edward Island.

There is also some information concerning the salaries paid to teachers which points up an impossible situation confronting the authorities in many of the provinces. For example, in Newfoundland the average teacher's salary was $1,065. The average salary is given for some of the states immediately south. The average salary for teachers in Maine was $2,115; Prince Edward Island, $1,152; New Hampshire, $2,712; Nova Scotia, $1,587; Vermont, $2,348. Going down the list we find a high average in British Columbia of $2,590 but in the state of Illinois to the south the average salary was $3,458. Again there is a wide spread between salaries paid to teachers in Canada and the United States.

My colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) had a sessional paper back in 1952 listing the present federal expenditures on education. You find an approximate total for the year of about $20 million including the amount for the Department of Labour for apprentice training, youth training and vocational grants, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the national research council, the Department of National Health and Welfare for professional education and post graduate training, the Department of Veterans Affairs for grants to universities and the Department of Finance for grants to universities. The total was $20,936,000. The small sum of just over $20 million was spent for the educational facilities I have mentioned, and last year $24 million was spent for the Velvet Glove, which was later discarded as useless.

I am also indebted to the Canadian teachers federation for their excellent research. They have made a study concerning the position of civil servants to point up the problem confronting those who are in the teaching profession. I have never been guilty of complaining about the salaries being paid to civil servants. As a matter of fact, I know a great many who are staying with the public service at salaries which are a great deal less than they would command in the commercial field. But we are robbing our schools of a great many teachers and I think that this report made by the federation deserves some consideration. They say:

> Of six arts graduates hired as junior administrative officers in 1946 at approximately $2,000, three of the six are now earning between $7,000 and $9,000. Of eighteen hired in 1950 at approximately $2,400, most are earning between $5,000 and $6,000; five of the eighteen are earning $6,000 to $7,000 and one is earning between $7,000 and $8,000.

They mention that those who joined external affairs and trade and commerce as foreign service officers started at $3,900 and after seven years would be receiving between $5,500 and $6,000. If those same people had gone into the teaching profession there would have been very few positions anywhere in Canada available to them at salaries at all comparable. I have here a comparison of the teacher salary schedules of some of the larger centres in Canada, and I will give the low and the high figure:

	Low	High
Vancouver	$2,300	$6,200
Calgary	2,370	6,390
Winnipeg	2,450	5,750
Windsor, Public	2,700	6,800
Toronto	2,800	6,800
Ottawa	2,800	7,000
Montreal, Protestant	2,150	6,550
Montreal, Catholic	2,150	5,300
Halifax	1,900	5,650
Saint John, N.B.	2,250	4,895
Charlottetown	1,525	3,575
St. John's, Newfld.	2,004	4,200

It is hard to expect teachers to stay in areas in Canada where these low salaries are being paid when the public service in Ottawa offers salaries such as those I have mentioned, and when industry is offering salaries that are away out of line with those teachers are receiving.

It is particularly difficult to hold teachers in the smaller communities. A very competent science teacher up in northern Saskatchewan who had been there for seven years left last term to accept a position in Regina at a salary increase of $800 over what he had received in the small town. He was replacing a science teacher in Regina who had gone to Timmins at a salary $800 more than Regina was paying. That man in turn was replacing a teacher who had left Timmins to go to Toronto at a salary $1,000 more than was being paid in Timmins. There was a difference of $2,600 in the salary paid in a small community in northern Saskatchewan from that paid in Toronto with similar qualifications being necessary.

Mr. James Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, took time in giving his annual report to his shareholders to discuss this important question. He said:

> The economic positions of all teachers has deteriorated relative to other professions of comparable training and responsibility, and relative to the working force as a whole. Thus the teacher today finds himself in the same occupational "depressed area" which he occupied as long ago as 1776: a member then as now of what Adam Smith called "that unprosperous race of men commonly called men of letters".

And again:

> With the present disparity between the salaries we pay our teachers, and the salaries we pay for comparable talent elsewhere, we cannot expect to recruit or to retain enough qualified men and women to maintain our present teaching standards in our high schools and universities.

While it is all right to have a pious resolution of this sort being presented every year, a resolution which is not opposed by anyone on the government side, I submit that it is imperative that the government of Canada face up to the fact that as a result of our changing economy our municipalities and provinces have not the wherewithal to provide the facilities which will supply Canada with the educated people we must have to face the future. There is no reason why this country of 16 million people with our great natural resources, with our record of achievement in war time could not face up to the fact whatever is physically possible must be made financially possible. Something better than the plan proposed from the government side must be forthcoming if we are to meet successfully this crisis in the field of education.

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks in support of the resolution put forth by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) I should like to congratulate him heartily for having put it before the house and for having proposed it with sound argument. He has done it as a good Canadian and has dealt with the matter in a manner above party consideration and for the sole welfare of our fellow young Canadians and of Canada as a whole.

When he introduced his resolution last year the hon. member for York Centre said he was hoping for the support of all sections of the house. He got support from members of every political affiliation. I was glad, and I was also impressed at the same time by the way in which his resolution was received by the hon. members. It showed that if hon. members do not agree all the time on certain matters dealt with in the house they are all eager to promote better education and greater knowledge for the younger generation. In concluding his speech last year the hon. member for York Centre, who is known as a promoter of better understanding among the different racial groups in Canada, made a special appeal to his colleagues of French origin, when he said, and I quote from page 571 of Hansard of January 26, 1956:

> I should like to conclude my remarks in French as I am most anxious to have the support of my French-Canadian colleagues on both sides of the house.

None of the members of French origin to my left saw fit at the time to express openly in the chamber his opinion on the matter and we do not know as yet the stand of those hon. members on the matter. But on the government side of the house the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Blanchette) expressed very well I think the opinion of our French colleagues when he said in concluding his remarks on that occasion as reported on page 594 of Hansard of January 26, 1956:

> The great need is for first class men to give leadership and inspiration through their own brilliant, original discoveries. The future depends not only on the continued liberality of government agencies but on the number and quality of the men induced to do research work. The greatest need is to discover and train these men, and surely the resolution of the mon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) will, if implemented, assist us to attain the aim envisaged.

Since our colleague the hon. member for York Centre, asked his French-Canadian colleagues to support him on his resolution, and since I graduated from one of our great universities not so long ago, I feel it my duty to add my voice to those who have spoken already on the matter. In doing so I feel I am doing my duty and also doing my share of what is good for my fellow citizens, my country, my province and the people I represent because they would all benefit from the implementation of such a resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the proposed resolution introduced by the hon. member for York Centre reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level who are in financial need in so far as the subject matter of this resolution is within the competence of parliament.

This proposed resolution is in complete agreement with the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, as submitted to parliament in May, 1951. In this report the commissioners recommended, on page 419:

> That the federal government maintain and enlarge the system of scholarships, of bursaries and of loans to undergraduates now in operation and known as the Federal-provincial Vocational Training Plan.

However, before going further into the matter and because we are dealing with something which relates to education, may I be allowed, as a representative of a Quebec constituency, to wonder if the implementation of such legislation would interfere with provincial autonomy. In the first place, it is important to determine if this legislation is contrary to our constitution as enacted in 1867. Since we are dealing with educational matters, it is important, I think, to know if we have any right at all to discuss it and, even more to know if we may adopt legislation in aid of education.

I remember that last year, when we took up the same resolution, the Hon. George Drew, a former premier of Ontario and then leader of the federal Conservative party and of the opposition, a man who when he was a provincial premier had proclaimed himself a champion of autonomy, just like the premier of my own province, stated, as is reported on page 572 of Hansard for 1956:

> The purpose of this motion, undoubtedly, is to emphasize the need for an extension, a very substantial extension, of the award of scholarships to those who seek the opportunity to take advantage of the educational facilities that our universities afford. This can be done without in any way interfering with the exclusive jurisdiction over education which rests with the provincial governments under our constitution. This can undoubtedly be worked out on a satisfactory basis of effective co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

Now what do we find in section 93 of the British North America Act, that section which defines the powers of the provinces and confers exclusive rights in different matters? Here is what we find:

> In and for each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, . . .

Well, Mr. Speaker, that section is clear, plain and definite about the organization of education and about the organization of our teaching institutions in the different provinces of the country, at all levels, either primary, secondary or university education. Provinces alone may enact legislation in the field of education. This was a guarantee given to them when our constitution was enacted in 1867. More particularly for the province of Quebec, it is a guarantee which was given to her perhaps primarily on account of the fact mentioned last year by the hon. member for York Centre when he said—and I quote page 598 of last year's Hansard:

> I know that French Canadians are proud of their language, their customs and their traditions. They are right in feeling as they do, and I congratulate them on that score. In order to maintain this character, French Canadians mean to keep control of education in so far as it concerns them.

That is, Mr. Speaker, the main reason why French Canadians are jealous of their exclusive rights in the matter of education. They want to keep their language as well as the traditions bequeathed to them by their ancestors, and I am convinced that the whole Canadian culture is enriched by this fact.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, it is always a delicate matter for a federal member from the province of Quebec to deal with education. If the other provinces of confederation jealously cling to their rights in the field of education, my province, for her part, and for the reasons just mentioned, will never tolerate any encroachment on section 93 of the British North America Act which grants her exclusive rights in matters of education.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the fact that the federal government grants scholarships to our Canadian students, scholarships which are accepted by them, is an interference with the autonomy of the provinces in the field of education.

This afternoon I heard the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Girard) state that he felt the need for the establishment of this system of scholarships not only in the province of Quebec, but in the whole country. In his speech, if I am not mistaken, he said that he could not see how those scholarships could be distributed in various provinces without violating section 93 of the constitution. I respect his opinion, but I do not agree with him. As far as I am concerned, I feel that the federal government has the responsibility of helping Canadian students to pursue their courses, no matter in what province they live. We must help those students. When I was at university myself, I noticed that most of our students were from middle-class families. Many of the students of my acquaintance had to work during the summer in order to be able to pursue their studies, and several of them even had to work during hours of study. But, what about that large number of intelligent, diligent, studious, and ambitious young Canadians who cannot get higher education and who cannot go beyond college, for lack of funds. I suggest that the whole country is thus deprived of the valuable services which could be rendered by those young Canadians if they had enough funds to complete their courses.

In each of the provinces, tremendous amounts of money are spent, with reason I think, for national defence, health, research, social security and the development of our natural resources. However, Mr. Speaker, is there a greater natural resource than the intellectual potential at our disposal for making our country richer and more prosperous? We need more technicians, scientists, doctors, engineers, etc.

Mr. Speaker, we are doing a grave injustice to the nation, the Canadian family and more particularly those born in low-income families, if we refuse to help talented students to complete their studies. I admit that the state must not substitute itself to parents, nor to the family, but it has an inescapable duty to help the family, and young Canadians. The assistance I just mentioned, which concerns us more particularly in this case, is the help to universities. That assistance could be given by various provincial governments which, on the other hand, are fairly generous in the granting of scholarships.

Moreover, in my own province, scholarships are granted annually to some students. Some foreign governments also grant university scholarships to our young men and women. There are also private concerns sufficiently conscious of their social responsibility to provide valuable scholarships annually to students from the province of Quebec or from the country as a whole. Moreover, in my own province, the St. Jean Baptiste Society, by providing honour loans renders invaluable services to young students of that province. And there are similar scholarships provided by the government of this country.

May I digress for a moment to answer the argument advanced by the hon. member for Lapointe. According to him the proposed scholarships are a threat to provincial autonomy. By the same token then we should refuse to accept scholarships provided by private enterprise, or by foreign governments. But there is no interference with provincial autonomy. These young men who receive scholarships from private enterprise or from provincial governments or from nameless associations are perfectly free to act as they wish and to benefit from the advantages provided by the scholarships in question.

Nevertheless all those scholarships which I have just mentioned are not sufficient to render justice to all our fellow citizens in every part of this country. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see every talented, responsible, competent, studious and ambitious young Canadian provided with a higher education.

The proposed resolution introduced by the hon. member for York Centre is a long step in the right direction. That is why I am happy to support it. It does not interfere with provincial autonomy. If I were in any doubt about that, I would not support it. I am of the opinion that in certain cases the federal government may provide assistance in this field without imposing any conditions and without interfering with the rights of the provinces in the field of education. This case which we are discussing today is such a case.

I want every young Canadian, whatever his province and racial origin, and whatever his background, to benefit equally in the field of education and every other field. This is the aim of the government in granting aid to education. It is not only in dictatorships like Russia, that certain methods are applied, not so much to help the students, but to make them the slaves of the state machine. Here, in Canada, in our democratic country, where the living is good, the sole aim of our various governments is to raise the intellectual standards of our young Canadians. As a matter of fact, their only aim is to help the nation to develop and prosper in order to exert an ever-increasing influence in the world. We want to help the less fortunate.

Some may wonder, Mr. Speaker, by what means we may determine the eligibility of students whose parents are of modest means. Well, Mr. Speaker, did we not find an adequate way of choosing those who would be eligible for the old age pension. In a field such as the one we are now considering, the government could easily find means to choose those who would be eligible for such scholarships.

At page 361 of the report which I mentioned a moment ago, one of the suggestions made by the commissioners reads as follows:

> We therefore recommend:
> (f) That since the amendments which we are proposing in this legislation will, if they are adopted, extend the present system of scholarships to a greater number of universities and colleges, there be established an advisory council to be known as "The University Training Advisory Council" which will include representatives of the provincial and federal governments and of the universities.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that such a recommendation is practical and takes into account the rights of each and everyone. What we want here in Canada is to give to the greatest possible number of young Canadians an opportunity to avail themselves of our facilities for higher education so that, in the end, our whole nation may benefit by it. What we want is to give assistance to parents with large families who do not get a sufficient income but whose children have talent and wish to be educated so that they may serve the Canadian nation.

It is in that sense that I approve the resolution of the hon. member for York Centre as I am firmly convinced that the Prime Minister of Canada, who always has young Canadians in mind, will welcome this resolution. The sooner we put our education facilities within reach of a greater number of young Canadians, the better it will be for the whole country.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as I have agreed with so much that has been said in the course of this debate and have disagreed with practically nothing, perhaps I might be well advised to content myself by saying nothing at all. But there are one or two points that I should like to make very briefly.

I think it is quite clear that public interest in education has been aroused in a way in which it has not been aroused for many years. The reason for it, of course, is perfectly obvious. The reason is fear. The reason is that we watch what is going on in Russia and we are afraid that we are being left behind in the kind of competition that the Russians are putting on. What is that competition? It is a competition in the production of all the material apparatus of life, including military engines of all kinds. We are troubled that we may be left behind in this competition. I regret to say that I believe that is the main reason why we find education being talked about so much. Therein I think lies a great danger. Therein lies the danger that we may concentrate on technical things or mainly on technical things. We may concentrate on the production of more and more technical people. On that matter I want to say two things.

First of all, I want to point out that what we need most of all in this world at the present time is not more technical things but more wisdom, more knowledge of how to live together. That is what we need most of all. That leads me to say that when we are thinking about assistance to education I hope we shall not allow ourselves to concentrate wholly on technical things but will remember that while wisdom cannot be taught in the same way that technical things are taught, nevertheless there is more chance that those who educate themselves broadly—who read history and literature, who know how men have lived, what the difficulties of the past have been and how they have been overcome—will become wiser than if they lack that knowledge.

In the second place, in speaking about technical education I wish to point out what has been pointed out to me by men who are in the industrial world, namely that we are in danger of not using our resources in quite the right way. It has been pointed out to me more than once that in the industrial world there are a large number of people with full engineering training and the highest of technical skills doing work which does not demand such full technical training at all, and that the work in many cases could be done by those with much less technical training. I am glad to say that in the province of Ontario regard is being had for that situation and that technical schools are being set up which may do a great deal to overcome that difficulty.

The second thing I want to do is to say something about those who are in the universities and to whom I hope the aid will be directed. I notice, for example, that this resolution, for which I shall vote, speaks about providing national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level. If that means for undergraduates only, I want to say a word about it. In thinking of those who are at the university I have, for my own convenience and in a rough and ready way, divided them into three classes. First of all, there are those who fail, and we ought to get rid of them from universities.

I do know that at the present time university heads are troubled over the number of failures that they find in the early years. While I am not an educational expert I cannot help wondering whether or not some explanation for these failures may be contained in a letter I had some years ago from a man who was teaching one of the very elementary classes in a university. He told me he discovered to his surprise on taking a poll that 16 out of 40 in that class had never read a book of any kind during their years at school except their technical textbooks. I could hardly believe that, but he assured me it was so. He went on to argue, and this interested me, that the curriculum in the English course should be relieved of the English classics and should be replaced by modern works.

He said that the pupils of whom he was speaking—and they may not have been the best, they may not have been a fair test—would not have been able to read Shakespeare, Milton, Browning or Wordsworth without a dictionary because they would not have known the words. Then he added this, and it interested me very much. "You and I have to remember that when we were at school, even though we did not get any training in the ancient classics, we had the Bible read in our homes and thus we had the vocabulary that would enable us to read any good English literature." I am not going to offer any further opinion as to the number of failures but it is such to concern university authorities.

There was one thing more my friend said which interested me greatly—I had not thought of it before. He said that you have to remember that radio and movies—we had no television in those days—which take so much of the attention of the children now demand no effort, while the reading of even a novel does demand effort. Of course, in what some of us like to regard as the good old days it was quite a common thing for children actually to be kept at home during the evenings and to sit down with their lesson books in front of them and spend a considerable amount of time working at them. Whether or not the change in that has anything to do with the incidence of failures at the present time, I do not pretend to say.

I come now to the second class at the universities which I like to think comprises the great majority of university students. I refer to the competent, reliable, industrious people who do their work and who afterwards do the world's work too. They are perfectly competent but they do not have anything in them resembling genius.

I come then to the third class of people who have genius or something like it; people who have an extra spark; people who are going to provide the great teachers, scientists, theologians, philosophers, poets, the artists and so on. They are of a special class but they are in great danger, as I understand it when I read this resolution, of not being considered as proper subjects for these scholarships. I should like to put in a plea that the requirements and needs of these people should be carefully considered, because after all it is upon them we have to rely to make our way of life a better way of life. It is these people to whom we are going to owe so much if they can be given an opportunity to fully develop themselves. I venture these comments because when we speak about scholarships I think that we should not confine them wholly to those who, as I say, are going to do the world's work; who are competent and industrious and have all the good pedestrian qualities raised to their highest level but who lack these special high qualities which go to those who have what I call genius or near genius; those people on whom we have to rely for making our life something more than a dull pedestrian affair.

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): I am very glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate. In view of the lateness of the hour and the fact that there are possibly a number of other speakers who would like to take part, I am going to compress my remarks into a somewhat briefer compass than I had originally intended. However, I am very glad to have the opportunity to say something. As a Nova Scotian I might say I am particularly interested in a resolution of this kind for at least two reasons. One reason is the fact, as was so graciously indicated by a couple of western members who spoke in the debate this afternoon, that Nova Scotia has made such a signal contribution to the cause of education in this country.

The second reason is that in Nova Scotia, as in the Atlantic region generally, I think it is perhaps fair to say that for the student who is working his way through college, either partially or wholly, the task is somewhat more difficult than it is in the more prosperous provinces of Canada. It is true, of course, that a large percentage of our university students do work their way through college, either partially or wholly. This afternoon the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) spoke with some pride about a classmate of his who had succeeded in paying his way through college by selling aluminium. Almost anyone can sell aluminium. I recall that when I was at college a student who was there at the same time financed his way through college by selling Bibles. I think that requires salesmanship. I was never quite sure at the time whether it was his superb salesmanship and business acumen or the piety of his Nova Scotia clientele to which he owed his success. But in view of the fact that he has since risen high in the business world I am inclined to the view that he had the former qualities.

I should like to add my congratulations to those which have been tendered the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) on his part in formulating and presenting this resolution. Of course, he cannot, I suppose, claim credit for originating the idea any more than the Wright brothers can claim credit for originating the idea of human flight. But in the resolution he presented this year and in the resolution he presented last year, which was practically identical, he has put the central idea in concise and concrete form. He has brought it forward for the close scrutiny of this house, and for this reason I should like to congratulate him. I should like to congratulate him also upon the fact that he marshalled the arguments in favour of the resolution very ably and presented them logically, forcibly and lucidly.

It is easy to deduce from what he has said and his manner of saying it that the subject is dear to his heart and is one which he has entertained with sincerity and enthusiasm. I think the house is greatly indebted to him in this regard. It is true that this year the discussion on the resolution is going to constitute a double covering of certain ground which is being covered in the debate with regard to the establishment of the Canada Council. However, I might point out that in so far as scholarships are concerned they are, it seems to me, a corollary to the aid which is being extended to the universities themselves. On the one hand we have aid being given to the universities so that they may provide better facilities for scholars and this resolution, of course, has in mind aid to deserving and needy scholars themselves who would take advantage of the facilities which the universities afford.

I was particularly glad this year to hear that the Canadian universities were to receive aid, and that the university grants were to be doubled. I might reiterate what I said before, that I think it regrettable that these grants are still being distributed on the basis of provincial population.

I think it is clear that this resolution has enlisted very good support from members on all sides of the house. This shows, I think, that we, not only we, but the people of Canada whom we represent here, are increasingly aware of the value of higher education as a significant factor in our national development. In this regard we must consider higher education from two distinct and yet very closely related points of view. First, there is that of fostering the arts and humanities; and second, there is that of promoting scientific and technological advancement. Unless we keep these in proper focus it seems to me we shall arrive at a distorted understanding of the whole subject.

In this age, with its increasing emphasis upon materialism, an unfortunate development, and yet one which I think we must assume is with us, it is in some quarters customary to belittle the value of the classical education. I certainly do not support the present resolution with any idea that it may encourage the production of withdrawn intellectuals moping in misty ivory towers; not at all. But is is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that if Canada is ever to attain the stature of a truly great nation, which we all ardently hope and expect for her, she must progress not merely along the paths of science and engineering, essential though such progress is; there must also be a flowering, or so it seems to me, of the things of the intellect and the spirit, of those lofty ideals and conceptions which are to be found only in the realms of art, literature, philosophy, religion and in all the allied manifestations of a truly noble culture. Here it is that human thought appears at its highest and purest and that, Mr. Speaker, is higher than any jet plane or any rocket can ever soar and certainly purer than the finest distillation of the laboratories. And from such sublime flights of the human mind come also those concepts of freedom, of democracy and of the worth of the individual without which all our material achievements count for little more, I should say, than those of so many ants or bees. Certainly, efficiency is a most desirable quality, but I sincerely hope that we shall never have for our national goal the soulless efficiency to which a communist state aspires, that and nothing more.

Surely, no one will dispute the outstanding and essential role of the university in encouraging and promoting those lofty flights of the human mind of which I have just been speaking. On the other hand, for all I have said, I do not wish it thought that I am decrying in any way the necessity of maintaining the highest possible standard of advancement in all scientific and technological fields. Indeed, history shows that the full development of the arts and humanities usually, though not always and not necessarily, comes with the attainment of a high level of material well-being, such as today only science and engineering can ensure to us. For example, I think it may well be that the modern world cares very little about what, let us say, the gross national product of ancient Athens may have been in any particular year or years, how many helmets or chariots or galleys were turned out; and yet, if Athens had not enjoyed worldly strength and prosperity, even based though it was on the evil foundation of slavery, I doubt very much whether she would have ever lighted those beacons of mental and spiritual progress that have made her name deathless. A similar lesson may be drawn, I think, from the beginning of the Renaissance in Italy and also from the Elizabethan age in England. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while we must advance the cause of liberal education, we must not neglect that of science and engineering.

Today, indeed, as previous speakers have pointed out, the nation which falls behind in the latter fields faces the danger of extinction.

We note the alarm that has spread through the western world at the revelation that Russia shows signs of outstripping us in the training of scientists and engineers. We regard that as a potent threat to our security and freedom. And again, we see the teeming masses of workers in the countries of Asia, against whose wretchedly paid labour we cannot compete in the markets of the world except by maintaining our place in the vanguard of technological progress.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if Canada is to meet and realize her bright destiny as a truly great nation, it is essential that every fine, keen young mind which she produces shall have full opportunity, by access to higher education, to realize all its potentialities and make its greatest possible contribution to the national cause, whether that may be in the field of the humanities or in the more mundane fields of science and technology.

I am not proposing to quote any statistics, Mr. Speaker. I am not particularly noted as a dealer in statistics. In fact, I sometimes think that when they are used as lavishly as they quite frequently are in this house they form more or less so many hurdles which thought is bound to stumble over in its course. And yet, there has been a profusion of statistics given from time to time in this house—I think there have been some given in this debate—which show only too well that, compared with many other countries, Canada is allowing much of her best available talent to lie fallow for lack of opportunity for university training. How much, perhaps no statistics can accurately determine. But we need the utmost development of all that talent if we are to hold our place in the forefront of modern civilization. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, in the development of that talent no factor has more significance, I submit, than the university and the training which it can give. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have mentioned I consider that the present resolution is a sound and worthy one, well calculated to advance our true national interests, and certainly no narrow constitutional arguments should be allowed to weigh against it.

I suppose there are possibly some strict constitutionalists who might say that this is an infringement upon the provincial realm, who might utter the old cry "federal hands off education"; but to me, Mr. Speaker, this does not constitute any infringement upon the provincial rights in the educational field.

I fully agree with previous speakers that under our constitution education is in the provincial realm, but it seems to me there is a vast difference between an attempt to interfere with or control a provincial system of education, or to exercise any authority over it, and what this resolution proposes, which, as I see it, is simply a matter of assisting brilliant and deserving students who are in need to take advantage of whatever educational facilities may be afforded in the realm of higher education in any particular province.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that does not constitute any constitutional infringement upon the rights of any province and therefore I think this resolution deserves the support of all of us here and I do not think there should be any serious objection to it from any quarter.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose tonight to cover the field of statistics, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat said he would not; nor do I propose to discuss education in any general way whatsoever. I rise to speak on this matter because I happen to have had a lifetime background of experience in a small university town where it has been my good fortune to know for more years, perhaps, than I like to recall, generations of students who have come into that university and gone out into the world.

This resolution, of course, was before us last year. I am not sure whether it is a matter of conceit, Mr. Speaker, or of complacency, but this afternoon I read over the speech I made last year and I felt I could not improve upon it, and therefore there was nothing new that I needed to say on this occasion. But at the time I did mention and did give an instance that happened a few days before this resolution was moved a year ago. We read in the press that a relatively large grant of money had been made by a former graduate to the university with which I have been associated. He was one who had worked his way through 20 years before because of the fact that he was fortunate enough to be appointed as a waiter in the dining hall and thereby got a scholarship which enabled him to graduate. That is typical of the matter which is envisaged in this resolution. The swift years of the past develop the human material and of course like stones that are thrown into a pool sometimes the ripples roll to the shore and sometimes they are dissipated before they reach there, but at the same time from those who have had assistance in the past much more assistance has come in later years.

Coming as I do from a town which contains a small university similar to the one mentioned by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), and similar to the small university with which has been associated the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen), I am able to say that I personally feel that universities of this kind which have not attracted the support of the government and which have not the wealthy alumni societies which are associated with some of the larger universities can profit more by the subject matter of this resolution than can larger universities. Therefore there can be no doubt in the minds of hon. members of this house that this resolution is worthy of support. Today we are overlapping the field envisaged by the legislation which will be brought down concerning the Canada Council. The Canada Council legislation proposes that there will be fairly substantial grants made toward universities in the future. The main reason I rise to speak on this matter this evening is that I feel the subject of education which has been discussed so much in the last year or two is one of vast importance and this is simply the beginning of much more extensive discussions and more comprehensive legislation which will be enacted by this parliament in years yet to come. We are only at the threshold of this tremendous expansion particularly in the field of university education.

Early this evening I was reading Hansard of last year and I observed the contribution made by our friend who is no longer with us, the late Mr. Noseworthy. When speaking on this resolution a year ago he referred to the fact that when he first came into the house—I forget whether it was in 1940 or 1945—he moved resolutions in respect to education on three different occasions and each time they were ruled out of order because they transgressed provincial jurisdiction and therefore were not within the competence of this parliament. We have moved a long way in that relatively short period and I know we are going to move much further in the years to come because the problem concerning the future of university education in this country is one which is going to command more and more attention from this parliament as years go by. This problem can be solved only by parliament assisting universities through grants to the municipalities and provinces who will in turn look after the needs of the elementary and high schools.

For this reason as well as for many other reasons which I could suggest I rise to voice my support of this resolution. I know there are many others who desire to speak on this resolution and I do not wish to delay their contributions. I am sure that almost every hon. member of this house, if not all hon. members, will support this measure. Although it probably blends and merges into the legislation that will be brought down within the next few days with respect to the Canada Council, we are nevertheless blazing a trail here which those who will come after us will some day say marked the beginning of the recognition by the Canadian parliament of its responsibility for university education.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, so much has already been said on this resolution that it is very difficult at this stage to avoid repetition, but as one who has been connected with education for a great many years and also as a university graduate who knows from personal experience what it means to be a needy student, I feel that I have a special obligation to support this resolution which has been sponsored by my friend the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth). At this point I should like to tender to him my congratulations on bringing this resolution before the house at this time. The resolution under debate reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide national scholarships and bursaries for students at the university level who are in financial need in so far as the subject matter of this resolution is within the competence of parliament.

This resolution might seem unnecessary in view of the fact that there is also before this house another measure dealing with the setting up of the Canada Council which appears to have similar objectives. Section (a) of the resolution dealing with the Canada Council reads as follows:

> The Minister of Finance may, out of the consolidated revenue fund, pay to the council the sum of $50 million to constitute an endowment fund for the purposes of the act.

When the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) introduced this resolution last Friday he pointed out that the purposes of the proposed bill were in some respects different from the purposes of the resolution which is now under debate. I should like to quote what he said as reported at page 395 of Hansard.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, is that in order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. Is the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo intending to quote from a speech made by the Prime Minister in another debate of this session?

Mr. Carter: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Well, I had expected that we would reach a point in this debate when this would come to a head because one could see it coming.

Mr. Knowles: All day long.

REFERENCE LIBRARY
NATIONAL FILM BOARD

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I checked with Beauchesne and the appropriate words are:

> The member while speaking must not refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion.

I think the hon. members on all sides of the house have endeavoured to follow that rule and I think hon. members on all sides of the house have found that in several cases matters do come before this chamber which are so inter-related that at least part of the debate on one might be dealing with a subject which is then being debated under another heading. At the same time I think it is the intention of the rule that a quotation should not be made out of its context and have the result of quoting any hon. member of this house on a subject on which he has not spoken. I believe that is the intention of the rule.

If I may take just a moment I should like to comment that the point was raised by myself some years ago in connection with two very similar private bills when the remarks made on one would perhaps have been applicable to the subject matter of the other except that in this particular instance one sponsoring group was being commended and it was not intended by the speaker at the time that the commendation should extend to the other sponsoring group.

Therefore I feel that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) will agree that if we are going to carry out this rule with the intent that I think it has we should make our points during this debate without quoting—the citation says "referring to"—but I would say certainly without quoting the remarks of any hon. member made during another debate during this session. I feel sure the hon. member can make the point he wishes to make without infringing that rule.

Mr. Carter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is no necessity to quote what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said. The only reason I was using his words was that they expressed what I wanted to say so much better than I could myself. The point I was trying to make was that there is considerable difference between the objectives of this resolution and those of the other measure to which I referred and which also envisages grants and scholarships to students. In introducing the resolution having to do with the Canada Council the Prime Minister pointed out that scholarships would be made available to people who perhaps could not properly be considered as university students. He went on to illustrate that by mentioning groups of people such as artists, musicians and actors.

[Mr. Knowles.]

The resolution which we are now considering is different in two very important respects. In the first place, it is different in that it is specifically designed to help needy students to get a university education. The factor of need does not enter into the awarding of scholarships under the Canada Council. It is also different in that it makes provision for bursaries as well as scholarships which the other measure does not. One might have hoped that this resolution would have also made provision for the granting of interest free loans to students.

It is fitting that education should occupy the attention of this house to such a great extent at this time. Canada is a very rich country with a tremendous future and education is essential to the development of our material resources and the steady expansion of our economy. Education can also play a very important part in the development of those areas of our country which may not be so richly blessed with natural wealth.

We all think of the United States, our neighbour to the south, as having the highest standard of living in the world. Mr. Thomas Bouchel, a member of the United States chamber of commerce, when addressing audiences in the United States following his return from Europe some time ago has been quoted as saying that in his opinion Switzerland has the highest standard of living in the world and Denmark had the highest standard of life.

In recent months we have become increasingly conscious of the fact that university education is also essential to our national defence.

Indeed it may even be our first line of defence. The emphasis which Russia is placing on education and the feverish haste of Russian universities to turn out engineers and scientists indicate that they have made the same appraisal. It becomes increasingly clear that our human resources, our brain power, are the most precious of all our resources. Any nation which neglects their development does so at its own peril.

On the political level education is essential also to the preservation of our democracy and our democratic institutions and to the solving of the complex problems which face us today. Democracy has been described as government of the people, by the people, for the people. Democracy cannot work unless the people are in position to play their part effectively, and they cannot play their part effectively without sufficient educational training to develop independent thought and judgment.

The people must be able to understand the present in the terms of the past and to anticipate the future in terms of both. Abraham Lincoln said that "if we could just know where we are and whither we are tending, we could better know what to do and how to do it." Above all education is essential for living a life. The only forms of life that have survived on this planet are those which have been successful in adapting themselves to their environment. In this age of electronics, automation and the atom bomb the ability to adapt oneself to one's environment becomes more vital still. A knowledge and appreciation of those values which satisfy the soul, which go to make up a full life and which are of permanent lasting value are indispensable if people and nations are to reverse their present course toward chaos and destruction.

On motion of Mr. Carter the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take the further supplementary estimates which I tabled a few days ago; then the resolution on the Canada Council, and second reading of the bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENT STATISTICS

Question No. 1—Mr. Boisvert:

How many manufacturing establishments were in operation (a) in each province; (b) in each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954, 1955?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

1 (a) and (b):

POLYMER CORPORATION LIMITED

Question No. 8—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. What is the book value of Polymer Corporation Limited, including both buildings and land?
2. What is the amount computed by Sarnia as to basis of payment in lieu of taxes?
3. What real estate was purchased by or for Polymer Corporation in the years 1954 to 1956 inclusive, and what was the amount paid for same?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Defence Production:

1. As of December 31, 1955, the book value of Polymer Corporation Limited amounted to $48,409,311, as set forth in the company's published annual report. The figure for the year ending December 31, 1956 has not been finalized and will be disclosed in the company's annual report for the year.

2. It is the company's policy to pay to the city of Sarnia the same amount as would be payable if the company was a private concern. The plant is assessed each year by the city assessor in the same manner as other industrial property in the area and the company's grant to the city is determined by applying the current mill rate to the final business and property assessment. The grant to the city in lieu of taxes for 1956 amounted to $297,547.80 and the total business and property assessment made in 1956 which will serve as the basis for determining the grant for 1957 amounts to $5,168,515.

3. Disclosure of purchases of real estate and the amounts paid for same would not be in the public interest, since any land purchased in the Sarnia area has been acquired in competition with industry and others for current or future plant expansion.

T.C.A.—MARITIME FLIGHT CHANGES

Question No. 12—Mr. Bell:

1. Have any changes been made in T.C.A. flights in and out of the maritimes in the last two months?
2. If so, what were these changes and why were they made?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

1. Yes.

2. One North Star flight operating Montreal to Halifax and return replaced by a DC-3 aircraft.

One North Star flight operating Halifax to Boston and return replaced by a DC-3 flight.

These changes were necessitated by the loss of a North Star aircraft in British Columbia on December 9 and were made effective by a schedule change on December 15.

CAMP GAGETOWN COAL CONTRACTS

Question No. 20—Mr. Brooks:

1. How many tons of coal have been contracted for by the Department of National Defence or any other government department for use at Camp Gagetown, during the winter season 1956-57?
2. What quantity is being purchased from (a) Minto area, New Brunswick; (b) outside New Brunswick?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Defence Production:

1. 20,039.5 tons.
2. (a) 20,000 tons.
   (b) 39.5 tons.

PARCEL POST, VANCOUVER, BURNABY, NEW WESTMINSTER

Question No. 28—Mr. Goode:

1. Were tenders called for the delivery of parcel post in the area covered by Vancouver, Burnaby, New Westminster, etc.?
2. If so, (a) when; (b) who were given the opportunity of tendering; (c) what prices were quoted; (d) who received the contract?

Answer by: Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General):

1 and 2. Tenders were not called and no change is contemplated at the present time in the existing arrangements.

PARCEL POST DELIVERY, VANCOUVER DISTRICT

Question No. 29—Mr. Hahn:

1. Has consolidation of the parcel post delivery in the Vancouver metropolitan district been completed?
2. If so, who has the contract?
3. When was such contract let?
4. When were tenders called?
5. How many applications were there?
6. For what reasons was successful applicant chosen?
7. Are any parcel post carriers being let out as a result of the consolidation? If so, how many?
8. What are the names and addresses of each of those so affected?
9. How many years of service did each give to date?
10. On what day is the new service to go into effect?

Answer by: Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General):

1. No.
2 to 10. See answer to No. 1.

INSTANT COFFEE INGREDIENTS

Question No. 30—Mr. Hahn:

1. Are there any ingredients other than coffee in the instant coffee sold in this country?
2. If so, (a) what are such ingredients; (b) are any of them considered detrimental to health?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1 and 2. All the instant coffee products on the market in Canada have been analysed in the laboratories of the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare and no ingredients other than those present in coffee were found in the products labelled 100 per cent pure coffee. One brand contained a small amount of added dextrose or sugar; this ingredient is not considered detrimental to health.

MAIL TRANSPORT COSTS AND REVENUES

Question No. 32—Mr. Hahn:

1. What was the amount paid to (a) Canadian Pacific Railway; (b) Canadian National Railways; (c) Trans-Canada Air Lines; (d) Canadian Pacific Airlines; (e) Great Northern Railway; (f) Pacific Great Eastern Railway; (g) other means of transportation, for transport of mail in each of the fiscal years ending in 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954, 1955?
2. In each of these years, what was (a) the total revenue received from second and third class mail; (b) the estimated cost of handling second and third class mail; (c) the total tonnage of mail carried; (d) the total tonnage of second and third class mail carried?

Answer by: Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General):

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Question No. 45—Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many miles of the trans-Canada highway were completed by December 31, 1956?
2. How many miles were built in 1956, by provinces?
3. How many miles are under construction, by provinces?
4. How many miles have been completed through the national parks?
5. How many miles are still to be constructed in each province?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

1. Approximately 2,800 miles of the trans-Canada highway are now completed of which the following mileages, exclusive of national parks, have been constructed since agreements were signed under the Trans-Canada Highway Act: Grading, 2,038; paving, 1,577.

2.	Grading	Paving
Newfoundland	28	—
Prince Edward Island	12	17
Nova Scotia	33	—
New Brunswick	18	7
Ontario	30	52
Manitoba	32	52

New Brunswick	8	—
Ontario	112	28
Manitoba	10	6
Saskatchewan	—	33
Alberta	31	—
British Columbia	54	11
Total	314	81

4. No mileage within Banff and Yoho national parks has been paved. Eighty miles of the trans-Canada highway through Banff and Yoho are under contract for grading, with 51 miles completed. In addition 14 miles of bituminous stabilized base course have been completed.

5. Under the terms of the new trans-Canada highway agreement, pavements of good standard, but not necessarily to trans-Canada highway standards, constructed prior to December 1949, may be retained as part of the trans-Canada highway. Therefore, it is the provinces prerogative to reconstruct to trans-Canada highway standards such sections.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINE

Question No. 46—Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many miles of the trans-Canada pipe line is completed?
2. How many miles of the pipe line have yet to be built to reach Winnipeg?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

1. To date, 225 miles of pipe line have been laid, with clean-up operations complete.

2. Three hundred and fifty miles are yet to be completed. Of this portion of the line, 231 miles of right of way have been cleared; 226 miles have been graded, and 195 miles of pipe have been strung or stockpiled in Canada. In addition, the following work has been done at river crossings, which come within the uncompleted portion of the line: The west Assiniboine crossing is 75 per cent complete, with both dual lines pulled across the river and the east Assiniboine crossing is 50 per cent complete with one line pulled across the river. Work on the Red river will be started on completion of the east Assiniboine crossing.

DUMPING DUTIES ON IMPORTS, 1956

Question No. 50—Mr. Lennard:

What was the total amount applied as dumping duties on goods entering Canada, during the calendar year 1956?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

Period January 1 to September 30, 1956, (latest figures available) $934,584.25.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION STATISTICS, ONTARIO

Question No. 51—Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. What quantities, in bushels, of (a) fall wheat; (b) spring wheat; (c) corn; (d) soybeans, were produced in the province of Ontario for each of the years 1950 to 1956, inclusive?

2. What quantities, in bushels, of (a) fall wheat; (b) spring wheat; (c) corn; (d) soybeans, were produced in each of the counties of Kent and Essex, in the province of Ontario, for each of the years 1950 to 1956, inclusive?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

1 (a), (b), (c) and (d) and 2 (a), (b), (c) and (d).

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 25, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMMUNICATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the Income Tax Act (communication of information).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Income Tax Act so as to make it possible for a minister of the crown to communicate to parliament information obtained under the Income Tax Act with respect to corporations. No change is made in the secrecy provisions so far as the income tax returns of individuals are concerned.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR HEARING OF CORPORATION APPEALS IN PUBLIC

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Income Tax Act (corporation appeals).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Income Tax Act so as to provide that when corporations take an appeal to the income tax appeal board the hearing shall be in public. No change is made with respect to the right to have an appeal heard in camera in the case of an individual.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF ISRAELI FORCES FROM GAZA STRIP AND AQABA AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with the current matter before the United Nations and in particular as to the terms under which Israel is to retire its forces from the Gaza strip and the Aqaba area. Would the acting minister say what stand Canada intends to take, and in particular does it not intend to support the stand of Israel that withdrawal should not take place until adequate provision has been made to protect Israel from potential future acts of aggression? Would the minister say what attitude Canada intends to take on this matter and in particular whether the minister does not think that before withdrawal takes place there should be such defensive measures taken by the United Nations as would prevent a possible future outbreak of hostilities between Egypt and Israel?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend did not find it possible, I am sure, to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. In a matter so important he would not expect anyone to give an ill-considered reply. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is at the United Nations. The government is in continuous contact with him and does view this situation with the interest which the people of Canada would expect the government should have in a matter of such great importance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The decision is to be made today in the United Nations, Mr. Speaker, and Canada's stand should be forthcoming. I think the House of Commons has a right to know what stand Canada intends to take on a matter as important as this.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend will understand, of course, that the resolution provided for a report to the assembly by the secretary general at twelve o'clock today. Negotiations were under way last night and negotiations are under way now, so it would not be in the interests of those negotiations for me to state at this moment a position that cannot properly be taken until the full results of those negotiations are made known. I believe that will commend itself as the kind of reply which my hon. friend would, in these circumstances, make himself.

STATELESS PERSONS—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell the house if Canada is a signatory to the convention on the status of stateless persons adopted by the United Nations economic and social council in September 1954 which states in part that:

Where a stateless person requires the help of the authorities of a foreign country to whom he could have no recourse the government of that country shall afford him aid.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): And further:

A stateless person will not be expelled except on grounds of national security and then only after a decision has been reached by due process of law. In the event of expulsion he will be allowed a reasonable time within which to seek legal admission to another country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): In view of the fact that my hon. friend did not give me advance notice of his intention to ask this question, the answer which I give is subject to verification. My impression is that we have now under study the convention that was projected and discussed at the United Nations, and that as a result of that study we will be in a position to determine when and if we should give our support.

UNITED NATIONS—INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATES RESPECTING SUEZ SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Prime Minister.

In view of the announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the importance of the next few days at the United Nations, and the circumlocution of the Minister of National Health and Welfare in answering the questions put to him by the Leader of the Opposition this morning, can the Prime Minister tell the house what instructions have gone forward to the Canadian delegation at the United Nations with respect to the position they should take concerning the Gaza strip, and if it is their intention to introduce a resolution to ensure full passage of all ships through the Suez canal, or to support such a resolution if introduced?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I cannot make any further disclosures beyond those made by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. The hon. gentleman knows that this is a very important matter and that resolutions, to be passed by the assembly, require that there should be approval by two-thirds of the members giving an affirmative vote. Negotiations are taking place, and it is not possible at this time to determine in detail what the exact form of resolutions will be in order to bring about the results which we hope can be achieved. The question is being investigated very diligently and we are getting frequent reports from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) about the progress of these negotiations, and he is fully aware of the interest of the government and of the Canadian public in the free passage of ships through the Suez canal and in the maintenance of the cessation of hostilities in that area; and all our efforts are intended to obtain satisfactory results with regard to these two important matters.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): We have some difficulty in finding out what the Canadian position is. I ask the Prime Minister whether he agrees that this is the Canadian situation, as reported in the New York Times this morning: "that Israel should withdraw from all Egyptian territory without conditions, and on a mere nebulous promise that some time later the matter will be taken up". Is that Canadian policy, that Israel has to get out without guarantees being given in advance?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It does not matter in what form the hon. gentleman asks his questions, I am not going to go further than I have gone up to the present time.

Mr. Fulton: Have you a policy?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We have a policy, and the policy is to achieve results and not merely to achieve political partisan advantage here.

An hon. Member: What a temper!

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Prime Minister why—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Meadow Lake had the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Annoyance is no substitute for information.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of National Health and Welfare in a position to make a statement to the house as to the basis of agreement between the Ontario government and the federal government with respect to the implementation of the hospital insurance program?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Well, Mr. Speaker, I can add nothing more than what I have said already twice this week.

Mr. Knowles: May I direct a supplementary question on this matter to the Prime Minister? Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that the four provinces, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario, which have indicated agreement have a population representing 54 per cent of the population of Canada? In view of his own emphasis on the counting of noses does he not feel that this majority makes it possible for the government to go ahead now with this plan?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have not made a calculation as to what proportion of the total population of Canada is represented by the latest statistics arising out of the census that was held last year, but there has been no change in the proposal that was made and announced in the house, that the government would make its recommendation to parliament when a majority of the provinces in which a majority of the population resided would have expressed their desire to go ahead with a scheme based upon that proposal.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Prime Minister a further supplementary question? How substantial does the majority have to be? It is now 54 per cent and if Nova Scotia comes in the majority will be 59 per cent. Is the government going to stand by and let a few provincial governments, representing a minority of the people of this country, veto this desirable health plan?

Mr. Martin: You know that is not the case.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The word "majority" has a connotation that my hon. friend well knows. There is a majority of supporters of the government in this house, as he well knows, and—

Mr. Knowles: Elected on the basis of only 49 per cent of the total vote.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —they would not be any less a majority were they substantially fewer in numbers than they happen to be at this time.

Mr. Fulton: And will be after the next election.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That is my hon. friend's prediction but it is frequently the case that no one is a prophet in his own country.

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of press reports that Ontario, although agreeing to the health plan, may wish to delay implementation for a year or two, can the minister say whether such a delay by one province will make it necessary for other agreeing provinces to delay similarly or can any province go ahead as soon as the plan comes into effect?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is familiar with the terms of the proposals made by the federal government last year. There is nothing I can add. Those proposals provide in themselves the answer to the question which my hon. friend has put.

Mr. Knowles: But you are modifying the proposals.

POTATOES

GATT—RENEGOTIATION OF TARIFF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance on a different subject? Can the minister say, or will he confirm, that an application has been made to GATT for permission to renegotiate the tariff agreement between Canada and the United States on the subject of potatoes? If so, will he inform the house whether those negotiations are under way?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I confirm that an application was made to GATT for the privilege of renegotiating with the United States the tariff on potatoes. Since that occurred a matter of only a few days ago I do not think anything has been done since that time.

Mr. Fulton: I did not quite understand the minister's reply as to whether permission was received.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. MacLean: May I ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Cape Breton South wish to question the minister further on the matter raised by the hon. member for Kamloops?

Mr. Gillis: No; it is on an entirely different subject.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to see the hon. member for Queens?

Mr. Gillis: I give away to the hon. member for Queens.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. MacLean: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Will the minister assure the house that the negotiations will take place at as early a date as possible, with a view to having the outcome of such negotiations, if favourable, included in this year's budget?

Mr. Harris: Well, Mr. Speaker, the negotiations with the United States will be conducted at a time suitable to both parties and may or may not take a long time to carry out, I do not know; they may not even be successful. I am sure all hon. members who are concerned about this subject would hope they would be, and I would hope they would be and that we shall conduct the negotiations in that neighbourly spirit that will probably get results.

Mr. MacLean: I have a further supplementary question. If the negotiations are not completed in time for the results to be included in this year's budget, will any action be taken by the government to change the tariff and bring down legislation before the next year's budget is presented?

Mr. Harris: I think we ought to look forward to conducting negotiations with all the expedition that we can, together with a desire to achieve a desirable result. When that time comes it will be soon enough to decide what to do about the tariff itself.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RIGHT OF CIVIL SERVANT TO ENGAGE IN OTHER WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Is it proper for a full-time civil servant employed by the unemployment insurance commission to engage in other work, such as being the director of a company like the Northside Freight Handlers Limited, now functioning on the island of Cape Breton?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I would not consider it proper for a full-time civil servant to engage in such activities if they were in any way to interfere with good public relations of his office, or with the proper and efficient discharge of the duties of that office.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED DISBANDMENT OF TWO INFANTRY BATTALIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister make a statement to the house concerning today's press report that two infantry battalions are to be disbanded?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there are at present in the Canadian regular army 15 infantry battalions and two armoured regiments. It is proposed to reduce the 15 infantry battalions to 13 for the present and to increase the two armoured regiments to three. Accordingly, two battalions of the Canadian guards, the third and fourth battalions, are being reduced to nil strength. The new armoured regiment is to be activated from the militia and I hope to be able to announce the name of the unit at an early date.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister what is the name of the armoured regiment that will be formed from the militia?

Mr. Campney: I have just said that I hope to be able to make a statement very shortly giving that information; I cannot do so today.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask a supplementary question. May we now conclude that the department has adopted the policy of more armour and greater mobility for our army so long advocated by the opposition?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Campney: The hon. member can make his own deductions.

I would like now to answer the question the hon. member asked yesterday with respect to the facilities in the newly reconstructed Minto armouries at Winnipeg. I would answer his question by saying that in rebuilding this armoury there has been no change in the basic design and while there are facilities provided for basketball, volley ball, tennis and so on, as is the case in other armouries, no special provision has been made to have an indoor running track.

Mr. Churchill: Would the minister take it under consideration and perhaps make a change in the plan?

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. What is the form to be of the projected new armoured regiment? Is it to be a regular armoured regiment with Centurions, or an armoured reconnaissance regiment or an armoured car regiment?

Mr. Campney: I am sorry but I did not hear the last part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Harkness: I asked if the projected new regiment is to be a regular tank regiment such as the two we have or an armoured reconnaissance or an armoured car regiment?

Mr. Campney: It is to be a regiment similar to the two already in existence.

MIDDLE EAST—LOCATION AND ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister now in a position to make the statement which he stated on Wednesday last he would make with respect to the Canadian forces in the United Nations police force?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, but I expect to be able to do so on Monday.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED TRANSFER OF WORK TO ABROGATE COLLECTIVE AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Is it the policy of the Canadian National Railways to abrogate agreements with legitimate unions by giving car cleaning contracts to organizations such as the Northside Freight Handlers Limited, now functioning in Cape Breton?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton South was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. I may say that I have communicated with the management of the Canadian National Railways who advise me that it is not their policy to abrogate any agreements.

An hon. Member: But they do it all the time.

Mr. Marler: I should like to take this opportunity to point out that on July 25 last I made a statement in connection with a similar matter, and I would refer the hon. gentleman to Hansard. I would also like to remind him that he is a member of the standing committee on railways and shipping owned and operated by the government and that when the accounts of the Canadian National Railways are before the committee he will be able to pursue to his heart's content the implications of his question today.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker, I might thank the minister for that answer, but I was afraid the committee he mentioned would not meet this year.

Mr. Marler: I hope, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's fear will prove not to have any foundation.

Mr. Gillis: Thank you, sir.

SHIPPING

PILOT BOAT ACCIDENT, SAINT JOHN—INVESTIGATION BY BOARD OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the board been established to investigate the serious tragedy resulting in the loss of the pilot boat outside Saint John harbour in which the crew perished? If so, when might we expect the investigation will get under way?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a formal investigation is to be undertaken by the Hon. Mr. Justice W. A. I. Anglin as commissioner. Mr. George T. Clark, barrister, of Saint John, has been appointed counsel. The following have been appointed to assist the commissioner at the investigation: Captain A. W. Hilton, shipping master of Yarmouth, who is to serve as nautical assessor, and Captain George P. Elliott, retired marine superintendent, of Halifax is to serve also as nautical assessor. The investigation is scheduled to open at Saint John court house on February 6, 1957.

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF COLOUR PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Owing to the great fall-off in sales in Canada of black and white television sets, has the C.B.C. come to any decision regarding production of colour programs for C.B.C. and other stations?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The policy with reference to production of colour television is progressing. I do not know that there has been any change because of the fact that the sale of black and white sets has fallen off. We are trying to keep up to date with other countries as becomes our importance. I am sure that the progress of colour television will go on in Canada, perhaps not as quickly as in our neighbouring country but sufficiently fast to meet the demand which we have.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO EXPORTS TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of a report by prominent people in the grain industry to the effect that Canada's excellent export record in the sale of wheat to date this year may not be maintained. More specifically, can the minister say why so far exports have not been made to Russia or any of the satellite nations, and whether any part of the agreed quantity of 15 million bushels which Russia was to take this year is likely to be shipped in the near future?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government of Canada has a trade agreement with Russia which provides that Russia will buy a minimum of 15 million bushels of wheat this year. We have every reason to think that agreement will be carried out and we have been advised that certain ships have been chartered to move the wheat.

As far as dealings with iron curtain countries are concerned the situation in those countries is disturbed, particularly with respect to Hungary's position and to some extent Poland and Czechoslovakia. Purchases from those countries did not occur in the first half of the crop year last year and we are still hopeful that purchases will be arranged before this crop year ends.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION OF RESIDENCE REQUIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the government planning to introduce at this session of parliament an amendment to the Old Age Assistance Act which will reduce the residence requirement from 20 years to 10 years? Such an amendment would bring this act into line with the Disabled Persons Act and the Blind Persons Act, and thereby prevent discrimination against new Canadians.

[Mr. McCann.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I can only refer my hon. friend to the answer which I gave to that question in this house I think a week ago Wednesday.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

DORCHESTER—REPORTED DISTURBANCE AT PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Has the minister heard of the disturbance at Dorchester penitentiary in New Brunswick, and, if so, is he in a position to give any details?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure the Minister of Justice will on Monday if in fact there has been a disturbance.

WATER RESOURCES

UPPER THAMES VALLEY AUTHORITY—DECISION AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): On Wednesday last the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) asked if a decision had been arrived at regarding federal participation under the Canada Water Conservation Act for a proposed flood control and water conservation scheme on the upper Thames river.

I believe the best way in which to reply to the question would be by reading a short extract from the letter I wrote on January 17 to Hon. Mr. Nickle, minister of planning and development for Ontario. I quote:

> The proposals of the authority were given further careful consideration from an engineering and an economic standpoint. I may say now that from an engineering point of view the project appears to represent a comprehensive plan of river control, and that it would indeed serve to reduce flooding on the upper Thames river. However, following a review of the benefit-cost data made available to this department it does not appear that there is, as yet, a satisfactory demonstration that there are clearly defined benefits of sufficient value to justify federal participation.
> In these circumstances I would suggest that the best course would be for the upper Thames valley conservation authority to consider whether or not it is satisfied that the benefit-cost position has been investigated adequately. If the conservation authority believes that further investigation would disclose a more favourable picture, it may wish to provide the supporting data.

IMMIGRATION

C. G. HANNA—PAYMENT OF DEFENCE COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is the defence of Christian George Hanna being paid for by a Vancouver newspaper?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not the faintest idea. I know I am not paying for it, and I doubt if Mr. Hanna is in a position to do so.

FINANCE

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK—INTEREST RATE ON DEPOSITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has there been a recent change in the interest rate payable on deposits in the post office savings bank? If so, what is the change and what is the reason for it?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I am not sure that there has been a recent change but I would not be at all surprised if there has been, in line with the change in interest rates generally. However, I think the Postmaster General would probably be able to answer that question better than I can.

INTEREST RATES ON MUNICIPAL CAPITAL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister going to take some steps, either by expression of opinion or by definite direction, to make it possible for municipalities to finance necessary capital construction at lower rates of interest?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne mentioned an item of legislation intended to be of assistance to municipal corporations. It is on the order paper and I hope we will reach it in due course in order that it may be given approval by the house. I think the hon. gentleman's question relates more directly to capital assistance to municipal corporations, and I do not recall that this parliament ever did that except during the depression years under an act passed at that time. However, several, if not all, of the provincial governments have on their statute books and in operation authority to assist either by the purchase or the guarantee of bonds issued by municipal corporations. I understand that a great many municipal corporations have had the benefit of these statutes in the past and are using them now.

Mr. Pallett: My question did not have to do with capital assistance but rather with direction as to the lowering of the interest rates charged on these bonds that even the municipal corporations to which the minister refers must pay. That depends entirely on direction from the minister. Has any thought been given to that?

Mr. Harris: Well, as I think the Prime Minister has said on other occasions, we consider everything that might be in the interests of the Canadian people.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—SITUATION ON HOBBEMA RESERVE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the widespread public protest arising from the threatened expulsion of persons of Indian ancestry from the Hobbema reserve in Alberta, will the minister indicate to the house what consideration is being given to suspending these evictions?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, evidently the hon. member for Edmonton East was not in the house the other day when I answered a question put to me by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona. There is nothing I could add to that statement at this time.

Mr. Harkness: Nothing you are prepared to do.

Mr. Holowach: Is it a fact that under the terms of the act the minister has the right to intercede and suspend such evictions?

Mr. Pickersgill: The other day I said I would not give the house legal opinions. I think that was a sensible view then and I think it is still a sensible view.

Mr. Holowach: May I just tell the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Holowach: May I ask the minister a further question? Is the minister aware that the people of Canada have a heart and want a stop put to these senseless expulsions of Indians from reserves?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think if we ever reach the orders of the day the minister will be able to demonstrate that he knows very well that the Canadian people have a heart, having regard to an item in the supplementary estimates.

LIVESTOCK

HOGS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PREMIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it the intention of the government to increase the premium on grade A hogs at an early date, and, if so, by what amount?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry, but because of the noise I was not able to hear the question.

Mr. Bryson: Is it the intention of the government to increase the premium paid on grade A hogs at an early date and, if so, by what amount?

Mr. Gardiner: There has been no decision made to do so.

Mr. Bryson: I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture a further supplementary question. He says that no decision has been made. Is the government giving active consideration to an increase in the premium?

Mr. Gardiner: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the chief government whip, or perhaps I should refer to him as the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister. In view of the exchange between the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for Cape Breton South and in view of the fact that yesterday there was no motion to set up the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, will such a committee be named by the House of Commons at this session?

Mr. W. G. Weir (Parliamentary Assistant to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I presume it is intended to do so. Arrangements are all ready to do so immediately it is called for.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE BY MR. SPEAKER TO ASKING OF QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Speaker: I want to say that the question period today is an improvement perhaps over some previous days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: But I want to add that it did not pass without notice as far as I am concerned that it is either impossible for some hon. members to find the rules I quoted yesterday—maybe they do not have Beauchesne, third edition—or if they have read them they do not understand them the same way I do.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Terminable services—

538. Freight assistance on western feed grains—further amount required, $2,000,000.

Mr. Harris: This item represents underestimating by the government as to the amount of feed grain that would be qualifying for this subsidy during the current fiscal year. We find that the amount previously provided is not sufficient. There has been no change in the policy, of course, and none is suggested by this supplementary item, but it does mean that during this fiscal year we will have paid a greater amount by way of subsidy on feed grain than at any time during recent memory, and the full amount of $2 million is needed now in order to make these payments.

Mr. Charlton: It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to criticize the payment of this freight assistance in any way, but to criticize the administration in so far as the red tape, etc., that has to be gone through is concerned and the fact the government has never made this a permanent policy as we have requested on many occasions in this house. The uncertainty with regard to this freight assistance has made it necessary for eastern feeders to avoid dependence on western grain for their feed requirements. It is for this reason that eastern feeders have probably increased their acreage of corn to a greater extent than would have been necessary had there been some stability in government policy with respect to freight assistance.

We never know when it is going to be dropped. It has been hinted on various occasions that the measure would be dropped. The farmer is never sure. We have asked on several occasions that more storage space be made available for western feed grain and this has been promised. However, we are not sure whether or not it has been made available and on many occasions it has been difficult for eastern feeders to be sure of the quantity of western feed grain available.

I want to point out that this has been called, by certain people, a straight subsidy to eastern feeders. It is no such thing. It does enable the western producer to dispose of some of his surplus to eastern feeders in a great deal better way than he could if this freight assistance were not paid. The advantage, I think, it could be fairly said, is just about 50-50 between the western producer and the eastern feeder. If there is any truth in the fact the government is considering eliminating this policy then I wish they would come out and say so. As I say, there is no certainty in the mind of the eastern feeder as to whether the assistance will be continued. He cannot make his plans very far ahead, so he adopts the only other course—

Mr. Harris: Did my hon. friend not see the estimates that were placed before us the other day?

Mr. Charlton: Yes, I saw that, but tomorrow the government could say they were not going to pay it next year; that is what I am trying to bring out. We have asked on various occasions that this be made a permanent policy so the farmer would know what to expect from one year to the next. A man cannot change the rotation of his crops in two weeks. He cannot decide he is going to put in double the acreage of feed grain in two weeks. He has to plan ahead. If the government is not considering eliminating this assistance, then at least tell the eastern feeder what the policy of the government is. It has been clearly indicated to us today by the answers to the questions on the orders of the day that the government is continuing to consider matters but makes no firm statement as to what they are considering or what their decisions have been.

As I said before, as a consequence of this uncertainty eastern farmers have increased their acreage of corn and that is detrimental to the western producer because naturally if the eastern feeder is producing more corn then he is not going to require the amount of western feed grain he would otherwise require. Then, there is the matter of price which has caused some eastern feeders to hesitate about purchasing western feed grain. There are many uncertainties in connection with this system. As I said, we have urged the government to make this legislation permanent in nature. I hope the government will state now that the policy will be in effect for another year at least if they do not want to make it permanent, so the farmers can plan now for their future requirements.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, that the government has not listened to the vociferous pleas on the part of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre for the abolition of freight assistance on feed grain. I am very pleased to know his is a voice crying in the wilderness in this respect. I trust that in respect to old age pensions, the difficulties from which we have been suffering and many other questions he has raised, his will continue to be a voice crying in the wilderness. We are pleased to know that the policy of the government is to continue this freight assistance. It is of great help to the farmers in British Columbia, particularly the dairy and poultry producers because the cost of grain is a major item in their costs.

I do urge the government to give reconsideration to the restoring of the reduction that was given effect last year, because this assistance is paid on the basis of so much per ton and every time there is a freight rate increase, from which the farmers have suffered recently, the percentage of assistance they receive in respect of this feed grain is lessened and lessened. I urge that consideration be given to that, particularly in view of the recent freight rate increases across Canada.

I have the honour to represent, on the whole, small farmers who work long hours and who receive a very modest return, but their costs are high with respect to feed grains. There is one community that is now paying $80 per ton for No. 5 wheat landed on the wharf at that point, and that is the highest cost of which I know at the present time. Then, the farmer has to truck it 20 miles in some cases. When you relate that cost to the farmer to what the wheat producers on the prairie are receiving you can see that someone in between is pinching quite a lot and it is the opinion of the farmers I have the honour to represent that it is the milling companies of Canada.

Now, because of that situation which has existed over quite a number of years there is a growing demand on the part of dairy and poultry producers in my constituency for the government to make arrangements to enable them to buy their wheat or grain direct from the farmer through the wheat board and overcome this middleman's cost. Our farmers are organized members of fruit associations, poultry organizations and dairy organizations, and they would not for a moment want to do anything that would destroy the effective organization with respect to the marketing of wheat on the prairies. But we do suggest that the government could give consideration to making some arrangements for these producers to buy in carload lots direct from the farmers through the wheat board and overcome this middleman's cost. That is all I have to say on this question, at the present time, Mr. Chairman. In conclusion, I once again urge the government to reconsider the amount of the subsidy in view of the recent increase in freight costs.

Mr. Quelch: We, in this group, have always supported the policy of freight assistance on feed grains to both the east and the west. I agree with the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand that there should be a greater degree of permanence given to this legislation so the farmers would know this policy will continue and they can plan ahead. I have one or two questions I should like to ask in this regard. Can the minister say what was the total amount of freight assistance given on shipments to both the east and the west? Can the minister break down both of those amounts to show how much was for oats, how much for barley and how much for wheat?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman, I can give the total over a number of years of the payments made with respect to the shipments in all the provinces, but the details as to how it is broken down in the various kinds of grain I could not give. I can only add that I notice it comes to some $254 million over the period of time that the subsidy has been in effect. This year the increase is expected to be something in the order of 200,000 tons more than last year, but I will put on the record by way of answers to questions the information requested. As to the permanent side of it, I might draw to the attention of the committee that I am afraid I am entering into a discussion of next year's estimates. The reason I intervened when the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand was speaking is that the provision is in this year's estimates again.

Mr. Knight: I assume the government is not responsible for the quality of feed grain sold under this legislation. When the hon. member for Kootenay West was speaking he must have drawn to the attention of the committee whether or not the government should subsidize the freight charges upon rubbish such as certainly is received sometimes by the farmers in the maritime provinces. I do not know whether I should say this, but I think there is a distinct connection between the subsidization of freight and the quality of the material that is shipped to the eastern provinces. I am well aware of the fact that a good deal of the mixing is done in the provinces. I personally have seen what was supposed to be feed grain put out by private mixers in one of the maritime provinces and I saw a farmer in one of those provinces mix some of the so-called feed with water and offer it to his hogs. They refused to eat it.

I think I might add a word on what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said. I have mentioned this before. Apparently it is not a good idea because nobody ever does anything about it. It seems to me that when there is a feed industry of such great volume as they have in the maritime provinces the farmers should get together in their co-operatives and buy grain, as my colleague suggested, not necessarily from the western farmers through the wheat board but from the wheat board itself. I do not care whom they buy it from, but I think it should be bought under a Canadian certificate of quality so that those people would know what they are getting.

I am well aware of the fact that a great deal of this mixing is done by private concerns. There is a great bulk of wheat seeds, rubbish, wild oats, wild buckwheat and other grains of that kind that disappear every year. They go somewhere. My suspicion is that they go into the stomachs of maritime hogs.

Mr. Fulton: I want to say just a word on this problem raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West. The interest of the farmers in my constituency in the question of feed grain arises mainly in respect of the cattle ranchers who wish to put their cattle on grain to finish them for market. Our area is not a good grain-growing area but it is a very good cattle-ranching area. The situation is that we are in direct competition with prairie beef on the British Columbia market. The British Columbia ranching industry does not produce more than from 40 per cent to 45 per cent of the beef consumed in our province. The rest is brought in mainly from Calgary and Edmonton, but most of it from Calgary. Therefore, it will be seen that in our own domestic market we compete with prairie beef, probably 100 per cent of which is grain-fed. When we pay the prices for our feed grain, which the hon. member for Kootenay West referred to, it will be seen that we are at a very distinct disadvantage, particularly in light of the fact that the fashion being set now is almost universally for grain-fed beef. We know that well-finished, grass-fed beef is just as good as grain-fed beef, but we are a minority producing province and it is virtually impossible to fight against the trend for feed-grain beef which is set by the packers. Something has to be done. Either the feed-grain assistance must be increased or else our ranchers must be allowed to buy direct from the farms on the prairies their supplies of feed-grain, as the prairie farmer is allowed to do now. It may be that it would have to be a combination of both.

The prairie farmer gets his feed grain at about $20 or $25 a ton from his neighbour without any interference. We are not allowed to buy it direct from the farm and if we do we do not get any feed grain assistance in bringing it in and so we are hit both ways. It is an economic problem of great proportions for our farmers. I am not speaking for an area that is not really a good beef-producing area; I am speaking for an area that is a good beef-producing area, as the Minister of Agriculture knows, but which is squeezed between the two policies of the government, one of which seeks to reduce the feed grain assistance per ton, while the other makes it impossible for the farmers to buy their grain at prices which will enable them to compete with their competitors on the prairies. If the policy of not permitting direct farm purchases is to be followed, then I think the only fair thing to do—and I insist the only fair thing to do—is to increase the amount of feed grain assistance so that our farmers will be relieved by that action from the consequences of the unfair competitive position they are placed in by the other action of the government.

Since we are discussing this question of feed grain assistance, this seems to me to be the appropriate place to bring it up. The Minister of Finance apparently is in charge of putting these supplementary estimates through. I put it to him, and he has the choice, in fairness, of increasing the amount provided for feed grain assistance or persuading his colleagues to permit us to buy grain direct from the prairies.

Mr. Hahn: I would be remiss in my duties if I failed to take part in this particular discussion by reason of the fact that some of the questions raised are of relative importance to the district which I represent.

I feel, as do other hon. members, that the feed grain assistance must be maintained. I was very interested in the observations made by the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand because I recall that on April 9 last year, I think it was, when the board of transport commissioners held their hearings in respect of freight rates, a portion of a letter from the Minister of Agriculture was read in which he was purported to have written that there is of course a possibility parliament might change the law.

As I recall it, about February 28, 1954,—I have not the Hansard here—when this same minister brought in a change in the regulations which drastically reduced feed grain assistance to my province, it had a dire effect upon the industry in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

I fully realize that what the Minister of Finance said is quite true—and I think he would agree with me—that when a certain figure appears in the estimates it does not necessarily follow that it will be used. If the government decides that the regulations are going to be changed, then we can have such a change and it can have a marked effect upon our industry in British Columbia. The fact remains that agriculture is the third most important primary industry in British Columbia, second to logging and mining. It does play a very important part in our lives.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, I would draw to his attention and to the attention of the committee that possibly the answer is not entirely in the fact that we have this feed grain assistance that he mentioned.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the Manitoba Co-operator of June 21, 1956, which would indicate that the complaint of one Stephen Francis Murphy, a turkey farmer from Mission, British Columbia, was heard by the courts and the following judgment was handed down:

> Had the plaintiff transported his own grain from Manitoba to British Columbia for his own use, I question whether the prohibition would apply. Here the plaintiff purchased grain in Manitoba and tendered it for shipment to a company in British Columbia.

The fact remains that a British Columbia farmer is not permitted to buy grain from any of the prairie provinces without having it go through the wheat board. I am not opposed to that. I feel the wheat board is doing an excellent job in this country and I would like to see it retained. However, the difficulty as I see it is summed up in this article from the Financial Post of December 10, 1955. I realize that the date is old but it has a significant bearing on this matter. Under a dateline from Lethbridge, Alberta the article says:

> At the 90 cent level, feedlot operators were swamped with deliveries of high-grade wheat. Many bought enough grain to maintain feeding operations for two years.

The farmers in Alberta and Manitoba can exchange grain at any price they wish and for considerably less than what we pay in British Columbia. The article continues:

> I have just sold 10,000 bushels of No. 2 wheat at 60 cents a bushel not because I need the cash but rather because I don't see any hope of selling all my grain to the wheat board within the next two years.

Compare that with the minimum price the British Columbia farmer pays for No. 5 wheat of about $3 a hundredweight.

There we have a specific instance of what is being done on the prairies. I do not blame the prairie farmers. They have to get ready cash and this is a common-sense way of carrying on business, but why should they be denied the right of sending grain into British Columbia on that same basis? Better still, why should the British Columbia livestock and poultry producer be denied the right of purchasing grain on the same basis as does any farmer on the prairies? If the price is going to be consistent they should all pay the same price. We have the awkward position spoken of by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson wherein farmers in his area who raise a great deal of feed grain find it impossible to send their grain into the British Columbia market because merchants in British Columbia find it to their advantage to import birds and other products from the United States. We are not only denying a proper market to the British Columbia producers but we are also denying the prairie farmers the right to send grain into that area. I would therefore strongly urge the minister to consider a further supplementary estimate in this respect in the forthcoming year to bring back into effect the $5 that he removed on February 28, 1954.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I would like to endorse a great deal that has already been said particularly by the hon. member for Saskatoon who complained of the quality of the grains that are being sold in markets as feed. I saw a sample not long ago which I am sure consisted mainly of sweepings and dust. It was totally unfit to be put on the market for sale and I think the minister should carefully consider the type of feed that is receiving the subsidy; otherwise we are encouraging a trade that is of no credit to Canada through shipping such grain.

I would also urge support for what was said by the hon. member for Kootenay West regarding dairy and poultry producers being able to bring their own grain from the prairies. In my area we have several retired wheat farmers who are now engaged in fruit growing and from them I have learned that if they want to get grain from their own farms on the prairies it cannot be done directly, nor can they ship their own fruit from British Columbia to the district on the prairies where they formerly lived because that is forbidden and so they must have a middleman and the railway companies each taking a pound of flesh out of both products in which the farmers are interested.

The result of this is that on the prairie a farmer has to sell five bushels of grain to buy a basket of apples and in the Okanagan valley he must sell five baskets of apples to buy a bushel of grain. The whole situation is stupid and the intervening red tape which causes this discrepancy in the cost of moving the products should be removed. I feel that the assistance now given is completely inadequate, but over and above an increase in the assistance some step should be taken to make it possible for a farmer who formerly lived on the prairies, and who is now interested in doing so, to bring in feed grain he cannot sell from his own farm to British Columbia through the wheat board but not through other channels. I think much could be done to help the prairie farmers dispose of their feed grain and the poultry and dairy farmers of British Columbia to take advantage of a fair price for their commodities.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the difficulties of the farmers on the mainland of British Columbia but those difficulties are quite small compared with the problem which faces the poultry men on Vancouver island because not only do they have to pay freight by rail but there are the additional charges to move the feed from the mainland to Vancouver island.

As is well known, owing to the skill of the breeders on Vancouver island a strain of turkeys has been developed which is sometimes referred to as the double-breasted bronze which are now accepted all across Canada, and the entire turkey business very largely depends on the ability of the Vancouver island breeders to produce enough eggs to sell the day-old poults to the breeders in other parts of the country.

I feel that the business of the legitimate feed merchants should be protected because while it may be possible for some of the larger farmers to purchase feed direct from farmers in Alberta or Saskatchewan nevertheless the majority of the small farmers will not buy in carload lots and will have to deal through regular grain merchants. From the information I have received from grain merchants on Vancouver island I am convinced that their margin of profit is extremely small. It would seem to me that the solution to this problem would be to restore the freight assistance to the amount it was a few years ago before the reductions were unfortunately made. I do hope that in the coming year it will be possible for the government to increase freight assistance over the amount that is now being provided.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few words to say on this particular item not because I am a farming expert but because I am taking a look at the economics of this proposition. In the main estimates there is a provision for $16,500,000 for feed grain assistance.

The minister is realistically stepping them up $3 million more this year. That is quite a bill and it is accumulating from year to year. As I see it the questions of feed grain and fertilizer are interlocked; they go together.

