graceful lady, coming into his office arrayed in all the habiliments of love, wearing looks of the deepest despair and darkest desolation; she has loved, not wisely, but too well; she has placed herself in a sad position, and now appeals to this good counsel for that relief which the Draconian Code does not afford. I cannot, any more than the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones), see why this question has been brought up here. We all know that the family is the archetype of society, and as it is secure, society will be secure, and we must be careful how we meddle with the family relations. But, from the research manifested by the member for Jacques Cartier, we must assume that some things are at fault, and that we in the 19th century must bear with a little more ease and humility on the errors of humanity than was done at the time of the framing of the Code of Leviticus. I have been seriously troubled by the theological question. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) produced authorities to which we all bow, but upon which the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) does not look with such great respect; then came the legal address of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who presented other claims to attention by a manner of singular ability, and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott), in able speeches, also appeared to differ with him in regard to matters of detail. Considering all the arguments of the case, with a sense of all the difficulties of the situation, I do not feel disposed, as a member of the Church of England, to share in the prejudices of the hon. member for South Leeds. I will confess that I have been convinced by the power and learning of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and, consequently, that I will give his Bill my support.

Mr. GAULT: I sent a copy of the Bill of my hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), immediately after it was printed, to the Lord Bishop and clergymen of the Church of England, also to the Roman Catholic Bishop and several of the clergy, also to clergymen of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregationalist and Baptist Churches in Montreal to ascertain their opinion of the measure, and have had only two replies—one from a clergyman of high standing, who quite approves of the Bill and says it is not contrary to the Word of God, and the other from the Rev. Dr. Corder, of the Unitarian Church, who says he believes the Bill will conduce to the interests of good morals and sound public policy. With these views in possession and none disapproving, it is my intention to vote in favour of the Bill. A great many of my friends in Montreal, who have married their deceased wives' sisters, are gentlemen of the very highest respectability and standing, and I do not see why they should be held as law-breakers for that cause.

MR. MCCUAIG: I do not rise for the purpose of adding any remarks to those already expressed by hon. gentlemen, members of the learned profession, and of this House, both for and against this measure, having reference to the effect the passage of this measure may have on society in Canada. My desire is to call the attention of the House to the opinions entertained in England, for which Canadians have great respect, by eminent men, as reported in the English Hansard, 1877. In doing so, it is my duty to place before this House the views of the representative men of the various bodies, as well as the equally distinguished public men of the Empire, from both points of view. In favour of the Bill, 1877, then before the British Parliament, permitting a widower to marry the sister of his deceased wife, I will read the views of the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops residing in England, as addressed by those Prelates to the members of a Royal Commission appointed to enquire into the state of the English law, as well as the replies of Cardinal Wiseman to certain questions he was called upon to answer. In the letter addressed to the Royal Commission on the law of marriage, by the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of England, is the following passage:—

“ With respect to the much debated question of marrying a deceased wife's sister, with us the impediment is diriment of marriage; but urgent cases will arise when ecclesiastical authority finds it reasonable to remove the impediment by dispensation. And among the motives for such dispensations are the preventing of great evils, the protection or reparation of character, the difficulty of forming another marriage, the consideration of children born, or that may be born, etc., and, although cases of this kind are comparatively rare, we could wish to see the civil obstacles removed which stand in the way of remedying what may prove to be grave matters of conscience.

The following questions were put to Cardinal Wiseman:—

"Do you construe that passage in Leviticus XVIII, 18, as prohibiting marriage with a deceased wife's sister, or merely as saying that a man should not take two wives together, at the same time being so related?"

"Reply—Certainly, that verse appears to have the latter meaning, that two sisters shall not be living together in the same house, as wives of the same person.

"Question—Is such a marriage held by your Church as prohibited in Scripture.

"Reply—Certainly not. It is considered a matter of ecclesiastical legislation."

This influential advice in favour of the Bill will no doubt have a powerful influence on the minds of our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen in Canada. Though from a Canadian or Colonial standpoint in favour of a similar Bill passing the Dominion Parliament, with the law of England in its present shape, which declares in effect the children of such marriages are bastards in England on questions of inheritance of real property and the unhappy consequences contingent upon such a state of things to children yet unborn, I say it is just possible a different opinion might have been arrived at. I will now read Lord Brougham (see Hansard, English, 1877, pp. 1175 and 1176) in support of opinions entertained in England of the law of the Empire, as it is at the present day, when applied to the inheritance of children of marriage by a widower with his deceased wife's sister in any of the Colonial possessions of Great Britain; and in Canada, notwithstanding, by the North America Act, this Dominion is authorised through her Dominion Parliament to deal with the law of marriage and divorce. Lord Brougham said:

"One should say that nothing can be more pregnant with inconvenience, nay, that nothing can lead to consequences more strange in statement than a doctrine which sets out with assuming legitimacy to be not a personal status, but a relation to the several countries in which rights are claimed, and indeed to the nature of different rights. That a man may be bastard in one country and legitimate in another seems of itself a strong position to affirm, but more staggering when it is followed up by this other—that in one and the same country, he is to be regarded as bastard when he comes into Court to claim an estate in land, and legitimate when he resorts to another to obtain personal succession; nay, that the same Court of Equity (when the real estate happens to be impressed with a trust) must view him as both bastard and legitimate in respect to a succession to the same estate."

I now, Mr. Speaker, propose to read opinions of several eminent authorities of the Protestant Church, on the measure having for its object legalising the marriage of a man with the sister of his deceased wife. Dr. Benjamin Franklin says:

"I have never heard upon what principle of policy the law was made, prohibiting the marriage of a man with his wife's sister, nor have I ever been able to conjecture any political inconvenience that might have been found in such marriages, or to conceive of any moral turpitude in them."

To arrive intelligently at the opinion of the Rev. John Wesley, I will read an extract of the tract written on this subject by John Fry, a gentleman of distinguished learning:

"Suppose a man had married a virtuous woman, every way fit for him, with whom he lived happily until it pleased God to take her off by death, leaving him a widower with young children, and his circumstances such as made it fit for him to marry again, and his deceased wife had a maiden sister much like herself, and, therefore, on all accounts fit for him, who, on account of his kind and obliging behaviour to her sister, had conceived so good an opinion of him, and such fondness for his children, as engaged her consent to supply her sister's place. Can any reasonable person say it would not be fit for him to marry her."

The House will observe the Rev. John Wesley approves of the views of Mr. Fry, by the extract which I will now read from a letter addressed to his friend by Mr. Wesley:

"This is the best tract I have ever read on this subject. I suppose it is the best that is extant."

The opinions of the Baptist ministers in London are thus given:—

"In the judgment of the Board, the marriage of a widower with the sister of his deceased wife is scripturally lawful, and ought not to be prohibited by human legislation." Resolution of the Board of Baptist Ministers in London and Westminster.

Lord Macaulay writes to the Secretary of the Board of Baptist Ministers :

"I am truly glad to find that my opinion on the subject of the Marriage Bill agrees with that of the most respectable body in whose name you write."

Rev. Dr. Chalmers says :

"In verse 18 of Leviticus xviii, the prohibition is only against marrying the wife's sister during the lifetime of the first wife, which of itself implies liberty to marry the sister after her death."

Dr. Adler, the Chief Rabbi of the Jews in the British Dominions, gave the following evidence :—

"It is not only not considered as prohibited, but it is distinctly understood to be permitted; that on this point neither the Divine law, nor the Rabbis, nor historical Judaism, leaves room for the least doubt. I can only reiterate my former assertions, that all sophistry must split on the clear and unequivocal words, Leviticus xviii, 18, in her lifetime."

The following is from the speech of Lord Francis Egerton, in the House of Commons:—

"In 1835, a most important Statute had been passed by that House under somewhat peculiar circumstances, and he might also say of haste and want of due deliberation, materially affecting a portion of the marriage laws of this country (England). In this case the voice of Heaven was silent, and that of man had been given with hesitation and confusion of utterance that deprived it of its due authority."

Lord Broughton said :

"That our Established Church should select one point of the Canon Law, and establish an arbitrary limit without giving any power of dispensation was, he was sorry to say, a very great tyranny, and one he felt convinced that the true principles of the Church of England did not sanction."

Mr. George Anderson, M. P. for Glasgow, in his speech on the Marriage Bill, 20th July, 1869, said :

"He denied that there existed in Scotland the strong and general aversion for those marriages which was alleged to exist."

I have now given the House the opinions of several eminent men, all inclining to the belief that the law of England should be changed, to legalise marriages with the sister of a deceased wife, and which may no doubt influence public opinion in this Dominion. With a view of cautioning hon. members of this House, I may be permitted to draw their attention to the various views and arguments advanced by those whose opinion I have just read in favour of the change of the law, and to my mind the argument of expediency preponderates. I may, in support of this statement, read the arguments of Lord Chief Justice Denman and Sir George C. Lewis. Lord Chief Justice Denman says :

"If the Act of 1835 has notoriously failed in its operation, if these marriages, though discontinued by the Legislature, have become more numerous, not only among the lower classes, a large proportion of whom must ever remain ignorant of the existence of this and similar interferences by law with freedom, but among the cultivated, the thoughtful, the conscientious, the exemplary; if the stigma set by the law is not stamped by the public opinion, if the offenders are as well received as before, and are respected for acting on a just view of scriptural text, perverted by erroneous interpretations; in such case it will surely be more politic to make the law consistent with reason, than in a fruitless endeavour to bend reason to arbitrary law, to vex and persecute where we cannot prevent, to curse whom the Lord hath not cursed, and defy whom he hath not defied."

Sir George Cornwall Lewis, M. P., said :

"Upon the whole, looking at the law, the practice of foreign countries, and the unwillingness which prevails in this country to submit to the present law, he should give his cordial assent to the second reading of the Bill."

The eloquent words of Mr. Beresford Hope, the Attorney-General of England, and Mr. O. Morgan, delivered in the Commons of England against the passage of a Bill introduced by Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, in 1877, but not carried, to relieve the disabilities of inheritance in England of the children of a man with the sister of his deceased wife, and which I now propose to read to this House, I accept as a true index of the public opinion of old England, and a safe guide for me in recording my vote against the measure, now before this House, introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. Mr. Hope said :

"As to the first, it is conceded that, whatever may be the state of the law for the purposes of those Colonies, gentlemen who have allied themselves with their wives' sisters in the Colonies, will enjoy the protection of such laws as those Colonies may have passed; that, in point of fact, clearing the question of all verbiage and ambiguity, the only grievance, if grievance there is at all, is that the offspring of those alliances will not inherit property under intestacy or settlement, nor succeed to titles in England. That is the grievance on the side of the Colony. The grievance on our (England's) side is much broader; a more real one; shall or shall not all or any of the Colonies have the right to force the hand of the Mother Country? Shall we or shall we not put the marriage laws with all those great and delicate questions which run into moral, into social, and into legal considerations; shall we put all those questions into the power of all or any of the Colonies which happen to enjoy a responsible Government to regulate for us? Is the law to be made for England by Canada or by England for England, and by Canada for Canada? Let me just take the case of a couple that have committed an alliance of this sort. The couple have taken a trip to Australia, and the return trip may stand for the honeymoon. They go into society, and say they are as good as anyone else, and perhaps rather better. They have been married according to law in the Colony and under the protection of my hon. friend's Bill. Well, they attempt to go into society, and what is their position there? No doubt in some quarters they would be received with all the honours of martyrs. Elsewhere they would be regarded as persons who, for the purpose of contracting a marriage which is not legal in this country, had evaded the law of the Mother Country by undertaking the expense of a voyage to one of the Colonies; whilst other persons, desirous of contracting the identical marriage, were unable to do so because their business or their want of means obliged them to remain in the United Kingdom. Is that a pleasant position for a high-minded man or a pure-minded woman to stand in? But that is what your measure would lead to. I will take another case, and suppose two brothers who are successively in remainder to some property or some title. Each of these brothers has become a childless widower, and each feels that the vacant chair at his desolate hearth might be best filled by his sister-in-law. The elder brother is poor and unable to afford the expense of a voyage to the Colonies. He goes through the marriage ceremony, say in England, or in Denmark, with his sister-in-law. The younger brother, more adventurous or more wealthy, makes his voyage to Australia, and after due interval of time brings back blushing sister-in-law decorated with his surname, from the southern hemisphere. Now the question of property comes in. A son is born to each. The son of the elder brother and of the elder brother's sister-in-law is illegitimate, because his parents clung to Europe. The son of the younger brother and the younger brother's sister-in-law inherits the estate or the title because his parents took that pleasant voyage to Australia. Is that a state of things which anybody would like to see existing in England? Yet that is another result to which this Bill of yours would lead you. By this Bill you enable a man, at the small expense of a journey to Australia and back, if he can afford it, and possibly of a residence of twelve months in one of the Colonies, to marry and bring back that person as his wife. What is this but to confound the ideas of right and wrong, to defeat the laws of succession and inheritance, and to commit an outrage on the social feelings of the country, just because the man has a longer purse and some more leisure than the small residuum of persons remaining in England, who might wish to do the same thing, but are wanting in the material means of giving effect to their desires. This, Sir, is the light in which I am compelled to regard this Bill."

Earl Percy said:

"The Colonies had passed Acts legalising these marriages, and those Acts had received the assent of Her Majesty, and because that had been done they were now asked to change their own law in order to put themselves right with the Colonies. He wanted to know how far that argument was to be carried? Were we prepared to accept the views of the colonist on all matters in which the Colonial Legislatures came into contact with the Imperial Legislature? If that were to be the rule, he could hardly understand how we could be said to be independent of the Colonies at all—it would be for the Colonies to dictate the laws which they were to pass. These marriages were objected to on moral, social and religious grounds, and they were asked to change their conduct on a moral, social and religious question in order to suit the Colonies. If this Bill were passed, a rich man would be enabled to contract a marriage legally with his deceased wife's sister, whereas a poor man could not do so. Legislation of this kind would be introducing the thin end of the wedge. If marriage with a deceased wife's sister were right and lawful, let them pass a measure making it legal; but, if not, let them resist by every means in their power any modification of the law by any indirect method of dealing with the question."

The Attorney-General of England said:

"According to the English law, a man domiciled in this country could not contract a valid marriage with his deceased wife's sister either here or elsewhere. Such a marriage, whether contracted in England or elsewhere, was wholly null and void. The law of Scotland was more stringent still. Such marriage in that country was not only void, because illegal, but was a crime, and a man contracting the marriage might be subjected to severe penalties, formerly if not now, to death. If a man not domiciled in a Colony—and a domicile was a most important element in this question—married the sister of his deceased wife in that Colony, the marriage, although according to the law of the Colony it was perfectly good, and was recognised as valid whilst the man and his wife remained there, was not so recognised in England; but on the contrary was considered an invalid marriage altogether."

Mr. Osborne Morgan said:

"An Englishman domiciled in Australia, and having married his deceased wife's sister and having issue by her, might return to England and might there invest £1,000 in the funds and another £1,000 in the purchase of freehold land. At his death, intestate, his son by the second marriage would be legitimate as to the funded property but a bastard as to the land."

Before the introduction of the Bill in the English House of Commons, by Lord Lyndhurst, the law of the Empire declared the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister voidable, but void only when decision was pronounced by the Courts of England. Lord Lyndhurst's Bill changed the law, by legalising all past marriages contracted with a deceased wife's sister by a widower up to 1865, but so amended the law that all marriages of that nature after the passing of that Act, 1865, was declared absolutely void. I appeal to hon. members of this House and ask, is it not our duty, with the evidence before us of the apparently inflexible determination of British statesmen to hold all marriages by a man with his deceased wife's sister, in England, void, and the unhappy consequences which may result and overtake the families and the children of such marriages inheriting property or title, especially in England, to reject the measure now before this House, which, if passed, will encourage a state of things repugnant to the educated public opinion of the Empire, and declared by her laws to be void and of no effect? I admit the natural feelings of relationship may secure to the children of the deceased mother, in some instances, a more tender and affectionate consideration, at the hands of the sister of their deceased mother, than they would at the hands of a second wife of their father, in no way or manner connected previously with the family by ties of relationship. But I deny, emphatically deny, that any true and good woman, worthy of being called by the sacred name of wife and mother, and accepting the responsibilities which at the time of her marriage with a widower she was fully informed would come within the compass of her legitimate duties, would withhold from those young, tender, helpless and motherless little ones that affection and gentleness which distinguish a true woman's nature. I shall vote that the Bill be read this day six months.

MR. ROSS (Dundas): I do not desire to give a silent vote on this question, because I consider it very important. I entirely differ with the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones) on the subject, and as to the views held by the Church of England. In my intercourse with clergymen of that Church, I have often heard them express regret that they were frequently obliged to refuse to solemnise marriages with deceased wives' sisters. Many valuable members of this Church have left it, and joined other Churches on account of this disability. I do not believe there is any good reason why we should interfere with persons desirous of uniting in marriage, to prevent them. It appears to me that no person is so suitable to take the place of a deceased sister as a surviving sister, or to take care of the children and exercise that kindly oversight which the departed would have wished. Parliament has no right to prevent such unions, for which there are so many strong, natural and other reasons. The great patriarch, Abraham, himself married his half-sister; and, if there was nothing wrong in that act, why should we consider it wrong at the present age to permit the present proposed Bill to become law. Therefore, I shall have great pleasure in voting for the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who shows himself up to the age, and a friend of that liberty we all should approve of when there is nothing wrong behind it.

MR. ANGLIN: I agree with the hon. member for South Leeds in one of his propositions, that neither the Government nor the Parliament, King, Lords or Commons, has anything to do with the law of marriage, which should be settled by the Church only. However, with regard to the temporal questions, including the settlement of property, the power of the Legislature in modern times must be invoked. I should support any Bill intended to settle property rights on the part of those contracting such marriages as are named in this Bill. I think the word "valid" objectionable, unless we regard it as only used in a Parliamentary sense, and having no meaning beyond the admitted powers of the Legislature; but the word "legal" is a different word, which I would prefer to see used alone in this connection; for, in using the word "legal," no Catholic supporting the Bill could be supposed to express any doubt as to the validity of any marriage contracted according to the laws of the Catholic Church.

MR. GIROUARD: I consent to the suggestion of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), and will allow the word "legal" to stand for the purpose of the Bill instead of the word "valid." That will be sufficient.

MR. LANDRY : In a question assuming all the importance which is generally ascribed to the question now before the House, it appears to me that great advantages would result in the debate if the matter were placed on a proper footing. And what can that footing be if it be not the great principles which form the foundation of society, and the luminous brilliancy of which enlightens the intellect, by pointing out, as the lighthouse does to the pilot, the dangers of navigation, the reefs upon the shore. And if ever we stand in need of a skilful pilot, if ever prudence, even when least distrustful, for bade us to entrust the vessel in which we are embarked to the mercy of the wind, if ever we needed the steady hand of the steersman, it is under existing circumstances, when we have to encounter a species of legislation which may attack or protect the rights of the Church, restrict our own, and seriously compromise those which are claimed by the Provincial Legislatures. These are the three reefs which stand forth before us; this is the three-fold danger which we have to avoid. Gathered together from all points in the Dominion, we are all here as representatives of the people, and our duty is, by wise and enlightened legislation, to attain the objects aimed at by the civil and political society of which we are members; but we are also members of a religious society, and as such strictly held to the obligations which it imposes upon us, entirely subject to its ordinances and bound to respect its rights. Let me, Sir, going at once to the point, state from that point of view what are the rights and the duties of each individual. It is an elementary and universally recognised principle in every society that power must be proportionate to the object which that society proposes to attain. By power must be now understood the entirety of the rights possessed by society, whether such rights are derived from society itself, the intrinsic source of power, or whether they are the results of certain agreements, the extrinsic source of power. In virtue of its nature, that is to say, of an intrinsic derivation, all society has a right to exact all that is requisite for the complete attainment of its object. Now, to obtain that result, a three-fold power is necessary: 1st. That of proposing in an obligatory form the means tending towards its object—legislative power; 2nd. That of compelling the proper application of such means according to the sense and in the manner prescribed by the authority proposing them—judicial power; 3rd. That of forcibly constraining those who refuse to apply them, and of repressing those who attempt to obstruct them—coercive power. This necessity of power, as a means of attaining the end, does not limit its extent; it is the end itself which regulates and fixes it. In fact the end is the main element of all society; it is the source of its existence; this it is which determines the nature of the means, their proportion and their utility. It evidently follows from their nature that the means are subordinate to the end. It is now easy to draw a conclusion. Power in all society is a means which, of its nature, it has to attain its end; it is a means which must be subordinate to the end. Therefore, in all society, power, let its source be what it may, intrinsic or extrinsic, let its nature be what it may, legislative, judicial or coercive, must be proportionate to the end which society proposes to attain. Such is its extent. If we now glance at all societies at present existing on the face of the earth, the most cursory examination of the question will demonstrate the existence of two principal forms of society, which include all others: 1st. Religious society, the Church; 2nd. Civil society, the State. If men unite and form societies, it is with a view of labouring for the attainment of benefits which prosperity confers upon them. Now all benefits composing the happiness and prosperity of mankind are included of necessity either in spiritual welfare or in temporal welfare. Thus civil society and the Church divide between them the attainment of this double welfare, temporal welfare falling to civil society and spiritual welfare to the Church. Thus the Church and civil society comprise all other societies. The existence of these two branches of society being admitted, let us consider the relations which may exist between them. Those relations are not always alike, for the good reason that civil society or the State presents variation in its composition, which must of necessity influence its relations with the Church. It will be understood that a Catholic State cannot have the same relation with the Church as a heretical or an infidel State. But let us leave out of the question civil society, composed from a religious point of view,—first, of infidel individuals, society not under the dominion of the Church; second, of schismatical and heretical individuals, society separated from the Church, but subject to its power—to consider only civil society composed, still from a religious point of view, third, of Catholic individuals, society united to the Church and subject to its power. In this latter society, and this it is which distinguishes it from the other two, the individual belongs at once to both branches of society, to civil society as a citizen and to the Church as a Catholic. Now in every society the obligation obtains that the members of it should unite their power to attain a fixed end. In the case under consideration, he, therefore, who is at once a member both of civil society and religious society, is subjected to a double obligation, that of attaining the object of civil society, of which he is a member, and that of attaining the object of religious society, of which he is also a member. If these obligations be compared with each other, it will be found that they agree, that is, that they exist without conflict or discord. Now societies, being under the same conditions, since from their nature such obligations exist, are either in accord with each other or in conflict. What is then the duty of the Catholic citizen, that is to say, of him who is at once a member of civil and of religious society? If the two societies are in accord, if their obligations exist together without conflicting, the duty of the Catholic citizen is easy of performance; he has only to conform to the obligations of the two societies of which he is a member. But if these are in conflict, if one cannot strive for its object, at least in its own opinion, without interfering with the other; if the Catholic citizen, in a word, is brought face to face with contending obligations, what line of conduct should he adopt, the choice to be made being decided by the motive? This is what we have to define: Religious society, the Church; and civil society, the State; are, as compared with each other, two unequal societies, but composed, as in the present case, of the same members. They are two unequal societies, because their objects are unequal. There can indeed be no equality between eternal welfare, the object of the Church; and temporal welfare, the object of the State. If the objects are not equal, it follows, as a matter of course, that one must be superior to the other, otherwise they would not be unequal. Is it necessary for me to prove that eternal welfare is superior to temporal welfare? No, that is an admitted truth, evident to all the world. Therefore, the object of the Church is superior to that of the State. Again, it is admitted, and it is the principle which serves as the basis of our argument, and which was cited at its commencement, it is admitted without question that in society all power must be proportionate to the object. Therefore, the power of the Church, a society superior to civil society, because its object is superior to that of the State, is itself superior to that of the State. In view of contradictory obligations imposed, the one by religious power and the other by civil power, the Catholic citizen is therefore bound to obey the Church in preference to the State. But the duty of obeying is correlative with the right to command, that is to say that it is the duty of the citizen to obey, because it is the right of the State to exact that obedience. But, if, in view of contradictory obligations emanating, the one from the State, and the other from the Church, the Catholic citizen is only found to submit to the latter, he therefore does not and cannot owe obedience to the State. Therefore the State has not the right to exact such obedience—judicial power. If the State has not the power to exact such obedience, it follows that it does not possess that of compelling by force the citizen whose duty does not bind him to obey—coercive power. Further, if the State has not the right to exact or to compel, it cannot have that of proposing, in an obligatory form, what cannot be an obligation to a Catholic citizen—legislative power. The State has therefore no power to impose on Catholic citizens obligations which contravene the rights of the Church. The legislator—and we are here as legislators—has not therefore the power of legislating in a manner opposed to the rights of the Church. Such are the true principles which must guide us, and make us Catholics accept the teachings of the Church. Now, what are those teachings at least so far as relates to the question of marriage. Before replying, it is important to establish at once what are the rights of the Church in this important matter. The forbearance of the House will allow of my approaching this question. In the abstract, marriage is a natural, civil and ecclesiastical contract. It is a natural contract instituted by God himself amid the magnificence of the terrestrial paradise and the unity and indissolubility of which receive a sanction and authority which is no less than Divine in character from the words of Genesis :

“ Erunt duo in carne unâ ;
Quod Deus conjunxit homo non separet.”

Marriage is also a civil contract, but in this sense only, that it is a contract subject to certain civil formalities, apart from which the marriage may be looked upon as void as respects the civil results which may follow it. Thirdly, marriage is an ecclesiastical contract, and as such subject to the canons of the Church. By this it is not to be supposed that marriage is a triple contract. Not so, it is a single contract which takes these several names according as it is looked at, as relating to the propagation of the human race or as a matter of interest either to civil society or to religious society. I have stated that marriage is an ecclesiastical contract subject to the canons of the Church. That truth I shall now demonstrate. Since this discussion began, you must have observed, Sir, that most of those on either side have, as a rule, each in his turn, addressed in support of their assertions, the incontrovertible authority of Holy Scripture. Such an advantage should not be denied me, and I may be allowed to prove my proposition by biblical quotations, which I shall give, not as an expression of my own individual views, but as the doctrinal and divine interpretation of the Church to which I belong. First, I state that marriage is a sacrament. What St. Paul wrote to the Ephesians (v., 25, 28) : “ Sacramentum hoc magnum est, ego autem dico in Christo et in ecclesiâ,” is an incontrovertible proof of the truth of this proposition, and the more so for us Catholics, because it has also been the teaching of the Church from its foundation to the present day. The fathers of the Church have spoken : St. Ignatius of Antioch, Tertullian, Origen, St. Athanasius, St. Augustin, etc.; the voice of the Church was heard at Florence, at Cologne, at Trent ; and everywhere and at all times marriage was proclaimed a sacrament. Now, what the Universal Church believes, and has always believed, can only have been transmitted to us by Apostolic tradition, and what the Apostles have transmitted to us as a divine institution, proceeds as all admit from Jesus Christ himself. Marriage is therefore a sacrament and a sacrament of the new law. For us Catholics it is a dogma of faith. Pius IX, in his letter to the King of Sardinia, dated 19th September, 1852, says : “ It is a dogma of faith that marriage was raised by Our Lord Jesus Christ to the dignity of a sacrament.” Would you know the doctrine? The Council of Trent speaks : “ Whosoever says that marriage is not really and truly one of the seven sacraments of the Evangelical Law, let him be anathema.” If marriage is a sacrament, and such is our unalterable belief, the Church only, by divine right, has supreme power over christian marriage. In fact the Church alone is the dispenser of the sacraments. St. Paul teaches us this in his first epistle to the Corinthians, chapter 4, in which he says : “ Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Jesus Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God.” The Pope Gelasius, writing to the Emperor Anastasius told him plainly : “ Although your dignity raises you above the human race, you are nevertheless subject to the Bishops in matters relating to the faith, and to the delivering of the sacraments.” And what is a sacrament, if it be not a means subordinate in its nature to the object of religious society? The Church has, therefore, supreme power over marriage. An examination of history proves that in all ages the Church claimed, by divine right, power over marriage. In the days of the primitive Church, the Apostle to the Gentiles, writing to the Corinthians, told them that it was not the Lord but he, Paul (Dico ego non Dominus), who prescribed a regulation in relation to marriage between infidels, one of whom had embraced the faith. He thereby recognised the right of the Church to make regulations respecting marriage. In 305, the Council of Elvira, that of Neocæsarea in 314, St. Basil, Pope Innocent I, Pope St. Leo, the Council of Agda in 506, St. Gregory the Great, the Church in a word, by the lips of her teachers and the decisions of her Councils, promulgates her laws as to marriage, and decides what are absolute impediments, and we Catholics have only to submit to that infallible authority. And when error lifts up its head, when the most false principles are circulating in society and threatens to poison all true doctrine, a Pontiff of sainted memory does not fear to raise his voice. And what are the words of that aged man? They condemn this proposition:—"The Church has not the power to establish absolute impediments to marriage, but that power appertains to the secular authority, by whom existing impediments may be removed," (Syllabus, 68.) We now arrive at the true question as it presents itself to us. We shall easily solve it. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier brings in a Bill which may meet with our approval, but he has just delivered a speech which I cannot accept as an expression of the ideas and principles of Catholics upon this question of marriage. What does the hon. member maintain? That this Parliament has the undoubted right to establish absolute impediments to marriage, and the not less undoubted power of dispensing with them. I protest against such a declaration, and I emphatically deny that this Parliament has a right to legislate as to the validity of marriage. Marriage is a sacrament; the State has nothing to say as to the administration of the sacrament, and, by consequence, as to the validity of marriage. That is an ecclesiastical contract over which religious society alone has a power, which cannot be vested in the State. Further, the doctrine announced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, so far as we Catholics are concerned, has been solemnly condemned by Pius IX in the 68th Article of the Syllabus, which I read a few minutes ago. I think, however, that the hon. member has confounded absolute with prohibitive impediments. It is important that the difference should be understood, and that distinction should be made in a case where there should be no confusion. By an impediment to marriage must be understood every obstacle to marriage. When that obstacle cannot be overcome without rendering the marriage void, the impediment is said to be absolute. If an individual, regardless of the law, by a misdemeanour, contracts a valid marriage, the impediment is said to be a prohibitive one. As may clearly be seen, the absolute impediment is an insurmountable obstacle to marriage, as it renders the parties unable to contract. It is an obstacle to the administration of the sacrament, for marriage is a sacrament. The State, therefore, has nothing whatever to do with it, and to the Church alone belongs the power of establishing such impediments; the Church alone has the power of dispensing with them; and, whereas amongst us Catholics no one can question the testimony of our infallible Pontiff, I shall now cite an extract from the letter of Pius IX to the King of Sardinia, under date of 19th September, 1852:

"A civil law, which, supposing the sacrament to be divisible from the contract of marriage for Catholics, pretends to regulate the validity thereof, contradicts the doctrine of the Church, usurps her inalienable rights, and in practice puts in the same rank concubinage and the sacrament of marriage, or sanctions the one and the other as equally legitimate. Let Caesar, keeping what is Caesar's, leave to the Church what belongs to the Church. Let the civil power deal with the effects resulting from marriage, but let it leave the Church to regulate the validity of marriage itself between Christians. Let the civil law take for its starting point the validity or invalidity of marriage as determined by the Church; and starting from that fact which it cannot constitute, the same being without its sphere, let it regulate the civil effects."

The Church, therefore, claims for herself alone the right of regulating the validity of marriage, the power of legislating on absolute impediments. The proposition of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is therefore untenable. No, Mr. Speaker, we have not the right to establish absolute impediments to marriage; what we can do, as a Parliament, as a civil authority is, "taking for our starting point the validity or invalidity of marriage, to regulate solely its civil effects." Parliaments have that power only. "The matrimonial contract," says Mazzarelli, "is governed by the laws of the Church, because it is a spiritual contract in ordine sacramentum." Let the civil power, therefore, preserve its authority; no person desires to usurp it. Let it declare null and void any contract made without the formalities it prescribes. Will that contract be void? Yes; who denies it? It will have no validity—but, be it well understood, it will have no validity before the civil power. And what is meant by saying it will have no validity before the civil power? It means that it will give the contracting parties, in civil society, no legitimate action, for this is the sole and only result of the annulling of a civil contract. But, if the Church determines that the same contract is valid in foro conscientie, in ordine ad sacramentum, it will be valid matter of the sacrament, and the marriage will be indissoluble in the eyes of the Church. And why? Because it is not the civil contract, but the natural, divine, spiritual, ecclesiastical contract, which is the matter of the sacrament of marriage; and it is the laws of the Church that govern spiritual contracts and offices. These principles being clearly established, let us proceed to enquire as to the nature of the measure now before us. What is the purport of the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier? It is as follows:—

“1. Marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, shall be legal and valid; Provided always, that, if, in any Church or religious body whose ministers are authorised to celebrate marriages, any previous dispensation, by reason of such affinity between the parties, be required to give validity to such marriage, the said dispensation shall be first obtained according to the rules and customs of the said Church or religious body; Provided also, that it shall not be compulsory for any officiating minister to celebrate such marriage.

“2. All such marriages heretofore contracted as aforesaid are hereby declared valid, cases (if any) pending in Courts of Justice alone excepted.”

The first paragraph declares to be legal and valid a marriage, against which the Church has set up an invalidating impediment, but it must be remarked that this clause is not absolute, and that it only stands together with the proviso accompanying it, which is nothing but the setting forth of the conditions to which the contracting parties should submit, if they desire their marriage to be considered by the State as legal and valid. And what are these conditions? The same which the Church desires to impose. By legislation such as this the State recognises the rights of the Church, accepts her ordinances, and only recognises as legal and valid, in the particular cases we are now discussing, the marriage when contracted after the preliminary dispensation has been obtained, in conformity with the rules and usages of the Church. Legislation of a similar nature to this—not complete, it is true, but such as it is—should be accepted by the Catholics in this House, and will be I hope. We will vote then against the proposition made to us by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) to give this Bill a six months' 'hoist.' Favourably as I regard the principle enunciated in the proposed law as now presented to us by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, I must nevertheless make some important reservations. This legislation is incomplete and ambiguous, and in its phraseology leaves much to be desired. For example, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) remarked, there is nothing in this legislation which determines the line of conduct to follow, or at least which establishes the line of conduct to be followed when the contracting parties belong to different religious creeds. I do not intend to attempt a critical examination of the wording of the measure, but, when the House goes into Committee, I shall suggest one change which I consider desirable. This measure, Mr. Speaker, may be considered from another point of view. There are other considerations which must not be lost sight of. Indeed, in this important question of marriage, the Local Legislatures have a jurisdiction which must be jealously guarded, and we must not permit this Legislature to encroach in any way upon the rights and privileges of our Provincial Legislatures. I trust that, when this measure is again submitted to our consideration, in Committee of the Whole, it will receive all the modifications required to render it a measure worthy of this House, and in keeping with the true principles of religious and civil society, and in conformity with the rights and privileges which the fathers of Confederation gave to our Local Legislatures.

Motion made and question proposed:

That the said Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six weeks.—(Mr. Thompson, Haldimand.)

PRIVATE BILLS RECEPTION.

TIME EXTENDED.

MR. ROBINSON: I move that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended for twelve days. This is the same motion I previously introduced to the notice of the House. Exception was taken to it by the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), who thought it better that, in accordance with a strict interpretation of the Rule of the House, the sanction of another Committee should be had to the same request, which has now been given by the Committee on Private Bills. I take it for granted, therefore, that this motion will meet with the acceptance of the House. In relation to a remark made yesterday about the supposed necessity of the Committee on Standing Orders insisting on the observance of the rule requiring a Private Bill to be deposited with the Clerk of the House, eight days before the meeting of the House I find, on enquiry, that, if that rule is enforced, it must be with the concurrence of the House, and is not within the province of any Committee. The request for an extension of time seems reasonable. The House is supposed to sit about three months, and, considering the importance of many of the Private Bills, it seems but right to ask for an extension of time for their reception. Some of these Private Bills are of more consequence than some Public Bills—for instance, a Bill concerning a Charter for a railway affecting the interests of some thousands of people.

MR. BLAKE: I was surprised to hear the reason given yesterday, and repeated to-day, for the indulgence which it is suggested should be extended to promoters of Private Bills, because I was aware that on former occasions a course had been adopted, which I perceive from the certificate of the Clerk is still followed, which renders that excuse quite untenable. The course is that, so soon as a notice for a Private Bill appears in the Official Gazette, a copy of the Rules is sent to the signer of the notice, and these Rules show him that a copy of the Bill must be deposited with the Clerk of the House eight days before its meeting, and that no petition for a Private Bill can be received after the first ten days of the Session. I think under these circumstances it cannot be said that there is any reasonable excuse for the promoters of Private Bills now, in the third week of the Session, wanting an extension of twelve days in the presentation of petitions. I agree that Private Bills may be of considerable consequence, affecting important private rights, and it is for that very reason that they should come before the Committees at a season when they can be properly considered. I think the Government ought to take, this Session, some decisive step which will render it impossible for any promoter of a Private Bill to say, the Rule made in 1876 having been broken every Session since, he had a right to expect it would be broken again forever; and for that reason he was late in bringing his Bill forward. If there be any exceptional case in which a good reason can be given for the delay, the Rule can be suspended. But there should be no wholesale suspension. Else we had better at once abrogate the Rule, and make our laws conformable to the bad practices of Private Bill promoters.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton): I

agree with the hon. member for West-Durham (Mr. Blake) in a great deal that he has said, but; as it is well known throughout the country that the Rule has been suspended time and again, I think it would be unwise to enforce it at this particular moment. There are a great many important Private Bills, I understand, which are yet in the hands of the printer, and have not yet been reported upon. I hope, whatever may be the subsequent course, that the recommendation of the Committee in the present instance will be complied with.

MR. RYMAL: I had once the pleasure of being Chairman of that Standing Orders Committee, and I found that persons who had any exceptional private legislation to pass through were the very ones who came late, with some excuse, and endeavoured to have the Rule set aside. If there be a special case, the House can treat it as such.

MR. MACKENZIE: There was a universal concurrence of opinion, four years ago, that this should be put a stop to. Instead of its being stopped, the practice has been growing, and the hon. member for Hamilton now claims the very laxity of the practice as a reason why it should be continued. Unless the leader of the House takes some strong measures in this matter, we might as well have the Rule abolished altogether. Indeed, it is a dangerous thing to have this constantly set aside, because some very questionable legislation might be forced upon us. Some of us who have sat for a long time in the House have experience of its being used for the purpose of getting questionable Bills introduced at a busy time of the Session, which would have had no chance had they been introduced at a time when discussion upon them could be more easily obtained. I hope the hon. gentleman who leads the Government will take vigorous steps in the matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is correct in stating that there was a unanimous consent that some check should be placed upon the introduction of Private Bills all through the Session, and suspending the Rules which were made for the protection of people who might be affected by this private legislation, who, if they had insufficient notice, would be obliged to let judgment go by default. With respect to special interests what the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has said is also true. It was for the purpose of removing great evils that those Rules were made, but the question is whether those Rules from the moment they were adopted have been rigidly carried out. I think they have been fairly observed. They were adopted in 1876, 1877 and 1878, and ought to be supported. Any hon. member who has had a special Bill, which, for some special reason, was not presented in time, might get the House to dispense with the Rules when the special reasons were stated.

MR. ANGLIN: There seems to be some misapprehension with regard to the manner in which the Rules were enforced. In 1876 the old state of things was continued, because we were satisfied that many people would be put to great inconvenience. But unless I am greatly mistaken, this particular Rule was enforced in 1877 and 1878. At this moment, I cannot recall a single instance in which it was departed from. My impression also is that the Rule was pretty well observed last Session. It demands the grave consideration of the House whether this Rule should be suspended or not.

MR. CARLING: I think the proposition of the hon. the First Minister must commend itself to the House. It is a proposition which should commend itself to the House.

MR. ROBINSON: There are no Rules affecting any Committee of the House which have been changed so often as those under consideration. In 1873, certain Rules which were in force prior to that time were abolished, and from that time until 1876 another practice governed the Committee on Standing Orders. In the latter year the present Rules were introduced, and to a great extent they have governed the action of the Committee. I think, if a Committee of both sides of the House were now to consider the question, a change would no doubt again be effected to the advantage of the House and the public.

Motion negatived.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): I move that the time for the reception of Private Bills be extended twelve days. By voting upon this the House can show its opinion as to the proposition for the hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Robinson).

MR. BLAKE: The proposition for an extension has been lost.

MR. CAMERON: This is a different motion. It is for the extension of the time for the admission of Private Bills.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved in amendment that the word "twelve" be struck out and "six" be inserted.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 57) To consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the North-West Territories.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Bill (No. 59) To repeal the Act to render members of the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces now included or which may hereafter be included within the Dominion of Canada ineligible for sitting or voting in the House of Commons of Canada.—(Mr. Ouimet.)

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Fleming.)

FIRST READING.

MR. FLEMING introduced a Bill (No. 58) Further to amend the Immigration Act of 1869. He said: I may explain that the object of the Bill is to render the master of a vessel carrying passengers to this country responsible for pauper or destitute emigrants in the same manner as he is now held responsible with regard to those who may be lunatic, idiotic, deaf or dumb, blind or infirm. The effect of the Bill, if it should become law, would be to require the master of the vessel, on arriving at any port in Canada, to report to the Collector of Customs at such port the name and age of all passengers who are paupers or destitute persons. If the master failed to make such a report, he would be liable to a penalty for his neglect. Upon the arrival of the vessel at the port, it is provided that, if the medical superintendent, on examination, finds among the passengers a pauper or destitute person who in his opinion is likely to become a permanent charge on the public, he will report to the Collector of Customs at the port, who shall require the master of the vessel to execute a bond in the sum of $300, the condition being to indemnify the Government or any municipal corporation, or charitable society from any expense or charge to be incurred within three years for the maintenance and support of such pauper or destitute passenger. It will be optional with the master of the vessel either to enter into such a bond or to pay the Collector of the port a sum of money to be fixed by the Government, in lieu of this bond. The 16th section of the Act of 1869, which gives power to the Governor by proclamation to prohibit the landing of pauper or destitute emigrants until a sufficient sum of money is provided for their temporary support and transport, is by this Bill repealed.

Bill read the first time.

NEWSPAPER REPORTS.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS.

MR. DAWSON: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg leave to draw the attention of the House to a notice which appeared in one of the Toronto papers, to the following effect:

"The treatment received by Mr. Mills at Mr. Dawson's hands was certainly far from courteous. Instead of Mr. Mills' attendance being politely requested, without any previous intimation he was served with a summons as if he were a refractory witness."

I beg to say that the persons referred to were requested to give the Committee such information as they thought fit, and at a special meeting the following day Mr. Mills was heard and gave interesting and valuable information. The signing of that summons was a mere formality on the part of the clerk, who has been twenty years in the House, without the Chairman or members of the Committee being consulted.

MR. LANDRY: I beg to call the attention of the House to a report which appears in the Citizen to-day. In the speech I made on the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, I am reported to have "cited a large number of the authorities of the Church to prove that the proposed Bill was opposed to the spirit of religion and sound stability." I never took that view of the question. On the contrary, I tried to prove that sound stability and the spirit of religion was not at all against the measure introduced by my hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard).

MR. FLEMING.

BRITISH COLUMBIA ADDITIONAL SUPREME COURT JUDGES

BILL.—[BILL 44.]

(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. BLAKE: I observe that neither the Bill nor the Local Act of 1879 contains a provision for carrying out the plan prescribed by the Local Act, which provides that, of the five Judges of the Supreme Court, two only shall be stationed in Victoria, and three shall be resident at named points in the mainland. With reference to the two new Judges to be appointed, I presume it will be competent to the Executive to prescribe to them the places at which they are to reside. It appears to me the Local and Federal legislation taken together will be defective in not giving adequate power to carry out the scheme of the Local Legislature, unless some legislation exists enabling the Executive in proper form to carry out the provisions as to changing the residence of existing Judges. I make this suggestion, not that I am at all shaken in my opposition to the Bill, but because it appears clear the difficulty should be presented with a view of its being removed before the measure becomes law. It is not conceivable that without some legislation, Local or otherwise, the Executive should have the power of ordering a Judge, who has been appointed to a Court stationed at Victoria, to reside at Barkerville; nor can such a disadvantageous transfer be properly effected without due consideration of its pecuniary and social results to the Judge removed. I am satisfied that the Government will not, without further Local and Federal Legislation, and increased expense, be able to carry out the scheme of the Act of 1879.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): As at present advised, I do not think it would be proper to make any such amendment. I do not propose to interfere with the Legislature of British Columbia with reference to the disposition it proposes to make of its judicial strength. I think the duty of this Parliament is fully performed when, the Local Legislature having passed an Act appointing two additional Judges, it has provided, according to the Constitution, the salaries of those Judges.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, amended and reported.

PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the farther consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. McLennan: "That an Order of the House do issue for a statement of each contract let up to the 31st December, 1879, on the Pacific Railway, showing the estimated cost of the work on such contract according to the tender accepted, the amount paid to the contractor or contractors in respect thereof, and the amount yet required to complete the contract, so far as the same is known or approximately estimated; also, a statement of the decision, if any, arrived at by the Government as to the bridging of Red River, and the junction of the line west of Red River with the part of the road under construction from Thunder Bay and with the city of Winnipeg."

MR. MACKENZIE: When the House rose at six o'clock on Wednesday evening last, I was making some remarks concerning the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), and was about to notice some charges which the hon. gentleman made against those who were opposed to the Administration in 1872. In his comments he was desirous—at least he said so—of making only such comments as the circumstances justified respecting the period of the life of the late Administration and affecting the present. But I was a little surprised to find, among those comments, the hon. gentleman stating that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were responsible for—if I recollect his words aright—obstructing and overturning the Act of 1872, for building the Pacific Railway. I can only express the charitable hope that, as the hon. gentleman was not then in Parliament, he was not in Canada either. There is no escape from the conclusion that, if in Canada, he has forgotten what took place during that eventful year. The Act authorising the Government to build the Canadian Pacific Railway was passed in June, 1872. Immediately thereafter a deputation, consisting of the chief contractors and some of the Ministers, visited England for the purpose of securing the capital necessary for the construction of this road. That deputation utterly failed in accomplishing their object. Up to the very last moment of their return from England, and of the meeting of Parliament in 1873, indeed up to the close of that Session—at least to the adjournment had in consequence of the charges made by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington)—the Administration held out hopes to this House and the country that they had accomplished their mission, and that the road would be built under the terms of the original Act and of the contract with Sir Hugh Allan. It was only some time after Parliament arose, in 1873, that the public became aware that Sir Hugh Allan had relinquished his contract on account of his failure in England to accomplish his purpose. And how the hon. member for Glengarry came to acquire and express the belief that gentlemen on this side of the House were responsible for the failure of the Administration's plans in 1872 is more than I can comprehend. The hon. gentleman, by his censorious remarks, courted a revival of the discussion of the events of 1872 and 1873. With regard to this, I have only to say it is not my intention at present to enter upon a discussion of those events, although, if the hon. gentleman or any of his friends on the Ministerial side desire to have those matters recalled, hon. gentlemen on this side will not shrink from the conflict. I think, however, that the general opinion of the hon. gentleman's confrères will be that it is not advisable, in their own interest, that such a revival of that discussion should take place. So far from obstructing and overturning the Government's plan of 1872, we would have been glad if the railroad could have been constructed without imposing any burdens on the people of Canada beyond that provided in the Act; and respecting the other statement of the hon. gentleman, that the effect of our obstruction in 1872 was ultimately to overturn that Government, I have only to say to him that he knows full well, or should know, what it was that overturned that Government—that it was acts of their own for which Parliament and the country held them responsible. But I would not have esteemed it a very great crime if we had overturned the Government on that or any other public measure on which we differed; and, as to the succeeding Government, of which I had the honour to be a member, having left its position with reference to this or any other matter, that does not enter into the present discussion, and I do not propose to pursue the general discussion upon the Pacific Railway policy, further than is necessary at present to vindicate our own position, and show how fallacious the statement of the hon. gentleman was in making his motion. Everyone who recollects the events of 1872 and 1873 will perfectly comprehend why the project of the Government of that day failed in England, and why the Government was overturned; and everyone will understand perfectly that the hon. gentleman, who was not then in Parliament, and who has therefore no immediate responsibility for the acts of the gentlemen he now sustains, is desirous of making them appear as well as possible under very disadvantageous circumstances. He would, however, have done much better if he had avoided all reference to a matter which can only be termed disreputable to those he defends. With regard to the plan which the hon. member for Glengarry says was overturned and obstructed by us, I have this to say: I believed from the first that, if this road was to be built, it must be built through the taxation of the people of Canada. I had no objection to securing assistance from the public lands, but rather hoped that some assistance would be so obtained from the public lands of the North-West Territories through which it would pass. But I knew too well how little was ever realised from the public lands of the older Provinces to enable me to encourage any hope of obtaining very substantial assistance from that source. I therefore said in Parliament and elsewhere that I had no faith in the accomplishment of the promises of the hon. gentlemen opposite respecting the building of the road, and it turned out that, when the Ministers of that day, and their associates in connection with the Pacific Railway contract went to England, they were utterly unable to find any capitalist or contractor who would touch the project. But in the Act of 1874, which the late Administration introduced and passed, we also proceeded upon the assumption that something could be done with those lands. I have been reproached more than once with having adopted means for the payment of the building of the road which I formerly declared to be insufficient, and it is quite true that was the case. But a succeeding Administration must very often adopt the ground taken by the previous Administration, although they may have opposed it during its passage. Because, when once an Act is an accomplished fact, it has to be acted upon, and, when the Canadian Parliament, at the instigation of hon. gentlemen opposite, had committed itself to a project of the most gigantic and expensive character, and had pledged its treaty faith to the accomplishment of its promises, it was not for the succeeding Administration to throw any obstacles in the way of its accomplishment, but to endeavour, as far as consistent with the welfare of the people generally throughout the country, to aid in the fulfilment of the promise and to give the plans of the previous Administration a fair chance of being realised. We, therefore, in the Act of 1874, provided means for utilising the public lands for the building of the road if they could be utilised, but during the progress of the surveys it became very apparent to us, as it must have done to every observant man throughout the country, that the only hope we had of ever obtaining any advantage from the building of the road was to furnish means as early as possible for throwing a large population into the prairie districts of the North-West, and depending on the development of trade more than on the value of the lands. The Government therefore determined, pending the completion of the surveying operations, to build a certain portion of the line under ordinary Government contracts. The Government determined to utilise the navigation of the lakes and river so far as they were navigable in that direction, so as to avoid the construction of any railroad where water communication might be used. I know that some ridicule has been cast upon the project for using the water-stretches for navigable purposes, and we were accused of having completely abandoned the scheme. We never did abandon it or any part of it. I would have no objection to abandon anything that I found to be less profitable or less advisable than what I believed it at one time to be. Nor would any wise man have any hesitation in changing his opinion when evidence should be afforded him that his opinion was based on wrong premises. We were quite satisfied that in the first place we should use the great lakes westward to Fort William instead of building a road round Lakes Superior and Huron, and we were equally satisfied that to reach the waters in the central portion of the Territory, between Thunder Bay and Selkirk, by railroad communication was the proper mode of proceeding, and contracts were let out accordingly in that direction. Not one mile of road was built except what was in the most direct line of communication. The distance given by Mr. Dawson, in his map and in his pamphlet report, between Winnipeg and Thunder Bay, was, if I recollect aright 432 miles. The distance by the railroad route to Selkirk—as far west as Winnipeg—is only about 412 miles, if I remember aright. This shows that the most direct line has been obtained. But, while resolving to use the water-stretches as far as possible, the Government also resolved to proceed with the construction of 185 miles, if they found, upon the reception of the tenders and upon the consideration of the national finances, that it was possible and advisable to spend so much money upon that portion. Before these tenders were received for that portion, the Administration had passed out of office, and of course we were not responsible for what took place afterwards. The Government also contemplated acting under the same determined resolution that their expenditure should be controlled solely by the taxation necessary to be imposed; they had adopted the Burrard Inlet route, and proposed to build a line of railway from the neighbourhood of Yale to the navigable waters at Kamloops, subject of course to the conditions already mentioned. We had no reason to expect at the time we called for tenders that the cost of this road would reach so very large a sum as it appears to have reached. From the tenders before the House, and including the price of rails, so far as I am able to make out, the cost of the 125 miles cannot possibly be less than ten millions, a cost far in excess of what it was supposed it would probably be. I have no hesitation in saying that the late Administration would have hesitated before venturing to ask Parliament to sanction so serious an expenditure, at the present time, for such a comparatively short piece of the railroad. That is a matter which I will discuss, of course, when we reach the question generally upon the Estimates. I regret that I have anything to say at all at present, but the course the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) has taken forced me to make a rapid survey of the events of the last few years and the policy of the two Administrations. There is one thing always to be kept in view; the Government of which I was a member held that, whilst they were bound, as far as the resources of the country would permit, to keep faith with the British Columbia Government, they held also that it was desirable to obtain better conditions with the Government of British Columbia if it were possible to do so, and, whether wisely or unwisely, compromise terms were effected through the mediation of Earl Carnarvon. These terms bound us to accomplish and finish the road from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean by the year 1890, but that arrangement was predicated upon and subject to the conditions of the Act of Parliament that had been passed here—the solemn resolution of the House of Commons that the expenditure for that purpose should not exceed what was commensurate with keeping the taxes of the country within the limits that then existed. We were bound not merely to do what we could to accomplish the bargain with British Columbia, but immeasurably before that we were bound to see that the whole country was not ruined in order to keep a comparatively useless and impossible bargain with that Province. All our measures were therefore based upon that ground, and we have felt continuously, during the last few years the serious danger of the country running into a rapid and unbearable accumulation of the public debt. I do not know, I have not the means at my hand for ascertaining, the precise expenditure connected with the past and present contracts on the Pacific Railway. If my memory serves me aright, the expenditure already incurred, and that involved in existing contracts will bring up the total expenditure at this moment to the neighbourhood of $40,000,000. An hon. member behind me says it is much more than that; probably it is. I speak wholly from a general recollection of the various tenders. It is that at any rate. It was contemplated originally that the road was to be built entirely for $30,000,000, by gentlemen opposite, and 50,000,000 acres of land. It will be seen how fallacious were these calculations, and, in order to excuse themselves, hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of saying, as the hon. member for Glengarry said, that we rendered it necessary to proceed with the whole line by ordinary Government contracts. How, Sir, did we render it necessary? We executed some of the difficult preliminary portions of the road, the execution of which was eminently favourable to the letting of the line to future contractors. It was clear that, if we had railways penetrating into the prairie country it would be much more advantageous for people taking the contract for the balance of the road. Accordingly, after having had these preliminary sections, either completed or nearing completion, we issued in the spring of 1878 invitations to English capitalists and contractors to compete for the execution of the entire line upon terms even more favourable than those embraced in the original plan, because the Act of 1874 provided that there should be paid to the contractors $10,000 in cash per mile, that 20,000 acres of land should be given for each mile of the road, the land, of course, subject to conditions of sale which were not imposed in the Act of 1872, and the contractors were then to reach the competing point by stating the amount in addition to these land and money payments for which they would demand a guarantee of four per cent. for twenty-five years. The Chief Engineer was absent in England during this season on leave of absence, but he had undertaken while in England to communicate with capitalists and contractors wherever they could be found and explain the plans and profiles sent to London, and such were directed, at any rate, to apply to Mr. Fleming for further information. Everything was done to secure favourable offers for the execution of the work under these terms. The result was, I believe, that only one tender was received, after I left office, but, as the hon. Minister said last Session, that one was of a character that could not be received, considered, or acted upon. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman how our action up to that time had in any way a prejudicial effect over the prospect of constructing the road for $30,000,000 of money and 50,000,000 acres of land. All our efforts had been in the direction of facilitating the letting of future contracts. The country had been thoroughly explored, the most ample information that could be obtained from all sources was printed in a separate volume and placed at the disposal of our officers in London, to be shown or given to everyone who desired to tender for the work. Such were the terms and conditions of the Act of 1874, which failed to produce any favourable response from any contractors or capitalists in England. And hon. gentlemen opposite felt, no doubt, as their action shows, that their plan had broken down from its own inherent weight, from its utter insufficiency to meet the emergency. When they came back to power, instead of utilising the preliminary sections we had built or almost finished, and obtaining those favourable terms in England they always said they could obtain, larger sections were immediately let as ordinary Government works, payable in money, for which the Government will have to borrow money, amerce the country in debt, and thereby greatly increase the taxation of the country. It was the intention of the late Administration, had the people permitted them again to return here as a Government, to have had all these matters in relation to tenders from England fully considered and submitted to Parliament, with their own views as to the course that should be pursued. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the responsibility of incurring a vast expenditure in the way of letting this work by ordinary contract. And the hon. member for Glengarry is not at all afraid of the approaching heavy burdens of taxation, not at all afraid of the ultimate consequences to the country. He blamed us very severely in his remarks for the comparatively little progress we made with the work, and eulogises the present Administration for their extreme hurry in proceeding with the work. That may be the view of the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, but I can tell them it will not be the view of the country. It is a most serious thing under the present circumstances to proceed at any extravagant rate with the works, and it is a serious question for the consideration of Parliament, whether we are justified at the present time in proceeding at all or not. It is a question hon. gentlemen may treat lightly, but it is one of the greatest possible importance to the future prosperity of Canada. I have been attacked and ridiculed because I said and repeatedly said that our true policy, as statesmen in Canada, was to make Canada a cheap country for the workingman to live in. It is still my opinion. The legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite has been in a contrary direction. They believe that the true policy of Canadians is to make Canada as dear a country as possible to live in. This is not merely a fact deducible from their argument, but it is clearly asserted in its absolute sense. They believe that, if commodities are dear, wages will be high also, and that it is an advantage to have everything at a high price, because there is an appearance of wealth, while the ultimate result is practically the same, plus the cost of the senseless proceeding. I believe, on the other hand, that the prosperity of the great mass of the people, labourer, farmer or mechanic, is insuperably connected with the maintenance of a reasonable Revenue Tariff, and with the maintenance of a reasonable rate, of taxation. And, if we are to borrow from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 every year for prosecuting these works, we shall soon land ourselves in such a position that we will not be able to present the financial aspect that the country now presents or did present until very lately. We have also to consider in connection with the debt of the country the municipal and Provincial indebtedness. We find that almost every one of the Provinces, indeed every one east of Ontario, is at this moment clamouring for some addition of payments. We have the same story from the west; and Ontario, this year, has been obliged to avoid the expenditure of any further money for new Provincial railways in consequence of the rapid disappearance of the surplus, which, by careful financing, they had been able to husband for several years and apply to such works. We are called upon by the hon. gentleman to rejoice that the taxation of the people is to be increased; we are called upon to rejoice that the hon. the Minister of Public Works has had the spirit to build 100 miles of the road, and to arrange for the building of another 100 miles immediately, by an excessive expenditure, which, for years to come, must be met solely by taxation, as I contend, on the workingman and the farmer. Taking the view I take of this question, I have no ground or reason to rejoice in any of these things. Parliament will be called upon to express its opinion of the course to be taken under what appears to me very gloomy prospective circumstances; and I fear that the hon. the Minister of Railways—the opinion of whose great energy I have no hesitation in endorsing, for he has tremendous energy, but it is an energy for mischief—will find that his energy has been expended upon these works and measures in a way that will end in disaster. I would rather he would show timidity than see him display the energy boasted by his followers. At all events, whatever they may do, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will have great hesitation in sanctioning the extraordinary measures and projects for purposes which will involve this country in irredeemable debt. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) can look upon this expenditure with great calm, in view of the easy means which he says there are of liquidating the debt of the Government, and of the municipalities too, I suppose; but, as these visionary measures are not entertained by the people of this country, they will not be sanctioned. Such excessive measure will not be approved of merely on the faith of the successful working of a paper currency. It was amusing—excessively amusing—to hear the hon. the Minister of Public Works declare that the result of the measures he had taken, and everything else connected with the building of the railway, the necessary result would be to diminish the taxation of the people. This was the statement of the hon. gentleman, but these are measures which, without any remarks from me at all, everyone will feel it is utterly impossible to carry out successfully, to spend vast sums of money, and rely upon possible sales of land in the North-West to recoup the country. The hon. gentleman says that in the past there was extraordinary extravagance. A large expenditure was unavoidable in the progress of the work. Some forty or fifty thousand miles more or less were travelled and explored in searching for the best line; some twelve thousand were instrumentally surveyed. The expenditure of about $4,000,000 was incurred in surveys in consequence of the bargain of 1872.

an extravagance that could not be controlled by any Government; but, so far as I was able, I endeavoured to control it. I had to choose the best and cheapest routes, and, in everything where expenditure of money was concerned we endeavoured to check its utter waste, although a great deal was wasted. I do not desire to refer to anything further now, for the reason that I prefer to discuss the question when the Estimates are before us and the projects of the Government are fully presented to the House, and when all the papers which are to be brought down have been laid before us.

MR. PLUMB: I rise at this moment simply to reply to what has fallen from the late Premier. I do not intend to enter upon a full discussion of the railway policy, until we have seen the papers which will be brought down by the hon. the Minister of Railways, and have heard his statements and explanations. There will be time enough then to discuss his connection with the Pacific Railway; and I have no doubt that, by dint of that energy which the hon. gentleman opposite justly gives him credit for, these reports and papers will be brought down in ample time to give full opportunity for examination and debate. I think it premature to enter upon a general discussion of the course that has been followed or the plans that have been adopted or foreshadowed by the Government. There will be time enough for that hereafter; but I venture to make some remarks at this moment because quotations have been made and inferences have been drawn by my hon. friend from Glengarry from a report of a Sub-Committee of the Public Accounts Committee, submitted at the close of the last Session to this House, with voluminous evidence therewith. The Sub-Committee was charged with an investigation of all matters connected with the construction of the Pacific Railway between Thunder Bay and Red River. I was Chairman of the Sub-Committee, which I venture to say accomplished a most important work, and faithfully executed a very laborious task amidst the pressure of the usual business of an active Session. I desire to call the attention of hon. members to that report and evidence, and to the evidence taken before a Committee of the Senate sitting at the same time and charged with similar duties, because they will bear me out fully, as I believe, in what I am about to say. The address of my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) in support of the motion which has given rise to this adjourned debate, by its lucid and logical arrangement, its calm tone, and above all by the importance of its subject, deserves and must receive the thoughtful consideration of this House and of the country. That hon. gentleman has an advantage which I do not possess. He has visited and made himself acquainted with the line of railway completed or under construction which will connect Lake Superior with Red River, and the section now under contract, which will extend it westward from the latter point. He has confined himself mainly to topics which are resultant from his own observation, and his opinions and conclusions, unbiassed, as all who know him know they must be, are entitled to great weight. I shall, however, direct myself more particularly to the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton, who has just preceded me, remarks which warrant me in taking a wider scope than I should have felt myself at liberty to take under other circumstances. I noted in the remarks of the hon. gentleman this afternoon, particularly in the concluding portions of them, a tone which I was unprepared to expect, after listening to the calm and temperate tone and the comparative fairness of his address on Wednesday of which they are the continuation. He chose to attack my hon. friends on the Treasury Benches with characteristic bitterness, and I shall not hesitate to reply fairly but fearlessly, and, I trust with Parliamentary courtesy and without personality. I ask the attention of the House to certain matters which, under the challenge thrown down by the hon. gentleman, I shall venture to discuss in view of the great national undertaking to which three successive Administrations have committed us, and the grave responsibility which, as representatives of the people, we are constantly called upon to assume in respect to it. In 1873-4, as my hon. friend has impressively stated, a great change in the political aspect of the country and of the House took place, through the events following the spring Session of 1873, culminating in a dissolution of the Parliament of 1872, and a General Election in January, 1874.

The Pacific Railway question was the chief instrumentality in effecting the revolution that characterised the election and brought the hon. gentleman who sits opposite to me an accession of power such as no man ever wielded before in the history of party government in this country. He was practically omnipotent in this House. His incisive criticisms of the policy of the previous Government, in respect to the Pacific Railway, and his loud promises of economy and reform had won confidence throughout the country, and he was looked upon, it appeared, by a majority of the people as a fitting man to be entrusted with framing and carrying through a successful policy for constructing the railway. Well, Sir, he entered upon that work in the Session of 1874, by bringing forward resolutions embodying his new scheme for the construction of the road. The resolutions were hurried through the House, as has been often mentioned, at a late hour of the night—hurried through by the power of that great and overbearing majority, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the small minority which opposed him. The hon. gentleman has frequently boasted that not a word or even a comma in his resolutions was changed during their passage through the House. He has led the public to believe that we accepted them en bloc, and, in his hustings speeches, prior to the late election, he often alleged that we did not even propose an amendment, and that, therefore, we acquiesced and were sharers in the responsibility of their adoption. I deny it. One important amendment at least was proposed, but it was scouted by the hon. gentleman and his triumphant and overbearing majority, and he assumed the entire and heavy responsibility of taking upon himself, as the head of his Department, the construction of the road as a Government work. The public had every reason, in accordance with the statements and criticisms of the hon. gentleman himself, to expect that he would not enter upon the construction of the work without the most careful consideration; that he would not commit himself to a policy in regard to it without weighing every argument, and, above all, that he should not adopt a line and put it under contract until he had, with the most deliberate, the most searching and the most critical enquiry and inspection, ascertained that it was the best one. We remember that hon. gentleman's criticisms on the construction of the Intercolonial Railway; we remember his scathing denunciations of the defective state of the surveys of that Railway; we remember his language on that subject, some of which I think it would not be improper to quote. When condemning the premature letting of contracts on that Railway, he says:

“We know that though Mr. Fleming had been engaged four years in the survey of the Intercolonial Railway, before a single sod was turned on the line, the surveys were in such a state of incompleteness that it cost the country a great deal more than it need, and would cost more yet, besides giving rise to difficulties and heart-burnings among the contractors, who alleged they had been deceived with regard to the character of certain sections. I have their complaints before me every day. Every gentleman knows, who hears the motions made in this House from day to day for papers in connection with these contracts, that a grievous blunder was made at the beginning, and that it arose from the commencement of the work before a complete survey had been made.”

Having commented thus severely upon his predecessors, it would not have been surprising to learn that he intended to adopt a safer policy and to give out no contracts for railway construction until full surveys justified him in doing so. Now, on the 3rd of April, 1875, the hon. gentleman gave out two most important contracts for the construction of the Railway. They were awarded upon a bill specifying the kind and quantity of work to be performed and of material to be furnished. Many tenders were received, and the contracts were given out fairly, no doubt, but they both fell into the hands of Sifton, Ward and Company of Petrolia, ardent supporters and close friends of the hon. gentleman in his constituency of Lambton. Contract No. 13 covered excavation, grading and bridging from Fort William to Shebandowan, forty-five miles. Contract 14 was for the same kind of work, from Selkirk to Cross Lake, seventy-seven miles. We had every reason to believe that, having selected Fort William on the Kaministiquia and Selkirk on the Red River as the terminal points of the line, between Thunder Bay and Red River, the hon. gentleman had fully satisfied himself, after thorough examination and exhaustive survey, and after a careful consideration of the question in all its bearings, that he was fully justified in committing himself to Fort William and Selkirk as starting points, that he could run between them the best, cheapest and most practicable line, and on entering upon the work of construction that he had sufficient trustworthy data upon which to compare tenders, base and award contracts, and state with approximate accuracy the cost of completing them. It was the initial step, and its importance to the country cannot well be over-estimated. Now, Sir, does it seem credible that no survey worth the name had been made of the line when tenders were asked for, and when contracts were entered into—so far was the hon. gentleman from having made the requisite examinations between Thunder Bay and Red River, and satisfying himself by close and accurate surveys that he was right in taking the initiative in the important work. Soon after the contract was made for extending the line from a certain point on the eastern portion towards the west, from a place called Sunshine Creek to English River, another contract was made; and, from the hon. gentleman's utterances we had reason to believe that he had not made these contracts without due examination; but we are told that when the contracts were entered into no surveys had been made at all. And yet, Sir, it is certain that no line for construction had then been finally located even up to the time that the contractors went up with their men to begin work. In one case they were kept waiting while the Government Engineers were deciding upon the line, and a claim of some $3,000 or $4,000 was allowed to one firm of contractors for the delay while the men were lying idle, and the engineers were fishing for the route for them to break ground upon. Contract No. 13 was for the construction of a line from Fort William to Lake Shebandowan. It was based, as were also the others, upon a bill of works, giving details of quantities and material. It was not discovered till the work was actually begun that no practicable line could be found to Lake Shebandowan. An arrangement was made to terminate the contract at Sunshine Creek, thirty-six miles from Fort William. Whatever had been done beyond that point was utter waste. Mr. Fleming says it was very little, but he naively states that none of the contracts were let a minute too soon. In fact there was no knowledge of any part of the line embraced by either contract in an accurate sense, and no survey except of the most superficial character. Mr. Fleming says, in his evidence before the Committee, that "the truth is we did not know where we were going when we began to build the road." The same happy-go-lucky policy enacted the state of things on Contract No. 14. Mr. Carre, the Resident Engineer, was instructed, in 1874, to make a trial location of the route from Keewatin to Selkirk. "We ran through," he says, "using the men who packed the provisions when not moving camp; they chopped out a line which I ran with my eye and a pocket compass, and I never went back over it again." When Mr. Carre, who was working westward, got about ten miles beyond Cross Lake, towards Selkirk, he was asked for the plans and profiles for Contract No. 14, and went to Winnipeg and made the best plan he could. He had made this rough examination of but fourteen miles of the seventy-seven embraced in the contract, and upon this the Government saw fit to get up a bill of quantities for a line which no engineers had ever been over. They went there with the contractors after the work had been let. In respect to Contract 25, which started from Sunshine Creek on the abandoned Shebandowan route, and carried the line north-westerly by way of Lac des Mille Lacs and Port Savanne, a word may be said. The hon. gentleman used to discourse glibly of the advantages of connecting his two bits of railway by means of a route by way of Rainy Lake, Rainy River and the Lake of the Woods, a detour of some 400 miles from Port Savanne on Lac des Mille Lacs, which we are led to believe would be for many years his western termination of the Fort William line to Keewatin or Rat Portage, which he intended to be the eastern end of the line from Red River. This he called utilising the water-stretches. There was a descent of 400 feet between Port Savanne and Rainy Lake, and eight portages, some of them three or four miles long, lay between those points. My hon. friend stoutly asserted that this would prove a practicable route for traffic when a lock at Fort Frances on Rainy Lake and River had been constructed. The construction of the Fort Frances Lock was undertaken by day labour with about as much previous planning and knowledge as of the railway line, and very much the same sort of accurate estimate of the cost. A full record of the transactions connected with that memorable and unique bit of hydraulic engineering I think the House does not yet fully possess, but I intend, if possible, that they shall possess it before this Session ends. The House will learn, I think, that there were no settled plans whatever, and no working drawings or directions for building the lock, although a heavy outlay of public money was involved. The superintendence of the work was entrusted to a Government favourite, who was not an engineer. A well-known forest ranger of Ontario was engaged to direct the men who were to cut and convey to Fort Frances the timber necessary for the work. He started for Fort William in the spring of 1875, I think, and sailed from Sarnia by a steamer, on board of which he found a large gang of men from Alexandria in Glengarry, who had been employed to work under his direction. The Dawson Route had not been opened. There was great delay and difficulty in getting forward the men and supplies. When they arrived at Fort Frances, the Government Engineer was not there, and an Indian was employed to search for him, and the money paid him for his three weeks' hunt appears duly entered in the Public Accounts. Mr. Sutherland, the Superintendent, did not wait until the Engineer was trapped before he sent his ranger and the Glengarry axemen in search of timber. The ranger's instructions were simply "to get timber." A vast extent of wilderness had to be traversed in order to find it. Most of the Glengarry men proved useless and were discharged. They returned to Fort Frances, where the paymaster had no money to pay them with. There they remained for months, living in utter idleness at the Government's expense. About fifty thousand feet of timber was the grand result of a long summer's work, and if it has not been stolen or sold it still lies unused at Fort Frances. The Alexandria man who went up in charge of the Glengarry force was, it is said, the agent of a shopkeeper of that village, to whom the men were indebted, and who took the ingenious but roundabout method of getting payment out of their wages at the Government expense. Towards the end of the season they were sent back from Fort Frances to Glengarry also at the Government charge. Contract 25 took up the line of the Railway from Sunshine Creek where Contract 13 came to an untimely end, on the failure to find a practicable route to Shebandowan. It would be reasonably supposed, inasmuch as the late Premier had repeatedly declared that the Fort Frances route should be utilised for many years to come, and that there was no intention during that time of building the intermediate line of railway, that he would content himself by extending the road westward to Port Savanne, the point of debarkation for the water-stretch route, but it was found that Contract 25 pushed the road to English River, forty miles beyond Port Savanne, for no possible purpose of traffic, involving thereby a premature, and temporarily a useless, expenditure of a very large sum of public money. The road terminated in the midst of an utter wilderness. In the specifications of that contract, as in all the others, quantities were stated, the contractors fixed prices, the cost at those prices was calculated, extended and summed up, and the total formed the amount of the bid. A comparison of tenders is made by this method, and it is contended it is the best one. So it may be, if quantities are ascertained with tolerable accuracy, and if the prices throughout a tender are consistent. But, Sir, under the direction and sanction of my hon. friend opposite, it has proved a most disastrous failure. The cost beyond the original amount of the contracts given out by him between Fort William and Selkirk has been, in every case, enormously large, ranging from 32 to 80 per cent. In every one of them, there has been an enormous increase beyond the specification in the quantities of certain kinds of work. In Contract 25 the specifications were for one million cubic yards of earth excavation and filling. It was taken at 33c. a yard. Nearly two million yards have been done. In another contract, eighty thousand yards of the same kind of earthwork, taken at the high price of 37c. a yard, is increased to one million six hundred and fifty thousand yards. In that contract, also, solid rock excavation, of which the specifications called for three hundred thousand yards at $2.75 per yard, is increased to five hundred and twenty-five thousand yards; and of loose rock at $1.75 per yard, the quantity is increased from thirty thousand yards to sixty thousand. He had several hundred thousand feet of timber, which he took so low that he could not even deliver it. That contract must have been under discussion two or three years, and all the difficulties ought to have been understood, but that gentleman had not been long upon the ground when it was suddenly discovered that the trestle-work was of wood, and there was danger of fires. Engineers of any experience should have known that wooden trestle-work would take fire before Joseph Whitehead took possession of the work. There was a recommendation that the trestle-work should be abandoned, that the earth and rockwork should be increased; and we were surprised to find, when we came to investigate this contract, that whereas Mr. Rowan stated that there would be an increase of $260,000, it was increased over $900,000, and there was no modification of the cost of the earthwork, which had been so insignificant an item in the first bid; there was no alteration in the cost of the rockwork, which was increased from 300,000 to 550,000 yards. The estimates that were brought before us showed that in that contract there would be an increase of nearly a million dollars. Now, it is not that these matters are not liable to error. We do not contend that we can tie down these contracts, and that they are in all cases to be brought within the exact sum for which they were made. I never have contended that. I do not expect to find, even in the great care which I know has been taken by my hon. friend the present Minister of Railways, that his estimates may not be exceeded, nor shall I find any fault with him if they are. I find no fault with the late Minister of Public Works because his estimates are exceeded; but I want to make this point, that the hon. gentleman went before the public, in 1877, when he was engaged in holding political picnics during the election campaign and his constant theme wherever he went was the economy the skill with which he was constructing the Pacific Railway. He said that he had succeeded in obtaining that economy which all Governments had aimed at, but which very few were able to achieve; that he had succeeded in securing it in building this Railway; that the 228 miles which he had under contract would be built in all respects as well as the Intercolonial Railway, except the bridging, which would be of timber, and that it would be built at about $24,500 per mile, or at about one-half the cost of the Intercolonial Railway. He repeated that statement everywhere. I have a dozen different quotations showing how the hon. gentleman insisted upon this, and I will read one or two. On the 20th April, 1877, Mr. Mackenzie stated in the House of Commons that the cost of the 228½ miles to which I am referring would be as follows:—

Amount of the contracts.....	$3,302 568
Engineering, $1,500 a mile.....	346 750
228½ miles of steel rails.....	385,575

At Kingston, on the 27th June following, at a great Reform demonstration, he is reported to have said:

“I shall be able to show that, notwithstanding the difficulties we had to contend with west of Lake Superior, which were not met with in the construction of the Intercolonial, this Government, by its wise policy, by its proper system of letting contracts, by its judicious system of preparing beforehand elaborate surveys and examinations of the country, has succeeded in building and letting contracts for the road west of Lake Superior for less than one-half per mile of what the Intercolonial cost. (Cheers.) I think I shall be able to establish that, as far as the administration of the great public works of the country are concerned, we have succeeded beyond our expectations in realising that economy which every Government professes to observe and desires to secure, but which very few can reach, unless by devoting their whole energies to the task, and introducing essential reforms in the management of public works.”

If I had wished to be sarcastic, I could not have chosen words better designed to convey the sharpest and most effective sarcasm. At Colborne, on the 9th of July, 1877, we find in the Globe report that he used the following language:—

“We have 228 miles under contract between Thunder Bay and Red River; and, under our wise system of contracts, we are building those 228 miles of railway in a country where no white inhabitant ever lived, where only the foot of the Indian and trapper ever trod, for a little less than one-half of what the late Government built the Intercolonial."

A few weeks later, at a great gathering of the faithful at Brampton, on September 19th, we are again told by him if, the Globe's report be correct and the famous yellow-covered handy volume of picnic speeches issued by the Reform Association does not misstate him :

"The cost of the Intercolonial, as nearly as may be, was $18,000 per mile, and the 228 miles of the Pacific Railway, beginning at Thunder Bay, now under contract, we are building with as good a roadbed as the Intercolonial, only our bridges are wood instead of iron. The road cost us, under our wise and economical system of contracts, including ample allowances for rolling stock, $24,535 per mile, or about one-half the cost of the Intercolonial."

On the 4th of May, 1877, in the House of Commons, while under a greater responsibility, and greater restraint than gentlemen sometimes are when they are addressing picnic and hustings meetings, he said, climbing down a little, as they say on the other side of the border, that :

"The 228 miles would be completed at an average cost of somewhere about $25,000 a mile, not an excessive cost when we consider the character of the country traversed."

On the 3rd April, 1875, he moved that the Government be authorised to enter into a contract with the parties sending in the lowest available tender, for the construction of that portion of the Pacific Railway, extending from Rat Portage to Cross Lake, that is, the thirty-seven miles embraced in Section 15, of which I have already spoken. Even in 1875, he actually came before Parliament and proposed to take a contract for building that road when, I undertake to say, not even a line by axe and compass had been laid down upon it. He said :

"It so happened that a most elaborate survey had been made of this section. It would be impossible to have a more careful survey, a closer examination, or a more careful calculation than had been made on those thirty-seven miles. There had been no such survey on the Intercolonial."

We have now to refer to the evidence of Mr. Carre, the Division Engineer, taken before the Committee of the Commons last year, in regard to Sections 14 and 15 :

"We just ran through, using the men who packed the provisions on days when we were not moving camp, to chop a line, which I ran with my eye and a pocket compass ; then, as soon as the transit men came along, they ran the transit level over it and plotted it ; then I put down the locat on line, and the location men ran that line. If the profile showed a practicable line, I was satisfied. I never went back over it again, so that I never saw the country after the line was located. When I got over Cross Lake and was about ten miles on Contract 14, I was asked for plans and profiles, which I was told had to be sent in, so I went out to Winnipeg and made the best plan I could."

In his evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons, Mr. Carre testified, in respect to the estimate of the cost of Section 15, that it had been prepared by himself and Mr. Rowan, at Winnipeg, and added :

"We had only two days to do it in so that it was totally impossible to make the re-calculations."

"Q. How did it happen you had only two days to prepare it, and under whose orders was it done? A. I do not know. Mr. Rowan just asked me for the information, the order came from the head office."

"Q. He, Mr. Rowan, told you it must be done immediately? A. Immediately, yes. Remember, I never gave the estimate as an accurate estimate of the cost. If I had been asked to estimate the actual cost of the work, I would have refused point blank to pretend to give it. No mortal man could give it on that survey."

That evidence shows that there had been no survey worth the name. Mr. Carre had simply run a line with his compass and axemen. He understood nothing of the quantities nor of the probable cost. Mr. Carre said distinctly that no human being could have given an estimate of the cost of the road with the bill he had before him, and he had to go back to Mr. Rowan to get him to make out a bill of works for this road. With that bill of works the hon. gentleman went with people of Canada and challenged to the support on the ground that, with either insufficient data, with that mere imaginary bill of quantities, he was building this road for $24,000 a mile. I say that that gentleman, so far as he is concerned, stole a verdict from the people by representations which he knew could not be proved. I say it with great hesitation, and I say it with a grave sense of my responsibility in making that statement. I hope I am wrong. I do not say that these great excesses could have been avoided ; I do not say it was possible for the Government to have built those lines within the limits of the contract, but I say that Mr. Fleming in his sworn statements says, with the warrant of the hon. gentleman opposite, that these were mere estimates put together for the purpose of asking for tenders, that they had no foundation, and were made out in the hon. gentleman's office in the Western Block. Further extracts from the report just referred to establish what I have said and are as follows. Mr. Fleming states :

"It (Section 13) was not thoroughly surveyed, it was done hurriedly, I represented to the Minister that it was simply a means of comparing tenders, it had no pretension to accuracy as to final cost of the line. When the work was let we did not know where we were going to. This contract (No. 13) was let before we had sufficient information to enable us to compute the total cost.

"Q. Who is the Engineer in charge of this work (Section 14)? Who located it? A. I cannot remember who made the original survey. There was a survey made by Mr. Jarvis years ago, perhaps in the year 1873. The more recent surveys were made by Mr. Rowan, and no one was more surprised than myself to find the quantities greatly exceeded. I was very much disappointed. I had hoped that in every case we had made sufficient allowance for everything, but it seems we had not in this case. As I said before, the whole thing was done hurriedly in the office at headquarters, simply on the profile furnished, and during the Session of Parliament when every one is worked at high pressure. It is not surprising that mistakes of that kind sometimes occur.

"Q. Are we to understand that the contracts which are now the subject of this enquiry were let before the survey was sufficiently advanced to allow you to take out accurate quantities? A. Yes."

Mr. Marcus Smith, Acting Chief Engineer during Mr. Fleming's absence in England, testified before the same Committee, as follows :—

"The line (Section 13) was not located for construction at the time of letting this contract, and they had to begin locating the line after the contractors were there. They had all their men on the ground for some weeks before the Engineer arrived to locate the line; they claimed compensation for the men's wages and board during that time."

Mr. Marcus Smith, in giving evidence in respect to claims made by contractors for delay awaiting the location of the line, was asked by a member of the Committee :

"Q. What is the approximate cost of the delays the contractors claim for? A. There were seven claims. Claim No. 1 was for fares of men from Sarnia to the Landing (Prince Arthur's Landing), and for boarding these men,

$3,142. That claim was for boarding and wages of men while idle, and fares for men to supply places of those who left.

"Q. Did I understand that that claim arose in consequence of the contract being let before the survey was made and before it was ready to be let to the contractors? A. Yes. They proved that, because I awarded part of their claim, I went thoroughly into the matter and awarded them what I thought was due."

Under those circumstances the hon. gentleman went before the country and claimed that he was building this road at the rate of $24,500 a mile. But we have another statement from the Chief Engineer, in which he says that those 228 miles will cost $38,092 a mile, and I do not believe he has got at the cost yet. That is nearly the cost of the Intercolonial, and yet the bridges are wooden structures, and, owing to that circumstance, a large amount of money is temporarily saved, but the road falls far short of being a first-class one. We have in evidence that starting from Selkirk as a fixed point was a mistake of the most grievous character. It is in evidence that, if the line had been deflected a few miles south, $360,000 would have been saved to the country on the section below Selkirk and Cross Lake alone. This is what Mr. Carre says in regard to it :—

"Q. Did you run a line south of the located line. A. I did.

"Q. Did you make any estimate of difference in cost between the two lines. A. Yes. A very rough estimate, I am speaking from memory now. I have the figures, but not with me, and would not like to say without them.

"Q. State it approximately? A. I think it was \$360,000, or thereabouts, in favour of the southern line. There was a difference in length, I believe, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles. It, the located line, was that much shorter than the other."

In his evidence before the House of Commons, Mr. Carre said it was for $402,950, and the work has already cost $722,134. I think that the reports made last year by both Committees will bear out much more than I have ventured to say on this occasion. I have not in the slightest degree overstated what those investigations conveyed, and what warnings they gave us. I have not overstated in the slightest degree the condition of the survey between the Red River and Kaministiquia. There was practically no survey at all, and yet we have paid enormous sums for engineering.

there. It is estimated at $1,500 a mile, and has cost, I believe, far more. I can point the hon. gentleman to a railway more difficult of construction, more difficult to find a route for, which was built without any such expenditure. Mr. Mark Hopkins, Mr. Huntington, of Sacramento, and Mr. Stanford, late Governor of California, by their own energy and enterprise built a railroad from that city to the terminus of the Union Pacific at Ogden. They erected 400 miles of snowsheds to protect the line. They ascended and descended the wild precipices of the Sierra Nevada, far more formidable in altitude and engineering difficulty than the Cascades, and carried that line to completion during a period of the greatest inflation in the United States, by which the cost of construction was enormously enhanced. They were business men spending their own money and that of their friends, and, in view of what has been frequently said about the terrible difficulties in the way of construction, financially and physically, they did not occupy seven years and spend nearly six millions in looking for a route. They had a point to reach, and they kept their engineers in advance of the construction train as it made progress. I may state that the gentlemen built 1,309 miles of road; that they received, from time to time, aid to the amount of about twenty-eight millions of dollars, from the United States in Government bonds, sold fifty-five millions of their own, and have issued capital stock to the amount of nearly fifty-five millions more, which last, under the well-known process of watering, probably represents very little cash paid in. But, even on these enormously inflated figures, representing one hundred and thirty-seven millions of dollars, the yearly nett earnings enabled the company to pay yearly interest on all its bonded debt, on the United States bonds, and 8 per cent. yearly dividend on its capital stock. Lands of their land grant were selling up to 1876 at an average of $5.27 an acre. I do not think the prospects for building our Railway so gloomy as hon. gentlemen opposite wish to make out, but, on the other hand, that there is every reason to believe that it will be carried to a triumphant conclusion and will not be the burden to the country that the hon. gentleman predicts. Until the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals makes his statement, we do not know what arrangements he has made or contemplates. For one, I have great confidence not only in his energy, but in his ability to complete the work that has been so hampered by the half-hearted policy of the last Government. Here before me is the report, which will be found to corroborate every statement I have made in regard to the hon. gentleman and his railway matters. It will also be found there that the contractor for Section 15, on which an enormous increase of cost has grown out of a radical change in the plan of construction, had scarcely arrived on the line in the autumn of 1877, when he proposed to Mr. Rowan, the Resident Engineer, to substitute earth and rock-work for trestle-work. Mr. Rowan made a report, an elaborate calculation, including a very ingenious compound-interest calculation, showing that the proposed change would involve an extra cost of about $240,000. Mr. Fleming, who came to Canada for a brief visit in the following spring, recommended the Government to adopt the changed plan, which I think was a judicious one. But the question naturally suggests itself: why were not all the difficulties and advantages suggested by Mr. Rowan fully canvassed before the contract was made? Mr. Fleming, it appears, did not consult at all with Mr. Smith, the Acting Chief Engineer, during his stay. Mr. Smith states that he left Ottawa for Winnipeg several weeks after Mr. Fleming returned to England, and that although he had frequent discussions with the First Minister prior to his departure, Mr. Fleming's recommendation of the change, of which Mr. Smith knew nothing, was never mentioned by Mr. Mackenzie. That hon. gentleman fully corroborates this extraordinary statement; his sworn evidence will be found in the report of the House Committee of which he was a member. He says he never spoke of the matter at all to Mr. Smith, and he also stated, unequivocally, that, although he personally approved of the change, still, because it involved a large amount of extra expenditure, and in view of the nature and particulars of the contract, he was not prepared to recommend it to Council. The change, however, was made, and every engineer connected with it seems to have mysteriously become impressed with the idea that every other engineer connected with it had received orders or permission from the proper authority to make it, and the work went forward, under that supposition it seems, and was half done when it was discovered that nobody had authorised, and nobody was responsible for, the change. And yet the plan, as modified, was a proper one, but the pros and cons should have been fairly discussed before the bill of works was prepared, upon which the contract was tendered for and awarded. The Government ought to have known that trestle-work would easily take fire, that it would soon decay, and that earth and rock were better and more durable, and in the end cheaper material for a first-class road bed, equal in nearly all respects to the Intercolonial. They ought also to have known that the large bill of timber required for the trestle-work could not be obtained nearer the line than the head waters of the Mississippi, and that the fulfilment of that part of the contract was ruinous to the contractor, if practicable at all. When it was recommended to make a charge for releasing the contractor from delivering timber which he had bid at ruinously low prices, and to substitute sixteen or seventeen hundred thousand yards of earth at thirty-seven cents, and two hundred and twenty-five thousand yards of rock at $2.75, why was not the entire contract modified? I can understand that no special caution was necessary in accepting a bid for eighty thousand yards of earth-work at thirty-seven cents a yard, but if that was to be increased to sixteen hundred thousand yards it was quite another affair. Notwithstanding the startling figures I have given, I venture to say that the end is not yet, and the man is a bold or credulous one that boasts of the cheap construction of his railway until he has paid his last bill. The estimate last year is by no means a final one as to the four contracts. I do intend to cast the least reproach or suspicion upon the contractors; it is their business to make the best of their bargain, and that of our Ministers and their engineers, who are, I believe, not our masters, to see that they are carefully watched. I know that one great item of increased expenditure is a bottomless pit in Cross Lake, but why was not that discovered by the exhaustive survey before the contract was given out? It was the discovery of the hurried location in the west, of the utter incompleteness of the surveys, and the statements made from time to time so confidently by my hon. friend from Lambton, in which he referred to their accuracy and exhaustiveness, that induced me to investigate this subject, and his reckless challenge gives me opportunity to bring before the House the results of my examination. It is no fault of mine if they leave him in an unpleasant position. The warnings which we now have, I think, should lead the House seriously to consider the system by which the contracts have been let. I am not an engineer, but I think my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will be able to show us that he has taken extra precautions with regard to those contracts, and that his intention is that there shall be no disappointment on the part of the country, in respect to his estimate of the cost of his part of the work. Until the facts are before us, I do not wish to criticise his policy, but I believe, from the energy and ability he possesses, that the great task which rests upon him will be pushed on as rapidly as possible, and so assist in the colonisation of the fertile lands west of the Red River. I have never been in the country, and cannot undertake to judge of the merits of rival routes. I have no doubt that the best steps will be taken to unite the uses of a colonisation road with one adapted for through traffic. Probably for years to come there will not be a pressure of such traffic, but so long as the line is built in the most convenient way for securing the local traffic, and for opening up the lands most convenient for settlement, we ought to be content. The true policy, in my opinion, is to build it with this view, as rapidly as is consistent with the position of the country, without adding to the burdens of taxation. It is useless to talk now of the proposition of the Government to build the road in ten years. That idea has been reiterated repeatedly, and unfairly presented in order to damage the present Government; it has not made an unfavourable impression on the country. Everbody knows that there was a salvo to that agreement by which it was understood that the road should not be pushed forward in any manner incommensurate with the power of the country to bear the increased burdens. In 1872, when railroad speculation was at its height, when railway enterprises of the most difficult character and of unparalleled magnitude were being pushed forward, there was no great hazard in saying that this road could be built in ten years. The Central and Union Pacific was built in four or five years by private enterprise, and I do not think that the proposition to build the Canada Pacific in ten was so wild, chimerical and hazardous as my hon. friend wishes it to appear. For the present state of affairs, the late Government is entirely responsible. My hon. friend opposite, without any need for undue haste, made contracts without surveys, not knowing where his lines were to run. His engineers made up bills of works for specified quantities which were entirely hypothetical. He made contracts for these specified quantities, being advised that they were the only means of comparing tenders, and assumed them to be exact when he publicly announced the fallacious figures they produced as the real cost of the contracts, the cost of constructing the road. Here are the results as given to the Committees: Contract No. 13, contract price, $294,265; cost reported to Committees, $331,979. Contract No. 25, contract price, $1,037,061; cost reported to Committees, $1,384,645. Contract No. 14, contract price, $402,950; cost reported to Committees, $722,134. Contract No. 15, contract price, $1,594,085; cost reported to Committees, $2,524,999. Total amount at contract prices, of which Mr. Mackenzie made his boasts, $3,328,361. Total cost as reported to Committees, $5,081,010. Increase, $1,752,649. And to this must be added the further increase estimated by Mr. Fleming, in his statement of last winter. Taking these figures into account, which were ascertainable and ought to have been known to the late Minister of Public Works, if he gave that attention to his duties which his friends claim for him, and which certainly everyone had a right to expect, it follows that either he did not know that his 228 miles of road had cost, steel rails included, about $38,000 a mile, when he assured the public that it would only cost $24,500, or he did know. Officers of his Railway Department certainly could not have been ignorant of it. He may take either alternative; he cannot be congratulated upon either. With regard to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, I have already stated that I will not undertake for a moment to criticise his work until he gives us the data on which to judge of it. But one transaction of my hon. friend is at any rate open for comment. His own utterances elsewhere have given me the right to refer to a transaction of his which stands in very striking contrast to one of the same nature of the hon. gentleman who preceded him. In 1875, the hon. member for Lambton purchased 50,000 tons of steel rails which would serve to lay 500 miles of road. There must have been an immediate prospect of constructing that extent of railway, else the purchase was speculative and unwarranted. He paid between fifty-four and fifty-five dollars a ton for those rails. My hon. friend now in charge of the Railway Department having decided to construct without delay the gap of 188 miles, between English River and Rat Portage, without which the entire outlay by his predecessor on that route was utterly useless, placed it under contract soon after he came into office. Finding that more than eleven thousand tons of the rails purchased by the hon. member for Lambton had been used without permission of the House, and I believe without sanction of law, for re-laying the Intercolonial Railway, and that 5,000 tons were in British Columbia, intending to let contracts on the Fraser River immediately, and to push the line rapidly on west of Red River, my hon. friend very wisely and properly made a purchase of 50,000 tons of steel rails last summer for those parts of the work under construction and about to be let. There is a strong contrast between the two transactions. In that by the late Minister, the prices fell, before the rails could be legitimately used, to a point which involved a loss of principal and interest of more than two millions of dollars. In the second, the price paid for them, delivered in Montreal, was £4 18s. 6d., or about $23.84 a ton. Those rails could not now be purchased for less than $40 or $45 a ton. There is then a profit of a million of dollars or more on the transaction to place on the one side against the late Premier the hon. member for Lambton's loss of two millions on the other. I can therefore honestly compliment my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, not upon misdirected energy, which the hon. gentleman opposite attributed to him, but upon energy expended in the right direction. It seems quite impossible for hon. gentlemen opposite to get through a speech on any subject without wandering into a discussion of the National Policy. My hon. friend the member for Lambton can speak clearly, forcibly, and to the point, and he had a right in dealing with the motion of the hon. member for G'engarry to vindicate his policy; but I do not exactly see that he need have found it necessary in doing so to drift off into questions that have been discussed over and over again in the House and elsewhere, and which have been dealt with by the newspapers ad nauseam. That hon. gentleman states we are impoverishing the country by large expenditures on the Pacific Railway and by our National Policy. We can stand a good deal of that sort of accusation and impoverishment; we can afford to await the results of both. The hon. member for West Durham, in speaking of the Supreme Court, chid us for expecting seed planted to-night to germinate in the morning. We claim the use of the same simile in regard to the National Policy, which is being carried out in accordance with our pledges to the people, who accepted our pledges and sent us here an immense majority to fulfil them. That policy is not a policy for a day or a week; its fruition cannot come until there is a relaxation of the depression, which has been universal, affecting Free-trade and Protection alike. It is childish to talk about what ought to have happened the day after the elections in 1878, and to ask why the new Government did not adopt an increased Tariff then and there, even before the old one had resigned; why bank stocks fell, and why there have been more failures this year than last. It is as absurd to expect immediate fruit from this policy as it would be to expect immediate results from the freshly-sown seed. If the National Policy is sound, the results will prove it. I do not wish Canada to be a cheap country to live in, in the sense hon. gentlemen opposite prefer to. I would rather see it a dear country, with plenty of money to buy the necessaries of life, and plenty of work for the people. I did not object to a man having to pay in California $50 for a pair of boots, when he earned $10 or $20 a day by his labour. Nothing is so depressing or injurious to the spirit of the people as to make a country too cheap to live in, for what is very cheap the proverb tell us is usually nasty. Low prices are a mockery to men who are out of work. Capital having been severely dis-couraged, it may take some time to draw it again into the channels of trade. My hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), with his large business experience, knows perfectly well that it took five years, from 1837 until 1842, for the restoration of the confidence of capitalists after the great crisis of that disastrous period. Where the causes of those panics, followed by depression of trade and general distrust, have been deep-seated, along time has been necessary for recovery. The depression of 1873 was brought about by causes greater in variety and more potent in influence than any other that this country has witnessed. It has been longer in duration and more searching and intense and general in its effects and consequences. I remember that the hon. gentleman from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), in his two last Budget Speeches, in the jauntiest manner predicted a speedy return of prosperity, and such hopefulness surprised us. He claimed to have special indications of the good times coming, through the revenue returns. It perhaps suited his purpose thus to attempt to palliate his deficits and soften or prevent too close an examination and description of them. I do not desire and have not desired to criticise in any unpleasant sense, except so far as the hon. member for Lambton has provoked a discussion in which any hon. member may properly take part, the policy of the present Government in respect to the Pacific Railway, nor to deal with what I consider the most important question in connection with it, that of the Engineering Department. We have had under the late Government an enormous expenditure in that particular Department, entirely out of proportion with the apparent results. If I were an expert I have no doubt I should be able to point out large expenditures which have been utterly useless, costly lines run through impracticable districts, and large amounts spent in consequence of a halting, half-hearted policy not at unity with itself. The late Government had one prominent member who did not wish the railway built at all, and another who did not wish it extended beyond the Rocky Mountains, while others gave the whole policy anything but a cordial and vigorous support. It was very easy to put off and pacify people by continuing the surveys, while not attempting a definite location, upon the ground that the best route had not been found. But no such idea impressed itself on the mind of the First Minister when he rushed blindly into the four contracts of which I have spoken. I think it was simply monstrous to commit the country absolutely to those two termini—Selkirk and Fort William—until it was known somewhat nearly what the practicability and economy of this direct line between them would be; also, what would be the result of continuing the line westward from Red River, with Selkirk as the starting point. So much money has been expended on the present line and at Fort William and Selkirk that, practically, we are bound to a position which I do not believe to be the most advantageous for the country or for the road, and yet it is impossible to fix the responsibility. The late First Minister evades the responsibility of the change of work on Section 15 and of making the four hasty and improvident contracts. He shelters himself, when it becomes necessary, behind the Chief Engineer, who, we have it in evidence, was in England during the greatest part of the time that hon. gentlemen were letting the work without survey, and that changes involving millions of unforeseen expenditure were made. Nobody knows by whose authority when tenders were advertised for. Section 15. Mr. Fleming was in Europe, and Mr. Marcus Smith was in the North-West. Mr. Smith telegraphed Mr. Mackenzie not to go on with the letting until he came to Ottawa, saying that he had important reasons for advising delay. Yet the mischief was done without heeding his advice. Hurriedly done; tenders were advertised for, for the work upon specifications involving the trestle-work, and that plan was utterly abandoned almost at the outset by the direction or acquiescence of parties unknown or undiscovered; the contractor found that he could not execute it. I do not say he would not—I am not blaming him for taking for granted that the Government would not lead him to attempt what proved to be an impossibility. He had great difficulties to contend with. I want to fix the responsibility, both as to the particular case and as to the claim which the hon. gentleman put before the country as to his exhaustive surveys, and the economical precision of his contract, where it belongs, and we, on this side, well know where it belongs. I could give proof upon proof of the statements I have been making, and I defy any hon. member to controvert any single one of them. I have considered it my duty to discuss such questions as the present, often at considerable length, and I may have been regarded as prolix and tedious; but I have been actuated by a sense of duty, and have taken up the time of the House while in opposition with the approval and at the instance of the leader of my party. The address of the hon. member for Lambton was everywhere weak but where it was personal, and, even there, his attacks could be parried by those who knew the facts. I want the House to understand that there were no surveys of the road made in the time of the hon. gentleman, worthy of the name, between Red River and Selkirk, when the four contracts were let, and, that the Pacific Railway between Red River and the Kaministiquia will have cost, instead of $24,500 a mile, as was vaunted by him, $40,000 a mile; that during three years of the period when those works were going on, the Chief Engineer was absent, that he was never on the line of the road, and that hon. gentlemen opposite permitted him to go on year after year without doing their duty in fixing a compensation for his important work. It is no excuse for their leader to retort we are following their example. We inherited the position, every month that the settlement was delayed, aggravating the difficulty, which has arisen, because, for some occult reason, the late Government did not come at first to a decision to grapple with it as they should. It is childish to plead they could not fix a salary, because an adequate one would have exceeded that of Ministers up to 1873. Their salaries were raised before they reached office, and I am not aware they ever remonstrated against their amount. I will not weary the House by further remarks; I crave its indulgence for any faults or omissions, and return it my sincere thanks for the kind attention with which I have been favoured. I notice the hon. member for West Durham, who is nothing if not critical, indulging in that bland and pleasant smile for which he is noted.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman asked pardon for any omissions; we can stand the omissions.

MR. PLUMB: I do not object to the pleasant smile or the charming witticism of the hon. gentleman, the indication of his amiable character and charming temper; but if it pleases him, it does not hurt me; I only hope that this question will be again discussed, when I know we shall have from the hon. the Minister of Railways a vindication of the Government policy, which has at heart the rapid settlement and development of the Great North-West, a policy which I hope will satisfy the country and prove as successful as it deserves to be.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 49) To incorporate the Red River and Assiniboine Bridge Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 50) To amend the Act to incorporate the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Williams.)

Bill (No. 51) To amend the Act 36 Vic., cap. 118, intitled an Act to grant additional powers to the Quebec and Gulf Ports Steamship Company.—(Mr. McGreevy.)

Bill (No. 54) To incorporate the Canadian Telegraph Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 55) To amend the Act 40 Vic., cap. 72, intitled an Act respecting the Beaver and Toronto Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

House resumed the Debate on Mr. McLennan's motion.—[Vide p. 455]

MR. RYAN (Marquette): The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) who has moved this resolution, during the recess visited Manitoba and the North-West Territories. I have reason to know that on more than one occasion the country since then has been benefitted by the experience of the hon. gentleman, as I am sure it will be in the future. I have reason to thank the hon. gentleman for the introduction of the resolution, for it has given rise to a debate, the progress of which will be watched with the utmost interest in the North-West. During the course of the debate one or two very important statements were elicited from the hon. the Minister of Railways. One was with reference to the construction of the railway bridge at Selkirk. So far as my constituents are concerned it is a matter of indifference to them whether the bridge of the Canadian Pacific Railway is constructed at Selkirk or Winnipeg. At whichever place it is constructed we will be able to do our business with equal facility. But if we are indifferent as to where the bridge is constructed we are not at all indifferent to other interests involved in the construction of the road; we are not at all indifferent to the speedy development of the country. The construction of a railway bridge at Selkirk would cost some $400,000 or $500,000, perhaps a little more or perhaps somewhat less. In a country so well adapted to the purposes of railroad construction as is Manitoba, this sum would pay for the construction of forty or fifty miles of railroad, as each mile of railroad opens up for agricultural settlement twenty-five or thirty miles on each side of the line, and the money which would be paid for the construction of a bridge at Selkirk would open up for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation 500,000 or 600,000 acres of land. It is well known that the corporation of the city of Winnipeg proposes to erect a railway traffic bridge at that city. Indeed they have already let the contract, and I am informed the construction is being at present proceeded with. Under the circumstances it seems to me that it would be extremely inadvisable to proceed with the construction of the bridge at Selkirk. The wisest policy would be to use the bridge to be constructed by the corporation of Winnipeg for some years to come and spend the money saved in the construction of forty or fifty miles of railway. Another statement made by the hon. the Minister of Railways, which I received with a great deal of pleasure, and which will be received with a great deal of pleasure in the North-West, had reference to the delay which has taken place in the construction of the first hundred miles west of Winnipeg. It was with the utmost satisfaction that I listened to the assurance that the delay was not occasioned by any default on the part of the Government Engineer, or of the Government; that the branch line was actually ready for construction, and that the delay arose from causes over which the hon. the Minister of Railways had no control. While on this subject, I may be permitted to confirm a statement of the hon. the Minister of Railways, that the contractor is now doing everything in his power. In fact, so soon as the ice across the Red River became strong enough to admit of the passage over it of a locomotive, a track was laid across the ice, and I believe I am justified in saying that from the first time that locomotive passed over the river up to the present time not one hour has been lost in pushing on the work as vigorously as possible. By the time the ice breaks in the spring, I have no doubt that the necessary material for the construction of the first 100 miles, will have been brought across the Red River. I was in hopes that during the period for reflection, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has had during the last year, that he would have had occasion to change his opinions relative to the present route south of Lake Manitoba, and the route which his Government proposed to adopt. I am sorry to find that the hon. gentleman still adheres to the opinion that the route by the Narrows is the one best calculated to subserve the interests of the Dominion. But while the hon. gentleman argues from false premises he cannot hope to arrive at any other than an incorrect conclusion. The hon. gentleman starts out with the supposition that the road by the Narrows is some thirty miles shorter than the other route. I was very glad to learn from the statement of the hon. the Minister of Railways that the road south of the Narrows is only some twenty miles longer. Of course in such a great trans-continental road, such as this, the saving of distance is a very important consideration; but it occurs to me that it is only one of several considerations which ought to guide the Government in locating the road, and not by any means the most important one. The hon. gentleman asserts, and perhaps with a certain measure of truth, that the grades on the route by the Narrows would be much better than those on the southern route. If this is true, of course it is a very important consideration and entitled to very great weight. But on the other hand, we must reflect that the very fact that the grades on the northern route are not at all excessive must suggest the fact, which is the case, that it is very low. The distance between Selkirk and Thackery—those are the two points at which the routes diverge and converge—is some 359 miles. I have never myself been over the northern route, but I have, along with the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), been over a very considerable portion of the route south of Lake Manitoba. With regard to that route, I can speak with positiveness. With regard to the other line, I cannot speak of my own knowledge, having only the reports of men well known to me, who worked on and along it, in addition to the ordinary public means of information, which were available to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) and his Government. But I am satisfied that I am in possession of information which justifies me when I say, that out of 350 miles which intervene between Selkirk and Thackery there are on the northern route not over 100 miles suitable for settlement. There are miles upon miles of swamp. At one place the poles of the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph are not on the ground at all; they are erected on platforms on floating moss, and in many places, where the poles have broken from the platforms, they have sunk to the level of the wires. This is not a solitary instance. There are several miles of the road of the same character. A great deal has been said about the Swan River Valley, and hon. gentlemen have been led to believe that the great amount of land there would compensate for the amount of bad land. The Swan River Valley is only some fifteen or twenty miles wide; it extends from the abandoned line northward, and empties into Swan Lake at a distance of forty or fifty miles. This is the only really first-class land on the northern track, if it be first class land.

MR. PLUMB.

While on the southern route, between the same points, Selkirk and Thackery, 359 miles apart, there are probably 300 miles of first class agricultural lands, having throughout the greater portion of that distance a breadth of eighty or a hundred miles. The hon. gentleman stated in the course of his remarks, that in the North-West the general direction of the fertile belt is from south-east to north-west. This statement is of itself true, but in the subject under discussion, it is somewhat calculated to mislead, because, although true in the abstract, if we examine the fertile belt or that portion of it which intervenes between Selkirk and Thackery, we will find that whereas the proposed route by the Narrows is partly in the northern verge of the fertile belt, and in places wholly north of the first-class lands, the route south of Lake Manitoba traverses for nearly its whole length the centre of the best agricultural lands in the North-West. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) also in advocating the superiority of the northern route, took it for granted that the cost of the construction of the northern route would be very much less. Now, I think the hon. gentleman, when he came to this conclusion, was reasoning from data which are altogether insufficient, and which do not at all sustain the conclusion he has come to. The country, as is well known, is very low and marshy, full of swamps—covered for miles with muskegs. We have had some experience in building a railroad in a marshy country. We know something of the difficulties experienced on Section 14. The difficulties were so much greater than was anticipated that the actual expenditure on the work exceeded by nearly 80 per cent., I think, the estimated expenditure. We have from the lips of the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, himself the fact that, in one instance, his engineers failed to ascertain the true depth, or made a miscalculation of the depth, of one of these swamps—instead of being five or six feet, there were seventeen or eighteen feet of moss—and this made a wonderful difference in the expenditure, so that if the construction on the northern route had been proceeded with, we should have had many such swamps—not one muskeg but dozens, perhaps scores of them. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has not presented any argument to justify him in coming to the conclusion as to what the relative expenditure on the northern and the southern routes would be. The position which the hon. gentleman occupies in this country is a very enviable one; his great talents and long experience make it a matter of great difficulty and render me very diffident, extremely diffident, in placing my statements in contradiction to the hon. gentleman's. But I will give hon. gentlemen one test by which to judge of the relative value of the two statements. It is quite well known that settlers going to the North-West look through the country and settle on the best lands. We may assume quite safely that if the great volume of emigration goes in a particular direction, the best lands are in that direction, and with a long link of railway going through it, land of equal fertility will be five times as valuable as it would be at a greater distance. In 1874 and 1875, the Government of the hon. member for Lambton fixed upon the northern route for the construction of the road; they actually constructed the Pacific Railway Telegraph along the northern route. It was manifest that the great Pacific Railway was to go past the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. Now hon. gentlemen can judge for themselves whether, if the quality of the land on the northern route had been as good as south of Lake Manitoba, the great volume of emigration would not have flown to the lands on the northern route. It is, however, a fact, while immigrants have passed by to the south of Lake Manitoba, taking up every valuable piece of land within Manitoba, and swarming across the western boundary, have proceeded 200 miles in advance of railway construction on the southern route. The northern route remains as it was an uncultivated wilderness, an uninhabited dreary waste of swamp. Gentlemen can easily satisfy themselves of the truth of this statement. We all know that wherever a piece of land in the North-West is taken up, whether purchased by script or taken under military warrant, or located as a homestead, a record is kept of it by the Department of the Interior, so that anyone can judge for himself of the relative value of the two routes by enquiring at the office of the Surveyor-General. During the last Parliament I was continually advocating and urging upon the Government the necessity, in the interests of the Dominion, of changing the route; and I was continually met by the argument that I was interested, and that my advocacy was therefore liable to suspicion. I was told that my constituents resided south of Lake Manitoba, that all their property was there, and that therefore my testimony was unreliable. My representations were all received with this reply: "Oh, of course, you are in favour of deflecting the line, because your people are there and their property is there." The same style of argument may, perhaps, be used against me, when I advocate, as I do, a deflection of the line so as to touch the Portage. If this argument avail against myself, it is certainly not admissible in the case of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), who, I believe, does not possess one square foot of land in the North-West, who went up to Manitoba, not for speculation, but merely for the purpose of acquiring more reliable and authentic information relative to the North-West than he could otherwise hope to obtain; and therefore when he urges a deviation from the present line, so as to touch the Portage, I think this House and the country will be disposed to attach a good deal of weight to his arguments. I thank him, and my constituents thank him, for the plea he has entered on their behalf. In relation to this subject, the hon. the Minister of Railways has promised that he will, during the course of the ensuing spring, visit Manitoba. We have every confidence in him and in the Government of which he is such a distinguished member, who have given us such proofs of their desire to be paternal to the new settlers in the North-West, and to be protective to them, no less than to every other class of the community; and I am quite satisfied to let the matter rest in their hands. When he comes up he will be able to judge for himself; and we will be quite satisfied to abide by his decision in relation to the deflection of the line, without pressing our claims any further. I think this debate will be a benefit to the public; it will tend to attract attention to Manitoba and the North-West. The discussion in this House will also tend to conduce to the interests of the Dominion; the Government engineers will be alive to the fact that their conduct is closely watched, and they will be influenced in a great degree. If their conduct is thus subjected to scrutiny in this House, it will have a tendency to make them more careful and energetic. Gentlemen who follow the hon. member for Lambton are in the habit of playing two tunes. They do not speak in the same strain in the West as in the older Provinces. In the Eastern Provinces his followers deprecate the laying out of money in the North-West; they think moneys ought not to be expended in the construction of railroads in the North-West; but when any one of those followers gets out into the prairie Province his utterances are changed; there the hon. gentleman's followers are as great advocates of such expenditure as the followers of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches. After the speech from the hon. gentleman from Lambton we know what we are to expect. He deprecates the construction of the road altogether; he believes that the country is unable to sustain the expenditure. It is well that we in the North-West know that. He owes nothing at all but inactivity. He condemns the energy of the Government in placing these 200 miles west of Winnipeg under construction. The hon. gentleman and his followers have no hope for the country; they do not believe that the country is able to build that road. On the other side, the Government not only offer a vigorous railway policy, but they give us the best guarantee of their intention to carry out that policy by placing 200 miles under construction. I am satisfied that the followers of the hon. member for Lambton in the North-West will read his speech with regret, because I believe when it is fully circulated and understood, there will not be found any in Manitoba to follow that hon. gentleman, with the exception of those so blinded by party prejudice as to prefer the welfare of the party to the welfare of the country. But there will be many who have hitherto honestly and faithfully followed the hon. gentleman who will feel it to be their duty, not only to their Province, but to the Dominion as well, to abandon the party led by him and rally to the support of the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury Benches.

Mr. DAWSON: The House and the country should feel indebted to the hon. member for Glengarry for drawing attention thus early in the Session to the condition of affairs on the Pacific Railway. The hon. the Minister of Railways has defended the management with his wonted ability, and it is quite natural and proper that he should say something in favour of his officers. The late Premier, too, has just said of his former subordinate, the Chief Engineer, that he had distinguished himself as a writer; but it sometimes happens that great authors like great orators are not very good practical men. I have by me an evidence of the Chief Engineer's pre eminent ability as an author, in a paper which is given in his report on the railways, as having been read in England, no less before the Royal Canadian Institute. It is not particularly luminous as to facts, nor in some cases very accurate, but as a literary effort it is truly wonderful, and, as a sort of historical romance, it is a fitting and pleasing accompaniment to the ideal quantities and figures with which the Chief Engineer is in the habit of embellishing his reports. In his work of last year, a work which, to say the least, is of a highly artistic character, the distinguished author permits himself to indulge in a tilt at the railways of Ontario, and of these he says that they have cost nearly $180,000,000, and with characteristic keenness of intellectual vision in unravelling a complicated question, observes that "if they could have been constructed for one-half the cost the other half of this enormous sum, $90,000,000, may be assumed to be a wholly unnecessary outlay." It required a Chief Engineer and an author to discover this startling fact, but having found it out, in order that Ontario and all other countries may learn to avoid such unnecessary outlays in the future, he is prepared with a remedy, to which I shall now draw the attention of hon. members. I have here the Chief Engineer's report of 1878, in which he has laid down what he calls "A comprehensive scheme of Railways," and according to which he says "the Government should control not the location of the trunk lines only, but all lines," and here is a drawing illustrative of his scheme. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that this picture is not exactly like anything hitherto observed in the heavens above or on the earth beneath. In some parts, it looks like a skeleton with the vertebrae clearly visible and in others it has wings extending to the remotest parts of the continent. It has a tail, or something of that sort, pointing eastward to the undefined regions of Labrador, for which latter country there appears not to have been room enough on the map. It is certainly a most wonderful conception, and it may be that it is the full-fledged outgrowth of a former bantling, known as "territorial roads," but it is not the harmless thing that it may, at first sight, be supposed to be, for it represents ten thousand miles of railway; and the scheme, mild and visionary as it is, has been propounded by the man who controls our Pacific Railway. It is not indeed a matter to be laughed at, for the country is at this moment expending millions at the dictum of the Chief Engineer on projects scarcely less visionary than this professedly ideal one of a continental system of railways. The cost of surveys has been frightful, very much greater, comparatively speaking, than that of the railways of Ontario. They have cost four millions, and the Chief Engineer cannot fail to perceive that "if they could have been performed for one-half the cost, this enormous sum of $2,000,000 may be assumed to be a wholly unnecessary outlay." It is needless to say that these surveys could not have been made for a very much less sum than they have cost. The great error from the very outset was in the clumsiness and costliness of the organisation. I have myself seen as many as fifty or sixty men attached to a single surveying party in the woods, and of course it required about as many more to carry in supplies and outfit for them, and all this to accomplish what could have been done, and in former times used to be done, with a party of ten or twelve. These little armies were spread over the continent, and the surveys were continued for years, while the country bled freely for the cost, but what was the result? Why, that no later than last year the Chief Engineer issued a report accompanied by one of those maps so characteristic of the eccentricity of genius all over which were written index figures pointing to the words "nothing reliable known." Four millions of dollars was surely a large sum to pay for mere surveys, which, according to the Chief Engineer's own statement, seem to have resulted very generally in "nothing reliable" becoming known by their means. The Geological Survey has shown what may be accomplished by small parties. By its means a knowledge of vast areas has been obtained at a very moderate outlay, and although such surveys as its very efficient and industrious officers make are not sufficiently precise for the location of a railway nor intended to be so, they nevertheless give a fair idea of the topography of a country and are invaluable as guides in the selection of high-ways, and this is about all that can be said of the Pacific Railway Surveys which have cost vastly more. In speaking of surveys, I have had in view more particularly those which have been made in the country lying between Lake Superior and the prairies. In that section they were most extravagantly managed, and the same individual who had them in charge, notwithstanding the very marked absence of intelligence which characterised his operations then, was entrusted with the laying out and supervision of the works on sections 14 and 15. On the first of which the expenditure has already exceeded the estimates by eighty per cent., while on section 15 his lamentable blundering has occasioned an outlay of a $1,000,000 over the estimate. He has been pouring material which represents, in part, the resources and life-blood of the country into the bottomless pit of Cross Lake, a place which could easily have been avoided. I have just come on one of this gentleman's reports, and shall read an extract which will enable the House to judge of the intelligence which controls the expenditure of millions at Kewadin :

"The Winnipeg River, at the outlet of the Lake of the Woods, where we cross it, is a stream of considerable magnitude, draining an area of about ten thousand square miles, an area which is largely increased below the point where we cross it."