I do not see any reason why the maritime provinces should not supply themselves with feed grain provided they are given the necessary assistance, particularly with respect to obtaining fertilizer for the purpose of rehabilitating their land. I think it is time that we began to think of that. The other place is establishing a committee to look into the question of better uses of land and the Gordon commission also emphasizes that matter.

During the war, I think around 1942, the department of munitions and supply made a grant to the Dominion Coal Company for the purpose of research into the use of the slag at the steel plant as a fertilizer. Quite a lot of money was spent on that. I do not know whether or not a report was made by the company. However, a few weeks ago an eminent agricultural expert in the maritimes made the statement that there were 100,000 tons of slag being thrown away each year at that steel plant which could have been used as fertilizer on the land in Nova Scotia.

It is costing a lot of money to take feed grain from the prairies into the maritimes. I think that the cost down there is about $80 a ton; it is $60 in British Columbia. I know that fertilizer is well over $90 a ton. The point I am making is that this assistance is necessary in the unplanned use of our land at the present time. I do not think that the answer is just in continuing to give assistance but is also in what the Senate committee will find and what the Gordon commission will find as to better utilization of our land in our own area. I believe that the questions of fertilizer and feed grain are interlocked. I might tell the minister that in my lifetime we had one of the largest fertilizer plants in Canada located at that steel plant in Sydney. It was there until the late thirties but it followed the other industries into Canada. Now we are dragging it back and paying subsidies on feed grain and other commodities which we think could be produced in the maritime provinces for our own use at least.

I wish to leave this observation with the minister because it is true, at least I think it is, that there is 100,000 tons of slag which could be used as fertilizer and thereby provide fertilizer cheaply if not gratis to the farmers in that area, which would assist them and persuade them to go into the production of feed grain.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, there is a point or two which I would like to bring to the attention of the minister and also to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture regarding assistance with respect to feed grain. I believe since the main estimates on this were passed during the last year there has been an increase in freight rates, and this has had a very detrimental effect on the economy on using feed grains from the west in the maritimes in spite of the assistance, because as has already been pointed out by some hon. members, especially the member for Kootenay West and the member for Humber-St. George's, in the throne speech debate, and I would commend him on what he had to say to the minister, by reason of the 11 per cent increase in freight rates the freight cost of delivering a ton of grain in the maritimes has increased, depending upon the area, as much as 50 per cent of what it previously cost.

As a result of a whole series of freight rate increases since this legislation was first introduced much of its benefit has been dissipated because the actual cost per ton in freight on feed grain brought into the maritimes has increased. It has gone up rapidly, I believe, because there has been no corresponding increase in the amount granted by the feed grain assistance legislation. I would like to have some information from the minister as to what is the actual freight rate cost of delivering a ton of grain to some representative point in the maritimes, and also what it was when this legislation was first introduced, what it is now and perhaps what it was at an intermediate point when the freight rates were at some intermediate figure. In any case this rapid increase in freight rates on feed grain to the maritimes has in many instances made the difference between a profitable and an unprofitable operation in the case of persons who are producing pork, turkeys and many other things. The result now is that many farmers in the maritimes have gone completely out of pork production because of the increased cost of feed.

For the last couple of years in the maritimes we have had the absurd situation that when a woman goes into a meat shop, especially during the holiday season, to buy a turkey she is as likely as not to get a turkey which was raised in California or in some other large turkey ranch in the United States. Part of the reason why these imports are increasing is that they are more highly processed and in most cases are ready for the oven when bought; frequently that is not the case with respect to Canadian turkeys.

I would also like to have verification on another point. Most farmers in the maritimes are under the impression that there are only certain sources from which they can obtain western feed grain. I think it would be to the advantage of all concerned if the situation could be clarified by the minister so that individual millers in the maritimes, or co-operatives or others who import feed grain, would be fully apprised as to what are their privileges. I am under the impression that they could order grain direct from some company in western Canada which is acting as an agent of the wheat board and have it shipped direct or perhaps even from a line elevator. I am not sure on that last point. If that is the case I think it should be more generally known.

Mr. McLeod: Mr. Chairman, I would like first of all very strongly to endorse the point made by the member for Okanagan Boundary and then I would like to cite certain instances in my own area. Farmers in my own area are not retired fruit farmers, but are dairy farmers who own farms on the prairies and receive a share of the crop and they would be very glad if they could go into the province of Saskatchewan with their own trucks and haul the feed into their own part of the country. However, the minister knows that that is contrary to the regulations concerning the grain trade at the present time.

In my riding I have a problem a little different from that which exists in some of the others. We produce a lot of wheat which is shipped in carload lots, mainly to the coast, for feed purposes. It is evident that the price they receive for that grain according to the local market in British Columbia is depressed by the amount of the subsidy. I agree, Mr. Chairman, that in the over-all picture of British Columbia the subsidy is of great assistance to the agricultural economy and must be continued; indeed, it should be raised, but at the same time I would suggest that our wheat growers in that part of the province which I represent, when they ship their grain to the coast for use there as feed, should be entitled to the same subsidy as if the grain came from the prairies. That is the only point I wish to make.

I would like to add my support for a continuation of the subsidy and for an increase of the subsidy, but I would also suggest very strongly to the minister that he take into consideration the point I have made regarding a subsidy to our growers of wheat when they ship their grain to the coast for feed purposes.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I wish to support some of the things that have been said here with regard to the position of dairy and poultry farmers on the coast. There are quite a large number of poultry farmers in my constituency, and they suffer very badly from the effects of the present price structure with regard to feed. Some of them have, I think, been overcoming their difficulties recently by bringing in feed grain from the Peace river block of British Columbia which they can do, of course, without interference by the wheat board authorities.

However, I think there are certain disadvantages about that type of solution. In the first place I do not think we should rely on records which might undermine the position of the wheat board and, in the second place, the supply of feed grain from the Peace river block is fairly limited; they don't get a subsidy. It has occurred to me for some time, Mr. Chairman, that we are overlooking a very useful natural advantage that we have in western Canada. We have on the Pacific coast the only temperate climate in Canada—the only mild climate.

Mr. Nesbitt: What about ours?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is merely a matter of meteorological fact, and because this is a matter of meteorological fact it means that on the Pacific coast the production of dairy and poultry products can be undertaken in much more advantageous circumstances than it can in more severe climates. We have on the other side of the Rockies one of the major grain-growing areas of the world, and it does seem strange to me, Mr. Chairman, that we have not yet achieved some arrangement of our agricultural economy in this country whereby the enormous stocks of feed grain for which, according to my colleagues here, the prairie farmers receive the very minimum of income, cannot be transported to the Pacific coast for use in the manufacture of dairy and poultry products under the very best conditions.

I admit that this is not entirely due to the operations of the government, but it is perhaps due in part to the failure of the government to take action. In British Columbia almost the entire feed business is under the control of two firms; one is a wholly-owned subsidiary of one of the large milling companies of Canada, and the other has a close connection with a milling company by virtue of interlocking directorships. The "spread" between the price paid to the producers of grain and the price paid by my constituents is almost unbelievable, and as an instance of this robbery that is going on I would like to cite the case of one of my constituents who has a very large turkey farm. He decided one day that he was "fed up" with the enormous price the feed company was charging for grain, so the next time the salesman for that company came round he said he was making arrangements to bring grain from the Peace river, and instal his own grinding machinery. The salesman promptly reduced the price by $17 a ton.

The government did institute an investigation, some years ago, of this particular factor in our economy—the milling industry—and some quite startling revelations came out of that inquiry, but no action was taken at that time. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that while the subsidy on grain feeds is certainly desirable and, as the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke said just now, should be increased, that in itself will not solve the main problem, which is to see that the produce of the prairie farmers reaches the people in my constituency and province who need it, paying the least possible tribute to the middleman in the process.

I would commend to the Minister of Agriculture that he undertake a very careful restudy of that hearing which was held with regard to the milling and grain industry a few years ago, and consider whether or not there are some steps he could advise his colleagues to take in order to remedy this fantastic situation in which a stable and profitable dairy and poultry industry on the Pacific coast is being hamstrung year after year owing to this enormous "spread" between the price paid to the prairie producer and the price paid by the poultry and dairy producers on the coast. I think this is a matter of urgent national importance, and some steps should be taken by the government to remedy the present situation.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I have spoken on this and similar matters on several occasions in the past, and therefore I propose to speak for only a moment or two now. I want to say again what I have stressed in the past, namely that this is not to be considered in any way as a "handout", or as assistance to something which does not give a definite economic return to the Dominion of Canada. I am quite certain that of all the expenditures made by this government in all phases of activity there is none which has produced a greater economic return than this, or helped more, in our area, to increase the gross national product to which the Minister of Finance is so pleased to refer.

We have developed in the east today an agriculture industry which is dependent almost entirely on this freight rate subvention. In the county of Kings, in my constituency, we have one of the largest poultry-raising areas in Canada. A few years ago it was on a deficiency basis. Only the day before yesterday one of the leaders in the establishment of that industry, Mr. Manning Ells, the largest producer of day-old chicks in Canada, and the man who founded the poultry industry in that whole area, died. It was due to his leadership, to a large extent, that the poultry industry grew as it has done.

I want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that this matter of a subsidy is vital. Secondly, I join with others who have spoken in believing that in view of the increase of freight rates which has taken place the government should give consideration to increasing the subsidy; whether or not that can be done at present is a matter of government policy, but certainly the speeches made in this house indicate the necessity of such action. It does not do a man much good to receive a subsidy which met the case a few years ago; today we are confronted by a continued horizontal increase in freight rates until the benefit of any subsidy received has been largely wiped out. It would be interesting to know the position of the producers in the maritimes today with regard to the effect of this subsidy as compared with their position before this horizontal increase in the freight rates came into operation.

Again I want to urge that the time has come when this should be made a permanent part of government fiscal policy. The hon. member for Brant-Haldimand asked this morning if there was any truth in reports that this scheme might be discontinued. The Minister of Finance, of course, can say: Well, look at your estimates. But as the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand pointed out, the estimates are only for this year, and even then we are not sure whether they are going to be adopted or whether the money is going to be spent.

At its recent convention the party to which I belong adopted as one of its planks that this policy should be a part of the permanent economic policy of the Dominion of Canada. It is not fair to producers who have risked their savings, who have developed the industry as they have and have turned a deficit area into a surplus one as they have in the east, to be dependent on the vagaries of a government to determine whether they are going to include X dollars for the subsidy this year or whether they are going to include Y dollars or whether they are not going to include anything. Then too, up until recently at least, we have had half of the amount voted in the main estimates and the other half voted in the supplementaries.

This is one of the most important things which has been done for agriculture in eastern Canada in the last 20 years. It is justified in every way, shape and form. It has returned more money to the Dominion of Canada than any other one expenditure made for agriculture in the east. I am sure that no government would think of doing away with it, but let us have it written into the law in such a form that the producers can go ahead with some certainty. They face enough difficulties today without having to wonder about the whims and caprices of this government or any government that might be in power, and the time has come when this scheme should be made permanent.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I have a question. I should like to ask the minister to clarify the problem to which the hon. member for Nanaimo referred. If a co-operative in British Columbia, Ontario or the maritimes were desirous of making a purchase of grain from a farmer in western Canada, would the subsidy be granted? I know that they would have to make the paper arrangement of having the grain sold to the Canadian wheat board and then in turn purchasing it from the board. However, can a co-operative or a large farmer buy a carload of wheat from a western farmer through the channels of the Canadian wheat board and still receive the subsidy on that carload of grain? Suppose someone—it might even be someone with a large turkey ranch as the hon. member for Nanaimo said—wanted to buy a carload of No. 6 wheat from a farmer in Saskatchewan who had a large enough quota to fill a car. Could he make arrangements with the wheat board to buy that car from the farmer, have the car shipped directly to him and purchase it from the wheat board and receive the subsidy on that carload of grain?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that I might say something on this matter and one or two other matters that have been mentioned. I had hoped that I would discuss these matters on the general estimates of my department which deal with these different problems. This item only deals with one thing and I do not think we are completely in order in discussing quite a number of other things. This item only has to do with assistance on freight.

The question which has just been raised is one which does involve the farmer in some difficulties but at the same time it is very difficult to see how it can be otherwise if we are going to have the wheat board system.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

The legislation that we have goes just as far as we can go under the constitution. We can control the passing of grain over a provincial boundary line and we do that under the wheat board act, but when it comes to moving grain within a province we are not able to control that.

That results in some of the things that have been mentioned, the first one being that according to a letter that was written one farmer had sold wheat to another at 60 cents a bushel, and the suggestion is that he ought to be able to sell it from one province into another at 60 cents a bushel. I have said before and I am going to repeat that is something that can be corrected by the prairie governments. It should not be permissible for a farmer or feed dealer to take advantage of a farmer who is in difficulties because he cannot get cash to induce him to accept 60 cents a bushel for wheat that is worth $1.40 even on the basis of the advance payment. There is only one authority that can stop that and that is the provincial authority. I suggest to some of my friends opposite who have been doing considerable talking that they have far more influence with these governments than I have.

Mr. Argue: Why do you not answer the question?

Mr. Gardiner: I suggest that they use their influence. I am answering the question which you were talking about out in the west a while ago and you will be talking about it again.

Mr. Argue: When?

Mr. Gardiner: The suggestion is that because wheat was sold in Alberta by one farmer to another at 60 cents a bushel it should be possible to sell it over the boundary line into British Columbia at 60 cents a bushel from one farmer to another. I do not think it should be possible in a province on the western plains for wheat to be sold at 60 cents a bushel within that province when that wheat, even on the basis of the advance payment, has a value of $1.40 a bushel. That is something that can only be dealt with by the provincial governments.

With respect to the other question of moving wheat through the wheat board, it stands to reason that when the wheat is put into the elevator then no matter which elevator it is the farmer gets an advance payment and he also has the right to get interim payments and the final payment when they are made. Therefore he is not only entitled to the initial payment when the wheat goes into the elevator but to full final payment.

The wheat board insists that the wheat remain in position to obtain when it is sold to the purchaser and no matter where it is sold the price which can be obtained at the time it is sold. Therefore what is actually said is that you can put wheat into an elevator of a certain elevator company or one of the pool elevators and it can be shipped over the mountains into British Columbia or shipped elsewhere and then you can get the wheat from the wheat board out of the elevator of that same company. It may not be exactly the same wheat. I do not suppose they can follow it through. Having taken it into the elevator at the initial point, it would be difficult to declare that it was exactly the same wheat but it would be wheat of the same grade, and it could be purchased on the other side of the mountains at whatever price the board is selling wheat on that particular day.

That money comes back into the pool and there is provision for interim payments and a final payment. If we are going to have the wheat board system I do not know how it can be done in any other way in order to make absolutely certain that the farmer on the one side of the mountains gets his proper initial payment and the farmer on the other side pays whatever the current price is at the particular time he takes it out. Therefore the whole thing enters into the transactions in connection with the pool that is carried on by the wheat board, and that is possible at present and can be done.

One or two other questions were raised during the discussion which I think I should mention while I am on my feet. One had to do with the quality of the feed which a person in the maritimes purchases or the quality of the feed on the other side of the mountains. I have continually before me on my desk in my office a list of the prices of feed for chicks on the other side of the mountains. One of the very big costs involved in those prices is fish meal which certainly is not produced on the prairies. It is produced right near where the chickens are fed. In addition, other parts of the cost are ingredients which are not involved in these freight payments at all. It is only the grain that is involved in that, and it is not grain as it is ground into feed even down in the maritime provinces or in Ontario, but it is the wheat, oats and barley that is shipped and the freight is paid on it. Then, some feed merchant in one or the other of the provinces takes that grain and has it ground into feed which is sold to the farmer. It is quite a different product from the product on which the freight assistance is paid initially.

I am quite sure that hon. members will agree too that when you put that ground feed, even if nothing else is in it but wheat, oats and barley, if you put it into a bag and have the bag all handsomely painted up, there is a considerable part of the cost which the farmer is paying which is not related to the grain but is related to some service. I quite understand my hon. friend from British Columbia indicating that all the farmer had to do when he was talking to the feed merchant was to point out he could ship the grain from the Peace river area down to where he was at a certain price in order to get the tonnage price of the finished product reduced by $17. Again, I call attention to the fact that is a transaction entirely within the province of British Columbia. This government has nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. Fulton: You will not pay feed grain assistance on it?

Mr. Gardiner: Of course, we do not; we do not within any province. We do not pay freight assistance on the movement of grain produced within a province to some other place within the province. As my hon. friend has said, the farmer can go to the feed merchant and say: Here I can get that grain from the Peace river country shipped down at such a rate and I can grind it myself. The feed merchant naturally does not want the farmer to get into that practice. Every farmer can do that. He can send over to the prairies and get it through the wheat board method at a much lower rate than he is being charged by the man who ground the feed, but the feed merchants do not want him to do that. This is merely a matter of bargaining between the individual on the one hand and the feed man on the other. The whole transaction is carried out within the province, and if there is any regulation of it required it would be done by the province.

I repeat that while it would probably cost a little more to get it over the mountains into Vancouver than it does to get it down from the Peace river country, or perhaps it is vice versa, I do not know, but whatever the difference is there is far more than that added in many of these instances referred to by other costs that have nothing to do with freight rates on the shipment of grain. I would suggest again, therefore, that many of these questions could be better discussed when we get around to my estimates, at which time they could be discussed under the different items to which they belong.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): The minister almost accidentally answered my question. The question was quite a simple one. I think the minister realizes you can—

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to point out I was not answering your question alone but I was answering the questions of a dozen members.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): My question is directly related to the feed grain subsidy, the item under discussion. It is quite a simple matter to retain the identity of a carload of grain. A large group of farmers could load directly in a car and, still selling through the Canadian wheat board,—I have done it myself—it would be a simple matter to maintain the identity of that car until it reached the producer who was buying the grain from the wheat board.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, do it. There is nobody stopping you.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): That is important. Then, is the feed grain subsidy paid on the carload of grain to the co-operative or individual who is purchasing it, whether he be in Ontario or British Columbia?

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly, the freight subsidy is paid no matter who shipped it or how it was shipped. It is paid at the other end when it is proven it was feed grain.

Mr. Fulton: The point is that it still costs three times as much to our farmers in British Columbia as it does to the farmer on the prairie.

Mr. Gardiner: No, it does not.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, it does, and I have sent the minister the figures which come from the cattle co-operative in my constituency and which show exactly what it costs them to land the various grades of wheat, oats and barley at the delivery point, and buying it through the board, not through a middleman but through the board. These figures show that for the same quantity and the same grade of grain it costs the farmers three times as much in British Columbia as it does on the prairies. It is that situation to which I referred. Either you have to help us by increasing the amount of freight assistance or you have to help us by allowing us to buy direct from the farmer on the prairies the same as the cattle raiser on the prairies can buy direct from his neighbour.

Mr. Gardiner: I cannot let that pass, that it costs three times as much to get grain—

Mr. Fulton: It is $65 a ton as against somewhere between $20 and $25 a ton. I will send the minister the figures.

Mr. Gardiner: You are talking about feed that has been mixed up with other things. I am talking about grain.

[Mr. Johnson (Kindersley).]

Mr. Fulton: And I am talking about grain.

Mr. Gardiner: I am talking about grain, not mill feeds.

Mr. Fulton: Why do you say I am not talking about grain? I am. I am not talking about mill feed, I am talking about grain bought from the elevators.

Mr. Gardiner: Now, just listen to the answer then you may say whatever you want to say afterwards. It is not true that grain needs to cost anybody three times as much on the west side of the mountains as the farmers get for it on the prairies.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what I said; I knew the minister was going to mislead. Why does the minister not understand the question?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the question, and I understand a little about farming too.

Mr. Fulton: So do I.

Mr. Gardiner: The fact is that there have been cases stated here and I think that is perhaps what my hon. friend had in his mind, that it has been stated here—I am not sure whether or not it was the hon. member for Kamloops or someone else—that someone wrote a letter—

Mr. Fulton: Are you answering my question or someone else's?

Mr. Gardiner: I am going to answer your question. I intend to indicate to you why somebody else should have to pay a certain amount more. It has been indicated in a letter that some farmer on the prairies sold grain to another farmer at 60 cents a bushel.

Mr. Fulton: I am not referring to that. I thought you were going to answer my question.

Mr. Gardiner: I am saying it was stated here, and that is what I answered, and that is what you mean when you say $20 a ton, that one farmer was selling wheat to another at 60 cents a bushel. Well, I quite agree that it may cost somebody on the other side of the mountain $1.80 and that would be three times as much. But it is not necessary for the farmer at Kamloops or anywhere else to pay three times as much for grain as the farmer on the prairie gets for it because of anything done here, he pays the price of the grain plus the freight to ship it over there. This policy provides that part of that freight is paid by the government. The only difference the farmer really needs to pay is his part of the freight. If he pays anything more he pays it because he does not want to grind the grain himself or he does not want to take it to someone else and let him grind it for a fee. He wants the privilege of going and buying feed in fancy bags in which feed is put up and which, in many cases, has something else mixed with it. Then, when he does that, after there has been so much done with the grain, he cannot compare that price with the price the farmer gets on the other side of the mountain and say he pays three times as much as the farmer gets.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has not answered my question. I am glad he has answered someone else's, if he has. My point was that the farmer on the prairie, and this is capable of proof, the cattle raiser on the prairie can go to his neighbour and get grain for between $20 and $25 a ton; that is not sold through the board, but it is what the cattle raiser on the prairie pays to his neighbour, the grain grower. The cattle producers' association in British Columbia buy their grain through the wheat board so they can get the feed grain assistance, and they find it costs them something more, somewhere between $60 and $65 a ton landed at William's lake in this case and that is somewhere between two and three times as much as the cattle grower on the prairies has to pay for his grain to feed his cattle.

Mr. Gardiner: Irrespective of what you say, it is not correct in other than a few cases where it was sold on the prairie at 60 cents a bushel.

Mr. Fulton: I know one is restrained here by the parliamentary rules—

Mr. Knowles: Not the minister.

Mr. Fulton: —but I tell the minister that he is stating what is not correct.

Mr. Gardiner: Then, we are equal on that.

Mr. Fulton: They have been submitted to the minister by myself in a letter and submitted to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and they have been discussed by me with the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce and they have never been questioned before. The minister is questioning them here because he knows he is backed into a corner that he cannot get out of and therefore he makes a statement which he knows to be incorrect.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend—

Mr. Fulton: The problem will obviously—

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has apparently—

Mr. Fulton: Just one second—

Mr. Gardiner: —got the habit from—

Mr. Fulton: I did not interfere when the minister had the floor. It is quite obvious this problem will not be dealt with because the government is not capable of providing a solution, but they might have the grace to admit that they do not have a solution instead of trying to deal with it by falsifying the record.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend could get away with that kind of talk in the Conservative convention but he should not be allowed to get away with it here. I listened to him on the television and that is the kind of speech he made there. The facts are that there is not anything in this provision for freight rates that has anything to do with the question he is discussing. The fact is that it does not make any difference who ships the grain or how it is shipped, in so far as the provisions in the freight rate assistance legislation are concerned part of the freight is paid. My hon. friend suggested in his last few remarks that it was done because it was done through the wheat board. It is not done because it is done through the wheat board. As a matter of fact, most of the feed grain was not shipped through the wheat board at all when this policy was set up. The grain could be shipped from one place to another and no matter how it was shipped, so long as it could be proven it was for feeding on the farms, freight assistance was paid. That is still the case. Any of the other matters that are being talked about are not provided for under this provision at all; they are provided for under the Canadian Wheat Board Act. And that is done in order to see to it that the prairie farmer does get the money that is paid for the grain no matter where the grain is sold; whether it is sold in Europe, in eastern Canada or over the mountains, the act is set up in such a manner as to make it possible for the farmer to get the initial payment and then to make certain that he gets all the money that is taken into the pool by selling the grain. That is all that is involved in it. All these other matters have to do with things which can be controlled within the provinces. If wheat has been sold at these prices in Alberta, it should not be sold at these prices, and there is nobody who can stop it except the provincial governments. If on the other side of the mountains grain is being sold for more than it is entitled to be sold for after it has been handled by merchants in the province, then that is something that could be dealt with, but I doubt very much the statement that the result is that you are paying three times as much for grain. Maybe you are paying for services. I doubt whether you are paying three times as much for grain in British Columbia as one farmer can get it for from another under the price system as we have it on this side of the mountains unless one person is taking advantage of another.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister not know perfectly well that you cannot get freight assistance on grain bought direct by a farmer in British Columbia from a farmer in Alberta?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I do not know any such thing. I do know that under the Canadian Wheat Board Act you cannot ship it that way.

Mr. Fulton: You cannot ship it out. Does the minister not know, therefore, that you cannot get freight assistance because you cannot ship it?

Mr. Gardiner: You cannot get the grain, that is all. It is not a matter of getting freight assistance.

Mr. Fulton: Therefore, the only way you can get the grain is to buy it through the board and by buying it through the board it costs you between $55 and $65 a ton landed. The farmer on the prairies can buy the same grain from his neighbour for between $20 and $25 a ton. Does it not cost the British Columbia farmer three times as much?

Mr. Gardiner: It does not cost him anything more at all; except transportation and handling charges, it does not cost three times as much. My hon. friend can figure it out for himself. In his figures he is dealing with the initial payment or a farm to farm transaction which is not usual in the first instance and with the final payment in the second.

Mr. Fulton: I am dealing with the landed cost of the grain and I am certainly under the impression that 60 is three times 20. If it costs my farmer $60 a ton landed it costs him three times as much as it costs the prairie farmer who can buy it for $20 a ton from his neighbour.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, if the freight rate makes up the difference that would be right, but I doubt whether it is, as a matter of fact I know it does not.

Mr. Fulton: What I am pointing out is that the policy of the government is one thing which compels the feeder in British Columbia who wants to buy grain from the prairies to buy it from the board on a basis which costs him between $55 and $65 a ton for landing it; whereas it costs the farmer on the prairies feeding it to cattle somewhere between $20 and $25 a ton. By paying the $65 rate is the only way that my farmer can get the grain from the prairie. Therefore, it is costing him three times as much. Unless you do something about the freight assistance on the one hand, or allow him to buy grain direct on the other, he is going to continue in that competitive position and the minister cannot deny these facts. They were brought to his attention last year and he apparently was not prepared to do anything about them but he cannot deny they are facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are talking about bootleg prices.

Mr. Fulton: I am not talking about bootleg prices.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, you are.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact you are talking about something that scarcely ever happens.

Mr. Fulton: We have another farmer here today.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have had a lot more to do with farming than you have.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration can ask the officials of the wheat board in this city and the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce whether it is not a fact that these purchases are made on the prairies. They have no objection to the purchases and they have no desire to stop them.

Mr. Pickersgill: It has no jurisdiction over them.

Mr. Fulton: How is it a bootleg price, then?

Mr. Harris: I wonder whether I can bring the discussion back to the item under consideration. We are dealing with contributions for feed grain, subsidies on freight rates paid on feed grain, and whether or not there is any merit in the figures presented by my hon. friend, I think he will agree that he is arguing about a policy in connection with the wheat board that really does not affect this particular item.

Mr. Fulton: It certainly does affect the cost of the grain.

Mr. Harris: I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. Fulton: You should increase this item to take care of your policy.

Mr. Harris: The item has to do with contributions to the cost of transporting the feed grain, regardless of the cost of it. The cost of transporting feed grain from the prairies is $11 odd a ton. This is a contribution based on that and not on the cost of the goods when sold or delivered in British Columbia. Therefore, I hope we can postpone the discussion on whether the cost in British Columbia because of the wheat board is so many dollars or so many other dollars until the wheat board might be under discussion in the house. If we can agree on that we can probably get this item through before the noon adjournment, unless there are some other questions I have not answered.

Mr. Quelch: So much has been said about lower prices that some farmers in Alberta get for their wheat that it should be clarified. It is truly a deplorable state of affairs that many farmers in Alberta have sold wheat at 60 cents to 65 cents a bushel. The solution does not lie in the minister's suggestion that the provincial governments should deal with it. The solution is in the federal government making advances to grain stored on the farms so that the farmers will not be forced to sell their grain for 60 cents to 65 cents a bushel.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Charlton: No, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Hahn: The Minister of Agriculture in indicating that feed grain could be brought from the Peace river country to the lower mainland of British Columbia said that there was no subsidy allowed on this. I am wondering whether that applies should the grain be hauled by rail through the normal channels to the Pacific coast. Is the feed freight subsidy paid in such instances?

Mr. Harris: I am afraid I do not understand my hon. friend's geography. Would he repeat his question?

Mr. Hahn: To carry grain from the Peace river section of British Columbia, or Alberta for that matter, to the Pacific coast it must be channelled along the Northern Alberta Railway line through Edmonton and by Canadian National Railways down to Vancouver. Does this make such shipments subject to the regulations of the wheat board and therefore entitled to a subsidy?

Mr. Harris: Well, Mr. Chairman, I could not answer the question directly by saying yes or no. It would seem to me that the practice in paying is on the basis of a voucher presented by the dealer who has bought the grain for delivery to himself. That voucher would have to show the point of origin of the grain and if it were in the same province I presume the policy would be not to pay it. Whether by being transported to another province it would receive the advantage of the subsidy is a question which I must say has never been asked me before and I am not ready to answer it now but I will see if there is any difference and advise the hon. member.

Mr. Hahn: I observe that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture is present. Perhaps he could give us the answer to that question which is a matter of some importance in our area.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Hahn: Before we leave that point I would like to know if the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture is prepared to indicate whether the subsidy is paid on grain coming from the British Columbia Peace river area into the lower mainland of British Columbia when it is carried by the normal channels of freight through the province of Alberta.

Mr. McCubbin: Mr. Chairman, I would have to take the hon. member's question as notice, but I can assure him that he will receive an answer to his question.

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words about item No. 538, whereby we are asked to vote an extra $2 million for assistance to western feed grain transport. My purpose will be to point out the benefits derived from the act authorizing that assistance, particularly as it concerns Quebec farmers and feeders.

As is known, that assistance dates from October, 1941, and involves the payment by the federal government of a substantial part of the freight costs of grain shipped from the Fort William elevators eastward, notably to Montreal and Saint John, N.B., with additional compensations for other intermediate marketing centres.

Quebec farmers count on western grain. In fact 75 per cent of the feed grain consumed in that province comes from the prairies. That means that more than a million tons of grain are brought each year from the west to Quebec. I hope that hon. members from the prairies are grateful for this Quebec patronage of grain producers in western Canada.

The high cost of these grains at the shipping point and the equally high cost of transportation have become a problem for Quebec farmers and cattle producers because of the rise in the operating costs of their farms and of the low selling price of their products.

Since October, 1941, the federal government has paid the not inconsiderable amount of $102 million in subsidies for the transportation of this grain from Fort William to the various selling points in the province of Quebec, the amount shipped as of December 1, 1956 being 15,633,000 tons. The average subsidy per ton has been $6.52 between 1941 and 1953 and since 1953, $7.98 per ton.

Quebec farmers and cattle breeders have therefore benefited from an average annual subsidy of $7,259,100, according to the terms of this useful piece of legislation.

It is estimated that it takes 1,000 pounds, that is half a ton of feed, to get an average hog ready for slaughtering. It therefore means that our farmers have received an average of about $4 per hog under the freight subsidy on feed grain. Without that subsidy which brings more than seven million dollars to Quebec, and without the premiums on quality, which bring an average of $1,226,100 a year to the farmers and breeders of Quebec, this kind of breeding would have come to an end long ago, in my opinion. So the Quebec farmers are in a position to appreciate the generosity of the federal government.

I am therefore pleased, as the representative of the farmers of Roberval constituency, to congratulate the federal government on its policy with regard to grain transport and I ask them to maintain and, if possible, to increase that subsidy to the greatest benefit of our farmers who are now going through difficult times.

The farmers of my constituency, as a result of the poor crop in 1956, will have to apply outside for seed grain, and I know that this legislation providing assistance to the transportation of grain will help them indirectly to face that new ordeal.

(Text):

Mr. Charlton: We were glad to hear the Minister of Finance assure us this morning that everything that appears in the estimates for the coming year will be spent. I can recall several instances where items have appeared and were not spent but held over for another year and so I was happy to receive the assurance of the minister that such will not be the case this year.

Mr. Harris: Only if we get around to passing it, you know.

Mr. Charlton: The item will be passed, never fear. The thing we are concerned about ensuring is that the department will not change its mind about it in the meantime and cancel or reduce the appropriation.

I should like to ask the minister one question with reference to the matter raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon. Is any consideration given as to the quality of the feed on which the subsidy is paid?

Mr. Harris: I think the hon. member for Saskatoon and my friend the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand are quite aware of the fact that the subsidy is paid on grain and not on feed and that it is not the content of the feed which the farmer buys which gains the subsidy but the grain that goes into the feed.

Mr. Charlton: What I am getting at, Mr. Chairman, is the matter that was raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon. Is the subsidy paid on grain that contains 90 per cent weed seeds?

Mr. Harris: I could not answer that question because of the details involved but I will certainly find out if there are any, shall I say, lower grades of grain which are rejected for the purposes of this subsidy.

Mr. Cardiff: Would the minister tell us what is done with the dirt and seeds that are removed from the grain at the lakehead?

Mr. Harris: Well, I am afraid there is a little too much noise. Would my hon. friend repeat his question?

Mr. Cardiff: I wonder if the minister could tell us what is done with the weed seeds that are removed from the grain at the lakehead in the cleaning process.

Mr. Harris: No, I could not tell you at the moment but I will find out what is done with them and advise the committee.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask for a little clarification on one of the statements made before lunch by the minister. I gathered from his remarks that it is now possible for a producer of feed grain to make a deal with a feeder and that some transaction could take place between the feeder and the producer through the Canadian wheat board. You will recall that last year we had a similar discussion in which I asked the very same question. While the minister went on at great length and invaded every creek and inlet, still he gave the impression that it was not quite possible that that could be done. I should like a little clarification on that point. At the same time he admitted that possibly something could be done and the Minister of Finance said that the problem would continue to receive consideration. Perhaps the minister would give a little clarification on what he said this morning. I think there have been things said here this morning which should have been said on previous occasions in connection with this piece of legislation which is before us.

While I did not hear all of the remarks made by the member for Cape Breton South, from what I did hear I think he and I are in substantial agreement. I am quite prepared to say that the people of Canada should subsidize the movement of feed grain to eastern Canada or elsewhere for the purpose of providing feed for dairy cattle and poultry, but it seems to me it is very questionable if it is economically reasonable to expect that we should take grain for cattle from one part of the country to a far distant part, thereby penalizing not only the people of Canada by paying subsidies on grain moved but also in the final analysis to some extent penalizing the consumers who consume the finished product. It seems to me the reasonable thing to do would be to feed the cattle where they are raised. It seems to me that that is the most economical way to carry on.

Therefore I am not opposed to these subsidies but I think that we should give some consideration to spending some of the money for the benefit of the consumers and the people of the country in general. I should like to have a statement from the minister in respect to the proposition that a producer and a feeder can enter into an agreement with the Canadian wheat board to make a transfer of grain from one to the other.

Mr. Harris: I agree with my hon. friend when he says that some of the things which were said this morning should have been said on another occasion; that is, of course, on the main estimates. It has not been the custom on the supplementary estimates to go into the whole question in detail although there may be questions of some importance which should be answered at that time. Therefore I do not think I should try to clarify the explanation made by the Minister of Agriculture this morning. I do, however, think I can put my finger on what has been understood by anyone who deals through the Canadian wheat board. I think theoretically it would be possible for a producer to make a contract with a consumer for the sale of grain for the purpose of the subsidy; but the transportation of feed grain over the provincial boundary brings it within the jurisdiction of the Canadian wheat board and the trouble is that the sale must be by the farmer of his own grain and it is very difficult to make any arrangement through the wheat board which would continue identification of the grain as it passes through the wheat board's control. I think that is the practical difficulty. I hope that if members think this difficulty can be overcome they will discuss it on the main items of the estimates.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

A—Department—

Immigration branch—

539. To provide, subject to the approval of treasury board, for transoceanic, inland transportation and other assistance for immigrants and settlers—Further amount required, including authority to make advances, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to the intergovernmental committee for European migration for the cost of transportation and other assistance with respect to Hungarian refugees coming to Canada, and to the provinces for the cost of caring for such refugees, $9,000,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I should ask this house to accept this item without giving a brief explanation, not only as to what is being asked for but also what is being done as a result of the policies which received almost universal approval in the house at the special session in November.

As hon. members will recall, the day after the session was prorogued I left for Vienna. I arrived in Vienna on the following day and remained there for three days. In spite of the fact that one or two newspapers in this country questioned whether it was necessary or even useful for me to make that journey, I think that if we intended to carry on the policy which was explained and approved here in parliament it was a good thing for me to have done, because it was possible to decide on the spot certain things which would have been difficult for officials to decide on the spot, which would have required a great deal of communication and clarification for someone who was a long distance away. One of the things which was in my mind and which I thought might cause difficulty before I went to Austria was that we might not have enough real estate to deal adequately with the problem. I had on one or two occasions impressed this point on my officials.

Mr. Nicholson: Real estate?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said real estate and I meant real estate, premises in which people could sit down while waiting for applications to be dealt with. Our office in Vienna is, as are all our offices, maintained as economically as possible. This office happens to be on the fourth or fifth floor, or on both floors of an office building in Vienna in which there is a small lift which will carry about two people and a stairway going around the lift, which is fine if you have six or seven people going into a building in an hour. On the Monday morning after I arrived in Vienna there were over 100 people at the door of that building, I was informed, at five o'clock in the morning; I was not there but I was told. At the time I was finishing my breakfast at the hotel, at about nine o'clock, the manager of our office came to see me and said, I do not think that you ought to make your visit to the office for a while yet because it is impossible to get into the building, the stairways are jammed, the lift is jammed and it is impossible to move.

I said that this was really exactly what I expected. I felt that the real problem would not be a lack of personnel and probably not even a lack of doctors nor a lack of transport to bring the people to Canada, but that the real problem would be a lack of space in which to deal with applicants. I said that I thought there was every reason why I should go at once to examine the situation. In the meantime the police had persuaded the people to move back so that it was possible to enter the building. We immediately got in touch by telephone with someone who had a dance hall or a similar building a few miles away which had been used by a shipping company to make arrangements for the transport of a group of Hungarians who were coming to Canada later. I said that this place should be rented for the rest of the month. We finally managed to get hold of somebody who had some authority over the place and told him we were coming along in a car to take over and that we would discuss the rent afterwards. By 11.30 our officials were actually processing people in that building, having hired two or three buses to bring them a couple of miles across the town from the regular office to this place.

The same difficulties occurred with respect to having a staging point where these people could wait until transport was available to bring them to Canada. There was also the problem of getting shipping space. We had an airlift which of course was very helpful in getting some people moving quickly, but to move any large numbers it was obviously preferable to have shipping. Mr. Jacobsen from the inter-governmental committee on European migration came to Vienna and met me at noon on that Monday and we made arrangements right there and then for enough ships for about 5,000 Hungarians.

During the course of the morning, just before lunch, I had seen the Austrian minister of the interior for half an hour and had sought to impress upon him the importance of making one camp available in Austria for people who were coming to Canada so that they could be kept together, and so that they would be available, and we would know where they were when the transport was available. Of course, this camp was not to have been run by the Canadian government and it was not even originally thought that it would be operated by Canadians at all. It was to be under the general charge of ICEM, if I may abbreviate the rather long name of that organization, and we were told the barracks at Wiener Neustadt might be made available. Incidentally, I understand these were the barracks where Marshal Tito many years ago did his military training when he was in the army of the Austrian empire.

This place had been left rather a shambles by the Russians. I insisted on going out to see it. I had been told that it was all ready to receive people, that it had beds, mattresses, a kitchen and other essentials. Well, there were a few beds and a few straw mattresses. There were no windows and there was no heating. I had been told there was a kitchen but nobody could find the key to the door. It was pretty clear that it would take quite a lot of elementary rehabilitation before people could be put in it at all in very cold weather, and it was cold. We did get things in train to get that done and it was occupied about ten days later.

It did not seem to me, after that, that there was much more I could usefully do in Vienna; because my experience is that ministers are all very well in their way, but once questions of policy are settled it is very much better to leave the officials alone to get on with the work instead of remaining under foot.

Mr. Knowles: Better for the minister to get out of the way.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I got out of the way.

This story has been told before in other places, but I think I should like to place it on Hansard. When I arrived in Vienna on Saturday afternoon, one of the first things I was told was that there was a faculty of forestry of one of the Hungarian universities which had come in toto across the boundary into Austria and that the dean of the faculty had approached our ambassador a day or two before to discuss with him the possibility of their coming to Canada. I must say that this rather fired my imagination, and during the evening while I was dining with the Austrian foreign minister I kept thinking of this faculty and how it could be dealt with and dealt with expeditiously.

Finally, late that evening I sent a telegram to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, and a telegram to my wife asking my wife to telephone me at an hour which was about the equivalent of seven o'clock in Vienna and the minister a couple of hours later.

Mr. Sinclair: You might point out I was in Vancouver.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Fisheries was in Vancouver and that was why I felt I ought to get in touch with my wife because I could get in touch with her at a much earlier hour than I could get through to the Minister of Fisheries on account of the three-hour difference in time. It is quite complicated when you are telephoning between Vienna and Vancouver. By the most extraordinary coincidence—it is a coincidence if you are using the trans-Atlantic telephone service—my wife did call me at seven o'clock on Sunday evening. I suggested to her that she get in touch with the Minister of Fisheries in Vancouver and ask him if he could not make arrangements to have this faculty moved to British Columbia and affiliated with the university and make provision for shelter for them there and let me know before midnight. And he did that. I do not think that sort of thing has been done very often.

I may say that on Sunday evening last these professors and students passed through Ottawa. I believe they are now in Abbotsford and that their next stage is to go to Powell River where they are to set up housekeeping for a while and learn English.

When I had felt that I had done everything I reasonably could in Vienna I left by motor car about eight o'clock in the evening and drove about 200 miles into western Austria. I slept in a small hotel and next morning went on to the place where these students were. I put to them the offer that my colleague had passed to me the day before and after a good deal of discussion back and forth during which I tried to explain the virtues of British Columbia—

Mr. Sinclair: Easy.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and some of the advantages there would be for them and for us I went away with their acceptance of the offer. I also discovered when I got to this place near Salzburg where they were staying that there were in addition somewhere between 100 and 150 other university students, students of mining engineering, oil engineering, geology and various other sciences, and several professors, who also expressed interest in coming to Canada. They expressed a desire to be together in Canada and I told them I would endeavour to find some place where they could go and be together. I could make no promise but I told them I would see what I could do. I said that I did not think it would be reasonable to suggest that they should also go to British Columbia and that I thought it would be to some other place.

As soon as I could do so, I got in touch with my colleague, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, (Mr. Hellyer) and arranged with him to have one of these students go to Toronto. I may say that my hon. friend put him up in his own house and looked after him for about two weeks so that he might look around and see what might be possible. The hon. gentleman got in touch with the president of the University of Toronto. He also got in touch with a number of prominent businessmen in Toronto, and a very generous offer was made for the reception of these professors and students.

Meanwhile I had also communicated with the chancellor of my own university, the University of Manitoba, about these students at a time when I was not quite sure where they might go. When I arrived in Paris a few days later I had a telephone call from Mr. Sifton and the premier of Manitoba, who were together. They had thought that this group represented a complete faculty and they made a most generous offer, for which I personally shall always be grateful, and of which I shall always be proud, to bring this group of students and professors to Manitoba and look after them completely for a certain period.

In the meantime news reports about this group of students had got out in Canada and we also had offers from Ottawa University, Laval University and several other places where there were not actually universities but where people hoped that this group of students might be the nucleus for something. All these offers did pose a bit of a problem. The young student who had come here as the spokesman of the students visited the various universities. I felt the only way to do was to have him visit the universities, compare the offers and communicate with the other students, and the decision they finally made was to go to Toronto. I may say that this group of students has either arrived in Toronto or will arrive there before the end of the day.

An hon. Member: They arrived this morning.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to add, though I am breaking my narrative by saying this, that there are also a good number of other students in Vienna, and elsewhere in Austria, who are seeking to come to Canada or the United States in order to complete their studies, and there are at the present time about 100 of them in Montreal. The national conference of Canadian universities has set up a committee to review the qualifications of these students and to examine all the offers of assistance which have been received, in the hope, as far as possible, of finding offers of assistance that will fit with the qualifications of the persons concerned, with a view to having them placed in various universities throughout the country. I do not know whether the number of offers received is as yet equal to the number of students who are in Canada. That is one reason why I felt I would like to say something here about the situation, in the hope that my words might go beyond this chamber and perhaps might not, in all cases, fall on entirely deaf ears. It does seem to me that in the light of all the concern that was being expressed in this country only a few short months ago as a result of that very interesting conference at St. Andrews, it would be a very unfortunate thing if we in Canada missed the opportunity of getting young people who are almost completely trained—people who have only to learn one of the official languages of this country and who, because most of them are quite bright, could probably do that in a few months by modern intensive methods. It would, as I say, be a pity if we did not allow ourselves to take advantage of this opportunity to enrich our country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will return to my narrative and shall try to make it brief.

I had announced, of course, at the very beginning of this movement of Hungarian refugees, that all our offices in Europe would give priority to applications from these people. After I had seen what I did see in Vienna—the fact that at the time I was there there were 70,000 of these refugees still in Austria, and that the numbers entering every day were at least equal to the numbers taken away—it seemed to me that we should not take refugees, except sponsored cases, from any of the countries of secondary refuge while the problem in Austria was so acute. I felt it would be desirable to see what the situation was in the offices in the neighbouring countries, and I wanted, moreover—though this is not strictly relevant to the present discussion—to see what the prospects were in these countries for immigration this year.

I found in Germany that the German government had set no limit on the number of refugees they were willing to take, but they were having difficulty in finding accommodation for them. However, they did want to keep them all because they have an acute shortage of labour. In these circumstances I gave instructions that no visas were to be issued except to those refugees who had Canadian sponsors who were prepared to look after them.

In Holland, where I went next, I found that the government of The Netherlands had agreed to take 3,000 and keep them in the country, and they did not want these people disturbed. But they did feel that they had room to give temporary refuge to 2,000 more, and they had apparently made some representations to Ottawa, as well as to Washington and Canberra about this situation. I had thought of the same idea as appeared to be in their minds while I was at Bonn the night before, and when I proposed this plan to the Dutch minister he said: "We have already suggested that to your government." We had some discussion during the afternoon and then he came to dine at the embassy. I was able to get my colleague, the Minister of Finance on the telephone, and we agreed it would be quite within the terms of reference under which I was acting if I undertook to move to Canada between the 1st of March and midsummer at least 3,000 from Holland. The Dutch came to the conclusion that they could only find shelter for 2,000, and we made an arrangement under which that number of people are being moved to Holland now. The first 500 have already arrived in Holland. These 2,000 will begin coming to Canada in Dutch ships in small numbers after the 1st of March and until the end of June.

This arrangement seems to me to have the great advantage of getting 2,000 more people out of Austria reasonably quickly and also of keeping them in Europe during the winter when, as I do not need to remind any hon. member, it is very difficult for us to accommodate large numbers of new people in Canada.

I next went to Belgium, where I found that the situation was somewhat similar to the situation in Germany. They were not able to take an unlimited number of refugees, but they wanted to keep those they had. They had employment for them. The decision we took in this case, therefore, was that from then on we would accept only sponsored cases.

When I got to Paris I found that the situation in France was really very difficult. I think that, perhaps, hon. members may be interested to know why. The French, with the characteristic generosity in humanitarian matters which that country has always shown, had agreed to accept Hungarian refugees without any limit as to numbers, and about 8,000 or 9,000 of them had already arrived in France. The only places in which they could be lodged quickly were military barracks, and any hon. member who has had experience of French barracks knows there are more hospitable places in the world than the average caserne. Some of these barracks were also occupied by French troops; there were sentries on duty, and some of the refugees got the impression that they had left one prison in Budapest to go to another prison in France. This impression was intensified by the most unfortunate kind of communist propaganda, so much so that when I met the minister of the interior, under whose department these people are being cared for, he asked me to get Canadians to visit these camps to tell the people there that France was not a communist country; that it was not a "people's democracy" but a real democracy. The French wanted these people to stay, and wanted them to work, but would have no objection to their going away to any other country if that country would take them. He asked me to accept some immediately as a token of the truth of this.

Well, under the policy of priority I have enunciated earlier we had agreed to take a certain number of them, and I naturally did not countermand anything that had been done; but I explained that I did not really think it would be proper to take refugees from France, a country which was able to look after them, while leaving such a great burden on Austria. I felt the best we could do would be to send our officials round as quickly as possible, and indicate that we would come later with teams and give people visas that would be valid after April 1. By that time, it seemed to me, we would be able to absorb them in Canada: by that time, also, we hoped there would be a clarification of the situation in Austria. In any event the problem in Austria itself would not be so great during the summer months. This was very acceptable to the French government, and we agreed to take up to 3,000 providing the French would take a corresponding number from Austria in the interval, and that policy is now being worked out.

When I reached England I found that the situation was not quite as bad as in France, but it was very nearly so. Britain had had to suspend the actual movement of refugees because there were no places readily available for accommodation. The British government and people had made a magnificent effort; they had moved 12,000 people to the United Kingdom, 6,000 of them in about three days by a really drastic airlift which was going on while I was actually in Vienna. But they were finding a lot of difficulty of one kind or another in that many of these people claimed they had been promised they could go to the United States or Canada. They were very disappointed when they found they were still in Europe. I recall particularly hearing of one group who were taken to Scotland—I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood would be interested in this—and when they asked where they were they were shown Scotland on the map. They said Oh, this is too close to Russia; we want to get across the Atlantic at once.

In any event, our high commissioner had been approached by the British government to ascertain if we would start taking some of these people to Canada right away. We arranged a meeting with the people who were actually looking after the refugees—they were voluntary agencies exclusively—and with the home office which had official charge of them. While I was not able to conclude an agreement while I was there I did make an offer which was accepted a day or two after I returned to Canada. Our offer was to take 5,000 from the United Kingdom after April 1 on the understanding that the British would, as quickly as possible, resume taking refugees from Austria and would take a corresponding number. This understanding was arrived at in good faith and I am sure will be carried out by both sides.

While I was abroad I had arranged for the transportation to Canada, between the time I was there and the end of January, of 9,000 to 10,000 Hungarian refugees. I felt that it would not be prudent or sensible for me to go beyond that until I returned to Ottawa and found out the response that was being made and how things were being organized or until I had an opportunity to consult with my colleagues and determined what they felt would be a reasonable flow to maintain during the winter months. As soon as possible after my return to Ottawa I consulted my colleagues and I recommended that we should make immediate arrangements for another 2,000 to come by sea in February and for the maintenance of the Maritime Central flights. This was the only Canadian company that was willing to continue these flights beyond January 1 because both T.C.A. and C.P.A. had other commitments for which their aircraft would be required. It was understood also that, as soon as we had some experience as to how these people were going to be placed and how we could distribute them throughout the country, we would consider taking more.

It began to appear to me early in January, while I was still recovering from the effect of having had a chip taken off my shoulder in the hospital, that we could quite easily take another 1,000 people by sea in late January and February, so another thousand was added to the number. More recently my colleagues authorized me to go ahead and make arrangements for another 2,000 to come to Canada in March. I should say that in addition to these numbers there are always a certain number of sponsored cases that are being handled in small numbers by ordinary airlines and by ordinary sea passages which, week after week, do mount up to something. Our best estimate at the moment is that we will have more than 15,000 Hungarian refugees in Canada by the end of February, and that we will have between 2,000 and 3,000 more coming in March. Then, we will still have these 10,000 that are being staged in the three countries I have mentioned.

This does not mean at all that we are going to stop taking people from Austria after March. Our position is, as it has been throughout in this matter, that we intend to take these people as long as they want to come here and it looks as though we can find accommodation for them and, in a reasonable time, find work for them. We are going to take them as rapidly as we think they can be reasonably readily absorbed. I think it would be imprudent to try to make hard and fast arrangements too far in advance. We do intend to follow that course.

I should like to indicate very briefly, if I am not taking up too much of the time of the committee, sir, what the proportion of those coming to Canada is compared with the overall situation so far as Hungarian refugees are concerned.

The Chairman: Perhaps I might take the opportunity provided at this moment to advise the minister that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Has the minister leave to continue?

Mr. Fulton: I will say a word and then the minister can continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. member for Kamloops. I shall try not to exceed my time again, sir. There have been approximately 170,000—I should like hon. members just to consider that figure for a moment—about half of the population of metropolitan Ottawa, of these Hungarian refugees enter Austria since November 4. They have entered a country of between six million and seven million people, a poor country and a country that had very little surplus accommodation. About 100,000 of these refugees have left Austria for other countries. The largest single group has gone to the United States. There have been, as I think hon. members probably know, 6,500 admitted to the United States as immigrants and 15,000 admitted as parolees. Do not ask me to explain what a parolee is because I am not an expert on United States immigration matters. I sincerely hope, and I am inclined to believe, that the United States is going to take more. But up to now, that is what they have done, and that is not as large a number as we are definitely committed to take. We are committed to take over 25,000 already.

I should think that next after the United States would be the British, and they have taken about 12,000. This will be about the total number they will take unless there is some big change in policy, because what they are taking from now on is merely a matter of substitution. The French and the Germans have still put no upper limit on the number they will take. About 10,000 have gone to France and about 10,000 to Germany. Other countries have taken a considerably smaller number. At the moment the only country that is taking any considerable number of people out of Austria is Canada, either by direct movement to Canada or indirectly. Measured in terms of numbers, therefore, we have committed ourselves already to take between 1/6 and 1/7 of those who have come into Austria.

In terms of the monetary commitments that we have made so far in connection with this matter, assuming that the house agrees to this estimate, we will have spent proportionately very much more than any other country, including the United States; not absolutely, but proportionately more. I believe it is necessary to say these things, not because I want to suggest we have done too much or that we have done all we could or should do, but I would suggest that if we are going to view this problem in anything like its proper proportions it is only fair to the Canadian taxpayers who are paying for this movement that they should know what they are getting and what they are paying.

I should now like to say a word or two about something which is really a good deal more relevant to the estimate here, and that is the problem of settlement. We have had the most magnificent co-operation from voluntary organizations all over this country and I cannot speak too highly of them. There have been times when I think all of us have felt, everybody connected with the movement, that there could be and should be a little more co-ordination, but I have taken the view that it is not the proper function of the immigration department to try to organize that co-ordination on a national basis. The problems of settlement are local problems all over the country and much better results will be obtained through proper local initiatives. We have tried to co-operate with everybody who is willing to help. We have tried to make every suggestion we could about the most effective way of organizing that co-operation but we have not tried to run the show. We have tried to fit our activities into the voluntary activities. I think that is the right way to do it.

One or two misconceptions have arisen as a result of an agreement we made with the government of Saskatchewan, which was made by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, who was acting for me while I was abroad and for which we are very grateful to the government of Saskatchewan. It was a businesslike arrangement made in a businesslike way. Under that arrangement we did agree to pay to the government of Saskatchewan $3 a day for each of the refugees while they were in the provincial reception centres. Because of this, and because we have agreed to do something similar in other provinces where reception centres are set up, if they are needed, I am told that a misconception has arisen in certain parts of this country which I should like to clear up now, namely, that every Hungarian gets $3 a day as soon as he comes to the country. I am told there are places where that is widely believed.

Well, it is not true at all; they are not getting anything. The money is paid to the provincial government, or to whoever is operating the reception centre, for the services rendered in that centre. And where we provide subsistence, as we do for Hungarians, like other immigrants who cannot support themselves in the first year in the country, we do not pay money to the immigrant receiving the subsistence, we pay the bills and we do not pay $3 a day. We get it done just as cheaply as we can get it done respectably, and will continue to do so. In fact, nothing is being done for the Hungarian refugees that is not done for other immigrants once they land in Canada. It is true that they get their way paid to the place where they come to settle. That is the only respect in which they are given treatment different from that of any other immigrants.

Another misconception that has arisen, and it was given a good deal of unnecessary currency, I think, by one or two people whose activities seemed to me to be almost mischievous—was that we were giving to those refugees free health care which was being denied to Canadians.

Mr. Gillis: That is true.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it is not true at all.

Mr. Gillis: For one year.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, it is not true for one year. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is not aware of the real facts. Hungarians and other immigrants are treated in the same way as Canadians are; if they are indigents they do not go without treatment. But if they have an income they pay their bills like anybody else, and that is the situation. We do not go around looking for bills to pay, either.

I do not think it would be the sense of this house, or the sense of the country, that we should treat immigrants better than we treat our own people. I do not think it would be the sense of the house or the sense of the country that they should be treated worse. These are people who have come—and I am not referring here specifically to Hungarian refugees but to immigrants generally—to this country and whom we have accepted, and given a landing to, on the assumption that they are going eventually to become fellow citizens of ours. I think the sooner we treat them on a basis of equality the better.

The reason the federal government does certain of these things in the first year is that, for many kinds of welfare services in this country, a year is the ordinary period required to acquire domicile within local jurisdictions. That is the reason it is done and the only reason. I felt it would be useful to say these things in the hope that the facts may catch up with some of the rumours.

We are asking in this item for $9 million. It would be optimistic to think that this $9 million was going to cover the whole cost of this operation. We had certain money. I notice the hon. member for Perth, who was here a moment or two ago, is not in the chamber just at this moment. During the discussion of the regular estimates I think he accused me of padding one of the items and I said at that time I hoped that the amount would never be used because it was there for an emergency. Well, sir, unfortunately, unhappily, tragically, the emergency happened and we were very glad to have that money because it has tided us over pretty nearly until now.

We are asking for another $9 million now and we are spending out of our regular votes and using our regular services for these refugees, and I do not think we can begin to estimate all the costs there will be in this movement before the autumn. But it will be considerably more than $9 million and I think it is only fair to tell the committee that right now.

I do think—and I imagine that every hon. member who has seen at least some of these Hungarian refugees also thinks—that we are going to get full value for our money. I want to say this. I think there will be some people among these Hungarian refugees who will be undesirable; I think there will be some bad eggs among them; I think that is inevitable and I think it is better to face that fact right now. I do hope, too, that the few cases—because I believe there will be few—that are disappointing will not be unduly magnified, at any rate, by responsible people. I am sure they will not be by any member of the house. The great majority of these people are—if I can judge people at all—bright and vigorous. They are intelligent and a good proportion of them have some skill. The great handicap they have is that very few can speak either English or French. When they have got over that handicap I believe they will be as good immigrants as any, as good settlers and ultimately as good citizens as any we have ever had and I think in the long run they will enrich this country.

There is just one other thing, sir. While again this is not quite strictly relevant, yet I think I ought to say a word about it. There has been a good deal in the newspapers lately about the transportation problem that is likely to arise in the late spring. We anticipated this problem in the immigration department away back last August, long before this Hungarian problem added to it, and we have been in touch with steamship companies and the air lines with respect to it ever since. I had a conference with a number of steamship companies when I was in London and we have had a number of other conversations, and we are going to have to take special and extraordinary measures to move the regular flow of immigration which is going to be larger than usual this year, apart from the Hungarians. But I believe we are going to find the means to do it and certainly we are going to make every conceivable effort to find the means to do it because, as my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has indicated more than once, we have a bigger program of capital expansion this year than ever before, and one of the biggest shortages that we will experience later this year is almost certainly going to be a shortage of manpower and we want to get all we can in order to maintain the expansion we have had in the last few years.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure there will be no one in the house who will not agree with the purpose for which the $9 million is being requested in the supplementary estimate, though there may be and I think there properly are some criticisms and quite serious suggestions that could be made as to the method by which the matter has been handled to date and how it should be handled in the future.

If I voice some of those criticisms I want to say at the outset that I hope it is not going to be taken as indicating any disagreement with the purpose for which the money is sought and for which the sum the minister referred to has already been spent, because I am quite sure all hon. members of the house as well as the country generally agree that not only will these people coming from Hungary enrich our country, as has been the case with all the other immigrants we have received, but it is Canada's duty as a nation of the world to make some contribution to the solution of this problem.

We have some criticisms to offer, though, and they are serious criticisms; and if I say that in listening to the minister today, in listening to him on previous occasions, and in reading reports of his trip to Vienna one of the criticisms that has occurred to us is that perhaps there has been a little too much use of the first person singular and a little too much suggestion of personal credit for what is being done, that is perhaps a minor matter and not one of the serious criticisms we have in mind.

I think probably the best place to start is the point where the minister concluded, and that is with respect to the settlement arrangements here in Canada. I am sure that all on this side of the house feel that, except in so far as the difficulties of the situation make it necessary, these immigrants should not be dealt with in any way different from normal immigrants, and should not be given any special privileges over and above Canadians. I deliberately used the qualification "except in so far as the special circumstances of this movement make it necessary" because this surely cannot be regarded as an ordinary movement of immigrants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, quite.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has pointed out that in this movement, if in fact it is not to be properly described as a crash operation, 170,000 persons have already fled from Hungary into Austria, a country very much smaller, very much poorer and very much more crowded than Canada and many other countries in the western civilization, and that we cannot leave Austria to grapple with that situation too long because it must be dealt with as an operation calling for immediate action. I also want to say that I accept the fact that there were bound to be mistakes, shortcomings and deficiencies in the handling of the problem to date, and it would not be fair or responsible not to accept that fact and to criticize the government because they tried to do something even before they had satisfactorily worked out all the details. As a matter of fact my criticism rather goes the other way in that—

Mr. Pickersgill: We have been too timid.

Mr. Fulton: No, but having been willing to accept the risks and to face the fact that it is going to create problems, the government is not doing enough now to solve the problems which have been created. I think it was inescapable that there would be problems, particularly concerning the reception and settlement in Canada of these people, but I am not at all satisfied that enough is now being done to meet those problems. I do not accept the minister's statement that it is not the proper function of the immigration department to try to co-ordinate the problem on a national basis.

In the ordinary course of immigration, which under the policy of the government certainly cannot be said to be overly vigorous, the reception and settlement arrangements for immigrants can probably best be made on a local basis. Where you have an emergency movement such as this I do not think it is at all sensible to suggest that the reception and settlement arrangements should best be left to be handled on a local basis, and that there is no responsibility on the part of the department to co-ordinate them on a national basis. That is exactly the responsibility that exists in a situation such as this.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair, and perhaps we could save a lot of time by not quarrelling about terms. As far as settlement is concerned, that responsibility is accepted by my department. I was talking about reception and welfare and things that are done incidental to the arrival and between the time of arrival and settlement.

Mr. Fulton: I will go on from there to say that here again I think we must face the fact that these immigrants are probably not going to be able to fit into the stream of Canadian employment, activity and life as quickly as the great majority of normal immigrants who come to Canada. We must remember that to a large extent these people are not coming to Canada in the full sense of the words "of their own free will". They are coming as the result of a tragedy which occurred in Hungary, to use the minister's words, and many of them are coming entirely unprepared, never having thought before of the possibility of emigrating. In many cases they are coming without having at their disposal the means which many normal immigrants have, and so it cannot be expected that they will be fitted into the ordinary pattern of Canadian life as quickly as the majority of normal immigrants.

For that reason it seems to me we have to accept a greater responsibility for looking after these people than is normally the case, and that is necessary not only in fairness to them but I believe it is essential in protecting the legitimate interests of Canadians who are already here. I do not think it is fair to the Hungarian refugee to turn him out too quickly into the normal stream of Canadian employment, nor would it be fair to those employers who are supposed to accept him or his fellow workers, the employees who are interested in working alongside him and interested also in the job he will be filling. While we accept that there will be shortcomings in the initial phases of this movement, as I have said, my criticism is that I do not see sufficient signs of action being taken at this time to deal with the problem and remove those shortcomings.

I have not seen a great many of these immigrants myself but I have seen some of them, and I have spoken to others who have seen many more. One of the things which I do not think is being attended to nearly rapidly enough is the problem of education in our languages. Those whom I say arrived in Canada with an immigration sheet, a list of phrases and words in Hungarian and English; one sheet, that was all. Up to the time I left them we had not been able to find out what plans were made to provide them with a more adequate phrase sheet, or to organize classes for them where they might learn the language.

I do not suppose that there exists a great quantity of Hungarian-English dictionaries in Canada. It seems to me that sort of thing is one of the responsibilities which this department should meet; that is, the provision to the local welfare organizations of an adequate supply of material, whether it be mimeographed sheets or printed books, which would enable the instruction of Hungarians in the English and French languages. There should be more than normal attention paid to the organization of classes for these people.

Remember that the ordinary stream of immigration to Canada in the last few years has averaged, I think, somewhere just under 150,000. Now we are committed to take an additional 28,000, and it is quite possible that we will take at least 30,000 or 40,000 in one year; that is one-fifth more than our normal intake, all in one group. It is going to take more than the normal effort to instruct these people in the Canadian approach, Canadian skills and Canadian way of life, let alone the English or French languages. I do not think that responsibility can be left to the local citizens' welfare organizations, Canadian citizenship societies and the other organizations which normally make themselves responsible to a considerable extent for that work.

Here it is obvious, I believe, that the department must accept a greater responsibility itself and make greater efforts to assist these people; otherwise these refugees will not be able to fit into the Canadian pattern as they should. Here we have what you might call quite properly a crash operation in which the department are going to have to accept a great deal more responsibility and expend a great deal more effort than they have done up to the present.

That raises the question of camps or reception facilities. Here we are in the winter months accepting a very large addition to the normal flow of immigrants, at a time when employment opportunities in Canada are normally much more restricted than in the summer months. I do not think it is sufficient to say we will leave it to the generosity of private individuals to receive and care for these people until such time as employment opportunities increase in the summer. That may be a period of up to six months or more. I think the department must make an assessment of the situation and endeavour to find accommodation, even if it be in the nature of temporary camps, and I do not mean a tent camp or anything of that sort. There are areas in Canada where such buildings exist and where the instruction of these refugees would be facilitated a great deal more than if they were scattered about in individual homes, where this type of work is so much more difficult to co-ordinate.

I think there also must be more attention given to informing these men and women when they arrive just what plans are made and what facilities are available for their instruction and their placement, because those whom I have seen and spoken to were warmly received by the Canadians into whose homes they went; they were marvellous people to have. As the minister stated, most of them had skills. All they wanted was not to be a burden on the people in whose homes they found lodging. Their greatest concern was that they did not want to take charity; they wanted to be able to earn their way in Canada as soon as possible. They were almost desperate about finding out what arrangements had been made for their instruction. The people with whom they were living tried to assure them that they would be welcome there as long as they wanted to stay, but the more Canadians tried to show them that they need not worry for the time being, that they would be glad to have them stay, the more the Hungarians felt that Canadians were trying to show them charity. They appreciated the charity, but they did not want to come to this country and be accused of expecting nothing but charity.

Something must be done to make available much more rapidly than is the case now facilities for instructing these people and fitting them into our pattern of Canadian life. I do not mean to fit them in more rapidly, but rather to start more rapidly to instruct them as to how to go about fitting in.

Another reason I am convinced that the provision of accommodation is a responsibility which we must accept is because of the growing problem in Austria. Unless we are able to receive them they will pile up in the camps in Austria. I have not been there; the minister has. Mr. Michael Barkway, one of the members of the press gallery, has also been there; he and the minister do not seem to agree in their opinion as to conditions in Austria and Canadian responsibility in the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think there is any disagreement between us as to the conditions in Austria.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear that. Then I take it that the disagreement is in what we must do about relieving conditions more rapidly than is being done now. Certainly Mr. Barkway suggests that unless something is done to keep the stream moving quickly, not only will Hungarian refugees themselves suffer from sad disillusionment, which would be a bad start, but the whole cause of freedom will suffer because the communist propagandists in that area will then be able to say that all this talk about the western nations receiving these people is only talk. If the refugees were left to languish in Austria there would then be a condition in Austria which would be disastrous. Therefore I do not think it is enough for us just to say that we are taking more than the United States in proportion. We have proportionately more room than the United States.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not agree with that.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think we should take pride in that fact and leave it at that. We have to assess our own capabilities to deal with the matter and then fulfil the obligation which that assessment imposes upon us.

While we are happy that the $9 million is being asked for, I do not think it is going to be wisely spent unless some greater responsibility is accepted by the federal department of immigration with respect to the reception, settlement and accommodation arrangements here, and particularly the instruction arrangements here. I believe that now is the time to plan those arrangements, so we may not only continue but in fact speed up the movement to Canada of those refugees we are prepared to take. I think our efforts should be directed to getting over here as quickly as possible the number that we decide should be accepted in Canada. Another question which occurs to me—it is a matter of detail, but I would like the minister to deal with it—is whether we are accepting refugees in Austria solely through our immigration office or whether we are going out into the camps—

Mr. Pickersgill: I did answer that the other day in reply to a question.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister must expand on the subject. I know he referred to it. This is one of the points that concerned Mr. Barkway at the time of his visit. What drive is being made to go right into the camps and set up the necessary facilities there, and show these people that we mean what we say when we offer to provide a home for them in Canada? That would seem to me to call for an increase in staff, because it would mean manning two offices instead of one. Can the minister not tell us the details of the work being done there?

The other question I have is one of a general nature. What is the total number of refugees who are expected to move into Austria, and is it expected that the movement will continue at the same pace as in the past? At one time I understand that the refugee figure amounted to about 1,000 a day. Has anyone attempted, or is it felt that anyone could attempt, to estimate the total number of refugees who may be involved? What is the estimate of the number Canada feels she can take and that will be available to us?

Those, I think, are questions which should be answered now in order that the problems of settlement may be discussed in the light of that information. Whatever the problem may be, as I have said—and I think this is the point that requires to be emphasized—this cannot be regarded as a normal movement, and the responsibilities of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration for coordinating the reception and settlement of these people are far greater than the minister seems to indicate he is prepared to accept.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, when we were discussing the feed grain item this afternoon the Minister of Finance seemed to think we had roamed far afield. I agree with him. In this case he will have to thank his colleague sitting behind him for initiating a wide-open debate on immigration. I have a few words to say on this subject; I shall try not to ask for additional time.

The minister made a very provocative speech. He always does, but I always excuse him on the ground of political immaturity. He will learn in time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am getting pretty old.

Mr. Gillis: You are not doing too badly. The first thing I would like to clear up is the statement he made that some people, in trying to be mischievous, had created, or tried to create, the impression that medical expenses were paid for immigrants. That is not true. You made the statement that from time to time statements were made that created the impression that medical expenses were paid for immigrants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I correct that?

Mr. Gillis: That is exactly what you said.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I said was that it was said they were given free health care. This statement was made by a well known broadcaster in Toronto over and over again, and it just isn't true.

Mr. Gillis: I made a few remarks on that very point in the house. I do not want to be classed with the mischievous. Are you listening? That is the trouble with the minister; that is why he is so uninformed. He makes his own speech, then closes his ears and carries on a private discussion while somebody else is trying to clarify his mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize. I am a little deaf in one ear, unfortunately.

Mr. Gillis: The Minister of Fisheries was bothering you. On that particular point I have stated in this house, with respect to medical care, that immigrants who come into this country and who have no employment are housed in a hostel in Montreal by the Department of Labour. That is what is suggested by the hon. member for Kamloops should be done now, with regard to the Hungarians.

Mr. Pickersgill: That hostel is being used right now.

Mr. Gillis: Well, in that hostel, to those without employment, medical care is provided.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Gillis: Without a means test. Then when they leave the hostel and go into a province and find themselves in an indigent situation, provision is still made for their health to be cared for. Let me give you this evidence. I have it in my hand. I was a member of the committee that examined the estimates of the Department of Labour in 1956, and I raised this very question in that committee because of an item which appeared in those estimates. I will read the questions and the answers. This is at page 536 of volume 12 of the minutes of that committee:

Mr. Gillis: Now, the agreement with the provinces with respect to medical expenses—there is quite a large item there?
Mr. Dawson: Yes.
Mr. Gillis: Do you spend the amount voted each year for that purpose?
Mr. Dawson: I think we did last year. You were talking about the agreement with the provinces?
Mr. Gillis: Yes.
Mr. Dawson: We had $135,000 appropriated for this purpose in the last fiscal year, and we spent $127,000.
Mr. Gillis: That would indicate that your hostel was operating at pretty near capacity, was it not?
Mr. Dawson: No, this is medical expense shared with the provinces after they have been placed in employment and in their future homes.
Mr. Gillis: After they have been placed?
Mr. Dawson: Yes, this has nothing to do with the medical attention at the hostel.

Then I wanted to know why they should pay medical expenses after they had secured employment. But that definitely proves that there is provision for all medical purposes for one year if people find themselves in indigent circumstances after they go to find employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite correct; but if they are in employment and have the money to pay it is not provided. There is a means test, in other words. It is the same as the municipalities do for other indigents.

Mr. Gillis: Of course. I went on to point out that this is a national health insurance for immigrants—

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely health insurance does not depend on indigence?

Mr. Gillis: That is health insurance not on a contributory basis. We are going to make it a little tougher for our own people.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no; all indigents can get treatment.

Mr. Gillis: The Department of Labour has that arrangement; you may have other arrangements through your department.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I make this point clear? This is all being transferred to my department in the next fiscal year. Up to now we have both handled it; they do it for one group and we do it for the rest.

Mr. Gillis: I was talking about what has been done up to now; I am not crystal-gazing into the future. When your estimates come before the house we will take a look at them.

[Mr. Gillis.]

With respect to the $9 million for the movement of Hungarians, of course having regard to the way in which the minister puts the matter—a strong humanitarian plea—no one disagrees with it. However, I have always felt that immigration should be a planned proposition. While we are obliged to move these people at the present time, personally I do not like young people running away from their country when it is in danger.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely—

Mr. Gillis: The minister said this when he was speaking.

An hon. Member: Do you want them to stay and get shot?

Mr. Gillis: They were moved to England, and they did not want to stay in England because it was too close to Russia. They were moved to Scotland, and they did not want to stay in Scotland because it was to close to Russia. Where are they going to run from here?

Mr. McIvor: Ireland.

Mr. Gillis: That is an impression. The minister said that, and of course he reported what someone else said.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Gillis: That is not a good reason for coming to Canada, and it is not a reason that should be advanced for taking them in here. I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops on the point he made with respect to a centre where these people could be sorted out. If they are permitted to come in here by the thousands, unscreened, not medically checked, and are dumped into the main stream of employment across the country, whether it be agriculture or the regular labour market, without some check being made, then I think it is bad planning. While you may not have the facilities to do it in Austria, I believe there should be a centre in Canada where they could be assembled, medically checked—

Mr. Pickersgill: Every one of them is medically checked at centres in Canada before they go into the stream.

Mr. Gillis: That is fine; I am glad to hear it.

Mr. Fulton: They are not kept there long enough.

Mr. Gillis: They should also be examined with regard to where in Canada they can make their best contribution. What are their skills? Where are you going to send them? In my opinion that is not being done at the present time. I also warn the minister that people in many parts of Canada are questioning the advisability of throwing so many people into the general labour market. They are very seriously questioning it in my part of the country. I am asked the question a good many times, and maybe the minister can give me the definition; what is the difference between a refugee from the maritime provinces or some other part of Canada, and a war-scared refugee from Europe? One can get just as hungry as the other. I get letters from some who have gone to New Zealand, without any assistance from the Canadian government, some of them from my own home town.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know.

Mr. Gillis: Of course, because I wrote the minister on that subject and I got a very curt reply. Some time I will give him the answer, but I am not going to do it now.