At the time at which the report from which this extract is taken was written, the country had been well mapped out, and any person of ordinary intelligence could have seen that at Rat Portage the Winnipeg carried the drainage of an area of upwards of thirty thousand square miles, but he says that the drainage area, of which he gives an estimate, is largely increased "below" the point at which he crosses it at (the Winnipeg), but how the drainage area below could return to increase the drainage area above he does not explain. His chief would hardly have committed a blunder of this kind, but then he is not like his chief, an author. He cannot vie with him in writing, but he can fully match him in the confusion, worse confounded, which he has brought, and still brings on an enterprise which demands both natural intelligence and educated skill on the part of the employés entrusted with its management. The system is bad, radically bad, and I know of no better remedy than that which I suggested last year, which is that some amendment should be made in the existing law, so as to provide for the appointment of a board of engineers, to whom all reports and matters connected with this vast undertaking could be referred. The cost of a single mile of railway would pay the expense of such a board for years. As matters now stand, the reports of the field engineers are suppressed, unless in harmony with the preconceived notions of the chief, and lines are laid out between given points with but little reference to the character of the intervening country. So that, as in section 15, lakes and swamps have to be filled, and rock ridges cut through, where a little care in the selection of the line and a little deviation from a given course would have saved half the cost. There are able engineers in the service, but their voices cannot be heard. Even the reports and maps of a man of such eminence in his profession as Mr. Marcus Smith, are suppressed; and why should this be so, seeing that the country has a right to the information for which it has paid so dearly. The country would have confidence in the reports of a practical man like Mr. Smith; it has little or none in the costly volume of the great author. The late Premier has just referred to the water stretches between Thunder Bay and the Lake of the Woods. Had he persevered in his first scheme of running the railroad from Thunder Bay to the head of Rainy Lake, at Sturgeon Falls, taking, as a temporary expedient, advantage of the water communication intermediate between that point and the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods, and adopting the line from the latter place to Fort Garry, Section 15 and Section B, which, taken together, will cost $10,000,000, would have been entirely avoided, and the ultimate all-rail line would have been shortened by some thirty or forty miles. Had he, I say, persevered in this wise course, we would long since have been in communication with Manitoba through our own territory; but the influence to which my hon. friend from Glengarry has alluded, as being a power behind the throne, was in operation then as now, and the hon. gentleman's better judgment gave way before it, to the great loss of the country. It is well known that engineers have been traduced and dismissed because they held views in regard to the proper direction of the railway in certain sections different from those of the Chief Engineer, and under such a system how can independent reports be looked for? However earnest Ministers may be in their desire to promote the best interests of the country, in regard to this great national enterprise, and I believe that in the past as in the present, without regard to party lines, they are, and have been, very earnest, their best efforts will be thwarted if they have not the proper machinery to work with. If they are to allow a man of iron will, who would change the whole direction of a railway out of jealousy of a rival, to have his own way, and spend thousands upon thousands of dollars on impracticable crotchets, such as territorial roads, continental schemes of railway, and so forth, all the millions that Finance Ministers can borrow in England, all the resources of the country will fail to carry this great enterprise to a successful conclusion.

MR. McLENNAN: I beg to say a word or two before the motion is put. In the first place I am obliged to my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways, for the courteous manner in which he has treated myself, and the judicious manner of treating the subject that I brought before the House. I did it because I thought that the present was a good time to discuss some features in connection with this undertaking, and that the House would be better prepared for the hon.

Minister's statement when it comes down. I had the belief, and I hope it was not too presumptuous, that some suggestion that I might make myself, or that might be made by some other hon. member of the House, would lead to consideration of the question that might affect that statement in some small measure. I hope so still, and although I do not hold to my opinions without change, I claim the privilege of thinking that this discussion has not been useless. I am aware that in moving as I have done on this question—and it has been called to my mind repeatedly—that I placed myself between two fires. I hope to come out scathless; but with reference to some remarks made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) I have a little to say, and in the first place about an almost personal matter. The hon. member for Lambton rather blames me because I undertook to discuss subjects that became interesting to this House at a time when I was not a member of it. Well, that was my misfortune, and it was my misfortune in common with a great number of the inhabitants of this country. There are only 206 members in this House, and we are all honourable and wise members, 205 besides yourself, Mr. Speaker, who must be the very pink of wisdom, listening as you do, hour by hour and day after day, to all the wisdom of both sides of this House. But all the people outside this House are not asleep during this discussion, and they were not asleep during the time it was my misfortune not to be in this House. If we had all been asleep I think the course of the hon. member for Lambton gave us a rude awakening: in fact we were brought very wide awake by the policy that hon. gentleman pursued. I do not know but I am indebted to him for the fact of being in this House. Like a great many other men in the country, I came to the conclusion that if I and others who agreed with me did not come to this House, we might, perhaps go, as one may say, to the dogs. But having come to this House, I considered it my duty to keep my eyes and ears open. Now I rather blame the hon. member for Lambton, because I am afraid he must have been asleep two days ago when I made my statement to this House. I like to be precise in quoting the words of the hon. member, for Lambton because I have discovered that he is in the habit of never admitting anything and of never retracting anything, of never admitting that he has been mistaken. The hon. gentleman charged me with saying :

“ He rejoiced that the Ministry had placed 200 miles of road in the North-West under contract, and that he had displayed great energy in plunging this country into debt.”

The hon. member for Lambton states that it is of the greatest possible importance to consider the expenditure in this connection, that may, if it is perserved in, lead the country to ruin. Now, if that hon. gentleman had not been in the somnolent condition in which he assumes I was in 1872, 1874 and 1875, he would have discovered that that was the very ground on which I brought forward this motion, because I thought the expenditure in progress ought to be subjected to scrutiny and control in a greater degree than we had seen exercised. In the rapid reference I made to the early history of this undertaking, I mentioned the fact that the policy of the Government which first took up this subject was thwarted by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Lambton controverts this statement. He says they did not oppose that policy. Well, if they assisted that policy, if they desired to see the road built by a subsidy of money and of lands, it must have been during the time that we were all asleep, for that is not the impression which was conveyed to the country. The hon. member further states that when his Government assumed power, it was obliged to take up the work in the condition left by his predecessor, and to keep the promise that he had made to the country. The general impression is that at the time these hon. gentlemen took charge, they adopted a new policy. Instead of a policy to build the road by a subsidy, which, I think, we have all discovered would have been an economical one, they adopted the policy of carrying on the work by a continuous expenditure of public money, and without the measure and without the control which would have existed in carrying out the undertaking as first proposed. He says further, in that connection, that the present Government, upon resuming power, instead of utilising their accomplished work, immediately let extensive additional works by ordinary contracts. Well, if the object of the present Administration was to get into the Lake of the Woods, to get into those water-stretches, into that mud and water of which we have heard so much, they might have utilised the work accomplished by the hon. member for Lambton. I cannot conceive any other place to which that “ accomplished work ” would have led them. Then the hon. gentleman used another term, “ they let additional works by ordinary contracts.” As I am not a contractor, I do not know what an “ ordinary contract ” means, if it has any specific meaning. If the method of contracts which we have been discussing here is an “ ordinary ” one, it seems to be one that leads to very extraordinary expenditure, and it is a method that was inaugurated, as far as I understand, by the hon. gentleman opposite ; and, if it has those faults, I think that is a good reason why his successors should depart from it. One other expression the hon. member for Lambton used was that “ they were committed to a bargain ” to have the survey completed. Well, I do not know what that means. I do not understand what bargain they were committed to for the completion of the road or the survey. As I understand the matter, the bargain to complete the road was made by themselves—a bargain to complete it by 1890. I think this House will absolve the Government from completing any bargain, if there is reason to suppose it will involve the country in ruin. The hon. gentleman referred to the contract for 125 miles in British Columbia, and he had a perfect right to do so ; but I said nothing about that, and will not do so now as I do not wish to prolong the discussion ; I have merely made these remarks to justify myself for bringing the question before the House, and, as I said before, I hope the debate may not be entirely useless.

Motion agreed to.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS
ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 37.]

(Mr. McCarthy.)

SECOND READING.

Bill read the second time.

[BILL 38.]

(Mr. McCarthy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MILLS : I think the Bill is not within our jurisdiction. We have no doubt legislated on the subject before. The Bill refers to the 12th section of the Criminal Procedure Act, and any hon. gentleman who examines it will see that that section does not at all relate to any matter of procedure. It gives a particular Court criminal jurisdiction in certain cases and denies it to the others. It is obvious, that, according to the British North America Act, by passing the Bill, we would interfere with the power of Local Legislatures to constitute Courts. If saying in what Court a particular class of offences may be dealt with is not giving to that Court jurisdiction, I do not know what the word means. I think, when you say it shall be the duty of a Court to try a specified class of offences, or that it shall have power to adjudicate in certain civil matters named, you are dealing not with the question of procedure but with the question of jurisdiction. When the Criminal Procedure Act, which the hon. gentleman undertakes to amend, was before the House, it was almost impossible to obtain a serious discussion on any question relating to jurisdiction. The older members who sat in the old Parliament of Canada, when Parliamentary omnipotence was recognised, were unfitted by their training to consider questions of jurisdiction; and others will remember that, in our first Parliament after federation, they could not be induced to look at such questions. Since then, we have had those subjects before us again and again. They have been before the Courts, and have naturally attracted, to a larger extent, the serious attention of Parliament, and when now we find we have made a mistake on a subject of this kind, instead of perpetuating it, we ought to retrace our steps and get back to a more tenable position. The hon. member's Bill no more deals with the question of procedure than if it named any other class of offences than the one mentioned. Once you admit that this House has the right to interfere with those Courts, there is no point at which you can draw the line. The 92nd section of the British North America Act provides that the Local Legislatures shall have exclusive jurisdiction in the administration of justice, "including the constitution, maintenance and organisation of Provincial Courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those Courts." Although the hon. gentleman does not deal in this Bill with the whole category of crimes, he does deal with two classes of offences, and says that a particular Court shall have jurisdiction over them. This is a measure that the House ought not to pass. I do not contend that his proposition is not a reasonable one, or that the course he recommends would not improve the law. Upon the merits of the Bill I express no opinion. What I do say is that the subject is wholly beyond the purview of Parliament. This House ought not to deal with a subject which is clearly within the province of another legislative body; it ought to respect the Constitution and keep within its powers.

MR. McCARTHY: Before answering the observations of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I ought to mention one matter which I had forgotten. The instance that induced me to bring in this Bill was the trial of a homicide in the city of London, which gentlemen from the West are familiar with. It has been stated that this Bill reflected unfairly and injuriously on the learned Judge before whom the prisoner was tried, and on the officers conducting the prosecution. I ought to state that although my attention was directed to this subject by that trial, I did not intend to pass any opinion in regard to the manner in which it was conducted. I have no reason to suppose that the trial was not conducted properly, or that the learned Judge and the prosecuting officers did not properly conduct it. So far as I know, they did their part as well as it ought and could be done. It is only fair that I should make this explanation, since it has been represented to me that perhaps this legislation was in consequence of a mistrial having taken place before that learned Judge. My reasons for introducing the Bill may be briefly stated. While County Court Judges are limited in their jurisdiction to matters of a trivial amount, not exceeding $400, the Courts of Quarter Session, which are presided over by the same County Court Judges, have almost as great power and wide jurisdiction as the Superior Courts. I think that was not so originally, and that from time to time that jurisdiction has been given them, and it is quite time, wherever the power lies, that that jurisdiction should be taken from them. With regard to the observation of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) on the constitutional question of jurisdiction, that he thought this House had not the power that, by enacting the 12th Section of the Criminal Procedure Law, of 1869, it assumed it had, and that we ought not to go on repeating a wrong which, in his judgment, we had enacted in 1869—I do not think the words he read are quite so clear as he thinks. The 27th sub-section of the 91st clause of the British North America Act does not speak of jurisdiction in words, though very possibly—I do not think necessarily—that may be its meaning. We must look too at Section 92, sub-section 14. Now we must read them together, with this further qualification, that, where the jurisdiction is not exclusively conferred on the Local Legislature, we have it in this Parliament. Certain powers are conferred on the Local Houses, and for the purpose of explanation, these powers are defined in the Act; but where there is any difference between powers, the latter part of the 91st clause of the British North America Act says that the clauses conferring the jurisdiction on the Local Legislatures shall give way, and if there is no clause expressly giving powers to those Local Legislatures, the power lies with this Parliament. The Provincial Legislatures may constitute a Court and frame rules for it, but that may not prevent Parliament here from saying such and such offences shall be tried in it. We have used such jurisdiction without question. No Local Legislature has ever pretended that it has power to regulate the constitution of the Criminal Courts, in the way the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) claims.

MR. MILLS: Certainly.

MR. MCCARTHY: I do not know an instance of it. They have never legislated in that direction. As we, by the Act of 1869, assumed that power, the Local Houses have not questioned it or assumed to legislate in an opposite direction. I do not think we should be the first to assume that we have exercised certain powers unconstitutionally for ten years, as the hon. member for Bothwell imagines. I am not making any innovation or asking the House to enact anything new, but simply amending a power we have hitherto exercised—constitutionally, as I venture to think. When the Bill is in Committee I propose to add one or two other clauses—one suggested by the County Attorney for Oxford, which I think good; it is that perjury, now only triable at the Superior Courts, may be tried at the Quarter Sessions, instead of sometimes keeping the accused six months awaiting trial. A document has been handed me, drawing my attention to the fact that, while an ordinary magistrate's warrant, backed, may be executed in any Province, the rule does not apply to a Bench warrant, which can only be operative within the Province in which the Court issuing it exists. I think we should make a Bench warrant run and be enforceable in any Province in the Dominion.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): The suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has only been mentioned to me since I entered the House this evening. The difficulty is not, I think, removed by the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that we have been doing for ten years what is now objected to. If we were wrong in 1869, certainly continuing in the wrong track for ten years will not help us. Therefore we come back to the simple question raised by the hon. member for Bothwell; whether, under the British North America Act, the Local or this Legislature has the power of indicating what Courts shall be the criminal and what the civil tribunals. Now, I do not think there is any difficulty, either in the section or sub-section relating to this question, in sections 91 and 92. They are both very clear and distinct as I read them. The clause in section 92, with reference to the powers of the Local Legislature is:

It appears to me the solution of the difficulty, if difficulty there be, must be found in the meaning of the word “constitution,” in the 92nd and 93rd clauses of the Act. Does the word “constitution” go the length to which the hon. member for Simcoe must carry it, or bear only the limited construction put upon it by the hon. member for Bothwell? The hon. member for Simcoe says that "constitution" in this case means not only the appointment of the Judges and the creation of the Court, but the determination of the limits of its jurisdiction, and also the procedure therein. In criminal matters it has also the constituting of the Court, but the procedure rests entirely with this Parliament. Does the word "constitution" there so far trench upon the word "procedure" as to limit this Parliament in its power of directing what Court, when formed by the Local Legislature, shall try criminal cases. While entertaining great respect for the opinions of the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mills) and while not prepared to express a strong positive conviction on the question, my own impression is that the word "constitution" bears, and ought to bear, in view of the policy of the law, the construction which the hon. member for Simcoe puts upon it. I express this opinion with some hesitation, the subject having been brought to my attention only this moment. I hope it will be considered the wisest course to let the Bill be read a second time, as before it comes to Committee we shall have an opportunity of considering more fully the subject, with, I hope, the assistance of those minds in the House capable of dealing with the question.

MR. MILLS: I think the word "procedure" is used in the British North America Act upon a well-understood meaning. We use it with reference to certain departments of law with regard to the means in which cases shall be brought before the Criminal Courts. Procedure does not include in any case the question of jurisdiction, which is wholly within the purview of the Local Legislature.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend may not understand me. My idea is that the appointment of Judges, under the authority of Acts passed by the Local Legislatures, constitutes the Court, and that the word "procedure" includes criminal jurisdiction.

MR. MILLS: I cannot understand how any Court can be constituted unless it has a well-defined jurisdiction given it. Recently the Ontario Legislature dealt with this subject. Instead of having several Courts, it proposed to consolidate one Court, and to say it shall be formed into certain divisions similar to those of the High Court or Justice in England. It also proposed to say what class of cases should be tried in such division. Among other things dealt with is the constituting a Court for the trial of crime. It proposed to say in what division of this Court or in what other Court crime shall be tried. If it did not say that, it would not constitute a Criminal Court at all. The very moment we undertake to say that a particular Court shall be vested with the power to try particular classes of offences, we are constituting a Court for that purpose. I disagree with the hon. member for Simcoe when he says there may be powers relating to the constitution of the Courts, or the administration of justice, that are not distributed. I hold that the two sub-sections of the British North America Act, taken together, deal with the whole subject of the administration of justice. The subsequent section which authorises the Parliament of Canada to constitute a general Court of Appeal for Canada, and also such other Courts as may be necessary for the better administration of the laws of Canada, do not divest the Provincial Legislatures of any powers. I do not understand that anyone holds that, if we were to exercise that power and constitute Courts, and give them power to deal with both the Civil and Criminal Law of the Dominion, that that would, in the smallest degree interfere with the original jurisdiction over the affairs of Canada with which the Courts of the Provinces are vested. I will suppose we were to constitute a Court of original jurisdiction, for the trial of criminal offences and the administration of the laws of the Dominion; that would not, in the slightest degree, under the provisions of this Act, take away from the Local Legislatures the power given them by the 14th sub-section of the 92nd section, they still would have power to try criminal offences, and administer the laws of Canada in those Courts as Courts of original jurisdiction. We could not prevent their exercising that power by the provisions of any law we might pass; much less can we do so by attempting to alter the constitution of a Provincial Court as is proposed by this Bill. Procedure, therefore, has wholly to do with the means in which particular offences or offenders shall be brought before the Court, and with the pleading, practice and law of evidence. My objection to this Bill is that it deals, not with procedure, but with the constitution of the Criminal Courts.

Bill read the second time, on a division.

THE LATE ACCIDENT TO THE VICE-REGAL PARTY.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

“LORNE.

“The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons his reply to the Joint Address of the Senate and the House of Commons, expressing their sympathy on hearing of the accident which befel himself and Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, when on their way to the Senate Chamber.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 5th March, 1880.

“Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

“I much regret that the Princess is unable to receive with me in person the Joint Address you do me the honour to present to me to-day.

“The concern you express for the injuries she lately received when on her way to the Senate Chamber, the sympathy shown on hearing of the accident, and the satisfaction expressed on learning that the evil results are now fast disappearing, give to us a token of your kindness which has been deeply felt by her.

“During the time she has been in Canada, she has received from the people of this country constant marks of their chivalrous and generous affection. She bids me tell you, what I know to be the simple truth, that she is very sensible of these, and feels herself happy in having come here, and in being the occasion of the manifestation of the love of a loyal and united people for the Queen and the Empire.

“It will be her pride, while in Canada, to devote herself to the interests of the people, who have before them so great a future, and in whose hearts it will be her earnest wish to find an abiding place.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the whole House, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 24) To incorporate the Dominion Commercial Travellers' Association.—(Mr. Gault)

Bill (No. 27) To incorporate the Baptist Union of Canada.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

WEST INDIES.—STEAM COMMUNICATION.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to subsidise a line of steamers from St. John, N.B., to Panama, touching at the West Indies.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The subject of subsidising a line of steamers from the Dominion is under the consideration of the Government.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. DECOSMOS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure this Session to enable it to issue Life Insurance Policies; if so, what is the nature of it?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not the intention of the Government to introduce such a measure this Session.

KENT, N.B.—COGAGNE PUBLIC WHARF.

QUESTION.

MR. GIROUARD (Kent) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause a survey and examination to be made during the ensuing summer at the port of Cocagne, Kent County, N.B., to meet the views expressed in a petition from a large number of residents of that locality, praying for the construction of a public wharf at that place.

MR. LANGEVIN: It is the intention of the Government to cause an examination to be made the ensuing summer.

SHELburne, N.S.—CAPE NEGRO ISLAND HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any appropriation for the improvement of beach and protection of harbour at Cape Negro Island, Shelburne County, during the present year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not the intention of the Government.

SHELburne HARBOUR, NOVA SCOTIA.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect a fog whistle at the entrance to Shelburne Harbour, Nova Scotia, during the present year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not the intention of the Government.

RICHMOND, N.S.—FOURCHÉ HARBOUR FOG-BELL.

QUESTION.

MR. FLYNN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a fog-bell at the entrance to Fourché Harbour, in the county of Richmond, this year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not the intention of the Government.

CEDARS CANAL.

QUESTION.

MR. MONGENAIIS enquired, Whether any decision has been taken by the Government with regard to the building of the Cedars Canal, on the north side of the St. Lawrence, in the counties of Soulanges and Vaudeuil.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No decision has yet been arrived at in regard to that question.

RAILWAY STATIONS IN MONTMAGNY.

QUESTION.

MR. LANDRY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be erected, next spring, railway stations at St. François Rivière du Sud, St. Michel, St. Jean Chrysostome, Etchemin, St. Pierre Rivière du Sud, and Cap St. Ignace, and to repair the station at St. Thomas.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It is the intention of the Government to erect new railway stations at St. François Rivière du Sud, St. Pierre Rivière du Sud, and to repair the stations at Cap St. Ignace, and St. Thomas.

NAVIGATION BETWEEN LONDON AND CHATHAM, ONTARIO.

QUESTION.

MR. STEPHENSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps, during the present year, with the ultimate end in view of improving and facilitating the navigation of the river Thames, between the town of Chatham and the city of London.

MR. LANGEVIN: It is not possible to take any steps just now to improve and facilitate the navigation of the Thames.

between the town of Chatham and the city of London, because we have no data to go on; but it is our intention to have an examination of that river made next season.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—BRANCH AT LÉVIS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANDRY, in moving for an Address for a copy of the report of the survey made in 1879, by order of the Government, preliminary to the construction of a branch of the Intercolonial Railway to connect St. Michel or St. Charles with St. Joseph de Lévis, and all the documents, petitions, etc., relating to this matter, said: Not only the municipalities situated between the two points specified in my motion, but also a large number of other municipalities on the line of the Intercolonial, or adjoining the parishes crossed by that Railway, have raised their voices, and through their Municipal Councils have called upon the Government to construct the branch from St. Charles to Lévis. The Quebec Board of Trade and that of Lévis were not behindhand, and upon a question within their purview, for this is a matter of trade and commerce, they affirmed, without any hesitation, all the importance of the proposed branch, its undoubted utility, I may say its commercial necessity. The Government ordered a survey, and called for a report on the proposed line, thereby recognising all the importance to be attached to the various petitions which have been addressed to it. The survey was made, the report is now before the hon. the Minister of Railways. My motion calls for the production of that report, but I hope at the same time to draw the favourable attention of the Government to this question, and to obtain, if possible, from the hon. the Minister of Railways, such a declaration as may cause us not only to hope, but to be assured that this branch of the Intercolonial Railway will be built. Its length will not be great; the distance from Lévis to St. Charles by the proposed line is twelve miles. Starting from Lévis, at the point where the ship-yards now are, it will run eastward along the river, tending to the right at St. Joseph Village which it will cross near the convent, and skirting Indian Cove, will tend to the right after leaving it, following an east-south-easterly course to connect with the Intercolonial Railway near St. Charles station. I have just stated that the distance from that station to Lévis is twelve miles. With the Intercolonial Railway, as it is now, the terminus being two miles above the proposed terminus, the distance from St. Charles to Lévis is twenty-three miles, and would amount to twenty-five miles to reach the point where the St. Charles Branch would terminate at deep water. There is therefore a difference in favour of the proposed line of thirteen miles, an enormous amount in a distance of twenty-five miles. This is one of the advantages which should induce the Government to adopt the proposed line. It is not the only one. Doubtless it is pleasant for travellers to save thirteen miles out of twenty-five, but what is pleasant for travellers is a matter of necessity for trade, and the moment that branch is built, traffic will, as a matter of course, infallibly take that route. And it is the special interest of the Government that it should be so. In the more or less remote future, the North Shore Railway, we must at any rate hope, will become one of the roads necessary to the Pacific Railway now being built by the Government of the country, and the Government on its part, I am sure, in the interest not only of the Province of Quebec but of the whole country, will make it a duty to acquire the North Shore Railway. Now, from the moment that the North Shore Railway becomes a continuation of the Pacific Railway, there will only be the St. Lawrence to be crossed to connect the Pacific and Intercolonial Railway, and realise in its entirety the immense line which, traversing the whole of the vast possessions of Great Britain in North America, will connect the Atlantic and the Pacific. If we look only to the present, not raising a corner of the veil which hides the future from us, without reckoning its promises, I admit that the proposed branch would not at once assume all the importance with which time must necessarily endow it. But, when the Government shall have acquired the North Shore Railway, the whole traffic of the West, utilising this line, because it is nearly ninety miles shorter than the present Grand Trunk line, will go to Quebec, will cross over to Lévis by means of ferry vessels, such as are now in use in the United States, and finding in the proposed line that which commerce invariably prefers, because it is the shortest, will utilise the latter and prove in the plainest manner the correctness of our foresight and the justice of our most legitimate hopes. Is there an objection to the cost of the undertaking? Such an objection cannot stand for a moment before the requirements and the interests of trade. And, further, what Government, convinced of the legitimate nature of our claims would refuse to expend in that part of our Province, for an object of public interest, a sum of $200,000—and the outlay on the proposed undertaking will not reach that amount,—while millions are yearly expended in the extreme West for the construction of the Pacific Railway and the improvement of our system of Canals? The interests of our Province, those of the Maritime Provinces, those of the whole Dominion—for the greater interests of trade cannot but be those of the country—all combine to show the Government that our request is a reasonable one, that it is deserving of their consideration, and that they must grant it if they are desirous of doing justice to those who come to this House to defend and promote the interests of the county which they represent.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The importance of the work to which the hon. gentleman has referred has not escaped the attention of the Government, and a survey was ordered in order to show what difficulties would be encountered, what the character of the grades would be, and to make an estimate of the cost. I shall have great pleasure in bringing down the result of the survey with the plan, so that the hon. gentleman may have an opportunity of seeing exactly the position of the question. It will receive the attention of the Government, but it is impossible for me to say at this moment what decision will be arrived at. The hon. gentleman say it will cost $200,000, and that as so much money is being spent in other places he thinks that might also be provided. But it would naturally suggest itself to the mind of the hon. gentleman, that the more money the Government is compelled to spend in other places, the less is the ability of the Government to furnish the requisite $200,000 for this work. There is no doubt that the line would be shortened and a great convenience would be secured by its construction.

MR. ANGERS: I may be permitted to add a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), since I find the Government have not yet made up their minds as to the period at which the direction of the Intercolonial Railway at St. Charles is to be made, so as to bring it in a direct line to the harbour of Quebec, at a place called Indian Cove. I can give no better reasons for the immediate construction of this work than those given last year by the hon. the Minister of Railways, to induce the House to make the purchase of that portion of the Grand Trunk comprised between the Chaudière and Rivière du Loup. He then stated that, under the Act of 1867, the Intercolonial should connect Halifax with the waters of the St. Lawrence, and that consequently it was necessary that this portion of the Grand Trunk should be purchased and directed from St. Charles to Indian Cove, a distance of about ten miles. The Rivière du Loup Branch has been purchased, but the direction of the ten miles of road is yet to be made. It is most important that it should be; it will shorten the distance between St. Charles station and the harbour of Quebec by some thirteen miles; moreover, by connecting with the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental, it will make the total distance from Halifax to Ottawa 926 miles, whilst by the Grand Trunk route it is now 1,010 miles. The result of this connection over the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental would make Halifax some eighty-four miles nearer to Ottawa. Referring to the grades on the ten miles of road to be built to bring the Intercolonial in a direct line to the harbour of Quebec, they are stated to be eighty feet for three-fourths of a mile, and sixty-six feet for three miles, the remainder of it being light. These grades can easily be reduced, and perhaps entirely avoided, by running the road on the river side of the St. Lawrence as far as St. Michel, and from there to St. Charles. By this means the road would be run over a flat country, the right of way would not be expensive, the beach of the St. Lawrence below Indian Cove being the property of the Province of Quebec; and upon private property would not cost more than $30 to $40 per acre. It was stated that the bulk of trade came over the Grand Trunk from the west, and that there was no urgency for the change.

Motion agreed to.

LEEDS AND GRENVILLE COUNTY JUDGESHIP.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. BLAKE, in moving for an Address for correspondence on the subject of the County Court Judgeship and Junior Judgeship of Leeds and Grenville; and for a statement in detail of the amount of judicial work transacted by the County Court Judge and Junior Judge, in each year, for the last twelve years, said: It may perhaps be within the recollection of some members of the House that, four years ago, an enquiry was made by the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government, as to the intention of the Administration with regard to the vacancy created by the demise of the Senior Judge of Leeds and Grenville. It was then my duty to reply that, the Administration, having made such enquiry as they could, and having received from the Junior Judge a statement that he was perfectly adequate to the discharge of the whole work, it was not thought to be in the public interest to make a second appointment. Indeed I may observe that the old law rendered it often a great temptation to those charged with such duties to create second Judgeships, because there was then no provision for a retiring allowance to a County Court Judge. The consequence was that the Executive was placed in a painful position when a Judge became incapable of discharging his duties, and there were no means of supplying the people with the needed judicial power. I am sorry to say it was too often decided to supply the want by a second appointment. Of such appointments was the original appointment of a Junior Judge of Leeds and Grenville. That difficulty was removed during the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton, by a measure providing for retiring allowances to County Court Judges, and from that time out it was the policy of that Administration not to make any second appointments where age and infirmity rendered it impossible for the existing Judge to discharge the duties of his office; such applications were met by a reference to the Act. We considered that there was no reason for burdening the finances of the country with a second appointment to fill the vacant Judgeship in Leeds and Grenville, and I am not aware that there has been any special increase of judicial work in those counties, or that there has been any serious change in the labours and responsibilities of the Judge since the time the sole incumbent of the office reported that he was thoroughly competent to discharge the whole duties. Rumours have been for some time in circulation to the effect that it is intended at no long date to create or fill a Junior Judgeship in Leeds and Grenville. I have recently received communications from respectable inhabitants of that district, saying that it was reported on good authority and with great circumstantiality, not merely that the position would be filled but that a particular individual had been assigned to the place. Therefore I thought it right to move for correspondence, and also to ask for a statement in detail of the judicial work in each year since Confederation, in order that the House may ascertain whether there exists to-day any substantial reason for the appointment of this Judge that did not exist formerly, or whether the real reason is that the Judge is to be appointed by a different party from that which would have made the appointment in 1876.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): There can be no objection whatever to the motion of the hon. member passing. The rumours to which the hon. gentleman refers are entirely unfounded. The Government have made no promise, have made no appointment, nor have they made any selection whatever to fill the place to which the hon. gentleman refers.

MR. MACKENZIE: Would the hon. gentleman make the same statement with regard to the similar rumours with reference to the counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): I would have no objection to say that no such appointment has been made in the county of Glengarry.

MR. MACKENZIE: Oh.

MR. McDONALD: I can go further, and say that no promise has been made to any person. So far as I know, the Judge for Glengarry has no intention of resigning. I was incidentally shown a letter from him the other day, in which he declared it to be his intention not to resign.

MR. MACKENZIE: I was quite aware of that, but what I wished to know was whether the current rumours had any foundation. The hon. gentleman said the rumour with reference to Leeds and Grenville had no foundation.

MR. McDONALD: I can give the same answer to the hon. gentleman as I gave to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): The hon. the Minister of Justice's answer to the hon. member for West Durham is satisfactory as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. It has been stated in the public press that a certain gentleman expects to get the appointment of Judge in the counties of Leeds and Grenville. The hon. gentleman does not deny that rumour, and, of course, we must take it for granted that there is something in it if he does not deny it in explicit words. I regret that the hon. gentleman who has made this motion has not gone further, and asked for information in regard to the judicial work done in the various counties throughout Ontario. The return in that form would have afforded valuable information to members of the House who have taken an interest in this matter. I believe that the whole system upon which County Court Judges are dealt with is a bad and vicious system, and the quicker the Government remedy it, the better. This especially refers to the system upon which they are paid, a system which has nothing to recommend it which has some uniformity but no justice or propriety. For instance, a County Court Judge, who has to administer justice to 100,000 persons, whose time is constantly employed and whose labours are enormous, gets precisely the same pay under the law the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government introduced in 1873, as a County Judge administering justice to a county comprising 10,000, 15,000 or 20,000 persons. The one man has ten times as much work to do as the other, as the returns submitted to the House some time ago show, and yet both Judges get precisely the same pay. Take, for instance, the county of Bruce. By the census of 1871, the population of that county was shown to be about 50,000. Now, I apprehend, the population of that county must border well on to 100,000, and yet one Judge administers justice in that county as County Court Judge, at an outlay to the Dominion of $2,600, and so with the county of Leeds and Grenville. The present judge, when he was Junior Judge of these counties, said he did not want another Judge appointed because he was adequate to the whole work himself. In 1871 there was a population in the county of 57,918. I suppose now it has largely increased and yet he discharges the whole of the judicial business of the county for a salary of $2,000 and $200 for travelling expenses. The county of Wentworth, having within it the large city of Hamilton, and containing a population of some 100,000, has only one County Court Judge; there is no Junior Judge. The Judge of that county overtakes, satisfactorily the enormous judicial work pertaining to his office for an outlay to the Dominion of $2,200 a year. In fact this system of appointment and the principle on which these Judges are remunerated is vicious and ought not to continue. In addition, as a general rule, the salaries are altogether too low; if you expect first-class talent you must pay for it, and this you cannot expect to get for the salaries paid; they have in many cases enormous duties to perform, and should be paid in proportion to the work done. Some of these Judges, especially the Junior Judges, accepted office in the expectation of getting their salaries increased; but they have not been increased. Upon what principle does the Government appoint these Judges, and on which principle does the Government pay them? On none that can be justified to the House, and on none that can be understood by anyone. There is certainly more work in the more populous counties than in the less populous ones, and the true principle is to base the salaries on a sliding scale, and pay in proportion to the amount of judicial work in every county. Take the county of Ontario for example, with a population of 45,890. That has a County Court Judge, with a salary of $2,800; he was appointed under the old law; by that law the Governor in Council fixed the salaries on a sliding scale, according to the amount of work to be done, and ranging from $1,800 to $2,800. This Judge, fortunately for him, was appointed under the old law, and draws his salary of $2,800. Besides this Judge at a salary of $2,800 there is in the county of Ontario a Junior Judge at a salary of $2,200—making $5,000 altogether for the administration of justice in that county with a population of only 45,890. Then again take the county of Wentworth with the double population, and with four or five times as much work to do as is done in the county of Ontario, and yet there is only one County Court Judge with a salary amounting to less than half of what is paid in the county of Ontario. Again the county of Grey has a population of about 90,000; the judicial work of that county is done for $2,000, while, in the county of Waterloo, with a population of forty odd thousand it costs $5,000 to do the work. A careful examination of the position occupied by these Judges, the mode of their appointment and the system of remuneration, will show anyone that the system is bad and vicious, and that both parties, both the present Government and the previous one, are to blame for not adopting a more equitable system. The Junior Judge's salary is a fixed, unalterable one. He has no increase, nothing to look forward to, no hope to rise—nothing to stimulate his ambition. That of the Senior Judges may be increased, but that of the Junior Judge never. In 1873, when the law was changed, the sliding scale abandoned and the present cast-iron rule adopted, the hon. the present leader of the Government said that it was the intention of the Government that the Junior Judges in the Provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick should get $2,000 to begin with, and it was the intention of the Government to increase the salaries from $2,000 to $2,400 after three years' service; but, although the hon. gentleman was the author of that Bill and made some appointments under that Bill, and on the understanding that such increase should take place, he has not made these increases although the propriety of doing so has been pressed on him. Upon the occasion of passing that Bill several hon. members, including the hon. member for

West Durham (Mr. Blake), pointed out the viciousness of the system then being entered upon; he strongly pronounced in favour of the system then prevailing, that of a sliding scale, and contended that that was the true principle on which to remunerate these Judges, namely, in proportion to the amount of work to be done, but the hon. gentleman opposite carried his Bill notwithstanding these protests. Several applications have been made by these Junior Judges for the promised increase of salaries after the expiration of the first three years of their service, but these applications have been refused; and of course these men, who abandoned their professions on the assurance of the First Minister, have been deceived and disappointed. The Government hold that they are not bound to pay more than $2,000 a year, as the Act is now construed to apply only to Judges and not to Junior Judges of the County Court. If the Government desire to get first-class men to occupy these important positions—and they are important positions—they cannot expect to do so for a salary of $2,000 a year for the first three years, with an increase of only $400 after the expiration of the three years. Take for instance the county of York; it would be impossible to find first-class men who would do the whole of the judicial work of that county for $2,000 a year. The work is heavy and is constantly increasing. There has been hardly a Session of this Parliament or that of Ontario, since Confederation, that some new duties and some additional work has not been imposed on the County Court Judges. I object to the system which gives a Judge, administering justice to a small population—in some cases as small as 20,000 inhabitants—and having less than one-fourth of his time occupied in the discharge of his official duties the same way as the Judges of the counties of Bruce or Grey or Wentworth, who have an enormous amount of work to do, and whose time is necessarily all occupied in the discharge of their duties—I object to the system as a bad and absurd one, and I hope the hon. the Minister of Justice will see his way, before next Session of Parliament, to make such modification of the present system of paying these Judges as will do justice to all the Judges. In fact, the best thing we can do is to retrace the steps of the Government and go back to the old system, adopt the sliding scale and fix the remuneration according to the amount of work that the Judges have to perform. That is the true course, and the one that should never have been departed from.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think that the hon. gentleman might well have left this matter in the hands of the hon. mover of the resolution. He has wandered away from the subject of the motion. The hon. gentleman says that the question has not been answered in reference to rumours, which he says have been broadcast, and that, because the Government have not denied them, they are, therefore, true. That is a new idea as to the responsibility of the Government, that they should be responsible for every rumour that floats, whether private or public. When the hon. the Minister of Justice stated that there was no appointment, and no promise or selection of any person for any office, I do not know if there could be any more distinct statement.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): But what is the intention of the Government?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. member for South Huron asks what is the intention of the Government? Their intention is that, whenever it is proved to them that—in the language of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake)—the work in any given county has so increased that an average Judge, with good physical health, cannot perform it, then a Junior Judge, under the Act, will be appointed. I remember quite well the conversation that took place in the House when the question arose as to the county of Leeds and Grenville, and the Judge, Mr. McDonald, who then held the Judgeship of that county, and who does still, stated that he was quite able to perform the duties. I have no reason to think that he has become incapable since. It is quite true that the Bar in the counties of Leeds and Grenville and Glengarry have made strong remonstrances, and represented that the Judges could not perform their duties, and contended that it was necessary, in the interests of the public, to appoint Junior Judges; but I can only assure the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) that these are not the only counties from which remonstrances have come. The hon. gentleman says that the mode of paying the Judges is absurd. I do not know whether he is attacking the present Government or the late Government, but, if the mode is absurd, it is quite clear that the late Government have been guilty of the same absurdity. The hon. gentleman says that some statement was made with reference to increasing the salaries of Junior Judges after three years; but, even if this promise was made, it so happens that before those three years had passed we were out and they were in, and, while we were ex cathedra, they continued the matter as it was left. My hon. friends opposite must therefore smart under the strong castigation given to us both by the hon. member for South Huron. I cannot understand the line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman. He says that with good salaries first-class men can be got, and none but first-class men should be chosen. But it is necessary that we should have first-class men for small counties as well as for large counties. They all hold the same rank, and they are all bound to give all their time, whether for large or small counties; and I think there ought not to be a disparity in the pay of the Judges. A Judge can do no more than give up his time to his judicial duties. It would be a misfortune, under the hon. gentleman's mode of paying, for a first-class Judge to get a small county. Or, if the first-class men, on account of the difference in the rate of pay, would not take the small counties, then the large counties would have superior men, and the small ones inferior men. The small counties would not have such good Judges as the large counties. There would not be such good justice to be obtained in the small counties as in the large ones. Now, it is just as important in small counties as in large counties to have a Judge of first-class ability. A person who brings a suit in a small county has the same right to have the service of a good Judge as a person bringing a suit in a large county. If the Judges are to be men of first-class ability, as the hon. gentleman contends, then they must be first-class for all the counties, big or little. If that be the conclusion of the House—and it seems to me to be common sense—then the complaint is that the salaries of the Judges of the counties are insufficient. If the hon. gentleman thinks so, he is bound in the interest of the Judges to press for an increase. Speaking of Ontario, you can get men of high standing in the profession—perhaps not of that particular excellence from which you choose Judges of the Superior Court, or Judges of the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal—but you can get for the present salaries good working County Judges, although the salaries are much less than the salaries of the Superior Court Judges. I think, with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the hon. leader of the Opposition, that, whenever a vacancy occurred there was no lack of applications by gentlemen who held respectable positions in the profession. It is a general rule with local leaders of the profession, gentlemen of respectable standing, gentlemen having good practices, to apply for those appointments. Of course, I take it that a man in good practice, whether he goes to the Superior Court Bench or the County Court, will not equal pecuniarily his practice as a professional man. Professional men who look for judicial appointments are men of experience, men of some age, men willing to retire from the active everyday worry and fatigue of professional life, who have, by a successful practice, accumulated some means, and desire to retire to a dignified position as a Judge, although their emolument will be less than the average amount of their professional earnings. Nowhere in England or here will the country submit to pay salaries equal to the highest amount that the best ability will gain for a professional man. I think, when the rule was laid down, at the time the subject was discussed, when the Bill which the hon. member for South Huron declares was absurd was passed, the question was how to average the incomes in a given locality so as to secure sufficient talent to perform the judicial duties; and the great difficulty that arose was from there being no retiring allowance; in consequence, Junior Judgeships were invented for doing the work of the Senior Judges, who could not be turned out to starve, after becoming, from ill-health or physical weakness, incapable to perform their duties. The late Government, in a praiseworthy spirit, attempted to cure that by providing a retiring allowance. But that does not induce them to retire. They are just about as willing to retire on two-thirds of the salary as they were on nothing, and I do not see how you are to get rid of the difficulty unless you allow them to retire on full allowance. There are continual complaints of Judges, who, through ill health or physical weakness, have become incapable of performing their duties. There is a little anomaly arising from this fact, that, while we have the power of appointing, the power of removal does not rest with the Dominion Government but with the Local Government. I am personally aware that there are continual complaints made at this moment that Judges hold office and draw salaries who are incapable of performing the duties. We have no means of preventing that. We cannot remove a Judge, and consequently the responsibility of any Judge lingering on the Bench, who should retire, does not rest with the Dominion Government. There can, of course, be no objection to the production of those papers. I am glad the hon. gentleman has moved for them, and I am glad the discussion has arisen, because it will give full notice to the Bar in the different sections of the Province that other considerations than the mere convenience of the Bar must govern this question; that having two Judges in any given locality must and will govern this House in appointing Junior Judges and fixing the salaries.

MR. FITZSIMMONS: Just before the late Government went out of power, a very strong pressure was brought to bear upon them to appoint those Judges. I believe in the views expressed by the hon. the leader of the Government on this question. I think the Judge for the combined counties of Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Macdonald) is a very capable one. He is respected, not only as a judge, but as a gentleman, and I have no hesitation in saying that his appointment has given general satisfaction. With regard to the appointment of Junior Judges, I may say that the Government have been approached by a large number of persons connected with the united counties of Leeds and Grenville, asking for such an appointment, but, so far as I know, they have resisted, on the ground that such an appointment was unnecessary. I am not prepared to say whether it is necessary or not, but I know that Mr. Macdonald has performed his duties with zeal and given general satisfaction.

MR. HESSON: I desire to make a few comments on this matter. It is true, as the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) has remarked, that there are large counties in Ontario where the Judges have very heavy work to do. I can refer to the county in which I live (North Perth), where the Judge has a population of 60,000 to 70,000 to adjudicate for. The Bar are complaining that judgments are not rendered as rapidly as they ought to be in the interests of the public, and we cannot blame the Judge, because he is overtaxed with work. He has been many years on the Bench, and has had very little or no relaxation, and I think it would be in the interest of the public if a Junior Judge were appointed. Even if the salary were small, there are good men practising at the Bar who would be glad to take such positions, even with the salaries now attached. I have applied to the hon. the Minister of Justice, and pressed him in regard to this matter, but without result. It is not alone from the county of Leeds and Grenville, or from Glengarry, that these complaints come, but from many other counties in the Province. I think that the Judge of the county of Perth, who has grown old in the service, requires some assistance; and the hon. the Minister of Justice would do well to consider such demands from counties where the population and territory is large, and where Judges have given a long series of years to the Public Service.

MR. BLAKE: The observations just made no doubt present a fair sample of the arguments used in favour of the appointment of Junior Judges. A man has been a long time on the Bench. He has got tired of work. It is true that he has not laboured hard, but still if he is tired he should have a holiday. In order that he should have one, he is not to be placed on a retiring allowance, but is to receive full pay, while another man is to be paid to do his work. The gentleman, however, who is said to have been overworked in one instance has suâ sponte been discharging the office of Master in Chancery for his county, as well as that of Judge. If he cannot discharge the official duties for which he is paid a salary and those of the Master in Chancery as well, he had better resign one of those positions. I wish to say that I am wholly satisfied with the answer the hon. the First Minister made to the observations I addressed to the House. That of the hon. the Minister of Justice was not quite so full, but the general statement of the hon. the First Minister of the principle on which the Government propose to act is satisfactory. I will hope that the virtuous resolutions thus proclaimed in this House may never under any pressure be departed from in the privacy of the Council Chamber. But I cannot agree with all we have heard. I cannot agree with the statement that the retiring allowance has not done good. It is true that not many Judges have accepted it, but still some have. But it has done good in rendering it plain to the Judge and the public that there is another alternative to that which was formerly the only one—the appointment of a Junior Judge. It is easy to say to the Judges: If you are unable to do the work, we are now in a position to retire you and you have no longer any claims of compassion on us. You are enabled to point out to suitors, who complain that a Judge cannot do his work, that their proper course is to present that fact to the Judge, and if necessary to the local authorities, with a view to his retirement. I should be very sorry to agree in the proposition that County Court Judges, after twenty years' service, should be retired on full pay. What we did, and what is now the law, is calculated to remedy the evil, and it only requires that the Administration, when approached with a request for the appointment of an additional Judge, should firmly hold their hand if the real ground for such appointment is that the existing Judge has become too infirm to discharge his duties. Nor can I agree with the statement that the salaries are based on a proper footing. I do not like the old law, which arranged the salaries on a sliding scale, on no principle except at the discretion of the Executive; but I do not think it was right to equalise all salaries on the principle which now obtains. I agree with the hon. gentleman opposite that there ought to be a proper amount of judicial talent in the Judge of the smallest county. It is often the case, however, that light work will be taken by able men at light pay, and to say that there should be the same degree of pay in all counties is practically to put the largest and most important counties to a disadvantage, because no man can doubt that those considerations which will influence an able practitioner to accept the dignified position of County Court Judge at a small remuneration are largely connected with the ease of the position. I have a paper before me showing the amount of work in different counties, which shows that there are counties which are infinitely more eligible in that point of view than other counties. In the county of Wentworth the work is actually double that which it is in some other counties. A tolerably accurate mode of determining what the relative scale of compensation should be would be found in the population of the district. But that would be subject to correction in the case of large urban populations, where there would be a larger relative amount of work than the total population of town and county would show. But after such a correction, for which the judicial statistics would indicate a basis, I think a scale of that description could be formed. The other difficulties are more serious. If we only had to deal with the Province of Ontario we could obtain a just plan, which would not largely add to the burdens of the Treasury, and would assist in producing a good result, namely, the supplying of fit men for these places. But, when you begin to deal with the County Court Judges in Ontario, you must deal with them elsewhere, and also with those of certain Superior Courts, and that is a still more difficult subject to dispose of satisfactorily. With regard to the suggestion that there is no difficulty in finding men at the county Bar to fill the place, my opinion is that it would be better to take men from other counties. One weak point in the system is that the County Court Judge resides in a single locality, and he discharges his duty amongst a comparatively narrow circle, before the same people and before the same clients. He is human and must be subjected to human influences, and at any rate he is suspected sometimes of favouring the suitors and practitioners with whom he is best acquainted. That is a difficulty which we cannot get rid of, but it is an argument against appointing the Judge from among the practitioners of the county.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not speak on that subject.

MR. BLAKE: The right hon. gentleman said that there were numerous applications from the Bar of the county asking that they might be made Judges of the locality. I am pointing out that as far as possible those should be disregarded. I think that, as a rule, we should fill the office from some other county by a man who has abilities to commend himself to the people of the locality as a man fit to administer justice. Such was the principle on which, so far as practicable, I acted in filling these places, and I believe with good results.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: My remark was applicable altogether as to the ability of getting professional men of sufficient standing to accept the present salary. The question whether it is preferable to send a stranger rather than a member of the local Bar, is a different question, and one to which I did not allude. There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman said about the expediency of sending a stranger without any local prejudices.

MR. BERGIN: So far as the United Counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glen-garry are concerned, I may say, on the part of my brother representatives from these counties, that we do not desire the appointment of a Junior Judge, but we do desire some arrangement by which the present Judge may be superannuated, who, we all regret to say, is physically incapable of performing the duties. We believe that one Judge, if he is capable, industrious, sincerely desirous of doing his duty, and in good health, is quite sufficient, but, if he be like our present Judge, broken down in health, and like the gentleman spoken of by the hon. member for North Perth, performing in addition the duties of Master in Chancery, either he must retire or assistance be provided for him. And I quite agree with the hon. member for West Durham that no County Judge should fill the office of Master in Chancery, but, as the Judges of the Chancery Court have of late years insisted upon appointing the County Court Judges to this position, since attention has been called to the evil, it is to be hoped they will avoid such appointments in the future. Thus far I agree with the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) as to these Judges, but, when he says it is undesirable that gentlemen should be appointed from within the counties, then I take issue with him. It is very desirable that County Judges should have an intimate personal knowledge of the county, and possess the esteem and respect of the people. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that a Judge appointed from without a county can, in these respects, be at all compared with the member of a local Bar, thoroughly known to the people as an upright, honest man, whose moral character is unimpeachable, and whose word is never gainsayed? Such a one will command universal confidence, but it will be a long time before one from another county, no matter what his attainments or character, will be so regarded. The arguments of the hon. gentleman are specious, but not more specious than unsound. The only one worth attention at all is the one that members of the local Bar, if appointed, will be under local influences. The hon. gentleman forgets that the new man will speedily form new associations, and, if not a very strong man, will be more under the influence of his new friends, and more likely to fall into the hands of cliques than a member of a local Bar. Moreover, in a Judge there must be public confidence from the moment of his appointment; and, as a rule, no one but a member of the local Bar can commend this. This is our opinion at all events, and we have urged it and shall continue to urge it upon the Government, whom we look to to find some solution of the difficulty in our counties. The present Judge, who is much respected, an able man and possessing the confidence of the people, is in such a state of health that it is quite impossible for him to perform the duties, and he refuses to resign, for the reason that his retiring allowance, together with his fees as Master, would be quite insufficient for his support. Cannot some means be devised to give to him an adequate annual pension?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The subject of the appointment of County Court Judges is one that deeply affects the interests of the people. The administration of justice in the County and Division Courts comes home to every man in the Province with particular interest. I agree with the opinion of the hon. member for West Durham that the system of paying those Judges by a uniform salary, or too small a salary, is not calculated to get the best men for the counties and cities, where the work is heavy. I cannot admit that the administration of justice in the large cities does not require a man of more energy, experience, and ability than the rural places where the duties are very light; and a Judge disposing of hundreds of cases to the tens disposed of by others should be paid somewhat in proportion. There is another reason, moreover, very material for such a change, the greater expense of living in the cities and large towns. It is not seemly and does not raise the Judge in the estimation of the people, that he should be unable to live within his salary, or avoid, as is sometimes the case the calls of bailiffs and sheriff's officers. Such a state of things ought to be enquired into, and, if it be found that living in the cities is too expensive to enable these Judges to uphold the dignity of their office, their salaries ought to be increased. Besides, in the cities they have to dispense justice in the Insolvent Courts, in cases involving thousands of dollars, and large amounts of property. In the Province of Quebec, the Judges discharging similar duties to those of the Ontario County Court Judges, receive salaries ranging from $3,500 to $6,000. Quebec has twenty-six Superior Court Judges, receiving $3,500 to $6,000, whereas the thirty-seven County Court Judges in Ontario are paid only $2,000 to $2,400. I do not think the difference is due to the fact of the Ontario Judges having lighter duties to discharge or less important business, or being men of less ability and experience. I see no reason for this inequality. I think the hon. the Minister of Justice should look into this matter, and especially the claims of the Judges in the cities of Ontario, whose work is so important and remuneration so inadequate. They have multifarious duties to attend to, that Judges in rural districts are exempt from. I trust that the remark of the hon. member for West Durham, which has been practically endorsed by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, that the Judges ought, if possible, to be taken from other places, will be acted upon. The suggestion is excellent, and ought to be carried out. It does not seem wise or judicious that persons often engaged in a county as active partisans or politicians should be set to administer justice therein. The practice introduced by the late Government of appointing Judges from other places is most salutary.

MR. BOULTBEE: The effect of this legislation will be a diversion of perhaps more than half the County Court business into the Division Court. It seems to me to be very unfair to take away half the work, say of a man receiving $3,000 to $4,000 a year, and impose it on one receiving only $2,000, who would thus be charged with the chief burden of the work. The Junior Judges would thus be doing two-thirds of the work for small salaries. In the county of York, for instance, it is questionable whether the Junior Judge would be able to do the work that would thus be thrown on him. Even if his salary were increased, it would seem improper to treble or quadruple his expenses by this change. At present, the Junior Judges who hold the Division Courts are enabled to fix a Court at one place one day and at another the next, and so on, making a sort of circuit. With the amount of extra work that would be thrown on them with the increase of their jurisdiction, they would be no longer able to take that cause, but be obliged to fix a day for the holding of the Court, and to go and hold the Court by itself, thereby largely increasing their expenses. It would not be fair to impose those fresh expenses on those Judges, who are not well paid at present. Though you may get men of average capacity now to take those judgeships, they may not be acceptable if, in addition to the extra duties, you impose an expenditure of $100 to $200 on them for travelling expenses. Unless the matter is dealt with in some practical common-sense way, those Judges will necessarily hurry the business of the Division Court to such an extent as to prevent its proper discharge. A large portion of the business of the country is done in the Division Court, and we must concede it is done in far too hurried a manner. With this change the probabilities are it will be done in a much more hurried and inefficient manner, and it would be but right to make some such arrangement for the better remuneration of those Judges as should secure, not only increased efficiency perhaps, but as great expedition as hitherto.

SENATE EXPENSES.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. MILLS moved for an Order of the House for statement showing the amount paid Senators as an indemnity, the amount paid to the officers of the Senate, the amount paid to messengers of the Senate, the amount paid for printing by the Senate, and the amount paid for all other expenses connected with Senate, for each Session since the 1st of July, 1867.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to explain the object of his motion?

MR. MILLS: I think the object of the motion is plain on its face. The expenses of the Senate, especially the contingent expenses, have been large, and it would be interesting to know how they have arisen, and it would also be interesting to the public generally to know the cost of the maintenance of the second Chamber.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The first Chamber.

MR. MILLS: Another Chamber than this. Hon. gentlemen will see that the position the Senate occupies with regard to expenditure is an anomalous one. In England, since 1870, the expenditure of the House of Lords has been subject to exactly the same supervision as that of any other Department of the State. A return is made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Committee of Public Accounts examine into the expenditure of the House of Lords, the same as into all other outlays. That is not the case in Canada. A Bill was passed here regulating the financial affairs of this House, under which a Committee of Ministers has been appointed to assist the Speaker in the management of expenditure. That is supervised by a body which the Senate is a party in creating. This Act does not apply to the Senate, however. While the expenditure of this House that, constitutionally, has the control and provision of the means for the conduct of the Government, is not absolutely under its control, but under that of a Committee, constituted by the action of Parliament, to which the Senate is a party, there is, from year to year, an expenditure going on in the other Chamber, subject to no supervision or control, and which, I am told, has not been audited or supervised for many years past. I do not think that is a desirable state of things. It is very important we should see exactly what the Senate's expenditure is, and how far the Auditor-General, who has been appointed under the authority of an Act of Parliament, is efficiently supervising this expenditure, as well as that of all the other Public Departments. My impression is the returns will show that the expenditure of the other Chamber has not been as economical as that of this House.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Senate asking their Honours for the information required in the above statement.—(Mr. Mills).

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.—BREWERY AT BATTLEFORD.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. FISET, in moving for an address for copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Territory, or any other person, in relation to the establishment of a brewery at Battleford, in the said Territory, said: My reason for making this motion is that one of my friends who resides in the North-West, applied to the Government, through me, with a view to obtain a license to manufacture beer at Battleford. The Government thereupon referred the question to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West, and, on receiving his reply, informed me that they could not grant such license. Now, I should like to know the reasons given by the Lieutenant-Governor which have rendered it impossible for the Government to grant my request. I feel sure the House will have no objection to allow this motion to pass.

MAIL CONTRACT BETWEEN VICTORIA AND SAN FRANCISCO.

RESOLUTION NEGATIVED.

MR. BUNSTER moved:

That it is desirable that the contract for carrying the mails between Victoria and San Francisco be awarded to British or Canadian vessels, whose headquarters shall be at Victoria.

MR. MILLS.

He said: We are labouring under a great disadvantage in British Columbia from having the mails to San Francisco carried by American vessels. I am credibly informed the masters of these vessels are paid by our American cousins to run down and decry British Columbia and Canadian territory, and yet some of them receive as high as $54,000 of Dominion money. The captains ask passengers where they are going, and if they say they are going to British Columbia, the response on the part of the captain is: "You are a fool; you might as well throw away your money as to go to British Columbia. Why not go to Washington Territory or to Oregon?" That is the way the American companies talk when they are receiving our money for carrying the mails and making Victoria and Nanaimo way-ports. Now, I leave it to the good sense of this House if it is fair that we should encourage foreigners to carry our mails and our passengers. In the first place, their vessels are very unsafe, and they will not allow Canadian Inspectors to inspect them. Only a few years since, 316 of the people of Victoria were lost on one of these same American unseaworthy ships. The vessel in question, the Pacific, had been bought by the company for $30,000, her original price having been $500,000, but, so old and rotten was she, that while on the route between Victoria and San Francisco, when struck by a sailing vessel she immediately went down with all on board, with the exception of one passenger and one of the crew. One of the directors of the previous company which had owned her, when asked why he had disposed of her for so large a figure, exclaimed that he would not take a passage in her for $30,000, and the result proved his wisdom and foresight. He not only saved his money but his life as well. I think the Government should take into consideration the advisability of putting a Dominion steamer on this service, for I am sure that there are a great many people on this side of the continent that want to visit our shores, but will not do so unless they can travel in seaworthy vessels. I would suggest to the Government that it should buy a boat for this service, or award the contract to a boat stationed at Victoria. When the last contract was let, I tried frequently, but unsuccessfully, to obtain it for a British steamer. A good vessel would soon pay for herself in carrying freight and passengers, besides inspiring the travelling community with greater confidence by travelling on a British ship.

MR. O'CONNOR: I quite agree with my hon. friend's remarks, that it is desirable preference should be given to British vessels for this service, but, in the present instance, I fear that is not practicable, according to the terms of the motion. The motion says the contract should be awarded to British or Canadian vessels whose headquarters shall be at Victoria. Now, I suppose what the hon. gentleman means is that the contract shall be awarded to owners of ships whose headquarters is at Victoria. I am not aware of any person or company at Victoria having vessels of that kind. I know that my hon. friend claims that the Hudson's Bay Company have vessels which answer the description, and, if they have, they are the only persons, so that the passage of this motion would be equivalent to giving the contract for carrying the mails to the Hudson's Bay Company, without competition, and at their own price. As we cannot accede to that proposition, we are under the necessity of opposing the hon. gentleman's resolution. I would suggest that he withdraw it, as he has doubtless secured one purpose in speaking to the resolution.

MR. BUNSTER: That is a very easy way of getting rid of the motion, to ask me to withdraw it. I did not make it for the purpose of withdrawing it. I brought it forward in the interests of the entire Dominion as well as in the interests of British Columbia. I quite understand why the hon. the Postmaster-General does not know that we have in that Province vessels suitable for carrying the mails, for he has never yet visited our Province. If he would inquire of Mr. Dewe, the General Post Office Inspector, who has been to British Columbia, he would find that there are British companies there who have suitable vessels, and who are wise enough to put on good and safe vessels. We have been living in hope that this would be done when the Pacific Railway was built, and we have waited year after year for that consummation, which yet seems as far off as ever. If I cannot get the support of this House for my motion, I suppose I shall have to bow with submission to the will of the Government. But five years is a long time to bow, and, if the contract is not awarded to a British vessel, at least the Government ought to have some consideration for the safety of British subjects who have to travel in unseaworthy ships. The Government should see that they are properly inspected. The owners of these vessels bring American inspectors down into the cabin and treat them to a champagne lunch. "Oh," say the owners, "these vessels are good enough to carry Britishers if they are not for Americans," and so the inspectors pass the vessels. I speak feelingly on this matter, because we have lost so many of our citizens by their boats. It is not right for the Postmaster-General to ask me to withdraw this motion. In my opinion it is his duty to give it his serious consideration. I am sure that every man in the Province will endorse my remarks on this subject.

MR. DECOSMOS: As far as the resolution goes, I am entirely in favour of it, but the matter has stood over so long that it will do no good to pass such a resolution at the present moment. The award has been given at a very low rate to the owners of foreign steamers. I think the mistake made in this matter was in allowing foreign steamship owners to tender for carrying these mails. But, as they have been allowed to tender, I think we should accept the situation for the present.

MR. MILLS: The Government is very inconsistent in opposing this motion. In the Tariff, the Government has laid down the principle of protection to home industries, and that great injuries would result from making our country a slaughter market. If the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches are right in the financial views they have expressed, I do not see why the same principle should not apply to the matter now before the House. It is perfectly obvious that, if there are no vessels at the present time, if the protection is only sufficient and the amount offered high enough, persons will be induced to engage in shipbuilding, and furnish the necessary vessels for the route. Besides that, many persons will receive employment, and those gentlemen have an opportunity of getting rid of the charge of being "flies on the wheel." Only let them exclude American competition, and say that none but British, or better still, Canadian, ship-owners shall be at liberty to receive contracts from the Canadian Government—and it would be very unpatriotic for hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches to take any other view of the subject—many persons will be induced to engage in this business, people who are out of employment will get employment, and the poor man will receive an honest day's wages for an honest day's work. Why should the hon. gentleman withdraw his motion, and why should the hon. the Postmaster-General retire from the position he has taken with his party on the principle of protection to home industry? Let them be consistent and apply their principles to this particular branch of Canadian industry; let them awaken a hum on the Pacific coast.

MR. BARNARD: I trust that in this matter the Government is acting consistently with the National Policy. It has stated its policy is to protect Canadians from a slaughter market. Unfortunately for us, we have had our slaughter market or the shores of the Pacific, when that terrible accident occurred, by which nearly three hundred persons were slaughtered in an old American vessel. Perhaps the hon. member for Bothwell wants a repetition of that kind of slaughter business. The object of the motion, I take it, was to draw the attention of the Government to the necessity of getting a better class of ships into the service. I believe, if the contract was awarded to British ships, we should have a better service. Steamers belonging to Americans on that coast, running north from San Francisco, are of a very inferior character indeed, and I think that any effort in the direction of subsidising safe vessels for the people of British Columbia to travel in should meet with approval.

MR. BUNSTER: After the remarks of the last speaker, I will ask that the motion stand. I hope that the hon. the Postmaster-General will see that we have good vessels for that service in future. If the hon. the Prime Minister could visit our Province, he will meet with a reception that will make him feel proud. With the consent of the House I will ask that this motion should stand for further consideration.

Motion negated on a division.

FREIGHT RATES FROM THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. SNOWBALL moved for an Order of the House for statement showing the rates charged on freight from all principal points from Chicago and eastward to all points in the Maritime Provinces, to which freight is billed through; showing the different rates charged during the year, from 1st of January, 1879, to 1st of January, 1880; also, the rate charged for fish from all points in the Maritime Provinces to Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Detroit, Chicago, Boston, New York and Philadelphia.

MR. MASSON: We can only give what information we possess.

MR. SNOWBALL: There has been a great deal of complaint lately that the rates of freight are in excess of what they have previously been since the Intercolonial was opened. There must be some reason for this, and I desire to ascertain what that reason is. Another complaint is that goods are carried at through rates for less than the rates to intermediate stations. There is nothing asked for in the motion that the Government is not capable of doing.

MR. MASSON: Whatever information can be given will be given.

Motion agreed to.

SHELburne HARBOUR, N.S., FOG WHISTLE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in moving for an Order of the House for copies of correspondence and petitions asking for the erection of a fog-whistle at the entrance to Shelburne Harbour, Nova Scotia, said: I enquired of the Government to-day if it was their intention to make any provision for this work during the coming year, and was told it was not their intention. I may say in this connection that some two years ago petitions were forwarded to the Marine and Fisheries Department, signed by the representatives of the various insurance companies, in the Maritime Provinces and by the shipowners of Halifax, Yarmouth and St. John asking for the erection of a fog-whistle at the entrance of Shelburne Harbour. It is one of the most important harbours on the coast, and within the past few years it has become one of the principal ports of call in Nova Scotia. In 1878, over 100,000 tons of shipping went to that port alone, because it was easy of access, and had telegraphic communication with all parts of the world. There is another reason why this matter should receive attention at the hands of the Government. Prior to the last election, the present Minister of Railways and Canals visited Shelburne, and gave to the people pledges in this direction. I think it would be well for him to carry out the pledges he made upon that occasion, and if he did he would perform a great public service. I hope, if the Government have not made provision for this expenditure in the Estimates this year, that next year they will be able to do something in that particular.

Motion agreed to.

PELEE ISLAND MAIL SERVICE—MR. WRIGHT.

MOTION FOR CONTRACT.

MR. OLIVER, in moving for an Order of the House for a copy of the contract entered into between the Government and Mr. Wright, during the year 1879, for the carrying of the mail between Kingsville, in the county of Essex, and Pelee Island; also, all correspondence between the Postmaster-General, or the officers of the Post Office Department, and Mr. Wright, with reference to said service, said: Before putting this motion, I would like to make one or two remarks with reference to the subject. It appears that, by an advertisement inserted in one of the local papers, tenders were asked for, to be received on or before the 18th April last. On 13th April last, Mr. Wright sent in a tender to carry the mails for six months, commencing on 1st May and ending 1st November, for $287. On 24th April he received an answer from the Department, informing him that the tender was accepted by the Government. On the 28th April, the Postmaster at Kingsville received a communication from the London office with papers to be filled up by Mr. Wright for the performance of said service, and there is a note attached to the said communication which I will read. It runs as follows:—

“Mr. Wright is of Colchester. He is to be at Kingsville, Thursday, when I hope also to be at Kingsville to meet him. If not, have contract handed him to get signed.”

Well, Sir, on the 17th May, he received an answer from the Department at London, in the following words:—

“I am quite as disappointed as you can be—but I am not yet advised from Ottawa who the postmaster is to be—and it is of no use whatever my commencing the business until I know who is to be postmaster.

“The delay is not here—and I wrote to postmaster, Kingsville, and desired him to explain this to you.

“So soon as I receive instructions, I will attend to the matter—until I do I must perforce wait.”

On the 19th June, Mr. Wright wrote the Post Office Inspector at London again, to the following effect:—

“Herewith you will please receive the contracts filled up and signed for the Pelee Island mail. I would have sent them before this, but fully expected to have seen you personally or to have heard from you. Have you as yet heard from Ottawa who the postmaster is to be? I am told Mr. Arthur McCormack will be appointed. I have been ready and waiting, expecting every day to get orders to take the mail over to the Island.”

On the 21st June he received the following reply:—

“I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th inst., with contracts for Kingsville and Pelee Island service enclosed. I regret to say that I have not received any nomination to the postmastership at Pelee Island yet, but will notify you when it is necessary to be ready for conveyance of the mail.”

On the 18th August, Mr. Wright received a very strange letter from the Post Office Department in London, in which he was asked to perform the service for September and October for one-third of the full amount of the tender, that time being one-third of the time covered by the contract. He answered, refusing to perform the service for the two months on those terms. He said he would not perform the service for the worst two months of the half year for the same rate as for the whole six months; and, upon the 4th of November, he wrote stating that the contract had expired. He wrote to the Post Office Inspector at London as follows:—

"My contract for the Kingsville and Pelee Island mail having expired on the 1st November, instant, you will please send me $287, being the amount due me under said contract."

Upon this he received the following communication, endorsed upon the last-mentioned letter:—

"The contract never was accepted or entered upon or signed by the Postmaster-General. I must therefore refer you to him at Ottawa."

On the 13th November, Mr. Wright wrote to the Postmaster-General at Ottawa the following letter:—

"I entered into a contract for the conveyance of the mail between Kingsville and Pelee Island, in Lake Erie, from the 1st of May to the 1st of November, 1879, and was fully prepared to carry it out. On the 4th of November, instant, I wrote to the Post Office Inspector at London—a copy of which communication I herewith enclose. The letter was returned to me, with a memorandum endorsed thereon, referring me to the Postmaster-General at Ottawa.

"I now beg leave to submit my claim to your consideration, as I feel that I ought to be remunerated for my loss of time and expenses, as I made every arrangement necessary, and as my tender was accepted and contracts duly executed with sureties, I was prevented entering into any other engagement.

"I therefore claim that I am fully entitled to the amount of my contract."

To this letter he received a general acknowledgement, and upon the 6th December he received the following letter from the Department:—

"With further reference to your letter of the 15th ultimo, in which you claim payment for the conveyance of mails between Kingsville and Pelee Island, during the summer season of 1879, I am directed by the Postmaster-General to request that you will be so good as to state what the work was which you performed under your contract, and for which you claim to be paid."

He answered the Postmaster-General by setting forth his claim as given in the previous letter, to which he had received no reply, and upon the 6th of February he wrote again to the present Postmaster-General, as follows:—

"Will you allow me to call your attention to a mail contract I tendered for and entered into last summer for the conveyance of the mail to Point au Pelee Island. I wrote to the Inspector at London for my pay, and was by him referred to Ottawa. On the 11th of December, 1879, I wrote to the then Postmaster-General at Ottawa, but up to the present have had no reply. On that date I wrote claiming that, notwithstanding the non-performance of the work, I am entitled to be paid the amount of my contract, for it was not my fault, but the apparent neglect of the Department, that the service was not performed; and as my tender was accepted and contract signed with sureties I was compelled to prepare for the service, and paid out money and involved myself to do so; besides, as it was a matter to which I would have had to give my personal attention, I have in consequence lost a whole summer's employment, for you will see my contract was not cancelled or my bonds released, and I was kept in waiting and suspense during the whole time. I trouble you with this letter since it appears I cannot get any answer from the Department, and I feel sure you will do me the favour to look the matter up."

To this letter he never received an answer. Now, Sir, the question I wish to submit is this: Mr. Wright tendered for this service in good faith. His tender was accepted. He got bondsmen who were accepted. The tender was never cancelled, the bonds were never released; and in consequence of that engagement he lost his summer's employment. I therefore submit to the Postmaster-General that he is fully entitled to his pay; and I hope, and make no doubt, that the present Postmaster-General will state that he has looked into this matter, and that the Department is willing to pay the man for his services.

MR. O'CONNOR: I was not the Postmaster-General when this affair took place, and I can only speak from the information I have obtained from the Department in the regular way. It seems that tenders were called for before 1st May last, for the carrying of the mails from Kingsville to Pelee Island, that Mr. Wright's was the lowest tender and that his tender was accepted. At that time it was supposed that the post-office on the island would be established by 1st May, but it turned out that the post-office was not ready until 1st September following. In the meantime, Mr. Wright was not called upon to perform any service under the tender accepted. It had been in the meantime suggested to the Postmaster-General that the service could be more efficiently and conveniently performed from a place called Leamington than from Kingsville; and, having come to the conclusion that that was the proper place from which to carry on the service over to Pelee Island, an offer was made to Mr. Wright to carry the mail from Leamington instead of Kingsville. He, however, declined to do so, and the Postmaster-General, in the interest of the public service, gave the contract to other parties.

Of course, whether Mr. Wright is entitled to any compensation or not is another question, and one which, while I retain the position I have, I am quite ready to entertain and consider, but I think he is rather unreasonable in preparing a bill for the whole season's service without having performed it, and when he might have performed it with very little inconvenience. It made little difference whether he conveyed it from Kingsville or Leamington. But he refused the alternative and stuck to the bonds which he gave, and now he thinks he can obtain the whole season's price for service he never performed. I think that might be fairly resisted. However, I see no reason why the motion should not pass, and the papers be brought down, and the whole matter enquired into.

Motion agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILWAY TELEGRAPH.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DREW moved for an Order of the House for a return giving all correspondence respecting the non-efficiency of the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph; for all correspondence with the contractors in reference to the working of the line, and for a statement showing the moneys paid for the construction of each section; 2nd. The amount still claimed as due to the contractors, and all correspondence relating thereto; 3rd. The details of the amount, if any, which have been deducted from the subsidies payable to the contractors in consequence of the frequent stoppage of the line.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If I remember aright, a large portion of the correspondence connected with the Canadian Pacific Telegraph, moved for near the close of last Session, has already been brought down. I have no objection at all to bringing down the correspondence supplementary to that, with the exception of the report referred to by Mr. Compton; and I do not think it is consistent with the public interest to lay that on the Table at the present moment. Mr. Barnard's contract was cancelled by the Government, and an investigation was taken under oath in relation to it. Mr. Compton was sent out to British Columbia for the purpose of taking the testimony to be obtained there under the provision of the law, to enable the Government to get sworn testimony in relation to matters of that kind. That testimony has been referred by me to the Department of Justice, and under those circumstances I do not think it would be proper at this moment to lay that report on the Table. I have no objection to the rest of the motion, but I would like the hon. gentleman to strike out that portion which asks for Mr. Compton's report.

MR. DREW: I have no objection.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONISATION PAMPHLETS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. TROW moved for an Order of the House for a statement in detail of all books, pamphlets or papers already issued or contracted for, as Immigration Papers, by the Department of Agriculture and of the Interior, or any other Department, on Immigration and Colonisation, since the 1st day of January, 1875, giving the name of the person by whom the book, pamphlet or paper was written or compiled, by whom published and where; the number of copies ordered, the number delivered, and the amounts paid, or agreed to be paid, and the amount, if any, advanced on account of orders not yet delivered; the returns to be accompanied with a copy of each such book, pamphlet or paper, and that all correspondence in reference to such printing to be brought down.

MR. POPE (Compton): It would be very difficult for us to furnish copies of pamphlets yet to be printed. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by that.

MR. TROW: I mean only those that are contracted for and yet to be printed.

MR. POPE (Compton): The hon. gentleman asks that a copy of each pamphlet be furnished. How can we furnish a copy of a pamphlet that is not yet printed.

MR. MACKENZIE: It could be copied, even if it is not yet printed.

MR. TROW: Surely the hon. gentleman must have examined them, or he certainly would not have those pamphlets contracted for.

MR. POPE: The motion asks that we furnish the House with a copy of all pamphlets printed and ordered to be printed. We may order a pamphlet to be printed, or allow some one to get up a pamphlet without seeing it at all, but not permit it to be printed unless it is suitable. That is very often done. We cannot furnish a copy of any such book as that.

MR. TROW : That is just the information I want to get. I want to know if there is any looseness about the Department. I want to know whether the hon. gentleman authorises parties to prepare pamphlets and engages to print 20,000 or 30,000 without knowing that they contain reliable information.

MR. POPE: The hon. member has not made out his case at all. If a person comes to me and asks if he may get up a pamphlet, I say "yes." I will take the pamphlet if it suits me after it is prepared. The hon. gentleman wants me to furnish a copy of a pamphlet like that. Suppose I have not seen it?

MR. ANGLIN : Does the hon. gentleman buy a pig in a poke in that fashion?

MR. JONES : My hon. friend does not say he buys a pig in a poke. He says, when a pamphlet suits him, he will take it. Perhaps the hon. member (Mr. Trow) would like to have a copy of the pamphlets to be printed next year.

MR. CASEY : The hon. Minister certainly stated that perhaps he might order somebody to write a pamphlet for the Department without seeing it. That certainly means that he gives a commission to write the pamphlet and undertakes to publish it. This is probably what my hon. friend (Mr. Trow) is trying to get at. It is certainly an extraordinary admission for a Minister to make, that he would give somebody a commission to write a pamphlet and undertake to buy it without knowing what it is. But, if he means they will take the pamphlet after he sees it, that slightly alters the complexion of the matter, but not very much. No one will write a pamphlet and submit it to inspection without having received a hint that it was pretty sure to be accepted.

MR. POPE: I think anybody that publishes a book expects to sell it. It it suits, people may promise to take a certain number of copies. Am I then to bring down a pamphlet before it is published or I obtain a copy myself. This motion, if passed, would make me buy all pamphlets for all time to come, before the House, whether it was convenient or suitable or not.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant): Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Agriculture would tell whether he has given permission to anyone to try his hand at writing a pamphlet, and how much he is giving for it.

MR. BOULTBEE: I think it would be rather hard to press for the particulars in this case. For we all know we have a number of very ambitious, clever young men, who think they know a great deal, and though they may not resort to public speaking, think they should be writing something frequently. It would be very hard if the young, rising intellect of this kind should be crushed out by harsh and economical Ministers, who refused to look at such lucubrations. It would be very hard if the House should return such writings, and add them to the number of rejected addresses. It is very much better to let them produce what they can, and let the Minister get it printed. Why cover a man with shame, who has been trying to do something for his country and has simply failed?

MR. TROW : I merely ask for a return of the pamphlets contracted for by the Department of Agriculture; the amounts paid and promised, and the number of copies of such pamphlets.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : It is impossible to pass the motion in its present form. The mover asks for a statement, in detail, of all the books, pamphlets, etc., issued or to be issued. It would be quite possible to give a statement in detail of all the books, pamphlets and papers issued, ordered or contracted for; and I would suggest the amendment of the motion in that sense. I am a little surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite argue that it would be monstrous for the Government to engage to promote the publication of a work not already written. That is constantly done—not by the Government, but by the public, which subscribes and pledges itself to take certain works before they are written or published. Gentlemen do this often, because confident of the character and capacity of the authors and publishers. So, in the same way, if a gentleman offered to publish a work which the Government believed, from his knowledge and character; would be of great value to the public, and which would not be published without Government aid, there would be nothing inconsistent in its undertaking to promote its publication by pledging itself to the purchase of a certain number of copies. Yet I am not aware of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture having made any such arrangement.

MR. MILLS: If the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has been doing business in this way we are anxious to know it; and there should be no objection to pass this motion. If the Government have been doing business with ambitious literary young men, and contributing liberally towards the financial success of their efforts, we should know it. When private individuals subscribe for works in advance, it is out of their own pockets; but Ministers subscribe with the public money, not touching their own salaries for the purpose, and, if the Ministers were employing men to write immigration pamphlets containing emigration advertisements, the people whose money is taken should know it.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I will illustrate my meaning by supposing that a gentleman like the mover of this resolution were to approach the Government with the statement that, after spending two or three months visiting a very important section of the country, which it was very desirable in its interests to bring prominently before the public, he was prepared to publish a pamphlet upon it, resembling the one he has published; in such a case I should favourably entertain the proposal of a gentleman who had established his claim so thoroughly to the attention of the public, and should approve of a certain amount of expenditure for that purpose.

MR. MASSON: If the Government had made a mistake in purchasing a pamphlet, before knowing its contents, it would be but following the example of the House itself, as the Library Committee ordered in advance 400 copies of a book that was to be published by Mr. Todd, our able Librarian.

MR. POPE: I hope the hon. gentleman will amend his motion, in the first place by not asking me to bring down what I have not got, and, in the second place, by asking for all the pamphlets, etc., published since 1875.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I think we have a good precedent for the Government acting in the manner they have done. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) will bear me out in saying that a Government in Ontario engaged a certain hon. gentleman in this House to write a book for them, and decided to pay him for it before knowing what its contents might be. I am sure the Dominion Government could not have been far wrong in paying a much smaller sum for a pamphlet in advance of a knowledge of its contents.

MR. TROW: No pamphlet, book, or paper of any kind or description that is not reliable should be circulated to encourage emigration. I have heard that the Government pamphlet advertises lands in Nebraska, Dakota and other parts of the United States, and, if so, it was not the place of this Government to encourage the circulation of such works. Government ought not to help to issue or circulate any publication without having been thoroughly examined and revised by the Secretary of the Department, and the contents should treat exclusively of our own country.

MR. BLAKE: The case to which the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) refers was a case in which a gentleman was employed to compile information with reference to a question affecting the interests of the public. The cases to which allusion has been made in this discussion, or some of them, are cases in which works were prepared by persons not employed by Government, on the most conspicuous parts of which are advertisements of United States lands. I believe that 5,000 copies of one of those works have been purchased by the Government for distribution, with a view to promote immigration to the North-West Territories. This book contains flaming advertisements of lands in the Western States. It does not appear to be a judicious thing for the Government to circulate that kind of pamphlet.

MR. POPE: The hon. member for West Durham has not made much of that remark. I might go through every word of a pamphlet, and, as was the case in this instance, know nothing of what the publisher was going to advertise on the cover. The hon. gentleman opposite might do the same thing.

MR. BLAKE: I would not pay the publishers for their distribution, with such advertisements in them.

MR. POPE: I do not suppose he would. No money has been paid for it; and perhaps I would not either.

MR. BLAKE: If you had known enough.

MR. POPE: The hon. gentleman is the seat of all knowledge, and when I want to learn anything, I have only to cross the floor to him. I repeat there might be advertisements put at the end of the pamphlets of which we could know nothing, not having seen them. I saw the pamphlets published by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) on the North-West, through which he travelled, and for which publication he may have pocketed public money. It no doubt contained great information, but people disposed to find fault might have quarrelled with it, perhaps, in some respects. It should have been shown to the hon. member for West Durham, who is a man of judgment in all things; his ipse dixit would be taken—nobody else knows enough.

MR. TROW: I understood the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to say I pocketed public money for my pamphlet on Manitoba. I defy the hon. gentleman to prove that I ever pocketed one cent, but on the contrary spent $2,000 of my own money travelling in the North-West, purposely to gather reliable information to encourage immigration. I challenge the hon. gentleman to prove I received a cent from anybody.

MR. POPE: Amend your motion to include 1875, and we shall see whether you did or not.

MR. TROW: I do not object to amend my motion as suggested by the hon. the Minister of Railways. If the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) desires to prove I pocketed public money, he can amend the motion as he pleases. I now pledge myself that I will give to the poor of this city $2,000, if the hon. Minister can prove that I ever received or asked to receive one cent; further, I would not have taken it had it been offered me.

MR. POPE: The hon. gentleman need not put up the money. I will take his word for it.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MR. BLAKE.

MAILS BETWEEN LONDON AND EVELYN POST OFFICES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. OLIVER, in moving for an Order of the House for a return of copies of all correspondence between the Postmaster-General, or the officers of the Post Office Department, and Mr. John Burns, of West Nissouri, relative to the carrying of the mail between Evelyn post-office and the city of London, said: I would like to state to the Postmaster-General my reasons for making this motion. It appears that a tender was asked for by the Department for carrying the mails between Evelyn and the city of London, twice a week, and that Mr. Burns tendered for it. He received an answer to his tender on the 24th of December, 1879, stating that his tender, being the lowest, was accepted. He was to get $115 a year for carrying the mail between these two points. He received, a day or two after, a letter from the postmaster of Evelyn, asking him to come to the post-office and sign the papers in connection with the service, but before that date he received a notice from the London office, dated the 2nd January, which was as follows:—

"I beg to advise you that the Postmaster-General has been pleased to cancel the acceptance of your tender for the Evelyn and London mail service, and to leave matters as they are for the present"

I will not trouble the House by reading a copy of the letter sent by Mr. Burns to the Postmaster-General, asking for some explanation with reference to the cancellation of his tender, and to which letter he never received an answer. I know Mr. Burns personally. He is a man of high character; he was in the service some seven years previous to that time as postmaster and carrier of the mail, and discharged his duties, according to the general testimony of the neighbourhood, to the satisfaction of the public and the Department. What I want to know is why this tender was cancelled. Of course, the present Postmaster-General was not Postmaster-General at that time, but he must, nevertheless, be able to state to the House the reason for the cancellation of this tender. I know that Mr. Burns is an active and pronounced Reformer. I am sure that my hon. friend from London (Mr. Carling) or East Middlesex (Mr. Macmillan) will endorse the statement I have made with respect to his political leanings. I want to know whether politics had anything to do with the cancellation of his contract. We have heard it stated time and again in this House that no discharges were made in consequence of political leanings, but, from what I know of this transaction, I believe the cancellation was made simply because Mr. Burns was a Reformer, and not because he was unable to perform the services required of him. Now, if this course is to be pursued, it is better for the Government to announce in the Canada Gazette, or through the public press of the country, that it is unnecessary for any Reformer to apply for any service under the control of the Government. That would relieve the Reformers of the trouble and annoyance of tendering for a service of this kind and having their contracts cancelled. I am confident the Postmaster-General will be able to state if my view of this matter is a correct one or not.

MR. O'CONNOR: It is quite evident the hon. gentleman had prepared a speech for the occasion, in order the better to make out a grievance. I am quite unable at present to satisfy the hon. gentleman's demand. I cannot say at present why it is the contract was not carried out. All I can now say is that the matter is under enquiry by the Inspector of the district, and, until his report is made, I am not able to give any answer whatever. In the meantime, I must oppose the motion of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver).

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he refuses to produce a copy of these papers?

MR. O'CONNOR: I mean to say that, until the Inspector, who is now enquiring into the matter, and has all the papers before him, reports, it is impossible for me to answer the motion.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Inspector's report cannot alter the papers; he may deliver an opinion on the subject, and I can only say that, if the Government refuses to give copies of these papers, they will show that they are not able to defend their action in this matter. This is the first time in the history of this House that such papers have been refused.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I understand the hon. the Postmaster-General to say that the correspondence is incomplete, and he proposes to have it completed before it is brought down. I do not see any difficulty in allowing the motion to pass, with the understanding that so soon as the correspondence is completed it shall be brought down.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

RAILWAY STATIONS IN LEVIS, BELLE-CHASSE AND MONTMAGNY.

MOTION FOR RETURN WITHDRAWN.

MR. LANDRY, on the Notice of Motion being called for an Order of the House for copies of all correspondence, petitions and other documents in relation to the construction or the repairing, as the case may be, of the railway stations at Etchemin and St. Jean Chrysostom, in the county of Lévis, of St. Michel, in the county of Bellechasse, and of St. François, St. Pierre, St. Thomas and Cap St. Ignace, in the county of Montmagny, said: The question I put to the Government this afternoon, and the answer thereto, cover part of the information I desired to obtain by the present motion. But the answer covered only the cases of St. François, St. Pierre, Cap St. Ignace, and St. Thomas. If the hon. the Minister of Railways would answer the other part of my former question, this motion could be allowed to drop.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I think I have some slight reason to complain of my hon. friend. He put a question on the Notice Paper, and my answer was that I would obtain the information and give it to him at an early date. I did obtain that information, but in the meantime he extended his question, and embraced several other things in it, of which he had given me no previous intimation. But I shall be glad to get the additional information for the hon. gentleman.

MR. LANDRY: The question as originally put embraced but four localities, but with the permission of the House I extended it the same day to other railway stations.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY SURVEYS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for an Order of the House for a return containing a copy of all reports of surveys for a railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, with maps of the surveys and estimates of the cost of the railway, if any.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: My hon. predecessor will remember whether a report or estimate was made of that survey. My own impression is that it was ordered, and was in course of execution, when, owing to the action of Parliament, the work was interrupted.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think there was not a full estimate, but a rough estimate, which showed the work to be a very expensive one.

Motion agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILWAY LOCATION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for an Order of the House for a return containing a copy of a memorandum of location of Canada Pacific Railway, 1879, by Mr. Marcus Smith; also, copies of the map of Canada Pacific Railway, 1878, accompanying report of Mr. Marcus Smith, acting Chief Engineer.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I shall be obliged to ask my hon. friend to leave out that portion of this motion which asks for copies of the map of the Canada Pacific Railway of 1878, accompanying the report of Mr. Marcus Smith. The Department took exception to a portion of that map, and did not feel justified in publishing it as a Government map. That was the action taken by the late Government, and by my hon. predecessor, and I believe it was taken on the ground that portions of the line of the Canada Pacific Railway, and a section of country covered by that map were exhibited as being of a very barren and sterile character, when so strong a statement was not warranted by the information in the possession of the Department. Other sections were represented as being of a very fertile and excellent character, which had not, in the judgment of my hon. predecessor, been sufficiently explored to warrant their being described in such terms. I may say that explorations carried on during the past season have satisfied me that Mr. Marcus Smith was not correct in describing large sections of that country as being of a very inferior description, and the effect of the publication of this map would be to commit the Government to definite and explicit statements that I do not think the facts will exactly warrant. I have no doubt the map was prepared with a conscientious regard to what the gentlemen preparing it believed to be true. I do not feel sure, that I would be acting properly if I were to publish the map, as it would be published if it were to be brought down to the House. So far as the report is concerned, I think it was published in extenso by the former Minister of Public Works, and then the only objection was that the map which had been prepared to accompany it did not accompany it. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press the motion.

MR. ANGLIN: Do I understand the hon. the Minister of Railways to deliberately withdraw all he himself said at one time with regard to the conduct of the hon. the Minister of Public Works in this matter? Does the hon. member withdraw what, if I remember aright, he designated as the suppressing of a valuable map?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I can only say that I think the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) will find that he is entirely in error. I do not think he will find that I made myself responsible for an attack on the hon. member for suppressing valuable information. I certainly did not do so, if in possession of the information I now communicate to the House. I should be much obliged to the hon. member for Gloucester if he would show me the statement he refers to.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am quite sure, if the hon. gentleman himself did not make the statement, some of his friends did, and I am quite sure that newspapers all over the country did. I was represented as doing something very bad indeed by suppressing a map that would have given accurate information concerning the country. I know a very great injustice was done.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I do not think the hon. gentleman will say I was a party to that injustice.

MR. MACKENZIE: If the hon. gentleman says he was not I accept his statement at once. I did not say he was. At all events the hon. gentleman has tonight frankly stated that he would have done the same under similar circumstances, and that he believes it was proper not to publish the map. I do not claim to have any knowledge of the country affected by the map, but I did think it a very serious thing to issue a map which gave, as I had reason to believe from enquiries I made, wrong information affecting prejudicially a part of the country which will, in my opinion, be one of the most valuable districts in the North-West. It was a very serious matter to allow that map, which was characterised in such strong terms by some of the principal officials in the Department as erroneous, to become public property and mislead emigrants and everyone connected with the Public Departments. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has vindicated my action in that respect.

MR. DECOSMOS: This map, it is claimed, covers the ground that was shown on a certain celebrated map that was sent to the Paris Exposition, that was prepared in the office of the Minister of the Interior, and exhibits the information gathered by the Chief Engineer of the period, Mr. Marcus Smith. Without wishing to deny what has been stated by the hon. the Minister of Railways or the ex-Minister of Public Works, I think it is but an act of justice to the acting Chief Engineer that this map should be laid before the House and the country; and if he is at fault the House and the public will be able to act as a jury, and show where he is at fault. His friends and sympathisers would be able then to discover that the Government is right and the acting Chief Engineer wrong. I regard it as a very small matter for the Government to withhold this map from the House, inasmuch as the railway route marked on this map is so highly spoken of in the report of the Chief Engineer of the Canada Pacific Railway, recently submitted to this House. I believe that if this map were placed alongside of the map of the recent explorations of 1879, that the two maps will be found to be very nearly similar. That being the case, I trust the hon. the Minister of Railways will withdraw his objection, and lay the map moved for before the House, and let the House judge of its value. For my part, I think I should be doing an act of injustice to consent to the request of the hon. the Minister of Public Works.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I must then ask the House to sustain me, and I move in amendment that the words after "Mr. Marcus Smith," where they appear for the first time, to the end thereof, be left out. I need not detain the House further than to say that the Government are not prepared to become responsible for the publication of the map, and I cannot consent to bring it down, nor can I consent to allow a question between an officer of the Government and the Government itself to become a question of controversy by the House of Commons, while that officer retains that relation with my Department.

Amendment (Sir Charles Tupper) agreed to.

MR. MACKENZIE: Before the motion is carried, I desire to refer to a paragraph, which shows what passed upon this matter in 1878. The hon. gentleman who has made this motion, brought the subject up as a matter of complaint, that the map had not been presented to the House. The report is as follows:—

"Mr. MACKENZIE said there was a map in preparation with a view to arrive at as accurate information as possible as to the nature of the soil to be traversed by the railway from Lake Winnipeg westward. This map had been submitted to the Chief Engineer, who did not consider it correct, and therefore it would not be submitted to the House until corrected.

"Mr. TUPPER said he would call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to a statement contained in the report of the acting Engineer. This matter was of vital importance, yet the map to which he had referred as containing the information necessary to an accurate reading of the report of the acting Engineer had not been furnished. * * * He trusted there was no necessity for suppressing the map, without which the report to a considerable extent was unintelligible.

"Mr. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had no right to say the Government were suppressing anything. * * * If the Chief Engineer said the map was inaccurate it was not to be depended on as any authority whatever."

That is all that passed at that time about the map, and yet, from the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, the plain suggestion went out that the then Minister of Public Works was suppressing a very important map, for some reason or other.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to :—

Address—1. Copies of all papers and documents in relation to the dismissal of Omer Allard, formerly employed in Her Majesty's Customs at the city of Montreal, Superintendent of tide-waiters and lockers ; 2. Copies of all charges and complaints in relation to the dismissal of the said Omer Allard ; 3. SUPPLY.

II. CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Mr. Speaker, before submitting my financial statement, I desire to move the House into Committee, in order to take a vote on Supply, and I ask my hon. friend opposite to consent to concurrence to-day, because it would be much more desirable to make the statement on the proposition to go into Committee of Ways and Means. They quite understand that, therefore I move that the House go into Committee of Supply.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not propose to object to the proceeding, but it would have been better to have observed the regular rule and taken a vote before now.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I quite admit that, but the circumstances were peculiar. I desired to follow that course, but owing to the serious illness of the Deputy of the Department, and other matters, I delayed it, and I therefore rather throw myself on my hon. friends opposite on the present occasion.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Mr. Speaker, in moving the House into Committee of Ways and Means, I desire to make my financial statement. When I had the honour of addressing this House on the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means, last Session, I took the liberty of calling attention to the different position I occupied on that occasion to the position I occupied as Finance Minister in 1873. I briefly referred to the fact that in the period referred to (1873) the country was prosperous, and the Treasury overflowing. Last year, when I made my statement, I had to admit that the Treasury was not overflowing, and the country was not so prosperous as we could desire. The Government realised at that time the difficulties they experienced in meeting the House under such circumstances. These difficulties were, however, diminished from the fact that the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government had, when leader of the Opposition, submitted resolutions to the House of Commons affirming a certain policy which was at that time rejected by Parliament, but subsequently affirmed by an overwhelming majority of the people of the Dominion. In dealing, therefore, with the most important subject which could receive consideration—and difficult as it was, we felt we had behind us and in the country a sentiment in favour of the policy that we were about to submit—the difficulty was to prepare that policy, and arrange its details in such a manner as to make it not only acceptable to our supporters in Parliament, but to make it universally acceptable if possible to the Dominion. We experienced less difficulty than we would have under other circumstances, because all those points had been previously considered and discussed throughout the length and breadth of the country. But, as I have just stated, the difficulty was to harmonise the views and sentiments, not only of our supporters in the House, but of our friends out of the House, so that the proposals in their operation should not bear unfairly or unjustly on any portion of the Dominion. Well, Sir, the Government applied themselves to this task, and we had the satisfaction of feeling, at the close of the Session, that there was a general concurrence of feeling in the House and out of it, that the members of Parliament had redeemed their pledges, that the Liberal-Conservative party had carried out its pledges, that the Government had fulfilled its pledges; and there was every reason to expect and hope that the policy was not only acceptable to our supporters but would be beneficial to the country. It will be our duty, presently, to consider how far our hopes and expectations in that respect have been realised. But, Sir, our difficulties were not confined to the question of the Tariff; they extended to the question of finance. Why, Sir, it was shown by the statements which were submitted to the House in the Public Accounts, that for three or four years there had been a steady decline in the revenue as compared with the expenditure, and that the deficiency had reached for three years preceding, and as we estimated for the fourth year, an average of $1,750,000. It became necessary, therefore, for the Government to consider what steps could be best taken while they were carrying out their policy with regard to the advancement of the industries of the country, at the same time to increase the revenues of the Dominion. Our difficulties were not confined to the providing for the deficiencies to which I refer. The Government found that heavy engagements had been made by their predecessors for public works embracing a great extension of our canal and railway systems. They had entered into engagements for the construction of canals involving an expenditure of millions of dollars, which the present Government were bound to carry out and to provide the means for. In passing, I may remark, that I recollect perfectly well the time when the Government proposal to construct additional canals was submitted; it was not objected to by hon. gentlemen in the Opposition, because it was found that it was then deemed advisable and necessary that employment should be given to the people, thousands of whom were idle; and it is rather a striking commentary on the present state of affairs, that at the present day you do not hear, notwithstanding we are told that great depression exists, any proposition coming from either side of the House to construct public works, solely or largely, to give employment to unemployed people. But such was the case, and such engagements were entered into. Proposals had been made by our predecessors; contracts had been entered into involving a large expenditure for the extension of the railway towards Nipissing; for works west of Red river and east of Winnipeg, and for the completion of the Pembina Branch; and tenders had, moreover, been asked for 120 miles of railway in British Columbia. All these engagements required large sums of money, and added largely to the annual interest; therefore we had not only to provide for a deficiency of two millions a year, as was then estimated, but we had to look forward to an increased expenditure in the shape of interest on the Public Debt, amounting to from $400,000 to $500,000 a year. It was under these circumstances that the Government, having to assume heavy engagements, were called upon to give the subject our most careful consideration. Difficult as was our position at that time, the difficulty was increased from the fact that the late Administration had so arranged the expenditure for the Pacific Railway that to make it effective it became necessary that a very expensive link should be completed, in order that we might have the advantage, with the least possible delay, of the money which had already been expended. It became necessary for the Government at once to undertake the work of building 180 miles of railway, to connect the head of Lake Superior with Winnipeg, a most expensive public work; and it was not only our duty to put it under contract at once, but to stipulate that it should be completed with the least possible delay, in order that the expenditure on the works already carried out should be made effective and beneficial, and that the country might be opened for settlement and development. Well, sir, what did the Government find in addition to that? In addition to the providing for the construction of the roads named it was deemed necessary to add to our expenditure, and with the least possible delay, by providing for the building of 200 or 220 miles west of Winnipeg, in order that, when the road was opened from the head of Lake Superior to Winnipeg, we should have the fertile country west of Winnipeg open for settlement, so that we might have the advantage and benefit of the expenditure so far made. As you will understand, Mr. Speaker, these new works involved a large additional outlay, and I may say we feel that in making it we have acted in accordance with the wishes and opinions of our friends in and out of the House, whose desire in common with that of the whole people of the country is that the North-West may be opened up, and that the old portions of the Dominion may derive the benefits, direct and indirect, of its development. Sir, if the Government could have had their own way in the matter, apart from other considerations, they would have desired that the expenditure on public works, chargeable to capital, should not have exceeded five or six millions a year; but, under the circumstances which I have related, engagements had to be met which will involve, perhaps, the expenditure of twelve millions during the current year, and twelve or thirteen during next year. The House will understand, under these circumstances, that our difficulties are great, and that they are not diminished by the fact that we have to provide, not only for this large expenditure, and for the deficiency of two millions a year, but for a sum largely in excess of two millions. Sir, if the deficiency in the last year had only been what was estimated, our difficulties would have been less to-day than they are. I desire, Sir, in order that we may understand this matter fully, in order that our position with reference to the expenditure of the current year and of next year may be fully understood, to state that the deficiency of the last year, instead of being two millions—when we take into account the fact that under the expected change in the Tariff we received in that year property belonging to this $700,000 of Customs more than we would have received had it not been proposed to change the Tariff, and that we also received $600,000 from Excise for the same reason—was $3,400,000 instead of $2,100,000.

Mr. MILLS: Hear, hear.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: A gentleman opposite says "Hear, hear." I may explain upon what basis I make that statement to the House. In the first place, let me call the attention of the House to the estimate submitted by the late Finance Minister as to the receipts and expenditures for 1878-79. The hon. gentleman estimated that the receipts from Customs would be $13,750,000; and the receipts were $12,900,659. I stated that experience has shown that $700,000 of that was received as the result of the large importation of February and March of last year, and properly belongs to this year, and would not have been received had there been no prospective change in the Tariff. The Excise receipts were estimated by the hon. gentleman to be $5,250,000. They were $5,390,763. It is now clearly established, Sir, that had there been no proposed change in the Excise duties, $600,000 less would have been received during that period, that should be credited to this year. The hon. gentleman estimated the receipts from bill stamps at $250,000; they were $188,000. He estimated the receipts from the Post Office Department at $1,200,000; they were $1,172,000. He estimated the revenue from Public Works and Canals at $1,900,000; it was $1,863,149. The interest on investments he estimated at $800,000; the receipts were $592,800. The receipts from all other sources he estimated at $700,000; they were $412,700. The estimates as a whole amounted to $23,850,000; the receipts were $22,517,380. Deduct from that the $1,300,000 on imports and Excise, which would not have been received had there been no prospective change in the Tariff, and the receipts would have been $21,217,380. Now, then, in reference to the expenditure. The estimated expenditure was $23,669,073; the actual expenditure reached $24,455,381. Of this expenditure, I may say that there was an under-estimate for interest of $285,891. This is, of course, a charge provided for by law, but the payments under this head were $285,891 in excess of the estimate. There were also the following under-estimates:—Charges of management to the extent of $92,180; on sinking fund, $146,992; on election expenses, $62,757; on pensions, $5,323;

on superannuations, $3,521; on subsidies, $21,901; and the Supplementary Estimates, $627,000. I do not know that the hon. member desires me to give the details of the increased interest, but I hold a statement of it in my hand, showing it to amount to $285,000. But I may say here that, while the expenditure reached, as I stated, $24,445,381, the lapsed balances, as will be seen by the statement laid on the Table of the House at the request of hon. gentlemen opposite, amount to about $700,000. Had the $742,938 of lapsed balances been expended by the present Administration, the deficiency would have been $4,161,866. But I do not purpose, Sir, to charge hon. gentlemen opposite with the amount unexpended, because we know that there are always lapsed balances.

MR. ANGLIN: Hear, hear.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. member for Gloucester says "Hear, hear." It is quite clear, Sir, that the deficiency, if it had not been for the $1,300,000 that was received as a result of the changes in the Tariff and the largely increased revenues in the Customs and Excise during January and February, would have been $3,482,917. But, Sir, it will be quite readily understood, I think, that, under these circumstances, while we were basing our calculations for the future upon a deficiency of $2,000,000, we practically had to deal with a deficiency of over three millions of dollars, and it will not be surprising if our expectations with reference to the balances of the current year, based on a new estimate, which I purpose submitting, will be found not to be entirely realised. Sir, it means not only an increased expenditure for the current year of over a million on this basis, but it means an increased expenditure of a million a year for future years. We must necessarily see, in making our calculations for the future, whether we can possibly, with the greatest economy, make the two ends meet. There may be some criticism with reference to the expenditure for which Supplementary Estimates were asked last year I have gone into the different items of which they were formed, and I find that they contained items amounting to about $100,000 in all, for which the present Government are responsible. I know

hon. gentlemen opposite may say: "You asked in that vote for an additional sum for railways." We know, Sir, that the expenditure for the Intercolonial Railway for that year exceeded very largely the estimate by our hon. friends opposite; but, Sir, that additional expenditure cannot be charged upon the present Administration. The deficiency on that public work reached $700,000 during last year. The deficiency during the first six months amounted to $380,000; so that the deficiency during the first six months of the year, for which hon. gentlemen opposite were mainly responsible, and during the other six months, for which they were partially responsible, was in the main the result of their administration. Therefore, if we examine this matter with the view of ascertaining how far we were right or wrong in regard to this proposition, it will be seen, I think, very clearly, that the expenditure, at all events, for which our hon. friends opposite were responsible, would have left a deficiency of at least three millions instead of two during that year. I now come to the consideration of the expenditure for the present year. I have prepared a revised statement of the revenue and expenditure, having regard to the experience we have had down to the present time. I estimated, last year, that we would probably receive during the present year from Customs $14,000,000, exclusive of, as I stated then, an estimate of $500,000, which was collected in February and March, and which fairly and legitimately belongs to the present year, but which at the close of the year was found to amount to $700,000 instead of $500,000. I now am firm, Sir, in the opinion that, apart from that money collected last year that belongs to this year, the receipts from Customs will be, as estimated, $14,000,000 for this year. It has been said that the revenue up to the 1st of January does not warrant such a conclusion, but, if we will examine the amount received from Customs up to that period, and add to it even $500,000, our original estimate, we shall find that it is very nearly half the $14,500,000 estimated for the whole year, and, when we take into consideration that we have probably consumed, or that there have been thrown upon the market the goods that paid the duty last year and belonging to this, we may fairly expect during the last six months of the present year to realise a sum equal to that received during the first six months, $7,250,000. I may also state, from the returns made up every ten days, that we received during January and February and the first five days of this month, $450,000 more than we received during the same period in 1878. This, Sir, goes to show very clearly that we have consumed the goods that were brought in last year, and that we shall, during the balance of this fiscal year, have increased revenues to an amount sufficient to meet the sum estimated by the Government. The estimate we now make for Excise, based upon experience to the present time, is $4,500,000, to which is to be added $600,000 that was received in last year, but which properly belongs to this, and we have $5,100,000. This is not as large as the amount estimated this day twelve months. I recollect perfectly well that hon. gentlemen opposite took exception to my estimate, that we would receive from the additional 10c. per gallon on spirits $100,000. That is the only item in the revenue that shows a falling-off down to the present time. It may be that the hon. gentleman was correct as to the causes which have led to that reduction, but I am disposed to take a different view, and have arrived at the conclusion, Sir, that it is caused by a decreased consumption of spirits, whether it may be from the increased duty, or from the fact that the habits of the people have changed with reference to the use of this article; but, under any circumstances, I believe that it will be considered by a very large proportion of the people that, if, by an increase of the duty, the consumption has been diminished, the change was justified; this is the item of all others in which they would desire to see a reduction, and one the falling off in which will not cause much regret. It was estimated that the Post Office would yield $1,200,000, and we entertain that opinion still. In the Public Works, it will be found that we estimate an increase of $50,000 over the estimate of a year ago. That arises from the fact of our taking possession of the Pembina branch of the Pacific Railway. It will be found from the Estimates now before the House, that we have asked Parliament for $50,000 for the management of that road. But, while we have increased the expenditure to that extent, our increased revenue will be in proportion. With reference to bill stamps, our estimate is $200,000. On interest on investments it will be found that there is an increase arising in this way. From the loan which was obtained in England last year, and from the moneys which were subsequently obtained from 5 per cents of the Dominion of Canada, we had more money than was required for the current year, and held over at the present moment for the payment of liabilities due on the 1st of July next, and bearing interest; and, therefore, the interest we are receiving on that money, so held, will probably amount to $200,000—though I have stated the amount at only $150,000—over and above what was estimated. So that while the interest account on the debit side has increased, we have also an additional sum to place to the credit side of the account. Of all other revenues, it was estimated that they would amount to $700,000, and, from looking at the returns of last year and the returns so far in the present year, I think it is very probable that that item will not exceed $600,000, making the estimated receipts for the current year $24,450,000, against a previous estimate of $24,200,000. We now come to the estimated expenditure. It was stated last year that it would reach $23,869,262. The Supplementary Estimates show that, after deducting the vote for items belonging to last year, after deducting the items chargeable to capital, the Supplementary Estimates for the current year, chargeable to income, amount to $858,922. They are made up in part by $100,000 for the relief of the sufferers in Ireland; $201,000 for the relief of the Indians, who were in a starving condition; $97,500 expenditure on public buildings in St. John more than was voted by the House; $50,000 for the running expenses of the Pacific Railway; $42,000 for repairs to canals and other items, making in all $858,922. Then, Sir, we come to the under-estimates in interest. I have to call attention to the fact that the probabilities are that the interest account of this year will exceed the estimate by $660,000. This increase was caused in this way: I stated a few moments ago that the under-estimate of 1878 for interest was $285,891, and the basing of the estimate of the current year upon the estimated amount of interest for last year led to an error to that extent in the estimate for the current year. The error of the last year occurred in the following way: the late Government probably estimated on a loan of £2,500,000 instead of £3,000,000, which would make a large difference. The 6 per cent. stocks that matured last year and were payable by the Government on six months' notice, were probably estimated by my predecessor at 5 per cent., and as notice was not given, the result was that those securities paying 6 per cent. were only redeemed in December or January last, and this made a difference of $40,452. The sale of 5 per cent. stocks was estimated below what was sold during the year; and then there was paid to our financial agents in London, $24,293; to Morion, Rose and Company, for interest on temporary loans made by my predecessor, amounting to £500,000, the sum of $47,893; and to the Bank of Montreal for temporary loans on general account (which contained a loan of £500,000), $64,472; interest on seigniorial indemnity, $25,193; a difference in the amount of the estimate of deposits in the Savings Bank during the year of $7,533. 47, making altogether $288,891.87 of an under-estimate. As our estimate of this year on interest account was based on that estimate, we had as the result a large under-estimate under that head of $280,000 and odd dollars. Then, Sir, during last year a new loan was necessary. There were 6 per cent. debentures for £400,000 sterling, falling due in England on the 1st January—£600,000 in addition to these falling due on the 1st July next. There were also the $4,000,000 of 6 per cent. securities falling due in Canada, of which the Government gave notice in May last that they would, at the expiration of six months, either pay them or substitute 5 per cent. securities for them. The expenditure on Capital Account of the present year must amount to something like $10,000,000. It was therefore decided that a loan should be negotiated, not only for the purpose of the payment of the 6 per cent. liabilities falling due in England, but that we should also be in a position, in the event of the parties holding the securities in Canada, asking for money, instead of their accepting 5 per cents in lieu thereof. A loan of £3,000,000 was therefore placed on the market, though the money was not immediately required, as the time was considered a favourable one. This left the Government with a large amount of money for the time being, a considerable portion of which is now deposited in the banks of the Dominion, bearing from 3½ to 5 per cent. interest. So we have an offset of $250,000 on the credit side to meet additional charges for interest. This swells up the interest account $250,000 above the Estimates. The whole expenditure estimated for the current year, from the Estimates now on the Table of the House, is $25,478,000. The expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway will, however, be $300,000 less than the estimate, the fact being that, during the first six months of the last year, there was a deficiency of $380,000, and the returns show that for the first six months of the current year the deficiency is but $34,000. Under these circumstances, we are prepared to state that the expenditure will be reduced for the maintenance of Public Works $300,000 less than the estimate, and that the lapsed balances, which are generally large, may be fairly estimated at $200,000, making a deduction of $500,000, leaving the estimated expenditure of the current year at $24,978,000, against the first estimate of $24,450,000, or $500,000 of an estimated deficiency. Now, when it is considered that the deficiency of last year, had it not been for the exceptional circumstances I have named, would have been over $3,000,000, and we are enabled to show in the present year a deficiency of but $500,000 or thereabouts, I think that under those circumstances, and in view of the fact that, if our predecessors had estimated correctly the interest for the previous years, the result would have been that our Estimates would have been very nearly realised, we can justly claim that, in the first year of our Administration, our income and expenditure are not far from being balanced. I will now call the attention of the House to the estimated income and expenditure of next year. It will be seen by the estimates of next year that the expenditure is placed at $25,007,203. The estimate is as follows:—Customs, $15,300,000. On looking into this matter very carefully, it is considered by the Government that, in view of the increased prosperity in the country, in view of the increased prices of articles to be imported, the amended Tariff, the changes in which are not made for revenue purposes, will produce an increased revenue of $600,000. We expect to receive from Excise, $5,213,000. In referring to the resolutions I am about to submit to the House with reference to Customs, it will be found that upon careful consideration we cannot count on any increased revenue from the proposals to be submitted. I will leave that question until I read them in detail, when hon. members will be able to judge for themselves. In reference to Excise, a proposition will be made to the House that will probably add $200,000 to the income from that source. It is proposed to grant licenses to manufacture Canadian leaf tobacco, and that an Excise duty of 14c. instead of 20c. per pound will be imposed. With reference to Public Works, including railways and canals, it is estimated that we will receive $2,286,000 during next year. The Estimates contain an additional appropriation for railways not beyond what was asked for during the present year, it is $160,000 less; but there is $200,000 required for working the Pacific Railway, and the Minister of Railways assures us, and the evidence to which I have referred warrants him in making that statement, that during the next year the income from these public works will be equal to the expenditure, and it will be found that in the estimated income we placed a sum equal to the estimated expenditure. Bill stamps will bring $208,000; interest on investments $600,000; and Post Office $1,210,000. I will observe here that the interest on investments—$600,000—is $250,000 less than estimated for the present year, for the reason stated, that the sums of money that have been loaned and are now at interest, will be used in paying off certain liabilities, and the result will be that our income from investments will be $250,000 less next year than during the present year. From other revenues we expect $700,000, making an estimated revenue or income for next year of $25,517,000. If our expectations are realised in this matter, it will appear, Sir, that our pledges will have been redeemed, and the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure will have been restored, and there is a very good margin, indeed, which justifies us in arriving at the conclusion that such will be the case. I take this opportunity of making the statement that we expect to provide for the expenditure on Capital during the next year partly by the balances we now have on hand. As shown by the return made to the House, out of the thirteen millions four millions have to be paid for the redemption of debentures on the 1st July next. Five or six millions will therefore be available for expenditure under the heading of Capital Account during the next year, leaving over three millions as a reserve; and the Government propose to submit for the consideration of the House a proposition to extend the authority already given with reference to the issue of Dominion notes. The Government propose to ask that the amount now fixed, beyond which a note cannot be issued, unless we hold dollar for dollar in gold, shall be extended from twelve millions to twenty millions of dollars, and the Government will place whatever proportion of that twenty millions they may find it in the interest of the country, in circulation. Twenty-five per cent. of the circulation will be held in gold and guaranteed Dominion securities, not less than 15 per cent. to be in gold. That will be the proposition that the Government will ask the House to support. That will enable us, with the amount of gold that will be released and three or four millions additional circulation added to the five or six millions we have now on hand, to dispense with any necessity to go into the English market to provide money for next year's expenditure. We will be able to secure whatever the deficiency may be from the capitalists of the Dominion, at such a rate as will be satisfactory to the country. These are briefly the proposition that we submit with reference to income and expenditure during the periods to which I have referred. If there are any further details I will not detain the House now to go into them, but will take an opportunity to do so later on. I desire to trespass on the attention of the House for a short time in dealing with the objections that were made last Session, and may be made again with reference to our Tariff policy. I ventured, when submitting that policy, to remark that the resolutions were not aimed specially at any particular country; still as British subjects, owing allegiance as we do to the great Empire of which we form a part, it was designed in the preparation of our Tariff that if we favoured one country more than another, it would be Great Britain. I recollect, and the House will recollect, the objections that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the effort that was made to prove that the Tariff then submitted would operate more injuriously and affect more especially the manufacturers of Great Britain than those of the United States.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: Hear, hear.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Do I hear the hon. gentleman opposite say "hear, hear?" Then, Sir, we will have an opportunity of discussing this matter fully. Some gentlemen, out of Parliament, and through the press, have made various statements upon this matter, but here on the floor of Parliament, where we can bring up facts on both sides, we can arrive at a just and accurate conclusion on the subject; and while we could only speculate last Session with reference to these effects, time has shown, and the evidence lies upon the Table of this House, that instead of its operating to the disadvantage of British manufacturers, as compared with those of the United States, it has borne less heavily and affected them less than the manufacturers of the neighbouring Republic. I have made an abstract from the comparative statement of the Trade Returns for six months. The return submitted to the House represents the imports of the last six months, that is, from July to January, in the present fiscal year, compared with the first six months of the last fiscal year; and it is from these returns that we are able to draw some conclusion, and, I trust, accurate conclusions with reference to the effect of this Tariff. These returns show that the importations of iron and steel manufactures from Great Britain, in 1878, under the head of "free goods," amounted to \$961,672. Under the head of "free goods," this year, they amounted to \$1,599,182. Under the head of dutiable, last year, the imports amounted to \$1,491,867, and this year to \$1,688,614. The dutiable goods bearing an average duty of 17½ per cent., there was a large increase, an increase of \$800 in the imports from Great Britain under that head (Steel and Iron) in the first six months, and in 1878 the imports from the United States under the free list was \$148,874, and in 1879, \$169,913. Under the heading of dutiable goods, last year, they were \$1,725,000, against \$1,288,000 in the present year, showing an increase in one case of \$21,000, and a falling off in the other of \$500,000. Under the heading of cotton goods, as shown by the return, in 1878 the imports from Great Britain amounted to \$1,824,921, in 1879 to \$2,089,812. From the United States, in 1878, for the six months, the imports were \$1,126,000; in 1879, \$745,000. This shows a large increase in the imports from Great Britain, and a falling off of nearly \$400,000 from the United States. In glassware the imports from Great Britain were, in 1878, \$76,246, and for 1879, \$95,440; from the United States, \$215,000 in 1878, and \$180,000 in 1879. Leather manufactures from Great Britain in 1878, \$187,000; 1879, \$227,000. From the United States, in 1878, \$332,735, in 1879, \$225,808. Under the head of sugars, the imports from Great Britain in 1878 amounted to 19,173,000 lbs.; in 1879, 9,964,000 a falling off of one-half. From the United States, in 1878, the imports were 38,000,000 lbs., and in 1879, 11,500,000 lbs. From the West Indies, in 1878, 4,728,000 lbs.; in 1879, 37,800,000 lbs. The imports of tea from Great Britain, in 1878, were 2,056,000 lbs.; in 1879, 3,201,000 lbs. From United States, in 1878, 3,516,000 lbs.; in 1879, 1,400,000 lbs. From China and Japan, in 1878, 575,000 lbs.; in 1879, 1,515,959 lbs. Wood manufactures, such as cabinetware, from Great Britain, in 1878, to the value \$5,700; in 1879, \$3,258. From the United States, in 1878, first six months, \$154,000; same period in 1879, \$46,800. Other woodenware—Great Britain, 1878, \$5,000; in 1879, \$20,000. From United States, in 1878, \$201,000; in 1879, \$199,000. Experience during the first six months with respect to the imports from these two countries shows this: that the falling off in the value of imports from Great Britain in free and dutiable goods amounts to 7 per cent., while the decrease from the United States was 33 per cent. Then it was asserted that the Tariff would act unfairly on the English manufacturers, and subject them to a large proportion of the increased percentage. By referring to the tables it will be found that the increased rate of duty upon free and dutiable goods, imported from Great Britain during the six months of the present year, was 19.43 per cent., against 19.9 under the old Tariff of 1878; and that the percentage from the United States, omitting as is proper, from the consideration of this question, the foreign goods that were imported but were also exported, but were entered last year for consumption, because there were no duties imposed on them, the percentage of increase has risen from 12 per cent. in 1878 to 15.3 per cent. this year. In the one case there is but an increase of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., while in the other there is an increase of 3 per cent. on the average duty collected on those goods. I know hon. gentlemen will very naturally ask how it can be possible that with the increased duties imposed upon British goods the rate of duty has only been increased $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., but we must take into account the fact that the sugar that was imported last year was double that imported this year, and paid forty-two per cent. What I say with respect to English imports has double effect when applied to the United States, because we imported from them under the same rate of duty double the amount of sugar we imported from Great Britain, and if we had imported the same quantity in this year it would have given the increase in the same ratio, and have made the difference 4 per cent. instead of 3. These facts go to show that, while the object, design, and intention of the Government was not to legislate directly against any particular country, but in favour of Canadian interests, the effect of the Tariff has been to diminish less the importations from Great Britain than from the United States. The next objection to the Tariff was that it would increase the cost of goods and give us no revenue. The hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), speaking on this point, said that, if the policy of the Government succeeded, if an additional impetus were given to the industries of the country, the Tariff would not produce the revenue that was proposed, and he was good enough to venture the statement on that occasion that the effect of the Tariff would be to increase the cost of goods to the consumers by six or seven or eight million dollars. You see, Mr. Speaker, that he left something of a margin, but what the effect has been is quite clear. The returns show that the increase of the Tariff upon imports has been $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. more than it was before. We had a revenue of twelve millions from imports, and if you add one quarter additional to that you do not get six, seven or eight millions, scarcely the half of it. But the statement was made that the Tariff would enrich the manufacturers and impoverish the masses. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman opposite said, in order that he might be safe in his predictions, whatever might be the circumstances, that by-and-by the manufacturers themselves would be impoverished, and that the whole country would be in a worse position than ever before. An hon. gentleman opposite, anticipating the discussion of this question, said the other day, and I think it was the leader of the Opposition, that half the manufacturers of Canada are dissatisfied with the Tariff.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Well, I have not seen half the manufacturers of Canada, but I have seen a great many of them. Knowing what would be said on the floor of the House, judging from what has been said in the past, I felt it my duty to ascertain from personal observations, as far as our manufacturing industries were concerned, what the effect of the Tariff had really been; and in my intercourse with the manufacturers, I will not say that there were no objections made to the operations of the Tariff. Were I to say so, I would be stating what is not true; but what I do assert is that, on the whole, the manufacturers express themselves satisfied with the Tariff, and if I had not found some objections to some of its provisions, I would have concluded that it had been framed too much in their interests, so that the very fact that they objected to some clauses led me to the conclusion that, on the whole, though there might be some slight amendments to the Tariff necessary, we were accomplishing the objects we had in view. Sir, as the discussion proceeds on the different items—because we will have as free and as full a discussion as we had last year—we will be in a position to examine into the operation of the various clauses of the Tariff, and more intelligently than last year, because we have had the experience of some months of its working. I have known that where railways have been constructed there have been particular localities which, from exceptional causes, have been injured; and so I am prepared to hear that hon. gentlemen opposite have found some point with reference to the working of the Tariff that will be a parallel to such cases as I have referred to; but who on that account would abolish our railway system? I am satisfied, from my own observations and from what I know in the matter, that the result of the Tariff has been such that there will be no declaration of this House, or on the part of the country, in favour of a change in the general policy of the Government. Sir, we will no doubt have it said by the gentlemen of the Opposition that the increased cost of certain articles has been caused by the increase of the duties, but I have here evidence, to show, with reference to the leading manufacturing interests of the country, that, beyond the increase in the cost of the raw material to the manufacturer, the people pay nothing more under this Tariff than they would have done under the old. I believe, Sir, that that can be established beyond a doubt, and, under the circumstances, I look forward to the discussion on this subject not with any dread, but with a degree of satisfaction, feeling that the facts we can present will be most satisfactory to the country and to the friends of the National Policy. It was also said by gentlemen opposite that this policy would create an unfriendly feeling in England towards Canada. It is true, Sir, that, when we were there last summer, mingling with men in the manufacturing districts, we found expressions of disapproval with reference to our policy.

It was to be expected, because, owing to the position and the circumstances of that great nation, it has been led to adopt a different policy. Looking at us from their standpoint, the manufacturers there believe that our policy is unwise and injudicious; but have we had any evidence, has anything recently transpired to show that the attachment of the people of England and their regard for Canada and Canadians has been diminished by the enactment of this Tariff? Has there ever been in the history of this country a period when Canada has been looked to with greater interest by the people of Great Britain and Ireland than at this very moment? I think a distinguished member of the British Government can claim some acknowledgments from this country for the course he has taken in calling the attention of the people of Great Britain to Canada. We on our part have shown by the liberal vote given so recently by this House, that we are not only in a position to give employment and comfortable homesteads to the thousands and tens of thousands of working men who cannot find work over the water, but that we are prepared to extend to them a helping hand in the hour of their adversity. Sir, I think, if at any period Canada stood well on the other side of the Atlantic, that period is to day. But, Sir, the statement was made that the course we have taken would affect our credit in England. What evidence have we that it has affected our credit except favourably? When it became my duty to visit England last summer, and to ask the capitalists of that country to take another three millions of our 4 per cent. unguaranteed securities, there were paragraphs in the papers, which may have originated with speculators; and not with our political opponents, decrying this loan; and when the time for the reception of the tenders came, there were very grave doubts expressed with reference to the chances of obtaining the minimum that was named, because it was 4 per cent. higher than had ever been named by any Finance Minister before. And yet, Sir, in the face of this alleged damaged credit, we obtained for that loan $700,000 more than my hon. friend opposite obtained for his loan of the same kind in 1874.

We obtained, if I take the books of the Dominion of Canada to show the net results from the different loans, \$600,000 more than my hon. friend obtained for his loan in 1876. My hon. friend may rise in his place and say, as he said in the west, that Mr. Tilley was in England at a most favourable time; money never was so low; money never was so cheap; that I was the most fortunate man in the world. Well, Sir, I admit that, to a great extent, to be true; but I recollect perfectly well that my hon. friend opposite, last Session—not in the fair manner that, I think, he ought to have acted—referred to the loan I negotiated in December, and in his attempt to show that the unguaranteed portion of that loan only brought 86 per cent., he based his argument on the statement that Sir John Rose floated a guaranteed loan that brought 110 per cent., and the 5 per cent. portion of which brought but 90 per cent.; and the hon. gentleman made that statement for the purpose of showing, though his comparison was an incorrect one, that I had obtained only 86 per cent. Then the hon. gentleman followed his statement up by saying that in the Economist published a few weeks previous to the date of which he was speaking, he found our securities quoted at 92 $\frac{1}{4}$ or 92 $\frac{1}{2}$, while New South Wales 4 per cents netted 99 $\frac{2}{3}$; and the hon. gentleman was kind enough to say that he had the Economist in his desk, and would hand it to me, if I wished. Now, Sir, I have in my desk the Economist of the 24th February, and will let the hon. gentleman have the use of it; and what does it show? Not that the exceptional circumstances referred to produced such favourable results. According to his own statement, the difference between our securities and those of New South Wales was 7 per cent. The last quotations, those in the Economist of the 24th of February, quote the Dominion of Canada 4 per cent. securities at 96 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 97, while those of New South Wales were 98 $\frac{1}{2}$, whereas a year ago, there was, according to the hon. gentleman, a difference of 7 per cent.; that difference is now reduced to 2 per cent. Sir, when we consider the relative position of the securities of Canada today, compared with those of New South Wales, which stands ahead of every other British Colony, we find that there has been an advance of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ or 5 per cent. in the value of our bonds, compared with those of the Colony referred to, which proves that the policy of the Government of the Dominion has certainly not damaged our credit abroad. Sir, there was another statement made, and I hold that it was one of the gravest and most serious statements made during last Session with reference to this Tariff—and what was that statement, Sir? It was that this Tariff was framed in such a way that it would bear more heavily upon certain provinces of this Dominion than upon other provinces, that it would affect certain provinces unfavourably and would lead to the breaking up of this great Confederation. Sir, my own Province was singled out as the Province of all the provinces that was to suffer by the policy of the Government. Sir, I have endeavoured, during the time I have been a member of this House and of the Government, to refer as little as possible to provincial questions, or to matters of purely local consideration. But when, Sir, that idea has been persistently propagated, when the Opposition have unremittingly endeavoured, by their declarations with reference to the effect of that policy, to create dissatisfaction in the Provinces of the Dominion, when for the purpose of striking a blow at the Minister of Finance, they have sought to damage the credit, reputation and standing of the people of that Province, I feel that I am justified, independent of local considerations, to make some reference to the bearing of this Tariff, and its effect upon New Brunswick. Sir, that Province has passed through great trials and great difficulties. Two-thirds of the commercial centre of that Province was destroyed by fire, two years ago. Some fifteen or sixteen millions of dollars worth of property over and above what was insured was swept away in a night. The lumbering interest of that Province for two or three years has been very much depressed, and the shipping interest has not been remunerative as it was in days past. The partial failure of these two industries, in which a large portion of the people of that Province are engaged, and in which their capital is largely embarked, together with the great disaster to which I have referred, deranged the business and trade of the Province; and a good deal of depression, a good deal of suffering, has followed in its wake. It has been attempted to be shown that the bankruptcies of that province have exceeded those of any other province, and I was surprised to find the attempt made to attribute these bankruptcies to the operation of this Tariff. I will say here, and I think without fear of contradiction, that there are not more than two cities in the Dominion, taking into consideration population and the amount of business done, that have had fewer failures and fewer bankruptcies than the city of St. John. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) rose the other night, in anticipation of this discussion, and, in speaking of the condition of St. John, he made a statement which was true, but of a misleading character. He said that in 1877 there were more men employed in the city of St. John than there are to-day; that they were receiving larger wages than then they are to-day. Now, I agree with the hon. gentleman that it is the fact, but he should have gone on to say that the great fire took place in 1877, that two-thirds of the city was destroyed, that thousands of mechanics and labourers came to that city to secure employment in the work of restoration, and that increased wages was the result to the labourer and mechanical like; and now, when the city has been rebuilt, is it to be wondered at that thousands who came into the city to re-build it are leaving it, that wages are not so high as then, that there are not so many men engaged in the manufacture of doors and sashes and bricks, that there are not so many foundrymen at work as there were then. I say, is it surprising that such is the case? The hon. gentleman stated the facts truly, but his conclusions were entirely erroneous, because he had endeavoured to impress on the House and the country that the effect of the National Policy had been to bring wages down to their present rates. Let me further say with reference to the city of St. John and the Province of New Brunswick. The leader of the Opposition, the other day, and I can understand his object, said there was but little probability of manufacturing industries springing up in that Province, and of St. John becoming a manufacturing centre; and he said that he always expected that in Nova Scotia, where they had coal and iron, they would be able to have large manufacturing industries, but what could New Brunswick expect? I assert that there is no portion of the Dominion of Canada which, in proportion to its population, has as large a number of its inhabitants engaged in manufactures as has the city of St. John. Manufacturing enterprises have been going on in that Province for a quarter of a century, increasing year by year, and extending, so that down to 1874, when these enterprises were at their height, 8,000 people in that city alone were employed in manufacturing industries. The hon. gentleman said he was not surprised that I should have been met with such limited cordiality when recently visiting that city. Was it limited? We had two dinners there on that occasion—the hotels we have there at present are not large enough to give dinners, to two hundred people at once. And I venture to say, further, that we had as many at the two dinners as the hon. gentleman had when he visited St. John as Premier of Canada. Let me give additional evidence of the ability of the people of that Province to carry on successfully manufacturing industries. I may tell this House that nearly every contract let since the new Tariff came into operation, for the construction of locomotives, snow-ploughs, cars, and turn-tables for the Intercolonial and Pacific Railways has gone, with the exception of three locomotives and two cars, to the Province of New Brunswick, and on lowest tender. When I state further, that though the sash and door manufacturers and carriage makers are not doing what they did in 1874, boot and shoe manufactories are in successful operation; machinists are freely employed; the cotton manufactory there has doubled its capacity within the last six months, and is preparing to quadruple it. And since this policy was adopted by the House of Commons a lock and brass factory has been started in Moncton, with a subscribed capital of \$200,000, of which \$66,000 has been paid up; that arrangements are being made for the establishment of a sugar refinery in the same place, the necessary capital having been subscribed; that recently the inhabitants of the town of St. Stephens were called together to consider the propriety of establishing a cotton factory there—they having sent to the United States for experts to select a site—that a site has been selected, that stock is being subscribed, that American capitalists are willing to build it and put it in operation, if their taxes are remitted for twenty years, that the expenditure involved in such an enterprise will be between \$300,000 and \$400,000; that a company with a capital of \$60,000 is being formed for the manufacture of nuts and bolts, and that various other interests of that kind have grown up in that Province within the past six months, the whole requiring altogether a capital of \$1,000,000—when I mention all these things, I ask whether, under those circumstances, Ontario or Quebec has exhibited a greater spirit of enterprise than has the Province of New Brunswick, bearing in mind, at the same time, that in proportion to population, our one million of capital is equivalent to six millions in the Province of Ontario, or four and a-half millions in the Province of Quebec. Sir, a characteristic scene took place since I came into this House this afternoon. I heard of a petition being circulated in St. John, asking that certain amendments be made to the Customs Tariff, and if I heard correctly the late Minister of Customs presented such a petition this afternoon. If the object of this petition was to influence the Government when making their changes in the Tariff—considering that it has been in circulation for a month among those who do not agree with us politically—why was it left until just before I rose to make the Budget Speech. I say, Sir, that this petition was said in St. John to be a piece of political clap-trap, and it has proved itself to be so. It has been said that the imposition of a duty on corn and cornmeal is unpopular, and I know that duty is unpopular in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

MR. MACKENZIE: And in Ontario, too.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: And if we were legislating here solely for these Provinces we would not have asked for its imposition, but it was part and parcel of our policy; and what is the fact? It will be seen by a return on the Table of the House that the duty collected on corn and cornmeal in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick has been nearly or quite met by the reduction of the duty on molasses consumed during the same period. It will be found that though in New Brunswick we consumed 55,000 gallons more than for the corresponding six months, the duty collected is something like $9,000 or $10,000 less, in other words, the reduction of duty on tea and molasses will balance what is paid by the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on corn and cornmeal. Still not a word is said on this point by hon. gentlemen opposite, their object being to alarm people as to the effect the Tariff is having on particular industries in these Provinces. Then we come to the duty on flour, and I have heard it stated that this is an Ontario Tariff. It will be found by the returns on the Table that during the last six months New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have not paid one dollar more on coal and flour than has Ontario, in proportion to population. We may expect objections to provisions in this Tariff, but on looking at its operation throughout, it is a marvel to me how we could have framed a Tariff that bears so equally on all portions of the Dominion I am quite prepared in the discussion of this subject to have hon. gentlemen opposite differ with me on this point, but let us go to the returns and form a judgment from the facts submitted to the House. It is said the greatest enemy of truth is prejudice, and its greatest friend time. Time is solving this question with reference to the Tariff. The main discussion on the Tariff will be this Session. The result of another year's experience will be such that our friends opposite will be then veering their course for a moderate protective policy, in order that they may meet the desires of the country. It is said this policy has damaged the country generally.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." Well, the hon. gentleman and his organ for five months after the passage of this Act, endeavoured to show that the country was poorer than it ever was before. For the five months subsequently, the Opposition organs endeavoured to show, when the prosperity of the country was so apparent that it could not be gainsaid, that it was not the result of the National Policy. Dun, Wiman and Company published a statement showing that the bankruptcies in Canada had been greater last year than ever before. Then the cry was again raised that the country was going to ruin. Here was something to build an argument on. It was amusing to read the varied statements made from time to time with reference to the Tariff. I will give you a sample. In one of the leading papers, which hazarded the statement that this policy was enriching the manufacturers at the expense of the masses, appeared a quotation of the price of rubber overshoes, to show how the prices had been increased and the manufacturer enriched; and yet the same paper in the same issue called attention to the fact that 2,000 pieces of Canadian woollens had been bought the day before at 30 per cent. less than any price ever before known in the history of Canada. Such is the inconsistent line taken by the Opposition. As to bankruptcies, it was stated in the House the other night that these increased bankruptcies were the result, to a great extent, of the general impression on the part of the people that the law would be repealed. The result of that impression was that the man who had been struggling along with his head just above water, took advantage of the law. On seeing the prospect of improved times, they came to the determination to obtain relief from these liabilities and start anew on the flood tide of prosperity. In the United States, in 1878, the same fact was noticed. Just at the commencement of prosperous times there were more bankruptcies than during the previous years. It is to be deplored that our magnificent country, with its grand prospects, should be decried, and its credit damaged for party purposes. The hon. leader of the Opposition stated that, if it had not been for the good crop last season, the country would be in a worse position than it ever was before—is it not in a better position than it was a year ago? Can you look anywhere throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion and say it is not so? Take the importers who, from their position, would naturally have less sympathy with this policy, and with this Tariff, than those who are more directly benefitted by it, and you will find, universally, both in wholesale and retail lines, that in the last six months the general trade of the country has been largely improved and increased. If you go to the farmer, you will find that he recognises the improvement in prices for the articles he has for export, or for home consumption in the home market. You may go to our shipping interest, and you will find that during the last five or six months every one has a more hopeful feeling than they had before. Take the lumber interest of the Ottawa Valley and other parts of the Dominion, and mark the change. You will find every man, who is engaged in that business in the city of Ottawa, in the west, or down east, doing double work, making sales ahead, and with a different, a more buoyant, spirit than he had twelve months before. I care not in what part of the Dominion you go, you will find a more hopeful feeling and more confidence; and, notwithstanding all these evidences of prosperity, the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition will blind their eyes to the facts and state that the country is not prosperous and are doing everything in their power to prevent emigrants from coming into the country to settle and invest their capital, and help to promote the prosperity of the country. I think it is scarcely necessary for me to enlarge upon this point, but I have no fears for the future of the country. Its prosperity I feel is assured. I do not say that it is all the result of the National Policy. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) that there are other causes affecting it, but I assert this—that the day after this policy was adopted in this House, in leading commercial centres and throughout a large portion of the Dominion of Canada, there was an entirely different feeling, a more hopeful feeling than there was the day before the policy was announced. And I believe, from personal observation and indisputable evidence, that 10,000 men are now occupied in the country who could get no employment before; and, what is more, the returns of the last six months, adding the three millions and a half of imports of the previous year, which clearly belonged to that, will show that the difference between the imports and exports of the Dominion for the last six months are in favour of the exports by $6,500,000. At the close of the year we will find that by the reduction of imports and the increase of exports, the balance of trade, which some gentlemen think is of no importance, though I think it is of vital importance to this country, will for the first time in the history of the Dominion be in our favour. I am, Sir, hopeful with reference to the future of this Dominion, and I believe that with the policy of developing the Great North-West, with the expenditure that was asked for this year, and is asked for by the Government for next year, we will be able by 1882 to pass through from Ontario to Manitoba by rail on our own territory and 200 miles beyond it—that we will be able to place hundreds of thousands of immigrants in comfortable homes in that magnificent prairie country, and bringing out of it its products. We will then have in an increased revenue and exports, a return for the expenditure we are now making. If we can fairly succeed in making our financial arrangements for the next two or three years, our difficulties will have been tidied over, and we will then be on a sound basis for the future. I said, in introducing the resolutions last Session, that the change in the fiscal policy was so great, that it was quite impossible for any Government or any body of men to frame it, so that after the experience of a year there would be no amendments to propose. The amendments that I desire now to submit to the consideration of the House will show that there are no radical changes whatever to submit for the approval of Parliament. There are many of them framed rather with the view of removing the difficulties in the working of the Tariff than as changes of policy. In the working out of the propositions of last Session, there necessarily was a good deal of friction. Many articles were composed of different materials, and of course the rate of duty was levied in proportion to the material of which the article was made. It was found that difficulties were arising from that source, as well as from others, and these considerations have led the Government to submit some amendments for consideration. I have had a synopsis of the resolutions prepared, which I propose to read to the House; it will show more clearly the changes made than the reading of the resolutions themselves. In the first place, it is proposed, as it was found that the duty on demijohns, when they were brought into the country.

AN HON. GENTLEMAN: Oh.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: My hon. friend laughs at the demijohns. He rather sneered the other night at my temperance principles. If my hon. friend, (Mr. Mackenzie,) and I were going on together now as we did twenty years ago, in favour of temperance, perhaps he would not have sneered so much at me on this question. As to demijohns, those imported with vinegar, or wine, or acids, were subject to a different duty from demijohns imported empty. They will be charged 30 per cent. ad valorem instead of 20 per cent.; asphaltum, used in making varnish, 10 per cent. ad valorem instead of 20 per cent.; bagatelle tables or boards, with cues and balls, 35 per cent. ad valorem same as furniture; billiard tables raised from 10 to 15 per cent. ad valorem; the same will apply to pianos, the specific duty remaining the same; bird-cages of all kinds will come under uniform duty, no matter of what material they are composed. Shoemakers' ink is placed at 25 per cent. Books are changed from 6 cents per lb. to 15 per cent., in consideration of our hon. friends opposite, who advocated that course last Session. Account books, 30 per cent. instead of 25 per cent.; valentines, chromos, and cards generally, a duty of 30 per cent. They were classed under different heads before. Some paid 20, some 25, and some 30 per cent., and it led to confusion in collecting the duty. Braces and suspenders are placed on the 25 per cent. list, they having previously been charged different rates, according to the materials of which they were made. Cans containing fish, under the Washington Treaty, will be charged 1½ cents per quart can, and the same price for each additional quart. This duty was imposed in order to counteract the effect of the American legislation, by which the trade of the United States had an advantage over our people of eighteen cents per dozen on all canned fish. China and porcelain is to be increased from 20 to 25 per cent. Combs are placed at 25 per cent., instead of a duty being charged according to the materials of which they are made. Crapes of all kinds are now placed at 20 per cent. Fishing rods at 30 per cent. Fire-proof paint $\frac{1}{4}$ cent per pound. Flagstones, dressed, \$1.50 per ton. Artificial flowers are reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. Grapes are increased from 1c. to 2c. per lb. Mattresses of all kinds, 35 per cent. Silvered, plated glass, imitation porcelain, shades, decanters, etc., 25 per cent. Gloves and mitts, of whatever material made, 25 per cent. Wrought iron tubing, plain, not threaded, coupled or otherwise manufactured, 15 per cent.; slabs, blooms, loops or billets, are reduced from $12\frac{1}{2}$ to 10 per cent. Liquorice is placed at 20 per cent.; when in extract or confection, 1 cent per lb. and 20 per cent. Malt, extract of, or for medical purposes, 25 per cent. Poultry and game, 20 per cent. Milk food, 30 per cent. The ad valorem duty on cabinet organs is increased from 10 to 15 per cent., specific duty unchanged. Bismuth is placed on the free list. Ruled paper is charged 25 per cent. Collars, if cotton, linen or paper, 30 per cent. Quick-silver is placed at 10 per cent. In regard to the duties on champagne, it is provided that the quarts and pints in each case shall be the ordinary sized quarts and pints. Steel and manufactures thereof are placed on the free list for another year. In regard to sugars, syrups and molasses, it is provided that the duty is to be charged on the export duty or other Government tax. Trunks are increased from 25 to 30 per cent. The duty on cigars and cigarettes is increased from 50 to 60 cents per pound. Tomatoes in cans are placed at 2 cents per pound. Watch actions, movements, 20 per cent., cases and watches 25 per cent. Hubs and spokes in rough are reduced from 20 to 15 per cent. I now come to a question of some importance, and that is the question of coal. When this was under the consideration of Parliament before, the Government after giving the matter very careful consideration, came to the conclusion that 50c. a ton on bituminous coal would carry it from Nova Scotia to Toronto. A considerable quantity of coal was sent to Toronto during last year, and it was hoped that arrangements could have been made with the Grand Trunk Railway by which the quantity might have been largely increased. After giving the matter the most careful consideration, and desiring to enable that industry to send its products as far west as Hamilton, it is proposed that ten cents additional per short ton be charged on bituminous coal. That will make the duty sixty cents per ton. Slates of all kinds and manufactures of slate not otherwise specified are made 25 per cent. ad valorem. Wool, viz., Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, and combing wools, such as are produced in Canada, are to be placed on the Tariff at three cents per pound.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman state what the revenue he expects to derive from these changes on the Tariff?

SIR LEONARD TILLEY: I stated that after examining this matter carefully I do not think we will receive much additional revenue from these changes.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not from coal?

SIR LEONARD TILLEY: No; because we think this will carry the coal from Toronto to Hamilton, and if it does we will lose revenue, the Nova Scotia coal taking the place of imported coal. But upon the export duty on sugar and some other articles we will have an equivalent. However, the Estimates of increased revenue are not based upon these resolutions. The following are the additions to the free list: sulphate of ammonia; bismuth; cinnabar; machinery of worsted and cotton mills, limited to October 1st, 1880; muriate, of potash crude; settlers' effects, under regulations to be made by the hon. the Minister of Customs; live stock, when imported into Manitoba or the North-West Territory by intending settlers, until otherwise ordered by the Governor-in-Council; steel till 1882; water-colours, by well-known artists; quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines, unbound. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I may say that these propositions the Government lay with confidence on the Table of the House, believing that they are in accordance with the policy declared last Session, and that they will be sustained not only by the House, but by the country.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY.

After Recess.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : Mr. Speaker, There was one remark which the hon. gentleman opposite insisted upon with which I am entirely disposed to agree. I agree with him in thinking that, when a fiscal revolution, involving such enormous changes as are involved in the Tariff which he recently proposed, has been submitted to the consideration of the country, it would be unwise to deny that a considerable length of time must elapse before the full results of such a measure can become clearly apparent. I am quite well aware that there have been a great many influences at work, all operating more or less on the position and prospects of this country, wholly apart from the fiscal policy we have adopted. I myself, when I occupied the position now held by the hon. gentleman, never committed the mistake of supposing that the best possible fiscal policy would obviate the results of great extravagance on the part of a Government or people ; nor have I ever asserted, here or elsewhere, that even a very bad fiscal policy would at once neutralise all the effects of great natural advantages or great energy or industry on the part of the people to whom that system was applied. That I take to be true as a general proposition, everywhere, and especially true of Canada, and indeed, of the whole of North America, because, from various circumstances, this continent may be regarded as being usually in a state of rapid growth, though a growth of fits and starts, in which, as our own experience, and the whole commercial history of the United States shows, periods of inflation are followed by periods of depression, and vice versa, from time to time. I think, however, be this as it may, that at present certain great facts are tolerably clearly apparent to every man in this country, which will assist us in forming some conclusion as to the merits or demerits of the policy of hon. gentlemen. For instance, we know too well that our revenue has not increased, in spite of the somewhat confused explanations by which the hon. the Minister of Finance endeavours to persuade us that from the fact that upon March 1st, 1880, our net receipts were two millions less than on March 1st, 1878, therefore we are sure to have a surplus at the end of the ensuing four months. We know likewise that it may be true, as the hon. gentleman has told us, that in New Brunswick new factories are expected to crop up, though they have not yet begun to give employment to the inhabitants of that favoured Province. But we also know that in other parts of this Dominion, with which we are better acquainted, those happy results have not been felt, and that, so far from greater employment being given to the working classes, we find, as that hon. gentleman might have seen in yonder square ten days ago, that hundreds, nay, thousands, of starving workmen are cursing the day they trusted the false promises of the hon. gentlemen opposite. We know perfectly well, the statements of the hon. Minister to the contrary notwithstanding, that the confidence which was to have animated the whole commercial community on the happy restoration of hon. gentlemen opposite to office, has taken the extraordinary shape of a greater depression of bank stock and a greater number of bank and business failures than Canada has ever heretofore known. We know, and if proof was wanted the hon. gentlemen might have had it in the petition of 3,000 electors of St. John city and county laid upon the Table this afternoon, we know that the people are not satisfied with his new policy, and the more they learn of the practical working of the hon. gentleman's Tariff, I venture to predict, though not endowed with the spirit of prophecy which the hon. the Finance Minister seems to possess, the less they will be satisfied with it. We know also, and here again I take issue with the hon. gentleman, that the prices of all the various articles that these men have to buy have risen, and their wages and the price of the chief articles the people have to sell have not. We know to our sorrow—because I am not one of those who wish for the sake of injuring my political opponents to see misfortunes inflicted upon the country—we know that the great and alarming emigration which prevailed in former days, from 1860 to 1870, is resuming its former proportions. We know that, from the hon. gentleman's own Province, from every one of the Maritime Provinces, men are seeking other countries where they will not be oppressed as in their own land. And there is not much wonder that such is the case. Turn to our Public Accounts, and you find an expenditure of \$250,000 for the purpose of bringing emigrants to this country. Turn to our Tariff of Customs, and you find seven millions being wasted, or worse, in trying to drive the old inhabitants of Canada away. We know also that the number of bankruptcies is not reduced under the régime of these hon. gentlemen. The hon. the Finance Minister, following in the wake of his illustrious leader, would have us believe that so far-sighted were the bankrupts of Canada, that they rushed wholesale into bankruptcy in 1879, for fear that a law would be introduced in March or April, of 1880, to prevent them from doing so at all. Sir, this explanation reminds me of the apology made by the First Minister for allowing a private member to introduce that Bill, of which mention was made in the Speech from the Throne, and I hardly know which is the lamer, the explanation or the apology. I suggest with all humility another explanation. Possibly the members of the commercial community may have wished to pay a last delicate attention to hon. gentlemen, and went into bankruptcy to provide some sort of employment for that horde of official assignees which the Bill of my hon. friend from Stanstead is about to sweep out of existence. Now, Sir, I desire in the first place, following the track of the hon. the Minister of Finance, to deal with the financial state of the country. Thereafter, I propose to show how, in my judgment, his Tariff has affected the mass of the people of this country, and what claims he is likely to have for a renewal of the confidence of which he boasted so much—a confidence, be it remembered, which was bestowed before the people had the slightest notion of the blessings which were in store for them. The hon. gentleman stated that there had been a deficit of \$1,960,000, I think, for the year ending 30th June, 1879, and as a matter of course the hon. gentleman intimated that I, and no other, was responsible for this. I am at a loss to know whether I am to be responsible for \$3,000,000, \$3,400,000, or \$4,100,000, because all these sums were mentioned by the hon. gentleman as being respectively the true deficit of the year. But we will assume, for the purpose of argument, that I am to be held responsible for the \$1,960,000 which the Public Accounts state to be the deficit for the past year. Sir, I decline that responsibility, and for reasons which I think some hon. gentlemen in the House and some people in the country will think reasonable and substantial. I say that deficit has been caused partly by the fact that that hon. gentleman and his colleagues expended about three-quarters of a million dollars more than we should have expended had we been in their places, and partly by that unparalleled feat of financial genius, as the London Times called it, whereby the hon. gentleman, with a generosity all his own, not merely threw wide open the Dominion Treasury to every importer who wanted to anticipate the new duties, but absolutely went out of his way to afford facilities through the medium of the banks to those merchants in order to put into their pockets over half the money that ought to have gone into the National Treasury. There, Sir, is the cause of the deficit, and the only cause. I say, Sir, the onus is most distinctly and clearly on the hon. gentleman. I do not refuse to bear the full responsibility of all the expenditure which we authorised, either by Order in Council or by the Estimates we brought down, but I will go no further. Permit me to contrast the condition of things in the year 1874 and that in the year 1879. In 1874 I held the hon. gentleman responsible for the expenditure which was then incurred, and this was the reason why I did so. That hon. gentleman by his several Orders in Council, and by the Estimates which he himself brought down, had made provision for the expenditure of \$23,685,000. He had further expended during the August and October Sessions of Parliament held under his régime the sum of \$200,000. That was before we came into office, and I have always held him and his colleagues responsible besides for the expenditure of the general election which was rendered necessary by their misconduct. However, I do not want to insist on that or on a considerable number of items which had been expended by these hon. gentlemen, and for which we afterwards got the authority of Parliament. But I point out to the House this fact, that, without taking into account the question of the general election, that hon. gentleman had spent or taken authority to expend \$23,885,000 in 1873-4, while our actual expenditure was \$23,316,000, or \$568,000 and odd less than the amount that gentleman had estimated for and taken authority to spend. Now, according to his own statement, throwing in the Orders in Council for sums brought forward by us, and allowing for the extra expenditure on account of the elections, which he estimates at \$65,000, the total expenditure we had authorised was \$23,920,000, of which I may remark a very considerable proportion, as he himself admitted, was not expended. He therefore expended last year some \$535,000 more than we are responsible for, while we expended \$568,000 less than he had taken authority to expend in 1873-4, and that I say constitutes a strong prima facie case against the hon. gentleman. Still I am not disposed to rest my case there, but I will point out to the House where I think these gentlemen were guilty of needless and improper expenditures. In the first place I do not admit that the hon. gentleman had the right to charge me for interest—at any rate more than to a small extent—on loans effected after I left office. He assumes what he has no right to do, that I intended to effect a loan of three million pounds sterling. This was not my purpose, but I leave that question till I can refer to his remarks about his recent loan. When we come to ordinary expenditure, what do we find? Why, Sir, we find that these hon. gentlemen, under the head of ordinary expenditure, have expended a very considerable number of sums which I feel perfectly certain, had we remained in office, would not have been expended. We find under the head of Civil Government that, whereas we expended in our last year \$823,000, these gentlemen expended \$861,000, of which about \$20,000 were for contingencies. We find that, under the head of Militia, whereas we expended \$618,000, these gentlemen expended \$130,000 more. Now, I do not charge them with the whole of that amount. I think it is probable that a portion of that may have been legitimate enough expenditure. But I say that, had we been in office, the Militia expenditure would have been at least \$60,000 less than it was. In the matter of Legislation these hon. gentlemen caused an extravagant expenditure in two ways. First, in consequence of the Minister of Finance not being prepared to bring down his measures to the House for many weeks after we met, and secondly, as the returns laid on the Table of the House show, by permitting the expenditure of this House to run riot until, on the vote for \$8,000 for sessional clerks, messengers and pages, there was an expenditure close on \$30,000. Sir, for that class of expenditure I refuse all accountability. Nor do I think that we are chargeable with the fact that the hon. the Minister of the Interior, as the hon. member for Bothwell showed last Session, saw fit to put nearly five quarters instead of four in the ordinary expenditure for Indians on that year. Under the head of charges for collection of revenue, I would also point out that, whereas we expended \$1,724,000 for the service of the Post Office in 1878, these gentlemen expended \$1,784,000, while in the following item they expended \$400,000 more than we demanded for the task of maintaining railways and canals; and \$200,000 more apparently than they themselves so late as the month of May deemed necessary. That expenditure may or may not be defensible; I am not in a position to form an opinion on the subject, but I do know that my hon. friend beside me spent \$200,000 less during his last year than his successors saw fit to expend. I remark in connection with this subject that I know too well from the state of things that confronted us when we became responsible for the administration of the affairs of this country, from the shameful way in which those roads were run down, how easy it is largely to diminish for a time the apparent expenditure on great public works. I also know how many hundreds of thousands, and perhaps millions, it cost us to put those roads in proper condition. If the information we have received from the Maritime Provinces be correct, there is an exceeding probability that something of that kind will occur again in a few years. I may add, for the hon. gentleman himself admits it, that there is at least \$100,000 for which he and not we were responsible, and therefore I submit that the hon. gentleman had no right whatever to attempt to hold us responsible for any more of the expenditure for 1878-9 than we ourselves had brought down Estimates or taken Orders in Council for. I may likewise point out the very important differences in our respective treatment of the situation. In 1873 I found, as I showed in the clearest possible manner, that, unless large additional taxes were put on, there was a certainty of a very serious deficit occurring, and we put on taxes which, as everybody admitted, cured the deficit for that year and the next year, without inflicting any serious burden on the people of the country. I say that, when no more than 2 or 3 per cent. are added it matters little whether the revenue be anticipated by a few months or weeks; but it matters a great deal when, as in the case of this Tariff, the Tariff was raised at one bound from 17 to 35 per cent. in the case of many articles of general consumption. I notice that in these allusions to deficits, the hon. gentleman was cautious enough to adopt a somewhat different tone from that which he and his colleagues indulged in in other places as to what these deficits portend. Perhaps the shadow of coming events may have been on the hon. gentleman. He may have in view a time when it would not be convenient for him to lay down the general proposition that deficits cannot exist without proving the great imbecility, the great incapacity for administration, of the Government who are responsible for them. Perhaps, Sir, there was another reason. Our position at present, as regards that hon. gentleman, is peculiar. I do not remember, to have found in constitutional history anything at all resembling it in time past. We have here on the floor of this House a Finance Minister duly authenticated and holding Her Majesty's commission. But, if rumour is to be believed, there is behind that hon. gentleman a very distinguished personage, who is a sort of alter ego to the Minister of Finance, who is here, there and everywhere, as the necessities of the Finance Minister compel him. Does the Finance Minister go to London to negotiate a loan; that distinguished personage is there. Is he called upon to explain the fiscal policy of his country before a Chamber of Commerce in England; that distinguished person is there. Does he go to Washington; that distinguished personage is there. I am glad the hon. gentleman is in such good hands. I have a great admiration and respect for that distinguished personage, and I do not know that I ever felt more admiration for him than when I saw him discharging the whole duty of an ambassador abroad as those duties are defined by those two eminent constitutional authorities, Sir Henry Wotton and the present Minister of the Interior, with such a splendid disregard to the consequence to his own reputation provided only he could assist the Minister of Finance in his difficulties. I can understand that that distinguished gentleman at any rate, if he has not forgotten all he ever did or said or suffered, would have given a wise word of caution to the present Minister of Finance. I cannot doubt that a man of his experience in public affairs must be aware that there is considerable danger, in spite of all the hon. gentleman's calculations, that things may not turn out precisely as he expects; that this year and next year, and possibly the next two years, he may expect serious deficits. Perhaps, too, the hon. gentleman remembers, and I dare say the hon. gentleman's colleague remembers, a certain episode which I must apologise for troubling the House with, though it has a decided bearing on the question before us. I can recollect very well a period at which the present First Minister directed the affairs of this country, a period at which the distinguished person to whom I have alluded was his Minister of Finance. I can recollect in 1858, when the revenue of Old Canada was \$5,270,000, and when there was a net deficit, deducting the sinking fund, of \$3,083,000, or a percentage of deficit to revenue of 58 $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. In 1859 there was a revenue of \$6,600,000 and a net deficit of \$1,328,000, or a ratio of deficit to revenue of about 20 per cent. The succeeding year there was a deficit of \$1,939,000 to a revenue of \$7,500,000, or a proportion of 26 per cent. In 1861 there was a revenue of \$7,500,000, with a deficit of \$1,879,000, being in the proportion of 25 per cent. to the revenue. Now, Sir, in our time, there was a deficit in 1876. The revenue in that year was \$22,500,000, and the net deficit, deducting sinking fund, was \$1,077,000, being in the proportion of four and four-fifths of one per cent. to the revenue of the country. In 1877 the revenue was \$22,050,000, and the deficit \$631,000. In 1878 the revenue was \$22,375,000, and the deficit, deducting sinking fund, was about four-fifths of one per cent. in proportion to the revenue. You will observe that our greatest net deficit, compared with the greatest deficit of the hon. gentleman's leader, and of the hon. gentleman who was then acting as Finance Minister, stood in the proportion of four and four-fifths to 58 per cent., and that the percentage of deficit in our last year as compared with the percentage of deficit in his last year was as four-fifths of one per cent. is to 25 per cent. And as the hon. gentleman appears to be in a mood to make arithmetical comparisons, I may say further than our worst deficit bore the same ratio to their worst that one bears to twelve, and that our final deficit was to theirs as one is to thirty. And that, Sir, is not only a fair ratio of the respective differences between the two deficits, but I submit is also a fair ratio of the prudence, the economy, and the administrative capacity which characterized the two Governments. I would warn the hon. the Minister of Finance that when he talks of deficits he is treading on very dangerous ground indeed. He has been good enough to tell us that he, and he alone, looks to the future without any embarrassment, because he had obtained on the 1st of March, 1880, the sum of \$14,081,000 as the total revenue for the past eight months. I find that on the 1st of March, 1878, our revenue amounted to \$15,003,330; on 1st March, 1877, \$14,263,000; and on 1st March, 1876, \$15,616,876. I confess, particularly after hearing that the hon. gentleman expects to expend something like \$24,900,000 in the current year, that I fail to see on what principles he expects our average monthly revenue of one and three-quarter millions to rise to something like \$3,000,000 per month for the remainder of the year. He may be correct, and I should be glad for the sake of the country, to believe it possible; but I fear the result will prove that the revenue of the next four months will bear but too exact a proportion to that of the last eight months, and that he will be called upon to face a deficit of from \$2,000,000 to \$3,000,000, that is, supposing that he fares no worse during the next four months than he has during the preceding eight. I find by the Customs Returns that up to the 1st of February, 1880, there was a total revenue from this source of \$7,400,000. Up to 1st of February, 1879, the Customs Revenue was \$6,970,000 and no less than \$485,000 of the first named sum is due to the duties on coal and flour. I take no account of the enormous disproportions shown by the returns of last month to those of the same month last year, because I am aware that in the month of February, 1879, through the extraordinary generosity of the hon. the Finance Minister, an unusually large amount of goods were passed through the Custom-houses, and paid duty. But I call attention to this fact that the result I have just shown has taken place in the face of extraordinary circumstance. We have had a good harvest, and unusually good prices for certain portions of our products. The markets of the world in general have been rising, and we ought to have got our share of profit from the revival. The whole result is the best possible endorsement of the policy of the late Government. We have been blamed for not imposing further taxes in 1876. What was our position then? We had recently imposed heavy taxes. We knew that we were very close to the true effective limit of indirect taxation, and also that a very slight revival in the price of ordinary staple articles would suffice to restore our revenue, and therefore we determined that it was our duty to practice the strictest economy, and to exhaust all reasonable means before adding any further to the burden of the people. Had our course been followed, had the hon. gentlemen opposite been content with a fair revenue tariff, all the hon. Finance Minister's difficulties would have disappeared and the country would have been in possession of a surplus. Then the hon. Minister informs us that one cause of his embarrassment was the heavy engagements he had inherited from the last Government, and he was good enough to recall to our minds the unexampled prosperity which existed when he was Finance Minister, in 1873. I also desire to recall that period to your recollection. I desire to recall how that hon. gentleman mistook inflation for prosperity; how he then, in defiance of remonstrances from this side of the House, and particularly in defiance of my own remonstrances, made that inflation the excuse for heaping enormous burdens upon the people of the country, and for adding deliberately and most needlessly the sum of one and one-half millions to the fixed expenditure of the country. It is a matter of public record that in some six years they increased the expenditure from \$13,000,000 to \$23,000,000, and that they went out of office leaving unfulfilled engagements, which, had they been fulfilled, would have added four or five millions more to the expenditure of the country. We took office and found this state of affairs staring us in the face. Only one engagement for Public Works did we carry out, that for the Canada Central Railway, which had not been incurred by our predecessors. Take the Estimates for 1873-4, drawn by the hon. the Finance Minister. You will find votes taken for the Welland Canal, Lachine Canal, and I believe every canal in the country, as well as for the Pacific and Intercolonial Railways, and for every work, in short, in which we have engaged, and yet he dares to talk of the heavy engagements we left behind us. I shall take the opportunity of saying a few words as to the extremely heavy Estimates which the Finance Minister has laid up on the table. I do not pretend to say that when a Volume of eighty-eight pages is thrown at our heads the day before the Budget, I or anybody else is able to make that careful analysis of it which should be made, but I say that, without any careful analysis, enough can be seen to fill every hon. gentleman who desires the welfare of his country with very serious alarm and misgiving at the amount which the Government consider the least with which they can carry on the Government of the country; and it must not be forgotten that these are but first Estimates. Judging by old usage, and I am afraid the hon. gentlemen opposite are not likely to introduce a new precedent in that respect, besides these Estimates for \$25,000,000 we will have Supplementary Estimates brought down before the Session closes, not to speak of a probable Schedule A next year also; so that this will not at all give the true amount the hon. the Finance Minister will require for the service of 1881. I regret still further to notice that in these Estimates the hon. gentleman, departing from the practice uniformly observed by his predecessors, has introduced a charge of \$300,000 for surveys of Dominion Lands to capital account. I say there is no possible excuse for making this a charge on capital account. It is evident that the hon. gentleman is afraid that the deficit, which he knows is impending, will be monstrously swollen by this additional sum. Everyone will remember that on every hustings in Canada these hon. gentlemen rated the late Government for extravagance, especially in the matter of Civil Government, Superannuation Allowances, Indian Expenditures, and Post Office Department. Now let us see what we expended in 1878, and what these gentlemen propose to spend in 1881. In 1878 the total expenditure for Civil Government amounted to barely \$823,000. Now, we are told \$917,451 are required—being an increase over our expenditure of nearly \$100,000. Sir, we were reviled without stint because in 1878 we found it necessary to expend \$106,000 for the purpose of providing for superannuation. I perceive that \$142,000 is the least these hon. gentlemen can get on with for their superannuation charges. For Indian service, in 1878, \$421,503 was expended. Now I see \$649,786 is demanded for the same service. In the Post Office Department, Sir, in which our extravagance had become rampant, we spent \$1,724,938 in 1878, these gentlemen now demand \$1,852,000, being \$130,000 more than the late extravagant Government found necessary to expend. I see but one substantial saving attempted to be made, and that is in the matter of Charges for maintenance of Railways. Now it may be possible to carry this out to some extent. I confess myself that everything that has come to my knowledge, everything that came to my knowledge while I was Minister of Finance, renders me very doubtful indeed as to the probable success of an attempt to reduce these railway expenditures to a much lower point than they touched in 1878 without injury to the service. Nevertheless I shall give my hearty support to, and shall heartily congratulate the hon. the Minister of Railways if his ability and energy do enable him to carry out the pledges which the hon. the Minister of Finance made on his behalf that he will effect the saving of which he speaks. But I reserve my opinion on that subject until we obtain that fuller information which will enable us properly to discuss the saving proposed to be made in that direction. These other figures at all events appear to me to indicate a revival of that spirit of reckless folly which led these hon. gentlemen to double the expenditure of Canada in seven years, between 1867 and 1873, and which, at a former time, as I showed, led them to expend in one single year something like 60 per cent. more than the total Revenue of the country. And I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House—for the question will be put to them in such a way that they cannot possibly avoid answering it before many weeks are gone—to reflect whether they think the statement the hon. gentleman has submitted, whether they think the prospect of five or six successive deficits, (including those that have already occurred) are a justification for the proposal of these hon. gentlemen to add to the burdens of the Dominion of Canada by an expenditure which they know will exceed thirteen or fourteen millions of dollars—and which will probably exceed fifteen or sixteen millions—among the mountains of British Columbia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on a question on which I entertain but small hopes of being able to agree with the hon. the Minister of Finance, and that is as to the relative merits of the several loans which he and myself negotiated in London. I have admitted always—I admit frankly now—that the loan the hon. gentleman made in 1879 was a good transaction per se. I thought the time was well chosen, and the terms obtained were in my judgment decidedly good. But I also say—and this is the point on which I do not expect his acquiescence—that the terms he got, having reference to the other circumstances of the case, were not one hair's breadth better than those I formerly obtained. I say, Sir, as to the price, if that be a criterion—although the price obtained in London for a loan, as everybody knows, depends in a great degree on causes entirely beyond the control of the Canadian negotiator for the time being—if you go through the whole history of loans since Confederation

I think you will find that the hon. gentleman, with respect to his loan as compared with mine, has no particular cause for exultation. The first loan made on Canadian securities since Confederation was in 1868, when Sir John Rose sold a portion of our five per cent. securities for 90 per cent.; and in the condition of the market at that date, a very good transaction it was. Six years after I sold 4 per cent. securities in London to the extent of four millions sterling at 90 also. Now it does not require much calculation to see that at a distance of six years I obtained better terms than Sir John Rose, by 25 per cent, and if we apply the same rule as the hon. gentleman wants to apply to my loan it would appear I did five times better as compared with Sir John Rose, than the Minister of Finance has done as compared with me. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman succeeded in obtaining a nominal sum of 95 per cent. or so for the loan he made, but the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House that in making that loan he gave extraordinarily favourable allowances; that going to London at the end of July to negotiate his loan, the hon. gentleman had allowed interest to run on the bonds he placed on the market from the 1st of May preceding—in other words, the loan place on the market carried 1 per cent. interest accrued, while subsequent allowances made it amount to 2 per cent. instead of 1, which was the amount allowed on the loans of 1874 and 1876. I do not complain of that. I simply point out that when the hon. gentleman talks of having effected a loan at 95 he ought to tell the House that, with the allowances granted on that loan, it actually netted little more than 93. Now, at the time the hon. gentleman negotiated this loan he would do well to remember that money was cheaper than it had ever been in England before. There is no period in English financial history at which money could be obtained for a considerable length of time for seven-eighths of one per cent., which was the actual rate of discount on the London money market for commercial bills when the hon. gentleman negotiated his last loan. He knows also that there was an unusual accumulation of bullion, and if he wants a further comparison of the merits of the respective transactions, he has only to look at the relative prices of the United States securities in 1874, in 1876, and in 1879. When, in 1874, I negotiated a loan of four millions sterling, and introduced a totally new security, as far as Canada was concerned, into the London market. United States 5 per cents could be obtained on the London market for 104 or 105. When, in 1876, I negotiated a loan at the nominal rate of 91, the United States had just placed a loan on the market at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., for which they obtained 100 $\frac{3}{4}$. In other words, I obtained in 1876 precisely the same rate for Canadian 4 per cent. securities—allowing for the difference in interest—which that great people, the United States, were getting for their $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cents. But, when the hon. gentleman went over to London, I observe that he sold his 4 per cents at what he calls 95, but what was in reality 93, and American 4 per cents were selling at that very time at 104 to 105. In other words, I got as good prices as the United States, and he got 10 per cent. worse. Now I am arguing with the hon. gentleman according to the style of argument adopted by himself and his organs in the public press. I do not desire to take away from him the credit of negotiating a loan on good terms. He is welcome to that credit, and I am even willing to strike an average and put the good price he obtained in 1879 against the bad price he obtained for his loan of 1878. But there are two points on which I think his conduct was censurable. When in the Session of 1879 the hon. gentleman was reviewing the details of the loan of 1878, I called attention very strongly to the fact that the sinking fund of Canada had attained enormous proportions, and that it was extremely desirable that an attempt should be made at the earliest possible moment to get rid of the sinking fund attachment, and I was quite willing to have sustained him to the utmost of my power if he had made any attempt to do so. I regret, Sir, that having such magnificent opportunities as he had last July he should have utterly neglected to make that attempt, and I say that if he had understood thoroughly the advantages of his position Canada would have been relieved for the next thirty years of the necessity of paying \$75,000 a year by way of a sinking fund on account of that loan; and you will recollect that at the present time the sinking fund amounts to \$1,270,000 per annum, and is increasing at the rate of \$50,000 or \$60,000 per year. I say that this is altogether too much, that it has ceased to be useful, and is positively becoming mischievous; and I say it was a great mistake for the hon. gentleman not to make at least an attempt to get rid of the sinking fund. Moreover, I think it would have been better, seeing that money can be borrowed as he avers on such easy terms, seeing that our credit is so high (though I might be permitted to suggest that his intention of seizing seven or eight millions of the currency of the country might appear not exactly to coincide with the opinion he has stated); I say it would have been far better to have taken advantage of that state of things to have paid off the six-per-cents, which have matured, instead of re-investing them as he has done at five per cent.; and in short that had the hon. gentleman availed himself properly of the advantages of the situation our charge for interest to-day might easily have been \$105,000 per year less than it is, and will be during the next thirty years. While I am on the subject I may say that I cannot quite agree with his explanation of the causes of the extraordinary mistake he says he made in the computation of the amount of interest payable this year. I do not understand why a Minister of Finance, in computing the interest to be paid on our funded debt for 1879-80, should have been embarrassed because his predecessor had negotiated certain temporary loans in the year 1878; and if there were, as he says, two or three sums of money borrowed from the Bank of Montreal or other institutions in London, in anticipation of the payment of the Fishery Award on which we knew we had a right to depend—I cannot understand why the existence of one or two advances of that kind should be held a warrant for making a mistake in the amount of interest to be paid in the succeeding year. Nor do I clearly see what purpose his explanation of the several mistakes he made in computing the expenditure for 1878-9 exactly serves. So far as I could understand it, it appeared to me that his statement is virtually that if he had not been mistaken he would have been right in his Estimates, but that unluckily he was mistaken. The hon. gentleman was frank enough to tell us—and I am bound to say it is more than the hon. gentlemen on his side usually admit—that he did not claim that all the prosperity which he says exists in Canada was solely due to the influence of the National Policy. This, Sir, is a valuable admission, and one which I hope gentlemen on the other side will bear in mind. When we come to consider the causes to which such prosperity as we do enjoy is to be attributed, I think we will see the value to be attached to that confession. The facts are that while we have been blessed with a remarkably good harvest there has been a great scarcity, amounting to positive famine, existing through a large portion of Europe; that prices and wages have gone up in the United States, and, as a consequence, there is an improvement in that country—an improvement which gives us better sales for our lumber, and, in certain cases, better rates of transport for our transportation companies. Now, are we to understand that all these things are due to the National Policy? Is it due to the National Policy of the Finance Minister that there was something like six month's continuous rain on the other side of the Atlantic, or are we to understand that the improvement in the United States which has reflected itself on us, which has increased the demand for our lumber and gives us better rates of transport, was produced because the hon. gentleman has been at great pains to reduce our trade with that country; while as to his claim of creating an improvement in the lumber trade and shipping trade, why, Sir, these are the two great interests which he has most hampered and embarrassed; and yet it is for the improvement of these interests that the hon. gentleman takes credit to his Tariff policy. But I perceive that the hon. gentleman has one special cause of exultation. Other things may have disappointed him. He may have made mistakes in computing the amounts he had to pay or the amounts he had to receive, but there was one thing as to which he has not disappointed himself or his friends. The hon. gentleman set himself to the task of reducing the volume of our trade, and he has succeeded admirably. He says our condition is much improved in this respect, and he absolutely boasts that our imports have fallen off and are still falling largely. Well, Sir, there have been persons not altogether unknown in economic circles who have demonstrated pretty plainly that if the exports of any country exceed its imports, that excess arises mainly from this circumstance: that a nation exporting more than it imports is either getting the worst of the bargain or is indebted to other nations, which, though true, is certainly not a cause for great congratulations on our part. I would like to call the attention of the House to some remarkable statements made a few years since by this same hon. gentleman from the very seat he now occupies, which I think will show that there was a time, not so long ago, when a great increase in the importations of the country was not regarded as quite such an alarming circumstance by the hon. gentleman opposite. Here are his words, taken from his own Budget Speech in the Session of 1873:

“Suppose there should be no increase in the importations and in the general trade, which is supposable, but which certainly will not be realised. Let us see what our position would be, then, in the event of our having to fall back on increased taxation. To make up the deficiency, I have stated that in the last five years the average duty collected on imports was 12½ per cent. For the first six months of the current year it was not 10 per cent. Suppose it became necessary to impose additional taxation upon the people, equal to that which has been exacted during the first five years of Confederation, by increasing the average from 10 to 12½ per cent. Has taxation in the past been oppressive? Have our people felt it grievous and hard to bear? I think not. But let us apply that increased taxation to the imports of the present year, which will probably be $125,000,000. This would give us $3,437,500 to meet the interest and sinking fund and the commission, amounting altogether to $3,367,000.”

Now, Sir, you will note three things here: 1st, It was not even “supposable” that our imports would fall below $125,000,000. 2nd, That our rate of taxation was not to be increased more than 2½ per cent. 3rd, That all this was so perfectly certain that we might safely embark in undertakings invoking an addition of several millions a year to our annual expenditure for interest alone; and he goes on to justify on this account the enormous burdens he was then asking permission to lay upon the people. The hon. gentleman who made those statements is now Finance Minister once more. It is true seven years have come and gone since the hon. gentleman held the position which he now occupies. We know that in seven years every fibre of the human frame is said to be changed. Am I to understand—the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) can tell—that a moral as well as a physical revolution takes place in that time? Am I to understand that what was true in 1873 is false to-day? That what was a good reason for congratulation in 1873 would be a source of lamentation and mourning and woe to the Finance Minister now? That what was an admirable basis for his whole future financial policy in 1873 would be a delusion and a snare in 1880? There was one thing, however, that did not change. I had the honour of a seat in this House in 1873, and I recollect that when the remarks I have just read were delivered by the hon. the Minister of Finance, in his usual glowing style, the cheers of his followers were as loud when he boasted of an importation of $125,000,000 as they were when this evening he announced that our imports had fallen to $70,000,000. The hon. Minister of Finance and his supporters are well matched. There never was, I suppose, a Finance Minister who had such very accommodating followers, nor were there ever followers who had such a very accommodating Finance Minister. They remind me forcibly, Mr. Speaker, of the language of the Spanish courtiers in the old ballad of the Cid and his charger:

“Ne'er had they looked on horseman might to yon knight come near,
Nor ever on a steed so meet for such gallant cavalier.”

And if any of them take objection to my metaphor, I would most respectfully assure them that a horse is not the quadruped to which I would of my own special choice compare gentlemen who are persuaded that the best way to increase the wealth of the community is to treble their taxation. There is no doubt one important factor in our present prosperity, to which my hon. friend's characteristic modesty has prevented his making more than a passing allusion, but which I cannot allow to pass unnoticed. We all know he was good enough to make a progress through the country last autumn in order to see how well his policy was promoting the welfare of the people. I desire to say that I entirely repudiate the view taken by some wicked editors, who likened the hon. Minister to a commercial traveller who had filled his customers' orders and was returning for further instructions. I commend his zeal, but I may have doubts whether that zeal was wholly according to knowledge. I may have doubt whether the best means of finding out how the policy actually worked was by means of a number of interviews with different manufacturers, lasting from three to thirty minutes, according to the political predilections of the parties. I may doubt whether the information gleaned was always as strictly accurate as might be desired. Let us put ourselves in the place of the manufacturer being interviewed. Here enters the hon. Minister of Finance with his pleasant manner, and his pocket full of sugar plums for all good little manufacturers, while behind, but visible in the shadow, is the stern visage of the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), with the Customs cat-o'-nine-tails, and all sorts of pains and penalties ready for those wretched infidels who might fail to acknowledge that there is but one Minister of the Interior, and that the Minister of Finance is his prophet. No doubt this was a state of things eminently likely to enable the Minister of Finance to discover the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, but yet I am inclined to think that my hon. friend's simplicity and good nature have been somewhat imposed upon in the course of his peregrinations. It is on record that in former times, in the good old days of the Irish Church establishment, a certain prelate of that Church set out on a progress through his extensive diocese, mainly, I believe, with the view of ascertaining what progress his clergy had made in converting the members of another persuasion. It is also on record that in the course of his progress he came to a parish where the Protestant rector and the Roman Catholic priest lived on terms of great amity, although the rector's congregation consisted only of his own family, a clerk and a sexton. I am happy to say that in this difficult situation the genius of the good rector was equal to the emergency. He borrowed the congregation of his friend the priest for that occasion only, and I may add that the discerning prelate promoted him to a valuable benefice in reward for the extraordinary zeal he had displayed. I will not vouch absolutely for the facts, but I am led to believe that the hon. Finance Minister's good nature was imposed on in a similar way; and that in some of the manufactories he visited the number of parties employed was increased for that day only. I have also heard that wages were raised before the hon. gentleman came to a town, and lowered after he retired. But, Sir, like Lord Chesterfield, I only believe half of what I hear. I do not believe that the wages were raised before he came, but only that they were lowered after he was gone. Again, I am informed that such was the zeal of the workmen to get a glimpse of their great benefactor, that they actually preceded the Finance Minister from floor to floor of certain factories, in order that they might see him and also be seen by him as much as possible. As the hon. gentleman was good enough to give us a statement of the factories that were likely to open in the Dominion—particularly in New Brunswick—I would like him to give a list of those which have actually opened since the 1st of January, 1879, within the Dominion, and then we could form some idea of the actual bonâ fide result of the National Policy. While the hon. gentleman was disporting himself, I was not altogether idle. I took the opportunity of making enquiries throughout the various towns of Ontario as to the actual state of things; how far it was true that new factories had opened; how far those gentlemen engaged in manufacturing enterprises could report direct benefit from the increased duties. I corresponded with Ottawa, Prescott, Brockville, and some twenty-five or thirty other towns in Ontario, containing an aggregate of about 300,000 souls, and I regret very much to say that the result of my enquiries was, that although no doubt there have been the usual number of small factories started in various places, there have been likewise the usual number of small factories shut up, and those with whom I communicated were unable to discover any benefit accruing from this policy except to two or three industries. I would ask the hon. gentleman one plain question. Is he able, after all his enquiries, to lay his finger on as many as twelve factories in the Province of Ontario, each employing 100 hands and upwards, which have opened since the 1st of January, 1879. I do not say that even if he could that would be in the least a sufficient justification for the burdens he has inflicted upon the people. But I say if he cannot do that I think the House can form for themselves a tolerably accurate estimate of what the National Policy has done up to the present time in the way of providing employment for the idle people of Canada. For my own part, Sir—I am open to correction if I am wrong—I do not believe that apart from two or three sugar refineries and cotton factories, the hon. gentleman would be able to name, from one end of the Dominion to another, so many as twelve factories, each employing 100 men or upwards, which have opened since the commencement of this policy. There is no doubt that some few individuals must reap a very great benefit from the operation of the Tariff. No doubt that when seven millions of additional taxes are inflicted upon a people, even though much may be wasted, still a large portion goes into the pockets of a favoured few; and as the hon. gentleman desires to know how we can say that the country pays seven millions while the revenue returns show no increase, I may tell him that while nobody has pretended that he has put seven millions into the Treasury, what we have asserted is that of the seven millions which he takes out of the pockets of the people of this country a very small part goes into the Treasury and the greater portion into the pockets of a few manufacturers. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has fostered some industries—for instance the industry of smuggling, which was depressed some years ago, is rapidly reviving under the fostering influence of the hon. gentleman. Moreover, Sir, although the hon. gentleman dwelt very lightly on this point, I am afraid he will find that his Excise duties have already resulted in a great development of illicit distillation in different parts of the country, and also in the adulteration of liquors, although the hon. gentleman may not regard that as a very serious evil. I observe that the hon. gentleman himself has, and I know his organs have, made it a matter of complaint that we have not praised him for the general rise in prices that has taken place. Although this is a curious cause of exultation so far as the consumer is concerned, I am willing, for my part, to give the hon. gentleman the credit which he undoubtedly deserves for the rise in prices that has taken place in sugar, iron, bread, fuel, tea, coffee, cloth, and cotton, and in almost all articles of prime necessity within the Dominion of Canada—and I might add that things are not only dearer but worse. The fact of the matter is that in Canada our market is so small that it is easy in many cases for existing manufacturing and industries to combine together—and I am afraid that is one of the points which put us at a great disadvantage with the people of the United States, for, however mistaken their policy may be still in the great majority of cases, their market is so large that competition enables them to secure more reasonable prices, and, as a rule, excellence of workmanship, and so to escape at least one of the difficulties which exist here. But there is another and a far more important question to be considered. We have seen how the hon. gentleman's policy affects the revenue. I desire now to see how it affects the general interests of the great mass of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman has told us how pleased a few scores of manufacturers were with his visit. I do not doubt it in the least. I do not doubt that, apart from the pleasure of being visited by the hon. gentleman, which is a great one, these manufacturers were aware that a visit from a Minister of Finance was not a bad advertisement at the worst. And the hon. gentleman's organs have never been tired of repeating how zealously these favoured parties banquetted the hon. gentleman, and how pleasing it was to listen to the little duet between the sympathising Minister and the sympathising manufacturers— one party chanting the praises of a Minister of Finance who really felt for deserving manufacturers, and the other declaring how good and pleasant it was to find a body of patriotic individuals who were willing to support the present Ministry in return for the trifling privilege of putting their hands into the public till.

Now I would like to say a few words in explanation of the manner in which this policy affects a few hundreds of thousands of workingmen and artisans throughout this country. Was it not this Ministry's special boast, was it not their special pledge that they, if they got into power, would provide plentiful wages and plentiful employment for each and every workingman throughout the Dominion of Canada? Do we not know how the heart of the venerable leader of the House bled inwardly, as he himself has told us, all the time he was out of office, at the woes of the workingmen? Do we not remember how the Minister of Railways was in the habit of holding me up to execration throughout the Maritime Provinces, because, as he said, his fellow-countrymen were in danger of being trampled under the iron heel of an Ontario Minister of Finance? while, as for the Minister of Finance himself, he had no words with which to express his deep sense of the importance of the question. The position of the artisan was, as he told the people of St. John, the true question of the day. I well recollect the righteous indignation with which the hon. gentleman rebuked me in that city, because, as he said, I had imposed a tax on tea which discriminated unjustly against the poor man in favour of the rich. It is true that I submitted proof that the total extent of this discrimination amounted to about one-half cent per head per annum. But it was the principle for which the hon. gentleman contended, and I could obtain no indulgence at his hands on account of the unfair mode in which that particular tax affected the workingman. Now I would like to show how these hon. gentlemen have reduced their theories to practice. I do not propose to indulge in any vague rhetoric, I do not propose to indulge in any idle declamation, but simply to give the actual facts so far as they have been ascertained, or so far as they can be ascertained, showing the true incidence of taxation under this Tariff upon the ordinary artisan and workingman in this country. What I mean is what these taxes compel these persons to pay over the counter as it were. I do not at all mean only what goes into the Treasury, for it is the very essence of the protective system that taxes so imposed should not go into the-

Treasury but go into the pockets of certain private individuals or industries to be fostered. I cannot profess to deal absolutely exhaustively with this subject. I have selected seven classes of articles largely consumed. It is quite true that there is a very great variation in individual cases, as there always will be owing to the age, number and sex of members of families, and a great many other considerations familiar to hon. gentlemen opposite. But this one thing is certain, that under our present Tariff the more needy a man may be, the more mouths he has to feed the, heavier is the incidence of taxation upon him. I may add also that the immediate effects may not be as clearly visible as they will be in a few years, because many of the people have some past accumulations to fall back on. But though the full effects may not show themselves at once, still I think, after I have given a few examples to the House, they will see that there is great need to do something to relieve these poor people from the pressure of the burdens now imposed on them. I may remark that with a view to accommodate myself as far as I can to the wishes of the Finance Minister, I have selected two or three examples from the city of St. John, which is a place where the operation of the Tariff is perhaps as clearly felt as any other part of the Dominion. I find from an actual account stated that an artisan residing in St. John, having a family of four, and an income of $350 a year, has to pay on the tea and coffee he consumes a tax of $1.56; on the sugar and molasses he consumes $6.42; on seven barrels of flour $3.50; on five tons of coal $2.50; on coal oil $1.20; while on his clothing, dry goods, and articles of that description the tax amounts to no less than $40. The result is that out of an income of $350 this person is compelled to pay taxes to the extent of $59.93. On seven articles alone Take the case of another artisan, having a family of five and an income of $416. I find by actual examination—because these are persons who are prudent, temperate and sober, and who keep a pretty accurate account of what they spend—that he pays on tea and coffee a tax of

$1.92; on sugar and molasses, $10.40; on flour and oatmeal $6.50; on coal, $3.50; on coal oil about half that amount; on dry goods, etc. about $26; in all, $57. I take the case of another artisan, residing in St. John, with a family of six, and an income of $520. Here I find his tax on tea amounts to $3; on sugar, $7.60; on flour, $6.50; on the dry goods and clothing, which his family consumes, by actual record, $68.25, in all (including tax on boots and shoes) $90 or over. The last case with which I shall trouble the House is that of a man having a family of nine, and an income of $600. Here I find that on the self same articles the total taxation amounted to about $88. In the case of a clerk, having a family of six and an income of $1,100 I find that the taxation on these articles amounted to $74.33. You must remember that to these taxes must be added a reasonable proportion of Excise duties, which amount as nearly as may be to about $6.50 for each adult male in this Dominion; and if you allow an extremely small amount for taxes on such matters as furniture, medicine, books, tools, etc., of which each family must consume some small quantity, you will find, I think, that it is not an exaggerated statement to make, that the result of the hon. gentleman's taxation amounts to this that from one-fourth to one-fifth of the income of the great majority of persons having an income of less than $600 a year is at this present moment taken from them in consequence of the taxation imposed by this Tariff. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman has ever considered what the result of such taxes as this may be. I wonder if he knows how many persons in this Dominion are affected by a taxation pressing so heavily on incomes below $600. If he will condescend to examine the census returns, I think he will find that I am correct in stating that from five sixths to nine-tenths of our whole population are very seriously affected by the taxation that he has imposed, and which is utterly unprecedented at any rate in the history of Canada. The practical result of this Tariff is that whereas it is very largely from the savings of these classes that all great national accumulations are made, he will find that if he persists in inflicting this taxation that he will not merely paralyse their hopes of accumulating any saving, but he will interfere gravely with the proper education, perhaps even with the proper nourishment of the people and their children. One of these results must follow. Either these persons must greatly reduce their standard of comfort or lose all chance of bettering their condition. I can quite understand that hon. gentlemen who have not examined this question may think that the figures I have quoted are greatly in excess of any burthen of taxation which can possibly be imposed. But they must remember that this Tariff is so adjusted that by far the heaviest rates of taxation fall precisely on those classes of articles which the poorer portion of the community most largely consume. Hon. gentlemen must remember also that the real truth is apt to be worse than the figures show. If there is one thing more certain than another it is this that the poorest man is always the man who gets the least money value for his wages. He is the man who has always to pay most for everything he consumes, whether it be a pound of sugar or an ounce of tea, or a hundred weight of coal, or a loaf of bread, and he must always pay a higher rate of interest if he gets credit at all. I cannot imagine anything more damaging or more likely to affect prejudicially the most vital interests of the country than this scheme of taxation. The hon. gentleman has so managed it, that in proportion to the poverty of the man the larger is the amount demanded from him. The poorer he is under this Tariff, the larger sum in proportion to his income he will inevitably pay. Possibly the hon. the Minister of Finance may have observed this tendency. Possibly he may design to cure it on homœopathic principles. Or is it that the hon. Finance Minister is going to turn vegetarian, or has he become a convert to the doctrine of that great economist Mr. Bundell, and inclined to believe that the great fault of our people is that they have been too well fed in the past and they must be reduced to a diet that will bring them to proper submission to the yoke he has placed upon them. I would like to read to members of the House the opinion recently expressed by a distinguished English statesman as to the mode in which taxation ought to be inflicted on the people of a country. "It is a peculiarity" said Lord Derby at Liverpool the other day, "it is a peculiarity of this country, and I think a happy peculiarity, that the classes whose incomes are under £150 (i. e. $750) the class that is who live by weekly wages may relieve themselves almost entirely from taxation if they think fit." Now I hold that is a true statesmanlike utterance. There can be no greater mistake on the part of a statesman here or elsewhere than to impose on the great mass of the people whose incomes are below the figures named by Lord Derby, any taxes requiring them to pay over a considerable proportion of their earnings either to the Treasury or to private parties. Under any circumstances (though perhaps less so in Canada than in other countries) the reward of manual labour is generally far too small. I say it is a crime and a folly to make it smaller. If these gentlemen choose to tell us that they are aiming to create a privileged class, well and good. Then we will understand what kind of a contest we have entered upon. The true aim of every honest statesman in framing a tariff ought to be in the first place so to frame it that it will give no unfair advantage to any one class over another, and most of all so to frame it that it shall not oppress poor men. The aim of intriguing politicians in every country has been so to frame their tariff that as many dishonest advantages may be gained under it as possible from whence they can obtain political influence to keep themselves in their places. It is idle and worse than idle, to say that the incidence of this taxation is compensated or can be compensated by any increased wages which can be obtained. In former times we could say in Canada with some truth, that although Canada was not a country in which it was very easy to gather together great individual fortunes, still Canada at any rate had this honourable distinction that on the whole the distribution of property was tolerably even and fair throughout the Dominion. I say that this distinction has been entirely taken away, and I warn hon. gentlemen that by their further oppression they will bring down upon themselves consequences which they may little anticipate. Sir, men have risen in revolt for far less cause than to free themselves from the burdens now inflicted on the community, and fortunate it is that our people are patient and law-abiding in no ordinary degree. Still, I warn hon. gentlemen that there is a point at which even the most patient and law-abiding people might be tempted to take the law in their own hands. Passing from this question I desire to review the working of certain special anomalies in the Tariff which, as was pointed out last year, could have but one result. I see that the hon. gentleman proposes to add somewhat to the tax on coal. Now it may be interesting to ascertain what, up to the present time, this tax, which was not imposed for revenue, but to aid miners in Nova Scotia and to foster Intercolonial trade, has done for the objects which the hon. gentleman then stated he had in view. On looking over the hon. gentleman's trade returns, I see from the time the coal duties were imposed, to the 1st of February, 1880, the returns showed 937,000 tons imported in ten and a-half months, and in the whole year 1878 only 892,000, so that under the stimulating effect of the 50 cent. duty we have already an increase of 45,000 tons over the quantity imported when there was no duty. What has this done for the miners of Nova Scotia? One thing is perfectly clear, not a ton more has been raised, but everything these miners use has been increased in price. I would like to call attention to the peculiar folly of this tax, and what I say of it is equally true of the tax on flour and iron. It does not merely oppose every principle of political economy, but every principle of common sense. One of the main objects of a good financier should be to take as little as possible out of the people's pocket, more than he puts into the Treasury. Now, what are you doing here? In taxing coal you tax motive power. You tax the wages of the workman and increase the cost of transport. In fact, I suppose if the full effect of this tax could be traced, through and through, instead of 50 cents, it would prove to be 75 cents or more taken out of the pockets of the consumer. I was astonished to hear the hon. gentleman lay down the doctrine that you could balance the loss such a tax inflicted on one class of the community by inflicting an equivalent burden on another at the opposite extremity of the Dominion.

Does he mean that if you take 50 cents from the Nova Scotian fisherman for each barrel of flour he consumes, that he is fully compensated by your taxing an Ontario artisan 50 cents on every ton of coal he burns? And if this is his doctrine, what will he do for the workingman of St. John's, who has to pay both taxes? This is a most wonderful specimen of financial balancing of accounts. Then the hon. gentleman told us of the beneficial effects of the differential tax on tea. What are the facts? In the first six months of 1878-9 we imported 6,070,000 lbs. of tea, the duty being $341,000, and in the same period of 1879-80, 6,063,000 lbs. of tea, but only received a duty of $315,000, showing a reduction of $26,000; in other words the people pay 10 per cent. more and the revenue received $25,000 less; and when he talks of our direct trade with China and Japan, the hon. gentleman knows quite well that the only result has been that certain American ships on certain American lines of transport, have brought tea from China and Japan by San Francisco and New York and by no other way, and I am very dubious indeed whether the men who have clamoured for this imposition of a differential duty on tea will not find that they have simply invited American competition. As to the tax on spirits and wines the hon. gentleman's returns show that he received in the first half year of 1878-9 a total of $613,000 on wines and spirits, while in the half year, ending on the 1st of January, he got only $533,000. I suspect that the hon. gentleman will soon find that it is utterly impossible to impose very heavy duties in that quarter without increasing, smuggling or diminishing consumption; and although we do not expect him to know much about this special subject, surely one of his colleagues might have given him a hint as to the evil results caused in that direction. I much fear myself, that what between the joint efforts of the Minister of Finance and the phylloxera, good wine will soon become a fond tradition of the past. But passing from these minor matters, we come to, perhaps the very finest financial exploit of the hon. gentleman, that "greatest, grandest, sweetest" effort of his peculiar genius, the duty on sugar. This is a grand double monopoly. There is first the monopoly of refining or washing the sugar itself. There is secondly a complete monopoly of all speculation in this article, one of absolutely universal consumption. Now the results of the hon. gentleman's policy have been so very remarkable that I must call the special attention of the House to the subject. Our average consumption of sugar may be put at about 110,000,000lb., from which we got, under the old Tariff, about $2,500,000 or $2,600,000 a year. Now we have imported during the last six months 64,000,000lb. of sugar, as against 61,500,000lb. which we imported in the corresponding six months of 1878-9. In 1878-9, during these six months, we received $1,353,000 of duty, according to the hon. gentleman's own Customs returns, and in the last six months of 1879-80 $1,080,000, being a loss in six months of just $270,000, or say $540,000 a year as compared with the results under the old Tariff! That is to say, the hon. gentleman has added from 25 to 50 per cent. to our old rate of taxation on this article, and he has lost at least 25 per cent. of our former revenue. This is a veritable triumph of genius. Let us see what we do get in return. We have got a sugar refinery in which some 300 persons are employed. We find, however, at this moment, that if there were no duty on sugar, we could obtain sugars from the Clyde or New York for from 3 to 3½ cents per lb. less than we have to pay at present, so that about 3½ cents per lb. is imposed on that article, in taxes which do not come to the National Treasury, but partly to the Treasury and partly to a combination of sugar refiners, in return for which taxation representing a total burden on the people of Canada of fully $3,500,000 a year, perhaps $2,000,000 may go into the Treasury and $1,500,000 to employ about 300 men in Montreal. In other words, we pay for these men altogether something like $5,000 a year per head, just about as much as the salary of a Nova Scotia Chief Justice, and just about as much as the salary of a Cabinet Minister in former days. Why, Sir, this million and a half would nearly equal our total deficit and nearly double double the total amount of the hon. gentleman's most odious taxes on bread and fuel. And his justification is that the sugar refinery gives employment to 300 or perhaps 400 hands! Let me enumerate the achievements of the hon. gentleman. Apparently the only taxes which he did not impose for purposes of revenue, but for the encouragement of intercolonial trade (which by the way he now admits they have not done), are the only ones from which he has really got any money. Apparently too, the only two leading industries, lumber and shipping, which he did not try to foster, are the only ones in which there is visible any clear or substantial improvement. I might add, Sir, that he has entirely and absolutely lost the whole benefit of the great rise in prices which has taken place throughout the world. In spite of all the advantages that have accrued to the revenue from that advance, he himself admits that the Tariff has failed in supplying the deficit, and he has failed utterly in showing us where we are going to obtain that home market on which he was wont to insist so much. It is true that, although he gives a different explanation from that of my hon. friend behind me, he has succeeded in half depopulating the city of St. John, and it is also true also that whereas it ought to be the special aim of a Finance Minister to take no more from the pocket of the taxpayer than he puts in the Treasury, the hon. gentleman has been even better than his word in the opposite direction, seeing that whereas he told us last year that he was obliged to put on $7,000,000 taxation in order to get $2,000,000 of revenue, it now appears that he has put on the whole of the $7,000,000, but that we have not got one cent of the two millions he promised. I have no wish to be hard on the hon. the Minister of Finance. We know perfectly well whom the hon. gentleman represents. We know pretty well why he was chosen for the place he now fills. We know it was a case of clear and stern political necessity. We know that when the last election was pending, it was absolutely necessary that a certain class of influential voters should have some decent pretext for supporting the present Administration, and the hon. Minister of Finance was expected to afford that pretext. We know that it was also necessary in carrying out the policy proclaimed last year, that a Finance Minister should be found who would combine these requisites. He must be a man of good position, of plausible address, of thoroughly respectable character, and very obliging disposition, and lastly, must have a mind perfectly free from all regard for, and indeed from all knowledge of those antiquated doctrines of political economy which the hon. gentleman has trampled under foot with such remarkable results. Sir, let us be just. Given such a situation, where could a better selection than the hon. gentleman's have been made? The hon. gentleman has alluded to the general results of his Tariff. He has alluded to its results to agriculturists, lumbermen, fishermen, ship-owners, and other persons engaged in the like callings. I shall briefly review the results of his policy. Everyone knows what these hon. gentlemen promised. The agriculturist, they said, should have better prices all round. Everyone knows that besides they were promised a large additional home market. Now, Sir, I believe it is true that so far as the article of wheat is concerned—no thanks to the hon. gentlemen opposite—there has been a considerable rise in price. This was not unnatural in view of the famine in Europe. But I happen to reside close to a great barley-growing district. And I know very well that the price of that cereal, which used to be about $1.00 a bushel, has fallen during the last year to from 50 to 60 cents. While, if we go into a comparison of the prices that ruled for most articles that the farmer produces before the imposition of this Tariff and after we find some remarkable results. I find that the difference in the price of wheat in Chicago and Toronto before the imposition of the Tariff, was 11 cents in favour of Toronto, and I find by the last quotations, for the month of January, that wheat in Chicago was then 4 cents higher in Chicago than in Toronto. Before the Tariff was imposed, Toronto had the advantage of 14 cents over Chicago in the price of oats, but now Toronto has only an advantage of 1½ cents over Chicago. Now with regard to the price of rye. Toronto had an advantage of 10 cents per bushel over Chicago before the National Policy; now the price is 5 cents in favour of Chicago. I do not pretend to say that there are not other causes than the National Policy for this difference. But these hon. gentlemen and their friends and supporters told our farmers and everybody else that the inevitable result of the imposition of this Tariff would be a rise of prices in those articles to a far higher figure than before; and although the result I have stated may not of itself condemn the National Policy, it does unquestionably condemn the men who made those promises as having either talked of things they did not understand or having deliberately made false promises to the people. As to our home market, where is there an agricultural county in Ontario which has received any perceptible benefit from the development of any industry in its midst? Hon. gentlemen opposite say that their policy is due the improvement in the prospects of the lumbermen of this country. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say, after imposing heavy taxation on every article employed in the production of lumber, and largely diminishing the purchasing power of the wages of the lumbermen, he is entitled to claim credit for an improvement here? Does he pretend to say that he has benefited any of the great transporting industries which also have derived considerable advantages from the causes I have pointed out? And lastly, have the great bulk of manufacturers any cause to thank these hon. gentlemen? I know very well that some of them may have derived some temporary advantages from the National Policy so-called. But I also know that a large number of the best of our manufacturers are fully convinced that this policy is a great injury to them. They find that the cost of the raw material has increased, that in addition they will have to raise the wages of their workmen; while, on the other hand, they find that the power to buy of the customers with whom they deal has diminished under the effects of the Tariff. They find that they cannot raise their home prices sufficiently to compensate them for the increased taxation, and that they fight at a disadvantage in the struggle for foreign markets, and that all the hopes held out to them and to other classes are fast proving themselves an utter delusion. The hon. gentleman said last year in one of his speeches that the agriculturists of this country bear too small a proportion of the taxation.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I did not say so. I said they did not pay as much as other classes.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I say that if the hon. gentleman had known, as he ought to have known, how much the farmers of Ontario—of those of his own Province I cannot speak so accurately—contribute to the Revenue, he never would have made the assertion that the agriculturists of Canada do not pay as much as other classes. But even if that were the case—assuming it to be a fact for argument's sake—he may console himself with the reflection that that reproach upon the farmers of Canada has been for ever taken away, for, under his Tariff there is no one thing, except the food which the farmer raises and consumes, which is not and will not continue to be most heavily taxed. And, Sir, his Tariff hits these men in another quarter also; for, in addition to being heavily taxed, their charges for freight are considerably increased seeing that the hon. gentleman at one and the same time has added to the charges for the transportation of their grain, while by diminishing the imports he is virtually compelling the farmer to pay freight both ways. There is one cause of this great mistake which is patent enough to everyone who has examined the inception of this so-called National Policy, and that is the unfortunate and silly copyism of the United States which marks every feature of this Tariff. I say, Sir, even if the United States were right in their fiscal policy—which I deny—that is no good ground for believing that we would be right in copying them. When hon. gentlemen opposite hold up the conduct of the United States as a model for our guidance, they forget entirely these important facts—that they have a vastly greater market than we, (which, of itself, does away with a large amount of the mischiefs incidental to protection,) and that they have an enormously greater range of products; and they forget also that the United States are virtually a confederation of thirty-nine or forty nations, which have the most perfect system of Free trade on earth among themselves, and for that reason one of the main arguments on which the hon. gentlemen opposite depends, is in its essence entirely fallacious. I say with regard to the United States that a people possessing their natural advantages would, long ere this, have monopolised a vast proportion of the manufacturing and carrying trade of the world, had they consented to adopt a reasonable fiscal policy. As it is, what is the case? Why, after a protection of one hundred years or more, their iron manufacturers are unable to make a steel rail that can enter into competition with the English article, and they now have a duty in their favour of about 100 per cent. Look at the results to the shipping trade of the United States. Very recently I had occasion to examine a return, showing the number of vessels passing through the Suez Canal. Of some 1,400 ships of large burthen, 1,280, as nearly as I can remember, bore the flag of England, the remainder being distributed in various proportions among several Maritime Powers, Japan and the United States contributing one vessel each to the quota. Look at the proportion of manufactures exported by the United States. After all they have done to promote native industry, how utterly insignificant is the proportion their manufactures bear to the natural products they export. Now I desire to say a word or two upon a point on which the hon. gentleman has dwelt at great length, that is, the true condition of our trade relations with the United States. I doubt, Sir, very much, the wisdom of the course he has taken in devoting a considerable portion of his Budget Speech to show that we have considerably reduced our trade with the United States, and that by our Tariff we discriminate against the United States and in favour of Great Britain. If there has been one subject more utterly misrepresented than another by these same hon. gentlemen, and their organs and supporters, it is the real position of our trade with the United States. The fact is that the large nominal balance in favour of the United States is almost wholly composed of a great variety of articles passing through Canada from the United States to Europe, or else articles from foreign countries passing through the United States to us. We sell to the United States quite as much of our own productions as we take from them, and the result shown by the figures the hon. gentlemen are wont to quote is merely owing to the misleading mode of entering the items in our trade and navigation returns. I see that our annual importations from the United States last year were $43,739,000. Of this agricultural products, animals, and a certain quantity of wood in transit represented $10,530,000. There came to us through the United States from other countries, various articles, including hides, wool, etc., amounting to $2,770,000, while we imported of bullion in excess of our exports something like $900,000. In all of our nominal imports $14,200,000 come under the categories I have described. As regards our trade with the United States, therefore, our genuine imports from that country in 1878-9 were $29,500,000, (including a large amount for which they were simply middlemen for our own special convenience,) while our exports amounted to $27,365,000. Our imports from Great Britain were $31,000,000, while our genuine exports were $25,800,000. It is plain, therefore, that the parties who assert that the balance of trade has been largely in favour of the United States, and against us, argue under an utter delusion as to the relations really existing between the two countries. The hon. gentleman dwelt at some length upon his desire to sustain British connection, and he likewise told us that it was entirely a mistake to suppose that British statesmen had anything but the most friendly feeling toward the people of Canada. I am willing to believe that this is the case, in fact I myself might know it to be so, but for all that it would be a great error to believe that either the statesmen or the people of Great Britain look with any degree of pleasure or satisfaction on the policy Canada has adopted. The Marquis of Salisbury, who will probably succeed the present Prime Minister on his retirement, has spoken in this fashion on the late conduct of the Dominion of Canada:

“When you look at the map of the world you see that all the countries we trade with are not foreign countries, that an enormous tract of it owns the sovereignty of Her Majesty, and we naturally ask, are there the same insuperable obstacles, the same dead wall of protection, the same hopelessness of the spread of sound economic doctrine? I speak in a moment of deep discouragement, because one of the most important dependencies of the Crown, Canada, has adopted a course which we all must deeply regret. The opinion has been expressed by a distinguished statesman, with whom I do not usually agree, that this act of the people of Canada will make a deep impression on the minds of the people of this country, and from that judgment of his I cannot dissent. I think it will make a deep impression in their minds, and I think it will modify their feelings. But hoping our brethren beyond the sea will take a wiser and more liberal view of the tie that unites us, and of the commercial advantages which a liberal estimate of our relations will secure for both, I pass on to the dependency over whose action we have a direct and predominant influence.”

Well, Sir, I am of opinion that the Marquis of Salisbury is as likely to be correctly informed as to the feeling of the statesmen and people of England as the hon. gentleman is from any evidence he could have secured in his somewhat hurried visit to the Mother Country last year or the year before. Nor do I think it will very greatly impress the people of England, in view of the large diminution of their trade to this country to be told that although we have shut them out to a very great extent we have shut out the people of the United States to a much greater extent, in both cases to our own serious loss and detriment. The hon. gentleman alluded to the former prosperity which we enjoyed in this country. I have pointed out that, to a very considerable extent, what he calls solid prosperity was in reality a period of inflation, and I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that it was during the time when a protective policy was in force—from 1858 to 1865 during the very period when our minimum tariff was 20 per cent. and much higher on many articles—we had those serious and extraordinary deficits to which I called attention in the opening part of my remarks. And it was not until we threw overboard our protective tariff that prosperity returned under an average revenue tariff of 15 per cent. In some respects it seems to me our position is closely analogous to that we occupied at the commencement of Confederation. No doubt there has been a great weeding out among our commercial classes; no doubt some people have had to practice economy to an unpleasant degree, but there has also been a good deal of solid, substantial improvement in many directions. I look forward with considerable hope to the future; I believe there would be an excellent chance for Canada to rally had it not been for the unfortunate measures adopted by the present Government, under the delusion that they could enlarge our home market. I fear the benefit we might have gained and the lesson we ought to have learnt have both been thrown away. The Minister of Finance must know that he has been on the very verge of a precipice during the past year. Had our harvest been only an average one, had the harvest of the other side of the Atlantic been even an ordinary one, he would have run a very great chance of having his deficit increased by one or even two millions. He has escaped—no thanks to his own foresight or policy, but to a combination of favourable accidents, which may not occur again. I think it quite possible that the development which seems likely to take place in the North-West will aid us to a very great extent. I think it likely that their plan of inviting English tenant farmers to examine the country—and this is one of the few points on which I am able to commend the action of hon. gentlemen opposite—and the probable break-up of the English land system, may bring us considerable advantages. But I would ask the Finance Minister and the House what possible connection can the National Policy have with either of these causes of prosperity. I said just now that our position reminded me of that in which we found ourselves in 1867-8. I desire briefly to summarise our financial position since that period, dividing it into three main periods: (1) The administration of the present First Minister from 1867 to 1873; (2) The period when my hon. friend from Lambton held power; (3) The period from the accession of the present Ministry until now. In the first instance, everybody who knows the history of Canada will know that never had any set of men such magnificent opportunities as the First Minister and his colleagues from 1867 to 1873. Unhappily, our history records not how these opportunities were taken advantage of, but how they were misused; how our very prosperity was made a pretext and a means for enormously increasing the annual expenditure, and committing us to stupendous engagements, the like to which no nation in our circumstances or possessing our population ever before thought of taking upon themselves. Then, Sir, came the period when my hon. friend from Lambton was called upon to take the reigns of power. Sir, that Government came into office to find our annual expenditure monstrously swollen, to find, as I said, a vast mass of engagements undischarged and in a very short time thereafter to be called upon to confront a world-wide commercial depression, resulting in a most extraordinary depreciation in the value of almost all those articles from which our revenue was derived. And I say to these hon. gentlemen that we are not afraid to compare our conduct during that period with that of any other Government in similar circumstances and to show that we faced all these difficulties fairly, though we were not, we could not be, able entirely to avert the existence of deficits; and hon. gentlemen will find in spite of all their assertions that they will not be able to avert deficits under far more favourable circumstances. But to a great extent we had succeeded in clearing away those entanglements, and the road was open to a return to prosperity with a small increase—probably without any increase at all—to the national burdens. And I say the special fault of these gentlemen has been, that instead of allowing this to take place they have chosen to adopt a radically false system, a system which some among them must know to be radically false, and which must, I fear, issue in plunging them and the whole country yet deeper in difficulty, deeper in perennial deficits than ever. Now, Sir, we have commenced the third period. These gentlemen have come back, having promised all things to all men, and most undoubtedly, so far, the fulfilment has been of a very remarkable kind. Up to this time, as I said before, the way in which these promises of returning confidence and returning prosperity have been fulfilled has been by the multiplication of bankruptcies and by the destruction of several of our banks, by the very serious deficit of the past year and by the promise of more most serious deficits during the two years succeeding. We have had imposed upon us a huge burden of taxation; we are committing ourselves to huge undertakings—far greater than, in my opinion, our present resources warrant us in undertaking; we have thrown away all the gain our revenue might have received from the upward turn in the market, and we have formally adopted a policy which may be defined as especially adapted to encourage thieving, bribery and corruption and to discourage honest industry. But, apart from the results from a moral point of view, it cannot be denied that there are very serious risks ahead of these hon. gentlemen. So far as they do succeed in creating a home market, it is inevitable that they must largely lose revenue. It is inevitable that, in such case, they must have recourse, as I see they propose to have recourse, to a large issue of money on the security of the Government and they must dispense with all those safeguards which were formerly required, and which were not one whit too great; or they must have recourse to fresh taxation on the prime necessities of life. In these very Estimates submitted to us we see, in spite of the enormous increase of our annual expenditure, that they are about to commit us to a wholly unjustifiable expenditure in British Columbia. We know that throughout the whole of the Federal Provinces are demands being made on the Dominion Treasury which they will find it very difficult to resist, the more so that they themselves have been the very parties who have originally encouraged these demands. Had not the Minister of Finance chosen in 1873, at the very moment when he was incurring other enormous liabilities, to show the various Provincial Governments that by putting sufficient pressure on him they could obtain relief from the Dominion Treasury, I believe that not only our financial position but that of the several Provinces would have been infinitely better than either is to-day. What he then did was substantially to tear up the whole financial basis of our Confederation, and he has only himself to thank if, as I fear, those persons whom he formerly taught how to make raids upon the Dominion Treasury will turn upon him at the precise instant when it is most inconvenient to meet their demands. I say nothing, Sir, at present on the grave political and social questions which the action of that hon. gentleman is stirring up further than this, that I believe that no one thing could have been done more likely to foster and encourage a spirit of annexation than these hon. gentlemen's policy. That policy affords the greatest possible leverage to every man who desires to break the connection between this country and Great Britain. I say no possible reply from an economic standpoint can be made to the arguments of these people so long as we preserve a Protective system; and I know perfectly well that not a few of these hon. gentlemen's advisers support and aid them in their course, because they believe that will be the inevitable result. It is true that the present Ministry affect to deprecate this, and they say—and I am willing to believe them—that they have no such intention. But I warn them that, if the next harvest should prove to be an unfavourable one, they will run a great risk of creating a most formidable agitation, for which they alone will be responsible, but which it will be impossible for them to control. It is possible that good may come out of evil. It is possible that, as the misgovernment and mismanagement of the Administration which ruled in Canada from 1855 to 1862 resulted in the scheme of Confederation, from which, in spite of all that has come and gone, I yet trust much benefit may accrue to our country, so it may be that the enormous pressure of taxation under this Tariff on the poorer classes of the community may lead to a better readjustment of our whole fiscal system than we have ever been able to bring about before. It may be also that the conduct of these hon. gentlemen in excluding British manufactures, in practically setting at defiance the whole policy of the Empire, may lead to a reconsideration of the terms of our relations and those of other Colonies to the whole British Empire. And it may be that the people of Canada will at last learn a lesson, after a year or two's experience of those gentlemen's panacea, and that they will come to understand that, if a people wish to increase their receipts, the best mode is not by bolting and barring their doors against their best customers; and that, if they wish to diminish their expenditures, they are not likely to attain that end by taking back into their employment servants who had been dismissed previously for flagrant dishonesty. I observe that hon. gentlemen have on various occasions put forward a pitiful plea for time. It will not do, they say, to pull up the seed to see whether the tree has taken root. Well, Sir, all I have to say is this, that was not the language these hon. gentlemen were in the habit of using eighteen months or two years ago. Then we heard nothing of the necessity of waiting one or two or three or five years before seeing the true result of the National Policy. But besides I say that this plea is utterly at variance with the actual facts of the case. I say that there could hardly by any possibility be an occasion—if there was any necessity, as they averred, for artificially developing the manufacturing industries of the country—when there were better opportunities of doing so than in 1878. Never was capital more cheap or more abundant, not only here, but in England and the United States. Never could raw material or machinery or good buildings be obtained more cheaply than in that year. The whole subject had been thoroughly discussed for some years, and every man who was at all likely to engage in such occupations had ample time to make up his mind how best to employ his money. I must admit that I have been considerably astonished at the almost complete and total failure which has attended their efforts. It is only explicable in one way, namely, that the ground was so fully occupied before that there was little room in Canada for the establishment of new manufactures, unless indeed at enormous cost. That, I believe, is the true explanation of the failure of these hon. gentlemen to establish any new industries, giving employment to any considerable number of men, in spite of the stimulus which their Tariff affords. Of course we all know that some industries will be established from time to time. There is always considerable natural growth in a country like this, and it may well be, after so long a period of depression as that which existed from 1874-5 to the present time, that some development of the manufacturing industries of the country may take place, that they will share with others in the natural improvement which may arise from other causes. But I say apart from this there is no reasonable chance that these gentlemen will be able to establish any considerable number of new industries in Canada unless, as in the case of sugar and cotton, they are prepared to inflict a most enormous taxation on the whole mass of the people of Canada for the sole benefit of one or two such manufacturers. And I tell them also that, though they may postpone the day of reckoning, that day is not likely to be very distant. I say that the result of the victory of June, to which my hon. friend referred, shows what is the true opinion of a large section of the Dominion. These gentlemen now allege that the case is very different, that their policy was not on trial. What is the reason then that hon. gentlemen bestirred themselves so much; that they went to the chief cities of Ontario before the election, and declared in the most public and emphatic manner that they must regard its result as a verdict for or against them and their policy. And now they tell us that there is a difference. And most undoubtedly, Sir, there is. The verdict of the 17th September, 1878, was a verdict taken in the dark. That of the 5th of June last was taken after the country knew how they proposed to redeem their pledges. One verdict was given by a people, befooled, bewildered and blinded by sophistry and false promises of all kinds; the other, after they had awakened to a true understanding of what these gentlemen meant, after they had begun to perceive the fact that, if this policy was put in force for any length of time, it meant the utter extinction of all chance of establishing a separate national existence on this continent. When they awoke to find that the burdens these gentlemen heaped on us were equal to the whole weight of our existing national debt, and that they had utterly failed in providing employment for any large number of the people, then, Sir, they reversed the unfortunate verdict which the specious promises of these hon. gentlemen had induced them to give. Sir, we take our appeal from the people intoxicated and bewildered, to the people awakening to actual realities. I say that the result of these men's policy is and cannot be anything else than to make us retrograde most seriously in all which most pertains to real civilisation; and moreover, that, as was well said in the petition from the city of St. John, which was presented to the House today, it is a practical violation of the Federal compact, on the faithful maintenance of which the only chance of preserving our Confederation depends. I say that the effect of this Tariff is to make robbery legal, and the path to high political preference a ready connivance with the plunderers of the people, and that every day and every hour only shows more clearly how utter is their failure to make good their former pledges, and how strictly accurate is the statement that they have obtained power under false pretences, and no more represent the true will and opinions of the people of the Dominion, than it is now most clearly evident they do those of the majority of the great Province of Ontario.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: After the lucid, able and satisfactory statement made to this House to-day by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and the highly extravagant and arrogant speech delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, I do not, at this late hour of the night intend to trespass very long upon the indulgence of the House. But, Sir, I think it would hardly do to permit an hon. gentleman occupying the position which the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), the late Minister of Finance, occupies in this House, to take such liberties with the intelligence of this Assembly, and the people of this country, as he has ventured to take to-night, without making such a reply as is demanded. A stranger listening to the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat would suppose that he occupied in this Parliament, and in this country, the position of a man whose past record was such, and whose acquaintance with the financial affairs of this country was such, whose administration of the high office he held was such, as to entitle him to the respectful consideration and attention of those who listened to him. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman has been too long in this House, the hon. gentleman too long occupied the distinguished position of Finance Minister of this country, to permit him thus to trifle with his own past record. The hon. gentleman read from a speech made by my hon. friend when he was Finance Minister in 1873. Let me direct his attention for a few moments to that literature which he values above all other literature extant, the Budget Speeches of the hon. gentleman himself. He will find there such a mass of contradiction, such a mass of inconsistencies, such a mass of failure in all the predictions he has offered to Parliament, as the record of no public man in any country can parallel. The hon. gentleman forgets that the people of this country have not forgotten that record. He forgets that the people know the past record of the country. He forgets that they know that, after seven years of the most successful administration that ever crowned the efforts of any Government in this country or out of it, my right hon. friend the First Minister went to the people of Canada and obtained a good working majority to enable him to continue to carry on the Government of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman forgets that which is known to himself and to every other intelligent man in Canada, that a party which in their struggle for power trampled beneath their feet all the principles they had maintained in Opposition, and by the most corrupt procedure succeeded in drawing into the ranks of a coalition which they had long denounced, sufficient strength to enable them to seize power, and having seized power sprang a midnight attack upon the people of Canada without notice that such a thing was intended, and at a time when a great excitement had been created with reference to a matter which, when it came to be properly understood, was regarded by the people of Canada as not demanding condemnation at their hands, succeeded in snatching a verdict in their favour. The people, after five years' discussion, restored my right hon. friend and his colleagues to the proud position they now occupy. The hon. gentleman forgets that, in an unfortunate hour for the Opposition, the late Premier, in an evil hour for his party, in an evil hour for Canada, selected a renegade Tory as Minister of Finance, a man who had openly on this floor admitted that he left his party because he could not obtain the position in it for which he thought his talents fitted him. From that hour Canada, step by step, sank from the high position it had occupied, until the indignant public sentiment of this country hurled the hon. gentlemen and the Government from power. If there is a man in this House, or in the country, who ought to have some little consideration when he is challenging and investigating the efforts of my hon. friend, who was called in the great emergency of his country to endeavour to lift it out of the slough of despond into which the management of the hon. gentlemen opposite had sunk it, it is the hon. gentleman himself. These were the circumstances under which my hon. friend was called upon to assume office, and under which the Government of which he was a member were called upon to devise means by which Canada would again be restored to that proud and prominent position it occupied when hon. gentlemen opposite succeeded to power. The hon. gentleman has ventured to talk of the increased expenditure of the Government, under the Administration of my right hon. friend during the period he was in power before. But he forgets to tell the House that our largest expenditure—largely increased by the hon. gentleman's own acts after he succeeded to power—was $22,300,000. I showed to the House, in the speech I made in reply to the hon. gentleman in 1878, that, if he deducted from the amount of $23,316,000 the amounts not included in his own expenditure, it would reduce the amount for which the Government of my right hon. friend was responsible to $22,300,000. What did the hon. gentleman do? He was the Finance Minister of a party that had been filling the House and the country with the cry of economy. He was the Finance Minister of a party that had been imploring the people of Canada to give them an opportunity of showing how economically they would govern the country. But what did they do? Would hon. gentlemen believe it? The first Estimate the hon. gentleman brought down was between $26,000,000 and $27,000,000. The Statutes of 1874 will show that this gentleman, who now charges my hon. friend here with wild extravagance, because he has an Estimate of $25,000,000, with $1,000,000 more interest to pay, and $600,000 more sinking fund to pay than were required in his Estimate of 1874, carried an Estimate in that year of $25,168,000. The hon. gentleman ventures to talk of deficits. Well, there is no subject with which he is more familiar. He is a master of deficits. There is no man in this country or in any other, that could be found to equal him in the manufacture of that very interesting financial feature, deficits.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

He says that my hon. friend was guilty of great imprudence in giving banking facilities to parties who were going to pay money into the revenue, and which resulted in a large loss of revenue. The hon. gentleman himself put into the mouth of the Governor-General the statement that they were going to change the Tariff, thus giving an invitation to rush to the Custom-house. The hon. gentleman finds it convenient to deny the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance, who proved beyond controversy that $1,300,000 were discounted in consequence of our intention to change the Tariff. The hon. gentleman will find that in 1875 he made identically the same claim that there would have been an enormous deficit at the close of the financial year, but for the fact that, when he added $3,000,000 to the taxation of the country, the fact that he was about to do it being proclaimed, poured into the Treasury from Customs and Excise something like $1,700,000 additional Revenue. Did the hon. gentleman tell the people that he was going to entertain them with a series of deficits? No. He said "A Finance Minister that will allow a deficit to occur is unworthy of the confidence of the country, because its prosperity depends on our ability to meet our engagements." He came down to the House and said, "I have made up my mind not only to cover all expenditures, but to provide for the construction of the Pacific Railway, and I want $3,000,000 of additional taxes to enable me to do it." And what did he do? Having got the $3,000,000, he came back to the House begging for more taxes. The hon. gentleman reads a good deal. I wish he would read a little more; I wish he would read some of his own speeches made at that time. He has criticised the conduct of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, and accused him of being aided by my hon. friend Sir Alexander Galt, and that to the detriment of the country.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: No, no.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: He says "No." Why, did not the hon. gentleman go back to 1858 for the express purpose of showing the disastrous condition of the finances, brought about, as he alleged, by my right hon. friend on my right, with Sir Alexander Galt as Minister of Finance? Every word—although covered with pretended eulogy—was a stab deep and intentional at the reputation of Sir Alexander Galt. It is base ingratitude to attack a gentleman, whose services alone enabled hon. gentlemen opposite to obtain the only success of their five years' administration, and, if they had had Sir Alexander Galt at the back of the hon. gentleman who acted as their Finance Minister, the people of Canada would now have had reason to be thankful; but the hon. gentleman is unwilling to be taught; he is above receiving instruction on questions of finance, or even listening to suggestions. It was the misfortune of that Government that the hon. gentleman never was susceptible of being instructed, because he was deluded by the idea that he possessed the concentrated wisdom of the world on financial matters. Had he had Sir Alexander Galt at his back, it would have been better for Canada. He attacks Sir Alexander Galt, and accuses him of having sacrificed his reputation in his endeavour to support the policy of this Government. Does the hon. gentleman forget that Sir Alexander Galt wrote over his own signature denunciations of the fiscal policy of the hon. gentleman opposite; and that when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) misrepresented his opinions he was met by the unqualified denial of Sir Alexander Galt? The hon. gentleman must not suppose that we have forgotten the fact that he sat here three days paralysed by the letter which Sir Alexander Galt addressed to him in repudiation of what he had attributed to him. This hon. gentleman, who has been charged with sacrificing reputation to policy, came to the rescue of Canada at the most critical period in the history of the country, and by his Protective Tariff of 1858 did more to advance the interests of this country than has been done by any other public man. Let me come back to the deficits. The hon. gentleman in 1874 said, "Give me $3,000,000 of additional taxation, and I will maintain a surplus;" but he came back to the House in 1876 with a deficit of $1,900,785. This is the financial Solon that is going to become a professor of finance, and ask the world to sit at the feet of Gamaliel. He said, "I must have half a million more"; and the House gave it to him, but did he come back with the surplus he had promised?