Mr. Fulton: You mean to tell me you have had a short reply from the minister?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Did you say "curt"? Surely you meant "courteous".

Mr. Gillis: Oh, no. I am not going to mix it up with this discussion, because I am not going to take very long. We have shifted people from the maritimes to British Columbia.

Mr. Sinclair: It worked out very well.

Mr. Gillis: Very well indeed. We have also shifted people to different parts of Ontario. There are a lot of them. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River knows about that.

Mr. Benidickson: That is working out well, too.

Mr. Gillis: I hear from them, and they are getting along fine. However, up to December 31 of last year there were arrangements whereby to some extent the expenses involved in moving such people could be taken care of. As of December 31 that legislation expired, and it has not been renewed. I mention this to the minister because I think he has just as much responsibility in the case of people who have to move possibly 4,000 miles within their own country. I mean people who have been war veterans and taxpayers, and who are obliged to become economic refugees from their own part of the country.

Mr. Sinclair: They were attracted to British Columbia. They wanted to go there.

Mr. Gillis: You came down to recruit them because you knew where to get the best class of people in the world.

Mr. Sinclair: Exactly. They have done very well, and lots more will go out.

Mr. Gillis: They have done very well. By the way, I had a letter a few days ago from the recruiter you sent down there, and it has worked out so well that he is going back for a few hundred more.

Mr. Sinclair: Good.

Mr. Gillis: That is why I am saying to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that if there are 400 or 500 more who want to go out there to help develop and enrich British Columbia, the legislation that expired on December 31 might be re-enacted so that British Columbia might get the benefit of three or four hundred people from that part of the country. Incidentally, I do not like to see them move; but in view of the fact that the Gordon commission said "If, if, if, if", then should they move there should be some provision whereby the government will at least put them on a basis of equality with those who are coming here from other parts of the world.

Mr. Sinclair: In the case of those particular people the company advanced their fares, and it is the same company that is taking the Hungarian forestry school.

Mr. Gillis: Those who went out there are refunding their fares to the company out of their wages.

Mr. Sinclair: They are proud Scots. They want to pay their own way, as I would and you would, I hope.

Mr. Gillis: Definitely. Are you saying that the Hungarians are not proud Hungarians?

Mr. Sinclair: I said "proud Scots".

Mr. Gillis: Well, the inference is there. I know you did not mean that.

Mr. Sinclair: That is your inference.

Mr. Gillis: I mention that because I think we have as much responsibility in the case of the people about whom I am talking as we have in the case of people from outside Canada. I am not objecting to the people we are taking into Canada. I would say for the benefit of my generous, charitable, and sanctimonious friends to my right that we just cannot adopt a policy in North America of evacuating Europe because people there are afraid of Russia. I suggest that the minister should not pay any attention to people who talk that way. In the case of these people, however, there was nothing they could do but get out because of the circumstances that faced them. They had nothing but their bare hands.

Mr. Fulton: Does the hon. member not realize that some of the best immigrants of the past have been people who left to avoid persecution?

Mr. Gillis: My ancestors did.

Mr. Fulton: Have you any quarrel with them for coming here?

Mr. Gillis: It does not put those who drove them out on a very high plane.

Mr. Fulton: No. We are not asking to have Russians come here. We are talking about Hungarians.

Mr. Gillis: Some of them were moved to Scotland and England, and they said they were too close to Russia. As far as I am concerned, that is not a very good reason for coming here.

Mr. Pallett: Don't forget that is hearsay evidence.

Mr. Gillis: Of course. I heard it before I heard the minister say it here. I have heard that in other places.

Mr. Pallett: Not from the Hungarians.

Mr. Gillis: While I may sound as if I am being critical about bringing these people into the country, I am one of the first to cry down that kind of reason for bringing them here. They came here because they were hungry, because they were overrun, because they had no medical attention, because they had nothing with which to fight. They were dumped into a little country completely unable to handle them. The only place in the world still large enough and free enough is Canada. There is lots of room here. The caution I am expressing is that we should not go overboard by reason of sentiment in the process of being charitable and generous, and not realize what is needed to protect our own people. I know that things are pretty bad in my part of the country. The Gordon commission did not paint a very bright picture. Our people may have to move.

Mr. Pallett: It will improve now with Robert Stanfield.

Mr. Gillis: Stanfield cannot move the Atlantic ocean. We do not have the room for expansion. We are hemmed in by the ocean. We do not have the hinterlands of Ontario, British Columbia, Quebec and the other provinces. We are stuck there.

My main objective in rising at this time was to bring to the attention of the minister the lapse of the labour department legislation providing for the movement of people within Canada. I know that within the foreseeable future other people are going to have to be shifted. There are pockets now not only in Nova Scotia but also in Ontario. Perhaps in a few years the northern part of Ontario will be in the same position as we are down in the maritimes today, if not worse.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister who knows about this is here now.

Mr. Gillis: Yes; I am glad to see that the Minister of Labour has come in. I was just pointing out to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the fact that while we appreciate his request for a supplementary estimate in the amount of $9 million to assist in the movement of Hungarians the legislation in the Department of Labour that permitted your department to assist the movement of workers in Canada expired as of December 31. To the best of my knowledge it has not been renewed. I would suggest that the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration get together to develop a policy on behalf of the government that would place the economic immigrant within the country on the same footing as those from other countries who are obliged to come here for various reasons.

Mr. Gregg: No, the very modest funds available in my department for assistance in the movement of workers from one part of Canada to the other have not expired. They can be renewed from one fiscal year to another by means of the estimates each year.

Mr. Gillis: I suggest the minister check that, because my information from Mr. Thompson, the director of that particular vote in my area, is that he has been notified that the legislation has expired and was not to be renewed so far as that particular area was concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but I think I am at least 10 minutes late in getting up. The hon. member is now making use of an estimate of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to discuss legislation upon which really no action could be taken under the vote now before us.

Mr. Gregg: Would I be permitted to clear up one point which has been left in the air?

The Deputy Chairman: I think perhaps since I have allowed the hon. member for Cape Breton South to wander so far afield I should allow the minister to reply, but I think his reply should be extremely brief and, if I may put it this way, not provocative.

Mr. Gregg: I try to be brief and unprovocative at all times, and I can be on this occasion. In brief this is the answer. Under the arrangements made for this particular purpose, which I do not need to go into, the Minister of Labour has authority from time to time to decide whether certain areas in Canada are in such economic condition that he should be authorized to assist in moving persons from that area to another area in which they could find employment. There has been no change in that legislation and no change in the estimate, but the Minister of Labour has decided that in the recent past there has been no occasion to use any of that money in so far as Cape Breton is concerned.

Mr. Shaw: Had you not interceded in defence of the rules, Mr. Chairman, I was going to suggest that if I were to be guided by precedent already established during this debate, I would find it utterly impossible to determine the bounds within which I must keep in the course of my observations. I know, Mr. Chairman, that traditionally it is the duty of the opposition to criticize. This is a privilege I would not take away from the opposition, nor would I do anything to discourage them even on this occasion. Moreover, I may say that if there is one minister in the House of Commons who can provoke criticism it is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

However, upon this occasion I find it extremely difficult to be very critical. I say that, Mr. Chairman, because of the fact that we are dealing with those who are the victims of probably one of the most tragic situations ever to occur in this world. We are dealing with babies, little children, mothers and others who have done two things. First, they have given this world one of the finest demonstrations it has ever witnessed of just how much people who have lost their freedom value it. Furthermore, this occurrence has been an indication to those of us who are free just what is our responsibility in retaining it. Second, we are dealing with people who have done more than all others to unmask communism and indicate to the world the true nature of that vicious force.

I agree with some of the things said by the hon. member for Kamloops, but after all we are dealing with an emergency; something which has happened suddenly; something that must be dealt with immediately. If some of these things were to occur in the course of our ordinary immigration policy, the handling of immigrants who come here under normal circumstances, then I too would be rather severely critical. I am not going to be critical here. I do not expect us to be able to handle these people in exactly the same way as we would handle normal immigrants.

The minister mentioned that, proportionately, Canada had already accepted more of these Hungarian refugees than had the United States; that is undoubtedly true. I believe Canada is probably in a position to handle more of them than the United States will ever handle. I say that not from the standpoint of our ability or inability to finance them but because of the very nature of our country, economically and geographically, and the fact that we have been led to believe it is so extremely important for Canada to build up her population as rapidly as it is reasonably possible to do so.

Plainly I cannot subscribe to some of the observations of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I rather fancied that perhaps I misunderstood them; I hope I did not, but I cannot be certain until I examine the record and determine exactly what he said. Actually, Mr. Chairman, I rose in order to ask the minister a question or two. I am merely seeking information. I wonder if his department is yet in a position to indicate the disposition of these Hungarian immigrants across Canada by provinces. I think we should have that information. Secondly, I should like to have information with respect to the age groups, the sexes, the professions, occupations and so on. I would appreciate having that. I feel that probably the house would benefit as a consequence of receiving it. I am sure if the minister has the information he would be pleased to put it on the record.

I am not going to take up more time. Last November we as a group endorsed what the government indicated to us it was prepared to do. We feel that, to be fair, they have done a pretty good job of it. We realize that there are a lot of difficulties to be ironed out. We feel, as I said, that the government has done a pretty good job of it; but we also feel that the provinces, cities, towns, municipalities, voluntary organizations and individuals also have done a pretty good job and are continuing to do so. We hope any bugs that are appearing will be removed, and we expect they will. Probably in a month or two we shall be in a better position to assess the whole situation, and if with respect to certain things we do appear to be mildly critical we can assure the minister it will only be because we would be justified in being so. It is too early in the game for hon. members to be advancing some of the criticisms to which we have already listened.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the hon. member who has just taken his seat on having some Christian common sense. I congratulate the government on the job they have done. They were certainly not slow or lazy; they jumped into the job right at once, and I congratulate the government on sending the young minister over there to find out for himself, as he did. One thing I am surprised at is that the expert critic of the opposition has not been able to find more mistakes because of the vastness of the undertaking. But since Canada is a Christian country it is her duty to feed the hungry, clothe the naked and help those who are out of joint with the rest of the world.

I congratulate these refugees on the stand they have taken against Russia. It will live forever in the history of Hungary. We have a Hungarian committee in Fort William, as I mentioned before. We had the opportunity of taking a group of these refugees. Donald Clark and Son, of Port Arthur, who had bought the Great Lakes sawmill, had a number of houses that were formerly used to house Japanese who came from Vancouver and used the houses to shelter these people. The reception they received was certainly pleasing to the Hungarians. They were met by the mayors of both cities and by others, and they were well received and well fed. The clergy, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, representing this group, called on them. I know the majority of them are Roman Catholic, but that does not make any difference; they can be hungry, and they can be out of work.

Another thing is that many people thought there would be many communists among them. Anybody who has come out of Hungary under these circumstances is cured forever of being a communist. I congratulate the government and the young minister on the job they are doing, and hope they will keep on doing it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I think all hon. members were very interested in the minister's remarks. I found one thing he said very interesting, namely the reference he made to the group of students coming to Toronto today. I think he made reference to the fact that they had not yet landed but were going to do so. I am sorry the minister did not elaborate a little further on that particular subject, because many of us would like to know the number of students who are coming to Toronto; whether the government is going to pay for them or some private concern will pay for them; where they are going to stay while they are attending the university, and so on. I think we should like to hear about it from the human interest point of view.

The minister said these students are coming. I think some hon. members have heard stories about this arrangement. I have had some information which suggested that there would be about 109 students arriving, and that a great deal of the expense of their education was going to be paid by the Ontario mining association. I would be very glad if the minister could confirm or deny it.

When the minister was dealing with this matter of the students he made reference to the hon. member for Davenport and the fine liaison work he had done to help them along. I think the minister may have been a little less than generous in not giving some credit to the Ontario government, particularly to the department of planning and development. It is my understanding that they also had quite a lot to do with this particular arrangement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not this particular one; in the reception of the Hungarians generally, yes, but not this particular one. It was the president of the university and a group of businessmen who were approached directly by the hon. member about this matter. With respect to the refugees generally, I give full credit to the Ontario government for what they have done.

Mr. Nesbitt: That answers my question. The Ontario government actually had nothing to do with the mining students from Sopron University?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not in the early stages; I believe they have been very helpful lately.

Mr. Nesbitt: There is one thing I would like to bring to the minister's attention now rather than do it privately, as ordinarily I probably would have done. I think it is something that should be brought to his attention and to the attention of the country generally because, while it is only one situation, I have no doubt it could be duplicated in a number of places. The situation I am going to refer to has arisen because of a misunderstanding which, if it were cleared up now, would probably save a lot of grief for a number of people in this country in the future.

I refer to a letter I received the other day from a constituent of mine. His name is Mr. John Gyurki. He lives in Woodstock, and is a Canadian citizen of Hungarian extraction. I quote two paragraphs from the letter which I think are important. They read as follows:

> On December 14 last, I brought six members of my family to Canada from Hungary. To acquire sufficient funds to pay for their passage, I had to borrow money from the bank. I understood that the passage for refugees would be paid by the government, as pointed out in numerous newspaper clippings, some dated November 29 last. Two of these clippings are enclosed to you herewith.

I might say at this point that I shall refer to these clippings later. I continue with the letter:

In these clippings, the Honourable John W. Pickersgill stated that a decision had been made to grant free passage not only to those refugees yet to come, but to those already arrived or on route.

The next paragraph reads:

After inquiring about free transportation to Canada with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, I received a letter from them dated January 10 last, which I am enclosing. I cannot see any comparison between the contents of that letter and the newspaper clippings; they just don't correspond. I refer especially to the second paragraph of the letter.

I refer to the second paragraph of the letter which was sent to Mr. Gyurki, dated January 10 last, by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and it reads in part as follows:

I have your letter of January 4, 1957, enclosing six air contract tickets covering the transportation to Canada of five members of your family at a total cost of $1,035.

Free transportation to Canada in respect of Hungarian refugees does not apply where persons pay their own transportation to Canada or where the cost of their transportation is advanced by a friend or a relative in this country.

The remainder of the letter is not particularly relevant to this discussion. As a member of this house, Mr. Chairman, I understood that these were the regulations at the time, and I have no doubt that other hon. members had that understanding. But unfortunately the general public does not have the advantage of the sources of information that hon. members have, and very often—in fact most of the time—the public rely on what they read in the newspapers. I would like to refer to a couple of clippings which are enclosed in the letter. One is from the Toronto Star, dated November 29. It also contains a large picture of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and reads as follows:

Ottawa, November 29—Canada will not only open its gates to all Hungarian refugees who want to come here, but will provide their passage free, Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, told the House of Commons last night.

His announcement was greeted by cheers from all sections of the house, and welcomed by opposition speakers.

Until yesterday afternoon, the government had planned only to give the refugees "assisted passage", which was expected to be repaid.

Decision to give passage as a gift was made at a cabinet meeting yesterday afternoon, Mr. Pickersgill said. The decision applies not only to those yet to come, but to those who have already arrived or are en route.

I have another press clipping to which I shall refer very briefly. It is a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared under the same date line in the Woodstock daily Sentinel-Review. The quotation reads:

"It was decided," Mr. Pickersgill said, "that as almost all of these refugees have nothing they can bring with them except the clothes they are wearing, and, as many of them have little or no money, it was not reasonable to expect them to try to establish themselves in this country with a debt over their heads at the very start."

This policy of free passage would also apply to Hungarian refugees who have already had assisted passage to Canada—a small number as yet.

This is a very unfortunate situation, and there are probably a number of other people in the same situation as Mr. Gyurki of Woodstock. I was going to say there were others who had been victimized, but that word possibly has an unpleasant connotation. Doubtless there are others who have been misled by these press reports. Probably they should have made inquiries of the minister, but perhaps it was not possible to reach him because he might not have been available at the time. It is most unfortunate that these people should have borrowed money to bring to this country what in this case were not even close relatives, and relied on the press reports. As a result of having brought these Hungarians to Canada they are now in debt to the bank.

I am raising this point today in the hope that other people will not fall into the same trap, and I think the minister might consider as special cases those who went into debt in this way. Perhaps reimbursement could be made to these people who borrowed money in good faith in order to bring relatives and friends to Canada in an honest and sincere desire to be of help. I am not suggesting that the minister created this impression deliberately, but an unfortunate impression was created in the press and I hope the minister will be sympathetic toward this case and any others that might turn up.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the minister if he would allow me to do so. My question concerns the Hungarian immigrants who have been accepted in Canada up to the present time. Can the minister tell me how many were under nine years of age? Before the minister rises to answer my question I wish to say a few words about a group of young Hungarian immigrants who were admitted into this country.

Under the auspices of the bishop of Nicolet, His Excellency Monsignor Martin, a group of people were organized to receive young Hungarian immigrants, and already 600 have been taken in by families some of whom had five or six children or more. I might also point out that the demand for these unhappy young immigrants has been greater than the number who are available. The group has encountered one problem and it is the following. It is the desire of those families who have taken children into their homes to adopt the refugees, but according to the law of the province of Quebec the adoption cannot be legalized if the parents of the children are alive.

I would be grateful to the minister if an inquiry could be conducted as quickly as possible to learn whether the parents of these children are living or dead. If they are dead it will be very easy to have the refugee children legally adopted; then because of their young age they will grow into real Canadians and will be a great asset to the province of Quebec and to our country as a whole. I know the refugee children have been accepted into the homes like the real children of the mother and father, and are receiving from each member of the family the deepest affection that the human heart can give to another human being. If the Department of Citizenship and Immigration can conduct a survey as quickly as possible, as I have already said, in order to learn if the refugee children are orphans, it will be in the best interest of the orphans themselves and of the country.

(Translation):

Before resuming my seat, I should like to say a few words in French because I know that the hon. minister understands French very well and speaks it on occasion.

I commend the government and the minister for the manner in which they approached and solved the problem of Hungarian immigration, because they showed a world which is overrun by materialism that Canada has not yet lost its sense of humanity.

If we give those children who have been admitted into this country the same care and attention we give our own, they will be proud to become part of the Canadian community. They will forget the horrors they went through, and that were wrought upon them by people who called themselves their brothers. I therefore trust that those newcomers to Canada will make an important contribution, and that they will prove humanity is still the best law which governs mankind.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the statement made by the minister on this question, which is of particular concern to the Canadian people at this time and in which a great number of people are expressing a keen interest. I realize all the difficulties that surround a crash operation like this. I have discussed the matter with constituents of mine who are supporters of all parties in this house. There has been a particularly lively interest in this question in the riding of Kootenay West, and I must say that some of the letters most critical of the policy of the government which have appeared in the local papers were written by some of the most prominent Progressive Conservatives in my constituency, frankly expressing their views and concern about certain aspects of the government's policy in this case. As a result of conversations with people of all parties I agreed to briefly present their views to the house.

I am sure we all agree with the purpose behind this movement. I did not encounter anyone who opposed the coming to Canada of genuine political refugees; in fact, all the people to whom I spoke said they would welcome them. They were concerned, however, about certain aspects of the government's policy. I learned that a good number were concerned that only desirable persons should enter Canada. They were wondering whether the screening of these people was sufficient, and whether there were satisfactory medical examinations. I was very pleased to hear the minister say today that these people were screened and there were adequate medical examinations of those desirous of entering the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to interrupt? I would not like a false impression to be created about this matter. These people are in Austria, they are not in Hungary. Austria is part of the free world, and the Austrian government appealed to the rest of the free world to take the refugees as they came and not to select. Great Britain, France and every other European country did just that; and we here as a government, as I announced last November, made a decision to do the same thing. I believe the United States because of its rigid laws does refuse some and leaves them on the doorstep of Austria, but we do not. We give them medical examinations, and if treatment is necessary it is arranged here. We do not reject them for that reason. We are attempting to do as much political screening as is consistent with their rapid movement to Canada.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his explanation. I realize the difficulties with respect to screening, but on behalf of these constituents I do urge that as time proceeds, every effort be made to see that no unsuitable persons come into this country, that is persons who cannot accept our democratic way of life.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is hard to satisfy all the people in British Columbia.

Mr. Herridge: Not always. I misunderstood the minister when he mentioned medical examinations. I thought he meant in Austria.

I understand now that they are examined in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are examined in Austria as far as possible, but when it is not possible they are examined here.

Mr. Herridge: If they are found to have disabilities do they receive treatment in Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: The second point I have is that effect should be given to a policy under which no Canadian workman would be displaced from employment. That is one question I have had repeatedly brought to my attention.

Mr. Byrne: Did Conservatives say that?

Mr. Herridge: People of all parties, including the Liberal party. Many of the people to whom I spoke thought the government should exercise equal compassion and equal treatment for Canadians such as those mentioned by the member for Cape Breton South, where people wished to go to other places in Canada; and for those relatives of Canadian citizens who have been refugees from tyranny for a considerable number of years, some of whom have been in Hong Kong for some time and whose aim it is to come to countries such as ours.

As I said before, the minister dealt with the question of screening and has given a further explanation with respect to medical examinations. I was quite pleased to hear that he was frank in admitting that we are bound to get some bad eggs; I hope they are few in number.

Mr. Pickersgill: So do I.

Mr. Herridge: I think the fears of working people have some basis in fact, because I was interested to read a newspaper dispatch in the Toronto Globe and Mail of today's date which said:

> CCCL Charges Canadians Being Replaced by Refugees.
>
> President Gerard Picard of the 100,000-member Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour said today some employers are dismissing Canadian workers and hiring Hungarian refugees at lower salaries.

I presume that is on a very small scale at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I certainly hope so.

Mr. Herridge: I think the government should do more than hope so; they should give effect to this policy so as to do everything within their power to see that this situation is not allowed to develop.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can assure the hon. member that the placement service in my department would never knowingly direct an immigrant to any employer who was displacing his own workmen in order to take on immigrants, and we would do our best to see that he did not get them. Sometimes, however, it might happen that, on their own, immigrants might stray into such situations and it might be difficult to prevent that happening. I can assure the member that we would not intentionally allow it to happen.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear that, and I hope the government will do everything possible to see that this situation does not develop, particularly during the winter months.

I am sure the great majority of these immigrants are very thankful and grateful to have the opportunity of coming to a country such as Canada. I understand that the department pays the passage of these people who come to Canada, and in the great majority of cases they come by air.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, most of them have come by sea.

Mr. Herridge: In any case the Canadian people pay their fares?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister consider it unfair if we treated these people as we do people from other countries; that is, if we were to ask them to repay their passage, which was advanced by the Canadian government, in small sums per month when they found it possible to do so? I mention this because that idea has been given to me by a number of people, and I told them I would bring the matter up in the house.

I have just given the minister the views of a good number of people in my constituency, which I promised to do.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I am drawn into this discussion because of one comment made by the hon. member for Kootenay West. He mentioned that there was a variety of opinion concerning this problem of the Hungarian refugees, and he gave honourable mention to the Conservative party.

The problem is one which requires understanding and sympathy, I think, on the part of all members of this house as well as on the part of all citizens of Canada. It is an emergency situation and I feel that it should not be treated from the standpoint of narrow party politics; rather it should be treated from the standpoint of the broad humanitarian viewpoint. It is the first time Canada has attempted to deal with an emergency refugee situation, and there are bound to be many kinds of unanticipated problems.

In my area we have had a small share in the matter and, contrary to the situation which seems to prevail in the constituency of the hon. member for Kootenay West, some of the leading people who have been serving on the voluntary committees are ardent supporters of mine. In the city of Brandon we have had a particularly active group. We have quite successfully coped with the situation, largely because of the generous response on the part of the ordinary citizen.

I would like to commend the officials of the department. There might be some criticism by way of lack of over-all co-ordination by the top levels of the department, but certainly in my contact with Mr. Baillie, Mr. Voisey and Mr. Roberts it has been evident that they have done an excellent job in our particular locality. We are working by trial and error, and I hope the precedents which have been established and the experience which is being acquired will not be forgotten by the department but that they will take advantage to a much greater extent of the opportunity to obtain outstanding citizens by way of immigration emergencies of this kind.

The municipalities are somewhat concerned as to how much of a financial burden arising from this emergency will devolve upon them. There might be some bad eggs among the immigrants, but there are also plenty of good eggs. An immigrant who was being medically examined was found to have several large fragments of shrapnel lodged in his person. He had carried them ever since the days of the fighting in Budapest, and when he was asked why he had not reported the trouble before, even though he was suffering considerable pain, he replied that he was afraid that if he had he would have been prevented from coming to Canada. That, I think, is typical to a large extent of the spirit of a large proportion of these immigrants. This man has now been hospitalized. Does the department pay the expenses arising from a situation of this kind?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me, in view of the limited time now available, to answer the very specific questions which were asked by the hon. member for Red Deer, whose speech I appreciated very much, because this is strictly concrete information which I think it would be helpful to have on record in today's Hansard.

I can give the distribution by provinces up to and including today, assuming that every train and plane arrived today as it was expected to do. I have a table here, and perhaps I may read it very quickly. For the whole of the Atlantic provinces there have been 118. The other figures are: Quebec, 3,099; Ontario, 3,382; Manitoba, 1,013; Saskatchewan, 307; Alberta, 684; British Columbia, 1,310.

I have also a table here showing the occupational groups, and perhaps with regard to that it might be agreed that it be put on the record without my having to read it.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that course agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: The tables are as follows:

I also have a further table showing those processed up to January 16 by sex and marital status. I think these are perhaps the most useful figures to give, and they are the only ones I have available.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the other tables referred to be included in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: The table is as follows:

Mr. Fulton: What about the Canadian staff in Austria, and their distribution among the various camps?

Mr. Pickersgill: I intend to try at a later stage to answer all these different questions. Perhaps I could answer one of the questions put by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris right away. We are still in contact with most of the provincial governments with regard to how we are going to adapt the ordinary agreement for medical care of immigrants to this situation, but the expense will not fall on the municipalities.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not suppose the minister has any particular choice with regard to who is coming. Has he any knowledge as to the percentage of these immigrants who are agriculturists or farmers?

Mr. Pickersgill: I regret to say the answer is, only a small percentage; if it were greater we could place them very quickly. They are nearly all from urban places. These people are refugees from the fighting, just as my ancestors were who came to Ontario in 1783 as refugees from the fighting in the American revolution, and I did not altogether appreciate what the hon. member for Cape Breton South said about people who had to run away. There comes a point where the battle is completely lost and you either accept someone else's domination or you go somewhere else, and I do not think it is any disgrace to these Hungarians that rather than go to Siberia they should seek their fortunes in countries beyond the seas.

Mr. Gillis: I rise on a point of privilege. I am not going to allow the minister to put words in my mouth. The minister is the person who raised that question. He made the statement that he was told, in England and Scotland, that the reason these refugees were going to Canada was because it was still too close to Russia there. My reply to him was that I did not consider that to be a good enough reason, that running away from Russia was not a good reason to enter Canada. It was not I who said that; it was you who said it. I was playing it down.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that case, I apologize. What I said, or what I thought I said, was that these people said they had been told when they left Austria that they were going to Canada, and when they found they were not in Canada—some of them when they got to England thought they were in Canada—they felt they had been deceived, and said, "Please, we want to go to Canada." I cannot blame them very much for that.

Mr. Gillis: You did say that they said they were still too close to Russia.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: After the Russian tanks they had seen in Budapest I don't blame them.

Mr. Gillis: Don't blame me for making that statement. I was playing yours down.

Mr. Regier: I am sure the minister intends to make an early, lengthy and detailed reply to the many requests for information made by hon. members, and I would therefore only wish to add one or two other matters to his list in order that when we come to his estimates we may obtain a reply.

I believe that a moment ago the minister said these people were refugees from the fighting. I believe he said that. It appears that the hon. member for Red Deer has a little more information with regard to these refugees than a number of other hon. members have. I wonder whether, when the minister obtains additional information, he would be able to find out for us what proportion of the refugees actually participated in the battle against communism.

I am in full agreement with what the hon. member for Red Deer is advocating when he says by all means let us do all we can to help widows and orphans, children and mothers—I do not know whether he actually mentioned mothers, but I would add mothers—and so on. In other words we should help those who have suffered most. However, I would like to tell the minister that the favourite complaint that has been made to me is that the vast majority of these people seem to be young, husky, healthy single men; and it seems rather odd, if we are so open-hearted and anxious to help refugees from the horrors of battle, that the bulk of the immigrants should not be widows and orphans and so on.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but it being five o'clock the house must proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Mr. Harris: I realize that we are in the middle of an interesting debate which might take some time—on the other hand it might not—but some of this money is quite urgently needed, in regard to the particular item we are discussing as well as the final item on the list, and if it is possible for us to proceed with this for the remainder of the day's sitting it would avoid a great deal of inconvenience for the Minister of Finance, though I would not advocate this course, naturally, on any ground other than that of the public interest.

The Deputy Chairman: In any event I feel it is essential that at this time I should vacate the chair, as I think hon. members would agree that the committee of supply would not have authority to set aside the private bills hour.

Progress reported.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Hon. members have heard the suggestion made by the Minister of Finance. It is not my desire to influence the house. Therefore I ask whether there is unanimous consent that all items under public and private bills be considered as allowed to stand.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe that a bill in my name is first on the list. It was my intention to proceed with the motion for second reading of that bill during this hour, but if it is understood that if my bill stands all the others will stand too, I would be willing to let mine stand, in response to the appeal of the house leader. I trust that on future occasions he will remember this example of co-operation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it agreed that there is unanimous consent that all the business under private and public bills shall be regarded as allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There being no business for this hour, the house will revert to the consideration of the business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Immigration branch—

539. To provide, subject to the approval of treasury board, for transoceanic, inland transportation and other assistance for immigrants and settlers —further amount required, including authority to make advances, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to the intergovernmental committee for European migration for the cost of transportation and other assistance with respect to Hungarian refugees coming to Canada, and to the provinces for the cost of caring for such refugees, $9,000,000.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, now that we have at least another few minutes I should like to make it very clear that I support fully the position taken at the special session by the group to which I belong, and that we support wholeheartedly in principle the over-all actions of the government with regard to the admission of Hungarian refugees to Canada. However, I am sure that after the passage of the intervening months even the minister would not expect opposition members to agree to everything that is proposed without at least presenting to him the opinions of the people as they are expressed to us from time to time.

When the committee rose at five o'clock I was asking whether the minister could give me some indication in his reply as to the age level and marital status of those who were coming to Canada. I should like to exempt from this request those refugees who were university students, because it is a well known fact that it was the students of Hungary who were the first of the freedom fighters, and I heartily endorse young men of that type entering our country.

We hope the action of the government on this occasion to obtain suitable immigrants for Canada will be a precedent in obtaining more of the badly needed immigrants from the British Isles. I believe most members of the house would welcome action along similar lines, maybe not at this moment but in the next year or two, to obtain an influx of desirable citizens from the United Kingdom who we understand are very anxious to come to our country in large numbers.

I should like the minister also to inform the house how many newspaper, radio and other personnel were sent to Austria at the expense of the Canadian government, and also what was the exact purpose of sending such personnel there. I endorse what the hon. member for Fort William said to the effect that most of these immigrants are Catholics, and he added that Catholics too can be very hungry. I should like to remind the hon. member for Fort William and the minister that there are millions of people in Asia, especially in India and Hong Kong, who can be very hungry too, and who have been hungry and starving for years. I understand that fully a million in Hong Kong alone are also refugees from communism. Many of them have suffered as severely as many of the refugees whom we are now welcoming to Canada, if not more so.

Then in the displaced persons' camps of West Germany there are still thousands and thousands of refugees from communism, many of whom have suffered equally. Yet in the case of those in Hong Kong, and to a lesser degree in the case of the refugees from communism now in West Germany, we seem to have to pry them past the offices of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in order for them to be able to see the light of day in Canada. Therefore we hope that other refugees from communism will at least be given equally favourable treatment.

I know the minister made the statement that the government of France had not set any limit on the number it was permitting into that country, and later on he said that as the result of an agreement he had reached with the French government it had agreed to take a corresponding 3,000 more. I think there is a slight misunderstanding there, because if the French government has not set any limit it can hardly agree to take a further 3,000 or a corresponding 3,000 more. That is all I have to say at this time. I certainly hope the minister can clear up a few of the misunderstandings that are spreading around the country, and that have been expressed by members of various groups in the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall try to be very brief so the Minister of Finance can get on with his other urgent items.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, would the minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps if I do not answer all the questions in great detail—

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister allow me to interrupt him to say that I have one or two questions? Perhaps the minister would rather have me ask them before he sums up?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly. I had not realized that the hon. gentleman had risen.

Mr. Macdonnell: I listened, like other members, with much interest to what the minister had to say, and I think I should say quite frankly that I felt there was a good deal to say for what had been done. I listened, of course, with particular interest to the triple play which he described between himself, Mrs. Pickersgill and the Minister of Fisheries. It certainly was a lucky triple play. However, in saying these things perhaps the minister will not mind if I add a word of caution from that great authority, that great philosopher W. S. Gilbert:

> But though the compliment implied
> Inflates me with legitimate pride,
> It nevertheless can't be denied
> That it has its inconvenient side.

The "inconvenient side" is that one naturally expects that the minister will be able to answer every other question and deal with every other situation with the same degree of, shall I say, lucky skill as in the case of the forestry school. I have a few questions I should like the minister to deal with when he comes to reply.

I do not think any figure has been given as to the number in actual employment. I was out of the house for a few minutes, but I do not think that question has been asked. I should also like to have a breakdown by provinces, if possible, though perhaps that is not so important. Then I should like to have a breakdown by trades.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was given.

Mr. Macdonnell: The next thing I find of interest is what is the distribution of responsibility for finding jobs as among the department, the provinces and private organizations? Then there is another thing that seems to me of considerable importance. I have heard of a case where apparently the working day of some of the immigrants was broken in two, part of it being spent in ordinary employment and part occupied in learning English. I suppose there may be cases also where there may be a certain amount of training or retraining for some special occupations required. Those are the things about which I would particularly like to know.

Yes, there is one other question. Is any estimate possible as to what further number of refugees is likely to come from Hungary to Vienna? This may be something which the minister does not care to answer at all.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Before the minister replies there are one or two comments I should like to make and questions I should like to ask. First, I should like to express my appreciation of the humanitarian principle which is involved in bringing people from the tribulations of communist domination to the relative freedom of Canada. I believe the people all across Canada appreciate that. Certainly we in this group do, and we would like to see that principle extended to other groups in the world who have suffered from this same domination. If these Hungarians are being brought in on humanitarian grounds I think it would be only right to assume that the government should maintain this principle so far as refugees from Russian domination in other territories of the world are concerned.

Before I deal specifically with that, I should like to ask the minister if consideration will be given to assisting the municipalities which, within a year's time, will be charged with the responsibility of caring for any of these refugees who have not been able to find a place for themselves in Canadian life. It would appear that since the government of Canada has assumed responsibility, and rightly so, for bringing these refugees to Canada, they should continue to shoulder that responsibility rather than letting it fall on the urban and rural municipalities in which these individuals happen to take up residence.

I should like the minister to tell me if the government is giving consideration to affording fairer treatment to the refugees from communist domination who have settled in Hong Kong. The minister mentioned that some of the Hungarians are now going to be sponsored and will be allowed to come into Canada on that basis. Perhaps the hands of the minister are tied by the platform of the Liberal party adopted in August of 1919, in which section 7 reads:

A more effective restriction of Chinese immigration.

I hope that part of government policy has been changed to one of humanitarian principles, but I doubt that this is so; because I have a case where an individual applied to bring in his adopted son, who is one of the refugees from communist aggression now in Hong Kong, but the minister's humanitarian background has failed to give any recognition to the desirability of this man bringing his remaining child to Canada. I think the minister will be familiar with some of the details. The application has been denied because the minister said it was an adopted child. Surely there are adopted children coming in from Hungary on the same basis. The principle the government has been following of allowing those to come into Canada whom they deemed would fit into the economy is a rather narrow one, especially when they take credit for humanitarian motives.

My plea is that the government be consistent, and if we are going to take credit for being humanitarian then let us prove we are humanitarian by giving consideration to some of those who are suffering the same hardships from communist aggression. It is apparent that the government that has been in office is determined to prevent these people from coming into Canada, as is indicated by their platform of 1919 which evidently is still in force.

Mr. Green: Practically all the discussion this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, has been on the subject of refugees from Hungary; but as I read this vote it is a great deal broader than that. It is not restricted to immigrants coming from that unfortunate country. I would ask the minister to explain, when he replies to the various questions that have been raised, what steps his department has taken to meet the situation which has arisen in the United Kingdom. Evidently within the last few weeks there has been a great increase in the number of applicants wishing to come to Canada from the United Kingdom. I am wondering whether the department has extended its facilities for dealing with those applicants, the way it proposes to do so, and in just what manner those who are applying would be able to benefit from this vote.

Probably the minister will have noticed that there was a very critical editorial in the Globe and Mail—

Mr. Pickersgill: I read them all. I have been surprised we have come this far without having this brought up.

Mr. Green: I do not know whether the facts set out in that editorial are correct, but in any event I do suggest to the minister that this is a serious situation. I hope facilities can be made available so these applicants can be dealt with promply. Perhaps the minister would answer those two questions when he is replying to the others.

Mr. Pallett: I was interested in the minister's remark that there are some bad eggs amongst the Hungarians.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said there probably would be.

Mr. Pallett: I wonder if the minister could give any information to the house concerning what his information is in that regard, as the situation stands, without probabilities. What is the factual information behind that statement, if there is any? The minister will recall, unless he was absent at the time, there were some reports in the Toronto newspapers with regard to one incident, and I wonder if he could enlighten us as to that incident and if there were other such incidents what were their results.

In replying to the questions I wonder if the minister would also give us a breakdown of the $9 million under the various headings that are shown in the vote, such as transoceanic travel, inland transportation and then "other assistance"? I wonder if he would be kind enough to break down this vote under those various headings.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I could resume, sir, where I left off when I was so courteously interrupted by the hon. member for Greenwood with his interesting questions, I shall try to deal with the questions raised in the order in which hon. members spoke. The hon. member for Kamloops, whose lukewarm support on this occasion I can regard only as the highest praise, did raise a question about whether or not there were any Hungarian dictionaries or other books of that sort. There is a book on the press which I hope will be ready in a day or two. I had hoped it would be available a little earlier.

One of the officials of the Department of Labour, who was seconded for a little while to my department by my colleague and who is himself a Hungarian Canadian and the author of a number of important scholarly works, did work out a sort of basic dictionary.

It appears there is only one printing shop in Canada properly equipped to produce it. I think they were a little congested over the Christmas period and it has taken them a little longer than they had hoped. We hope to get it and other books as quickly as possible. This is a real problem and one you cannot meet very quickly.

As far as education generally goes, of course, we have agreements with practically all the provincial governments except two—maybe it is only one—for sharing the costs of education of adult immigrants. The provincial authorities administer the schemes, and they administer them in most provinces very well indeed. That is particularly true in the province of British Columbia. I think they are working very well to meet this problem, are recognizing its urgency and are coping with it, according to the information I have, very quickly. Certainly that is the general report from most parts of the country.

I do not think the hon. member for Kamloops would mind if we put off debate on whether the refugees should be in camps for longer or shorter periods until my general estimates are before the house. I would like in time to give my reasons for following the policy we are following, but very briefly I would like to say that I spent involuntarily—perhaps that is not true; perhaps voluntarily—two weeks in the hospital, and the day I left, I was reluctant to leave and face the world—

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps it was because there was to be a session of parliament.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was the day parliament opened. Perhaps that had something to do with it. I think there is a terrible danger of people getting this sheltered mentality if they remain too long in comparative idleness in institutions. For my part I believe it is a great deal better to get these people living with Canadian families in the way we live in this country, and I think they will learn far more about the country; they will probably learn far more English far faster. I would like to go on at length on this subject, but I do not think I should.

Both the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Greenwood asked whether I could make any guess as to how many more Hungarians would come into Austria. I cannot; I do not think anybody's guess is worth very much, because we do not know what is going to happen in Hungary. Certainly the number has greatly diminished lately, and I think that is due to the more brutal policies that now appear to be followed by the regime in Hungary.

The question was also raised as to whether we should not have brought the people to Canada a little faster than we have. Perhaps it would have been possible for us to take one or two thousand more in the months of February and March than we are planning. If the taking of one or two thousand more would have solved the whole problem I think I would have urged my colleagues to do it no matter what difficulties it would have created here, but it would not have solved the whole problem or more than a fringe of it. Having regard to all the circumstances, and having regard to the effort we were making, I felt that since it would not have solved the problem it was better to make these staging arrangements.

I think that with respect to the points raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I have said as much as I need to say. I do not think our real differences are anything like as great as our apparent differences.

I should like once again to thank the hon. member for Red Deer for the very pleasant things he said about my department. In so far as this movement of Hungarians is concerned, they are deserved. These public servants have worked terribly hard. It is not easy to get trained people quickly to handle a greatly increased number of immigrants; and officials must have a certain amount of training if it is to be done at all efficiently. The result was that all of them worked overtime; they gave up practically all of their holidays, and they are still working very hard indeed, both in Europe and all over Canada, and I appreciate what the hon. gentleman said about their service.

I gave the figures a little while ago for the distribution of the Hungarians across the country, and they will appear in Hansard. I gave figures for the ages and the marital status and the breakdown of occupations. I did not read them out, but they will appear in Hansard. The hon. member for Fort William said some very kind things about the local committees in Fort William, and I would like to echo what he said about all these local committees all over this country.

The hon. member for Kamloops said he felt there was not enough co-ordination at the top. I do not think I made myself clear. I do not think we should try to dictate how these things are to be done. We are trying, with our local officials, to do everything we can to co-operate with all those who are interested, and to give all the guidance we are asked to give; but we are not trying to push people around or to boss them unduly. That was really the point I was trying to make. I perhaps did it rather clumsily.

The hon. member for Oxford asked me whether I would elaborate on the movement of students. I am glad he did, because it gives me an opportunity to express again my great appreciation to the president of the University of Toronto and to a group of businessmen in Toronto who really made the most magnificent arrangements for the reception of this group of students, and I think the whole country should be grateful for what they are doing. I should like to repeat that there is this other group of 100 students who are in Montreal. I hope similar arrangements, perhaps on a less elaborate scale, will be made by interested individuals and corporations and universities, of course, for them.

The hon. member for Oxford raised the question of refunding the transportation expenses of people who had brought out their own relatives. What I said in the house, I am sure all hon. members will recall, was that we intended to cancel the assisted passage loans that had been given up to that time. That was all I said here, and I did not feel it would be proper for us to go beyond what I said here. We will look at these cases. Of course I do not think any case could have arisen after the day I made that statement, so that any of these cases where people borrowed money to pay these passages would have occurred before the policy was adopted; but if there does seem to be real hardship I will give consideration to what it would be proper for me to ask the taxpayers of Canada generally to do. But it would be quite a sharp departure from anything we have done before to suggest paying people for something they had already decided to do as a matter of family obligation.

The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska asked me how many of these Hungarians were under the age of nine years. I am afraid I could not answer that offhand. I will try to get the information and give it to him privately. If he refers to children who are not accompanied by their parents the number would be very, very small indeed. I understand the Red Cross have established a tracing service and they are trying to trace information about people who are separated from other members of their families, for the reason given by the hon. gentleman and for other reasons as well.

The hon. member for Kootenay West raised some questions, most of which I think I dealt with immediately after he raised them, but there was one about asking these people to repay the passage money. Having announced here that the passage was to be free I do not think we could very well go back on that policy, but I do say this. I have had one or two letters from Hungarians, one very touching, and if it were not so late in the day I would read it. These Hungarians received free passages, and are now voluntarily paying the money back. I do think if those who get good jobs quickly—and some of them are getting very good jobs quickly after they come here—would make a gesture of that kind it would make a very good impression on the Canadian people generally, and would help a great deal to make movements of this kind more acceptable.

A great many of these people, in fact practically all of them, came here with nothing except the clothes they were wearing. During the next few years many of them will have a much more difficult time in establishing themselves than would ordinary immigrants who bring something with them. I think that is and can be the only defence of our policy, and it is the only reason this free transportation is being provided for these people and not for others.

I echo what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris said about the committee in Brandon. Outside of being a Newfoundlander, I suppose I am a Manitoban next—

Mr. Harkness: You sound pretty fishy now, all right.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I must say that nowhere have the Hungarian refugees been received better than in Manitoba. In proportion to population a larger number have gone to Manitoba than to any other province.

I dealt with the question of the immigrants constituting a burden on the municipalities in a press release right after I came home. There is no burden on the municipalities for relief during the first year or for medical expenses for indigents.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked how many of the refugees had been fighters. I do not think we can answer that question precisely. I would imagine that it would certainly not be more than one-third of them, because quite a large number are women and children. Nevertheless a good number actually were fighters, including a large number of the students. I think the reason there are so many single young men is that these are the people, especially the key men, who expected that if they stayed in Hungary they would be deported to Siberia. That is one reason there is a rather large proportion of young men, and another reason is that many of these people had to walk 20 or 30 miles to reach the border of Austria. There were not many widows, aged persons and unaccompanied children, and there are practically no orphans.

The hon. member for Greenwood asked if I could say what number are in actual employment. I am afraid I cannot tell him at this time. A great many of these people have come, if not to sponsors, to friends. I would like to say a word of special appreciation here for the efforts of the Hungarian Canadians. Everywhere in the country they have done and are doing a wonderful job in assisting us to receive these Hungarian refugees. I am sure they are going to make it much easier for these people to adapt themselves quickly to this country.

I interpose that comment because a great many of these refugees go to stay with Hungarian families immediately upon their arrival in Canada. They are being looked after by them, and it is going to take a considerable time before we will know how many of them are in actual employment and how many are not. I could probably get a figure concerning the number who were placed through the employment service or my department, but I could not possibly give a figure that would be at all accurate as to the total number who would be employed at the present time.

The hon. member for Kindersley asked whether any provision was going to be made for the burden that might fall on the municipalities after one year. I think the answer to that question is definitely no. It seems to me that if we are going to have an immigration policy in this country we must bear in mind that we are bringing these people here with a view to their becoming Canadian citizens, and they should be treated like other Canadian citizens. In most localities they cannot qualify for welfare services until after the first year, at which time they can and should qualify just like anybody else in this country, unless we are going to discriminate against one group of residents.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said this vote was not restricted to Hungarians. That is quite true, though all the additional money we are requesting is required because of the Hungarian movement. He did ask me something about the situation in the United Kingdom and what is being done about it. I did say something about that, possibly at a time when the hon. gentleman was unavoidably absent from the chamber, but perhaps I could repeat my remarks.

Mr. Green: I have been here all afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I should repeat that as early as last August my department anticipated the need for additional shipping and other forms of transport for the larger movement of immigrants we expected this year, and at the present time we are in active negotiation for a large amount of additional transport. There is no trouble at the present time concerning British immigrants or any others getting transportation to come to Canada, but there probably will be after the first of April. The ships are not completely booked at the present time, but after the first of April commercial accommodation is not going to be adequate, and we are now taking active steps to get as much transport as we can.

Mr. Green: I think the minister misunderstood my question. I was referring to the departmental set-up abroad; for example, in London. I should like to know what is being done to meet the criticism that appeared in the editorial in the Globe and Mail to which I referred.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have seen the editorials which dealt with transportation, as well as the one to which the hon. gentleman referred. As far as accommodation in London is concerned, it is quite true that when you have an office staff of a size geared to look after from 500 to 700 applicants a day and applicants start coming at the rate of 3,000 a day, as they were when I was in London in December, and as they have been all the time since except on holidays, it is just not possible to deal with everyone who applies on the day he appears. I do not believe anything very serious is lost over this, because the applications are caught up with in a relatively short time, and appointments are made for a later period for those who indicate that in any case they do not intend to come to Canada until several months hence. According to the information that has been given to me, all those who have planned to come to Canada immediately are being dealt with.

We are securing additional accommodation in London. We have opened a new office in Bristol and have increased our accommodation in Glasgow, and are pressing into service just as many officers as we can who are capable of doing the work. I think the problem will be adequately dealt with.

The hon. member for Peel asked me what I knew about "bad eggs". I know nothing at all about the subject, but I am sure that when you bring 10,000 people to a country, as we have already done, without having the time to look them over carefully in the way we try to do with immigrants generally, I do not care what group of 10,000 people you take, you are going to have some who are not going to turn out well.

I do not know very much concerning the details of the incident in Toronto. I read the newspaper accounts and I understand an investigation has been carried out. I have not yet seen the final report of the investigation, but it was quite properly carried out by the provincial authorities, since it happened in a shelter established by them. It is the only incident about which I have heard.

As to the breakdown of the vote, I have here an approximation, and I hope it will be understood that we do not feel bound to spend it in exactly this way. It is estimated that approximately $2,800,000 will be required for inland transportation in overseas countries to the point of embarkation and for transoceanic transportation, including the costs connected with the removal, embarkation and debarkation of refugees. There is an estimate of approximately $700,000 for inland transportation in Canada. There is also an amount for maintenance, clothing and other expenses incidental to the movement and establishment of Hungarian refugees, including emergency assistance as and when required during the first year in Canada. That is the amount that is expected to be required up to the end of the fiscal year, approximately $390,000.

Then there is an advance of $4,750,000 to the inter-governmental committee on European migration in prepayment of passages over the period. We do not think this is very accurate. It is probably the minimum we expect to need. Then there is an advance of about $300,000 to be paid partly to provincial institutions and to other voluntary organizations for welfare and other assistance and incidental expenses.

Mr. Fulton: There is one part of the question I asked which I am sure the minister has overlooked inadvertently. I asked if anyone had made any estimate of the total number that might go to Austria. I can understand his answer and am satisfied that perhaps that is not possible. I asked him if it had been possible to make an estimate of the number who might be coming to Canada. Perhaps that could be considered in two ways. First, how many more is it presently envisaged will come if the stream continues to taper off, as it is now doing? Second, has the department made any assessment of the number that it would be feasible for us to take as a result of this refugee movement?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think it would be very sensible for me to attempt to give any estimate. I have given the committee all our commitments, and I think the hon. gentleman has said they add up to something like 27,000 or 28,000. I would certainly anticipate that there would be that number, and that that would be the minimum. How many more it may be possible to take or how many more may want to come by the time it would be possible to arrange it will depend upon a great many factors that are still in doubt, including the question of the shortness of transport which we are bound to face in the summer months. I am quite sure that any estimate I made now would be wrong, and I do not think there would be much profit in making it.

Mr. Fulton: A related question. The minister has said that as of now no visas had been issued to those who had left Austria and gone to other European countries and the United Kingdom, and that these would not be issued until the flow of those wishing to come directly from Austria had been dealt with, except for sponsored cases. I take it that after the number of refugees coming from Austria has been reduced to manageable proportions, shall we say, visas may then be given to Hungarian refugees who are in other European countries. I should like to know whether that is correct.

In order that we and they may both understand the situation, may I ask if the same arrangement for the payment of passages would apply to those who would then be coming not from Austria but from some other country, which would be considered an intermediate stage in their movement?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think all these things should be considered in due course. As far as the 10,000 for whom arrangements have been made with three countries are concerned, their passages will of course be paid. That will also be true of any sponsored cases there may be in any of those European countries. Beyond that, until arrangements are made for other movements I really do not think it would be prudent for me, without consultation with my colleagues, to make any commitments at this stage.

Mr. Barnett: Most of the questions I had intended to ask have been asked already, but there is one specific matter about which I should like to inquire. The suggestion has been made that the Budapest opera company might come to Canada as a group, somewhat as the forestry faculty did, to which reference was made earlier in the discussion. Has the minister any information he could give the committee on that?

Mr. Pickersgill: There were about 1,300 people in the Budapest opera company, and about 200 of those people left Hungary. I imagine that among those would be the more distinguished members of the company. About 100 went almost immediately to other European countries. One or two came to Canada, having relatives in metropolitan Toronto. Some of the group went back to Hungary. Nearly all have gone to one place or another.

Some of them may come to Canada as individuals, but I do not think their coming as a group was ever a serious prospect.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister overlooked two of my questions. I was disappointed that the minister was not able to give a figure as to the number in employment, but I appreciate the difficulties which he pointed out. However, my other two questions I think can be answered. First, I asked the minister a question which I think is of some importance, as to the division of responsibility between the federal and provincial authorities in the finding of employment. Then I asked if there was a plan with regard to giving instruction in English and other necessary things, and whether in fact it is already in effect, to the extent that immigrants are working part of the day in industry and spending another part of the day in obtaining instructions.

Mr. Pickersgill: As far as the last question is concerned, I understand that in nearly all cases once these people get employment classes are carried on at night. That is the normal procedure, in order that they may get on with their jobs right away. I dare say there are some who are not employed who may be attending classes in the day time. These classes are all handled by the provincial or local authorities, and I must say that I have not all the details at my fingertips.

The responsibility for finding employment for immigrants is the responsibility of my department. We get the greatest co-operation from the national employment service. It has always been felt that the first placement should be looked after by my department. We have the responsibility of bringing these people here, and it is thought it will make us more responsible about how many we bring.

There is another reason. I think it would be very bad for morale if we had immigrants lining up at employment offices. The employment service does keep us acquainted with vacancies they are not able to fill from their regular lists. They are most co-operative. We have also had excellent co-operation from the provincial governments, but they have no responsibility in the matter.

Mr. Pallett: In giving me the breakdown of the cost the minister gave the figures for inland, transoceanic and Canadian travel, but he then seemed to repeat by giving the amount covering prepayments for travel.

Mr. Pickersgill: The first amount would be spent before the end of the fiscal year, but the other amount covers prepayment for movements after the end of the fiscal year that are presently anticipated.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the minister's answer to one of my questions regarding people who have been misled by certain press reports as to what the minister had actually said, I am glad to know that the minister is willing to give instructions that consideration would be given to those cases where people advanced money to friends or to close relatives in order that they might get away from Austria and come to Canada. I think it is most commendable for the minister to have done that.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Payments to municipalities—

540. Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal properties—Further amount required including authority to make grants under the Municipal Grants Act to the municipalities of Winnipeg, St. James, Edmonton and Vancouver in respect of certain buildings therein notwithstanding that such buildings are located on lands leased by the crown, $2,024,000.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister care to give a breakdown of this amount among the four cities named in the item?

Mr. Harris: The breakdown is not complete, for reasons I will come to in a moment. The anticipated expenditure is as follows: Ottawa, $650,000; North York, Ontario, $150,000; Hull, Quebec, $250,000; Halifax, N.S. $150,000; special authority with respect to Winnipeg, St. James, Edmonton and Vancouver, where certain federal properties are on leased lands, $197,000; Calgary, $50,000, and various other centres, $577,000.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the minister would like to relate that answer more clearly to the item before us. The item refers to $2,024,000 in respect of Winnipeg, St. James, Edmonton and Vancouver—

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman, the item refers to grants under the Municipal Grants Act. The reference to Winnipeg, St. James, Edmonton and Vancouver arises from the fact that in these particular cases the federal properties are situated on non-federal land which did not qualify under the existing provisions of the Municipal Grants Act. We are voting it in this manner to make the position statutory.

Mr. Green: What is the basis for the payments in Vancouver? Is the crown paying the full tax, as though the property were occupied by a private firm?

Mr. Harris: The basis for these payments is the existing basis under the 1956-57 statutory provision. The suggested change in the speech from the throne will not be translated into legislation until later in the session.

These are payments on the present basis. In the case of Vancouver the building involved is, I think, a federal building owned by the university; a building which, because it is sited on university property, does not presently qualify.

Mr. Green: The university is not in the city; it cannot be that. The university is on provincial land. Can the minister tell us what buildings in Vancouver are affected?

Mr. Harris: Not at the moment. There is quite a long list, as I recall. This is intended to provide additional funds because municipal corporations, including Vancouver, had put in applications for considerably more than we expected would be the case, and that is why we are short $2 million. In the case of the cities mentioned we are making grants on a basis which has not up to the present been contemplated or provided for in the statute.

Mr. Green: I presume these will be occasions when buildings are owned by some private individuals and leased to the crown.

Mr. Harris: That is correct.

Mr. Green: Will these payments, then, be of benefit to the city or to the owner of the property? Will they relieve the owner of the property of paying that much in municipal taxes? I should like to have the names of the buildings in Vancouver to which this applies.

Mr. Harris: I will give that information to the hon. member, but I can assure him that the benefit will accrue to the municipal corporation and not to the lessor.

Mr. Barnett: I am puzzled by the reference the Minister of Finance has made to a building located on property belonging to the University of British Columbia—

Mr. Harris: Perhaps what you understood me to say was that because these buildings are not situated on federally owned property they are not covered by the present provisions of the act, and this is a way of covering them so that grants can be made in respect of them to municipal corporations.

Mr. Green: Are they buildings on which taxes are not being paid now by the private owners?

Mr. Harris: These, as I understand it, are buildings that are on property leased to the federal government, I thought by the university, but if the hon. member from Vancouver-Quadra corrects me I must admit I am wrong. At any rate, I think it is provincial or university property which is not taxable by the municipal corporation. Therefore we are taking this way of making it subject to our generosity, if you like to call it that, under the Municipal Grants Act.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is there anything in the situation that did not exist before? Were these buildings formerly not owned by the government? The change that has taken place I understand is a change in the percentage that has been applied. This seems to be a change affecting certain buildings.

Mr. Harris: The change that has been made is this. We have decided to pay with regard to certain buildings in these particular cities, on which up to the moment we have not paid. There is no change with regard to the character of the buildings or the leasehold property. It was decided we ought to pay on these particular buildings, and we are asking parliament for authority to do so.

Mr. Pallett: A series of other municipalities have been mentioned. Is this additional payment a payment on new construction, or does it represent extra grants on previous submissions by municipalities?

Mr. Harris: As I said, the number of applications from our municipal corporations has grown; there were a great many more than we had anticipated, and the sum of half a million dollars which I referred to covers a number of municipal corporations in regard to which we had no idea we might have to make grants. In other cases the grants are for greater sums of money, with the result that the estimate I placed before parliament last spring has proved inadequate. I have not with me the long list of all the additional corporations that would be covered; I think I gave information about that in the spring when the amendment was put through, but I can assure members of this committee that the amount of money we have had to pay in the meantime has surprised us.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is this a case where the conscience of the department has become more active than it was before, and they therefore feel they should pay on leased premises?

Mr. Harris: As a Baptist to a Presbyterian I suggest we should not discuss consciences, because sometimes we do not agree.

Item agreed to.

University grants—

541. To authorize payments to the national conference of Canadian universities (hereinafter called "the conference") for the purpose of making grants to institutions of higher learning in accordance with an agreement entered into or to be entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, between the Minister of Finance and the conference, such agreement to include, inter alia, provision that the total amount of grants to all the institutions of higher learning in any one province be calculated by multiplying the population of the province by $1, and that any amount payable to an institution of higher learning and not paid by the conference in the present fiscal year may be retained by the conference until such time as the institution to which the money is payable claims the payment from the conference or parliament provides otherwise for the disposal thereof; the amount appropriated under vote 132 of the Appropriation Act No. 6, 1956 to be applied to the purposes of this vote; additional amount required, $7,986,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, there is a situation here which I do not fully understand.

Mr. Nowlan: Six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Monday, of course, is private members' day, and I would not suggest that we would not take the full day. On the other hand, on one previous occasion we found that we did not and I had not announced government business. Therefore on Monday, should private members' business be exhausted and government orders reached, we shall proceed with the Canada Council legislation and the Canadian wheat board bill. On Tuesday we shall take the same legislation, together with the other items on the order paper, and on Wednesday the same. On Thursday, which is private members' day again, we shall follow the same procedure.

Mr. Nowlan: Dissolve on Friday.

Mr. Fulton: What about these supplementary estimates?

Mr. Harris: We will have to reach them by Friday next. Frankly I had hoped we could pass them today. I hope my last remark, Mr. Speaker, did not indicate a lack of thanks for the co-operation I have had in the last hour.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ROCKY MOUNTAIN EAST SLOPE CONSERVATION BOARD

Question No. 38—Mr. Hansell:

1. What are the functions of the Rocky mountain east slope conservation board?
2. Who are its members, and how often did they meet in 1956?

Answer by: Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. The functions of the eastern Rockies forest conservation board are set out in the agreement of June 19, 1947, between the governments of Canada and the province of Alberta. The agreement states: "the purpose and function of the board shall be to plan, advise on, direct and supervise and carry out as herein provided:

(a) the construction, operation and maintenance of all projects and facilities required for the proper protection of the forests of that area of the east slope of the Rocky mountains, forming part of the watershed of the Saskatchewan river, as more definitely described in the appendix hereto annexed;

(b) the protection of the forests in such area from fire, insects, disease and any other damage;

(c) the conservation, development, maintenance and management of the forests in such area with a view to obtaining the greatest possible flow of water in the Saskatchewan river and its tributaries".

The agreement was approved and confirmed by the Eastern Rocky Mountain Forest Conservation Act, chapter 59, II George VI, which received royal assent on July 17, 1947. An amendment to the act in 1952 did not change the general functions of the board.

2. (a) Major General Howard Kennedy, chairman and federal member.

Mr. H. G. Jensen, Alberta provincial government, provincial member.

Mr. A. T. Baker, Alberta wheat pool, provincial member.

Mr. J. LeRoy McLenahan, alternate federal member for Major General Howard Kennedy.

(b) Four meetings were held in 1956.

FLOUR IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Question No. 39—Mr. Hansell:

1. How much flour was imported into Canada from the United States in 1955 and 1956 respectively?
2. What particular kinds of flour were imported?
3. Was any duty paid on these imports? If so, what was the rate of duty?
4. Were these particular kinds of flour unobtainable from Canadian sources?

Answer by: Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State):

1. Imports of flour from the United States, calendar year 1955 and period January 1 to September 30, 1956 (latest figures available).

	Calendar year 1955	January 1-September 30, 1956
	—cwt—
Malt flour	5,073	4,221
Rye flour	1,192	1,162
Wheat flour	4,273	4,548

2. Information not available other than that shown in answer to No. 1 above.

3. Yes.

Buckwheat flour—tariff item 50, 45 cents per 100 pounds.

Malt flour—containing less than 50 per centum in weight of malt, tariff item 168, 25 per cent and 5 cents per pound; otherwise, tariff item 167a, ½ cent per pound.

Rye flour—tariff item 59, 45 cents per barrel.

Wheat flour—tariff item 61, 50 cents per barrel.

FISHING DRAGGER SUBSIDY

Question No. 62—Mr. Kickham:

1. To how many fishing draggers has the $165 per ton subsidy been awarded by the Department of Fisheries?
2. What was the approximate total new value of these draggers?

Answer by: Mr. MacNaught, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Fisheries:

1. 121. 2. $4,230,000.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Terminable services—

538. Freight assistance on western feed grains—further amount required, $2,000,000.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

A—Department—
Immigration branch—

539. To provide, subject to the approval of treasury board, for transoceanic, inland transportation and other assistance for immigrants and settlers—further amount required, including authority to make advances, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to the intergovernmental committee for European migration for the cost of transportation and other assistance with respect to Hungarian refugees coming to Canada, and to the provinces for the cost of caring for such refugees, $9,000,000.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Payments to municipalities—

540. Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal properties—further amount required including authority to make grants under the Municipal Grants Act to the municipalities of Winnipeg, St. James, Edmonton and Vancouver in respect of certain buildings therein notwithstanding that such buildings are located on lands leased by the crown, $2,024,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 28, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND BENEFITS AND PROVIDE CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to extend the benefits of the Municipal Grants Act and to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE AUTHORIZED AWARDS AND LEVY

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to increase the awards and the levy authorized by the act.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

EXCHEQUER COURT JUDGMENTS

Motion No. 1—Mr. Knowles:

For a copy of the judgment of the Exchequer Court of Canada in case No. 73805 between the Minister of National Revenue, appellant, and the Publishers' Guild of Canada Limited, respondent; and also a copy of the judgment of the Exchequer Court of Canada in case No. 78533 between the Publishers' Guild of Canada Limited, appellant, and the Minister of National Revenue, respondent.

DEAS ISLAND TUNNEL, B.C.

Motion No. 3—Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the provincial government of British Columbia, the New Westminster harbour board and the federal government, in 1956 and 1957, regarding an alleged cessation of planning and actual work on the Deas island tunnel across the main channel of the Fraser river.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): I wonder if the hon. member would permit this to stand until the Minister of Public Works returns to the house.

Mr. Goode: Agreed.

Motion stands.

BANK OF CANADA MONETARY POLICIES—NEW BRUNSWICK

Motion No. 5—Mr. Bell:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the provincial government of New Brunswick and the federal government, in October and November, 1956, regarding the monetary policies of the Bank of Canada and their effect on the economy of the province of New Brunswick.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): When I noticed in Votes and Proceedings the announcement of the hon. gentleman's intention to ask for these papers I communicated at once with the premier of New Brunswick. I have had an answer from him that he has no objection, so I do not need to make the usual reservation.

Motion agreed to.

BROADCAST "PORTRAIT OF SIR WILFRID LAURIER"

Motion No. 6—Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

For a copy of the broadcast "Portrait of Sir Wilfrid Laurier," given over CBC Wednesday evening, January 23, 1957, between 9.30 p.m. and 10 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT

FINAL RECEIPTS FOR THOSE WITH INCOMES OF $10,000 OR LESS

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act and regulations made under the act, so as to provide a final receipt for those income tax returns filed for the preceding calendar year for individuals whose income is $10,000 or less.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this problem was discussed a year ago but with respect to the resolution I had on the order paper at that time there was some question as to whether it would be ruled out of order by Your Honour, and so I took advantage of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and made some remarks at that time concerning my opinion as to how the changes in the Income Tax Act might apply. Having revised the resolution appearing on the order paper in the meantime, I welcome this opportunity to present to hon. members some of the arguments which I feel are good and valid reasons for some changes and amendments to the Income Tax Act as they apply to those taxpayers whose incomes are not in the high or extra high brackets.

Income Tax Act

One of the first objects that I have heard has always been, "Well, you are drawing a distinction between those who are in receipt of an income of $10,000 and those who are below that figure". I hasten right here to point out that the government now draws a line between various categories or groups of taxpayers, and those in the higher income tax bracket pay a greater percentage of tax. Therefore, to provide for those taxpayers in the lower income group a final settlement 12 months after the 30th day of April in each tax year would not be so difficult. It would not be difficult also because of the fact that, as I understand it, where fraud is charged the income tax department can take almost any number of years and bring the taxpayer before the courts of the land. Therefore, I cannot see that it would be too difficult to administer.

I, therefore, make no apologies, Mr. Speaker, for bringing this matter to the attention of the house and taking up some of the time of the house to present my views, and I think they are the views of a large number of Canadian citizens.

If we believe in democracy—and I think we all do—we acknowledge it is government by the people and for the people not government by a ruling class. Consequently, I think if a poll were taken the vast majority of taxpayers would be in favour of some amendment to the act which would let them know when they were finished with one year's business. At this moment I should also like to mention that I doubt whether there are over 5 per cent of the income tax payers in the bracket which I have mentioned whose income could not be revised either way.

As I said on another occasion, if my income tax return or that of any other hon. member or individual taxpayer was submitted to ten different officials or assessors of the income tax branch those gentlemen would come up with ten different answers or maybe 20 if you went back a second time. Consequently I think the time is long past due when some method should be established by which a definite and correct conclusion could be reached. I do not think this would be difficult because it seems to me that any qualified efficiency firm or accounting firm could set up a system to administer the act more speedily and satisfactorily. While I am mentioning these things I might point out that there are many harassed taxpayers who have worried themselves into a premature grave over the problem of income tax. As I said last year, I hold no brief for those persons who deliberately set out to defraud the income tax branch and consequently the Canadian people of what is their just payment under the law. I also want to point out that in my opinion the vast majority of Canadians are law abiding citizens regardless of what the income tax people may think about this.

I plan to appeal to the reason of both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue. I doubt if we depart from the British system of justice whereunder the accused is innocent until he is proven guilty in any other legal procedure, but people being prosecuted by the income tax branch are considered guilty until they have proved themselves innocent.

As I mentioned previously, I am not alone in bringing to the attention of the government the problems confronting individual taxpayers because many individuals and groups are expressing concern in this regard. I have on my files hundreds of letters from taxpayers in Ontario who have written to me protesting the present system under which they are never certain just where they stand with the income tax branch. In order to point out how widespread is this concern, there are many county councils which have passed resolutions along this line. I am going to refer to just a few of the counties near my constituency. These include Elgin, Huron and Perth, Lanark, Grey and Halton, Bruce, Lincoln, Oxford and Waterloo, Brant-Haldimand, Middlesex and Lambton. There are some others, but at the moment I do not have their resolutions on file. In addition to that many chambers of commerce have protested the present set-up as well as the federation of agriculture, the farmers' union and various women's institutes. I want to mention particularly two groups of women's institutes in Essex, the Malden Women's Institute and the Women's Institute of Essex County. They have both written to me backing up what I had to say a year ago and expressing the hope that some satisfactory solution can be found for the problem.

There have been many editorials and newspaper comments supporting the stand I took, and I should like to refer the government to a couple of clippings which I have and which I think are most pertinent to the problem. We all realize that the government has grown and now reaches into the private life of practically every individual in Canada. History has a habit of repeating itself. I have here a front page editorial which appeared in the Toronto Saturday Night of September 4, 1954. This was commenting upon what had gone on in Great Britain during and at the close of the war, with particular reference to ministerial responsibility to parliament. They were referring to an incident concerning the taking over of a 700-acre farm in Great Britain and what they say has a bearing on the understanding which the provinces had when they relinquished their taxation rights at the beginning of the war. The resignation of a particular minister in Great Britain had been called for, and the editorial went on to say:

> There was a time when such a resignation would have excited little comment; it would have been expected as the only possible course for a minister who had failed to keep his department in good order. But there was surprised and respectful applause for Sir Thomas Dugdale; he had actually admitted that a minister is responsible for the conduct of the civil servants under his direction. In other words, the principle of responsibility has been so generally ignored that any recognition of it by the members or minions of government comes as a distinct shock.
> Canadians have had many opportunities in recent years to study the growing disinclination of both federal and provincial cabinet ministers to accept responsibility for the sins of their departments, and considering the complacency with which this ministerial attitude has been accepted, they are likely to see a good deal more of it. There will be no change until they understand that this sort of thing can only mean government not by elected representatives but by an uncontrolled civil service.
> When ministers refuse to share the blame for waste, inefficiency and worse in their departments, they are admitting that the job of government has grown too big for them; they are claiming, in effect, that while they should still be trusted with the direction of the nation's business, they should not be expected to worry about the people they have hired for the day-to-day handling of that business. If we condone this attitude, we must be prepared to accept the inevitable result: the end of our control, as electors, over the way we are to be governed.

I commend to the government a second reading of that editorial in their leisure time because it does indicate the drift that is going on in this country toward a certain amount of bureaucracy. Another clipping along the same line rather intrigued me. It reads:

> History Repeats Itself
> Twenty centuries ago, and thereafter for four hundred years, the Romans ruled Britain without interfering in the private lives of the people. The Roman government attended to its own affairs and allowed the people to attend to theirs. Indeed, as Douglas Jerrold points out in his book "England; Past, Present and Future" it was from the Roman empire that the western world learned the art and purpose of government and the application of the rule or law to the preservation of the lives of free men living in ordered and mutually dependent societies.

However, as I have mentioned before, we see the various departments of government reaching out and trying to control the private lives of individuals from day to day, and it cannot in the end, in my estimation, lead to anything but disaster. For this reason I am asking the department to consider and review its attitude as it applies to the income tax payer in this country. The present attitude is, I believe, having a somewhat disastrous effect, but, no doubt because of the ever-increasing degree of inflation, that effect is not as apparent as it might be in other circumstances. Nevertheless, it is certainly discouraging production and, in a sense, it is penalizing the very people who form the productive element in our nation. When you take in—as I am doing here—that group of people whose net income is less than $10,000 a year, you are covering the vast majority of the productive enterprises of this country.

Some people are saying "I am not going to work for the government any more; I am just going to make a living out of my land or business. I am not going to hire a lot of help in order to make a few dollars. If I should lose, it would be 'just too bad'; if I win, the government will only take it from me and wonder why I did not make any more". Consequently, every small businessman, every self-employed individual and every working man who engages in part-time work has begun to question the results of his efforts as far as his income tax commitment is concerned. They are wondering: "If we do some overtime or put in some extra work for ourselves, will all we have gained be confiscated?" The net result of this situation is that we are in a sense, rewarding the non-productive and punishing those who are productive in our economy.

That is not the whole story either, Mr. Speaker. There is the fear in the minds of many people that sooner or later they will be "hauled on the carpet" and have their business transactions for years past—possibly over the past 15 or 20 years—made subject to review. We in the western world, have been told about the terror in totalitarian countries where the gestapo comes knocking on the door in the night. That is held up as one of the things to be feared in a totalitarian world. Well, the income tax department does not even wait until night before they knock on the door—they come in at any time, represented, in many cases, by a little man with a lot of authority. Yes, I am "sticking my neck out" a long way, as I mentioned earlier. The department seizes your books and seizes your assets, and you are presumably guilty until you are proven innocent. I know whereof I speak. I do not plan, Mr. Speaker, to bring to your attention four individual cases with which I am very familiar, but I will mention two of these cases involving estates. The people concerned were told that they owed the department a sizeable sum of money, and the heirs and the legal firms representing them were afraid to fight the case. Accordingly, they paid. It almost reached a point where it amounted to blackmail rather than the administration of the law.

In a couple of other cases in which the people appealed, when they said they were going to take the matter to the income tax appeal board, some time later one of the officials appeared and said, "We have reviewed this whole case; there are some mistakes; we are sorry but there is an error; forget all about it." If those people had paid the amount demanded, it would have been an admission that they were wrong. I am willing to bet that there are many cases in which the people, rather than fight, pay the amount demanded but do not owe the department at all.

Many of these taxpayers—good, law-abiding citizens—are finding that the department are autocratic and overbearing in their approach to the taxpayer. In fact, a good friend of mine retired years ago and went to Devon, England. In England during the war all kinds of restrictions were placed on individuals, as was done here, as we know, through the wartime prices and trade board. I well remember a letter he wrote to me and in which he said, "The government of Britain are making a crook out of every honest Englishman." I venture to say that the income tax department here, through their methods, are making crooks out of many otherwise honest people. I do not know whether I should use the word "warn", but at any rate I think I should tell the department that there is a rising tide of resentment against the department and the methods that are used in collecting what they allege are amounts owing.

I mentioned the small businessman. I want to point out that agriculture is not the only industry affected. Practically all small business across the country is affected. Those large corporations and companies doing a big business have their accounting systems set up; they have men who watch every angle of taxation so as to save as much as they possibly can in every financial move they make. But the smaller income tax payer is not able to hire that expert advice and opinion and consequently he must take his chances. Labour are watching closely so that in the overtime work they do, and by means of which they may contribute to the economy of the country, they are not penalized. They watch their overtime and pay close attention to it. In many cases lawyers advise their clients to settle rather than to fight the department because they figure that if they go to court and fight the matter or antagonize the department, the department will just clamp down on the law firm as well. Consequently they hesitate to take on these accounts.

I know of one particular case in which a certain individual was taking care of accounts for several clients. As soon as that individual died the accounts of every client of his immediately came under surveillance, and they had not anyone to fight their battle. They had expected that this particular individual knew all about their business and could fight the case for them. As soon as he had passed on, there was no one left to fight the battle. Consequently many of them were taken for either large or small sums. I think this is a terrible state of affairs.