Did he come back with a "moderate surplus?" The hon. gentleman might read his Budget Speech to refresh his mind. I think it would do him good. He requires to be taken down a little from that high elevation to which he seems to have soared to-night. I did not accept his promise. I had learned how utterly incapable the hon. gentleman was. I had followed and exposed him from year to year telling the House how little reliance was to be placed on any calculation he made; and they found that I was not very wide of the mark; for, in 1877, he was compelled to confess to the people he was suffering from the same chronic ailment, and had another deficit of $1,460,027. In 1878 he found himself confronted with another deficit of $1,128,146, and his last year culminated with a deficit of no less than $3,248,000, reduced to $1,948,000 by $1,300,000 obtained by the change of Tariff. Thus the hon. gentleman's deficits in the five years of his Administration amounted to $7,736,958; and if he wants authority he will find it in the Public Accounts, brought down under his own hand. But more—I have an official letter addressed to me by the Auditor of the Intercolonial Railway, the hon. gentleman's own auditor, showing that these deficits were reduced by hiding away an item of $390,000 of revenue charges, placed to capital account on the Intercolonial Railway; and I will give him Mr. Tims' letter proving it. This item swells the total deficits of the hon. gentleman to $8,126,958. The hon. gentleman may well talk of deficits, when he can boast of having accumulated $8,126,958 of deficits in those five years. I will ask him if any person is going to accept him as a great financial authority. Is this the man who is going to save Canada? Is this the man who is going to become the champion of the people of this country?—a man who came to power with an overflowing Treasury, who, in the period of five years, imposed $3,500,000 of additional annual taxation, and had at the end of that period an accumulation of deficits amounting to over $8,000,000,—the man who had for all time to come added an additional burden of between eight and nine millions of dollars to our permanent debt, instead of having an annual surplus of $2,000,000, as we had, to reduce the debt of the country? This is the man who has the audacity to sneer at the Finance Minister of this country—who is endeavouring to relieve the country from the embarrassments brought upon us by our predecessors—this is the man who presumes to lecture the Minister of Finance as if he were a simple child, and talks of his “confused statement.” He ventured to say that the hon. the Minister of Finance owed his position to the temperance movement; that it was the means of securing him his position as Finance Minister. He ventures to insinuate that my hon. friend had dragged down the temperance cause into the low arena of party politics. Let the hon. gentleman look into his own ranks, if he wants to find men of that stamp, and he will not have to go far. There never was a party who used a great moral question to serve party purposes, utterly regardless of the effect on the public, to a greater extent than his own. Well, Sir, after these enormous deficits, one would suppose that the hon. able gentleman, in the face of his professions of economy, would have been about the last man to challenge the administration of the finances by the right hon. gentleman on my right and his Government. The hon. member for Centre Huron not only rolled up over $8,000,000 of deficits, but he also increased the expenditure $8,500,000 over our largest expenditure. Had he been content with the existing expenditure, we should have been saved that $8,000,000 of deficits. The largest expenditure we ever had was in the year 1873, in which we only governed the country four or five months, and, according to a true comparative statement, that expenditure only reached $22,300,000. In 1874-5 the increase over that was $1,417,678. In 1875-6 the increase was $2,152,979. In 1876-7 it was $1,223,908. In 1877-8 the increase was $1,203,156, and in 1878-9 the expenditure was $2,153,381 more than our most extravagant year. There is an over-expenditure above the largest year that we were responsible for, adding $390,000 of expenditure belonging to revenue, which the hon. gentleman charged to capital, of $8,543,092 in the hon. gentleman's five years administration of the finances. And yet he ventures to talk to my hon. friend about economy. Standing convicted of the grossest extravagance of any public man that ever had anything to do with financial matters in Canada, utterly reckless of the people's money, thinking only of imposing additional taxation to enable him to commit himself to those expenditures, he supposes that that is all forgotten, and, that of all men in the world, he is to be accepted as an authority on finance and economy. He challenges the estimate of my hon. friend for 1880-81, an estimate of $25,000,000, as a monstrously extravagant one; although $1,000,000 more money is required to pay interest on the debt and $600,000 for the sinking fund additional to that which he had to pay in 1874, and yet he asked $26,168,000 from this House as the lowest sum with which he could then carry on the Government of the country. In the estimate of my hon. friend there is a sum of $200,000 to operate the Canadian Pacific Railway. That will not, I hope, cost the country a dollar. I hope to be able, by the management to which the hon. gentlemen opposite object so much, to get enough revenue from the road to balance the expenditure. I quite understand why they object to this management. There is nothing brands them more with extravagance and incapacity than their management of Government railways. They are aware of the beneficial effects of the change, and they must magnify every little accident that occurs, even if it is on account of a snow storm. Let us look at other railways, and what do we find? I had a letter from Winnipeg, in which Mr. Schreiber says that a large quantity of steel rails have been blocked on the St. Paul line by a snow storm for a week, and that there is no prospect of getting them to their destination for some time to come. Roads in the State of Maine have been blocked by the snow, and there is no section of country worse to operate on account of the snow than that along the Valley of the Metapedia. But, knowing all this, hon. gentlemen opposite are glad to magnify every accident, and I can understand the gratification they would feel if they could point to such an accident as happened only yesterday on one of the best managed roads of the country. They do this because they are afraid to listen to the exposure of the mismanagement and extravagance of their administration of the railways. When my hon. friend asks for a grant of $200,000 for the operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway, he does it in the full confidence that all that mismanagement and extravagance is to be followed by economy, which he believes, and I believe, will return every dollar into the Public Treasury. The additional amount asked for Indians is $165,000; interest on the Public Debt, $400,000; sinking fund, $100,000. Then there is the Census, $200,000 more, which the hon. gentleman will admit that we cannot avoid, and which will include not only those quadrupeds which he intimated sat on this side of the House, who support the Ministry, but a longer-eared class of quadrupeds who are equally accommodating to the hon. gentleman—I will not say in this House, but I think that if there is anybody outside the House who listened with pleasure to the diatribes he gave utterance to, he must have longer ears than the quadrupeds who are said to be so compliant in the support of the Government. The steamer to Brazil, $50,000. That gives us $1,115,000, and swells this estimate to less than a million of what the hon. gentleman asked Parliament to give him in 1874. Add to that the portion of the Grand Trunk Railway that is now operated as part of the Intercolonial, $250,000, because it is a mere matter of account, and you have $1,365,000 of this Estimate which the hon. gentleman denounces as so extravagant. I need not, I think, take up much of the time of the House in discussing the hon. gentleman's claim to economy or financial skill. I believe I am accused in certain quarters of envying very much the great talents of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I believe there are some people in this country, perhaps on the other side of the House, who venture to insinuate that I am excessively jealous of the position in this House of my hon. friend. I would be unworthy of the position I occupy in this House and in the judgment of the country, of which for twenty-five long years I have had such satisfactory and conclusive evidence, if I were not willing to say here, as I am prepared to say everywhere, that the people of Canada, in my opinion, owe a debt of gratitude to the present Minister of Finance, for the painstaking manner in which he has devoted himself to the consideration of the question of the Tariff problem, upon a successful solution of which rests the question of the life or death of the country. The hon. gentleman says that my hon. friend has gone about this country like a commercial traveller. It would have been in the interest of Canada, perhaps, if the hon. gentleman had adopted the same course, and instead of driving away with contumely men, however high their position in the commercial or industrial world, who wished to offer him advice, and wrapping himself up in that immaculate robe of perfection which with so much magniloquence he loves to assume, he had ventured to place himself in communication with the intelligent men of this country who are engaged in sustaining and developing its interests and industries. If I ever felt I should like to stand in my hon. friend's shoes it is to-night. And why? Because he occupies the proud vantage-ground of being able to say in the presence of conclusive testimony that, instead of having the ruinous, discreditable record the hon. gentlemen opposite have been fond of predicting, he has vindicated the position he occupied when twelve months ago he asked and obtained the confidence of the House in the fiscal policy he placed before it. My hon. friend rightly said that last year the fundamental objection taken to his fiscal policy by the hon. gentlemen opposite was that he would lose revenue instead of obtaining it. They said that the trade of the country was depressed, and said: "If you believe you can improve it by increasing taxation you are labouring under a mad delusion, the result of which can only be widespread disaster from one end of the country to the other." To-night my hon. friend has been able to come down with the evidence from the public records of the country, and show that his expectations with reference to the effect of the Tariff upon the revenue have been abundantly sustained and that issue placed beyond doubt in the mind of every person, except that of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright). Is there a man who will say, in the face of an intelligent Canadian public, that prosperity is not returning to the country? No man could venture that statement without being met by indignant repudiation and denial by everyone who has been in a position to judge of the condition of trade and business. The House will remember the position of the country two years ago, when borne down with deficits, and in such a condition that the hon. gentleman opposite confessed he knew of no means of getting more revenue. He declared to this House that he knew of no means of reducing the expenses of the Government—that he had reduced them to the lowest limit, and pared down the expenditure everywhere. If the hon. gentleman had not been summarily dismissed from office by an indignant public and constituency, he would have had to face a deficit of between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 on the 1st day of July last. What had he to offer to the people? Denunciations of the means my hon. friend the Finance Minister proposed to the House, by which at the same time the public credit could be maintained, and the industries and business of the people promoted in such a way as to cause the sun of prosperity again to shine on Canada—that sun that had been for five years under a dark, impenetrable cloud. What happened? The hon. gentlemen opposite knew perfectly well that, that policy having been adopted, it was challenged in this House, first, on the ground which my hon. friend has shown to be utterly untenable and unworthy of consideration. They also said, “Even if you do get the revenue wanted, you will get it at too severe a cost; you are going to exasperate Great Britain, and make it impossible for any Finance Minister to go to its money market and borrow what we want, in order to carry on the public works of the country except at most ruinous rates.” My hon. friend (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) has given his answer; he stands here to-night with five hundred and fifty thousand arguments that cannot be answered by any statement to be found in that forest of rhetoric without an acorn of thought, in which the late Finance Minister for two hours and a half wandered. No rhetoric can wipe out the fact that the hon. the Finance Minister went to England under very unfavourable auspices, after hon. gentlemen opposite had been unpatriotic enough to endeavour to arouse feeling against their own country, after they had sent columns of communications to the leading English papers to show that Canada was not only ruined by its Tariff policy, but that we should be unable to meet our obligations under it; he went after the press of those hon. gentlemen had been degraded to the low, unpatriotic and despicable purpose of decrying our own country for party purposes, and, worse than all, confronted by the fact that the late Finance Minister had accumulated over $8,000,000 of deficits in four years. But my hon. friend told the financial men of England that the people of Canada had not only hurled from power those gentlemen who had proved so utterly incapable, but had restored a party to power with an overwhelming majority, who had recommended the adoption of a policy of imposing such taxation as would give the new Government the means of meeting the demands upon the Treasury. The result was that my hon. friend came back with $550,000 more in his pocket for a three million four per cent. loan than the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) was ever able to obtain. Thus was swept away the story of the failure of our credit. If there is any faith to be placed in the statement of that hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), nothing was so disastrous to Canada as the series of deficits described, and especially in the hands of the man who, in the face of Parliament, declared that he knew of no further resource but direct taxation. Does he forget that, when the motion was made in the House, with reference to home-grown tobacco, he answered it with the statement that it would take $500,000 of the revenue from him, and that he knew of no means of replacing it but by direct taxation? I ask this House and country to put side by side that statement and the fact that, if he had been in power, he would have had to meet between three and four million dollars of a deficit on the 1st July last. He knows that the Government of which he was a member shrank from direct taxation, so distasteful to the people of this country, and yet, according to them, this was the only mode left them of discharging their obligations. The hon. gentleman said that they were not responsible for the liabilities my hon. friend was called upon to meet. Did they intend to leave the road from Thunder Bay to Red River with a gap of 185 miles.

AN HON. MEMBER: There were the water-stretches.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: They had abandoned them. The late Government undertook to build 113 miles from Thunder Bay to English River, and 114 miles from Red River to Keewatin, leaving 185 miles of a gap between. Dare they say they did not intend to fill it up, or that all the millions sunk in that unproductive work, that could not have carried a dozen passengers or a ton of freight in a year, were to be thrown away; and do they not then stand responsible for the $18,000,000 to be spent on that road before it can be completed? Could the present Government have abandoned the enlargement of the Welland Canal, a work which had absorbed millions? We had no power in the matter. Every dollar's worth of the work was under contract, and we were bound to complete it or pay the money for nothing. And yet the late Finance Minister dares, with the late Minister of Public Works sitting alongside of him, to say they were not responsible. Let him go to the Cornwall Canal, where $500,000 was expended by hon. gentlemen opposite with no possible result except the carrying of an election; that was an outlay utterly useless without the expenditure of millions besides. Yet they venture to assert they left to the present Government no liabilities for public works. What again of the 125 miles of railway placed under contract in British Columbia? I am astounded that, in the face of an intelligent people, and an independent Parliament, any man could be found, who knows that the late Premier negotiated with Lord Carnarvon and pledged the faith of Canada to the construction of the Railway from Thunder Bay to the shores of the Pacific—2,000 miles—by 1890, and who knows the hon. gentleman swept away that guarantee we had provided, that the expenditure should not exceed the resources of the people without additional taxation, who should arraign our policy in the manner witnessed. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that, having committed themselves to the building of 2,000 miles of railway, without regard to the resources of the country, with the character of the country irretrievably gone unless that pledge was redeemed, by such efforts as were possible to be made with that object, the location of the line to Burrard Inlet, and the invitation of tenders for that 125 miles, was done with out any intention of performing the work, but simply to hoodwink the people of that Province until after the elections. If so, hon. gentlemen opposite occupy a position that reflects very little credit on them. The hon. member for Centre Huron made another objection to our policy—that we should thereby alienate the people of England—an idea worked up thoroughly on both sides of the Atlantic. What was the result? That the hon. the Finance Minister has shown this evening, as in the case of the revenue, so in its bearing on the English people, that the fiscal policy of the Government has changed the current of trade from the groove in which it was being set by the hon. gentlemen opposite; and, instead of Canada being made subsidiary to the neighbouring Republic, and our people being made for it hewers of wood and drawers of water, instead of Canada giving nearly the whole volume of its trade to a country that refused to admit its goods, instead of Canada turning her back on the Mother Country, and giving her trade to foreign countries, the Finance Minister shows he has redeemed his pledge of a year ago, and justified his judgment that this policy would be eminently favourable to British interests and restore the trade to that channel which every loyal British subject must infinitely prefer to that favoured by the hon. gentleman opposite. What was the object of their tea and sugar duties? The whole power of the late Administration, from the hour they assumed office till the hour they were driven out, was used to build up Boston and New York as our commercial capitals, and leave us at the feet of that Republic, to whose grandeur and greatness all the trade and business of the country was made to contribute, instead of being directed towards that Mother Country to which we owe so much. Then, again, those hon. gentlemen declared: Your Tariff is not only going to arouse England against us, but to exasperate the United States—be careful, they added, the Republic does not swallow us up. The bugbear of American hostility was attempted to be excited, and in their newspapers everything possible was done to exasperate the United States against Canada. Those efforts were all in vain, however. There is not an American politician who does not feel that our imitation of their fiscal policy is the greatest compliment that we could have paid them. I had the honour lately of meeting an American gentleman holding a high official position in London. Did he tell me that the people of the United States were exasperated with us on this account? He said that we could not make the people of England understand that with Canada and the United States there is no alternative, in the public interest, but the protection of home industries. It would be beneath that great Republic to cherish a feeling of irritation towards a people, whose policy is, to a certain extent, in unison with its own—that are intelligent and independent enough to be able to strike out a policy suitable to their own interests. What effect has our policy had? It has directed the first minds of all the leading commercial circles of the United States, with a view to see if the change in the Tariff of Canada cannot be obviated by a fair readjustment or measure of reciprocity, as might be carried out to the satisfaction of both countries. That was another of the delusions with which the gentlemen opposite were either misled themselves or tried to mislead this House. There was another objection, and that was the old cry: You are going to make this a dear country to live in, you are going to depopulate the country, and drive all the people out of it, you tax the people to such an extent that they cannot live in Canada. Well, my hon. friend believed that, in providing profitable industry for hundreds of thousands of people in Canada, doing the work of Canada with Canadian hands and on Canadian soil, he would not depopulate the country. You would suppose, to hear those hon. gentlemen talk, that all our people were going away, and that nobody was coming into our country. Again, those hon. gentlemen are met by the public records, which give the most emphatic contradiction to all their impressions on this subject, for during the past year we have had over 30,000 emigrants, and of the best classes of emigrants that ever came to this country, as against less than 20,000 the year before. They were brought in at a smaller cost, and, even under the operation of that $20 prohibition, within the last two months, double the number of people are rushing into this country to make it their homes, than within the corresponding two months of last year. As my hon. friend the Finance Minister said to-night, Canada never occupied, since she was a country, so proud a position as she does to-day with respect to the question of emigration. The policy of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture was a bold and statesmanlike policy, saying to the world: We have got a country that does not require us to depend upon hired employés to show its advantages, but we have a country possessing such inherent claims to consideration that we are prepared to pay the expenses of a body of intelligent men to come from Great Britain, and traverse our country from end to end, and then go back to their own people and tell them the result. The result is that more has been achieved in the interests of Canada, more has been accomplished in opening up our magnificent country as a home for hundreds of thousands of men—not only the industrious, energetic sons of toil, but those who will bring a large amount of capital into this country to enrich it—more has been achieved in this way than ever before. When, a year ago, I ventured in this House to express the hope that in connection with emigration from Great Britain to this country there was a question worthy the consideration of Imperial statesmen, I was met by a shout of derisive laughter from hon. gentlemen opposite. The idea was derided that Imperial politicians could be induced to take the slightest notice of our absurd notions of the advantage of bringing British subjects and settling them on British territory in our North-West. But this laughter had hardly died away when we find my right hon. friend the First Minister presenting the same views to the greatest man in the British Empire, Lord Beaconsfield, who himself became an emigration agent for this country; we saw Lord Beaconsfield standing before his countrymen and saying that, although disaster had overtaken England, although unfortunately the condition of the working classes and of the industrial classes was not what was to be desired, he was able to tell them with pride and satisfaction that the Empire possessed in Canada a country of enormous resources, of great fertility, a country that could furnish to those whose necessities compelled them to leave Great Britain, homes that would be worthy of themselves, and where they would have the means of building up that same Empire of which they now formed a part. I say that there is no man in this country or out of it who knows anything of the subject who does not know that from that day to this the whole tone of the English press was altered. The increased amount of $550,000 more, which my hon. friend the Finance Minister brought back to Canada for his three million 4 per cent. loan, sinks into utter insignificance compared with the value to Canada of the statements by Lord Beaconsfield respecting British emigration to this country, which has placed Canada in a position to obtain advantages which she never had before placed within her reach. Well, there was another difficulty: prices were going to be increased. Gentlemen opposite said: It is impossible you can create these industries, and bring manufactures into operation in this country without a vast increase in the prices. The hon. gentleman opposite, in one part of his speech to-night, used that argument, and showed how the poor people were taxed under this Tariff, but what did he say before he sat down? He said it was perfectly plain the manufacturer is not going to be so well off because he is going to be compelled to give higher wages; and he will have to give them to the men he employs. So the hon. gentleman had some consolation in the inevitable fact that this policy is to compel the bloated manufacturers and aristocrats to disgorge their means by increasing the wages that have to be paid to the operatives. What more did he say? He said they cannot afford to do it, because they cannot increase their prices. Now, I want to know what becomes of his argument as to increased prices? I was amused at the hon. gentleman's powers of imagination, which are so great that they ought to have led him to turn his attention to writing novels. I am sure he could not draw more largely upon his imagination in any work of fiction that could emanate from his pen than he drew upon it in these statements he has made to the House to-night. He says there is a tax of $70 or $80 put upon the family of every operative in this country, and yet no revenue. Five-sixths of the people of the country pay $70 or $80 a family of taxation and yet there is no revenue. That is only one of the difficulties into which the hon. gentleman dropped in the course of as illogical a speech as I have ever listened to from any person in this House. The hon. gentleman has himself shown that, while we have fostered industries by giving this home market to our own people, we at the same time protect them against increased prices, because the competition between manufacturers themselves will induce them to furnish these goods at the lowest figure. Now, I ask if that is not the history of the past year? Because every man who knows anything of this country knows perfectly well that there has been a most striking advance in all the great leading industries of this country; I want to know if that has not at the same time been accompanied by as low prices for those various articles as we have had at any previous time. Prices may rise, they will rise, because the prosperity in the United States will prevent goods being furnished in that country at the same prices as they were before. But this increase of price will not be due to the protection afforded to the industry of this country, but will be restrained by the development of our manufactures. I want to know from the hon. gentleman, who thinks that that great country is in a state of Egyptian darkness, and that it will continue to suffer until it takes inspiration from the light that hon. gentleman will be able to shed, not only upon this benighted Canada of ours, but upon the great American Republic, why is that in Free-trade England the depression is so great? When I was there, I asked the Statesmen, the merchants, the manufacturers, the men of intelligence of all classes, what was the prospect of that country. Well, they said, it is dark enough. Well, I said, is there any day-light ahead at all? Yes, they said, there is one favourable indication, we believe, that things are taking a turn in the United States of America, and the moment they do we will feel the effect of it here. Now, does it not strike the hon. gentleman with a little astonishment that Free-trade England, with her dark horizon, with her deplorable condition every way, culminating with a famine in a large section of the Empire that is taxing the charities of the civilised world at this moment, and with a condition of pauperism and paralysis among the industrial classes of England itself, such as has hardly ever been paralleled in the history of that country, does it not strike the hon. gentleman, I say, with a little astonishment, that the only source of relief to which they are looking is the revival of trade and prosperity in one of the most highly protected countries in the world? The hon. gentleman has spoken of Lord Salisbury and Lord Derby. Does he not know that Lord Derby, when confronted with a body of workmen, told them the only resource he could recommend to them was to emigrate. Does the hon. gentleman not know that, when the sugar refiners went to Lord Salisbury, and asked him if there was no protection against the productive policy of France and other countries, if there was no security for the industries of their own country, that noble Lord answered them thus: "I do not see how we can bring any pressure to bear upon France or America, because we have nothing to offer them in return; we have given everything away already." That was the position of Canada yesterday, but it is altered to-day. Now we are in such a position that when the Hon. George Brown again is called upon to visit Washington for the purpose of negotiating a Reciprocity Treaty he will not be obliged to come back as he did before. He will not be in the same position as he was before, when he went down on his knees to get them to give a Reciprocity Treaty to Canada, and they asked him what he proposed to give them in return. Oh, he said, we have done all that long ago; we have given that all to you before; if you have any gratitude you ought to give some return. Oh, but, they said, that is not commercial principles; when we give anything away we want a quid pro quo. Consequently, that able man returned covered with the humiliation of defeat, because he was representative of a fiscal policy that enabled an American consul in this country to write to his Government: We have got almost all the market of Canada; if you persist in shutting out the trade of Canada you will get it all. I say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that all that has been changed, that Canada now occupies a vantage ground in relation to this matter that she never occupied before. But, if they want evidences of an increase in trade, let them go to the great commercial centre of the country, Montreal. What does Mr. Robertson, Chairman of the Harbour Commissioners at Montreal, tell us? He says: We have increased the net revenue by $400,000 more harbour dues this year. Trade has revived. What revived it? The increased importations of coal from the Maritime Provinces and of sugar from the West Indies. Yet those hon. gentlemen know how that bears upon the export trade in wheat by making the St. Lawrence the great outlet of cereals from the Western States. Our fiscal policy not only brought into operation the industry of sugar refining, but that gave employment to thousands of tons of shipping that otherwise would have plied between Boston and New York and the West Indies. Yet they close their eyes to the fact that it has given Canada back her West India trade, that Canadian ships manned by our own sailors are now carrying the products of our own country down to the West Indies, and coming back to Canadian ports, fostering the shipping industry, fostering the fisheries and fostering the lumber trade of the country. Yet, forgetting all that, the hon. gentleman closes his eyes to everything except the fact that it is called a Protective policy, and therefore it must be bad. I deny that the policy of my hon. friend has added one farthing to the cost of sugar in this country. I say that, notwithstanding the increased price of sugar here, the increase was still greater in New York. That fact alone shows how delusive the statement is. The hon. gentleman ventured to draw upon his imagination in regard to the poor man in St. John paying a duty on flour and coal. Does the hon. gentleman know that the duty on flour would not be 3c. per annum per head if it were distributed over the population of New Brunswick. It is the same in Nova Scotia. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the price of coal has been lowered in St. John instead of increased?

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT :
How ?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : Has not the hon. gentleman mastered the first rudiments of the question of the coal duty? Any person who knows anything about coal mining knows that, if you work a mine at a capacity of 100,000 tons, you can sell the coal at a smaller price than if you can only work it up to 50,000 tons. The output of coal in Canada during the past year has largely increased. The duty of 50c. per ton has been the means of opening up the markets of Toronto to some extent. Every person knows that, while there was a duty of 50c. imposed on coal during the last year, the cost of coal fell to the lowest price it ever was in the history of the country. We have, as the result of this Tariff, the coal mining interest stimulated without any person suffering in any section of the country, and, in adding an additional 10c., my hon. friend expects the coal of our own country to come into fair competition with the coal of the United States, in Toronto and Hamilton, and probably lower instead of increase the price of coal there. The hon. the late Finance Minister says the coal tax is an odious tax. He takes exception to the taxation of the necessaries of life. Is coal any more a necessary of life than many articles the hon. gentleman largely increased the taxation upon? He knows it is not. It is a source of warmth as clothing is; but the hon. gentleman never undertook to make clothing free. The hon. gentleman had no resource but direct taxation. He shrunk from the vista of his deficits, but had not the courage to propose a remedy. What would have been the result? Disaster to the credit of Canada. No Finance Minister could have gone to England and borrowed a dollar in the money market of the world unless he showed some intention to provide a revenue for the purpose of bearing the burdens of the country and maintaining the public credit. The works on the Welland Canal, put under contract by the hon. gentlemen opposite, must have come to a standstill. The link between English River and Keewatin must have been abandoned, because the money could not have been obtained. The policy of the present Government was to maintain the public credit, and stimulate our industries, and it is a policy that will commend itself to the people of the country. The hon. gentleman wants to know what has been the result of that policy. I defy him to put his finger upon a single industry in Canada of any kind that is not in a better condition than it was a year ago—agriculture, fisheries, lumbering, mining, shipping and manufacturing. Therefore, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has abundant reason to take courage, and, in view of the fact that light is again dawning upon our darkened, depressed country, the hon. gentleman may confidently look forward to the most successful results, if, after a year of the greatest difficulty, the outcome has been so satisfactory. It is impossible in an hour, it is impossible in a day, it is impossible in a year, to develop the results of such a policy as this, except in a partial manner. Any person understands that, if a ship is drifting on the rocks, although parties may board her who understand taking her off the quicksands or rocks, the momentum she had acquired will still go on for a time. Hon. gentlemen know that it is a principle of natural philosophy that the momentum is in proportion to the magnitude of the moving body, and as Canada is a body of considerable magnitude, it is impossible, even in the hands of the ablest navigator, to counteract that momentum instantly and turn the ship upon her proper course. I have witnessed, with a pride and pleasure beyond what I can express, the magnificent attitude of the intelligent people of Canada. Strong in their confidence, strong in their belief that the public affairs of this country were again in the hands of men who, in the future as in the past, would show that they knew what the public interest of the country demanded, they were willing to wait patiently for the result. The policy inaugurated by the Government is developing itself, and I have no hesitation in saying that I believe we are again fairly entered upon the path of progress and prosperity that attended the administration of my right hon. friend in days gone by. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will come back to the Treasury Benches. I will venture to say, however, that they will never stand where I now stand until they change their policy. They can do it. Their party need not despair. They are perfectly equal to the emergency. I was much amused to-night when I heard the hon. gentleman say that the country owed the late Government a debt of gratitude for having refused to depart from a Revenue Tariff in 1876. Let any intelligent man in this House read his Budget Speech for that year, and I will undertake to say that he will rise from its perusal with a conviction that that speech was prepared for a Protective Tariff. The hon. gentleman possesses great ability of statement, but he was not quite equal to the emergency. The Government of which he was Finance Minister saw that they would have a heavy deficit, and after taking counsel with each other they came to the conclusion that they owed it to the country to raise the Tariff from 17½ per cent. to 20 per cent. The hon. the Finance Minister prepared his speech for a Tariff of 20 per cent. Why was the Tariff not raised? A deputation from the Maritime Provinces, led by Mr. Jones, waited on him and told him that the Government must choose between abandoning the proposed Protective Tariff and going out of office. They counted their friends, and concluded that they were in a minority. At the last moment, they abandoned their policy, and the first half of the hon. gentleman's speech was one of the most elaborate and conclusive arguments in favour of Protection that it is in the power of any man in or out of this Parliament to deliver, while the latter half advocated Free Trade. He had not time to reconstruct his Budget Speech, and was compelled to put a Free-trade tail on a Protectionist body. I feel that I am warranted in saying the hon. gentlemen opposite will never regain power until they change their policy. Perhaps it may be said that they cannot change. The hon. gentleman opposite me is perfectly equal to it. If we go back a few years we will find that he admitted he was a Protectionist in principle.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: I never said anything of the kind.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The hon. gentleman was able to support my right hon. friend and Sir Alexander Galt in 1858.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: In 1858, I was not in this House.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman was not inside he was outside, doing his little best for them; and, having learnt how incapable Sir Alexander Galt was, he went into Parliament to support him. Having changed two or three times already, he can change once more; and that he will make that change, if he remains in public life, is as certain as that he has changed before. These hon. gentlemen opposite will never come back to power again, until they are brought to accept the verdict of the intelligent people of Canada. What was it that turned the scale to such an extent, that a party, coming into office by one of the most overwhelming majorities, should be placed in the powerless minority in which they are at present? It was because the people came to the conclusion that their policy was disastrous to the country, and the most independent men supporting them turned their backs upon them and placed my right hon. friend in the proud position he now occupies. So long as the hon. gentlemen set themselves against the public sentiment, so long as the Globe newspaper gloats with fiendish delight over every failure and every commercial disaster in the country; so long as it is apparent that it is not principle but party that actuates them, so long will they be compelled to content themselves with the position they now occupy. The moment the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) admits anything like rational thought upon this subject, so soon as he becomes convinced that the only road to power is a change of policy, he will be found—and so will his party be found—equal to making the change. The only account the hon. gentleman could give of the prosperity of the country was that these things come by fits and starts. Well, Sir, so long as the fits are with him, and the starts are with us, we shall be satisfied. I was a little astonished at the hon. gentleman venturing to say that the people of this country were cursing the hour they brought this party into power; and he pointed to the imaginary scores of starving and indignant workmen who came the other day for assistance. But does he know that the only man that was ever imprisoned in this building was the hon. the leader of the Opposition; that a private stairway had to be constructed so that he could be protected and hidden away from the infuriated and starving population, who asked for bread, and to whom he had nothing to give but a stone. I ask the hon. gentleman does he not know that this country will consider that he is taking a gross license with its intelligence, in the face of historical evidence to the contrary, in stating that the people are cursing the present Administration. They have had an opportunity of showing their detestation; and what is the result? When our opponents gained power by the unholy means they used, so soon as they began to live they began to die. So soon as the sober second thought of the people had an opportunity of giving its expression they speedily reversed the verdict of 1874. They steadily brought down that mighty majority of nearly ninety in four years to one of less than fifty. Their dissolution commenced from the very hour of their birth—from the very beginning, I may say, of their existence, which they managed to sustain for five years, till it was terminated by the exhausted patience of an indignant public. One would suppose, if the hon. member for Centre Huron is to be believed, that every person in the country was ready to spring up in indignation against the present Administration in order to bring these men who oppose it into power again. Where is the seat that you have taken from us? Where are those indignant people giving utterance to their execrations? They had an opportunity in Cornwall, but they did not—when my hon. friend Dr. Bergin turned a majority of 39 to a majority of 198. In Montmorency they have had an opportunity, where a man of great talent and ability, pitted against a leading independent supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite in a square party fight, was sent here to support us by a largely increased majority. Does that look like cursing and execration? Does that look as if the hon. gentleman had any ground for the assertions he has made here to-night? In Bonaventure—a constituency held by our genial and independent friend, the Hon. Dr. Robitaille—that popular and able gentleman's seat being vacated by his promotion to the position of Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, a successor was returned by acclamation. My hon. friend cannot find his crowd of people fuming with curses

there. In Provencher, Manitoba, in Yale, British Columbia, in the centre of our country, and away down in Cape Breton, in Nova Scotia, the electors have had an opportunity of denouncing my right hon. friend for his alleged legalised robbery, as a Protective Tariff is called, but they have not been able to get any to endorse that slanderous accusation. But not only have we held our own. In Charlevoix, East Hastings and Argenteuil their party has been defeated, and a difference made in this House of six votes in our favour by the action of these independent constituencies, while others in this House, elected to support them, have openly and independently declared their intention to abandon that party and policy, in order to sustain the successful policy of my hon. friend. Never was there a party or a Government so strong in the confidence and affections of the great body of electors of Canada as the present Government. I have not been able to notice a great many of the extraordinary statements that the hon. member has made. I have only endeavoured to notice the most important points connected with them; but, as a party man, as one who believes that the best interest of our country demands the continuance in power of the Liberal-Conservative party, I rejoice in the exhibition the hon. gentleman has made of himself, as I feel confident that this party will continue to control the destinies of this Dominion while the hon. gentleman favours us with such speeches as we have listened to to-night.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We have listened to the speeches of the hon. gentleman opposite, with something like astonishment at the volubility and abusive character of his utterances against his opponents. The language he has used to-night is characteristic of him; but I think I never heard a speech even from him more replete with abuse. The hon. gentleman thinks, I suppose, that by using offensive language he strengthens his position; that, if he abuses his opponents and praises his colleagues and himself, he will have accomplished his object; but the hon. gentleman will not find such abuse accepted by this House and the country. My hon. friend on my right has reason to be proud that hon. gentlemen opposite have found it impossible to answer his arguments; and has put up this abuse so as to avoid answering them. The hon. gentleman, who has just resumed his seat, stands prominent on his side of the House for that sort of work, such as he has so fully accomplished to-night. I shall not imitate such a course; but endeavour, by fair argument, to show the position of the hon. gentleman opposite is untenable, and that my hon. friend from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) is justified in the expressions he has used, and the arguments he has taken. In the first place, let me refer for a moment to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman was not so fair and candid as he ought to be, but we do not expect much candour and fairness from him under the position he is desirous of establishing. I do not say that the hon. gentleman would do anything unfair or unbecoming to injure a person against whom he was matched, but in order to cover his own ground he never hesitates to present questions which he deals with in that way. The hon. member for Cumberland accused my hon. friend (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) with being a renegade Tory, and he spoke of myself as having acted improperly in taking a renegade Tory into my Administration. I might characterise the hon. gentleman as a renegade Free-trader. I might characterise the hon. the Minister of Finance as a renegade Reformer. I believe the hon. gentleman (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) was the leader of that party in New Brunswick for many years. The hon. gentleman has changed his views of political life, and I do not blame him for it, if he did it conscientiously, and I hope he has. If he has gone back from light to darkness, conscientiously, let him assume the responsibility, and I will give him credit, not for the intelligence he has displayed, but for the step he has taken. But if my hon. friend beside me is to be denounced as a renegade Tory, because he has come from darkness to light, with how much more justice and severity might we characterise that species of renegade who has passed from light to darkness. The present leader of the Liberal party in England—we may call him the leader—Mr. Gladstone, was for many years a leading man among Conservatives; but who dreams of using the coarse language of the hon. member for Cumberland, and denouncing Mr. Gladstone as a renegade Tory. What would have been thought of any man who addressed such language to the Prime Minister of England, and accused Lord John Russell of having taken, in the person of Mr. Gladstone, a renegade Tory into his Administration as Finance Minister. But that was precisely what happened there as here, if that term is to be used. So far as the late Administration is concerned, I may say that no man became a member of it who was not entirely in unison with myself and the leaders of the Liberal party in connection with our whole policy. The hon. the Finance Minister, in the early part of his remarks, alluded to the responsibilities which had been cast upon him by his predecessor in office, and said that he was compelled on this account to increase the revenue in order to meet the expenditure; and the hon. gentleman who spoke last endeavoured, during a considerable part of his speech, to show that the late Administration, which I had the honour to lead, was responsible for the creation of many of the public works which had caused an indispensable increase in the debt. Now, Sir, I will give an authority for that responsibility, which I presume no one opposite will dispute. A certain hon. gentleman, who now acts as Finance Minister, says this:

“We are, however, entering upon new and increased engagements, involving a very large sum of money. We are entering upon works—we have already done so—which will require a large increase of our debt. We have $10,000,000 to expend on the Intercolonial Railway. We have $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific, and the canal system, that has been accepted by the Government, will involve an expenditure of at least $20,000,000. These are serious matters, inasmuch as they add $60,000,000 to our existing debt.”

Now, Sir, the late Administration modified this estimate of the hon. gentleman opposite. We declined to proceed with the whole of the Canals. The Welland Canal was in such a position that it had to be finished. The Lachine Canal was also begun, and was requisite in order to meet the requirements of the Ottawa river and the St. Lawrence river combined; and the Cornwall Canal was absolutely essential to the finishing of the system of Canals, when it is finished. But the late Administration determined not to proceed with the Beauharnois and the Williamsburgh Canals. We were determined to avoid every expenditure that could possibly be avoided on these great works; and instead of the hon. gentleman with such characteristic unfairness blaming the late Administration, instead of assuming the responsibility, if either of the hon. gentlemen opposite had the principle of fair play in their composition, they would have boldly assumed the responsibility which the hon. the Finance Minister did in 1873. That is the true position of that matter. The hon. the Minister of Railways says that the late Administration, at all events, assumed the responsibility of the Pacific Railway, under the arrangement made with Lord Carnarvon. We assumed it precisely as it was assumed by the hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect. We assumed it, as I stated the other night, subject to a determination to adhere to the declaratory Acts of Parliament, and the resolutions of this House passed repeatedly not to increase the burdens of taxation, for the purpose of proceeding with that work. The hon. gentlemen seems to think that, because we made a subsequent modified arrangement, we were more bound to that arrangement than the hon. gentlemen opposite were to the arrangement they made in 1872, when they made a deliberate bargain to have the entire work completed by 1882. The hon. gentleman (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) says in this same speech:

“Let us now consider, for a moment, whether under the circumstances we are likely to be able to meet this liability in the future without imposing heavy burdens on the people of this Dominion. I would like to take you with me in imagination over that period of ten years, within which the great Pacific Railway should have been completed.”

Well, Sir, we are within two years of the ten in which the road was to be completed, and very little of the great work is completed. The hon. gentleman goes on:

“I hope and trust, and firmly believe, that there is too much patriotism among us to allow any personal or political consideration to interfere with the progress of such a work as this.”

Now I have to say this further regarding the expenditure upon this work, and I hope the hon. gentleman who has questioned me so closely will give a little of his attention. He asked me if I would dare to stand up in this House and say that I did not propose to build a portion of the railway that we asked tenders for. I tell him that were we in a position now to command any consideration, all that we should spend on that road, particularly in the difficult places, where there is little population to be found, would be graduated entirely by the capacity of the country to meet the expenditure. With regard to the 185 miles the hon. gentleman alludes to, I may simply say that we were prepared to carry the traffic by the water from one point to the other if we found we were not able with the means of the country placed at our disposal to proceed with that section. We were never afraid to communicate our policy. We asked tenders, as hon. gentlemen are aware, in two separate forms, for the purpose of having the exact information before us, and that information we would be able to utilise in such a way as would meet the interests of the country and save the great mass of the people from an excess of taxation, which must ultimately be ruinous to us if these works are persevered in. The burden of taxation, to which my hon. friend opposite may refer, is much heavier than what anyone imagines. The hon. gentleman who spoke last said that it was most extraordinary to propound that where heavy taxes were levied the revenue was not benefitted to a corresponding degree; and he lectured the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) for uttering an exclamation to that effect. But a few minutes afterwards, in pointing out the effect a 10c. additional duty on coal would have, he said it would not add anything to the revenue, but bring Nova Scotia coal to Hamilton. Here is a case imposing additional taxation, which he himself declares will add nothing to the revenue. My hon. friend the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) showed conclusively last Session, and his speech has never been answered by the hon. the Finance Minister, or anyone else, taking the quantity of imports of various kinds of the previous year as a basis, that the Tariff of last year imposes an additional tax on the people of $7,000,000. Well, we have it admitted that a little over a million has reached the National Treasury from that enormous taxation. Some say that not a dollar has reached it; but I have no doubt that a considerable sum has reached the Treasury, but a small sum compared with the amount levied. Why the very essence of the National Policy is this: that certain parties who are manufacturers or producers of goods are to be benefitted, in order that the manufacture of such goods shall be confined to the country. The very essence of the policy is to benefit a certain class. That is not denied by anyone, but it is asserted by the hon. gentleman opposite that while this is true the stimulus it will give to native production, and the use made of our agricultural products, will more than meet whatever amount of taxes is laid upon the public to accomplish that object. The hon. the Minister of Railways says we will only again reach the Ministerial Benches by adopting his protective views. I assure him that if I never go back to the other side of the House without changing my policy, as he has done, I will continue to sit here or go out of the House. Whenever anyone changes his policy with the chameleon-like frequency, characteristic of the hon. member, it is time to give up talking about patriotism or anything of that kind. The hon. gentleman thinks it is an easy matter to change. No doubt his example is of value, but I should not hold him up as an example to be followed, but as a shocking warning to the young politicians of the day, of the general course which has brought a great public man like him to the degraded position he now holds.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order, order.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not use that phrase in a personal sense; I am speaking in a political sense wholly. I will not say the hon. gentleman is not entitled, both from his long service to the State and the distinguished position he now holds—I will not say of him what he said of my hon. friend (Sir Richard J. Cartwright)—that he was not entitled to respectful consideration. I will give him all the consideration possible, and every word he utters I shall consider. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his disquisition, said hon. gentlemen opposite were expelled from power by a misunderstanding. He said also that the late Administration that I had the honour to lead, was ignominiously defeated. I know of no ignominy connected with it. We were not accused of any public crime or dishonourable conduct. We fought the battle, whether right or wrong, upon a straight line, and upon principle. We took our stand upon the ground that we would not impose additional taxation upon the people, under the circumstances in which the country was placed. We opposed the Protectionist Policy on principle. We were defeated; but I am satisfied that, notwithstanding the accident that the hon. gentleman has alluded to, that, at this moment, if the country had to pronounce again upon the subject, it would pronounce in our favour. The hon. the Minister of Railways and the hon. the Finance Minister, although they have no connection whatever with Ontario, and also the hon. the leader of the Government, all went into the local elections in Ontario; and, if I recollect aright, the hon. the Minister of Justice also, made his appearance on the platform. The hon. the Minister of Railways himself went to the strongest Protectionist city in Ontario, Hamilton, and though he used his best and boldest efforts there, yet his candidate was defeated—I will not follow his example and say ignominiously defeated—but he was defeated; and in Toronto, where the hon. the Finance Minister showed forth the beauty of his system, the Conservative majority of the year before of 900 was reduced to 60. Such was the effect of his efforts there. The Premier himself took part in the discussion in Toronto, and used every effort; and the whole of the journals of the Conservative party took the ground that if the Liberal Administration of Mr. Mowat was sustained it would be the end of the National Policy—that that policy would then be condemned by the great Province of Ontario. And it was condemned, and that condemnation sustained the Local Premier and his Administration, beyond any other question discussed at the polls. The hon. the Minister of Public Works, in his remarks, referred to the expenditure under the late Administration. The actual expenditure for each year was as follows:—1873-4, under the Estimates of the present Finance Minister, $23,316,000; 1874-75, $23,714,000;

1875-6, $24,488,000; 1876-7, $23,519,000; 1877-8, $23,503,128. Now, while we get the expenditure of 1875-6 about the same as for the year 1873-4, we had imposed upon us during that year a very large additional outlay for which we were in no wise responsible, and the actual expenditure in 1876-7 and 1878-8. If we apply only those items which were chargeable during the reign of the hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1873, we find that instead of having an expenditure of 23½ millions, our expenditure was not more than 21½ millions. We had a vast increase of interest, and the hon. gentleman himself has taken credit for that now, but he was not willing to allow it to us, or to allow to us an increased expenditure on the Administration of Justice, and on the North-West Territories, under the laws passed by his own Administration, with many other similar items; deducting such items left us really with an actual average expenditure for the same things that the hon. gentlemen had in 1873, of two millions less than the expenditure in their last year. He announced to-night, as a result of the impossibility of meeting the expenditure of the coming year, that he proposes to use balances now in his possession to the extent of about $6,000,000—having that amount to spare out of the total balance of $13,000,000, and that he proposes an additional issue of Government notes to the extent of $8,000,000, the present issue being $12,000,000. At present there is a cash reserve to meet an issue of $12,000,000 of notes, something over three millions of dollars; and the hon. gentleman proposes to have precisely three millions to meet the payment of the twenty millions which he proposes to issue.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Five millions or 25 per cent.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not at all; it will be only 15 per cent. in gold and 10 per cent. in bonds; such was his statement. There is a famous financier, formerly living in Hamilton, and now in the employment of the Government, who used to advocate an original scheme for paper money. He had the ordinary currency coloured dark, and it was to be redeemed in paper coloured yellow, in order to resemble gold as nearly as possible, I suppose. The hon. the Minister of Finance proposes to hold 15 per cent. in gold and 10 per cent. in gilt paper.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has not told us in what way he intends to utilise it. Does he calculate how long it is to stay out? Is it to be issued through the banks, or are they to be compelled to take it at his price? Not one word about this extraordinary financial speculation has been given us, and we are expected to receive the simple statement only that this paper currency is to be issued, no information regarding it being given to the country. The whole of our financial system is to be overturned to meet the financial exigencies of the Government, which will not be met by those means however. The hon. gentleman will not be able in this way to do anything else but derange the currency of the country and stop the fountain of credit. I was not a little amused to hear him speak as he did about the imports and exports, and the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), following in the same track, seemed to think it was a matter to rejoice over, that the imports were steadily lessening. The reduction of the imports often shows the poverty of the country, and the increase of exports sometimes also show its poverty. I do not say that the ordinary views of the balance of trade which prevails in England are applicable to the same extent in Canada. We know from a very high authority in this matter what the position is that the hon. gentleman took; we have some little knowledge of financial matters from this source. The present Finance Minister took this position in his Budget Speech in 1873. He said:

"We have something like $12,000,000 a year excess of imports over exports. Add to that the interest on the debt of the Dominion, payable in London, $4,000,000, and we have $16,000,000 a year to be provided for which our exports do not cover. But if we look into the matter more carefully, we will arrive at the conclusion that there are no grounds for apprehension. * * I have taken some pains in the matter, taking one city as an illustration—St. John. * * * It appears that the return freights from that city amount to $2,000,000 a year, and if that be the case in St. John we may fairly estimate that from five to six millions of profit from freights are received every year, by which the surplus between imports and exports is very materially reduced. If we go further, and consider the expenses incurred in shipping the produce of the Dominion, which amounts to $70,000,000 or $80,000,000, for which disbursement bills of exchange are drawn, we find these two items make up the difference.'

The hon. gentleman has changed his views now.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : The balance is so much the more to our credit.

MR. MACKENZIE : So with that much less imports we are very much richer.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : That may be.

MR. MACKENZIE : Much richer with less business. The hon. gentlemen opposite, with their Protectionist Policy, have set themselves deliberately to destroy the foreign trade of the country. I believe that no country having commercial relations with the world can avoid having a foreign trade; because the moment they cease to have a foreign trade they sink in the scale of nations, go behind the age, and have no means in common with the rest of the world to exchange commodities. The idea of the hon. gentlemen opposite seems to be based upon the opinion that every one who buys from them can be made to pay their own price, while they are able to sell at their own prices also. I believe, and all intelligent authorities believe, that the true method of conducting trade is for every people to sell what they produce most easily to those who possess some other commodity which such nation requires, but cannot so easily produce. One of the most disastrous results of a Protective Policy is that it destroys the freedom of exchange, and tends to build up monopolies at the expense of the people. To be sure the remedy will come. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that there can be no change of Government in this country until every one in it becomes a Protectionist. I believe their policy has already proved a disastrous failure. The melancholy statement that the hon. the Finance Minister made to-night, was one that any Government might be ashamed of, especially they who proclaimed so loudly that the moment a change of Government should take place, returning prosperity would appear; that everyone would be employed, that bank stocks would rise in value, and that everything would show increased prosperity. From that day down to the present, increased depression took place. Stocks fell, failures increased, and there was very soon the deepest distress that could possibly be imagined, and the hon. gentlemen opposite were only saved, for the moment, by the good crops of last year. Even that good crop would not have done much but for the fact that there was a sad failure of crops in Europe, which necessitated the purchase of very large amounts of produce at high rates on this side of the Atlantic, and yet the hon. gentlemen opposite speak as if they produced the high price of wheat. They produced the high prices in manufactured articles, and everything they touched with the rod of the tax-gatherer. They taxed the coal and flour and food of the poor—everything they could lay their hands on consumed by the poor—and thereby increased the cost of living; but, although they put a tax on wheat that had no influence on the price of wheat in this country, though it injured trade in that article, every person knows it could not have had any influence, because the ultimate market was England, and we were only carriers of wheat from one end of the country to the other. The result of the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite has been disastrous, even to the revenue, which has shown a great deficiency. The hon. the Finance Minister endeavoured to make out that we will only have a deficiency of $500,000 to provide for, but, notwithstanding his skill in cooking the accounts, the fact is apparent that there will be a deficiency of between one and two million dollars, which has to be met. The hon. the Finance Minister said, with some indignation, that we were damaging the policy of the Government and decrying it to the country. Now, if the policy of the Government is wrong, it ought to be damaged. If the hon. gentleman opposite thinks that we are damaging a thing that we believe to be right, he is mistaken. We are damaging it because we believe it ought to be damaged. We believe that it is a policy that will be ruinous to the country, and that it has done infinite damage to the country already, and the sooner it is put an end to the better. Better damage the Ministry than damage the country. If it be necessary, in order to damage that policy, to show the evil effects it has had upon the trade and commerce of the country, why should we not do so?

Should we be deterred, by idle threats from the Government Benches, from exposing the folly, the selfishness, and the utter fallacy of the policy which the hon. gentlemen opposite inaugurated? Hon. gentlemen may deprecate upon it that, whatever happens, we shall not pause for one moment to expose the fallacies connected with that policy, and to point out to the country and to the world the views that we take on that policy, now in force in Canada. The hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) took credit for the revival of the lumber trade. Now, it will be remembered that, during the Tariff discussion last year, several statements were made. One was made by my hon. friend from Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King), which showed the amount of taxation imposed by the Tariff upon every thousand feet of lumber. The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), who is a moderate supporter of the Administration opposite, undertook to show that my hon. friend from New Brunswick was mistaken, but even he made out that there was an additional taxation imposed upon the lumbermen. He admitted that; only he denied it was so much as was calculated by others. Two other hon. gentlemen also made calculations to the same effect. Now, I would like to know how it is possible for a policy to benefit the lumbermen that imposes additional taxes upon them, and cannot provide any advantages. By their own admission, that policy is an obstruction in the way of the lumbermen, and now the hon. the Minister of Railways tells us that this obstruction has had the good effect of increasing the prosperity of the lumbermen. The truth is that any demand that has arisen for lumber has arisen from causes altogether unconnected with the National Policy. The demand from England has increased from local reasons, and the demand from the United States, during the coming season, is likely to be increased, but it is solely because they enjoy an increased prosperity which has not yet visited Canada. The hon. gentleman says the sun of prosperity shone immediately over the country upon the accession to power of himself and his colleagues, whom he characterises, by the way, as the ablest men in the Dominion. Who can be a better judge of that than the hon. member for Cumberland? In relation to sugar, the hon. gentleman stated, with a boldness characteristic only of himself, that sugar was cheaper this year in Canada than in any other country, or at any other time. Now I challenge him to produce the New York papers, containing the current prices, and the Montreal papers for every week in the year, containing the current prices, and I would ask him to apply the duty that was imposed under the old Tariff to the prices in New York, taking into account the cost of transportation, and then compare this with the prices charged in Montreal, and he will find that the people of Canada have been paying during the whole year from $\frac{1}{2}$ c. to $1\frac{1}{2}$ c. per lb. above that which they had to pay under the old Tariff.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said resolutions.

(In the Committee.)

Resolutions agreed to and ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

(In the House.)

Resolutions reported; and they are as follows:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Act 42 Vic., cap. 15, intituled an Act to alter the duties of Customs and Excise, by the following alterations in and additions to Schedule A of the said Act:—

1. In the item concerning "Carboys containing Acids," after the word "Carboys," insert the word "Demijohns," and after the word "Acids," insert the words "Vinegar or other Liquids."

2. After the item "Artificial Flowers," insert the words, "Asphaltum mineral, ten per cent. ad valorem."

3. After the item "Rabbit metal," insert the words, "Bagatelle Tables or Boards with cues and balls, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem."

4. In the items concerning "Billiard Tables,"—after the words "nine feet," in the second line, insert the words "or under," and strike out the words, "five feet by ten feet," in the fourth line, and insert the words "over four feet six inches by nine feet,"—and after the words "eleven feet," in the seventh line, insert the words, "or under," and in the eighth line strike out the words, "those of six feet by twelve," and insert the words, "all over five feet six inches by eleven feet," and in the tenth line strike out the words, "ten per cent," and insert the words "fifteen per cent."

5. After "Billiard Tables," insert the words, "Bird Cages of all kinds, thirty per cent. ad valorem."

8. In the item respecting "Bookbinders' Tools and Implements," after the word "implements," insert the words "and Bookbinders' cloth."

9. Before the item headed "Breadstuffs," insert the words "Braces or Suspenders of all kinds, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

10. After the item concerning "Candles," insert the words "Cans, or packages made of tin or other material, containing fish of any kind admitted free of duty under any existing law or treaty, not exceeding one quart in contents, one cent and a half on each can or package; and when exceeding one quart, an additional duty of one cent and a half for each additional quart or fractional part thereof."

11. In the item "China and Porcelain Ware," after the word "twenty," insert the word "five."

12. After the item concerning "Coke," insert the words, "Combs for dress and toilet, of all kinds, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

13. In the items concerning "Cottons, manufactures of," after the item "Cotton duck, &c.," insert the words, "Crapes of all kinds, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

14. After the item "Fish, fresh, &c.," insert the words "Fishing Rods, thirty per cent. ad valorem."

15. And also the words "Fire-proof paint, dry, one quarter of a cent per pound."

16. After the words "Flax seed," insert the words "Flag stones, dressed, one dollar and fifty cents per ton."

17. After the words "Artificial Flowers," insert the words "and feathers," strike out the word "thirty," and insert the words "twenty-five."

18. In the item concerning "Fruit, green," after the word "Grapes," strike out the word "one" and insert the word "two."

19. In the item concerning "Furniture," after the word "hair," strike out the word "and," and after the word "spring," insert the words "and other."

20. In the items concerning "Glass and manufactures of," after the word "pressed," insert the words "and cut glass," and after the word "bottles," insert the words "and decanters;" after the item "Ornamented, Figured," &c., insert the words "Silver Plate, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

And in the item "Common and Colourless Window Glass," after the word "Glass," insert the words "imitation Porcelain Shades."

21. After the above items insert the words, "Gloves and Mitts of cotton, leather, silk, woollen or any other material, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

22. In the items concerning "Iron and manufactures of," change the position of the words, "number seventeen gauge or thrimer," so that they shall follow the word "black," and precede the words "and boiler plate,"—and strike out the words, "Drawn boiler tubing, ten per cent." and insert in lieu thereof the words, "wrought iron tubing, plain, not threaded, coupled or otherwise manufactured, fifteen per cent."

23. In the other item "Slabs, Blooms, Loops or Billets," strike out the words "twelve and one-half," and insert the word "ten."

24. In the item concerning "Jewellery," strike out the words "and watches."

25. Before the item "Lithographic Stones," insert the words, "Liquorice-root and paste extract for manufacturing purposes, twenty per cent. ad valorem."

"Stick extract or confection, one cent per pound and twenty per cent. ad valorem."

26. After the item "Malt," insert the words, "Malt, extract of, for medicinal purposes, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

27. In the item concerning "Meats," after the item "Shoulders, &c.," insert the words "Poultry and game of all kinds, twenty per cent. ad valorem."

28. After the item concerning "Meats" insert the words "Milk food, manufactured by Henri Nestle, Dr. Gibaut, and others, and all other similar preparations, thirty per cent. ad valorem."

29. In the item concerning "Oil Cloth," after the word "printed" insert the words "Table Covers, similarly prepared, and oiled or painted window blinds."

30. In the item concerning "Organs, Cabinet," strike out the word "ten" after the word "thereto" and insert the word "fifteen."

31. In the item concerning "Paints and Colours," strike out the word "Bismuth."

32. After the item "Paper calendered," insert the item "paper ruled, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

33. In the item "Paper Collars, &c.," strike out the word "paper" and the words "twenty-five per cent.," and after the word "fronts," insert the words, "of paper, linen or cotton, thirty per cent."

34. In the item "Pianofortes," strike out the word "ten" after the word thereto," and insert the word "fifteen."

35. After the item "Quinine," insert the words "Quicksilver, ten per cent. ad valorem."

36. In the item "Silk in the Ginn," after the word "organzine" insert the words, "and raw spun silk not coloured."

37. In the item "Champagne" and all other "Sparkling Wines," after the word "bottle," in the third last line, insert the words, "the quarts and pints in such case being old wine measure."

38. In the item "Steel and manufactures of," strike out the figures "1881," and insert "1882."

39. In the item concerning "Stone," after the word "Marble," insert the words, "from the quarry, not hammered or chiselled."

Strike out "Grindstones in the rough, one dollar and fifty-cents," and insert, "Grindstones, two dollars per ton."

40. Under the heading "Sugars, Syrups and Molasses,"—in the proviso respecting the "fair market value,"—after the word "thereof," in the third line, insert the words "including export duty or other Government tax."

41. In the item "Trunks, &c.," strike out the words "twenty-five," and insert the word "thirty."

42. After the word "Twines," strike out the words "manufactures of flax and," and insert the words, "of all kinds."

43. Under the heading "Tobacco," in the item "Cigars and Cigarettes," strike out the word "fifty," and insert the word "sixty."

44. Under the heading "Vegetables," after the item "Tomatoes," insert the words "Tomatoes in cans, two cents per pound;" and after the words "all other vegetables," insert the words "including sweet potatoes."

45. In the item concerning "Watches, &c.," strike out the words "Watch movements," and after the word "twenty," insert the word "five," and add the item, "Watch actions or movements, twenty per cent. ad valorem."

46. Under the heading "Wood and manufactures of," in the item "hubs, spokes, &c.," strike out the word "twenty," and insert the word "fifteen."

47. In the item respecting "Coal," strike out the words "and bituminous," and insert thereafter the words, "Coal, Bituminous, sixty cents per ton of 2,000 pounds."

48. Strike out the whole of the items concerning "Slate for roofing," and "Slate Slabs," and insert the following: "Slates of all kinds, and manufactures of, not otherwise specified, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem."

49. Under the heading "Wool and Woolens," after the item "Felt for glove linings," insert the following: "Wool, class one, viz., Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshires Dum Combing Wools, or wools known as Lustre Wools, and other like combing wool, such as are grown in Canada, three cents per pound."

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the "Schedule of Free Goods," by the following additions thereto, and alterations therein:—

1. After the word "ammonia," strike out the word "crude," and insert the words "sulphate of."

2. In the item "Animals for the Improvement of Stock, &c.," strike out the word "animals," and insert the words, "horses, cattle, sheep and swine."

3. After the item "Berries for dyeing, &c.," insert the words "bismuth metallic."

4. After the item, "Chloride of Lime," insert the word "cinnabar."

5. To the item "machinery for Worsted and Cotton Mills, &c.," add the words, "until the first of October, 1880."

6. After the item "Plaits, straw, &c.," insert the words, "Potash, Muriate of, crude."

7. To the item concerning "Settlers' effects," add the words "Provided that under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs, live stock, when imported into Manitoba or the North-West Territory by intending settlers, shall be free, until otherwise ordered by the Governor in Council."

8. Strike out the item "Gunny Cloth and Gunny Bags."

9. In the item respecting "Steel," strike out the figures "1881" and insert "1882."

10. After the words "Paintings in Oil," insert the words, "or water colours."

11. In the item "Newspapers," strike out the words "received by mail," and insert the words "and Quarterly, Monthly and semi-monthly Magazines, unbound."

12. In the item "Wool, unmanufactured, &c." after the word "Animals," insert the words, "not elsewhere specified."

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide:

1. That any party in whose favour a licence is granted to have and use a chemical still shall, upon receiving the said licence, pay to the Collector of Inland Revenue the sum of $10.

2. That any party in whose favour a licence for manufacturing tobacco, wholly or in part, from foreign leaf, is granted, shall pay therefor to the Collector of Inland Revenue the sum of $75.

3. That any party in whose favour a licence for manufacturing tobacco exclusively from Canadian leaf is granted, shall pay therefor to the Collector of Inland Revenue the sum of $50.

4. That any party in whose favour a licence for manufacturing in bond for exportation is granted, shall pay therefor to the Collector of Inland Revenue the sum of $300.

5. That any party in whose favour a licence to have an Excise bonding warehouse is granted, shall pay to the Collector of Inland Revenue for one such warehouse the sum of $40, and for each additional warehouse the sum of $20.

6. That as respects the duties of Excise on spirits: (a) When the material used in the manufacture thereof consists of not less than 90 per cent. by weight of raw or unmaltered grain on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength of proof, and for every less quantity, than a gallon, $1. (b) When manufactured exclusively from malted barley, taken to the distillery in bond, and on which no duty of Customs or Excise has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon, $1.02. (c) When manufactured exclusively from molasses or sugar taken to the distillery in bond and on which no duty of Customs has been paid, on every gallon of the strength of proof by Sykes' hydrometer, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, and for any less quantity than a gallon, $1.03.

7. That as respects the duties of Excise on manufactured tobacco, the said duties shall be as follows. (5) On manufactured tobacco and snuffs of all kinds, except cigars made in whole or in part from foreign or imported leaf tobacco, and containing not less than 10 per cent. by weight of moisture, and so in proportion for any greater or less degree of moisture, on every pound or less quantity than a pound, 20 cents. (6) On cigars made in whole or in part from foreign or imported leaf tobacco and containing not less than 10 per cent. by weight of moisture and so in proportion for any greater or less degree of moisture, on every pound or less quantity than a pound, 40 cents. (7) On manufactured tobacco of all kinds, except cigars and common Canada twist, when made solely from tobacco grown in Canada, and in a manufactory where no imported or foreign tobacco is used or kept, and containing not less than 10 per cent. of moisture, and so in proportion for every greater or less degree of moisture, on every pound, or less quantity than a pound, 14 cents. (8) On cigars made solely from tobacco grown in Canada, and made in a manufactory where no foreign or imported tobacco is used or kept, and containing not less than 10 per cent. of moisture, and so in proportion for every greater or less degree of moisture, on every pound, or less quantity than a pound, 30 cents.

8. That as respects the duty of Excise on vinegar, vinegar containing 6 per cent. of acetic acid, the strength to be determined by such tests as may be established by Order in Council, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength, on every gallon, or less than a gallon, 4 cents.

9. That as respects the duty of Excise on methylated spirits: Methylated spirits being composed of alcohol mixed with wood naphtha, in such proportions, and subject to such regulations as may from time to time be made by the Treasury Board, there shall be paid a duty of 15 cents for every gallon of the strength of proof, and so in proportion for every greater or less strength, and for every less quantity than a gallon.

10. That any provisions imposing any new duty or making any alteration in any duty of Excise imposed by the laws now in force, or any alteration in the mode of calculating any such duty, by which the amount thereof may be increased or diminished, shall come into force immediately on the day of passing of the Act making such alterations, and shall apply to, and the duties hereby imposed shall be payable on all spirits and tobacco, vinegar, fermented beverages, methylated spirits, distilled, manufactured or made, or taken out of bond for consumption on and after the said day, and such alterations as aforesaid shall apply to, and the duties hereby imposed shall be payable on all malt held by any brewer, malster, distiller, or other person on the said day, or manufactured or made thereafter, and the duties hereby made payable on licences shall be payable only on licences issued after the said day, existing licences remaining in force during the time for which they were granted.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing resolutions, and the alterations made in the duties of Customs and Excise, and on the articles therein mentioned, shall take effect upon, and after the 10th March, instant.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 10th March, 1880.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 67) To amend the Acts respecting the Canada Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Fitzsimmons.)

Bill (No. 68) To incorporate the Nelson Valley Railway and Transportation Company.—(Mr. Macdougall.)

Bill (No. 69) To incorporate the Rapid City and Souris River Colonisation Railway Company.—(Mr. Bannerman.)

PRINTING OF A PARLIAMENTARY PAPER.

REMARKS.

MR. STEPHENSON presented the sixth Report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I notice among the papers not to be printed, as read by the Clerk, that containing a detailed statement of the amount of Imports and Exports. The question as to whether it should be printed or not was postponed until another meeting.

MR. ANGLIN: It is one of the most important papers ever laid on the Table of the House. It is a difficult paper to print, but I think, under the circumstances, it ought to be printed immediately, if possible.

MR. STEPHENSON: The matter was fully discussed by the Printing Committee, and it was thought that, on account of the time and expense involved in printing it, it was better not to print it in full, but only an abstract, which was contained on the last two sheets.

MR. MACKENZIE: I hope the Chairman of the Committee will have a meeting and re-consider that to-morrow. It is a very important document, and should be printed.

MR. STEPHENSON: I will make a note of this, and lay it before the Committee.

BUCTOUCHE HARBOUR, KENT, N. B.

QUESTION.

MR. GIROUARD (Kent) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any appropriation for the construction of beacon-lights at the entrance of Buctouche Harbour, Kent county, N.B., during this present year.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.): It is the intention to place two beacon-lights in this harbour.

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

QUESTION.

MR. FARROW enquired, What amount of fractional currency, of the denomination of 25c., is now in circulation, and what amount is in the hands of the Receiver-General; further, does the Government intend to give the country a further issue of 10c. and 25c. for the convenience of change, instead of having, as now, to use postage stamps, which are very inconvenient.

SIR SAMUEL L. TULEY: There are $116,949 in circulation, and in the hands of the Assistant Receiver-General $43,091, and in vaults, $172,500. Arrangements are being made for $150,000 small silver, of the denomination of 5c., 10c., and 25c.

KEEWATIN—JAIL ACCOMMODATION.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether, in view of a recent decision rendered by the Chief Justice of Manitoba, ordering the release of persons sent to the Winnipeg jail, in default of payment of the fine imposed by Magistrates in Keewatin, for the selling of liquor, it is the intention of the Government to amend the law in this respect or to provide for jail accommodation in the said District of Keewatin.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): It is the intention of the Government to introduce such an amendment of the law as may be required in consequence of the decision of the Chief Justice of Manitoba.

MONTREAL CUSTOM HOUSE—HARDWARE VALUER.

QUESTION.

MR. COURSOL enquired, Whether a successor has been appointed to the late Mr. Bryson, formerly valuer of hardware at the Custom-house, Montreal, and whether such appointment, if made, is temporary or permanent.

MR. BOWELL: The Government has appointed a gentleman as hardware appraiser in the city of Montreal, who is still on trial.

CHATHAM, ONT.—GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

QUESTION.

MR. STEPHENSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to put in the Estimates or Supplementary Estimates to be brought down during the present Session a sum of money for the erection of a fit and proper building in the town of Chatham, Ont., for the accommodation of the Customs, Postal and Inland Revenue Offices and services in that town; if so, what amount; if not, why?

MR. LANGEVIN: In answer to my hon. friend, I may say that this matter is under the consideration of the Government.

NEWFOUNDLAND—FREE ADMISSION OF CANADIAN CATTLE.

QUESTION.

MR. MCISAAC enquired, Whether the Government has opened, or intends to open, negotiations with the Government of Newfoundland, with the view of effecting the free admission of cattle from the Dominion into that Province unconditionally, or in return for a like admission of its fish into the Dominion.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : There has been no communication with the Government of Newfoundland upon this subject since last Session, when that Government declined to admit free cattle imported from the Dominion of Canada. There is no immediate intention of reopening negotiations.

DOMINION DAM, DEVIL LAKE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. JONES, in moving for an Order of the House for a return of all documents or correspondence, during the year 1879, with the Department of Public Works of this Dominion, relating to the rebuilding of the Dominion Dam, Devil Lake, in the township of Bedford, Province of Ontario, said : It is not the first time I have brought this motion before the House. I brought it up in 1877, but the late Government did not then see fit to carry out the request I made. I hope, however, this Government will do so, because I think it is their duty. It has been stated on the floor of this House that this dam does not belong to the Government at all, but to private individuals. I propose to show that it does belong to the Government, and that when it was destroyed it should have been rebuilt, in order to raise the upper level of the Rideau Canal for navigation purposes. The dam I speak of was built forty or fifty years ago, by Mr. George Chaffey and Mr. Benjamin Tett, for the purpose of bringing down lumber, etc. It was used by these individuals for a great number of years, and when they gave up the lumbering business, they asked the Government to take the dam off their hands as it was required for the purposes of a reservoir to assist during low water the navigation of the Rideau Canal. The dam was destroyed in 1876 by some evil-disposed persons. The excuse given for not reconstructing the dam was that the Rideau Canal did not pay the Government, and that some $30,000 a year was required to keep it up. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) forgot to say that this canal was a gift to this Government from the British Government. The Dominion Dam, the Rideau Canal and the whole of the Ordnance Lands on which these buildings stand were a gift ; and, though the revenues received may not pay expenses, when you take into consideration the amount of money paid for the St. Lawrence, Chambly and Welland Canals, I think it will be seen that the Rideau Canal has not been so costly to the Dominion as the others. In order to show that this is a Dominion work, I will read what took place. In 1871, the water supply failing for the Rideau Canal, Mr. Slater recommended that the dam should be rebuilt, and an Order in Council was passed, 25th January, 1872, granting a sum of $700 to build Harts and Devil Lake Dam, which was carried out. In 1876, the dam was destroyed, it was the duty of the Government to rebuild it, for the purpose of keeping up the upper level of the canal. It was also the duty of the Government to find out who the evil-disposed persons were that destroyed it and punish them. Although it was said some action was taken to find out who destroyed that dam, I have not been able to learn what action was taken to find out who those evil-disposed persons were. In 1875, we find the dam is still in charge of the Dominion Government, and Mr. Wise, the present engineer of the canal, in his report says :

“ The maintenance of the dam is, I consider, necessary to secure the navigation of the canal during periods of low water, which experience has shown now occur. The dam keeps back the snow and rainfall of a large area of rocky country, and on that account at a minimum of damage. To secure the benefit of this water to the canal, when most required, a paid officer of the Department should be put in charge of it without delay.”

In 1876 again, Mr. Wise in his report says :

“ Experience has shown that periods of low water now occur which formerly did not, and if the supply for navigation on the descending level to Kingston is to be maintained, all the present reserves should be held under control. The damages, if fairly assessed, should not exceed $3,000.”

In 1876 and 1877, Mr. Perry, P. L. S., was employed to make a survey, showing the damages and to report. His report and plans in full are in the Department. Mr. Wise in his report of October, 1879, says :

“ Chaffey's Dominion dam retains the waters shed of some seventy-five square miles of rocky country, supplying the south-west descending level to Kingston, discharging through the Devil Lake into the Rideau Canal, at Mud Lake. This dam was torn down by some evil disposed persons in August, 1877, and was never re-built. Its destruction deprived the canal of this large reserve, and if the efficiency of the navigation is to be maintained at all seasons, I would recommend its reconstruction. On account of the rocky nature of the country and from my own personal observation of the lands drowned by this dam, the claims for damages that have been set up are greatly exaggerated, and could not be sustained on any investigation. A comparatively small appropriation to meet any just claims would secure this reserve to the canal."

This dam is about 50 feet long and 12 feet high, and it would cost to re-build is about $300 or $400. The Rideau Canal is becoming more important every day, and I think it is the duty of the Government to support it. It is not in the interest, as will be said by some hon. gentlemen, of mill-owners on the line of the canal that the dam should be reconstructed, but it is in the interest of the managers of the canal itself.

MR. ROCHESTER: I think the remarks of the hon. gentleman with regard to this canal perfectly correct. I do hope the hon. the Minister of Canals will see his way clear to rebuild this dam. It is a very small affair in itself, but is a large thing for the navigation of the canal. I may state for the information of the House that, although the Rideau Canal has not paid working expenses for a number of years, there is a probability now of its beginning to pay. During the whole of this winter large quantities of iron ore have been shipped from this part of the country to the United States, and I have been given to understand that arrangements are being made to carry that ore by water instead of by rail, for the simple reason that they have to draw some five or six miles to the railroad, while the water accommodation is within a mile of the mines. The intention is to take this ore by the Rideau Canal this season. This is a new branch of industry that has started up in this part of the country. I would like to draw the hon. member's attention to another matter in regard to this canal. About fifteen miles from Ottawa there is a ledge of rock that runs across the canal. I am told that it would cost about $1,500 or $2,000 to remove this ledge of rock, which would give 12 to 18 inches more draught of water through to Kingston. It would be a great thing in carrying iron ore from Ottawa to Lake Ontario. I hope the hon. Minister will instruct an engineer to report in regard to this matter, and the actual cost of the removal of the lock. There is no doubt that the Rideau Canal has been for many years of some cost to the country, but, when the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has made representations to us about the cost of the canal, he has invariably refrained from telling us how much money has been received from the sale or otherwise of the ordinary lands belonging to the canal. I think there is some stipulation between the Imperial Government and this Government that the canal shall be kept open and in working order.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. ROCHESTER: Although the hon. gentleman says "no," I think that an arrangement such as I have referred to does exist. In view of this new industry springing up, I hope the navigation of the Rideau Canal will be kept open, and in order to do this it is necessary that the dam should be rebuilt and that the ledge of rock I have alluded to should be removed.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: There is no objection to this motion passing. I may say that the difficulty no doubt has been the very small amount of work that was required for this canal, and it seems inadvisable to spend a large amount of money until there is greater demand for this mode of transportation. But, if it should appear that there is to be an increase of business, and that the paying qualities of the canal will be improved by taking up its improvement—if, when the matter has been carefully looked into, they are found necessary, the repairs will be made.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never had any hesitation in declining the rebuilding of this or any other dam on that canal route; because there is water enough to carry all the traffic offered. In the year 1877-8, the traffic on the canal amounted to $7,535, and the expenditure for maintaining it amounted to $39,780. Last year the revenue was $5,878, while the expenditure was $35,288. It is quite well known that the canal has been surrounded by railways, and the through water traffic is nearly all done by the St. Lawrence Canals, and must so continue. The Dominion should not be saddled with the expense of improving this Canal, when it is clearly a Canal used for local traffic only, and has no Dominion traffic carried over it. The Canal has been a constant cause of expense at all times. It is a mistake to suppose that it is a real service to this part of the country further than the spending of the money is concerned. My advice to the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals—and I tender it for what it is worth—is that the expenditure on such works should be such only as we get some return from.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman opposite takes the ground that this work should not be undertaken because it will entail an expense on the country. But why should this Canal fare worse than other Canals? Take the St. Lawrence and Welland Canals, which, both together, give a total nett revenue of $38,000, and then look at the millions of dollars they have cost the country. This Canal has not cost the Government anything; it was a gift from the British Government, together with the Ordnance Lands, worth two millions or more dollars. Yet the hon. member for Lambton puts forward such an argument as that for not rebuilding a work absolutely required, and which we are bound by agreement to keep up.

MR. HAGGART: This Canal is not only a benefit to those parties who use it for transport or traffic, but it is useful to many important manufacturing works that are erected on it, almost every one of the works on the route being supplied with water from this Canal. There are no works that indirectly give so much benefit to the Government as the works on this section, and it is of great importance that this dam should be kept in order so that the Canal may be kept open.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—RAILWAY COMMUNICATION.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

MR. BRECKEN, in moving for an Address for copies of all surveys, engineers' reports, correspondence, memorials, papers and documents, having reference to a proposed railway connecting Cape Tormentine, in the Province of New Brunswick, with the Intercolonial Railway, and also connecting Cape Traverse, in Prince Edward Island, with the Prince Edward Island Railway, said: I may remind the House that, when the Province of Prince Edward Island entered Con-ederation, in 1873, among the terms of Union guaranteed to that Province was the following:—

“Efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers to be established and maintained between the Island and the mainland of the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion.”

It is well known to this House that efforts have been made to carry out this promise. The steamer Northern Light was built by the late Government, led by the hon. member for Lambton, and placed on the winter route between Georgetown in the Island and Pictou in the Province of Nova Scotia. I do not profess, Mr. Speaker, to have such a knowledge of shipping as to warrant me in saying whether that vessel is properly modelled and built for the work intended for her, but I doubt very much whether it is possible to construct a steamer, I care not on what model or by what moulds, that will be able to keep up regular and constant communication throughout the winter months between the Island and the mainland, I do not believe it possible. I do not wish to undervalue the services of the winter steamer; she is no doubt an advantage to us, inasmuch as she keeps open the communication with Nova Scotia for six weeks after our summer boats cease running; the freight that she carries is a great advantage to our merchants besides affording facilities for females to travel to and from Prince Edward Island, which rarely takes place by the way of the Capes. From the experience we have had of the Northern Light, now extending over four winters, I feel justified in stating to this House that no winter steam-boat communication can fairly and thoroughly carry out and fulfil that condition of the Union which assured to us efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between the Island and the mainland, placing us in continuous communication with the railway system of the Dominion. Mr. Speaker, the people of the Island look with confidence to the Government to carry out fully and honestly this condition. In 1878, the predecessors of the present Government sent an engineer to make a survey of the country lying between the Intercolonial Railway and Cape Tormentine, in the Province of New Brunswick, and between Cape Traverse and the railway on the Island. Mr. McLeod's report may be said to be in favour of the undertaking. After examining several competent witnesses, living on both sides of the Straits of Northumberland, whose occupations have been for years to make the winter crossing, and whose experience was placed at his disposal, he reports :

“That the evidence appears to show that the most reliable way of crossing to the Island is by the ice-boats, and that a steamer cannot be used during that period, that there is no part of the Straits where the ice opens at regular intervals, but that the movements of the ice are governed by the wind ; that the best crossing for the ice-boats is between Allens on the mainland and Cape Traverse on the Island ; also that a screw steamer, drawing about 10 feet of water, would be the most suitable at all seasons when the crossing is practicable, and that the ice-boats would be enabled to commence crossing when the steamer is forced to stop.”

On reading over Mr. McLeod's report, and looking at his estimate of the cost of constructing wharfs on the New Brunswick and Island sides of the Straits, it is quite evident that his idea was to provide protection and accommodation for a steamer of the draft of the Northern Light which is from 18 ft. to 20 ft., for he speaks of building a wharf at Cape Jourmain, about 2,100 feet long, at a cost of about $147,000, which will give 700 ft. of wharf at from 10 ft. to 12 ft. at low water spring tides, while, at Cape Traverse, he reports that the present wharf should be lengthened 740 ft. and widened, making it 2,200 ft. long, at a cost of about $95,000. Less draft of water, and wharves probably of one-half Mr. McLeod's estimate, would be sufficient to accommodate a small tug-boat necessary for the efficient winter crossing. The country between Amherst and Cape Tormentine is very favourable for the construction of a branch railway at a very reasonable cost. This would involve a distance of about thirty-four miles, while the proposed branch between Cape Traverse on the Island and County Line station, runs a distance of about eleven miles, and through a country quite level. This latter route is, I believe, the shortest and most economical. The whole work might be constructed at a cost of about $600,000. The Straits of Northumberland are about nine miles wide in a direct course. The men employed in the hazardous and arduous service of carrying mails and passengers across these Straits are a brave, hardy, and careful body of men. Too much cannot be said in their praise. I doubt very much, Mr. Speaker, whether any body of men employed in the Public Service of this Dominion work harder and are so poorly paid as our mail carriers. Hon. members who fortunately live on the mainland and who reside near the centres of commerce are accustomed to receive with regularity their letters and correspondence, can scarcely conceive the disadvantages which the mercantile community and others in Prince Edward Island labour under from the delays and irregularities which occur in despatching and receiving Island mails. This is a matter of great moment to the Island, the drawbacks which are incident to our insular position should receive the earnest consideration of the Dominion Government, and we may ask as a matter of right under the terms of Union that these disadvantages should be lessened as much as possible. We see railroads involving the expenditure of millions being built in other parts of the Dominion yet unpeopled, and we from the Lower Provinces give our support to these great undertakings believing that they will tend to develop these hitherto unsettled Provinces. But we, from the Lower Provinces, come from a country thickly populated, which does not possess the means of communication which are afforded to the people settling in the North-West. We do not speak in a complaining spirit, because we believe both sides of the House were waiting to learn the result of the Northern Light experiment, which I boldly assert has failed to secure that continuous communication which we have a right to expect under the Terms of Union. I urge upon my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and his colleagues to give this matter their earnest consideration, and to see that the people of Prince Edward Island receive their due, and that the terms promised to us are faithfully and honestly carried out, and that, too, with as little delay as possible.

MR. McISAAC: In the Sessions of 1877 and 1878, the subject of the present motion was brought to the attention of the House, and received full consideration. On those occasions, several hon. members, including all the representatives of Prince Edward Island, took part in the discussions. Some advocated the route between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine, some advocated Cape George as the mainland terminus, while others contended that a point near the mouth of Wallace Harbour was the most suitable terminus; all, however, agreed that the present route was impracticable, and that Pictou as a terminus should be abandoned. They attributed the failure of the Northern Light to the continuance of this route. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries not only condemned the route, but maintained that the Northern Light, from her model and construction could never perform the service with any degree of success. Two years have since elapsed, and we find the same route continued; we find the model and construction of the boat have not been improved or changed, and, worse, no attempt has been made to effect an improvement. This is more surprising when it is known that the hon. gentleman, who had been the loudest in denouncing the boat and her performances up to the Session of 1878, has been since presiding over the Department which has exclusive control over the service. Since his elevation to office he has done nothing, said nothing, to remedy the grievance, which, until then, had been the object of his constant denunciation. It is not for me to impugn the sincerity which such an inconsistent course may open to suspicion. Let the people of his Province be the judges on that head. The service is most important to Prince Edward Island and the other Maritime Provinces. It affects more or less the whole Dominion. The maintenance in an efficient manner of steam communication in winter and summer, between the Island and the mainland, is a principal stipulation of the Union compact. Without this valuable guarantee, probably the Province would not yet have entered the Confederacy. Seven years of the Union have already passed, and this condition has not been fulfilled. The Northern Light was secured for carrying it out, but so far she has failed, simply, I believe, because Pictou was made the mainland terminus. For the past few years she has been struggling between Georgetown and Pictou; the result is known to every man in the Lower Provinces. She has at least fully demonstrated her inability to perform the service between these two points. After so much experience, I believe she should be employed in discovering the most feasible route. Her duties for a time should be confined to the work of testing the comparative accessibility of the proposed points on the mainland. When the most accessible point is ascertained, then the question of connecting it with the railway system should be determined. If the route between Traverse and Tormentine is found to be the best, let the necessary railways and piers be constructed, although the cost, on presumably good authority, will exceed half a million dollars. I do not speak with entire confidence as to the accuracy of the estimate, but I presume the report and papers moved for by my hon. friend, when brought down, will show at least the approximate figure. Should the point near the mouth of Wallace Harbour be found to be the most accessible, I say let it be selected, and let the required railways be built. But, if the route between Georgetown or Souris and Cape George should prove to be the most practicable—and I believe it will, if amply tested—it should, for that reason alone, independently of additional considerations, be adopted. Cape George affords sufficient depth of water, has already a large pier, easily kept in repair, and is within about fifteen miles of the Eastern Extension Railway, which may be regarded an extension of the Intercolonial to the Atlantic. It is also several miles nearer Georgetown and Souris than Pictou, and any person will easily perceive how important a saving of even a few miles becomes in such an arduous navigation as that before the House. The construction of a railway over the short distance of fifteen miles would cost a mere trifle in comparison with the large expenditure required to connect any of the other points with our system of railways. I may say, also, that the ice never packs so solidly along this route as it does in the more western parts of the Straits of Northumberland. This arises from its proximity to the mouth of the Strait of Canso, and the entrance between Prince Edward Island and the Island of Cape Breton, where the ice is never wholly at rest. The Government, I trust, will not authorise the construction of railway branches anywhere, in connection with this service, without first ascertaining the most feasible route. The experience of the last three or four years plainly establishes the wisdom of such a course. The country, with its present enormous liabilities for railroads and other public works, is not in a condition or mood to bear additional undertakings, especially while the success of the object in view is questionable. I hope the hon. the Minister of Marine will move in the matter at once, and will remain no longer exposed to the charges which he himself, with such earnest-looking indignation, had been making against his predecessor, while he was in the habit of protecting the interests of his Province from this side of the House.

MR. HACKETT: This question of winter steam communication is of great importance to the people of Prince Edward Island. The prospect of obtaining it was one great reason why the people of the Island consented to Confederation. That was well understood by the people of the Island at the time of Union, and it is better understood to-day. Owing to the peculiar situation of the Island, to her insular position, and to the fact that for five months of the year her coasts are completely surrounded with ice, she could not derive any benefits from Confederation. The people of the Island were aware that the Dominion was pledged to the construction of public works of great magnitude, such as the opening of Canals, the building of railroads, and other work of a similar nature. They also knew that, on becoming a part of the Dominion of Canada, they would be compelled to contribute their share for the construction of those works, and, unless means of communication bringing them in connection with the railway system of the Dominion, winter and summer, were secured to them, they would not be in a position to participate in the benefits which would accrue to the rest of the Dominion by the construction of these works. They therefore have it expressly stipulated in the terms of Confederation, that efficient steam communication, winter and summer, should be maintained by the Dominion Government, for the conveyance of mails and passengers to and from the Island. Now let us consider for one moment how this part of the compact has been carried out. We find that for the first two years after Confederation nothing at all was done towards fulfilling this part of the contract, so far as the winter season was concerned. In the year 1876, the Government, recognising the rights of the Island in this matter, placed the now famous Northern Light upon the route between Georgetown and Pictou. I am not going to say anything disparaging of the Northern Light. She was built expressly for the purpose of testing the practicability of navigating the Straits in midwinter. She was merely placed there as an experiment and, if she has not come up to the expectations of those who took an interest in her, she has not altogether proved a failure. She has at intervals succeeded in effecting a crossing, sometimes making her trips with considerable regularity and sometimes being for a whole week at a time locked in the ice, being unable to move in any direction. She has, however, been successful to a certain extent and her operations have been of great benefit to those engaged in trade, as they have been enabled to receive consignments of goods that they otherwise would have to do without till spring. With regard to the carriage of mails and passengers, which is, after all, the main feature of this affair, and which is the only part of the original compact that we can insist upon having carried out, her operations have been most unsatisfactory. Even during the present winter, which has been one of the most successful seasons, it was found necessary, about the middle of January, to take the mails away from her, and have them forwarded by the only route by means of which communication can be kept up with the outside world in midwinter—the Capes route. Capes Traverse and Tormentine are only separated by a strait of some nine miles in width, and experience has shown, after many attempts at other points, that this is the route which must be adopted for our winter mail service. Such being the fact, it becomes the duty of the Government to so improve this route as to make it as perfect as possible, and all their energies and means should be concentrated on this one point. At present, the crossing is effected by use of the small ice-boats, as it was before Confederation. I need not refer to the difficulties and hardships experienced by the brave and hardy men who have to perform this service, who are called upon in the middle of our severe winters to risk their lives in the public interest. They have been most successful in performing this duty, and, owing to their skill and ability, we are enabled to receive our mails with some degree of regularity. But the great difficulty they have to contend with is not the ice but open water, when high winds prevail, and they have been frequently compelled to return on account of the open water and lolly, without being able to effect a crossing. It is believed by parties who are competent to judge in this matter that a small steamboat to supplement the ice-boats would perfect this service so far as the crossing is concerned. The only thing then required to render this service complete, would be to connect this ferry with the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways; this would necessitate the construction of two short lines of railway on both sides. With this object in view, the late Government ordered a survey to be made of the proposed branches. This survey was made by Mr. McLeod, C. E., a gentleman of considerable ability, and he reported that the building and equipping of the railways, as well as the construction of wharves on both sides, sufficient to accommodate a steamer drawing 19ft. of water, would cost about $600,000. I am of opinion, however, that it is not at all necessary to provide wharfing to the extent estimated by Mr. McLeod; that wharves sufficient to accommodate a vessel drawing 10ft. of water will answer all purposes, and thereby a saving of about $100,000 would be effected. It will thus be seen that about $500,000 will be the whole expenditure required, and, when we consider the large expenditure which is going on every year for the purpose of keeping faith with the Province of British Columbia, amounting to millions of dollars, I think we are not asking for anything unreasonable when we request that this small amount shall be expended at once for the purpose of carrying out the solemn compact entered into with Prince Edward Island. In looking over a debate which took place in this House on this subject in 1878, I was pleased to find that the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, then in opposition, expressed himself in the following manner:—

“It was a part of the terms of Union with Prince Edward Island, and the Government of Canada was bound to accomplish, if that were possible, that communication which had been attempted to be made by means of the Northern Light.”

I presume the hon. gentleman is of the same opinion still, and now that it is clearly established that communication must be kept up by way of the Capes, I hope he will at once take action and cause these branch railways, so necessary to this communication, to be built without delay and thus carry out the terms of the Union with Prince Edward Island.

MR. YEO: I agree with all that has been said by the previous speakers respecting the necessity of undertaking the construction of the branch lines at once. They are required to keep up regular communication between this Island and the mainland during the whole of the year. One of the inducements held out to the people of Prince Edward Island to join the Confederation was the promise to establish steam communication with the continent in winter as well as summer. The Dominion engaged to do this by the Terms of Union. The Northern Light has done very well, better than most persons expected, but the experience of the last four winters has proved that she is not to be depended upon to make regular trips during the winter months. She was placed on the Georgetown route by the late Government, to keep up communication between that town and Pictou, but it was found that, owing to the irregularity of her trips, the mails were frequently delayed, to the great inconvenience of the people of the Island and their correspondents abroad. Experience has proved that the only practicable route is by Capes Traverse and Tormentine. The representatives of the Island did their best to convince the late Government that this is the only one that can be depended upon to secure regular mail communication with the Island in the winter season. They maintained that the only way to carry out the Terms of Union in this matter of mail communication was to connect the Island Railway with the Intercolonial by means of two short lines of branch railways and a ferry. The Government, in accordance with these representations, sent Mr. McLeod, an engineer, and a competent man, to survey the lines and to choose a site for the wharves on each side of the Strait. His report is before the House. I consider that the estimate for building the wharves is much higher than will be required, as the Northern Light is much too large, and draws too much water to be placed on that route. If a small but powerful boat, drawing 10 ft. of water, was placed there, she would be large enough to do all the work required of her, and the expense of building wharves for such a boat would be comparatively small. The previous speakers have referred to the large sum it would take to do this work, but I do not think that considerations of expense ought to prevent the Government taking the work in hand immediately, as they are bound by the Terms of Union to keep up daily steam communication between the Island and the mainland. The Government is spending millions of dollars in British Columbia to fulfil its obligations with that Province, and Prince Edward Island has as good a right to insist upon the reasonable terms on which it entered the Confederation being kept as British Columbia. The hon. gentlemen who now form the Government made the bargain with the Island delegates, and, as they are strongly supported by the representatives from the Province, they should consider themselves under a greater obligation to do justice to the Province in this matter. The hon. the Minister of Railways, when in opposition, strongly advocated the branch lines, and now that he is in power the people interested expect that he will perform what he then promised. Besides, one of the branch lines will run through the hon. gentleman's own county, and he knew that many influential men among his constituents were very desirous of having it constructed. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when in opposition, was a strong advocate of the branch lines and the Cape Traverse route, and I hope that he will use his influence to have the work proceeded with as speedily as possible.

subject in which my constituents have a very great interest, as well as the constituents of the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper). The difference between him and me, however, is that I want the connection with Prince Edward Island established through my county, while he wants it in his. I am very glad the hon. members from Prince Edward Island are moving in this matter, which is one of great importance. I believe the Dominion is under an obligation to the Island in this matter; and I trust that as we have two Cabinet Ministers deeply interested in it, steps will be taken at an early day to give effect to the wishes of the people in that part of the country. I know that my hon. successor (Mr. Pope, Queen's. P. E. I.) was extremely anxious about this work. He used to pay my county the compliment of passing through it on his way to and from Prince Edward Island, and he has taken great pleasure in telling my constituents how important this work was, and that if I only chose to take the proper steps to exercise the influence I possessed with the late Government, there would be no difficulty in getting this work completed. He also stated that if there should be a change of Government there would be no question about securing this work. A change has come, the hon. gentleman himself being now in the Government, and I know that he may have the powerful assistance of the hon. the Minister of Railways in securing the enterprise. He, too, is interested in and has pledged himself to this work among his own constituents. When we find the hon. members for the Island, supporting the Government, unanimous on the subject, we might assume they would have sufficient influence to induce it to complete this necessary work. I am glad those hon. members have touched upon the subject of the Northern Light. The House knows that, in the time of the late Government, the denunciations of that steamer were almost unmeasured, and that I was severely reflected upon for having provided her. The present Minister of Marine then denounced the Northern Light violently, as worthless and unfit for the service, stating her purchase was an absolute waste of money. Now what do we find? I think this is the fourth year she has run, all the time growing in the public confidence ; the members from the Island speak in the highest terms of her ; she has vindicated herself perfectly, it being admitted she has performed wonders in winter navigation. If the statements of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were true, he should have stopped that steamer last winter. Yet she is still running, and I am glad to know she performs such good service. The same officers we had are still in command of her, but it must be admitted she cannot sustain the postal communication between the mainland and the Island, it must be kept up by the Capes. I think Mr. McLeod, the engineer, after a survey, reported that the only point at which communication could be maintained regularly with the Island was opposite the Capes. Whether the steamer can run there or not I am not prepared to say. I was very glad to find that my successor intended to put a steamer on at the Capes, to make the experiment. I learn that he has changed his mind, however, the reason, I presume, being that the Northern Light is doing such good service on the present route that she cannot be spared. The desire to keep the steamer running should not prevent us from getting the railway connection.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER : I have no objection to the motion. I took the earliest opportunity of laying before the House all the information we possessed in relation to this subject. In the terms of Union with Prince Edward Island, there is an engagement on the part of the Dominion to maintain steam communication both summer and winter with the Island, as far as practicable. The late Government, recognising the importance of that obligation, had the Northern Light constructed, and placed on the route for the purpose of endeavouring to maintain winter communication. The hon. member for Westmoreland, late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, knew that very great difficulties were encountered in this undertaking. I think the experiment has been more successful the present winter than in any former period, and I am afraid he is right in the conclusion that it is not practicable to maintain sufficiently regular communication for mail purposes by the steamer, except between the Capes. In discussing this matter with the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it was determined, so soon as serious difficulties were encountered on the present route of the Northern Light, between Georgetown and Pictou, to place her between the Capes, to see how far the presence of a steamer there could assist in the navigation by keeping a passage open between the ice on both sides. I believe the Northern Light has been ordered to that service, with a view to the solution of that question. The subject of the construction of a railway has remained in abeyance, although a survey was ordered by the late Government, which was made by an able engineer, Mr. McLeod, who made a very valuable report on the subject. The subject has remained in abeyance until the further experiment be tried, of how far steam communication between the Capes can be established for mail service. The mails are now carried between the Capes by ice-boats ; but I am in hopes it will be found that either the Northern Light, or a boat more specially constructed for that service, will be able to maintain regular communication, or decidedly improve it, by making it less trying to passengers than that by the ice-boat system. It is incumbent upon the Government to carry out, as far as possible, the obligations of steam communications between the Island and the rest of the Dominion ; and, no doubt, although a very large expenditure is involved in the proposed wharves at the Capes, I believe it can be greatly reduced by getting a boat of lighter draught. Both the lines on the Island and the mainland are extremely favourable, and the grades are easy, and the work to be performed with the bridging is light. So it would not involve a very large expenditure to give us steam communication by Cape Traverse and the Intercolonial Railway. There need be no serious difficulty in completing the connection between those points, and I hope that at an early day the Government will be in a position to deal with this important work.

MR. MACDONALD (Kings, P. E. I.): The whole subject of steam communication between the points mentioned is very important. I differ from the statement of the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Brecken), that the Northern Light has fallen short of expectations. When it was first contemplated to keep up winter communication with the Island by steamer, the most we looked forward to was a shortening of the winter by a boat that would succeed in running a month later in autumn, and a month earlier in spring. We find now that the Northern Light, after repeated trials and a great deal of mismanagement, has at last succeeded in keeping up communication between the island and the mainland during the whole of this winter. I had some doubts myself that this would ever be accomplished, but having made a trip in the Northern Light this winter, I have come to the conclusion that steam communication can be maintained between the Island and the mainland with very great regularity. It has been said that the straits were easy of navigation this winter; the contrary is the case. We found the gulf, seemingly, packed with ice, almost fuller of it than ever before, notwithstanding which the steamer continues to run; she made lately the round trip in one day, carrying a large quantity of freight and many passengers. I am informed that from the 1st January till the 1st March she carried over 200 passengers. This is a great source of comfort to the people compelled to travel across the Island in winter. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) said that the late Government agreed to abandon the present route from Georgetown to Pictou. After an experiment of several winters we have found it practicable. I believe that that is the only route practicable for steam communication. A good deal has been said against the Northern Light, but anyone who makes a trip in her by winter will agree with me that she is one of the best boats afloat in sea ice. I believe to-day no other boat would equal her in going through it. The hon. member for Antigonish says she is continually sticking between Georgetown and Pictou. I admit that during February last it took her a week on some occasions to make the trip, but unless a man's time is particularly valuable, it would be better spent in a comfortable steamer than on the ice-boats going across by the Capes. We know that the keeping open of communication with the Island, summer and winter, by steam, was one of the terms of Confederation. It is just possible that during the depth of winter, and with only one boat on the route, the mail will be compelled to come by the Capes, to secure regularity. But I believe that if the Government would put on another boat on the route, between Georgetown and Pictou, we could have it almost as regular as by the Cape. In any case, I believe that it is the duty of the Government to carry out the terms of Confederation, and that the boat should be kept on her present route for the comfort and convenience of passengers. I have heard a great deal of denunciation of the Northern Light and her management. I can state from my own experience that the captain and crew who are now on board of her are good men, and the right men in the right place. Captain Finlayson is a good and careful man. It has been said that he is rather chicken-hearted, but it does not require a very great-hearted man to make the trip in the Northern Light. But if she gets into an ice-jam, he will look carefully after the ship and bring her safely out. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) believed the Cape George route was the best one for the Northern Light; possibly there may be something in that; it may be easier of access at certain times. But we know that the tides have more effect on the ice in the Gulf, and that the water between Pictou Island and the mainland is generally open by force of the tides. I trust, however, that to facilitate the present mail carriage, the Government will see its way clear to construct branches to the Cape in order that the winter service of the mails may be continued with regularity, while at the same time they continue the passenger service by the Northern Light to the eastern section of the Island.

Motion agreed to.

MR. BRECKEN, in moving for an Address for copies of all memorials, correspondence, papers and documents, having reference to a proposed branch railway connecting Rustico, in Queen's county, in Prince Edward Island, with the Prince Edward Island Railway, at or near Hunter River Station, said: I hope the hon. members of this House will not think the members from Prince Edward Island have contracted the railway mania, but this is a matter I wished specially to bring before the House. Rustico is a settlement in Queen's County, situated eight or ten miles from the nearest station on the Prince Edward Island Railway. It is old and prosperous and thickly settled, chiefly settled by the French speaking population. It has a bar harbour, and the people fish extensively, the annual catch of mackerel amounting to 15,000 barrels. The country is densely populated, and besides affords many advantages as a seaside resort. The hotel accommodation is good, and annually draws from the hot and dusty cities of the Dominion and United States many visitors. Rustico and vicinity are rapidly becoming favourite resorts, owing to the health-giving and invigorating climate, affording also the luxury of sea-bathing to an extent not surpassed by any place in the Dominion. The branch that is asked for will be about nine miles in length, and will pass through a level country. It is the opinion of competent men who have examined the subject, that this branch would be the best paying portion of the railroad in the Island. I suppose there are nearly 1,000 farmers who would be profited by it as a means of transporting their produce to Charlottetown. Another consideration is that the island is becoming denuded of wood, and to this district will be obliged to resort to the use of coal as a fuel, for the transportation of which this branch would be of great utility. I know that the present railway engagements of the Government are very heavy, and I dare say they feel they have as much on their hands as can well be undertaken, but I trust this matter will engage the serious attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways. The House must remember that the Prince Edward Island Railway is a Dominion property, and if this branch was built it would add largely to the earnings of the road. At present, and without this branch, a large portion of the fish caught and produce raised has to be transported from Rustico to Charlottetown, a distance of about fifteen miles, in carts.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I have no doubt the work the hon. gentleman proposes is a very important one, and that it would be very desirable to extend a branch from the Island Railway to the point he mentions, but I am afraid that it is hardly possible for us to make any promises in connection with this work at present. The efforts we are now making are to balance the expenditure, as far as we can, in the operation of the railway, and when that is accomplished, if it is possible to consider any extension, we will do so.

Motion agreed to.

NEW BRUNSWICK—CLAIMS AGAINST THE DOMINION.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury), in moving for an Address for correspondence between the Government of New Brunswick and the Government of this Dominion, concerning certain claims made by the former Government against the latter, since the 1st day of March, 1879; also, all Orders in Council, since that date, referring to or dealing in any way, by ordering payment or otherwise, with said claims, said: I do not intend to refer to the merits or demerits of the claims referred to in this resolution at this time. Three or four times within as many years this subject has been brought up and urged by me in this Parliament. I am aware that there are many difficulties connected with the settlement of some of these claims, which has been complicated by previous legislation. A good deal of correspondence has taken place with reference to them, and deputations have been sent here by the Local Government, on several occasions, to effect their settlement. The members of the Dominion House of Commons were particularly urged by the Local Government to effect a settlement. A paragraph was inserted in the Speech from the Throne before the Local Legislature, making reference to these claims, and stating that they ought to be paid at once with interest. Members both of the Assembly and of the Council, in their places, warned the members of the House of Commons that unless they urged the former Government to come to some arrangement they would be held responsible. We did urge upon the late Government, as well as on the present Government, the settlement of these claims. We have now in power here the hon. the Finance Minister, who was then Governor of New Brunswick, and who took an especial interest in the settlement of those claims at the time. I am glad to see that he is now able to do a great deal towards securing an equitable adjustment. Since the present Government came into power, there has been no conference, that I am aware of, between the members of the House of Commons and the members of the Local Government in reference to these claims; but during last summer we were informed that a deputation of the Local Government was at Ottawa seeking a settlement, but, as no information has reached the public as to what has been decided upon, I put a question upon the Notice Paper, to which I received no satisfactory answer, but was informed that, if I would give due notice and ask for the Orders in Council referring to the subject, it would give me the necessary information—which I did, and which is the resolution now before the House. I beg to suggest to the hon. the Finance Minister that, if he would now briefly explain any arrangements that have been effected, in advance of the papers being brought down, it would be highly satisfactory, as it might be several days before the papers would be prepared, as I understand that there are a great many parties in New Brunswick who are anxious to find out if any settlement was arrived at, and, if so, what amount was allowed. I am reminded that in the Estimates there is $10,000 proposed to recoup the large expenditure for emigration in New Brunswick in 1874-5, made by the Government of New Brunswick. With reference to that claim, an arrangement was made by the late Government with some of the members of the Local Government that, on their expending a certain amount of money on emigration, the Dominion Government would supplement that amount by a like sum in New Brunswick to the extent of $10,000. That arrangement was carried out for one year, and the following year they expended a large amount, but the Government in the meantime had decided that they would not allow the Local Government any further amount, and they were notified to that effect. But before the notification they contend they had expended a large amount. Now, I am glad to see this in the Estimates; I presume it is a settlement of one of these claims, but I regret they have not paid in full. If the amount of $10,000 is due by their agreement, being five years ago, the interest on that amount is due likewise. The hon. the Finance Minister will recollect that, when he was Governor of that Province, his Executive declared in his Speech from the Throne, on the opening of the Legislature, that the claims were just and should be paid with interest, and he no doubt agreed with this paragraph of the Speech. If the claim is equitable, they should have the interest upon it, which in five years would amount to $3,000, making $13,000 instead of $10,000, as is proposed in the Estimates. With reference to the other claims it would be premature to discuss them until we are informed whether any portion of them have been paid, and how much, if any, on each claim.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Considering the very great interest the hon. member for the last six years has taken in this subject, I trust the papers, when they are brought down, will give him entire satisfaction.

Motion agreed to.

RAPID DE FEMME, N.B., SALMON HATCHERY.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

MR. COSTIGAN moved for an Order of the House for a return giving a detailed statement of the cost of the Salmon Hatchery at Rapid de Femme, N.B.; also, a statement of travelling expenses incurred by S. Wilmot, Esq., directly and indirectly, in connection with said hatchery.

Motion agreed to.

MR. COSTIGAN, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of all tenders received by S. Wilmot, Esq., for the construction of the Rapid de Femme Salmon Hatchery, and copies of all notices issued calling for such tenders, said: My object in asking for copies of these documents is to discharge a duty I think I owe to my constituents and myself. The work was improperly let and it was attended with unnecessary expense, and I have reason to believe that the duties connected with this matter have not been properly discharged. I took the necessary steps to have the matter set right, but did not succeed in doing so. Whatever qualifications that gentleman may possess, I came to the conclusion that his usefulness had ceased, so far as Victoria county is concerned, and I enter a solemn protest against his discharging those duties any longer in the constituency in respect to which I have a right to speak. I did not ask anything unreasonable of the Government. I claimed that my political supporters and every man in the community should be placed on a fair footing and have a right to compete for the work. That is the only favour I asked, and I had a right to ask it. I have therefore called for these papers with a view of having the matters investigated, and I will do my best to establish the ground I have taken that the gentleman in question has not acted in a proper manner in the discharge of his duties so far as my constituency is concerned.

MATANE POSTMASTER—L. N. BLAIS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. FISET, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of all correspondence and other documents in relation to the dismissal or discharge from office of the ex-postmaster of Matane, L. N. Blais, Esq., trader, said: In making this motion, it is not my intention to begin over again the debate in relation to the numerous dismissals made in the county of Rimouski since the present Government have acceded to power. The dismissal I have just mentioned is, however, a special case. I think that, as an act of injustice, it surpasses all the other dismissals that have taken place in this sense, that it interests not only Mr. Blais, but also nearly the entire population of Matane, who, in this dismissal, have seen their rights and interests set aside. In order to establish the truth of what I assert, I shall read the petition forwarded to the hon. the Postmaster-General, on the 1st August, 1879, of which I hold in my hand a certified copy. It is as follows:—

“Sir,—The undersigned professional men, merchants, business men and others, of the parish of St. Jérôme de Matane, in the county of Rimouski, respectfully sheweth: That they have learned with regret that your Department intend to change the location of the post-office of Matane, and to place it on the west side of the River Matane, at the request of a few individuals, who have a personal interest in that change, which would be contrary to the justice your petitioners and the public have a right to expect from you; that for twenty-seven years and over, our post-office has been under the honest and able management of L. N. Blais, Esq., formerly a merchant and Justice of the Peace of Matane, and that no one has ever had reason to complain of the management of that office, but on the contrary all have been highly satisfied by the courtesy and attention of that gentleman; that your petitioners comprise the greater number of inhabitants residing on the west side of the river, who, as well as all those on the east side, and the whole population in general, desire that the office should remain where it now is; that in view of the perfect satisfaction Mr. Blais has given to the public ever since his appointment as postmaster of Matane, your petitioners greatly fear, and for good reason, that they will suffer from so uncalled for a removal, and from the appointment to the office of a person not enjoying the confidence of the public; that, moreover, the post-office, where it is now located, is not more than two hundred yards from the centre of the village of Matane, while at least three-fourths of the parish, comprising one-half of the said village, are on the east side of the river, where the said office now is; that your petitioners would look upon it as an act of political vengeance and a serious injustice to Mr. Blais, and the public in general, if the post-office were changed as has been suggested to you in the interest of three or four individuals; therefore, your petitioners, relying on your sense of justice, your honour and the goodness of their case, earnestly hope that you will grant their request and refrain from removing the post-office of Matane. And will ever pray.

That petition, Mr. Speaker, bears the signatures of 183 persons, and I may further state that, with the exception of three or four individuals, all the parties interested, even those on the west side of the river, to which the post-office has been removed, alike signed that petition. But their protest was in vain. In vain did they appeal to the sense of justice and the honour of the Postmaster-General and to the goodness of their case. Mr. Blais has been dismissed, and the post-office handed over to one of the three or four individuals mentioned in the petition. How is it possible, in the face of a fact such as this, for hon. gentlemen to declare in this House that no dismissal has been made through political motives? It may be asserted, but the assertion will not find ready credence. The attempt to destroy the importance of the petition, by alleging that it was signed by residents of Petit Matane where there is a post-office, is a mere pretext put forward as an excuse for not having paid attention to the request of the petitioners, and it cannot justify the dismissal of Mr. Blais.

MR. LANGEVIN: At the time when these papers were presented, I do not remember to have seen this petition. I do not know whether it was presented before or after my departure for Europe; but, however the case may be, I do not recollect this petition. I know that one of the petitions, which I saw at the time, was presented in favour of the post-office remaining where it was before. This petition was signed not only by persons who had immediate intercourse with this post-office, but by persons who lived three or four miles further on, and who had a post-office of their own. The reason why the place of the post-office was changed was because the village of Matane is on this side of the river; the church is also on the same side, and the farmers who attend this church for divine service on Sunday morning all come from this side of the river, and, consequently, it is there where the post office ought to be, so as not to compel persons to cross the bridge in order to look for their mail matter on Sunday. The papers will speak for themselves, and there is no objection on the part of the Government to lay the correspondence before the House.

MR. FISET: The hon. gentleman says that this petition was signed by persons who already had a post-office; I should much like to know what business these people, who already possessed a post-office of their own, had with that at Matane.

MR. LANGEVIN: That is just what I pointed out. I stated that the petition which I saw previous to my departure for Europe, in favour of keeping the post-office in the place where it was formerly, was signed not only by persons living in the neighbourhood, but also by people living three or four miles away, that is to say, at a place called Little Matane, where there is another post-office, and consequently these petitioners asked for the keeping up of a post-office by which they were not served.

MR. FISET: I am convinced that the persons who signed that petition are not three or four miles from the post-office of Matane. The hon. the Postmaster-General asserts that it is not the people on this side of the River Matane who asked that the post-office should remain where it was before. With the exception of three or four persons, that petition is signed by all the people of Matane on this side of the river, and amongst them the present postmaster, who himself thought that the post-office should be changed. What can be the reason for changing the post-office of Matane, when the whole parish asked that it should remain in the hands of Mr. Blais, and no complaint whatever was made against him? When the papers are produced, it will be my duty to lay before the House the information in my possession in relation to that dismissal.

MILITIA ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Masson.)

FIRST READING.

The following Bill (from the Senate), was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 70) Further to amend the Acts therein mentioned respecting the Militia and Defence of the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. Masson.)

CANADA GUARANTEE COMPANY.

MOTION FOR STATEMENTS.

MR. ROCHESTER, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of all statements transmitted since the 1st day of January, 1875, to the hon. the Minister of Finance, pursuant to section 14 of cap. 48 of the Statutes of Canada, passed in 31 Vic., and pursuant to section 20 of cap. 42 of the Statutes of Canada, passed in 40 Vic., by the President, Manager, or other officer empowered thereto of the Canada Guarantee Company, a body corporate, incorporated by cap. 36 of the Statutes of Canada, passed in the 14 and 15 Vic., together with copies of all affidavits verifying such statements, and deposited with such Finance Minister, pursuant to the requirements of the Acts above mentioned, said: The object of this resolution has been to some extent gained since I put the notice on the paper by the fact of a Bill having been brought before a Committee of the House. So far as I can learn, there appears to be a general dissatisfaction with this company with regard to the payment of its claims, and there has been some talk that their capital was not sufficient to cover the amount they had insured. I see by their report that they put the amount of their unsettled claims at $25,000. I know that in the city of Ottawa alone there are some $19,000 of unsettled claims, and I am therefore led to believe that there must be more than $25,000 of unsettled claims all over the Dominion. It would appear, from the course pursued by the Manager of this Company, inasmuch as nearly every claim is contested, that they think it is only right to contest every claim that comes against them. I think these circumstances justify the resolution I now move.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 22) Further to amend the Act therein cited incorporating the Canada Guarantee Company.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

CREDIT VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.—[BILL 53.]

(Mr. Haggart.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): As this Bill is extraordinary in its character, I do not think it right that it should pass the second reading without calling the attention of the House to its provisions. In taking exception, I do so in the discharge of a public duty. I have a knowledge of all the facts, acquired as counsel for the Northern Railway of Canada in the litigation which has been going on between it and the Credit Valley Railway, but I do not wish to say one word here except in the public interest and as a representative of the people—not in the interest of any particular company. The Bill substantially asks for three things. The gist of the Bill is contained in the three first clauses. I think that all the other clauses of the Bill are merely of a formal nature, necessarily following the three clauses to which I have directed attention. The first clause is a declaratory clause, that the Governor-General has control of the powers, lands and property of the Northern Railway Company. That is all based upon the allegation that a deliberate surrender of these powers, by the cancellation of an Order in Council conferring them, was made by this Parliament inadvertently, and under a misapprehension of the facts, not knowing in reality what it was doing when it surrendered those rights. In 1859, all the property belonging to the Northern Railway Company reverted to the Crown, under a Statute then passed, which gave power to the Governor in Council to authorise other companies to work the line, which was financially involved and in a bad state of repair; and an Order in Council was passed giving over the line to the bondholders of the Northern Railway Company on certain conditions, one of the conditions being that they should raise sufficient money to put the road in repair, and that Order in Council made a reservation to the Governor in Council, as appears by the preamble of this Bill. There can be no doubt, as has always been conceded, that this power or reservation only applied to the then existing railways, and that it was put in for the express purpose of carrying out negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Great Western Railway Company, which had previously been proceeding. Immediately after that Order was passed, an arrangement was completed whereby the requisite rights of way were secured to the other companies, and that was ratified by an Act of Parliament, and after that there was no necessity for a reservation of that power in the Order in Council. When the Acts were consolidated, the Order in Council was deliberately, and with the full sanction of the Government and the House, repealed, inasmuch as every other condition in the Order in Council being fulfilled, and that condition also, it was entirely unnecessary that it should remain in existence. The object of the reservation was performed, and it was no longer of any value. This Bill proceeds as if it was intended by that Order in Council to reserve to the Credit Valley Railway, and any other railway, these rights and powers in opposition to the Northern Railway Company. That is an entire misapprehension, and those hon. gentlemen who were in the House when the Act of 1875 was passed, will confirm me in saying that the Order in Council was deliberately repealed; therefore it is not right to pass an Act of Parliament based upon a misstatement and misapprehension, as that clause is. The next clause gives certain rights to the Credit Valley Railway to enter upon any lands, and so on. In the first place this is a provincial railway company, a provincial corporation existing under a Statute of Ontario, and it comes here to ask us to give it power to enter upon lands of other companies chartered by this Parliament. This being a company not chartered under Dominion legislation, I doubt the right and power of this Parliament, and I question the expediency still more, of giving to a purely provincial corporation, of whose existence we have no knowledge, except such as we have of all the Acts of the Provincial Legislature, the rights which the second clause professes to give it. There are other objections to that clause, to which I will presently refer. My objection to the third clause is that it is wholly unnecessary; that right and power existed in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, which has already employed an engineer to do this very thing, and that engineer has made his report and the Privy Council has passed an Order in Council in that respect. The power is already given which is now asked for. It is already given by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council.

MR. MACKENZIE: What is the date of the Order?

MR. CAMERON: It is dated 22nd July last. The Railway Committee considered this matter very fully. All interests were represented. They appointed an Engineer, Mr. Frank Shanly, to examine this property, and to make his report, and, after the engineer had reported, the Railway Committee, at a subsequent meeting, had it presented to them, and they adopted Mr. Frank Shanly's report and plan. Efforts have been made on behalf of this railway company to gain public sympathy. It has been represented that it was being ill-used by the Northern and the Grand Trunk Railway Companies, and that these two companies are against the Credit Valley Railway going into the city of Toronto. So far as the Northern Railway Company is concerned, they have no reason to object to the Credit Valley Railway but would be glad to see them in the city of Toronto, and they have signified their willingness in that respect; and as to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, neither that Company, nor any other company, has the power to oppose the entrance of the road into the city. There is no obstruction, so far as the Northern Railway Company is concerned, nor can there be any obstruction so far as the Grand Trunk Railway Company is concerned; and there is no reason why the Credit Valley Railway Company could not, without this Bill, go on with the construction of the line. The decision of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has given them that right. No company has the power to oppose them, even if they should wish to do so. The Northern Railway Company have given their express approval and consent, by a formal resolution of their Board, to allow the Credit Valley Railway to enter on their lands; and they favourably adopted the plan and report of the engineer appointed by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I say, therefore, that that clause is wholly unnecessary, and that we would only be passing needless legislation if we passed this Act as asked for. There are a number of statements in the preamble of the Bill which are entirely untrue. A discussion of them would show a number of reasons why the House should not pass the Bill; but I do not propose entering into the discussion of these reasons now, so far as they depend on matters of fact. One reason, however, why this Bill should not pass is, that the question is now in litigation before the Courts. By going on to this land the Credit Valley said: "You do not own this land; you are mere squatters, and we will go on in spite, and in defiance of you." The Grand Trunk filed a Bill in Chancery to restrain them, and the case is now and has been pending for months. The Credit Valley Company set forth these facts in their petition, and claim that the judgment already obtained is wrong and erroneous. They appealed from that judgment, and are now prosecuting their appeal. That being the case Parliament should not interfere, and by legislation of this kind cut the Gordian knot before the Court and declare what the legal right of those parties are. I have heard the argument advanced in this House and elsewhere that we ought not to interfere in a contest between parties in litigation before an ordinary tribunal, and yet that is the very thing, according to their showing, that the Credit Valley Railway Company are asking us to do. Pending a settlement of their rights in Court they ask us to step in and decide in their favour, a request which is entirely contrary to usage and propriety in Parliamentary practice. Notwithstanding the fact that I have held the position of counsel in the litigation on this subject, as an independent member of Parliament I deem it my duty to call the attention of the House to improper legislation on a matter of this kind. I do not intend to offer any motion or amendment, but I simply wish to call the attention of the House to the facts I have mentioned.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): I do not propose to discuss this Bill in any way, but I wish simply to point out the inconvenience of objecting to the second reading of the Bill. There is a very strong feeling in the district I represent on the subject, and I have received letters urging that some legislation of this kind should be adopted. The objections made by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) are matters that ought to be put in evidence before the Railway Committee, where matters in dispute should be considered, and a decision arrived at according to the evidence produced. The statements made by the hon. gentleman may be accurate. There may be reasons why Parliament should accept this Bill—or they may all justify its rejection by the Railway Committee. But I think a matter of this kind ought to go to that Committee, where all the facts in relation to the case can be heard with much more convenience than on the floor of the House, and the Bill can be considered on its merits. I think, under those circumstances, the Bill should be read a second time and referred to the Committee.

MR. CARON: I agree with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) with reference to this Bill, and I believe that the second reading should not be allowed. It is true that the objections against the Bill might very well be urged before the Committee on Railways, which, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) suggested, would constitute a kind of Court where evidence could be taken and the merits of the case passed upon. But I think it unnecessary to take this evidence or to send the Bill to the Committee, in view of the fact that on the face of it there are objections which cannot be overlooked, and that the questions in dispute are pending before the Courts. As I understand it the Credit Valley is a local road—a provincial railway coming under the jurisdiction of the Local Courts. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no reason for it to come here and ask the Federal Parliament to interfere in its behalf. The license of occupation was granted to the Credit Valley Railway by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, for a portion of the reserve which had been given to the Northern Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. It will be seen, on reading the Order making the grant, that it is extremely guarded; but it was quite evident that the Federal Government consented to allow the Credit Valley Railway to pass over the lands which had been granted to the other railways. But there was a proviso to the effect that the license of occupation should not operate to imply any covenant or agreement on the part of the Crown to give possession, but that the license should be subject to any legal right to which the Grand Trunk or Northern Railway might possess. It is quite evident that the Government foresaw the difficulties in the way of this grant, and a decision of these difficulties, it appears, is now pending in the Courts of Ontario. It would be a most dangerous precedent for Parliament to set, if it should pass this Bill, while those questions are before the ordinary tribunals of law. It seems that the Credit Valley Railway Company have selected that remedy, and I think it would be quite improper for Parliament to interfere now. I cannot rightly understand that all these objections can be urged before the Railway Committee; but if hon. gentlemen are convinced, as I am at least, that there are objections which should not and cannot be overcome, to this Bill, why allow it to go before the Committee? Why not dispose of it immediately? The principle for which I am contending is of such importance that I should like to see Parliament, by the rejection of the second reading, asserting that the case should not be taken from the Courts and disposed of by a Bill of Parliament.

MR. OLIVER: The subject is of considerable importance to a section of Ontario. It is true this is a local road as regards its charter, which came from the Local Government; but it is intended to become a through line, which it shortly will be. It extends from the town of Ingersoll to the limits of Toronto, one branch running back into the county of Wellington. It is 160 miles in length, completed, and there are some twenty-two or twenty-three miles, from Ingersoll to St. Thomas, where it connects with the Canada Southern. Then it will be an outlet for the Canada Southern from St. Thomas to Toronto, and there is not the slightest doubt that that road will be continued from Ottawa through the centre of Ontario to Toronto; and if that work is to be finished, it will be a grand through line, connecting with the Canada Southern at St. Thomas, and extending to Ottawa, where, joining the Occidental Railway, it will connect with Montreal and Quebec. So that our Quebec friends, interested in the Occidental road, have as deep an interest in this subject as we in the west; for there is not the slightest doubt in my mind it will be a through road. The hon. gentleman who opposed the second reading, stated that one of his reasons for so doing was that the Credit Valley Railway had tried to create a sympathy in its favour, which may be the case. But what did the Northern and Grand Trunk Railways do? Did they not try to create a sympathy in the country and in the House in favour of their views and against the entrance of the Credit Valley Railway into Toronto? Ever since the inception of the Credit Valley Railway, those roads have endeavoured in every possible way to defeat it—in the municipalities, where it sought for business, and elsewhere. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Caron) stated that the Northern and Grand Trunk paid for the right of way into Toronto. If I am not misinformed, the Northern never paid anything for it. True, it spent a considerable amount in making the hundred feet of the Ordnance Lands, suitable for the railway track into Toronto; but, for the line itself, it never paid a single cent. Now, the Credit Valley Railway is perfectly willing to pay its proportion of the amount spent in improving the 100 feet width. This was a portion of the Ordnance Lands reserved by the Government, for a right of way for all the western roads entering Toronto; and in 1875, when the Northern Railway asked for a Bill to pass here, I proposed an amendment re-investing in the Government the power of those 100 feet. On that occasion, the Northern Railway authorities pledged themselves that they would throw no obstacles whatever in the way of that road coming into Toronto; but it appears that as soon as they got their Bill passed, they made every effort to prevent the Credit Valley Railway coming into that capital. I wish to show you the interest that Toronto and other western municipalities have in this road. Toronto gave it a bonus of $350,000; a part of the county of Oxford, $200,000; Wellington, $135,000; Waterloo, $110,000; Halton, $70,000; Peel, $75,000; the town of Milton, $30,000; Brampton, $20,000; Ingersoll, $10,000; Orangeville, $15,000; Streetsville, $20,000; the Provincial grant was $3,000 a mile—altogether $558,000, or a total of $1,673,000 given towards the construction of this road. It has been said this road is an opposition line to the roads from Toronto westward; that was the very object of building it. If those other roads now obstructing the entrance of the Credit Valley into Toronto had done anything like justice to the various sections of the country west of Toronto, this road would never have been built. As an instance—one miller in Ingersoll has got, within six months, from the Great Western, between $600 and $700 of rebate, which, had the Credit Valley not been built he never would have received. This Bill should pass, or at any rate be allowed to go to Committee. When this road was prepared to enter Toronto, the Northern Railway and the Grand Trunk built a station-house right upon the 100 feet, and laid tracks over the whole of it also, which are not necessary for those two roads. They were laid purely for the purpose of an excuse for depriving the Credit Valley Railway of the privilege of entering Toronto. Now I submit that this House, having jurisdiction over a Bill of this kind, because those lands belong to this Government, this House is the proper body to deal with the matter. The hon. member for Quebec stated that this railway ought to take the track laid out by the Government Engineer, last summer. I understand that he laid it out on that part of the 100 feet occupied by the Grand Trunk, and that as soon as he did so, or immediately afterwards, the Grand Trunk covered the whole ground with tracks, which were supposed by the company necessary for the work of the road, but which other people supposed it did not require.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The construction of the Credit Valley Railway has been completed from Ingersoll, the most distant point in the west, to the limits of Toronto, its object being to find a terminus at the waters of the bay, and in the port of Toronto—a very proper and important object to those interested in the success of that railway, and to the people in the country through which it passes. But they are met at Queenstreet, in the city of Toronto, by the opposition of the Northern and Grand Trunk Railways. The Credit Valley requires a piece of land, over which it is said, by the engineers and experts who have examined the question, it is necessary—convenient and not disadvantageous to those railways—that the Credit Valley should pass. The railway companies referred to say the property belongs to them—that they have the exclusive control of it—and they refuse to permit the new railway to reach its terminus over their property. But it turns out that this property does not belong to them, except by occupation; that they never purchased it or paid for it, or became legally possessed of it, and that it is still the property of the Crown, which the hon. the Minister of the Interior represents, as Administrator of Ordnance Lands. He has assumed to have, and has exercised the power of granting right of way or license of occupation to the Credit Valley Railway to reach its terminus at Toronto over it. The question of title was argued at considerable length before the Privy Council, on two separate occasions, by lawyers representing the different interests, aided by engineers able to explain the legal, physical and traffic difficulties of the case. It was decided by that high tribunal that it was lawful, proper and expedient to grant the Credit Valley Railway Company what it claimed, and license of occupation was granted on the assumption that the Minister representing the Crown had the right to grant it—but subject to any right, legal or equitable of any other company or party. The other railways resorted to the Court of Chancery to prevent the Credit Valley entering upon what is called the 100 feet strip, by pleading their possessing rights against the right of the Credit Valley Railway Company, under its license, succeeded in obtaining an injunction, and having it made perpetual, preventing the Credit Valley from obtaining the benefit of the right of way desired and conceded by the Crown. The Credit Valley Company believethat the High Court of Parliament which has jurisdiction over this public property, is the only power which can settle the difficulty, and, while giving the opposing railways as much as is convenient and proper for them, can and will give the Credit Valley access to the city of Toronto and the waters of the bay. They have come, I think, in their right, to ask the assistance of Parliament. If they do not make out a case by evidence, before the Railway Committee, composed as it is of experienced men, and establish their claim to the assistance of Parliament to secure an entrance into Toronto, the Bill will be rejected. The Constitutional and other questions will be heard by the Committee, when, I venture to say, the Credit Valley Company will succeed in showing the Committee, and afterwards to this House, that Parliament can take cognisance of corporations created by the Local Legislature. We here deal with the rights of individuals in any Province, and corporations are simply a certain number of individuals authorised to act, and to sue and be sued as an individual. I believe this is a proper case to go before the Railway Committee.

Mr. HOLTON: I think it is quite clear that this Bill ought to go to the Railway Committee. It is perfectly understood we commit ourselves to no clause or principle of a private Bill by sending it to the appropriate Committee, where alone the allegations of the petitioners and counter allegations of the opponents of the Bill can be inquired into and considered. I have no prejudice and no interest in the conflict that seems to be raging over this Bill. But I know something of the usages of the House. I know no hon. member is supposed for one moment to commit himself to any principle contained in a Private Bill. It goes to the Committee, where alone it can be properly dealt with. How can we take the dicta of hon. members opposed to this Bill without inquiry into the subject. We must have an inquiry before we are competent to pass judgment at all.

MR. DOMVILLE: I would like to remind the hon. member that when the Albert Railway Bill was going through the House he argued the other way. He said there was a principle involved in the Bill which should not be sent to the Railway Committee until that principle had been passed upon, inasmuch as we might otherwise adopt a policy that was likely to be disadvantageous in principle.

MR. HOLTON: I do not distinctly remember the circumstance. My impression is that the Bill was brought in at the heel of the Session, and it was considered in Committee. I think we must consider Private Bills on their merits. The doctrine frequently laid down by the right hon. the leader of the Government, and I think very correctly, is that we are not to be held committed to what we know really nothing about nor can know anything about, until the Bill has been before some Committee for examination into the allegations and counter-allegations in regard to the measure.

MR. PLUMB: I think my hon. friend from Kings has made a strong point against the hon. member opposite.

MR. HOLTON: It has no reference to this matter.

MR. PLUMB: The hon. gentleman is an undoubted authority upon points of Order, and as such is entitled to every respect, but sometimes I think his judicial disposition is a little affected by the peculiar circumstances of the case. I think in the case now before the House he has enunciated doctrines opposed to those which he advanced in the case of the Albert Railway. In the Bill which we have now under consideration, hon. gentlemen will find that there are ample subjects for discussion before it goes to Committee. The Bill states that this matter is appealed to the Court of Chancery of Ontario, and pending that appeal they petition this House to decide the question. The Bill also says that in 1875 a grant was made to the Northern Railway Company, and insinuates that the Government of the day—for whose action the hon. gentleman opposite, then First Minister, is responsible—did not know what they were doing. I am opposed to this Bill, although I have no prejudice against the Credit Valley Railway. I have only to say that if this Parliament is to be a tribunal for taking evidence and deciding legal questions of that kind, it will have to sit more than three months. I for one do not think the time of this Parliament should be taken up by judicial questions, which can be properly disposed of elsewhere.

MR. BOULTBEE: I do not rise for the purpose of either defending or attacking this Bill, but there is perhaps a principle underlying the action sought to be taken here that is worthy of a good deal of attention. It seems to me that there is nothing we should guard against more carefully than encouraging these great railroad corporations to come to this House and seek to accomplish by means of legislation that which they should properly obtain through the Courts of Law. I think it is a dangerous thing; the power of these corporations is so great, they are able to exercise so much influence that it cannot but be patent to you, Sir, and to the House, that they are able to bring a good deal of influence to bear. Of course a great deal of sympathy is sought to be raised on account of the position of the Credit Valley Railway. A number of hon. gentlemen who have been instrumental in giving bonuses to that road would like to see every advantage given it possible. But the real element to be considered here seems to me to be a grave one, namely, that we should be careful in legislating away rights which are secured to persons or corporations, and, if any of the rights and any of the properties they claim to hold are not theirs by right of law, their right can be enforced against them in a Court of Law, and any wrong can be redressed by the same means.

MR. HOLTON: I think I have called to memory the action I took in relation to the somewhat celebrated Albert Railway Bill. I argued on that occasion in favour of referring an amendment to the Bill made by the Senate to the Railway Committee, which is in every way consistent with the course I am now taking. Some hon. gentleman pretended that it was competent for the House to pass on this amendment without reference to the Committee. I argued as forcibly as I could in favour of the reference of a small amendment to the Railway Committee. I am now arguing in favour of referring a long and important Bill at its inception to the Committee according to the usual practice. There is not that degree of inconsistency, or indeed any inconsistency at all, in my action which the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to fasten upon me.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Boulton) that we should consider gravely any application made to set aside the decision of legal tribunals and adjudicate ourselves. But I take it that is not the question before us now. The question is the reference to the Railway Committee. My hon. friend from Chateaugay (Mr. Holton) says the passage of the second reading in no way pledges the House to the principle of the Bill, but merely enables the Railway Committee, the tribunal specially selected for making enquiry into such matters, to consider the measure either in Committee of the Whole or by a Sub-Committee. We are losing a good deal of time, and it seems to me it would be better to allow it to go to the Committee of Railways and be dealt with when it comes from that Committee. It is the duty of every member of the House to fully consider whether the report is such as in his opinion it is wise to adopt, if the Bill, when it comes back from Committee, should operate in any way as interfering with any of the tribunals of the country.

Bill read the second time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 60) To incorporate the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 63) To extend the powers of the Manitoba South-Western Colonisation Railway Company, and to further amend the Act incorporating the said Company—(Mr. Schultz.)

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER LEGALISATION BILL.

[BILL 30.]

(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MILLS: I think that the amendment of the first section by striking out the words "and valid" would meet some of the objections to the measure on ecclesiastical grounds. The measure would then encourage the marriage as a civil contract, and leave untouched the question of its ecclesiastical validity.

MR. KAULBACH: I am in receipt of a letter from a clergyman of the Church of England asking for delay in the passage of the Bill until the friends of the Church, in the various parts of the Province, may have an opportunity of learning more of its merits. I think it advisable that this measure should be delayed.

MR. MILLS: I move that all the words after the word "legal," at the end of the second line of the first clause, be struck out.

MR. WELDON: There is this difficulty in the matter. This measure declares such marriages to be legal, and the Statutes of the Local Parliament compel officiating ministers to officiate where there is no legal impediment.

MR. MILLS: We cannot compel anyone to perform the ceremony, nor can we say they shall not perform any ceremony. That is a matter clearly within the province of the Local Legislature, as it relates to the solemnisation of marriage, and one with which we have nothing to do.

MR. ANGLIN: It would be more convenient if the hon. member would take another mode of ascertaining the opinion of the Committee on this point. Some of us may wish to strike out the words "and valid," and retain the rest.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This House cannot by legislation compel a minister to perform a marriage ceremony, or interfere in the matter in any way. A part of that clause trenches very closely upon the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures, if it does not directly interfere with them, as I am not quite sure it does not. I was much struck by the line of argument taken by the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) the other day, and I am not at all sure but that that section had not better be amended. I am strongly in favour of leaving the clause as it will stand as amended by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

MR. JONES: If this Bill is to be passed, it had better be passed in the shape the hon. member for Bothwell proposes.

That is the only way that Bill can pass this House at all.

MR. LANGEVIN: I would observe that, by this motion of the hon. member for Bothwell, only the two first lines of the clause will be left, that is to say, these words:—"Marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, shall be legal," and then the words "and valid," with the two provisos will be struck out, the first proviso reading as follows:—

"Provided always, that if in any Church or religious body whose ministers are authorised to celebrate marriages, any previous dispensation, by reason of such affinity between the parties, be required to give validity to such marriage, the said dispensation shall be first obtained according to the rules and customs of the said Church or religious body."

And I must say that, if we were to adopt this clause, we would, in my opinion, exceed our jurisdiction and infringe upon the rights and privileges of the Local Legislatures according to the Confederation Act. The provision relative to the dispensation mentioned in the tenth line is strictly within the province of the Local Legislatures. Such is the meaning of the Confederation Act, not stated in so many words, but understood by the promoters of that measure at the time it was drawn up. I may remark that I had the honour at the time of giving the views of the Government on that subject, when my right hon. friend who now leads the Government was at the head of the then Government. The views then expressed met with the approbation of the House at the time. The proviso in question in the present Bill is, therefore, strictly within the province of the Local Legislatures, and this power ought not to be assumed by this Parliament. When I first looked at this Bill, and considered the reason given by the hon. member for Bothwell the other night for striking out all the words after the word "legal," I thought I could not really vote for the Bill; and for this reason, that, as a Roman Catholic, I cannot admit that the Parliament of Canada has the right to legislate on the subject of marriage, pure and simple, which would be an interference with the rights and privileges of my Church, which holds marriage to be a sacrament. On the other hand, the Confederation Act having reserved to the Local Legislatures the right to legislate on the celebration of marriage, and those Legislatures having asserted the right to determine those points, I think we would be only acting within our province by adopting the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell. I would have preferred to put in this Bill a proviso that any marriage contracted according to the rules and prescriptions of the Church or the Churches to which the parties belong, between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, would be legal; but, considering the difficulties that such legislation would lead us into, and the difficulty there would be in determining the functions of the Legislatures and the Parliament on this point, I am ready for my part to vote in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell. I cannot help thinking that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is mistaken, if he says that the matter of dispensations is within the power of the Local Legislature. The Local Legislature has, by the Confederation Act, power to legislate about the solemnisation of marriage, and the mode of celebration necessary to render the marriage legal and binding; but nothing to do with regulating as to the parties who shall marry. That, it is admitted, belongs to this Parliament in the legal sense of the Confederation Act.

MR. ANGLIN: Catholics believe that only the Catholic Church can make any laws affecting the validity of marriage—the vinculum matrimonii. In considering the clauses of a Bill of this kind, the views of all parties must be taken into account. If we could pass a Bill merely declaring that marriages celebrated according to the rules and regulations of any Church should be legal, it would be a very simple matter. Under the proviso as framed the only question that arises is whether we should or should not distinctly and directly recognise the powers and authorities of any Churches or religious bodies to regulate the conditions on which marriages are to be contracted. That is the object of the framer of the Bill in providing that, where dispensations are required under the laws of any Church, such dispensations must be obtained to make the marriage legal. I see the word "valid" is used throughout; we ought to substitute "legal" for "valid" in every instance. It would be better if the question was taken on a motion to strike out the word "valid;" after that, we could, with less embarrassment, consider whether we should recognise the right of the Churches, or any of them, to take a share in determining the legality of marriages; whether we should recognise the right claimed to require dispensations before celebrating the marriage. With regard to jurisdiction, the Act of Confederation must be taken as we find it, and we must interpret its meaning as it clearly appears on the face of it, without regard to the views of the hon. gentleman who discussed this question when the scheme for Confederation was brought forward, or when the Act passed through the Imperial Parliament. I would like to hear the hon. mover, who desires to retain one of the provisos. I would prefer that we should vote on each particular branch of the question, and not on all together.

MR. LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman is right in saying that we must interpret the Confederation Act, taking it as it is; but, if some disposition is not clear, or requires some explanation, it is quite within our right and the manner of, and rules for, the interpretation of Statutes, to see how the framers of the Bill viewed the subject at the time the law was passed. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the solemnisation of marriage is left entirely to the Local Legislature to deal with; but, with reference to these dispensations, I say that the question is not left to the Local Legislature, but to the Church to which the hon. gentleman and myself belong. If a marriage is to be contracted between parties of the Catholic faith, and dispensation is required, according to the rules and prescriptions of the Church, the law does not say that the dispensation will be such and such, but mentions the dispensation authorised by the Church, and the marriage then takes place. We have no right in this Parliament—with all the great powers that we own and claim and have—we have no more rights than the Confederation Act gives us; and those powers are limited on this subject; we have to declare what is the status of parties throughout the Dominion; but what the mode of celebration is to be, or what the dispensations shall be, is not within our province. After considering and weighing well that clause, I am disposed to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as I have already stated.

MR. CASEY: While I agree with the hon. Minister in wishing to expunge this clause, I do not coincide in the reason given by him. I understand him to contend that—this being a question of whether a prior dispensation is requisite to make a marriage valid—the power over these dispensations rests with the Local Legislatures entirely; and it is there I must take issue with him. I think the Constitution says it rests with the Local Legislature to say how the parties shall marry; but the question here is who shall marry? It rests with the Local House to say by whom the marriage ceremony shall be conducted and how it shall be conducted; but it rests with us in this Parliament to declare what persons shall have power to marry one another. Although I do not admit that we have no jurisdiction, I think this clause had better not be in the Bill. I think it would be as well to take this question of expunging the clause piecemeal, and make it two or three votes, as my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) suggests.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But, if those hon. gentlemen who think it goes too far will not vote, I do not see how the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) can alter his motion.

MR. MILLS: It is open for any member to move an amendment.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He might move that all after the word "valid" might be struck out.

MR. MILLS: Or stand as part of the Bill. With regard to the question of jurisdiction, I think the rule was well recognised in the Constitution of the United States, that it was necessary to look whether the power given is general or special. Now the question of property or civil rights was given to the Local Legislature. Out of that power was carved another—the subject of marriage and divorce—which, being carved out of a larger power, should be construed strictly; and then out of that is carved the power over the solemnisation of marriage. I am inclined to agree with the views expressed by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that, after all, the power does not rest here. There is, too, this consideration, that, by the canons of the Catholic Church, marriage is a sacrament, and it is by the authority of the Church and not by Acts of Parliament that marriages celebrated by that Church are rendered valid; and it is on that account that I strike out the word "valid." Protestant clergymen are divided on the question. Many do not think marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister is right. There are a great number of laymen of a different opinion; and these would not be willing to leave it to their clergy to decide for them the question of the propriety of such marriages, and I propose to protect their right of private judgment. I think, if we have the power to pass this proviso, we could not meet the views of various classes by doing so. We should find ourselves more free, and give less offence to the consciences of the people by leaving the proviso out.

MR. WILLIAMS: It seems to me that, if the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell passes, clergymen who have religious scruples against performing such marriage ceremony might perhaps be under the impression that the law intended that it should be compulsory upon them to perform the marriages which this Act legalises. Under these circumstances, and knowing, as I do, that many of the clergy of the Church of England felt that they could not do so without breaking their ordination oath, I cannot see why the last proviso should be also struck out. I therefore move in amendment to the amendment that the second proviso be retained.

MR. WELDON: This difficulty it seems has arisen from the division of powers under the British North America Act. The proposed Bill declares the marriage with a deceased wife's sister to be legal. With regard to the members of the Roman Catholic Church, they stand in a different position. They rely on their dispensation to render the marriage valid, but, with regard to the Church of England and Presbyterian Church, many of their ministers have conscientious scruples as to its legality, and they are placed in an awkward position. On the one hand, it is declared by this law to be legal to solemnise these marriages, and on the other, a clergyman, believing it to be a violation of the ordination vow, cannot perform such a marriage; therefore, it seems to me that it would be wise to retain that provision, a negative provision, not to be compulsory on them. A clause might be prepared and put in by which men holding conscientious views, feeling that they cannot perform the ceremony, may be relieved.

MR. CASEY: I do not think any such provision is necessary. This is only a permissive Bill. It does not say that a clergyman must marry the parties, but it says he may marry them, and I do not think there is any danger of a clergyman being compelled to solemnise such a marriage against his conscience.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the question is this: Does this House believe that, under the terms of the Confederation Act, we have the right to adopt this clause? If we have not, we should not adopt it, for it might destroy the Bill altogether. Supposing the Bill was carried, and anyone should bring it up before Her Majesty's Government, within two years, and show that the Bill was ultra vires, it would be disallowed. As the hon. gentleman who spoke last says, there is no law compelling any clergyman to marry those persons, and there is no use of running a chance of defeating the Bill, when I do not think we have that power.

MR. ANGERS: I am in favour of the principle of the Bill, because I find that its enactments will make the law of the land in accordance with the law of my Church, when proper dispensations are obtained. I am also in favour of it because I have heard from the best authorities in this House that, according to the Church of England, such a marriage is only voidable and not void. I would, however, prefer retaining the proviso. To remove the proviso is to offer perhaps an inducement to people to infringe the laws of their own Church. With the proviso, they must first remove the impediments which may exist according to the rites of the congregation to which they belong. Article 127 of the Civil Code of Quebec will still be in force in that Province. The impediments imposed by the Church of Rome, which have to be removed before such marriage, can be celebrated in so far as Roman Catholics are concerned. I do not, however, find the same protection in other Provinces. The impediment removed from Article 125 will fail as a general impediment without Article 127. I think it would not be infringing upon the powers and limits of Local Legislatures if we stated that marriage with a deceased wife's sister or the widow of a deceased brother shall be legal, if we put in a proviso requiring the fulfilment of the formalities imposed for the celebration of marriage by the laws of the Provinces to which the contracting parties belong. I am very much in favour of such a proviso, but I am willing to vote for the Bill pure and simple as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) proposes to amend it. I have faith in the liberality of the Local Legislatures of the several Provinces, and believe that they will not enact laws contrary to the rules of any Church.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Williams) negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Mills) agreed to.

MR. JONES said the amendment to the second clause showed that the remarks he made the other night were correct, that this Bill was brought in for interested motives. He thought, therefore, it should not be pressed to a conclusion hastily. A number of petitions might be presented against the Bill if there was a delay of a week.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 71) To incorporate the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway.—(Mr. White, North Renfrew.)

Bill (No. 72) To extend the corporate character and powers of the Direct United States Cable Company to the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. McCarthey.)

AUDIT OF PARLIAMENTARY ACCOUNTS.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I beg to move that the report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be concurred in. This report is printed in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday, and refers to the subject of auditing the accounts of expenditure for salaries and contingencies, of the House of Commons and members' indemnity by the Auditor-General. It is a new practice, and it has been introduced because it was considered the Audit Act did not give the Auditor-General this power. The report also contains the following resolutions:—

“Resolved, That in the opinion of this Committee the accounts of expenditure for salaries and contingencies of the Senate, and for their members' indemnity, should be audited by the Auditor-General; and that the House be requested to send a message to the Senate requesting their Honours to concur in and to give effect to this resolution.

“Resolved, That in the opinion of this Committee the amounts of payment made under the authority of the Joint Committees of both Houses on Printing, and on the management of the Library, should be audited by the Auditor-General; and that the House be asked to concur therein, and to send a message to the Senate requesting their Honours to concur in and to give effect thereto.

“Resolved, That the House be asked to send a message to the Senate to request that their Honours will be pleased to give leave to Robert LeMoine, Esquire, their Clerk, to furnish details of the sum of $44,098.74, paid for salaries and contingencies of the Senate, for the year ended 30th June, 1879, for the use of this Committee.

Resolved, That the House be asked to send a message to the Senate to request that their Honours will be pleased to give leave to Robert LeMoine, Esquire, their Clerk, to furnish for the use of this Committee a detailed statement of amount paid to each member of the Senate for indemnity and mileage; also the number of days each Senator has attended a sitting of that body, during the year 1879, as per item of $83,772.48, in Public Accounts, for year ended 30th June, 1879, page 88, part ii."

I call special attention to this report as it involves a change in the mode of auditing these accounts.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow this to stand over for another day, in order that we may give some consideration to the resolutions which affect the Senate. I understand indirectly that that body is trying to take exception to the resolution calling their officers to come before the Public Accounts Committee and furnish the details required, and, in order to have an opportunity of looking into the precedents, I would ask my hon. friend to allow this matter to stand over.

MR. MACKENZIE: We are not calling upon their officers; we are asking the Senate to direct their officers.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I understand the objection which is likely to be taken is that, while they do not object to furnish their accounts we, by calling upon their officers to be examined and cross-examined before the Committee, do not trust to their honesty. It is no use getting up or fostering a feeling of that kind. I have no objection to concurrence being taken in the first two or three resolutions.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I may call the right hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that these resolutions do not ask that the officers of the Senate attend before the Committee and be examined and cross-examined, but simply that their Honours will permit their Clerk to furnish for the use of the Committee the required statement.

Motion agreed to, and report concurred in.

Resolved—1. That the accounts of expenditure for the salaries and contingencies of the House of Commons and members' indemnity should be audited by the Auditor-General.

2. That the accounts of expenditure for salaries and contingencies of the Senate, and for their members' indemnity, should be audited by the Auditor-General; and

3. That the amounts of payment made under the authority of the Joint Committees of both Houses on Printing, and on the management of the Library, should be audited by the Auditor-General.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Senate, acquainting their Honours that this House has passed the two last mentioned Resolutions, and requesting their Honours to concur in, and to give effect thereto.

CANADA GUARANTEE COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. ROCHESTER enquired, In view of Bill (No. 22), to amend the Act incorporating the Canada Guarantee Company, and to limit the liability of its shareholders, whether the Government have obtained from the company a statement showing the amount of subscribed stock, the number and amount of the shares respectively, the percentage paid up, the number of policies outstanding, and the number of unsettled claims upon policies issued by the company, and the amount of such policies held by the Government as security for public officers.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The returns have been furnished to the Government. The amount insured on the part of the Government in that company for the officials of the Civil Service is $277,100.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ELGIN STATION, L'ISLET COUNTY.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make a station, temporary or otherwise, on the Intercolonial Railway, at Elgin Station, county of L'Islet.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The Government have not yet determined to erect a station at the place the hon. gentleman refers to.

MILITIA DRILL.

QUESTION.

MR. CARON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to allow a large number of the Active Militia to drill this year, and whether they will increase the number of days for the annual drill.

MR. MASSON: It is intended to call out about 20,000 of the volunteer force for twelve days drill, as last year.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY REVIEW AT QUEBEC.

QUESTION.

MR. CARON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to hold a review of all the troops that can be assembled at Quebec, to celebrate the Queen's Birthday, on the 24th May next, and allow all that can attend pay and transport, as in 1878 and 1879.

MR. MASSON: It is the intention to hold a review of the Active Militia at Quebec, on the 24th May. It is not known how many corps will attend. The allowance will be about the same as for the review at Montreal last year.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—RAILWAY CONNECTION.

QUESTION.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision during the present Session for the construction of a railway from the Intercolonial Railway to Cape Tormentine, and from Cape Traverse to connect with the railways of Prince Edward Island.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The Government will not be prepared this Session to submit a provision for that service.

[BILL 38.]

(Mr. McCarthy.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

MR. MILLS: I think we have no jurisdiction in this matter. The right hon. the Minister of the Interior himself introduced a Bill relating to criminal procedure in an early Session of the first Parliament after Confederation. That Bill was carried through and became law without properly considering the question of jurisdiction. In dealing with questions of this sort, this Parliament must have respect to the provisions of the British North America Act. Sub-section 27 of section 91 of that Act provides that "the Criminal Law, except the constitution of the Courts of Criminal Juris-dition, but including the procedure in criminal matters," shall be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament. It is clear from this subsection the framers believed that unless criminal procedure was expressly exempted from Provincial jurisdiction, it would be included in the power to constitute the Courts. And sub-section 14 of section 92 provides that the Legislature of each Province shall have exclusive jurisdiction over

"The administration of justice in the Province, including the constitution, maintenance and organisation of Provincial Courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction and including procedure in civil matters in these Courts."

In this section the whole subject is embraced in the administration of justice excepting procedure in criminal matters. There are three things mentioned in this section of the British North America Act, namely, the constitution, maintenance, and organisation of the Courts. In the two sub-sections referred to it will be seen that the word "constitution" is used in the first instance in a more comprehensive sense than in the second. In the first instance it is used in a broad comprehensive sense—in a sense so broad as to embrace criminal procedure unless it is expressly excepted, and in the second the same sense is expressed by using the three words "constitution, maintenance and organisation," and again excepting, by implication, criminal procedure. It is perfectly clear that the word "constitution" is used in a sense to embrace the subject of jurisdiction. "Organisation" is used with reference to the manner in which the Court shall be formed, the officers to be appointed, the places where the Court shall hold its sittings, and so forth. The hon. gentleman will see that, if we can divest the Provincial Court of any portion of its jurisdiction in criminal matters, we can declare that any Court shall have only such jurisdiction as we may choose to give it, in any matter whatsoever. We have here the right of constituting Courts of original jurisdiction, by the 101st section of the British North America Act. That section provides that:

"The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organisation of a General Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional Courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada."

The terms of this section, with regard to the powers of this Parliament to establish a general Court of Appeal for Canada, are the same as those used with regard to the Courts of the Provinces, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction. Except in regard to criminal procedure, they are as comprehensive for Courts for the trial of crime as for Courts for civil purposes. It is true that under this section we may establish Courts of original jurisdiction for the administration of the laws of Canada. But, if we have the power to do this under that section, we have no power to take away the jurisdiction of the Courts constituted by the Provincial Legislatures. The control over the jurisdiction being conferred on the Provincial Legislatures by the 14th sub-section of section 92, I think it is a well-known rule of interpreting a Statute to so interpret it as to give effect to every part of its provisions; and, after constituting the Court, you cannot take away the jurisdiction, by mere implication, with which it has been invested by another Legislature. There is another principle, equally obvious, that we cannot give jurisdiction to a Provincial Court. It is true that the question was raised upon the Act relating to controverted elections but it is also true the decision or advice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council shows that they considered by the provisions of that Act that an Election Court was established, and that Act did not undertake to confer jurisdiction on existing Courts, but by its provisions it constituted an Election Court under the authority given by this 101st section. The hon. gentleman proposes here to exercise the power of conferring jurisdiction on a Provincial Court, and he proposes to divest another Provincial Court of the power with which it is invested. He cannot do either of these things, except in so far as we improperly assumed to give it, and we ought not to proceed in this way. We have been going in a wrong direction, and we ought to recede from the position formerly taken, and leave to the legislators and Governments of the various Provinces the right to exercise, without this meddlesome and illegal oversight, the functions conferred upon them by the Constitution. We cannot undertake to argue that these powers will be abused if left in their jurisdiction. We cannot undertake to say that that power will be wrongly exercised, or that a Court will be wrongly organised for the administration of justice, if left to the Local Legislatures. If the hon. gentleman thinks so, he should seek to change the Constitution, not by an unwarrantable usurpation of power, but in a constitutional way. But, so long as the Constitution remains as it is, we must presume that the Local Legislatures will constitute their Courts of the most suitable character. I do not think we ought to adopt this Bill, and I think the hon. gentleman ought not to persist in carrying the Bill through the House in its present form.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think it is a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman that the Criminal Act of 1869 was passed without objection in the Dominion Parliament.

MR. MILLS: It was objected to at the time.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: And without any objection from any Local Legislature, and without a question being raised throughout this vast Dominion. It is not questionable now.

MR. MILLS: Oh, yes, it is.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am not aware of it, but certainly it has never been decided upon. No person has raised the question, and no Court has decided adversely to the decision of Parliament in 1869.

MR. MILLS: That is no answer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think it is an answer. The 12th section of the Criminal Act of 1869 provides that "No Court of General or Quarter Sessions or Recorder's Court, nor any Court but a Superior Court having criminal jurisdiction shall have power to try any treason, or any felony punishable with death, or any libel."

According to my hon. friend's argument, therefore, that clause is altogether ultra vires.

MR. MILLS: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But there are half a dozen such clauses.

MR. MILLS: Yes, yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: All of which are ultra vires, and only now discovered to be so for the first time by my hon. friend.

MR. MILLS: No, no.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think, if my hon. friend or myself were up on a criminal charge, and if we were to raise this point, we would not be acquitted if guilty otherwise. I contend that all these things are thrown upon the central or Dominion Legislature. We have a right to declare what is a felony and what is a misdemeanour, and to declare the different modes of procedure with respect to felonies and misdemeanours, and we have a right to declare whether offences shall be tried summarily by a Magistrate or by a Court of Quarter Sessions.

MR. MILLS: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then all the laws for the summary punishment of an offender are illegal, according to the argument of my hon. friend. According to his argument, all that we have the power to do is to declare that one crime is a felony and another is a misdemeanour, but no power to declare how it is to be tried.

MR. MILLS: That is a different question about procedure.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman contends that a person cannot be brought up and punished by a Magistrate. That is the result of his argument. All our legislation is false, all we can do is to declare what is a crime, and nothing more. It may be tried by a Court or no Court, or it may get a summary trial or a trial by one Court or another Court. We cannot be allowed to know that there is any such thing as a distinction between the Superior Courts of criminal jurisdiction and inferior Courts.

MR. MILLS: Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We cannot even say that treason, felony or murder shall be tried by a Court of superior jurisdiction. We have not the power to do that according to the hon. gentleman's line of argument, and, if, for instance, a Local Legislature decided that treason or murder should be tried before a Justice of the Peace, we would be obliged to submit. Perhaps he will not go so far but will allow that we can leave the law as it is, and as it has been generally and universally accepted, except by my hon. friend, through the whole of the Dominion.

MR. MILLS: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman has not the courage to bring in a Bill based upon his opinions; he has not the courage to introduce a Bill to repeal the 12th section of the Criminal Act of 1869, and I think, until we have made up our minds to decline jurisdiction, we shall find ourselves able to say whether it is expedient to deprive a Court of Quarter Sessions of the power to try treasons, etc., and for the same reasons to deal with all other such matters.

MR. MILLS: I do not think the right hon. gentleman has answered my argument. It is quite true that, if the Local Legislature thought proper to say that a Magistrate should try murder, and so of other crimes, it could do so. The Local Legislature may abuse its power, but that does not prove that it does not possess that power. The Local Legislature might give jurisdiction to a Magistrate to try cases of ejection, and the hon. gentleman might say that because it has not given such a jurisdiction it does not possess the power to do so. But in that way he can prove nothing. In Ontario it is not long since the Local Government submitted a Bill to the Local Legislature to consolidate the Courts of Justice there. They proposed to make but one Court, composed of certain divisions, and to declare what jurisdiction each of these different divisions are to possess. Now they have or they have not that power. They propose to say that, in a certain division of the Court, the powers of the old Court of Chancery shall be exercised by that Court, and that, where the rules of Common Law and Equity differ in civil matters, the rules of Equity shall prevail in all the divisions of this Court. Now, if they have no right to confer jurisdiction, they have no right to say that these Courts shall be consolidated into one Court composed of such divisions. The power to confer jurisdiction, both in civil and criminal matters, either belongs to us here or to the Local Legislature; if they have not both by sub-section 14 of section 92, they have neither. The right hon. gentleman should deal with the whole subject or not at all. The right hon. gentleman has not undertaken to deal even with the whole question of jurisdiction in criminal matters. In all the Provinces which have legislated since Confederation, it has been dealt with by the Provincial Legislatures. Why did not the right hon. gentlemen deal with the whole subject? Was it not because he believed the power to give criminal jurisdiction was vested elsewhere? And did he not give it in a few instances, by confusing jurisdiction with procedure? Why has a Provincial Legislature the power to establish Courts? Is it not to meet the wants of the people in the administration of justice, and how can they do this except they can say what the jurisdiction is to be? The Local Legislature of a Province may say: Whereas it is necessary for the better administration of justice that a Court should be established, for what?—why, to do certain things set forth. Can it be supposed that the law left them to judge of the necessity of having a Court, and denied to them the power to state the necessity, but left it to another body to guess what it might be? The right hon. gentleman must go much farther, or he must go back within the limits marked by the Constitution.

Mr. McCARTHY: I think that it is unfortunate this subject has been raised. I do not remember any question of the sort mentioned being raised in any Court. My hon. friend has referred to another Act, that of the Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald, in the Lower House. Well, I do not think that we interfere with that in the Province of Ontario; they have simply and expressly constituted the Court, but they do not pretend to confer jurisdiction on that Court. They leave that matter for some other legislative body. If the hon. gentleman will look at the earlier part of the Statute, he will find how the Constitution of the Senate is spoken of. There is no attempt to confer power or a jurisdiction on the Senate. It simply states how the Senate shall be constituted. Constitution is one thing, jurisdiction is another, and power is a third.

Mr. MILLS: A Legislature has power to give powers to a Court in civil matters.

Mr. McCARTHY: I will come to that in a moment. We now come to this particular clause by which jurisdiction is conferred on the Legislative House. This is affected by the 91st clause. Let us see what it says on this subject:

“ 27. The Criminal Law, except the constitution of Courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters.”

I think that covers the whole ground and settles the question of the Constitution of the Courts. It says that the Constitution of the Court shall not include the procedure in criminal matters. It is to prevent the possibility of a doubt that the words referred to have been introduced. Procedure does not mean jurisdiction, and I think that under all the circumstances it would be unwise on the part of this Parliament to reject the Bill simply and solely on the grounds presented by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills.)

Mr. BLAKE: It is quite obvious that the point under discussion would never be raised in any Court, because what is done by this clause is ostensibly to deprive the Court of jurisdiction in matters which are left to its jurisdiction. That proposition does not directly apply to the Act passed in 1869. It is carrying the argument too far to assume that there was any deliberate decision on the part of Parliament in the case of section 12 of the Act of 1869. Hon. gentlemen will remember that a large volume of laws were passed en bloc at that time on the recommendation of the Government. There was no discussion except on one Bill. I think that for a proper interpretation of the words “Constitution of the Court of Criminal Jurisdiction,” we have to enquire what the constitution and maintenance of the Civil Courts means in the 14th sub-section, and I think it will not be contended that the constitution of these Courts does not embrace the fixing of the extent of the jurisdiction of the Courts. Leaving out of consideration, for the moment, the question as to Courts of criminal jurisdiction, it will be found that the whole power with regard to the Civil Courts was vested in the Local Legislatures. I think, therefore, that the fair meaning of these two sub-sections is to give to the Local Legislatures the power of erecting Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, embracing in that power the power of declaring what the jurisdiction of each or all should be. Two modes of avoiding inconvenience are given, the one special and the other general. The special mode of avoiding inconvenience, from the absence of power which would otherwise exist on the part of Canada to enforce her laws, is the power to create additional Courts necessary for effecting the execution of the laws of Canada. Of course it is not pretended that this is an exercise of that power. Then the other mode is that which I think we may fairly refer to as capable of avoiding some of those evils, one of which the hon. the Minister of the Interior has referred to, namely, the power of disallowance. If there be any one reason when it might be safely adopted, it would be an abuse of power by the Local Legislature, such as he has suggested, namely, the giving over to Justices of the Peace the power to try the highest offences, when there were other properly ordained Courts of criminal justice for that purpose. The power of disallowance may not be unfairly exercised in cases in which the Local Legislature, having created adequate Courts, should proceed to interfere with the due execution of criminal justice and the administration of the laws so as to give power to a wholly inappropriate Court to try cases it was not competent to try. So that, if we are to assume that the Local Legislature might be guilty of such an impropriety or mistake as that, there is yet a power of correction. Upon the whole, I think that, in so far as this Bill proposes to remove from the County Court Judges the power which, by the Act to which, I have referred, was vested in them, no one can object; because in so far as it is a repeal of the Act which gave them those powers, and those who hold there is a difficulty about the jurisdiction can not object to the repeal. I do not precisely understand the words in the Bill: "Any offence charging an attempt to murder." The phrase does not seem to be a good one.

MR. McCARTHY: I just follow the words of the English Act.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I think some of the Local Legislatures have assumed the right to deal with this subject, and to constitute Courts and constitute the powers of those Courts. New Brunswick has legislated with reference to County Courts, and conferred upon them criminal jurisdiction. It seems to me the Provinces have this power, and not this Parliament, to define and fix the jurisdiction of those Courts. We legislate with regard to Criminal Law; but those Courts have charge of the administration of justice as much in respect of criminal proceedings as of civil matters. I find, with regard to the Courts of Oyer and Terminer that they have exercised the same power in New Brunswick—that it has been conferred on the County Courts. The same power, I apprehend, is exercised by the Legislatures of the other Provinces.

MR. COURSOL: It seems to me quite clear, and I have never heard any opinion to the contrary expressed in our Courts, that the criminal procedure is entirely left to the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament. The clause in the Confederation Act, cited a few moments ago, by omitting the words "criminal matters," can leave no doubt whatever about the intention of its framers, namely, to withhold such authority from the Local Parliament and to vest it in the Federal power. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the jurisdiction being vested in the Federal Parliament, this House has the right and full authority to classify the offences, and to designate the Criminal Court before which the different crimes may be tried. In the present instance, the object is to vest in the Superior Court the jurisdiction over certain offences which may now be tried at the Court of Quarter Sessions. The Bill does not even create a new offence, but merely changes the jurisdiction from one Court to another.

MR. McCARTHY: I wish to propose a verbal alteration—to substitute the words, "the County Judge's Criminal Court" for the words now standing in the sub-section; and also to leave out the words in the 15th line, "offences charged and," so that the words shall run thus: "Only the County Judge's Criminal Court shall have power to try," etc.

COMMON ASSAULTS DEFENDANTS WITNESSES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. McCarthy.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Order for House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill read.

MR. BLAKE.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: I think it is very desirable that there should be added to the Bill a clause giving power, in cases of a quasi criminal nature, and in cases of the trial of civil rights, to have the parties called as witnesses. The Bill was passed in this House a year or two ago and was rejected by the Senate. It was at the close of the Session, and, with all due respect, perhaps they did not quite apprehend the scope of the measure. A similar measure has been passed in England, and it is a very reasonable proposition. In England, in Ontario, and, I think, in the other Provinces, there is a law that parties in civil cases shall be competent witnesses; yet, if the case is brought to test, the right to shut up a road or a bridge, where a man's property may come into question, if it is brought in a Criminal Court, under an indictment, parties at present are shut out from giving evidence in their own behalf.

House resolved itself into Committee.

On Section 1.

MR. McCARTHY: The Committee will understand that it is simply intended to strike out the proviso in the clause now in the Statute, which seems to me to be illogical and inconsistent with the whole purport of the Act. The proviso is that, in the event of a Judge, at the conclusion of a trial, thinking that there is not evidence of a common assault, the defendant may be called to give evidence, but this proviso shall not apply to a case where the trial is by jury. I propose to add another clause, making it read "assault and battery," instead of "common assault," as it stands now. There is hardly ever a charge of common assault; the offence is generally characterised as "assault and battery." I have one or two letters drawing attention to this defect in the law. One case was of great hardship—the defendant was charged with kissing a young woman, and it was said that that was something more than a common assault, it was an every day assault, and the defendant was not allowed to explain that it was not a battery.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: An electric battery.

MR. BLAKE: If I remember aright, when the measure came back from the Select Committee, the suggestion was that, in cases in which the Judge was trying a case without a jury, if he determined at a particular stage that the case was no more than one of common assault, being able to determine the question of fact as well of law, he could then admit the evidence of the other party. But the Committee appeared to be then of the opinion that there would be difficulty in carrying that out where the case was to go to a jury, unless the Judge was in a position to treat the case as if there were two different counts, one for the aggravated and one for the smaller offence, and to direct a verdict for the defendant on the former, and thus leave to the jury only the latter. The case of common assault was that alone to which it was intended by the Committee the provision should apply, and the question is how that difficulty is to be met, because I believe the law is such that a man can be found guilty of the minor upon an indictment for the major offence, so that there is no power to direct a verdict for the defendant on the major, and then have a separate trial, as it were, for the minor offence.

MR. McCARTHY: No doubt the hon. gentleman is quite right—technically speaking, that is to say. But I do not think such a case ever occurred of a jury finding a party guilty of a major offence after the Judge told them there was no evidence. In practice, I do not think such a case was ever heard of. The result is this: the Bill is sent to a grand jury, including something more than a simple common assault, and the line is very narrow. I dare say one grand jury out of ten does not see the defendant, yet, if the party's mouth is to be closed, great injustice is done him. There is no pretence of anything but a common assault. The Judge is clear on that point, and the Crown officer submits to it, yet the party cannot give evidence.

MR. GUTHRIE: Technically, there may be something in the objection referred to by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), but in practice I do not think a jury would convict a man of a graver offence if the Judge charged that the evidence supported nothing but common assault. It was suggested at the time the Bill was under consideration that the defendant might himself by his own evidence make out a greater offence than common assault, and that the Judge, having heard his evidence, might leave the whole case to the jury, and the jury might convict the man. That, I think, was the course of reasoning in the Committee which led to the insertion of the proviso, contrary to my opinion. I am in favour of the amendment proposed by the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Section agreed to.

On Section 2,

MR. MCCARTHY moved to insert the words "assault and battery."

MR. IVES: Practically I do not think there is much danger of a jury, in spite of the Judge's charge, returning a verdict for the greater offence. We often know of juries who do not find the greater offence where the Judge charges it, but I have never known a case where they have been more severe upon a prisoner than the Judge has been in his charge. But, if such were the case, if the man was examined and the jury, seeing him and hearing his story, find him guilty of the greater offence, I can see no objection, for there must be something about him to warrant such a verdict.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

STOCK BROKERS REGULATION BILL—
[BILL 42.]

(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

Order for second reading read.

MR. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier): This Bill is about the same as the one I had the honour of introducing last Session; that Bill reached its second reading, and was referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, and, considering its importance, it was decided there to defer its further consideration until the present Session. In obedience to the order of the Committee last year, I now present this Bill to the House. It is well known that there are two Stock Exchanges in operation to-day in this Dominion. There is one in Montreal called the Montreal Stock Exchange. It was incorporated in 1874, under an Act of the Quebec Legislature. Another was incorporated about the same time, known as the Montreal Open Stock Exchange, but it ceased to be in operation some years ago, owing to a resolution of the Board of the first Exchange ordering the expulsion of any member who had any dealing with this Open Stock Exchange. There is also another Exchange in the city of Toronto, known as the Toronto Stock Exchange. These two Exchanges deal especially in Canadian stocks, rarely have they any transactions in foreign or Dominion securities, but generally in bank and other like stocks, such as those of the Montreal and the Dominion Telegraph Companies' stocks. It might reasonably be supposed that, when a broker is entrusted with the sale of shares he should act simply as an agent, that he should have no interest at all in the transaction beyond his commission and the interest of his client. It is well known, however, that in many cases the stock-broker buys for himself stock which he has instructions to sell for another party. It is well known that stock-brokers deal and speculate in stocks for their own profit. One of the Toronto brokers admitted last year, before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, that, when they had no transactions from outsiders, they operated themselves to keep up the market. It is also known that the operations of these brokers are secret. Their doors are closed, and no ordinary mortal has any access to their proceedings. The result of these speculations and combinations among brokers has been great depression in hard times and great inflation in times of prosperity. The following figures will show that beyond a doubt. I find in 1872, a time of great inflation, the following quotations, which speak for themselves:—

	Brokers' value.	Directors' value.
Bank of Montreal.....	271	150
Bank of Toronto.....	192	140
Merchants' Bank.....	133	118

The following figures, which give the standing of leading stocks in March, 1879, are also remarkable:—

MR. GUTHRIE.

Valuation according to last report of Directors.	Stock Exchange quotation.
Bank of Toronto, about.. 150	117
Consolidated Bank, about 107	46
Ontario Bank, about.... 104	63
Molson's Bank, about.... 120	76
People's Bank, about.... 108	50
Union Bank, about..... 101	53
Exchange Bank, about... 105	55
Merchants' Bank, about.. 109	79

I propose by this Bill to put an end to the operations of brokers as far as they are personally interested. In England, under the new regulations, they have what are called stock-brokers and stock-jobbers. The stock-broker is merely an agent while the stock-jobber has the privilege of speculating for his own profit. By the first clause of this Bill it is enacted that brokers shall be licensed by the Board of Trade. By the 2nd clause it is provided that stock-brokers shall disclose the names of their principals except in the case of bank shares, which are regulated by a special Statute passed last Session. This enactment is necessary, because a broker, being commissioned to sell a certain number of shares, reports he has disposed of the shares without giving the name of the purchaser. In some cases the purchaser is the broker himself, and, under this provision, these transactions will become impossible, at least it will be checked to a great extent. The 3rd clause provides that brokers shall not be interested in the operations of the Board :

“No stock-broker shall be personally interested in any such contract, either as seller or purchaser, directly or indirectly; nor shall directly or indirectly operate, deal or speculate for his own account or profit on any stock exchange or elsewhere in such stocks or securities, either in his own name or by and through the agency of an intermediate party.”

By the 4th clause I have endeavoured to put down short sales, or sales for future delivery. The Banking Act of last Session has special enactments about short sales of bank stock, but it is perhaps not known that the Montreal Stock Exchange recently passed a resolution not to comply with the law, declaring in fact that in the case of a sale of bank shares for future delivery the seller shall not be obliged to give the number of shares. Short sales on the Corn Exchange need not to be so regulated. The intrinsic value of wheat, corn and grain generally is known to the world.

Parties interested in that article do not depend on the quotations of the Montreal Corn Exchange. They have the reports of the Liverpool, Chicago and other markets. But, in the case of Canadian joint stock, or bank stock, there are no quotations outside of Canada, and the shareholders, seeing the quotations of the Stock Exchange in the daily papers, are sometimes alarmed and misguided, and they may thereby be induced to sacrifice their property. This is an important reason why clause 4 should be adopted. It reads as follows :—

“All agreements for the future sale or delivery of shares, stocks or securities, of which the seller is not actually possessed in his own right, at the time of making such agreement, shall be absolutely null and void as to all parties and to all intents and purposes.”

Section 5 says :

“No broker shall receive double brokerage or commission—that is to say from both seller and buyer—but from the seller or buyer employing him only, and in no case shall he demand or receive for his services any larger sum of money than the amount of the usual brokerage or commission.”

The 6th section provides that :

“Every contravention of any of the provisions of this Act shall subject the offender to a penalty of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000 for every such contravention or offence, payable one-half to Her Majesty and the other half to the private prosecutor, which said penalty or penalties shall be recoverable by suit in any Court having jurisdiction to the amount of such penalty, and by distress of the goods and chattels of the defendant, and, in case of their insufficiency, the offender may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year, as the Court may order, unless the penalty and costs be sooner paid.”

And in certain cases, where the broker shall make short sales, or exact more than the commission from his principal, it provides that he shall be subject to the forfeiture of his license. The 7th section is an important one. The Montreal Stock Exchange, some months ago, a short time after the Banking Act was passed, consented to admit the public to their rooms, not for the purpose of transacting business, but with a view of enabling them to see what was going on. The section will make this inclination of the stock exchange imperative. It says :

“Every stock exchange shall be open, and suitable accommodation for the public shall be provided in every stock board-room, or place where brokers meet to transact their business ; and any person who shall aid or abet in excluding the public, or any individual whomsoever, from any such exchange, stock board-room or place, without just cause, shall be guilty of a contravention of this Act."

Section 8 has been introduced to meet an objection that was made in England when similar provisions were in existence. In the time of Lord Kenyon, some 200 quitam suits were instituted with a view of fining some stockholders who had acted in contravention of the provisions of the then existing Statute (7 Geo. II, cap. 8), but they all failed, because the operations of the brokers were held to be "privileged." It is proposed to meet this difficulty by section 8 :

"No person shall be excused from answering any question put to him in any suit brought under this Act, on the ground of any privilege, or that the answer to such a question will tend to criminate him, but no such answer shall be used in any criminal proceeding against any such person, other than an indictment for perjury."

The general character of this Bill is not new ; similar provisions were in force in Great Britain for 125 years, and they are to be found in all countries where stock exchanges or "bourses" are in operation—Paris, Amsterdam, Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Berlin, Vienna, St. Petersburg, etc. It can easily be imagined that in England stock-brokers grew with the Bank of England, which was established in 1694. The first English Stock Exchange seems to have been open in 1773. But as early as 1700, when brokers used to do their business on the street, we are told by Fenn that "a strong feeling was aroused against stock-jobbing, which was denounced as a public nuisance." It was about that time that Sir William Temple thus defined the stock-broker—a definition which has been preserved by Webster—and which is unfortunately too true in many instances in our days : "Stock-brokers, who having no stock of their own, set up and trade with that of other people, buying here and selling there, and commonly cheating both sides, to make a little paltry gain." In 1734, an Act (7 Geo. II, Cap. 8) was passed to put an end to what was then publicly called "the infamous practice of stock-jobbing." The first clause enacts that :

"All wagers and contracts in the nature of wagers, and all contracts in the nature of puts and refusals, relating to the then present or future price or value of any such stock or securities, as aforesaid, shall be null and void to all intents and purposes."

Clause 4 decrees a penalty of £500 on making or executing "any such puts or bargains." Another penalty of £100 is imposed upon any person "giving or receiving money to compound differences relating to stock not actually delivered."

A penalty of £500 is also inflicted upon any broker or person "buying or selling stocks of which they are not actually possessed at the time of the contract."

Clause 9 provides for the keeping of a brokers' book or register, under a penalty of £50. This Statute was enacted for three years only ; but its provisions were found so wise and necessary that they were made permanent by a subsequent Act (10 Geo. II, Cap. 8) and remained in the Statute-book of Great Britain until the year 1860, when they were repealed as being "unnecessary restrictions" (23 Vic., Cap. 28). Yet the London Stock Exchange remained subject to special regulations, which were promulgated in 1818, and which will be found in Russell on Factors and Brokers, page 213. These regulations were of a municipal character, the London Stock Exchange being dependent on the municipal authority of the corporation of that city. They were about the same as those contained in the Statute of 1734, and further provided for the licensing of brokers under certain conditions, and, among others, the giving of a bond, taking of an oath and the promise "directly or indirectly, by himself or any other, not to deal for himself or any other broker in the exchange or remittance of money, or in buying any tally or tallies, order or orders, bill or bills, share or shares, or interest in any joint stock to be transferred or assigned to himself or any other broker, or to any other interest for him or them." These municipal regulations or by-laws of the corporation of London were repealed in 1870, by an Act passed in that year by the British Parliament, and intitled "The London Brokers' Relief Act, 1870" (33 and 34 Vic., cap. 60). The stock-brokers did not, however, remain without some State discipline. A Statute passed in 1845, (8 and 9 Vic., cap. 109,) and still in force, declared that "all contracts or agreements by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void." Under this Statute, the Courts in England have maintained that "time" bargains, made with no intention to purchase or deliver shares, are null—(Fisher's Digest, Gaming, p. 4179.) The Imperial Statute of 1845 is not in force in most of our Provinces, and the consequence has been that a different rule prevails with us (Baldwin vs. Binmore, L. C. Jur. 297; 4 Moore Indian Appeals, 339). The Criminal Law of England, which is also found reproduced in our Criminal Act of 1869, has also made it an offence for a trustee to sell to himself. However, England soon found out that these short and lenient limitations were quite inadequate. Gambling on the Stock Exchange became more alarming, and in 1867 Parliament thought it expedient to interfere and "make provision for the prevention of contracts for the sale and purchase of shares and stock in joint-stock banking companies, of which the sellers are not possessed, or over which they have no control," and ordered "that such contracts shall be void, unless the members by which such shares are distinguished are set forth in such contracts."—(30 Vic., cap. 29.) The provisions of this Statute, as far as bank shares are concerned, were introduced into Canada by the Banking Amendment Act, passed last Session. But, of course, in London, as in Montreal, means were found of evading the law. Stock-gambling is practiced more than ever. Doubts were even expressed whether the Criminal Law reached the operations of these trustees or agents. In 1877, Sir George Campbell, from his seat in the Commons, asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department "whether, with reference to the serious division of opinion among the Judges on the question whether Stock Exchange practices, which all consider to be dishonest and immoral in the highest degree, are punishable by the existing Criminal Law, and also to the opinion of the Attorney-General, that it is no part of his duty to initiate criminal proceedings against the promoters of companies, the Government are still considering the expediency of strengthening the law dealing with financial and commercial frauds, and of appointing a public prosecutor, who may deal with the delinquencies of the rich as effectually as the police deal with those of the poor?" To this query, Mr. Assheton Cross replied, "that the hon. member must be aware that a Commission had been very lately appointed to enquire into the whole subject. He was bound to say that, under the circumstances, it would be wise to wait for their report before any such steps as those suggested were taken." Although this report has been made, denouncing, in the strongest language possible, the practices of Stock Exchanges, no action, at least as far as my knowledge goes, has been taken by the British Government. In the meantime, public opinion is more and more growing against the evils complained of. In an able article written in Fraser's Magazine for April, 1879, the great commercial crisis from which Great Britain has been suffering is attributed partly and firstly "to the gambling spirit of the English people, fostered by laws which encourage that vice in high places. It is but the naked truth," continues the writer (Mr. E. A. Ryder) "to say that the Stock Exchange is a legalised and enormous hell. Statistics cannot be given, but it may not be unfairly affirmed that of the transactions in the Stock Exchange nine-tenths are illegitimate, that is, do not result in the transfer of sureties from seller to buyer. 'Contango,' 'differences,' and the other terms in use, clearly indicate that the business is as purely gambling as to stake at rouge et noir." The Times of the 18th April, 1879, under the heading of "Monte Carlo," has the following remarkable observations:—

"The real strength of Monte Carlo consists in the weak points of European morality. The Prince of Monaco has only to point to the Stock Exchange of every European capital, where, every year, there is twenty times as much real gambling, under the name of speculation, as there is at Monte Carlo. For one simpleton who has lost a few hundreds at Trente et Quarante and disappears from society, he could point to the thousands that risk all and more than they have in time bargains, and ruin not only themselves, but their creditors, and, worse than that, the relatives upon whose natural affection they work to make good their losses. Enormous as the scandal of Monte Carlo is, it can bear no comparison with the shrines of Fortune thinly disguised with a commercial character. The ruined gambler of the Casino throws himself into the Mediterranean, or publicly executes himself at the tables, or otherwise acknowledges the criminal character of his position. The English, French, or German speculators for the advance or fall have no more real grounds for their presumption than the man who plays Roulette on a 'system;' but they are not ashamed of themselves when they lose all. They throw themselves, not into the sea, but on their creditors or their friends. There is no hypocrisy about Monte Carlo. It does not hide its shame or cloak it with fair pretences. It is gambling, nothing more or less, with the usual accessories of ill-got wealth. That there is a controversy at all, and that preachers dare to be open-mouthed about it and to denounce it with no uncertain sound, is so much in its favour. They are not so courageous or so plain-spoken about the far more potent and extensive mischiefs that we have lately seen wrought at home by respectable and religious men."

Mr. Arthur Crump, a distinguished writer on finance, and the editor of the monetary column in the London Times, has been asking himself this very pertinent question in his recent work entitled, "A New Departure in Political Economy." To use the language of the Montreal Gazette, of the 24th March, 1879, in quoting him with evident pleasure, Mr. Crump predicts the approaching disappearance of brokers as a class and the conversion of their present mischievous activity into labour useful to the community. "Reflecting," continues the Gazette, "upon the enormous development of this activity in Montreal, no member of this broker-infested community can fail to utter a sigh of relief at the prospect, however dim, of so happy an ending in the future to the troubles of the present." But, to come to Mr. Crump, he describes some classes of society who are useless to the commercial system, and in this connection he says:

"All kinds of brokers come under the same category. They consume more and produce less than any other section of the working community. What they save counts for very little, because it is no real saving. What they save is simply filched from the hard earnings of others, a portion of which they should have saved themselves. It is proverbial that money easily gained is rapidly spent. There is no class in the community which really does so little for the benefit of their fellow-creatures in the way of honest hard work as the broker middlemen class, and none which is so pretentiously ostentatious of their means. Consumers of luxuries in an undue proportion, who are not at the same time good workers, are a direct loss to society. We are of opinion, therefore, that no class can be so well dispensed with, and is being so economically and efficiently replaced, as the body of middlemen, and that their removal to a sphere in which a good day's work will be got out of them is a permanent, direct and indirect, gain to consumers as a body."

MR. GIROUARD.

I am not so hopeful as Mr. Crump, or the editor of the Montreal Gazette; but I believe that prohibitory measures would tend to check the operations of these aristocratic gamblers. The restrictions I am endeavouring to introduce are those which had the sanction of ages not only in Great Britain, as we have seen, but also all over Europe, in France, Germany, Russia, in fact every place where a Stock Exchange exists or has existed. In France, for instance, the stock-brokers are licensed by the State; in Holland they are nominated by the municipalities of the locality; in Germany they are appointed, in some places by the Boards of Trade, and in some other places by the Magistrates; everywhere a control is kept over them by the State or the citizens. In every country the broker is also bound to keep a register of his operations, and to give a true and correct copy of his entries to his principal. He is likewise prohibited from dealing for his own profit on any Exchange, and as far back as 1673 we find in the celebrated Ordinance of Louis XIV of that year, an express prohibition to be engaged in any trade or commercial business whatever. Brokers are also bound to disclose the names of their principals. Generally, Stock Exchanges are open to the public, and I believe the same rule prevails in the New York Stock Exchange. (See de Saint Joseph, Concordance des Codes, page 18, and following; Rothschild, Dictionnaire d'Economie, page 226). My Bill does not go beyond these regulations, and I hope it will receive the favourable consideration of this House. Its subject is of the greatest importance, and I hope will be considered with impartiality and fairness, free from outside pressure or influence, without prejudice, and especially without sympathy for the class of men it deals with, who generally, as everyone knows, are highly respectable, personally, and very pleasant members of our society.

MR. MACKENZIE: I presume it is intended to send this to the Committee on Banking and Commerce?

MR. GIROUARD: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not choose at the moment to oppose the Bill as I am quite willing to have it discussed. One of the provisions of the Bill is that no one shall act as a stock-broker "in any manner whatever," and that if he should do so he will be subject to a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year, if he fails to pay the fine. Now that clause, and some other clauses of the Bill will, in my opinion, be impracticable. Anyone in business might often act as a stock-broker. He might be an agent for the exchange of securities, even if his business is not that of a stock-broker. and I do not think this House can control such liberties. If anyone thinks fit to carry on stock-broking, I think he might do so without our license or authority, and I am of opinion that in law any restriction of this liberty is wholly inconsistent with that freedom which we enjoy in this country. The Local Legislatures in Ontario and Quebec have authorised the establishing of Stock Brokers' Associations. Now, what right have we to say that they shall not act in that capacity. We are endeavouring to impose disabilities on people over whom we have no control whatever. The 8th section of this Bill provides that no one shall be excused from answering any question put to him, but that no such answer shall be used to criminate him in a prosecution other than in an indictment for perjury. Now, a question may be put, and a person be compelled to answer, even if the answer would tend to criminate him in an indictment for perjury. This is a monstrous clause to put in a Bill, and one which should not be entertained, no matter under what pretence. I have, however, no objection to some of the provisions of the measure, if we can enact them. I think something in the way of legislation should be done in regard to stock-broking, so far as we can control it. I admit some of the evils of stock-broking as sometimes carried on, and any measure we can adopt that will put an end to these evils I shall be willing to consider. But this Bill is wholly inconsistent with the powers under which we legislate, and entirely inconsistent with that personal liberty which is above all Constitutions.

MR. GIROUARD: I wish to say one or two words in answer to the hon. gentleman's remarks. First, as to the question that we have no jurisdiction to regulate Stock Exchanges. It has been alleged that they have been authorised to carry on business in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They have no such power under their charters. The only power they have is to hold real estate, and, in fact, no Local Legislature has any jurisdiction to authorise stock-broking. This Dominion Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction in matters of commerce and banking, and, even if the Local Legislatures had conferred the alleged privilege, the Statutes conferring it would be ultra vires. It is said that this Bill or some of its provisions are in restraint of trade, an infringement of the liberty of the subject. Now, it is not the first time that this Parliament has introduced Bills restraining trade and the liberty of the subject. Have we not laws punishing common gambling, frauds and crimes generally, which are all restrictions on the liberties of the subject? To be short, all prohibitory laws are restrictions upon the liberty of the subject, as the hon. gentleman calls it. If it is right to prevent by legislation common gambling at a horse race or in a public house, it should be likewise lawful, just and wise to suppress gambling in bank stocks and high spheres of life and business. The next point was with regard to the preventing of a witness from making certain disclosures. That is said to be extraordinary, but it has not been found too extraordinary to have been already placed in our Election Law, under the very auspices of the hon. gentleman, when leader of the Government of this country. I do not think that this Bill is too strict. I believe that something should be done in the direction of the Bill; I am willing to concede that it may not be perfect in its details, but when the Bill will be in Committee, any reasonable suggestion that may be made will be accepted with pleasure.

Bill read the second time.

TIMBER TRANSMISSION COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 48.]

(Mr. White, North Renfrew.)

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed.

MARITIME JURISDICTION ACT AMENDMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Shaw.)

SECOND READING PROPOSED.

Order for second reading read.

MR. McLENNAN: It will be observed that this is a Bill to repeal the second section of an Act which in itself repealed some of the provisions of an important Bill—the Maritime Jurisdiction Act of 1877.

When the Bill was passed providing for the establishment of that Court, I had not the honour of being in this House, but I quite believed that the Court was not necessary, and I think it was stated in Parliament then that the Court could only provide remedies that could already be provided in the then existing Courts. I think, with the feeling we have to-day, we do not want two Courts where one can serve the purpose. In this particular case I think it has been found that the Court is simply an obstruction to the business of transportation. The clause proposed to be repealed reads thus:—

“No right or remedy in rem given by the said Act in respect of claims for tonnage or claims for damage by collision by any ship shall be enforced as against any bona fide mortgagee whose mortgage is duly executed and registered at a port of either of the Provinces of Ontario or Quebec.”

This does not prevent a suitor from obtaining his remedy in either of those cases; it simply provides that a security shall be held just as it was held previously to 1878. It was to be a registered security, and not to be interfered with in the Maritime Courts. This matter was argued at length last year, and I need not go over the same ground, but I may state that in my opinion the proposed repeal will give no advantage to any parties who ought to be protected in their claims against the vessel. There is a class of people in all seaports who take a great interest in the navigator, who are very much interested in sailors' earnings. Their office is generally to supply his wants, but more particularly to supply his drink, and their interests are generally in conflict with the business of public carrying. Those are the persons who have the greatest interest in the existence of the Maritime Courts. I regret the failure of the motion last year to repeal the entire Act; but, having obtained a repeal of two of its clauses, I think we should now be travelling backwards unwisely to restore them. I deprecate anything like violence even to so small a work of man as this little Bill, and would prefer if my hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. Shaw) would withdraw it; otherwise I shall move that it be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time six months from to-day.

MR. McCALLUM: The hon. gentleman says the present Bill is not necessary to protect sailors in their rights. I do not agree with him. If the clause in the existing case is not repealed, sailors would have to send to the port of registry to ascertain if there was a mortgage against the vessel in order to know whether they could collect their wages. Before the enactment of the law, I have known American vessels change owners in order to get rid of their indebtedness to Canadians, and I think the repeal of the clause would be a great benefit to our people. The thanks of the country are due to the late Government for their action in this matter. Our vessels are principally engaged on international waters. As I understand the law, if a Canadian vessel damages an American one, the owners of the latter can come into our Courts and collect the full amount of the damages if the Canadian vessel and her owner are worth the amount; but if an American ship damages a Canadian one no greater amount can be recovered in an American Court than the value of the vessel, although she may have done damages to ten times her worth, and her owners may be good for it. No honest man should have any objection to this Act, which is necessary to protect the interest of the sailors. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 12th March, 1880.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 73) To amend an Act respecting the Port Whitby Harbour Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 74) To incorporate the North-West Colonisation Land Company.—(Mr. Schultz.)

Bill (No. 75) To regulate the floating of cordwood upon the River St. François du Lac —

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S

BILL PROPOSED.

MR. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce a Bill in relation to the true construction of section 12 of the Northern Railway Company's Act, 1877, and to remove doubts thereon.

MR. MACKENZIE I would like to know whether this is in amendment of a Private Act.

MR. McCARTHY: It is reported.

MR. MACKENZIE: It may be reported, but that is nothing. Is this Bill introduced at the request of the Northern Railway Company itself?

MR. McCARTHY: A petition has been presented by the stock-holders of the Company.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is an extraordinary thing for a member of this House to introduce a Bill to interfere with the Act of a private company. If they want to remove doubts they should petition for it. It should not be done on behalf of a few individuals. If this mode of legislation is to be carried on, no company can be safe. It is the only time I ever knew of legislation for a company's interest in defiance of its own will; and I hope no such proceeding will be countenanced by the Government.

MR. McCARTHY: I must certainly say that I am surprised at the hon. gentleman's objection. Certain of the stock-holders complain of injustice; and surely they have a right to petition Parliament for redress. They present their petition in the usual way, and, because the whole Company do not concur, these stock-holders must be shut out. The Act passed in 1877, which purported to define the rights of stock-holders, does not do so; it does not give the advantages it was intended to give. They want the section in question to declare what it was intended it should declare, to provide for their representation on the Board; but, because the whole Company do not concur, they have, according to the hon. gentleman, no right to come here for redress.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not say the whole Company. A majority of the Board may petition for it; but, where a company, as a company, want no Bill, and petition for no Bill, it is very irregular for an independent member to put forward a Bill to amend its charter. If the hon. gentleman will find one instance where such a thing has been done before, I will withdraw my opposition.

MR. McCARTHY: It appears to me it has been done many a time. I do not know of any other way in which it can be done. It comes then to this: that, unless the directors come and petition for the alteration, the minority—those who may be oppressed by the majority—cannot come for redress. I cannot understand how that view can be maintained.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to have the view of the Government on the subject.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think it is a matter for the House.

MR. McCARTHY moved that the rule in reference to the notice required for the introduction of Private Bills be suspended.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to see the Bill.

MR. McCARTHY: It is not printed yet. I believe it is not an unusual thing to hand in a Bill which has not been printed.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is improper.

MR. McCARTHY: I have sent for the Bill. It is a very short one, and I have no doubt it is in type by this time. If the House pleases, I will speak at length on this subject. In 1877, an Act was passed in regard to the Northern Railway Company, an Act brought in at the time when the hon. gentleman controlled the House. The hon. gentleman has an antipathy to the stockholders of this road—

MR. MACKENZIE: I rise to a question of order; there is nothing before the House.

MR. SPEAKER: There is a motion before the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Bill is part of the motion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If the Bill is part of the motion, then the Bill, being part of the motion, is before the House.

MR. SPEAKER: No doubt there is a motion before the Chair. It is for the introduction of a Private Bill, but the rule is very strict, that no Private Bill can be introduced unless it is printed.

As there is no copy of the Bill referred to in my hands, I must rule the motion out of order.

EXPENSES OF THE SENATE.

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Senate to request that their Honours will be pleased to give leave to Robert LeMoine, Esquire, their Clerk, to furnish details of the sum of $44,098.74, paid for salaries and contingencies of the Senate, for the year ended 30th June, 1879, for the use of the Select Standing Committee of this House on Public Accounts.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Senate to request that their Honours will be pleased to give leave to Robert LeMoine, Esquire, their Clerk, to furnish for the use of the Select Standing Committee of this House on Public Accounts, a detailed statement of amount paid to each member of the Senate for indemnity and mileage; also the number of days each Senator has attended a sitting of that body, during the year 1879, as per item of $83,772.48 in Public Accounts, for year ended 30th June, 1879 page 88, part ii.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

MOTION TO PRINT A PETITION.

MR. JONES moved :

That the petition of His Lordship the Bishop of Ontario, presented this day, praying that the Bill now before Parliament to legalise marriage with the sister of a deceased wife, may not become law at present, but that the various religious bodies of the Dominion may be allowed an opportunity of expressing their convictions regarding it, be read and received, and printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think some reason should be given before we print such a petition in the Votes and Proceedings. If all petitions presented to this House against Bills of this kind are to be printed, it will cause a considerable addition to the printing bill. It does not seem to me that the petition of any individual, no matter how exalted his position, should be printed, simply because it came from that quarter. If the hon. gentleman wants the petition printed, I would much rather it should be printed for distribution among the members.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I agree with the hon. member (Mr. Mackenzie) that the petition should not be printed in the Votes and Proceedings, and that it would be better to print it for distribution among the members.

MR. SPEAKER.

MR. JONES: I have no objection to the amendment suggested. I do not think an important Bill of this nature should be pushed hurriedly through the House. Petitions will be presented against it from Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. I think that sufficient time should be given for the presentation of those petitions.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Ordered, That the said petition be printed for the use of members.—(Mr. Jones.)

PRIVATE BILLS PETITIONS.

MOTION TO EXTEND TIME NEGATIVED.

MR. ROBINSON, in moving that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended for four days, as recommended by the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, said: I make this motion at the unanimous request of the Committee, whose decision was arrived at owing to statements made by hon. gentleman that certain Bills in which they are interested were delayed in transmission from Manitoba on account of the violent storms. There has been no communication by mail, for a month, and they have heard that this petition would be received in the course of a day or two; and the Committee thought it unjust, after this statement, made by one or two hon. members that the rules of the House should be rigidly observed.

MR. BLAKE: This is a recurrence of the old discussion we had the other day, in which the sense of the House was adverse to any general extension. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson) has given us a perfectly good reason, if it is proved by the promoters of the Bill, for their making a special application for the suspension of the Rule in this case. We make objection to wholesale extension, which would favour the evil as well as the good.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentlemen who are to take charge of this Bill spoke yesterday about the course to be pursued. I said then that, if it could be established that some train was delayed two or three weeks, it would be a reason for a delay. For my own part, I am not objecting to this special extension. But instead of that the Chairman of the Committee has now moved for a general extension, which ought to be opposed.

MR. ROBINSON: The hon. gentleman knows I do so at the bidding of the Committee.

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly.

MR. BOULTBEE: One of the Bills affected by the motion before the House is one I have charge of and which I spoke to the hon. member for Lambton about yesterday. The petitions were prepared some months ago under my advice and sent to Manitoba, and have been on the road from Rapid City something like four weeks; they only reached me the day before yesterday. In speaking to the hon. gentleman I did not give him to understand I would take any special course; I asked him the proper course to follow, and I thought I was acting properly in asking for an extension of time. If there was any misunderstanding it arose from my ignorance of the Rules. I simply acted in the way I thought best to procure an extension of time. It is of no interest to me, but only to those who sent me the Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think it was settled the other day that the Rules should be rigidly adhered to; but it was said, as to-day, that, in any case where cause could be shown that a Bill should be made an exception to the rule, if the consent of the House was taken, that favour should be granted. The House had always erred, if at all, on the side of leniency.

Motion negatived.

PRIVATE BILLS.

MOTION TO EXTEND TIME NEGATIVED.

MR. DREW moved that the time for receiving Private Bills be extended six days, as recommended by the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think there was a motion made on the submission of the report of the Committee on Private Bills the other day, that the time should be extended for twelve days, and a motion in amendment that it should be limited to six was rejected. That was the deliberate decision of the House; and this report is in reversal of the action of the Committee.

Motion negatived.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Order for receiving Report of Committee of Ways and Means (March 9th) read.

MR. MACKENZIE: The sugar legislation which the hon. member for Cumberland has been taking credit for was of the most extraordinary character. When I last addressed the House I was proceeding to show, and challenge the hon. gentleman to deny, that the price of sugar in Canada was relatively higher than in New York; in other words, that, if the old Tariff had been applied to sugar during the last year, we should have had it delivered in Canada, after purchasing it in New York and paying the old duties, at $\frac{1}{2}$ c. to $1\frac{1}{2}$ c. per lb. less than we have had to pay to the monopolists of Montreal. We have other grievances besides that one. In Ontario, it seems to be the intention of this Government to legislate against the rights of the people to have a refinery at all. From a return brought down to this House it will be seen that, during six months in 1878, we imported 32,000,000lb. of sugar into Ontario; while during the six months last past, of 1879, we imported only 9,000,000lb. There is a discrimination in the law against the importation of sugar into that Province; it is prohibited to bring in sugars from New York, although that is the cheapest route to the Upper Province from the place of production. Canadian vessels can take and deliver West India sugars at New York, and they can be carried by railway to the point of consumption cheaper by that than by any other route; but in order to give a monopolist at Montreal and some others further east entire control of this trade, the Government have prohibited the importation of sugars by any route save the St. Lawrence, and in such a way that the casual observer may not notice it at first in reading the Statute. It is done by imposing on all sugars entering Canada from New York and all other than St. Lawrence ports, duties on packages equal to those on the contents, which operates as I have described; and to show that the operation has been in this direction during the six months of 1878, corresponding to the last six of 1879, only 20,000,000lb. were imported into Quebec, while for that period of 1879 the quantity was 46,000,000lb. I object wholly to a policy which discriminates against any Province or locality of the Dominion. This is one of the worst evils of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they endeavour to force trade into unnatural channels. To be sure, the hon. member for Cumberland said that this afforded a great deal of employment to Canadian vessels. It does not furnish one pound more. They carried the sugar in any case from the West Indies, and even from the Clyde, and they cannot obtain a monopoly to Montreal. There is no advantage in this policy in any respect; and it is another instance of the mischievous policy pursued in endeavouring to divert trade by legislation to artificial channels. Speaking of the revenue from sugar, the results of the last six months show that we imported 2,110,000lb. more than in the corresponding six months of 1878, and got \$250,000 less duty. While this revenue has suffered to this extent the people have been paying higher prices by an average of 1c. per lb. than they would have paid under the late Tariff, and this 1c. must have gone into the pockets of somebody. The legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite has had the effect of diverting this heavy taxation—for it is as much taxation as if it went to the Government coffers—into the pockets of a few monopolists; and we find the hon. the Finance Minister boasting that his policy has created what we scarcely had in Canada before, some millionaires. This policy has resulted in making some men excessively rich, and all the rest of the country poor in the same proportion. The hon. the Finance Minister stated the other night, in his speech, that there was a decrease in the goods imported in the United States to the extent, if I recollect aright, of 33 per cent., when there was a decrease of only 7 per cent. as affecting British goods. Now, this calculation was arrived at by a manipulation of figures which is totally unjustifiable. He embraced certain free goods from the United States, which preponderated largely, and based his calculations upon those. The real position is this: There was a decrease of imported goods from the United States upon which a duty was collected of 18 per cent., while there was a decrease on goods imported from Great Britain on which duties were paid of 15 per cent., only a difference of 3 per cent., while the hon. gentleman made it appear that there was a difference of 26 per cent. against the United States. This shows how unreliable are the statements the hon. gentleman has made. I leave the details of that to be dealt with by other hon. gentlemen who will speak, as I propose to devote myself chiefly to some other branches of the discussion. But we see in another branch of trade what the effect of the Tariff has been. In the six months of 1878, there were imported of woollen goods \$4,420,257 in value, yielding a duty of \$773,217. In the corresponding six months of 1879, there were imported \$2,984,153 in value, paying a duty of \$787,661; in other words, the total value of such goods imported was reduced by over one-third, and the duty collected was about the same. The average rate of dutiable goods from Great Britain in 1878 was properly stated by the hon. gentleman opposite at 19¼ per cent., and it is now 19½ per cent.; but from the United States it was 12 per cent., whereas it is now 15 per cent. Now, the average upon dutiable goods from Great Britain, while it was 19¼ per cent. before, is now 24½, or an increase of 5 per cent.; while the average duty which was before levied on goods from the United States was 22, is now 23, per cent., or only an increase of 1 per cent. So the hon. gentleman has discriminated against British trade, notwithstanding a'l his professions of loyalty and devotion to the Mother Country, as 5 per cent. is to 1 per cent. But, the hon. gentleman promised that this matter should be rectified, in his interview with some manufacturers in Manchester. If I recollect right, he promised that attention should be given it at the coming Session. What is the attention the hon. gentleman has given it? There has been nothing in the hon. gentleman's speech indicating the slightest change, and yet we were led to suppose—or would have been led to suppose, if we knew nothing of it from other sources—that the people of Great Britain were immensely pleased. The hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) was intensely gratified that he found a member of the United States Embassy in London who coincided with him in the Protectionist policy. Well, Sir, it was what was to be expected; he could hardly expect a Protectionist Government to have anything else than a Protectionist servant there, and that servant would naturally express concurrence in his views. But the hon. gentleman failed to tell us that he found everywhere else a concurrence of opinion hostile to the policy which has been pursued. To be sure, the hon. the Finance Minister called upon this side of the House to establish a statement that was made that there was great discontent in Great Britain at the policy pursued by my hon. friend from Lennox.

AN HON. MEMBER: Centre Huron.

MR. MACKENZIE: He should have been from Lennox, and he will be the next time. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) quoted Lord Salisbury's remarks as evidence of the strongest kind coming from the second man in the British Cabinet, regarding the course pursued by Canada, and expressing the opinion that it would produce great discontent throughout England. Now, what was the reply of the hon. gentleman from Cumberland to this? He acknowledged the statement by Lord Salisbury, but added: "What," he says in his emphatic manner, "does not the hon. member for Centre Huron know that Lord Derby, when confronted with a body of workingmen, told them the only resource he could recommend to them was to emigrate to America?" Well, what on earth has this to do with the question? The mere fact that Lord Derby said something in the way of advising men to emigrate did not at all affect the position taken by Lord Salisbury, and had no connection therewith, and is therefore no answer. If the hon. gentleman had accompanied his preposterous and absurd statement in comparison of the utterances of the two noble Lords with less than his own vehemence of manner, it would have been ridiculed and laughed at. There was nothing whatever in the statement made by Lord Derby that in the slightest degree conflicted with or referred in any way whatever, directly or indirectly, to the statement of Lord Salisbury respecting the evils of a Protective policy in Canada. But the hon. gentleman opposite was obliged to send Sir Alexander T. Galt to Belfast to apologise for his policy. He was sent there in order to make a speech, that the hon. gentleman either did not feel capable of making himself, or did not care to face the people with.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I was on the Atlantic then.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, but when he went on the Atlantic he knew very well that these people wished very much to see him. I quite admit that the hon. gentleman did right under the circumstances in sending Sir Alexander T. Galt, only it is extremely inconvenient to have a Finance Minister not occupying a seat in either branch of the Legislature. How the hon. gentleman happens to make up his calculations as to the revenue for the year I am utterly unable to conceive. He admits that, while the revenue from July, 1877, to the 1st March, 1878, was $15,032,742, from the same period in 1879 to 1880, it was only $14,083,534; yet he expects to bring up the revenue to the amount he mentioned. Now, applying the same principle of calculation which is applied elsewhere to the remaining part of the year, we would only have reason to expect an additional revenue of something over six millions; and suppose we add a million to that, for the purpose of making up deficiencies in estimating quantities and values, or for making up for importations that might take place under peculiar circumstances, we have a total revenue, calculated by the hon. gentleman's own figures, of a little over $21,000,000. The hon. member for Cumberland laid great stress upon the fact that there had been several deficiencies during the term of the late Government. He lectured my hon. friend beside me as being a "king of deficits," and he approached the discussion of that subject as if there was something in deficits that was immoral or improper. Now, if there was a deficit, it was simply because the Government was unwilling to impose additional taxation during a time of deep depression of trade, but, notwithstanding the deep depression of trade, had the values not fallen as they did, there would have been no deficit. It was, therefore, clearly right that we should calculate to some extent upon a revival of trade, upon higher prices in the future, and that the revenue would naturally rebound from the state of depression into its normal condition. Under these circumstances it was but right that we should not look upon a deficit as an insurmountable evil, or its existence as in all cases a political mistake, because money has to be provided in some way at any rate, and the only question that can possibly arise under these circumstances, is this: Is it better for the Government to impose additional taxation where it can possibly be able to do so, or to leave the amount of the deficit as an additional charge against the country in another shape? The country has to pay in either case: by imposing additional taxation, it pays at once; by avoiding it, payment is postponed. But, while we are agreed in the general proposition that in a normal state of trade there should neither be a deficit nor a superabundant revenue, I at the same time say that in the exceptional circumstances in which we were placed, we adopted the best possible course that could be adopted. But the hon. gentleman opposite was not content with denouncing deficits in themselves—although he might have been more moderate in his language respecting that, as he had a gentleman sitting not far from him (Sir A. T. Galt), who is his assistant Finance Minister at the present time, and whom he was protecting by his speech against what he considered the assaults of my hon. friend from Centre Huron. He ought to know that that gentleman was a deficit maker on several occasions during the few years he was Finance Minister, before 1862. He ought, therefore, to have been more modest in his denunciation of what was done by his own friends. They pursued that policy at a time when there was no depression in trade; they pursued a policy of allowing deficits to occur without taking any steps to meet them. We were in a different position. A serious depression had overtaken us, and, if any Government was ever justified in allowing a deficit to exist for a few years, we were justified. But the hon. gentleman was not content with denouncing the existence of deficits as a political, if not a moral, wrong, but he also grossly overstated the amount. Now, I quite admit that the amount was not more overstated than are the usual statements of the hon. member for Cumberland; we look for such statements from that hon. gentleman; he is always in excess with his figures, such as the statement the other night, that we came into office with a majority of ninety at our back. The hon. gentleman must know perfectly well that that was not the case, yet he boldly ventured the statement as if it was an indisputable fact. Now, the hon. gentleman states, respecting the deficit, that it reaches over $8,000,000. I will read to the House, according to his own statement, the deficits as they occurred. In 1874-5, we had a surplus of $935,644; in 1875-6, the deficit was $1,900,795; in 1876-7, $1,460,027; in 1877-8, the deficit was $1,128,147; in 1878-9, $1,937,999. But I would say with respect to this last figure, although I have taken it from the Public Accounts, the Estimates we prepared for that year would not show such a deficit. The hon. gentleman opposite introduced a very large expenditure by Supplementary Estimates into the last year, for which we were not at all responsible. But, even assuming the responsibility for all that expenditure, our last deficit amounted to $1,937,999, and the total to $6,426,968 for these four years. From that sum we have to deduct the surplus in 1874-5 which leaves the nett deficit $5,491,324. But from this amount we have again to deduct the amount which during that time we paid for the extinction of the Debt, although it is invested otherwise at present; in other words we paid to the Sinking Fund the sum of $4,190,064, which left our entire deficit for the period we were in office, including the amount for last year, for which we were not responsible, at $1,301,260, while the hon. gentleman made it in his extraordinary speech between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000. Now I will now proceed to deal with another subject. I said in the course of the early part of my remarks that, while we were able to keep our expenditure for our period of office not any higher, or very little higher than the last year for which the hon. gentlemen opposite took the estimates, that is, for 1873-4, it was only through expenditures forced upon us by no policy of our own that we reached the expenditure of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1873-4. This we are entitled to deduct, to make a comparison with theirs. I may say, with reference to expenditure generally, that we kept within the Estimates of 1873-4, as prepared by the present Finance Minister. In our expenditure for that year, we spent $565,000 less than the hon. gentleman estimated for. But in the last year for which we took Estimates, that is 1878-9, during which financial year we were in office three and a-half months, and the hon. gentlemen opposite eight and a-half months, they not only did not keep within our Estimates but they expended a little over half a million more than our Estimates covered; we are therefore charged with half a million of sundry payments for which we have no responsibility. Now, I propose, with the indulgence of the House, to give some exact figures of certain services which were performed by us which the Government preceding us had not to perform, and which we reasonably must deduct from our total expenditure in order to compare it with the expenditure of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the year 1873-4. In the fiscal year, ending June, 1875, we paid an increase over the year 1873-4, in the matter of interest on debt and subsidies to Provinces alone, of $868,938. In 1875-6, we paid $866,561, in 1876-7, we paid $1,223,538; in 1877-8, we paid $1,393,725, and, for the last year, for which I do not assume any responsibility or take any credit, $1,696,843. Now, for Weights and Measures, for which Act the hon. gentlemen opposite, prior to 1874, paid nothing, we paid in 1874-5, $69,969; for 1875-6, $99,785; for 1876-7, $111,085; for 1877-8, $96,484. For the North-West Police, being a service which the previous Administration were responsible for and partly organised, we had to expend in excess of their 1873-4 expenditure, 1874-5, $133,984; in 1875-6, $169,919; 1876-7, $153,140; 1877-8, $135,149. We had to pay additional to the expenditure of 1873-4, for the extinguishment of Indian titles in the North-West, as follows: in 1874-5, the excess was $49,422; in 1875-6 $130,307; in 1876-7, $155,528; in 1877-8, $275,435. We had also to pay additional sums for the Administration of Justice to the following extent: $98,530, in 1874-5, in excess of their largest payment the previous year, and a similar excess in 1875-6 of $144,750; in 1876-7 of $167,629; in 1877-8 of $167,005. Now, with regard to the Administration of Justice, we are responsible, in one sense, for one item of these increases, about $50,000, being the yearly cost of the Supreme Court. But the Supreme Court was a measure which hon. gentlemen opposite were determined to introduce. It was introduced by them, if I recollect right, three times, and they only failed to carry it because they had not sufficient strength in the House to do it. When we introduced that measure, it was supported by both sides of the House, so the Administration of the day had no special responsibility regarding that. The other increases in the Administration of Justice were wholly consequent upon the establishment of the Court of Appeal in Ontario the year before we came in, but no payment upon that account was made by that Administration. The establishment of County Court Judges in Nova Scotia, the establishment of a full Court in Manitoba, and the expenses of miscellaneous justice and the North-West Territory items, make up the balance of this increase. Now, there is not one cent in all this expenditure for the Administration of Justice for which we can be held responsible in any shape, except that of the Supreme Court, and that responsibility is shared by hon. gentlemen opposite. Then no payments were made by the hon. gentlemen opposite before we came in on account of Prince Edward Island. We know from official statements that the expenditures connected with that Province amounted to about $800,000 and a little over for each year. Of that, however, a little over $370,000, I think, is composed of subsidy to that Province, and the interest upon the amount of debt allotted under the Terms of Union. I therefore calculate $400,000 as the amount which was imposed upon us to provide for, in addition to the subsidies and debt, which I have already calculated under that head. We have therefore paid for each year's expenditure on this account a sum of not less than $400,000. Then we paid on account of the Intercolonial, over the last year of hon gentlemen opposite, that is, 1873-4, the increase when the line was completed, in 1876-7, $360,124; and in 1877-8, $509,724. The nett, result is this, that in 1874-5 we paid, of such items as were never paid by hon. gentlemen opposite at all, the amount of $1,620,843; in 1875-6 this excess was increased to $1,811,322; in 1876-7 it had increased to $2,571,044; and in 1877-8 it had increased to $2,977,522. I omit from this altogether some special payments for which we might fairly take credit. We had to meet the entire expenditure of the Exhibition at Philadelphia; we had to meet the entire expenditure at Sydney, and we had to meet a very large proportion of the expenditure connected with the Exhibition at Paris. We had also to meet a very large expenditure connected with the boundary survey in the west. There is also the sum of $13,000 for the organisation of the North-West Territories, which I have not included. I have, in fact, failed to include a very large number of items which I fairly might have included, and which would swell this by some $200,000 or $300,000. I desire to confine myself entirely to items which cannot be disputed or impugned. Now, what would be the result of these figures? It would be this. We spent, as I have stated, of the Estimates which the hon. gentleman presented in 1873, $565,000 less than he estimated. The nett expenditure for that year was $23,316,316, and that I may say included one considerable item for the Intercolonial Railway, which the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) denounced us for charging to revenue account at all. He said it ought properly to be charged to capital account, and that we were not justified in charging the revenue with it. If we had not charged the revenue with it, we would have come within the expenditure estimated for by something approaching $1,000,000. Apart from that the nett result is this. The normal expenditure for 1873-4 was, as I stated, $23,316,316, and, making the deductions which must be made in order to have a fair comparison, our expenditure of 1874-5 was $22,092,228; for 1875-6, it was $22,677,050; for 1876-7, $20,948,257; for 1877-8, $20,525,636; for 1878-9, $20,898,407. That is, supposing we admit our responsibility for the expenditures of that year—a responsibility which I admit so far as our own Estimates are concerned, but which I do not admit so far as the Supplementary Estimates of last Session are concerned. I think I can fairly appeal to the House that I have shown most conclusively that the late Administration, instead of being charged as they have been by the hon. gentleman opposite with being extravagant, are entitled to the praise and confidence of the House and the country for the economy they exercised in the discharge of their public duties. I have said nothing about the inevitable increases, such as the increase of the Civil Service consequent upon the introduction of another Province; upon the increase connected with matters I have mentioned in the North-West Territories, such as the salary of the Lieutenant-Governor, the payment to his Council, and expenses of a cognate character in the Territory of Keewatin. I have not taken into account many things which I might fairly take into account, because I desire only to refer to such matters as are indisputable and against which no argument can by any possibility be urged. I do not propose further to follow the matters connected with the financial statement made to the House at the present time. While speaking of the Tariff, I omitted to refer to one of the articles which I intended to refer to, and, although a little out of my line of argument, I must ask the patience of the House to deal with it for a moment. One of the pretences of hon. gentlemen opposite was their desire to benefit the farmers. It was alleged that, because the United States imposed certain duties upon our grains we should meet them, to use the words of the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), by adopting the sincerest form of flattery, by following their example, and that we also should impose a similar duty on their grains and agricultural produce. We know very well that, except in urgent circumstances, or for important local reasons, no grain paid any duty into this Dominion on account of the Tariff, that the amount received from that source was one which could not be less trifling in its character, and must of necessity have no effect upon our prices. We know that the price of wheat was relatively higher in Chicago and other western cities in the United States than in Canada under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite, since their Tariff was passed, than it was before, while we had no duties on foreign wheat. But, while they were willing to make a pretence of serving farmers in this way, they neglected utterly the imposition of duty upon some articles which might possibly put money into their pockets. On the article of manufactured woollen goods they took care to impose the heaviest duty ever known in this country; heaviest upon the poorest article of woollen cloths. They made the poor man pay ten times as much as the rich man, as the specific duty on the finest broadcloths was the same per pound as that upon the poorest quality which the labourer and farmer wore. They endeavoured in this way to give protection to the woollen manufacturers, and the decrease in the quantity of woollen goods brought into the country shows how effectually that protection has operated. But, while this was done, while they pretended to protect all classes, no protection was given to farmers upon their wool. The hon. gentleman opposite—stung by the reproaches of hundreds of thousands of honest yeomen throughout the country, who felt that they were betrayed and sold, that they were imposed upon by the specious pretensions of hon. gentlemen opposite at election times, who demand that this shall cease, that the Tariff shall be reduced to its proper position—in order to throw a sop in their way and keep down the rising storm, imposes a duty of three cents a pound on imported wools of the Leicester, Cotswold and Lincolnshire sheep. Now, I can hardly believe that the hon. the Finance Minister is ignorant of the fact that there is not a pound of these wools imported into Canada. He surely knows that this is worse than the sham he perpetrated last year. I know that that is the case, because I know the qualities of the wool grown in this country and the qualities imported. But, in order that there may be no mistake about it, I will read extracts from some letters which I have received from parties deeply interested in this business. One of these is perhaps the largest dealer in the whole of the Dominion. He says:

“Mr. Tilley will not get one dollar of revenue from this source, as we do not import one pound of this class of combing wool, and we are not likely to do so, as we have no machinery here to manufacture the class of goods this type of wool is suited for. We can buy wool from other countries at a great deal less cost better suited to our trade. This duty is a transparent fraud on the farmers, as it will be of no benefit to them, and will not affect the manufacturers. The price of this class of wools is determined in England which is our only competitor; she produces annually 100,000,000lb.

We produce 8,000,000lb. I have been in this business over twenty years, and was only able to ship three times to England. Our market has always been the United States. I bought and sold 1,300,000lb. last year, of which 900,000 lb. went to the United States, the balance was used in Canada.”

The other writer is a manufacturer, who says the duty will be of no benefit whatever to the farmers. The following is an extract from his letter:—

“I see that the Government intend putting a duty of 3c. per pound on Cotswold, Leicester and Lincoln wools by way of pleasing the farmers, but it will not benefit them one cent, as the class of wools are as a rule worth more in England than Canadian wools are here, consequently, not likely to be largely imported; but there are wools imported of long staple coarse hair which do compete with Canadian in the manufacture of carpets, blankets, flannels, coarse tweeds, grey cloths, and knitting yarns. The wools I refer to are East India, China, Egyptian, Russians Italian, and many other continental wool, which are now used in Canada. If it is necessary to protect the Canadian farmer his share should not be such an imaginary one as the proposed duty will be; 5c. on the low class or wools would be a protection.”

That is the opinion of a gentleman who is a manufacturer and who understands precisely what he is speaking about. I was somewhat surprised—well, no, I was not, I was interested, but not surprised—to hear the hon. member for Cumberland denounce the efforts made by the late Administration, in 1874, to obtain some reciprocal trade with the United States. He represented the plenipotentiary accredited by Her Majesty's Government, at our instance, as going down on his knees to the Yankees, and telling them that we had nothing more that we could give them, and that all had been given away, while the hon. gentleman had no doubt in view a full recollection of what was given away in 1871 by his present leader. The hon. gentleman was right in stating that we had given away nearly all that we had; but it was not given away by us. We never gave anything away. The only transaction we had with the United States Government was the Fishery Award, from which we realised a very large amount of money, as the hon. gentleman knows, while they were quite willing to sacrifice the whole of the fisheries for a mere nominal payment in 1871. We demanded, in the first place, to have no English Agent unacquainted with this country and the merits of our case. We insisted upon having the management of our affairs in our own hands. This was conceded, and the result was what was never before accomplished. We got what was just at the hands of the United States, because of our good management of our case. But the hon. gentleman says that all was given away that the country had to give. Why, Sir, we recollect the pitiable figure cut by the hon. leader of the Government in Washington in 1871. We do not forget that he could have got, if he had had only the foresight and practical knowledge as to what he should do, the admission of coal, salt, lumber and fish into the United States, and he refused to do it. And it will also be recollected that he did not pretend, as the Canadian representative, to venture to put in a demand, much less insist on it, for reparation for over a million dollars, which we expended in defending this country against marauders from the United States. No country was ever so humiliated as Canada was by the hon. the leader of the Government, unless, indeed, it was England, that concurred in the decisions of the Convention. The hon. gentleman was right in saying that everything was given away. In fact, we gave away some things without any pretence at recompense. We gave away the free navigation of the St. Lawrence in exchange for the use of the Yukon and Stickeen Rivers in Alaska. The hon. gentleman was not aware that we were in full possession of the navigation of those rivers before that, by virtue of the Convention of 1825 with Russia. Yet that was the solace. We gave away those great rights for a right to navigate a canal in our own territories on the St. Clair Flats. There was nothing else to give away, or it would have been given by the craven, abject policy pursued in Washington in 1871, where the hon. gentleman's leader acted as our representative. I am only surprised that the hon. member for Cumberland would ever think or dream of speaking of the proceedings at Washington in connection with the proceedings of both Governments. The hon. gentleman sneered at the plenipotentiary sent by Canada in 1874, and spoke of the expense in connection with that mission. Well, Sir, our plenipotentiary never charged Canada a cent for his own services, and we find that abortive missions to France and Spain have already cost the country nearly $12,000, without an iota of benefit, good, bad or indifferent. Nay, more than that. They have bought up a Senator, who changed his political views last year, and got him to their side by paying him $1,500 in order to do something in Paris, at the same time that we were paying $12,000 to Sir Alexander T. Galt and Mr. Bernard for the same service. And they are not ashamed of speaking of these things—they are not ashamed of the figures in the Public Accounts. It is as transparent a fraud as was ever offered by a public man. Yet we are lectured on this side of the House because we did not succeed in the praiseworthy effort at Washington in 1874 to obtain some terms of equality in connection with our trade to that country. Nay, more, hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that it is a grand thing to revile the United States; that it is a fine policy to attack that country; that it is a grand principle of political action to apply the lex talionis; that we must reciprocate what we consider their illiberal policy; that we must endeavour to do them all the injury we can. Now, we know that it is the inevitable fate of this country to be associated with the United States in trade relations. We cannot avoid it. We are side by side for thousands of miles. They are the same people as ourselves. They were a British Colony like ourselves, but they have a different system of Government; but there is no reason why we should not have the closest relations of trade with that country. They should be one of our most profitable customers, and anything that is done to injure them is a fatal stab at our own prosperity. We find that, during the Recess, Ministers have been guilty of the indiscretion, to use no stronger word, of boasting what they will do, and the hon. member for Cumberland, the other night, boasted in his own peculiar style, that now we had the United States at our feet; that now 4,000,000 of people could dictate terms to 50,000,000; that now, when they saw we were taking matters into our own hands, that we were determined on continuing a policy of Protection, and keeping Canada for the Canadians, this people would come and solicit from our hands a portion of the good things Canada has to offer. Nothing can be more sublimely ridiculous or absurd. We can discuss those matters in a reasonable, sensible way with the United States, and do all we can to show them again, as we have done in the past, that the prosperity of both countries may be considered in a commercial sense together, and that while we have our different political feelings, we are desirous of cultivating trade with them. By following that policy, we may achieve something. By following a defiant and offensive policy, we only lend strength to the arms of those parties in the United States who are hostile to us as a political organisation, on this continent. The Government are doing their very best to injure the country, by attempting to initiate a policy of retaliation with a people twelve times as strong as we are. Even the legislation of the country has been tampered with by hon. gentlemen opposite. When we were in office we found the malt trade from Canada to the United States prosperous, and we found that the Customs duty of 2c. per lb., which was in the old Tariff on malt, but which was never realised, because there was little or no malt imported into Canada, was looked upon by the people of the United States as an intention to exclude their products. The late Government abolished that duty upon malt, and the hon. gentlemen opposite took off 1c. of the Excise duty we had on malt, and re-imposed 2c. per lb. upon malt coming from abroad. The result was this, that the Legislature of the United States has taken up the challenge of the hon. gentleman to retaliate, and they have imposed such a duty upon malt coming into the country that will make it impossible for Canadian malsters to continue that trade. And this is done by the mischievous meddling of the hon. gentlemen opposite with matters they do not understand. They pretend to have an intimate knowledge of trade, and in the resolutions introduced last year concerning the Tariff—resolutions, I may say, which, with all that was attached to them, were borrowed from the United States Tariff; and all will remember that some of the rags of the United States Tariff hung around the resolutions when they were brought down here. Words only applicable to Washington were found in the resolutions on our desks, showing that, while the Government were determined to have a Protective Tariff, they did not know what it meant or how to frame it, and had to look to Washington for information. That is the position, Sir. I have no doubt whatever but the silly boasting of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to their neighbours will produce still more disastrous results if they are continued in power many years by the people, and I think it my duty to warn the country and this House that the policy which they have pursued is the most dangerous that any Government could take the responsibility for. The hon. the Minister of Railways said the other night that such was the brilliancy of the prospects of Canadians; such was the prosperity that had dawned upon the country, that people—I quote his words—were “rushing into Canada” in order to partake of those benefits. Why, Sir, there has been a rush out of Canada. The hon. the Minister of Finance knows very well, and he acknowledged it honestly in the House the other night, that thousands of people left St. John for the United States, and the only excuse the hon. gentleman gave was that they came into New Brunswick because employment was to be had in 1876 and 1877, and left in 1878 because there was no employment for them. Well, that is precisely what we said; this is precisely our ground. Under the late Government and the late régime, work was, generally speaking, even in the darkest period, plentiful; but the moment the stamp of the policy introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite was set upon the country things changed for the worst. Some one says, “the mark of the beast.” No, Sir, rather the sline of the serpent. The moment that trailed itself over the land, that moment the people began to move. We are informed by the United States Consul at Sarnia, where I live, that during the last season no fewer than 23,000 Canadians crossed the river at that point to settle in the United States.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: No, to go to Manitoba.

MR. MACKENZIE: No, to settle in the United States. I quote from the Consul's report, and I have no doubt that it is correct; and I have no doubt it is equally correct of the exodus from New Brunswick.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The Americans should not be annoyed at our policy, then.

MR. MACKENZIE: So far as acquiring a desirable population is concerned, they should not; but they can afford to take the population, and resent the retaliatory policy of the Government as well. The one is not intimately connected with the other. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) let us into a secret the other night. He told us that Sir John A. Macdonald—I beg pardon for naming him, because I never remember whether he is from Kingston or some other place—had inspired Lord Beaconsfield and enlisted him as a Canadian emigration agent. Well, Sir, it was one of the most pitiable exhibitions I ever remember seeing the Premier of the British nation make, and I was sorry that any demented Canadian should have reached the ear of His Lordship and induced him to make such a preposterous statement as he did a few days later. For my part, I supposed it was some wandering vagrant, who had found access to His Lordship, but, when I learned that it was the Premier of Canada that had instilled such nonsense into the British Premier's mind, I was more than astonished, and I can only trust that no Canadian, be he Minister or commoner, will ever again make such a preposterous statement to any British Premier; or, if he does, that the British Premier will not be foolish enough to give the statement credit.

MR. LANDRY: Hear, hear.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am glad to find that one hon. gentleman on the Ministerial side of the House entirely agrees with me. To be sure, Sir, the new light is a small one, but even a rushlight gives light occasionally in a dark place; and, if the hon. gentleman will only not hide his rushlight under a bushel, there is no saying what it may accomplish in the corner where he sits. I need not take up much of the time of the House with reference to our own policy with all foreign nations on commercial matters. The House is well aware that the ground we held was that foreign trade is an essential element of national prosperity. We hold that any restrictions upon trade, otherwise than what is required for revenue purposes, are mischievous, and while we shall always be ready to aid the Government of the day in obtaining such taxes as are requisite for carrying on the public affairs of the country with credit, we shall never consent to a policy which, while raising some revenue for the State, imposes eight or ten times that amount as taxes to be paid by the public to individuals who do not serve the State. That is the position we occupy. It is said that we are hostile to manufactures. How are we hostile? We believe that the Revenue Tariff which was formerly in existence gave a very considerable protection to manufactures. It was called "Incidental Protection," and, whatever there may be in a name, it was a protection, nevertheless, because it gave every manufacture in the country 17½ c. on the dollar more than he would be entitled to were trade entirely free between this and foreign countries. We took steps at the various Exhibitions in the South Seas and in Europe and the United States, to have our manufactures properly represented, and those steps were beginning to produce a natural result. A considerable amount of our manufactured goods were sent to Germany and France, some to the Cape of Good Hope, some to the Australian Colonies, some to New Zealand—all in consequence of the measures taken by the late Government, to make known the kind of manufactures which can be obtained in Canada. It is said that hon. gentlemen opposite were peculiarly tender in affording protection to ship-builders, and the two hon. Ministers—the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for St. John—were taking especial credit to themselves in this matter. In 1874 the hon. member for Cumberland attacked the late Government repeatedly because they were imposing unusual burdens on shipbuilders. Well, what has happened under the new system? Shipbuilding was never so depressed as it is to-day. Let the hon. gentleman look at the shipyards at Quebec. Let him look at the idle thousands in the city, who formerly found a considerable amount of employment. Two ship-builders of Quebec, two prominent citizens, told me that the city was never in such a state as it is at this moment, largely on account of the failure of shipbuilding, through the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and partly from the failure to obtain work, as the hon. gentlemen promised, by the established of manufactures. The hon. the Minister of Finance said that I was mistaken in the remarks I made the other day with reference to his own Province—that there was a large amount of manufacturing done there. I have no special intimacy with that Province, and I shall leave that subject for some New Brunswick gentleman to deal with. What I said, however, was this: I had no reference whatever as to whether there were or were not extensive manufactures there. What I desired to point out was this: that the Finance Minister, in endeavouring to account for the probable injury that would be done to his part of the country, pointed out, over and over again, that it would become a great manufacturing centre and send its goods to the west. What I said was that, while there was no doubt in my mind of the intelligence and enterprise of the people of New Brunswick, I found they had no special advantages which would enable them to compete with intelligent people 1,000 miles away, and that it would require an unusual degree of intelligence and skill, not possessed by the western people, or an ample possession of unusually cheap power—something to give an advantage—in order to achieve that result. I said then, and repeat, that there are no such special advantages in New Brunswick, and that the hon. gentleman, in endeavouring to do what he failed to do—to carry his own Province—led the people to believe in what he must have known to be a glaring impossibility. Indeed, he has himself admitted that there are less working people in his own constituency now than some years ago; his manner of accounting for the fact I leave to the disposal of gentlemen from his own Province. Our policy towards the manufacturers there and elsewhere is very simple, that no class of the community should be placed upon a footing inferior to that possessed by any other class, and, if the manufacturers obtain an undue preponderance in the way of protection, that result will be injurious to all other classes, but especially would it be injurious to the farmers and mechanics, and, in a minor sense, to the labourers; that those classes would have to pay whatever it cost to protect the others; that fortunes built up by the millionaires, of which the hon. the Finance Minister boasted a short time ago, were only extorted from the sweat of the people, who earn the real wealth of the country by their hard labour. I desire here to refer to a statement of the hon. member for Cumberland; he stated in the most pronounced manner that, in 1876, my hon. friend the late Finance Minister, and the Government of which he was a member, had determined upon the introduction of a higher Tariff, and that they were diverted from it by a deputation, headed by a Mr. Jones, who represented their determination to oppose the Government if such were done. This story is wholly imaginary; the late Government never determined on any such policy, and never were visited by Mr. Jones with any such message. There was a question at that time as to the policy of getting additional revenue, or allowing a possible deficit to accrue. As a matter of course, there was discussion among those who might anticipate the possibility of the Government imposing a higher rate of duty on imports; but that the Government ever determined to adopt that course is wholly incorrect. I expect the hon. gentleman will not repeat his statement, which has been made several times. An hon. friend behind me states that the whole speech of the hon. member for Cumberland was only a series of repetitions, and that future ones will be the same. In that case, I would suggest that he get it printed for future use and distribute it, as this would save a great deal of trouble in connection with its repetition orally. Having given the financial results since 1873, fully, and the effect of the Tariff upon the revenue, I have little further to say at present. There are many things I would like to discuss very fully. The hon. gentleman's speech is a rich mine for those who choose to attack him on many of the grounds presented; but, as many other hon. gentlemen are doubtless to follow me, much of what I would like to take up will be dealt with by them. But there are one or two things I desire specially to advert to. The hon. member for Cumberland, among other extraordinary statements, said that we gained office by unholy means in 1873. What were the unholy means? The hon. gentlemen opposite had a vote of want of confidence that I moved, as leader of this side, pending against them; they discussed it for days, and at last went sneaking out of the House one night—the hon. the Minister of Finance, with a commission as Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, prepared in the Privy Council office, awaiting him, and another Minister with a commission as Judge awaiting him. The hon. the Finance Minister got up at that time and stated, in his place in the House, that they intended to resume the debate on the following day, and asked us to agree to an adjournment, which, in the state of the House, they knew they could not carry. The majority assented to that adjournment, and before the House met again Lieutenant-Governor Tilley and Judge McDonald were off to their respective situations. The Government deserted their post; they failed to respond to an invitation to test their position by a vote of the House; they went out at the back door; they endeavoured to get away under cover, hiding themselves wherever they could. Under these circumstances, we were called on to assume the responsibilities of office by the Governor-General. And yet the hon. gentleman says we obtained office by unholy means. If our means of obtaining office were unholy, I may look in vain to the vocabulary, even of the hon. gentleman from Cumberland, and for a word expressive of the condition that the hon. gentlemen opposite were reduced to at that moment. To be sure, he took great care not long afterwards to wash his own hands of the transaction which was the cause of their quitting office. He said, at all events he was not to blame—he had no hand in the pie; and now, when he and all of those concerned in that transaction have come back to be leaders in political life, he speaks of it as a very venial transaction—defends it, almost, and flings taunts across the House against those who were called on to administer the Government when they were no longer able to do it. While the majority on this side of the House are disposed to leave this transaction alone, gentlemen opposite may well do so; because, if they persist in discussing it, perhaps it will be necessary for us to discuss, some day before long, in what position the country was at that time, what was the result of their policy, and what is to be expected from the continuance of such gentlemen in office in the future.