Then there are many people who go to the income tax department for advice. But according to what has happened in the courts and in the appeal boards, that is not the place to go for advice.

I hold in my hand a couple of clippings from newspapers, and the heading on one item is, "You take Official Tax Advice at Own Peril". This clipping is from the Ottawa Journal of February 21, 1955 and says that the oral or written statements and opinions of assessors and others when dealing with taxpayers from time to time, however sincerely expressed, can hardly be said to fulfil these requirements of section 14 of the Income Tax Act.

Then I should like to cite what happened to one taxpayer, as illustrated by an article in the London Free Press of March 12, 1956. Evidently this taxpayer in company with his auditor consulted the local officials, his only contact with the department, and they agreed that the cash basis method of computing his income for tax purposes was acceptable to them. However, some years later he was assessed for a considerable sum. He appealed to the income tax appeal board, which board ruled that the taxpayer was overly optimistic in his assumption that the cash method of computing income had been accepted. The joker is the word "accepted" in the act. According to the board the term "accepted" indicates the unqualified acceptance in appropriate form on behalf of the crown which leaves no scope for doubt. The oral or written statements or opinions of assessors or others, however sincerely expressed, cannot be considered as fulfilling this requirement. Consequently, therefore, you must take their advice with a grain of salt because later the department will repudiate it. I feel this is a regrettable state of affairs because these small taxpayers about whom I am talking should be able to obtain correct advice from the department. However, experience has proven that advice is not dependable.

A little earlier I mentioned the chamber of commerce brief. The chamber of commerce recommended that the right to assess be limited to a one-year period dating from the assessment. There is a joker in that, too, Mr. Speaker, and I claim that is not good enough. Some assessments are delayed for years and the taxpayer does not know his position. It provides a loophole and an alibi for the department. The Department of National Revenue demands that the individual taxpayer's returns be in four months after the close of the calendar year. However, when it comes to the department processing these returns, that can go on for years and years without arriving at any finality.

Just last evening on the train coming to Ottawa I met some of the members of the legislative and without asking them for their opinions on the subject they expressed concern about the lack of finality and suggested that something should and could be done about it. While I am mentioning that I might say that I think there is a desire on the part of the taxpayer to have a clear definition of capital gains. There is no such clear definition today. I would say that if the government is as efficient as they would lead the public to believe there is no reason in the world why these returns could not be processed within 12 months from April 30.

There is another alarming angle. I suppose there are two sides to every story, but I have had several taxpayers come to me and say that the assessors who appeared at their places demanded cash and would not take a cheque. I suppose there is a possibility of someone giving a cheque that would bounce, and consequently they did not want to be caught that way. On the other hand, I am just wondering why they demanded cash. In my opinion that angle should be investigated because the demand does not ring true.

Mr. Benidickson: Would my hon. friend give particulars on that?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): No, sir, I am not going to divulge the names of the people who came to me. They are in sufficient trouble now. Last year, Mr. Speaker, there were quite a number of Liberal members who had resolutions on the order paper or mentioned in their speeches the problems I am bringing to the attention of the house today. I would hope these members would be influential in furthering the cause about which I am speaking this afternoon. I noticed that there was one member on the government side who had the courage of his convictions and made a speech accordingly.

There are those who will say this cannot be done. I would think such an answer by the government or the officials concerned would be an admission of inefficiency or an admission that the department does not want to settle individual accounts within any stated time. It would be an admission also that the officials of the department like the power with which they are vested and are loath to relinquish it.

Recently I had two cases brought to my attention. One man had been making returns for many years when he was approached and told that his account was incorrect. He was asked for quite a sum of money and said he did not have that kind of money, but he would allot a certain percentage of his monthly pay cheque to meet their account. This was agreed upon. The account was reduced from thousands to hundreds. Then his wife was taken sick and she was in and out of hospital for many months. When the due date for the next income tax payment rolled around the man informed the department he could not pay it because he did not have the cash. He was informed that his wages would be garnisheed. He pointed out to the department that the refundable portion of the amount deducted from his wages for income tax purposes would more than cover what he owed the department, but they would not agree to that. They garnisheed his wages. As hon. members know, in the case of some companies this means that you are let out of your job.

Mr. Benidickson: Will my hon. friend give me the particulars of that?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes, sir. I had a letter from an individual who said that apparently her only crime was saving money for her old age. When the income tax department found cash in the bank they were immediately suspicious and investigated every possible angle. Her conclusion was that all the government wanted to do was to worry her to death before she was 70 and able to collect the old age pension.

A year ago I mentioned the efficiency of Eaton's and Simpson's in keeping track of their customers' accounts.

The Minister of Finance rather questioned what I had to say. I therefore took the trouble to find out how many accounts Eaton's and Simpson's processed in their mail order departments in a day and how many employees they had. As I understand it, the Eaton company employs about 5,000 people in its mail order department. This has nothing to do with the retail sales. They service about 50,000 orders a day and the average time taken to process an order is 20 minutes. The income tax department employ over 6,000 people. There are approximately 9 million people of tax-paying age in the country. They are not all taxpayers. I did not have time to review the income tax statistics to find out exactly the number, but there are in Canada about 1,500 persons for each employee in the income tax department, to say nothing of those who are not eligible for taxation. Therefore, it would seem to me that there could be a great deal more efficiency employed by the department than is employed at the present time.

While what I have to say now has nothing to do with the settling of accounts yearly, I do want to point out that those persons who are contributing to approved pension plans are able to deduct from their income tax the amount paid for such a plan, but those who are individually or self-employed help to pay for it because industry or concern passes on those costs. They become part of the cost of doing business. Consequently, those people who are individually or self employed are not able to deduct any payments they might make to a pension plan of their own. They are, in a sense, contributing to the pension plans of others in the costs of things they have to buy. That is something the department should look into. All self-employed people are under that kind of double-edged sword arrangement. On the one hand they are paying for others and on the other they are not able to deduct the costs of their own plans.

There is another comment I wish to make. We saw this during the early part of the last session. Planes and many other pieces of war goods were declared surplus and obsolete. They were bought as junk at a fraction of their original cost. Then, after being purchased as junk, they were sold to belligerent countries in the Middle East. My contention is that if some of the money obtained was used for hospitalization plans, increases in pensions and things like that for our own Canadian people it would be putting money to much better use.

I also wish to point out that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand the Income Tax Act. The department expects individuals who are busy trying to run their own business to understand all the ramifications of the act.

In conclusion I wish to point out, Shakespeare said that life is a stage and every person plays a part. I think everyone knows the part the income tax department is playing, with eminent success.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this subject is not new to the house. As a matter of fact, last session we had a very worth-while debate on a subject very close to the resolution we are discussing now because of the introduction of an amendment to a statute by the hon. member for Kamloops. At that time the hon. member for Middlesex East, who is now proposing this resolution, spoke and he said, as reported at page 3237 of Hansard:

> The income tax is probably the fairest method of collecting taxes because those who are most able to pay are the ones from whom taxes are taken. But the way in which it is done at the present time is extremely unsatisfactory.

I take it that in essence this is still the reason for his bringing forward this resolution today. On the other hand, I want to remind him and the house that last year when this matter was under discussion it was indicated that while the government at that time had under its income tax provisions an opportunity to reassess, beyond conditions of fraud and misrepresentation, a taxpayer's return within a period of six years, consideration would be given to reducing that opportunity in regard to time. In August of last year, when the Income Tax Act was amended by this house, it was proposed as a government measure that this period of time within which re-assessment could take place under normal conditions be reduced from six years to four years. It is true that the public bill, as introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops, proposed three years, but I suggest to the house it is reasonable to think that this fairly important reduction passed last year, from six years to four years, is worthy of a try-out without the most radical suggestion made by the hon. member for Middlesex East.

Some complications would result if we were to accept at its face value the proposition of the hon. member for Middlesex East. While there is some vagueness in the wording, he suggests that we can within a year of filing arrive at a conclusion with respect to the tax obligation of all individuals filing tax claims.

Our laws also provide a certain number of privileges to the taxpayers. It is not clear in the hon. member's resolution that he would similarly want to restrict the taxpayer in so far as his rights are concerned in asking for re-assessment in the case of a deduction at source. Under the present law the taxpayer is given the privilege of two years within which to ask the taxation department to refund to him certain moneys that he considers due by reason of certain deductions that are provided under law. That is not clear and if we were to accept the hon. member's resolution as proposed this afternoon I suggest it would take away from the taxpayer whose income is taxed at the source privileges that he now has of two years' opportunity of applying to the income tax department for a re-assessment and a reconsideration of his tax payments and his application for a refund for lawful deductions.

In the legislation proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops last year there was at least recognition of the fact that there should not be restrictions for the department in so far as taxpayers are concerned in cases of fraud and misrepresentation. In the resolution that has been presented to us this afternoon I find no reservation with respect to that matter and I think it will commend itself to the house as unworthy of acceptance on that score alone, because surely the present opportunities of the income tax department should be furthered and continued in terms of being able to reassess in the case of taxpayers regarding whom there is very definite evidence of fraud and misrepresentation in the matter of their filing.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member covered that.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not in the resolution. If we were to accept the resolution I know my hon. friend who just rose would be among the first to say we passed a resolution which was not accepted holus-bolus as a government.

Another thing which I think should be taken into consideration by hon. members is the general element of justice and fairness in tax matters as it relates to all taxpayers across the country. I find that in the most recent publication of the Department of National Revenue entitled "Taxation Statistics for 1956" and which is based on tax returns for the year 1954 the following information is available to all of us. It is reported there that the total number of taxable income returns for the year 1954 was 3,410,160. The number of non-taxable returns was 1,393,250. This means that a grand total of 4,803,410 tax returns were considered by the officials of the Department of National Revenue in 1954. I submit to the common sense of hon. members that they would not want to employ in the Department of National Revenue on a peak work period basis and then a lay-off basis the number of employees who would be required from April 30 to the end of the calendar year to process that number of returns.

I know the proposer of this proposition is sincere in his suggestion and I also know that generally speaking he speaks for an agricultural community. I want to point out to him that the taxation statistics for the year 1954 to which I have referred show that out of a total of 4,800,000 returns only 43,000 farmers and fishermen submitted returns that were subsequently found to be taxable. In addition there were 171,000 farmers and fishermen who submitted returns that were non-taxable.

There are many hon. members of this house who represent ridings which are basically composed of wage earners who have income from only one source and that is from an employer. Respecting the employees' class, a total of 3,032,300 employees filed returns on income that was taxable and a total of 994,660 employees filed returns on income that was not taxable. If we are to regard the element of fairness, I do not think the mass of people whose basic income is taxed at the source for income tax purposes as a result of their being employees would be satisfied if they felt that this government or any other government was restricted, as is suggested by the resolution before us, in its opportunity to examine carefully the returns of other taxpayers who have a more complicated situation, such as business proprietors, farmers and fishermen and professionals, in order to assure that everybody is paying the just and proper rates that are passed by this parliament.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has so aptly put it, it is not so much the collection of taxes or the rates charged that is objected to, but rather it is the method of collecting taxes that is objected to, and that is what is behind the resolution of the hon. member for Middlesex East.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, tax collectors and tax collecting methods have been unpopular throughout history. As many hon. members probably know, in the old and difficult days of the Romans the job of tax collector was hired out at a certain price. In other words, if the government of the day wanted a certain amount of taxes collected from a given area and they expected, let us say, the equivalent of $100,000 to come from a specific part of the country, someone would contract to take the job and if they succeeded in collecting more than $100,000 in taxes they filled their own pockets with the surplus. We all know, of course, that such a thing would not be allowable today; however, in effect it may not be as unallowable as it might appear because while the tax collectors of today receive a salary I think some of them have the attitude which says, "Get all you can". I know of one particular instance which comes to mind and there are other instances which I could cite. Just recently in my own town a man who operates a small business was visited by the collectors who said, "Well, we got so much out of so and so and now we are going to see how much we can get out of you". If that is the attitude of the tax collectors it is little wonder that the general public is complaining about the methods used by the officials of the Department of National Revenue because the state of mind represented by the "get all you can" attitude is not a desirable one.

There are people in other positions who have the same type of attitude. For instance, it is often believed that some policemen like to get as many convictions as possible because they think they might earn a promotion on this account. I cannot help but feel that a great many junior officials of the Department of National Revenue have the feeling that the more they can get out of the people the greater will be their chances of promotion. I know full well that when this department was before the special committee on estimates last year the minister denied that this was the case. I am not suggesting that the minister was trying to mislead anyone, as I think he sincerely believes what he said. I do not suppose for a minute that the department condones such a state of affairs, but I am quite sure in my own mind that many of the junior officials feel that if they do a good job and bring in a lot more revenue they are going to get promoted. I cannot help feeling that that is so as it is only human nature to feel that if you are making a success of your job you are going to get a promotion.

Another thing that was brought out last year when the affairs of the Department of National Revenue were being considered by the special committee was the length of time books of a company or an individual would be retained by the departmental officials when they were on a fishing expedition. Several times I have mentioned in the house the case of a private company where the books were taken by the departmental officials for examination. The officials arrived at the home of the owner at six o'clock in the morning. The owner was in Europe with his wife, but his son was there. The officials ransacked the house for the books, and I suppose in doing so they were within the law as they had a warrant. These books were kept for over a year, I believe for 15 months, at great inconvenience to the company. For instance, they did not know what money was owing to them because their accounts receivable book was away. They did not know what money they owed because their accounts payable ledger was away.

I see no reason why the department should keep books for that length of time. There is no reason why they could not have books of this kind photostatted and use the photostats in making their investigation. On previous occasion reference has been made to how good the Department of National Revenue is at photostatting. There is no reason why they could not use methods of that kind in this type of case so that the books might be returned and permit businesses of this type to carry on.

The hon. member who has just resumed his seat has said that he feels one year might be too short a time, that we should try out the four-year period, as was agreed to last year. There may be something in what he says, but I cannot help but feel that if the period was reduced to one year it would work out very well. I know the department will say that this would place a terrific strain on the department, that it would be an incredible thing to do, but I think most hon. members have seen examples in other fields where people have had to do something and have gone out and done it. Many of us can remember when during the war the length of military training was reduced. The usual length of training was from six months to a year but during the war we had to have people in a hurry. In my own experience in the navy the length of training was from three to four months. The results may not have been perfect but I know the people in that branch of the service did a pretty good job even though they had to get their training in a hurry. The same sort of argument could be applied to the Department of National Revenue. When people know they have only a certain length of time to do things they will get them done.

There is another item I should like to mention, the drawing up of income tax returns. As everyone knows, this is an exceedingly complicated matter. I think the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) agreed that this is so. In fact it is so much so that sometimes people go to lawyers to have this done. I do not think many lawyers know much about this sort of thing. I know I do not and I have an accountant draw up mine for me. A great many other people do the same thing.

However, many people, such as farmers, do not know just whom to go to in order to have their income tax returns drawn up. They should go to a chartered or public accountant, but very often they do not. As I say, many lawyers do not know too much about it but they still go ahead and draw up these forms, but they are responsible for any mistakes they may make on behalf of their clients. On the other hand, many people will go to a township clerk to have their income tax returns drawn up. They do this in perfectly good faith but, as hon. members know, this presents a very complicated problem in completing the returns, allowing for depreciation and so on.

Someone may go to a township clerk and the township clerk makes a mistake. Then several years later the farmer may find that he owes a lot of money plus interest. He may not be penalized because there was no intent to defraud, but he does have to pay interest. Yet he had his income tax return made out in completely good faith by someone who held himself out as knowing what he was doing. The township clerk holds himself out as an agent who knows and the farmer is penalized. It seems to me that if someone holds himself out as an agent to know, as we call it in law, and draws up income tax returns, he should be liable in damages for any mistakes he may make. If a lawyer makes a mistake he is liable for the consequences. I think that should apply to these other people.

The hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) who proposed this resolution said that there are many practical reasons why the burden of proof should be shifted. The individual must now prove that he is not guilty. I cannot help but feel that this constitutes a dangerous precedent. It may be all very well for government officials to go on fishing expeditions to see what they can find out, for a year as proposed in the resolution, but it is a dangerous precedent. This is contrary to all the principles of British justice which apply throughout the English-speaking world, and it is a very dangerous thing. Once it gets into one department of government the next thing we know it will be the case with all departments.

As has been mentioned by the hon. member for Middlesex East, quite often a person will be assessed a certain amount of tax but rather than appeal it to the income tax appeal board, which might entail employing a lawyer, he may decide to pay even though he feels he is not liable. Lawyers may not charge as much as members of some other professions, but they do charge fairly well. You may require a specialist in income tax law which is going to cost more. Even though a man wins his appeal where the sum involved is fairly small he may not be any further ahead.

Quite often a man decides to pay the amount he is assessed for because he feels that even if he won his case it would not be worth it. There might be $500 involved, and even though he wins he might have to pay half that amount to his lawyer. This is the rather unfortunate state of affairs that exists. I appreciate that that is not strictly the fault of the government, but that is what results from this type of law.

There is one last thing I would like to mention. After a reassessment is made a man may find that he owes $4,000 or $5,000. If he is a small businessman or a farmer and has to get that amount of money right away he may find himself in difficulty. I know that at times the Department of National Revenue will allow a little time for payment, but they do not have to. If a small businessman or farmer has to raise $4,000 or $5,000 or $6,000 in a hurry it may well mean the ruination of his business or his farm. We all know that when you have to sell something in a hurry you cannot realize its full value. If a farmer has to sell part of his farm or if a businessman has to sell some of his stock-in-trade in a hurry he may find that he must sell at a considerable discount and thus suffer a heavy loss in relation to what he has to pay. I would like to point out that though the words "fraud and misrepresentation" were not contained in the resolution, the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) dealt with that aspect, and said that this was in no way intended as a means of covering up people who had been dishonest and who had tried to cheat the government of its just due.

The last point I would try to make is this: when it is found that people have not paid what they should have paid, then, though perfectly innocent of any intention to deceive, they are not only penalized by having to pay the amount claimed plus interest, but they often have to suffer a considerable loss in being forced to sell part of a farm or business in order to raise funds in a hurry. I think that if he does nothing else, the Minister of Finance might consider some amendment to the act under which a time limit would be allowed so that people would not have to ruin themselves in an effort to raise money regardless of the circumstances.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): When I first read this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I wrote across it: "Supported with reservations." One of the reservations I had in mind has already been mentioned here, namely the possibility of fraud and misrepresentation.

The hon. member who sponsored this resolution (Mr. White, Middlesex East) has stressed that he is in no way endeavouring to protect those who are guilty of fraud or misrepresentation. I certainly would not suggest, either, that protection should be given to such persons, but the sponsor did make his position perfectly clear on this point. The parliamentary assistant (Mr. Benidickson) urged opposition to the resolution on the ground that this proviso was not contained in it. I cannot help but think—

Mr. Benidickson: They could not be found out within such a short period of time.

Mr. Shaw: I cannot help but feel that more than once in cases where this house has had government resolutions, even government bills, before it for consideration, all has not been stated; in fact, very few government resolutions give a clear picture of the full import of what is intended. Indeed, it often happens that this house, having passed a bill in the belief that it knew what it was doing, finds later that regulations have been attached to that bill to give it an effect which was never intended by the house itself when it passed the measure.

The parliamentary assistant referred to the fact that the taxpayer is given two years in which to claim reassessment and refund. It does occur to me that there might be a strong argument there for saying that the government, or the Department of National Revenue, should also be limited to two years with regard to its own actions; what is fair for the taxpayer on one hand should also be perfectly fair for the department. There is a difference between the two. The department has the wherewithal to hire experts to complete their job, while the individual is often an overworked, oppressed person who has all too little time and, possibly, all too little ability when it comes to keeping books.

I think it is inevitable that the national revenue department should be the most unpopular department of government. After all, they are in the business of collecting taxes, and none of us likes taxes. I think, myself, that the department becomes unpopular in relation to the weight with which taxation bears down on the public. During times like the present when most people believe that taxes are particularly oppressive there is bound to be considerably more criticism. I do feel, however, that the Department of National Revenue and the government can rid themselves of a good deal of the criticism which presently falls upon them by making a concerted effort to remove the anomalies and the inconsistencies which are found within the act itself.

I noticed in the press this morning that only within the last few days the Canadian Bar Association, I believe, and the accountants have made representations to the Department of Finance urging the removal from the act of certain obvious anomalies. I shall not refer to these anomalies in detail, though I could; they are there, and certainly consideration should be given to the correction of this difficulty.

It is also true, Mr. Speaker, that right across the country we find a great variation in the interpretation of the regulations; one finds a difference between the interpretation made by two district offices, in some instances, within a single province. I happen to have had evidence of a certain case which was handled by one of the district offices. It was discovered that the taxpayer in question was the responsibility of another district, and the accounts were accordingly transferred. However, in the second district a different interpretation was placed upon various sections of the act. I sometimes wonder, in this connection, how much of the time of the head office staff here in Ottawa is occupied in correcting errors made in district offices—errors of actual calculation and errors in interpretation. I doubt very much if we will get that information, but from what I hear via the "grapevine" a very substantial part of the time of head office is occupied in straightening out the difficulties which are constantly and chronically arising in the district offices.

That leads me to suggest this: I wonder if the department is doing enough to familiarize its employees in district offices with interpretations as accepted by head office. What effort is made to bring the staff together to consider and study interpretations? I think, myself, that no matter what is being done in this connection more should be undertaken. I agree with the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that it is probably these administrative difficulties that are causing the greatest amount of trouble.

Consider, for example, a farmer who has not either the time or, possibly, the ability—I am only thinking of certain cases; I am not condemning all farmers, or anyone else for that matter—to keep a clear record of his accounts. It does happen that in many cases people have neither the time nor the ability to organize an acceptable accounting system. In these cases the department imposes upon such people what it calls a "net worth statement". In some respects these things are perfectly vicious. I have known the affairs of certain individuals and I have examined net worth statements and, believe me, though you know they are wrong you just cannot prove they are wrong. It is one of the strangest things I have encountered while in public office.

Then there is the practice of placing the onus upon the taxpayer himself; in other words, the department will sometimes set down an almost fantastic figure and say: "We say this is right. If it is not, you prove it is wrong."

I will give the house a typical example—something that recently happened. A farmer had among his papers a receipt for $1,200, money that he had spent to buy cattle. The department had it included as income and kept insisting that he account for this $1,200. It is almost unbelievable. I would not have believed it myself if I had not seen these papers and the receipt. This is the sort of thing that causes annoyance and aggravation. I sometimes think that when the Department of National Revenue recruits new personnel it does not give sufficient attention to—if I may use this word—training its men.

After all, there are right ways and there are wrong ways of dealing with the public. I should think that the Department of National Revenue would be more concerned than any other department in dealing with them in the right way. They can be firm. They can insist upon the provisions of the act being adhered to. But I am sometimes troubled by the attitudes of those who can—I think someone in a previous debate described them as little gods—and do create a certain animosity among taxpayers or prospective taxpayers. The situation is just not good. I sometimes think that these regulations we now have seem to be predicated upon a premise or assumption held by some that people are inherently dishonest. People are not inherently dishonest. I think it is an error on the part of the Department of National Revenue to create the impression that that is what they sometimes believe. Rather, I would say that it would be an admission that the administration is incompetent, and that in so many cases they try to cover up their incompetence by these unfair procedures and pressures which are imposed upon prospective taxpayers.

I want to say to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance that I think we have come a long way in the past few years in clarifying income tax returns. I think it has been a progressive step. The department are simplifying them to a considerable degree and on the income tax forms they are putting a good deal of information for the purpose of assisting the one who is filing or preparing the return to complete the return with less chance of error. I wish to commend the department for that improvement.

As does the hon. member for Oxford, I feel there is still room for considerable improvement in the field of administration. I will frankly state to you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not fully aware of all the implications in reducing this to a one-year period. However, I would say this. If two years is considered good for the taxpayer on the one hand, certainly it should be considered good enough for the Department of National Revenue on the other hand.

There is just one other thing I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, and it is in connection with some of the things that annoy people. A perfectly honest person, we will say, files a return. He completes it to the very best of his ability. Some time later he is informed that he owes more money and of course he is frequently called upon to pay interest on what he owes the department. Yet the department itself can hold a taxpayer's money for quite a considerable period of time but he has no right to claim anything whatsoever by way of interest. It appears that the only safe thing for the average taxpayer to do is to overpay. Then, of course, he is caught again because, Mr. Speaker, in overpaying he runs into financial difficulties, is obliged to borrow and is up against possibly an even higher interest rate. I have said before and I say again that if the department expects me to pay interest on what I owe them, surely the least I can expect is for them to pay me some interest not on what they owe me but on the amount of money which they took from me over and above what the law of the land requires me to pay.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief remarks on this matter. First of all, I want to refer to what was said by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. He pointed out one or two technical omissions in the resolution, notably one referring to fraud, and I think that was answered. I think what we are all trying to do is to reach a reasonable solution of this matter. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that before this debate concluded we would have a somewhat detailed statement not merely from the finance department who look at the principles of taxation matters and decide them, but also from the revenue department who have the business of actually doing the work of collecting. It seems to me that this is rather a question of what is reasonable from a technical point of view rather than in any sense a matter of principle. We are none of us talking about matters of principle, except the principle of being fair. In order to know what is fair one must have a picture of the technique involved in the actual business of collecting.

In the discussion of a year ago, on June 12, 1956, the Minister of National Revenue gave us some figures indicating the way in which the work of the Department of National Revenue had been catching up with arrears of previous years. As reported at page 4959 of Hansard of 1956 he said this:

> I am very happy to say that that backlog of work has been cleaned up and we are now on a current basis. The same amount of work, or considerably more work, is now being done with 6,000 to 7,000 employees that was formerly done by 11,000 or more.

I come back to what I said a moment ago. What we are all trying to do is to find out what is reasonable or what can be reasonably expected of the department. It is for that reason that I wish we could have a more technical statement giving us a picture of the actual delays that are involved. I would hope that this resolution would not merely be voted down but that it would be taken by the government as a basis for further consideration and that there would be full explanation. If the actual proposal contained in this resolution cannot be fully accepted, then perhaps it can be partly accepted. The people who ought to be able to tell us about the matter are those who are in the day-to-day business of administering the taxes.

I do not think that I need to spend further time in speaking on the matter. I have not before me definite illustrations of the hardship which is being caused, although I think we need have no doubt that hardship is being caused.

I was particularly impressed by a remark made in the course of the debate a year ago—and I think it has been repeated again this afternoon—about the difficulty which is caused to people who find it almost impossible to keep their records in apple-pie order over the years and who, when faced with something that happened years ago, are in great embarrassment. I suppose it is also true to say that even though the amounts involved may not be large, nevertheless many people, notably farmers, have a much more difficult task in making up their income tax returns than do many of those who live in the city, particularly those who are on a salary basis or a semi-salary basis. Their problem is a piece of cake compared with the problem of the farmer. It therefore seems to me that every effort should be made to shorten the time and that the department should show itself to be co-operative in so doing.

Mr. Benidickson: This time was cut a third last year.

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes, it was. I notice that the parliamentary assistant said that it was reasonable that this system be tried out for a few years. But in answer to that proposal, I suggest it is just as reasonable or more reasonable to ask the department, who are experts in this matter, to consider carefully whether they cannot come up and say, "Yes, we can do it in less than four years. We have reviewed the situation and we are able to say that we can do it in less than four years."

That leaves one point that I want to make. It may be that certain reservations must be made. I think we have all agreed that fraud must be expected. In the case of fraud we realize that no arrangement can stand merely because it has existed over a certain number of years. Now, there may be some other qualifications. There may be a qualification which I am not able to put into apt words where new facts arise and where perhaps the matter should be opened up. I realize that is difficult to do, and I realize that may open the door very wide. Perhaps to some extent I am unintentionally torpedoing my friend's resolution when I say that, but my point is merely this. I think we might ask the department not to take an arbitrary position and say that a year ago we reduced it to four years, and we are not going to consider it any further for some years to come. My request of the department is that they take a fair look at the subject. A suggestion has been made that they should have two years just as an individual has two years.

If an argument in detail is made by the department showing that is not fair then the mover of the resolution and other people who have supported it, who are fair minded men, I am sure would be convinced. I do suggest it is fair that they should have a chance to be convinced, and when I say "a chance to be convinced", I mean there should be a reasoned and detailed argument made as to what really is the time required.

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure my hon. friend will agree, will he not, that this was examined by an estimates committee last year when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) was before that committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do not disagree with that, but after all this government wants us to believe that year by year they are getting bigger, better and brighter. I am sure they would say they had learned a lot in the last year.

Mr. J. W. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has just said he had no definite illustration of unfairness. I should like to bring to the attention of the house, Mr. Speaker, a case decided by the income tax appeal board on October 29, 1956. The judgment was handed down by Mr. Fordham. The case concerned an elderly gentleman in western Ontario who had farmed all his life and who had always been fond of horses. Eventually, he acquired a horse which managed to win for several years. Later on the assessors made an examination of his books and ascertained, by the net worth method, that he had more money than they would have expected from a perusal of his income tax returns. As a consequence, they assessed him and the assessment took place over a number of years from 1947 onward.

This gentleman filed a notice of appeal, and after the notice was filed the total assessment was reduced by some $7,093. In other words, the department admitted that the original assessment was not correct. I should like to quote from some of the facts cited in Mr. Fordam's judgment.

> It may be observed at this point that in the returns for the years 1947 to 1951, inclusive, appellant mentioned having received in the United States of America "race horse purses only". No amounts were mentioned, but in the part of each return in which this acknowledgment was made there is no space provided for the showing of any amounts, in any event.

Then, later in the judgment there is this observation:

> As already observed, the appellant obediently reported in the appropriate place in each of his income tax returns for the years 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950 and 1951 that he had received race-horse purses in the United States of America, but this disclosure has availed him nothing. He might well have been asked for particulars of these purses as and when the returns were received and examined. Likely, he would then have learned, before it was too late, that the incidence of income tax rendered desirable the keeping of a careful record of all prize money received across the border. I find it rather difficult to comprehend why no attention was paid to appellant's clear reference to moneys earned by him in the neighbouring country. It is easy to see how he may have been lulled into a feeling of security in the matter when no questions were put to him by local assessors.

It has been considered for some years that race horse winnings would be capital gains. This man had reported to the department the receipt of the money and the department had done nothing about it. Then eight years later they come to him and he is assessed a great amount of money. Let us not forget this assessment was arrived at by the net worth method, and Mr. Fordham had a word to say about that:

> There is something unsatisfactory about arbitrary assessments as they are necessarily founded on estimate and conjecture to a large extent and these methods of approach leave ample room for error on the part of the computer.

Of course the computer in this case is the department. I am bringing this case to the attention of the house because although the taxpayer has reported the source of the income he was not asked to explain it nor was he told that the amount would be taxable. As Mr. Fordham points out, it certainly does not seem fair at this stage. I feel it is manifestly unfair to assess a man who is 69 years of age some eight years after he has reported income and upon which he has not been questioned in any manner whatever.

There are other instances of gross unfairness in the establishing of taxable income on the net worth basis. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we come down to the fact that the administration of the department does not dispense British justice. According to the department the taxpayer is guilty until proven innocent, but I believe that he should be innocent until proven guilty.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I am assuming, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) will be replying to some of the comments that have been made about this motion. My object in rising, chiefly, is to ask a number of questions for the purpose of clarification. Perhaps the hon. member would be kind enough to make a note of the questions because I would appreciate an explanation.

First, I want to say that if the principle of the resolution is to bring about, at some point, finality to the income tax cases of individuals then I feel that the principle is a good one. It is a cause of irritation and disturbing for people to have their income tax affairs gone over year after year without reaching a point at which they can say, I have fulfilled my obligations to the government; the case is closed. It would appear to me that the intention behind the motion is good and on that basis the motion has merit.

One thing that bothers me is, I was going to say the haziness of the motion, but I do not wish to be too hard on the mover. It appears to me there are a number of questions left unanswered. Just looking at the second last line of the motion, I find these words:

> . . . a final receipt for those whose income tax returns filed for the preceding calendar year . . .

The question that arises in my mind is this. Is that a final receipt, as is stated in the motion, for the income tax return?

If it means exactly what it says, then I am a little doubtful as to whether it really is the intention because I would imagine the hon. member means a final receipt for income tax obligations or assessments rather than the returns themselves.

Then, it goes on to say, "for the preceding calendar year". I am thinking of something of this nature. Suppose I, as an individual taxpayer, were slow in filing my income tax returns, as unfortunately many of us are at times, and suppose I filed for the calendar year 1956 in November 1957, which I do not suggest is a good example but it could happen, then, what is the purport of the resolution? Is it that I should receive a final receipt for the preceding calendar year? Surely, one would not expect to receive a final receipt for the preceding calendar year if he filed within a month or two of the next calendar year. That would be, of course, an impossible and unreasonable thing to expect. Then, if he did not receive it that year and it carried over into the next year then, of course, he would not be receiving a receipt for the preceding calendar year. This is one of the things I would like to have explained.

Then, the resolution states further, "for individuals whose income is $10,000 or less". I would like the hon. member to tell us what he means by "income of $10,000 or less". Does he mean gross income, net income or taxable income? If he means taxable income, then, of course, we understand his point, but again I would like him to explain, if he will be so good as to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: Ninety per cent would be subject to the resolution because they have incomes of less than $10,000 a year.

Mr. Zaplitny: That is a sad commentary on the so-called prosperity the Liberals talk about. I was wondering also why the limit was set at $10,000 or less? What particular reason was there for choosing $10,000?

Another question which arises is, what happens in connection with refunds? If we take the wording strictly and interpret the words "final receipt", the word "final" in all its implications would either prevent or interfere with the individual's claim for refunds for overpayments or overassessments. These are some of the questions I should like to have clarified. Again, I wish to say that if the intention or the principle of the motion is that as quickly as possible after the returns have been filed the case should be brought to a point of finality, then I feel the motion has merit, but as it stands now there are some grave doubts in my mind as to what is exactly meant by the motion itself and I hope the hon. member will be kind enough to give us an explanation.

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, there can be no question that, in accordance with the established principles of British justice, a sword should not be permitted to hang over the heads of our people. That is exactly the situation with regard to the very long period of time during which an assessment can be made against any citizen in Canada in regard to his income tax.

I have had some experience in police work over the years and I have some knowledge of the methods by which investigations are carried out. The criterion of success of any investigator in the income tax branch is usually the amount of money he can bring in or the assessments he can increase.

Another point I should like to bring out—and I am in a position to prove it, preferably privately—is that political influence plays a very great part in the establishment of assessments in regard to income tax.

Mr. Weir: You are wrong there.

Mr. Van Horne: I happen to know. Last year a question was asked of the Minister of National Revenue in connection with the number of investigations that were being made and the minister replied that he could not find investigators to do the work. I know one investigator who took the trouble to come all the way up to Ottawa to see me for the sole purpose of telling me that he had to leave as an investigator in the income tax branch because he no sooner got an assessment or a big amount of money lined up and was prepared to bring the assessment to court or to implement a charge in court than he would be instructed by Ottawa to forget the whole thing and leave the person alone. He decided that he had better quit before he got involved in some shady deal. He was forced to do it because of government orders coming from Ottawa, shady deals being carried out by the members of the government.

Mr. Benidickson: Will my hon. friend name that gentleman?

Mr. Van Horne: I said I would do it preferably privately.

Mr. Benidickson: All right.

Mr. Van Horne: Principles of justice demand that the citizens of a free land be given greater consideration than they are given at the present time in regard to income tax assessments.

There is nothing in the resolution now before us to deprive a citizen of his right to appeal, or to prevent a citizen from taking advantage of the safeguards that exist in the law at the present time. The whole idea is to make our people free. After a certain period of time they can look back and say, "Well, we are clear of the income tax branch. They have had so many months in which to investigate us; they have not done so and therefore we are now free". It is indeed a pleasure to add my word of approval to the resolution.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house nearly as long as most hon. members have and perhaps there has been the odd occasion when people have come to me with income tax problems. Standing here in my place today I want to say that I deny emphatically the charge made by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. From my experience I wish to say that if he thinks that political influence is used in settling income tax problems and things of that kind, then I deny it and say that he is completely wrong.

Mr. Van Horne: I can prove I am right and I will.

Mr. Weir: He says that political influence is used. I deny that. From any experience that I have ever had, and in any discussions that I have ever had with anyone, I say that the income tax officials are honest, but maybe not always with the best discretion in carrying out their duties, but I deny the charge that political influence is exercised in respect of the settlement of income tax claims.

Mr. Van Horne: You have no means of knowing.

Mr. Benidickson: The member speaking has been here longer than most members.

Mr. Weir: The object of this resolution is to reduce the time in which the final settlement of income tax claims may be made. As the parliamentary assistant pointed out in discussing this matter, steps to that end were taken a year ago when the period allowed for review of a return was reduced from six years to four years. I think all of us would like to see the period reduced even further but, having regard to the fact that that step was taken a year ago, one naturally would feel that there is some ground for saying that there should be a little further time to gain added experience under the new regulation.

I am perfectly aware of what is said about the payment of income tax. Nobody likes to pay income tax and certainly no one relishes having his income tax affairs too closely probed. I think we are all conscious of that. My approach to this resolution this afternoon is from a somewhat different angle, and if I am regarded as being critical in this connection, well, it is just too bad. I am bound to say that I think the public relations of the Department of National Revenue could be greatly improved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Weir: I think the department could well afford to launch a campaign indicating a greater willingness on their part—they claim they already do this but I think they could indicate a greater sense of willingness —to assist the taxpayer and make him conscious of an obligation to the state rather than what might be described as a sense of fear for those people who exercise a considerable measure of authority in the matter of income tax.

An hon. Member: Make sure the minister hears this.

Mr. Weir: Having said that, I would point out I am perfectly conscious of the fact that wage earners do not have much leeway inasmuch as their income tax is deducted at source and their position is different from that of the small businessman who sometimes is not able to hire the most qualified bookkeepers and accountants and therefore has to deal with a problem of considerable importance; but I am thinking more particularly of the farmer who is confronted with the problem of having to make out an income tax return that completely meets the requirements of the act and the regulations thereunder without perhaps there being any leeway to question certain items. Concerning the matter of keeping records and books, I think some progress has been made and even the problem of the farmer is being worked out in a more satisfactory manner than was the case a while ago, but nonetheless the farmer is in a peculiar situation which is admittedly difficult. I return to the matter of the desirability of having the income tax people demonstrate in some manner to the public that they are friends of the taxpayer rather than being viewed with fear or as something to be avoided.

The final comment I wish to make relates to cases where there is a suspicion of wrongdoing or fraud and steps are taken to carry out an investigation. Unfortunately I have heard of cases where the investigation has extended over a considerable period of time which I think any reasonable person would consider an unreasonable length of time. While there may be many outstanding difficulties and perplexing ramifications involved in some of these cases, I think a hardship is worked upon a businessman who has all the responsibility of running a business, paying his bills and collecting from customers when his books and records are taken from him and kept by the department for many months in some cases. I think this is too severe a penalty to impose on a man despite the fact that he may be suspected of fraud or misrepresentation. Although it may mean more expense for the department, I think there is much to be said for either having a photostatic copy made of the books and records or expediting the investigation so that the documents are returned within a shorter period of time in order that the businessman may conduct his business in the ordinary way.

I do not think I would have risen to speak on this occasion if it were not for what I consider the totally unfounded remarks made by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne) which I believe are completely false.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. You would not thank me if I gave you the name of the person who exerted that influence and succeeded in getting his income tax reduced from $286,000—

An hon. Member: Get a soap box.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. The hon. member is not rising on a question of privilege but is continuing a point of debate.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He doesn't know what a question of privilege is.

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I too was not going to speak in this particular debate except to make a few comments. I do not have the experience as a politician that the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) has, but I have a certain training in law and one thing I learned in my training in the law is that if a man is accused of something one of the indications of his guilt is his immediate denial of the accusation.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You must be a very good lawyer, one of the best in Ontario. That is some philosophy.

Mr. Pallett: Concerning the resolution before the house the question arises as to whether we feel that certain work can be carried out by departmental officials. I recall when the estimates of the department with which the resolution before us deals were before the estimates committee last year the departmental officials were careful to point out that the backlog of work was caught up and they were now in a position to deal with the returns on a current basis. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution submitted today merely accepts the representation of the department and puts their word to the test.

We all know that, when we pay our ordinary bills and receive a receipt from the person to whom the account is paid, the account is considered closed. It would seem to me that the law applying to individuals in this country should also apply to the government of the country. When we legislate for the individual we should say that the government are also bound by the same terms.

It was also pointed out in the estimates committee last year that the assessors of the Department of National Revenue bear no responsibility for advising a taxpayer if he has made a mistake in failing to claim certain exemptions. The officials of the department check the returns for mathematical errors to ascertain that the taxpayer has paid everything that is due to the department but they do not feel bound to advise him if he has failed to claim deductions to which he might be fully entitled. Again this is a principle which does not apply to the ordinary individual. If through an error you overpay a person the law prescribes that you are entitled to receive back the amount you overpaid, but apparently that same law does not apply to the income tax department. If you overpay the department through an error they feel under no obligation to advise you as to the amount of overpayment and it is not remitted to you.

I completely support this resolution and I add my remarks to those of the hon. member who said that the parliamentary assistant's representations today do not speak very well for the other Liberal propaganda concerning the high standard of living which this country is enjoying. In the figures concerning the number of taxable returns submitted by the parliamentary assistant there was an admission of the very high percentage of people who do not make sufficient money to actually qualify as taxpayers. In other words they are not making the minimum amount of money which has been established as the basis below which you are not making enough to properly exist and should therefore not be called upon to pay income tax. The figures used by the parliamentary assistant in support of his department could be used equally well as a direct denial of the propaganda which the government has been spreading for the last few years concerning how well off everyone is in this country. The parliamentary assistant also admitted today that those earning $10,000 or less constitute 90 per cent of the Canadian people.

Ten per cent of the people of the country are making most of the money. According to the parliamentary assistant it would appear that the policy of the government is to permit the wealth of the country to be controlled by 10 per cent of the people. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is smiling.

Mr. Garson: I would challenge the hon. member to support his statement of fact with any statistics that will bear examination.

Mr. Pallett: One thing I have learned in this house is that statistics work both ways and no one is so adept at using them as the Minister of Justice. I suggest that the minister look after his own department; I suggest that he see to getting out certain reports that are needed and certain findings by commission that have been asked for by the people. The minister should confine himself to matters concerning his own department.

Mr. Garson: Has my hon. friend any support or foundation for this allegation of fact other than some figment of his own imagination?

Mr. Pallett: It has always been my contention that good government depends upon imagination. If I have imagination I am very proud of it. Statistics are available from a department run by another minister, by a minister who runs practically every department. If the Minister of Justice wants these figures all he has to do is to ask the dominion bureau of statistics for them. They are available and will show that the policies of this government permit the wealth of this country to be controlled by a very limited segment of the population.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I think if there is anyone at fault at the moment it is the occupant of the Speaker's chair. I have permitted the hon. member to complete the point he was making but I think the time has come when I should point out to the house that what we are discussing is whether or not there is to be a time limit on the issuance of official receipts under the Income Tax Act. This is a rather narrow subject which has resulted in incidental discussion of other matters under the Income Tax Act, which I believe it was the desire of the house should be discussed under this resolution. However, I am afraid that the discussion of broad policies concerning the proportion of the population who are or who are not paying income tax is a little beyond the scope of this resolution.

I heard the interjection by the parliamentary assistant that this $10,000 figure mentioned in the resolution would apply to some 90 per cent of the taxpayers. That statement was made, but I think we would be going beyond the purport of the resolution if we were to discuss why or why not 90 per cent of the people were paying taxes and 10 per cent were not, or vice versa. What we are discussing is whether or not there should be a time limit on the issuing of finalized receipts for individuals.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, I welcome your bringing the debate back to a proper basis, bearing in mind the interruption by the Minister of Justice. In conclusion, may I say that a resolution of this sort providing for the issuing of a receipt after one year deserves the earnest consideration of this house and of the government. According to the government's own admission last year before the estimates committee, the work of the department is current and I think this resolution should be supported by all hon. members.

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take up very much time. I was beginning to feel that we were getting a long way from what was intended by the mover of the resolution. Sometimes when you get off the track it results in some of the statements that are made being given a wrong interpretation. I am prepared to support this resolution in the terms in which it appears on the order paper.

I think the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) put his finger on a very important point when he referred to public relations. I doubt if any hon. members can go beyond their own constituencies in speaking of a matter of this kind; I know I cannot. My experience has been that most people are honest and do not mind paying a fair amount of taxes. The complaints that come to me mostly concern people who have made their returns and who feel that things have therefore been wound up. Actually there is no limit on the winding up of these tax matters.

An amendment was approved last year reducing the period from six to four years, but that does not mean very much. Rightly or wrongly it happens quite often that an assessor will come along to a farmer and the minute he announces himself—most of these people are honest—the farmer wonders why he has come to see him and he gets excited. We all know that bad propaganda spreads very fast, and while I admit that this does not happen in all cases there have been cases where people have thought a settlement had been reached but after two or three years the matter is opened up again. In my constituency the assessors have done a fairly reasonably good job, but these matters do create unsatisfactory feelings. It makes the people begin to think that they are all crooks.

Some income tax officials will bend over backwards in order to try to help straighten out matters when approached in the right way, but they cannot go beyond the law and the regulations. When a person disagrees with an assessment made by a tax assessor his only course is to appeal. I am told that in many cases relief is given, but there are many appeals on the agenda. In order to start an appeal a man must put up security and then he has to wait anywhere from one to two or three years before his case is heard because there is such a backlog of appeals to be heard. When the amount involved is only $500 or $1,000 a man may feel that he just cannot afford to appeal his case. He has to have accountants. And, Mr. Speaker, there are many little transactions among farmers which should never be taken into consideration; they do not amount to a hill of beans. However, once the department gets interested in a case it seems to pile up these little things to an extent that amazes the farmer. The farmer becomes excited; he "gets mad" and immediately suspects the department of "trying to do him." The quickest and easiest way of getting out of the problem is the course he will take, and I am satisfied that a good many people who have to pay $300, or $500 or maybe $1,000 would not have to pay at all if they could get their case to an appeal board within a reasonable time and at a reasonable expense.

That is the way I feel about it and for that reason I consider that this resolution will serve a very useful purpose if it enables the government to consider and reconsider some of these matters. I note that the effect of this resolution is limited to those whose incomes do not exceed $10,000, and I feel that this being the case the government would probably not lose much money anyway, even supposing there were to be some mistakes. The parliamentary assistant to the minister has led us to believe that this taxpaying group is the largest in the country, and if this is so I believe it is time more information was made available regarding it. The figure of $10,000 is, maybe, too high a figure to have specified; it would be interesting to have the views of the department upon a possible alternative figure. But I do think there is a class of people who should be given a final receipt at the end of two years—

Mr. Benidickson: Two years, did you say?

Mr. Montgomery: Yes, two years from the time the income was earned.

Mr. Benidickson: The filing might be in April, and that means just eight months.

Mr. Montgomery: You are presumed to file when the law says you must file. If you are late you have to pay a penalty.

The point I am making is this: There is no final receipt at this moment. At the end of three years there is no final receipt. The department can re-open a case at any time if they wish, and all they have to say is: "We believe you have kept back information; you have treated us fraudulently."

Mr. Benidickson: The crown must prove in court there is fraud.

Mr. Montgomery: Yes, but the department need not lay the charge as fraud and prove it; they need only allege it, and allege they can prove it. In their own minds they might be satisfied they could do so, but actually they do not prove it before they re-open a case.

These are matters which it is very proper to bring before the house and the government for consideration, because I believe there is a lot of misunderstanding about the whole question in the country.

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): When I read this resolution over, Mr. Speaker, I was in very much the position of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny)—I felt I would like some clarification of what period really is meant. I note that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) does not agree with the impression of the mover of this resolution; also, the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Montgomery) has indicated his interpretation of this as meaning "two years". From my own point of view I can understand that there may be some confusion as to the real essence of what is contained in this motion.

One other thing. I think this motion, if it were accepted, would create two classes of taxpayers in Canada. The motion as now worded affects those whose income amounts to $10,000 a year or less. In the 1954 taxation statistics it was shown there were 3,125,100 individual taxpayers; there were fewer than 60,000 taxpayers whose annual income exceeded $10,000. Now, if it were possible for the mover of this motion to accept the suggestion of his colleague from Greenwood that the time limit be extended to two years—and certainly there has been evidence on the part of the government of willingness to close the gap, because only last year it was brought down from six years to four years—some progress might be made. As we note, there is not quite complete agreement at the present time between the mover of the resolution, on the one hand, and the hon. member for Greenwood on the other, and I think we might almost indicate that all individual taxpayers be included in this resolution, in which case we would not be making any distinction.

I have read this resolution over with a great deal of concern because the mover of this resolution is within the same tax office as I am myself. Two or three things were said here this afternoon which I think cast a reflection on all income tax offices. The words "reaching out to control private lives" were used; the words "fill their pockets" were also used. I hope that at no time I will ever be accused of trying to use catch phrases that will leave an aspersion upon those people who are engaged to do a type of job which is not, I am sure, the easiest work to do.

One other thing. The mover of this motion was reading a number of supporting resolutions from different counties, but I note that he did not mention the county from which I come. I do not know whether they did not support this resolution of a year ago. However, I am of the opinion that something needs to be done, because only this weekend I had a taxpayer at my home whose case is being investigated back to 1942. It is almost impossible for this individual to get all the receipts that are necessary if he is to prove his case. The original assessment was for some $28,000 but after he was able to establish a certain number of receipts, a second assessment of $22,000 was made. Then, after a great deal of effort he secured more receipts, and the third assessment was for $10,000 plus about $3,600 in penalties. During all this time he had been employing an accountant, and I can readily understand why he engaged an accountant after hearing the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) that lawyers were not very good on this type of case. But this has proved an expensive procedure for this taxpayer to have to follow, and the money he has to pay in defending his case is money that cannot be charged as an expense. While I agree, Mr. Speaker, that this may be departing from the subject a little, I think this is one question which should possibly be considered when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is reviewing the tax structure.

So, Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to indicate my interest in this resolution as brought forward by the hon. member for Middlesex East.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, there is just one point I would like to emphasize—the point made by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) when he said that the Income Tax Department could have much better public relations than it has, and that they should be considered as more friendly to the people whose affairs they have to investigate than they are. I had a personal experience. I may say that I have no personal axe to grind with the income tax department. This happened in 1947. One week end when I arrived home I found a form letter addressed to me and stating that I owed the income tax department a considerable sum of money for the previous year's taxes. Mr. Speaker, if I had had a weak heart at that time, I would not be here to tell you about the matter. I can tell you that I nearly fell through the floor. I did not know where I could dig up this money. I felt that there had been an error but I was not too sure. The accountant who looked after my affairs was away for the week end and I was forced to decide to let the matter go until the next week end. I may say that the department gave me only a few days in which to pay up, or else. However, when I arrived home next week end, I found a letter from the income tax department stating that they were sorry, that they had made a mistake, that they had found my cheque in their files and just to ignore their letter of such and such a date.

Mr. Speaker, I do not object to mistakes. We all make them. But this was merely a sort of slaphappy way of making an apology for a mistake that was made by them. Some person should really have come out to see me personally and to apologize for this mistake. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if I had had a weak heart, as I said before, I would have dropped right there and that is just one instance. From some of the gestapo methods that are being employed today in some parts of the country, I know that is just what should happen. The public relations in connection with income tax should certainly be improved in no uncertain way.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before the debate closes I want to make just one statement. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) has already spoken on this matter and he stated the position of this group. We are going to vote for the resolution but we do so with some little reservation in that we feel that perhaps one year is not quite long enough to allow before the final and complete receipt is given. With that exception we are going to vote for the resolution. We believe that the resolution is a proper one in principle. There may be some of the details of administration that are not too practical but with that one exception we are going to vote for the resolution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Middlesex East speaks now he will conclude the debate.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank all hon. members who have taken part in the debate for the contributions they have made. I also wish to thank the parliamentary assistant for his explanation of the problems with which the department are faced. I think the debate has been a fruitful one. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) asked some questions and I shall attempt to answer them. The objective I had in mind was to bring about some finality at some date in order that the taxpayer will know that his obligation to the state has been paid and that he has a receipt to show it. In the resolution I am not asking that a receipt be given for income tax returns supplied to the department but rather, as I say, a receipt showing that whatever he may owe the state has been paid in full. The taxpayer wants an acknowledgment so that he knows that it has been paid in full.

There was some question as to the time and date. What I had in mind was this. For the year 1956 the returns are supposed to be in the hands of the department by this coming April 30. Twelve months from that 30th day of April something final should be arrived at. I appreciate what other members have had to say and what the parliamentary assistant had to say. In introducing the resolution what I had in mind was that we impress upon the government the need for some finality and the need to avoid going over a long period of years—six years or seven years, as the case may be—before the department has reviewed those returns.

Mr. Benidickson: The time was reduced last year from six years to four years.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Oh, that is not quite the case exactly. While it may seem to the taxpayer that this reduction is going to answer all his questions, he has not any receipt as to any finality. Consequently, while it is welcome, it is not complete. Hence I say that 12 months from the 30th day of April I would hope that the department would have arrived at some conclusion and that the account could be settled. I greatly appreciate the suggestion of the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, (Mr. Huffman) that a two-year limit might be acceptable. As I said, my intention was to bring to the attention of the government the problems confronting individual taxpayers. Again, the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, suggested that this include all individual returns except corporations, companies and so on. As I mentioned previously, the government income tax department draw a line between those who are inside $3,000, $4,000 and $5,000. Consequently I felt that somewhere a line could be drawn. It does not matter where you draw the line, there are those who are just inside and those who are just outside.

Then the hon. member for Dauphin inquired as to the exact meaning. I mean taxable income and I think the vast majority of hon. members rather understood that was what I had in mind.

I appreciate what the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) had to say.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: You are now saying that the $10,000 figure meant $10,000 of taxable income?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Taxable income.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, it would involve a lesser number of people than I indicated to the house when I said that 90 per cent of the taxpayers would be exempt from any further concern on their part from the investigating authorities after the end of the calendar year.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That puts another light on the subject. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance indicated that would take in 90 per cent of the taxpayers. If we put it at taxable income of $10,000, he says it is going to take in a great many more.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. You are overlooking the personal exemptions.

An hon. Member: That is all right.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I will let it go at that, then. Previously I did not have time in which to go into the taxation statistics for the year 1956 but I am going to take a moment or two now to do so. According to the report of 1956—that would be for the 1955 taxation year—I find that some 3,341,490 people in Canada had incomes under $10,000. I said also that the income tax department employed something over 6,000 people. I find that means there was one employee for every 500 taxpayers. It does not appear to me as though the problem would be insurmountable.

Coming back to what the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa had to say about public relations, I may say that we have municipal tax collectors and I have never heard of a case of animosity towards municipal tax collectors in which the affairs of the taxpayer had been handled in such a manner that any blame was attached to them. However, such is not the case in the income tax department. I think the hon. member made a very good suggestion. Probably the department will recognize it and take steps to correct the matter.

Mention was made by the parliamentary assistant that probably I represent a rural constituency. It is true that in years gone by Middlesex East was a rural constituency, but today approximately five out of six people are residents in the city of London. This is the bundle of letters I have received in the last year or year and a half and with the exception of about 10 they are all from business and professional people. Farmers are not inclined to write letters. They will come to see you, but they do not put their troubles in writing. Business and professional people are used to writing letters and consequently one receives more from them.

This motion may be defeated in the house, Mr. Speaker, but I feel certain from the nature of the discussion on both sides that the presentation of it will have a good effect. I believe I have answered all the questions that were asked and I hope those who feel there is some merit in the motion will support it.

EDUCATION

EQUALIZING OF OPPORTUNITY—ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of taking steps to relieve the financial crisis in education, without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I bring forward this resolution, and the house no doubt knows that it is not for the first time. I regret very much that there may not be the time before the house rises tonight to give the matter a thorough discussion, but such time as there is we can profitably spend on it. I bring the resolution forward not for political reasons, not with any geographical bias, but simply because I believe the implementation of this resolution would be a good thing for the children of Canada.

When I refer to the children of Canada may I say, although it may be used against me at a later date—that is immaterial to me—that I am no more concerned with the interests of the children of my own province of Saskatchewan than I am with the interests of the children of Nova Scotia, Quebec, Manitoba or any other Canadian province. The resolution has as its object the establishment of some degree of equalization of educational opportunity for all Canadian children.

Such equality of opportunity is surely the birthright of every Canadian child. The present state of inequality of opportunity in education across Canada is due simply to the lack of adequate finances and the differences in the ability of the various provinces to assist education from their own resources; therefore the resolution suggests that the federal government should financially support the provinces in such educational efforts as they are now putting forth or which they might decide to inaugurate. The program of education, the subjects taught and the administration of the educational assistance must lie in the hands of the provinces themselves; with that I am in complete agreement. For that reason I have been careful to write into the resolution the following words:

. . . without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field.

In opposing this resolution in former times when it was discussed the question of such aid not being constitutional was the only argument the government was able or found expedient to produce. Usually early in the debate the government put up a cabinet minister, a sort of government hatchet man, who had the double function of using one end of the hatchet, perhaps the blade end, on the content of the resolution itself, while the handle served as a kind of pointer which enabled the backbenchers on the Liberal side to know in which direction they must go.

I think on one occasion the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) led the brigade, in spite of the fact that the premier of his own Liberal province of Manitoba has frequently asked for federal aid for education. On another occasion the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) led the Liberal troops into battle, in spite of the fact that at the very time which he launched his attack the educational expenditure per child in his own province of Newfoundland was $86 as compared with $292 in the province of the minister who sits beside him, British Columbia.

The aforesaid members of the government have faithfully followed the line set by the cabinet ministers, though to my personal knowledge they have followed with increasing reluctance as the years have gone by. One can understand what pressures must be placed on those members who oppose this resolution, particularly in some of the more needy provinces. I am thinking particularly of the maritimes, for I cannot understand how any member representing a constituency in one of the Atlantic provinces could be conscientiously opposed to this particular resolution. However, as I said in a speech the other day, I think we are making progress.

When I came to this house 12 years ago and raised this question of federal aid to education there was a polite, or perhaps not so polite, raising of eyebrows. "What?" they said. "Do we mention education in the federal parliament? This is solely a matter of provincial jurisdiction". But we in this house have come to accept federal grants to various forms of education. We have accepted, and gratefully as far as I am concerned, federal grants for technical education, vocational education, grants to universities, and the very successful D.V.A. plan upon which I compliment the government. Can anyone say conscientiously that the acceptance of those particular grants has in any way involved federal control, or has in any way interfered with the jurisdiction of the provinces in the matter of education?

And what of the present? The people of the United States have a special day or week devoted to practically every subject you can name, and I suppose we tend to imitate them. I know there is such a thing as an education week, and I am going to suggest that in this House of Commons we have had "education week" during the past week at the end of which I speak. Not only do we have the grants I have mentioned, but we have had foreshadowed legislation which is to increase grants for technical education and vocational education, increased grants to universities, the setting up of a Canada Council which is to administer some of those grants and to promote increased expenditures in the arts and sciences, and to administer increased scholarships with emphasis upon the humanities.

What a change has taken place over the years I have been in this house. Those who have conscientiously and persistently advocated these changes might like to take unto themselves some credit for the fact that we have made some advances in this field, but I would suggest that although perhaps we have had some success in popularizing and publicizing the need for federal aid to education, it has been hard economic facts which have in large part produced the change. There is the dilemma in which the municipalities find themselves, the increasing difficulty they experience in carrying on adequate educational services. I think they feel almost unanimously that the basis for taxation for the purposes of education must be broadened in some way or other. No longer can it be put on the uncertain basis of real estate in the local field, as it has been in the past, with the assistance of the provinces which in many cases have not been able to give assistance in full measure. Speaking nationally, there is the growing national consciousness that other nations, some of them opposed to us ideologically, have been forging ahead in these matters while we have been indulging in the niceties of constitutional argument.

I have been encouraged by what I detect as a change in attitude in this house. I have reason to congratulate the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). I cannot quote his speech because it was made in another debate, but since it was similar in subject to the present debate I think I can at least refer to it. He was even vociferous in his acceptance of increased grants for technical and vocational training. Those things having been settled, he then turned to the problem in the lower schools and said there was a gap left that must be filled. He did not suggest it had to be filled by federal funds—he has to remember his position—but having made the proper genuflection to the constitution he proceeded to say what this gap was, and it was the need for assistance to secondary and primary schools in his particular district.

What was the solution he offered? I might almost have put the words into his mouth. The solution he offered was that the provinces would have to be urged to give education a great share of the grants which they receive from the federal government.

After all, is that not largely what I have been advocating in this house for years? The hon. member felt, as did another Liberal hon. member, that this should be handled in a delicate way. I appreciate the need on his part for such delicate handling.

I also wish to offer my congratulations to another hon. member of this house who made a very useful and eloquent speech. I realize that he was talking about university grants, another field of education, but he supported the same general principles. He said that every Canadian, no matter what his background or province or racial origin, should benefit equally in the field of education and other fields. He said that was the aim of the government to which he pays allegiance in the making of such grants. He said also that the sooner we placed educational facilities within reach of a greater number of young Canadians, the better it would be for the whole country.

As I said, that might have been an echo of my own voice. In his eloquent speech this member, the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau) said he was in warm support of the type of education we were discussing at that time. The hon. member did bring in the constitutional angle and said he would be loath to do anything that was against the constitution. I wish he would rise today and in that same eloquent way support the resolution I have moved. If he did so he would find himself in good company. In a speech such as I am about to make I cannot bring in too much documentation. I have files a foot thick containing everything that everybody has said with regard to this subject over the last dozen years. I have resolutions which have been passed by the Canadian school trustees' association, the Canadian teachers' federation, boards of trade, Legion branches, town councils and, as recently as the last two or three days, the Canadian Labour Congress. The Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour presented a brief to the government the other day in favour of university grants.

There are those who would argue that such grants are unconstitutional in terms of the British North America Act. Mr. Picard, the president of that organization, made no bones about his position on these grants. Last Friday evening he was interviewed as part of a news broadcast, and said that in his opinion anyone who was against these university grants would be against old age pensions and family allowances. I have made this same statement in regard to the matter I am talking about today. It would seem that perhaps my case is making some progress.

I have also asked, what about health? I do not think the word "health" is mentioned in the British North America Act; the Minister of Justice can correct me if I am wrong. However, we have grants in aid of health education. We have grants to assist the provinces in the building of hospitals. I do not think anyone has ever raised any question as to their constitutionality. There are other reasons, I suppose.

There is one organization which has made a special contribution to the cause of education, the Canadian school trustees' association. Naturally we would expect that that would be so. I believe it was in 1953 that this association formed a research committee to look into the whole subject of education financing in Canada. This is the book to which I had reference, and I would recommend its reading to any hon. member who is interested at all in this problem. It is entitled "School Finance in Canada" and was published in 1955. It is the report of the Canadian school trustees' association school finance research committee. The man responsible for the organization of this work was Dr. M. E. LaZerte, who is well known to educationists across this country.

When the Canadian school trustees' association had completed this book and had arrived at certain conclusions in regard to the whole matter they decided to interview the cabinet, particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in order to plead their case. Whatever his reasons may have been, whether political or constitutional, I think it was unfortunate that the Prime Minister should have refused to receive those gentlemen who came to see him on that particular occasion. Let us give the Prime Minister credit for being honest when he said that since he considered this matter was not within the purview of the federal government he had to refuse to see the representatives of this influential and widespread organization. I think in more than one way that action was a mistake. That is a serious charge for me to bring, so perhaps I had better document it. I have here an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 24, 1956, reading as follows:

In a recently prepared brief, the Canadian school trustees' association thanked Canada's Prime Minister and cabinet for granting an interview. But the trustees were too optimistic. They had to add a postscript: "Unfortunately the Prime Minister refused to hear the delegation". On parliament hill, it seems, scant recognition is given to any national interest in the well-being of the provincial school systems.

Yet this brief presents powerful arguments for federal aid to education—arguments that cannot be ignored.

May I interject to say that I intend to let this editorial make my argument for me at the moment.

It points out that the kind and quality of education provided in the provinces are of direct concern to Canada's civil service and its armed forces, its economic development and its trade. It states that tens of thousands of teachers have very little academic or professional training, and declares that "without federal assistance it is impossible to staff the schools of all provinces with adequately trained teachers." For the next ten years, about $200 million annually will have to be spent on new schools and renovations. The trustees contend that revenues—federal revenues—from income and corporation taxes, sales taxes and customs duties, should pay part of the cost.

The trustees' brief quotes Dr. Garnet Page, general manager of the chemical institute of Canada—

He is not the first businessman who has given this warning.

—as warning that as a matter of survival Canada must train more mathematics and science teachers and produce more scientists and technicians. It quotes pleas for federal aid from the Canadian teachers' federation, the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, a royal commission on New Brunswick's schools and the premier of Manitoba, and it adds its own plea.

It is hardly possible to maintain that these representations are not of national concern. If parliament should decide that it ought to give greater aid to education—on the basis, incidentally, of ample precedents like existing vocational training assistance and research scholarships—it could surely find means that would involve no interference with provincial control of the schools.

I shall proceed in my own words from here. I did mention this book "School Finance in Canada" put out by the Canadian school trustees' association, and I would like to have the permission of the house to put on the record in the form of four columns a sample of the type of research that has been done there. What I have brought down here are four tables, showing respectively the cost of primary and secondary education per pupil in each province; persons teaching without professional training; the percentage of enrolled grade 7 students reaching grade 11, and the percentage of population aged 15 to 19 not attending any school. That is not the way in which this was drawn up originally, but I have chosen these columns as a sample of the work which was carried out.

If you, sir, could secure me the permission of the house to have these placed on the record—

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman leave to have these tables printed in Hansard, and to dispense with his reading of them?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knight: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The tables are as follows:

If we are to have and retain good teachers we shall have to pay them. That goes without saying. I imagine that hon. members of this house take a good deal of care with regard to the qualifications of the doctors who deal with the bodies of their children, but they are not quite so alert to the necessity of qualification among those who cater to the children's minds. Let me say, too, that in this field, we get very much what we pay for; I think there is a close cost-quality relationship, if I may use that term, in education just as in other things. Oh, I know there are those faithful souls who for the love of the work and the love of the community work for nothing or next to nothing, but generally speaking this is not the case. I am talking particularly about male teachers, and I think it is important that there should be more male teachers. I do not want to discuss the psychological reasons behind that statement, but I think boys of a certain age probably need men teachers. But you cannot get men teachers who are prepared to deny themselves their own right to live in decency, to bring up a family and provide in turn for the education of their own children.

The supply of teachers is not keeping pace with the increase in child population. High school teachers are almost impossible to obtain. I know district after district which at the present time is using inferior teachers, men or women not qualified to teach high school at all, because no others are obtainable. The people who live near such schools are waking up at last. I think most people in Canada have begun to show an increased concern about this problem. They know that increasing thousands of children of both public and high school ages are crowding the school doors, and they know we have not the facilities to accommodate them. Let us face that fact. And this crowding will increase progressively over the years. We have a scientific deduction, if such a thing is possible, made in this very book as to what the school population will be in the future; there is an estimated increase, over 1952, of 70 per cent in primary schools and 75 per cent in secondary schools by the year 1965. No one can tell me that the facilities we have now will be adequate to provide the number of places necessary to accommodate and educate this growing stream of young people. They are asking us for bread; we cannot give them a stone.

I wonder if it would disturb the constitution too much if the federal government were to assume some of the capital cost of schools, where the need exists, in the same way they do with regard to hospitals. They do it for hospitals; why not for schools? I admit that health is perhaps more important than education because, after all, one has to be alive; but after that I think we could do with a little education.

In most of the provinces, of course, the answer I am going to get from my hon. friends is, "What about the provinces who have sole jurisdiction over education? What are they doing?" Well, they are doing their best. Sometimes their best is not sufficient, as many members of this house very well know. The provinces have increased their grants, and I am glad to see that my own province of Saskatchewan, also the province of Quebec, have increased their grants substantially. However, many of the provinces have reached the limit of the taxes they can raise on property. In my own province—and let me emphasize again that I am not pleading for my own province, or for my own province only, but for the children of Canada—school tax arrears jumped from $5 million at the end of 1953 to $10 million at the end of 1955. These are tax arrears. The municipalities and provinces have reached the end of their resources, and only the federal government is left to come to our aid. The public of Canada would, I am quite sure, support this plea I am making for the granting of federal money for education, so long as no interference with provincial responsibilities was implied.

The last sentence contains the key to the whole situation. When will my hon. friends realize that nobody in the world, as far as I know, has any designs to interfere in the control of education? What is taught, how it is taught, where it is taught or anything else of that kind lies within the jurisdiction of the province; all we want to do is support the hands of those people within the provinces who are trying to educate these children. That is all we want to do, and it is entirely a financial problem; administration and curricula are entirely provincial responsibilities and long may they so remain.

To strengthen my argument I could have quoted educationists on this occasion. I have quoted dozens of them on previous occasions, and no notice was taken; their words have been ignored. Thus, for today, I have chosen someone who, although a scholar, may, through the fact that he is a businessman and a successful one, appeal more to some of my hon. friends. I said, "to some". Speaking of teachers and professions, he says this:

> We are failing to give a reward consistent with either equity of incentive and we are therefore endangering the future welfare of our whole economy.

That is the end of the first quotation. The gentleman I refer to, and from whom I have quoted, is Mr. James Muir, chairman and president of the Royal Bank of Canada. He also said, and I quote from the Montreal Gazette of January 11:

> Our duty as citizens is not to direct educational policy, but to ensure that our educational system is provided with the financial tools to do the job which, in the next ten years or so, it will be called upon to do.

May the government rise to that challenge. With those words, sir, I think I shall conclude.

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty to oppose this resolution by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) for the following reasons. The present government proposes to create a fund of $100 million to help universities in this country, and to provide $60 million yearly in subsidies to the same universities. This step represents considerable progress, and I do not think it would be wise at this time, financially speaking, to go further than that.

The second reason is this. By way of new fiscal agreements with the provinces the federal government will increase its payments to these provinces by an amount of about $127 million a year for five years. The provinces which feel the need of increasing their grants to their educational system may do so with the money provided by the new fiscal agreement.

In the third place, the resolution that is actually before the house would provide grants to the provinces for the purpose of expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada. This means that some conditions should be attached to these grants.

I may say the fourth reason is this, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that some provinces actually challenge the right of the federal government to take money from the general fund in order to provide help in education. It is true that actually the federal government proposes to help universities but I submit that this help is given for culture and not for education. I do not think it would be wise to go further than that and invade the field of education that is represented in primary and secondary levels. Besides that, I believe this resolution infringes on the legislation the government is proposing to bring in this year in the field of culture. For all those reasons I believe it is our duty to oppose it.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, this resolution which is now before the house has been discussed on various occasions in the past, and I do not propose to take much of the time of the house at this particular moment. I think the hon. member for Saskatoon is to be commended for having brought this matter to the attention of the house on the various occasions on which he has done so, and for the forceful arguments he has advanced in support of the resolution.

I know of one general attack which can be made on this resolution. It is one which was made last year by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who was the hon. gentleman who replied to the hon. member for Saskatoon. I happen to have been sitting here at the time. I remember the debate. He discussed the provincial autonomy problem with respect to education in the Dominion of Canada. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that an argument could be made with respect to provincial autonomy.

Speaking for myself and for all members of the party to which I belong, may I say this. If we believed that the implementation of this resolution would result in an infringement of provincial autonomy in the field of education, then certainly neither I nor any of the hon. members associated with me would give it support. But you have two answers, I think, to that argument.

In the first place the resolution itself, as it is now before the house—and I think it is in slightly different form than the resolution which was introduced some years ago—specifically provided for the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education. That provision is written into the resolution. Therefore such members of the house as see fit to support this resolution can do so without any suggestion that they are attempting to impinge upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education.

Then you have the British North America Act itself which, in section 93, states that in and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education. Hence you have a double-barrelled protection, Mr. Speaker. In so far as the resolution is concerned, we have written into it the provision that this shall not interfere with provincial autonomy; and we have the British North America Act itself which says that the provinces shall have exclusive jurisdiction in making laws with respect to education. I therefore frankly cannot see the validity of the argument that the acceptance of this resolution necessarily impinges on provincial jurisdiction in the field of education.

I can see where, if it were handled in a way in which no government would handle it, terms and conditions possibly could be attached which would interfere, or would tend to interfere with the field of education in so far as provincial jurisdiction is concerned, but no government would think of doing such a thing. No matter what party might be in power in this parliament in the years to come, it would not think of doing such a thing. We all recognize the fact that to the province is given, and properly so, exclusive jurisdiction in the field of education. Surely it is possible for a government, as this government is doing every day, to make grants to a province without impinging upon the jurisdiction of the province and making it a vassal or fief or controlling it in any shape or form.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Would he think it is possible for the federal government to make moneys available in the large sums in which apparently, from the arguments that have been made, would be required, without taking any precautions whatsoever to see whether they would be spent in a prudent and proper manner, and to provide for any federal supervision which might be regarded as necessary to that end?

Mr. Nowlan: That is an involved question, Mr. Speaker. It is like every other question a good lawyer might ask. It is one to which it is rather difficult to answer either yes or no. But certainly if one were obliged to answer it as briefly as that, I would say yes, for this reason. You are making a grant to a responsible provincial government without attaching terms and conditions to the grant.

I think one condition which would have to be attached is that it be expended in the field of education, as undoubtedly—I shall finish this sentence and then call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, if I may—this government proposes to do with respect to the Canada Council. Although we have not the bill before us yet, apparently we are going to grant to the Canada Council a principal sum of $50 million; and the income is going to be used by the Canada Council, I suspect, without too many terms and conditions being attached by this parliament.

Certainly with provincial governments of the stature and status we have in Canada today it is possible for this government to make grants to provinces in the field of education without in any manner directing the way in which the provincial governments may administer them in the field of education itself.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Nowlan: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was suggesting that it would be possible to carry out the terms of this resolution without infringing upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education. As I said, there are ramifications that could be debated in this way or that, but the primary point is that grants should be made to the provinces for education purposes, and that having been done that the administration of those moneys could be left within the jurisdiction of the provinces, as has been done in so many cases in the past with federal grants.

The hon. member who preceded me in this debate this afternoon suggested that there should be no further consideration of this resolution at the moment because of the fact that the Canada Council grants were before the house and they took into consideration the portion of the education field which was contemplated by this resolution. It is true that the proposed measure with respect to the Canada Council will assist the provinces in the field of education, and to that extent the measure deserves the support of all members in the House of Commons and of the people generally. The resolution before us considers the field of education with respect to the primary and secondary school level, as I see it. It is a matter of the provincial responsibility with respect to education, and certainly the proposed grants through the Canada Council would go toward assisting universities. They would in no way assist the provinces with respect to the primary or secondary school level.

The hon. member went on to say that in so far as the provincial responsibility was concerned, that was something the provinces had to meet out of the payments which were being received from the dominion treasury or from other sources of revenue. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that there are provinces in Canada which can meet the demands of primary and high school education out of funds which are available to them either through the fiscal payments from the dominion treasury or from their ordinary fields of revenue, but certainly that is not true of every province. It is not true of my own province, because it was only six or eight months ago that the then premier of Nova Scotia, the head of the Liberal government of that province, pointed out that even under the new fiscal arrangements the amount the province would receive would be $5 million short of the bare minimum required to meet the services and governmental responsibilities of Nova Scotia.