Mr. RYKERT: Mr. Speaker—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. RYKERT: I shall take my own time in endeavouring to reply to the remarks of the hon. member who has just sat down, as well as those of the ex-Finance Minister. Were we to believe all that is said on the opposite side of the House we must come to the conclusion that this country is coming to ruin and disaster. One would naturally suppose that those hon. gentlemen who profess to be such patriots would have the interests of the country so much at heart that they would seize the first opportunity of joining with the Government in endeavouring to alleviate the country's sufferings; that when they found the country sinking to ruin and decay, and its credit impaired as they have described, they would strive, with the Government, to relieve it from its serious trouble. Some years ago, hon. gentlemen opposite felt it to be necessary to abolish party lines and join hand-in-hand with hon. gentlemen on this side for the good of our common country. The result was the launching upon the country of the great scheme of Confederation. But hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends, true to the instincts of their party, the very moment they found the Conservative party in possession of the Treasury Benches, with some Liberals determined to co-operate with them in carrying on the public business, at once set to work to pull down what had been built up, and to leave the country to its fate. That, in my judgment, was not a patriotic course; but it is just exactly what might have been expected of them. The hon. member for Lambton alluded a few nights ago to the hon. the Minister of Railways in reference to what he said of the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright). He then remarked that no instance could be found in the record of the Canadian or English Parliament of any statesman having spoken of his political opponents in the style of that hon. Minister. I very much doubt if any hon. gentleman could surpass those remarks the hon. member for Lambton himself made immediately after. Though he promised to address himself to the question itself, without calling what he described as ugly names, he, the moment after, launched forth with all his energy into a stream of abuse of the hon. member for Cumberland, denouncing him in unmeasured terms. I have no doubt he felt the criticism of that hon. gentleman, but, if any person ever deserved the castigation dealt out by the hon. the Minister of Railways, it was the hon. member for Centre Huron. All must have felt the speech of that hon. Minister to be unanswerable. The very moment the hon. gentlemen to the left of the Speaker found themselves in the cold shades of Opposition, they commenced to attack and abuse the Government; that has been their practice from time immemorial. The Conservative party has once more been charged with all sorts of crimes and misdemeanours, with extravagance and corruption. But, when the Reformers were in office, and found guilty of extravagance and corruption, their only reference was: we are no more guilty than our opponents; they did the same or worse. I believe that the whole cause of this unwarrantable attack on the Government is a feeling of chagrin and mortification at the success of the National Policy; and I should be wanting in my duty to my constituents and electors were I not to take the first opportunity to recognise the great value of that policy, which has proved, even in a short time, a boon to all. They predicted last year it would fail, and that within twelve months we should have to go back to a Revenue Tariff. The Opposition, on the day the House met, predicted a deficit of $3,000,000, and the whole speech of the ex-Finance Minister was based on the supposition that there would be a large balance against the Government. I think I can show that the late Government are responsible for any actual deficit. In the case of a great national undertaking, like this fiscal policy, we had no right to expect a great success the first year. However, I and other hon. members on this side have been agreeably disappointed at the result; instead of $3,000,000, there is only a deficit of $500,000. Another plan they seem to adopt, in order to satisfy the people that the National Policy is a failure, is to publish reports similar to that which appeared last evening in the Opposition organ here, showing that there were only 300 empty houses three years ago, and now under the National Policy there are more than double the number. What is the meaning of all that? Did we ever hear of any person crying down his credit before? Yet these people, in order to make the people believe that the National Policy is a failure, proclaim it to the world, and illustrate it by stating that there is a large number of vacant houses in every part of the country. I venture to assert there is no other place in the country in which the same number of vacant houses could be found as in Ottawa, and what is the cause? I believe it is to be attributed to the failure of the lumber trade. Their policy is to make the people believe that the country is going to the dogs. Their organs almost daily dilate on failures and bankruptcies. These hon. gentlemen gloat over the misfortunes of other men; they seem to be delighted when they find a man who has become insolvent, and desire at once to parade his private affairs before the House. It is an extraordinary thing that the great men of the party, that the party itself should, because they happen to find themselves in Opposition, resort to such disgraceful means in order to make people believe in the failure of the National Policy. I think, however, the exhibit made by the hon. the Finance Minister, a few nights ago, must satisfy every person that that policy has succeeded beyond even the most sanguine expectations, and promises greater success. I feel that I should be wanting in my duty towards that hon. gentleman if I did not here state that I believe that the National Policy meets with the approbation of the country. I can say for my own county that I have heard very few, -if any, complaints against it. On the contrary, I have scores of letters approving of that policy. I can quote from manufacturers in every part of the Dominion in its favour. In my county, numbers of manufacturers have increased their staff of workmen by nearly one-half within the last year, and one large manufacturer has increased his capacity to nearly double what it was. They find that the stock which was imported last spring, in anticipation of the new policy, is now nearly exhausted, and in a short time they expect to see the beneficial effects of that policy. The same result is seen elsewhere. Almost every day we read in the papers of new manufactories being established in different parts of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite say this is not the result of the National Policy. Well, what is the cause of it? They said a short time ago that our country was rapidly going to destruction, that our factories were being closed up, but all that has been shown to be incorrect, and I think we can fully claim that the revival is largely, if not entirely, due to the National Policy. The hon. gentlemen seem very much annoyed that the hon. the Minister of Finance has redeemed his pledges made before the elections of 1878; they are annoyed that the National Policy has proved successful; they are annoyed that the hon. the leader of the Government has carried out strictly everything he promised when he brought before the House that famous resolution before the late dissolution. Those hon. gentlemen are so much annoyed at the result that they are doing all they can to destroy the credit of the country. I cannot believe that they are sincere, because, though we hear the hon. member for Lambton declaring that he is a Free-trader in policy, we know that sitting all around him are Protectionists. We know that a large number of his supporters, both in the House and out of it, are not only in favour of a Protective policy, but of a retaliatory policy.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.—[BILL 17.]

(Mr. Kilvert.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the said Bill.

MR. SPROULE objected to the 3rd clause of the Bill as amended.

MR. KILVERT said the amendment agreed upon was that, in cities and towns, the opening up of the street for the erection of poles or carrying wires under the ground, should be done under the direction of an officer appointed by the municipal council. The general powers given to telegraph companies were more extensive than this Bill proposed to grant them. If allowed to enter cities, towns or incorporated villages, the promoters of this Bill were willing to submit to the regulations of those municipalities.

MR. BOULTBEE: I do not wish to hamper this company or bother them in any way. The telephone is a very useful invention, but, if the company has power to go from house to house and street to street, the very least they can expect is that they should get the consent of the owner of the property. We are granting powers to deal with property in a manner which could not be done without an Act of Parliament, and we ought to see that it is done under the direction of the proprietor, who, in this case, is the council of the city, town or village, as the case may be.

MR. RICHEY said he perfectly agreed with the observations of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton). He had proposed an amendment in the Railway Committee somewhat to the same effect as this proposed amendment. It seemed to him a very high-handed act, after a Legislature had incorporated a city and conceded to it certain powers—the inhabitants of that city not being able to till the soil without the permission of the city; not being able to plant a tree without authority—that persons outside of that city should be allowed to come in and break up the soil for the purpose of laying down their wires. If permission of this kind were granted to telegraph companies and telephone companies and horse railways, citizens would never know when they were safe. This matter should be left to those who were entrusted by the city with the right of guarding its interest.

MR. SPROULE said he thought the amendment was good enough as far as it went, but it only affected part of the evil. There should be a provision in the law to prevent these companies putting up their lines in the most important streets, and interfering with ornamental trees. He thought also fire companies should be allowed, if necessary, to cut these lines. If this Bill were not amended, the Company would have the right to do as it pleased. He had a doubt whether this matter belonged to this House at all, instead of to the Local Legislature.

MR. RYKERT.

MR. WRIGHT said the power given to cut down shade trees was a matter that required careful consideration. Some shade trees on his property, which he had been preserving for thirty years, had been ruthlessly cut down by a telegraph company to whom this power had been given, not only to his own injury but to that of the public.

MR. HOLTON: No doubt the powers asked for by this company have reference exclusively to cities, towns and incorporated villages. They do not propose to build their lines from town to town, but only in the towns, and it may be well questioned whether they ought to come here to obtain the powers which they ask. If, however, we can give them the powers they seek, then, unquestionably, those powers should be exercised subject to the regulations that the various corporations may enact respecting the opening up of streets, etc. But I invited the attention of the right hon. the leader of the Government to this larger question privately, and I think it is well worth his attention. I do not speak dogmatically in relation to it, but I have very grave doubts indeed as to whether this measure ought to come here at all; but I am very clear about this, that, if we have power to grant the Charter with the powers which are sought for, we ought to surround those powers with such safeguards as will prevent inconvenience and injury in the cities and towns in which these, perhaps very useful, appliances may be erected. I venture to suggest, while I do not wish to thwart or delay the hon. member in charge of this Bill, that it is a new thing and we ought to be cautious in establishing precedents in relation to it; and, therefore, I suggest that the Bill should not be taken through to-night. It may take this stage, and perhaps my right hon. friend the leader of the Government may consider it. I have doubts, in the first place, as to whether the promoters of the measure should come here at all. The Local Legislatures are alone concerned in the governance of the municipalities of the country, and we ought not to override the powers of the municipal bodies to regulate their own affairs.

MR. JONES: It was understood in the Railway Committee that this Bill should be reprinted and amended in accordance with the suggestions made in that Committee. It was suggested that the 3rd clause should apply not only to cities but to towns and incorporated villages. At present it applies to cities in one place, to towns and cities in another place, and to incorporated villages in another. I think this clause should be made to apply to cities, towns and incorporated villages without distinction.

MR. KILVERT: It was especially provided in that 3rd clause that we should have no right to cut down shade trees; we did not ask the right to do so. The hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) mistakes the object of the Bill in saying it is only to be confined to cities, towns and villages. We propose to connect those places by telephone as well as to establish telephones within them. The 3rd clause has been amended in accordance with the suggestions made in the Railway Committee, in so far as to put in the words "towns or villages." I am willing, also, to amend it by adding the words "towns, villages and other places." I have also added a clause providing that the construction of these lines shall be under the supervision of the engineer or such other officers as the council of the corporation may appoint, and in such manner as the council may direct. I think that meets all the objections which have been raised against the Bill. I will have the Bill printed as amended before it comes before the House again.

Bill ordered to be reported.
House resumed.

(In the House.)

Bill reported.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 76) To remove doubts as to the true construction of Section 12 of the Northern Railway Company Act, 1877.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the debate on the motion for concurrence in the resolutions, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (March 9th.)

MR. RYKERT: I think I heard a remark made by the hon. gentleman from Lambton to the effect that he hoped I would spare him the infliction of a speech. I have no disposition to spare the hon. gentleman, if I can help it, although I think there is nothing very much to answer in what he has said. Like other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side—and particularly the hon. gentleman who sits on his right—he thinks that whenever he takes off his hat he uncovers all the political wisdom of the country; but there are others who do not entertain that opinion. What they say can have very little effect on this side of the House, and I think I can point to no better illustration of the actions and conduct of these gentlemen than that which appeared a few weeks ago in the Toronto Grip, in which they are represented as sitting down, laughing and fiddling, while the country is going to the dogs, like the Roman of old. I am not aware that the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has any right to lecture gentlemen on this side of the House, or to lecture the present Finance Minister. The remarks of the hon. gentleman, the member for Centre Huron, will not bear much scrutiny with regard to deficits and extravagance, and I may say—without being unparliamentary—corruption. His record, both inside and outside this House, will not justify him in lecturing the present Finance Minister. I think that a gentleman, who, a year or two ago, sat on this side of the House, and who assumed office with a large surplus, and with an overflowing Treasury, and who found himself unable to cope with the affairs of the country before the expiration of the five years that he and his colleagues held the Treasury Benches—a gentleman who sat with his arms folded, indifferent to the country's welfare, and who acknowledged himself incapable of affording any relief, is not a fit and proper person to lecture the hon. the Minister of Finance. His parting words, which he gave to this House in 1878, are sufficient to show to us that he is not qualified to administer a rebuke to those now in possession of the Treasury Benches. When he found himself with his second or third deficit, he gave us the following parting words:

"I hold we committed the very common error, of grasping at far too much; a pardonable error perhaps, but none the less a grave error, particularly in a country circumstanced like ours. * * * In conclusion, I desire to be clearly understood, I do not at all pretend that the present Government have been faultless in their conduct during the last four years. I do not at all pretend to say that they have committed no errors or that their conduct of affairs has been absolutely free from blunders. To make such a boast would be to expose myself to the jeers of hon. members opposite."

The country believed that that hon. gentleman and his friends had committed great blunders, which he was forced to admit in his last financial speech. The country knew he was utterly incapable of managing its financial affairs. Well, Sir, these gentlemen went to the country, and the country had the choice between men who had violated every political principle, men who had not only ruined the credit of the country, but who had left the country in a ruinous state—the country, Sir, had, the choice between these men and the right hon. gentleman and his friends, who had, on retiring from office in 1873, left the country in a prosperous condition, and who had always faithfully and honourably legislated for the good of the country. They had the five years' record of the gentlemen opposite before them, and they ignominiously defeated them at the polls. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to say that it was a "snap" verdict, but the people of this country are not so badly informed; they know what they are doing well enough, and can readily choose between men who are true patriots and men who have sacrificed every political honour and principle for office. The late Minister of Finance claims that he, above all others, has the right to discuss financial affairs in this country. We could see surrounding his speech, the other night, a sort of hidden venom towards his former leader in this House, and any person studying his career in this House must have known that his motives were other than patriotic. The fact is that his talents were not recognised by the right hon. gentleman who leads the House. Had the right hon. gentleman thrown aside Sir Francis Hincks and taken Sir Richard J. Cartwright into his Cabinet, we would now have seen him on his side of the House, for the feelings of the hon. gentleman are opposed to the principles of the Reform party. His talents were not appreciated, and then he joined hands with gentlemen on the other side of the House, and the moment they reached the Treasury Benches we find how he conducted himself. He is not satisfied it appears with having rolled up a number of deficits, but he attempts to justify it by showing that other men in power had also had deficits. That is a strange style of argument, but it is the argument which is always adopted by the Reform party whenever charged with extravagant expenditure. They say, "True it is, we have done all that, but other hon. gentlemen have done worse than we have done"; and that is a justification. He charges the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government with increasing the debt of the country upwards of ten millions of dollars in six years, between 1867 and 1873. When I heard that startling statement I was surprised. I read over and over his picnic speeches, and I read over the speech he delivered here the other night; and I was curious to learn what position he occupied in this House during these same six years in which he charged the right hon. gentleman with such extravagance. I turned up the records of this House, and I find the hon. gentleman no less than ninety times recorded his vote in favour of the right hon. gentleman, whom he charges with this extravagance, and only thirty-five times against him. This was his course during the six years that he charges the right hon. gentleman in favour of whose measures he recorded so many votes with increasing the debt of the country by $10,000,000. He tells us the Government ought to be condemned because a previous Government with which the right hon. gentleman was connected had rolled up a debt of $10,000,000, and he tells us this after voting the greater part of the time with the right hon. gentleman for the measures by which that debt was contracted. It seems rather inconsistent that he should condemn the course taken and at the same time have voted with those whom he condemns. While condemning that extravagance here, I find that elsewhere he does not charge the right hon. gentleman with extravagance at all. In the celebrated speech made by him at Newmarket, which is known to some hon. gentlemen, after speaking about the increase of expenditure from thirteen millions to twenty-three millions of dollars he says:

"Before proceeding I may as well observe here that I am not necessarily condemning those several expenditures, but I am simply pointing out to you the position in which they had left the finances of the country when my hon. friend the First Minister assumed power."

Well, Sir, we have another evidence that he was not dissatisfied with the course of legislation during those years. He went to London to negotiate a loan, and upon that occasion he was anxious to put the best foot forward. He was anxious to make the people of England know to what extent we were entitled to credit. He pointed out the magnificent resources of the country; and, in speaking of the ten millions added to the expenditure of the country during those six years, he says: "The whole of this debt has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility, for railways, canals," and so on. We find him afterwards at Aylmer, and there he ran riot in his absurd remarks. He used language unbecoming any gentleman, as he is addicted to do when not in the presence of gentlemen opposed to him, and who cannot, therefore, have the opportunity of answering him. In speaking there of the increase of the National Debt, he said :

"They prepared to meet such a burden of debt as no Minister had ever before dreamed of imposing on the country, by raising the expenditure, in one year, four millions of dollars. Sir, I have asked myself more than once, and I now publicly repeat the question, was this done in sheer brutal ignorance and recklessness, or was it done of malice prepense? Did they design to scuttle the ship after they had plundered her? Or was it only the last mad folly of the drunken crew before they ran upon the breakers?"

That is the choice language of a Finance Minister. Let me notice another portion of his celebrated manifesto, issued in England, and which is intended to show in what manner the money was expended by this "mad drunken crew," as he called them at Aylmer. I find therein the following language :

"The Revenue has shown a continuous surplus during each year since Confederation; in 1867, although it has in the interval been charged with much heavy expenditure of an exceptional kind, such as outlay connected with the several Fenian attacks on the country, the acquisition and organisation of new territory, and providing an adequate defensive force for the Dominion, etc."

Here is a man who has on one day charged another with an increase of expenditure of $10,000,000, admitting on another he had increased it in opposing the Fenian raid, and providing a defensive force, etc. We find that this gentleman has, in the face of his past record, the audacity to stand up and make charges of recklessness and extravagance against the present Finance Minister. We find, a short time after his party assumed the reins of power, that this financial genius did not altogether fancy the Estimates brought down by Mr. Tilley, and the first thing he does is to prove to the satisfaction of the House and the country that there was going to be a deficit; and, in order to give greater publicity to it, he placed in the mouth of the Governor-General these words. He said in his Speech, delivered at the opening of the Session of 1874 :

"I regret to say that the receipts of the present year will not be sufficient to meet the expenditure. It will therefore be necessary for you to consider the best means for making good the anticipated deficiency."

He set out with proving to the satisfaction of the House, at that time, that there would be a deficit, and then he asks for an increased expenditure. Immediately he asked for power to raise an additional sum of $3,000,000. What was this for? The country can only infer that it was to cover his anticipated reckless extravagance. So delighted was the organ of the party with the hon. gentleman, that it gave him the following certificate :—

"Mr. Cartwright was perfectly justified in imputing the whole responsibility of the deficit to his predecessors. The country is advantaged by having a Finance Minister who is interested in telling the whole truth and reserving nothing. It is doubtful if the whole truth has been told of late years, and the fact that Mr. Tilley failed to realise or let the House know that he was $1,500,000 short in his Estimate of 1873-4, has an ugly look about it."

At that time he was satisfied there was a deficit, and so was the Globe, but in a very short time we find there was no deficit. The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, in replying to the Budget Speech in 1874, showed that instead of there being a deficit there ought to be a surplus. The House, however, cordially voted the $3,000,000 to supply the anticipated deficiency, as exhibited by the hon. gentleman, as it is always ready to supply money, when it finds the country in an embarrassed condition. The line of argument adopted by the hon. gentleman is an amusing one, and I propose now to apply the same line of argument to the deficit of this year, and I think I can prove that instead of the hon. the Minister of Finance having a deficit he has a surplus. It is in the recollection of hon. gentlemen, that the hon. the Minister of Finance this year declared that, had it not been for the vast amount of goods suddenly withdrawn from bond, prior to the adoption of the National Policy, he would have had a surplus. That is just the argument these men adopted in 1873-4. Let me read from the Globe, and if the hon. the Minister of Finance can satisfy himself that the Globe is right, he will see that he has no deficit. The Globe of August 6th, 1874, says :

"It is quite true that the receipts of the year, under the operation of the new Tariff, and the rush to take goods out of bond when an increase of duties was anticipated last April, have, so far as can be ascertained at present, covered the deficiency and created a surplus * * * The approximate additional Customs duty, which accrued from the removal of goods from bond, in expectation of increased duties, was $600,000, and of Inland Revenue $650,000. But these are in the nature of drafts in anticipation of the revenue naturally accruing in 1874-5. The improved revenue caused by the new Tariff amounted up to the end of the financial year to $546,000. Then these sums amounting in the aggregate to $1,796,060, brings up the revenue to $24,204,925."

The hon. the Finance Minister says that at least $700,000 worth of goods were taken out of bond in February last year, in anticipation of the increased Tariff, which amount, if the theory of the Globe be correct, must properly belong to the year 1879-80. If so, then, instead of there being a deficit of $500,000, there will be a surplus of $200,000. I purpose still further to show the inconsistencies of the ex-Finance Minister. I find that the figures of the hon. gentleman were not always looked upon in the very best light by his own organ. I am going to call a witness, who will be believed in the Grit Court at any time. I find in the Globe of July, 1872, the character of the hon. gentleman is given on the eve of the general election. Previously to that he had made an open bid for the finance ministership, but the right hon. gentleman the present leader of the Government, did not appreciate his abilities. He made a speech on the occasion of the delivery of the Budget Speech, in 1872, in reference to which the Globe says:

"If we may judge by a financial calculation with which he endeavoured to amuse the House the other evening, the 'independent' member for Lennox and Addington is under the impression that he is a wit—a delusion in which the Government papers are likely to confirm him by representing his 'calculation' as though it was of some account.

"Since the hon. member for Lennox and Addington has by a little figuring succeeded so much to his own satisfaction in confuting his own opinion a year ago, we would suggest that he should keep himself at the figuring business. His party is just now in need of the services of a man good at mixing and muddling figures."

Now let us go a little further. I happened to notice some time ago that some writer in Current Events had been dissecting the hon. gentleman and I thought it worth while preserving the same as it appeared to me a very perfect picture of the hon. gentleman. Anyone reading it would almost fancy it was written by some person who heard the hon. gentleman speak a few nights ago:

"Perhaps the recent political history of Canada has never been so boldly travestied before an intelligent audience as the Finance Minister attempted to travesty it at Strathroy.

His facts are almost invariably wrong, and his figures—well, his figures are plastic and accommodating. No public man, certainly since Confederation, has less right than Mr. Cartwright to attempt a show of consistency. Whether the soupcion of personal pique against the Conservative leader, on the ground that his claims as a financier were contemptuously set aside, be true or not, there is certainly a verisimilitude about it, read in the light of the Minister's vindictive speeches against his former chief, which cannot be blinked. The attempt to play upon popular ignorance, or rather popular indifference, not merely to him and his antecedents, but to any party politics more than a year old, is futile. He is now responsible for the financial status and credit of the Dominion, and we have no hesitation in saying—although there is not the sign of a suitable successor on the other side—that he is not the man to play ducks and drakes with the future of the Dominion. His policy has been all wrong from first to last; he has borrowed money at ruinous rates, when he should have imposed taxes; he blames his predecessors for not imposing taxes when they were not wanted; his forecast of the future has egregiously failed in every year of his tenure of office; and, in addition to all his other deficiencies, he has the foulest tongue, save, perhaps, Mr. Francis Jones, in the Dominion. Incompetency is stamped upon the whole course of his Administration, and if posterity will not say of him what Sir Francis Dashwood expected contemporaries to remark, 'There goes the worst Chancellor of the Exchequer that ever lived,' it will be because they have forgotten all about him. * * Mr. Cartwright is so eaten up of personal antipathies that he could not do any good as a Minister, if he would."

I have no doubt the hon. gentleman anticipated that his record would be brought up. I take this course for the purpose of showing the House what kind of a gentleman we have to lecture us here every night. It is not an unfrequent occurrence to hear that hon. gentleman denounce the hon. members on this side of the House for the course they have taken in regard to the Pacific Railway. One who did not know the course pursued by the hon. gentleman in Parliament would naturally suppose that he was always of the same mind, but we find that his statements are not of a stable character. The hon. gentleman made a stump speech at Dunnville, in which he threw as much odium as possible on the right hon. the leader of the Government, and said the country had swept him out of political existence. Subsequent events, however, showed that he was wrong. In that speech he said:

"And as if those burdens were not sufficient they had committed the huge and final blunder of engaging to build the Pacific Railway."

When he made this speech, he knew right well that he himself had always supported the Pacific Railway policy of the right hon. gentleman. Even as late as 1872, after he found that his financial ability was not appreciated, and had commenced coquetting with the hon. member for Lambton, he used the following language in a speech at that time (See Globe,) May 1, 1872 :—

“Their good faith was pledged for the construction of the Pacific Railway in a given time, and if the construction broke down they would still have to complete it any cost.”

This is the gentleman who voted with the Government of that day to entrust them with $30,000,000 to build the Pacific Railway as well as with 50,000,000 acres of wild land, and also voted against a resolution declaring it inexpedient to trust the Government with the disposition of so much money without first submitting the same to Parliament. This is the gentleman who condemned the increase of expenditure between 1867 and 1873, and at the same time voted to throw $9,000,000 of the people's money into the sea, as the Government of the day, which he supported, was charged by the Reform party with doing, when it adopted the longer route for the Intercolonial Railway. I noticed also in a recent speech, delivered by the same gentleman at Dunnville, he made a charge against the Government for its reckless expenditure in behalf of Nova Scotia. Upon taxing my recollection, I concluded that I had seen the hon. gentleman's name figuring alongside those of hon. gentlemen strongly in favour of granting aid to Nova Scotia. At this celebrated meeting at which the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) was present, the hon. the ex-Finance Minister says :

“Searcely were they in office for a year when we find them willing to destroy the whole financial basis of Confederation, to appease the people of Nova Scotia. In fact if the late Government had set their wits at work to devise a plan which would inflict the most serious injury on the prosperity of Confederation, they could not have succeeded better than they did.”

Now that subject was discussed in Parliament and a vote taken upon it. The following amendment was moved by Mr. Holton and seconded by Mr. Mackenzie :

“In the opinion of this House any disturbance of the financial arrangements respecting the several Provinces provided for in the British North America Act, unless assented to by all the Provinces, would be subversive of the system of government under which this Dominion was constituted, and, if effected, as proposed by this Bill, in favour of one Province, without at the same time providing for a general revision and re-adjustment of those arrangements, would be manifestly unjust to the other Provinces.”

It would be supposed that the hon. gentleman voted in favour of that amendment, but, on looking to the record, I find that the Hon. Sir Richard J. Cartwright voted against it. He did not tell that in the county of Monck. That is the kind of man we have to lecture to us on what we should do in regard to the financial affairs of our country. The hon. gentleman says that this Government obtained their present position by false pretences. Well, these false pretences, I suppose, were that the country had found that he and his colleagues had run the country hopelessly into debt, and squandered all the surplus that had been accumulated year after year by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Government ; that they had shamelessly abandoned their principles ; that they were entirely indifferent as to the affairs of the country, and that they were determined that that fly-on-the-wheel policy should not be continued. Yet these men had the cool impertinence to say that we had obtained power by false pretensions. I think it comes with very bad grace from this hon. gentleman. I think I have heard the charge made that the hon. gentleman had purchased no less than five of their colleagues in order to obtain possession of the Treasury Benches. At any rate a certain number of leading Conservatives allied themselves with the hon. gentleman, who all his life had opposed coalitions. The people knew that, and entered a righteous verdict against them. It is well known how that election was carried. We find that something like twenty-eight of these gentlemen were unseated for elevating too high their political standard. I am now going to call a witness to prove that there was wide-spread corruption on the part of the Reform party on that occasion, and that gentleman is the hon. member for West Durham. He had a thorough knowledge and appreciation of the corruption of those days. He made a celebrated speech, which he called “a disturbing speech” in a place called Aurora. In speaking of the extravagance and expenditure at many elections, he tells us what was done by the Reform party. In that celebrated effort, which is called the "Aurora disturbing speech," the hon. member for West Durham says :

"Although no candidate has been found guilty of any impropriety, it has been found that many men belonging to the Liberal party, and prominent in the electoral districts, so far forgot what was due to the country and to this party as to be engaged in the disposition of funds in an illegal manner."

When the hon. member for Lambton came back from the elections in 1874, the hon. gentleman told us that they had not spent a dollar—that the election had been conducted with the utmost purity. But the most beautiful part of the speech of hon. member for West Durham is where he gives the flat contradiction to the hon. member for Lambton. He says :

"There is no doubt of the gross impropriety of the acts disclosed, and the only excuse that I can see for it is that these gentlemen could not have fully realised that we had got the boon we had been struggling for, but thought that the old corrupt course would be followed by the other side, and that whoever was elected by any means could keep his seat."

In speaking about the same election in 1874, and the result of the controverted election cases, a person named McKellar, whose name is familiar in connection with the Proton enquiry, in giving evidence on the subject, stated a few interesting facts. He was in the town of Prescott, and declared that he would let the people know how elections were carried on. He is somewhat of a humourist, and has generally a pretty good story to tell. On the occasion I refer to, he said :

"It is very convenient for our opponents for us to keep quiet while they did all they could to corrupt the people. He might best illustrate what had taken place, by a story of how a person who had thrashed everybody around him, got converted and became a Methodist local preacher. A man had an eye on him, and thought to give him a good beating, believing that he would not resent. He went up to him and told him what he intended to do. The man who had been converted immediately said he thanked God he belonged to a Church which believed in backsliding, and taking off his coat said he would be a backslider for a moment. This is what the Reformers had done ; they had backslidden for a moment, had got the reins of power and passed a law which prevented corrupt practices."

That is the way the election in 1874 was carried ; and yet the hon. member for Lambton talks about corruption. Those hon. gentlemen opposite have boasted about their majority in 1874. Well, the hon. member for West Durham was not sanguine about that majority. He said the majority was represented by 178 votes, and had they been turned the other way there would be a minority in the House. The hon. gentleman charges this Government with recklessness and extravagance in the expenditure connected with the Pacific Railway. He always stated that the late Government would never give a contract for any portion of the line that had not been surveyed and located. This was one of the governing principles of the Reform party, but, upon the eve of election, they advertised for tenders for the line from Yale to Kamloops, and not one foot of the line was surveyed or located. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has attacked the financial policy of the Government, and has exultingly pointed to his record as a proof of his statements. He has said that the hon. the Finance Minister had expended different sums of money which had not been voted by Parliament. I admit that one of the fundamental principles of the Reform party at one time was that no money should be expended without first obtaining the sanction of Parliament, but I contend that the whole history of the party shows a perpetual violation of this principle when they were in power. It is charged that the hon. the Minister has expended $20,000 in excess of the appropriation for contingencies. The hon. gentleman has always been suspicious of "contingencies"; he said that the word generally covered up a great amount of rascality. Once, in the Local House, I noticed a charge for "dusters," and on investigation I found it was for a champagne spree at Belleville. On another occasion, I found the peregrinations of the now celebrated "corkscrew club" under the head of contingencies. Well, the hon. the Minister of Finance is charged with spending $20,000 more than the House voted. I remember some remarks of the hon. member for Lambton in regard to contingencies in the Local House. He thought it was an outrageous thing for a conservatory to be built for the Governor-General, and the expense charged to contingencies. When he got into power, however, we find a similar charge under the head of "Library." In 1873-4, the present Minister of Finance asked for $150,000 for "contingencies." By a strange turn of the political wheel, the hon. gentlemen opposite found themselves on the Treasury Benches, and they spent $222,000, or, in other words, $72,803 more than was voted for that purpose. And yet it is a great crime for the hon. the Finance Minister to exceed the appropriation by $20,000. In 1874-5 the hon. gentleman opposite asked for $175,000, and he spent $208,000, exceeding the appropriation by $33,000. Before the Opposition went to the country, they cut down the Estimates, and the sequel is that this Parliament has been called upon to make good a deficiency of $1,034,000. The amount asked for this year is $25,000,000, but, if the charges for which they are responsible, and which had to be voted last year are deducted, the sum would be $23,970,000. The hon. gentleman is what you may call huge on figures. He showed that the hon. the Minister of Finance had expended $30,000 more for Civil Government than was voted by Parliament, and an additional $30,000 for Superannuations. But he fails to tell the country that the general expenditure has been kept within the Estimates in many items. Comparisons are sometimes odious, but I think the hon. gentlemen will find that we do not suffer much by a comparison with 1873-4. At that time $733,459 was appropriated for Civil Government; the amount expended by the hon. member for Centre Huron was $883,000. The amount voted for the Administration of Justice was $380,261, and $459,037 was expended by the same gentleman; Penitentiaries, $357,525 and $359,551 was expended. Therefore, in these three items alone, the hon. gentleman exceeded the appropriations by $267,028. Let us take the same items for 1878-9, which the ex-Minister estimated, but which were expended by the present Minister. Then $882,174 was asked for Civil Government, and the present Minister of Finance expended $861,170; Administration of Justice, $614,000 was voted and $527,896 expended; Penitentiaries, $322,314 voted, and expended only $308,482. It would therefore appear that the hon. the Minister of Finance saved $72,070 on these three items, as contrasted with his (Sir Richard J. Cartwright's) over-expenditure of $267,028. Now let us take the Estimates for 1880-81. Although they are apparently large, they only exceed the proper Estimates of the preceding year by something like $4,000 or $5,000. What is the cause of the increase this year? It is not the extravagance of the Government. The interest on the Public Debt is responsible for $699,191; the Census, a matter which must be attended to, requires $195,000; for Railways there is an extra item of $48,500; the extra amount for Indians is $165,000, making $1,079,691, which should be charged to extraordinary and not to ordinary expenditure. Deduct those extra items from the amount estimated by the hon. the Minister of Finance, the Estimates of this year will really amount to $23,939,000, or $40,000 less than those of the hon. gentleman opposite in 1878-9. Hon. members opposite have turned their attention towards the National Policy, which they term a sort of "legalised robbery." I say that the hon. member for Lambton does not represent the feelings of his own friends on that side of the House on this question; the public records show it. Is he in accord with the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver), who, I think the records will show, is a strong Protectionist? Is the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in harmony with that hon. gentleman on this question? I think not. If they are, the record belies them. I think the hon. gentleman only speaks for himself, and that the great Reform party, represented by the hon. member for North Oxford, is of an entirely different view. Let me illustrate the fact by a few observations from one of those hon. gentlemen who are continually harping upon the subject before the people, and asserting that the Reform party is entirely opposed to Protection, which is ruining the country. I would like to show how inconsistent they are, and have always been. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) was not always a Free-trader; in one of his speeches in Parliament, he said:

"Protection would, in this country, for a few brief years, enable manufacturers to make enormous profits, and would create a temporary general prosperity."

The hon. member for Lambton, in a speech delivered by him in Toronto during the late election, said :

"There is no doubt that wherever a protective system is adopted, it will for a time increase the production of a country, the manufactured products of a country, and in doing so will, if the sources of revenue are not dried up, induce a seeming prosperity."

The hon. gentlemen said just what we say, that manufactures create prosperity, permanent prosperity we hope at present. We have had a year of the National Policy, and it is shown clearly and conclusively that the country has benefitted by it largely. The hon. member for North Norfolk said that Protection was especially necessary in a new country, which would thus be enabled to compete with older countries, where it had long been established; that it suited the people at large, and especially the farming interest, etc. Here is what he said in 1876 :—

"That Protection is especially necessary in a new country—to enable it to compete with countries where manufactures are established; that judicious Protection here fits the nation at large, and especially the farming interests; that it creates a home market for farm products, and that the purchasing power of labour is increased; that the experience of the United States under Protection was a clear and marked illustration of Protection; that the tendency of Protection is not to increase, but to cheapen, prices to the consumer."

I recollect well when the question was discussed in Parliament, in 1876, the Hamilton Times, one of the Grit organs, took the Free-traders to task because they had pronounced against Protection :

"The next few months will develop whether Canadian manufacturers are to obtain justice by the adoption of Reciprocity, and failing that, their claims are as strong as ever for Protection. Meantime it would be well for our Toronto confrère to remember that he is not talking to a parcel of ignorant children, who do not understand their own requirements, and who can be laughed out of their honest convictions; but let it be understood that the manufacturing interests of Canada must be sustained and encouraged, either by Free-trade on both sides of the border, or by a Canadian Tariff that will correspond with that of the United States."

Now, one would suppose from his speech that the hon. member for Lambton is an advocate of the United States. He talks about some Senator being purchased, a charge which he ought to be ashamed to make, knowing as he does that that hon. gentleman is, and has been, respected as an honourable man by all parties. One would naturally suppose that he himself had been purchased by the United States Government to advocate their cause. He is well understood to be a strong friend of the United States. The hon. gentleman says that a retaliatory policy will be suicidal to this country. His friend the hon. member for North Norfolk does not think so. A retaliatory policy, in 1876, was what the country then required. Hear what he then said :

"With regard to the resolution, I confess I would like to see a retaliatory policy adopted, which would bring the United States to terms, and would at least protect us against slaughter prices."

The member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) also spoke in favour of Protection, in these terms :—

"I must admit that I am in favour of a defensive policy. I cannot view with complacency what we see in this country. We live beside a country with a population ten times greater than our own, whose industries have been fostered by Protection until they are enabled, even in some articles in which Britain excelled, to challenge supremacy with her. While that nation has erected against us and other countries a hostile Tariff, we have our hands bound and give them free and unrestricted right in our markets."

We need not go further than the Globe, which, under the heading "Weekly Review," on February 26th last, made these remarks :—

"Reports as to the business of the week are contradictory to some extent. This applies chiefly to the trade in dry-goods, some houses claiming to be doing a good business, while others report only a fair to middling trade. This is scarcely to be wondered at, as it is admitted that the dry-goods trade and also hardware have grown to considerable proportions here, thus rendering possible a great range of variation. Orders are coming in more freely for dry-goods, but the hardware men are not over-taxed. The wholesale dry-goods trade are busy filling orders for the spring trade, and in some instances both entry clerks and packers have been compelled to be on duty early and late. This branch has improved lately, and the spring trade may be said to have fairly commenced."

In the Globe of September 6th, 1879, I find the following additional testimony, which removes any doubt as to the effect of the National Policy :—

"It is long since it has been in the power of Canadian journals to speak in congratulatory terms on the aspect of commercial matters; but we think we are justified in doing so today. We have for some time past mentioned that there were indications of amendment in the condition of the finance and commerce of the country; but have refrained from jumping too hastily at the conclusion that bottom had been touched, and that we were again moving upward. But matters now strongly point to an improved state of affairs. The 4th of September is always regarded as a critical test of mercantile ability to pay their indebtedness, and enquiry at the banks show that though there was a very large amount of paper maturing to-day, engagements have generally been very satisfactorily met. It is not putting it in too strong a light to say that bankers' expectations have been more than realised. We think we may say that the turn has come, and, under a regime of prudence, the necessity for which has been so strongly impressed upon all by the events of the past, we need not anticipate any retrogression from the upward step which has been taken."

What, after that, is the use of the hon. gentlemen opposite talking about the country going to the dogs, and the like? Is not that a very good proof of the prosperity that is being developed? In October, 1879, the Globe said:

"The improved feeling previously referred to as being manifested in business circles generally continues to be exhibited, and even in a somewhat more marked degree. * * * * * Country merchants, consequently, rejoice, and the buoyancy is felt in proportion by the larger dealers of the city, from whom the main supplies are derived."

See the testimony also of the Montreal Witness, another Grit organ, which explains the cause of increase of bankrupts:

"The increase in the total amount of liabilities during the past year is owing in a measure to the failure of four banking institutions, whose liabilities were of course far above the average. Were it not for the failure of these banks, the year would probably be, with respect to the total amount of liabilities, the most favourable since 1874. Thus the average liabilities have also been greatly increased, being, in 1879, $15,430, against $14,088 in 1878, and $14,657 in 1875. The number of failures is very large, but there can be no doubt that these have also been increased in consequence of the general apprehension concerning the amendment, or total repeal, of the Insolvent law, apprehensions which were not unfounded, as the repeal bill was only prevented from becoming law by the action of the Senate."

The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) said the farmers were going to the dogs as fast as possible—were being starved out, with no prices for their grain; yet his own organ stated they had more time to think of home comforts during the winter months. On December 4th, 1879:

"Taken altogether the trade of the last two months is an improvement on that for the corresponding periods of 1877-78."

Does the hon. member for Lambton want more than that to show the National Policy has been a success? The hon. member for Centre Huron, who was somewhat theatrical in his speech the other night, thought he made a great point, in speaking of the 200 idle workmen in Ottawa; he wanted to show what a terrible calamity had befallen the country, because that number came to the Parliament House to lay their grievances before the Premier; that, he thought, was an illustration of the statement that the country was going to the dogs, under the National Policy. But I recollect a larger similar demonstration during the late Administration, when that hon. gentleman had back stairs made from his office, by which to escape or hide from the workmen. The several hundred workmen were then of the "rough" class, and hon. gentlemen opposite did not wish to touch them with a twenty-foot pole. At election times they are the bone and sinew of the country; but men like the hon. member for Centre Huron have their aristocratic natures shocked by the presence of workmen. The Tory party were charged with having got up those demonstrations as an electioneering dodge. The Globe, of April 5th, 1877, said, under the heading of "More Tory Tactics":

"The Conservatives, have, with that good taste and love for the eternal fitness of things which are the special characteristics of the party of gentlemen, seem to have selected the Parliament buildings of the Dominion as a convenient and appropriate place in which to hold one of the noisiest and most disorderly of their party demonstrations. On the Premier going to the door of the Committee Room he was accosted by two rough-looking fellows who told him they wanted him to come down and speak to the men. Mr. Mackenzie refused to go. * * * There is no doubt the whole affair was a thinly disguised political dodge."

"Rough-looking fellows" is the term used by the Reform party towards those workmen, except about election time. The hon. member for Lambton and his organs alluded on several occasions to the statement of the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) that he could not give the idle men work, there being no

Parliamentary appropriation, and have described him as being totally indifferent to the wants of the workingman, and abused him because he would not spend money for them without the consent of Parliament. Now, what did the hon. member for Lambton say when these "rough fellows" came and demanded something of him? That reminds me of a letter I saw to-day from an expatriated countryman of ours, to a friend of his, which I could almost fancy the hon. gentleman had written. It is in his vein; he points out that the Ontario Government are going to be exceedingly liberal to the poor men, and, in order to relieve their distress, are going to erect new Parliament buildings. The hon. member for Lambton is reported to have said here:

"Mr. Mackenzie said he need not say that he was glad to meet the unemployed workmen, the appointment having been made in the ordinary way. He sympathised deeply with those in distress, and was anxious to do all he could to relieve them. The view taken by the men yesterday was apparently that the Government of the Dominion should provide bread or work. The Government was as powerless as anyone present to contribute in that direction, but he (Mr. Mackenzie) was always willing to relieve distress when he could afford it. * * * The Government had no power to expend money without the order of Parliament. Because the Parliament Buildings were located in Ottawa, that was no reason why the Dominion Government should assist the unemployed workmen of the city. The people of Ottawa had no greater claim on the Government for assistance than the people of Halifax, St. John, Toronto or Montreal had. He pointed out the great advantages offered the agriculturist in the North-West Territories, where a man could get 100 acres of good land for nothing, and while working on it look forward to future affluence."

The late Minister of Public Works said the Great West was open to the workingmen, and the Globe came down upon them with all its vengeance. Why did not he put his hand in his pocket and relieve them? The hon. gentlemen opposite have complained of the duties on coal and wheat, which are not new impositions. I recollect when there were duties on those articles, and a motion made to remove them from the dutiable list, which was opposed by several hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) said on the subject:

"We heard yesterday afternoon, with great regret, that the hon. the Finance Minister was going to exempt coal and wheat from duties, but that hon. Minister did a wise and judicious thing in returning to the duties he proposed. He would oppose the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry to put flour and meal on the free list."

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) moved for an Address, praying for the imposition of an import duty on wheat, flour, Indian corn, hops, salt and coal. Yet it is a great crime in us to tax those articles; but in those days it was all right. Now, however, it is scandalous for the hon. the Finance Minister to impose such duties, as the whole of Ontario is supposed to be up in arms against it. I have not seen the uprising. A proposition was made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) to put a duty on flour, meal and Indian corn. An amendment was made for the purpose of removing tea from the list, and admitting coal and meal free. Who voted against it? The hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) and the hon. members for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) and North Oxford (Mr. Oliver.) The hon. member for Lambton has challenged the emigration policy of the present Government. I think, with his record as leader of the Government of Ontario, he ought to say little about the emigration policy of any Government; for a more extravagant policy was never initiated. The whole policy of the Reform party has been to bring ruin and discredit on this country so far as the emigrants were concerned. He found fault with the Sandfield Macdonald Government because it sent the present member for Cardwell (Mr. White) to England, and paid him $5,000 as Emigration Agent; and yet, the moment his party took office, they covered the Mother Country with hungry gentlemen as Emigration Agents, such as Horrocks Cox, at an enormous expense to the Province. They talk about misleading the people of the Mother Country—see what they did. I have the Official Report in my hands, by which I proved similar statements on a former occasion. So long as they were in power, they systematically misled the emigrants, etc. Here is what the Agent of Ontario published in England:

"They will also clear from five to six acres, and they will find you the seed to plant it. The moment you get there you may begin to put your spade in the soil. I will not tell you that every stump will be out; but I will tell you that in some of these stump lands I have seen some of the finest crops of corn growing I ever saw in my life. The Government, I repeat, will find you seed; they will find you from five to six acres of land ready for the deposit of that seed, and as soon as you have got your land, and at any time find your strong, bony arms idle, the Government will take up every day, every hour of your spare time, and will pay you the equivalent of five shillings a day for working on the colonisation roads."

That was the policy of the Reform party up to 1878. They misled emigrants from the Mother Country. But let us come down to the Blue-book. We find, in 1875, that there were 19,243 emigrants brought out at $14 a head; in 1876, there were 14,999 at $19.60 a head; in 1877, there were 15,323 at $12 a head; and in 1878 they brought out 18,372, at $9.63 a head. Now, the hon. gentleman now at the head of that Department brought out during last year 30,717 emigrants at $5.74 a head—double the number at half the price per head. And that is the extravagant policy of this Government. It is said that thousands of emigrants are going away to the United States—driven away from this country by the National Policy. What are they going there for? It is not the Protection Tariff that is driving them out. There is more Protection there than here. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) sneers at the idea of Earl Beaconsfield being inspired by the right hon. gentleman. I do not see why our chief should not inspire Lord Beaconsfield. I think he would inspire anybody coming in contact with him. A reference has been made to the speech of Lord Derby and the speech of Earl Beaconsfield. I am glad to know that our chief is so well recognised in the Mother Country, as the foremost man in this country. I do not think it a wonder at all that Earl Beaconsfield should look to our chief for a true and correct account of what is going on in this country. He knew the right hon. gentleman could be relied on; he knew he could not tell a lie; he knew right well what kind of man he was.

MR. ANGLIN: Oh.

MR. RYKERT: I know the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) does not like it, but we are thoroughly satisfied with our chief, and the country is satisfied with him. Let me read an extract from the report of—of one of the Clear Grits, I was going to say—Mr. William Annand. I think his name is to be found on the other side of politics; he was the emissary sent to the Mother Country by that party. What does he say? His report is to be found at page 148 of the Report of the Minister of Agriculture of that time. He says:

"The omission of Lord Derby was, however, admirably supplied in the now celebrated speech of Earl Beaconsfield, delivered at a large public meeting, held at Aylesbury, in September last, in which his Lordship spoke of the 'illimitable wilderness' of fertile prairie land in our Dominion of Canada, where, for a comparatively small sum, the unhappy agriculturist, now unable to pay rent to the English landlord, might, in a very brief time, become the owner of a valuable estate in Manitoba or the North-West. The emphatic references of the noble Premier to the agricultural capabilities of the Dominion, necessarily created a marked impression at the time in favour of emigration to Canada—an impression which, instead of being weakened, was deepened and strengthened by the hostile criticism to which some details of His Lordship's speech were subjected. Canada was never so well advertised before."

That is the report made by the emissary sent to England by the Grit Government. I do not know that I have much more to say in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Huron. There, however, is just one other matter to which I will refer. He has advocated a novel theory. I was reading that work of that celebrated writer on Political Economy, Mr. Mill (I do not mean the member for Bothwell), and also the work of a celebrated person called Smith on the same subject; and I find the opinions there expressed far behind the times. We are told by those writers that, when the exports are greater than the imports, it is a sure sign of ruin. Well, I leave the philosophers of Bothwell and Centre Huron to settle these things; and I think that, if they spent a little more time in the Library, they might find that the whole of their theory is a theory of the past, and is now entirely exploded. The hon. members for Centre Huron and Bothwell have taken the liberty of telling us that the end of our political existence is at hand; that the handwriting is on the wall. I do not see it. I have looked around the country, and I do not see the writing on the wall. They say, look at the Ontario Local elections. I have visited many of the counties helping my friends, and I can venture to say that in no constituency was the question of the National Policy discussed in the Local elections, except in the cities and a very few counties. Many a county was taken by the utmost debauchery.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Oh.

MR. RYKERT: Hon. gentlemen say "Oh." Well, I speak by the book, and I know the amount of money expended was very large; money carried most of the elections. Take the county of Welland. The Conservative candidate was a plain Dutchman, like myself, and he beat the Hon. J. G. Currie; a question of corruption drove him from Parliament. Then look at the South Wentworth election; it went Conservative at the last election; but, by some hocus-pocus work, it was turned around by a majority of two or three. We hear no jokes now from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rymal); because he sees the handwriting on the wall, and he fears the next election. They will find at the next election that Ontario is sound to the core; that they can appreciate the finance measures of this Government, and, when that day does come, the Opposition will know it to their regret. I will not detain the House.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Oh, go on; go on.

MR. RYKERT: Hon. gentlemen say "go on." They need not say "go on," or "stop." I will go on, and stop, when I please. They need not think they can disconcert me; if they think so they are quite mistaken; I am not so easily put down. The hon. member for Lambton's speech was apparently made up from those he has delivered during the last two or three years; this re-hash can have very little effect on the country, and no effect whatever in the House. A more unpatriotic and unstatesmanlike speech was never before delivered by the leader of a great party. The hon. gentleman cannot address the House without resorting to all kinds of personal abuse. Every word of his remarks except a few words on the present policy of the Government, is a repetition of what is to be found in the picnic speeches, as published and circulated. A few lines were written in reference to the hon. gentleman's speech, which he delivered in Renfrew a few years ago, which are very applicable to the speech with which he has just now favoured the House. I do not know whether he wrote these lines himself; but they are so appropriate that I think I cannot do better than to repeat them:

"He cannot make the old speech
He made so long ago,
For cheek and voice would fail him
And self-possession go;
For broken pledges come in mind
With each remembered phrase,
He cannot speak of 'purity'
As in by-gone days.

"He cannot make the old speech,
Its words would make him blush,
The crowd would interrupt him
With 'Cauchen' and 'Big-Push.'
Unseated Grits would give the lie
To each familiar word,
He cannot make the old speech,
It would be too absurd."

I must apologise to the House for occupying so much time; but I felt, as an Ontario man, that I was bound to answer some of the observations of hon. gentlemen opposite. As a representative from that Province, I feel that I owe a duty to the people who sent me here, and a duty to my party, to endorse the policy of the Government, which has been an inauguration of prosperity, and which, if fairly and honestly carried out, I believe will bring us a great future. I believe that capital is flowing into our country—the farmer is benefited by it—the manufacturers have, I know, gained by it. The sneer made by the hon. member for Centre Huron, because the present hon. Minister visited the manufacturers, ill became him. If he could bring himself to the level of his fellow-men, it would be a great deal better. His kid-glove ideas are such that he cannot talk to the farmers and the workingmen, but the present Minister of Finance has shown himself a man of the people. I believe that the people of Ontario recognise that the policy of the hon. gentleman will produce the greatest good to the country. How could the whole fiscal policy of the country be altered without some inconvenience? But if, after one year's trial, it requires very little modification, it shows that the principle of it is sound, and I make no doubt whatever, Sir, that under the wise legislation of the present Government we shall continue to prosper throughout the whole Dominion, and that a great future is in store for us.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) : I do not propose following the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) through the whole extent of the political tirade to which he has treated the House. As a dealer in political carrion he has no rival, and I am quite willing to allow him the entire monopoly of that business. I have listened attentively to the splenetic speech with which he attacked the Reform party, and was amused to see that he had taken down his favourite scrap-book from its musty shelf, and turned over page after page in order to give a series of readings to the members of this House as an exhibition of his own peculiar trade. My hon. friend was particularly anxious to-night to, as he said, demolish the late Minister of Finance, The special mission with which he charged himself was to traduce and villify, and I think it will be universally admitted that he fulfilled his mission with remarkable ability, an ability, Sir, which he rarely displays in any other direction. He attacked the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) for changing sides, but will that hon. gentleman look back at his own career for a few moments? It so happens that somewhere between 1862 and 1863, a county in the west was represented by the same individual who now represents it, and, if the Journals of the House are turned up, it will be found that the hon. gentleman, who is now supporting the present Government with so much vigour, supported the opposite party at that time; and if you look down the votes of these years you will find that he voted along with the Reform party. The votes are recorded thus, "Rykert, Rymal, Scatcherd, Mackenzie," and so on. Has my hon. friend been more consistent than the late Minister of Finance? What change has come over the spirit of his dream? In what light has he seen the error of his way? From 1862 to 1863 he was a firm supporter of the Reform party, and now we find him sitting down in sweet communion with those to whom he was so firmly opposed in by-gone days. Is he the gentleman to point the finger of scorn? Is he the gentleman to condemn even my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, whose financial ability has been recognised by this House, and whom the whole country will recognise in the proper way? The hon. gentleman has dealt in reproaches against the Reform party for what he calls their political debauchery. He must needs hurl invectives against Mr. Currie, late member of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, and against members who have made speeches in different parts of the country; but he is not entirely invulnerable in that respect himself. My hon. friend, whose inconsistency I have already exposed, had a seat in the Local Legislature of Ontario; and he is the only member who was ever brought before the Bar of that House and indicted for political immorality. I will read the report made by the Select Committee, during the Session of 1874. That Committee reported as follows:—

"1. That the Great Western Railway Company of Canada, on or about the 1st day of July, 1870, paid the said John Charles Rykert the sum of $1,000 for Parliamentary services rendered by the said John Charles Rykert to such company in the then recent Session of the Legislature of Ontario."

SOME HON. MEMBER: It is hard to believe.

MR. ROSS: Yes, my hon. friend on my right says, "It is hard to believe," but I fear it is too true. The report continues:

"2. That one Edward D. Tilson gave the said John Charles Rykert the sum of $100 for Parliamentary services rendered by the said John Charles Rykert in connection with the Bill to incorporate the town of Tilsonburg, in the Session of the said Legislature held in the year 1871-72, such money being paid to the said John Charles Rykert after the third reading of such Bill."

SOME HON. MEMBER: Oh, that cannot be there.

MR. ROSS: Well, the hon. gentleman can read the report for himself if he likes. It goes on further to say:

"3. That the said John Charles Rykert received from the Toronto Street Railway Company the sum of $150 for professional services rendered by the said John Charles Rykert in connection with certain legislation respecting said Street Railway and the proposed Ontario Street Railway, in this Legislature and elsewhere."

"4. That at the time of the payment of such moneys aforesaid the said John Charles Rykert was and still is a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario."

I will now read from a minority report of the same Committee. There was a disagreement in regard to the circumstances under which the money was paid. The minority of that Committee held that the money was paid for professional services. Here is what they say :

"They find that the said John Charles Rykert, while a member of your honourable House, received or was paid the following sums of money by persons who were or had been concerned in seeking or opposing legislation before your honourable House or the Committee thereof : the sum of $1,000 by the Great Western Railway, which had been concerned during the Session of 1869 in opposing certain legislation provided in the interest of the Canada Southern Railway Company, and supporting certain legislation sought by the first-mentioned company in connection with the line of railway known as the Air Line ; $150 by the Toronto Street Railway, which had been interested in opposing, during the Sessions of 1871, 1872 and 1873, certain legislation provided in the interest of the Toronto Street Railway Company ; $100 by one Edward D. Tilson, who had been interested in certain legislation provided by him during the Session of 1871-2 for the incorporation of the town of Tilsonburg."

The minority and the majority of that Committee in their report agreed as to the fact of the money being paid, and my hon. friend himself is of course fully aware whether he received the money or not. The evidence is there. Now, Sir, it will be a little surprising to this House that entries like that appear on the Journals of the Local Legislature, a Legislature which my hon. friend did not adorn, and from which he would have been ignominiously expelled, but for the mistaken kindness of Mr. Mowat and the Reform party. Perhaps, however, he will adorn this Legislature, and, after seeing the error of his ways, will repent and become virtuous. I hope so, but I am afraid that the evidence which recently appeared in one of the Courts of St. Catharines will hardly support my expectation. However, strange things sometime happen in politics, and it may be that my hon. friend may hereafter be more virtuous, but I do hope that he will at least spare us the pain of referring to these Journals, and of calling the attention of the House and country to his former political degradation. I cannot go so far as to say that he was bought, but I know that the money was paid, that his political support was given, whether as a consideration for that money or not the hon. gentleman himself knows. Then my hon. friend goes on to charge the Reform party with decrying the credit of this country. He takes the ground that, because we are not satisfied with the National Policy, because we choose to say that it is not calculated to advance the interests of this country, we are therefore unpatriotic and disloyal. The hon. gentleman's charge in that matter is scarcely worthy of consideration. It is not to be admitted for one moment that the Conservative party monopolises the entire loyalty and patriotism of this country. The ground we take in regard to this National Policy is that it has not fulfilled, and that it cannot fulfil, the promises made in its behalf when it was first introduced. I deny that we decry the credit of the country, but we do say that the prosperity which was promised because of the introduction of the National Policy has not come, that the workmen do not receive better wages as they were promised, that business has not improved as we were promised, at least we have no substantial evidence of its improving. We say it remains with the hon. gentlemen opposite to show that the business of this country has improved, and that greater prosperity does ensue because of this policy. Why, it was the hon. gentlemen themselves that first began to decry the standing and prosperity of the country. Let me refer in proof of this to the resolution introduced by my right hon. friend the leader of the Government in connection with this question. It reads as follows :—

"That this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious re-adjustment of the Tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and the other interests of the Dominion ; that such a Policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries now so sadly depressed." Now, you will find in almost every line of that resolution evidence of the country being decried. If you will go back to 1876, when the first resolution in regard to this question was introduced, you will find the same sentiment prevails, and did there not come up from every platform in Ontario a dolorous wail from my right hon. friend about the depressed industries of Canada, about the suffering workmen, about the expatriated citizens, and about the poor hard-working, ill-fed labouring men ? In the Eastern Townships we were told that from the emerald lakes and the green fields came up the cry, "Sir John, come over and help us." But so far from the Reform party decrying the country or pointing out its depressed condition, they took the ground that the depression was overstated, and that, moreover, it was a season of general depression in the United States, Great Britain and continental Europe; they took the ground that these depressions were periodic, and that, after a while, in the natural course of things, the depression would be removed and the country become prosperous again; and I believe that under the circumstances it would have recovered its prosperity, in the natural order of business, far more effectually and speedily than it has under the treatment it is receiving at the present time. Is it unpatriotic for us to take the ground that the country is not so depressed as it is represented? If that is what my hon. friend means by the term unpatriotic, then I wish to be considered unpatriotic. I believe that the depressed condition of the country has not been relieved by the National Policy. I believe that if the depression does pass away it will be not because of the National Policy but in spite of the National Policy; that the improvement in trade in the United States and elsewhere, with the good crops with which Providence has favoured us, will give an impetus to trade in the Dominion in spite of the depressing effects of the National Policy; but that prosperity, I am bound to say, would have come sooner had not the hon. gentlemen opposite proposed to tamper, as they have done, with the ordinary rules of business. We are charged with being unpatriotic; for what? because we have supported an economical Government.

MR. RYKERT: Hear, hear.

MR. ROSS: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." Perhaps he understands economy just as well as he did political morality. But are we unpatriotic because we have supported that system of trade that prevails in England, and have refused to copy the system of trade which prevails in the United States? Are we unpatriotic because we were going on with the public improvements of this country just as fast as the means of this country would afford? Are we to be considered unpatriotic because we refuse to copy the American Civil Service system and dismiss whole shoals of public employes at every change of Government? Am I to understand that patriotism means going up and down through the country like mountebanks, making promises that can never be fulfilled in the nature of things; deluding the workmen with the promise that wages will inevitably rise; deluding the farmer with promises of prices that he cannot realise? If that is the patriotism meant by my hon. friend, then I wish to be considered unpatriotic. Let me show how the patriotism of my hon. friends opposite is regarded by a certain Political Economy Club which sprung up, strangely to say, very recently in Montreal, under the wing of some of the leading Conservatives there.

MR. McCALLUM: No, no.

MR. ROSS: My hon. friend says "no." Well, he was not there at the time. I am not charging him with being one of the chickens that went under the wing of that political club. He has not got that far yet, only so far as to get a cheap supply of coal for his tugs. Why, under the very wing of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), in the city of Montreal, within a few doors of his Montreal Gazette office, we find a club organised called the Political Economy Club, and in their first manifesto they make use of the following words:—

"The Protection of home manufactures against British competition, by the imposition of heavy Custom-house duties, and the appointment of Sir A. T. Galt, the most prominent independence advocate in Canada, to negotiate commercial treaties with both France and Spain, can leave no possible doubt in the minds of intelligent observers that the policy of the present Government is to free themselves more and more from the thralldom of the Colonial system."

That club takes the Protective system inaugurated by the hon. gentlemen opposite as an evidence that the Colonial connection with the Mother Country is about to be severed, and claims to see in the appointment of Sir A. T. Galt as a negotiator of commercial treaties an evidence that the present Government are opposed to our Colonial system, and looks at the sympathy which is created by the assimilation of our system of trade to that in the United States as a proof that we are approaching nearer to the institutions of the United States, and when that assimilation is complete Canada will be cut loose from the Mother Country. The

hon. gentlemen may draw such conclusions as they see fit from the manifesto of this club, but the fact remains that the club based their manifesto on the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Whether these gentlemen are identified with this club I am not prepared to say, but we know that it receives its entire sympathy and support from gentlemen professing Conservative principles. We objected last Session to the National Policy, because we believed it would alienate the sympathies of the Mother Country from Canada. We were not mistaken in that opinion. The Canadian Tariff was denounced in every English newspaper, by every English statesman, by English Boards of Trade, showing conclusively that the feelings of Englishmen are aroused and their affections alienated from this country. We objected to the Tariff on another ground, that it would bear unevenly upon the Provinces. Hon. gentlemen must know that there are certain features in the Tariff which have a tendency to alienate one Province from the other. When we entered into Confederation, it was on condition that the interests of the whole country should overbear the interests of any particular Province, and that no Province should be favoured to the detriment of the whole nation. If a fiscal policy is introduced, by which one Province has special advantages over another, or is burthened more than another, then the original contract is broken and injustice is done. Inasmuch as the Tariff has this effect, it does interfere with the harmony which should exist between the Provinces. On what ground has this agitation in regard to the Fishery Award been taken up in the Maritime Provinces? Simply because they feel that this Tariff presses upon them unduly, and it is as an offset to the injurious effects of the Tariff that they are seeking a certain portion of this award. Let me give you a fact or two, which will illustrate the working of the Tariff. The percentage which Ontario paid upon dutiable goods she consumed last year was increased by $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; the Province of Quebec, $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; Nova Scotia, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; New Brunswick, $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; British Columbia, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; Prince Edward Island, 2 per cent. So unevenly does this Tariff rest upon the various Provinces that the

Customs' duties paid by Ontario have increased by $1.16 per head; those paid by Quebec, only 27c. per head; New Brunswick, $1.40 per head; British Columbia, $1.80 per head; Prince Edward Island, 27c. per head. The Tariff presses very unevenly. In one case the duty is increased to $1.16 per head; in another case it is increased to $1.46; in another case 27c.; in another case $1.80; in another case it is only 9c. You will see from the very nature of things, that a Tariff that presses so unevenly upon the consumers of the different Provinces must have an injurious effect upon the political sympathies of the people. Suppose that the people of Ontario become restive and say that your Tariff has increased our duties to $1.16, while it has only increased the duties of the people of Quebec 27c. What reply can you make? There can be no reply only this, that any Tariff which would press so unevenly iniquitous in the very nature of things. Now, who pays the coal tax? Certainly not the people of the Maritime Provinces so much as the people in the Province of Ontario, who import their coal from the United States, and, in order to accommodate, as much as possible, the people of Nova Scotia, the 50c. tax was increased to a 60c. tax per ton. The people of Ontario will be disposed to say, we have to pay 60c. a ton on the coal we consume, and yet there are people in this Dominion entirely exempt from this obnoxious tax. What right have we as members of this body politic to be burdened with taxes which do not lie equally upon every section of the body politic. In the same way with the flour tax: It is mainly the people of the Maritime Provinces, who, as a matter of necessity, bring their flour as return cargoes from the United States, who have to pay the obnoxious tax of 50c. per barrel on flour. The Province of Ontario is to a certain extent, though indirectly, exempted from that tax, and the people of the Maritime Provinces may say: We have to pay this obnoxious tax, in regard to which a large portion of her Majesty's subjects are exempt. I will take another illustration. The Great Western Railway of Canada is to a large extent the great artery for trade in the Province of Ontario. That railway paid a coal tax of about $50,000. The increase of the Tariff to the extent of 10c. per ton will increase the coal tax of the Great Western Railway by $10,000. That means increased freight and a reduction of profits. In the Maritime Provinces, railways are not of the importance they are in Ontario. Are we not, therefore, discriminated against in regard to this matter? Are we not correct in saying that the tendency of the Tariff is to destroy the harmonious feeling which should exist between the various parts of this great Confederation. Its direct tendency is not, as it should be, to bind together the different Provincial interests, but to alienate them, and to set up a standard of taxation in one Province which does not apply to another Province, and to leave the less favoured Provinces to complain that they are not treated fairly under the system of Confederation into which they have entered. Another charge against the Tariff is that it does not bear evenly on individuals. This of itself, if proved, would be sufficient to condemn it. The only ground on which a revenue can be fairly collected is that, as near as may be, all classes of Her Majesty's subjects will be obliged to contribute equally towards it. Now, let us examine this Tariff somewhat in detail, and see whether all classes of Her Majesty's subjects derive equal benefit from it. Take the farmer to begin with. He was promised, under this Tariff, a home market for his produce. On every platform in Ontario, the farmer was told that, under the existing system, he was obliged to send his grain to Liverpool in order to find a market. The hon. the Minister of Railways in the city of London told the farmers of my county that under the present system they were obliged to send their produce 3,000 miles in order to find a market, but that under this National Policy they would find a market for their products at home. Well, has this been realised? Look at the returns laid on the Table of the House by hon. gentlemen opposite, and what will you find? You will find that, for the last six months of 1879, we exported $2,500,000 worth more of animals and their products than were exported during the previous six months. And not only has there been an increase in the exportation of animals and their products, but we have actually exported nearly $5,000,000 worth more of the products of the soil during the same period than we did during the previous six months. The farmer has to go to Liverpool to find a market for his produce as he had before. He was deluded by hon. gentlemen. He was promised a home market, but did not receive it. I remember that, when hon. gentlemen opposite were agitating the National Policy in my county, they told the farmers: Your millers do not need to buy your farm produce; they can keep their mills running by importing cheap American grain; but, when we get into power, we will put a duty upon this wheat, and your millers will have to pay you the difference of the duty which we impose; you will have a market and American wheat will be kept out. But what have hon. gentlemen done? Instead of fulfilling the promises they made, they ostensibly put a duty upon American wheat, and then threw wide open the doors to American wheat in order that our millers may grind as much of it as they choose. This is deluding the farmers from beginning to end. If hon. gentlemen had felt disposed to fulfil the promises they made, they would insist upon the exaction of the duties imposed. We were promised a duty of 15c. a bushel on barley, and the farmers were told that that would enhance the price of barley. The duty was put on, and how much has the price of barley been enhanced? In what particular item has the farmer got one cent more for any product of the farm or dairy in consequence of the adoption of the National Policy? I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to point to one single instance in which the farmer in Ontario has been advantaged to the extent of a shilling by the National Policy. But I can show you where disadvantage has accrued. On every article the farmer consumes the duty has been enhanced. The cottons he uses have been enhanced 20, 40 and 45 per cent. His woollens are enhanced in a similar proportion.

MR. FARROW: No.

MR. ROSS: I say yes; they have been advanced. Notwithstanding that the dissent of my hon. friend from North Huron comes like a voice from the tomb, I can tell him that I have looked at the papers laid on the Table of the House, in which it appears that the duties on woollens have been enhanced some 8 or 9 per cent. as compared with the previous year. The hon. gentleman will find that the duties on every description of woollens are enhanced. He will also find that the coarser grades of woollens pay a higher duty than the finer woollens. I repeat my challenge, that in regard to no article sold by the farmer has he received any Protection, and in regard to every article consumed by him the price has been enhanced, from the furniture with which he adorns his parlour to the hardware with which he repairs his farming implements. In every direction the burdens imposed on him have been increased, and for these increased burdens he has received no equivalent. Hon. gentlemen were the friends of the workingman in the hour of his depression. They promised him better wages and constant employment.

AN HON. GENTLEMAN: Hear, hear.

MR. ROSS: Hon. gentlemen admit it. Well, here is a statement made by the hon. the First Minister at the Amphitheatre at Toronto:

"We must grow up manufactures by a judicious system of Protection, and, if we do, the labourer and the workmen will get employment, the capitalist will seek the assistance of the workman, and there will be a community of interest and a community of action. If we have only a sensible system of Protection, if we have only a common-sense system of law, we will find that the workingman and the capitalist will work together, and the country will blossom like a rose."

Does it blossom? Can my hon. friend the Minister of Customs point to a single blossom—even to a bud? Can he detect its fragrance in the air? I cannot, for one. Does the workingman of the city of Ottawa smell the perfume of this beautiful blossom, which was to grow out of the National Policy? Does the hon. the Minister of Finance see it bloom and blossom? If he cannot, no individual can, for his imagination is so florid that he can see further into the future than any of us can pretend to see back into the past. Has my hon. friend for Centre Toronto (Mr. Hay) seen it blossom? Let us see what he said in the Amphitheatre on that occasion. It was as follows:—

"His hearers might depend upon it that the working classes were the bone and sinew of the community, and the reason the meeting was called was because more workmen were wanted in the country (cheers), and there was a desire that they should be better paid and have more work."

And on the eve of the election he issued the following placards:—"Vote for Hay," "More employment and better wages." That is the statement made by the hon. gentleman in the city of Toronto, on the 17th September. Did the workmen of the city of Toronto realise that? Have the workmen realised it in any other part of the country? We know, as a matter of fact that, since the National Policy has come into operation, wages have actually declined, and the cost of everything which the workingman consumes has increased. He was promised by my right hon. friend a reduction of duty on some articles, and he was promised an increase of duty on others. They promised that there should be an increase on cottons, woollens, etc., and a decrease on sugar, coffee, and so on.

AN HON. GENTLEMAN: And on silks and satins.

MR. ROSS: Yes, on silks and satins, things of which the workingman requires a great deal. Have these promises been realised? In some respects they have. So far as the increase on cottons, woollens, and linens are concerned, they have been, but he pays as much for his tea, coffee, sugar, etc., as ever he did, and the trouble is he does not pay it into the Treasury, but into the pockets of those who do not require it as much as he does himself. Can my hon. friend show me where the workingman has been improved by this policy? Have not all the promises made to the workmen been broken, not only in whole but in detail? They have no better wages, no more employment; expatriation now as before; families going to the United States as before; people glad to get away from the embarrassing influences of the National Policy, knowing that, as long as they remain here, they will be pursued by the Collector of Customs, and that everything they require for household or family purposes will be heavily taxed. Sir, the workmen of this country have been deluded. We say that the hon. gentlemen have broken their promises, and we bring them to task for having broken those promises. We wish to tell this country that they have promised the workmen more employment; they have promised them better wages; they have promised prosperity; and that, when they made these promises, they knew they could not perform them. When they promised the workingman more employment, they promised what the right hon. gentleman was obliged to refuse them the other day. The lumbermen were promised great advantages from the National Policy. Have they realised those advantages? Not at all. The manufacturers were promised great advantages, and I venture to say that they, and particularly the manufacturers of woollens, and cottons, and sugar, have received all the advantages which the National Policy affords. But that is a special, not a national advantage. The National Policy has built up monopolies, as we said it would, in favour of a few sugar refiners, and woollen and cotton manufacturers, and some tug-boat companies. Tug-boats plying between Canadian and American ports, or plying in International waters, are exempted from the coal duty, but inland boats must pay 50c. a ton on the coal they consume. The Tariff should not give special advantages to one over another. The man who plies his tug-boat on a canal should have the same privileges as one who has tug-boats anywhere else. Take the case of the corn duty. The farmer is subjected to a duty of 7½c. upon corn. He gets no rebate, but the manufacturer of starch gets a rebate of 5c. on every bushel of corn he uses for manufacturing purposes. Is not that unfair? Is not that enough to condemn the so-called National Policy? The hon. gentlemen cannot work their own Tariff. On their own admission, it is a failure; and the people have to suffer. So much for the special advantages supposed to be conferred by the Tariff. They say it has been an advantage, in that it has revived the West India trade, a trade which seemed to languish under the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). They say this trade has been revived. I have taken the trouble to enquire into the extent of this revival; and I find that it amounts to this. I find that a large portion of this revival is merely a transfer of the trade from Great Britain to the West Indies. I do not see any value in that. A Canadian vessel would sail to Great Britain with a cargo of produce or cattle, and she would bring a return cargo of sugar. Now, under the present system, instead of returning with a cargo of sugar, she has to return with something else, or simply with ballast. It just amounts to this, that a return cargo is brought from the West Indies, instead of Great Britain, by vessels which go to the West Indies; therefore, this is merely a transfer to the West Indies from Great Britain. They think perhaps that this is an advantage; but I can see no advantage in it. Even, however, if it does amount to an advantage, what is the extent of it? Under the régime of the hon. gentlemen opposite, we imported in the last six months of 1879, 4,721 tons of sugar from the West Indies more than we did in the last six months of 1878. It resolves itself into this, that we have imported extra sugar enough to load ten small schooners, giving perhaps 100 to 200 men employment; and, because we have this little extra trade of 4,721 tons of sugar, the hon. gentlemen say that we are on the high road to prosperity, and that the halcyon days of peace and plenty are dawning upon us. I do not see in that such an advantage. I do not see the great prosperity on which they pride themselves. The same thing may be said with regard to the tea trade. I have examined the statistics in reference to that, and I find that in the last six months of 1879 we imported 470 tons of tea, from China and Japan, more than was imported in the last six months of 1878, and, on this account, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways burst into extasies over the revival of the China trade. The hon. gentleman knows we do not import directly one single pound of tea from China; he knows that not a pound of tea is imported by a Canadian importer, but that it simply comes from a Boston or New York house; it is simply a transfer of importation from ourselves to Boston and New York merchants. But, even supposing this tea did come from China direct, would that amount to a revival of prosperity? It would give employment to a vessel of about 500 tons, manned by ten or fifteen men. Why, Mr. Speaker, is this the unprecedented prosperity which they tell us about? "Large oaks from little acorns grow." Hon. gentlemen can build up, with one cargo of tea, a whole nation's prosperity. A few cargoes of sugar from the West Indies—and Canada is prosperous and happy. But the mole-hills they have exalted into mountains are only mole-hills after all. In their own conscience they know they are deceiving the country, as they did in 1878. They say that commerce and shipping have revived. Perhaps there is a great revival in shipping; but, in the Monetary Times, I find the following statistics: In 1868, Quebec built thirteen vessels, tonnage 10,928 tons, value $434,680. In 1879, Quebec built not thirteen vessels but two vessels, tonnage 2,960, value $105,971. Is not that reviving commerce and shipping, and giving employment to ship-carpenters, cordage-makers, and so on? That shows the revival of commerce with a vengeance. But I have more to say on this question of commerce; so far from increasing it has decreased, taking the returns laid upon the Table of the House. I there find that in the last six months of 1878 we exported and imported $8,000,000 worth of merchandise more than was exported and imported in the last six months of 1879. I am adding the imports and exports together in both cases; for the whole bulk of the commerce of the country represent the total employment of shipping, and railways, and forwarders, and employes of docks and harbours. Well, then, I say that the exports and imports represent $8,000,000 for the last six months of 1879 less than in the last six months of 1878. Does that mean an increase in the commerce of the country? Does that add to the labouring men's wages? Does that add to the wealth of shipowners and railway companies? The modes and means by which hon. gentlemen opposite try to prove that the National Policy is a benefit are so absurd that they only need to be pointed out to be condemned. It is absurd to say that, if the duties are increased on commodities, we need not pay any more for those commodities than formerly. If it is true, as alleged, that $7,000,000 are taken out of our pockets more than formerly, it is quite clear that that same sum cannot be taken out without increasing prices. If the woollen duty is more than it was it must add to the price of woollens. To tell the people that they are paying a higher revenue now than formerly, and that still their goods do not cost them more than formerly, is trafficking in the credulity of the country. Hon. gentlemen say: But prosperity cannot come in a day; We must have time.

But, Sir, who was it said it did not require time? Who was it said stocks would go up and prosperity come, and the clouds be uplifted immediately on the defeat of the late Government. The hon. the leader of the Government, speaking at Parkhill, said:

"If the Conservatives gained a majority there would be a return of confidence at once, and even before the new Tariff could be introduced the manufacturers would have such hopes for the future that they would be employing more men, circulating money and increasing their business, all of which would reflect beneficially on the farming community. The moment a Tariff, the effect of which was to keep Canada for the Canadians, was introduced, confidence and prosperity would return."

The did not want us to wait then. All they wanted was that they should get in power. The fact of the Liberal party being defeated, they said, would restore prosperity and a general advancement in the commercial interests of the country. All that was wanted was to give them the reins of power. That was their own promise, in their ante-election speeches. But, now that they are called upon to fulfil these promises, they go on their knees, and say: We are not ready for our trial yet; we were ready before we attained power; we could make strong promises then, but now that you ask us to make those promises good, we are not prepared; it is too soon; postpone the day of judgment; do not condemn us; it is true that, before we came into power, we said there would be a general "hum" and a general increase of business; now we are in power we know we have not done what we promised. They ask for time, and their asking for time proves that they know that the prosperity they promised has not been realised. We have the evidence from their own mouths with which to condemn them. We hold them up as having violated their promises—in whole and detail—to every individual in the country, from the seaman on the deck to the simplest lumberman in the district woods, from the humblest housewife to the richest millionaire. We hold them responsible for having violated all their promises, and if the opinion of the honest people of this country were asked now, it would be very different to that which was given some time ago. I do not wish to follow the hon. gentleman who preceded me, at greater length. I wish, however, to make a remark as to the Tariff changes of the hon. the Minister of Finance. It was formerly held by an hon. gentleman opposite that one of the principal features of the Tariff should be permanence, and that it was wrong to make any changes. I remember that, when my hon. friend the member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) brought down his Budget and announced some changes to be made in the Tariff, the hon. the Minister of Railways denounced them, and contended that they would be demoralising to trade, and interfere seriously with the business of this country. But what do we find now? A Tariff in which there are over one hundred changes. Articles are classified in one form and then put in another form. How are we to know what this thing is if every year this Tariff, which was a marvel of excellence, is to be changed. It was marvellous last Session, and I suppose it is marvellous still, even in its much altered condition. The Tariff is not what it was last year. There are different articles on the free list that were dutiable last year. How are we to know what my hon. friend means by his National Policy. If he continues to change it during the next four or five years as he has changed it this year, perhaps it will resolve itself into "incidental Protection;" perhaps we will get back to Free-trade, the point at which the hon. gentleman started in his own Province. Perhaps he takes this way of settling back to his previous opinions, which, I have no doubt, his better judgment apprises him are right and proper still. But this marvellous Tariff had to be amended. The emendations have been submitted to us, and some of them are surprising in their nature. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) referred to the duty on wool. There is no doubt that duty was imposed to try and convince the farmers that their interests would not be overlooked. Does the hon. gentleman (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) suppose that there is a single farmer in Ontario so dull of comprehension as not to know that that duty was a delusion and a snare; that the kinds of wool mentioned are never imported into Canada? I venture to say that the hon. gentleman will not collect 15 farthings from that source during next year. Why should we send to any other part of the continent for wool grown at our own doors? It is one of the most transparent devices conceivable to delude an honest people by promising them the substance, and fulfilling that promise with a shadow. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that the National Policy is as popular as it was when brought down in 1879, and they say that, as a result of that policy, everybody is hopeful—that the lumberman is hopeful, the farmer is hopeful, the manufacturer is hopeful, and who is not hopeful? Anyone who followed the hon. the Finance Minister through his Budget Speech, must have seen that one gentleman at least was not hopeful. Never did any Minister bring down a Budget to a legislative body that gave such evidence of depression as the hon. the Finance Minister himself. If he was hopeful, his voice, manner and gesture did not indicate it. On the contrary he gave the most unmistakeable evidence that, if he had possibly relieved the depression of the industries of the country, he was himself labouring under some kind of depression. We have indications that the National Policy is not as popular as the hon. gentleman maintained it is. We had a general election in the Province of Ontario last June, and that election to my mind had a significance. Let me quote from a few speeches made during the campaign to substantiate my position. Mr. Meredith, leader of the Opposition, took the ground that the National Policy was in issue—one of the great issues before the people. These are his words:

"One reason why the Ontario Government should be condemned was because they had taken a determined stand against the National Policy. He believed that, when the 5th of June came, they would give the same verdict they gave on the 17th September."

Is there any hon. gentleman who was a higher authority on the popular cry in Ontario than the leader of the Opposition? But we have some further evidence as to what the question at issue was; some other gentleman gave an expression of opinion on the subject. On nomination day in Toronto, the Hon. Mr. Morris said "it was clear, beyond all peradventure, that the battle must necessarily be fought on the same line as it was on the 17th September." Then, here is what the

Toronto Mail, a good authority on some questions, said: "If they desire fair play to the National Policy, they must shut their ears to the charmer, charm he never so wisely." Then the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) at the amphitheatre, in Toronto, said, referring to his Tariff: "Let them as electors do their duty in such a way as to sustain this policy." In the Mail's report of Sir Charles Tupper's speech at Hamilton, he used the following words:—"He knew too well that at such a crisis they were so patriotic that they would sustain the unanimous decision rendered by the country on the 17th September last." But they did not do so in the city of Hamilton. There there was another gentleman—I think hon. gentlemen opposite know something about him—Sir John A. Macdonald, who said at Toronto: "In opposing Mr. Mowat and his Government they were fighting the battle of the National Policy just as much as they did on the 17th September." Here we have this statement, in strong and emphatic terms, from the leader of the Opposition in Ontario, and we have it again from the hon. the leader of the House, that the issue on the 5th June last was, as far as the Conservative party was concerned, the same as on the 17th September. What interest had my hon. friend from St. John in the Local Politics of Ontario? Was it necessary for him to air his eloquence in Toronto in order that the electors might become acquainted with him? Not at all. He was going to reach into their pockets by means of the Customs Tariff, and wished to bolster up the National Policy. What did he know about the Local politics of Ontario? Perhaps as much as he knows about the politics of Timbuctoo. Was it necessary for the hon. member for Cumberland to go and interest himself in the politics of Ontario? Not at all. Those hon. gentlemen united and went to urge the people that the battle must be fought out on the same line as in the previous September. But the electors understood that question perhaps as well as they did. Take the city of Toronto. In September the majority was 1,826; on the 5th June it was 125. This was a reaction, but perhaps the hon. gentleman would call it sustaining the National Policy. In the city of Hamilton, we find that on the 17th September the Conservative candidate had a majority of 498, and on the 5th June the Reform candidate was elected by a majority of 62.

MR. MACKENZIE: There was no knight there.

MR. ROSS: The night had come and gone and it had become clear day. There was a knight before the day of election, but the sunshine succeeded it. Do hon. gentlemen feel now that there is a reaction in the Province? They chose the battle cry themselves, and on that cry they went to the country and flung their flag to the wind, and asked the Conservative party to rally around it and sustain the National Policy. But from the different counties of Ontario came back the answer, clear and unmistakeable: We want nothing of your National Policy." The people were unequivocal in their expressions of condemnation. But we need not disturb the few years they will sit on the Treasury Benches by forebodings of premature decline; we need not embarrass them thus early in their career; their sad fate will overtake them quickly enough.

MR. PLUMB: Hear, hear.

MR. ROSS: My hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) has an exceedingly large margin in his county. I think I can count it on the fingers of my right hand, but he will find it growing smaller by degrees, and beautifully less, until his limping hexameters will be heard no more in the land. My hon. friend had better beware. There is a day of reckoning, and even the sublime effrontery with which he addresses the House must come to an end. The grave, which I know he is not prepared to fill, is already dug for him. We may be called at any moment to chant his requiem, and may even now, I think, regard him as politically dead. I will not trouble the House with many further remarks. I wish to say that we must remember that the resources of the country are limited; that our 4,000,000 of people can be so overburdened with taxation as to depress their prosperity and interfere with their comfort; and I warn hon. gentlemen opposite that, unless the system of extravagance which they have inaugurated, for it stands upon every page and in every line of every page of their Estimates, is curtailed in some way, we will be so far involved, we will be so burdened with taxation that the prosperity of the country must be crippled, and our resources, great as they are, overtaxed. To burden this country with an increased expenditure for Public Works beyond what it is able to bear is, to my mind, a serious matter. In 1876, I moved a resolution in connection with the Pacific Railway, asking the Government, of which I was a supporter, not to go on more rapidly with that line than could be done without increasing the burdens of taxation. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will be recreant to the trust reposed in them, if they so overburden the country with taxation, in any shape or form, as to cripple the resources of this people, and posterity will execrate the day when the Conservative party was placed in power. There is another subject in regard to which I must warn the hon. gentlemen. If they inaugurate a system of trade which is retaliatory in its character, as the present is designed to be, our neighbours will be disposed to retaliate in kind, which would alienate us and disturb those close commercial relations which exist between us. I tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that they are inflicting an injury upon the trade of this country, which an opposite policy will not, perhaps, remove. We prospered under the Reciprocity Treaty. Why? Because we had uninterrupted commercial relations with the American States; the prosperity we gained was due to the freedom of trade between the two countries. Can the hon. gentlemen hope to be wiser than the Parliament of Canada was at that time, and can they hope for prosperity from an opposite course? Can they hope, by damming up the channels of trade—by interfering with every branch of trade and commerce—with every useful occupation and calling in the Dominion—can they expect, by a vicious system of Tariff, to develop the resources of the country, and add to that prosperity we should secure by a free system. It is not possible by the very nature of things. The more articles you tax, the more vicious you make it, the more you recede from the safe principles of sound economy, and the more you fly in the face of those lessons taught by the great political economists of England, and, if hon. gentlemen opposite are wiser than the gentlemen who taught the people of England political economy, we are very much mistaken as to the sources of England power. I warn them, in the first place, against abnormal expenditure for Public Works; and, secondly, against the diversion of trade from natural to artificial channels; and, thirdly, against any tendency to disturb the peace and harmony prevailing among the different Provinces. We have a great territory, extending between two oceans, capable of sustaining a population of thirty or forty millions. We have a country of great resources, which we can rightly and honestly advertise in the market of Europe as one in which the emigrant will find a comfortable home. If we so hamper our commerce with vicious regulations that the emigrant will find no great advantage on this side of the Atlantic, what inducement will he have to settle amongst us? If everything he consumes is taxed more heavily here than at home, his disposition to settle among us may be changed, and we shall not be able to secure that large addition to our population which, under a more favourable system of trade, we might obtain. What hon. gentlemen should do is by every possible means to make this a desirable country to live in, by a better system of Customs regulations. I hear hon. gentlemen cheer ironically the words "cheaper country." I mean that condition of things in which business is not wantonly interfered with, and the wheels of commerce clogged by vexatious Customs regulations. This is the true protective policy, and, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to encourage a policy of that kind, I am heartily with them, and disposed to sustain them at every stage. So far as they wander from what I believe to be sound principles of political economy, as regards expenditure, so far as they are disposed to hamper trade and interfere with free commerce between Canada and the neighbouring country, they will find in me an uncompromising opponent, and disposed not to accept the remedies they propose for the disease in the body politic, one not disposed to give them any countenance in their attempt to delude and mislead the people of Canada.

Mr. McCALLUM moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at

Monday, 15th March, 1880.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. HOLTON.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Now that the presentation of petitions is finished, it is my painful duty to rise to ask this House to adjourn. It is with heartfelt regret and sorrow, amounting to a shock, that I heard yesterday that an old and respected member of Parliament—one who has been with us for years—is no more. It seems but a few hours ago that we had seen him full of life, full of vigour, in the maturity of his judgment, in excellent apparent health, and carrying out from day to day the useful career which he had promised to himself when he first entered Parliament, and which he had faithfully carried out to the end. I feel, Sir, that the motion that I make as an humble testimony for my own part of the regard which we all feel for him, comes with peculiar fitness from myself. We had never been politically of the same party. We have always been drawn up in Parliamentary conflict in opposite ranks, but during all that time, though conflicting, we had, I am proud now and happy to say, and happy to remember, uninterruptedly a great personal friendship. I knew and valued his good qualities, and he, perhaps, in some degree returned the affectionate regard which I always had for him. It was arranged across the floor, and it pains me now to repeat it, that he entered into that discussion that we should put an end to the practice of adjourning the House on the death of any one of its body except in very exceptional cases. I, Sir, think this is an exceptional case. It is not the ordinary one of a member, one of our body, disappearing in the course of nature; it is not the ordinary case of our knowing that a place we have seen occupied by him will hereafter be seen occupied by another; but it presses upon me in this case as if we had seen him fall, as if we had seen him die in the chair, which I now see vacant before me. I feel the shock so greatly, and I feel that every member of this House also is so struck by it, that we could not, for the soul of us, profitably enter into any discussion, into any Parliamentary business, with this recent bereavement pressing upon us. I have known that gentleman for many years; I knew him as a business man before he entered Parliament; I was connected with him in business relations; I had most intimate business relations with that gentleman, and I can vouch for what all the world vouched for, the unswerving uprightness and honesty of purpose of that gentleman in every relation of life, private, social, commercial, business and political. He, Sir, held a unique position in the Parliament of Canada. Although a strong party man, and sometimes, perhaps, from my party point of view, too strongly actuated by party motives, he never wavered from the probity of his judgment and his warm affection for his country. He held himself aloof from the bitterest struggles of party, and we all, on this side, looked with confidence to him in matters where the honour, the dignity and the prosperity of this Dominion, and of the Province with which he was connected before the Dominion existed, were concerned. He was holding a position in which his disinterested usefulness for the country was more distinguished than at any other period of his life. He had survived much of the hardened bitterness of party conflict. He thought only of the interests of the country, and he prided, and justly prided, himself on being a great Parliamentary authority. His utility to this House, his utility to every member of this House, and his usefulness to the country in that regard, was almost if not quite unequalled in either branch of the Legislature. I speak, of course, not in a party sense, when I say that his mind was an exceedingly Conservative one, especially that affecting vested interests, affecting private rights, he was always found protecting those interests and those rights, and he resisted any and all attempts to override them by any revolutionary, any hasty, any heroic steps, if I may use a mediæval expression. He always leant towards the side of protecting the rights of property. As we all know, he fought the battle of freedom, political and constitutional. I know what the regrets of his political friends in this House must be. I know how useful he was to them. I know what a great loss his death is to them. But I say, from the sincerity of my heart, that I think the loss to the whole House is as great as the loss to his own political friends. And if it be a loss to this House, how great, how serious must be the blow to his personal friends. I have known him so long, nearly, I may say, an age, knowing him from youth upwards. He was one of the last, if I may use the expression, of the old party, which used to meet years and years ago in the old Parliament; and I feel, to use the language of Edmund Burke, "what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue." Sir, I think we ought to make this an exceptional case. I feel that were any member to rise to-day and enter into any discussion of importance, he would see that empty chair; he would think of that kindly countenance, and he would feel with me that we ought to show respect to his memory by adjourning the business of this House to-day.

MR. MACKENZIE: I may say, Sir, that everyone will join heartily in the very just remarks made by the hon. gentleman opposite, and especially those who have long felt Mr. Holton's influence and knew his excellent personal qualities. It is impossible for those who have long been his associates in public life, to estimate the great loss that has been sustained by his own party, by the whole House and by the country. I look upon his death at this moment, as it would be at any time, as a national calamity, and I feel that anything we can do, as his old colleagues in this House, to convey a sense of the impression we entertain of his great worth to the country, and especially towards his bereaved family, should be done. I feel myself utterly unable to say—

MR. LAURIER: If in view of this great calamity, this great national calamity, I were permitted to speak with personal feelings, I would say that there is no one in this House who has more than myself reason to lament the death of Mr. Holton. It was my privilege when I was a very young man to become a friend of Mr. Holton; and from that moment up to the moment of his untimely death, many have been the occasions I have been able to appreciate the many noble qualities which endeared him to all those who came in contact with him. Members of this House who knew him only as a public man, who could judge of him only from what took place on the floor of the House, could appreciate his noble public qualities—they could appreciate the loftiness of mind that prompted him in everything he did—they could appreciate his entire sense of and devotion to duty, the noble manner in which he carried out his convictions of duty. They could appreciate also the vigour, exempt from bitterness, the moderation, exempt from weakness, with which he always defended his convictions. But they did not know the whole man. Those, on the other hand, who had the advantage of his personal friendship, knew that his private virtues were on a par with his public virtues. They could appreciate his unflinching attachment to his friends, his strong domestic affection, his large and tender heart, which revealed itself in everything whether great or small. He is now no more, and the best tribute that could be paid to his memory are the words which have fallen from the hon. the First Minister's lips, "that his loss would be almost as much felt by those whose views he combated as by those whose opinions he upheld." Though engaged all his life in active political struggles, though all his life a strong party man, yet there is satisfaction in the thought that in this country, where political strife entails much bitterness, he has not left one single enemy behind him. His loss will be mourned alike by his friends and political foes, and all feel to-day that there is a gloom in this hall which darkens it and which must darken it not only for this Session but for many Sessions to come. Mr. Speaker, by none will his loss be more keenly felt than by his fellow-countrymen of French origin. All French Canadians, irrespective of party, feel that a man has departed from among us who was the connecting link between many of the discordant elements in our midst. Our Province has been the home of his choice and adoption. He had lived all his life among us, and mingled continually with us, and we always looked upon him as one of ourselves. He lived a man, who, in any station of life would have naturally sided with the few against the many. His nature also prompted him on many occasions to side with us French Canadians; and his name in our Province has become a household word, as also wherever the French language is spoken in Canada. He is now no more, and all I can say is that his loss is irreparable.

MR. WRIGHT: As one who has been in the Legislature with the late lamented member for Chateauguay, since 1863, I trust I may be permitted to add a few words to the very hearty eulogium passed on that gentleman by the First Minister, and to place my last tribute, a simple spray of Ottawa pine, on the coffin of a gentleman whom we all admired, esteemed and respected. So sudden has been the shock, so extraordinary has been our bereavement, that I do not believe this country or this House can realise the extent of our loss. We have had many sad bereavements in this House, as many of the old members can well remember. We suffered a sad bereavement when the late Mr. McGee passed away, when Sir George Cartier departed, and others of our eminent statesmen went to their rest; but, with the exception of Mr. McGee, perhaps not one has given us such a shock as that just experienced. We had in the former cases some premonition, some shadow of the impending calamity; but in this case, it burst on us in a manner sudden and extraordinary. Remembering, as we do, the excellent gentleman gone to his rest—remembering what an active part he took in this House, and that, with the late John Hillyard Cameron, he was one to whom all sides appealed with extreme confidence, the loss is one which can hardly be repaired. Under a cold and somewhat serious aspect, he concealed the hot lava of human affection; and we, men of the rank and file, who did not take the front rank in discussion, knew we might safely appeal to him for advice and assistance on every possible occasion; and so, as our own leader has said, the loss in his death is not simply that of a party, but a loss, before all, to the country. We, as humble soldiers of the Conservative party, have been arrayed against him, and have differed with him politically, but that will not prevent our placing a modest wreath on his coffin and saying the last sad word, "Farewell."

MR. LANGEVIN: I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without uniting my voice in the language which is most familiar to me, and which was so fluently spoken by the lamented gentleman who has passed away, to those of the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition in the expression of the regret and grief which we feel at the news of the death of our lamented colleague. Mr. Holton was a member of Parliament for more than a quarter of a century, and during nearly the whole of that term I have had the honour and satisfaction of sitting in Parliament with him; and although we were by circumstances placed in different political parties, yet the hon. member never dealt with questions in such a way as to be unable on the following day to meet his opponents and to grasp their hands as on the evening before. I, for my part, am aware that not only is his death a great loss to the House, and especially to his party, but I further consider it a very heavy loss to our Province of Quebec. Mr. Holton did not belong to our political party, but we claimed him as one of us, as a distinguished citizen who did honour to our Province. I can but concur in all that was said by the hon. leader of the Government when he expressed, in such well-chosen terms, how great was the grief which we felt when we heard of the death of the hon. member for Chateauguay; I can but say that this death is a terrible blow to all of us, and that it should warn us, especially those of us who have completed our fiftieth year, that our turn may soon come, and that we should all so act that those who remain behind us may be able to say that which we can now say of Mr. Holton—that he has not left a single enemy behind him.

MR. COURSOL: As the representative of one of the important divisions of the city of Montreal, where the death of our esteemed and regretted colleague is now the cause of general mourning, I feel that I should be wanting to my duty and untrue to the sentiments of my own heart, were I not, Mr. Speaker, with your kind permission, to lay my tribute of eulogy and regret on the freshly opened grave of a citizen, of a friend, so highly valued by us all, and whom I have known so well. The Hon. Mr. Holton died like a soldier in the thick of the fight; he died at his post, where, for so many years, he discharged so faithfully, so honestly, and with so much self-devotion, his duties as a representative of the people. All those who have known the Hon. Mr. Holton, as the citizens of Montreal have known him, and as I have known him myself, are well aware that in his public life as well as his private life, he was frank, loyal and sincere in his convictions; of this he everywhere, and at all times, gave proof; and the French Canadian people will never forget the services he has rendered them. He knew how to be just, and on many occasions rose superior to prejudice in defending the legitimate rights of the French-Canadians, under circumstances of difficulty, when other men would not have dared to act as he did. French Canadians feel that they owe him a debt of gratitude; and I venture to say, on their behalf, that his death will leave a void which will long be felt by them in the ranks of their friends of a different origin. As a citizen in his public life, as a man in his private life, a volume would scarce suffice to narrate all his noble deeds and describe his many virtues. As a citizen he lent his aid to every work of public charity; and the poor whom he assisted could alone tell his numberless acts of private charity, towards which his heart was ever naturally inclined. The poor, therefore, will bitterly deplore his loss. I myself have been cognisant of acts of benevolence accomplished by him in secret, under circumstances when many another man would have courted publicity. To do good silently was his greatest pleasure, as it brings to-day, no doubt, his just reward. I should have wished for time to prepare myself to speak of the virtues of so good a man—of the merits of the great citizen whom death has just snatched away from his family and his country. But I felt that I must not hesitate on this occasion, but give expression to the sentiments inspired by this most sudden death—sentiments which, I feel convinced, are shared by all the inhabitants of Canada, and more especially in the Province of Quebec. At this very moment telegraphic despatches are being received from every part of the country, expressing the deep and widespread regret caused by this calamity amongst the entire population of Canada. I think that the House, by enabling its members to attend the funeral of a man so distinguished as Mr. Holton—a man who was so truly a patriot—will not only discharge its just duty, but offer a well-deserved tribute of respect to his memory. I am sure also that the city of Montreal will, in this instance, do as she has ever done for eminent citizens.

MR. GAULT: I may be allowed, as a member for one of the divisions of Montreal, to express my sincere regret at the sudden death of the hon. member for Chateauguay, which took us all by surprise and shocked the whole community. The name of Mr. Holton is esteemed in every household in the land. I dare not attempt to give full expression to my feelings on this sad occasion, on the sudden departure of our esteemed colleague, a better man than whom never lived. His death is a sad loss, not only to his constituency and Montreal, but to the House and the whole country.

MR. BÉCHARD: Let me be permitted to unite with those who have preceded me in rendering a last tribute to our late distinguished colleague, whose sudden and unexpected death has plunged the House into mourning and filled it with consternation. Since 1854, when he entered Parliamentary life, Mr. Holton has played a most important part and has filled a most eminent position in the political world of Canada. Strongly attached to his political principles, he had likewise the art of expressing them: and striving to bring about their ascendancy, not only with great lucidity of intellect and great power of reasoning, but also with that tone of conviction, free from all ostentation, that simplicity, that urbanity of manner, which, while it made him beloved by his friends, at the same time commanded the respect and esteem of his opponents. It is no small thing to hear it said on every side in this House that that great man, after a Parliamentary career of more than twenty-six years, does not leave a single enemy behind him. The country has lost a great man, a distinguished patriot. But the loss to this House is a still severer one. The important position which he filled here, and in relation to which he had become a most competent authority, made him one of the most useful and distinguished members of this Parliament. We shall long feel the loss of the counsels of that wise experience which had caused him to be justly denominated the Nestor of the House.

MR. PLUMB: I feel that every private member of the House has sustained a great loss in the death of the hon. member for Chateaugay, and that this calamity will be a sufficient excuse for me to join in the general expression of mourning, and the general eulogiums which are uttered here upon him who has just departed from among us. It is fitting that we should speak of him here in this Chamber, where so great a part of his intellectual life was developed and manifested, by which he was best known to the people at large, and will be longest remembered and most revered by them and by us his sorrowing opponents. It was but a few hours ago since the gentleman, whose death we are now mourning, seemed in full possession of life and vigour, and was actively attending to the public duties which he discharged with a strictness, and with a fidelity which was an example to every one in this House. It is but a few hours ago since I sat with him on the Committee of Banking and Commerce, where he brought, as he always brought to the Committees which he belonged, the resources of a well framed mind and a judgment which was eminently clear and Conservative. I can add nothing more in that respect to what has already been said with much feeling and eloquence by my hon. friend the leader of the Government. I had a very long and pleasant conversation with Mr. Holton just previous to his death, in which he referred to the lamented Sir George E. Cartier, and to some passages of their public life together. I thought him then in the full possession of his health and his vigour, and no one would have dreamed, while listening to his animated discourse, that we had not the assurance that he would not remain for many years among us, an honour to this House and an honour to the country, and one of the most useful members that has ever sat in any deliberate body in Canada. When he parted with his friends on Saturday night, the impending shadow was upon him. In another hour or two however, he had gone over to that great majority to which we are all sooner or later to be drawn. I may say, while I stand here, that I have lost in him a kind, generous and tender friend. One with whom I have been in the most intimate social relations, even since I had the honour of taking a seat in this House, one from whom I have received kindly advice, one from whom I have received great information and instruction, and one in whose society I always found great profit and pleasure. He possessed and had the gift of clearly imparting a great fund of practical knowledge, drawn from extensive experience and acute observation, and study of men and of events. He had been a constant and discriminating reader during his maturer life, and had acquired and assimilated in his mind, a varied and extensive store of sound English literature. He was specially versed in the literature which is most interesting to a people, who, like us, are forming institutions upon the basis of constitutional and popular liberty, that which bears upon the momentous Parliamentary struggles which agitated England during and subsequent to the reign of Charles the First, and culminated in the great events that secured Parliamentary liberty to the British Empire. In the history of those stormy and sanguinary conflicts he had an accurate speciality of knowledge, and it was a favourite theme of his conversation. The great ability, ease and clearness with which he grasped public affairs, enabled him rapidly to form just conclusions, and to enunciate opinions which were always valuable, and which will long continue to be quoted in this House and elsewhere. He had extensive knowledge of Parliamentary practice and Parliamentary history and precedents, and through his retentive memory, he was capable of readily applying principles to circumstances, and of forming through his clear impartial judgment an eminently just conclusion. I met him late in his Parliamentary life. Whatever may have been his previous courses of thought and action, he had then sunk the controversial in the judicial habit. What he did here was eminently in that direction. We, on this side of the House, feel that we have lost in him one who can scarcely be replaced, in view of the broad and competent manner in which he dealt with subjects that were constantly coming up. We all know that in certain lines of legislation, there was no man who could be so safely appealed to. We feel that in every way this House and the country have sustained a loss which is irreparable. To my friends on the opposite side, I would say this a time when we can meet together and lay aside party disputes and differences in a common sympathy and a common sorrow. To them I would say that we fully appreciate the feelings with which they must have assembled in this House to-day, and have looked upon yonder vacant chair. To the country we may say from this place where we know him best, and where we can best appreciate him, that a loss has befallen them which is almost incalculable. But, Sir, there is a deeper affliction still, which I will not venture to touch upon. I will not venture to cross the threshold where private griefs are hidden from the public eye, but I will say this that no man within my knowledge more truly "wore the white crown of a blameless life." Perhaps there is scarcely any one among us who, if suddenly called upon to make up and close the great record of his life, would find so few pages which he would wish to blot as Luther Hamilton Holton.

MR. MOUSSEAU: Mr. Speaker, when the intelligence of the sudden death of Mr. Holton spread throughout the city, grief was depicted on many faces and many a stern countenance was wet with tears. It looked as though everyone had lost a father or a friend. The spectacle we witness to-day is a still more moving one; we have seen the hon. the leader of the Opposition—overwhelmed by grief caused through the death of his hon. friend—unable to finish the eulogy he had begun. We have seen the hon. the Prime Minister praise the regretted dead in accents almost stifled by emotion. All those who have spoken have been the echoes of the sentiment of profound sorrow felt by all. That sentiment does honour to the House, but it reflects greater honour still on the man who is its object, and whose sudden death has caused so much grief in this House and throughout the whole country. I think I may sum up the leading characteristics of Mr. Holton by saying that, if on this day we are so deeply moved, if we are all so overwhelmed by grief, it is that Mr. Holton was for those of his own age a brother, and for those younger than himself a father. That is the true explanation of the feeling which has manifested itself in this House and throughout the country. His was a great character; and he was possessed of noble, rare and precious qualities as a public man and a statesman. Sincerely convinced of the correctness of his own views, of the excellence of his opinions, the soundness of his principles, he sought to make them prevail without provoking the least bitterness, or any ill-feeling in those who differed with him. Like many great men of whom history speaks, Mr. Holton did good by example rather than by precept. If a fault was committed, he attributed it to the weakness of our common nature rather than to a bad intention. In his judgment, patriotism required two things: that one should live chiefly for the country and in a subordinate manner for the party. In his case, political alliances were made always to yield to the greater interests of the country; and he has been seen nobly to take up the defence of a cause, although by doing so he would have to separate himself from some of his friends. A man who acted out his political life in this way, who was so liberally endowed by nature, must inevitably leave behind many deep regrets. But along with these regrets he has bequeathed an important and wholesome lesson for the young men about to launch into public careers. His great and noble example will be the consolation of those who have lost him, especially of the members of the Opposition, and of their chief who was his intimate friend. I have said that to his equals in Parliamentary experience he was a brother, to young members he was in truth a political father. To whatever side of the House a member was attached, he was always sure of finding in Mr. Holton a friend, a faithful counsellor, who never refused, without regard to party, to give the benefit of his great experience and his wisdom to all who came to consult him. Mr. Holton has ever been found to be a citizen animated by an unselfish patriotism, and a true christian love for his neighbours. By speaking in this way of this distinguished man, I am only fulfilling a duty specially incumbent on the younger members, for I truly believe that with Mr. Holton we shall lose more than the older members will.

MR. TASSÉ: I may perhaps be allowed to add my humble share to the eloquent and unquestionable tributes of respect to which we have just listened in relation to the sudden and lamentable decease of one of the most useful, one of the most remarkable, one of the most experienced of the members of this House, the Hon. Mr. Holton. Of all the qualities of that lamented gentleman which commanded our esteem and our admiration, there is one which I look upon as among the greatest, as one of those that did more honour to his head and to his heart, that of the friend of youth, that of filling the position of the friend and the adviser of the younger members of this House. He did not confine his counsel, marked, as a rule, by great wisdom, and the result of a prolonged study of men and things, to those only who worshipped at his own political shrine, and who thereby had a claim upon his sympathy, but he dispensed them with like benevolence to those who had enrolled themselves under a standard to which he bore no allegiance, thus showing that egotism—the reef towards which party feeling usually leads—had left no mark on his great and generous nature. And above all it is that I feel that I am but yielding to a sense of gratitude when I am impelled to address the House on this occasion in a tongue which, I remember with pleasure, was not devoid of charm for the lamented member for Chateauguay. The scene which we have just beheld—mournful as is the cause which gave rise to it—is not the less a beautiful one, is not the less worthy of admiration, is not the less grand. History has handed down to us the name of a celebrated warrior who not only wept the death of his rival, but erected a statue to his memory. So we have just witnessed a not less touching sight, not unusual it is true in our Parliamentary halls, which is a eulogy on the institutions which could inspire it, a eulogy on the men who took part in it, and, above all, a eulogy on him who was deserving of so unanimous a testimony of respect. We have had proof that however lively, however warm, however bitter even our political contests sometimes are, yet passion never so far blinds us as to cause us to fail to recognise in a loyal opponent the most admirable gifts with which he has been endowed by the Creator, intellect, rectitude and integrity, when those gifts are united in so eminent a manner as they were in the case of him whom we are now lamenting. Mr. Holton was one of the few eminent minds of whom it might be said, "We contend against him, but we are proud of him." We see fall upon his opening grave the tears of those who were his companions in arms, who fought by his side amid varying vicissitudes for a cause which is not mine, but which he sincerely believed to be the best; but we have also seen men who have been his opponents for more than five and twenty years, such as the right hon. leader of the Government, give evidence of grief no less deep, and of respect no less high, for the memory of him who but yesterday, as it were—a new and striking proof of the instability of all things human—took part in our proceedings with his accustomed energy and ability. It has been rightly said that the Liberal party, of which Mr. Holton was one of the leaders, and that this House, of which he was a luminary, have suffered a severe loss. If, notwithstanding the great services rendered to his party in the course of a long Parliamentary career, we for a few months only assumed the heavy responsibilities of office, certain it is that he always exercised great influence and great authority among his party. With the independence of mind which characterised him, he did not shrink on several occasions from blaming the conduct of those of his friends whom he considered to be wandering from the right course. Loyal to England, strongly attached to her institutions, the admirable working of which he so well understood, desirous of preserving intact the tie which binds us to her, he did not hesitate, some few years ago, to condemn a movement in favour of independence, which, in his opinion, could only end in annexation, and in that way in the destruction of our national autonomy. A friend of liberty of conscience, and desirous that harmony and good-will should reign among our people, he strongly reprobated every action, every movement which might tend to disturb religious peace, recognising the fact that that is the surest foundation for the stability and greatness of this country. And no one has forgotten that on a celebrated occasion, when he was sitting at your right hand, Mr. Speaker, he energetically denounced a political manifesto, which, at the time, resounded painfully, and which he considered to be of a nature to light up religious warfare, the worst scourge which can ever desolate Canada. This is one of the finest deeds in his career; he will ever be honoured for it in history, and it enables us to declare that Mr. Holton has deserved well from the entire country. It was more than a good action, it was a great lesson of wisdom and patriotism. And he owed it to his spirit of toleration and conciliation that for many years he enjoyed the confidence of an electoral district, two-thirds of the population of which were French and Catholics, the county of Chateauguay, which in its time thus gave a convincing proof of our liberality towards our fellow-citizens of a different race. It is not for me, Sir, to pronounce judgment on the various acts of Mr. Holton's political career, in relation to which a diversity of opinion may exist; I wish on this occasion to imitate the brevity which he liked to cultivate in connection with his speeches; but I cannot refrain from repeating that his premature decease leaves a void in this House which it will be hard to fill. Within a few years, death has made serious ravages in our ranks, even among our leading politicians; it has removed from our midst McGee, Howe and Cartier, to speak of but these three alone—at the highest point of their merit and of their glory; and now, remorseless as ever, without the slightest premonition, it has suddenly cut short the career of a man who occupied an enviable position, an eminent position in the Councils of the nation. Though those great patriots, who devoted their energies in different ways to their country's good, while inspired by the same high motives, have ceased to instruct us with their enlightenment and experience; though the State must in future be deprived of their valuable help in emergencies through which it must pass, let us at least learn from their example—to use an expression of the lamented dead, in a celebrated debate—never to despair of the country, and let us so act that the good teachings which they have left behind them, will still be useful to the country by serving as a guide to those to whom is entrusted the control of its destiny.

MR. MACDOUGALL: I do not rise for the purpose of adding merely to the language of eulogy upon the deceased member of this House, but as an old political friend, as a colleague of his in the Government of Canada, as one who has for thirty years been on terms of intimacy and in close political sympathy with the late hon. member for Chateauguay, I think it would be proper to make one or two observations with reference to his position in this House and in the country before this motion is carried. The hon. gentleman belonged to the old school. He belonged to a class of politicians who are rapidly passing away—men of deep convictions, of invincible courage in defending them, and always ready to make private sacrifices for the public good. I look about this House, and I see very few faces of members who belonged to the Parliament of Canada when he became a member of it, and when I, as a young man, had the honour to rank myself among his political friends. From 1849 up to the time of Confederation, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I had the privilege—and it was indeed a privilege—to gather political encouragement, to learn political wisdom from the more mature experience, the better furnished mind, of the hon. member for Chateauguay. I do not know, I cannot call to mind, any important question of politics or of legislation or government, during all that period, with reference to which I held any different view from the hon. gentleman. At Confederation, he took the view that the country was not ripe for such a change, and he took that view honestly; he regarded the question from the standpoint of a patriot. He had apprehensions not only that the country was not ripe for the change, but that it would involve us in political and financial embarrassments and dangers; and I am not quite sure that his apprehensions were without some good foundation. However, he accepted that which the country seemed to approve; and we can all bear witness that he has laboured and assisted by his labours in the improvement of our laws, and in securing the permanency and success of our institutions. His sudden removal impresses this House, and will impress the country, with a sorrowful feeling, for we have incurred a great and irreparable loss—a loss which this House will feel at every step, and in all its proceedings, and will sustain with intense regret. On account of his great familiarity with our institutions and the practice of Parliament, we have all found, when differences arose, that his judgment and advice could be safely followed; and we all bear witness that, notwithstanding his strong political feelings, when the question was one affecting the privileges or the honour of Parliament, he was always found true to his country and his duty, rising superior to partisan feelings or political bias. We have indeed sustained a great loss. It has fallen upon us suddenly. But, Sir, the younger members of this House will have the advantage—and I trust they will avail themselves of the advantage—of his career, which from the feelings that will be found to prevail throughout this Dominion, will show that, when a public man, in his place in Parliament, performs his duty earnestly and honestly; when he faithfully adheres to the principles which he avowed at the hustings, and redeems the pledges he may have made to his constituents, he will be appreciated and approved, and that in the end his country will do him justice.

THE LATE MR. HOLTEN.

MOTION TO ADJOURN.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As it is usual to adjourn on St. Patrick's Day, and as we know that a number of hon. members will be absent on a melancholy duty, I propose that, when the House adjourns to-night, it stand adjourned until Thursday, at three o'clock, p.m.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 77) To facilitate the detention and safe keeping, in certain cases, of persons convicted in the North-West Territories or District of Keewatin, and sentenced to imprisonment.—
(Mr. MacDonald, Pictou.)

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Ordered, That Government Business shall have precedence immediately after routine proceedings on Thursdays, during the remainder of the Session.—(Sir John A. Macdonald)

FISH INSPECTION.

RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed Resolutions (Mr. Baby) respecting the General Inspection Act, 1874, and the amending Act.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BABY: The object of the Bill it is proposed to base on these resolutions is to insert in the General Inspection Act of 1874, in the schedule of fees a fee for the inspection of smoked herrings. According to the law now in force, the fee for smoked herrings only applies to barrels and half barrels, and everybody conversant with the matter knows that smoked herrings are never put up otherwise than in boxes. This measure will meet the requirements of the trade, no doubt.

MR. ANGLIN: These resolutions have taken me by surprise. I have never heard any demand for an inspection of the kind. There is no difficulty in our market as to whether boxes are full or not. I know no reason why this impost should be placed upon the trade, or why persons should be obliged to submit their boxes for examination. I represent a district in which a large amount of herrings are taken, and I live in a city in which large quantities of smoked herrings are sold, but I never heard it said that there was any necessity for having such an examination as this. These inspections are always vexatious, and I hope the hon. Minister will pause before going further, and ascertain whether there is any need for the measure.

MR. LONGLEY: I think it is very desirable that there should be an inspection of smoked herrings. As near as I have been able to ascertain the sentiment of fishermen in respect to inspection, it seems to be somewhat divided, but I think the balance of opinion is much in favour of inspection. It is quite likely that the quality of the herrings would be improved under proper inspection. If, under a tax of 1c. or 1½c. per box, the quality should be improved to the extent probably of 5c. or 10c. per box, it is apparent that, instead of being a detriment to that particular industry, it will really be an advantage to the fishermen. I have no hesitation in saying, however, that I think a tax of 2c. per box for inspection is far too high. I have endeavoured to impress on the hon. Minister the same conviction, but it would seem that he has been largely influenced by the opinions of the Board of Trade. Now, with all deference to the valuable opinion of a body of men such as those constituting the Board of Trade, I think the fishermen themselves are likely to be better judges of what is a fair tax for inspection than any board of trade. These boxes are 18in. in length and 9in. in width. They are supposed to contain beside, a certain weight of fish. Strange to say, while the inspection has been talked about a good deal, and while inspectors have been appointed, the law has been left in such an indefinite condition that it was not known by the fishermen themselves or anybody else whether the inspection was compulsory or not, and if it was, what fee was to be imposed. There is nothing in the law to guide one in this matter, except the statement that the fee for the inspection per half barrel of herrings shall be 3c., and upon that assumption, I suppose, some have concluded that, if smoked herrings were inspected at all, the inspection fee would be 3c. Now, let us look at this matter from another standpoint. Under the law, it is not obligatory on the part of the inspector to inspect more than 10 boxes out of each 100 boxes, so that only 100 out of a 1,000 boxes would require to be inspected. Now, assuming that the fee imposed is put at 1c., the inspector has $1 practically for inspecting ten boxes of herrings, and $10 for inspecting 100 boxes. So I contend strenuously, in the interest of the fishermen themselves, and on the score of equity and justice, that the fee should not exceed at any rate 1½c. per box, and my own decided opinion is that it should not exceed 1c. per box; and I shall feel myself called upon to contend to the end that it shall not be made larger. And if it is placed at a higher rate than that, then you give the advantage to the inspector at the cost of the hard-working fisherman, because there is scarcely any industry that is more exhausting or arduous in its nature. I hope the hon. Minister will allow himself to be suitably impressed with the remarks that have been made. I do not think it is customary to put up many of these herrings in half boxes, and I was not aware that any were put up in quarter boxes. I should say, however, that 1c. per box and 1½c. per half box, would result in a very considerable advantage to the fisherman, in view of the standard and the quality of the fish being raised. Under those circumstances, no one would have occasion to find fault. This particular kind of fish are caught exclusively between Digby, on the west, and Annapolis Royal, on the east. They are caught on both sides of the river for a distance of nearly twenty miles, and for some years this has been an exceedingly profitable industry. I am told by some fishermen that the catch has been, in certain years, 25,000 boxes, but I apprehend that it has been very rarely that the catch has equalled that amount. These herrings are widely known for their excellent quality. They are sent largely to Glasgow, Scotland, in which market they sometimes realise a very high price. They vary in the locality in which they are caught from 40c. or 50c. to 80c. or 90c. per box. The average price is about 50c. or 60c. per box. I will not use the word protest, but I certainly shall most strenuously oppose the imposition fee of 2c. per box on those fish.