When you consider that according to the bureau of statistics the school population of this country, and I am speaking not of the universities but of the primary and secondary schools, over the period between now and 1960 will be increased by over 100 per cent, and when you appreciate all the burdens that will impose upon the municipalities and the provinces, it suggests that certainly my own province could not meet this additional burden out of the revenue which it will now receive. I doubt if there is any province in Canada that can do so. I think the time has come, therefore, when the dominion government should give most careful consideration to this resolution, which has been discussed on so many occasions in the past.

One could indulge, if one wanted to do so, in a discussion of the whole problem of education. I do not propose to do that at the moment. But I should like to say one word, not only about the fiscal demands for plant and equipment but the demands upon the teaching profession in the various provinces of Canada as well. I believe every hon. member in this house knows that the teachers in our primary and secondary schools are making tremendous sacrifices, and that the great majority of them could go into fields of private endeavour and earn more money than in the field which they are occupying. They continue this work because they have a service to perform, and they are performing a remarkably good service. These teachers cannot get the salary range which they deserve when the fiscal arrangements with respect to provincial finances are frozen, as they are at the moment in the various provinces of which I have knowledge, and certainly those in the east.

Therefore, without taking further time of the house at the moment, I do want to say for myself, and I believe for all members with whom I am associated, that we are heartily in accord with the purpose of this resolution. We believe that sooner or later the purport of this resolution will be developed into specific enactments by the parliament of Canada. We feel the time is long since passed when more steps should have been taken than have been up to the present, and I do feel that the government of Canada facing this situation should deal with it in an objective way. If there are no more valid reasons against the necessary action than the question of provincial autonomy, which was raised at one time by the Minister of Justice and at another by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, then I think the parliament of Canada should take some steps in this direction during the present session.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I should like to commend the hon. member for Saskatoon for his persistence in focusing our attention on this very important problem of education. Last Thursday we devoted a whole day to debating a resolution proposed by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Hollingworth) which dealt with some aspects of this problem. I feel it is fitting that we should follow up that debate with another one today concerning a similar resolution which affords an opportunity of discussing points not previously covered.

The resolution under debate reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of taking steps to relieve the financial crisis in education, without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada.

As I compare this resolution with those of previous years I believe I can detect a slight change in emphasis. The earlier resolutions placed emphasis on the attainment of equality of opportunity, while the present resolution seems to emphasize the need for relieving the financial crisis in education. While equality of educational opportunity is a consummation devoutly to be wished, in my opinion it is one that can hardly be attained in a vast country like Canada, with so many different political jurisdictions, with such great variations in natural wealth, and with such great variations in geographical conditions.

The hon. member for Saskatoon pointed up this difficulty when he compared the per capita expenditure of $86 in Newfoundland with $292 per student in another province. Any grants the federal government might make available to the provinces for education would serve only to maintain this inequity unless, of course, the grants were made on a basis of need, in which case the province with the highest standard would not receive any assistance at all.

Instead of thinking in terms of educational opportunity, I believe it is more realistic to think in terms of minimum educational requirements, or of providing a minimum degree of educational opportunity because educational opportunity is not directly related to money or to per capita expenditures. We all know of cases where people with the same educational opportunity have had varying degrees of success in the outside world and have made very different contributions to the country in general. Neither is there any assurance that we are even now receiving full value for the money we do spend on education. The dean of the law school of Columbia University recently made references in his report to the calamity of graduate students who came to Columbia law school without being able to read and write intelligently, and we have heard similar criticisms from the presidents of our own Canadian universities.

It would appear, therefore, that the crisis in education is not wholly financial. Certainly part of the crisis is inherent in the system itself, and I believe the time has come when our educational system should receive a thorough overhauling. Perhaps we shall find that we still have a horse and buggy system of education in a motor age.

Part of the crisis also is due to the shortage of teacher supply, and it has been found, in my province at least, that additional money and increases in teachers' salaries are not the complete solution to this problem. Be that as it may, there is no doubt that a very considerable part of the crisis is financial. This is true even in the richest provinces. How much more is it true in the poorer provinces, especially in the Atlantic provinces, and in my own province in particular it is truest of all.

In Newfoundland we have from 100,000 to 120,000 children in our schools. The provincial government is spending $10 million on education out of a total budget of $42 million, and this sum does not take into consideration the very considerable amount of money paid in fees, in donations by organizations and in free labour in the construction and maintenance of school buildings. If we could put an assessment on these extra values we would probably find that they would total over another $1 million. It has been estimated that in 25 years our population in Newfoundland will double. That means an extra school population of 100,000 or 120,000 to be provided for. That means an extra 3,500 classrooms to be built. At $15,000 a classroom this amounts to somewhere around $60 million, or around $3 million per year just on new buildings alone.

Our child population in Newfoundland is increasing more rapidly than in any other part of Canada. It is increasing so rapidly that it has been estimated that an extra 170 teachers per year will be required to take care of the increase in classroom population. This, together with replacements because of retirements, death, marriage and transfers from the teaching profession to other occupations, bring the total of new teachers required yearly up to 600, and we have facilities for training fewer than half that number.

If we think in terms of minimum educational opportunity I think it would be worth while to look forward to the graph of intelligence based on the normal intelligence quotients of the human race. Generally speaking we find that such a graph tells us that about 5 per cent of our population have superior intelligence. I do not know just how many children are in all the classrooms in Canada, but perhaps there would be 4 million. That means one-twentieth, or 5 per cent, of those should be in our universities, and if they are not there this constitutes a tremendous waste of brainpower in our country. In my own province of Newfoundland, with a population of 400,000 and a school population of say 100,000, we should have 5,000 students receiving university training. These are the people best suited for the learned professions from which the country will draw its lawyers, doctors, dentists, engineers and scientists and teachers.

We cannot do without these. Another 5 per cent or 5,000 still could profit from university training and should be able to obtain it.

At the other end of the scale we have 5 per cent representing children who because of their mental condition require special facilities for educational training. That is a field where practically nothing at all is being done at the present time. Between these groups we have varying degrees of intelligence which must be trained to the maximum in order to enable them to take part in the economic and social life of our country.

How can the poorer provinces cope with the terrific financial expenditures involved in the educational field? I know it has been suggested that the federal government might turn back to the provinces certain sources of taxation. That might be very well in the case of some provinces. It might help to solve the problem as far as Quebec and Ontario were concerned, and possibly also as far as Alberta and British Columbia were concerned, but it certainly would not begin to solve the problem in the maritime provinces in general and in Newfoundland in particular. We simply do not have the taxation resources to yield the required revenue even if the federal government turned back certain sources of taxation to us.

What then is the alternative? The problem in the case of the poorer provinces is that they simply do not have the money or the means of getting it. The only possible source of money is the federal government, but federal financial aid for education involves some very real difficulties.

I listened to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings as he spoke a while ago, and I find myself unable to go along with him in the easy manner in which he soared over the obstacles that present themselves in connection with this problem. The trend of thought developed by the hon. member is based on the assumption that the present order of society, so comfortable for us in Canada, is destined to continue and endure forever. As much as I would like to believe that, I do not think the hon. member's easy optimism is in accordance with reality. The poet Tennyson has said, "The old order changeth, yielding place to new", and at no time in the history of mankind was that saying truer than at present.

Let us face the facts. There are two and a half billion people in this world, but less than one-half billion find it a comfortable world, or find our present order of society one they wish to preserve. In my very own riding there are 40,000 people who do no find this present order of society very comfortable. For over two billion of the earth's inhabitants it is an extremely uncomfortable world indeed, and these two billion people, or 80 per cent of the entire human race, desire a change. Furthermore there are 800 million communists in the world who have dedicated their lives to changing our present order of society. We are wasting our time in trying to preserve the status quo. Change is bound to come, and a new order of society is inevitable. We cannot hold it back, any more than we can hold back the ocean with our hands. The only thing we can do is to help shape it in the way we wish to have it, and that is why education is of such paramount importance. That, I think, is fact No. 1, a fact which no one can dispute.

Fact No. 2 is that there is a great deal of apathy, indifference and self-satisfaction abroad in our land. Fact No. 3 is the trend toward shifting responsibility to other people. We say, "Let George do it," and in most cases the "George" we have in mind is the federal government. The fourth fact is the trend toward bigness, toward bigger and bigger business, toward bigger and bigger government. We see this trend persisting even at the cost of personal freedom. To me these are danger signals, and if persisted in these trends will inevitably result in the destruction of our way of life.

I agree with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings that there is no danger foreseeable in the lifetime of the present generation, or during the time this government might be in power or during such time as any party in this house might be in charge of the government of our country or during the time any of the personalities in this house might dominate the political scene in Canada. But we know that time, like an ever-rolling stream, bears all its sons away. Old parties pass on, new parties take their place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carter: Personalities disappear and new personalities come on the scene.

Some hon. Members: Hurrah.

Mr. Carter: If the present trends are persisted in, who can say what type of personality will dominate the political scene in Canada in 40 or 50 years' time? We all know what happened in Italy and Germany when education came under the direct control of such personalities as Hitler and Mussolini. Who says it cannot happen here? I do not want to appear as a prophet of doom, but I think if we face facts honestly we cannot rule out the possibility of such events occurring in Canada.

There is one other fact that we must always bear in mind. Once education in the provinces becomes dependent on federal funds, that condition will always remain. I do not see how there will ever be in the future an opportunity for the provinces to take back that burden from the federal government. Despite the Canada Council, education in the provinces, once it becomes dependent upon federal funds, will also be dependent upon the personality that controls the purse strings. Therefore I believe the premier of Quebec has a point when he maintains that federal aid for education involves not only constitutional difficulties but dangers as well.

What then is the answer? There seems to be no positive answer. It is rather a choice between two evils. In finding an answer we must follow certain well established principles, such as the importance of the individual, the country's need and what the national interest demands. We must put first things first. I submit that the national interest demands that this problem of education must be solved somehow in spite of whatever dangers or risks are involved.

The resolution states that whatever grants be made available should not interfere with provincial jurisdiction, which would indicate that perhaps one of the ways of approaching a solution is by making grants available for educational plants, for building construction and maintenance. Certainly in a country like Canada, with all of our vast natural resources, given mutual good will it should be possible to find a solution which will enable federal aid to be made available together with the proper safeguards to minimize the risk involved.

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Saskatoon, for again bringing before this house and the people of Canada a matter of such great importance. I listened most intently to the remarks of the last speaker. With some small portion of what he had to say I must say I can agree, but with the larger portion of what he had to say I must disagree. I agree with him in that I feel that we in Canada should place first things first. To me one of the first things that we as a nation of intelligent people should consider is the education of our young people. That should be something we as a group of people should consider as one of the first demands on all levels of government.

All the ten provinces of Canada are today faced with two problems of major concern in the field of education. The first is the drastic shortage of qualified teachers in each and every province, and the second is the lack of modern school plants to cope with an ever-increasing school population. A few years ago the Canadian school trustees' association embarked upon the preparation of a report dealing with school finances in Canada. The committee in charge of this particular research was headed by Dr. M. E. LaZerte, former president of the Canadian teachers' federation, former president of the Alberta teachers' association; former dean of the faculty of education at Alberta and now, I am given to understand, dean of the faculty of education at the University of Manitoba.

Dr. LaZerte and his committee made a most extensive survey of the whole matter of school finances, and ended up with a recommendation which pointed out vividly that there was room for federal aid to education in Canada. I do know there is no apathy, especially in the west, when it comes to federal aid to education. Every social club, every organized group of men and women in western Canada by and large has passed resolutions calling upon the federal government to give federal aid to education.

Dr. LaZerte brought forth some startling figures in his studies. In one place he dealt with the probable increase in secondary school enrolment in Canada. He secured figures from the dominion bureau of statistics which indicated that from 1952 up to 1964 and perhaps longer there would be a tremendous increase in the number of students enrolled in Canadian high schools. He pointed out that in 1952 there were 305,200 students enrolled in Canada—with the exception of Quebec—in grades 9 to 12 or grades 9 to 13. This figure increased as the years went on and we find that in 1955 there were 345,850 high school students in Canada. It was estimated by the dominion bureau of statistics that by 1964, there would be well over 600,000 students registered in high school courses in Canada.

That figure of 600,000 for 1964 is an increase of approximately 200,000 over the figure for 1955. Two hundred thousand more high school students will mean 8,000 more classrooms to be constructed at an estimated cost of $15,000 per room, and 8,000 new teachers to handle those 8,000 additional classrooms and this with Canada facing a very drastic shortage of fully qualified teachers. We as Canadian people I hope will exert greater and greater efforts to see that all our young people are given at least a basic high school training.

The 1951 census indicated a very gloomy picture regarding school attendance by our young people. It indicated that of young people in Canada between the ages of 15 to 19 years, 63 per cent of those residing in rural areas were not in attendance at school and 57 per cent of those living in urban areas were not in high school. Where were they? They were certainly not at school receiving the type of education that would make them better and more capable men and women; they were out working. What was the reason? Did those young people representing 63 per cent of those residing in rural areas not desire to go to high school? I do not think so. I feel that they found it impossible to do so.

As has been pointed out, we spent the whole of last Thursday in a comprehensive and inlightening debate on the advisability of establishing national scholarships for worthy university students. I am certain, Mr. Speaker, all hon. members will agree that educational opportunity for young people should be made uniform right across Canada. The view has been expressed here that it would be impossible to introduce a uniform standard of education throughout Canada; but, Mr. Speaker, I have never yet felt that anything was impossible. Certainly we should be striving for a uniform standard of education, the best standard that we as Canadian people can give to our young citizens.

I am prepared to admit there are certain sections of Canada which find it far more difficult than others to finance education. I know that even in the wealthier provinces the provincial governments are finding it increasingly difficult to provide the ever-increasing amounts of money needed for this purpose. The fact that we do have a wide disparity of wealth in Canada, Mr. Speaker,

I regard as a strong argument why the federal government should enter this field and attempt to do something to ensure that a child in the poorest province in Canada should have an opportunity to receive the same type of education as one in any of the wealthier provinces.

The following figures, Mr. Speaker, are cited in the report of the research committee of the Canadian school trustees' association with regard to the provincial effort in education during the year 1951-52. They deal with combined provincial and municipal expenditures on elementary and secondary education in the nine provinces of Canada with regard to which they were able to obtain information. The committee point out that in Newfoundland the amount per capita spent on education in this particular year was $19.61; on the other hand, they point out, the per capita income of that province in that year was only $576. In Prince Edward Island the per capita amount spent on education was $16.84, and the per capita personal income, $633. Nova Scotia spent $25.61 per capita; the average income was $781. New Brunswick spent $29.41; average income, $711. When we move west, we find that Ontario spent $33.52 per capita on education; average income, $1,341. In the western provinces, Manitoba, with an average income of $1,110 spent $28.29 per capita on education. Saskatchewan, with an average income of $1,306, spent $39.34; Alberta, with an average income of $1,251, spent $39.42, and British Columbia with an average income of $1,256 spent $45.34.

All this means, Mr. Speaker, that it costs money to educate the young people of Canada. It does cost money, though not as much as it should cost the people of Canada, by any means. It means that in those provinces where there is a low average income the per capita amount spent on education is low; that the young people in those provinces are not getting the education they deserve as young Canadians. I say it is high time the federal government realized that this situation is one they should deal with in the interests of young Canadians and Canadians in general, rather than sit piously by doing nothing.

Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that if the federal government were to enter the field of federal aid for education we would eventually reach a position where the federal government was the dominating authority. That is not necessarily true. We already have, at the present time, a position where the federal government is giving money, earmarked for specific social purposes, to the provinces, though the management and administration of those social services are in provincial hands. The federal government has already entered the field of education, with or without the consent of the British North America Act. Only last week a conference was held here in Canada to discuss vocational education and increased aid for vocational education in the ten provinces of Canada. We know that this year the federal government proposes, and rightly so, to give large sums to the universities of Canada in the way of construction grants. We know that following the war the federal government provided education—and rightly so—for many of the young men returning from world war II. The Canada Council plan has already been mentioned.

As I have already pointed out, this resolution has been before the house for a great many years. It is one which should, I feel, receive more than mere consideration by the government and hon. members; it should be acted on by the government now.

In a submission which was supposed to have been made to the Prime Minister at one time, the Alberta school trustees' association and other associated bodies would have made this recommendation to the government. I quote:

> It is now recommended that federal grants to the provinces in aid of education be greatly increased and that they be "general" instead of "special" in nature.

—in other words a grant to be made to the provinces to be spent on education as the provinces saw fit. Quoting still further:

> That to assist in financing elementary and secondary education the federal government be requested to give aid to the extent of $150 million per annum at the present time, one-third of this aid to be on a "per pupil" basis and two-thirds as equalization grants to provinces with low tax-paying ability, the latter payments to be proportional to provincial needs.

The principle of giving grants according to the need of an area is already recognized in many of the provinces across Canada. We have in the province of Alberta equalization grants which are given to school divisions which are not as fortunate as others. The wealthier a school division is, the smaller these grants are. The more unfortunate it happens to be, the greater the grant which it receives. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that many of the "straw men" who have been put forward from time to time in opposition to this resolution are merely political straw men, and that if this government were so disposed it could immediately call in the ministers of education of the ten provinces, and they would soon arrive at a fair and equitable system of granting federal aid to all the provinces of Canada.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first of all to congratulate those who have preceded me for the important and eloquent contributions they have made. It is quite natural, in my opinion, that they should have done so, having regard to the fact that this subject matter has been before us on previous occasions and we are all, in a manner of speaking—and I am sure this applies with particular force to the hon. gentlemen who introduced this resolution—producing variations upon a theme by the hon. member for Saskatoon.

I could not help thinking, however, that amongst all those who have spoken, perhaps the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose, who has just taken his seat, has contributed more than has any other hon. member to a sort of basic understanding of the nature of this resolution, by the moving plea he put forth on behalf of the poverty-stricken province of Alberta for assistance from the federal government toward the support of its primary education. When, as he eloquently and cogently pointed out, this was what he was seeking, we had here a revealing measure of the nature of the resolution before us.

Another feature of the debate which struck me as being rather encouraging was to have the hon. member for Saskatoon quote, with no inconsiderable approval, Mr. James Muir —I think he is still president of the Royal Bank of Canada, or chairman of the board —and then to find myself in agreement with both of them on the point upon which Mr. Muir was quoted, namely that Canada should spare no effort as a nation to provide the best possible education that we can provide for all Canadians. If I recognized the quotation, this part of which my friend the hon. member for Saskatoon did not quote, I think one of the reasons was that Mr. Muir was apprehensive as to whether the free world was maintaining an educational system which could be compared with that of the unfree.

The hon. gentleman who introduced this motion stated, and it was quite unnecessary that he should have done so, that he was no more interested in the children of Saskatchewan than he was in those of any other province. I think we all approach this subject as Canadians with a desire to get the best system of education we can by means which are reasonably acceptable to all parts of our country. I read the wording of the motion:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of taking steps to relieve the financial crisis in education, without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada.

I should like to submit, Mr. Speaker, that the provision which has already been made by this government is the only way we can bring ourselves within the language of this resolution, especially the clause "without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field." In other words I should like to submit that the provision which has been made is the only provision which can be made which does not encroach upon the jurisdiction of the provinces.

I say that because, as is well known, the fiscal arrangements we now have between the federal government and the provinces are the product, in large measure, of the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission. I do not think we have ever had before in the history of Canada a royal commission which could compare with it in the way its recommendations and the matter which supported them have stood examination, and the validity of whose findings in spite of the passage of time has continued to be sound and unchallengeable.

When he says that our job is to provide the provinces with the financial resources to do the job, I should like to point out to my friend the hon. member for Saskatoon that we have set out to do that in accordance with the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission; that we have in a large measure succeeded; and that the only way in which my hon. friend can acquire argumentative validity for his submissions to the house today is by shutting his eyes completely to what has been done with regard to implementation of the Rowell-Sirois commission report. For example, he says he wants the federal government—and if I am misquoting him I hope he will correct me—which has made grants to Canadian universities, to make to the support of primary education further grants of the same kind as those they have made to the universities. He says if they can make them to the one, they could make them equally well to the other.

I submit to him that it is one thing to make grants to the universities of Canada which constitute, when they are received, a minor part of their income, and which are made to institutions which are fully autonomous, self-supporting and self-governing; but it is a different thing altogether to make grants, which would be a large part of the income of the primary schools of the province, to provincial governments whose provincial departments of education actively control, supervise and make policy for the whole primary school system of the province.

I am sure the hon. member for Saskatoon, as a school teacher versed in the history of our country, would be one of the first to agree with me when I say it is not an accident that, at the time of confederation, in the distribution of powers under the British North America Act the legislatures of the provinces were given exclusive authority to make laws in relation to education. This, Mr. Speaker, was a deliberate provision upon which certain of the fathers of confederation insisted as a condition to the formation of the Canadian federation in order to protect their religion, their language and their way of life.

The point of this is that primary education is concerned entirely with the instruction of the young during that highly formative period of their lives, which instruction, as the Rowell-Sirois report points out, is of decisive importance with regard to religious training and the preservation of language and culture. Let me quote from volume II of the Rowell-Sirois report:

> We have already said that the instruction of the young during their formative years is a matter which the provinces must continue to control (subject of course, to the safeguard for religious minorities provided in the British North America Act and amendments). A free hand in something so important to the social and cultural life of the people seems to us to be vital to any provincial autonomy worthy of the name, and it is obvious that any attempts to alter the existing arrangements would meet with powerful opposition and would provoke profound resentment.

In relation to that quotation, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that if federal grants were sufficiently large to be worth while to the provincial governments which received them, the dominion treasury simply could not defend handing those large sums of money to the provincial governments without assuming some responsibility as to the manner in which they would be spent. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said that would be a simple matter to overcome, and they could be handed out under certain conditions. But if they were handed out under certain conditions it would be necessary to follow the grants to make sure those conditions had been fulfilled. Under those circumstances it seems to me quite beyond all reason to imagine that provincial autonomy over primary education would be maintained.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask the minister a question? As I listened to the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings this afternoon it seemed to me the minister was misrepresenting what the hon. member said. Does the minister maintain that these funds, in the hands of the provinces, might be subject to misappropriation?

Mr. Garson: No, Mr. Speaker, my words did not say that and they were not susceptible of any such inference.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, yes, they were.

Mr. Garson: If the hon. lady draws that inference I can only leave her to her own conclusions.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is the inference I draw.

Mr. Garson: It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that on a previous occasion the former leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew, stated in the course of a debate on this same subject that he was completely in favour of provincial autonomy in these matters. I agree with him, and I suggest that the Rowell-Sirois report, from which I now propose to quote, supports both of us in that view. One should remember that this Rowell-Sirois commission was sitting shortly after the greatest depression through which we have ever passed, when conditions of primary education in the Dominion of Canada were infinitely worse than they ever had been before or since. It was in relation to conditions at that time, not in relation to the relatively good condition of education today, that these remarks were made, which I now quote:

> Many representations have been made to us that financial help should be extended by the dominion to the provinces for various purposes, such as scholarships, technical training, grants to be used for general educational purposes provided that the provinces did not reduce their own expenditure on education. These representations appear to have been inspired largely by consternation at the reductions in educational expenditure which certain provinces, under the stress of the depression, have felt compelled to make. It has even been contended that the dominion is bound to see that there is equal educational opportunity, as far as is practicable, for every Canadian child. We have the deepest sympathy for these views which have been advanced by many of the organizations most closely associated with education in Canada, and we share to the full the regret that, especially in recent years, education has been terribly neglected in many of the poorer parts of the country and that wholly disproportionate sacrifices have been imposed on those who have devoted their lives to this important public service. But the representations appear to us to go too far in denying the right of each province to decide the relative importance of expenditure on education and expenditure on other competing services. It is our hope that provision can be made for the fiscal needs of all provinces, including within those needs provision for the education of the young. Our financial proposals aim at placing every province in a position to discharge its responsibilities for education, on a scale that is within the means of the people of Canada, if it chooses to do so. Once this position is established it seems to us best that education, like every other form of welfare service in a democratic community, should have to fight for its life, and that a generous provision for the education of the children of the nation should depend, not on any arbitrary constitutional provision, but on the persistent conviction of the mass of the people that they must be ready to deny themselves some of the good things of life in order to deal fairly by their children. Hence we do not think that it would be wise or appropriate for the dominion to make grants to the provinces ear-marked for the support of general education.

As we all know, following upon the delivery of this report, in view of the fact that there were public men in Canada who had to be educated with regard to these matters and who at first opposed the implementation of the provisions of the report—most of them not in the Liberal party—the implementation of the report was delayed until that educational process was completed. There are still some signs in this house that it is not complete yet.

It was not possible, until the first wartime tax suspension agreement, to develop anything along the lines of the Rowell-Sirois recommendations. Under that wartime tax suspension agreement, which had been condemned in another form as an absolutely impossible arrangement for the provinces, there was not one of the provincial treasuries that did not have a most favourable experience as regards increasing its ability to spend money for education and other provincial services, and as regards treasury surpluses they were able to show during that period. When the war was over this was followed by the first post-war tax rental agreement.

Mr. Hodgson: When was the Rowell-Sirois report brought out?

Mr. Garson: The Rowell-Sirois report itself was brought out in May, 1940.

Mr. Hodgson: That may be, but it was finished in May, 1938.

Mr. Garson: I think perhaps my hon. friend may have in mind that some of the hearings, perhaps in Ontario, were finished in May, 1938; but the whole thing certainly could not have been finished in 1938.

Mr. Hodgson: Does the minister not think a report brought out in 1938 or 1940 is outmoded? This country is moving much faster than that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly not.

Mr. Garson: It is because of that fallacy in the minds of a number of members in this house that year after year we have the presentation of this resolution and some of the speeches in support of it. I will not say they are made in ignorance of the contents of this report, but at least they are made in disregard of it.

Now, the present suggestion is, to adopt the language of the motion, that money shall be made available to the provinces for educational purposes, "without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field".

Well, I want to try to show hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that this is precisely what these agreements have done; and I should first like to give as an example the experience of my own province of Manitoba. The Manitoba revenues which were surrendered under these agreements in 1946 were worth a little over $8 million a year. In place of these we got under the agreement a guaranteed minimum of $13,500,000 and received in the year ended March 31, 1948, about $14,500,000. To make a long story short, Mr. Speaker, we shall receive in the present fiscal year, I believe—I have not checked the exact figure—something close to $35 million, which is more than our entire budget in 1949. Now, will any member of any party in this house have the hardihood to rise in his place and say that with this increase in revenue it is not possible for the provinces to support primary education?

Mr. Hodgson: What is your surplus this year?

Mr. Knowles: What is the increase in the cost of education?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): What was the federal budget in 1939?

Mr. Garson: Let us leave that one province out. It is true Manitoba had a very favourable settlement in that contract, but let us take the agreement as a whole.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister permit a question before he leaves Manitoba?

Mr. Garson: Yes, surely.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister say whether he thinks the contributions made by the federal government to Manitoba for education, such as contributions for vocational training, contributions for the building of Carpathia school in Winnipeg and the school at Fort Churchill, all of which are outside of these grants, violate the Rowell-Sirois principle or interfere with provincial control over education?

Mr. Garson: No, I do not for one moment, because they are all earmarked grants, all made upon certain conditions which must be complied with; but they relate only to certain technical training.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no.

Mr. Garson: Well, I put it this way so as not to waste time. They do not relate to primary education.

Mr. Knowles: Carpathia school is an elementary school in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Garson: I know.

Mr. Knowles: The school at Fort Churchill is an elementary and high school.

Mr. Pickersgill: And it has nothing to do with primary education in general.

Mr. Knowles: It certainly does.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend cannot use up my time and trap me by these—

Mr. Knight: May I ask one question?

Mr. Garson: One at a time. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre cannot trap me by these atypical cases which he cites. He knows as perfectly well as I do that there is not now, in Canada, federal contributions to primary education, in the terms in which they are recommended in the resolution which is before us.

Now, let us take the grants from the federal treasury under these federal-provincial agreements. To go to the first post-war tax agreement, that is the first tax rental agreement in 1947-48, the sum of $80 million in that year was paid to seven provinces. In the last year of that same agreement 1951-52 another province having come in in the meantime, the $80 million had gone up to $122 million. Then a new agreement was negotiated, and in 1952-53 the first year of the new agreement with nine provinces that $80 million had gone up to $286 million, and in 1953-54 the second year of the second agreement, just one year later, it had gone up to $309 million by operation of the escalator clause, in order to take care of increased expenditures, including education. In 1956-57 the last year of that agreement, still with nine provinces, it had gone up by escalation and the like to $357 million.

Mr. Van Horne: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Garson: No; my time is running out. I will be glad to answer the hon. member's questions at the end, if I have time.

During the past year we have been negotiating a third agreement, and we hope to have all the provinces of Canada included. The amount payable, as nearly as we can estimate it at this moment, under the third agreement is $640 million, plus certain other adjustments of taxation and so forth of $35 million, or a total of $675 million.

In other words the contribution of the federal government under this head in the period from 1947-48, when it was $80 million, has gone up in ten years to $675 million in 1957-58, or by almost eight and a half times.

[Mr. Garson.]

Will any reasonable man tell me that in that large increase there is not elbow room within which the province of Alberta can find some way of taking care of its primary education, or even the province of Newfoundland? It is an increase of eight and a half times in federal payments.

The great virtue, Mr. Speaker, of this arrangement is that it complies with the resolution of my hon. friend from Saskatoon. This is the only way in which this money can be paid "without encroaching in any way upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces". As the provinces get this money, they can spend it on roads, they can spend it on bridges, they can spend it on graft, they can do what they like with it, or they can spend it on education.

Mr. Knight: Is the minister aware that one of his colleagues took the exactly opposite position in opposing this resolution? The Minister of National Health and Welfare said the reason it was unconstitutional was that it was earmarked for education.

Mr. Garson: I heard my colleague and I heard my hon. friend from Saskatoon. I think the explanation of my hon. friend's remark is that he himself did not understand the minister.

Mr. Knight: Thank you very much; no one else does.

Mr. Garson: The fact of the matter is that the Rowell-Sirois commission was in my opinion much the most distinguished commission we had ever had. It would be a very happy situation if all our commissions produced as satisfactory a report as it did.

Mr. Knowles: You had better explain yourself.

Mr. Garson: And I would say that, because we have for our measures support from the fact that we took the Rowell-Sirois recommendations and implemented them. By and large, having regard to the fact that we have been passing through an era which has tested the financial arrangements of governments at every level, municipal, provincial and federal, the Rowell-Sirois policies have worked out remarkably well. They certainly have provided, if the provinces choose to spend it for that purpose, plenty of money with which to pay for education.

The hon. member for Saskatoon may perhaps recall that on an earlier occasion, I think it was in 1952, I pointed out that under these tax agreements then in effect over a period of five years not one of the treasuries of all the provinces of Canada had shown a deficit; they all showed surpluses, and those surpluses for the 5-year period totalled nearly two-thirds of a billion dollars of provincial debt reduction. My hon. friend the hon. member for Saskatoon says, "If we do not pay some money they are going to have to close up primary education." Well, the only thing wrong with all these arguments is that the facts do not bear them out. It is only by ignoring the facts—I will not say suppressing them—but by paying no attention to them, that my hon. friend can make the kind of argument he does.

I sympathize entirely with him on the importance of primary education and the importance of increasing school teachers' salaries. But I say when he is proposing to do this by transgressing the provision which was put into the constitution of Canada most deliberately by the fathers of confederation, and which has proven over the years since to have been a very wise provision; and since the facts as I have related them show that the provinces, if they wish to do so, can make adequate provision for education, there is no case upon which he can ask for the support of his present resolution in this house.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had great sympathy for the hon. member for Saskatoon and for the position he took. I think it is unfortunate that the minister does not have a little knowledge as well about the real situation in the educational system, because I am quite sure there is not a teacher in the country who would not get up and refute everything he said. When he tells us and asks us to believe that the provinces are able to cope with this problem under the present financial arrangements, he flies right in the face of the express views of all educational authorities in Canada. The minister may be an expert in law, but I suspect he has not been paying very much attention to the mundane business of the local administration of schools or he would not attempt to put over as logical arguments the fantastic statements he has made this evening.

I was interested to find that apparently he bases his opposition to this resolution on two grounds. The first is the findings of the Rowell-Sirois commission. I remember the findings of that commission very well. I was a member of the British Columbia legislature at the time and it was notorious, as the Minister of Justice well knows, why that particular section of the Rowell-Sirois commission's report was included and why it contained the weak, feeble and unconvincing arguments he has quoted here tonight. At that time there was no doubt in the mind of anyone that it was a political consideration which forced that particular section of the Rowell-Sirois report.

The other ground upon which the minister apparently bases his position is a constitutional one, and I was quite interested when he suggested that of course there had been no contravention of provincial autonomy over education in regard to grants for universities, because they were all minor in quantity. I was reminded, Mr. Speaker, of the story you may remember about the young lady who was the subject of some censure over the results of her behaviour. Her defence was, "Well, it was such a very small baby". Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice is the last person who should suggest to us that a minor fracture of the constitution is permissible but a large one is unthinkable.

Mr. Knowles: He got away with a fairly large one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: This resolution calls for payments to the provinces, if I read it correctly.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely these university grants are not paid to the provinces. There is no parallel at all.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): No, they are not paid to the provinces; and that brings me to another statement of the Minister of Justice when he suggested, if you please, Mr. Speaker, that provincial universities—and this is true of all the western universities—which have been established by provincial legislatures are more autonomous bodies than are provincial governments. What an astonishing point of view. We can make grants to universities because they are autonomous—

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My hon. friend has attributed to me a suggestion which I did not make. He is confusing it with an inference which he improperly drew.

Mr. Knowles: We all heard it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Those were the words the minister used.

Mr. Garson: Hansard will show the words I used.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes; if you do not change them, Hansard will show that you referred to universities as autonomous bodies, and therefore that the grants to them could not be put on the same basis as grants to provincial governments.

An hon. Member: Word for word.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I suggest to you, sir, that not only is the minister advancing quite a ridiculous argument, but he is also overlooking a very important factor. That is that provincial universities, while every effort has been made to remove them from the control of provincial governments, are nevertheless subject to considerable pressure when a provincial government wishes to exercise it, because the provincial government has control of all the grants. These arguments do not seem to add up to any sort of reality.

I want to deal particularly with the main thesis of the minister's refutation of the resolution tonight, and that is that the educational wants of Canadian children are or can be adequately cared for by the present fiscal arrangements. I want to suggest to him that his thinking is far out of date, because there is not a province in Canada at the present time that has established an adequate primary and secondary educational system.

I suppose sometimes we tend to forget what a very large bite we undertook to chew when in Canada we decided to educate all children, and we may also tend to forget that it is a relatively new development. It was a new idea when about 100 years ago, I suppose, perhaps a little more in some parts, it was decided to provide elementary education for all children. At that time it was possibly a fairly easily achieved ambition, because no doubt the first thought was that it would be very elementary education that the vast majority would require or would wish or would have to have provided for them. In fact until comparatively recent times this was the case.

I recall that when I went to high school in British Columbia a much smaller proportion of the children who attended elementary school with me went on to high school than today go from high school to university. At that time the high school student was the rarity, and the cost of education per capita was in consequence very much less than it is today. But I think we have to go even further than that. I think we must consider for a moment just what are the purposes of our education. Sometimes I am rather dismayed at the implications of some statements which are made with regard to education; the idea that the purpose of education is to produce so many people skilled in this particular line and so many in another specialized field and so many in some profession or trade. I think we lose sight of the fact that education is something else again. Education should primarily be the process of developing human beings, and in order to do that there is one thing we have to do which our educational system has never been able to do even from the start; that is to maintain and encourage the natural curiosity and inquisitiveness of the human being.

Every human being starts off life as a bundle of curiosity, and it is the way in which human beings develop and the way in which societies develop; but when you gather 40 or 50 pupils into a class and ask a teacher to take charge of them, all that teacher can do is to maintain sufficient order to wrest from those students an unwilling acceptance of certain information and facts. I have no doubt whatever that much of our trouble today with regard to juvenile delinquency has been primarily caused by the fact that our educational system stifles that necessary inquisitive, curious feature of human nature. In order to maintain it, the very first thing we need is about twice as many teachers as we have at the present time, and that is an extremely conservative estimate.

I would go further and quote something I said to a teachers' gathering in my constituency not long ago, when I told them—and you may think it was a very rash thing for a politician to say—that I hoped the time would come when half those in attendance at the gathering would be found unqualified for their jobs; but of course I was quite safe, because each one was quite convinced that I was referring to his neighbour and not to him. I then went on and suggested something further. I said I also hoped that I would see the status and the rewards of the teaching profession raised to the degree where there would be two applicants for every vacancy in the profession.

Unless we can approach something like that, then we are not going to really fulfil the fundamental purposes which were referred to tonight by the Minister of Justice, the purposes of the fathers of confederation, and so on. Today the world is a much more complex place than it was in their day. If ever there was a time when children required individual attention, when they required the encouragement of their speculative intellects, today is the time; because they have to combat an enormous barrage of influences and of propaganda which are definitely antisocial and anti-intellectual in nature.

We may think we can solve these problems by banning certain deleterious aspects of our society, like crime comics, but the only real protection for young people from some of the evil influences of modern society is the development in them of inquiring minds which will seek always to extend the boundaries of their knowledge. I suggest that in order to do this a very large proportion of the national income of this country must be devoted to providing the sort of scholastic environment which will produce those inquiring minds which will be made safe from the influences of some aspects of this modern world. To do that is beyond the capacity of even the richest province.

When the tax rental agreements were brought up in the legislature in Victoria I was very dubious about them. Curiously enough a Liberal member of the legislature and I were the only ones who were dubious. I was dubious because I doubted whether the great and good federal government would always see eye to eye with those of us who considered that there were vast improvements to be made in the society in which we lived. Tonight we have had proof that I was right. The spokesman for this government still does not admit that we have a crisis in education. Putting it in simple emotional terms, you may say that you cannot buy these things; but the bitter truth is that you have to buy them, and with hard dollars. We will have to offer inducements to the best brains in our society to undertake this most important job in our whole society, because the whole rest of our lives depends upon what those to whom we entrust our children are able to do with their trust.

The whole of our elaborate and complex society rests finally on the shoulders of the primary teacher. She is the first one who sets the child's mind in a certain direction. I would suggest that all the obstacles that have been raised tonight of insurmountable constitutional blocks will eventually be blown apart when finally it dawns on this government that it has to take action in this field, just as it took action in the field of family allowances, in the field of grants to universities, both of which I suggest are perhaps suspect to the constitutional purist. I have never been able to understand why grants in aid of technical education were not subject to the ban, but apparently they are not.

We know quite well that eventually, when they are met with the demands of public opinion, these blocks will be removed; but the tragic thing is that in the meantime a whole generation of Canadian citizens is suffering and much of the future of this country is being endangered, because if we go on this way we shall invite the worst possible fate that could overtake us. That is, that the next generation will be no wiser than we are.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) on moving this resolution designed to give financial assistance to our educational institutions and teaching establishments. In so doing, he affords us all, as members of this house, an opportunity to show our interest in matters of education in this country. It is a valuable contribution to the future of Canadian youth and to Canada as a whole.

This debate also gave us the opportunity of hearing an excellent speech on the question of education by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and of being informed of the position of the government of our country on this matter.

I also wish to thank the hon. member for Saskatoon for the kind words he had on my behalf because of the speech I made last week in a debate on a similar subject. In his remarks this afternoon, he expressed the wish that I give my opinion on the question he submitted to our consideration. Mr. Speaker, as a man in public life, I have never been afraid to express my opinion, neither here nor elsewhere, and it is with pleasure that I take this opportunity to express my views on the matter he submitted to us.

In the speech he just made, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) told us that the Minister of Justice seemed unaware of the fact that there is a financial crisis in the field of education. I listened most carefully to the remarks of the Minister of Justice and I for one am convinced that he is conscious of the needs felt by all provinces in matters of education. I know that the Minister of Justice is mindful of provincial autonomy and that he leaves to each province the care of discharging its obligations.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Saskatoon when he says that our schools are faced with certain financial difficulties in each and every educational field, primary, secondary and university. Because of the increase in our population we have to build more schools and universities. We also recognize the necessity of providing higher pay for college and university professors as well as for high school and elementary school teachers. These people are putting heart and soul in the teaching of our children and I do think that everybody here will agree that they should be better paid.

Education

Still the problem which we have to face in the educational field also exists in other fields. I need only mention here the difficulties faced by municipalities in their administrative work, precisely because of their current rapid expansion. However, the financial difficulties which we are facing in the educational field are such as to deserve study by all those who are in charge of the various government activities in this country.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this is a critical problem since it has a bearing on the future of our children, of the younger generation of this country and of the nation as a whole.

In seeking to settle this financial problem, we must take into account the British North America Act in so far as it concerns the rights which have been reserved to the various provinces on confederation.

Last week during a debate initiated by the hon. member for York Centre, I had the opportunity of expressing my views on the attitude that we should adopt here in this house, with regard to education, in order to ensure that provincial autonomy in this connection be respected. In my conclusion I supported the granting of university scholarships which would in no way threaten the autonomy of the provinces, on the contrary.

To return to the discussion now under way, let us read over the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Saskatoon:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of taking steps to relieve the financial crisis in education, without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field, by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for the expansion and equalization of educational opportunity across Canada.

When I first read the resolution, I felt inclined to support it. However, after listening to the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Saskatoon, I think I should make considerable reservations, and perhaps even more than reservations. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speak of the hon. member personally, but I fear this resolution coming from the C.C.F. benches creates a great danger. Indeed, during the four years I have spent in this house, I have noticed that certain members of his party seemed to forget, on several occasions, that we had in Canada a constitution giving rights to the provinces in certain fields, and more particularly in the field of education. When I read carefully the resolution moved by the hon. member, I see that it included the following sentence:

> . . . without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces . . .

However, while making his speech this afternoon, the hon. member had this to say: "The public of Canada would support, I am quite sure, this plea which I am making for the granting of federal money for education, so long as there was no interference with provincial responsibilities implied".

Earlier, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member had said: "I wonder if it would disturb the constitution too much if the federal government were to assume some of the capital cost of schools". He concludes by saying that he does not believe it would.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the educational system, both on the primary and secondary level, is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the various provincial legislatures. When the hon. member says that we should assume some of the capital cost of schools, we already see there an encroachment upon the autonomy of the provinces, and that is exactly what we do not want.

In that same speech, the hon. member said:

> What is taught, how it is taught, and where it is taught or anything else of that kind lies within the jurisdiction of the province. All we want to do is to support the hands of those people within the provinces who are trying to educate these children. That is all we want to do and it is entirely a financial problem.

Well no, Mr. Speaker, it is not solely a financial matter; it is a problem affecting the organization of education in this country and more particularly in the provinces, a prerogative which has been guaranteed to us by the British North America Act which provides that education is exclusively a provincial matter.

In the province of Quebec, as in any other Canadian province, I am sure that the legislative body wishes to discharge its responsibilities in accordance with the rights and powers guaranteed by the constitution. That is what is provided by section 93. As I said last week, when we have to deal with education we must be very careful to respect that guarantee given to the provinces by the fathers of confederation.

It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot accept in its entirety the resolution moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon; I wonder if the hon. member realizes the difference between what we could call here education proper, which comes under provincial jurisdiction, and Canadian culture, a field where the government of our country may have, in some cases, certain responsibilities. I agree with the hon. member when he says that our educational system is in great need of funds. Since the planning of education has been entrusted to the provinces the solution of this financial problem in the field of secondary and primary education is their sole responsibility. Therefore, as a representative of a federal constituency, I will not even discuss these problems in so far as they relate to primary and secondary education.

In the field of university education, the problem is just as serious. However, who provides the universities with the funds they require to educate our children? These funds come from credits voted by the different provincial legislatures, in certain cases from federal grants, and from certain amounts put at the disposal of our universities by private enterprise or by private individuals anxious to help our young Canadians.

Needs are growing, Mr. Speaker, precisely because more and more young people, throughout this country, are entering university. I am happy to note that fact. It proves that Canadian culture is constantly being raised to higher levels, and this is as it should be. I had occasion last week to express my views on the matter of primary and secondary education. As I said a while ago, it is different in the case of universities. In fact, there is in that field a cultural aspect regarding which the federal government could make a contribution without however laying down any condition. That is in complete agreement with the findings of the Massey report which recommended assistance to universities, which is urgently required.

For a long time the Prime Minister of our country has been concerned with the problems of universities. Recently, when he received an honorary degree from the University of Sherbrooke, he announced that he would recommend to parliament that grants to universities be increased from 50 cents to $1 for each university student in the country, thus bringing to $16 million annually the amount of statutory federal grants to universities.

In the speech he made on November 12 last at the national conference of Canadian universities, the right hon. Prime Minister said, and I am quoting from La Presse of Tuesday November 13, 1956:

> I have already explained why the federal government had the right to offer such assistance. I feel that it is not only its right but its duty to do so.

In the same speech the Prime Minister added:

> My colleagues and I feel that the annual federal grants to universities should be continued and increased and we are prepared to recommend to parliament, at the next regular session, that they be doubled.

That is what the parliament of Canada has done at the very beginning of this session. And if I refer to Hansard of last Friday, January the 15th, I see that the Prime Minister in the explanations he gave us on the subject of the assistance that the Canadian government wants to give to various universities in this country, takes into account the autonomy of the provinces. During the same debate I noticed that the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), agreed with the Prime Minister. I suggest that all the members of the house recognize that we should help Canadian universities. However, I want to be sure that such assistance will be granted with due respect for the autonomy of the universities and provinces. In order to insure that this autonomy will not be affected, it is provided in the measure introduced by the government that the universities of the various provinces of the country will not be forced to accept the grants, but that they can refuse them if they believe that this would encroach upon the autonomy of the provinces.

The resolution of the government provides that the grants will be distributed by an independent organization.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) said a moment ago that there was no difference between the measure introduced by the Prime Minister and the proposal of the hon. member for Saskatoon. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) pointed out that there is all the difference in the world between these two proposals since under the resolution of the Prime Minister, the grants will be offered to the universities and not directly to the provinces.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a special appeal to private enterprise in this country to provide an ever increasing help to our universities and our university students.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. members of this house for the interest they have shown in the problems of education and teaching in our country. In so doing, they prove that they are conscious of their responsibilities; I urge them to continue to work for the future of our country with due respect to the spirit and the letter of our Canadian constitution.

The hon. member for Saskatoon said this afternoon that he was glad to find that an ever increasing number of hon. members show their interest in education. However, I would not want the growing interest to which he referred to be taken as an excuse to encroach upon certain sections of the Canadian constitution.

However, I cannot give my full support to the resolution before the house, precisely on account of the explanations given by the hon. member. In my opinion, if the resolution were carried in its present form, it would be an encroachment upon the constitution and that cannot be allowed. Such an action would be an interference in a field exclusively reserved to provincial jurisdiction. I am still convinced that no hon. member would wish to encroach upon what we call provincial autonomy.

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I have very little time left before ten o'clock but I do think I have time enough to make a few remarks. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), I am convinced, has introduced his motion in a sincere effort to find a solution to the problem of education in general.

I do not have to demonstrate the need for supporting education. That is a generally recognized fact. All of us here to the best of our ability, are searching for a formula according to which our young fellow citizens may be allowed to benefit more from education.

Education is a personal responsibility of parents. That is a privilege which is rightfully theirs. Still, man is not able to develop, to realize his whole potentialities except as a member of society. That being the case, those in authority must exercise their complementary duties. In my province this is first of all the business of the local school board to which I am particularly happy to pay tribute.

Our federal system nevertheless recognizes the exclusive responsibilities of the provincial authorities to legislate in educational matters. I will remind hon. members that the fathers of confederation did not deem it wise to include these in the general powers granted to the provinces under section 92. They chose instead to draw up a separate section to deal with this matter, a fact which indicates the importance they attached to the subject. It was their wish that education be a provincial matter. Even with the best intentions in the world, I do not think that we should do anything which would, in any way, diminish the responsibilities of the province.

The mover of the motion has taken the precaution to include the following reservation:

> Without encroaching in any way on the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in this field.

That is undeniable recognition of the fact that the federal government has no jurisdiction in that field, and that should be sufficient to dispose of the resolution. Problems coming within the field of our jurisdiction are numerous and varied; some are very difficult to solve. We should spend our time and energy working for the common good of our constituents in the fields in which we have jurisdiction and which were assigned to us by the provisions of the British North America Act.

Federal legislators are duty bound to be very circumspect and careful in matters of education. The province of Quebec has most imperative and special reasons to be jealous of the field of education. It is the only means available to French-speaking Canadians of keeping the language and traditions inherited from their forefathers. If there is a crisis in the field of education, a fact recognized practically everywhere, let us leave to the provincial authorities the trouble of studying the problem and let us help them to solve it if they so request us. The proposals designed to put an end to the present financial crisis in the field of education referred to in the resolution must come from the provinces. They will I am sure set the required conditions and guarantees.

For all the reasons I just gave—it is already ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker—I must say that I will oppose this resolution of the hon. member for Saskatoon and I move the adjournment of the debate.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Gauthier (Lake St. John) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lapointe: Tomorrow we shall go into supply and continue, and I hope complete, the study of the supplementary estimates. Then we shall take up the legislation as announced by my colleague the Minister of Finance on Friday, in the order in which he announced it.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

INFLATION CURBS AND LOAN CONTROLS

Question No. 36—Mr. Thatcher:

What action has the government or the Bank of Canada taken, in an effort to curb inflation, to control loans made by finance companies, small loan companies, insurance companies, credit unions, etc.?

Answer by: Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance):

The government and the Bank of Canada have made it clear in discussions with finance companies and the larger retailers that a continued expansion of credit is not desirable, but no specific controls have been imposed on loans made by finance companies, small loan companies, insurance companies, credit unions, etc.

WHEAT—DELIVERY QUOTAS, WESTERN PROVINCES

Question No. 47—Mr. Hansell:

1. How many points in the three western provinces respectively closed the last crop year with a wheat delivery of (a) over five bushels quota; (b) five bushels quota; (c) under five bushels quota?
2. How many points in western Canada received an eight bushel quota?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

	Province	Number of delivery points
1. (a) Over five bushels	Manitoba	375
	Saskatchewan	1,001
	Alberta	492
	Total	1,868
(b) On five bushels	Manitoba	—
	Saskatchewan	103
	Alberta	85
	Total	188
(c) Under five bushels	Manitoba	None
	Saskatchewan	"
	Alberta	"
2. On eight bushel quota	Manitoba	316
	Saskatchewan	307
	Alberta	195
	Total	818

STEEL PRODUCTION, 1955-56

Question No. 58—Mr. Gillis:

What was the total tonnage of basic steel produced in Canada for the years 1955 and 1956, by (a) Algoma Steel Corporation; (b) Stelco; (c) Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation?

Answer by: Mr. Dickey, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

Production of steel ingots and steel castings

	Year 1955	Eleven months ended November 1956 net tons of 2,000 lbs.
Steel ingots
Open hearth-basic	3,917,051	4,234,329
Electric	524,692	510,993
Total steel ingots	4,441,743	4,745,322
Steel castings
Open hearth-basic	26,003	29,427
Converter	164	284
Electric	61,491	80,634
Total steel castings	87,658	110,345

(a), (b) and (c) Under section 15 of the Statistics Act returns for individual companies may not be released.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 29, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES

SOBLE SPY RING—INQUIRY AS TO RAMIFICATIONS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister give any report to the house in connection with the investigation into the connections or ramifications disclosed by the Soble spy ring in the United States? What is the present position in Canada as to any connection between the operations of the Sobles in Canada with those carried on in the United States?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understood that in my absence some interest was taken in this matter and in anticipation of a question such as that asked by the Leader of the Opposition I have prepared the following statements:

Hon. members will have read in the newspapers that the United States federal bureau of investigation has recently made several arrests charging residents of the United States with espionage. Under arrest are Jack and Myra Soble and Jacob Albam. As the members are aware, the policy of the Department of Justice is carefully to refrain from disclosing information relating to security matters, and the department is especially careful in this regard when the security matter concerned involves the security services of friendly nations with which we co-operate in security work. The federal bureau of investigation of the United States is one of such security services and naturally we have been co-operating with it in this case in question by investigating Canadian aspects of the case.

For obvious reasons it is quite impossible for me to disclose any facts revealed by our investigation, since these may relate to the security both of Canada and the United States; and, in addition, the members no doubt have noted that this case is sub judice in the United States courts at the present time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, could the minister go so far as to say whether or not any investigation that has taken place—as revealed in the United States press—in which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were co-operating with the federal bureau of investigation indicates that any of the activities of the Sobles in connection with their business operations in this country were found to emanate from or to be connected with the U.S.S.R. or its embassy here?

Mr. Garson: Well, Mr. Speaker, in line with the position that we have always taken, I am sure my hon. friend upon reflection will consider that the question he has just asked seeks to elicit information of precisely the kind that we avoid giving. In other words, the information which he seeks if given might conceivably be of more value to those who are not friendly with us than any possible value it could have in satisfying my hon. friend's curiosity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would be the last to want to prejudice in any way the investigation but the information is available in the United States press and I am wondering why parliament should be denied information as to whether or not the U.S.S.R. embassy is involved in this matter.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, Canada in common with other free countries of the world pursues the same policy, I believe, with regard to the maintaining of secrecy in relation to security matters.

Now, as my hon. friend correctly points out, when prosecutions take place in a free country the trial has to be in public, and in due course, in order to meet the necessities of these prosecutions, information has to be made public which up until that time has been kept secret. I am sure my hon. friend will agree that until the time comes when it is necessary to disclose it for the purpose of a public prosecution it is very much in the interests of ourselves and our allies that security should be maintained in relation to it.

DISABLED PERSONS

REFERENCE TO DEFINITION OF TOTAL AND PERMANENT DISABILITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Can the minister tell the house when we may expect some change for the better in the definition of total and permanent disability contained in the regulations under the disabled persons pension act?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend last Friday gave me notice of his intention to ask this question. He will recall that late last fall there was a meeting between the provincial departments concerned and the federal government regarding regulations which have to do with the disability pensions legislation to which the hon. gentleman has drawn my attention. I can tell my hon. friend that following that meeting a revised definition was drafted and sent to all the provinces for their consideration. As soon as the provinces advise us that this and other proposed changes in the regulations are acceptable to them we will lose no time in our turn as a government in dealing with the proposed revision of the regulations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY MR. DULLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. He will have read in the press over the week end the reports of the statement made by Mr. Dulles before a Senate committee in Washington to this effect:

> If I were an American boy, as you call it, going to fight in the Middle East, I would rather not have a French and British soldier, one at my left hand and one at my right. I think I would feel a lot safer.

Is there not some protest the Canadian government could make to Washington which would have the effect of stopping these provocative statements?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows as all hon. members of the house know that this statement attributed to Mr. Dulles taken out of its context has been interpreted as reflecting upon the valour of French and British soldiers, and he knows that there have been given complete explanations to the effect that nothing of the kind was intended and all that was intended was to imply that, because of the feelings in the Middle East toward the British and the French arising out of the crisis connected with the Suez incident, their presence with United States troops might be more provocative than the presence of United States troops alone. I think that an expression like that taken out of its context is subject to misinterpretation. I think it is fortunate that there have been serious attempts made to clear up the misinterpretations placed upon those words.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. Green: Does the Prime Minister not realize that this statement has already caused grave concern in Great Britain and in France? Surely Canada, trying to get these nations together again, could help by making some protest to Washington against any such further statements being made.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do not agree that a diplomatic protest by Canada to Washington would have the effect desired by my hon. friend.

KASHMIR—INQUIRY AS TO CANADA'S POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Canadian government has expressed any view or indicated any policy with respect to the Kashmir situation and the action of the government of India. Have there been any discussions with other commonwealth countries as a result of this situation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that there have been discussions as late as yesterday between the under-secretary of state for external affairs and the high commissioner of the United Kingdom, and I know there have been other discussions. I am sure the hon. gentleman appreciates, as we do, the importance of this matter and shares the hope that there will be a solution found that will not cause any serious disturbance in the relations between the various members of the commonwealth. Of course the hon. gentleman would, I am sure, agree that it is a matter about which it is difficult for other members of the commonwealth to do more than express their keen desire to be as helpful as possible to the parties in reaching an amicable settlement and that they all deplore the state of affairs that has gone on since 1947 in connection with this area of what was previously known as India.

Mr. Fulton: Then are we to understand that these discussions are continuing and that the matter is still the subject of negotiation, in which case I would imagine that most hon. members might feel we should not ask for a report until the negotiations are concluded; or is it just a matter of representations having been made and the matter resting there, in which case I think we would be entitled to press to know what the representations were?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I should not like to use the word "negotiations" because these discussions have been matters of consultation between the members of the commonwealth other than India and Pakistan as to what each or all of them could do to help in bringing about an amicable settlement of the issue. From that I would not want hon. members of the house to take it that there have been no discussions of it with the representatives of both India and Pakistan. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it has been the subject of very earnest conversations along the lines, of course, that it was a matter that had to be primarily settled by those two governments but that its settlement was of great interest to all the members of the commonwealth.

[Later:]

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister supplementary to that addressed to him by the hon. member for Kamloops. Would the Prime Minister advise the house whether or not the Kashmir situation was the subject of discussions between the Prime Minister and Prime Minister Nehru when he was in this country? If so, would he tell us what was that discussion and advise us if any correspondence has been exchanged between him and Prime Minister Nehru since the recent taking over by India of Kashmir?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, there has been no correspondence exchanged on the subject of Kashmir with the Prime Minister of India since his visit to Ottawa. As to my confidential conversations with him, I do not think it would be proper for me to attempt to disclose them here in the house.

STATELESS PERSONS—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister now give the house a definite answer to the question to which he gave a tentative answer on Friday, namely, is Canada yet a signatory to the United Nations convention on the status of stateless persons?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada is not a signatory. The matter is under consideration and study.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have a supplementary question. How much longer than 2½ years does the minister think he and his colleagues will require before they come to a decision?

Mr. Martin: I think my hon. friend will find that the length of time he has indicated is not in harmony with the facts.

KING SAUD—INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government given consideration to extending an invitation to His Majesty King Saud of Saudi Arabia to pay a visit to Canada during the time His Majesty is visiting in North America?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that matter has not yet received consideration.

AGRICULTURE

PRODUCER MARKETING BOARDS—NEW LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government any new marketing legislation to present to the house at this session following a recent ruling by the supreme court of Ontario?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet given full consideration to this question and, when it has, a report will be made to the house.

HEALTH INSURANCE

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister now in a position to make a statement to the house on the present state of negotiations between the province of Ontario and the federal government with respect to health or hospitalization insurance? In particular will he comment on the Ontario government's confidence that tuberculosis and mental cases will be included in the proposed plan?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I dealt with this matter on Friday last. There is nothing more I can add following the announcement made in the speech from the throne yesterday in the Ontario legislature that the government of the province of Ontario is tabling today in the legislature its plan which it anticipates might come within the ambit of the proposal made by the federal government for a system of hospital insurance. I cannot add anything more at this time to what I have already said.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister has tabled the correspondence between the federal government and the governments of the three western provinces regarding this matter, will he make public or will he table the correspondence with the Ontario government regarding this same matter?

Mr. Martin: I will be very glad to suggest to the premier of the province of Ontario at the earliest possible moment that this correspondence should be tabled; but I will have to wait until I hear from the premier of Ontario pursuant to the arrangements which we have made with him.

FINANCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER CONCERNING INFLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance or perhaps in his absence to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the headlines in the Montreal Gazette where the Minister of Finance is urging the Canadian people to help defeat inflation. Would the Prime Minister care to tell the house what difference there is, so far as inflation is concerned, between people spending their own money and the government spending it for them?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That would depend entirely upon the purpose for which money was expended.

EGGS

TORONTO—REPORTED DOWNGRADING BELOW MINIMUM PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the minister know if it is legal for firms in Toronto to buy from producers grade A large eggs at 30 cents and grade down to an average price across the board of 23½ cents?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know from any information which has come to my attention that such a transaction has taken place. I only know, looking at the prices this morning, that they are as high as 39 cents for grade A large on the market in Toronto. I cannot understand why anybody would sell them for less.

[Mr. Martin.]

REFERENCE TO REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house whether he has investigated the situation with regard to egg prices, something which, according to recent press reports, the minister undertook to do at a meeting with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture? Can the minister say whether he is prepared to recommend a change in the present method of support prices for eggs which will result in the producer receiving greater benefits from the price support than is at present the case?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call your attention to the fact that this question is in a form which is condemned by the rules of this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend is giving information rather than asking for it.

Mr. Fulton: That is the only way we can get any information.

Mr. Gardiner: If the information were correct there could not be any objection to it. As a matter of fact I was in Winnipeg last week attending the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the question asked me was as to whether I knew that eggs were selling that day in Toronto at from 33 cents to 34 cents a dozen. I said, "Yes, I knew". I had received information the day before that eggs were selling at that price and I said that it would be necessary for me to take the plane that night at 6.10, irrespective of what question period there might be, in order to be here on Thursday morning to deal with it. I did not say, "to make investigations"; those investigations had been made and were continually made from December up to that time and I dealt with it in the manner that was reported in this house a few days ago, namely, to indicate that we were prepared to take delivery of oil-dipped grade A large eggs at 38 cents a dozen as from that time, an hour before the session opened last Thursday. Those eggs, of course, had to be oil-dipped. The oil dipping costs a cent a dozen, so that we were prepared to cover the cost of the extra cent, making it 39 cents on the basis of the program which has been carried on for the last five or six years.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to clear up this egg situation with the Minister of Agriculture. In my riding producers shipping eggs to Toronto find that after the eggs have been delivered and the return comes back they are in this situation. One return came back from the Dominion Stores which paid an average price across the board of 23½ cents a dozen. Is that legal?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it depends on the situation. As far as the legality is concerned, I do not want to discuss that question because I am not an authority on it. But it is possible that certain grades of eggs might average out at 23 cents a dozen back at the point of delivery. I am not sure about that. If it is a nest run of eggs I certainly could. If they are medium size eggs I would have to examine the records very carefully in order to find out what the price would be. It has been running 7 cents, 8 cents or 9 cents below the grade A large at times but the eggs which are guaranteed are grade A large eggs, and the prices which I quoted are for grade A large eggs.

Mr. Hodgson: The grade A large eggs in this case were 30 cents a dozen.

Mr. Gardiner: That is possible.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL—STATEMENT ON INVESTIGATION INTO INCREASED PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the question asked last Wednesday regarding the Combines Investigation Act, in connection with the recent increase in the price of gasoline?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it has been. The question which the hon. member for Mackenzie asked on that occasion was: Has the minister's attention been drawn to the items in this morning's papers reporting that five of the major oil companies in Canada yesterday announced price increases in gasoline and fuel oil of about a cent a gallon at the wholesale level; and will the minister consider ordering an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act with a view to determining whether or not there is a combine which resulted in these price increases being announced at the same time.

My answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is as follows:

As I have already explained on several recent occasions, it is the practice of the combines branch to observe notable price changes and to consider carefully whether they raise any reasonable suspicion of a combine. The combines branch has, accordingly, been noting price changes in the petroleum market since they began early this month.

Whether or not this attention will lead to any formal inquiries is a matter which is not known at the present time, and if it were known I would not be in a position to discuss it further unless and until a report were made to me by the restrictive trade practices commission in the usual way.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FAUTEUX COMMISSION REPORT—ACTION TO BE TAKEN IN IMPLEMENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, one which I have been pursuing now for a couple of years, on probation. The minister has encouraged me to wait for the report of the Fauteux commission. This report has now been produced, and my question is whether the government has reached any decision with regard to carrying out the recommendations of this commission for action at the dominion level.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has been good enough to give my secretary oral notice of the question he has asked today, I have been able to prepare in reply a statement which I now present.

On July 20 last, shortly after the Fauteux report was made public, I wrote to the provincial attorneys general pointing out that the Fauteux recommendations would require for their implementation action by the parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures of Canada; and that I therefore thought that the federal and provincial ministers should consider the report in a joint conference to this end.

In their replies to this letter the provincial authorities indicated dates for such a meeting that varied from early in the month of October to as late as mid-January of this year.

Meanwhile, we had been getting ready for such a conference and, in this connection, gathering together all the available, relevant data. This proved to be a bigger task than we had anticipated, so on October 18 I wrote to the provincial ministers to suggest that the best way of arriving at an accurate set of comparable figures for both federal and provincial ministers would be to have a meeting in Ottawa of senior federal and provincial officials for the exchange of the necessary statistical information. A meeting of senior federal and provincial officials was accordingly held in Ottawa on November 14 and 15 last, attended by representatives of all of the provinces except two.

The proceedings of this conference have been transcribed by the reporter who was in attendance. It was agreed by the meeting that the provinces would supply us with 100 copies of the statistical information which they had sent to this conference in order that we might redistribute this among the other provinces concerned.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that we received the last of this material from the last province to report within the past 48 hours and these copies are now on their way to the provinces concerned.

The deliberations of the federal and provincial senior officials have made it clear that a large amount of work is still required to be done before either the provincial or federal governments can be in a position to discuss in any adequate manner the policy decisions that would be involved in considering the implementation of the Fauteux report.

Forthwith, after the conference at Ottawa in November last with the federal and provincial officials, the officers of the Department of Justice began work on the preparation of proposals covering the entire field of corrections which will be submitted for approval to the federal cabinet and then to a conference of federal and provincial ministers for consideration. I have already pointed out to the provincial ministers that it is difficult to predict at this time how long it will take for the proposals of the government of Canada to be placed in final form for their consideration, but that in view of the fact that we do not as yet have all of the provincial material before us—we have not had any reply from two of the provinces—and considering the multiplicity and magnitude of the problems involved, I did not see at that time how this could be done in less than five to six months.

I have informed the provincial ministers that as soon as our work is completed it is my hope that we would be able to send our proposals by mail to the provincial governments and that after they had had an opportunity to consider them, I will ask the provincial ministers concerned to meet with us in Ottawa, at a mutually acceptable time, for a discussion of the issues involved.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to ask a supplementary question. I must say that the minister's report sounds to me like the old slogan from the child's game, "this year, next year, some time, never." I want to ask the minister whether there has been any offer made to the provinces along the lines of the recommendation of the Archambault report nearly 20 years ago which, as the minister very well knows, recommended in item 74 that "the pay and duties of probation officers should be the subject of an agreement between the provincial and federal authorities." Was any offer made pursuant to that at this meeting? Was there any indication given of co-operation or was it just an exercise in putting off?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I must repudiate in as forceful language as I can command any suggestion of my hon. friend, which I think is quite unworthy of him, that this was a put-off performance. If my hon. friend, who I understand has given this matter a good deal of study and who, I gather, is the expert of his party upon this subject—

Mr. Macdonnell: Not an expert.

Mr. Garson: —has any comprehension of the subject matter at all, he will know that it is quite impossible for a conference of federal and provincial ministers to gather together to discuss policy decisions unless they have all of the available data before them. All the provincial ministers were of the same view, and it was with that in mind that this conference of senior civil service officials was arranged. We were all agreed that this was the proper procedure to follow, and they on their side and we on our side are going forward with the matter as quickly as circumstances will permit.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister has not answered my question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister has not yet answered my question, which is very simple.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell: Did the government give any indication of assistance under the recommendation of the Archambault report of 1938 that the pay and duties of probation officers should be the subject of an agreement between the provincial and federal authorities?

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend's second question, may I say that in all of our discussions with the provincial ministers, having regard to the fact that we met to discuss the Fauteux report, no reference was made by any of us to the Archambault report.

DORCHESTER—STATEMENT ON DISTURBANCE AT PENITENTIARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) addressed a question in my absence which my colleague, the Minister of Finance, agreed to take as notice. The question read:

Has the minister heard of the disturbance at Dorchester penitentiary in New Brunswick and, if so, is he in a position to give any details?

I am informed that on Thursday evening last a small group of inmates at Dorchester penitentiary, about 25 in number, refused to eat their evening meal and threw their trays over the landing, causing some disturbance. The situation was quickly brought under control by the officers of the institution without the general population of the institution becoming involved. The meals served had previously been examined by senior officers of the institution in accordance with the usual practice and they report that there was no just cause for complaint. The meal consisted of scrambled eggs, French fried potatoes, wax beans, a large cup cake, bread and butter and tea with milk.

MERCHANDISING

INQUIRY AS TO LEGALITY OF TRADING STAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Did the Canadian association of consumers draw to the attention of the minister the circulation of these trading stamps by some of the food stores, and did the minister inform the association that the matter would be looked into with a view to finding whether any legislation covered it? If so, has any conclusion been reached by the minister with regard to this matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): In reply to my hon. friend's question, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I received representations with regard to this subject matter from a large number of individuals and associations. My recollection is that I received a communication from the Canadian association of consumers but I should not like to undertake now to repeat, with any pretence to accuracy, the nature of my reply.

Mr. Coldwell: I think I saw it. That is why I am asking the question.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend saw it, he can read it. The situation is that we have, as my hon. friend knows, upon the books now a law against trading stamps which has been in existence since 1905. It was continued at the last consolidation of the Criminal Code notwithstanding the fact that we received representations upon behalf of the trading stamp companies to have it repealed. This law is still in existence. The position that we have taken is that we should like to have this law tested before we ask parliament to consider any amendment to it if for no other reason than to know with greater assurance the nature of the amendment that might be required.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO ACCESS TO DEPARTMENTAL RECORDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Are treaty Indians allowed access to the records of the Indian affairs branch in order to defend themselves against eviction proceedings?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would be quite impossible to answer this question intelligibly or intelligently in the form in which it is asked because there is no such thing as an eviction proceeding applied to treaty Indians. I presume what the hon. gentleman means is, are persons living on Indian reserves, whose status as Indians has been protested, allowed access to the records of the department in order to help them establish their claim that they are Indians. If that is what this question means the answer is, most certainly they are.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—SITUATION ON HOBBEMA RESERVE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, reverting to Indians, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister been informed that Chief Walking Eagle of the Stony band has, in relation to the Hobbema situation, suggested that Indians in the Rocky Mountain House section of my constituency are talking of the possibility of resorting to the old practice of scalping their enemies, and has the government taken any steps to evacuate the few remaining government supporters from possible danger?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that this subject has been talked about, and I trust that in this case, as in others, it will end where it began, in talk.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. To correct the injustice being suffered by the 118 members of the Hobbema Indian band in Alberta, is the minister giving consideration to the resolution passed by the Alberta bar association that section 12 of the Indian Act of 1951 be repealed on a retroactive basis? Will such an amendment to the act be proposed at the current session of parliament?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the minister is not giving consideration to recommending any such amendment. The minister wishes to reiterate his hope that the persons who feel aggrieved and their solicitors will enter an appeal so that the courts may decide the issue.

Mr. Nickle: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister indicate what action will be taken by his department in connection with the petition to Her Majesty the Queen sent forward by members of the Hobbema band? Will this petition go from Ottawa to its destination in London?

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand, sir, the petition has been directed to me as the responsible minister and I shall have to give consideration to what is the proper course to take from that point on.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the minister not go farther than that and say that action will be taken to remove the injustice that is being done to these Indians? Is there not some course that he intends to follow other than passing the buck in connection with this matter?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me in the first place that this is not a question. What strikes me as a simple layman to be much worse about it is that a barrister should rise in the house and suggest that when an appeal to the courts is provided by law something else should be substituted for that appeal.

GRAIN

BOX CAR DISTRIBUTION AND GRAIN MOVEMENT—INQUIRY AS TO HOLDING OF CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Has the conference recommended by the agricultural committee during the last session of parliament to deal with improvements in box car distribution and grain transportation been called together as yet?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the distribution of box cars is not under the administration of my department.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, if that is so I should like to direct the same question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the conference recommended by the agricultural committee to deal with grain transportation and box car distribution been called together?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. As I recall the recommendation, it was not suggested that the department call the meeting together. I do not remember who was to call it, but I have not heard that it has been arranged.

CRIMINAL LAW

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. This appears to be his day, too. Since last asked in the house, has the minister discussed or had any correspondence with the chief justice of the Ontario high court division with reference to the possibility of speeding up the report on sex criminals? If so, when might the report be expected?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when in my absence in western Canada last week my hon. friend from York West asked this question in the house my deputy was diligent in the matter and telephoned Chief Justice McRuer and received this reply:

> Members of the commission are finding the problem extremely difficult but are exercising the utmost diligence in the preparation of their report which will be delivered just as soon as it is possible.

The chief justice was unwilling to be more definite than that.

[Later:]

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the very unsatisfactory answer received from the chief justice of the high court division of Ontario with respect to the time of bringing in his report would the minister consider fixing a date at which time if the report does not materialize someone else would be appointed to complete the work who would have more time to devote to the subject matter?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, my answer to my hon. friend is "No, sir."

Mr. Hamilton (York West): A further supplementary question. Since there is every indication that nothing is going to be done about this problem until the report is in, does it mean that the government is giving no thought to taking some action in the near future?

Mr. Garson: I am trying to be as courteous as I can to my hon. friend.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): My questions were courteous.

Mr. Garson: I am not suggesting that my hon. friend's questions were not courteous, but the amount of knowledge he brings to the subject produces a result which is not very courteous to those who know something about it. When the hon. member implies by his question that the chief justice of Ontario and his colleagues upon this commission have been remiss in not producing a report before now in respect to a subject matter which if I am not mistaken has not been very successfully reported upon by any human being, no matter how learned upon the subject, he is making an insinuation which is quite undeserved and against which I must protest.

In so far as the government are concerned, we appointed the members of that body because we had confidence in them and we have confidence in the expedition with which they are carrying on their work. Having some knowledge of its difficulty we are prepared to wait for their report until they can produce one for which they wish to vouch, and upon the basis of which we can produce legislation to this house for which we can vouch.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): On a question of privilege, I should like to point out that there is definitely no reason why the minister should draw the inference which he has in making the political speech he has just made.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CHATEAU LAURIER HOTEL—REPORTED CHANGE OF MANAGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to write a contract with the Hilton hotel company for a transfer of the administration of the Chateau Laurier hotel in Ottawa along the lines of the contract for the new Canadian National hotel in Montreal between the railways and this United States company? If the minister answers in the affirmative, is it the intention of the government to keep this new contract as secret as the previous one?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am most interested in the question the hon. member has just asked. This is the first time I have heard any such suggestion made concerning the transfer of the administration of the Chateau Laurier, and having regard to the source of this information which has just come to me, Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether it is accurate.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware that the president of the Canadian National Railways when appearing before the railway committee two years ago indicated that his company would consider a management agreement with other C.N.R. hotels similar to that which exists with the Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal?