MR. GILLMOR: I suppose the fishermen in my constituency produce from two to three hundred thousand boxes of smoked herrings or they may be half boxes. Their market price of these herrings is rarely over 20c. per box, and I have often known them to fall as low as 10c. or 12c. If 1c. per box were put on these fish it would be an enormous tax. I have not had any conversation with my constituents upon this subject lately, but, when the matter was introduced some years ago, they were decidedly opposed to it. I do not consider that it is desirable, either in the interest of the fishermen or the purchaser, that this tax should be imposed. It will create another office at the expense of the fishermen. I cannot suppose that if this inspection is enforced, it will only be to the extent of 10 per cent. of the boxes, but presume every box should be inspected as every barrel of flour and fish is inspected, if any portion is inspected. I shall certainly oppose the measure in my humble way, because in my opinion there is no necessity for it.

MR. WELDON: I quite agree with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) that this tax would be a very heavy imposition on the people of the county of St. John and the other counties of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia bordering on the Bay of Fundy. It is a matter upon which I should like to communicate with my constituents for the purpose of ascertaining their views. I feel satisfied, however, that they will be opposed to this tax, and I fail to see, after listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley), what benefit is going to be derived from it.

MR. DOMVILLE: The hon. gentlemen desirous of protecting our industries are no doubt in the right. It cannot be expected that if inspection is to take place it can be done without someone paying for it. We must bear in mind that this inspection will enhance the value of these fish abroad. I only make this remark because there can be no wish on the part of anyone to oppress the trade of the country or to put the fishermen to a disadvantage. Whether the rate proposed is too much or not is another question.

MR. DOULL: I am not directly interested in this description of fish. I must say, however, that the smoked herrings which find their way into our market, although they must be of a coarser kind than the herring the hon. member for Annapolis referred to, are sold for 20c. a box, and frequently for less than that. I agree with the hon. member for Charlotte that the imposition of the proposed fee for inspection would be more of an injury than a benefit. Now, 2c. a box for inspection would be a very heavy tax, and in my opinion is an unnecessary tax. There is a good deal in what my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Longley) says, that the imposition of an inspection fee, and the necessity for inspection, would be a means of improving the quality of the fish. It would have that effect. But do not let us tax an industry for that purpose so as to cripple it, as it would be by imposing a tax of 2c. on what is sold for 15c. or 20c. I therefore express my disapproval of it, as I think it unnecessary and unfair.

MR. LONGLEY: I am not quite sure, but it is my impression that smoked fish, or any other sort of fish require to be inspected before being sold, and it were better that the inspection should take place where the fish are caught than where they are sold. It is quite true that a sale might be effected without any inspection, but, as a general rule, the purchaser would not feel himself safe in buying without inspection; and I think, with regard to these smoked herrings, as well as other kinds of fish, that they require to be inspected, and are usually inspected before they are sold, so that the tax may as well be imposed where caught as where sold after; so that I do not think any objection on that score amounts to much. If it were practicable, it certainly would seem to be quite fair to make a distinction as regards the inspection fee between fish worth 50c. or 60c. per box and those worth 20c. per box; and if the hon. Minister could see his way clearly to make a distinction—1c. on fish caught in Annapolis Basin and $\frac{1}{2}$ c. on those caught at Grand Manan and other points—it would seem only reasonable and right.

MR. BABY: The inspection fee mentioned in the resolutions before you, Mr. Chairman, is not imperative in the strict sense of the word, not more so than the other fees mentioned in the 68th section of the Act now in force are. It is only where there is a board of trade, through which an inspector is appointed, or through the Government, where there is no board of trade, that the inspection is to be made. The fee as recommended at the time by the Chamber of Commerce of Nova Scotia, was 3c. per box; and I put it down to 2c. only. However, after hearing what has fallen from hon. gentlemen, and particularly from the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), I ask for more time to examine the law; and I have no objection that more attention should be given to the subject, and that you should leave the Chair, Sir, for the present, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. LONGLEY: I understand the inspection is to be compulsory.

MR. BABY: Only where there is an inspector.

MR. LONGLEY: Then the whole thing hinges on an inspector being appointed. We should first decide whether the inspection should be made, and, if so, what would be a fair inspection fee. I do not think much could be gained by making provision for inspection without making it compulsory; because some catchers or curers say they do not care for inspection; they feel that their own reputation is sufficient to guard against putting up unsound fish; but the qualities of fish are likely to be considerably improved by proper inspection; and what we seek is, not to impose a tax on fishermen, but to do what would be a decided advantage to them by raising the standard of the fish.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As I understand it, these inspectors are only appointed on the recommendation of the board of trade, and these fees in the 68th clause are for the purpose of paying the expenses of inspection, so that the cost of this inspection shall not be thrown upon the Consolidated Revenue. I quite agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken, as to the principle upon which all inspections are based. It is of great importance that no bad article of trade should be allowed to go to a foreign country. A few such cases might destroy a large and prosperous trade. That is the principle of inspection. The only question here, therefore, is whether the fees are too high. If they are they should be reduced. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue has heard what has been said, and will give the subject due consideration.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue says this was at the instance of the Board of Trade of Nova Scotia. There is no Provincial Board; there is only a Board of Trade at Halifax.

MR. BABY: I stated that many representations were made in this direction. There was a flaw in the law which, whilst providing that the inspection should take place, mentioned no fee in this respect—this fee having, by an oversight, no doubt, been omitted from the schedule. There are several clauses in the Statute which say that the inspection of smoked herrings shall take place, and what will be the quality of the herrings submitted to such inspection, but no remuneration provided for the inspector. These representations were made by a number of gentlemen from the Lower Provinces, who stated that the inspection would enhance the price of herrings, principally of those which are prepared for exportation.

MR. ANGLIN: If these resolutions are passed, this inspection fee will be compulsory clearly. At present there are inspectors at all the principal fishing ports which are places of export, and the law gives those inspectors the right to inspect the fish. In no case would the election be left to the fishermen or those engaged in the business. Upon the representation probably of a member of this House, where there is no board of trade, the Government would appoint the inspector, and the inspection would become compulsory. It should be borne in mind, therefore, that, if we adopt the principle embodied in these resolutions, we are adopting the principle of compulsory inspection. With regard to other kinds of fish intended for exportation, it may be desirable that they should be classified carefully, so that a proper reputation may be established in the foreign markets. The poorer kinds of this fish bring such a small price that there is no inducement to export them. The only smoked herrings that will ever find a market abroad will be those which are carefully selected by the parties shipping the fish. The hon. Minister will see that those of us who represent fishing districts are not prepared to express approval of this measure; and I hope before further action is taken the House will have ample time to consider this matter. It is a subject we need not quarrel over; we all wish to do what is best calculated to promote the general interests of those districts. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who represents the largest number of persons engaged in any part of the Dominion in the herring fishery, says the proposed measure would be regarded by the fishermen as an onerous tax. I think this matter, in view of these facts, should not be hastily dealt with.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In the compulsory clause respecting fish, nothing is said about smoked fish, so, unless something to that effect should be introduced, based on the resolution, it would not affect the fish spoken of.

MR. ANGLIN: In that case I have no objection at all.

MR. LONGLEY: The inspection of pickled fish is compulsory.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, but unless that clause is made compulsory by inserting "smoked fish," the inspection would not be compulsory in respect of that class of fish.

MR. BABY: For the information of the House, I will repeat in French the explanations given before. The law, as it exists at present, provides that smoked herring shall be inspected wherever there is an inspector, and where there is no inspector there is no inspection. It provides for imposing fees upon barrels and half-barrels of smoked herrings, which is an anomaly, as fish of this kind is always packed in boxes, but no fee is stated for boxes and half-boxes of that article, and these resolutions are meant to supply that defect in the law. As to fixing the amount at 2c. per box, that rate was at the time suggested by the Nova Scotia Chamber of Commerce and others in that Province, and also by interested parties in the Province of Quebec. However, after hearing an expression of opinion from hon. members present, and as this is a matter requiring careful consideration, the Government will now ask the Committee to report, with leave to sit again, and before sitting again will endeavour to ascertain whether the rates proposed are really too high or not.

MR. GRANDBOIS: Notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. Minister, I think the buyer of herrings is the most competent person to examine them and judge of their quality. I think inspection is unnecessary, and will be very unpopular. It is the opinion of those who are perfectly competent to give an opinion that ion is of no use whatever.

MR. BABY: Not only the Board of Trade, as I said before, but a large number of merchants who are largely engaged in the herring business have represented at different times that smoked herrings in boxes ought to be inspected. For this the present law does not provide, and hence these resolutions.

MR. VALLÉE: Is this inspection to be obligatory?

MR. BABY: It will be obligatory where there is an inspector, and there is always an inspector where there is a board of trade, by whom they are generally recommended to the Government for appointment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill (from the Senate) was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 78) Respecting the President, Directors and Company of the Bank of New Brunswick.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) for the second reading of the Resolutions relative to duties of Customs and Excise reported from the Committee of Ways and Means (March 9th).

MR. McCALLUM: I crave the indulgence of this House while I make a few remarks on this subject, in reply to the observations which fell from the lips of the previous speaker. In my opinion, Sir, the members of this House and the people of this country feel grateful to the Government for the success of the National Policy inaugurated last year. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that we have not kept our pledges. What were our pledges when we were on the other side of the House? What did we say when we went before the people? Our contention always was that the Government of the day, no matter what was its political character, whether Tory or Grit, Reform or Conservative, must have money to carry on the affairs of the country, to pay the expenses of Government, to pay the interest on debt, to make the necessary public improvements; but we claimed, also, that the money should be collected in such a way as would as far as possible assist the people. Has not the Tariff brought down by the hon. the Finance Minister last year had that effect? The hon. gentlemen opposite claim that it has not. Why, they have eyes, and see not; they have ears, but hear not; they have minds, but will not understand. They are croaking and murmuring, but it seems to me their cries are the lamentations of drowning men catching at straws, drowning in the political sea of their own inconsistency. I might refer to the broken pledges of the hon. gentlemen opposite, not by way of excuse for ourselves, because we have nothing to excuse ourselves for, and two wrongs will not make a right, any more than two blacks will make a white. What was the policy followed by the Grits in 1873-4, when they came before the people? I remember well reading in the chief organ of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite what the hon. the then Prime Minister said before the electors of Lambton. He told them he was going to raise the standard of public morality, and conduct the business of the country on principles every honest man would approve, and which would bear the light of day. If he did raise that standard, it did not float long; it was soon hauled down, and disappeared, owing to the actions of his colleagues and supporters in this House. I remember when, in 1873, the late Premier addressed the people of Lambton, he said that, during the Ministry of the Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, the corridors and lobbies of Parliament at Ottawa were filled with contractors and expectant contractors, influencing, threatening and bribing members to support that Government. But the right hon. leader of the present Government has kept these contractors in the lobbies and corridors, while the hon. member for Lambton, on entering office, gave some of them seats and contracts in his Cabinet, and put one in the Speaker's chair. If that was not trailing the standard of public morality in the dust, I do not know what it was. What was the pledge and platform of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1873-4? It was economy, purity and the giving of contracts for public works by tender and to the lowest bidders. What about the Palen contract, the Goderich Harbour matter, and other similar transactions? They also spoke about the independence of Parliament. The last speaker in this debate (Mr. Ross), speaking of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) was very sharp in his criticisms. What has been the stock-in-trade of those hon. gentlemen for the last five years? They have dealt a good deal of abuse to the hon. member for Lincoln, but he stands well in his county, and, if you look at the evidence given by the solicitors of the Great Western Railway, you will find it stated that the money Mr. Irving gave that hon. gentleman had nothing to do with his Parliamentary services. He was tried before a Parliamentary Committee, composed principally of Grits, who, if they could have sunk the hon. gentleman, would have done so. But how does he stand in his own county? He beat at the last election, a strong, honest man, and, had he not stood well with his constituents since those charges were made against him, he would not be here to-day. That is proof positive that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, as I told them before, was not in accord with the opinions of the people of Lincoln. The hon. leader of the Opposition has talked lately of the deplorable condition of the United States, as to their trade; he went so far as to say they had not ships enough to exchange their produce with other countries.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said not a word about United States shipping.

MR. MCCALLUM: That is very like the hon. gentleman. I will read, however, what a friendly organ of his party, the Quebec Globe, or otherwise the Montreal Herald, says in reporting his speech the other day on this question:

"MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, I suppose that the less our imports are, we are so much richer. The hon. gentlemen opposite, by their Protectionist policy, have set themselves deliberately to reduce and destroy our foreign trade. I believe no country possessing a fleet of vessels, no country having commercial relations with the world, can avoid having a foreign trade. Because the Americans have ceased to have a foreign trade, they have sunk in the scale of nations. They have fallen behind the age, because they have no means of exchanging commodities with the rest of the world."

What does that mean?

MR. MACKENZIE: There is nothing about United States shipping in it.

MR. MCCALLUM: I will leave the country to judge if the interpretation I put on the hon. gentleman's speech is not correct. If the hon. gentleman would look a little further, to the United States commercial reports, he would find a different exhibit and that he is very much mistaken. Such statements are on a par with others frequently made by hon. gentlemen opposite across the House. They have for years decried the policy of that Republic, asserting it was in a bad condition and getting greatly impoverished. What is the fact? I have a statement of the exports and imports of the United States for the last thirty years, but will take the ten-year periods:

	(Not Coin and Bullion.)
	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
1850.....	$164,034,033	$134,500,233	$393,934,266
1860.....	336,232,485	316,242,423	652,524,908
1870.....	419,803,113	376,616,473	796,419,586
1879.....	432,979,124	695,340,790	1,132,319,914
Increase from 1850 to 1860.....			$253,590,642
“ “ 1860 “ 1870.....			143,994,673
“ “ 1870 “ 1879.....			335,900,323
Balance of Trade against United States
1850.....			29,183,800
“ “ “ 1860.....			20,040,062
“ “ “ 1870.....			46,686,640
“ “ “ in favour of United States
1879.....			264,379,163

This is the country that has been decaying under Protection—that has fallen behind in the race of nations, and has not ships enough to exchange its commodities for those of other countries. Its trade has trebled in thirty years. Though its shipping might have been more prosperous in former years, it possesses over 4,000,000 tons at present in foreign trade, which is no very bad condition of affairs. The hon. member for Lambton the other day found great fault with the Minister of Railways because he made some remarks on the hon. gentleman from Centre Huron (Sir R. J. Cartwright) being a renegade Tory. I am of opinion that the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals is not as good a judge of a renegade Tory as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). That hon. gentleman at one time, speaking to the electors of Hamilton, in 1871, defined a Tory as a curious animal, and he said, if you remove the skin, you find a Tory, and then remove the flesh to the bone, and you find him a Tory still. The hon. member for Lambton says that he was in accord with him on all subjects before he went into the Government. I suppose he subjected the hon. gentleman to the surgical operation alluded to. If he did, he is better qualified to express an opinion as to what he is composed of than the hon. the Minister of Railways is, who did not put him through the operation. He says that no man ever became a member of his Cabinet who was not in accord with them. I know he has been in the habit of saying that the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir R. J. Cartwright) was in accord with them for years before he entered the Cabinet. I do not think the House or the people of the country will accept that statement as correct. I think it is quite the reverse. We have the authority, and I am sure we cannot have a better authority than the organ of the party, the Globe newspaper, in regard to the hon. gentleman. It said he was “a mixer and a muddler,” and was guilty of almost all the political crimes possible. Other planks in the Grit platform were: Parliamentary control over expenditure of money and independence of Parliament; to keep the people’s representatives free from favours from the Crown; but they had no sooner got possession of office than they scattered all these planks to the four winds of Heaven, and allowed members of the Government and the Speaker of the House and their supporters to fatten on the Public Treasury. This was the result of the policy promulgated by hon. gentlemen opposite. But do we not remember the steel rails transaction? We remember how they put their hands into the public purse for the purchase of 50,000 tons of steel rails, and, when they were brought to task for it, the then leader of the Government said it had never been promised that it should be done. On that occasion the late member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) brought them to book in this House, once on account of their violating their pledges in the matter of having contracts laid on the Table and expending the people’s money without a vote of Parliament. Hon. members will remember the late Government bringing a Bill into the House to build a railway from Esquimaux to Nanaimo, in British Columbia, and we remember the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) opposed the passage of that Bill, although they accepted seats in the Cabinet shortly afterwards; and the hon. member for Lambton tells us that his Government was in accord on all questions. But they could not have been in accord on this question; for we know the hon. members for West Durham and Bothwell voted against the Grit Government on that occasion. We know they did not agree on that policy. We have not learned yet who gave away his principles on that question. We should like to know whether Mahomet went to the mountain or the mountain to Mahomet. On the question of the reorganisation of the Senate, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was not at one with the Government. The real leader of the party in another place came out in the Globe newspaper and placed his big foot upon that scheme, and said they had a fit of midsummer madness, but now they tell us they were in accord upon all questions. The hon. member for Middlesex, in his speech, referred to the Montreal manifesto as a annexation manifesto. Now, who is the head centre of that annexation clique in Montreal? What has he been formerly, and what is he now? I do not know that it is necessary to name him. He was sent to Philadelphia at one time by hon. gentlemen opposite, and employed at a salary of $3,000 a year. What did they send him there for? If they knew his proclivities, was it to buy or to negotiate an arrangement between this country and the United States? But, Sir, I can say this that they sent him there, and he revelled there at the country's expense, in wine and cigars, for a long time. They sent him to Paris afterwards, and I hold in my hand a very amusing document; it is an account of the expenses of the party when they were off on a "jamboree" at Philadelphia—I cannot call it anything else. It is an account of expenses for wines and cigars, besides what they paid for Annie.

An Hon. MEMBER: Better not say "Annie" more about it.

MR. McCALLUM: Well, no; I will not say any more about it. Why, Sir, these gentlemen revelled at Philadelphia in wines and cigars. The expenses at Philadelphia, for living alone, for a short time amounted to $7,625, and for wine and cigars, $757; and these are the men that promised the country economy. But they did not stand long; they were turned adrift, and they say now: Oh, if we had a chance of going to the country again the country would be with us. What guarantee have they got for anything of the kind? Is it because Oliver Mowat's Government was supported in Ontario last summer? I think the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), when he spoke of that, went beyond the mark. He should not go back on the Government that employs him. Oliver Mowat was governing Ontario in a much better way than the Grit Government had governed the Dominion. Speaking of the Province of Ontario, we know that they are Reformers, because at the last Dominion elections they turned them out; they would not have any more to do with them; they would fain support Oliver Mowat and nothing more. The hon. gentleman says I get my coal free. Well, Sir, I call upon him now to make that statement good. If he gets up in this House to make assertions of that kind he must substantiate them; and I defy him or any other man in the country to say I have received or want any favour from the Government, or that I get one single cent of drawback on this coal matter. I have an interest in steam-tugs, and I had last summer; I had an interest in three tugs running on the river. If I take my coal on board in the United States, and burn it in international waters, how is the Government to get duty on it? You must first catch the birds before you cook them. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) might just as well say that, if he is in the United States, and takes his breakfast in the city of Buffalo, he must pay duty on the tea he drinks. This was done in the interest of the coal merchants of the counties of Essex and Lambton. If you go into the United States for supplies or coal you need not report at the Custom-house, but if for any other purpose you must pay $2.50 for report and clearance. If the hon. member for Middlesex, whenever he has occasion to go to the United States, wishes to pay duty on the tea that he drinks there, I am perfectly willing to pay duty on my coal. This hon. gentleman tells us that the Tariff causes discontent in the Provinces, and that the people of England do not like it. Let us for the moment grant this. We know it makes a difference to the people of England and the United States. But I would rather be true to my own people; I would prefer to be loyal to my own people than to the people of England and the United States. But it is not so; the people of England are not dissatisfied with us; the people of England appreciate us, and we stand better in that country; they see to-day that we are trying to open up this country and trying to make a home for the crowds of toiling men of England. It is said that we are offending a few shopkeepers in Sheffield and Manchester by doing this. What need we care? We have a right to do as we think proper; what has been conceded to us. The gentleman opposite tells us in a warning voice to be careful. I want to know if we are here on sufferance. We are told that we have given offence to the United States. Why, we have paid them the greatest of compliments by copying a leaf out of their book. We are told that our Tariff should be framed so that it would bring about a reciprocity for all countries. I remember on a former occasion delegates being sent from this country to the United States. I was very much interested in the question at the time, because the county I live in had large business relations with that country. Sir Alexander T. Galt was on that delegation; Mr. Howland, Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, was on that delegation; Mr. Henry, from Nova Scotia, was on that delegation. I was proud of my country when I saw the way in which those gentlemen carried on the negotiations. But what did they offer us? We asked for bread and they offered us a stone. They offered us reciprocity in grind-stones. I thought hon. gentlemen opposite were gritty enough and did not want any more grind-stones. The Government of the hon. member for Lambton was not satisfied with that rebuff, but sent Hon. George Brown from Toronto to Washington, with his hat in his hand, and nothing has come out of it except that this country has paid a bill of expenses. I am in favour of Reciprocity, on equal terms, with the United States, but common sense and decency teaches us that overtures must now come from the Americans. What were we to do under the circumstances? The late Government seemed content to sit here and wait for the prosperity of the country to revive of itself. But this Administration adopted a different plan. They took measures to bring about better times, and every intelligent man must admit they have succeeded in a marked degree. But the hon. member (Mr. Ross) says the people of Ontario have to pay a duty of 60c. a ton on coal. That is a great grievance. In talking as he did, he seemed to be trying to set neighbour against neighbour and Province against Province. If it were not unparliamentary, I would call such talk treason. Lord Redesdale says: "Treason to the people is a much more heinous offence than treason to the Crown." I would like the hon. member for West Middlesex to understand that the 60c. duty on coal is not felt very heavily in the Province of Ontario; it is yet a wooden country, and there are thousands of cords of wood now rotting in the woods, and there is but little coal used for fuel in Ontario, except in cities and towns, and the large majority of people do not feel the tax on coal, as they burn wood for fuel. I want him to understand that the people of Ontario are willing to stand that tax on coal in order to assist the miners of Nova Scotia. There is no doubt but that the present Tariff is a matter of compromise; but, in talking about it, hon. gentlemen opposite fail to tell us what they would do if they were in power. When they sat on this side of the House, they folded their arms and did nothing. The ship of State might drift on the rocks, but they said: We can do nothing; we have got to the utmost limit of taxation in this country. They tell us that we have raised the taxation of the country. Well, we did so, but we got a little more money in return than they did. To show the House that I am correct, I will quote from the speech of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) in 1878, in which he foreshadowed direct taxation. [Vide Debates, 1878, p. 437.] The hon. gentleman admitted that he had gone as far as he could. He was wedded to the 17½ per cent., but we contended that the revenue should be so changed as to assist the industries of the country, and, as far as possible, to give the Canadian market to Canadians. To show that this hon. gentleman had great antipathy to the cities, I will quote further from that speech. He was desirous of taking the power to manage their own taxation from the cities. [Vide Debates, 1878, p. 435.] The House will see that the hon. gentleman wanted to get direct taxes from the people. I cannot see for what other object this language was used. My hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) went into figures to show how much per cent. the people of Ontario paid per head more than the people of Quebec and the other Provinces. I would like to know how he arrived at his conclusion. Can he explain his process? No one could—nobody could give a correct estimate of the contributions of each Province. How is he to tell what amount of imports, that paid duty at Montreal, Quebec or Halifax, is consumed in Ontario? It is a mere guess of the hon. gentleman; his whole speech was also a mere matter of guesswork. Hon. gentlemen opposite charged that the Tariff would have the effect of making the manufacturers rich. They appear not to like our having any rich people in the country. They also declare the manufacturers will only be rich for a while, and that afterwards, with greater competition, they will become poor; but meantime they swallow up everybody and everything, and then swallow themselves at last—I do not know any such animal—perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain. I will leave hon. gentlemen opposite to explain this paradox if possible. I do not think the comparison fair as regards the manufacturers. The hon. member for West Middlesex got up, and, parrot-like, repeated the statements of the hon. member for Lambton about the commercial question. Anyone who will look dispassionately at the returns of the hon. the Finance Minister, will see that we are not in the position those hon. gentlemen have described. We can see we are improving already; that there is hope for this country; that the exports are more and imports less for the last six months, and that there is a difference of $15,000,000 between the exports and imports. If we double that amount for the whole year, we shall see that after the adoption of the National Policy, the country will be better off by those $30,000,000 than in the preceding year. They have also taken the farmers under their paternal wing. Now, to what extent have the farmers benefitted from the National Policy? According to the return in my hands, I find that the comparison for the six months ending December 31st, is as follows:—

1879.....	34,048,894
	$7,138,348
Exports.
1879.....	$54,283,241
1878.....	46,376,598
	$7,907,243
Total in favour of Canada for six months ending 31st December, 1879.....	$15,047,591

Balance in favour of the National Policy if the next six months are as good as the last..... $30,035,182

The country is going to benefit by the increased exports and imports, because the labour engaged in manufacturing the goods formerly imported into the country will be employed here by ourselves, thus keeping the money in the country for the advantage of our own people instead of giving it to foreigners. If those hon. gentlemen will look dispassionately at those returns, they will see that this country has turned the corner, that the present Government has got us out of the disastrous groove the last Government had brought us into, and which soon would have brought us to ruin. I do not say we are going to get rich fast, but we are on the fair way to prosperity. Well, these gentlemen say, of course, that the Tariff is ruining trade. The fact is that we carry more of the products of other countries than we did before, and besides we carry more of our own. If they will only look at the statements I have given, they can come to no other conclusion than that our carrying trade has greatly improved. They say that the farmer is not benefitted, but he gets the benefit of supplying the home market to the extent of $14,191,000. That is some benefit to the farmers of this country. I know we cannot go into the question of how many bushels are sold, because we have not got the returns, except for the first six months. We were told the other day that the prices got by the farmer had not increased. But I know better, as representing an agricultural constituency. I am an agriculturist myself, and I can tell them that this Tariff has assisted the farmer. The price of oats now is much higher than it was before. Though the crop of oats last year was a good one, the price still keeps up to 33c. per bushel, whereas they used to bring only 24c. or 25c. a bushel. These gentlemen say that we are making of Canada a nation of paupers. They would not allow us to tax ourselves to carry on those great public works, which will be of so great a benefit to this and future generations. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) told us we promised the people if we got into power we would restore prosperity and confidence to this country.

Well, have we not done so? Have we not fulfilled our pledges. On the 18th of September, the next day after the election, affairs began to improve. On that day the housewives of Canada brushed off the flies from the wheel, as we do the flies from the windows; so we got rid of the hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend from West Middlesex says the hon. the Finance Minister put a tax on wool. Well, those gentlemen will have to stop a long time in the cold shades of Opposition before they can pull the wool over the eyes of the electors of Canada. They tried it, and they have failed. For myself, I would like to see a duty of 4c. a pound on all wool coming into Canada. Why? Because we can grow our own wool in this country. Our farmers could grow any quantity of wool in this country if they only had price enough. We pay taxes on tea, and we do not raise an ounce in this country. I say this Government has benefitted the farmers by raising the duties on coarse goods that were formerly imported at a low rate of duty. We have by this means given the manufacturers Protection, and enabled them to give more to the farmers for their wool than formerly. We shall not again see the wool as low as it was a year or two ago. The farmers of this country understand that question very well, and will not allow those gentlemen to pull the wool over their eyes. The hon. gentlemen want a cheap country to live in. Well, we have a cheap country to live in now. They can go to the Indians on the plains, and live cheaply by the chase. They can go back to barbarism, and then they can live cheaply. But we do not want to do that. We want under this policy to live so that the majority of the people of this country can live comfortably and have the necessaries of life. The object of this Government is to give the workingman a good day's wage for a good day's work. The industry of the country is its wealth. We could not get along in the world without work, and I am sure that Canadians would have no desire to do so. We are told about the promises we made to the workingmen. Well, we told them that the revenue in this country, as far as possible, would be collected so as to give them work. Is there not more employment in this country now than when hon. gentlemen opposite were in the Government and there will be more and more. As far as the National Policy is concerned, hon. gentlemen hold us responsible. We accept the responsibility. We do not wish for a moment to shirk any of it. They make the excuse that when they were in power they were unfortunate and had bad crops. There is no wonder that the people went back on them because, if a man is unfortunate in all his undertakings, you do not want to employ him. The people were of that opinion, and they got rid of hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) told us the other day that the people of this country were leaving for the United States in order to escape the Customs officers. I want the hon. gentleman to understand that the United States is a much more prosperous country than Canada, and when I was on the other side of the House I told hon. gentlemen so. I know it to be so. I have business relations with many parts of the United States; I can speak from my own knowledge. At the same time I want him to understand that the emigrant will have more Customs officers after him there than he will have here, but under the Protective system that prevails there they are able to employ more labour and pay better wages. The hon. leader of the Opposition has found fault with the hon. the Finance Minister because he is going to extend the issue of Dominion notes. I think, if there is any one point in the statements of the hon. the Minister of Finance that deserve favourable consideration more than another at the hands of the people of this country, it is that one question, because we have now to pay so much interest on English capital. We know that it has become a very serious matter for us now to collect revenue enough to pay the interest on on what we owe. I consider that the Government is acting wisely in using the credit of the people of this country among themselves instead of going to England for it. What has been the practice of the Finance Ministers of this country? Each one has acted in the groove that his predecessor did. The present Finance Minister has struck out for himself in the matter of the National Policy, and he is now striking out in the way of a National Currency. If Canadian credit is good enough to borrow English gold to pay for Canadian labour, is it not good enough to pay for Canadian labour without English gold, on which credit we wish to base a National Currency. It is a matter of confidence in our ability to pay, because, if we are not able to pay the interest on our principal in full, the money-lenders of Lombard-street will not give us a dollar. In going to England, we said we wanted $100,000,000 to build this Pacific Railway, or to make other public works. I have come to the conclusion that it will cost us five millions a year interest, including the management of the loan. In thirty years the people of this country would have to pay $150,000,000 for the use of that $100,000,000, and still have the principal to pay. But supposing we extended the policy brought down to the House, by accepting the currency system suggested of legal tenders and bonds, the one changeable with the other, at the option of the holder; supposing we want this year $10,000,000 or $20,000,000; if you want $20,000,000 say, issue $10,000,000 in Dominion notes, and $10,000,000 in bonds at interest at 4 per cent. thereon, payable semi-annually in gold, the Dominion notes, of course, paying no interest at all, the one convertible with the other at the option of the holder, the result would be a cheap loan to the country; and, Sir, who will deny that we should have cheap money? Capital and labour are joint partners in producing wealth. Whenever capital is paid more than fair interest for its use, labour must suffer, and only gets what is left, or, in other words, the money lender gets his pay whether business men suffer or not. Under such a system interest would get so low that 5 or 6 per cent. could not be got, and people would change their currency for bonds paying 4 per cent. We should thus get a loan from the people of this country; and, if we issue that $100,000,000 in that way, it would cost this country only about 2 per cent., because, issuing it in half-and-half, the bonds at 4 per cent. and the Dominion notes paying no interest, we should thus be getting a loan at 3 per cent. less than it could be got otherwise. It is said that, if this system were adopted, the people would tell you that, if you did not have gold as a basis, no one would accept it, and that we could not pay for our imports without gold as a basis. I would ask how you pay for it now. You do not do it with gold. The exchanges of this country are not carried on by gold now. You pay by your exports, and I consider that the balance of trade would soon be in our favour, and that our exports will be greater than our imports, so that there will be no difficulty in getting exchange. It is the very thing, and should be adopted. I can say that you will have no less gold then than now, but you will have less need of it. How do you get gold now? We get it in exchange for exports, and emigrants bring it into the country, and we dig it out of the ground. Any man in his senses can see how well this National Currency would work to our advantage. Will we have less exports and less emigrants? Certainly not. And we shall have more gold and less need of it. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) could not let the chance go by without having a slap at a friend of mine. He said in his speech, a few days ago, in reply to the hon. the Minister of Finance:

"There is a famous financier in Hamilton, in the employ of the Government, who, in his original scheme for paper money, made his currency notes, which were to be redeemable in paper coloured yellow, in order to resemble gold as much as possible. The hon. gentleman intends to have 15 per cent. in gold, and 18 and 10 per cent. in yellow paper, I suppose."

He has gone out of his way to give a slap at a good, able and honest man, who has done as much as any man for the good of this country, but they must have a slap at somebody. I am not going to detain the House any longer.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. McCallum: I do not wish, as I have said, to detain the House any longer, but, if they wish me to go on with their history, I can give them as much as they want. I do not wish to say anything about them individually. I know them collectively, and the country knows them and knows no good of them. They are where they will remain, in the cold shades of Opposition. I thank the House kindly for the patient hearing they have given me, and I will now take my seat.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. Oliver: It is my desire to make a few remarks upon this very important subject, which has engaged the attention of the House for the last few years. I do not purpose taking up much of the time of the House, but certainly it is my duty and my privilege to say something upon a subject which is of such great importance to the people of this country. I listened to the hon. member who addressed the House before recess, and I must say that we had in that speech a little of everything. It reminded me of the Yankee, who, when he went to a hotel, always took some hash for dinner, for the reason that when he took hash he had a little of all that was going. Such was the speech of the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum). I think that the remarks he made with reference to the paid Secretary who attended to the affairs of the Dominion at Philadelphia, three years ago, were uncalled for. We know that a house was rented by the Government for the use of the Board of Commissioners, and not only for their use, but for the use, to a large extent, of Canadians who visited the Exposition. The Commissioners received nothing for their services; their time was given to the country for nothing. Of course, the Secretary was paid, and he had to be hospitable to the Commissioners as well as to the Canadian visitors, and, as a matter of course, he had to provide some of the luxuries of life to dispense to the Canadian people. I do not approve of having such things brought before a legislative assembly. We know that that has been the practice in the Province of Ontario recently. It is known that a return was brought down which showed the expenses of the Lieutenant-Governor's trip through the western part of the Province and Manitoba; and I may say that the only difference in that respect between Conservatives on that side of the House and the Reformers on this side is that the former are able to cover up their tracks more successfully than the Reformers. We find that, when any expenditure is incurred by the Reformers, a plain statement is made of that expenditure, and for what it was expended. But we find that, when the Conservatives take a pleasure trip, the expenditure is covered up under some other head. We found that, in Ontario, in 1871, when the Commissioner of Crown Lands took a trip in the direction of Lake Superior, $500 or $600 were expended in luxuries: in brandies, whiskeys, wines, cigars and tobacco; and this was covered up under the head of "Colonisation Roads." This shows clearly the difference between the expenditure of the Reformers and the expenditure of the Conservatives. During the course of his remarks, I heard my hon. friend from Monck state that the Tariff would bring about Reciprocity. I think I heard the hon. the Minister of Finance make a similar remark. I have read the same statement in the Conservative press, and I have heard it at public meetings throughout the country. Well, Sir, there is a difference of opinion as to whether it will bring about Reciprocity or not. I find that there are some very high authorities who think that it will bring about something else sooner than Reciprocity. Let us take the opinion of Mr. John Bright as to what will be the result of the Reciprocity Treaty. In answer to a letter from Mr. Forbes, published in to-night's paper, he makes the following remarks with regard to the course taken by the Canadian Government:—

"I regret the course taken by the Canadian Government. I regard it as the first step in the direction of separation from the Mother Country. If the Colonies were wise they would follow our example. If they will not do so we must leave them to their own course, but I think they should not come here for loans or for guarantees for loans."

That is the opinion of Mr. John Bright, and I say that the first step has been taken towards the very course which he mentions. I find there is to be an exhibition in the Australian Colonies during this spring, and the report of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture shows that he has appointed an American to represent Canada at that exhibition. Is this not one step towards annexation? Is it an acknowledgment that we have not a single person in the whole Dominion that is fit to represent Canada at the exhibition of the Australian Colonies, and that we were obliged to borrow Mr. William Cameron, one of the New York Commissioners, as our representative.

MR. POPE: He is a British subject.

MR. OLIVER: I apprehend that he is an American, or he would not have been appointed on the New York State Commission. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Western Morning News, a paper that is published and circulated extensively in England. It reads as follows:—

“Are not our manufacturers neglecting the Australian International Exhibitions? Great complaints are made by the Colonists of the indifference of the Mother Country. What is more important, the vigorous patronage of the United States is quoted with effect as a contract. America seems to have made up her mind to win the Australian trade, and, if she does, she will wear another feather in her cap, and England will, in a sense, have to pay for the plume. A time when Canada is discussing Reciprocity with the States to the exclusion of England, is hardly the time for giving a slight to the Colonies, which in every sense are still loyal.”

This is as much as to say that more attention ought to be paid to the Australian Colonies than to Canada, because they are more loyal to Great Britain than we are. We heard a great deal from the hon. member for Monck with reference to the balance of trade. There was also a great deal in the Budget Speech with regard to the same subject. I have satisfied myself that there is a great deal of delusion in this balance of trade question. I have been looking over the statistics of France, and I find that, in 1868-9, previous to the Franco-Prussian war, when the country was in a prosperous condition, the balance of trade was against her to the amount of £24,000,000 sterling for two years. In 1872-3, immediately after that disastrous war, so far as France was concerned, the balance of trade was in favour of France to the amount of £18,500,000. I find that in 1876-7, after France had fully recovered from the effects of that tremendous war, the balance of trade was against her to the amount of £27,000,000 sterling. We find, also, on looking at the trade and navigation returns of France for 1878, that the balance of trade was against her to the amount of £43,646,000 sterling. This is proof positive that a country may without injury have the balance of trade against it when prosperous. But, coming to our own country, I think I have sufficient proof to convince the hon. member for Monck that the balance of trade against a country is not an indication of poverty. In the return of July 1st, 1857, it is shown that the balance of trade was against Canada to the extent of $12,424,000. Now, the most prosperous time which Old Canada ever saw, was immediately before that year. I find that, in the following year, 1858 there was a deficit against Canada of $3,375,000, under the John A. Macdonald Government, and that the balance of trade had been reduced from $12,000,000 to $3,000,000 against Canada. In 1860 there was a balance of trade in our favour of $184,000. In 1863, however, the balance of trade rose to $3,500,000 against us, and in 1867, the year in which Confederation took place, the balance of trade was $10,552,000 against Canada. In 1872, 1873, and 1874, the most prosperous year we have had since Confederation, the balance of trade was against us to the amount of $105,000,000, or $35,000,000 per year. It fell to $80,000,000 in the years 1875, 1876, and 1877, or $26,000,000 a year. But I have still higher authority in support of the proposition. I turn to the Budget Speech of 1873, when the Hon. Mr. Tilley was Finance Minister. We all looked upon that hon. gentleman then as one of the fittest men to manage the financial affairs of the Dominion, and believed that he had a thorough knowledge of the commercial interests of the country. What did he say in that Budget Speech? He pointed out the wonderful progress the country was making, and, as an evidence of that progress, he alluded to the very large amount that was invested in bank stocks. He called attention to the steady progress made in the value of the exports and imports since the commencement of the Union. He gave the imports for the five and a-half years since Confederation, but I will not trouble the House by reading them in detail. He also gave the exports for the same period. The imports, during the five and a-half years, he pointed out, amounted to $478,071,000, and the exports to $401,926,000, showing a balance of trade against us for that period of time of $76,145,000. He concludes the paragraph in the following manner:—“This is another evidence of the steady and progressive prosperity of the country.” Now, here is the authority of the Hon. Mr. Tilley in 1873, and it will be seen that the Finance Minister of that day disagrees with the present Finance Minister. The Finance Minister of the present day says that the balance of trade being against a country is an evidence that that country is not in a prosperous commercial condition. The hon. member for Monck joins him in the statement. Are we to rely upon the statements of the hon. the Finance Minister to-day or upon the Finance Minister of 1873? I think it would be safer to take the statement of the Finance Minister in 1873 than the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister in 1880. Then there was another statement made during this discussion. It was made by the hon. the Minister of Railways, who said that the liabilities and great obligations under which the present Government are labouring were handed down to them by the late Ministry, of which the hon. member for Lambton was the leader. Is this statement correct or incorrect? If correct, then it ought to be accepted. If it is not correct, then little faith or reliance should be put upon the statements of any hon. gentleman who would rise, with all the assurance possible, and make such an assertion in Parliament. What are the obligations resting upon the Ministry of to-day? They have got to complete the inland navigation of the country, the Welland Canal, and a large share of the Pacific Railway. Were these obligations undertaken by the late Government, or by the Government in power in 1873? Anyone who looks into the Public Accounts will conclude that all those great public works were handed down by the Government of 1873 to the Government that succeeded it, in the latter part of 1873. I find that the late Government spent upon certain of those works the following sums:—On the St. Lawrence Canals, about $3,000,000; on the Welland Canal, about $7,000,000; on Ottawa works, $1,400,000; on Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Railways, $1,350,000, that is up to the 20th February, 1878; on the Intercolonial, $6,000,000; Pacific Railway, $8,300,000, and on Ottawa works about $300,000. Now, many of those public works have not been completed, and they are handed down to the present Government, who, I suppose, will feel they are obliged to carry out and finish certain of them. The hon. the Minister of Railways stated the late Government were responsible for the commencement of those public works. Is this true or not? In turning over the records of Parliament, I find that the Finance Minister, in 1873, immediately after the Session, went to England to borrow money, and borrowed about $12,000,000. Why? If not to carry out and develop the public works of the country, which they had entered into. I have another evidence here which is sufficient, I suppose, to convince the hon. the Minister of Railways and the hon. the Minister of Finance that these works were undertaken by the Government in power in the beginning of 1873. Here is an extract from the Budget Speech of the hon. the Finance Minister in the Session of 1873, on page 16:—

“We are about entering upon new and increased engagements involving a very large sum of money. We are entering upon works—we have already done so—which will require a large increase of our debt. We have $10,000,000 to expend on the Intercolonial Railway; we have $30,000,000 for the Pacific Railway, and the Canal system that has been accepted by the Government will involve an expenditure of at least $20,000,000.”

Now, I think that this is sufficient proof that the Government of that day undertook the construction of those large public works, and that they were handed down as a legacy to the late Government, in place of them being a legacy from the late to the present Government. I find also in the Public Accounts that, during the time of the late Government, from the 1st January, 1874, to the 28th February, 1878, there was spent on public works, out of capital, borrowed money, the large sum of $2,000,000; and out of revenue they spent on the improvement of rivers, public buildings and harbours and piers the very large amount of $2,671,000. After having spent that, the whole increase of the ordinary expenditure from 1873-4 to the 1st July, 1877, was only $200,000; so that, as to the public works imposing great burdens on the shoulders of the present Government, they were undertaken and commenced by those hon. gentlemen when in power, in 1873, and previously. We have heard a great deal about the great prosperity enjoyed by the country at present. I have endeavoured to see it, and have looked in various directions to ascertain where it exists; and there is one evidence here, contrary to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite. I find there is no better test of the prosperity of the working classes of our country than the Dominion Savings Banks Accounts. In 1876-7, their deposits amounted to $5,726,000, and, in 1877-8, they had increased to $7,427,000, an increase in the year of $1,700,000. On looking at the following year, what do we find? That the depositors in the Dominion Savings Banks had withdrawn their deposits to the amount of $551,000. Apparently, this is an evidence that the working classes had to draw their deposits in order to pay their current expenses. There is another evidence. Anyone that will enquire into the value of real estate, in any section of the country, will come to the conclusion I have reached—that its value is not as much to-day as two years ago by 10 to 15 per cent.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Twenty-five per cent.

MR. OLIVER: Yes, in some sections. In my own section, improved farms, with buildings upon them, could be sold as high as from $75 up to $100 an acre two years ago. Now, there is not a farm that would sell for more than from $60 to $70 an acre; and this decrease in value is witnessed also in the Province the hon. the Finance Minister comes from, and, I am told, in Nova Scotia as well. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will say the decrease with us is in consequence of the large number leaving the western section of the Dominion for the North-West Provinces. How would that answer apply to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? The people of that section, instead of going to the Canadian North-West, are going to the American States—the great bulk at any rate. Again, take the rents of properties—a very good guide to go by—in the cities and towns in any section, and you will find they are less to-day than two years ago. In some cities—and I am told that St. Catharines is in a most deplorable condition, so far as rents are concerned—tenants are reported to enjoy the privilege of living in houses without paying for them.

MR. RYKERT: You have a bad authority.

MR. OLIVER: I will give you my authority before I have done—it is a good Conservative organ. I am not going to enter into the subject of the value of stocks, nor the number of insolvencies during the last year; but we all know that, for whatever reason, stocks fell enormously, that they are now lower than ever, and that there is a want of confidence in some of the institutions of the country, and that bankruptcies have wonderfully increased. We come to the evidence of the great prosperity said to prevail—the people leaving the country. I examined the returns made to the American Government, and found that, during 1877 the following numbers left this country and settled in the United States:—

Quebec and Ontario, twelve months..	16,063
Nova Scotia, “	.. 3,467
New Brunswick “	.. 1,457
Prince Edward Island “	.. 487

Total.....21,474

And for the six months of 1879, from January to July:

1879.

Quebec and Ontario, six months....	10,810
Nova Scotia “ 2,074
New Brunswick “ 2,004
Prince Edward Island “ 258

Total.....15,146

This is the way the people of the country have been leaving for the States. Yet we are told it is prosperous, that the people are happy, and are staying at home. The difference in favour of 1877 is over 9,000. Now, we come to Hamilton, and, if there is a city in the whole Dominion that ought to be benefitted by the imposition of a Protective Tariff, it is Hamilton. It is the centre of the manufactures of Ontario, and has always been so regarded. The hon. the Finance Minister will agree with me that it is the most important manufacturing centre in Ontario. In 1878, there were in Hamilton 377 empty houses, and in 1879, 528, or an increase of 15 per cent. for one year. This is the evidence of its prosperity. In Ottawa, at present, there are over 700 empty houses, and this is a fair sample of all the cities and towns in the country. But I have an authority I wish to cite to hon. gentlemen opposite; the Halifax Reporter—I think a Conservative organ—which has felt the pressure of the hard times so severely as to have had to take advantage of the Insolvent Act recently. I read the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the Address in this House (Mr. Richey), and you would think by it that the city of Halifax was a perfect garden of Eden, that everything was prosperous and happy in that favoured section. But what says the Halifax Reporter?

“Walk through any of our streets and you will find warehouses, shops, factories or dwellings closed up, and there are dozens of houses occupied by persons who pay a mere nominal rent or none at all, who are permitted to live in them on sufferance, liable to be turned out at any time, because the owners know that they can insure them on more favourable terms if occupied than if empty. Every steamer, and nearly every train that has left this port and city during the past summer, fall, and winter, has taken more or less people who have given up in despair the struggle to make a living here, and go elsewhere in the hope of striking some work. It will be infinitely harder to entice these people back than it would have been to have kept them here.”

It was often stated, and before the last elections, also, that the workingmen were to be benefitted by the National Policy—were to have steadier work and higher wages. Now, it is stated on the other side of the House that the Government has fulfilled all its pledges to the people. Has every promise been fulfilled? Is the pay of the workingman increased? I have heard it stated here that it is not, and I have not heard the employers of labour in this House or out of it try to contradict the statement. If the employers supporting the Government could honestly contradict the assertion that labour has not increased in value, they would have done so. I have read in the press of hon. gentlemen opposite that the trade of Ontario and the financial condition of the labouring class of this city was better now than previous to the adoption of this Tariff; the argument used was that there was no soup-kitchen in Ottawa this winter. What happened only a day or two afterwards? The journal which is the organ of the Government here published a financial statement of the expenditure and revenue of that same soup-kitchen, that had been running all the winter. We have further evidence of the poverty of the working classes in the statements made by the representatives of Prince Edward Island, and we have a striking representation from Nova Scotia. We find that, financially, it is bankrupt, and knocking at the door of the Federal Government, asking it to save the Province from bankruptcy, by handing over a portion of the Fishery Award. A similar statement is made by the members from Prince Edward Island, the majority of whom are supporters of the Government. I think only one of them voted against the Tariff. They all come now and say the Tariff policy has injured the Island, and that to recoup them for the injury sustained they will have to get part of the Fishery Award.

AN HON. MEMBER: And if they do not?

MR. OLIVER: And, if they do not, they will put themselves in the same position as the people of British Columbia did a short time ago—ask for secession. I see that, in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, a gentleman has given notice that, unless a part of the Fishery Award is given to that Province, he will move in the legislative halls that the Province secede from the Dominion. Now, we have another high authority, the Manager of the Intercolonial Railway, who testifies that the country has not prospered under this Tariff. We find that the Manager, Mr. Pottinger, in his report, states: “The prevailing depression in all kinds of business has so affected the traffic of the road as to cause a considerable decline in the gross earnings.” That is high authority that the country is not in that prosperous condition gentlemen opposite would like to have us believe. Now, there is another evidence. There was laid upon the Table of this House a petition from the city and county of St. John, represented by the hon. the Finance Minister, and does that say that the Tariff has benefitted that particular section of the country? And be it remembered that there are 3,000 voters’ names to that petition, and only about 4,000 in the division altogether. Now, I come to some of the objections which I take to this Tariff, as the representative of a large agricultural county. The first is the tea duty. It has been said that tea has not increased in price. That statement is not correct. We find that, by a return laid before Parliament the other day there has been imported from the time the Tariff Bill was passed to the 31st of December last the large amount of 2,129,000lb. of tea from the United States, and that tea paid 10 per cent. discriminating duty. Well, now, if tea had not increased in price, and the Americans had paid 10 per cent. more duty than the importers in the city of Montreal, if the importers of that city had imported it at 10 per cent. into this country less than the Americans, and had sold their tea at a reasonable rate, how is it possible for the Americans to sell their tea here? It is quite impossible. Put 10 per cent. against them, and, if the Canadians had sold tea at a reasonable rate, the Americans could not have sold it. The great objection to the tea duty and the discriminating duty, and the extra duty put upon sugar, is the fact that that duty does not go into the Dominion Treasury. It goes into the pockets of the manufacturers and the importers. Now, everyone that knows the export wholesale price of sugar in the city of New York, and adds the old duty to it, and the cost of bringing it to Canada, will find, when they compare it with the prices in Montreal, that we get it laid down from 1c. to 1½c. less per pound. There is another objection we take to the sugar duty, and it is that it is diverting the wholesale trade from Ontario. It is destroying the wholesale trade in sugar in Ontario. I find by a return that was brought before Parliament, a few days ago, we imported in 1878 of sugar direct into the Province of Ontario 32,000,000lb., and we imported, in 1879, 9,000,000lb. We lost the profits arising from the importation of 23,000,000lb. of sugar. The city of Montreal got the benefit of that. We find that in the Province of Quebec they imported in 1878, 19,000,000lb., and in 1879, 48,000,000lb. Now, the great objection to the removal of the import trade from the Province of Ontario to the Province of Quebec is, in my opinion, that the importation of sugar into this country is done mostly by one large firm, and when there are any profits they are all made by one firm, and the other merchants of the country do not participate therein. We find that there has been an increase in the price of sugar during last fall, and that the Redpaths made by that increase a profit of some $800,000 at one time. Now, if this Tariff had not been in existence, that $800,000 would have been distributed all over the Dominion; the merchants who held sugar and imported sugar into the various cities of Ontario and the other Provinces, would have par-

MR. GAULT: They have two sugar refineries in Montreal, competing very closely with each other.

MR. OLIVER: Not hard enough, I imagine, to harm each other much. Another objection I take is to the extreme Protection that is afforded to the manufacturers of cotton. It is impossible now to import cotton into this country to compete with the Canadian manufacturer. We have now three or four manufactories of cotton in this country, and what is the result? Every merchant in this country is at the mercy of these institutions. The merchants of the west at one time were in the habit of going to the city of Toronto or to Montreal to buy their goods at certain periods of the year. But a merchant doing a retail trade does not want to import a sufficient quantity of cotton to supply his retail trade for six months, and, when he purchases cottons, he purchases enough to supply him for the six months, giving his order for the cottons to be shipped to him at certain periods during the six months at a quotation. Now he cannot do this. If he goes to those institutions now, and wants a certain quantity of cotton to be sent to him at once, a certain quantity at two months and a certain quantity at three months, he cannot get a quotation for the cotton. He does not know what price he will have to pay for it. The manufacturers tell him: We will quote the prices of cotton that is sent to you to-day, but we cannot give you the quotation for cotton that you want six months hence; you will have to take the cotton without and cannot help yourselves. That is the position the merchants of our country have to take with reference to those institutions that were making 16 and 18 per cent. profit before the imposition of this duty.

MR. MACKENZIE: They are competing with each other, too.

MR. GAULT: Some of them are making no profit at all.

MR. OLIVER: The prices of all iron and steel manufactures are increased to a large extent.

MR. JONES: No.

MR. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman says "no." There is not a six-year old boy from one end of this Dominion to the other who does not know that the prices have gone up. You cannot buy 100lb. of nails to-day without paying for them at least a dollar higher than before the imposition of this duty. There is another evil connected with this Tariff, and I consider it one of the greatest evils that can affect any country, and that is, the encouragement it gives to smuggling from one end of the Dominion to the other. Go to the Detroit River, to Windsor, Sarnia or Amherstburg; go into any of those towns on the frontier; go to the line between the Province of Quebec and the United States, or to the line between New Brunswick and that country, and all you have to do is to cross the line in the course of the day, buy what goods you want, and tell them that your kitchen door will be open, and you will find the goods there next morning. If you want a barrel of oil, all you have to do is to tell them that your barn door will be open, and you will find the barrel of oil put upon the stock next morning for you. That is all that is to be done. Notwithstanding that there are detectives appointed upon the Detroit river to detect and ferret out smugglers, there are parties continuously crossing, day and night, and bringing goods from that country. Now, it is said that this benefits the farmers. My hon. friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum) said it would benefit the farmers because it would give them a home market, and the next moment he proved that our exports were larger than they were before. Now, how can that be? If our exports of the products of the soil, of animals and other things have increased, how is it possible that the farmers have a larger home market than before. Now, we find that the only thing that has increased in price is wheat. We know well why that is. It is known that it was the failure of the wheat crop in Great Britain and Europe that caused the increase of price, and we had an extra good crop. But suppose there had been a fair average price in Europe last year, and that we had had a small crop, I venture to say the price would not have been over 80c. a bushel. We also find that the price of barley is lower than before. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government said that as soon as 15 per cent. was put on barley, the price would be increased to the Canadian producer by 15c. per bushel. Has that prediction been fulfilled? We find that before the defeat of the late Government barley was worth $1.10, and the highest price now is 80c. per bushel. We find that the price of oats, peas and other cereals are in some instances lower than before and in some instances higher. We find also that live stock has decreased in value since that time. I am not saying that it is the National Policy that has brought down the prices, but I am merely stating that the arguments adduced by hon. gentlemen opposite before the last election were unsound, and the predictions made by them have not been realised by the country. We find in the new Tariff another little sop to the farmers. We find amongst the schemes of the hon. the Finance Minister one of the greatest marvels ever advanced on the floor of Parliament, and it is that of a tax of 3c. a pound on long wool, of which we do not consume a pound in this country. It was said by the right hon. gentleman that the American policy was an unscientific policy, but the policy he was going to carry out in this House would be a scientific one. All the wool we manufacture in this country and import is short wool from the Cape, from the Australian Colonies and South America. Now, the hon. the Finance Minister, perhaps, is not aware that we raise not only long wool, in this country but short wool. Whether he is aware of it or not he is giving protection to one farmer and to another farmer none. Here is a farmer with a flock of one hundred long woolled sheep, and his neighbor has a flock of one hundred South downs on an adjoining farm. The farmer with the long woolled sheep has a protection of 3c. per pound, while his neighbour with the South-downs has no protection. Would the hon. gentleman explain what science there is in that. We imported last year 4,976,000lb. of wool, every pound of which was short wool, and every pound of that wool came into competition with the short wool raised in this country. Why, if the long wool, which we do not manufacture in this country, is protected, should not the short wool, that we do manufacture, be protected? It will be difficult for the hon. gentleman to explain where the science comes in in this item. Now, we find another piece of science in this Tariff. A year ago I tried to convince the Government that it would be wise to give the people of Manitoba and British Columbia the privilege of importing stock free of duty. But the Government would not adopt that view; it was scientific to put a duty upon them, and I understand now they are about to give the privilege of importing stock into that country free of duty, and thus that which was science last year is not science to-day. Now, what does that scientific policy cost us? The hon. the Finance Minister had a great deal of help in producing this marvel. We find that he had the assistance of W. H. Frazer, Senator Falre and others, and that there was paid for outside help $3,999. There is another serious objection to this Tariff in the duty that is imposed upon western corn. We find that there is a large trade developing between this country and England in the export of beef. By the imposition of 7½c. upon western corn, the price of raw material for feeding this stock is increased to that extent, and we are less able to compete with the Western States in the English market in the item of beef. Another thing is that it puts the English and Scotch feeders upon the same footing with the Canadian feeders, 3,000 miles away from the English market. One of the English delegates to this country stated to myself last summer that they were laying down western corn in Liverpool at the same price that was then being paid for it in Canada. Now, this is an injury to the Canadian feeder, and the sooner it is remedied the better for this new industry that has grown up in this country. I have done with that, for I believe that the whole Tariff has been an injury, with the exception of a benefit to the manufacturers of cotton, the manufacturers of wool, and the refiners of sugar; but I desire before I take my seat to make a few very short remarks with reference to the finances of our country. We have heard that the late Government, which was lead by my hon. friend from Lambton, was the most extravagant Government that ever ruled in this country; that the present Government since they came into power have been going on reducing the public expenditure, that, in order to reduce the expenditure, some 200 or 300 hands have been dismissed from the Intercolonial Railway, and that a large number of employés have been dismissed in the Dominion from the various services for the same purpose. What do we find on comparing the Public Accounts with the Estimates now before the House, and that is scarcely a fair comparison, for the simple reason that, in all probability, before this House rises, we will have Supplementary Estimates adding to the present Estimates. We all know that, for a large amount which appeared in the Public Accounts of 1878-9, the Government was not and is not responsible. I find, by a comparison of the Public Accounts of 1878-9 with the Estimates now before the House, that the amount of interest on loan has been increased by the sum of $543,000. If there was one thing my hon. friend was condemned for by hon. gentlemen opposite, it was for having increased the Public Debt and the yearly taxes of the people to pay for the interest on that Public Debt. We find that Civil Government has been increased by $56,000. We find that the Administration of Justice has been increased by $30,000. We find that the Pension and Superannuation payments have been increased by $25,000. My hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was charged that the Pension and Superannuation sums had increased too rapidly during his Administration. We find that, in regard to Customs, the increase is $4,854. I remember the elaborate statements that used to be made by the present Minister of Customs to show that the percentage, as compared with the collection of the Customs duties, was greater under the Administration of the late Government than under the Government which preceded it. Now, Sir, with all his pretensions, with all his elaborate statements, we find that he has been compelled to increase the expenditure of that Department by $4,854. We find that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has also had to increase his expenditure by the large amount of $24,000. We find that the Post Office expenditure has been increased by $67,000. We find that the total Estimates amount to $25,007,203, to which ought to be added $300,000 for surveying Dominion lands in the North-West. In looking over the Public Accounts, I find that the Administration of the right hon. gentleman, previously to 1873-4, paid for surveying Dominion lands $735,601; and during the Administration of my hon. friend the member for Lambton he paid out of revenue $667,981 for that service, making in all $1,403,582. If there is one proof of the deplorable condition of the country it is that we have to borrow money to survey our lands in the North-West. Why should that $300,000 be charged against capital account instead of, as it was, against revenue account? It is to lessen the estimate for Consolidated Revenue, and make it appear to the country that hon. gentlemen opposite have kept their Estimates down to the very lowest figure. The Public Debt of the Dominion was $147,481,557 when my hon. friend from Lambton left power. When he took office it was $140,000,000. Now, according to the Public Accounts of 1878-9, since that time the hon. the Minister of Finance has borrowed $15,000,000. There is a scheme before the country to make a forced loan on the people of this country to the amount of $10,000,000. That will increase the Public Debt of the country to $172,481,557 or, taking the population at 4,000,000, the Public Debt will amount to $43 per head. The debt of the United States is only $46 per head, after going through one of the most gigantic civil wars that ever afflicted a civilised country. In the Dominion we have a debt of $43 per head, and we have never had a struggle of any description, and we have never had a life lost, except one or two, in the change of Government or the settlement of established Government throughout the length and breadth of this country. If there is a party in this country in favour of annexation, and it is said there is, although I do not know that there are any in my section of the country, it will be one of the strongest arguments in their possession that we are increasing our debt while the United States are reducing theirs. It is time for the people of this country to pause and think of what they are doing. It is time for them to pause and consider what the future of this country is going to be. When we find that the adjoining Province of Quebec is $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 in debt, when we find the Province of Nova Scotia making demands upon the Treasury, when we find gentlemen here from Manitoba asking for better terms, when we find the whole of the people dissatisfied from one end of the Dominion to the other, with reference to the finances of the Dominion, it is time for the people of this country to halt and pause and consider what they are doing. I consider that we ought to be careful in the large expenditures which we are undertaking at the present time. Why, Sir, there should be nothing undertaken until our finances are in a better condition. There should be nothing undertaken that has not been contracted for and entered upon by the contractors with the Dominion Government. All public works, except works of absolute necessity, ought to be put a stop to. Look at the enormous amount of money that it will require to build this gigantic Pacific Railway, from the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean. Add the amount that will be incurred in the construction of that work to the present Public Debt, and you will find that the debt of Canada will greatly exceed that of the United States. I hold that every public work, both for the improvement of navigation and the opening up of the country with railways which are not absolutely necessary, and which have not been entered upon, ought to be discontinued. There is only one more matter which I desire to refer to. We have heard a great deal about the writing on the wall since this discussion commenced. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen that the National Policy was not an issue during the last Local election, but I think the House has received sufficient proof to warrant the conclusion that it was. I have, however, one or two other items of proof which will further convince them that it was an issue before the country previous to and during the last election. What says one of the Conservative organs just previously to the last election:

“The Grits hope by their raving; to make the Tilley Tariff so unpopular before the Local election that they think Mowat may squeeze in by a narrow majority, and thus hold the Ontario Government. They will fail, however. The Local Opposition are not afraid to go to the country on the National Policy, and to show their colours they have put themselves on record in the Local House. They moved the following resolution: ‘That this House, while deeply regretting that the country still continues to suffer under depression, is of the opinion that the depression might have been mitigated by judicious legislation; and further regret that the members of the Executive Council of the Province of Ontario did, during the late Dominion Elections, identify themselves with the policy of those who opposed legislative measures tending to the relief of the industries of the country."

That resolution was put upon record in the Local House of Assembly. I have another nice little piece from the flourishing city of Hamilton, that magnificent centre of commerce and manufacturers. This is what that city did before they elected a gentleman to represent them in the Conservative interest. I will read the preamble and the resolution. They are as follow:—

"That this Convention recognises in the new Tariff now before the House of Commons a faithful and an honest fulfilment of the promises made to the people by the leaders of the present Dominion Government.

"That, in the opinion of this Convention, the said Tariff is well calculated to promote the prosperity of the country and to develop its industrial resources.

"That the Ontario Government, having used its influence and its patronage to prevent the adoption of the said Tariff, there is grave reason to apprehend that it would use them to embarrass the Dominion Government in their effort to give the said Tariff full effect, should the said Ontario Government be sustained in the approaching elections.

"It is therefore resolved, That, in the opinion of this Convention, the Ontario Government is not entitled to the support of the electors of this Province."

That was the resolution passed in the city of Hamilton when they were selecting a gentleman in the Conservative interest to become their standard bearer. What did my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) say on the strength of that resolution? He said that, if a Reformer or a Grit was elected at Hamilton to support the Mcwat Government, he would consider he was sitting as their representative under false pretences.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton): I merely wish to remark that the statement of the hon. member for North Oxford is not in accordance with the fact. I never made such a statement. It has been contradicted over and over again in the press, and I am astonished that he should reiterate that which, of his own knowledge, is not a fact.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know of my own knowledge that it is not a fact. I think the hon. member for Hamilton is a little too strong in his remarks. I accepted the statement, which was not corrected, and which appeared in the public press, that, when this resolution was passed, the hon. gentleman said that, if the Conservative candidate was not elected, he would consider he was representing the people of Hamilton under false pretences. If the hon. gentleman did not say that, I accept his denial of it, but I would like to know what he did say with respect to that resolution, or if he said anything at all. The published statement not being contradicted, I was under the impression that the hon. gentleman had changed his views from that time, and that he thought that if he was to represent the people of Hamilton under false pretences, the best thing he could do was to represent them for the balance of the period under false pretences, for he was never going to be returned again. This is what I considered the view of the hon. gentleman. I thank the House for their great kindness in paying such attention to the remarks I have made.

MR. SPROULE: I have listened with some attention to the remarks that have been made with reference to this Tariff by the hon. gentleman, who appears to have included in his speech denunciations against every member of the party favouring this Tariff who has spoken on the subject. He said at the commencement of his address that he was not likely to detain the House long. After that, he travelled over the greater part of this country from the east to the west, from Nova Scotia to Vancouver Island, and from the south to the north. He called up every shade of argument against the National Policy in support of the position he has taken, and the position that every other member in this House on the Opposition side has taken. He said just before closing that he believed, in some cases, there had been an increase in prices, but at the same time he was not going to say it was due to the National Policy. They have always failed to recognise or to admit anything good as coming from the National Policy, but, wherever there has been a lowering in the price, they have been only too anxious to attribute that to the failure of the National Policy. About a year ago this House was employed in a most animated discussion in reference to the prospects of the new Tariff, and it was then a matter of theory. That theory was based upon substantial reasoning, and is largely borne out to-day, and will satisfy any reasoning mind that the opinions then promulgated were well founded. It was predicted that the National Policy would not be a boon to the labourers of this country, but we are able to prove that the National Policy has been a great boon to the labourers of this country. It is only by comparing the condition of the labourers a few years ago with their condition to-day, that we are able to form a correct opinion as to whether it has or has not been a benefit. We are not in possession of very elaborate statistics, but, so far as the statistics go, we are able to show that it has worked successfully and given more employment to the labouring classes. If we look at the last six months of 1879, and the last six months of 1878, we shall be able to form an idea on this particular point. If the products were greater, and if the country was able to export more during the last six months of 1879 than during the last six months of 1878, it must be an evidence that the country was better employed. In the last six months of 1878 the produce exported amounted to nine million dollars, worth. In the last six months of 1879 these exports were increased to a little over ten millions. During the last six months of 1878, animals and products amounted to $8,972,000, but in the same period of 1879 they amounted to $11,500,000. This is surely a large increase, and an increase in the right direction. Agricultural products, a line of all others in which farmers in this country are interested, amounted in the last six months of 1878 to $17,556,000, but in the last six months of 1879 to $22,688,000. This is evidently an improvement, and an improvement in the right direction, and a true argument that the country is in a better condition to-day than in 1878. I believe that, in ascertaining what the condition of the country is, it is essentially necessary to ask how the people are employed, and, if you find them mostly employed, and working mutually for each others' wants, and in such a manner that the employment is distributed fairly, so as to produce what the people of the country want, the nearer in every line you can approximate to that, the nearer may you assume the country to be in a healthier condition. In looking over the various departments, we reasonably ask the question. Are they better employed than they were a few years ago? Take the farmers. It was said by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) that the farmers and the labourers of this country had not been benefitted by the National Policy, and the hon. member for West Middlesex challenged any member to produce one instance where agricultural employment had improved or increased to the benefit of the farmer since 1878. I think it was very strange that he should dare to draw upon the credulity of the public and risk his own reputation by sending broadcast among the farming community such a statement as that. If we compare grain this year with grain last year, the difference is very great, and will show a decided advantage to-day in favour of the farming community over the position they were in twelve months ago. In order to make a comparison, I took the file of the Globe for December, 1878, and I took down the prices for every day in that month. I then took the Globe for December, 1879, and did the same. I added together the prices for the different days, and then I divided the result by the days of the month, and thus struck the average price. I thought this would be a very good criterion to show whether the agriculturists in this country were receiving more or less now for their labour than formerly. In December, 1878, I find that the average price for wheat, thus ascertained, was 84c. per bushel, but in the corresponding month of 1879 it was $1.28 per bushel. Now, take oats. It was contended, and very strongly, that the duty imposed upon oats, which was intended to prevent the Americans from sending their oats into this country, would not improve the price of oats here. But I find that the average price of oats in December, 1878, was 31c. per bushel, while, in December, 1879, by the Globe's own showing, oats were 39c. per bushel, or 8c. per bushel more. It does not require a large amount of intelligence for the farmer to see through this, and they cannot help, while they have access to the press of this country, seeing that they are now receiving more for their grain than in 1878. Take peas. In December, 1878, the average price of peas was 62c., while, in the same month of 1879 it was 69c., or a difference of 7c. per bushel. Then take pork; another article in which the farmer is greatly interested. In December, 1878, he was getting for pork $4.36 per cwt., but in the same month of 1879 the price was $6.45, or a difference of $2.09 per cwt. I think any farmer can see that it is an improvement. Any farmer, having a hundredweight of pork to sell will require more than the logical reasoning of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) and of the hon. member for North Oxford to show him that he is receiving no benefit from the National Policy. Take the article of wool, a special article, which, it was pointed out, would be deteriorated by the National Policy. It was contended that there were 2,400,000lb. which we could not sell, and that the highest figure it would bring was 21c. per pound, but we find that at the end of 1879 it had gone up to 31c. per pound, a difference of 10c. per pound in favour of the farmer. Now, hon. gentlemen may take exception to the National Policy on this score, in view of the fact that, whilst there was no duty placed upon wool, it was higher last December than in the previous December, but the reason given for the probable increase of the price of wool was that a large amount of carpets could be manufactured in this country, and a large amount of other goods, that were previously imported, and the wool used for that purpose would cause an increased market at home, and that it would give us a higher figure for that commodity. The result has justified that opinion. Take now the article of butter. In 1878 it was only 17c. per pound. In 1879 it rose to 22c. These are the principal articles on which the farmer depends for his living. Every farmer is able to see that he is receiving a substantial benefit from the National Policy, and when he can see this it must destroy his respect for the integrity of those gentlemen in this House who say that the farmers are no better off than during the Administration of the late Government. I may say in reference to the assertion made by the hon. member for North Oxford, that farms are sold at a much lower price this year than they were a few years ago, and that therefore the country is not in a prosperous condition, that this is largely due to the heavy emigration from the Provinces to the North-West. We have an unlimited country, which is being settled, a country specially adapted for agricultural purposes, where farmers may find a fair remuneration for their labour, and where they may be able to raise a good deal more than they have been able to do here. This is the reason why there is not a larger demand for farms in this part of the Dominion, and this is the only sound reason that can satisfy any thinking mind on this point. It is in no way attributable to the effects of the National Policy. The hon. member for Lambton said that some 200,000 emigrants had gone over the line in consequence of the high Tariff which confronted them at every town. Why should they do that, when they would be met in crossing over the line with a much higher Tariff on the other side? It seems a strange and very feeble argument for the hon. gentleman to make use of. It is said that the labouring class in this country—which is a very large and numerous class—are not in so healthy and prosperous a condition, and are not paid so well as they was a year ago. I think anyone travelling in this part of Ontario will see that there is not by any means the same amount of poverty existing to-day as there were a year ago, and not so many dependent upon public charity as there were a year ago. Look at the few that came here a short time ago to ask for employment. They were told that, if they would call at the town hall, and give in their names, efforts would be made to find them employment. How many names were left there? I am credibly informed that there were only some three or four names given. I am quite satisfied, and a great many hon. gentlemen in this House are satisfied, that that was nothing more than a political manœuvre, made use of to bolster up a sinking cause, by the hon. gentlemen representing the Opposition in this House. It was nothing more than an attempt to show that there was a large number of people out of employment, and that the labourers in this country were in as bad, if not in a worse condition, than they were a few years ago. On this particular subject, I may say that it is well known that the

Savings Banks of our country will serve as a good criterion for ascertaining the real state of the labouring classes. The depositors in the Post Office Savings Banks are generally of the labouring class, because they are not able to accumulate large sums to invest in lines giving more ample securities and a higher return. They put away just as much as they can spare after providing for the necessaries of life, and deposit it in the Post Office Savings Bank. In looking over the returns for the last six months of 1879, and comparing them with the same period of 1878, we can form a good idea of the comparative condition of the labouring classes. I find that these deposits for the six months up to the end of December, 1878, were 20,000 in number, while, at the end of the same period of 1879—if the state of poverty which has been said to exist did exist, the labouring classes, who were, as has been said, largely dependent on charity, would be tempted to draw out their deposits—there were 28,000 deposits. The amount deposited in the six months ending 31st December, 1878, was $864,504, and in the same period of 1879 we have an increase, the amount deposited being $1,458,000. I think hon. gentlemen must see in this an evidence of prosperity. The number of new deposits in 1879, compared with 1878, shows still more conclusively an increase of prosperity. In the last six months of 1878 the number of new deposits was 4,000, in the same period of 1879 the new deposits were 7,000, or 3,000 more new deposits in 1879 than in 1878. In looking over these deposits, it is satisfactory evidence to my mind that the labourers in this country are better off than they were a year ago. As to the wages of these people, it was said that they were lower. I remember that the hon. member for West Middlesex stated that he was prepared to assert that wages were not as high in 1879 as in 1878. Well, I recognised this through his very long speech, that he was prepared to assert anything, the whole of his argument being based on his own simple assertions. He was ready to assert that the labouring men were not earning better wages now than they were a year ago. I may say that I was applied to by farmers who required hands to help in the harvest. I communicated with Mr. Donaldson, and asked him for eighteen men, but, instead of eighteen, only three could be sent. He said that the demand for labour was so great throughout the country that he could not send any more, and he stated further that the men would want their $18 to $25 per month for wages. I reminded him that wages were only from $14 to $16 a month a year ago, and he replied that times were better, and that they were asking better wages, and were getting better wages now. We can reasonably expect this condition of things to exist when we find that the farmer receives 4c. a bushel more for wheat, 8c. more for oats, $2.09 per cwt. more for pork, 10c. a pound more for wool, and 5c. more for his butter. I say it is all natural, and the labouring man must expect to get and must get a higher price for his labour. In advancing his theory in reference to the imports, one hon. gentleman gave the returns for the six months to show that the country is not in as prosperous a condition as it was some time ago. He compared the total imports for consumption for 1878 with the total of 1879, and, because he found the latter less, he argued that the country was not in as healthy a condition. If that hon. gentleman had only taken the trouble to investigate the facts, he would have been compelled to admit that his figures were only a verification of the arguments advanced on this side of the House a year ago. He would have found that the falling off in imports was due to an increased manufacture here, which had given employment to a large number of men, who were formerly out of work. Let us look at the figures. In 1878 we imported for home consumption, from Great Britain, $16,000,000 worth of goods; but in 1879 our imports from that country amounted only to $15,000,000, or a decrease of $1,000,000. Our imports for home consumption from the United States in 1878 amounted to $21,000,000; in 1879 they were only $14,000,000, or a falling off of $7,000,000. This ought to be a strong argument against the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, who claimed that the new Tariff would operate more against Great Britain than the United States. The decrease in imports proves, to my mind, that, when the people found the necessity of manufacturing those different lines of goods they formerly imported, capital was invested in that direction, the unemployed labour was employed in those manufactures, and the goods were made at home, instead of abroad. Establishments were restored in every part of the country that a few years ago were crumbling to ruin. It has been stated that the manufacturers were the only class prospering under the Tariff, and the same hon. gentleman took the trouble to tell the House that they made large profits before, but that now they are heaping up colossal fortunes. He ought to have informed himself of the condition of the manufacturers previous to the introduction of the Tariff. It is only necessary for me to cite a few instances to prove that they were not in a prosperous condition. Looking over the returns made when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, I find a deplorable condition of things. In 1873, there were seven companies engaged in the manufacture of bolts and nuts by machinery, for our railways and other public works. They were situated in Halifax, Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Paris, Port Hope, London and Hamilton. A capital of $200,000 was invested in that industry, and a large number of men were employed. What was the condition of this branch in 1878? Only $20,000 remained of the large capital invested; the factories were idle, and the men had been compelled to go to other places in search of work. Only one establishment in that line using machinery was in operation. Was that a healthy condition of things? Was that an evidence of manufacturers rolling up large fortunes? I think it is the most unmistakable evidence of a deplorable state of affairs, which must have grieved every lover of his country and humanity. But what is the condition with respect to that line now? In the short space of twelve or fourteen months, under the fostering influence of this Tariff, several establishments have started, some employing fifty, some sixty, some nearly one hundred men, and every labouring man employed in those factories probably represents the feeding of a family of five persons. Thus we find that hundreds of men have found employment in one branch of industry owing to the introduction and beneficent operations of the National Policy. Then I find from these same returns that we formerly had eleven glass manufacturers in this country. At one time that trade was doing well, but, owing to the strong competition of the Americans and their successful efforts in throwing their over-production into Canada, the glass manufacturers were compelled to abandon the business, and in 1878 there was only one establishment in operation, and that was in the manufacturing city of Hamilton. Now, if that state of affairs is regarded by hon. gentlemen opposite as encouraging, they must arrive at their conclusions by a strange mode of reasoning, which no intelligent men would adopt. Under the National Policy, however, the Burlington Glass Works, with several other establishments of that class, have been resuscitated, and are now running in full blast, this one with a force of 100 men. Allowing, as before, that each workman represents five mouths that are fed by his labour, this must be encouraging evidence to every impartial mind that the country is in a better condition than it was when hon. gentlemen opposite sat on the Treasury Benches. Then, what is the verdict in reference to the mercantile class. It has been argued that, because there was a large number of bankruptcies for the last year, the commercial community was not in a healthy condition, and that it was owing to the deleterious effects of the National Policy. These hon. gentlemen forget that a man could not start in business to-day and break down immediately—he will run a few years at least before he will give in. We explain the increase in the number of bankruptcies by the fact that the country had been going down for years, and finally reached the climax of depression. When the worst came to the worst, and traders saw no gleam of better times, they began to hand over their estates to the assignees to settle up. It may be that the dawn of a better era, to be inaugurated by the National Policy, induced some to seek relief in bankruptcy, in the hope of starting anew when the good time came; but it is nevertheless the fact that the country was going down hill all the time hon. gentlemen opposite managed its affairs. The statements of the Monetary Times, the Montreal Herald, and other representative papers in different parts of the Dominion, show that merchants are paying their way better and buying more freely, and that the prospects of the future are visibly brightened, and all classes believe we have started on an era of permanent prosperity. If we had had a steady winter, and the roads had been good, we would have been able to tell a tale in that particular line which would have astonished those who are most sceptical in regard to the improved condition of the small traders. Then let us refer to the lumber trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite contended that that interest would be ruined by the National Policy; that the duty on pork would increase the expenditure of lumbermen, and they would be unable to secure men except at higher wages, and would not be able to carry on their business. How far do those assertions square with the facts? To-day lumber is nearly one-third higher than it was a year ago. It is true that this is partially due to the rise in lumber in European countries, but that does not wholly explain the advance. It is partially due to the result of the policy of the Government. It has established confidence in the country. People are building houses and factories, and much more lumber is being consumed in Canada than was a year ago, and, as a natural consequence, the price has gone up. The hon. members who advance the theory that the advance in the prices of articles which Canadians have to sell must be accounted for solely by the fact that the price of those articles has gone up in Europe are not ready to admit that the almost universal advance here is due to an entirely different cause. I claim that the National Policy has restored confidence, and we find capitalists, who a year ago kept their money locked up, investing freely in various undertakings, and thus assisting in the return of better times. We have more people employed to-day than were at work a year ago, there is more capital in circulation, and there is a more cheerful and hopeful spirit among all classes of the community. Anyone who looks at the condition of our large cities will see that there are not the number of men walking around out of work there was last year. There must be some reason for this, and we find it in the confidence which has followed the wise policy of the Government. I think we have sufficient evidence to warrant us in saying that there are 25,000 men now in employment who were idle last year; but place the figure at 10,000, and allowing five persons to be supported by each man, we have 50,000 people now self-sustaining whom the country was compelled to support in some other way a year ago. The hon. members for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver), West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), and Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) endeavoured to show that the result of the late elections in Ontario was due to the National Policy. While the contest was going on, I had the pleasure of meeting many representative men, and I can state that at public meetings and elsewhere they gave the strongest assurances that the election was not to be fought on the National Policy, but that the Conservatives should call in question the actions of the Government of the Province. I went from platform to platform in my county, and I never, except on two or three occasions, heard the National Policy question referred to or used, as an argument. There were other questions in which the people were more intimately interested. We had the question of the educational system of the country; the exemption of property from taxation; the liquor license laws; the expenditure on the Government public works; colonisation schemes; Model Farm expenditure and usefulness, etc.; distribution of the Railway Funds, in the unfair way they did it. These were the vital questions that tested the strength of political parties in Ontario in the last contest. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that this assertion will but detract from the respect in which they are held by many of their friends in Ontario. The election was fought fairly upon the ground of the merits or demerits of the Local Government; and, while we might give many explanations in reference to the result of the elections, we cannot, in justice to the National Policy, admit there was a verdict in any part of the Province upon it. Notwithstanding the fact that those hon. gentlemen opposite have brought forward in their organs statements to show the hon. the First Minister said this or that in reference to that contest, they forget this was on the eve of the voting, when the minds of the people were made up and the verdict rendered, although not recorded. I visited a large number of places in various ridings, and only at three meetings was the National Policy called in question at all. I think this ought to satisfy us that the country is in a more healthy condition and the people are happier than before the introduction of this policy, and that they are looking forward to a not very far distant time when the country will return to that prosperity enjoyed in 1873, when the men now wielding its destinies were in power. It would require a great waste of argument and much sophistry to establish the theory that the National Policy is doing the country great injustice or injury. No matter how often the assertion is made, or from what authority, I believe that the hon. gentlemen opposite are only weakening their own strength among the representative classes of the country, especially with the agriculturists, manufacturers and labourers, when they try to sustain the proposition that the country is in no better condition than before the introduction of the National Policy.

MR. GIGAULT: Our new Tariff was adopted a year ago. In view of what has since occurred, have we any reason to regret the step that we took, and does the public interest require that we should modify our Tariff and accept the Free-trade principles of the Liberal party? If we were wrong in adopting a system of Protection, pride ought not to prevent us from acknowledging the fact, for the Conservative party have always aimed at promoting the material and moral welfare of the Canadian people. If, on the contrary, events justify the position which we assumed, duty commands us to follow up with energy the path which we traced out. During the discussion on the Tariff last Session, the Liberal party prophesied that the system would cut short the revenue from Customs. Has that prediction been verified? Certainly not; for the revenue from Customs has increased to \$6,678,191.39 in the last six months of 1879, as against \$6,320,863.20 in the last six months of 1878. The Liberals also prophesied that our financial policy would ruin our credit, especially in England, and yet since last Session the hon. the Minister of Finance has been compelled to effect a loan, which he obtained upon conditions and at a rate of interest of a more favourable nature than has been the case in relation to any previous loan. By the Public Accounts, which have just been distributed to us, it appears that the average interest on the part of our debt which is payable in England, has been reduced from 5.55 per cent. to 4.51 per cent. This is how our credit has been ruined among English capitalists. At the last General Elections we maintained that a people, like an individual, which buys more than it sells, that is to say, which imports more than it exports, is likely to experience a great dearth of money. For several years past the amount of our imports exceeded our exports by several millions of dollars annually, and we contended that a system of Protection would have the effect of diminishing our imports and increasing our products and our exportations. By the statement of our exports and imports which has just been submitted to us, we observe that our imports during the last six months of 1879 amounted to \$34,048,874, and our exports to \$54,283,841 for the same period of time, thus showing that our exports considerably exceeded our imports. The Liberal party maintained that our policy would have the effect of irritating the Americans and that our trade with them would suffer. Yet we note with satisfaction that our exportations to the United States amounted to \$17,699,705 during the last six months of 1879, while for the corresponding period of the year 1878 our exports to our neighbours only reached \$16,860,895. In his speech on the Address, the hon. member for West Durham expressed a desire to have a representative at Washington for the purpose of negotiating a Reciprocity Treaty which would provide for our products easy access to the American markets, an attainment which the Opposition, with reason, consider most advantageous. Now, what is the legislation which has placed the American market in so enviable a position? Is it not a Protective policy, the very system which our Liberals denounce as so fraught with ruin, which has produced in the American Republic the magnificent results which we all admire? The hon. member for Lambton, in his speech on the Address, declared that it was his intention to encourage Canadian manufactures by opening foreign markets to us. He understood that it is the duty of a Government to encourage industries; he was ready to bestow riches on the manufactures which to-day he appears so greatly to despise, but the means proposed could not have the effect desired. How would he have our industrial establishments, as yet young and tottering, contend on the foreign markets with foreign manufactures, while our manufacturers have not possession of our own market, and cannot contend even here with foreign competition? The present Government has begun by ensuring to us the control of our own market, and is labouring with energy and perseverance to open wide to us the markets of France and Spain. That is the only policy which can give an impetus to our industries and cause them to prosper. The hon. member for Lambton still repeats his assertion that the Tariff must of necessity compel the consumer to pay higher prices for our manufactured products, and makes that assertion when he knows that the American manufacturers, in spite of the system of Protection, or rather, thanks to that system, sell their manufactured products at extremely low prices; he makes that assertion, when he knows that, during his own short tenure of office, the American manufacturers, while paying a duty of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., used to rush their goods into our market and sell them at lower prices than our own manufacturers, under the system so highly vaunted, but which has proved so fatal to the hon. the leader of the Opposition. Notwithstanding the gloomy forebodings of the Liberals, our fiscal policy has already produced most gratifying results, and we can face the future with confidence and trust. The advantages of our Tariff are not to be judged by the experience of one year. When the abolition of the Supreme Court was under discussion, the hon. member for West Durham spoke as follows: "We are like children, who plant seeds in their garden in the morning, and pluck them up in the evening to see if they are growing, when we pluck up an institution which has hardly had time to germinate." If we were children because we wished to abolish the Supreme Court, organised five years ago, under the late Administration, how much more puerile is the conduct of those who wish to destroy a Tariff established only one year ago, when it is certain that our Tariff has produced better results than the Supreme Court. The National Policy which has just been inaugurated, has helped us to rise from the state of depression into which we had fallen. Money is more abundant, a larger number of tradesmen are employed, and any man who is not blinded by party feeling, will admit that Canada is in a more prosperous condition than she has been of late years. Let us not be surprised to hear the Opposition proclaiming that our policy is the ruin of the country. For thirty years past they have always repeated the same cry, but that has not prevented Canada from advancing, thanks to that same policy. When the Government were helping to build the Grand Trunk Railway, we were about to be ruined. The building of the Victoria Bridge was also to ruin us; and yet the Liberals themselves are now asking for the construction of another bridge opposite Montreal. Everyone must now admit that the establishment of our great railways has given a great impetus to the advancement of our country. When we consider that in 1851 our population was only 2,500,000, and that to-day it is 4,000,000; that in 1851 we had but 8,000,000 of acres of land under cultivation, and to-day we have 36,000,000 of acres settled upon; when we find that in 1844 we had only forty miles of railway, and that to-day we have 7,000 miles, we cannot but be astounded at the prodigious development of Canada; and at the same time we must admit that that development is due to the wise and enlightened policy of the Conservative party. Every time measures have been proposed which were calculated to increase our public wealth, the Liberal party has invariably undertaken to oppose the advancement of the country, and the efforts made to give Canada the position she is justly entitled to in view of our vast agricultural and other resources. Hence it is that we put but little faith in the predictions of our Liberal opponents. When the Opposition assert that our manufacturers cannot manufacture as cheaply, or give the same finish to the goods we import, they insult the intelligence and skill of our mechanics, who are not a whit behind the skilled artisans of other countries. After having examined the results we have attained from the fiscal policy inaugurated by the Ministry, we cannot but congratulate them on the patriotic course they have adopted, and promise our support to the policy of Protection, which is a fitting corollary to the policy carried out in reference to the railways and the canals.

MR. KING: It is not my intention to attempt a reply to the arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gigault), as I confess, to me, they appear unanswerable, since I fail to understand the language in which he has spoken. I propose, in dealing with this matter, to confine myself more particularly to the question as affecting the Province to which I belong. I regret that the hon. the Minister of Finance, in delivering his Budget Speech, should have thought proper to charge hon. members from New Brunswick, on this side of the House, with having, in their attempts to strike down a Minister of Finance, damaged the reputation and credit of their own Province. Let me say, Sir, I have no such desire. I venture the opinion that, if hon. gentlemen opposite would fairly consider the matter, they would concede that the hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick, on this side of the House, have quite as much interest in sustaining its reputation, interests, and credit as the hon. the Finance Minister and his small following from that Province. In his remarks the other day, he thought proper to characterise a petition laid on the Table, from 3,000 of the electors of St. John, N.B., as a piece of political clap-trap. With that I have nothing to do, but from his sentiment, nevertheless, I beg leave to differ. He said, if it was designed to influence the Government to change its policy, why was it put into the hands of men who did not agree with them? Are we to infer that only Government supporters should present such petitions?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No; I said why was its presentation delayed till that moment.

MR. KING: I have the report from the Ottawa Citizen, the only one I have seen. Its report gives the words I understood the hon. gentleman to utter, as follows:—

“If it was to influence the Government to make a change, why was it put into the hands of men who do not agree with us politically?”

Are we to infer from his remarks on that occasion that no representative of New Brunswick, for example, no matter how great its grievances may be, is to approach the Government with the hope of redress; that it may only be looked for when solicited by representatives in political accord with the Government. I take it for granted that is the inference that will be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks, and I think it came with bad grace from him, and that the doctrine will not go down with New Brunswick. I think that they understand too well their own position before Parliament to accept it, and know that they have the right of petition. He may treat with scorn the prayers of said petitions, but, notwithstanding, they will continue to present them so long as they remain aggrieved members of this Confederation. I do not propose to follow the hon. the Finance Minister through his Budget Speech, from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver; but there are some facts in connection with my own Province, with which I am familiar, and I will deal with these. If at present I had before me a map of Canada, and wished to ascertain its correctness, I would first examine places with which I was familiar, and, if I found their tracings were carefully drawn, and that all the surroundings were correctly delineated, I would take it for granted that the map was correct. But, if I found gross errors at those points, I should conclude the map was not a correct one. I intend to apply the same rule to-night. The speech of the hon. the Finance Minister is public property, and open to criticism, and, before I go further, I will call attention to some remarks he made last year in attempting to show the immediate effects of the National Policy in New Brunswick. He is reported as follows:—

“Since the 14th of last month, many of those manufactories which had closed down, have been re-opened. An Act was passed in the Legislature, a few days, to incorporate a company for a sugar refinery. Application has been made to extend a cotton manufactory, and increase the capital of the company. The glass works are again in operation.”

I ask the hon. the Finance Minister whether, while visiting the manufactories in St. John, last fall, he called at the glass factory, and found it in operation? I assert to-night that the National Policy has not had the effect described, and that the closed works at St. John could not be and were not revived by it. I think it would be somewhat difficult for him to point out the numerous factories that had been closed down previously, re-opened under this policy. A reference is made to the incorporation of a company to establish a sugar refinery in New Brunswick. I am quite sure the remarks could not have applied to the sugar refinery today being established in Moncton. I am almost positive that they applied to the proposed sugar refinery at Fredericton, which has since died a natural death. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman as to the enlargement of the cotton manufactory in St. John. That factory existed twenty years ago, and became prosperous long before the National Policy was heard of, and, so far as the principal articles manufactured at that establishment are concerned, it had the markets of New Brunswick under a 10 per cent. Tariff. We have no great cause to congratulate ourselves on the enlargement of that factory; it is intended the people of the rural districts shall pay for its enlargement. Cotton warps and factory cottons are subject to a duty of from 30 to 40 per cent., and in certain localities of New Brunswick the farmers are paying more for the support of that establishment than they are compelled to contribute to the support of their poor. We were told that Protection was going to revive slaughtered industries, and that the want of it had been the cause of the serious depression in the manufacturing interests of St. John. I ask the hon. the Finance Minister if the National Policy has had the effect of reviving the Coldbrook Rolling Mill; if that establishment, which formerly employed a large number of men, is in operation? There is no "hum" there—I only wish there was. I regret that many things are not in the condition the hon. gentleman describes. I believe that the raw material, old rails, formerly used to keep that factory running, have, within the last few months, been shipped to the United States, on Government account, and sold at prices far below their market value. I will read another extract from the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister this year, referring to St. John:

"I found the sash, door and carriage manufacturers were not doing as much as in 1874; the other manufacturers had doubled their capacity in the last six months, and were prepared to double it still further during the next year. When we find that, since the policy was inaugurated, in the town of Moncton a manufactory had been established with a capital invested of $200,000, $60,000 paid up," etc.

With reference to that factory, an impression prevails, and not without foundation, that it was in contemplation long before the introduction of the National Policy. The article proposed to be manufactured, a combination lock, is protected by a patent from the Dominion, as well as the United States, and I dare say, the British Government. It must appear to everybody that the manufacture of that lock, if an article of merit, can be as successfully prosecuted under a low as under a high Tariff. The hon. the Finance Minister further says:

"When we find a sugar refinery with capital subscribed and arrangements being made for its construction in the town of Moncton."

I believe that a number of gentlemen have formed a company in Moncton, and made arrangements as stated. We do not deny that it is possible, in that town, to carry on sugar refining successfully, when they have the Government of the Dominion at their back, willing, if report be true, to place the Government railway at their disposal to carry freight at reduced rates.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Hear, hear.

MR. KING: This makes a double kind of Protection. Reference was made by the hon. gentleman to a cotton factory at St. Croix River, as follows:—

"When we find that recently the inhabitants of the town of St. Stephens were summoned together for the purpose of considering the propriety of establishing a cotton factory on the St. Croix River, that would involve an expenditure of $300,000; that the site has been selected, the stock being subscribed, and that American capitalists offer to build it if the locality will free them from taxation for twenty years; when we find these various industries organised, involving a capital of $1,000,000, I will ask this House and the country whether Ontario and Quebec have shown a greater amount of enterprise."

We do not deny that a cotton factory may be run profitably there, though as yet less than $12,000 of stock has been taken in it; but we have no other foundation than the hon. gentleman for asserting that $1,000,000 is at present being invested in New Brunswick in manufactures. I think he fell into the same mistake this year as last, namely, counting his chickens before they were hatched. Last year, in attempting to prove the National Policy was just the thing for New Brunswick, he is reported as follows:—

“According to a statement made by Mr. Everett, the President of the Manufacturers' Association of the city and county of St. John, in 1874, as compared with 1878, giving the amount of capital invested, the number of males and females employed, and the annual wages paid, it appears that in 1874 there were 8,428 males, and 1,769 females employed in these manufacturing industries, and that in 1878 the number employed was reduced to 5,031 males and 1,821 females.”

I might just remark that I think in all fairness the hon. gentleman ought to have stated that, during the time that intervened between the making of that report in 1874 and 1878, two-thirds of the city of St. John had been destroyed by fire, and $15,000,000 over and above insurance had been swept away in a single night. I ask the hon. gentleman whether the reduction in the number of factory operatives was not as largely due to that fact as to any other. The hon. gentleman claimed that this falling off was due to the want of Protection and the sharp competition with the United States. During the Recess, it has been my good fortune to obtain a copy of the report of Mr. Everett, which I have carefully analysed. It will be understood that the hon. the Minister of Finance has sought to create the impression, whether warranted or not, that New Brunswick, according to population, was ahead of any other Province of the Dominion as a manufacturing centre. Let me read from Mr. Everett's report in order to see whether the position the hon. gentleman has taken is sustained by the report which he chosen to quote from. In the first place, we have: Blacksmiths, 100; coopers, 10; saw-mills, 2,225; bakers, 160; builders, 1,320; painters, 100; printers, 150; riggers, 70; shipsmiths, 35; spar-makers, 10; steam-fitters, 20; making a total of 4,200 people, whom the hon. gentleman classes as manufacturers. Now, I contend that these people are not in a proper sense manufacturers, and that instead of being benefitted by the operation of the National Policy, they are feeling the burdens imposed on them by it. Then we come to another class: Boat-builders, 25; block and pump-makers, 80; carvers, 72; iron-knee manufacturers, 60; sail-makers, 60; making in all 297. These men are solely dependent upon ship-building for their living, and, if the ship-builders get the drawback which the Government have promised them, they are in no way protected. Then we come to another class: Jewellers, 42; engravers, 60; match manufacturers, 30; milliners, 750; paint and lead, 13; soap-makers, 25. Total, 920. The hon. gentleman will recollect that last year, when the Tariff was under consideration, he said that the increase of 2½ per cent. in this direction was not for the purposes of Protection, but for the purpose of raising revenue with which to meet the anticipated deficit. I take it that the hon. gentleman will not claim that this class of persons are in anyway protected. Then we have harness-makers, 63; last-makers, 5; marble-workers, 70; sash and blind, 210; axe-makers, 27; nails and spikes, 272; carriage-makers, 120; foundries, 426; trunk-makers, 20; coffee and spices, 13; oil clothing, 5; tin-men, 71; brewers, 20; book-binders, 20; amounting to 1,342 in all. It is safe to assert that, notwithstanding the pretence to protect this class of manufacturers, the duties imposed on the raw material used by certain of them more than neutralised the benefits the Tariff was pretended to confer. Others of them had control of their markets heretofore, and asked no additional protection. Then we come to another class, who can fairly claim, and do deserve, full benefit from the protection afforded by the hon. gentleman's Tariff. These are the gentlemen who are unable to stand alone, and therefore require support from the Government: furniture, 150; tanneries, 75; cotton factories, 215; brushes, 50; hats and caps, 70; brass founders, 50; confectioners, 40; file-makers, 5; fishing tackle, 2; mattresses, 5; pianos and organs, 24; patent medicines, 6; potteries, 15; rope makers, 60; paper bags, 17; saw makers, 24; undertakers, 27—total, 835. There is still another class left: boot and shoe manufacturers, 1,071; clothing manufacturers, 800—total, 1,871. Of the boot and shoe-makers, undoubtedly a large proportion of the number alluded to never sought employment in a factory proper, but are engaged in custom work throughout the city and county of St. John, to which the report refers. The same will apply to those put down as manufacturers of clothing. I am satisfied that in the most flourishing time in St. John, there has not been so large a number employed in the manufacture of the ready-made article. Of the 9,420 manufacturers, as stated by the hon. gentleman in his Budget speeches, two years in succession, we find 4,200 belong to the labouring classes, and are in no way protected by the operation of the National Policy, and that less than 1,000 are receiving any direct benefit, while the remaining thousands are called upon to pay the taxes. I think that statements like this, uttered on the floor of the House, are calculated to mislead the members, and are entirely out of place, and I think the hon. gentleman should have looked into this statement more carefully before he put it forward to the injury of his own Province. Some hon. members may have voted for the National Policy, believing that it was for the best interests of the whole Dominion, including New Brunswick, and may have founded opinions upon statements such as the one to which I have alluded. My object is to place the responsibility on the right shoulders. The hon. the Minister of Finance, during the past year, thought proper to visit the different manufactories throughout the Dominion, and, in the course of his rambles, he visited St. John. I would suggest that, the next time he visits that city, if he is really desirous of getting correct information with regard to the prosperity of New Brunswick, he should look into the country market, and, as in case of the manufactures, he might put the following questions to the farmers, amongst whom he would doubtlessly find many of his former friends and supporters. It would have been reassuring to these gentlemen to know that a Minister of Finance took so great an interest in their welfare. Has the National Policy given you the home market which he promised you, and has the duty of 10c. per bushel on potatoes and oats succeeded in raising the price by keeping out the American article? He might go further, and ask whether the imposition of the duty on corn meal had tended to raise the price of coarse grains, oats, etc., as he asserted last winter it would. I think that one answer would have been all that was necessary. I do not hesitate to say that the hon. gentleman would have found last summer those who would have told him that never within the past twenty years had the farmers in that Province been obliged to accept lower prices for the surplus products of their farms, or compelled to pay comparatively higher prices for the articles they have to purchase. The hon. the Minister of Finance might have found in that market the farmer in middling circumstances, who, perhaps, was trying to dispose of the products of a small dairy. That man might have told him that, whereas, previously to 1879, 20lb. of butter would have purchased a barrel of cornmeal, 30lb. would then be insufficient for that purpose, and that it would take the proceeds of 4lb. of butter to pay the duties alone. That farmer could also tell the hon. gentleman that the increased duty on pork that had been promised, but has been entirely overlooked in readjusting the Tariff, with other protection promised during the elections, had not benefitted him at all. It is true that, after the butter and cheese had nearly passed out of the hand of the farmers, there had been a rise, which was not due to the Tariff, as no additional duty had been imposed on these articles. If the hon. gentleman was not then satisfied, I would here recommend him to visit the shipyards and saw-mills of St. John, and, if he found the real "hum" in that direction, he might rest assured that his friends, the manufacturers, were in a prosperous condition without a doubt. In his Budget Speech, knowing the duty on corn-meal was unpopular in New Brunswick, he sought to satisfy the people of that Province by telling them that what they paid by way of duty on corn-meal was more than compensated for by the reduction of the tax on molasses. I desire to state in this connection that a considerable part of the decrease of duty on the article of molasses is due to the fact that molasses is 50 per cent. cheaper than it was the previous year. The amount realised by the application of an ad valorem duty must, in consequence, be greatly decreased. The hon. gentleman need not, therefore, take credit to himself for the whole of the reduction on molasses. It is true that, while he was in St. John, the glad news reached that city from the other side of the ocean that lumber had risen considerably in price. I have no doubt he was glad to hear of it, and am confident that he is looking to what he characterised last year as a waning industry for the means of meeting a large proportion of the deficiency he expects to have the present year. We do hope that the increase in the price of lumber will help to make the country prosperous in spite of the National Policy, and that operators in the business can afford an advance of wages to their employes. Let me now refer to some figures which I placed before the House last year with reference to that industry. I have had no reason to change my views as to the increased cost of producing lumber under the National Policy, except in one particular. I admit that I was misled by the opinions advanced by the hon. gentlemen opposite. They stated that without a doubt the one great result of the National Policy would be to increase the wages of the workingman, and I assumed that the wages of lumbermen would be likely to rise. But I admit in that I was mistaken. No such result has followed. Never, for twenty years, have I been able to get men so cheaply as I have during the past autumn. The hon. gentleman, however, when in St. John, admitted that the advance in the price of lumber was not due to the National Policy. During the last season, the impression was sought to be created that the hon. gentlemen who opposed the Tariff were the very gentlemen who, thirteen years ago, were opposed to Confederation. I am prepared to deny that. I myself did what I could in my humble way to assist in carrying the scheme of Confederation, and I am prepared to assert that in this House to-night there are gentlemen who violently opposed the introduction of that measure who are supporting the Finance Minister at the present time. It is true that we have on this side of the House some gentlemen who opposed that measure, and they can now return to their constituents and say: We told you so; all that we predicted with reference to the result of Confederation has proved to be true, while those who supported that measure have been humiliated. One of the principle objections to Confederation in New Brunswick was that, whereas the Tariff of Canada was higher than the Tariff of New Brunswick, there was great danger of that Tariff being applied to New Brunswick. I recollect that on several occasions, the hon. the Finance Minister quoted the utterances of Canadian statesmen to prove that such could never be the case. I recollect, and, if it were worth while, I could produce speeches which the hon. gentleman delivered, in which he utterly repudiated this idea. And yet we find him here, in less than twelve years, not a long time in the life of a nation, imposing the odious burdens of a Protective Tariff on his own Province. I say, Sir, that it was through such statements as these, put forth by the hon. the Minister of Finance himself, that the Opposition in New Brunswick to Confederation was disarmed. We were told that St. John was to be the Birmingham and Manchester of the Dominion.

MR. DOMVILLE: So it is.

MR. KING: I challenge the hon. gentleman, if he will travel from Quebec to Sarnia, search all over this back country, to say that he will find any of the products of St. John, save that of the Parker Cotton Factory.

AN HON. MEMBER: There are some of them here.

MR. KING: During the Confederation campaign, on account of their fear of increased taxation, a suggestion was made to the hon. the Minister of Finance—who at that time filled a more humble position, less remunerative, but no less honourable, than the position he now occupies—that the people of New Brunswick should be allowed to retain their revenue and set aside a portion of it towards the support of the Federal Government. To this he objected that, as St. John and Halifax were to do the importing for all this back country, Ontario and Quebec would never consent. How much importing in this way has St. John done for these Provinces? Then we were told, in New Brunswick, that our population would increase by 1881 to 400,000 inhabitants. In 1871 the population was 285,000, and I venture to say that, when the Census is taken next year, it will be found not to be far in excess of 300,000 inhabitants, and I am inclined to fear it will fall short of that number. I would recommend the Government not to lose any time in taking the Census, for, if within the next year emigration from that Province continues, the population will be considerably reduced.

MR. MACKENZIE: There may be no Census to take.

MR. KING: Hon. gentlemen have thought proper to deny the fact that people are leaving New Brunswick. I think that persons living there, and who are continually there, ought to know what is transpiring in that country. I know that people are leaving, and that they are not going to the North-West, as has been suggested. I know of none from the county I have the honour to represent, and in which the hon. gentleman was born, that have gone to the North-West, with the exception of one person, who did go to Manitoba, but he came away again three months afterwards.

MR. MACKENZIE: Perhaps he saw the Government advertisements about Minnesota.

MR. KING: Now, need we wonder that the people of that Province are discontented and discouraged, when they find that the debt of this Dominion is so rapidly accumulating, notwithstanding the promises made at the time of Confederation that thirteen million dollars, annually, would be sufficient for all purposes, and when they find the hon. the Minister of Finance is now asking for twenty-five or twenty-six millions of dollars—double the amount that he said would be required to carry on the affairs of the country. Need we wonder, when the people are made aware of these facts, that they are leaving the country discouraged, when we consider that in the last year an amount, equal to the per capita subsidy paid the three Maritime Provinces, was spent in subsidising 30,000 Indians in the North-West Territory. What can the people of New Brunswick think, but that they have sold—sold in the truest sense of the word—to the Indians. The hon. gentleman in his recent speech in St. John, concluded with a grand peroration, and, if he is correctly reported, he said his only fear was that we would not be able to find ships sufficient to carry the emigrants that would come to our shores destined for the North-West Territory. Now, we would like to see some emigrants in our own Province.

The hon. gentleman seems to be so enamoured of the North-West, that the suspicion is gaining ground in New Brunswick that, contrary to nature, he is looking for the sun to rise in the west. If, Sir, we had arrived at a period in the history of Confederation at which those gentlemen who have been instrumental in bringing it about had passed away, and if we had in this Parliament another set of men to deal with, we in New Brunswick would have good reason for opposing such a policy as that to which I am referring. But, when we find this self-same Protective Tariff being carried in this House by those who made us such promises, we can never consent to it, never.

AN HON. MEMBER: Hardly ever.

MR. KING: Under these circumstances, it need not be wondered at that the people of New Brunswick are against this policy; but, notwithstanding the future may look dark, the people of that Province do not wholly despair; to use a familiar phrase of the hon. the Minister of Finance, they see a "silver lining in the cloud." By the result of the Ontario Local elections, we may take it for granted that she has returned to her first love; Prince Edward Island is wheeling into line, Nova Scotia comes right side up every other time, Quebec will ere long have seen her folly, and, when the hour arrives for New Brunswick again to speak, she will be found true to the principles which have made her, and the Empire of which she forms a part, great, glorious and free.

SOURIS AND ROCKY MOUNTAINS RAILWAY COMPANY INCORPORATION BILL.

(Mr. Boulbee.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BOULTBEE moved that the 49th Rule of the House be suspended, in relation to the Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Souris and Rocky Mountains Railway, and that leave be now granted to introduce the same.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT : I think it was understood that, when the Rule was suspended, the special reasons therefor should be stated.

MR. BOULTBEE : As I stated the other day in the Committee, the proper notice was given and the petition presented for introducing this Bill three months ago. Petitions were sent from Rapid City at the proper time, but were delayed a month on the way, and only reached here a day too late.

Bill read the first time.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 80) To simplify Criminal Procedure in the Province of Quebec, and to dispense with Grand Juries in certain cases.—(Mr. Coursol.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the proposed motion (Sir Samuel L. Tilley). "That the resolutions adopted in Committee of Ways and Means, on the 9th inst., be now read the second time."

MR. DOMVILLE : When I moved the adjournment of the debate the other night, my hon. friend the member for Queen's, N.B., (Mr. King), was loudly denouncing the prospects of New Brunswick, and lamenting its future. In fact his speech amounted almost to a funeral oration. I thought, at times, that New Brunswick was even worse off than it had been painted to me by those in opposition to the present government, when I left it. I was surprised to see him take up the cudgels for St. John; there are others here, an ex-Minister, from the city and county of St. John, for instance, who might fairly have done that for her. But I do not think St. John should be made the battle ground, or made responsible, for anything that falls short in the prosperity of the country. Why should St. John always be held up before the public? Is it not enough that we have suffered by the great fire of 1877, when nearly the whole city was swept away, and we were taxed to the utmost to build it up again, without having all our financial difficulties laid to the National Policy? It is not right; it is not just to do so. I could mention other cities that had no fire, and that suffered quite as badly as St. John during the commercial disasters of this country and yet nothing is said about them. The hon. gentleman used the argument that because he was in Opposition he could get no justice. He stated that no one could approach the Government for redress unless they were supporters of the Government. Now, I would like to ask him what he wants. Last year he found fault because the Tariff did not go far enough. He plumed himself upon having been a life-long temperance advocate, and a fast friend of the hon. the Finance Minister, and said he regretted he could not support him. Then he went on to say that the rural constituencies of that Province should have protection for wool and other articles that they raised. Now, he has got redress in that respect, he has got a protection on wool of 3c. per pound; yet he expresses no thanks on the part of his constituents, but still goes on grumbling. The hon. gentleman and his friends are doing all in their power to damage St. John and the whole Province in respect to its credit and prosperity. When the hon. gentleman says he cannot get justice, does he mean patronage? When his friends were in power, I can point to instances where patronage was abused by giving officers emoluments which were not justified by law. I need not name them, because the hon. gentleman knows them himself, and I do not wish to bring on the floor of this House any individual case of that kind. The hon. gentlemen thought they were going to do something wonderful at the late General Election, but, in spite of all the leverage that could be brought against us, we were able to hold our own and carry as many seats as before. I am not prepared now to refute the figures which the hon. gentleman submitted to the House, because I do not know the pages of the Blue-books out of which they have been raked, but I recognise the same hand in stringing them together as concocted those for my opponent in the last General Election, and who has for the last two Sessions been so busily employed manufacturing those statements for some hon. gentlemen on the other side. He finds fault with the Parks factory of St. John. I have seen Mr. Parks recently, and I ascertained that he has been enabled by the National Policy to enlarge his works, and he now employs some 300 or 400 hands. He also made some comments with regard to iron works having shut down. I will not say anything upon that point, because I am interested in that subject myself. If the iron factory, in which I am interested, cannot participate in a Tariff which is of general benefit to the country it is a personal matter. We are here to legislate for the whole Dominion, and not one particular Province, or county, workshop or trade. If, in four or five years, even according to my hon. friend's story, we shall be able to point to one factory that has prospered under the National Policy, while we cannot now point to a single industry that was benefitted by the legislation of the late Government during the past five years, it will be a consolation to know that our efforts to build up the industries of Canada have even been so far rewarded, and that our attempts were in the right direction. I would like to see my hon. friend exhibiting to us his scheme for the benefit of St. John. I should like to see him showing that, by the improvement of the harbour, the establishment of Harbour Commissioners, the extension of the wharves, and the bridging of the River St. John, the city would be benefitted. I should like to see him show that the construction of the Megantic Railway would place St. John 325 miles nearer the North-West than by the Intercolonial, and that there would be nothing to prevent St. John from competing with the whole Dominion for the trade of the North-West. With the denunciations heaped on the Government by hon. gentlemen opposite, where are we to look for the means required to make our railway connection and increase our West India trade? I think it would be better for the hon. gentleman to show us how the country could generally be benefitted than to be all the time running it down. With the necessary railway connection, and a sugar refinery, we should command two-thirds of the West India business, because, by the policy of the hon. the Finance Minister, no sugar or molasses can come into the Dominion unless it comes through a Canadian port. Now, what port is the most advantageous for the West India trade, in which 300 or 400 vessels are required? Certainly St. John, where all the year round the vessels can get a load of a class of lumber for which there is constant demand, and thus always obtain an outward cargo. St. John is capable of doing something; it is not so down-trodden as the hon. gentleman would have it understood. We cannot blame the hon. the Finance Minister for taking into consideration the development of the whole country. I should blame him if he did not. It would be a narrow policy if he merely legislated for St. John, and not for the whole country. If the Great North-West develops, as we have reason to believe it will do, instead of the 55,000 tons of sweets now imported, we shall probably require 155,000 tons, and Halifax, Montreal and St. John will each take their portion of the trade. Then we shall have our wharves, warehouses, teamsters, and everyone employed. We are suffering now from contraction of trade, and our people are disheartened. Those are the tactics of the Opposition of the day. It is too thin; it will not answer. After a fair trial of the National Policy, when we are enabled to show the people what we have done during the five years, they will see the justice of the Tariff, although it may not have pleased everybody. But I think that we shall be able to look back upon it and fairly say that the Tariff was conceived well and had done its duty. We cannot legislate so as to meet the demands of all classes in a moment; that which will effect the most good for the largest number of people is what we want for Canada. My hon. friend found fault with reference to the sale of old rails. I am sorry myself that they went out of the country, as I would have liked to have bought them with him on joint account. If I could have foreseen that iron would increase 50 per cent., it would have been a brilliant speculation. What is the good of crying about milk that is spilt? Mr. Pottinger got rid of them when he thought there was a good chance of getting a fair price, and I do not think any blame should be attached to the hon. the Minister of Railways for the transaction. My hon. friend also referred to the money portion of the Government's policy. I cannot join with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) as far as he goes, but I do not see why we should stand still and occupy the same position in regard to banking that was occupied 500 or 1,000 years ago. We must progress with the times, and legislate to meet the requirements of the present, and I believe that the Government's proposition to issue the $8,000,000 is a wise and necessary one. There may be opposition from the banks, because they are jealous of what they consider their own peculiar privileges; but banks are only the mediums through which we trade, and they prosper by the money they make out of the commercial community. The Government are perfectly justified in the step they have taken, and I think they might go further, and take away the whole circulation of the banks. If there is any profit in the circulation let the people have the benefit of it, and if there is any risk let the Government run it; but do not let us allow any incorporated body to make money out of a system of issuing paper money of their own. I am not prepared to champion the "rag baby" our friends talk so much about, but I think that the banks, who show such a great anxiety, and argue that the banks should have a paper issue equal to the full extent of their capital, are really themselves the strongest advocates for the "rag baby," only they seek to keep the control of it in their own hands instead of allowing the Government and country at large to have the benefit of it as well as the profit. I would like to see the Government's banking policy go hand-in-hand with the National Policy in protecting all the industries of the country. I want to see everything made in Canada, except tea and rum. The latter I prefer to see imported, because we will then get the genuine article. I differ with the Government in regard to some of the details of the Tariff, but in those respects they may be correct, and I in the wrong. Although my friends from Nova Scotia may not agree with me, I believe that, if the duty were taken off coal and placed on iron, we would have more coal burnt than we have to-day. Two or three hundred thousands of tons of iron are wanted yearly in Canada for the railways in course of construction, and if that were manufactured here it would necessitate a consumption of from 800,000 to 1,000,000 tons of coal, and we would achieve the double object of making the iron and consuming our own coal, and at the same time developing one of the most important industries of the country and employing much skilled labour. But the hon. the Finance Minister may say, with Lord Bacon: "Young men too quick, old men too slow; the happy medium is the right one to strike." Perhaps the hon. the Minister may have struck the happy medium, and may increase and regulate the Tariff so as to gradually develop all the industries of the Dominion. The duty upon molasses and the increased cost of living were also referred to by my hon. friend. He told us last year that the duty on shipping material would make ships dearer; but we find they are cheaper, and cost less to build than before. He told us logs would cost more to get out; but we find they cost less. Almost every article that enters into the consumption of the labourer is cheaper. It is only the other day we were paying 8c. duty on molasses, but since this Government came into power molasses is sold at 28c. a gallon instead of from 40c. to 50c. as under the past régime. We find the same thing with regard to sugar. It is stated that Redpaths have made a large fortune out of that article. Well, why should they not, so long as sugar is no dearer. Common raw sugar used to be sold on the wharf, wholesale, at 9c. to 10c. per pound and we can buy refined sugar at less money. So long as the people who use it do not have to pay more for it than it cost to import under the old Tariff, they are not injured, but, the contrary; as it has transferred to Canada the importation of raw sugar from the West Indies, which the United States enjoyed heretofore, and has given our own people employment in manufacturing it. A glance at the following table will show the course of trade:—

	Imports from Great Britain.	Imports from United States.	Imports from West Indies.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
1875...	13,000	19,200	22,200
1876...	23,800	19,300	7,600
1878...	12,780	24,750	16,500

Thus showing you that in one year the change in our favour has been largely in favour of building up the direct West India trade, which we were gradually losing under the blind policy of the late Government. The hon. gentleman talked of Quebec and Ontario as the "back country" of New Brunswick, but I hardly caught his meaning there. He told us that he voted for Confederation, and that he had since changed his mind on the subject. The question of Confederation should not be dragged into this debate. It is past and settled, and those opposed to Confederation must now accept it whether they like it or not. A petition was sent from St. John, praying for a repeal of the Tariff duties. I have searched the names diligently, and I cannot find any on it but those of persons who were in opposition during the elections. The better plan for my hon. friends, if they wanted to achieve their object, would have been to call a public meeting in St. John for the denunciation of the policy of the Cabinet. They could have got their leading people on the platform condemning the Government, or have asked the hon. the Finance Minister to resign his seat as representative of St. John. That was their proper course; but no, they took half measures. They did not dare to ask them to condemn the Government openly, or ask the hon. member for St. John to resign his seat, which I do not think he would have done even to please them. Then they endeavour to make the country believe that the whole city is against the present policy. I know there is discontent; but the people are poorer in consequence of the fire, and everything is done to cripple the credit of the city. There is no kind word of encouragement said to them by the New Brunswick representatives following Mr. Mackenzie.