Mr. Marler: No. Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the president made that statement and I would have to reread the evidence taken before the committee to see what was said on the subject.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

REPORTED INCREASE IN MAXIMUM PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister care to comment on the report written by Vic Mackie which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press last Friday, to the effect that prairie farm assistance payments would be increased from a maximum of $2.50 to $4 an acre?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sent over to me this newspaper file which has on the front of it a statement written by Mr. Mackie, the press gallery representative of the Free Press. The article runs over from the front page to page 14 and I have not yet been able to find page 14 in this large file so I am not going to attempt to reply to all that may be contained in the article. I shall simply say that last Friday a resolution appeared in Votes and Proceedings which set out practically all that is contained in the part of the article which appears on the front page of the Free Press with the exception of a reference to $4, which of course would not be included, and I presume from what has been said that there is a reference to $2.50 in the continuation of the article on page 14. All I can say is that the writer of the article apparently has read the resolution very carefully and he has done some guessing on his own part which may be more or less close to what will be contained in the bill when it is brought down.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION OF RESIDENCE REQUIREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received any representations requesting the reduction from 20 to 10 years of the residence requirement under the Old Age Assistance Act? If so, is the government prepared to give favourable consideration to such an amendment?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of my hon. friend's question is yes. The government, as he knows, is always giving consideration to any matter that has to do with the welfare of the people of Canada.

Mr. Zaplitny: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister been informed by the minister of public welfare of Ontario that the government of that province is prepared to agree to such an amendment at this time?

Mr. Martin: I cannot recall that that is the case but I would be pleased to look at my files and see whether or not that is the situation.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM—REPORTED DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING RECIPROCAL PENSION ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I direct another question to the Prime Minister. Evidently in the British House of Commons late last week the under-secretary for commonwealth relations, Mr. Alport, told that house that the British government was considering approaching Canada with a view to working out some form of reciprocal agreement regarding pension rights and other benefits for persons moving between the two countries, the idea apparently being to further migration. Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether the Canadian government has any such plan in mind and whether it would be willing to enter into an agreement of that nature?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the government of the United Kingdom wants to make any suggestion about an agreement to the government of Canada the suggestion will receive consideration, but no suggestions concerning pensions have yet come to our attention.

Mr. Green: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Canadian government ever given any thought to an agreement of this type?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak with authority for all the members of the government. I have never personally given any study to such a proposal.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GORDON COMMISSION REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING MARITIME PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Boo.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Speaker, when will your government finally decide to implement the recommendations of the Gordon commission relative to the backward economy of the maritime provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no government. The hon. member is addressing himself to the Chair at all times, and when he prefaces a question with the words, "When will your government," my answer to him is that I have no government.

Mr. Van Horne: When will the Prime Minister—

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, whenever there is any implementation to be made of the Gordon report the government will make the proper recommendations to the House of Commons.

Mr. Van Horne: When does your government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Van Horne: Does the government intend to take the same sit-down strike attitude it took with regard to the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The government would be quite delighted if the hon. gentleman would stage a sit-down strike himself.

Mr. Van Horne: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Van Horne: A supplementary question. Why do you object—

Mr. Speaker: Order. These questions are all of great interest to me and I should like to be able to hear them.

Mr. Van Horne: A supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Why does the Prime Minister object to answering the question when his very refusal indicates inaction, indifference and traitorship toward the people of the maritime provinces?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I do submit that these are not questions that should be asked on the orders of the day.

HIGHWAYS

REPORTED PAYMENT FOR CONTRACT IN NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. He has not yet had one today. This question arises out of press reports concerning a contractor who paid $12,500 in order to obtain a contract to do certain work on a highway in northwestern Ontario. Can the minister say whether any portion of that highway was part of the trans-Canada highway system? If not, does he know whether this practice has been followed in relation to work on any portion of the trans-Canada highway?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I have not seen the report in question. If the hon. member will bring it to my attention I shall look into it.

Mr. Knowles: It is on the front page of this morning's Globe and Mail.

INDUSTRY

POLYMER CORPORATION—DEVELOPMENT AT RED DEER, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What development is planned by Polymer Corporation on certain lands adjacent to Red Deer, Alberta, and when can some action be expected in this regard?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, plans are being developed by Polymer for a location in Alberta. At the moment progress in planning has not reached the point where an announcement can be made. When that point has been reached, I shall be glad to make an announcement to the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CONFERENCE TO REDUCE ACCIDENT RATE ON SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister report to the house the results of a conference held yesterday between the chairman and officials of the workmen's compensation board of British Columbia and officials of his department on ways and means of reducing the accident rate on ships loading in British Columbia ports?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to report to the house the results of the discussions which have been going on between officials of my department and officials of the workmen's compensation board of British Columbia. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the discussions began only this morning. I have not had any report of them and I think it would be more appropriate to discuss the subject when my estimates are before the house.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. Van Horne (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the Prime Minister for his compliment. May I now direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When will the government announce that it has finally acceded to our demands that old age pensions be increased?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Apparently the hon. gentleman is not aware that all that has been done in this field has been done on this side.

Mr. Van Horne: A supplementary question. Does the minister want any proof that he is absolutely wrong?

Mr. Martin: The proof that I am absolutely right is the hon. gentleman himself.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CRIMINAL CODE

STATEMENT ON ENFORCEMENT BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last on the orders of the day the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Reinke) asked if I could comment on the question whether there are any steps which the federal government might be able to take to ensure a more rigid enforcement by the provincial governments of the Criminal Code, in view of certain representations that the hon. member stated he had received from the parents' action league in Hamilton and also in view of what he referred to as recent tragedies.

I should say at the outset that I am not aware of any failure on the part of any provincial government to enforce the Criminal Code. Be that as it may, under our system of law it is the responsibility of this parliament to enact the criminal law and it is the responsibility of the provincial governments to see to the due enforcement of that law. I can only suggest that if in any province any person considers that the criminal law should in any respect be more rigidly enforced his representations in this respect should be made to the attorney general of the province concerned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MIDDLE EAST—STATEMENT ON LOCATION AND ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) asked if I would inform the house as to the present location of Canadian troops serving with the United Nations emergency force in the Middle East and report on their present activities. There are at present approximately 1,100 Canadian service personnel in Italy and the Middle East. Of the approximately 800 Canadian army personnel in the Middle East, roughly 600 are stationed at the United Nations emergency force base at Abu Suweir in Egypt, and approximately 200 at the United Nations emergency force headquarters at El Ballah, 30 miles south of Port Said on the Suez canal.

In accordance with the request of the United Nations our soldiers are providing communications, engineering and administrative support to the whole emergency force. The activities of these troops are, I think, sufficiently indicated by the names of the units into which they are organized. These are the Canadian base unit, Middle East, comprising some 252 personnel; a signal squadron, composed of 182 personnel; a transport company with 208 personnel, and an infantry workshop consisting of 149 R.C.E.M.E. personnel.

I might mention that the base unit contains an engineering detachment which has been engaged in clearing mine fields, repairing roads and bridges, etc.; a detachment of medical personnel who operate a small hospital, and an ordnance detachment which handles and accounts for stores for the whole United Nations emergency force, and small detachments of other services.

The Royal Canadian Air Force now has four Otter aircraft and one Dakota stationed at Abu Suweir at the disposal of the United Nations commander, and four C-119's based at Capodichino in Italy.

The number of air force personnel presently in Italy and Egypt varies from day to day, but runs to about 220 in Italy and 80 in Abu Suweir in Egypt. It might interest hon. members to know that since the establishment of No. 435 squadron at Capodichino on November 25, 1956, a total of 106 trips has been made to Abu Suweir, and 2,932 personnel and 764,722 pounds of freight have been carried without incident or accident.

Since the departure of H.M.C.S. Magnificent, no naval personnel are now in the area.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, with regard to Canadian troops in Egypt? From whom are our troops presently in the Middle East, and particularly, in Egypt, drawing their rations and what is the line of supply?

Mr. Campney: I think the United Nations has set up its own line of supply and, like most of the features which go to make up this new force, it is different in its composition and nature from anything we have had before; I cannot give details of the supply line. I know, however, that the troops have expressed themselves as being very satisfied with the whole supply system. It is being carried on by our own troops, but just where the sources of supply are I cannot say.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): May I ask a supplementary question arising from the minister's first statement. Can the minister inform the house what welfare services are available to our troops in the Middle East?

Mr. Campney: We have a small welfare unit in the Middle East ourselves; I have made inquiries from time to time and I understand the amenities are all being satisfactorily taken care of, except that there was some dearth of Canadian news but we have taken steps in an effort to rectify that. Otherwise we have had no complaints at all.

Mr. Dinsdale: Has the minister received any offer of services from a voluntary organization?

Mr. Campney: No, none as yet.

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): May I put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell us where Canadian troops buy their food stores—is it from the Egyptian government, or from Israel or from Italy?

Mr. Campney: They are being supplied by the United Nations from various United Nations sources.

STATEMENT ON SELECTION OF NEW ARMOURED REGIMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might make a short statement in relation to the armoured regiment which is being made part of the regular army. On Friday last, I think, I stated in the house that I would be able to make an announcement shortly in that regard.

I may say that the selection of this regiment has not been an easy task, because there are a large number of armoured units in the Canadian militia which have long and distinguished histories.

The matter of seniority in the militia list, the geographical location of the unit, the intended location of the new regular unit, the location of the two existing regular armoured units, the areas of Canada now represented by units in the Canadian regular army, and a suitable national name were all factors that had to be considered.

After giving careful thought to all these factors, the decision has been taken to select the 8th Princess Louise's (New Brunswick) Hussars.

As it is considered essential that any unit selected should have a name indicating that it is a unit of the Canadian army, preferably without other local or provincial geographical connotation, the 8th Princess Louise's (New Brunswick) Hussars has been redesignated as the 8th Canadian Hussars (Princess Louise's), and the regiment, under this name, will be brought into the regular army. The regular unit will be known as the First 8th Canadian Hussars (Princess Louise's) and the militia unit will be known as the 2/8th.

The new armoured regiment will be located at Camp Gagetown, with one squadron at Valcartier, Quebec.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask the Minister of National Defence what reduction in personnel is indicated by the disbandment of two infantry battalions and the formation of the new armoured regiment; secondly, will the men of this disbanded infantry battalion be given the opportunity to transfer to other units of the active army if they so desire.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, it is not felt that on balance there will be any reduction in the over-all number of personnel in the army, because, first of all, the personnel of the two battalions which are being run down will be used to strengthen the other two battalions of the Canadian Guards, and to provide reinforcements for the various units which need to be expanded in order to serve the new armoured regiment. Some may, of course, elect to go into the new armoured regiment. As I say, I think that on balance the total number will be about the same.

Mr. Pearkes: And they will all have the opportunity to transfer to other units?

Mr. Campney: I would not like to say how wide that opportunity would be, but I presume an opportunity will be given them; they will select what they want to do, and effect will be given to their wishes.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, regarding the announcement which the minister made respecting the Princess Louise's Hussars. What preference will be given to the officers and men who are already serving in the present militia unit of the same name?

Mr. Campney: That is a matter of internal arrangement. I presume the staff will have worked out a system of handling the new officers and personnel. Just what the position of the militia personnel will be in that arrangement, I would not attempt to say.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—DECISION OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on January 16 the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) asked a series of questions, and the answers are necessarily long. In view of the fact that the hon. member who asked the questions cannot be in the house today, perhaps, in order to save time, the house would agree that the answers be printed in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings rather than that I should read them.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the reply which the parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs is prepared to give at the moment be printed in Hansard as if it had actually been given in the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Would it not suffice that it be appended to the written answers merely with a statement that the following is an answer to an oral question reported at such and such a page in Hansard?

Mr. Knowles: That is better.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that this be done?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of answers referred to above, see pages 789-90.)

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

University grants—

541. To authorize payments to the national conference of Canadian universities (hereinafter called "the conference") for the purpose of making grants to institutions of higher learning in accordance with an agreement entered into or to be entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, between the Minister of Finance and the conference, such agreement to include, inter alia, provision that the total amount of grants to all the institutions of higher learning in any one province be calculated by multiplying the population of the province by $1, and that any amount payable to an institution of higher learning and not paid by the conference in the present fiscal year may be retained by the conference until such time as the institution to which the money is payable claims the payment from the conference or parliament provides otherwise for the disposal thereof; the amount appropriated under vote 132 of the Appropriation Act No. 6, 1956 to be applied to the purposes of this vote; additional amount required, $7,986,000.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, this vote represents a recommendation by the government that the grants that have been made since 1951 to aid universities in the discharge of their increasing responsibilities to the Canadian public be increased, in fact, be doubled and be calculated on the basis of $1 per capita of the Canadian population instead of 50 cents per capita of the Canadian population, as has been the case heretofore. Hon. members will remember that when the Massey commission held its hearings throughout the country all Canadian universities asked for special financial assistance from the federal government and that several organizations supported that claim. The Massey commission itself felt that such assistance was not only needed but urgent, and recommended:

> That . . . the federal government make annual contributions to support the work of the universities on the basis of the population of each of the provinces of Canada.

The commission further recommended:

> That these contributions be made after consultation with the government and the universities of each province, to be distributed to each university proportionately to the student enrolment.

The basis used by the commission as an illustration to determine the level of these contributions was 50 cents per head of population. It will be remembered that in 1951, after further representations from the Canadian universities and consultations with provincial governments, it was decided to recommend to parliament that that recommendation of the Massey commission be implemented. I am under the impression that it was the kind of recommendation that commended itself to practically all hon. members of the house, and an amount calculated on the basis of 50 cents per head of population has been included in the estimates ever since.

These payments were distributed directly to the institutions recognized by the provincial authorities as of university level in each province. The total amount was divided in proportion to the whole population of each province and within the province was divided among the institutions in proportion to the student enrolment in the courses leading to university degrees.

In the province of Quebec the authorities saw fit to allow this aid to be accepted for the first year only because it was stated that they feared that this was a first step towards encroachment on the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures in the field of education. I am sorry that that position was taken because I think that the institutions in Quebec could have made as good use of their share of this grant in past years as we know was made by the institutions of university level in the other provinces of Canada. I am sure that the work of the universities has been materially assisted by these grants and I do not think that their freedom and independence have been jeopardized in any way by the acceptance and use of the grants thus provided out of the appropriations made by the parliament of Canada.

In the meantime the situation of our universities has probably worsened. The most tragic aspect of this situation is undoubtedly the economic insecurity of the teaching profession. In its preliminary report the Gordon commission has stated the problem as follows:

> University salaries have barely kept pace with the changes which have occurred in the price level since pre-war days. Living standards of university teachers, especially of those in the higher ranks, have not increased with the general prosperity of the country as a whole. In fact, they have declined, and declined substantially, in relative terms.

Then a little further on:

These salaries do not bear comparison with the scales of remuneration which able men can command in business or in the professions or even with the earnings of some skilled workmen.

They go on to say:

The total annual cost of all salaries paid to assistant, associate and full professors in Canada at the present time, including deans and heads of departments, is about $12 million. As already stated we believe that it is important that the salaries of university teachers be increased very considerably.

Recently the executive council of the Canadian association of university teachers adopted unanimously a national salary scale of $8,000, $11,000 and $14,000 for assistant, associate and full professors. This scale is intended to secure to university teachers today their pre-war status and is based on 1938 average salaries multiplied by 3.5 which represents the composite increase in the cost of living and in the average real product of the Canadian worker since 1938.

The application of that new scale of salaries will involve the doubling of present salaries in central and western Canada and would require an additional annual expenditure by universities of approximately $12 million. Moreover, university enrolments are now rapidly increasing and it is expected that they will double by about 1965 which means, according to reliable estimates, that the staff of the universities should also be twice as large as it is now if young Canadians are to receive proper attention from the teaching staffs of the universities. This means that to meet our needs in this field our universities will have to devote about four times as much money on the salaries of teachers as they spend now.

We are now facing a dilemma which may be defined in simple terms. If the universities cannot spend more than at present on salaries, they will not only be unable to attract more teachers but they will be apt to lose more of the good ones they now have as, unfortunately, has been going on for some time past. In view of our rapidly increasing needs, I think this would have a pretty tragic effect on the development of Canada as a nation and I feel that all Canadians would not want such a crisis to take place. On the other hand, if universities are to fulfil their important role they must attract an increasing number of competent teachers and to do this they must be able to spend much more on salaries by 1965 than they spend at the present time.

The Gordon commission concludes its appraisal of this problem as follows:

In this connection it must suffice for us to express the strong opinion that no government which bears any share of responsibility for the future economic development of this country can allow a solution to the pressing financial problems of the universities to go by default.

That is pretty strong language but I think it is language that is fully justified by the situation facing us. According to the provisions of our constitution, it is clear that provincial governments have the main responsibilities in this field, and I think we are all confident that they will continue to meet that challenge and devote an increasing share of their rising revenues to assist Canadian universities in fulfilling their very necessary and important tasks. However, this has not been regarded in the past as their exclusive responsibility and I hope it will not be regarded in the future as their exclusive responsibility. Private foundations in industry, both in Canada and from abroad, have made important contributions in the past to help our universities and the teachers in them. While we hope that private contributions from other countries, especially those with which we have the closest relations, will be continued,—perhaps even that they might be increased—I am sure that hon. members have noted with great satisfaction the active interest which Canadian industry has shown more recently in this field. Our business men realize more and more that they can no longer afford to be indifferent to the financial problems of our universities, and they have initiated projects which, if fully implemented, will have most beneficial effects. These developments will be most reassuring for all of us—and I am sure that is the overwhelming majority —who want to see not only the survival but the expansion of private institutions of higher learning in Canada and who believe that the diversification of sources of revenue is the best method by which our universities can achieve and maintain the highest degree of intellectual freedom and intellectual independence.

While there is general agreement that provincial governments and private industry should increase their assistance to universities, there are Canadians who feel that the Canadian government should not intervene in this field. I cannot share that view. I believe that the Canadian government has the constitutional right to offer assistance to universities and that it is its duty and responsibility to do so. After all the Canadian people through their elected representatives are the greatest consumer in numbers of the training that is given to our young people in our Canadian universities. If we did not have the Canadian universities to give them that training, we might be in the same position as that in which we find ourselves with respect to the training of officers and directors of our armed forces and be obliged to establish, maintain and operate special schools for their training. I think that would be a great misfortune. I think it would be a great misfortune if the civil servants in the ordinary administration of their fellow citizens' affairs were not trained in the same way and were not regarded as part of the general public about whose affairs they are obliged to busy themselves.

I have seen countries where there seemed to be one group that was the government group, going from the prime minister right down through every degree of civil servant, whilst the governed were another group. That is not the way in which we have been brought up. That is not our way of life. In our democratic institutions it is the people themselves who select from among themselves, directly or through their representatives, those who are entrusted with the administration of such of their affairs as must be administered for the group at large. I think that is a more healthy situation than would be the case if we trained a certain number of young Canadian citizens for the occupancy of any ivory towers of civil administration.

It is on the same general basis of its constitutional right to devote funds from the consolidated revenue fund to national needs that the federal government has distributed, through the national research council, an amount of approximately $25 million since 1917 for postgraduate research in the field of the national sciences, these amounts being distributed to individuals and to universities. A great number of other federal programs have the same constitutional basis. Family allowances; the national health program; our financial contributions to pensions for the blind and for disabled persons; our assistance to technical and vocational training and to the unemployed; our equalization payments to the provinces; our contributions under the Canada Forestry Act and the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act, as well as others, belong to the same category of services which are primarily a provincial responsibility but which are of national concern and have benefited from the appropriations by this parliament to assist in carrying them out. All these programs have common features. They are financed through the consolidated revenue fund. They do not involve any element of compulsion and they apply to classes of responsibilities which relate to matters within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces but they do not amount to legislation controlling the administration or the operations of these functions.

From the origin of confederation provincial governments have accepted most of these programs and have participated in the financing of some of them without questioning their constitutional validity. They themselves have used the same continuation of the royal prerogative to apply public funds to matters that would be of value to the national development or to the welfare of the nation as a whole. In my own province where there have been these fears expressed about the constitutional right to make these grants the government, with the authority of the legislature itself, has made similar grants to educational institutions outside the limits of the province. I think the first was made for the University of Ottawa many many years ago, and they have continued to be made. I think they have helped to develop this feeling of interdependence of the people of one area and the people of another area. We feel—and I think parliament has accepted that provision—that it was proper to make grants in aid to further the good work of the universities. Of course, no one is obliged to accept these grants. But their acceptance has not in the past led to any undermining of the legislative jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures in respect of such activities, and I do not think it will do so in the future.

Federal assistance to the universities also raises the question of policy. I think that policy has been, six times already, decided by this house in respect of the earlier grants. I hope an increase, which will amount to approximately one dollar per head in all of the Canadian population, will be regarded as a proper contribution to make to their work.

In order to try to make it appear more obvious that there was no attempt whatsoever to control the activities of or to legislate with respect to the operations of the universities we are making the following recommendation instead of making direct payments to the individual institutions. We are not concerned with the individual institutions as individual institutions. We are concerned nationally with the effect of the university services to the Canadian nation. We are now recommending that instead of having cheques written out by the Department of Finance to each individual institution, the total amount appropriated by parliament for aid to the universities will be turned over to the National Council of Canadian Universities which has been incorporated recently and which, through its appointees, has agreed that it would accept the duty of receiving this amount en bloc from the federal treasury and of apportioning it on the basis as between provinces of the population of each province and on the basis within the province of the number of student enrolments in each institution recognized as being of university level in that province.

Hon. members will have noted that the item in the estimates provides that the amount which had been previously voted in the general estimates under vote 132 of the Appropriation Act No. 6, 1956, will be applied in the same way. In the past these votes, though made during the winter season, were not paid to the universities until late January or in the course of the month of February of the next calendar year. It was felt that if parliament were to consider that it was proper to increase the amount of the aid to the universities to an amount equal to $1 per capita of the Canadian population in view of the existing circumstances, it would not be proper to wait to give effect to that decision until the month of February, 1958. For that reason, this additional amount which will bring the vote up to practically $16 million is set out in language which will make it the duty of the Minister of Finance, after entering into a contract with the incorporated body, the National Council of Canadian Universities, to pay the whole amount over almost at once, as soon as the legislation becomes effective, so that it will be available for use in this calendar year and will not be retarded until the calendar year 1958.

I have been asked why there was this system of turning the grant over to the National Council of Canadian Universities instead of continuing to make the payments to each insitution individually. Well, I had hoped, and I still hope, that ultimately it will convince the people who require university services throughout the whole of Canada that there is no intention and no possibility of this impinging upon the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the respective provinces; that it is something which the Canadian government feels, in the interests of the Canadian people represented by the Canadian government, ought to be done in order to compensate for the direct value it receives from those university services in the training of the personnel fitted to occupy the offices in the administration which as the population increases and as the economy becomes more productive, are increasing in responsibilities and do require trained minds properly to administer the legislation which the representatives of the people adopt in their parliament.

So that there may be no suggestion that the whole Canadian people are being taxed for the benefit of only a portion or only certain regions of the country we want to provide that these amounts, if they are not taken immediately, will remain as a trust in the hands of the National Council of Canadian Universities to be applied for whenever the institution to which they would have been allocated sees fit to apply for them or until parliament sees fit to dispose of them otherwise. These are the terms that are set out in this vote.

Hon. members will recall that in the other votes it was the Minister of Finance who was to determine by regulations the various details that would go to fix what would be the meaning of university level and such other details. Well, all this will be set out in the contract entered into between the government and the National Council of Canadian Universities. As soon as that contract is entered into it will be tabled here and hon. members will see that the draft that is being discussed makes no change in the manner in which the calculations were to be made for the appropriate allocation as between provinces and as between institutions within the provinces in the previous votes for the lesser amounts.

I trust that any misgivings which may exist anywhere as to the possibility of the Canadian parliament wishing to trespass on the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures in respect of education will disappear and that it will be recognized that this is something that is in the interests of the nation as a whole, that is almost indispensable to the proper development of the nation as a whole, and that it will not in any way lessen the feeling of responsibility of the provincial governments or of those other employers of trained minds whether they be industrial or commercial firms or be other like organizations which are beginning to recognize—and I trust they will continue in their recognition —their responsibility—to do their share so that we may continue to have—I think we have had it in the past—university service of which we shall have every reason to be satisfied and be proud; that we shall continue to have the kind of university services that are necessary for the proper development of a nation that has tremendous natural resources, that has been very benevolently blessed by Providence in the area and richness of its land, and which I feel is to be the earthly home of an increasing number of reasonable-minded, well-trained members of the human family who will not only provide good living conditions for themselves in their own land but will continue to make their contribution to the welfare and improvement of human life throughout as large an area of the terrestrial globe as their influence may happen to reach.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister has been at pains to give us a very full and clear exposition of the reasons underlying the grants to universities and the change in the routing of the money, so to speak. I think there will be the widest measure of agreement in this house as to the desirability of assisting universities. That was covered in considerable detail the other day and I shall pause only for a moment or two to comment on what the Prime Minister said about the teaching profession. I think we will all agree with that.

I suppose it may be said that the manner in which those in the teaching profession are treated in a country is a sign of the degree of its civilization and I have sometimes been worried that in our own country we do not treat those in the teaching profession as we should, and this is particularly true in times of great prosperity. It was true in the gay twenties, in the thirties things levelled up better, and now again there has been a falling behind.

It is not disagreeing in the least with what the Prime Minister said concerning what is needed to be done if one offers one or two comments about the teaching profession. There are, of course, those dedicated spirits who regard the teaching profession as a way of life and who would be in it even if it involved something approaching starvation. I remember a professor of mine who sought my assistance one day in the preparation of his income tax. This was a good many years ago and at that time he was earning the munificent salary of $6,000 a year which he thought was a very good salary. I said that I did not agree with him and that he ought to receive the same amount of remuneration as a successful businessman. "Oh," he said, "but look at the kind of work I am doing. Why, if I were a man of means I would be ready to put down a premium to be allowed to do it". Well, Mr. Chairman, there are not many people like that, although there are some and in varying degrees there are dedicated spirits who would teach even though they had to suffer in order to do so. Also as a way of life we must not forget it has great attractions. It offers leisure which the rest of us do not enjoy and I say that not in order to disagree with what has been put forward as to the need but merely to draw attention to these aspects.

We come now to the actual grants. The Prime Minister has explained in considerable detail the reasons for the new method of routing the money. The Prime Minister very naturally is interested in the constitutional aspect of it which is seriously regarded in certain quarters and he has been at pains to explain it to us. Then we come to the national conference of Canadian universities. I suppose it would be a fairly accurate description of the use of the conference if I said it is to be used rather like a conduit pipe for the transfer of the money from the government to the universities. Well, a conduit pipe has not a very elevated function but it is useful and therefore I do not see that it is of vital importance whether the national conference of Canadian universities or the present system is used. I somewhat regret that the national conference will be used because it does not seem to me to be a natural function for it. I do not believe it is incorporated although it will become incorporated.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The letters patent under part 2, I think it is, of the Companies Act were issued on January 18.

Mr. Macdonnell: Thank you. The Prime Minister has I think covered one point which is necessary to be covered. I think it is clear from what he said that the national conference is not to have any discretion whatsoever in the matter of apportioning the funds. I think it would be not only unfortunate but most undesirable if any discretion were left, and that leads me to express the hope that the Prime Minister will give us some indication of the agreement which is to be entered into and which I assume will give definite directions to the national conference as to how the money is to be paid.

I have already said I rather regret that this method is to be used. In the first place it seems to me it is introducing a piece of machinery which we could very well have done without. Nevertheless I do not think it is a matter one should take too seriously and on the understanding which I got from the Prime Minister's speech that there will be no discretion left to the conference and that it will merely pass this money on, then it seems to me we come to the question as to whether or not we are prepared to increase the grants to the universities from 50 cents per head of population to $1; in other words, to double the grants. As I understand it, these grants go to the universities free of strings of any kind and I can speak for one university which has received its grant with very great thankfulness.

I do not think there is anything I need to add. Other grants for universities with a view to capital expenditures will be discussed and that need not be gone into now.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I am not following the Prime Minister in discussing the constitutional details of the situation because that is a matter that concerns him and the government, and I can understand how much it does concern them; I think I shall content myself with what I have said.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, we welcome this supplementary estimate which is now before us. We welcome the decision of the government to double the amount of money to be paid by way of grants to our Canadian universities. We also welcome most heartily the speech that has been made today by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I note that it is welcomed in all quarters of the house. I merely want to say, Mr. Chairman, that it is a speech that would have been most welcome yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: The Minister of Justice is not listening.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fact I noticed that part of the speech the Prime Minister made today was from a manuscript and I think it is unfortunate that he had not shown a copy of that manuscript to the Minister of Justice before that hon. gentleman made the speech he gave us last evening.

Mr. Nowlan: The Minister of Justice is looking very busy now.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian people are going to be somewhat confused by the news that is coming out of Ottawa these days with respect to the question of education. One day the news is that the government is all for the assisting of education in this country. On another day the news is that the government is against it, that the Minister of Justice has pronounced upon the subject and has said it is contrary to the constitution. Come another day and the Prime Minister says that education is something that is in the interest of the nation as a whole and that it is almost indispensable, in the interests of the nation as a whole, that something should be done about its financial support. I know that a line is drawn by the government between university education and general education at other levels, and the Minister of Justice is slightly on one side of it and the Prime Minister is slightly on the other side. Surely any reasonable person in Canada who is interested in the welfare of this country would agree that what the Prime Minister said today about the importance of education and about the concern of the nation as a whole in education applies to all levels of education just as much as it applies to university education. I say again that we welcome most heartily the excellent speech the Prime Minister made today. I am only sorry the Minister of Justice did not know that this speech was going to be made before he presented the remarks which he placed on the record last night.

In connection with this attempt to draw the line between university education and education generally may I remind the Minister of Justice of something with which he must be familiar, coming as he does from the same province which I have the honour to represent. He knows that in Manitoba grade 12 in high school is the equivalent of first year in our universities. As a matter of fact many of the courses taught in the first year of university, in both arts and science, are almost identical with some of the courses taught in grade 12. Boys and girls of around 17 years of age going to grade 12 in the high schools of Manitoba are in an educational system which according to the Minister of Justice cannot receive any financial assistance from the federal treasury because the constitution stands in the way, but other young men and women of the same age are going to the University of Manitoba or its affiliated colleges and taking exactly the same courses and according to the Prime Minister it is in the national interest that those institutions be assisted financially out of the federal treasury. I agree with the Prime Minister and I disagree thoroughly with the position taken yesterday by the Minister of Justice.

I hope that the growing interest in the importance of this question which was evinced by the excellent speech made today by the Prime Minister means that what we know is true will soon come to pass, that the day will come when out of the federal treasury there will be substantial grants of money for this important national interest, the interest of the education of our people.

The Prime Minister put it very well in what he said today about what education means to the community, to the government, to the civil service and to our people generally. If education means all of that to this nation and requires that the federal government find ways and means to provide financial aid at the university level, we submit that it applies to education generally. The only criticism I have to make of the Prime Minister's speech is that he did not rise in his place yesterday and make the same speech on the motion moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon.

The Prime Minister has been confronted with the difficulty of finding some way in which to make these grants to universities without paying them to the provincial governments or directly to the universities themselves. He has come up with this very interesting device—I have no quarrel with it at all—of paying the money to the National Conference of Canadian Universities so that that body may in turn channel it along to the universities themselves.

I was interested in the exchange which took place a moment ago between the hon. member for Greenwood and the Prime Minister. The hon. member for Greenwood thought that the National Conference of Canadian Universities was not an incorporated organization, but the Prime Minister came right back to say that letters patent had been issued recently putting that organization in the position where it could receive and handle this money. If the government is to be logical in this and recognize the importance which education generally plays in the life of this country it could probably suggest that letters patent be issued to the Canadian association of school trustees so that federal money could be made available to assist education down the line.

We welcome the education which is taking place on the other side of the house. We welcome the realization which is growing, as expressed in the Prime Minister's speech, of the importance of this question and we hope that it will not be long until we see a real extension of this principle in terms of the precepts laid down today by the Prime Minister.

I want to say just a few words with particular reference to the province from which I come. Thus far I have been speaking on behalf of our entire group in welcoming what the Prime Minister has said today, but as one coming from Manitoba I wish to point out that in our province there is a particular need for increased financial aid at the university level. All of us in Manitoba will be delighted that the amount to be made available to our institutions at the university level will be doubled as far as our province is concerned. As other hon. members from my province know, some months ago we lost from our university the entire staff of teachers in the faculty of education. Those teachers were lost to a university which was able to pay higher salaries.

Mr. Sinclair: They were attracted there. It was not a matter of salaries at all, it was the better working conditions and the fact that it is a nicer province.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Fisheries never misses a chance to put in a plug for the climate and some of the other advantages of the province of British Columbia, but some of the rest of us feel that there is nothing like the invigorating effect of life on the prairies. As I was saying, a year ago we lost the teaching staff of an entire faculty because of the inability of the University of Manitoba to pay salaries equal to those that could be paid somewhere else. In recent weeks there has been great concern at the University of Manitoba with respect to another faculty, the faculty of engineering. There is grave danger that some of the professors in that faculty may leave for the very same reason, because the salary scale at the University of Manitoba is inadequate.

Strong representations have been made to the university and the provincial authorities in Manitoba by representatives of the students. I am sure all of us who recall our college and university days will be interested in reading of this delegation of students going to the university authorities. I remember some strange things we went to the authorities about in my day but I do not recall that we ever urged that the professors should receive higher pay. Such is the state of university salaries at the present time, such is the seriousness of the situation created by the possible loss of professors by certain universities that that is what students are organizing for at the present time. They are trying to persuade the authorities to pay a higher scale of salaries to the professors in the engineering and other faculties in the University of Manitoba.

I could go on and speak of other difficulties facing the University of Manitoba. A minor tragedy occurred during the early part of the winter when a chemistry laboratory was destroyed by fire. This was just an old hut in which chemistry experiments were being carried on, but its loss underlines the need, not only for paying adequate salaries to professors but for providing buildings and other capital equipment.

So I say that in Manitoba, and I know the same is true in some other provinces, the need is very great. There is a crisis at the university level just as there is a crisis in education generally, as was indicated yesterday by the hon. member for Saskatoon. We feel that very serious attention must be given to this matter.

We do not want the government to take the view that because we welcome this larger grant, that so far as we are concerned it is the end of the story. We feel that sooner or later there will have to be a real grappling by all governments in this country with this problem. They will have to sit down together and consider the whole problem of the financing of education. At its very beginning this country made the decision that in terms of education we would be a democracy, we would make education available to everyone. I for one do not think that we made a mistake. However, if we are going to continue to adhere to the principle that education should be made available to everyone we are going to have to face these increasing costs. We are going to have to provide for them in ways that are sensible, in ways that relate to the nature of our economy at the present time. I am glad to hear the Prime Minister say that the federal government has the prerogative of making grants wherever it feels that the making of such grants is in the national interest. I am glad, too, that he underlined the right of the provincial governments to make grants wherever they feel that they are in the interests of the community generally. Nothing could be of greater interest to life in this country, and to the future of Canada, than the channelling into education of the proportion of our total national wealth that it needs and deserves. Toward that end I hope there will be further progress in the near future. Again, I say, we welcome this estimate; we shall vote for it gladly. We also welcome the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). We regret he did not make it yesterday. We hope he will make it the next time the broader question of aid to education, without—in his own terms—interfering with exclusive provincial jurisdiction, comes before this house, as come it will.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I intend to take just a minute on this item. I appreciate the views that have just been expressed with respect to the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon, and how appropriate it would have been had he made the same speech yesterday on a previous resolution, even though that resolution was sponsored by a private member. I may say that I am alarmed, however, that the government, with its huge majority, voted against that resolution yesterday—

Mr. Knowles: They talked it out.

Mr. Hansell: They talked it out, yes, but if they had voted on it the effect would have been the same, because the Minister of Justice himself gave the lead in one of the closing speeches. I am surprised at that, because the whole tenor of the speeches made yesterday by those on the government side of the house was to the effect that they were not in favour of the motion as proposed by the hon. member for Saskatoon.

I noted, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister made reference in his speech to certain regulations which must be laid down, and in accordance with which the council of universities will administer this money. I agree that there must be some sort of regulations governing this matter; I do not know what those regulations are going to be. It occurs to me that we might have been given some elaboration of that subject; I am inclined to think that, perhaps, the small colleges may be left out in the cold.

I am a believer in the small college; I believe the small college is of great value to the general educational progress of our nation. I have been connected with small colleges during part of my life-time experience, and I believe they have a very important part to play in our national life. I am sometimes amazed at the way in which we grind out the students who go forth from our high schools and universities—it is just like grinding them out of a mill. I wonder sometimes if they do not leave our schools of higher learning as if they had been turned out by an assembly line process which results in all of them knowing and believing the same things. I wonder if there is any real individual thinking among them.

I believe that the smaller college gives more personal attention to the student, and for that reason alone such colleges are of particular value. It is one thing to educate a mind; it is another thing to educate the personality. There is a difference between loading the mind with figures and facts and teaching the mind to think for itself. I am a great believer in individual freedom, and I believe the best possible education that can be given to our young people, and the most valuable education to provide for the nation, is the production of minds trained to think for themselves. When this is the object of education you do not get the stereotyped mind; you get independent thinking—and independent thinking is that which has made history. I make a plea for the smaller colleges on that account.

I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that there are a good many small colleges which are affiliated to universities, but there may be other types of colleges which are not. Let us remember this; education does not come only through a recognized university. Some of our young people, while desiring to think properly, also desire to use their hands. I do not know whether there will be any assistance here for some of our technical colleges. Some of our young people like to go in for agriculture. I know there are agricultural subjects taught in some of our universities, but I would be interested to know whether certain of our agricultural colleges may gain assistance from these grants. Then, again, there are religious colleges. There are a good many young people who wish to enter a school of religion, and there are some independent colleges connected with churches of one kind or another. All these things constitute what I would call a proper educational system for the nation as a whole, yet a lot of these smaller colleges have to go begging for money. Some of them are organized on a voluntary basis; some of them have to go out and appeal for funds from their congregations or from donors who may be particularly interested in an individual organization. I wonder whether any assistance would be given to such colleges as these from the funds which will be made available.

It is no mean fund; it is $7,986,000 a year, plus what has already been appropriated.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I wish to say anything else. We are in favour of the appropriation, but I would just voice this plea for the smaller colleges.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to make a few remarks on this important subject, to express, particularly, my own pleasure at the increased support to the universities which this item represents. After listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I am inclined to suggest that in this field of support to university education we have come a great distance in a relatively short time, and I believe, personally, that the wide public support which has been given to this assistance to the universities is the result, primarily, of the sympathy with which the Prime Minister has presented this problem not only to the house but to the people of Canada.

Before coming to the house as a member I had the opportunity to teach at a university in Nova Scotia and since that time I have been rather close to the administration, and have learned the very wholesome effects which have followed from this assistance. Now the assistance is to be doubled and further beneficial effects will flow. Several years ago St. Francis Xavier University at Antigonish opened a junior college in Sydney which now gives the first year in university education, particularly to the sons of coal miners, steel workers and others in the area who might not be able to leave their homes to go to a distant place. Just a year ago I had the opportunity of talking to the principal of Xavier junior college and he gave me a very vivid and impressive account of the good work that was being done not only in the academic field but also in other adult classes and he suggested that without the assistance provided through these university grants it would be next to impossible for this small community college to carry on this very useful work.

I believe further that the assistance now given in Nova Scotia and the maritimes generally, despite certain improvements that some of us would like to see, has meant a great deal to the smaller colleges to which the hon. member for Macleod has made reference. Twenty years ago there was a greater crisis in education in the maritime provinces than there is today in the sense that a great discussion took place on the desirability of university centralization. The advocates of centralization were unable to achieve their objective and the result is that we have in many parts of Nova Scotia today outstanding smaller universities which are giving not only good academic courses but are providing outstanding community and cultural leadership in various parts of the province. I do know that eastern Nova Scotia would be much poorer without the existence of St. Francis Xavier and I do know that the Annapolis valley would be much poorer without the existence of Acadia university.

The system of university assistance now in vogue permits a continued decentralization policy and does not in any sense attempt to centralize or bring together the whole university community into one locality as used to be advocated. It is very interesting also to observe that the trend today, as reflected in the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod, is towards a greater emphasis on the smaller community college, and this trend has reached its greatest development in the United States. I believe that the system of making these payments adopted by the House of Commons is helpful to the small liberal arts college and university and, indeed, some of the apprehensions expressed by the hon. member for Macleod do not come about because all of the church supported universities, provided they meet the required qualifications, receive assistance. There is certainly no effort to make a choice as between church schools and secular schools.

I was particularly pleased with the emphasis that the Prime Minister placed on the salary schedules existing in Canadian universities. There is an emphasis, sometimes too great, on building programs and on the development of great physical plants. But no matter what buildings are erected on university campuses, a university is still made up of professors, books and now, in a technical era, laboratories, and no great expansion of physical plant will replace the quality of professors who are the human medium of instruction.

I know it has been very difficult for young men in this country to continue their academic careers in the universities because of the lower salary schedules and because of the greater inducements offered by industrial and other occupations in the country. No single feature of this item appeals to me more than the capacity which it provides to Canadian universities to spend more money on the very indispensable part of a university, namely, its professors.

It is true that the assistance herein provided is not a final answer to the financing of universities. Universities will be expected to continue to cultivate their own private sources of assistance. That is all to the good because it is important that voluntary agencies and private individuals through their personal connection with the universities continue their interest in the cause of higher education.

I do not intend to go into the constitutional aspect of the problem but no matter what can be said on the constitutional phase it is still a truism that the universities are national institutions. If you consider, for example, the total number of graduates from any of the universities in Nova Scotia you will find that about 35 per cent serve in other provinces of Canada. Even if you consider the graduates of the larger universities in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec you will also find that many of these graduates do not remain in their own provinces but go and offer their services in the other provinces of Canada. Therefore there is a great and very wide circulation of graduates from provincial universities throughout the whole of Canada. These services are offered everywhere and point up very clearly that the universities of our country are national institutions and are deserving of national support.

I certainly welcome this particular item and I am sure that if this session is not notable for anything else it will be notable in the university communities of Canada for the very great strides made by parliament and the government in giving practical form to the great desire we all have to support the universities and the students of Canada.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I have been thinking exactly as the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond has been thinking, that whatever else may be said of this session or whatever else may be said before we are through and possibly experience a more tumultuous atmosphere than has heretofore characterized this chamber, no session has ever had so much to do with education as the present one since we opened on January 8. With the cultural council, with the resolution of the hon. member for Saskatoon, with the philosophical and learned address with which the Prime Minister opened the debate this afternoon, certainly this is a most unique session. I am sure there are those in the house, including myself in the very short time I have been here, who remember that when we started to discuss this item in 1951 we were told by some gentlemen who occupy rather prominent positions in the house: You should not urge that, do not ask for anything more, you know, it is such a risky proposition, the government is on such dangerous ground that the subject is very likely to be dropped, and please say nothing about it or else that will happen to it.

When we hear the forthright, intelligent and able presentation of the Prime Minister this afternoon with respect to this question we can realize how far the house and the government have progressed along this line in the days since the item was first introduced in 1951, I believe the Prime Minister said. Certainly we can all heartily agree with all that he said.

I am not going to take the time to discuss the matter at any length now. I have expressed my opinion on it in times gone by. I gather from the Prime Minister that we are going to operate under exactly the same formulas as have prevailed heretofore except that the amount will be $1 instead of 50 cents and the amount will be paid to the council or conference rather than paid to the universities by the Department of Finance. I am sure we all welcome very heartily the 100 per cent increase in the contribution.

I do not have to emphasize the problems of the universities today. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond suggested that the problems were not as great as they were at one time.

That is possibly true, Mr. Chairman, though I doubt it. The one thing I would regret most in the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon was the reading of the salary scale which has now been suggested and approved for university professors across Canada. I can imagine the reactions of certain university professors. I am sure if our friend the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond were still carrying on as a professor at St. Francis Xavier and saw that salary scale, he would be discussing that night with his wife whether he should remain or whether he should seek those western fields where salary scales are much higher. I am sure the same thing would prevail in other places in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is only an objective.

Mr. Nowlan: My friend from Queens University is issuing a warning to his faculty members that it is only an objective.

One thing I would say seriously in connection with this matter is this. I regret again, as I have expressed regret previously, that this system cannot be so administered as to take care of some of the inequalities which exist and which will continue to exist between universities because of the mechanical basis on which the grant is made.

We welcome the grant. I agree with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond that it is going a substantial distance or at least some distance in meeting the problems of the universities. But those problems are increasing so rapidly, as the Prime Minister himself intimated, that I doubt if this has gone far in solving problems that were in existence even 10 or 15 years ago.

In the east, in our own maritime provinces, we have the situation of the small college to which my friend referred. I certainly cannot forgo the opportunity of returning the compliment and saying that eastern Nova Scotia and in fact all Nova Scotia and the maritimes would be much poorer if it were not for the leadership given in the past and still being given by St. Francis Xavier in the eastern part of the province. Everyone in the east and I think everyone in Canada knows of the contribution that university has made to the educational and social problems of Canada.

I must not take more time, except to say again that I welcome the making of this grant; but because of the fact that we have a large number of universities, a relatively small population and a very large student population coming from all over Canada, the same disparity will exist. I think of my own university, for instance. I am not trying to quote the figures correctly but roughly $94, I think, was received last year in our case as compared with over $200 in other institutions.

I have expressed the hope and I am confident—that is why I am happy to see it—that this is another step along the road upon which we are just now starting. That is why I welcome this step. I am confident that sooner or later you are going to build into this machinery an equalization arrangement so there will be a minimum per student, at any rate, such as that used during the war in connection with the veterans, when I think it was $125 per student or something of the kind. If that were done it would be a big improvement. The cost to the treasury would be relatively small, and it would be of assistance to the smaller universities which do not receive provincial grants. There are no provincial universities in Nova Scotia. They are all privately financed. If an arrangement such as this were made it would go a long way toward rectifying the situation. Hence we welcome this grant. As I said, the students of history will look back at this as the year in which the government and the parliament of Canada embarked upon the new road in so far as education is concerned.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Leboe: I have three questions. The first is this. Does the one dollar per capita represent a relative amount compared to the costs of operating universities at the time the 50 cent grant was made? The second question is this. Is there any other reason why the grants are not made on a per capita basis to the provinces instead of to the national council of Canadian universities? The third question is, will these grants from the national council of Canadian universities be free of all obligations as to standards, curriculum or the hiring of the teaching personnel?

One other suggestion I should like to make is this. I wonder if it would be possible in any way to direct some of this grant to a revolving fund which would assist underprivileged students to get to university. I think a student who is worth his salt would like to pay his own way and, if it were possible for him to do so after he had taken his university training, pay back that amount of money so it would leave the way open for some underprivileged person to follow in his wake and take the university training he so greatly desires.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, like all other hon. members who have spoken on this subject, I am greatly alarmed by the difficult situation which the Canadian universities are in at the present time. Like all other hon. members in this house I have the greatest respect for my own alma mater, namely Laval University. I can easily picture all the problems that face this great institution at the present time, having regard to the increase in the cost of living, the increase in the cost of materials, and various other difficulties which the authorities of this great university must face at the present time. However, I am sorry to be the only voice so far which has been raised against this vote.

Mr. Knowles: Five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to be obliged to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but it is five o'clock. Perhaps this would be a convenient time for me to interrupt him. It being five o'clock the house will proceed to consideration of public and private bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 152, REVISED STATUTES OF 1952—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will be unnecessary for me to speak for more than a few minutes in moving the second reading of this bill, which has been before the house every year since 1948. In most sessions it has been debated, so the arguments for and against it have been presented a number of times. It is, of course, my hope that since all political parties in this country have gone on record as favouring the principle which underlies this bill, since three of the parties in this house, together with individual members on the government side, have voted for it a number of times, one of these times the bill will pass and its principle will be written into our federal statutes.

The purpose of the bill is to incorporate what is known as the voluntary revocable check-off into the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The voluntary revocable check-off is a provision that makes it possible for any union that has been certified according to law to request of the employer that deductions be made from the wages of the employees in the bargaining unit to apply toward their union dues. The provision is a standard one which includes the requirement that even after a certified union makes its request it shall apply only to those members of the union who personally sign such a request, with the understanding that any such member may at any time revoke that request if he wishes to do so. That is the reason for this provision being styled as the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that a provision similar to this one is in the labour codes of a number of the provinces of this country and, as I have already indicated, the principle of union security, of which this is the barest minimum, has been supported at political conventions by all the major parties of this country.

The wording of my bill is taken from wording which was written into the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act when that bill was in the hands of the industrial relations committee back in 1948. I must make it clear that the provision was not in the bill when the government brought it in, but it was put in by the committee on the motion of the then member for Spadina who is now a member of the other place. However, despite the majority vote of the industrial relations committee of that parliament for this provision, it was struck out by a majority vote of the house when the bill came back to committee of the whole. Since that time quite a number of Liberal members on occasion have spoken and voted for this provision, along with members of the three parties on this side of the house. This is what leads me to hope that one of these days parliament as a whole will recognize that this tribute to the position of organized labour in our economy should be included in our labour laws.

Not only has there been all kinds of support for this principle to which I have already referred but I would point out that in 1953 the house, while refusing to give second reading to Bill No. 2 of that year, it being identical with Bill No. 4 which is now before us, nevertheless referred its subject matter to the committee on industrial relations. I have before me the second report of the committee on industrial relations which was presented to the house on Tuesday, April 28, 1953. It is not very long. I should like, therefore, to read it to the house:

> The standing committee on industrial relations begs leave to present the following as its second report.
> Your committee has considered the subject matter of Bill No. 2, "An act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off)", and has agreed to report as follows:
> Your committee endorses the principle of Bill No. 2 and recommends that the principle of the said bill, together with the submissions included in the printed minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on the subject matter of this bill, be considered by the government in its review and proposed revision of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which the committee is informed is now under study.
> A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of your committee is appended.
>
> All of which is respectfully submitted.

It is signed by the chairman of the committee of that session.

I would point out also, Mr. Speaker, that on May 5, 1953, the chairman of that committee moved in the House of Commons that the report of the committee be concurred in by the house. There was a short debate which is recorded on about a page or so of Hansard, at the end of which that motion for concurrence was adopted.

I mention the fact that there was a short debate just to make it clear that it was not one of those pro forma votes. The house, I suggest, knew what it was doing when it concurred in this report, and thus made it the view of the house as a whole that the principle of Bill No. 2 of that year was endorsed and its study recommended to the government in its review and proposed revision of the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we learned later that study, of course, was given by the government, and no doubt it is still being given, to the subject matter of the bill, the principle underlying it, but that seems to be as far as the government has gone in relation to this pretty clear-cut recommendation which was made to it by the House of Commons in 1953, just before an election, of course, with respect to a report made to the house by a committee.

I mention that, Mr. Speaker, in support of my contention that this principle of having the check-off of trade union dues is something to which a great deal of thought and study have been given, something which has wide support and something which many of us feel should be put on the statute books as a recognition of the important and rightful place the trade union movement has in the economy of our country.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, the arguments for this proposal are on the pages of Hansard of the past eight or nine years and therefore it is not necessary for me to speak at any greater length. However, I have pleasure once again in presenting to the house this bill to provide for the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it is at least eight years since this legislation was proposed. I recall suffering some measure of embarrassment in the second session of 1949, when I was somewhat of a novice in the House of Commons and the hon. member introduced this measure which I supported wholeheartedly, to find out later that it was regarded as a want of confidence motion in the government.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no.

Mr. Byrne: The government of the day had been elected, I believe, in June of that year with perhaps the largest majority that any government had ever had in the House of Commons. For that reason I found it impossible to vote for the measure at that time. As I said, it was the cause of a considerable measure of embarrassment for me, but when explained to reasonable thinking people they understood my position. I mention this simply to substantiate what the hon. member said regarding the length of time it has been before the house.

I would say this legislation would not have far-reaching consequences in this day and age, because most locals covered by union agreements already have the check-off or a greater measure of union security. If I recall correctly the figures given by the Minister of Labour on a previous occasion, approximately 85 or 90 per cent of those who come directly under the federal Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act already have some measure of union security, either check-off, closed shop or union shop; therefore it would not have a far-reaching effect. However, the principle is one to which I personally subscribe and am certainly willing to support.

I believe it was back in 1946 that I took part in a labour lobby which appeared before the cabinet of the legislature of the province of British Columbia, and we put forth very strong arguments in favour of check-off being written into the labour act of that province. If my memory serves me correctly it was the following year that legislation was presented in the provincial legislature providing for the deduction of union dues. Many companies have strongly opposed this measure and I have never been able to understand the reasoning they pursue, when it is understood that almost every other conceivable project has been accepted. Many large groups of employees have made declarations to their employers, sometimes without having given notice, requesting that the company make deductions for specific purposes.

In reality the unions are entities and play an important role in our economy. More and more people are coming to realize that unions are an essential part of our economic life. Many large industries now appreciate the importance of the unions in providing bona fide agreements under which the settlement of disputes is simplified, and security and other matters are provided for in writing and followed to the letter. There is every evidence that unions are working in the best interests of everyone concerned.

Despite this increasing recognition of the value of unions, some large corporations still maintain that it is not a part of their social welfare responsibility to make deductions for union dues as they do with regard to other matters. This voluntary revocable check-off represents the very minimum form of union security. I can recall a company with which I negotiated almost going to the point of allowing the operation to be closed down over this very question of accepting the demand for voluntary revocable check-off. After having accepted the principle of the voluntary revocable check-off the company submitted the question to a board of arbitration, the findings of which were binding on both sides. I believe the chairman of that board of arbitration was Chief Justice Sloan, and the decision of that board has now come to be known as the Sloan formula.

Under the Sloan formula everyone in the bargaining unit is required to pay union dues to the local by which they are represented, whether or not they are members of the organization, and the company is required to deduct union dues from the salary of each employee so designated. There is a slight difference between the Sloan formula and the Rand formula. In the Sloan formula the arbitrator gave the right to those employees who were not members of the union but who were paying union dues to vote on important union questions such as the election of officers. This represented a departure from general procedure, but it was accepted by the union, which felt that those employees who were not registered members of the local but who were paying dues should have some right to determine the course to be followed by the union. This is a form of union security which is certainly a step ahead of the voluntary revocable check-off, and there are many more demanding types of union security with which even many union officers do not agree, such as the closed shop and others.

It has been the argument of the government that the question of voluntary revocable check-off should remain a matter for negotiation. It should be remembered that the questions of wages, job evaluation and the determination of the amount to be paid for each job, are union responsibilities. Many unions have negotiated with employers what is known as job evaluation. Under job evaluation the job carries the rate and the man, woman or juvenile—that would be unusual—would receive that rate of pay. The rates of pay with respect to individuals have been a union-management measure of settlement.

Only last year we brought in legislation providing equal pay for women performing equal work. It could be said also that this should be a matter for discussion between union and management, having regard to what is done in the case of job evaluation. If the legislation concerning equal pay for women performing equal work was good legislation, was legislation that eliminated discrimination, I would point out that these are matters which have been attended to in large measure by way of negotiation. Where there still appears to be some discrimination on the part of employers in what we deem to be a refusal to accept authorization for the deduction of union dues, it would be quite appropriate that this should be covered by legislation of this kind.

I have not a great deal more to say. I have supported this legislation in the past, occasionally to my own embarrassment. Down through the years I have supported it, and I hope the Minister of Labour will see his way clear, if not at this session at least in the near future, to accept this principle of the voluntary revocable check-off.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say very much on this bill on this occasion, because I have expressed my views quite fully several times. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has had this resolution on the order paper for a number of years, and I think he deserves credit for his persistence.

One reason we have always supported this bill is the fact that the Alberta government has recognized this principle for some time. The same type of legislation applies to many industries and professions in our province. Another reason I think this bill should be accepted by the government and made part of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is that it constitutes a form of union security. The money belongs to the individual, and it seems to me that from the standpoint, I was going to say of human rights, he should have the right to dispose of his own income in the way he sees fit, particularly as this is on a voluntary basis. Any time he wishes to cancel his contract he can do so. That is as it should be, on a voluntary revocable basis.

Having said that, I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more, as this is the same bill which has been introduced on many occasions. I see no reason why we should take up the time of the house in going over the arguments that have been presented in past years. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has expressed the same sentiments. He felt that as he had gone over this so thoroughly on many previous occasions he did not need to dwell at any great length on this measure at this time. Having said that, I trust that the minister will give some consideration to this bill.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length, because my views are well known. May I say to the minister before he speaks that I cannot understand how the federal government can oppose this legislation. Every province in Canada has similar legislation, and there have been no revolutions nor has any province been damaged. We have had it in Nova Scotia since the early part of the century.

We should stop to consider how deeply the federal government are concerned with the check-off. That being so, I cannot see how they can oppose this. I would remind the minister that just recently the Canadian Labour Congress presented a brief in which they asked for the granting of collective bargaining rights to civil servants. According to press reports the Prime Minister said the matter was under consideration. The different civil service associations now enjoy what this bill is asking for; they have a check-off for their dues. In effect these associations are the civil servants' unions.

I caution the minister as to the results if he opposes this bill and then grants collective bargaining rights to the civil service associations. He would then be taking away the right of check-off which they now enjoy. The federal government check off for many things. They check off for income tax, and I do not know how they would get it if they did not. They check off for contributions to the Red Cross and other charitable organizations, and for the purchase of Canada savings bonds.

As far as the rest of Canada is concerned, with the exception of our end of the country, the federal government really paved the way for those provinces which have adopted this type of legislation since 1940. The industrial relations committee recommended almost unanimously that this type of check-off be adopted; therefore I urge the minister to support this bill.

The bill would affect only those employed under federal jurisdiction. As I say, all provinces have this type of legislation, some legislation being stronger than others. The provisions of this bill would apply only to crown companies and organizations under the jurisdiction of the federal government. This legislation should have been passed long ago and I do ask the minister to remember that the civil service associations carry out very much the same functions as trade unions, and they now enjoy the check-off. The federal government is considering changing their status and granting them collective bargaining rights.

Unless this bill is passed, unless government employees are to benefit from this type of legislation, which is a form of union security, the civil servants may lose the privilege they now enjoy, not only of having their association dues collected by this method but also contributions toward their large recreational association.

Mr. A. H. Hollingworth (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I have voted in favour of this bill in the past, and I would like to say a few words in its support. Briefly, of course, labour relations come under provincial jurisdiction for the most part, excluding those matters which are the concern of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and they are largely confined to such groups as railway employees, employees of shipping, radio, television and air transport concerns, and those who work for the federal public works department.

Mr. Knowles: And in banks.

Mr. Hollingworth: According to a return tabled on February 8, 1955, there were 392,500 employees under federal jurisdiction, exclusive of civil servants, 277,800 of whom were covered by collective agreements. Of this number 223,400 were covered by the check-off. Therefore only 54,000 employees, or 20 per cent, are not covered by the check-off. It may be that the number is even less today; certainly there are relatively few employees who are concerned and, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South has just mentioned, civil servants are now covered by a form of check-off. Surely, therefore, it is important as a matter of principle that the voluntary revocable check-off be extended to the remaining federal government employees.

Of course the meaning of the bill in itself is that there is no compulsion here at all. The person concerned has his fees deducted, and at any time he may ask that the union should not receive his fees. In other words this is a voluntary principle, and I think that answers the argument which certain hon. members may put forward, that they do not like the compulsory feature. I do not think there is a compulsory feature in this bill. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I for one do not see why an employee who does not join a union should receive the protection of the union without paying his fair share. In other words I personally am opposed to the so-called "free-loader".

The other question concerns so-called collective bargaining. Some people would say this should be a matter of collective bargaining, and leave it at that. I wonder how they can say this, after they have thought about it for a minute, because when I am talking about federal employees I am usually talking about employees who are working for crown corporations, for the most part, or for industries which are controlled by the federal government. In other words we are dealing, in a sense, with an emanation of the crown, and surely public policy as well as private policy should be considered. I submit that is another reason why the government should support this bill in principle.

Finally, I may say that this measure has been approved by six provinces, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. Of course we are all aware that during wartime there was an order in council—P.C. 1003, I believe—which controlled labour relations and which worked out very satisfactorily. After the war I recall that the national labour code incorporated this principle of the voluntary revocable check-off, until it was deleted by parliament.

I think the time has now come when this clause should be reincorporated into legislation. I think this should be done as a matter of principle, and as a recognition of the role which trade unions play in this country. I, for one, would be very happy to support the bill which has been introduced.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, like the sponsor of this Bill No. 4 and those who have spoken in its support this afternoon, I do not propose to take too much of the time of the house, nor do I propose to cover the ground which has been so thoroughly covered over the past several years in the course of arguments both for and against this measure. I must repeat, however, what I have said in more recent years, and that is that the importance of this matter is gradually dwindling in the public mind, not only on the part of the employers but also on the part of the workers, as far as I am able to determine.

I know that my hon. friend who sponsored this bill will have in his office or in his desk three very carefully prepared brochures containing the briefs of the three great labour organizations, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and the legislative committee of the brotherhoods of the railways. If he has read those briefs this year very carefully, as I am sure he has, he will have found that in none of them has reference been made to the voluntary revocable check-off or to check-off of any kind.

Mr. Speaker, in saying that I must be perfectly fair and state, too, that one of the gentlemen presenting his congress' brief last week interjected these words into the midst of the reading. He said—and it would not be stating the case fairly if I did not refer to this interjection:

> I would like to say a word here about check-off of dues. This is a very important question which was overlooked in preparing the document which is now in front of you. My face is certainly a little red at the moment, and I do not mean communistically.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mean in any sense to try to lessen the importance of this measure in the minds of hon. members of this house. It is an important matter even though its importance now in the federal field is certainly not equal to the importance it had even as late as 1953. My hon. friend from Cape Breton South has said that the civil service associations would lose the rights they now possess to have membership dues deducted at the source if such a measure as this were not passed. That would not happen at all. Whatever rights these associations have with regard to the deduction of their dues were arrived at by discussion and negotiation on the part of their authorized representatives at the time they made the arrangements with regard to them, and as they go on to enter new discussions or new negotiations, whatever you may call them, they will be quite free, as crown companies have been free, to utilize the check-off in some form or other as a factor in the negotiations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on record the results of a survey of the numbers employed under federal jurisdiction who are affected by the check-off or who might be affected by this measure introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; and since this is a fairly long schedule I would like to suggest, if I have the unanimous consent of the house, that I place it on Hansard and have the situation brought up to date.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to place this on record in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gregg: Then I will do so. The table is as follows:

ESTIMATED NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES UNDER FEDERAL JURISDICTION

Numbers under collective agreement; numbers under agreement providing check-off; numbers under agreement providing for voluntary revocable check-off:

	I	II	III	IV
	Total employees under federal jurisdiction (a)	Total employees under agreement	Total employees under agreement providing for check-off	Total employees under agreement providing for voluntary revocable check-off (f)
Transportation—
Railroads (including express and excluding commercial telegraph operations)	185,600	173,400	138,600	1,000
Shipping (including stevedoring)	38,900	32,000*(b)*	10,900	3,600
Air	13,200	7,700	6,800	100

Communications—
Telephone (d)	40,900	35,300	34,900	34,900
Telegraph and cable	10,900	6,300	6,200	—
Broadcasting	10,500	3,900	3,900	—
Terminal elevators	5,300	4,600	4,200	300
Mining	5,200	4,200	3,400	1,600
Manufacturing	8,400	5,500	5,400	1,700
Construction (c)	3,000	3,000	3,000	200
Service (C.N.R. hotels)	2,300	2,300	2,300	nil
Other government enterprises (e)	13,700	1,300	1,300	nil
Banks	47,100	nil	nil	nil
Totals	395,700	289,500	230,300	44,600

(a) Estimated.
(b) Insofar as some longshore workers move from summer to winter ports, they may be counted twice as employees under agreement.
(c) Number under agreement; total figure for employment would be somewhere higher.
(d) Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia only.
(e) Includes Canadian Arsenals Ltd.
(f) Figures in column IV are also included in figures shown in column III.

In order that this may have some meaning, may I point out that it will be seen that a total of approximately 395,700 persons are employed in industries which come under federal jurisdiction. This total, of course, includes crown companies. It does not include classified civil servants. This figure should be reduced by a total of approximately 100,800 employees who do not come within the scope of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and comprise managers, supervisory employees or others who are employed in banks or in some government enterprises where employees are not yet organized and are not covered by collective agreements.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Of the remaining 294,900 employees who are employed in industries where there is an established pattern of organized bargaining, the table shows that 289,500 are covered by collective agreements. Of this total, 230,300 are covered by agreements which have some form of check-off. In other words approximately 80 per cent of the employees who are covered by collective agreements have the check-off in some form or other. It is also revealing to know that of the 230,300 employees who have some form of check-off, only 44,600 are subject to the voluntary revocable check-off.

That brings the record up to date, and it is a little different from what it was a year ago. The remaining 81 per cent were covered by check-offs of one kind or another—the Rand formula has been mentioned—which the employees concerned apparently felt were of more value to them than the voluntary revocable check-off.

I have been accused of bringing forward the argument from year to year that this is a matter that should be dealt with by collective bargaining, and I feel that is true. We have had a great deal of discussion in the last few weeks about what should happen with respect to collective bargaining in the federal field. I believe that in that field the policy of the government should be more and more to promote that kind of climate which will encourage responsible and healthy industrial relations.

We have some small element of compulsion in our Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. We say that certain conciliation procedures shall take place. We say that every collective agreement for a term of less than one year or for an indeterminate term will be looked upon as being for a term of one year. Those are points which have compulsory features, but they are quite different from what is contained in the bill. They help to make up that framework in which collective bargaining can be well and effectively carried out, and the moment parliament begins to legislate even in a small way in favour of one side of the bargaining table and does not provide something of an equivalent nature for the other side, then I contend we are taking unto ourselves some of those matters that are important in reaching a sound and useful agreement between the two parties concerned.

While the Minister of Labour and the government are in favour of union security, and are in favour of the principle contained here when it is reached by collective bargaining, for the reasons I have given I will vote against the bill today as I did last year. Many of the crown companies referred to now have some kind of check-off, but they have achieved it with the tacit agreement of the government. They have achieved it through collective bargaining and so should those very few others who desire it and who come under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as on previous occasions when this subject matter has been before the house at the instigation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I have listened with a good deal of interest to some of the remarks that have been made, and in particular to remarks made from that side of the house which supports the government. Certainly I was pleased to hear my fellow British Columbia member from Kootenay East speak, as he has done on previous occasions, in favour of the bill.

In my opinion the minister has not presented any more convincing a case today than he has on previous occasions for maintaining the position that he takes. I suggest to him that if in the labour briefs submitted to the government no great emphasis was placed upon the matter, it may be that the labour congresses are beginning to give up hope that they will ever persuade the government to make a move in this direction, and are relying upon the persistent efforts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to keep the matter alive as far as parliament is concerned.

I know the sort of recognition given to the new Canadian Labour Congress in this building by the members of the cabinet, and I also recall that the Speaker saw fit to entertain in honour of the new president of that congress. However, I suggest that as far as the thousands of members of trade unions across the country are concerned, a much more tangible and realistic recognition of the trade union movement on the part of parliament would be the adoption of the bill now before the house.

Actually I would have much preferred to hear the Minister of Finance speak today on the bill, much as I enjoy listening to the Minister of Labour, because I suggest that the Minister of Finance is perhaps the outstanding authority in the country on the subject of a check-off which, unfortunately, some people may consider as not revocable. Possibly he could give us an interesting exposition as to why he is prepared to support an irrevocable check-off with respect to some of the money he collects, yet is not prepared to support the much milder form of check-off proposed by the bill.

I felt I should like to say a few words in support of the bill introduced by my colleague, and at the same time express my appreciation of the fact that I have heard some voices on the other side of the house also giving support to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks now he will conclude the debate.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in view of the hour I shall make my remarks very brief, so that if a vote has to be called on the bill it will not take us too long into the supper hour. I welcome the support of those who have spoken in favour of the bill, including my colleagues of my own party, as well as the hon. member for Bow River, the hon. member for Kootenay East and the hon. member for York Centre. I had hoped that some member representing the Progressive Conservative party would speak on the bill. They have spoken on previous occasions, and I trust if a vote is called it will still be their policy to vote for the bill.

The Minister of Labour sought to answer some of the arguments for this bill. In the main I felt that he was answering the arguments from his own side of the house. Indeed, the hon. member for Kootenay East answered in advance, very effectively I thought, the argument that this was a matter that should be left to collective bargaining.

The minister also suggested that the number of employees who would be affected by a measure of this kind is not great, in view of the prevalence of some form of the check-off. I am sure he recognized that the answer to that argument is that a right such as that needs to be protected by legislation. It is also true that if it has been established by collective bargaining as a right enjoyed by the large percentage of those who come under federal labour jurisdiction, surely it should be extended to all those who come under such federal labour jurisdiction.

The minister enjoyed a bit the fact that I could not pick up one of the briefs presented to the cabinet recently by the various labour bodies and read from it a current appeal for the check-off. I would simply say to him that apparently those bodies were more concerned at this particular moment about some other matters which I hope the government across the way is considering, such as health insurance, an increase in the old age pension, and matters of that kind. May I remind him that the Canadian Labour Congress at its founding convention in Toronto last April adopted a 29-point program setting out all the things it feels should be attended to by the federal government. One of the points in that 29-point program was the establishment of the check-off.

Mr. Gregg: I admit that at once.

Mr. Knowles: Since it is evident that the minister and I are agreed, perhaps this is a good point at which to call a halt to my remarks. May I express the hope that the vote to be taken on this bill will be in proportion to the way in which the speeches have been made. There have been six for the proposal and one against. I trust the house will give approval to second reading of this bill.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Knowles: How would he have voted?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

University grants—

541. To authorize payments to the national conference of Canadian universities (hereinafter called "the conference") for the purpose of making grants to institutions of higher learning in accordance with an agreement entered into or to be entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, between the Minister of Finance and the conference, such agreement to include, inter alia, provision that the total amount of grants to all the institutions of higher learning in any one province be calculated by multiplying the population of the province by $1, and that any amount payable to an institution of higher learning and not paid by the conference in the present fiscal year may be retained by the conference until such time as the institution to which the money is payable claims the payment from the conference or parliament provides otherwise for the disposal thereof; the amount appropriated under vote 132 of the Appropriation Act No. 6, 1956 to be applied to the purposes of this vote; additional amount required, $7,986,000.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, before recess I was stating my opposition to this item although, like other members of the house, I recognize the difficulties faced by Canadian universities. Quebec universities face such difficulties as do those of other provinces, and provincial governments have to make great efforts to help them. For its part, the Quebec government is making a tremendous effort in that field in authorizing an expenditure of nearly 82 million dollars over a period of 12 years; to help universities. However, I realize like the other members that even this effort is not sufficient to solve all the problems which beset our universities.

I do not think that we can solve the problem by creating other problems, and the measure now being considered is a clumsy measure, one which leans towards centralization.

The government can certainly not claim this to be a very great find, since this formula is unacceptable not only to the Quebec provincial government but also to the universities of that province. It seems to me that surely the government could have found a more readily acceptable solution to the problem. I think that the difficulty is that the people of my province, at any rate, are simply convinced that this proposal is but another step, on the part of the federal government towards centralization, a centralization which has intensified since the war.

True, this afternoon, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did point out other spheres of activity upon which the federal government had encroached without eliciting any protests from the provinces. However, in most cases, the provinces could not do otherwise. Education, though, is another matter since this is a field which is basically provincial. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said yesterday, if education had not been reserved to the provinces, the British North America Act would never have been ratified and confederation would never have come about. Our constitution would not have been accepted if education had not been protected by those very clear sections of that pact.

Besides, only the provinces are in a position to face the technical problems of education, having departments of education whose officials have the experience required to deal with matters of such complexity. We, in Quebec, who constitute the French minority of this country, feel that the sections of the constitution dealing with education are the most vital ones, and that, in this respect, we cannot yield any ground.

If the federal government is now offering those grants to universities, it is simply because, with the amount of income tax it is collecting, it has accumulated huge surpluses and the federal government alone can afford to be generous in fields of activity from which, according to the constitution, it is barred.

I am not surprised that some people are asking, as was done yesterday in this house, for grants to assist elementary education, because, among all governments, the federal government is the only one with such money surpluses, and is the only one which could afford the luxury of invading fields of activity from which it has been excluded by the constitution.

The federal government has such surpluses simply because it taxes too heavily. I therefore would suggest that the best way for the present government to assist in the field of education at every level, and particularly to assist universities which need it so badly, is to give up a part of its taxation fields. This year, its surplus might run close to 700 million—

Mr. Marler: How much?

Mr. Balcer: —unless it finds ways to hand money around, so it will not have to blush about all that accumulated money derived from its reckless taxation over the last four years.

I know that my colleagues from other provinces who are not as scrupulous or as touchy as I am, because they do not belong to a minority, are ready to welcome that federal assistance to universities, because they are thinking only of the problems of those institutions. This is also the case of other provincial governments and universities in other provinces which are also prepared to accept federal grants and even urge that they be made larger.

Consequently, I do not want to insist that the universities of other provinces be penalized, but I do not believe that Quebec itself should be penalized because it attaches greater importance to the constitution than do the other provinces. Therefore, I ask the federal government to add an income tax deductibility clause proportionate to the amount which the Quebec institutions would have received if they all had accepted the offer of the federal government. The deductibility has already been considered in the past for other reasons, and I believe it might be possible in this way to help universities without encroaching upon the constitution.

In this way the concern shown by the government and Quebec institutions for the letter of the constitution would be respected, and all the universities of this country would be treated on an equal basis.

Without the addition of such a section, and in its present form, I believe that the item now under consideration is unacceptable. Consequently, I will have to vote against this item.

[Mr. Balcer.]

(Text):

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, first I would like to join those who have complimented the Prime Minister upon the realistic speech on this subject he made this afternoon. I should like also to mention the fact that during this session, particularly the last couple of weeks, the question of education has received a lot of attention from all quarters. This indicates that the problem is becoming a pertinent one in all provinces.

While we welcome the increase in the grants to the provinces, as far as I am concerned, coming from Nova Scotia, I want to indicate that this does not eliminate the fact that we are below the other provinces in the grant per student. I shall say more about this later, but I would just like to mention the fact, that in Nova Scotia we elected a new government recently, and the premier of that province is also the minister of education. They have not, so far, held a session of the legislature, but I have read a statement he made to the press that so far as that province was concerned their policy with respect to education was retrenchment; in other words, they could not continue to pour the money into education that is, perhaps, needed, because they do not have it.

Second, he said, grants to the municipalities were to be curtailed. This indicates that as far as education is concerned that province is in great difficulties. I am not quarrelling with the statement made by the premier of Nova Scotia, but I would point out that in the speech from the throne in the province of Ontario, where the government is of the same complexion, much additional expenditure on education is forecast, together with increased expenditure on such ancillaries to education as assistance to the municipalities, the building of schools and so forth. So the matter is not a political one; it is an economic question.

In every second newspaper one picks up there seems to be a statement by some eminent person on the present requirements of education and its future needs. Only this afternoon I was reading in the Ottawa Journal the report of a speech by Mr. Crump, of the C.P.R., in which he pointed out the growing need for teachers and staff in the universities. He stressed that the salaries of university teachers should be increased by 100 per cent in order to make the vocation more attractive to entrants, and to hold those for whom industry may be fishing. Of course these statements go on to forecast what the student population will be

10 years from now, and to emphasize the need for funds in order to expand facilities for accommodating these students. The fact of the matter is that according to the forecast the number will be doubled, and it all adds up to the need for more money.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with provincial incomes as they are today, there is no possibility, with the system of straight grants, of getting equality in education as between province and province. The federal government will, in my judgment have to take a greater interest and provide more funds in future if we are to meet the requirements of the universities. When I say that, I realize the difficulties with which the federal government has to contend. The British North America Act makes education the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, and any changes with respect to entering this field, financially or otherwise, have to be made by agreement with the province or by changes in the act itself. I think it is time the provincial governments, if they are all Canadian and if they want equality of opportunity as between province and province, will have to begin to realize that they are living in 1957, not in 1867, and changed conditions will have to be brought about.

I have argued from time to time in this house that rather than the grant being made to a university on the basis of the number of students in that university, the fact that it is related to the population works a hardship on some of the provinces which are not so wealthy, and I have suggested from time to time that grants should be made on the basis of the student population. In other words the number of students in the university should be the guide as to the amount of the grant.

Since this matter was last discussed in the house some of our people have been doing some "homework". Getting the figures, province by province, with respect to the student population as related to the general population in the particular province, or the number of students from other provinces who are in the universities of a neighbouring province, was not easy. The figures go back pretty far; they go back to 1951 and 1952, and the best examples we could find were put on record by the Minister of Finance on August 14, 1956. They are in Hansard at page 7591. The minister sets out there the grant per student from province to province, and I am just going to recite these figures for the purpose of my argument.

In Newfoundland the grant per student was $357.64; in Prince Edward Island, $207.69; in New Brunswick, $112.36; Ontario, $137.84; Manitoba, $101.55; Saskatchewan, $151.97; Alberta, $149.80; British Columbia, $99.42; Nova Scotia, $80.85.

These figures, the latest we could get, show definitely that Nova Scotia is away below all the other provinces. The reason for that is, of course, that the student population of the universities in relation to the population of that province is so much higher than in the other provinces. That situation arises because the province of Nova Scotia has facilities for the study of such subjects as medicine and dentistry, which do not exist in the other maritime provinces. Thus a large number of students from Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island who require this type of training are obliged to go to Nova Scotia in order to enter these particular fields, with the result that in the matter of grants Nova Scotia is being penalized because it was farsighted enough to establish the facilities which were required in that part of the country for instruction in these professions.

I have argued from time to time that the grants should be made by reference to the size of the student body and without reference to the population figure; but after looking over this matter with some of our experts I find that this suggestion, if applied literally as I have presented it in the past, would result in hardship to other provinces. The other three maritime provinces, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, would lose considerably by an arrangement of that kind. That would also be true of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. They would lose; and as far as I am concerned and, I think, as far as the people of Nova Scotia are concerned, we are not prepared to do injury to any other province in order to better our own position.

We have come to the conclusion—and when I say "we" I mean the members of this group who have been studying the question—that it is not good enough just to argue against something; there should be some alternative proposal, and I think the fairest solution we could arrive at would be one which recognized the fact that Nova Scotia is in her present position because she provided facilities which are being made use of by students from neighbouring provinces, where the opportunity for such studies does not at present exist.

Instead of a formula whereby the grant is made on the basis of the student population, we felt it would be fairer to suggest to the government that in the circumstances in which that province finds itself or, for that matter, if any other province finds itself in a similar position in the not too distant future, the government should consider, in addition to the grants now provided under the present formula which results in Nova Scotia definitely being placed at a great disadvantage, the possibility of establishing under the Canada Council additional grants to universities providing the type of education that has resulted in Nova Scotia finding herself in the position in which she is today. Such additional grants should be provided to schools which are turning out specialists where such schools are not available in other provinces.

I leave that thought with the Prime Minister because I do not believe he, the government or anyone else who has given any thought to the matter would want to continue to keep that province in its present position of, on the one hand, providing the facilities and accepting students from all over the country and, on the other hand, being so low down in the scale so far as grants to the universities are concerned. I think the matter calls for some additional thinking and some special arrangement on the part of the government to assist schools that are providing such special training. There should be an additional grant to enable them to expand in the future without the handicap from which they are now suffering.

Of course, education is going to cost a great deal of money. If the forecasts the experts are making today are correct, then the amount of money that will be needed for capital expansion of the universities, which are expected to have double the present student population in 10 or 15 years time, will mean that someone else is going to have to help to share the burden.

I have heard it stated on many occasions in the house that the U.S.S.R. is far ahead of Canada and the United States with respect to education. I have said before and I repeat that we must remember that in that country there are no companies, corporations or anyone else making any money. The profits that go to private industry in this country go to the state in Russia, and the state uses them for whatever purpose it wishes. They are pouring a lot of money into education, and if we are going to meet that challenge I think industries making fair profits in Canada will have to begin to think in terms of endowment funds for universities in order to enable us to meet the educational needs of the future.

Recently I noticed that some of the big companies are making pretty substantial contributions to some of our universities. I hope they will continue to do so, because with our population, the need of education as indicated by everyone who speaks on the subject, and the huge sums of money required, we cannot keep on dumping the cost on the taxpayers all the time because many taxpayers can ill afford the taxes they are paying today. But I do think that corporations making profits running into the hundreds of millions might very well consider it a good insurance policy for the future to assist in meeting the huge outlays that are going to be necessary in the field of education in the future. In my opinion they should look upon it as one of the best forms of insurance available to them to guarantee that the system under which they now operate and the freedom they enjoy will continue to be moulded to a considerable extent by the architects of the future, the citizens of this continent. That does not only apply to universities but also to primary education.

I hope the Prime Minister and particularly the Minister of Finance will give some consideration to the proposal that there should be an additional grant payable to universities in some provinces which are providing certain types of education that are not available in other provinces.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, along with other members of this group who have already expressed their opinions may I say I listened with a great deal of interest to the words of the Prime Minister this afternoon when speaking on this subject. From what he said I believe we can come to the conclusion that he has quite a good grasp of the need to deal with the crisis in university education.

He emphasized, and I think all of us could bear this in mind, that one of the first requirements to improve the status of university education is to see that the professors and other teachers in these institutions of higher learning receive adequate salaries. Until people throughout the nation generally recognize that our university teachers are performing services on a par with the most valuable service performed by other Canadians, and recognize that fact by way of adequate salary schedules, we will continue to debate the subject of a crisis in our institutions of higher learning.

From what little study I have made of the problem it seems that we have been slipping over the years. In the 1920's it is probable that in relation to the needs of the country at that time we were farther ahead than we are today. I have noticed figures indicating that in 1926 grants from governments generally to universities were 130 per cent greater than the cost to the university students. By 1950 grants from governments to universities were only 10 per cent in excess of the cost to the students. Following a contribution by the people of Canada through an item of some $7 million in the estimates the gap was partially closed, and it is estimated that with the item under discussion we shall be approximately back to the 1926 position in this regard.

It seems to me that if we are to meet the need of our universities brought about by the natural increase in enrolment resulting from our growing population and the need for greater numbers of university graduates, we as a nation are going to have to raise our sights. The Financial Post gave a good deal of attention to this subject in its issue of August 25, 1956. In an article in that issue Mr. Burke Stannard points out the large sums of money that will be needed in the future to take care of education in our country. He points out that while today we are spending approximately $800 million per year on education at all levels, this amount will require to be increased to $15 billion spread over the next ten years; and that if university enrolment increases to 300,000 the amount of $15,120 million will need to be increased to $17,500 million. Therefore any additional expenditure passed by the house at this time is a small sum in relation to this very large undertaking.

I have in my hand a statement giving amounts to be spent by various levels of government on education in this country—these are estimates—for the fiscal year 1955-56. They were prepared by the federal government some time ago for discussions with the provinces. These figures show that the federal government in that year would spend approximately $25 million in grants to education of all types; that the provincial governments of this nation would spend just under $300 million and that the municipalities, the local levels of government, would spend approximately $457 million, making total expenditures in this nation for that period of time of some $782 million.

If one breaks down those figures on a percentage basis, then to each education dollar the federal government is now contributing at the rate of 3 cents; the provinces combined are contributing 38 cents, and the municipalities and school districts, the local levels of government, are providing 58 cents. Even if as a result of this and other action the expenditure of $25 million by the federal government should be increased to $40 million, then the federal percentage would be up to only 5 per cent. If, as we hope, along with increased expenditures by the federal government, there will be increased expenditures by provincial governments and undoubtedly by governments at the municipal level, then the federal percentage may drop back again to near the current rate of just 3 per cent.

I think Mr. James S. Duncan, former president and general manager of the Massey-Harris-Ferguson corporation, has performed a useful service for the people of Canada in the study he has given to the educational system of our country and the educational systems and their results in other nations in the world. I think Canada's record is something of which no member of this house is proud, because not a member of this house can be proud of the comparison, having regard to the emphasis we are placing on education in this country compared to what is being done in the United States or in the U.S.S.R.

This evening we are discussing the passing of this further supplementary estimate. The Financial Post of the same date points out that for each 1,000 of population in Canada there are just 4.94 students enrolled in universities. In the United States the figure is 15. In the U.S.S.R. the figure is 19.6. Mr. Duncan and others have pointed out how necessary it will be to the future technological development of this country that we close soon at least a substantial part of this gap. It has already been pointed out that in 1954 in Russia there were graduated some 53,000 engineers. In the United States in the same year there were graduated just 23,000 engineers. In Canada the figure is running at approximately 2,000 engineers per year.

Some may say that our engineers have a broader education. That is probably true. Some may think they are even better qualified in a very specialized field. But here again it is pointed out that the graduate engineer in the Soviet union has spent 50 per cent more study hours than has an engineer in the United States, and I presume the same statement would apply to Canada. Of the engineers graduated in the United States, experience has shown that some 35 per cent are lost to engineering because they go into some other profession. Hence even these figures do not show the true preponderance in the engineers that are available to industry in the Soviet union as compared with the number available to industry in the United States.

I notice some amazing figures of the number of medical doctors being graduated. According to these figures, in 1955 the Soviet union graduated 27,000 medical doctors as compared to 7,000 in the United States. We graduate approximately 900 per year. Surely the medical field is deserving of greater effort by the people of Canada. I am afraid that when the Soviet union has this great preponderance in graduate engineers, medical men and scientists, they may make available such a large number to assist underdeveloped countries that, by comparison, in this field also we may be far behind.

Mr. Duncan says that the U.S.S.R. in 1955 graduated 120,000 scientists and engineers, against the figure of 70,000 in the United States. Of course Russia is attempting to build her nation as the technological capital of the world, as the area of the world with the greatest number of scientists and skilled professional people. Because she is graduating such a large number of scientists and is so determined to out-bid the western world, one finds that Russia is now undertaking very substantial loans to underdeveloped countries. Mr. Philander P. Claxton, Jr., special assistant to the assistant secretary for congressional relations, points out that $1·3 billion is being made available by the Soviet union by way of low-interest loans to assist 11 underdeveloped countries.

I am sure Canadians generally feel that we in this nation must come to grips with the question of the crisis in higher education; and that if this government takes the lead, as it now appears to be doing, the day will and must come when this great difference between what we are accomplishing and what is being accomplished in other nations is overcome. I look forward to the day when every young Canadian who has the ability to take advantage of a university education will have that opportunity irrespective of the amount of money that his parents, relatives or friends may be able to advance to him toward that end. I believe that we in this nation must work toward the time when Canadians have this opportunity. If they have the opportunity—irrespective of their individual ability to pay at the moment—of obtaining a university education, I am sure we will lead in this field.

(Translation):

Mr. Ratelle: Mr. Chairman, I should not like to see this item carry before I have had an opportunity to say a few words about it.

While listening very carefully to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), I was under the impression that, besides representing here a federal constituency the hon. member was also a spokesman for the provincial government. It is something which I do not like. I am not in the habit of discussing provincial matters and I never did so outside of this house. However, tonight, speaking for the first time in this house, I wish to say that, in my opinion, we must express our views on the matter submitted to us by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who is as free to introduce it as we are free to accept or reject it. As far and as long as there is no encroachment upon any section of the British North America Act, I will not hesitate to approve the item now submitted to the house by the right hon. Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet.

If the British North America Act were threatened, the Prime Minister would not have considered the matter now before the house and I can say quite clearly, that no government could induce me to vote in favor of such a measure. I am a good Canadian; I live in the province of Quebec and I mean to be a Canadian citizen in the full sense of that word since I have the honour to sit in the parliament of a country made up of ten provinces. It is only right that we should be interested in our own province but we must also, as a matter of principle, show some interest for anything which may happen in other provinces.

I noticed that, in his remarks, the hon. member for Three Rivers has said that the house was being presented with a clumsy measure.

An hon. Member: He is the one who is clumsy.

Mr. Ratelle: But, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I do not share his opinion. The hon. member has adopted an attitude which I am at a loss to understand.

I have had more than one opportunity to discuss this matter with a certain number of people and never have I met anybody, outside of political life, who has not recognized that this proposal was the best solution that the Prime Minister could adopt in order to make peace between the province of Quebec and the other provinces and ensure the respect of the privileges of all the provinces.

Since the hon. member is now at his desk, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to him that he could have talked about the grants which the provincial government does accept. He could have told us if the construction of vocational schools by the Liberal government in the province of Quebec, 50 per cent of the cost of these schools having been met by the federal government, has meant any lessening of the rights of the provinces in educational matters?

Since that time Mr. Duplessis has come into power and a number of similar schools have been built with federal and provincial funds. Has this step meant that a single boy or girl or even a single teacher has changed his or her way of thinking, has become anglicized or anything of the sort? I have never heard it said, and I do not believe that anything like that has ever happened.

It is an admitted fact that we have several provinces, whose approach to various matters can differ, but it is high time that we should be able to discuss national interest with frankness without being told we are encroaching upon the authority of the provincial governments, whether it be that of Ontario or that of Quebec. We sit here as representatives of the country as a whole; we represent ten provinces and not one.

We must protect the interests of the ten provinces while safeguarding the rights granted the citizens of Quebec by the British North America Act. I am sure that no one would want to violate the British North America Act because, if this should happen, it would mean war and I would be the first one to shed my blood in the defence of my fellow citizens.

If there has been no change since the building of the vocational schools was started, and if the Prime Minister gives me the assurance that the grants will be distributed to the universities by an independent council of the federal government, I wonder why some would make petty politics out of it while pretending to defend interests which do not exist.

As I say, I am a Canadian and I challenge anyone to say that I have not always done my duty in whatever field it be. I have read the bill several times, as many times as did the hon. member. I am not a lawyer but I have more confidence in a man whose competence is certainly as great as that of the hon. member for Three Rivers, and I refer to the Prime Minister. Both belong to the legal profession, and if the Prime Minister had thought for a moment that the measure would be harmful to the province of Quebec, I am sure that he would not have submitted it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to speak too long on this matter but, as the hon. member for Three Rivers is back in his seat, I want to tell him that we are good friends but also that we are here to speak our minds. I like to believe that he is sincere as I am myself. For twelve years I sat on the council of my municipality and not one of my fellow councillors can say that I even once mixed provincial politics with municipal administration, whether under the Duplessis or the Godbout administration. Not only that, but I asserted the rights of my municipality, under the Godbout administration, which was Liberal, and I even asserted them under the Duplessis regime, as I was a member of the council until 1950.

In proposing this measure, the government shows a remarkable broadness of outlook. Yet, there is still opposition to it.

A while ago the hon. member for Three Rivers spoke of taxes. I am going to do so myself, and it is time to settle all these little problems.

When Mr. Duplessis came to power in Quebec, the provincial budget at that time was of the order of 72 million dollars, if I remember well, whereas today it amounts to more than 400 million dollars. Where did he find this revenue in the province of Quebec? And this year, if I am well informed, the Quebec provincial government will collect 24 million dollars in income tax, plus 48 million dollars in equalization grants, or, in other words, 72 million dollars. We in the province of Quebec pay more income tax than in any other province and, with the sole exception of two provinces, we pay more sales tax than is paid anywhere else. And we are still asked whether we want one government especially for Ottawa and another for the province of Quebec! Well, if that is the case, let us come right out and say it, let us not beat around the bush. We might be able to understand one another better, and get along better too.

We cannot give everything to the province of Quebec, no more than to any other province, since we have to meet national defence expenditures, extremely heavy ones too. The premier of Quebec should be quite happy over this item which is used to preserve peace in the world since, in this way, his own security is assured as well as that of everybody else.

If we had that money, we could do much more. Unfortunately we cannot go any further for the time being. Besides, our citizens are willingly assuming their responsibilities as they are enjoying a freedom which the other countries do not know now and may never have known. We want a stronger country, a happier country, so that we may feel happy here in Canada.

Why not do away with petty politics and work in the interest both of the whole of Canada and of the province of Quebec!

That is what I have to say to the hon. member for Three Rivers; I hope that I have not hurt his feelings. I simply wanted to make things clear, once and for all.

(Text):

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the supplementary estimate of the Prime Minister regarding aid to universities is now before the committee, so I may say a few words on behalf of the universities. We are living in a remarkable era in Canadian development; it does not require any great knowledge of history to recognize this fact, and we are prepared to admit it without argument. The evidence is somewhat more striking in some parts of the country than in others, but there is scarcely a community in which people are not conscious of it. It is not only that the great cities are becoming monstrous in size and the smaller cities are astonishing themselves with their growth, but the quiet countrysides are being uprooted. In remote areas from Labrador to Aklavik which have lain undisturbed century after century the age-old remains of the glaciers are being rudely pushed aside by bulldozers.

Let me remind the committee of that period from 1900 to 1913 which came under the direction of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the prime minister who said, and believed, that the twentieth century belongs to Canada. During this period the rate of growth was even greater than it has been in the last decade. The relative increase in population was greater, and the number of immigrants reached very much higher figures. We then received from abroad relatively much higher these facts to the attention of the committee imports of capital than we do now. I recall because we have a tendency to forget our history. However, we have to admit that under the Prime Minister and his leadership the whole Canadian nation is on the move.

There is one thing we need to remember if we are to see our own time in proper perspective. Because our school histories tell us that the settlement of Canada began at Port Royal in 1603 or at Quebec in 1608 we can appreciate that the experiment in colonizing this northern half of the continent has been going on for about 350 years. It began at least as early as the settlement of the United States, and one might argue that it began a year or two earlier. We tend to forget in our present excitement just how long we and former generations of Canadians have been engaged in the business of developing Canada. We are prone to forget what long periods of waiting and discouragement there have been in our history. We are inclined to ignore questions as to why development in the United States has been much more rapid.

Generally speaking, the experience of history yields the very clear conclusion that the kind of resources we have in Canada, rendered less accessible by climate and dispersed population, made it necessary to wait until the western world had developed an industrial civilization with the need for our resources and with the technical means of uncovering and exploiting them. This was what was in the mind of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he said that the twentieth century belonged to Canada. He obviously did not mean that other countries had not a share in it. Having the whole history of this country in his blood and anticipating the long periods of waiting, he meant that the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries had passed Canada by in a certain measure, but that she would enter the full stream of world development in the twentieth century.

Until about 40 years ago, save for the closed chapter of the fur trade, Canadian development had been largely the application of industry to limited resources similar to those of the United States. Our farming areas in the east were similar to those in the eastern part of the United States. Our prairies were just the last of the North American prairies. Forestry was no different in Maine, Michigan and Washington from what it was in New Brunswick, Ontario and British Columbia. Our mining was an extension of United States mining. When we became engaged in the automobile industry Windsor and Oshawa were just much smaller versions of Detroit and Flint.

Today our current economic developments are much more distinctive. Despite large investments of United States capital many of our developments have a recognizably Canadian colour. At least some of the resources now being developed are distinctively Canadian. There is also apparent in this country a buoyant spirit of confidence and initiative and a sense of pride in what is Canadian. This notable period of national development has been stimulated by a coincidence of favourable influences. Our ship has moved out of the shallows; wind, tide and current speed us on our way.

One thing which has happened is that with the great spread and expansion of industry throughout the world and particularly in the United States the industrial intake of materials and particularly of metals and energy has increased enormously. It seems almost impossible to fill the machines which we have created with the amount and variety of materials they demand. With industrialization has come, also, a phenomenal increase in urbanization, in city and suburban living. On this continent this seems in part to be based on the greater economy of purchasing services, for example frozen foods and automatic dishwashers, as opposed to hiring services in the form of domestic and other help. Cost has forced us to get our services from the factory.

As industry multiplies and cities spread, new methods have become available for the discovery and exploitation of natural resources. The aeroplane has replaced the canoe in transporting the prospector. A whole series of instruments ranging from magnetometers to geiger counters can discover beneath heavy overburden the likely places for drilling. Modern earth-moving equipment has made possible exploitation with a speed which would have been incredible even 25 years ago. Changing methods of manufacture and use have given special importance to light metals, chemicals and synthetics, and the use of power, other than from coal, just at the time when we were tapping our oil resources and were capable of developing the last and remote sources of waterpower.

In the changes that are taking place capital and industrial knowledge from the United States are playing an important part, but though United States capital has been of decisive significance in many industries, it has in the over-all picture supplied not more than about 15 per cent of the total investment. Along with these revolutionary changes there has come, of course, growth in all sorts of other industries and areas for which these changes have created larger markets and more profitable opportunities for investment.

One of the most notable features of this period of our growth has been its persistence. Beginning as a period of active reconstruction, it proceeded through the Korean war boom, ran through two mild recessions, and in the past few months has shown remarkable vigour and expansive power. Ultimately the Conservatives and the C.C.F.'ers, the type of people who refer to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce as an optimist and who continually predict that the boom will come to an end, assuredly will be right; but so far the fulfilment of their predictions has been postponed year by year.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I should like to ask the hon. member from what document he is reading.

Mr. Argue: The one he wrote for use at the Rotary club meeting next week.

Mr. Hosking: I am just using some extensive notes, as the hon. member who interrupted me has done on previous occasions.

The Deputy Chairman: As the hon. member has been interrupted, I think perhaps I should point out to him that we are discussing one specific item in the supplementary estimates. I have no desire to stop the hon. member laying such foundation as he thinks necessary to lay in order to discuss the item, but we are discussing solely a vote of some $7 million to be made under certain circumstances to universities. I think I should ask the hon. member to come to the point of the resolution with reasonable speed.

Mr. Hosking: I am just laying the foundation as to why it is necessary to assist the universities. It has now become a sort of national occupation to attempt to predict what the national product of this country will be in 10 or 20 years' time, or to stake one's reputation upon the prediction that the population will be 22 million or 25 million by 1975.

With these industrial changes has come a great increase in population, helped by moderate immigration but arising mainly from a high birth rate. We have to cope at present with a population which has in it an unusually large number of children and a growing proportion of older, retired people. The number of dependents per income earner is at present abnormally large. In a few years, however, this will begin to change, as a larger number of the children born since 1945 or a little earlier enter the working force.

One of the interesting things that is happening is that because of resources and power and with the help of more effective transportation, a number of great industries are being established much further to the north than hitherto. Areas unfit for agriculture and producing little in the way of forest wealth have become the base for large industries. One of the constricting factors in our history hitherto has been the irregular, thin band of population never more than a few hundred miles from the United States border. It seems possible that we are now developing much more in depth, and much more in those parts of the country which are peculiarly and exclusively Canadian. There is here an interesting basis for conjecture for all who are concerned about the gradual development of distinctive Canadian characteristics in our culture and way of life.

All this is a pleasant, rather exhilarating success story, in which there have been relatively few disappointments and surprisingly few delays. True, the growth has brought with it difficult and wearisome problems of enlarging our living space and extending the whole apparatus of transportation and community living. Whether these problems involve gas pipe lines, a new and mammoth highway system or the provision of sewers and waters for swollen urban populations, the federal, provincial and municipal governments are wearily grappling with problems of growth, and are concerned with many others with which they have not yet come to grips.

We are stimulated by the experience of our material progress, and we are engrossed with the problems of resources, transportation and the capital investment which confront us. I am not one who deprecates either the importance of material progress or the sense of achievement which goes with the conversion of the forces of nature to man's purposes. The sense of achievement in mastering and using resources is something that goes deep into the consciousness of the people who have confronted this problem for the past 300 years.

We are spending enormous sums in the development of our material resources, and already we are beginning to ask ourselves searching questions as to whether we are giving enough attention to the conservation of our sources of pulp and metals, oil and gas and water. We are asking ourselves whether in the physical development of our country we are becoming more Canadian, and whether we are making it more worth-while to be a Canadian.

As soon as we look beyond the stock market and beyond the pressing daily problems that confront us, we all know that these material resources and the great industries and cities which are being built up will in themselves neither create a distinctive Canada nor make it a truly great nation. We may acquire something which imitates other countries, or might have been made from a department store pattern. There are, however, resources which are more important than oil, metals, spruce and water. They call for the boldest investment; they require the shrewdest selection; they need the most thrifty and long-sighted conservation. It is the human resources of a nation which give it distinction and guarantee its future.

Thus I am pleased that the Prime Minister has introduced a bill which will assist the universities in developing the people of this country so they can use the great natural resources which we have in such large quantities. It is the people who will put to work the things God has given to this country, who will help Canada take its place as a first-class power in the world.

Mr. Green: Will the Prime Minister bring us up to date concerning the situation with regard to engineers and scientists? We all realize that this vote provides for payments without any conditions direct to universities, but we hear most alarming reports from time to time about the great shortage of scientists and engineers. For example, there was a report published last week by the Engineering Institute of Canada with reference to the alarming current and prospective shortage of Canadian engineers and scientists. This paragraph appeared in the press report:

> More words have been spoken and printed about this situation than about almost anything else. Many voices have proclaimed the urgency, but after years of talk no one has done anything of consequence that will improve the situation quickly.

And again:

> There is some promise now that government and industry will help, but the needs appear to be away beyond any sums that are being mentioned as available shortly.

We all know how important scientists and engineers are to Canada at present and in the years immediately ahead. Can the Prime Minister tell us what is the opinion of the government with regard to all this talk of an acute shortage, and if there is such a shortage whether any steps are being taken to meet it?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I cannot give any precise figures to the hon. gentleman. At the present time there are indications of intentions to provide structures of various kinds to a total amount that would be beyond the capabilities of the available scientific or engineering or skilled or unskilled manpower, and greater than the materials available. There is a certainty that not everything can be accomplished that Canadians and Canadian corporations would like to do or have expressed intentions of trying to do during 1957.

Mr. Green: Because of the shortage of trained men?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Because the total is greater than the population of this country, with its savings and even the savings that come from abroad, with its manpower and its materials, can realize in the one year. During last year I understand the amount of capital investment was of the order of about $7.75 billion. Estimates that have been gathered for what I believe are called intentions for the present year would indicate an increase of as much as 12½ per cent over what was realized in 1956. Of course that would not necessarily be 12½ per cent in actual volume because there is an expectation that prices over the year in the construction trades—the capital investment trades—are apt to be as much as 5 per cent higher than in 1956. That would still leave an actual physical increase of 7½ per cent over what was realized in 1956, and my information from the data available to our experts, and their best estimates, is that this is more than the economy can produce.

Now, with respect to the so-called shortage of engineers, I know there is a greater demand for engineers than there was when either the hon. gentleman or I were at university. Just as one illustration of what I have in mind let me mention this. The hon. gentleman knows the reputation of the Taschereau family in the province of Quebec; it was always producing either clergymen or lawyers or judges. That family has supplied Canada with a number of very distinguished clergymen. The first cardinal was a Taschereau. They have supplied a number of very distinguished judges, and a still larger number of brilliant members of the bar in the province of Quebec. A Taschereau was my partner when I was at the bar. He has only one son, and the son, instead of following in his father's footsteps as has been done for generations by male members of that family, is studying to be an engineer.

This is because there is now a realization among the young people that there is a greater demand for engineers, and consequently there are more young people adopting that vocation than formerly. I feel, therefore, that there will be a greater number of engineers in the future. There will be a greater demand upon the universities to train engineers, and I know that right here in Ottawa there has been a very substantially filled subscription list in response to an invitation to Quebec and Ontario industrialists to contribute to the establishment of an engineering faculty at the University of Ottawa. They are doing this because they feel their businesses will require that kind of equipment. It is just as essential to their businesses to have trained staff as it is to have the machines which they instal in their plants. It is, I think, a very encouraging sign that our industrialists should be realizing, as I said a moment ago, that the greatest of our natural resources are our human resources, and that these human resources have to be developed and cultivated if we want to make full use of the other material resources with which our land is blessed.

I do not wish to expand upon that subject, but I do wish to answer, or try to answer, four questions which were submitted by the hon. member for Cariboo. As for the first question, I am not in a position to answer it with accurate statistical information. The hon. member inquired whether $1 per capita would represent, now, the same proportion of university expenditure as 50 cents per capita represented in 1951. I think it would, perhaps, represent rather more than the same proportion, because I do not think there has been an increase of 100 per cent since 1951 in university expenditures.

The second question was, why are these grants not just turned over to the provincial governments? Well, the equalization grants will be turned over to the provincial governments, but the provincial governments have a great many calls upon their finances, and these grants are recommended to parliament so they may go to the universities and to no other quarter; and we think that by placing them in the hands of the national conference of Canadian universities they will go to those universities. There may be other very desirable purposes to which these amounts could be applied if they were just handed over for general application by the provincial governments, but I think it is the desire of most members of this house that these grants should go specifically to the universities.

The third question was, will the grants be free of restriction with regard to curricula, salaries and so forth? The federal government does not wish to establish any kind of control over the freedom of the universities. The amounts are to be turned over to the national council and, in turn, by the national council to the particular institutions which are recognized by the provincial governments as being of university level, and I am confident that the authorities in those university institutions will make good use of the money available.

I think it would be an attempt to exercise some jurisdiction over educational affairs to tell the council that it might, as our agent, say to them what the curricula of their studies should be. That is something which is within provincial jurisdiction and which should remain within provincial jurisdiction.

Another question was, would it be possible for this aid to constitute a sort of revolving fund which beneficiaries would return to the university in order that it might be used to help other promising students to whom it might be of use. Well, the amounts are not very considerable with respect to each individual university, but if a university chose to use the whole of what it received, or a certain portion of that amount, for the purpose of making advances to promising students on the understanding that the amount would be returned, that would be something which would be quite within the discretion of the university concerned to decide. All we are asking parliament to do is to say that the government of Canada should contribute to the work of the universities an annual sum of the order, at the present time, of about $16 million a year, or $1 per head of the Canadian population, and distribute it in proportion to the population of each province, as between the provinces, and in proportion to the student enrolment within each province.

In that respect, the hon. member for Cape Breton South—he is not here at the moment —recited figures that were put on record in Hansard last August. But I am informed that those figures do not tell the whole story. I am not making any assertion as to what are the facts, but the very fact that there is some controversy as to whether this is or is not the fairest way to distribute the amount that we are asking parliament to appropriate for the Canadian universities is a reason I had in the back of my mind when making the suggestion that this fund should be turned over to the national conference of Canadian universities.

Of course they will not have any discretion under the contract to depart from the formula that will be set down, but they will have the right—and I feel quite certain they will exercise that right—to make recommendations as to what should be the terms of subsequent votes of this amount, and their suggestions to the government will be brought to the attention of the House of Commons with such recommendations about them as we may feel would be in the best interests of university activities throughout the country.

I am not making any assertion as to what are the facts but I have been told that, although it is true that in Nova Scotia there are quite a number of students enrolled who come from other provinces, the universities they attend are paid quite substantial additional fees because these students come from other provinces. I have been told, with respect to those who come from Newfoundland, that additional fees are provided by the government of Newfoundland or by the institutions in Newfoundland that participate in this grant. They are not able themselves to supply all the forms of university training their people require and there is a transfer of funds by them to the universities of Nova Scotia which perform the job for them.

These institutions, especially in the maritime provinces, are private enterprise institutions, and can fix and adjust their fees according to the localities from which their students come. That is one reason why there may apparently be less paid per capita of student enrolment than there is paid in Newfoundland, for example, where student enrolments in their institutions are much fewer per 100,000 of population than in the case of Nova Scotia. I am told that another reason for the difference is that in Nova Scotia a student who continues beyond the 11th grade is treated as of university level, while in Ontario only students who continue beyond the 13th grade are treated as of university level. That would affect the number of student enrolments.

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

These are matters about which I know very little, but they are matters which the members of the national conference of Canadian universities can inquire into very pertinently. I discussed with several members of the conference whether it would be appropriate at this time to try to devise some other formula that would not leave discrepancies that look so large, and I was told that many of them believed that this was the fairest formula but that these were matters that could be discussed by their conference.

The people who form this conference are all dedicated men and women. They are devoting their lives to a job they think is in the interests of their fellow citizens, and they can make observations. If as a result of their observations there is another formula that will serve better the desire of the house that the best possible use be made of the money appropriated by parliament to aid universities, their recommendations will be brought to the attention of the house. Every year there will have to be a vote in terms that will in substance be similar to the terms used in the item in the present supplementary estimate. If on their report it appears desirable that there be some change in the formula incorporated in the expressions used for that vote, those changes can be made.

I am sure that all those connected with the matter are sincerely and genuinely concerned that the amounts voted by parliament be used in the best possible way for the necessary aid to the continuance and, I hope, the progressive development of our university institutions. I do not think there is anything else I need to add. I noted the remarks of the hon. member for Three Rivers. He is one of those who fear that from this there would flow some intervention that would lessen in some degree the practical effect of the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature over universities. I am sorry I cannot convince him that he is wrong, but I must tell him that he cannot convince me that I am wrong, and I am submitting the item to the judgment of the house.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, it is very reassuring, I am sure, to hear the Prime Minister say there will be no interference with provincial autonomy in the matter of education. I suppose we will have to take his word for it, but I am still at a loss to know what difference there is between this principle as enunciated by the Prime Minister tonight and in a previous speech, and that enunciated by the Minister of Justice yesterday. I have here today's Ottawa Citizen. We know what the Minister of Justice said yesterday, but here in glaring headlines it says: "Federal Grants Would Cost Provinces Their Autonomy in Education—Garson." Here is the smiling gentleman's picture and under it the words, "Hon. Stuart Garson—Autonomy Would End."

I know the Minister of Justice was speaking in a different debate. I know the subject may have been technically different, but in principle I cannot see how there can be any difference. The resolution under debate yesterday called for assistance to the provinces by way of federal grants, and the principle involved in the present debate is also grants to the provinces. The only difference is in the mechanics by which the money travels, but the principle is the same. I wish the Prime Minister could give us an explanation of that. It would be more reassuring if he could explain what difference there is in the principle; or perhaps the Minister of Justice would care to take the ball and handle it for a while.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do not think the hon. gentleman needs any reassurance that the application of the money involved in this item is not going to interfere with provincial jurisdiction over the universities.

Mr. Knowles: Will the Prime Minister permit a supplementary question? Will he not agree that just as it is not in his mind at all that this item would interfere with provincial jurisdiction over education, so it is not in the mind of the hon. member for Saskatoon that his proposal would in any way interfere with provincial jurisdiction over education?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): When the other question arises it can be dealt with. I do not think the situation is the same. In the one case the matter of education is handled by I do not know how many thousand boards throughout the country. In the case of universities it is handled by the national conference of Canadian universities, made up of a small body of really dedicated men and women who have no taxing powers, who have only the right to expend what they can get without exercising any taxing powers.

I think the other proposition would mean either adding to the equalization funds that are handed over to the provinces to do whatever they like with, or the setting up of some machinery to look after the proper administration of I do not know how many thousands of elementary and high schools throughout the nation. That would certainly be a form of centralization that would make a considerable change in the way the system has been and is being handled.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. What the Prime Minister has been saying in the last few minutes has given me a somewhat different view of the national conference of Canadian universities, which we discussed this afternoon. I thought they entered into this situation purely as a mechanical agency conveying money as the agent of the government to the universities on a basis to be outlined by agreement, and that there would be an agreement to that effect entered into. This evening it has seemed to me that the Prime Minister was outlining for them a function that goes considerably beyond that.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): An advisory function.

Mr. Macdonnell: I understand the Prime Minister to say that they might see fit, as time went on, to make suggestions as to the method of distribution or as to certain courses—I do not mean courses in the sense of courses in study—certain of the functions of the universities. In answering the suggestion that the government might come forward and deal with secondary schools, the Prime Minister pointed out that there were thousands of boards dealing with secondary schools, and that that would be a matter of great complication.

I come back to this point, and it is my question. It is true that the university conference does not deal with thousands; it deals, I suppose, only with several score of universities. Nevertheless I should like to be clearer than I am at the moment as to just how far the government envisages this conference will undertake to recommend to the government different methods of distributing money; in other words how far it will go beyond the purely mechanical role which it is now being asked to undertake.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No more after this item is passed than they have been able to do in the past. They have frequently made recommendations to me as to what might be helpful in the prosecution of university work. Realizing that we are all interested in the successful prosecution of university work, I think they will not hesitate to tender such advice as may appear to them to be well founded. I sought advice from several of them as to the possibility of removing this complaint that has been made for the last six years by Nova Scotia authorities, about the fact that their per capita per student grant was smaller than that of the other provinces.

My first answer was this. If you have a larger proportion of students who are getting university training, is that not evidence that in the other provinces where the proportion is smaller the need is even greater as in Nova Scotia? But then gradually I received other assertions—ones that I did not feel I was competent to verify—that the whole story did not appear in this apparent discrepancy between the per student grant in each province.

As I mentioned before, in Ontario it is only after the 13th grade that one is treated under provincial jurisdiction as being a student of university level, whilst in Nova Scotia I was told that under the provincial legislation the one who went beyond the 11th grade is counted—if he is doing the work that is appropriate to the 12th grade—as a student of university level. That would affect the total number; and the total number being affected, it would affect the per capita grant that would result from dividing the whole of the provincial grant by the total number of students regarded in that province as being of university level.

Then I was told that in addition special payments were made to the Nova Scotia universities for students who were taking special courses but who were not residents of that province. I was not surprised at that, because they are private institutions supported in part at least by the contributions of the people of their own localities. Here I understand that in the elementary and secondary schools there is a difference in the fees that are charged to the children of ratepayers of Ottawa and those charged to children of ratepayers of adjoining municipalities who are admitted to courses in Ottawa. When I was told by several of the members of this conference that they thought this was the fairest scheme I said to them, "You will have an opportunity of discussing the matter again, and if you can agree that there is a fairer scheme, do not hesitate to tell us about it; and if we are impressed, we will tell parliament about it and parliament may take some action upon it. In the meantime we are going to recommend that the apportionment be the same as that of the previous grants that have been distributed up to the present time".

Mr. Macdonnell: I have one further question. As I understand it, the grant is to be made subject to the terms of an agreement to be entered into between the government and the conference of universities. Will that agreement, either now or at some other time, be before this house? The Prime Minister nods.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: When?

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I stated earlier—perhaps the hon. gentleman may not have been listening at that moment—that the draft which has been prepared and which is to be discussed with the national conference of Canadian universities embodies the same terms as were in the regulations that were made by the Minister of Finance under the previous votes. I stated that as soon as that agreement was completed it would be tabled in parliament so parliament could see that it was in exactly the same terms or, if there were any slight variations, could see what those variations were. The draft that has been prepared by our officials is an exact reproduction of the terms that were in the regulations.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): After making two false starts, Mr. Chairman, I have almost forgotten my question. It seems that great reluctance to interfere with provincial rights has kept down the amount here. I am hoping that this may be considered to be an experimental year and that, as it works out, there may be a greater chance for additional assistance along these lines. But I am wondering whether the Prime Minister would tell us whether, in his discussions with the provincial premiers and at dominion-provincial conferences, there was any exploration of any other method that might have been used whereby some type of undertaking might have been given by provincial authorities that if sums of money were handed to them in a division of the tax base, we could have been assured that it would have gone to educational institutions. I should like to know whether any items of that kind were on the agenda at the conferences that have been held.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Chairman. To the best of my recollection the questions were never raised at any of the provincial conferences in public. They have been raised in private discussions between me and the premier of Quebec, as well as in correspondence, most of which I think has already been tabled in this house.

The position is, "Well, here you are occupying too large a place in the field. Let us have the whole of direct taxes and you will not have to do anything for any of these things to which you have been contributing in the past".

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

National health branch—

Health services—

542. Immigration medical services—further amount required, $225,000.

Mr. Blair: I have a question on this item. Will the Minister of Finance explain why this additional amount of money is required, and for what services?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The additional money is required because I found it possible to convince my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare a year ago that he would not need as much money as it now turns out he does need for the purpose of carrying out medical examination of immigrants in the normal course of the business of that department.

Mr. Blair: Have the services been enlarged, and is additional accommodation needed?

Mr. Harris: Yes, there has been a slight enlargement in the United Kingdom and, of course, some temporary enlargement in connection with the Hungarian refugee problem, where we need additional doctors—not so much additional doctors as paying additional fees to doctors for examination of those people in Europe.

Mr. Hodgson: Can the minister tell me whether the immigrants are being medically examined before they leave?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman; those persons who are in Europe and are not coming forward immediately are being examined there, of course, as they normally are. Most of the immigrants are examined medically there. The exemption applies only to those who it was announced we would bring forward without medical examination for the purpose of easing the burden on Austria and who have, in fact, come forward. Where any refugee is proposing to come to Canada and there is time to examine him, of course the examination is made there.

Mr. Hodgson: Are those who were examined in Europe examined again after they arrive in Canada?

Mr. Harris: Well, all the cost of examining in Canada is part of this Canadian service rather than of the service abroad. We examine them, of course, along with the provincial governments if there is an understanding between the governments.

Mr. Quelch: For how many months after the arrival of the immigrant does the federal government assume responsibility for medical attention, where they land and where they eventually settle?

Mr. Harris: I think my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration made a rather lengthy explanation of that the other day. We have an agreement, as I recall it, with Saskatchewan, that we would look after the medical expenses for one year afterwards, and I believe that offer was made to all the provinces and perhaps accepted by most. I am not sure.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

A—Department—

Railway and steamship services—

543. Construction or acquisition of auto-ferry vessels and equipment—further amount required for the auto-ferry vessel for service between Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island and Caribou, Nova Scotia, $600,000.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I have a few brief remarks on this item. I presume it means that the construction of this ferry is being expedited in every possible way. There are a couple of changes and circumstances that have taken place since the regular item was passed at the last session that I would like to point out to the minister. The first is that the traffic on this service has continued to increase.

Mr. Harris: This has nothing to do with the service; it is an expenditure for the building of the ferry.

Mr. MacLean: The service has to do with the building of the accommodation.

Mr. Harris: This ferry is being built to accommodate the ferry service, yes. You can ask a question only on the building of the boat, not on the service.

Mr. MacLean: My point is this. If not at the present time, then very shortly even this ferry will prove inadequate because of the very sharp increase in passenger service offering on this route. At the present time the ferries operating are very inadequate.

Mr. Harris: Does the hon. member want to stop the expenditure on this one so we shall build it over again?

Mr. MacLean: No, I do not.

Mr. Harris: Then let us get on with spending the money on this one.

Mr. MacLean: My point is this. I presume this supplementary estimate is to expedite the building of this ferry as rapidly as possible. I presume it is going forward at a more rapid rate than was expected when the main estimate was passed last year.

Mr. Harris: That is correct.

Mr. MacLean: When is it expected that this new ferry will be brought into service? What will be the increase in capacity when this new ferry is brought into service?

Mr. Harris: At the present time the best estimate that can be given of when the new ferry will be brought into service is about the middle of the summer.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is this amount for some unforeseen costs in construction?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Queens was aware the construction of the vessel has proceeded at a faster rate than we had anticipated. The money is due for the progress payments.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Treatment services—

544. Hospital construction, improvements, equipment and acquisition of land—further amount required, $435,000.

Mr. Green: Can we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. Harris: This item is much the same, Mr. Chairman. This is an expenditure on Deer Lodge for construction purposes, brought about by the progress of the work, which has advanced faster than we expected; and this will be progress payments on the contract.

Mr. Green: There is one point I should like to place before the minister in the hope that he will take it up with the Prime Minister. This is the first item we have had today on veterans affairs, and we find that we are still in the position that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is also the Postmaster General.

Mr. Harris: And doing a good job.

Mr. Green: I raised the point last year.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: And the Prime Minister had this to say on August 9.

The Chairman: Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing a specific item in the supplementary estimates having to do with hospital construction. I really feel the remarks he is attempting to make are somewhat far from that point.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I submit to you—

Mr. Harris: On a point of order—

Mr. Green: I have the floor—

Mr. Harris: I am rising on a point of order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harris: I am going to raise a point of order at once on the pursuit of this—

Mr. Green: I had the floor.

The Chairman: As I understand it, the Minister of Finance is rising on a point of order.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Green: That is what I was doing, too.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra on a point of order.

Mr. Green: I submit that when an estimate having to do with a department comes up for consideration in this committee a member is in order in raising something, as I have done, having to do with the minister of that department. After all, he is the man who will be responsible for the expenditure of this sum of money, and I think I am perfectly in order in pointing out that this minister, no matter how capable he may be—and I am not questioning his ability for a minute—should not have these two departments.

The Chairman: Order. I am quite sure the hon. member will realize he has now finished his point of order and is attempting to go back to the remarks he was making when I rose. I think I can deal with that without hearing anything further.

This is an item in the supplementary estimates dealing with hospital construction, improvements, equipment and acquisition of land, and I feel that remarks with regard to the, let us say, dual capacity of the minister would be entirely out of order on this item and I would be prepared so to rule.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I think what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. A few moments ago the hon. member for Wellington South spoke on everything beside the item under discussion and was not called to order.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, does this item refer to one particular job, or does it cover several buildings in the course of construction? Can the minister tell us what are the hospitals that are involved in this total amount?

Mr. Harris: I did. I said it referred to Deer Lodge, which is the only one.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Loans, investments and advances—

545. Loan to the United Nations Organization to help finance the clearing of the Suez canal, $1,000,000.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I will make a brief explanation and give a more detailed one later if it is desirable. Briefly the United Nations, as the committee knows, is now clearing the Suez canal of the obstructions which were placed there during the late fall. That work is estimated to cost somewhere between $30 and $40 million. That is a very preliminary and tentative estimate, of course As I have said, the work is being done under the direction of the United Nations and the UN has no money for this particular work. Consequently the secretary general of the United Nations asked that he have put in hand the sum of $10 million as soon as possible by those nations which would find it possible to advance that sum in order to pay the cost of the job from day to day and from week to week.

After considering the matter it was decided to recommend to the committee and to the house that we should advance $1 million on a temporary loan basis to the secretary general of the United Nations to help finance the job that has to be done before the canal can be put in use again. I stress that this is a temporary advance by this country to put the secretary general in funds for the purpose of paying the cost of the job from week to week as it proceeds. This is not a contribution for that purpose. It is merely that we are acting, if you will, as temporary bankers to this extent. The United States has contributed $5 million of the $10 million that was asked for; other European countries are contributing various sums of money and, as I say, we decided we ought to make this advance.

I used the word "contribute" and I excuse myself, Mr. Chairman, by saying I did not mean that; I meant an advance. All the questions having to do with the cost of clearing the canal or any other questions in connection with this are left in abeyance so far as this item is concerned, in the sense that by making this advance we are not committed to make any further payments nor is this an assessment of any contribution we should make to the United Nations toward the final cost of the job of clearing the canal, the total cost of which, as I said a moment ago, has been tentatively fixed at between $30 and $40 million.

I hope the committee will take the view that this is merely a response to the request of the secretary general for temporary financial assistance under the circumstances, and that there is nothing in the item other than the simple wording we now have before the committee in the printed vote.

Mr. Pearkes: Could the minister say whether Canada is sharing in any part of the work of moving obstacles out of the canal, or could he give any indication as to how long that work will likely take and when this loan may be repaid?

Mr. Harris: We are not doing any particular work in connection with the clearing of the canal. It is expected that the work might take three or four months from the time it commenced some two or three weeks ago. The advance will be dealt with during the current session of the United Nations, when it will be decided how the cost of the clearing of the canal will be borne by the members of the United Nations. When it is decided and the assessments are made and the contributions are then fixed we will know about the return of the $1 million or any part thereof which may be our share.

Mr. Pearkes: Does this loan in any way cover the expenses connected with the Canadian forces now serving with the United Nations emergency force located in the canal zone—

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pearkes: —and who in many respects, I presume, would be connected with the clearing of the canal?

Mr. Harris: That is not what I was asked, Mr. Chairman. I was asked whether Canadians were participating in the clearing of the canal. I took that to mean physically working at clearing the canal.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps I used the word "contributing" wrongly, meaning a physical contribution to the clearing of the canal zone. If I recall correctly the Minister of National Defence in the statement he made this afternoon referred to the fact that there were minesweepers. I do not think he was referring to vessels, though he did not make that clear. I believe he referred to minesweeping equipment located in the canal zone being manned by Canadians. Does that refer to the actual clearing of obstructions from the canal?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I was referring entirely to land mines and to the work of the engineers.

Mr. Pearkes: Does this not include also a loan for the removal of land obstacles in the canal zone, or does it refer only to submerged obstructions?

Mr. Harris: It refers to those in the canal itself, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pearkes: The submerged obstacles?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact the minister said he had a more complete statement to make, may I call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Harris: I hope my words were not misunderstood. I was asked for a brief statement and I gave it. What I meant to indicate was that I would be glad to answer questions, but it is not my purpose to make any further statement in addition to what I have said up to this point.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I think there are other questions which will have to be asked on this very important subject. It is now ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this tomorrow.

Mr. Green: What will be taken up once this item is passed?

Mr. Harris: The same order of business I indicated last Friday: the Canada Council legislation and the Canadian wheat board bill.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTION

The following is the answer to an oral question asked on January 16 by the hon. member for Lambton West, which appeared at page 298 of Hansard.

CHICAGO DIVERSION—DECISION OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

1. How did it become possible for the United States supreme court to determine the flow of water through the Chicago drainage canal?

2. In his veto of the bill for increasing diversion of water from lake Michigan, did President Eisenhower state that he would not permit more water to go through the Chicago drainage canal?

3. Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a statement that the Chicago diversion was a matter for the international joint commission?

4. Would our supreme court or any judicial body in this country be empowered to permit a similar diversion from lake Huron or lake Erie?

Answer by: Mr. Cardin, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

1. This is a matter of United States domestic law and accordingly is outside our competence to answer. However, the following outline of my understanding of the situation may be helpful. A United States statute of 1890 forbids the alteration or modification of the course of any navigable waters of the United States without authorization by the Secretary of War. In 1899 the Secretary of War granted permission to the Chicago sanitary district to divert a certain quantity of water from lake Michigan into the Chicago drainage canal. Litigation concerning this authorization came before the Supreme Court of the United States which issued a formal order on April 21, 1930, limiting the volume of water which might be diverted at Chicago to an annual average of 1,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage of some 1,700 cubic feet per second. The order apparently is of a continuing nature and to obtain authority to divert a greater amount of water, an application must be made to the Supreme Court of the United States to vary its order of 1930. On December 17, 1956, the United States Supreme Court varied its order to increase the flow from 1,500 to 8,500 cubic feet per second (in addition to domestic pumpage) beginning immediately and continuing until January 31, 1957. The representations on the basis of which the court made its order were that, as a result of a serious drought in the American middle west, navigation on the Mississippi river had been seriously affected and that emergency conditions existed.

2. No. In his memorandum of disapproval dated August 9, 1956, President Eisenhower states that he has withheld his approval of House of Representatives Bill 3210. This bill proposed to increase the diversion of water from lake Michigan by 1,000 cubic feet per second for a three-year test period. I suppose, as legislation, it would in effect override the court order. In part, the President's memorandum says: "A comprehensive report by the corps of engineers which will include consideration of the best methods of obtaining improved control of the levels of the great lakes and of preventing recurrence of damage along the shores is nearing completion. I am asking the Secretary of Defence to expedite completion of this report. This report is in addition to the technical report on the effects of an increased diversion into the Illinois waterway which has been made by the joint lake Ontario engineering board to the international joint commission. I think it would be unwise to proceed with the diversion in the manner proposed in H.R. 3210 until all relevant information has been obtained, particularly since objections to the proposed diversion have been registered by the Canadian government in its note dated February 13, 1956, and additional objections filed by legal advisers of the states of Wisconsin, Ohio, and New York. . . . I am asking the state department to engage in discussions with the Canadian government in an attempt to work out a solution to these problems as soon as all pertinent facts are available." I may add that the Canadian government has not yet been approached by the state department, although recent newspaper reports indicate that such action may be expected soon.

3. No. On the contrary, on August 2, 1956, in replying to a question from the hon. member for Lambton West, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is quoted in Hansard, at page 6844: "It appears that the proposed diversion of the waters of lake Michigan would not come under the jurisdiction of the international joint commission unless it were referred specifically to it."

4. No. Lake Huron and lake Erie are boundary waters and article III of the boundary waters treaty provides that no "diversions, whether temporary or permanent, of boundary waters on either side of the line, affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters on the other side of the line, shall be made except by authority of the United States or the Dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions and with the approval, as hereinafter provided, of a joint commission, to be known as the international joint commission." The article goes on to explain that this provision is not intended to limit the right of each government to undertake certain governmental works in boundary waters which "do not materially affect the level or flow of the boundary waters on the other (side of the line), nor are such provisions intended to interfere with the ordinary use of such waters for domestic and sanitary purposes". A diversion from lake Huron or lake Erie would not be similar to a diversion of water from lake Michigan because the latter is not a boundary water. Diversion of waters from lake Michigan comes under article II of the treaty, in which each government reserves to itself "the exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion, whether temporary or permanent, of all waters on its own side of the line, which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters".

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1955-56 CROP

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the house that there will be an interim payment on the 1955-56 pool account for wheat. The payment decided upon will be 10 cents per bushel on all grades of wheat, except milling grades of Durum wheat. On milling grades of Durum wheat the interim payment will be 25 cents per bushel.

In reaching this decision in regard to an interim payment, the government has been guided by a statement of the position of the 1955-56 wheat account, as prepared by the Canadian wheat board. This statement indicates that the selling of wheat in the pool is well advanced and the account is in a surplus position on all grades of wheat delivered to the board by producers between August 1, 1955 and July 31, 1956. These deliveries amounted to 352.2 million bushels. The extent of the interim payment is based upon the recommendation of the wheat board.

The interim payment will provide for the distribution of approximately $37,300,000 to producers who delivered wheat to the pool in the year ending July 31 last.

In its main features, the interim payment which I am announcing is similar to the interim payment on the 1954-55 pool which I announced in the house on February 2, 1956, except that it is larger. The main difference is that, in the case of the 1955-56 pool, the interim payment of 10 cents per bushel will apply to all grades of wheat with the exception of milling grades of Durums; whereas in the case of the 1954-55 pool an interim payment was not possible on No. 5, No. 6 and feed wheat and some other grades. On some grades the interim payment a year ago was 5 cents per bushel.

I expect that the wheat board will be able to commence issuing interim payment cheques from the 1955-56 pool on about the same date as a year ago; the actual mailing of cheques to producers will commence about the middle of February or shortly thereafter.

It is not possible, of course, at this time to state definitely when the final payment will be made on the 1955-56 crop but on the basis of the information now available it would appear that an announcement of a final payment should be possible at about the same date as last year, during next May.

[Later:]

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST SHIPMENTS THROUGH VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister explain to the house why, when only the ports of Vancouver and New Westminster are open for grain shipments, every encouragement is not given by government policy for grain shipments westward and why Vancouver is discriminated against when other ports are open for ship transportation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I would point out to my hon. friend that shipments through the port of Vancouver are 60 per cent higher this year than they were at this time last year and that shipments of grain through that port are taking place at such a rate that stocks in the port are down almost to the vanishing point, despite the best that both railroads can do by way of hauling grain across the mountains. If my hon. friend will find some way by which we can load more boats per week than we are loading now we would be glad to go after more business for that port. At the moment it is working to absolute capacity.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question. I base my information on correspondence between the minister and the city council indicating that because of certain action that port was being discriminated against. They contended that they can still handle more grain.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not know. Perhaps the hon. member would ask the city of Vancouver to let me know how the port can handle more grain than it is handling today. I know there are boats at every berth and more boats waiting in the stream, and that has been the situation since early autumn.

[Later:]

CANADA-UNITED STATES—SUGGESTED CO-ORDINATED PROGRAM OF DISPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement by Herbert Hughes, president of the national association of wheat growers in the United States, in which he advocates a co-ordinated program for the disposal of surplus Canadian and United States wheat by barter and/or special measures? Will Canada consider approaching the United States government with a view to establishing such a co-ordinated program?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me a copy of the article in question. We do attempt to work closely with the disposal agencies of the United States—without too much success, I may say—but we will continue to see that whenever parallel action is possible it is followed.

STARRED QUESTIONS

PENSIONS—TRANSFER RIGHTS

Question No. 1—Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government obtained, since February 8, 1956, any statistical information on the transferability of pension rights by employees moving from one employment to another? If so, how many industrial pension plans in Canada provide for such transferability of an employee's pension rights?
2. Is the government taking any steps, or studying the possibility of taking such steps, to encourage and facilitate the mobility or transferability of pension rights, (a) with respect to employees in private industry; (b) with respect to employees in the public service?
3. Is the government now studying the possibility of a government sponsored national industrial pension plan, into which various industrial pension plans might be integrated, to facilitate retention of pension rights by persons who move from one employment to another?
4. What studies are being made by the government of any other ways of facilitating the mobility or transferability of pension rights? What are the results to date of any such studies?
5. Has the government received representations for the establishment of a national industrial pension plan? If so, what reply has the government made to such representations?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to question No. 1 no additional information to that contained in my answer to question 66, reported on page 992 of Hansard of February 8, 1956, has been obtained by the government.

Question No. 2: In addition to the answer provided last year to part 3 of the above question No. 66, a study is being undertaken of the effects of pension plans on the employment of older workers, including questions of transferability and mobility of pension credits.

Question No. 3: The question referred to in 2 above will assist in evaluating the desirability of facilitating the retention of pension credits by persons who move from one employment to another.

No. 4 is answered by No. 2 above.

No. 5: The Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour have included such proposals in their memoranda to the cabinet. It has been suggested that the implications of various proposals such as those included in the memoranda might be discussed further by representatives of the central labour federations with appropriate departments of government.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—PAYMENT OUTSIDE CANADA

Question No. 2—Mr. Knowles:

Is the government considering the introduction of an amendment to the Old Age Security Act to permit persons who have qualified for the pension paid thereunder to continue to receive the said pension even if they subsequently move to another country, (a) on account of health; (b) for other reasons?

Mr. Robertson, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Health and Welfare: As this question deals with a matter of government policy any proposed legislation would be announced by the government at the appropriate time.

SHAUGHNESSY HOSPITAL, VANCOUVER—POOL

Question No. 3—Mr. Goode:

1. Has the government made an investigation into the need of a heated pool for patients at Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver?
2. If so, what was the result of the investigation?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): In answer to this starred question may I say that following approval of funds for preliminary work in connection with new construction at Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, the architects were asked to prepare plans and the over-all planning for additional construction will include the study of the need of making provision for a therapeutic pool. As soon as detailed plans and estimated costs are available a decision will be made.

HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION, CAMPBELLTON, N. B.—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 4—Mr. Robichaud:

Has any assistance been given recently by the federal government toward the construction of additional hospital accommodation in Campbellton, New Brunswick?

Mr. Robertson, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Health and Welfare: Yes. Within the past fortnight approval has been given by the federal government to the granting of assistance under the national health program toward the cost of an addition to the Hotel Dieu de St. Joseph which will accommodate over 70 beds and additional bassinets. Approximately $95,200 will be available to the hospital for this purpose.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT OF LEGAL FIRMS

Question No. 4—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. What lawyers or legal firms were employed by any department of the federal government during the year 1956?
2. If any lawyer or legal firms employed by any department of the federal government during the year 1956 received more than $1,000, what are their names and what were the amounts paid in each case?

FEDERAL ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES, 1956

Question No. 7—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

1. What was the amount spent in advertising by each department of the federal government in the year 1956?
2. What firms or advertising agencies were used and what was the amount paid each such firm or agency?

SARNIA, ONT.—FEDERAL PAYMENTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Question No. 9—Mr. Murphy (Lambton West):

What was the amount paid to the city of Sarnia by the federal government in each of the years 1951 to 1956 inclusive, in lieu of taxes?

FEDERAL VESSEL CONSTRUCTION COSTS

Question No. 11—Mr. Bell:

1. In the last ten years, for all government vessel construction over $100,000, was there any difference as between the final cost and the amount of the original tender?
2. If so, what amount in each instance?

NATIONAL DEFENCE—FIRE STATISTICS, 1956

Question No. 19—Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. Did the Department of National Defence have any fires during the year 1956?
2. If so, what was (a) the total number of fires; (b) the total fire loss?
3. In all cases where the loss exceeded $1,000, what was (a) the location; (b) the service; (c) the cause; (d) the extent of the fire loss?
4. Was an official inquiry held in each case?
5. If so, what were the findings?

PUBLIC SERVICE, REGINA—40-HOUR WEEK

Question No. 52—Mr. Ellis:

1. Are any employees of the federal government in the city of Regina working on a 40-hour week required to work any part of these 40 hours on a sixth or seventh day in any week? If so, how many?
2. What is the classification of such employees and what reason is given for not providing for a five-day work week?

DOMINION COAL COMPANY—PAYMENTS

Question No. 57—Mr. Gillis:

1. How much money was paid the Dominion Coal Company for the calendar year 1956, by way of (a) subvention on the movement of coal; (b) subsidy; (c) drawback; (d) on exported coal?
2. How much money was paid the Sydney and Louisburg Railway, by way of (a) subvention; (b) rebate under the Maritime Freight Rates Act?

MARITIME PROVINCES—MILITARY TRUCKS

Question No. 65—Mr. Gillis:

How many cars or trucks have the navy, army, air force and Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the maritime provinces?

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE, ONTARIO

Question No. 75—Mr. Brown (Essex West):

1. How many persons between the ages of 65 and 70 years, (a) male; (b) female, were there in the province of Ontario, as of December 31, in each of the years 1954, 1955 and 1956?
2. How many persons in the province of Ontario in each of the years 1954, 1955 and 1956, were receiving old age assistance?
3. How many persons in each of the years 1954, 1955 and 1956, in the province of Ontario, (a) male; (b) female, have been rejected in their application for old age assistance?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

DEAS ISLAND TUNNEL, B.C.

Motion No. 3—Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the provincial government of British Columbia, the New Westminster harbour board and the federal government, in 1956 and 1957, regarding an alleged cessation of planning and actual work on the Deas island tunnel across the main channel of the Fraser river.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I do not think the hon. member would expect us to table correspondence between the provincial government of British Columbia and the New Westminster harbour board, but subject to the usual reservations I shall be glad to have the correspondence between this government and the government of British Columbia and the New Westminster harbour board tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation indicated by the Minister of Public Works, the motion will carry.

Motion agreed to.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO CERTIFICATION OF FINANCING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him whether the governor in council has passed an order in council during the last few days certifying the financing of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, that is correct, we have.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On what date was that order in council passed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Friday of last week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister whether the passing of that order in council before the transport board had a chance to make an impartial decision on this question was not improper action on the part of the government and something designed to influence the transport board?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The board of transport commissioners make their own decisions as they are a judicial body, and the government makes its decisions. A decision was necessary to facilitate the documentation of the financing of the pipe line and at the appropriate stage that particular decision is made. Ample evidence was provided to the government and the government made its decision.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce following the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition? Will the minister table the order in council to which reference has been made?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is certainly no objection to tabling it. I understand that such things are done as a matter of routine by the privy council office, but I will make sure that that particular order is tabled this afternoon.

Mr. Green: Why was it not left to the board of transport commissioners to make a decision without their being influenced by an order in council?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There was nothing to stop the government making a decision. The hearing of the board of transport commissioners was set for February 1, when the matter will be heard before the board, but that does not prevent the government taking independent action, because this is a decision that the financing has been completed; it is a matter of fact, not a matter for the board of transport commissioners to determine for the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If it is a matter of fact, what is the use of the board of transport commissioners? The matter will be submitted to them at the end of this week. What right has the government to prejudge a matter such as this, which lies within the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the matter lies within the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners in its administration of the Pipe Lines Act; the matter before the government is in connection with the obligation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to build their part of the pipe line, and the obligation of the crown corporation to build the northern Ontario section.

[Later:]

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—ACTION OF GOVERNMENT ON FINANCING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house what course of action the government will follow if the board of transport commissioners, at its next hearing, finds that the financing of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has not been completed?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Well, Mr. Speaker, I would call that a hypothetical question. The answer is that, after the board of transport commissioners brings down its findings, the government will consider the situation and take appropriate action.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I might ask a supplementary question, is that not exactly what has taken place here? The cabinet, first having ditched parliament last summer, now invades the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners and by anticipation attempts to influence its inclusive authority to decide.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am glad to note that the opposition, who have violently opposed the pipe-line project throughout its history, are now opposed to admitting that the pipe line is financed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are opposed to the government interfering with the board.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There are two separate contractual relationships: one is the contractual relationship between the government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and so far as that contractual relationship is concerned a decision of the government was required and has been made. There is a quite different relationship between the board of transport commissioners and the company. The question there is as to whether the board of transport commissioners is prepared to give final approval to the route and to the building of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines?

Mr. Diefenbaker: And the financing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The route approval depends on the financing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, of course.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): And that no doubt will be considered. The date of the hearing before the board of transport commissioners was set two months ago. There seems to be no particular reason to expedite that hearing but it will take place and the decision will be rendered. Whether or not the board of transport commissioners is going to be influenced by a decision of the government is a matter for the board to decide.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FAUTEUX COMMISSION REPORT—POSSIBLE CHANGES IN REGULATIONS OR LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister advise the house whether it is his intention to recommend changes in regulations or legislation that come completely within federal jurisdiction and responsibility relative to recommendations made in the Fauteux report and the report of the joint committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries? If not, why not?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this is the type of question of which one would like to have notice and I think I will ask my hon. friend to permit this question to stand as notice since there appears to be a catch in it.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PETERBOROUGH—INQUIRY AS TO USE OF OLD POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. On Thursday last I asked the minister if he could say what was going to be done with the old post office building in Peterborough. I should like now to ask the minister if he can tell us what is going to be done and if that building is going to be torn down to make way for a government office building to house other departments of government in Peterborough?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, no official decision has as yet been arrived at but we are contemplating the possibility of building a new building on that site.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): We certainly need it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPLICATION OF FEDERAL LABOUR LAWS TO HOLDERS OF MAIL CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Would the minister indicate whether federal labour regulations and laws apply to employees of persons who have federal mail contracts, and if so has such an employer in the New Westminster or Vancouver metropolitan area been given permission to work his employees for 50 hours per week?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, such a service contract does not come within the federal legislation of my department but I understand the Postmaster General exercises certain supervision over these matters, and if the hon. member will send details of what he has in mind to him or to me, we will look into it.

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—ACTION TAKEN IN KAMSACK AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What steps have been taken by his department to prevent a recurrence this spring of serious flooding on the Assiniboine river in the Kamsack area of Saskatchewan?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Assiniboine river in the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Manitoba is within the P.F.R.A. area, and there are quite a number of possible dam sites in the head waters of the Assiniboine river. Those have all been investigated by the engineers of P.F.R.A. and I understood that P.F.R.A. engineers and officials met representatives of the councils of municipalities in the vicinity of Kamsack at Kamsack last week and discussed the whole question of the advisability of constructing dams there for stock watering and what the effect would be upon flooding.

Mr. Castleden: Then I take it that nothing has been done.

Mr. Gardiner: All that it is necessary to do in order to find out whether or not you can do anything has been done.

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORTS OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based on a statement he made at a meeting he addressed in York Centre the other evening as reported in the Montreal Gazette. The statement is as follows—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member be good enough to put his question without reading the statement?

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, the question will not make sense without reading the statement.

Mr. Speaker: Then it is not the type of question that should be asked at this time.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, I may not read the words on which I base my question?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonnell: I hope I now have this question in more orthodox form, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Finance think the governor of the Bank of Canada, which is seeking to control inflation, may regard the minister, in the words of the daily press, as something resembling public enemy No. 1 for not practising what he preaches when he said:

> It seems clear that the only relief from a situation in which there is strong competition for money would be more saving which would release more real resources for use by those borrowers whose present needs are not being fully met.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I have never asked the governor of the Bank of Canada what he thought about me. If he had any strong opinions, I am sure he would express them about me and about the policies of the government. I do not think I need to answer the rest of the question.

[Later:]

ALLEGED REMARKS OF MINISTER ON POSTPONEMENT OF FEDERAL PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Was the minister correctly reported in the press as having said in Toronto on Monday that the federal government was postponing some of its projects and perhaps small business should do the same? If so, would the minister inform the house what projects the government has decided to postpone and why?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about the reports that have been made and if my hon. friend has not seen a copy of the notes I used on that occasion I will be glad to send them to him. I was not referring to anything other than capital outlay in the part of the speech that I presume got into the press in this form. What I said was that the government had reviewed its 1957-58 estimates having in mind the inflationary tendencies particularly in the capital outlay area and that as a result of that review we had in fact cut them down by—I did not use the figure—$105 million, so that the capital outlay of the government is that much less in this coming year than it has been in the past year and that is, I think, the example I was speaking of and that I hoped others might follow.

[Later:]

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS—ADMINISTRATION OF REGULATIONS AS RELATED TO ACREAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say whether through instructions to the banks or by way of regulation farmers who have less than 300 acres of cultivated acreage have been turned down when applying for farm improvement loans?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether any farmer who has less than 300 acres has been turned down for any reason such as his credit rating or the necessity of the particular purpose set out in his application. I do not think that because a farmer has less than 300 acres that would in itself be a reason why he should not get a loan.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): A supplementary question. Can the minister give the house assurance that bankers are not justified in denying farmers loans simply because they have not 300 acres or more under cultivation?

Mr. Harris: Before I give assurance may I inquire if my hon. friend knows of any case where that was the reason?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Definitely I do.

Mr. Harris: I would be glad if the hon. member would help the government of Canada by giving us notice of such cases.

[Later:]

CONFERENCE TO DISCUSS FINANCIAL PROBLEMS OF MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question. Can the Prime Minister indicate to the house whether or not it is intended to call a conference of the three levels of government in Canada in order to discuss the acute financial problems facing the municipalities? The Prime Minister will recall that such a request was urgently made by the federation of mayors and municipalities in its latest submission to the government.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, sir, the Prime Minister is not prepared to give any assurance that the federal government will call a conference of members of that level of government, which are agencies of the provincial governments. The position that has always been taken is that municipal authorities are agents of the provincial governments, and that if the provincial governments wished to have them represented in our conferences there would be no objection, but that we had no jurisdiction at all over such authorities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

KASHMIR—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT CONCERNING COMMONWEALTH NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance of the developments in Kashmir, will the right hon. gentleman consider making a full statement to the house as to the negotiations or representations or exchanges between the government of Canada and other commonwealth governments with respect to this matter at this time and negotiations in the past?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Delicate negotiations are going on now in many capitals in reference to that matter and I do not think it would help them at all to make a statement on what has taken place in the past or what part Canada is endeavouring to take at the present time. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the matter is being considered in an atmosphere of attempting on all sides to reach a solution that will ease the situation that has unfortunately existed with regard to that part of the subcontinent of Asia since the establishment of the republic of India and the commonwealth of Pakistan.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the representative from India to the United Nations made a disclosure in the United Nations assembly, as reported in the British press of January 25, of the text of discussions on that subject that took place in a commonwealth prime ministers meeting in 1949? It was in the light of that fact that I asked if this House of Commons and this country may be informed of what had been the discussions and what the background of the present position is.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I understand that the representative of India made a seven-hour speech in the general assembly. I must confess that I have not had time to read it all. I know what attempts are being made, about which confidential dispatches are being exchanged daily—and perhaps more frequently than daily—as the negotiations progress. I hope it will not be long before a statement of some improvement in the situation can be made.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) but in his absence I should like to direct it to the Prime Minister if he would not mind dealing with it. In view of the fact that provincial legislatures are now beginning their sessions and that their budget preparations are already well advanced, does the Prime Minister not think it would be most unfair to the provinces to delay further any announcement the government may have to make with regard to old age pension increases?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what effect old age pension increases might have on provincial budgets but the government has reached no decision in respect of the question the hon. gentleman suggests. As soon as a decision is reached—if one is reached—it will be announced in the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister taken note of the request of the Canadian Labour Congress in its recent brief to the cabinet for an amendment to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to provide that the certification of a bargaining unit shall be binding on any employer to whom work is transferred, so that the practice of by-passing collective agreements might be stopped? Will consideration be given to such an amendment at this session of parliament?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I noted carefully the representations made by the Canadian Labour Congress and the legislative committee of the railway brotherhood when they met with the government last week. These matters are being carefully looked into. Consequently it would be too early to answer the latter part of my hon. friend's question.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—SITUATION ON HOBBEMA RESERVE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In the light of the dramatic flow of the milk of human kindness that stemmed from the minister's personal mission to Vienna to assist Hungarian refugees from communism, is the minister prepared to undertake a new personal mission dramatically to assist victims of bureaucratic aggression, by journeying to the Hobbema Indian reserve in Alberta for a first-hand investigation of the case of 118 Indian men, women and children dispossessed of their right to live on the land that has been their home for several generations?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think it would be quite wrong for a minister of the crown to attempt to substitute himself for a court of law when parliament has decided that a question should go before the court.

[Later:]

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. If full-blooded Indians in Canada can be deprived of the legal right to call themselves Indians because of the white man's law passed by this government, can there be any security for a Canadian of any racial extraction protecting his rights to legally continue to be a Canadian?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, no full-blooded Indian can be deprived of his rights as an Indian by any statute of which I am aware that has been passed by this parliament.

An hon. Member: You had better read the Indian Act.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I understand that the time for appeal has nearly expired. Would the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration advise if it would be possible to extend that time and if so would he consider extending the time allowed for the filing of an appeal?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any reason to attempt to consider that hypothetical question until the time has expired. An appeal can be lodged up until February 6 and for the life of me I cannot understand why it has not been lodged already.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister quite satisfied that there are ample funds available to the Indians for the lodging of an appeal, and is he prepared to help them in that regard?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, no funds whatever are required. I am quite satisfied that, if an appeal is made by the aggrieved persons, any judge before whom it came would give the fullest possible consideration to the case.

Mr. Fulton: What about counsel?

WATER RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I apologize for not giving him notice, but I can assure him I am not trying to formulate policy on the basis of answers to questions. Can the minister tell the house when the representatives of Canada and the United States, who are going to discuss certain mutual problems with respect to the development of international rivers, will meet?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No definite date has been set as yet. Our people in Washington are discussing possible dates with the United States authorities at the present time.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister why there has been such a long delay?

Mr. Lesage: There has not been such a long delay, Mr. Speaker, because these discussions could only start sometime after the United States elections. We are not the only party to the discussions. There are two parties. On the one hand there are our representatives in Washington, and on the other there are the authorities of the United States. At the present time I cannot say more than that the discussions are going on with a view to fixing the date.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTIONS BY CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS—POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Will the Minister of Labour advise the house whether or not he is considering amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in line with the suggestions submitted in the brief of the Canadian Labour Congress during the present session of parliament?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

POSTAL SERVICE

NEW WESTMINSTER, B.C.—PARCEL POST DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Have the parcel postmen in New Westminster and South Burnaby who received a letter of dismissal effective January 31, 1957, been reinstated? If not, what future plans has the post office for parcel post delivery in the New Westminster area?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in order to properly answer this question and a similar inquiry which I received from the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode), I should point out that the men who are employed to deliver parcel post in the two localities mentioned by the hon. member are not employees of the Post Office Department. Parcel post delivery is done under a contract entered into by the post office and individual contractors and I would presume that the men to whom my hon. friend refers are employees of such a contractor—

Mr. Regier: Oh no, they are employees of the post office.

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry, but that is the case. However, if my hon. friend refers to certain individual contractors who received notice that the temporary arrangement under which they were making parcel post deliveries was to be terminated as of the 31st of January, 1957, these instructions have been suspended.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General following the one asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). It arises out of a letter which I wrote him on December 15 and a question which appeared on the order paper. Does the Postmaster General consider that a contractor who has had a contract for 24 years is a temporary contractor? For how long is the temporary suspension of the letter of notice of dismissal to last—a 24-year period?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, that question covers a lot of ground. When I referred in my earlier answer to a temporary agreement, may I say that what determines whether a contract is temporary or not is the fact of its being made for a set period of time. I am informed that none of the contractors referred to had any other arrangement with the Post Office Department than a temporary agreement to do the work at a certain rate per day, which agreement could be terminated any time by the Post Office Department. They are not employees of the department, they are individual contractors.

FREIGHT RATES

MARITIME FREIGHT RATES ACT—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the light of a statement made yesterday by federal experts suggesting that a drastic revision of the Maritime Freight Rates Act will take place, and in the light of a further statement that suggestions should come from the seaboard provinces, will the Prime Minister say now or later exactly how these suggestions should be made by the maritime provinces?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no statements made by expert officials. I do know that for some months the situation has been under investigation by officials of the Department of Transport for the purpose of securing accurate information as to what has been in fact the operation of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. As soon as that investigation is completed the matter will receive very serious consideration. It was brought to my attention by the former premier of Nova Scotia some months ago and I told him that the investigation was being made but that there would be no attempt to arrive at a decision until we had at least the preliminary report of the Gordon commission but that we were having the investigation made so that time might be saved in giving proper consideration to the problem as soon as we had received the Gordon commission report and had the data which I think it would be very advisable to have before us in arriving at an answer to the question as to whether or not the act is operating as it was intended to operate.

Mr. Bell: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that most of the information seems to be presently available, would the Prime Minister assure the house that action will be taken and legislation drafted this session on this very important issue?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not assure this house that there will be legislation until we have the information before us and have studied it and have come to the conclusion that legislation is required to make the act produce the effects that were intended when it was adopted.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the welcome announcement of the interim payment will the minister recommend to his colleague the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) the immediate appointment of a transport controller to direct box cars to the marketing points that ended the crop year with a very low quota and have a very small payment so that they will not suffer now because of this?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is well aware of what happened in the meetings of the committee on agriculture during the last session which in my opinion has made the position of transport controller completely untenable. Whatever recommendation I may make to my colleague, I cannot mention the name of any man who would accept that position and go before that committee in the capacity of transport controller.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not aware that these marketing points that ended with a very low quota are still on a very low quota owing to the failure of this government to appoint a transport controller?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO NAME OF NEW ARMOURED REGIMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence in the light of his statement made yesterday with respect to the Princess Louise's Hussars. Will the government give further consideration to retaining the old designation, of the militia unit at least?

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I have no comment to make on that subject, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: Can I have an indication that the question will be taken up by the department?

Mr. Hellyer: I will take the question as notice, and refer it to the minister, if I may.

IMMIGRATION

HUNGARIAN REFUGEES—REQUEST FOR STATISTICS ON AGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I rise, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. On page 686 of Hansard the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in referring to the Hungarian refugees, said he had figures regarding ages, marital status, and breakdown of occupations. I notice that the tables given in Hansard apply only to occupations and marital status. I wonder if that is an oversight, or whether the minister may yet table the ages in an appendix to Hansard.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think, sir, it was an oversight. When I looked at the table and handed it in to Hansard I thought it included the ages; it was only when I read Hansard afterwards, as the hon. gentleman has done, that I discovered it did not. I will see whether there is a table giving the ages, and if so, I will be glad to give it to the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that this session is getting on, with the end not weeks away, is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate to the house, either today or at an early date, what other legislation the government intends to introduce apart from what is already on the order paper?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Well, I will have inquiries made. I know there is one piece of legislation that it is intended to introduce and which is not yet ready, but I hope it may be ready for our consideration at a very early date. That is the measure dealing with the federal district commission. I will inquire whether there are other measures that are in preparation, and try to inform the house at as early a date as possible.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Prime Minister say when the committee on estimates will be set up, and what particular departments of government will be investigated by that committee during the present session?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I will be glad to discuss that question with the hon. gentleman and the leaders of the other groups.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Loans, investments and advances—

545. Loan to the United Nations Organization to help finance the clearing of the Suez canal, $1,000,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, last evening the Minister of Finance said that later in the discussion he would give a detailed explanation of this item and would discuss it at length; at least this is what I gathered from the remarks which were reported in Hansard. He said he would make a brief explanation, and give a more detailed one later if it was desirable.

Mr. Harris: Read what I said about that at the conclusion of the session.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I have read the entire statement, and I think that the suggestion which was made by the minister at the beginning of his remarks was very proper, and that the house and the country deserve a better and more complete summary as to the reasons for this loan. After all, it brings into focus a number of questions of paramount interest at this time for the preservation of peace in the Middle East and, indeed, throughout the world, and I have a number of questions which I wish to ask the minister.

Is the loan going to be effective, in the opinion of the minister, in providing for the opening of the Suez canal? What assurance is there that if the canal is opened Nasser, who up to now has defied every order made by the United Nations, will allow free passage for the ships of all countries, including Israel? What are the provisions for repayment? What has the minister to say with regard to the apportionment of responsibility for the destruction which has been done to the canal? Will Nasser be required to pay for the damage which, after all, was mainly, if not entirely, caused by him, and voluntarily done? I think we ought also to know how an allocation was arrived at whereby Canada assumes a disproportionate share of the actual amount to be lent to the United Nations.

These are matters which are being discussed today in the United Nations. Indeed, as one looks back over the last two or three months, one can only conclude that in the sorry history of the situation in Suez this loan would never have been required had there not been vacillation and uncertainty on the part of the free world—an attitude which has had the result of elevating Nasser to a prominent position as the dictator of the Middle East, and as the predeterminator, according to his will and his whim, of the orders made by the United Nations.

All these things arise under this section. But as yet, the house has not been made aware of the stand which is being taken by Canada at the United Nations, or respecting the direction or order made by the United Nations requiring Israel immediately to evacuate the entire Gaza area as well as the area in the vicinity of the Gulf of Aqaba.

On June 19, the secretary general was instructed to make, within five days, a report as to whether or not Israel would withdraw to the armistice line and, strangely enough, the secretary general has interpreted his mandate as giving him no right to demand or provide guarantees which Israel is seeking before evacuating the small areas she now occupies—the greater portion of the areas occupied having long since been evacuated by Israel. I think we have the right to know what attitude Canada is taking in this regard.

Israel has asked for guarantees to prevent Egypt from resuming raids on her territory, and to end the blockade that is imposed by Egypt in direct contravention of the orders of the security council promulgated in 1951. The secretary general says that nothing can be done by the United Nations to provide a strong force, except by the consent of Egypt. Surely this house and the country have a right to know how long this system of blackmail by Nasser will be permitted to continue. He has been allowed to say what the conditions governing the force shall be; he has been allowed to determine the tenure of that force; he has taken it upon himself to say that when, in his opinion, the emergency force should be withdrawn, that force shall be withdrawn. And in the last three or four days he has made his threat that unless the Israelis leave the Gaza area unconditionally he will, or may, make the canal unusable; and that he may find it necessary to call in the so-called Russian volunteers.

Sir, what assurance have we that if the canal is cleared Nasser is going to resume the responsibility of a nation enjoying membership in the United Nations? You say: What connection has the emergency force with a loan to clear the canal? There can be no peace, no permanence, brought about by the clearing of the canal unless before it is done responsibility is accepted by Egypt for a discontinuance of its previous wrongful acts.

I ask the minister to set out in detail what plans the United Nations has, what stand our representative, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is taking on behalf of Canada, in order to assure that the United Nations will have its directives respected not only by Israel but also by the grave wrongdoer, Nasser, who has treated the orders of the United Nations as so many scraps of paper. This week the United Nations faces its greatest challenge. It will either go forward to new strength or it will be emasculated in the same manner in which the league of nations was destroyed by similar action and defiance by Mussolini.

Would the minister say whether or not in Canada's opinion the Israelis should unconditionally withdraw from the Gaza area before the United Nations emergency force marches in in order to prevent a repetition of the border raids and the guerrilla attacks that have continued for seven years? Unless the emergency force is accepted as an instrument that can be used anywhere to secure and maintain compliance with the United Nations directives, then it is simply a nebulous force devoid of capacity to act and totally unable to assure that the clearance of the canal will be continued and that the canal will be made open without any restrictions to the ships of all nations.

I ask the minister whether Canada has demanded in the United Nations or intends to demand that when the Israelis evacuate their points of occupation on the gulf of Aqaba the Egyptian blockade of Israeli ships will end and all nations will be assured of equality of opportunity to utilize the canal and its facilities. Sir, if the canal is to be cleared by the United Nations through loans provided by member countries within the United Nations, have we not the right to be assured that Nasser's sole control of the canal shall end? Otherwise this is just a stopgap, another act of appeasement to Nasser.

Remember that he has said that if at any time he does not wish to maintain the canal as an open waterway he has the right to say so. I doubt whether in the last century there has ever been an equal defiance of the conscience and will of the free world than has taken place in the last few weeks. When parliament is asked to vote for a loan we have a right to know the degree to which, in the opinion of those in the government with a full knowledge of the subject, the clearing of the canal will effectually assure freedom of ingress and egress to all nations. If the United Nations allows Egypt this week to flout its authority Nasser will have been established on an eminence as a dictator in the Middle East. The future will then be fraught with fear and foreboding and the U.S.S.R. will have used him as a pawn to bring about that which they have endeavoured to achieve for more than 300 years, namely, a control over the Middle East that until now has been denied them.

Nasser has become emboldened by the unconditional support he has received from the general assembly, and I ask the minister if the Israelis withdraw from these two strategic points, Gaza and the gulf, there will be assurances that in so far as Canada's representative at the United Nations is concerned every precaution will be taken to assure that the United Nations emergency force will occupy these two areas and prevent aggression on the part of Egypt in the gulf area and in the Gaza area—prevent aggression on the part of Arab terrorists as well as prevent any bands from Israel from attacking or raiding in that area. Certainly the situation seems most anomalous in that Nasser, having defied the United Nations over and over again, having refused to obey an order made in 1951 to assure that the canal should be open and that Israeli ships should have freedom to pass through the canal, now insists, as one who has himself defaulted, that the state of Israel, the last bastion of freedom in the Middle East, shall be divested of all hope of protecting itself.

I ask the minister this. What assurances have we that when the canal is cleared Nasser, who up to now has adopted an attitude of international brigandage, will become a law-abiding member of the United Nations and will assure all nations complete freedom in the use of the Suez canal?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, there are a few things I should like to say on the supplementary item now before us and I hope to deal strictly with the matter of the Suez canal itself. The Minister of Finance is asking the house for its authorization of a loan of $1 million for the clearance of the Suez canal. On the surface, and I think I can say almost fundamentally, we are in favour of the loan, but naturally a number of questions should be asked and answered before authorization is given.

The situation is very similar to what would exist if I approached you, Mr. Chairman, or any other member of the house and asked for a loan to rebuild a house that had been partially destroyed by fire. Naturally you would like to know how the building was going to be used and administered. We as members of the House of Commons are in the same position in asking questions on this estimate authorizing the granting of a loan. We all agree that the Suez canal must be cleared and reopened for all ship traffic, but when the government asks for authorization of a loan of $1 million then before such authorization is given we ask the government to give as full information as they possibly can on what their stand, position and policy are regarding the Suez canal once it has been cleared. As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, if I were to ask you for a loan to rebuild a house or other building you would hesitate very much to lend me the money unless you knew the purpose for which the building was going to be used. You would hesitate very much unless you knew. You would not want it to be used as a bootlegging establishment, a house of ill fame or something not in the best interests of the community. The same thing applies with regard to the Suez canal, which is of such vital importance to all the world. When this government is asking us to authorize a loan for its clearance we should know the attitude of the government on the use that is going to be made of it once it is cleared.

I agree with a great many of the indications that have just been given by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) with regard to Colonel Nasser himself. In my own humble estimation there is no question whatsoever that he has been overcome by his own verbosity, that he thinks he is now the rising, shining light of the Arab world and that he is developing an attitude—and one expressed in words—which is similar to that which was evident during the rise of Hitler in Germany. Hitler in Germany and Mussolini in Italy cost the democratic world a great deal in money and in lives. We cannot see it happen again. Now, when it is in the embryonic stage, is the time for democratic countries in parliaments like ours to make our opinions known.

We in this group definitely are of the opinion that, as members of the United Nations, as one that is making a major contribution in the emergency force and one that is now being asked to make a loan for the clearance of the canal, this country through its government should at this time announce its view on its operation once it is cleared. I think it is only logical and reasonable to believe and to say that a waterway such as the Suez canal, which is important to the entire world, cannot be left under the domination and subject to the whims of a would-be dictator or of one country. Surely it is reasonable and logical, having the future in mind, to ask the government whether, in asking for this loan and in view of the other expenditures that this government is obliged to make, they are prepared to state that in the United Nations they are either going to put forward or support international control of an international waterway as is the Suez canal.

As the situation is at the present time, the only way in which it is possible to have international control of an international waterway such as the Suez canal is under the aegis of the United Nations. Hence the first question we should like to ask in considering the supplementary estimates is whether that is the attitude of the government and whether they will press it with everything they have in the United Nations and, in so doing, of course, give a guarantee that no country is going to be discriminated against. I would think it is obvious to all that in the re-opening of the Suez canal we cannot rely on the word of Nasser or on the word of Egypt as we have known them for quite a while past. They have indicated already over a period of five years that if they have viciousness against a certain country, they will use their control of the canal to block that country.

It was my privilege a few years ago, Mr. Chairman, to visit the state of Israel. I want to say that it was not only a pleasure but an inspiration in the time that I spent there to see a people dedicated to building a new country out of rock and sand, and they were doing it. In my estimation Israel today is the only democratic bulwark in that part of the world. It is therefore our responsibility and that of the United Nations to aid and to assist them. When in their great work, with their great objectives, they are blocked by the viciousness and dictatorship of one country, because of the Suez canal, I say that is an indication as to what some country or what some individual or persons like him would do to any other country—be it Great Britain, France, Canada or any other country—if we happen to get into their bad graces.

The Suez canal is of such great importance that such a situation has been protracted too long as far as Israel is concerned. We cannot possibly put any country in the position of facing a similar danger in the future. I speak as one who has been in that part of the world and as one who I think realizes the importance of national waterways. That is why we ask, through you, the Minister of Finance, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister whether, in asking for authorization for a loan at this time, they will give us a guarantee—as I hope they will—or at least an indication of the position that the government is going to take on the internationalization of the operation and administration of the Suez canal and whether a demand will be made by this government that it shall be such that no country shall be discriminated against in its trading and international affairs because of the whim of a man, a government or one country. I am certain that if we can have some indication from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance or the Secretary of State for External Affairs on this matter, he will find that it will be accorded a great reception in this country and that it will give the leadership required at this time in the United Nations on a matter of great importance.

We certainly support the objective, the purpose, of this loan but we feel that this information is important and imperative.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, this item we now have before us in the supplementary estimates calls to mind, of course, the whole tragic and humiliating history of the Suez problem, beginning possibly with the seizure by Egypt of this important waterway in violation of its treaty obligations. In fact, we could say that this tragic history goes back prior to that time when Egypt deliberately refused to fulfil its obligations in allowing passage of vessels of all nations through that canal. There are those who gloss over or even support the action by Egypt in nationalizing the Suez canal. They say she was in fact justified in taking over a canal located within the bounds of Egypt. But the fact remains that the treaty that was signed does not expire for approximately two years more. The action that was entered into at that time was in direct violation of that agreement.

I am sure we are all aware of the importance of this waterway to the economy of western Europe. I understand that approximately a half of the oil supplies of western Europe find their way through the Suez canal. The canal has been called the lifeline or the jugular vein of the economy of western Europe. I may say that the effects of the stoppage of the oil shipments were felt in France within a very few days after the canal was closed. Some of us had the opportunity of attending the NATO parliamentary conference, and we wondered just why it was that our hotel rooms were as cold as they were. Those who had a little time to spare and could not find other ways of occupying that time would remain in their rooms but they found they were too cold. Upon inquiring we were advised by the management of the hotel that oil was in short supply. They had placed their order as usual but had only received about 50 per cent of their regular supply. Rationing was going into effect and many homes were altogether without fuel. The people in that section were facing a very dreary and difficult period because of the stoppage of oil supplies through Suez.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the disgraceful display of bad temper, recrimination and retaliation over this situation has done nothing to establish confidence and goodwill amongst the nations of the free world. I would suggest, rather, that it has shaken the foundations of the free world in a very severe manner. We can understand how a situation like this could bring even the allies to a position where there are serious differences of opinion separating them. I was interested in reading a statement by the former president of the United States, Mr. Truman. In analysing the situation he said that interest in our own interests and in the interests of peace in the world should dictate that we never again allow ourselves to become separated from our allies.

There are many different phases that we must look at in connection with this particular item in our estimates, an item of $1 million to assist in the work of clearing the Suez canal. I say that before we even go that far there should be, as other speakers have suggested, some consideration given to the future status and use of that important waterway. Is the future use going to be dependent upon the whims of this sawdust Caesar as he has been called who, though defeated and discredited, has emerged as a god before whom Mr. Hammarskjold and the United Nations are bowing. A very interesting article appears in Saturday Night of January 5 with reference to this matter. Speaking of Mr. Hammarskjold it says:

> . . . Dag Hammarskjold, who has found the greasy Nasser too slippery for him. But Hammarskjold, although giving an appearance of dickering with the Egyptian dictator, has really been more of a messenger boy running between United States and Cairo.

A little farther down the article states:

Nasser, with the compliance of Hammarskjold (who referred to British crews of salvage vessels, as "enemy aliens") and the U.N., has managed to make low comedy of the Canadian resolution.

They are speaking now of the emergency force.

It is intolerable that a defeated and discredited dictator can impose conditions on an international police force. If he gets away with it (and so far he has), the UNEF idea is as dead as a pickled herring.

Possibly these are very strong words, Mr. Chairman, but I would suggest there may be more than a little truth in that article. I would suggest there must be a recognition of certain very important facts in a discussion of this matter. There is more to it than just an item in the estimates. I would suggest that the whole Middle East situation is tied up in a very real way with this action that is now proposed in clearing the canal.

The question of control has been raised. Who is going to control the canal after it is cleared? Prior to the nationalization of the canal it was operated by the Suez canal company. Then, Mr. Nasser got peeved and retaliated by taking over the canal and saying he was going to use it and operate it in the interests of Egypt. After the clearance of the canal, who is going to operate it? Mr. Nasser said he may find it necessary even now, unless his conditions are met, to halt the clearing operations. Apparently the United Nations, and some of our governments who are giving such complete support to the United Nations in this matter, are willing to let him dictate the terms. Whoever operates the canal, I would suggest that there must be a guarantee of the freedom of navigation for ships of all nations. This clause was in the agreement which was violated by Egypt in the refusal to allow passage of Israeli ships.

I recall back in the fall of 1954, when I had the privilege of being at the United Nations, a particular incident was under consideration at that time known as the Bat Galin incident. It was a matter of considerable concern at that time, but the principle involved was that the Egyptian authorities refused passage to Israeli vessels and on this occasion took possession of one. I would suggest as well that some attention should be given to the Soviet-Egyptian intentions. When I was speaking a few days ago I referred to an article written by James Cromwell, former United States minister to Canada. With reference to this particular matter of Soviet intentions, he had this to say:

The president was in a tough spot because of the elections. Sir Anthony's handling of the far eastern situation has been of the utmost value to all free countries. The British and French uncovered, captured and destroyed millions of dollars worth of top Russian war material, stockpiled in the east.

In doing this they blocked Russia's program for conquest in the Middle East. They also revealed to the world Russian plans to gain control in the east.

I know many here will not agree with the reference to Sir Anthony Eden. I was not stressing that particular aspect at this time, but the indication by Mr. Cromwell that that action did reveal the extent of Soviet intentions and plans in that area.

Then, we should like to ask the question, where do we go from here? Has that danger been completely destroyed; has it evaporated or are we still faced with that same serious problem?

I should like to refer to Newsweek magazine of January 14, 1957 where on page 16 under the heading "Danger Signals" I read:

East Berlin—The word here is that Egypt's President Nasser soon will send a delegation to Czechoslovakia to arrange for a second big arms shipment, including tanks, armored cars, and spare parts. In addition, 500 Egyptian army officers will arrive around February 1 to train in heavy-tank operation and jet-fighters and bombers.

Reports in the newspapers these last few evenings have referred to the continued supply of Russian materials to those countries in the Middle East. What is going to happen? Is any thought at all being given to this matter? What action is being taken? What safeguards are being provided? I think these questions are also of importance when we are considering an item like the one which is presently before us.

There are other problems to be considered. There is the problem in relation to the gulf of Aqaba, border guarantees and the United Nations emergency force. But over and above all of these hovers the great problem of the political settlement of the entire Middle East situation. We should not forget that these are what might be described as minor aspects of the over-all problem of the Middle East and if we cannot find a solution to the major problem the others will not amount to much.

With regard to the policy of the United Nations I believe I speak for a great many Canadians when I say that I am personally disturbed about the way the United Nations and Mr. Hammarskjold as secretary-general have been carrying on negotiations, conversations and activities with respect to the situation in the Middle East. It would appear that the United Nations policy is made up of a series of curt orders to the friends of the western world, to those whom we call our allies, and a policy of appeasement and collaboration with Colonel Nasser of Egypt.

I would like to know what other nations are doing with regard to the request for assistance in the clearing of the canal. What is the Soviet union doing? What is India doing? What nations are participating in what we might call the preliminary advance for the purpose of clearing the canal? I think that information would be of assistance to us.

In conclusion I would like to pose a final question. On what is this advance being made? Is it an advance on a greater sum that we will be asked to contribute at a later date? I believe the Minister of Finance originally suggested it was a contribution and then he changed that expression and substituted the word "advance". He has suggested it is a loan. Well, just what is it? Is it, as I have already inquired, an advance on a larger contribution we will be asked to make at some future date? Will it be in the form of a loan? How will it be repaid and who is going to repay it? Someone has said it is just an item of $1 million. I suggest it is more than that because it relates to one of the greatest problems which confronts us at the present time.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, to go around in reverse order, I might answer the last question first. The hon. gentleman would like to know whether this is a loan or an advance and if we are likely to be called upon to advance more money at a later time. I wish I knew the answer to that question but no one does know it as the present moment. As I said last night, this is an advance to put the secretary general of the United Nations in funds for the purpose of paying the interim costs of the clearing of the canal. It is an item of $1 million out of a total of about $10 million that he thinks he should have at the earliest possible moment. He has asked certain countries who are in a position to contribute United States dollars, because this is the basis of our contribution to the United Nations, for that sum. The United States have already said they would contribute $5 million. Norway has intimated that she will contribute $1 million.

Mr. Knowles: Advance.

Mr. Harris: Yes, advance. We have spoken of the $1 million in the vote and several of the western European countries have also said they would give consideration to the matter and advise the secretary general very shortly as to the amount they would be able to advance. In fact, in all cases they have intimated that their government was favourably disposed to doing something to make up to $10 million.

As to the future, my understanding is that something like this will occur. The United Nations will debate this matter at the current session and come to some conclusion either as to further interim financing or an assessment for the cost of the whole job and if that assessment is spread over all the members of the United Nations no doubt Canada will then be assessed for a sum of money. Whether it will be at the rate of our normal contribution of something between 3 and 4 per cent or whether it will be a different sum I would not be able to say at the present time, but if a further assessment is made of course we shall have credit for the $1 million on that assessment. On the other hand, if the secretary general feels that he can arrange the financing in some other way before the job is completed, in all probability he would then repay us the $1 million pending a final decision as to what our contribution ought to be in the end.

Now, to go back over the other questions—

Mr. Patterson: I wonder if I could ask another question at this point. Is Egypt going to be required to contribute anything to the clearance project?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, the resolution has not been discussed before the United Nations. I would not be in a position either to say what the ultimate resolution would be or even to suggest the probability. I know a great many opinions have been expressed as to who might or might not be asked to pay for the cost, but at the present time I do not think any useful purpose would be served by our discussing that or expressing our own opinion at least for the time being.

The other discussions on this item ranged not only up and down the canal but off on to the mainland. I did not want to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition to suggest that he was not in order when he was speaking of the Gaza strip and other aspects of the current dispute between Israel and the Arab countries. However, I would not want to pass over any of the remarks he has made without some very brief reference to every matter he mentioned, although I think we ought to confine the discussion to the canal as such and the clearing thereof.

I think our position with respect to the Gaza strip is quite simple. Eight years ago the United Nations established certain armistice lines which brought to an end the hostilities which were then proceeding. Since that time everyone has recognized that a political solution to all the problems in the Middle East and in particular the dispute over Israel is highly desirable. I am sure that everyone in Canada would feel that if the United Nations could bring out of its present meeting or even out of protracted negotiations over several months solutions which have not been attempted in some parts at all during the eight years, then a contribution of that kind and a good deal more might be justified. Peace in the Middle East, in my view and I think in the view of the government of Canada, depends on getting a political solution to these things which have been left in an uncertain state since 1948.

There is no question in my mind about the view the people of Canada would take about that settlement and that it ought to result in a recognition of the state of Israel by the Arab countries surrounding that state. We then ought to go ahead with our economic life without all the great expense to which all those countries have been put over the years in maintaining military establishments and thereby draining what might be a prosperous world of some of its means for improving the standard of living of the people.

The Gaza strip is not an issue in the vote before us. I can only say that we recognize it is one of the more current difficulties and it is hoped that the present negotiations going on at the United Nations will find some means of assuring that there will not be any form of chaos or lack of authority in that area during the course of the negotiations which might extend for some months.

The Leader of the Opposition has asked me to assure the committee that Nasser will be a law-abiding member of the United Nations. I am afraid that I am not in a position to sign any note of that kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not ask you that.

Mr. Harris: That was the concluding appeal, that the government give assurance that Nasser would become a law-abiding member of the United Nations.

Mr. Hodgson: Why not?

Mr. Harris: It would be our desire that every member of the United Nations would be a law-abiding member thereof, but I do not think I should be expected to give any assurance of that kind. I do want to give the assurance that coupled with the vote of $1 million which I hope the committee will approve we will reiterate the position we have always taken on this matter, that is that the Suez canal shall be free to everyone without discrimination in its use. What form the operative part would take is still a matter of great concern and indeed may not be foreseen at the present time, but the United Nations resolution saying that this waterway shall be open to all users is not only endorsed by Canada but will be endorsed by Canada and insisted upon in so far as we have the ability to do so.

I do not think that I can answer in particular detail many of the other questions that have been asked. There was one question directly affecting the money side which I might refer to briefly. The Leader of the Opposition wanted to know if there was to be an apportionment of the responsibility. He wanted to know also why it was that we were called upon, to use his own words, to make a disproportionately large contribution to the present financing. I think that is what he had in mind. If I have not explained that clearly I will repeat.

The appeal for immediate funds was made to those countries which in the opinion of the secretary general could most easily, both financially and legislatively, provide the money at the earliest possible moment. We recognize that one in ten is a larger contribution than we are called upon to make in almost any other phase of the United Nations. In most cases our percentage contribution is less. But it is for the very reason that this is not an assessment but rather merely an appeal for funds that the amount we are presently asking parliament to vote is larger than we would normally be expected to give.

I think the Leader of the Opposition also wanted me to say something about certain guarantees which were made back in 1951. All I can add to what I have said already is that I would hope that out of the present session of the United Nations will come an acceptable solution or at least some method of determining an acceptable solution which might not be precisely in the form of the guarantees of 1951 or those of 1948 but which would nevertheless be a means whereby these difficulties along the Israeli and Egyptian borders could be resolved.

Under these circumstances I regret that I cannot go further. I do appreciate the remarks that have been made by all speakers, each one of whom I think has admitted that we ought to do this, and that the economic advantage in clearing the canal and having trade resumed and costs reduced in Europe, in fact in Asia and all shipping countries, would be of great advantage and would be a real contribution to the resumption, not only of normal trade but of that feeling which gives rise in some cases to political settlements which otherwise would not be so easily reached. If I have omitted anything I shall be glad to attempt to answer what I have missed.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a further question. It has been said already, and I think it is true, that all of us would welcome the clearing of the Suez canal and more particularly the assurance that it will be free for international use. These funds which parliament is being asked to vote as a loan will presumably be spent under the direction of the assembly. Could the minister or his colleagues give us any information as to the debts which have been incurred for which this money is needed; who is doing the work; to whom this money will be paid for the clearing of the canal? We read in the press about what salvage boats and equipment are being used. Is British and French equipment being used and, if so, by what means? I think it would be helpful if we could have such information as the minister can give us as to the purposes for which this money is being spent currently and how the canal is being cleared.

Mr. Harris: The canal is being cleared by the United Nations.

Mr. Michener: Is it being done under the direction of the assembly or has the security council anything to do with it?

Mr. Harris: It is under the direction of the assembly. Brigadier General Wheeler is in charge of the operation and has almost complete authority, if not complete authority, for that purpose. He is employing any persons or any construction or salvage companies that he can obtain. At that time, as I said last evening, it was hoped the work could be completed in three or four months. The expenditure which we are trying to provide will be used by the secretary general, as trustee, through Brigadier Wheeler and the organization he has set up. I understand there will be some British ships and personnel being used to the best advantage in the work on the canal.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, in common with other members in this group we welcome the minister's statement, but in one phrase he used I think he said either too little or too much. I wish he would enlarge upon it. We all want to see the Suez canal open to all countries, and that is government policy, too; but supposing Colonel Nasser is not prepared to open it to all countries. Then, according to the minister's remarks, the freedom to use the canal might be "insisted upon". Would the hon. gentleman care to enlarge on that statement?

Mr. Harris: I thought it was clear, Mr. Chairman, that we have approved the United Nations resolution that there should be no discrimination in the use of the canal and that we would take the opportunity, when we remitted the $1 million, of emphasizing once again that we thought this should be the conclusion the assembly should reach in dealing with this resolution.

[Mr. Michener.]

When I used the word "insist" I meant it only in that sense, the sense of repeating again the argument we have used. I was not suggesting any sanction in connection with the $1 million, because we shall be paying this over at the earliest possible moment, but I mean that in doing this we shall emphasize again our concern that the canal must be free to the ships of the nations concerned, and that the resolution heretofore passed should be insisted upon in the United Nations in any future discussion as to the use of the canal.

Mr. Hahn: The Minister of Finance has indicated in his remarks that the United States, Norway and several west European countries have agreed to make loans. Is he in a position to tell us what amounts they will contribute, and what countries they are?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman, as I said, the only country which has actually given a figure is Norway, but the following countries are now engaged in the same processes as this house is engaged in, namely determining what they may do: Australia, Sweden, Denmark, The Netherlands, West Germany and Italy. We have had some preliminary announcements from the Italian, Danish and Swedish governments that they were favourably inclined toward the proposal, but that is as far as I can go.

Mr. Pearkes: How is it that the United Kingdom, France and Italy, who are most concerned with the results of these activities, have neither made nor been asked to make any contribution?

Mr. Harris: I think the hon. member will see that in some cases it is desirable that these things should be done by nations which, while interested in results, might not possibly be accused of having had any part in what brought about the discussions we are now undertaking.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance has treated this question as though everything were lovely and there were no obstacles in the way of success. He implied that it was just a matter of a little persuasion and a little bit of delay until the canal is opened again and all the trouble would be at an end. In the meantime Canada is going to pass out a mere million dollars to bring about this result. One might almost be excused for thinking the ministers were putting up this million dollars themselves. That seems the attitude of the Canadian representatives on this question, they make big fellows of themselves by having Canada contribute what is obviously an amount far in excess of what she should contribute.

Mr. Harris: I carefully said, every time, that we are asking parliament to do this.

Mr. Green: Oh, "asking parliament to do it". There is no doubt about what the members sitting behind the minister and supporting him on this side of the house will do. The responsibility goes right back to the cabinet. Canada is advancing far more than her proper share, and I repeat that in effect the ministers are making good fellows of themselves at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer. This situation is just not as simple as the minister has made it appear.

I have here an extract from the U.S. News and World Report of January 25, 1957, which has this to say with regard to the situation in Suez:

In that Middle East tangle, here are things to keep an eye on: Suez canal clearance is to be far enough along in March to let some ships through. One issue is whether Nasser will let British, French, Israeli ships go through.

Obviously that has not been settled yet. The minister said this afternoon that the government of Canada would press for the free use of the canal by all nations, but it is perfectly clear that this man Nasser has not yet agreed to that; in fact he has been making threats that if certain conditions are not adhered to, British, French and Israeli ships will not be allowed to use the canal. The dispatch in the U.S. News goes on:

Another issue: will tolls be paid to Nasser? Test may come with the first ship to try transit. The west is getting braced for this test. Price of clearing canal remains to be settled. U.S. has advanced $5 million. Others have hung back. Who will pay, and how much, are the questions. U.N. police force may have to take on more jobs. It may be asked to police Gaza strip and gulf of Aqaba. Israel now holds these strategic areas. Egypt claims them. U.N. will have its hands full with this dispute.

This house should be told what stand Canada is to take with regard to Egypt paying something toward the clearing of the canal. After all, who was it blocked the canal in the most malicious piece of sabotage in many years? Egypt deliberately blocked this canal, with the result that it will cost somewhere around $30 million or $40 million to clear it. However, there was not one word from the government today to suggest that they believe Egypt should pay at least some of this amount, not a breath of any such suggestion. Canada is rustling around and raising $1 million. The Americans are putting in $5 million, and they should put up 15 times as much as Canada. There is no reason why we should pay one-fifth as much as the Americans for this or any other similar project.

Nasser, the man who has brought about most of this trouble by breaking his agreements and by flouting the resolutions of the United Nations through the months and the years, is to get off scot-free, while the people of Canada are being asked to pay the shot. That is exactly what I said would happen when I spoke during the session last November. It is perfectly clear that we have now reached that situation, and I think instead of the minister getting up in a wishy-washy way and trying to get this vote through on soapsuds, a representative of the government should get up and say exactly what Canada believes should be done; and it should be insisted that this man Nasser should pay at least a reasonable proportion of the cost of clearing the canal. It is all very well to expect the people to pay and pay and pay, regardless of who is at fault.

In this whole deal it seems that the democratic countries, the ones that will follow the rules laid down by the United Nations, are those who will get all the abuse and all the insults, and then have to pay the shot. That is the position we are facing in this parliament today; a few words of maudlin sympathy for Israel, while at New York the Canadian representative is insisting that Israel must get out of the Gaza strip and away from the gulf of Aqaba before anything can be done. Could there be any situation more ridiculous?

I come now to another point. I ask the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister to give the house some definite assurance with regard to what is to happen to this United Nations emergency force. There is a statement in the press this morning. One thing about these dictators—Hitler was the same, and Mussolini was the same—they always tell us exactly what they are going to do, and we never believe them; we always think it is too bad to be true, and we bury our heads in the sand. Then we wake up to the fact that they have actually done what they said they were going to do. Here is what appeared in the press this morning under the heading, "UNEF Won't Stay".

Cairo—Deputy foreign minister Fattah Hassan—

He is an official of the Egyptian government.

—said in an interview that "the United Nations emergency force will not remain in Egypt after Israel has withdrawn from Egyptian territory". In the interview, published in the newspaper Al Massaa, he said: "UNEF will not remain in Egypt after completion of the mission entrusted by the United Nations regarding the withdrawal of all aggressors behind the armistice lines."

They have taken that stand from the start and the democratic nations have given in all the way through. We were led to believe when this force was first raised that it would be kept largely in the Suez canal area in order to see that there was free transit through the canal. We thought that the force was to act to bring about a final settlement of the question. But right through the piece Nasser has got everything he wished. He said that he would not have the force in the canal area and the troops had to go out into the Sinai desert. That is where they are now. He said he would not have the Queen's Own Rifles in Egypt and the Queen's Own Rifles went back to Calgary from Halifax, with alibis made by the Canadian Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet.

In the order in council passed on November 20, 1956, authorizing the sending of Canadian troops we find this paragraph:

> And whereas member nations were invited to contribute self-contained battalion groups to which Canada agreed, as a result of which preparations were made to assemble such a force for dispatch in part by air and in part by H.M.C.S. Magnificent;

And so on. It was battalion groups that the United Nations wanted, but Nasser said there were not going to be any Canadian infantry troops and they were not sent. Every step has been dictated by Nasser. I think we are entitled to know now just what Canada is going to insist upon with regard to the United Nations emergency force. Is that force to remain in the Middle East until there has been a settlement of the boundary dispute between Israel and the Arab nations? Is it to go into the Gaza strip? Is it to go to the gulf of Aqaba? Is it to have any responsibility in the Suez canal area?

These are the sort of things the house should be told. If that is not the intention, then it is perfectly obvious what will happen. Israel, by the force of opinion built up by the nations that are opposed to her and want to see her wiped out, will be forced to get out of the Gaza strip and the gulf of Aqaba area. Then, following the same course that has been followed right through, Nasser will demand that the United Nations emergency force be withdrawn. The same nations that have been demanding that Israel withdraw will then demand that the United Nations emergency force withdraw and Nasser will be in complete control, built up to a position of dominance in that area far greater than Mussolini or Hitler ever achieved and built up primarily by the backing of the democratic nations, including Canada.

If that is the position that is to come about and if the Canadian government is going to sit back, do nothing about it and just let things drift, I suggest it will be a great tragedy. It will be out of line with the whole character and background of the Canadian people. The Canadian people are people who make their position known. They believe in taking a stand and making their position known. I am sure they are not behind the government in the pussy-footing on this question, their policy of hanging back and trusting that everything will work out in the long run.

The Minister of Finance has not been able to give us any definite assurances, and I hope the Prime Minister of this country will rise from his seat this afternoon and assure the house and the country that Canada is going to take a determined stand to see that Nasser is not allowed to get away with any more of these dictatorial moves. Canada has taken a very large part in the United Nations emergency force, a part far in excess of what she was obliged to do. About one fifth of the troops in the force are from Canada even though none of them are infantry troops. I hope the Prime Minister will make it clear that Canada is going to insist that the United Nations emergency force remain in the Middle East until the question of boundaries has been finally settled and until free use of the Suez canal has been assured to all nations of the world.

Mr. Pallett: I want to ask a question of the Minister of Finance who apparently is now taking the responsibility with respect to international affairs.

Mr. Harris: No, just supplementary estimates.

Mr. Pallett: I notice that the amount of the item is $1 million. In his statement the minister said that the fund was $10 million in United States funds. Is he saying to the house that it is $1 million in United States funds or should the correct figure be less than $1 million?

Mr. Harris: The $1 million will be Canadian funds translated into United States funds, with whatever result may come.

Mr. Pallett: If that is the situation can the minister tell us what will happen to the difference of $40,000 odd? What will happen to that money?

Mr. Harris: Nothing. We have $40,000 to our credit on the advance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we have been trying to get some information on the question of what Canada's stand is going to be on this matter at the United Nations and so far we have not been able to get any information. A moment ago the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked the Prime Minister to let the house and the Canadian people know what attitude Canada is going to take on the question now before the United Nations. Are we going to ask Israel to evacuate the Gaza strip and leave these islands and rocks in the gulf of Aqaba area without any assurance that the United Nations emergency force will move in and do its part to preserve the integrity of Israel?

I think we have a right to know that because all of this is intertwined with the situation on the Suez canal. This $1 million vote, this loan, simply underlines the degree of parliament's ignorance of what is going on or what stand is to be taken by Canada at the United Nations. In the last ten days or so the stand taken has been one of vacillating retreat from reality. What we have the right to know, and from the Prime Minister, I take it, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is what stand Canada is going to take.

The other day I asked a question on the orders of the day and I was not able to get any information at all. Is Canada going to stand idly by at a time when the authority of the United Nations has been challenged and disregarded by Nasser and demand unconditional withdrawal on the part of Israel while at the same time allowing Nasser to be an undischarged bankrupt with respect to his responsibilities to carry out the 1951 orders of the security council?

Mr. Chairman, what is happening in the Middle East today is almost a rewritten version of the retreats that were taken in 1936 in the league of nations and which ultimately and inevitably led to war. There is nothing more serious that can come before this parliament than a matter such as this. Nasser has simply defied everyone. He has defied the United Nations. He has laid down the terms. He has said, "These are the terms upon which a police force will operate against me". We ask what stand Canada is going to take. We are driven to find that stand on the basis of speeches made outside the House of Commons.

In the next two or three days decisions will be made. The United Nations assembly is adjourned in so far as a decision on this matter is concerned. We have a right, Mr. Chairman, to know what Canada intends to do. We are asked to vote a $1 million loan to help clear the canal and we have no assurance that when the canal is cleared, Nasser will not close it again. We have no promises. We have nothing except uncertainty. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Prime Minister to let the country know where Canada stands on this matter, for up to the present time the most discerning eye cannot follow the stand taken by Canada in the United Nations in this regard. I ask the Prime Minister whether he will now tell the house and the country what is going to be done to assure, first, the maintenance and continuance of the United Nations by assuring that its directions will be lived up to; and second, whether this is a unilateral responsibility to which any nation may object as Nasser has done.

What assurance has the secretary general received from Nasser that, when the canal is opened up, the ships of Israel and the ships of Britain and France will not be subjected to the type of intimidation that existed from July last until November? Unless we have some assurance like that, what we are doing today is simply postponing the day of responsibility by the simple expedient of lending $1 million, not knowing how it is going to be used or, when used, what the result is going to be. In addition, we have the right to know whether the United Nations emergency force is simply to be a body whose destination is determined by the wrongdoer, whose membership is to be determined—as it has been to date—by the wrongdoer and whose tour of duty is to be dependent on his whim. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Prime Minister clarify this situation. The present prospect holds dire fears for the preservation of peace not only in the Middle East but throughout the world.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman wishes to know what Canada's position is going to be. Canada's position has been stated in a speech of five and a half pages, a copy of which I obtained through a dispatch and of which mimeographed copies are said to have been sent by bag last night and which will be available. Summary reports of that speech have been made in the newspapers, and I do not think I shall attempt to read it into the record.

Mr. Green: Why not tell us in your own words?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No. I am not going to attempt to tell in my own words the contents of the speech.

Mr. McGregor: You don't know how.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I did not catch that last remark.

Mr. McGregor: I said that you don't know how.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Perhaps the hon. gentleman will endeavour to get my place at the coming election and he will know how a lot better than any of those who have had responsibility for public affairs.

Mr. McGregor: I could do just as good as you do. You stand up there like a dummy and you will not even answer the questions.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I am not going to attempt to speak if that is the attitude.

Mr. McGregor: You don't know how. I said that you don't know how.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member must realize that the hon. member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Chairman. One does not want to annoy the Prime Minister, and interruptions do on occasion annoy him. Will he now proceed to tell the house and the country in summary—and if not in summary, then in detail—what the stand is so that members of parliament will not be obliged to wait for the daily press for statements made elsewhere in order to ascertain the course that Canada's government is taking? Would the Prime Minister do that?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I am not going to attempt to repeat from memory the language used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I do not think it would be of much advantage to read it into the record at this time. It is a speech that was made publicly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Yesterday morning. Copies may have arrived already. As soon as they arrive I will communicate to the hon. gentleman a mimeographed copy of the speech that was made there and in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated just what was the position he was taking as being the position of the Canadian government.

Mr. McGregor: After we vote the money.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Could the Prime Minister epitomize it? It is a simple question. Is Israel to be placed in a position that, having evacuated, the United Nations force is not to stand as a guardian against future guerrilla aggressions on the part of the Arabs?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That is not the position taken by the Canadian government.

The Chairman: Order. Excuse me, but may I interrupt both hon. members at this point in order to do what I perhaps should have done earlier. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, certain of these matters are inextricably intertwined and it has been extremely difficult for the chair this afternoon to determine the exact moment when we have departed perhaps too far from strict relevancy. I think hon. members will agree that I have been rather lenient in that respect. However, I think that any questions which are asked and any replies which are made should relate, as our rules require, to this particular item. I would therefore ask hon. members to direct their questions to this item which is as follows:

Loan to the United Nations Organization to help finance the clearing of the Suez canal.

I would also ask hon. members to whom the questions are being directed to give their answers having in mind the same strict ideas of relevancy. I would therefore ask hon. members on both sides to co-operate in trying to observe our ideas of relevancy when we are discussing what is, after all, an item in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Green: Through you, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is not a very satisfactory state of affairs if the House of Commons is compelled to find out what the stand of the Canadian government is either by getting a multigraphed handout a day or two after debate has taken place in this house on this question or by reading it in the newspapers the next day. If the Prime Minister does not wish to state the policy today in his own words, I think we are entitled to have him read into the record the speech that was made in New York by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Chairman: I presume the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has just risen to make further representations on the point of order which I was trying to elucidate. I would feel that any answers which were made to questions or any debate which took place at this time could only be relevant to the exact item under consideration. So long as we adhere to the rule of relevancy, which all hon. members well know, then we are proceeding in an orderly manner. Otherwise, I do not think it is appropriate to discuss certain questions at this time. This is an item in the supplementary estimates and we are, of course, governed by the rule of relevancy.

Mr. Green: On the point of order, I might say that the Minister of Finance has made a statement today and members on this side of the house have made statements. The debate has continued in the ordinary way, and in accordance with the rules of the house. Now, the Prime Minister has risen to reply and to make his position clear. I submit to Your Honour that surely it is in order for the Prime Minister to do that. I do not understand on what basis you could now rule that when it comes to the Prime Minister's reply he cannot reply because he will not be in order. If that is the case, it reduces the debates in this house to a farce. I suggest the Prime Minister has a right to reply. He has been in parliament for a long time and is well able to decide what is relevant and what is not. I do not see why he should not be permitted to read into the record the speech which was made by his Secretary of State for External Affairs in New York.

Mr. Harris: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, you may remember that I opened my remarks by pointing out that the Leader of the Opposition had wandered farther afield than I thought he might have, but without my interruption, in reference to those things I felt were outside the scope of the vote. I did that out of courtesy, rather than interrupt him, but it does seem to me that, while I would not be the one to suggest the Prime Minister ought not to say what he feels is in the public interest, the point I made originally is the one you are trying to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition that any matters other than those connected with the canal are really outside the present issue. One of the two questions the Leader of the Opposition addressed to me more recently had to do with the situation in Israel, unconnected with the canal. I said that, subject to these remarks—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Harris: —the whole question of whether or not the UN force will take over the Gaza strip has nothing very much to do with the clearing of the canal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is the brevity of the answers that causes the curiosity of the opposition. Possibly I might ask the question this way, Mr. Chairman, without in any way agreeing that we are out of order in the questions we have asked. Will the Prime Minister tell us what stand the Secretary of State for External Affairs took yesterday at the United Nations with reference to the question of the canal, the protection of commerce on the canal, and the degree to which he insisted on assurances that when the canal is opened up Nasser will not again defy the United Nations and deny the free nations of the world the right to use the canal?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been dealing with that matter. We tried to get that information in parliament, but we could not get it. This is the first opportunity we have had to ascertain the facts. At the moment, I am directing my question to the Prime Minister as to the representations made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of Canada in connection with the canal matters. I ask him what stand is being taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of Canada in this very important matter?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, I think that without infringing the very wise interpretation of the rule you have stated it is probably possible to say why this vote is being recommended to the Canadian parliament. There was a resolution adopted, in which Canada participated with a large number of other members, giving authority to the secretary general of the United Nations to proceed as expeditiously as possible in organizing the work of clearing the canal. In doing that he made commitments, on behalf of the United Nations, to those who have been doing very efficient work up to the present time in clearing the canal.

This being the case, we thought that we should continue to lend our support to the conduct of the secretary general in trying to bring about a settlement of the mid-eastern problem in a manner that would avoid the outbreak of war again in that region. It is because we still have confidence in the efforts that are being made to that end by the secretary general that we decided to recommend to parliament that this advance of $1 million be made as an advance without any commitment as to who should ultimately have to pay the cost of that necessary job, or the job that seemed to us to be necessary, and bring about a situation where a political settlement would not go back to the situation prior to last October, but would be a situation that would make for peace in the area with some reasonable assurance of permanency. It therefore is not foreign to the reasons for recommending this vote to the house to envisage the possibility of this being helpful to the realization of the objectives of so many of the members of the United Nations.

Now, the stand that was taken yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on behalf of Canada was that, under the terms of the resolution that had been adopted, priority was to be given to the withdrawal from the areas that had been—I do not want to use the word in a sense that would imply blame in any way—occupied by Israeli troops. It was felt that was not enough to comply with the real effect of the resolution that had been adopted; it was not enough to bring about a situation that would be merely the restoration of what took place before the occupation of those areas by Israeli troops, but it had to be something that would prevent those areas from being used again for the threats to Israel to which they amounted, and the raids that were being manned from those areas. It was felt that was something that must be considered at the same time as the general assembly was considering the report made by the secretary general that Israeli troops had not made a withdrawal from the Gaza strip or from the shores of Aqaba; that possibly as a matter of the right priority the withdrawal should be required first but should be accompanied by measures that would assure that there would not be merely the restoration of the preoccupation condition, but that there would be such measures as would provide for the security of Israel in respect of the raids which formerly had been launched from the Gaza strip or the Sinai desert and also the assurance of free passage through the canal to all shipping. That is the theme which the Secretary of State for External Affairs developed in his speech yesterday and the hon. gentleman will see in some of the headlines in the Ottawa newspapers tonight that there is very substantial support for the attitude taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in that speech of yesterday morning.

The resolution that will follow is now being discussed. The hon. gentleman knows, as I do, that whatever we may feel our position to be, Canada cannot dictate what the resolutions adopted by the general assembly will be. There has to be an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the membership to carry a resolution and we know, and I am sure the hon. gentleman knows, that many discussions are taking place at this time between these various delegations to get the kind of resolution that will conform with the position expressed in the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday morning, and that will have the support of a two-thirds majority and that will reassert the statement that the Israeli troops should withdraw, but will be accompanied by further statements that immediately following the withdrawal such and such dispositions will be taken to prevent the situation from remaining no better than it was before the occupation of those areas.

The suggestion is being made in strong terms by a number of delegations that the United Nations emergency force should police that whole area for such period as might give time to bring about a settlement that will make for—I perhaps should not say permanent peace in the area but will make for stability—and for the removal of the immediate threats of the resumption of hostilities.

Mr. Green: Would that be only with the consent of Egypt?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If Egypt resists, the only alternative would be a resumption of hostilities, and what is being attempted is to put such pressure upon all the parties that there will be something that will not require or will not be the occasion for the resumption of hostilities. It is because we feel that the resumption of hostilities would be disturbing to the whole world including Canada that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is doing his best, as are many others, to bring about a situation where security can be achieved without a resumption of hostilities, and that can be achieved along the lines he has stated, the security of Israel against the raids that came from that area and the right of all nations to make use of the canal.

As to what will be the ultimate way in which the funds will be raised: Will it be an assessment against the members of the United Nations? That has been suggested and it does not seem to have very strong prospects of being the solution adopted. Another solution is extra or supplemental tolls paid by the users of the canal to provide through those supplemental tolls the amount that will have been expended to clear the canal and to make it open for shipping generally. These things cannot be brought to a head quickly. It has always been our experience in drafting, when several are concerned that not every mind envisages the proper way to express the proper ideas in the same fashion and in the same language, and these things take time. When you have to have two-thirds of 80 in favour in order to get an effective resolution, it takes some time and some negotiation to have them all agree that the proper words, the proper punctuation and the proper order of expressing the decisions are contained in the document submitted. That is work with respect to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has had quite a lot of experience. I am not asking hon. members opposite to share that admiration but I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs has won much admiration from other delegations at the United Nations for what he has been able to do in that respect. To make a positive statement and say, "It must be this or we are not going to support it," is not apt to bring about the adoption of a resolution supported by a two-thirds majority of the 80 members of the assembly. That is the situation as it stands at the present time and I hope it will mature into a resolution that will have the required support from many quarters. I appreciate, of course, that it is rather unpalatable for hon. members of this house to have to learn what is being said or done elsewhere but it must be realized that it is the "elsewhere" that is the forum where the resolutions are going to be discussed and adopted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, but it is Canada that is being bound by them, and Canada's parliament should know.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If Canada's parliament is to be told beforehand what will be the unalterable position of the Canadian delegation I would not expect Canada to participate in many resolutions the general effect of which may be of advantage, though not exactly in the line that originally would have been proposed by Canada.

I think the hon. gentleman will recognize that what I am saying will accord with what he himself has observed on more than one occasion when he has visited the assembly halls either of the security council or of the general assembly of the United Nations. The government is not in the same position in the United Nations as it is in the Canadian parliament. In the Canadian parliament it can put forward its proposal and if the proposal is not adopted the government stands defeated and another government is called in to take its place. At the United Nations that is not the situation. If the Canadian delegation takes a stand as an unalterable stand and it is not acceptable to a majority of two-thirds of the 80 members of the United Nations, the resolution is just not adopted. Under present conditions I think it would be a very sorry result for the United Nations. I hope hon. members will feel, as I do, that if this situation can be cleared up in a satisfactory way through the actions of the United Nations the prestige of that body will have been greatly enhanced and the confidence of the world at large in that body and its efficiency will have been greatly increased.

That is what we have been trying to do; that is what we have been trying to bring about. It is true that if this were to be a contribution or an assessment of what Canada might be expected to pay for the clearing of the Suez canal it would be out of proportion. It may be that our contribution to the United Nations force is out of proportion, but after all the general who has been chosen as the commander for the United Nations is a gentleman of Canadian citizenship for whom I think we all have admiration and whom we felt it would not be the desire of the Canadian people to let down in his efforts to discharge successfully the responsibilities that have been placed upon his shoulders by the United Nations. That is the reason this government has endeavoured to meet the requests made by General Burns as to the kind of assistance he would feel he should have from Canadian personnel with whom he was of course more familiar than he would be with personnel supplied by other nations. It was for that reason that there were these alterations made in the original plan. My hon. friends on the other side say that it is because it was at the dictation of Nasser.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what Nasser says; that is admitted also in the United States.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There are many who say it was at the dictation of Nasser but there are others who believed it was better to compromise than to resort to a resumption of fighting in that area. That was the alternative.

When you can bring a man like Nasser, whom I have never met and about whom I have had very conflicting appraisals by different persons, all of whom I think were speaking in perfectly good faith, to a kind of compromise that is tolerable and that will assist in reaching the final objective without the resumption of armed hostilities, that I think is an achievement.

Mr. Green: What compromise has he made as yet?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do not know that it would be of any value for me to attempt to go over the details of the discussions that have taken place with Nasser in regard to this situation. If the hon. gentleman feels it would have been better for the free countries to resort to armed force to impose their will as to what they thought would be the best solution, then I cannot agree with him. On some occasions that may be the only way in which results can be achieved, but when there is any other way, even though it may require a lot of negotiation and a lot of changed commas or words in a resolution, there is a real achievement when progress is accomplished without resort to the force of arms.

Up to the present considerable progress has been made. It may be that there should have been greater care exercised in the drafting of the original resolutions of November 2, 1956, but they do cover the whole area. It may be that because one paragraph came before another it makes it necessary to deal with what was in the preceding paragraph before dealing with what was in the next paragraph, but if they are all dealt with in the same document and by the same resolution I think the order in which they come in that document and in that resolution is not as important as the avoiding of the resumption of armed hostilities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there is no one on this side of the house who would desire to see a resumption of armed conflict. In no question that was asked here this afternoon was there any possible suggestion that that would be the preferable course. What we are trying to do is to secure some information as to the stand being taken on behalf of the Canadian people with the objective in mind of securing peace in the Middle East. We advanced the idea that before there should be any evacuation on the part of Israeli troops from the Gaza strip and from the gulf of Aqaba, Israel had the right to an assurance that she would not be left unprotected. The Prime Minister has now said that the protection of Israel against the resumption of raids and guerrilla warfare is in the concept advanced yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): As well as by the representative of the government of the United States who spoke before the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister referred continually to the fact that this idea was suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As I read the record, and as the Prime Minister now says, it was first advanced by Henry Cabot Lodge, the representative of the United States.

There is one thing that has not been cleared up by the answer given by the Prime Minister. The secretary general of the United Nations appears to be under the impression that his mandate does not go beyond directing Israel to remove its forces. It does not permit him to suggest any further action that should be taken in order to maintain the integrity of Israel and preserve the Suez canal for the use of all nations.

Over and over again he has taken the stand that Nasser has to consent. Up to the present time Nasser has certainly dictated the course which has been followed. He says: These are the rules; this is the kind of force I will accept; these are the terms under which that force will operate. For any nations of the free world to accept his ipse dixit as the final decision and basis of settlement; for the nations to accept in their entirety his declarations may cause a temporary appeasement, but all history shows that those who thirst for blood are not appeased. In the speech yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs these words appear:

> 3. Empower the secretary general to deploy the emergency force into the vital areas as Israel pulls out—but to consult both disputants before making such a move. The force thus would take over the duties of the old UN Palestine truce team but would extend them along the Aqaba gulf coast.

Now, I ask the Prime Minister this. Do the consultations which are being carried on with the disputants imply that both the disputants must consent to the force being used? Up to the present time Mr. Hammarskjold has taken a very firm stand that no action anticipated to be taken on Egyptian soil shall be taken without the consent of the government of Egypt. The Gaza area and part of the area on the gulf of Aqaba have been accepted as Egyptian territory since 1948. Will it be necessary to have Nasser's consent as a condition for the moving in of the United Nations emergency force to patrol those areas? If it will not, I think the general plan will meet with universal approval of the people of this country, because that is what has been asked for; it is reasonable, and it is the only way in which there is any possibility of preserving peace in the Middle East.

On the other hand, if the means to be taken have to be acceptable to Nasser then those means cannot achieve peace. They may result in the continuance of a truce, or of an armistice, but there can be no peace in following the dictated determinations of Nasser. I therefore ask the Prime Minister this. Is it intended that the emergency force or the United Nations force, the truce administration or whatever you like to call it, will move in and will not require the consent of Nasser before doing so?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I think this is a matter of semantics rather than a matter of politics. "Will they require the consent of Nasser to move in?" They will require that there be no armed opposition to their moving in, and that is in accord with what has been the pursuit of the United Nations since it was seized with this problem of bringing about a settlement that would not require force of arms for its achievement. It is not only the force of arms that acts upon the acquiescence of parties to a dispute. If the hon. gentleman will read the whole of the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs he will see that there is a dispute as to the legal situation with respect to the Gaza strip and the Aqaba shores, and the minister for external affairs recommends that the question be submitted to the international court for adjudication but that in the meantime both parties give assurances that there will be no attempt to make use of these areas for the resumption of active hostilities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And enforced by the emergency force?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The emergency force will be there to see to it that there is no resort to a resumption of armed hostilities.

The whole affair is very much made up of different scenes, if you will, of the same drama; and it is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that I have ventured to mention things that do not deal obviously and directly with the recommendation of this vote to the House of Commons. This is only one of the scenes of the drama, and the main actors are not always those who first appear upon the public stage. The hon. gentleman says the first public suggestion of this procedure was made by Mr. Lodge, and that is quite true. But the hon. gentleman also knows that there had been discussions behind the scenes for several days, and those discussions dealt not only with what should be proposed but also with who should make the proposals, so as to ensure that they might receive the widest possible acceptance.

The hon. gentleman knows, as I do, that the sponsorship of resolutions is frequently a matter which requires a great deal of discussion behind the scenes before it is agreed upon, and even now I hope the representative of India will find it possible to join in sponsorship of the resolutions that will be brought forward. I know there may be some wishful thinking with regard to that, but the hon. gentleman will see in the dispatches that a resolution is very apt to come about as something arising out of the atmosphere that develops, or will develop, among the delegations during this adjournment.

I do not think the hon. gentleman would imagine, and neither do I, that there were no resolutions ready when the adjournment was suggested, but it was felt that before bringing these forward it would be better to have this adjournment so they could be discussed in a forum where no one was taking a public stand from which a retreat would have involved loss of face.

I for my part—and my colleagues feel as I do—trust a great deal in the discretion and tact of our Secretary of State for External Affairs in the manoeuvres to which resort must be had in order to bring about something that proves acceptable to a two-thirds majority of the general assembly.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two about the purpose of this proposed loan of $1 million to the United Nations; and by way of introducing the remarks I wish to make, may I say I believe it is the common belief of the house that we are now being asked to vote this sum because of some prior action taken by the government of Canada.

We were here in November, when we debated at some length an action which was then fresh in our minds and which had just been instituted in the United Nations. I, for one, though regarding it hopefully and supporting the vote that was taken at that time in respect of the United Nations emergency force, raised some very serious questions and doubts which everyone must have had regarding the choice the Canadian government, along with other countries, made to remove the police action in the area from the hands of the French and British and place it under the direction of the assembly of the United Nations. That choice was made and that again has gone on under the direction of the general assembly. Today, in consequence of that choice and action, we are now providing funds as a loan to pay for one of the objectives which the United Nations assembly is trying to attain.

I agree that it is not an easy problem. Everyone here will agree that to lend $1 million to clear the Suez canal for traffic and, more important, to re-establish it as a channel of free international trade, is a worthy objective, and I am sure the government will secure the necessary vote. But the fact that we are voting the money, the fact that the government will have the money in its hands and will lend it and will be under responsibility to the house and the country to account for the expenditure and demonstrate as time goes on that the expenditure has produced a result that is worth while, also brings into issue the initial choice the government made in sponsoring in the United Nations the resolution to set up the emergency force. It also brings into issue the government's conduct in pursuing that choice at the United Nations, as our Secretary of State for External Affairs is doing at this very moment.

The Prime Minister raised the difficulty which we all see of obtaining a two-thirds majority. That must have been in the minds of the government when they undertook the course they are now following and undertook to put the responsibility for the solution of the Middle East problem in the hands of the assembly.

It is quite true that a two-thirds majority is needed for every resolution, that the assembly can only act by resolution, and that if that majority cannot be obtained the whole procedure, the whole course of this remedy, this police action, this attempt to solve the present issues in the Middle East, may be completely stultified. But that is something upon which the government has entered with its eyes open and knowing the consequences of using the general assembly for that purpose. We said at the time, and I repeat, that we were hopeful the choice made and the action we are taking today would lead to a more effective means of dealing with this kind of international problem where some exercise of authority, either by states in association or by the United Nations through an emergency force, is absolutely essential to the correction of disorder and to the correction of those who create the disorders.

I say we are hopeful it will lead to something, but let me say this, and this is the point I wish to make. The government has made a choice which has resulted in the action under way today, and the government is on trial in carrying through the consequences of that choice in the general assembly of the United Nations. The people of Canada will look to them to justify their conduct by success. Therefore what we have to see to in voting funds, and all we can see to, is that the government will not be content with anything less than the objective which has been so well stated today, a solution of these problems through action of the United Nations, a solution which does not depend on the consent of one of the parties, the consent of Nasser of Egypt or any consent which will nullify the solution of the three important problems respecting the Suez, the Israeli-Arab dispute and the question of the Arab refugees.

The latter two are not in dispute today, but the disposition of the canal problem is the object of this vote. I do suggest that the money will be wasted and the course of the government's action will be condemned in time by the people of the country unless they take a firm line at the United Nations and justify the choice they made some months ago. That can only be done by being insistent and convincing. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is a very tactful and convincing man. We hope he will succeed and that the general assembly will be effective in solving the problem. As I say, the government is on trial, the minister is on trial, and we are looking to them to justify the course which has been taken.

Mr. Patterson: The Prime Minister indicated he would see that the Leader of the Opposition was provided with a copy of the recent speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder whether it would be possible for all members of the committee to obtain copies for their information.

Mr. Pallett: We are voting here $1 million, a considerable sum of money; and in the light of the explanation advanced, part of which was conveyed to me at secondhand because it was necessary for me to be out of the house earlier this afternoon, it seems to me that many of the essential elements have not been fully explained. This item appears under a rather unusual heading, namely "Loans, Investments and Advances". As I understand it, a loan is something, usually money, that is given with the understanding that it will be returned. An investment is something into which you put your money in the hope that it will appreciate and bring some sort of return. An advance is a going forward.

[Mr. Michener.]

I do not think it has been explained how the loan is to be secured. Originally there was a reported though not confirmed proposal put forward by some United States bankers under which they would advance to the United Nations the full amount of the money, not only the $10 million but the total sum of $50 million required to clear the canal. I understand that from their investigations they were not satisfied that there would be any enforceable obligation on the United Nations whereby that body would have to repay the money. That opinion was obtained by people in the investment business, but even in the face of that the representation is made to the house that this amount is in the nature of a loan and is an amount of money that will be returned. I think the Minister of Finance should assure us that there is an enforceable obligation under which the money will be repaid if the amount is in fact a loan. If it is a gift then the item should be clothed in the proper language and so described.

There is another thing I think we might reasonably consider. International loans generally bear interest. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation says that when the Canadian people borrow money for housing they must pay 6 per cent. There is no suggestion here that the Canadian people as a whole in going into a foreign market with their money, if you like, are going to receive any return by way of interest.

I remember well the Prime Minister saying last session that the Suez was no concern of ours, that we did not have any ships going through the canal, and why should we bother with anything going on in that area. Looking at the item in a rather cold-blooded fashion, and that is the way I think the Minister of Finance should look at a financial transaction, I think he might give us some indication whether there is to be any financial return. I am sure it would be of interest to his department and the people of the country as a whole.

This afternoon the Prime Minister made certain references to an address by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the United Nations. I thought it rather significant that he omitted any suggestion that the resolution proposed to the United Nations is not going to carry in its present form, and in all honesty I think it should have been said that it was not intended that it should carry in the form in which it was proposed. By the language used and by everything the Prime Minister said I think there is rather the suggestion that someone has come up with an answer. The Afro-Asian group will not subscribe to the proposal put forward by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Prime Minister well knows they will not.

Knowing that, I think he should go further and explain to us what steps Canada is taking in that regard. It is nice to refer to things that are to be done, but the motive behind the action should also be explained to this house. Let us go further and see what assurance can be taken from the assembly and what hope there is of ensuring the success of this assurance. How much more are we going to be asked for after this $1 million is spent? Is there then going to be another call made on the Canadian people? Can the Prime Minister assure us that all members of the United Nations are going to participate in this and that if the secretary general does reach some formula, all nations are going to support it? Or is this just $1 million tossed out in hope? If that is the situation, let us hear it.

As I recall it, I do not think any of the eastern countries have yet agreed, either by resolution, speech, communication or in any other way, that they are willing to participate in any United Nations levy in order to repay any money used in clearing the Suez canal. If that is the situation I think, with the greater facilities available to this government, we should be informed about this matter. Do not put something forward and then say, "Now pass it". We feel that we should hear who is going to be responsible for the repayment of this loan; whether all the members of the United Nations have agreed to subscribe to the formula that the secretary general may produce, and also whether there is any term on the loan and whether we have any assurance as to when, if ever, it will be repaid.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in the course of the Prime Minister's remarks he said something about people hoping that the emergency force now stationed in the Middle East could prevent an outbreak of hostilities. I do not see that the present emergency force, being a lightly armed infantry force, could do anything to stop the opposing forces of Israel or Egypt if those two countries decided to engage in hostilities again, because those hostilities would be undertaken by armour, aeroplane and heavy equipment. The emergency force, I think in the words of the secretary general himself, is only an enlarged observer corps. The prevention of an outbreak of hostilities—and everyone is fervently hoping that such an outbreak will not occur—must be accomplished by other means.

Earlier the Prime Minister, in speaking of this loan which is for the clearing of the canal, indicated that it was one of the steps toward reaching a political settlement in the Middle East. He said, and I hope I copied down his words correctly, that it would be helpful to a realization of the objectives of so many members of the United Nations. It is in that light that we are considering this matter. If this is to be helpful to a realization of the objectives of members of the United Nations, we must be clear in our minds as to what those objectives are.

Mainly, of course, the objective is to ensure that there will not be an outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East, and that Israel and Egypt will not again enter upon war. But over the last eight years armed conflict of a sort has been going on between Egypt and Israel, with border raids and things of that nature. Resolutions of the United Nations have been ignored quite frequently by both sides. Certainly one of the great difficulties that Israel was experiencing with Egypt was the denial of passage through the canal to ships carrying the Israeli flag, and the prevention of ships destined for Israel from reaching the port at the top of the gulf of Aqaba. Unless that main problem is resolved, how can a cessation of hostilities between those two countries be assured?

At the present moment the United Nations is considering the problem and the Canadian representative has, according to the Ottawa Citizen, about to be presented to the United Nations a resolution which must be split into two parts now if there is any hope at all of having it passed. In today's issue of the Citizen it is stated:

> . . . Canada and a number of other nations will introduce two resolutions later this week—

That is to be done in order to get over this difficulty of the one draft resolution of Canada, which apparently is not acceptable.

> —the first reiterating the U.N. demand that Israel withdraw its troops from Gaza and the Aqaba gulf area and the second ordering immediate efforts to expand the role of the U.N. emergency force in maintaining an armistice on the Egyptian-Israeli border.

The difficulty is that those nations that are opposed to Israel are insisting that Israel withdraw her troops completely before any further action is taken. Yet unless further action is taken, what is the situation? Here is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in the assembly debate, and this is within quotation marks in the newspaper. He was speaking about the situation that would result if there was any possibility of failure to pass the second resolution, namely the one to use the emergency force in those areas and on the Egyptian-Israeli border. If there is a failure there, he says, this will be the situation:

> . . . this failure "will be a demonstration of the futility of this organization (the U.N.) that would have devastating effects" on world affairs.

Then he went on to say this, and this is summarized in the paper; these are not his direct words:

> The Israelis would stay put; the Arabs would try to level sanctions on Israel through the U.N.; new outbreaks of violence might take place; soon the UNEF would be forced out of the Middle East and a novel international experiment killed.

Hence it all rests on an "if", Mr. Chairman, if the second proposed draft resolution is passed. If it is not passed, then there is the quandary. If the first one is passed and is agreed to by Israel, the Gaza strip will be evacuated of Israeli troops, the Aqaba gulf area will be cleared of Israeli troops, and the emergency force at that stage is not moving in. Unless it moves in the Egyptian forces will move in, and there will be a situation such as that which prevailed during the last eight years. Hence unless this second draft resolution passes the assembly, which resolution refers to the utilization of the emergency force, we will have achieved no solution to the problem in the Middle East.

It is quite obvious that the second draft resolution should have priority and should be passed before insistence is directed to Israel to withdraw her troops. Canada's position, which is being made a little bit clearer day by day and as this debate continues, seems not to have been very strong. It rests upon too many suppositions as to what might happen if something else is done. I would have preferred an insistence by Canada on a reversal of this order and the proper use of the emergency forces in these two disputed areas. If Canada is going to go along with these other nations and insist that Israel withdraw completely and then merely take a chance on the emergency force being used, I think we are in a very difficult position.

If the use of the emergency force depends, in the last analysis, on the consent of Nasser, experience in the past shows that such consent will not be forthcoming. To what has Nasser consented up to the moment? I do not know of any resolution of the United Nations to which he has given consent, unless he drafted the resolution himself and had it presented in a form that would be acceptable to him. What confidence can we place in any of these resolutions being accepted by Nasser? The situation, therefore, becomes even more involved and Canada's position should be made much clearer; that we stand firm on the use of the emergency force, that novel international experiment. It was that with which we went along in the early part of December, a trial run of this international experiment, the use of an emergency force so that peace would prevail in a sensitive area of the world and so that during the period of peace a permanent political settlement might be made.

But this novel international experiment, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is very close to being a failure because of the grave difficulty in the United Nations at the present time as to how this force shall be used. Of course, back of it all is the yielding to Nasser's demands right from the end of October to the present day. A firm stand against Nasser should have been taken much earlier. Canada's offer to send the Queen's Own, rejected by Nasser, was an indication that there would be trouble in persuading the Egyptian dictator to do anything that might be asked of him by the United Nations. So the United Nations faces, I suppose, the most perilous moment in its history, and we are intensely interested in Canada's actions and activities under those circumstances.

It is for this reason that I think it would have been better if, earlier this afternoon, there had been a full disclosure by the government as to the instructions that had been given to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Prime Minister seemed to imply, when he was speaking this afternoon, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in speaking yesterday to the assembly, had outlined the stand of the government of Canada. I would have liked to interrupt to ask the Prime Minister if he could not inform the house as to the instructions that had been given the minister prior to the delivery of that speech yesterday. This would have been helpful, rather than compelling us to go through a process of endeavouring to extract information from a reluctant government. The situation is much too serious for anything in the nature of failure to provide complete information.

If hostilities break out in the Middle East, immediately a thousand-odd Canadian soldiers are in danger. It was our interest in the safety of those soldiers that caused us on this side of the house to ask where they were located. I think we require even more information with regard to the protection that is afforded, particularly the Canadian troops who are the administration echelon of the emergency force. Are they in an exposed position? Are they protected by the infantry battalions that have been supplied by other nations, or might they be unhappily sacrificed in any outbreak of hostilities? This concern must be in the minds of the Canadian people, and is certainly in the minds of the relatives of our soldiers who are overseas.

Under those circumstances we cannot, without careful consideration, enter into the voting of a million dollars to assist Nasser in clearing the canal which he blocked after the outbreak of hostilities, the canal from which he perhaps intends to derive a great deal of revenue. Why should we, without guarantees concerning the future, be so quick to assist Nasser in re-establishing his economic position in respect of the canal? Let us hear from him or from the proper sources as to what he intends to do to ensure that after clearance of the canal, assisted by our money, it will be free to international traffic without any hindrance whatever; that it will be free to the ships of Israel, and that the ships of Britain and France will not be prevented from making use of it. None of these assurances have been given, and something in the way of a definite assurance is required before we should be asked to vote such a large sum.

I see that it is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

INCOME TAX INSPECTORS, PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Question No. 24—Mr. Hansell:

How many income tax inspectors are out on the road checking farmers income tax returns in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta?

Answer by: Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue):

The approximate numbers, of which the majority go out on the road, are as follows: Manitoba, 30; Saskatchewan, 60; Alberta, 40.

TURKEY IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Question No. 27—Mr. Lennard:

1. How many turkeys were imported from the United States during the fiscal year 1956, (a) alive; (b) freshly killed; (c) frozen?
2. What was the duty levied per pound?
3. What sections of the United States did they come from?

Answer by: Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State):

1. (a), (b) and (c). Information as to the number of turkeys imported is not available. During the fiscal year 1956 there were 11,427,828 pounds of turkey imported from the United States.

2. The rates of duties applicable to turkeys imported from the United States have been in accordance with the following tariff items:
Prior to June 30, 1956

(a) Live turkeys—Tariff item 2—Domestic fowls, pure-bred, for the improvement of stock, free.

Tariff item 9—Poultry and game, n.o.p., 12½ per cent.

(b) Turkeys freshly killed—Tariff item 9—Poultry and game, n.o.p., 12½ per cent.

(c) Turkeys—frozen—Tariff item 9—Poultry and game, n.o.p., 12½ per cent.

On and after June 30, 1956

(a) Live turkeys—Tariff item 2—Domestic fowls, pure-bred, for the improvement of stock, free.

Tariff item 9—Poultry and game, n.o.p., 12½ per cent.

(b) Turkeys freshly killed and