MR. CASEY: Hear, hear.

MR. DOMVILLE: My hon. friend opposite says "hear, hear." When his Civil Service Bill comes into effect the citizens will be happy, for they will have a chance of applying for Government situations from him as, doubtless, when a change of Government takes place, he will be Minister of Education, and have the whole patronage of the Civil Service in his hands. But show those people that you take an interest in them, and intend to assist them as well as the people of the North-West, tell them to be hopeful and energetic, and much of the complaining will disappear. Much pressure of another character has been put on the people of New Brunswick; need I refer to it? It has been applied since 1866, since Confederation. We have heard of people who wanted certain trifles and little favours, which they could not get because Confederation had ruined the country. In these days it is the National Policy that has ruined the country. When logs went up the other day, the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. King), could not well tell the people that the price had been killed by the National Policy in England. In his speech in 1878, he said that the reason why the price was down in England was that the people were too poor to buy them. Now, according to him, it is the people of St. John who are too poor. Doubtless there is a great deal of commercial distress all round; but, unfortunately, New Brunswick is picked out as the party battle-ground. Much has been said about the people leaving the Province; the hon. gentleman (Mr. King) having said that he knew of only one man that went to Manitoba, and that he came back disgusted, but thousands had gone to the Western States of America. I did feel sorry for the emigrant to the North-West when this report was made, because I imagined that this poor man must have felt very lonely by himself, being undecided for a time whether to remain there or come back to Queen's, N.B., or go further west. We were not told the calling of that man, or the conditions under which he departed. He may have gone like Japhet in search of a father, and come back unsuccessful. A great many people have left St. John, no doubt. Was it not better for them to take advantage of the winter and get employment in Boston, Portland, or elsewhere, until spring? Who went away? He says they were operatives in the saw-mills. They could not have been, because, since the lumber rose the other day, there is a prospect of all the mills being at work on the opening of navigation. Logs never come down in winter, and thus the same cause that deprived the saw-mill men of work this year must have done it in years gone by. Consequently, if the men are to cut up deals for the English market, they cannot go to saw in the States. The hon. gentleman (Mr. King) must change front and say they were mechanics in the ship-yards. If so, how can they build ships for Great Britain, if she is not purchasing? As he said last Session, we must look to England to buy our ships. If ships are not required in New York, as we have found, there being very lately a fleet there unemployed, how can we dispose of more ships than the markets of the world will absorb? There is no demand for them at present. Consequently, at St. John, there are only three or four ships building, where there used to be twenty to thirty. That has nothing to do with the National Policy. What seems to him the unfortunate circumstance is that our political friends took office in 1878—a very unfortunate thing for hon. gentlemen opposite, who were driven out of power by the almost unanimous voice of the poor man, who wished to see a party in power who would respect his welfare and work for his prosperity. Besides, in St. John, we had a very large floating population, much of it from the United States, which came to rebuild the city, including bricklayers, carpenters and other mechanics. I think I have shown that the exodus from St. John is not due to the National Policy, but to the great fire. Returning to the subject of the farming districts, the hon. gentleman (Mr. King) spoke of, I would like to go with him to Queen's, and hear his denunciations of the Government for its Protective policy, before the farmers. He said himself they should be protected, in his speech of 1878, and yet he is unwilling for party purposes to stand by his own convictions and what he knows to be the views of the the farmers.

“He (Mr. King) did not wish to be considered as advocating Protection, but, on the principle of fair play, he would ask for the farmers of his county the same kind of Protection the hon. the Finance Minister was willing to accord to clock-makers of Hamilton, or the manufacturers of patent medicines in St. John. He would also remind the hon. gentleman that hides, wool, and eggs, were all products of New Brunswick farms, and ought, in all fairness to the farmers, to have been subjected to duty.”

Well, there is only one patent medicine manufacturer in St. John, so it can hardly apply to the business. So the hon. gentleman could claim protection for the farmers, and all in his own county are in favour of it; because the last year their agriculture was stimulated by the increase in the price of wheat. It is many years since they sowed so much wheat, we having to import our breadstuffs from Ontario and the United States at a great loss of gold. But last year Queen's grew almost enough wheat to feed all the own people for the year. The farmer says: I would rather see flour at $8 a barrel when I have it to sell. Consequently, no injustice has been done him. I am prepared to advocate against the hon. gentleman in his own county the National Policy. He told the people that my hon. friends did not intend to give them this National Policy. He said: They are going to humbug you. Yet, when they reached power and established this policy, the hon. gentlemen opposite appear disappointed at the carrying out of our pledges. I pledged myself to the advocacy of Protection; and we have the satisfaction of knowing we have been true to our promises. If we have done injustice to the country or our constituencies, or have failed in our duty, we will take the consequences, and not ask the Opposition to sustain or assist us. He (Mr. King) said to the House, in 1878, and I quote from the Debates :

“The principal industries there were farming, lumbering, shipbuilding, fishing and the carrying trade. These industries were, many of them, at the present time, struggling for an existence. The cause of this he contended was not to be found in the Dominion, nor in the legislation of this Parliament, but was due to the fact that our customers in Great Britain and other foreign countries were too poor to purchase our staple articles of export from us at remunerative or even paying prices, and the consequence was that prices were run down at fearful rates and our people were embarrassed.”

Thus he admits that the country was not prospering when we came into power, and states as a reason that we are governed by outside conditions, and yet he now tells us the National Policy has done it. He asked for a duty on wool last year for the farmers, and this is granted; yet he says he can get no redress. He told us in 1878 that, as a matter of fair play, the farmers should be protected, whilst now he says Protection is ruination to them. The hon. member is so illogical that I cannot do more than leave it to the people of New Brunswick to form their own opinions of his unpatriotic course. We depend on our constituents; we depend on the whole country to support us in doing our duty. If the country thinks that we have not done what is right, or shown skill in conducting the affairs of the country, we will have the satisfaction of knowing that at least we attempted to benefit Canada; we did not sit down for five years without attempting to do any thing to alleviate the sufferings of the people. We did our best, and, if we have failed, we have done what we consider in the best interests of the country, and we are willing to accept the verdict of the country, whatever it may be. Better to try and give the trade of the country to our own people, even if we fail, than to be turned out of office, as our friends now in opposition were, by carrying out a policy which drove the best talent out of Canada and made the nation poor, by allowing our enterprising neighbours across the border to take away all our gold, instead of keeping it at home and making the country rich. When the Americans will consent to trade with us on equal terms, giving our people the same advantages as they derive from us, it will be time enough to talk of Free-trade; but, until then, I will never support any Tariff which places our own mechanics, manufacturers and farmers at such an unfair disadvantage as the hon. gentleman from Queen's and the party he follows seek to force on Canada at all hazards.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I had placed before me on my desk a sheet of foolscap, intending to take notes of the hon. gentleman's points. The sheet happens to be blank, so far. I endeavoured vainly to grapple with the line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman in favour of his position. I understood, however, from the drift of his observations, that, although he was not quite satisfied with the action of the hon. the Finance Minister, he was rather inclined to favour an additional Protection in some things and a repeal of the duty upon some others. On the whole, as I understood him, he was in favour of increasing the taxation that the hon. the Finance Minister had already imposed on the country. He may have changed his opinions, as all great men have a perfect right to change them. He may now be found conscientiously advocating Protection, although several years ago the hon. gentleman was an out-and-out Free-trader. I would not for a moment suggest that it was simply because the hon. gentleman happens to sit upon the other side of the House, and not on this, that he has changed his opinions, and is now supporting the policy of the hon. the Finance Minister, who is his leader. I recollect that not very long ago, at all events not long in the history of a nation, Mr. James Domville was present at a Board of Trade meeting, when he did not entertain the opinions he now entertains upon this great question, and, when a member of that Board of Trade moved that a petition should be presented to Parliament praying for a repeal of the duties upon flour, coal and coke among those who voted for the resolution stands the name of Mr. James Domville. I recollect, upon another occasion, when a resolution was moved by a member of that Board of Trade, to the effect that the revenue required by the Government was so great as to afford all the incidental Protection required, and that, instead of adding to the Tariff then existing, the duty should be gradually reduced, so far as the needs of the revenue would allow, the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville), was not satisfied to give a silent vote upon that occasion, but was found among the orators addressing the Board of Trade. Among other things, he said he was himself a manufacturer, and he expressed the sentiment of the other manufacturers of his Province. He would be sorry to see additional duties imposed upon manufacturers, as he believed they could then successfully compete with the world. The hon. gentleman appears to have changed his mind since then, and now he tells his leader that, although he is sorry there are some taxes imposed, upon the whole he is rather in favour of the policy of the Government, and in some respects would like to see additional Protection. The hon. gentleman forgets to tell us whether, in these industries, in which he is himself largely engaged, the policy of the Government has been a success. I understand that at one time the hon. gentleman was largely engaged in the soda trade, but he forgot to tell us whether under the operation of the National Policy his dividends were largely increased or the reverse. He is largely interested, so I am informed, in real estate in the city of St. John, but he forgot to tell us the amount of dividends he had been able to reap from his investments in that city. He has failed to tell us whether the companies with which he is connected, and in which he has a controlling influence, have been benefitted by the policy of the hon. gentleman who leads him in this House. I will now leave the hon. gentleman in the hands of the representatives of his Province, who, I am sure, know well how to deal with him. Before proceeding with the general remarks which I propose addressing to the House I have one observation to make with regard to the speech of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). One of the points on which he relied was that the National Policy had benefitted the classes it was intended to benefit; that it was a material benefit to farmers, the prices of whose produce had largely increased since the 17th of September, 1878. I challenge the hon. gentleman's figures, and I say he cannot find in any great centre of trade, in the western section of the Province of Ontario at all events, that the prices of grain have increased between the 17th of September, 1878, and the 16th day of March, 1880, with the single exception of wheat, and he will admit that the price of wheat is in no way regulated or controlled by what may be done in this House.

MR. SPROULE: I took those figures from the Globe newspaper.

MR. CAMERON: But, if the hon. gentleman will look over the Globe or the Mail, between the 17th of September, 1878, and the 30th January, 1880, he will find that every single article the farmer sells, except wheat, has been reduced in price instead of being increased since the introduction of the National Policy. Another point upon which the hon. gentleman based an argument in favour of the National Policy and justified its continuance was that the deposits in the Savings Banks had largely increased during the last six months of 1879, as compared with the last six months of the year 1878. With all the confidence with which my hon. friend is noted when he ventures to address the House, he spoke of the increase in the number of depositors and the large deposits during the period referred to, and in confirmation of his argument quoted the report of the Post Office Department, and gave the figures of the deposits in the Savings Banks of that Department during the last six months of the year 1879 and the corresponding period of 1878. With characteristic emphasis, he said: There was the result of the National Policy; the deposits had increased in the six months of 1879 over the six months of 1878 by over half a million dollars. The hon. gentleman told part of the truth, and forgot to tell the whole truth. He forgot to tell what the condition of the account was on the 31st December, 1879. He forgot to tell the House that there had been a falling off in the aggregate amount of deposits for the year 1879 of something like half a million dollars. He forgot to state that, though the depositors had increased in number for the last six months, the aggregate amount for the year had fallen off by half a million dollars. We know that the class of men who generally make the deposits in the Savings Banks are usually the poor people, who put their dollar, or their five dollars, or their twenty dollars in the bank, and, when the hard times come, these men, in order to keep the wolf from the door, have to withdraw their deposits, and the result has been a falling off in the total amount of those deposits by some half a million dollars between these two periods. The hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House another thing, which would account for the increased number of depositors and the increased amount of deposits during the last six months of 1879 and the last six months of 1878. I do not mean to say that the aggregate decrease of these deposits is altogether owing to the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but to one extent they are no doubt responsible for the result. We know that during the last year there have been several bank failures, and the result has been a want of confidence in the financial institutions of the country among the class of people who deposit small sums in these institutions, and we know that to a large extent the Government and the policy of the Government is responsible for that. We know that, with the poor people who deposited with the bank their earnings under a different policy, the moment the uncertainty began to prevail, their confidence began to be lost in our monetary institutions, and they took the earliest opportunity of withdrawing their deposits from these institutions and placing them in the Post Office Savings Banks. These facts will easily account for the increase in the deposits for the last six months of 1879 over the corresponding period of 1878, and the aggregate decrease for the year. I recollect well, that when, last Session, the hon. the Finance Minister brought down to the House his Budget, in what, to my mind and from his standpoint, was a powerful and able speech—I will give the hon. gentleman credit for that—we pointed out that the promises of the hon. gentlemen opposite made before the elections had not been fulfilled, and that in the nature of things they could never be fulfilled, we were answered by the hon. the Minister of Finance and his friends that it was not to be expected that the mere change of Government and a proposed change in the Tariff, although hon. gentlemen were committed strongly to Protection, would accomplish the object which the authors of the National Policy had in view in a day or a month; that it would require time for the people to understand and appreciate the blessings that would flow from this proposed policy; it would require time to develop fully the surprising results that would, according to the hon. the Minister of Finance's predictions, unquestionably follow the introduction of this new policy. It was a new process of extraction, and, like all other innovations, it required care and skill in the handling, and time in the developing process. We then pointed out: That may be all true enough, but that is not what you told the electors. These are not the arguments you made use of in the political campaign. These are not the arguments by which you deluded the electors into voting for and putting you in office. Then the assurance was: Electors, we will change all this in a moment of time; the hour we are sworn into office the change will be complete—a lasting, abiding, permanent change for the better. We were further answered by the hon. gentlemen opposite, not with a denial of the false pretences under which they gained the object of their ambition—that they could not deny, the evidence was too fresh and too clear to admit of that—but that we were not to expect in an hour the full effects of the National Policy; that we were not to expect in a day that the prosperity promised by the present Administration, as the result of the change of Government, could be realised; that we were not statesmanlike in our demand that the pledges of the hon. gentlemen opposite should be promptly fulfilled; that we were unpatriotic in drawing the public attention to the continued depression in trade, notwithstanding the National Policy; that we could not expect a miracle in trade from the introduction of an untried experiment; that the National Policy would in time produce its legitimate results. Sir, we knew that all along. We expected nothing; we anticipated nothing but failure; we simply drew the attention of the House and the country to the extravagant promises given and the pledges made by hon. gentlemen opposite to the electors before the elections. We compared the pledges with the fulfilment, and pointed out how marked and distinct the one had been made and how signally the other had failed. We were asked to have patience—to wait. From an honest and sensible standpoint there was reason in this; from honest and sensible men there was fairness in this request; but from hon. gentlemen and from hon. gentlemen's standpoint there was none. They assured the country that, the moment they assumed office, that moment prosperity would return, business expand and trade revive. We knew they were not true prophets; we pointed that out to them last Session, and we were told to wait until the end of the year. Well, Sir, we have waited, waited until the end of the year, waited until their policy had a chance of developing itself; we have waited with the patience and calmness of men who honestly believed that the policy to which hon. gentlemen were recklessly committing the destinies of this great country would in the end prove disastrous to its best interests; we waited with the assurance of the hon. the Finance Minister that the result at the end of the year would justify the position he took. Well, Sir, at the end of the year what do we find? Business expanded? trade revived? prices to farmers higher? the unemployed employed? labour for all? wages higher? the tide of immigration flowing into the country? stock higher? bankruptcies fewer? general prosperity spread all over the country? Not at all, Sir, except in the fevered imagination of hon. gentlemen opposite. Do we find the gloom which the hon. the Finance Minister spoke of last Session dispelled? The hon. the Finance Minister himself happy with a large surplus? The Public Service carried on as effectually and efficiently as usual? Light-houses, piers, harbours, breakwaters constructed and maintained as in former years? Not at all, Sir. Do we find the dark cloud which the hon. the Finance Minister spoke of last Session, in such solemn tones, removed? The light of a more prosperous day breaking on the commercial horizon? Do we see through the vanishing clouds of commercial depression the silver lining that the hon. the Finance Minister assured us twelve months ago we would see? Not at all. It is true that the hon. the Minister of Finance speaks with confidence, but the tone, the voice, and the manner betrayed the uneasiness within, and still he asks us to wait. Wait one year more? no; two more? no; three more? no; but he says: Have patience and wait. He tells us that no one expected this policy would work miracles; no one expected to raise the country from what they are pleased to call the "slough of despond," in which they say they found it, and place it on a sound commercial and financial footing in one year, and therefore hesays to us "wait." Well, Sir, we have waited with the patience and forbearance of Job for the promised prosperity, and we have waited in vain. We knew the promises made at the elections could not be fulfilled; we knew the predictions made to the House last Session could not be realised, and now, Sir, are we to take the advice of the hon. the Minister of Finance and wait another year? We may do so, and wait until the end of this Parliament—wait until a deceived and indignant people will rise in their might and hurl them from power—and we shall wait in vain for the promised benefits of the National Policy. Sir, hon. gentlemen know it; they know blood cannot be taken out of a stone; they know a poor man cannot be made rich by taking from him the little that he has. They know that you cannot make a comparatively poor country rich by extracting from its consuming millions—using the strong and expressive language of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals—additional taxation. That is what the hon. gentleman has undertaken to do—that is the conundrum which the hon. the Minister of Finance has undertaken to solve—the riddle he has undertaken to unravel unsuccessfully. As the hon. gentleman failed in solving the problem, he should honestly and candidly admit that he has, as able and better men failed before in undertaking a thing that, in the nature of things, cannot be accomplished. Do not continue the delusion, do not perpetuate the shame; with the fact of the failure so clearly staring you in the face, openly and honestly tell the deluded and deceived farmer, mechanic and labourer that you have failed and that you were mistaken in assuring him before the elections that a country could be made prosperous by Act of Parliament. Sir, we told the hon. gentleman last Session what the result of his policy would be. The hon. gentleman admits that the manufacturing interests are not all satisfied, he admits that there is poverty and distress in the land. The hon. gentleman is candid enough to do that; his colleague has not even that candour. He must admit that the condition of the farmer is not improved—that labour is scarce and wages low. He has been eighteen months in office and has failed, utterly failed, in relieving the distress. The hon. gentleman's leader said at Parkhill that the moment they assumed office prosperity would return. It has not returned. We did not believe it then, we do not believe it now; and the hon. gentleman's speech is the very best evidence of the fact. But, Sir, in warning the country against the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, we are told by the hon. the Finance Minister that we are striking down the credit of the country. That we are proclaiming to the world that prosperity has not been restored, that the country is still suffering commercial depression, that, therefore, its character and reputation is injured at home and abroad, and that, therefore, we are pursuing an unstatesmanlike and unpatriotic course. Sir, I say that, if the facts on which we base our arguments exist, we are not responsible for the facts or the consequences. If prosperity has not been restored, if the trade of the country is still suffering, if labour is scarce and wages low, if the people are leaving the country, it is the fault of hon. gentlemen opposite; and, if they are now harvesting a crop of idleness, starvation, a beggary of labour and a pestilence of insolvency, the fault is theirs, not ours. But, Sir, the moment we who sit on this side of the House raise our voices against the policy of the Government, the moment we point out that the policy, if persisted in, can only end in ruin and disaster to the country, that moment we are unpatriotic and our conduct is unsstatesmanlike. Sir, I deny that in any respect we have done more than it was our plain and honest duty to do, thinking as we do on these grave and important matters. But, Sir, if it is unpatriotic in us who sit on these benches to point out, in calm and temperate words, the folly of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, how much more is that course unpatriotic when done by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, with all the responsibility that attaches to the Ministers of the Crown? The House and the country know that the stock-in-trade of hon. gentlemen opposite before they assumed office was striking at the prosperity and credit of the country. The master spirit of the House, who moulds his followers as clay in the hands of the potter, in his famous speech at the amphitheatre, addressing a gathering of his gaping followers, said: "Property is becoming so valueless that you can purchase property for comparatively nothing, and the shrinkage is so great that a man who thinks himself well-off one year finds he is poor the next. I ask, whether wages have not fallen, whether there has not been a decrease in the population and an increase in the number of insolvencies." And yet, with these utterances fresh in the memory of everyone, with every possible effort made by the leader of the hon. the Minister of Finance to ruin the credit of the country, and sink it into that "slough of despond" where the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals says he found it when they came into power, we are taunted with unpatriotic conduct because we warn the House and the country against the mad folly of relying on a system of unjust and uneven taxation to relieve the commercial depression of the country. Sir, you cannot gather figs from thorns; no more can you hope for continued and permanent prosperity by increased taxation. Hon. gentlemen think that, by adding to the burdens of the people, you can increase the happiness and prosperity of the people. They proclaimed that doctrine on the stump, on the hustings, and on the floor of Parliament. I well recollect the exordium of the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister last Session, the impression it made on my own mind, and the mad folly I thought I saw concealed under its wild and visionary theories. I well recollect the bright picture which the hon. gentleman attempted to paint of the sunshine and prosperity that gladdened the hearts of the people of this country while he was in office, and of the darkness and gloom that settled on the land when he retired from office, and the still darker and gloomier condition of affairs when he returned from the ease and retirement of the vice-regal lodge at Frederickton to mix once more in the stirring scenery of active political life at the capital. Sir, no word-painting of mine can at all do justice to the hon. gentleman. Let me recal to the recollection of the House what the hon. gentleman then told us. [Vide Debates, 1879, p. 409.] Now, I challenge the hon. gentleman to point to a single instance in the history of Canada where a Finance Minister, whose very existence depended on the credit of the country, who required at once to resort to the money markets of the world to carry on the Public Service of the country, painted so dark a picture of the condition of the country as he then did. The hon. gentleman can find no parallel in history. No, Sir, I am mistaken. History does point to one man madder and wilder than even the hon. the Minister of Finance. He commenced the depreciation of his country. The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals put the finishing touches to the picture. Last Session, he outdid the hon. the Minister of Finance, and this Session in the violent speech he delivered, he outbid his colleague in the Government, and his rival for the reversionary interest in the leadership of the party, in wholesale abuse and denunciation. He accomplished the finest piece of acting I ever witnessed in the House or out of it, when he said: "If ever I felt I would like to stand in my hon. friend's shoes, it would be to-night." Sir, every word he spoke, every sentence he uttered, every action was a stab at the hon. the Minister of Finance, and an open and palpable bid for the leadership of the party. He struck out for higher game than the hon. gentleman's shoes. No one in the House could fail to see it. The hon. gentleman has fairly won the position, and can fairly claim the victor's palm, and step into the boots of the leader of the House. The hon. the Minister of Finance must see the folly of entering the contest with his redoubtable rival. The hon. the Minister of Finance cannot but see that the hon. member for Cumberland's audacious statements, his reckless assertions and his successful assault upon facts and figures, won for him the admiration of his friends in the House, and the loud and repeated applause of gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman has proved a success, and I congratulate him upon his success. I congratulate hon. gentlemen on the choice they have made. The successor is in every way worthy of the position, worthy of his following, and especially worthy of his great predecessor. Both, out of office, denounced in unsparring and unmeasured terms their political opponents. Both, out of office, did all they could to depreciate and injure the credit of the country at home and abroad. The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals continued his denunciations on the floor of Parliament after he became the sworn adviser of the Crown. Sir, I have noticed in even my short Parliamentary career that, whenever an opponent was to be denounced and abused, whenever an argument could not be met by a counter argument, whenever in the political exigencies of the party facts were to be distorted and figures made to speak the exact opposite of what they meant, whenever it became necessary to arouse the flagging zeal of the supporters of the Government, the hon. member was on hand, the hon. member played the rôle of a political bully, and always played it satisfactorily. The hon. gentleman, in his Budget Speech of 1879, said: "Where wealth, prosperity and happiness were in Canada, we now find gaunt poverty and distress pervading the country from end to end. I do not envy the hon. gentleman his feelings, when he casts his eyes over the horizon of his country and finds here and there spectres gaunt with famine and distress, poverty where wealth existed, famine where plenty was known."

MR. CAMERON.

Sir, I challenge the hon. gentleman's statements. I take issue with him on the facts; they existed only within the hon. gentleman's vivid imagination. I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that no country on the face of the earth was more peaceful, contented, happy and prosperous than Canada then was, in view of the great wave of commercial depression that had then passed over the land. The hon. gentleman has unbounded faith in his leader. We will not question that hon. gentleman's honesty or integrity. We will not call in question the correctness of the evidence of his right hon. friend; and I will prove the correctness of my assertion out of the mouth of the gallant knight who leads the House—not hapazard remarks, made in the heat of a political debate, but by words carefully weighed, and calmly and deliberately uttered at a social gathering and among congenial friends, and with a full sense of their importance. The right hon. gentleman said in July, 1878: "I thank Providence we are now, in the tenth year of Confederation, a prosperous, happy and contented people." The hon. gentleman's slanders on the country, that made him, and gave him the notoriety he has so fairly earned; the hon. gentleman's unfounded and audacious statements; the hon. gentleman's unwarrantable attacks on the reputation of the country, I answer, in the calm and deliberate language of his leader: "I thank Providence that we are now, in the tenth year of Confederation, a prosperous, happy and contented people." I will recollect the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance last Session. I listened to that speech with the utmost attention. I listened this Session to the hon. gentleman's speech on the Budget with profound admiration of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman occupies a unique position in the House. He occupies the unenviable position in Parliament of being able to present his views and arguments with the utmost possible gravity, even though the experience of the past and the facts and figures of to-day stare him in the face and confront him at every turn. He has the faculty—the peculiar faculty—in a marvelous degree, of being able to ex-hume the skeleton of a financial policy, dead and buried forty years ago by the most intelligent and advanced nation on the face of the earth, and present it to the country as the living embodiment of a policy suited to the wants and requirements of this new land of ours, and present it so as to meet the approval, nay, the enthusiastic approval, of the hon. gentlemen opposite. When my hon. friend from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) stood up in his place in Parliament, in replying to the hon. the Minister of Finance, and, in his clear, logical and argumentative style, stripped, as it were, the very skin and flesh from the "thing" which the hon. gentleman had set up for the admiration of the country, it stood revealed to the world in its true character, as nothing but a skeleton after all. The hon. the Minister of Finance attempted to cover the exposure through the aid of the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), but the speech remains unanswered until to-day, and, in fact, it is unanswerable. I did not envy the hon. gentleman's feelings that night; I do not envy them now. From my place in Parliament I watched the hon. gentleman's actions; I saw his restless and uneasy attitude; I saw his assumed indifference; I saw his futile attempts to ward off the ponderous blows administered by the hon. member for Centre Huron, drawing blood at every stroke; I saw his long and laboured breathing; I saw the smile that occasionally played over his face—the smile was a grim and sickly one;—I saw the hon. gentleman gradually disappearing, lower and lower, behind his seat—I expected every moment to see him on the floor. At once the picture presented by the hon. gentleman mirrored in my mind the stirring incidents that occurred in the Society of the Stanislaw. The hon. gentleman is a reader, and he will recollect that Brown of Calaveras, and Jones of Table Mountain, were earnestly discussing whether a skeleton, discovered by the latter, was the bones of Jones's long lost mule or the remains of the paleozoic age.

"Then Abner Dean of Angels rose to explanation, when

A chunk of old red-sandstone hit him in the abdomen,

He smiled a kind of sickly smile and sunk upon the floor,

And the subsequent proceedings interested him no more."

I will now leave the Finance Minister for a moment or two, and pass to his colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland; but, before doing so, I have a confession to make. I have always had a strong partiality for fiction. I well recollect that in my boyish days I read with wonderful zest such standard works as "Jack the Giant Killer," "Munchausen," "Robinson Crusoe," and "Gulliver's Travels," and I must confess that even in my maturer years I still retain the partiality for works of fiction, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if you desire to revel in the realms of fancy for awhile, I can recommend for your perusal the latest edition of the latest romance, as revised and corrected by the author, Sir Charles Tupper, and I can assure you you will find in its pages the finest romance of modern times, far in advance of either of the productions that gladdened my childish hours, and to which I have referred. As I propose troubling the House with an analysis of this latter production, I have taken the trouble to arrange the statements in chronological and consecutive order for the convenience of members; and here let me confess to a difficulty that beset me at the outset—the difficulty of naming the hon. member for Cumberland's productions. "Munchausenisms" first suggested itself to my mind. Then "Gulliverisms." After mature reflection, I abandoned those two suggestions and decided on christening the hon. gentleman's offspring "Bounces." I shall therefore proceed to introduce the House to the hon. gentleman's "Bounces." Commencing with "Bounce" No. 1, the hon. gentleman said:

"But he forgets to tell the House that the largest expenditure—largely increased by the hon. gentleman's own acts after he succeeded to power—was $22,300,000. I showed to the House in the speech I made in reply to the hon. gentleman, in 1878, that, if he deducted from the amount of $23,315,000 the amounts not included in his own expenditure, it would reduce the amount for which the Government of my right hon. friend was responsible to $22,300,000.

Here the hon. gentleman boldly asserted that the largest estimate brought down to Parliament by hon. gentlemen opposite when formerly in power was $22,300,000, but the hon. gentleman did not condescend to give us the figures that made up that aggregate sum. He contented himself with making the bold and reckless assertion. I have taken the trouble to examine into the matter with care, and I find, by the Public Accounts, to which I would draw the careful attention of the House, that the estimate to which he refers was $23,685,000, and in addition to this there is an item of $200,000 for Legislation in the two extra Sessions of 1873, which properly ought to be charged to hon. gentlemen opposite, as they were, by their scandalous conduct, the cause of these two extra Sessions of Parliament. Then there is an item of $105,000 for the elections of 1874, which also properly belongs to the Estimates of 1873-4. To this should be added the cost of the late Sir George Cartier's funeral, the cost of the New Brunswick School Law, and several other items, which really makes the aggregate of the Estimates of 1873-4 over $24,000,000—a difference between the hon. gentleman's statements to the House and the facts of $1,700,000. This may appear a small sum in the eyes of the hon. member for Cumberland, and that the difference does exist the public records afford ample proof. The hon. member for Cumberland then proceeded to say :

“ Would hon. gentlemen believe it? The first estimate the hon. gentleman brought down was between $26,000,000 and $27,000,000. The Statutes of 1874 will show that this gentleman, who now charges my hon. friend here with wild extravagance, because he has an estimate of $25,000,000, with $1,000,000 more interest to pay, and $600,000 more sinking fund to pay than were required in his estimate of 1874.”

Before making this bouncing statement the hon. gentleman should have consulted the Estimates for the year 1874-5 to which he refers. He ought to have consulted the records of Parliament; he ought to have read the hon. the Finance Minister's speech of last year. He does not condescend to give us the figures that make up this sum; he coolly tells us that the first estimate of my hon. friend aggregated nearly $27,000,000, and then quietly passes on to some equally extravagant assertion. On reference to the Estimates for 1874-5, I find that the original Estimates for that year were $42,230,406, less Public Works chargeable to capital, $11,606,625, and less paid for reduction of Public Debt, $5,752,651; in all to be deducted from original estimate, $17,359,276, thus leaving the Estimates for that year at the sum of $24,871,140, instead of $27,000,000, as the hon. gentleman puts it. The hon. gentleman's figures are astray. His statements are wrong by nearly $2,000,000, but, in the eyes of the hon. member for Cumberland, that is a small matter. This is “Bounce” No. 2. The hon. gentleman, in his usual exaggerated and extravagant style, then proceeds :

“ Talk of deficits. Well, there is no subject with which he is more familiar. He is a master of deficits. There is no man in this country or in any other that could be found to equal him in the manufacture of that very interesting financial feature, deficits * * * This item swells the total deficits of the honourable gentleman to $8,116,968. The hon. gentleman may well talk of deficits, when he can boast of having accumulated $3,116,968 of deficits in those five years.”

Now, Sir, I challenge the hon. gentleman's assertion. I challenge the correctness of his figures. I defy him to make good this astounding statement by the records of the House. The hon. member for Lambton clearly explained that the total deficits during the five years his Government occupied the Treasury Benches were $5,491,324, less the sum of $4,190,064 paid on sinking fund; this would leave a net deficit of only $1,301,260. I ask the hon. gentleman by what process of manipulating the figures he arrived at the conclusion that there was a deficit of $8,116,968 in 1874-5. I challenge the hon. gentleman to make good his assertion. He cannot do so. This is “Bounce” No. 3. The hon. gentleman proceeded with his criticisms of the financial policy of the member for Centre Huron, and asked, in his loudest tones, and with characteristic vehemence. “ What did the hon. gentlemen leave us when they retired from office,” and he proceeded to answer his own enquiry by stating: “ They left us the legacy of an enormously increased Public Debt and immense public works to construe, that will tax the energies of the country for fifty years to come.” The hon. gentleman, before making this extravagant and untrue statement, should have read the speech of his colleague, in the Session of 1873, and should have made himself familiar with the facts before risking his reputation on these allegations. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in his Budget Speech of 1873, admitted the then Government had pledged the public credit for the construction of public works to the extent of $60,000,000. The hon. gentleman would have been nearer the mark had he said $100,000,000. Scarcely a dollar was added to the Public Debt during the existence of the late Government. I may well, as the people of the country no doubt will, put this outrageous assertion of the hon. member for Cumberland down as "Bounce" No. 4. The hon. gentleman's passion for exaggeration is still unsatisfied. He proceeds:

"From that hour Canada, step by step, sank from the high position it had occupied, until the indignant public sentiment of this country hurled the hon. gentleman and the Government from power. If there is a man in this House, or in the country, who ought to have some little information when he is challenging and investigating the efforts of my hon. friend, who was called in the great emergency of his country to endeavour to lift it out of the slough of despond into which the management of the hon. gentleman opposite had sunk it, it is the hon. gentleman himself."

Sir, I deny, in the strongest language I can use, the statement of the hon. member for Cumberland, that, during the five years the hon. member for Lambton successfully wielded the destinies of this country, the country was sunk in the "slough of despond;" and I answer the hon. member for Cumberland's, unfounded assertion to the contrary by quoting the language of the hon. gentleman's master. The hon. leader of the House stated on the occasion I have already referred to: "We are now in the tenth year of Confederation, and I thank Providence we are a happy, prosperous and contented people," and yet, in the face of the language of the hon. gentleman's leader, he has the audacity to tell the House and proclaim to the world that, during the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton the country was sunk into the "slough of despond." "Bounce" No. 5. The hon. member for Cumberland then tells us, and in order that the House may be seized with the hon. member's identical words, I quote them:

"To-night my hon. friend has been able to come down with the evidence from the public records of the country, and show that his expectations with reference to the effect of the Tariff upon the revenue have been abundantly sustained and placed beyond doubt in the mind of every person, except that of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright)."

Now, I confidently appeal to the members of this House. I confidently appeal to the hon. gentleman's colleagues, when I say that not a single word that fell from the lips of the Finance Minister would justify the hon. member for Cumberland in using this wild and extravagant language. Why, Sir, the hon. the Minister of Finance had the candour to admit that there was a deficit of $500,000, and gentlemen who are conversant with the financial affairs of the Dominion are well satisfied that the deficit will be largely increased before the 1st of July next. If the hon. Minister's prophecies have all been realised, I ask the hon. member for Cumberland how it is that the hon. the Finance Minister has to come down to Parliament this year and propose a hundred changes in this marvellously perfect Tariff. We can easily understand how hon. gentlemen have apparently reduced the deficit to so low a figure. Why, Sir, any Government can make both ends meet if they pursue the policy the present occupants of the Treasury Benches have pursued. During this Session, I have noticed one hon. member after another rise in his place in Parliament and ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works if he intended to improve this pier or that one. I find other hon. gentlemen asking if it is the intention of the Government to improve this harbour or that one. I find a score of questions of that kind, and the invariable answer is that there are no funds to make those improvements. If the Government starve the public works of the country, and do not repair piers and light-houses, harbours and breakwaters, they may easily come down to Parliament and boast that to some extent the revenue and expenditure has been harmonised. But the hon. gentleman went a step further. He declared that not only did the late Minister of Finance roll up a deficit of $8,000,000, but he increased the expenditure over the last Estimates brought down by the old Government in 1873 by $8,500,000. Where did the hon. member get those figures? Did he examine the Public Accounts? Did he examine the Estimates? or was this merely one of the wild and reckless statements he is constantly throwing across the floor of Parliament? On referring to the Estimates for 1874-5,

I find that the amount was $24,871,000; the Estimate for 1873-4 was $23,691,000, a difference of a little over $1,000,000. Yet the hon. gentleman, with his magnifying glasses, magnifies this small excess in expenditure into an increase of $8,500,000. This is "Bounce" No. 7. There was another statement of the hon. member that astonished me, and I am sure it surprised and astonished many other hon. gentlemen. He stated: "If you go to the farmer, you will find that he recognises the improvement in prices for the articles he has for export or home consumption in the home market." The hon. the Finance Minister told us that every industry in the country was flourishing, that trade had expanded, and business had revived, that, in commodities the farmer had to sell, prices were up, and that, with respect to articles he had to buy, prices were lower than a year ago. The hon. member was bound to be on the safe side, but he ought to bear in mind that, in this, as in everything else, he cannot blow hot and cold. The hon. the Finance Minister's statements were moderate, although incorrect in some respects; and, placed beside the extravagant assertions of the hon. member for Cumberland, they were exceedingly moderate. The hon. gentleman knows very well that wages have not advanced; that what the farmer has to sell has not increased in price, but that what the farmer has to buy has advanced. The hon. gentleman knows that business has not expanded, and that trade has not revived, and that depression and gloom still exist in the land. In confirmation of what I say, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the state of the market on the 17th September, 1878, and the 30th January, 1880. I take the figures from a Toronto newspaper, published in January last. The following table will convince the sceptical that my statements in this respect are fully borne out by facts:—

	Free-trade Prices. Sept., 1878.	Protection Prices. Jan. 30, 1880.
First-class cattle.....	$ 5 00	$ 4 25
Second-class cattle....	4 25	3 75
Third-class cattle.....	3 25	2 25
Barley, No. 1.....	1 10	78
Oats.....	34	35
Peas.....	64	65
Dressed hogs, 100lb....	6 00	6 40
Mutton, 100lb.....	7 00	7 00
Hay, ton.....	13 00	10 00
Straw, ton.....	12 00	6 50

MR. CAMERON.

In many parts of the rural districts, hay can now be had at $6 a ton. Verily an extraordinary way of improving the condition of the farmer.

MR. ROCHESTER: Give us the price of rye.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I have not the figures here, but, if the hon. gentleman is in the habit of using rye, he can get the quotations for himself. While the prices of articles the farmer has to sell have increased, the articles he must necessarily buy have largely increased in price. Rubber goods have increased in price 40 per cent., hardware increased 12½ per cent., groceries of all kinds 12½ per cent. Nails are said to have advanced largely, at least $1 a keg. Cottons and woollens have also increased, and I have no doubt that every article consumed by the farmer is dearer to-day than it was twelve months ago. The hon. gentleman's statements as to the improved condition of the farmer under the National Policy is "Bounce" No. 8. Another statement was made by the hon. member for Cumberland to which I wish to direct the particular attention of the House. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman willfully misrepresented the facts. He did so either willfully or ignorantly, and, in either case, the hon. gentleman is at fault. I see that he is not in his seat. Well, it is not my business whether he is there or not. It is his duty to be there, and if he is absent it is not my fault. On page 464 of last year's Debates, the hon. gentleman in discussing the Budget Speech said:

"I believe the result of the imposition of a duty on coal will be to bring about Free-trade in that article between Canada and the United States."

The hon. gentleman predicted with all the confidence of a prophet, that putting 50c. a ton on coal would necessarily cause reciprocity between Canada and the United States. I ask if his prediction has been verified? Has any proposition ever been made to the United States Government to allow Canadian coal to go in free, in consideration of American coal coming into this country free? The statement of the hon. gentleman in this regard was the most absurd that I ever heard uttered on the floor of Parliament. Here we are 4,000,000 of people, scattered over a territory stretching for thousands of miles, and yet it is claimed that a simple duty of 50c. a ton on coal will coerce 50,000,000 of people into opening their markets for the introduction of Canadian coal. The hon. member was evidently trying to solve the problem which Lord Dundreary could not solve—he wanted to make the dog's tail wag the dog. But the hon. gentleman went a step further—he said the other night when discussing this question:

“The output of coal in Canada during the past year has largely increased. The duty of 50c. per ton has been the means of opening up the markets of Toronto to some extent. Every person knows that while there was a duty of 50c. imposed on coal during the past year, the price of coal fell to the lowest price it ever was in the past history of the country. We have, as the result of this Tariff, the coal mining interests stimulated without any person suffering in any section of the country, and in adding an additional 10c. my hon. friend expects the coal mining interest of our own country to come into fair competition with the coal of the United States, in Toronto and Ham lton.”

I tell the hon. gentleman that the statement he makes is wholly opposed to the facts; and I challenge him to prove the allegation he thus recklessly makes, with all the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown, in answer to the unanswerable arguments of my hon. friend from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright). I challenge him to prove by the public documents, by any official or authentic documents, by the returns made to Parliament, that a single statement he has made in the speech from which I have quoted on the coal question contains a grain of truth from beginning to end. He said:

“My hon. friend the Finance Minister has been able to prove that every prediction with reference to the effects of the National Policy has been fully verified and carried out.”

We find the contrary to be the case. One hon. gentleman said that the returns submitted to Parliament would prove the correctness of his statements. The documents before the House prove exactly the reverse. There is not a single return, there is not a single Parliamentary or other document or return before the House, that would in the very slightest degree justify the hon. gentleman in the scandalous and misleading statement he has allowed to go abroad throughout the country. What are the facts? If there was a larger output of coal in Nova Scotia during the last year that output must have gone somewhere. It must either have been consumed in Quebec or Ontario, or been exported to the United States. It has not been consumed in Ontario, as I shall presently prove to your satisfaction. I was astonished by the reckless statements of the hon. gentleman on this point, and I took the pains to examine the Trade Returns for several years, and compared them with the Returns for 1879. I thought I was pretty conversant with the state of the coal trade, but the hon. member's bold and audacious statement fairly took my breath away. I ask him now to listen to what I am going to tell him on this subject, if he is within range of my voice, and, if he is not, then he ought to be. I notice that, whenever the hon. gentleman has made any scandalous statement in the House, or when he indulges in a violent and unprovoked attack on any hon. gentleman, he does not remain in his place until the debate is over, and a chance of reply face to face is given to the member assailed. He prudently keeps out of his place in the House, and out of his antagonist's reach. His conduct may be prudent; it certainly is not manly. Now I desire the hon. gentleman to listen to the figures I am about to quote, and then shall ask the hon. member for Cumberland to rise in his place in the House and candidly state that he had misrepresented the facts when he made the statement I have already quoted. In 1877, the Province of Ontario imported coal from the United States to the amount of 623,205 tons; in 1878, 593,725 tons were imported, and 648,144 tons in 1879. The hon. gentleman, or any other hon. member who takes the trouble to investigate the matter, will find that the figures I gave are correct, and, that instead of the imports of coal into Ontario decreasing in 1879, there was an increase in the importations of 54,419 tons. So that it is clear that, if there was an increase in the product of coal, the increase did not reach Ontario. But it may be said the Province of Quebec absorbed more than formerly. Let us see. I challenge the hon. gentleman's statements on this point with reference to Quebec. Let us see how the record stands. In 1878 the imports of coal to that Province were 257,176 tons; and in 1879, 277,039 tons, showing an increase of 19,853 over the former year. It is quite clear, then, that the extra output of coal, if it ever existed, could not have gone to Quebec, and equally clear that it could not have gone into Ontario. But perhaps the hon. gentleman may say it has gone to the United States. Well, I will test the hon. gentleman's accuracy by that standard and see if he can escape. I find by the Trade Returns that the total amount of coal exported from the Dominion in 1877 was 249,536 tons; in 1878, 340,127 tons; and we exported in 1879, 315,793 tons. In other words, we exported in 1879, from the whole Dominion, 23,404 tons less than we did in 1878. I have thus shown by the figures that there could not have been a larger amount of coal in 1879 than in 1878. Had there been, the coal must have found an outlet in Ontario, Quebec or the United States. It could not have gone to Ontario, because we imported more in 1879 than in 1878; it could not have gone to Quebec, because Quebec imported more in 1879 than in 1878; it could not have gone to the United States, because we exported less in 1879 than in 1878. And the logical sequence of all this is that the National Policy has not benefitted the coal trade. Now, in view of these facts, what foundation had he for so grossly misrepresenting the coal industry. I ask him to admit that his statements were wrong and calculated to mislead, and to withdraw them at once, and I ask him before making similar statements, intended to go abroad in the country, misleading the great body of the consumers, to turn to the records of Parliament for correct information and to post himself thoroughly up. For the hon. gentleman's information I will read an article on the question I am now discussing. In the Journal of Commerce, of 13th February, 1880—a journal that can have no object in lying on this subject—I read the following statement:—

“The output of coal for the United States for 1879 is somewhat less than 1878. The falling off of shipments to the United States is due to the large productions in that country during the year, while the lessened shipments to St. John, N.B., are due to the circumstance that nearly all the new buildings are suited to the burning of anthracite coal.”

I suppose the hon. gentleman will not

question that authority; it is the authority of a commercial paper, a paper that can have no object in misrepresenting the facts. The figures I have so far given, and the correctness of this article, I challenge the hon. gentleman to deny.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am prepared to sustain the statement that the output of coal in Canada the last year was greater than in the year before.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I deny the statement again, and will prove the correctness of my assertions, and the incorrectness of the hon. gentleman's, by the returns brought down to the House, and to which the hon. gentleman has appealed. But the hon. gentleman may attempt to escape by saying that the National Policy has only been in force six months of the financial year, and that therefore the returns afford no fair comparison. That is not the ground the hon. gentleman put it on, and I am discussing the correctness of his allegations; but, even on that ground, the hon. gentleman's statements are wholly beside the truth. We have a Parliamentary return of the output of coal for the last six months and also for the last ten months of the present financial year. We have also the report of the Minister of Mines in Nova Scotia, and all three documents afford concurrent testimony that the output of coal was less in 1879 than in 1878. I am going to establish this fact by additional testimony, so conclusive that even the hon. gentleman cannot escape me. The returns I have alluded to show that, for the first six months of 1879, after the introduction of the National Policy, the imports were 572,884 tons, assuming, for argument's sake, that for the next six months they will be equal to the last, you have about 1,150,000 tons imported into the Dominion. We imported, in 1878, 894,798 tons. Giving hon. gentlemen opposite the benefit of the larger figure—of the return for the first six months and assuming the imports for the next six months to equal it—the amount for this year, under the National Policy, will exceed that for last year by 200,000 tons; and yet the hon. the Minister of Railways tells us there was a larger output from Nova Scotia this year than ever before.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I said that the output of coal in Canada during the last year was larger than the year before. I have the figures for this assertion under my hand.

MR. DOULL: The output in Nova Scotia last year was larger than that of the year before by 18,000 tons. So says the return from the Department of Mines, N.S.

MR. CAMERON (South Huron): I was answering the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), who stated that the output of coal in Nova Scotia was larger last year than the year before. The hon. gentleman's whole argument was based on the Nova Scotia output. He had reference to no other coal fields, and from his line of argument could not possibly have referred to any other coal than that of Nova Scotia.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I spoke of Canada as a whole.

MR. CAMERON: Where is there coal except in Nova Scotia, to which the hon. gentleman alluded? Is there any in New Brunswick? The hon. gentleman can give no figures bearing on any other than Nova Scotia coal. His whole argument pointed to Nova Scotia, his object being to show the benefits to that business by the development of its coal-mines. In addition to the returns already submitted by me to the House, I have a return for the last ten months of the current financial year, showing that we imported even under the National Policy during the last ten months 864,986 tons. The imports for the next two months in the same proportion would be 172,997 tons, or, for the whole year, a little over a million tons. Now, we only imported in 1878, 898,000 tons, which would leave the importations for this year in excess of those of 1878 about 143,000 tons. So that under the National Policy the evidence is conclusive that the output is less than under the policy of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The Journal of Commerce of 6th February, 1879, points this out clearly. It says: "In 1878 the import of coal was 894,798 tons free of duty; in 1879, six months, the quantity was 572,884 tons, and the duty $286,442. The import of coal does not seem to have been affected by the duty." Sir, I have not yet done with the hon. member for Cumberland and the coal question. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) said that he has the last returns of the Minister of Mines to the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia. I have them, also, and will read an extract on this subject to the House, to show still more conclusively the recklessness of the hon. gentleman's propositions:—

"The annual report of the Mines Department, presented in the House of Assembly, gives the following among the productions of mines in this Province for the past year: coal raised, 788,273 tons; coke made, 9,646 tons. In the coal trade of Nova Scotia the total sales for the year 1879 amount to 688,624 tons, being a decrease over the sales for the year 1878 of 4,883 tons."

I think I have convinced the House, at all events those who are open to conviction with reference to the coal question, that the hon. gentleman has, beyond all question, been guilty of "Bounce" No. 9, and I trust I have brought the fact home to the hon. gentleman's conscience. I pass to the question of emigration, and I ask the hon. gentleman if his anticipations in this respect have been realised; I think not. The universal testimony to-day is that the tide of emigration, instead of flowing into Canada, is steadily flowing out of it. Let me read the hon. gentleman a few extracts culled from the public press on this subject. A paper published in Summerside says: "It is estimated that over 300 people have left Summerside within the last eight months, and only seventeen emigrants have come in. The National Policy has not helped Summerside or Prince Edward Island so far." A Nova Scotia paper says: "Two hundred and sixty farmers left Liverpool a few days ago to take up land in Texas; most of them were fairly provided with means." Another paper says: "A party of 250 Canadian emigrants bound for Kansas, passed through Detroit a few days ago by Grand Trunk Railway and went west by the Michigan Central." When the hon. the Minister of Finance was presenting his Budget Speech last year, he was good enough to tell us that the National Policy would open up the country, that it would create increased activity in business and commercial circles, that large capitalists would invest in manufacturing industries, that it would stimulate business enterprise of all kinds, that confidence would be restored, that the dawn of a better and brighter day was about to break on the commercial horizon, and that all this would encourage a steady and continued flow of emigration to Canada.

The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, never behind his rival, painted in still more brilliant colours the picture of this great country under the policy in which they were then launching the destinies of this country, and cheered us all with the assurance—and hon. gentlemen know how assured and confident the hon. gentleman always is; he never hesitates, and he never doubts—he assured us that, the moment the news reached across the ocean that Canada had adopted a National Policy, that moment there would be an overwhelming rush of emigration to Canada from the centres of population in the Old World, who would spread all over this country, and rapidly populate with millions the vast fertile fields of the North-West.

MR. ORTON: May I ask the hon. gentleman what he is reading from?

MR. CAMERON: If the hon. gentleman is very anxious to know, he can come across the House to me and I will tell him all about it. I am giving him information he never had before. I am reading extracts from Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and other newspapers. And, by the way, I do not wonder that people leave the country to take up land in Texas, because it is pretty clear that we have men, formerly in this House, acting as emigration agents, for the sale of lands in the United States, and issuing pamphlets under the authority of our Agricultural Department. And now, Sir, we see the effect of it. We see that sixty farmers with their families left Liverpool, Nova Scotia, 300 left Summerside, and thousands left other parts of Canada to take up land in Texas. This is not all. We find, by the report of the American Consul at Sarnia, that, for the three months ending 1879, 22,600 people passed from Canada by that port to the United States. And from that report it is clear that we have been sending out of the country the very class of men that, above all others, we ought to retain in the country. I will read the American Consul's report on the subject. He says:

"Some idea may be gained of the manner in which emigration to this country is increasing by the fact that, for the quarter ending December 30th, 1879, the total number of emigrants entering this port was 22,600. Of this number 176 were cabinet-makers, 741 carpenters, 2,804 farmers, 402 farm-labourers, 7,505 labourers, and 134 shoemakers. Nearly all these emi-

Another American authority says that 100,000 persons have emigrated from Canada to the United States during the past year. If that is so, and I have no reason to question the correctness of these statements, the hon. member for Cumberland cannot honestly say that the National Policy has encouraged emigration to Canada, and I can therefore safely call this "Bounce" No. 10. I now pass for a moment to the question of the manufacturing industries of the country and the hon. member for Cumberland's bold and defiant language on the subject. The hon. gentleman is always bold, audacious and defiant. He said: "I defy him to put his finger on a single industry in Canada of any kind that is not in a better condition than it was a year ago." Sir, I take up the hon. gentleman's challenge, and I answer his defiance, not with bold words and audacious assertions, but with a few plain, simple facts. I ask the hon. gentleman if he or his colleagues or friends in Parliament did not send to every manufacturer in Canada a circular marked private and confidential, asking for information as to the working of the National Policy? I ask him if answers were not returned to these circulars, and if the hon. gentlemen have not now got these answers in their possession, and if these answers were to be submitted to Parliament? Sir, these answers were not satisfactory to the hon. gentlemen opposite and these answers are concealed from the people. The circular to which I refer is as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—Would you kindly confer on me the favour of filling in the annexed answers and returning as soon as possible, as I desire to prepare a full record, and shall rely upon your judgment in making returns for your district.

"Very sincerely yours."

This circular was scattered broadcast over the land. One has some curiosity to see the answers to it, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite should at once bring these answers down to Parliament. As the hon. gentleman has failed in the discharge of this duty, I propose submitting the answers sent by one of the parties to whom the circular was addressed, as a sort of specimen brick. The person alluded to added the following information as the result of the National Policy:—"Monkland Mills closed; Fergus Mills closed; Johnson's Tannery closed; Sewing Machine Factory closed; Douglass Mills closed." One would think this list of disasters enough for one village to chronicle. The correspondent, however, adds, under the head of "Industries started since the Government change of Policy," "Six marriages and twelve deaths." The hon. gentleman defies us to point out a single industry that has not prospered under the National Policy. I ask him what has become of the great corset factory of Windsor, that was to employ 500 hands? Sir, it does not exist. The hon. the Minister of Finance visited a number of factories last fall, with a view of ascertaining the exact condition of the manufacturing industries. The hon. gentleman was graciously received wherever he went, and, because he was graciously received, he returned to Ottawa triumphantly declaring that the National Policy was a great success. But hon. gentlemen should remember that it is not at all to be wondered at that the hon. gentleman, with his smiling and beaming countenance, was received with cheers wherever he went. That is not to be wondered at from men whose fortune the hon. the Minister of Finance could make or mar with the stroke of his pen. But, while my hon. friend took so much pains to visit some factories, I ask him were there not a good number of factories which the hon. gentleman took particular pains to pass by—factories that have passed out of existence since the National Policy came into force. The hon. gentleman visited one factory in Guelph, and the result of the visit was that he had not left there twenty-four hours when that factory went into insolvency, and now offers to pay twenty-five cents on the dollar. The hon. gentleman in his visit to Almonte neglected to visit the Almonte furniture company, the Almonte iron works, the Almonte woollen extract mills, the Cameron extract mills, and a number of other industries that had been killed under the National Policy. The hon. member for Lincoln follows in the same track as the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Cumberland, and declares that, without any exception, the manufacturing industries of his section are in a flourishing condition. Why does the hon. gentleman not know what is passing at his own door? Does he not know that, of all the cities of the west, St. Catharines has the unenviable notoriety of being the most distressed, and of having benefitted the least by the National Policy? Let me read to the House what a newspaper published in that city says with respect to the trade of the place and the National Policy.

"In regard to the efforts of the National Policy in Lincoln, we may mention the closing of the Union Foundry that once employed 50 men, the Spoke Works with a pay list of 60 men: the Dolphin Works, 20 men; the shipyards—Shickluna, 200 men, and Simpson, 75 men; Sullivan's Planing Mill, 20 men; McCormick's, Dyer's, Sword's, Dolson's, Riddle's, Switzer's, Dougan's, Jane's, Badgley's, Ness Bros., John Sutton's, Wilson Bros., and others, builders, not a single man of whom, with the exception of Mr. Dougan, who has three or four men employed, is now employing labour, and the most of whom have come to financial grief. Indeed there is not a single building enterprise unscathed in the city by commercial depression. And, besides these, G. and N. Oille, who a short time ago employed sixty men now have ten on their roll; Abell Bros. have been reduced from fifteen men to three men; Holmes and Greenwood from fifteen to three men; Wales, from twelve to three men. And dark as this picture is, it is by no means complete. Not less than 2,500 inhabitants have left the city during the past eighteen months for the United States—nineteen families, representing about 150 people, within the past month, by the Great Western Railway alone. Rents have been reduced on all unleased property in the city fully 50 per cent. There are not less than 400 vacant dwellings and places of business. As against this most painful revelation of depression, we have only to record the establishment of a single new enterprise within the limit of the city, namely, a Cotton Batten Factory capable of a business of from $12,000 to $15,000 a year, and employing some six or eight men and boys. We defy Mr. Rykert to enlarge upon this list of advantages, or to gainsay a single item of information here placed on record. It is true that the Saw Factory, especially protected by the Government Tariff, has been able to maintain its prosperity, though there has been no appreciable increase in the number of hands employed or the amount of wages paid. The Axe Factory is also in operation, though employing many men less than three and a-half years ago. It would be interesting if some member would read these facts in Parliament and ask Mr. Rykert to explain."

AN HON. MEMBER: That is a Grit organ.

MR. CAMERON: That organ challenges the statement of the hon. gentleman from Lincoln; it defies him to prove the statement he has made in the House, and tells him, if he goes up to St. Catharines, he will see the condition of the industrial classes there.

AN HON. MEMBER: It is the biggest liar in the country.

MR. CAMERON: I think there is one exception. The hon. the Minister of Finance says the people are satisfied with the National Policy. Sir, I deny it. I would ask the hon. Minister if, on his tour in the west in search of a "hum," he did not make a speech in the city hall, London, and if, on that occasion, he was not besieged with people of all classes complaining of the bad effects of the Tariff; I ask him if some of the warmest supporters of the Government in that city did not point out to him that the Tariff was so badly constructed that it would require a week to point out its injurious effects on the dry-goods trade alone. I ask him if the wholesale grocers, the confectioners, the carriage-makers, the glove-makers, the chemical manufacturers, were not one and all complaining of the injurious effects of the Tariff on the industries in which they were engaged; and in some measure to meet these complaints the hon. gentleman does not propose amendments to what the hon. member for Cumberland calls a marvellously perfect Tariff.

AN HON. MEMBER: The lawyers were not complaining, were they?

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

AN HON. MEMBER: That is in order. The lawyers were not finding fault.

MR. CAMERON: I quite understand the hon. gentleman's intentions in making this interruption, but I am not to be put out of my line of argument by the hon. gentleman's interruptions; he does not know any better. The hon. the Minister of Finance, having pointed out the success of the National Policy in the west, now tells us that the manufacturing industries in his native Province, New Brunswick, are flourishing. He tells us that sugar refineries, glass factories and cotton mills are springing into existence there. The hon. gentleman forgets that he told us precisely the same things in his speech of the 17th April, 1879, in this

MR. CAMERON.

House. The hon. gentleman then expressed his surprise that the National Policy, only in existence one month had so stimulated all kinds of trade that these manufacturing industries were called into existence in the short space of one month. The hon. gentleman points to-day to precisely the same industries and tells us that now they are about to spring into active life, and that the National Policy is the cause of all this. The hon. gentleman forgets his speech of last year and the significant fact that these industries are no further advanced to-day than they were twelve months ago. In fact, without elaborating this point, I may say in general terms that the returns brought down to Parliament, the information gathered from all sections of the country, show very clearly that the National Policy has so far proved a failure in restoring general prosperity, and that the hon. member for Cumberland's defiance to us to point out a single industry that is not in better condition to-day than twelve months ago, is like all that hon. gentleman's assertions, vain and empty boasting, and I am safe in putting this down as "Bounce" No. 10. I have one other observation to address to the hon. member for Cumberland, and then I pass on for a moment or two to more congenial work. The hon. gentleman tells us with the greatest possible gravity, addressing the House in an exceedingly offensive tone, that:

"The hon. gentleman forgets that, in an unfortunate hour for the Opposition, the late Premier, in an evil hour for his party, in an evil hour for Canada, selected a renegade Tory as Minister of Finance, a man who had openly on this floor admitted that he left his party because he could not obtain the position in it for which he thought his talents fitted him."

I ask the hon. gentleman on what authority he makes this scandalous charge? I ask him to produce the evidence on which he alleges my hon. friend left the Conservative party because he could not obtain the position which he thought he was entitled to. The hon. gentleman ought to know that my hon. friend left the Conservative party when no honest or honourable man could longer belong to a political party whose leaders had prostituted their positions to the basest possible purposes. My hon. friend has all along maintained a clear record and high political reputation. He could do neither by longer continuing in the ranks of the Conservative party. He left his former political associates, but, before doing so, notified the leader of the party that he could no longer be considered a member of the Conservative party, and yet the hon. member for Cumberland has the audacity to say that my hon. friend left the Conservative party for mercenary motives. Sir, the charge has been made before now, and denied over and over again, and the stale scandal is to-day repeated with renewed venom by the member for Cumberland. My hon. friend challenges the correctness of the statement. He challenged the hon. the leader of the Government to publish the letter in which he announced his intention of severing his connection with the Conservative party, as that letter contained the clearest indication of his conduct. The hon. the leader of this House has not had the manliness to do so, and so the old story is repeated by the hon. member for Cumberland. If the hon. gentleman can take pleasure in wallowing in such political offal, so far as we are concerned he shall have a monopoly of it. But let me ask the hon. gentleman if, when he called my hon. friend a renegade Tory, he reflected on the history of himself and his colleague. Let the hon. gentleman look behind him and before him, to the right of him and the left of him, and he will find himself surrounded with renegade Reformers. What is the hon. gentleman's colleague, the hon. the Minister of Finance, but a renegade Reformer? Is the hon. member for Cumberland again poking fun at his colleague? It looks marvellously like it. But let me ask the hon. gentleman if he is not, if not a renegade in politics, at least a renegade in principle. Why the hon. gentleman has changed his political views at least a score of times in his political life. Why, Sir, in 1870, the hon. gentleman was a loud-mouthed Protectionist; in 1874, the hon. gentleman was a rampant Free-trader, and made a powerful Free-trade speech in Parliament, and denounced my hon. friend from Centre Huron, when proposing some slight changes in the Tariff, as being a Protectionist and about introducing the thin edge of the Protection wedge into our commercial policy; in 1875, the

hon. gentleman went back on his first love and became a Protectionist. In 1876, when it was generally believed the Government proposed to increase the Tariff, the hon. gentleman again became a Free-trader, and came down to Parliament with a stirring Free-trade speech in his pocket. The hon. the Minister of Finance did not propose a change in the Tariff, and everybody knows that powerful Free-trade speech was lost to the world; but the hon. gentleman was equal to the occasion; he had no conscientious scruples about changing sides; and, at 6 p.m. of the same day, the hon. gentleman came down to Parliament and delivered a strong Protection speech. The hon. gentleman's friends need have no fear of him. He can change sides, in either politics or principles, quicker than any man, either in the House or out of it, and yet the hon. gentleman has the audacity to challenge my hon. friend as a renegade Tory. I have now done with the hon. member for Cumberland. I have endeavoured, I must admit but feebly, to analyse the hon. gentleman's speech. Time does not permit me to pursue the interesting enquiry. It affords an unending and exhausting theme for the curious and enquiring mind, and, for the information of those who may be inclined to dig still deeper into these mines of modern romance, I may say that I have tabulated the hon. gentleman's assertions under different heads, and then struck a general average, with the following result:—75 per cent. of "bounces"; 15 per cent. of "struggles between the hon. gentleman and facts," in which the facts always came off second best; and 10 per cent. with a grain of truth. I now leave the hon. gentleman to the tender mercies of his friends, and pass to the hon. the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman tells us that there is a considerable falling off in the Excise, and he is pleased to attribute that to the increase of temperance principles. As a teetotaler myself, I could heartily join with the hon. gentleman in congratulations, if the hon. gentleman's opinions in this respect were correct. I fear, however, that the hon. gentleman is mistaken. Did it never strike the mind of the hon. gentleman that the falling off may be accounted for in a much more likely and less satisfactory way?

Did it never occur to the hon. gentleman that it might be accounted for by the fact that there is more illicit distillation and more smuggling now than there ever was before? I venture to say that it will be found by the returns of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue that there have been more seizures for illicit distillations in the last twelve months than ever before. In many portions of the west, the hon. gentleman can get as much swamp whiskey as he likes. It is clear from the number of convictions under the Revenue Act that there is a large amount of illicit distillations, and it is equally clear that this illicit distillation is the direct result of the change in the Tariff; and increase in the Customs or Excise duty beyond a certain point always encourages smuggling or illicit distillation. It will be recollected that, when the hon. member for Centre Huron brought down his Budget in 1874, and proposed some changes with respect to the Excise on spirits, the hon. member for Cumberland denounced my hon. friend's proposition, and stated that, if the changes were made, the result would be an enormous amount of smuggling and illicit distillation. I commend the member for Cumberland's speech to the hon. the Minister of Finance. In his predictions, the hon. gentleman will find the secret of the falling off of the Excise in this respect. There was another statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance that surprised me a good deal—that is with reference to the duty on sugar. The hon. gentleman will admit that the condition of the sugar trade today has not fulfilled his anticipations. I find the following statement made by the hon. gentleman with regard to the sugar duty. He says:

“With regard to sugar, there will be a decrease in the price of it. This has been questioned, but I have not the least doubt, under the operations of this Tariff, there will be a decrease in the price of that article also.”

I ask the hon. gentleman now if the price of sugar has been reduced by reason of the hon. gentleman's Tariff? Everyone knows that it has not, and that today sugar is at least a cent a pound dearer than it was twelve months ago. The hon. gentleman's predictions have not in this respect been verified, any more than the other predictions of the other hon.

gentlemen who sit opposite, predictions so lavishly made and so signally unfulfilled. Before I resume my seat I wish to refer for a moment or two to the hon. the leader of the Government, who told the people in his famous speech at the amphitheatre, Toronto, before the elections, that property was becoming so valueless that it could be purchased for comparatively nothing. I would like to ask the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House if, since then property has increased in value. The universal testimony from all sections of Canada is that it has not. On the contrary, the price of property has decreased by 25 per cent. outside the large cities or manufacturing centres, a decrease that is simply enormous considering the circumstances of the farming classes. There are scores of houses in the small towns and villages in this country that you can get for little or no rent, and in many places you cannot get them occupied even for the taxes. In Western Canada, land can be bought for $20 an acre less than two years ago, and yet hon. gentlemen tell us of the wonderful success of this National Policy. The hon. the leader of the Government also referred to the shrinkage in the value of stocks. Everybody knows that my hon. friend's predictions in that respect have not been verified. Let me read a quotation showing the market price of Bank Stocks in September, 1878, and February, 1880:

BANK STOCK QUOTATIONS.

	15 Sept., 1878	17 Feb., 1880.
Montreal.....	171	138½
Ontario.....	83½	72½
Consolidated.....	74¾	Suspended.
People's.....	74¼	60½
Molson's.....	95	80
Toronto.....	140½	122
Merchants'.....	96½	91½
Eastern Townships.....	106½	100
Exchange.....	78	50
Ville Marie.....	65
Federal.....	104½	101

The shrinkage on these stocks since September, 1878, amounted to several millions of dollars, and a part of it is undoubtedly due to the National Policy. Some of these banks have passed into insolvency since hon. gentlemen came into office. I do not mean to say that that was the result of the National Policy, but what I do say is that the National Policy has not improved the condition of the stock or any other market, as the hon. gentleman said it would, and in that respect also the hon. gentlemen have proved themselves false prophets and deceivers of the people. In a word, Sir, this policy has not had the effect of building up a trade expanding commerce, creating general prosperity, inducing a tide of emigration, and imposing new life and vigour into business generally, as hon. gentlemen said it would. The hon. the leader of the Government told us that in 1878 trade was dull, wages low, the young men leaving the country, and the captains of industry by thousands passing into insolvency. We say the condition of affairs is worse now than in 1878, and that hon. gentleman replies not with a denial, but with the statement that the increased number of insolvencies is owing to the expected repeal of the Insolvent Law, and that traders were anxious to rush into insolvency before the Insolvent Law was repealed. Does the hon. gentleman not know that no one can become an insolvent of his own accord? That can only be done by his creditors, and, if the creditors are pushing men into insolvency now, the same state of things existed in 1878. I cannot close my remarks without drawing the attention of the House again to the fact that the evidence shows that no one has been benefitted by this National Policy but the sugar refiners and the manufacturers of cotton and woollen goods. The evidence is equally clear that the farmer is injured, the merchant is injured, the mechanic is injured, the labourer is injured, in fact it is injury, ruin and disaster all along the line. One word in this connection, and I shall have done. The hon. member for Cumberland referred to the condition of the labouring classes in Canada, and especially in the city of Ottawa, and stated that their condition is better now than in 1878. He said that my hon. friend the member for Lambton was inundated with applications from the starving poor of Ottawa; that they asked for bread, and he gave them a stone; and that so great were their importunities that my hon. friend had to go down a back stairway to avoid the hungry and maddened crowd who came to him for assistance. The hon. gentleman forgot to state to the House and the country that, within the last few days, and in the face of Parliament, the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government and his colleagues were besieged by those same hungry and starving men, gaunt with distress and famine, who laid siege to the Parliament buildings and prevented Ministers from peaceable access to Parliament, except through the aid of the posse comitatus. When these poor and starving men asked for work, everybody knows the answer hon. Ministers gave them. The starving asked for a fish, they got a scorpion; they asked for bread, they got a stone; they asked for honest labour, they were given the advice that Horace Greeley gave the young man, "go west." They asked civilly for the privilege of earning their living near their homes, they were invited to go to British Columbia at their own expense, and there compete with "Chinese cheap labour." That is the advice, that is the assistance that these champions of the workmen before the elections gave them, when their services were no longer required. They said: True we promised you work, we promised you good wages and constant employment, but unfortunately, now we have no work; we can do nothing for you; Government cannot interfere; go to British Columbia; emigrate. That was comforting advice for the dependent but honest labourer, who begged for the privilege, only the privilege, of earning his living. Go to British Columbia. Men whose families were starving, men who had not a meal in the house, nor a dollar to procure one with, were coolly advised to go to British Columbia. The conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite is a direct insult to the poor and labouring classes; an insult that I am sure they will not forget; an insult that the labouring classes of Canada will wipe out at the next election. One word of advice to my hon. friend opposite and I have done. Sir, I well recollect the remarks of my hon. friend last year in closing the debate on the Budget. He told us he had devoted the greater part of his life to the service of his country; he told us that he had been engaged in many of the stirring scenes and events of his long political life, and now, in his old age, and when the shadows were slowly, but surely, coming over him, the one hope and aim of his life was to leave to his children an honest name and unblemished political record, and that now his highest ambition was to leave them and the country he had served so well the National Policy as a heritage. Sir, I trust it will be many a long day before the hon. gentleman's always beaming and pleasant face shall have passed away from among us. But, before the time does come, as come it must, before the day wanes and the shadows grow longer, I trust the hon. gentleman will retrace his footsteps, become a wiser and better man; fall back on the honest reputation honestly acquired in the vigour of his manhood and the maturity of his judgment, in his native Province, fighting the battles of the people against the enemies of the people, fighting the battle of civil religious and constitutional liberty against the foes of all; that he will leave this heritage to his children is my earnest prayer, and not the shadowy and shattered one which he has lately acquired as the champion of a policy that can have but one termination—disaster to the country and oppression to the poor.

After Recess.

MR. BOULTBEE: I listened to the speech of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron). It did not seem very clear to me, and I do not think it seemed clear to him or anyone else who heard it. I did think that the question now before the House was so important that it deserved to be treated with some degree of gravity and consideration. This question should not be treated with the flippancy with which he treated it, and I must confess that I wondered that a gentleman who is so old a Parliamentarian as himself, a man who has been so long in the councils of the country, should have made such a harangue as he has delivered. I could not see what he was driving at, and found no solution until I heard him declare himself the sort of literature on which he had slaked his thirst for knowledge in his youthful years. He told the House confidentially that, when young, he had perused "Jack the Giant Killer" and the "Arabian Nights," and various other works of fiction of a cognate character. A gentleman who has read so much of literature will doubtless recollect an old saying of one of the ancient poets "that a tub retains very long the odour of the liquor that has been kept in it." He would doubtless pardon me if he were present for comparing him, even figuratively, to a tub—not an empty tub by any means, as we have had evidence to-night—but, if we were to test him by the old saying of the tub we should come to the conclusion—I do not think I am uncharitable in saying so—that not only had he perused "Jack the Giant Killer" when a child, but that he had not read much of anything else since. That would be the conclusion we would naturally come to on hearing the style in which this hon. gentleman addressed the House on this grave subject. He told us also—I suppose it was for the amusement of the House—a very affecting anecdote about a mule, and his voice certainly became turned to an accent of kindly sympathy with the animal while he was narrating the incident. I could not gather what it was exactly, but I understood the point of the story to be this: that some man, with a lack of common sense, coming too near a mule, got kicked by the animal. Fortunately, perhaps, for the hon. gentleman, there was no mule in his immediate vicinity at the time of his speech; so he was relieved from any danger, for, though he expressed himself so kindly towards the animal, he might have met with the same fate as his friend on the occasion referred to. I could not understand very well what the hon. gentleman was driving at, but several hon. members from the Maritime Provinces, sitting near me, gave me to understand that one of the subjects he was talking about was coal. Now, there is nothing we in Ontario hold to be so important a matter as the duty that was imposed upon coal. We were willing, though it came principally out of our own pockets, that a fair duty should be imposed on coal, so that the Maritime Provinces should have some balance of compensation for the duties on commodities which they require. I was anxious to learn how the matter had resulted, and I find that, instead of its being correct, as he stated, that the quantity of coal imported into Ontario and Quebec had not increased, it has increased during the past year very largely; that something like 50,000 tons of coal more were brought from the Maritime Provinces this year into the Upper Provinces than before. The Government are now arraigned by the Opposition speakers for having formulated and inaugurated a Tariff and a fiscal policy for this country which has not worked satisfactorily—that is their pretension—and which has placed us in a worse position than before. Now, it is unfair to charge the Government with that Tariff. In proposing that Tariff, they only obeyed the clearly understood will of the whole people. I can speak at any rate for Ontario, and I know that, throughout that Province, in every city, town, village, and township, the Protective policy was put forward by every man who took an interest in the welfare of the country, not only Conservatives but Reformers, and I take it that the Government, in framing this Tariff, was only giving an expression to what was the will of the people. The last election that took place, so far as Ontario was concerned, was an extraordinary election. It brought men into this House, myself among the number, I dare say, that never would have come had not the people determined that this policy should become law. The people rose, not only the Conservative party, but the flower of the Reform party, and put down their foot so strongly in favour of having something done in the way of remedial legislation that many a man was returned to this House who would not otherwise have come here. It was that question that brought out men like Robert Hay, peaceably pursuing his avocations, to separate himself from the party with which he had been connected for a lifetime to join with men who proposed to do something for the country in the hour of its need. This was the view taken by the people throughout the Dominion, and no man of common sense, or common honesty, can deny it. What, then, was the duty of the Government? Could they shut their eyes to what the people wanted? Were they to let the country drag along from worse to worse, or to try by wise legislation to bring about a better state of things? I think that was the duty of the Government, and I think I shall be borne out by any fair-minded man in saying that the duty of the Opposition should have been—though they doubted the wisdom of that policy, yet when they found that the country was against them and they came back to this House with such a miserable following in numbers,— to accept the situation. Their duty should have been to say: Well, we did not agree with this policy, but the country wished it carried out, and we will endeavour to help the Government to give it effect. Such was their duty, and such would have been the course of patriotic men. We read of many cases in other countries where the Opposition have felt it to be their duty to submit themselves to the will of the people and endeavour to carry that will into effect. But what do we find the Opposition doing here? They are not trying to assist the Government and the country to put that policy into shape; they formulate no proposition, they bring in no resolution, they do not propose any amendment; but they devote all their energies to petty, carping criticism of simple incidents arising out of this policy. They are striving to make one man dissatisfied with his neighbour, one Province dissatisfied with another Province; they are trying to set the Maritime Provinces against Ontario and Quebec, trying to bring out British Columbia in opposition, trying to create jealousy and dissatisfaction everywhere, while we are trying to weld all these Provinces together into one powerful Confederation. Sir, that is not the course of patriots; that is not the course of men who love their country well. The hon. gentleman who spoke last asked how we could expect to make a country rich by adding to its taxation. He surely must have forgotten how, when the party he supports was in power, it rolled up deficits and pledged the country to such enormous expenditure that the imposition of fresh taxation became an absolute necessity. The revenue had to be raised, and it was the part of wisdom to make the raising of that revenue advantageous to our own people, when duties had to be imposed. But we have not raised one dollar more than was necessary; it is hard enough to raise a sufficiency. I think we are fortunate that the hon. the Finance Minister has been able so nearly to make the revenue balance the expenditure, and I think the country is grateful to him for it. I think it is scarcely respectful for hon. gentlemen on the other side to speak as they have done of a gentleman of the character of the hon. the Finance Minister—sneering at his intelligence, sneering at his ability. The late Minister of Finance made use of an extraordinary expression, which I took down; he said the present hon. the Finance Minister was a very accommodating Finance Minister, and that he had a very accommodating following. It seems to me, from what I have been able to observe of men and things, that statesmen are not those who are so bound up in the arrogant, selfish egotism of their own esteem that they can make no change. It seems to me that wise statesmanship is rather shown by making a change when the changed conditions to which the country is subject show that an application of new principles was to be made. Statesmanship is not that a man shall stand on the pedestal of his own dignity, repelling from him all counsel, allowing no one to come near him and saying: I know this thing, and only me, and I permit no man to interfere with me. The great "I" sticks out too large in a man like that. Statesmanship is shown in being able to adapt oneself to the changed circumstances of the country, but I mean that the change should only take place after the gravest consideration, and after consultation with the best men that can be found, not by reason of mere petty spleen or disappointed personal ambition. Now, how has this Tariff been received by the country? Is it a fact, as stated by the Opposition, that it has been received with widespread dissatisfaction, that every man is miserable and distressed? No, Sir, it is not so. The feeling of the country is not changed that this is a wise measure and will prove beneficial. But no man who is not blinded by mere party bigotry would pretend that prosperity could be brought in nine months, necessitating as it does a change in the whole fiscal relations of the country. In making this great change, probably more than a twelve-month, perhaps two years, must elapse, before this policy can work itself out. It is not twelve months since this change was adopted, and of course men had to adapt themselves to the changed state of things; capital has to be found and set afloat; it has to be turned into new avenues. The worst thing this policy has had to encounter is the unpatriotic conduct of the Opposition from one end of the country to the other, ever since that policy became law, declaring their unceasing hostility to carrying out the will of the people in this regard. Capital is very sensitive. Men do not like to invest their money in business, which in a short time may be upset or destroyed by an alteration in the commercial system of the country. I do say that, when the country had suffered so long, and then determined to inaugurate this new policy, it should have been the duty of the Opposition, at least, to say: Give it a trial, if for only a certain number of years. Because I know that large numbers of people are deterred from going into business at the present time because it has been laid down in the Globe, having a vast influence, that all other differences must be sunk in order to do away with this horrible Tariff. Such a feeling of uncertainty is doing a great injury, and retarding the speedy working out of the effects of this Tariff. But not only Conservatives, but the wise and liberal men among Reformers, are well satisfied with the wisdom of this measure. I can give two instances of this in my own riding, of men who have a Provincial reputation. I venture to say their names are well known to every Ontario member in this House. One of them is Mr. Spaight, a great waggon-maker, who has been Warden of the County of York, and who is a strong Reformer, who opposed me at the late elections. I met him recently, and discussed the National Policy with him. He told me he thought it was a wise and good policy, and was doing the people good and giving the people satisfaction. He was sure it would do more good. No man, I think, has a better opportunity of judging whether the farmers are satisfied with this Tariff than he has. He said he found increased confidence, not only in business, but among farmers. He was satisfied that things would get better. Nothing, I think, conduces more to the well-being of a country than confidence. Another man, perhaps as widely known as he is, Mr. Russell, one of the greatest cattle-breeders in the country, and a strong Reformer who opposed me at my election, came to my office, two or three months ago, and told me he was well satisfied with this Tariff, and he thought that farmers were generally well satisfied with it. I put this question to him, because I knew that it affected him: "How does the duty on corn affect you?"

He replied: Of course it made a trifling difference at first, but he found he could feed his cattle on other articles with equal advantage. These are men well known, of large reputation, of great intelligence, who have travelled about a good deal, and who know the country well, and their opinions, I think, are worth something. I think we may sum up the whole matter by saying that at the last General Election the country was felt to be in a deplorable situation. The late Government refused to do anything by way of legislation to alter it. The people were not satisfied with this. They displaced hon. gentlemen opposite, and returned a strong party against them, out of which the present Government was formed. That Government brought about such legislation as the people desired. They have succeeded in the first year in very nearly balancing our accounts, and in managing our affairs so that a very small deficit exists, and that caused by the action of the late Government. They have made arrangements for carrying out the railway policy with thorough activity. It was conducted, I think no one will deny, by the late Government with a most fatuous imbecility, leaving the line with a link in the centre not begun or contracted for. The present Government have made every arrangement to have that link completed, and they will, I think, have it completed very nearly as soon as the other links begun by the late Government. In addition to this, they are, in carrying out the views of the country, endeavouring to develop our Far West. They have 160 miles of the road west of Winnipeg under contract. They have also made arrangements for further opening up that country of unexampled fertility, which we hear in the present year is to receive so large an emigration. In regard to that, I may say that the leader of the Opposition sneered at the leader of the Government on account of the interview he recently had with the English Premier. He said: I think that, from what fell from Lord Beaconsfield, his ear had been gained by some wandering vagrant. I thought that was not, perhaps, a respectful way of speaking of the leader of the Government. That, however, matters not. All I have to say is that, having English connections myself, and being in correspondence with that country, I have had many letters from there, stating that there has been more talk about Canada of a favourable character since Sir John A. Macdonald's visit there, and since his interview with Lord Beaconsfield, than there has been for the last twenty years; that the country has grown in favour, and that there is going to be an emigration from England to this country, not of men utterly without means, but of persons more or less possessed of money, which will be of great advantage to the Dominion. That is an advantage which, at any rate, has grown out of the interview between the leader of our Government and Lord Beaconsfield. There is a remark that I meant to have noticed before, that fell from the late Minister of Finance. In discussing this question, he said, in effect, that it was not an advantage to a country that the exports should be larger than the imports. It appears to me that no greater mistake could be made than that. If we can so nourish and cherish our own manufactures that we produce to a large extent what we want, and we can so manufacture that we import say $50,000,000 in a year, and we are able to export $60,000,000, it does appear to me that we should have that $10,000,000 extra to spend amongst ourselves. Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition in discussing this question are very fond of indulging in a spirit of prophecy. When hon. gentlemen are predicting a dark future for this country, when predicting its utter ruin, when showing that we are about to starve to death, that nothing but disgrace will befall us, when they are filling the air with vaticinations so grave, more nearly akin to the melancholic ravings of a diseased imagination than sound prediction, I would venture to offer my divination against them, and say that I believe that this policy, if persevered in, instead of the hon. the Minister of Finance leaving his memory covered with execration, in the future it will be embalmed in the memory of a grateful people when the names of his detractors are forgotten. I would say this, Sir, that, if we are to make Canada a country for ourselves, if we are to build up this great Confederation into the nation it deserves to be, rich as it is, with every element of material wealth, peopled with a people at least as intelligent as any on the face of the earth, gifted with no ordinary degree of energy and determination—if, Sir, we are to achieve this result, we must do it by patriotic feelings. There must be a sinking of miserable party and provincial distinctions and differences. There must be a little giving way of one to another, because, in a community like this, just as in a family of individuals, there must be mutual concessions to produce mutual happiness and prosperity. The vote in support of these resolutions was one of the most remarkable votes that ever took place in the history of nations. In this Chamber we had a large number of men supporting the Government on its general policy, but, with their diverse interests tearing them apart in various ways, they fought and contended for their various interests, day after day, as the discussion took place, and tried to get this and that advantage for the various communities to which they belonged, and, after having tried by every legitimate means to put the nation in the best shape they could, they were satisfied to vote as one man, and give effect to a Tariff prepared for the good of the whole. I would say that he is no good friend to his country who is continually going about hoping to reap some petty advantage by stirring up one Province against another. We cannot have such a Confederation as we ought to have if the Maritime Provinces will not give way a little to Ontario and Quebec. Ontario and Quebec must also give way to the Maritime Provinces. There must be mutual concession. There must be a general desire to get rid of little difficulties in order to work out a scheme like this, because it is a grand scheme, and one that deserves not only the worthy consideration of this House, but of the whole country. I believe it is now being welded together so as to make a Confederation of which we can all be proud. Let us, as far as we can, for the purpose of building up a great nation here in this western world, sink all little personal differences, and all unite for our common country.

Mr. WALLACE (West York): The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) stated in the course of his remarks that every prediction the Opposition had made last year, with reference to the National Policy, had been verified. Well, one of their predictions was that the flour mills, oatmeal mills, and mining and lumber industries would have to shut down. I should like that hon. gentleman to name the first one of these that has shut down on account of the new Tariff during the past year.

An Hon. MEMBER: The soup kitchen has been shut down.

Mr. WALLACE: Yes, the soup kitchens appear to be the only industries that have gone out of business, and they were almost the only new industries inaugurated during the Reform Administration. The hon. gentleman also said that the increased cost of manufacturing salt would crush this industry out of existence, and that the cost would be increased 10c. per barrel. The fact, however, is that, in Goderich, the headquarters of salt manufactured in Canada, salt is 5c. per barrel cheaper than before. He also stated that, in consequence of the increased price of coal, railroad freights would have to be raised to a very considerable extent. What do we find in that respect? At the present time we are having our salt conveyed from Goderich to points in the county of York for 12c. a barrel less than a year ago. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), predicted that the prices of agricultural implements were to be raised very much. He said last year, as reported on page 1075 of Debates, 1879:

“That it is impossible for the implement makers to sell their products to the farmers at the rate they are now selling them at. The result will be an inevitable increase in the range of prices to everyone who has to purchase.”

In contradistinction to that, I would like to read letters I have received from leading manufacturers in the county of York. Mr. John Abell, one of the largest manufacturers of agricultural implements in the Dominion, writes as follows:—

“I have not advanced the price of any article I am manufacturing since the National Policy came into force, neither do I think there will be any advance, notwithstanding the great advance in prices of pig and bar iron.”

Another gentleman of the same county, who is one of the largest manufacturers of implements, writes as follows:—

“The great benefit we, in common with other manufacturers of agricultural implements, derive is, that the policy of Protection gives us the North-West for the sale of our products. Manitoba and the North-West open up an almost illimitable field for our manufactures and I am satisfied it will make Ontario one great hive of busy workers. With Protection, the field is ours, without it, Brother Jonathan's, because of his contiguity. Does the Manitoba farmer pay more than he did under the 17½ per cent. Tariff? No, our goods are now sold to the Manitoba farmer at about 10 per cent. less than under the old Tariff. You can readily understand that, if we make and sell a large quantity, we can sell cheaper than if but few are made."

Here is another gentleman, residing in the West Riding of York, also a large manufacturer. He says:

"With the machinery we have coming across the Atlantic, our mill for making cloth will be double what it was on 14th March, 1879. If it had not been for the Tariff we should have had to shut up, because the limited sales we could make would never have allowed us to reduce the cost of production. Though we are now paying higher wages than a year ago, by manufacturing very large quantities we are enabled to sell cloth at lower rates, and the wholesale dealers tell me that our goods last year were cheaper and better value than they could import under the old Tariff. But nothing but the Tariff could have enabled us to make them cheaper."

These are the opinions of gentlemen who are large employers of labour, and whose opinions are worthy of consideration. But we have been told by hon. gentlemen, time and again, that everything is going to the dogs, and that the country will be ruined. While the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) was speaking, he recalled to my memory the following item, which appeared in the city papers the same evening:—

"The contractors on the Welland Canal have raised the wages of labourers on the Canal from one dollar to one dollar and twelve and a-half cents per day."

I would like to ask these hon. gentlemen if any little items of that kind were published during the period they administered the affairs of the country. The changes were always the other way. We read of wages reduced, time shortened, and a great number thrown out of employment. I have a little more evidence to submit from the Toronto Globe. In the Toronto Globe of January 2nd, 1880, I find the following, specially reported for the Globe by its Montreal correspondent:—

"From visits to our principal firms in the different branches of the wholesale trade and manufactures, your reporter learned that the business transacted during the past six months has been largely in excess of any year since 1873. * * * The outlook for the spring trade is most encouraging. Already orders are pouring in, which augurs a more extensive business than even the late improvement warranted the most sanguine in expecting. Local manufacturers of cottons, woollens, and other fabrics, as well as iron-founders, are kept very busy, and, in not a few instances, they are obliged to work overtime to meet the constantly increasing demand. The Hochelaga cotton mill, for instance, which has lately added a new wing, gives employment to four hundred additional hands, and is so pressed with orders that it is running up to nine o'clock at night, without being able to supply the orders. In the other branches of trade it is the same gratifying story. The effect of this state of things is apparent in the improved condition of the working classes. At no similar period of the season for several years past have there been so few destitute and idle people in our midst."

I think that is a full answer to the charges made against the National Policy, to the effect that employment is not to be had for the labouring classes.

AN HON. MEMBER: What paper?

MR. WALLACE: The Toronto Globe. This same paper goes on to say:

"The railway and shipping interests connected with the city have never been so prosperous as during the past year. The increase in freights has been enormous. The Grand Trunk alone during the past six months, shows an increase of over $400,000 in excess of the same period of 1878."

AN HON. MEMBER: What paper?

MR. WALLACE: The Globe. This proves that the country is gaining confidence in the future of the Dominion. They are not afraid to invest and help it along. Further on the same paper says:

"The leather trade is buoyant. During the past week a city firm exported to England 10,000 sides of Buffalo sole. This makes 60,000 sides of sole shipped to England during the last three months, reducing the stock here to a very low ebb."

Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House say that prices have gone up under the pressure of the present Tariff. They say that the price of nails has increased; that is true, but it is a fact that the price of nails under the National Policy was at a very low figure. Nails were sold last summer at $2.75 per keg. That is the lowest figure that has been reached for twenty years. The price up to the time of the inauguration of the new Tariff was $3 for nails, and in the United States they have now reached a price $1.55 higher than they are here. Under the Protection laws, the prices are less in Canada than in England or the United States. We have also been told about sugar. I say that sugar is cheaper than it has been for a dozen years.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

MR. WALLACE: Oh, but yes. The price of raw sugar of a fine quality during July and August last was 6½c. per pound. There is a misconception on this sugar question. Some people imagine that raw sugars are not fit for common use until they have gone through a refinery, but there are some raw sugars that are as white as this paper, and have been selling at 6½c. per pound. In Toronto, sugar has not been sold so cheap and of so good a quality for many years for that price. The hon. gentlemen opposite say that tea has increased in price. Well, it has increased somewhat during last fall, but it was not increased in Canada but to a very slight extent, though it had doubled in price in China. The increase in the price of teas, therefore, is not attributable to the National Policy. It is said that the price of cottons is raised. We have a better quality of cotton goods sold in Canada, and we find that the price is about the same as before. The price of raw cotton is increased from 8½c. to 12c. or 14c. It has increased about 50 per cent., but the price of cotton goods has increased little or none, although the quality is much better. This calls my attention to another statement made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver). I believe he said the people were dissatisfied, and had been misled by what they had been told in 1878. In reference to misleading the people, it may be well to refer to the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, made to the people of Toronto, in May, 1878, on the National Policy. He said:

"In 1876, the entire production of the iron manufactures of the United States was, as nearly as may be, $100,000,000. The total exports of that production amounted to only $688,612 or eleven-sixteenths of one per cent. of the entire produce of their manufactures."

That is, that they produced $100,000,000 of iron manufactures and exported less than $1,000,000 worth. He tried to show that they might supply their own country under a Protective policy, but they could not export any. I will quote from statistics. The annual Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on the Commerce and Navigation of the United States, for the same year that Mr. Mackenzie referred to, that is, 1876, shows that during that year the exports of iron and manufactures of iron were $8,837,894, and he told the people then, and published it through the country, that the exports were only $688,000. That means that twelve times as much as that which the hon. gentleman had led the people to believe was exported. After that, will the hon. gentleman say who were the men to mislead the country previous to the elections of 1878. I would like to ask if that was not misleading the people. Another great gain to the country from the National Policy is in the increased prices the farmers have obtained for their agricultural productions, by which they are enabled to pay their workmen better wages and give them more employment, while they might otherwise have had to keep them idle. We find the prices in Toronto as follows:—

Flour—Superior extra.....	$4.00 to $4.10	$4.40 to $4.50	$5.90 to $6.00
Fall wheat.....	93 to 95	1.03 to 1.04	1.30 to 1.32
Oats.....	25 to 28	34 to 00	35 to 37

Showing a healthy upward tendency during the time the new Tariff has been in force. Another great benefit from the National Policy is this: that the Provinces can supply one another with their products. I have referred to the statement brought down by the hon. the Minister of Customs, showing the amount of grain imported for home consumption from 15th March to 31st December, 1879, and also a similar statement for the eight and one-half months before the policy came into force, namely, from 1st July, 1878, to 15th March, 1879. The result is as follows: The total grain imported for home consumption was 881,466 bushels, valued at $379,014, for the last nine and one-half months, that is, the period between 15th March and 31st December, 1879; while, in the period of eight and one-half months preceding the going into force of the National Policy, the total grain entered for home consumption was 12,255,849 bushels, valued at $7,003,680. These figures show fourteen times as much grain entered in the period of eight and one-half months under the old Tariff, and at a value of nearly twenty times as much as is now imported in the first eight and one-half months under the new Tariff, for home consumption. The number of barrels of flour imported for consumption for a similar period, under the old Tariff, was 468,000 barrels, and, under the new Tariff, for a like period, for home consumption, was 63,341 barrels. This shows that the farmers of Ontario and the other Provinces are reaping great benefits from this new Tariff, by supplying local wants from the home markets. But the great benefit to the Dominion is the substantial union of the Provinces. For thirteen years that union has been, in a great degree, merely a union on paper. There has been no real bond of union between them. If we continue the present policy we will have a more binding and cementing Union of the Provinces than by any other means. I do not intend to detain the House any longer, and, in conclusion, I have to express the hope that this Policy will in the future, as in the past, be a great benefit to the whole Dominion.

MR. ARKELL: It is not my intention to take up the time of the House longer than a few moments. I think the discussion on this policy is premature. In about two years from this time, we shall be able to judge as to the value of that policy. I think, if it be given two years trial, we shall find that the gentlemen opposite will not be so ready to get up and speak in opposition to it. I intend to speak only of what I know something about. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) said there had been no advance on grain in Canada other than wheat, and that had been caused by the failure of the crops in England. If he came into my riding and made such a statement, he would get laughed at. I know that, previous to this Tariff coming into force, the farmers of East Elgin were receiving from 45c. to 50c. per bushel for corn, while under the new Tariff they have been readily receiving 60c. per bushel. The same thing is to be found with regard to oats, which, under the new Tariff, have advanced 10c., a rise just equal to the amount of duty put on. In speaking about wheat,

I think the policy of the Government is not quite right in that direction. Under that policy, it is well known that our best wheat is shipped to England. This is a great injustice to this country—giving to our own people an inferior description of flour produced from inferior western wheat. But, if the policy of the Government in this respect be changed, I am satisfied that the Tariff will in every other respect, as in this, give satisfaction to all the Provinces of the Dominion. The hon. member for North Oxford, (Mr. Oliver) says there has been no advance in the value of stock. I see by a St. Thomas paper of yesterday that two parties engaged in buying and selling stock, had purchased 750 head for the English market, at the sum of $60 per head, and I came to the conclusion that the prices must have been satisfactory to the farmers who sold them. Speaking about manufactures, the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) said the only benefit that had been derived from the National Policy was obtained by manufacturers. Well, it is a very good thing that we can get that admission. It is a good thing to find that it is a benefit to someone. In my own town of St. Thomas there are not many manufacturers, but under this policy I think we will keep growing in that direction. There is one firm engaged in the manufacture of threshing machines, and all kinds of farming implements. This firm is composed of two staunch Reformers, men who never voted the Conservative ticket. I allude to the firm of Haggart and Cochrane. Last December, Mr. Cochrane went to see what kind of a country Manitoba was. When he came back, he reported to his friends that he had arrived at the conclusion that it would prove the garden of this Dominion. Speaking of his own particular line of business, he said that under the old Tariff it was impossible to send a threshing machine or other agricultural implement from Ontario to Manitoba, because the market was completely drugged with those articles from the United States. But, under the present Tariff, he stated he could ship his machines into that Province and undersell Americans. I am satisfied that that gentleman will never give a vote adverse to the National Policy. I am not prepared to say that the firm will vote the pure Conservative ticket in future, but it is certain they are satisfied with the policy of the present Administration. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) stated that property had depreciated in value 50 per cent. Well, I do not know how real estate is in his part of the country, but I am not aware of any decline in value in the county of Elgin. Farms are worth just as much there as ever they were, and farmers are more anxious to keep them than they were formerly. With regard to empty houses in cities and towns referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite, I may mention that there are no houses to be had in St. Thomas. We are creating every season from 100 to 120 houses, and there is still a great demand for dwellings. If we build at that rate for ten or twelve years to come, I am satisfied that we can find occupants for them. Now, the question of the balance of trade has been referred to. Hon. gentlemen opposite have argued that the balance of trade in favour of a country is no indication of its prosperity. If that is the case, I think the United States must be getting very poor indeed, for last year they had the balance of trade in their favour nearly to the amount of $300,000,000. My own impression is that just as soon as the balance of trade turns in our favour—and I see plainly that it is coming round—there is no doubt it will keep increasing to a large amount, and the country will prosper proportionately. I will close my remarks by stating that the people of my county are perfectly well satisfied with the Tariff. They are satisfied that the hon. the Finance Minister will from time to time make any changes that may be necessary. We must all understand that changes may be required in order to make the Tariff work in a harmonious manner. I think we have the right man at the head of the financial affairs of the country, and I have no doubt but that everything he does in regard to Tariff arrangements will be for the best interests of Canada.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant): As members of the Opposition we have a duty to perform in this House, and in the endeavour to perform that duty it seems that members of the Opposition who have given utterance to their thoughts have given dissatisfaction to some of the Ministerial supporters, if not to the Ministers themselves. But hon. gentlemen should possess themselves in patience. They must know that an Opposition in criticising Government measures must criticise them in the direction which to them appears right and proper, and they must expect that the views that are enunciated, the statements that are made, will not be such, perhaps, as they would desire to listen to. But it is the glory of our institutions, Sir, that we have under them free speech and free expression of thought; that we not only have liberty to think as we choose, but liberty to give expression to our thoughts, always remembering to express them in such a manner as becomes gentlemen. I desire to offer a few remarks to-night with reference to the subject before the House, and which has been before it for the past few days, and in doing so I will endeavour to speak without any acidity of temper; I will endeavour, as far as I am able, to let any statements that I may give utterance to be words of truth and soberness. Though my views may not be the views of the hon. gentlemen opposite, it is possible, perhaps, that they may be enabled to see that there is a standpoint at least from which parties standing here see things in a different light to that in which they are viewed by hon. gentlemen opposite. It will be necessary, perhaps, just to glance at the history of this country for a year or two in order to rightly understand where we have arrived, and why we are discussing this question at the length we are doing. It will be in your recollection, Mr. Speaker, as it is in my own, and in the recollection of other hon. members of the House, that two years ago another Administration occupied the Treasury Benches. It will be remembered that shortly after that period an election had to be held. The people were to be appealed to. The people were to say who should be their rulers and administrators during the ensuing term of the ordinary life of a Parliament. As usual on such occasions, the Ministry of the day and their supporters, who had confidence in them, appealed to the country for a continuance of its confidence on the ground that their affairs had been managed economically, wisely and well. Gentlemen who opposed that Administration many of whom now constitute the supporters of the present Government, took the ground that there had been incapacity, that there had been extravagance, that there had been inability, that, in point of fact, there had been corruption on the part of the Ministers, and, of necessity, corruption on the part of those who supported them; and the cry of the then Opposition, and now Ministerial party, was that Mackenzie's Administration must be deposed from power chiefly because they were incapable and extravagant—because they had plunged the country into distress and could see no way of extricating it. Taking advantage of a state of things that existed at that time—a state of depression in the country—they were enabled to make an impression on the minds of some of the people of the country. Not a very strong, great or wide impression was made, but an impression was made on a certain number of minds in a great number of different constituencies that was sufficient in its effect to hand over those constituencies from supporters of the late Administration to hon. gentlemen who now support the Government. How was it done? One of the factors was the denunciations hurled against the Mackenzie Administration because of their reckless extravagance. That cry sounded from every platform throughout the length and the breadth of the country. It was stated that the financial management of the late Administration was such as would lead to national bankruptcy in a few years; that excessive expenditures had crept into every branch of Civil Government, and that it was necessary to apply the pruning knife, sharply, quickly and deeply; and the cry was: Give to us the reins of power—reinstatement the Conservative party. True, the people had little to hope for from the history of that party, but they were led away by the cries of those hon. gentlemen, and said: We will give them a trial. Well, the trial has been given, and now, after nearly two years' administration by the Conservative party, we are in a position to-night to compare notes, to speak with more accuracy than we were able to do a year ago, because a year ago there was a great deal of prophesying, a great deal of forecasting of what was to be. I do not say it was confined to one side, but was common to both sides of the House. But to-night we are in possession of certain facts, certain official figures—figures that may be distorted, but figures that are before the public and that the public can understand, figures that will not lie; and in the light of those figures, as well as in the light of past figures, I ask hon. members, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the people of this country to judge whether the men who occupy the Treasury Benches have fulfilled, in the direction of economy, the pledges they gave to the country. And I ask the hon. gentlemen at their backs, if they still remember the pledges they gave to their constituents to the effect that, if the Conservative Government increased the public expenditure instead of reducing it, they would turn round and help to put them out of power. I see hon. members before me, whose names I could mention, who gave such promises.

MR. ROCHESTER: Name them.

MR. PATERSON: It is unnecessary to name them. I dare say the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) would have taken the same tack if he represented a western county where the Grit element, as it is called, is strong. The hon. gentleman anticipates my argument, and admits by his interruption that he is cognizant of such pledges having been made. What is the record? The record is what might have been expected from the past history of those hon. gentlemen. The same hon. gentlemen who comprise the Administration now were in power seven years before. The people of the country are therefore familiar with their record. During the seven years of their former Administration, the expenditure was swollen from \$13,000,000 to \$23,000,000; the controllable expenditure was increased from \$3,000,000 to over \$8,000,000. That was their record. Five years of the Mackenzie Administration succeeded, and how stood the record? Giving the year 1879—for I am willing to assume full responsibility for that, since I charged the hon. gentlemen opposite with full responsibility for 1874—was there an increase of \$10,000,000, such as the previous Government made? No; the increase was very little over \$1,000,000. Take the ordinary controllable expenditure, and how did the Mackenzie Government stand? At the end of the five years, instead of having an increase of \$5,000,000, it had decreased \$1,300,000. Then we come to the present record of those gentlemen who are again on the political field, and masters of the situation, who sit in Parliament with a vast majority of intelligent men behind them, men who have a stake at interest in the country, men who, if it were not for party pledges, would openly confess that the promises made before the elections have not been fulfilled, and would be ready to admit that the people had been promised what the Government were unable to perform. The Estimates for the ensuing year are before us. Is any economy visible therein? Is there a curtailment of the amount of the people's money demanded to carry on the Government? From these Estimates I have ascertained the fact that, in the first Estimates before, the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, \$25,007,000 are asked for—\$1,000,000 more than the Mackenzie Government demanded. I ask them what they want this extra \$1,000,000 for. They told us they would manage things more economically. Why is this? Is it because some sudden calamity has overtaken the country, or on account of some special vote that was unforeseen? No, Sir. There is an increase in almost every item—an increase in every controllable item. There is an increase of \$42,570 for Civil Government. That is in the Departments presided over by those gentlemen, who said: Give us the reins of Government, and we will cut down the expenses; who denounced the extravagance of Mr. Mackenzie and his colleagues. I come to Immigration and Quarantine, an expenditure which was sharply criticised by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, when he was on the Opposition side of the House. They ask for \$14,400 more for that Department. Then there is the item of Pensions and Superannuation, a matter that hon. gentleman opposite waxed eloquent over when they were before the people—this Superannuation and Pension fund that was draining the life-blood of the people to give to a lot of men that ought to provide for their own future. Oh, the denunciations we listened to in respect to that fund. But \$14,871 is asked for on that account. How stand the Estimates in regard to Public Works and Buildings chargeable to income, that were managed so recklessly by the Mackenzie Administration, according to the statements of the present Minister, who assumed in days gone by, as I dare say he would have the hardihood to assume now, he is so much more competent? Where is the economy when \$112,000 more is asked than was asked by his predecessor? Take Railways and Canals, chargeable to income, and you find that \$48,000 extra is asked for. Take Customs, upon which the hon. gentlemen opposite were so eloquent in the time of the late Government, as they pictured the officials sitting in the offices with nothing to do, and how stands the requirement for that Department?—\$7,496 more are required for that than the Mackenzie Administration asked in their highest year. Take the Department of Excise, that was to be managed so economically; \$1,351 extra is demanded. Take the Post Office, that was such a fruitful theme for declamation on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, what are its requirements?—\$90,000 in excess of the Estimates of last year. I said I would run through the whole list, but why need I go into detail, when you have the fact before you in the Estimates, that in the first requirements laid before you on the Table, to be supplemented by further requirements, \$1,000,000 more is asked than was demanded by the late Administration. That is the record of the present Government for the first year of their financial management, and the result they cannot deny. They stand in the position of men who have promised what they have not fulfilled—what it was not in their power to fulfil—of men who have deceived the people, having given estimates of public expenditure they could not carry out. Another charge made against the late Administration was that it was continually rolling up deficits threatening to engulf in ruin the country. There were deficits under the Mackenzie Administration, no doubt. For four years there were deficits, and one year had a surplus. The total of the deficits was \$5,491,314. The hon. the Minister of Railways, in his remarkable speech, which was so thoroughly dissected this afternoon, and in which so many Tupperisms were discovered by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), stated that those deficits reached \$8,116,968, showing the slight inaccuracy, the simple imaginative stretch of \$2 695,201, or a discount of 47½ per cent. There is no use in our dealing in figures not in consonance with the truth, when everyone can look at the public records. If we deduct the sinking fund, the money laid by for the reduction of the Public Debt, the nett deficit would be reduced to \$1,306,000—not a very serious matter indeed. With that fact staring us in the face, we find the hon. the Minister of Railways magnifying the deficits by 47½ per cent., thinking, by mere assertion and force of character, to make people believe the amount was \$8,000,000. The speech of that hon. gentleman was as full of inaccuracies as was possible even to its author. Read it through and through, and you will be amazed and astonished at its expressions and sentiments. When the facts seemed to come in the hon. gentleman's way, and the figures were against him; when the plain unanswerable statements of the late Finance Minister stood out before him; how were they met? By volleys of abuse. When he stated the correct total of the deficits, the present Minister of Railways could not disprove it, but could hurl the taunt that that hon. gentleman was the king of deficits. When the late Finance Minister made statements about this Tariff that could not be controverted, the hon. the Minister of Railways thought he found an effective retort in the remark that my hon. friend's head was impenetrable. When the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) was met by statements he could not otherwise controvert, he replied that the late Administration and their friends belonged, or ought to belong, to animals of the long-eared family. The figures of the late Finance Minister, however, cannot be controverted. No wonder that the hon. the Minister of Railways was so plainly found trying to turn the attention of the House from matters of fact to matters of fiction, when he discovered the facts so strong against himself. But my hon. friend will not forget that, in this House and country, there is no room for gentlemen of reputation like himself, to risk reputation by departing from statements of fact to indulge in fictitious assertions, such as may be in favour with the hon. member for Cumberland and other hon. gentlemen opposite One copy of "Tupper's Proverbial Nonsense" in the country is enough. If any gentleman prefers to give free rein to his imagination—to talk of hundreds of thousands of tons of shipping, that all vanish into thin air; to indulge in the unreal, fanciful and romantic; let that hon. Minister retain the monopoly. I am sure the late Finance Minister will shun that rôle. But I will now deal with the Tariff question, after noticing the remark of the hon. the Minister of Railways that the hon. member for South Huron had, in the matter of coal, misrepresented him—that he spoke of the output of the Dominion, not of the product of Nova Scotia alone. The hon. gentleman's statement was made in discussing the question from a Nova Scotia point of view, when, in all fairness, he urged that the statement applied to the Nova Scotia mines and none other. He asked: Does not the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) know that in St. John the price of coal has been lowered? How? said that hon. gentleman, if the hon. gentleman has not mastered that, he has not mastered the first principles of that question; does he not know that 100,000 more tons of coal produced would enable the coal to be sold lower? I ask if that had not direct reference to the Nova Scotia coal mines? Will even he, with all his effrontery, dare to say that any British Columbia coal finds its way into St. John? The connection in which his argument stands proves that it applies alone to the output of coal in Nova Scotia. Finding that a gentleman, fortified with official facts and figures, was on his track, he attempted to shelter himself behind the subterfuge that he had not been speaking in reference to the mines of Nova Scotia, but of those of Canada, including British Columbia. Another factor brought into operation to secure their late success was the cry that Protection was needed; that great stagnation in our industries prevailed; that the amount of depression was simply deplorable, etc. The hon. member for Cumberland pictured the gaunt spectres of despair that wandered up and down the country, the people suffering from want and famine; the children, with hungry eyes and shrunken features, looking to helpless mothers for food, and he next assailed Messrs. Mackenzie and Cartwright, who so lamentably conducted the affairs of the country. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite now talk of our want of patriotism, as they point to the present condition of the country; they say that for five years we destroyed it, while they have endeavoured to teach the people that their success and prosperity depended upon legislative enactments and them alone. Those hon. gentlemen must not find fault when, taking up their own theory, their weapons are turned against them. The people are asked to judge by the results to our trade of the new policy, by its success in the improvement of the country, whether those gentlemen have, in their position as Ministers, achieved the success they boasted they were capable of bringing about. It has been stated here to-day, as often elsewhere, that it was futile and useless to condemn the Finance Minister and his colleagues and supporters for the Tariff, because the people had demanded it. I denied that statement last year, and deny it again. The people did not know what the National Policy was; they asked those hon. gentlemen, through their representatives, during the late Administration, to tell them what that policy was, when their present leader replied it was not the duty of the Opposition to formulate a policy, adding: We shall not tell until we get into office, when we can ascertain the wants and requirements of the people; but we tell you we will put in force a policy that will give steady work to the idle; higher prices to every farmer for all he has to sell; will dot your rivers and streams with magnificent erections for manufacturing; we will give a startling impetus to the prosperity of the lumber interest; we will cause comfort and prosperity to be greatly magnified by this wonderful remedy; shoals of fish in our waters will be vastly increased; our shipping will be doubled, and, where there is now wailing and distress, all will be joy. As the hon. member for Cumberland said: "The wilderness that the late Administration made this country, shall again blossom as the rose." We must enquire how far these cloudy predictions have been fulfilled. We have to see, not simply whether the taxes have been heaped up by this National Policy, as they have, but whether hon. gentlemen opposite have given us, with that, the promised prosperity. Have the predictions of the hon. the Finance Minister, judging from the official figures he has given us, been verified? I candidly admit he was not alone, last year, in forecasting the future. The leader of the Opposition did so, too; but to-night we have to determine who was the keenest in vision, which of them most fully realised the probable operation of the policy of the hon. the Finance Minister. At this point I must notice one of his statements—that the Tariff was not framed as against Great Britain and in favour of the United States. The late Finance Minister and late Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee) asserted last year that the Tariff discriminated against the manufactures of Great Britain and in favour of the United States; and, while I took the same view, I was not one of those who attached so very much importance to the fact that it bore against Great Britain. I think we have a right to frame a Tariff against that country if we see fit. But our contention was that, borrowing as we do in the Old Country for our public works; having been met so generously, and having received so long the protection of the British flag; claiming as we do to form an integral portion of the Empire, we held that, while we did levy taxes, it was the duty of the hon. the Finance Minister to see at any rate that the Tariff did not discriminate against that country, and in favour of a foreign country. I credit him with not desiring to do so; I believe he desired to avoid it in framing his Tariff, and I ask him to discuss the point—to take the turns of the imports from the United States, Great Britain, and the other countries, and examine in their light the operation of his Tariff. What do we find? We find in the six months' return, ending in December, 1878, as compared with December, 1879, the following figures: At the end of December 1878, under the Mackenzie Administration, there was imported from Great Britain of dutiable goods \$14,481,676, on which there was a duty collected of \$2,835,387, or an average duty of 20 per cent. From the United States there was imported \$11,748,796, on which there was a duty collected of \$2,624,284, or an average duty of 22½ per cent. Now, we come to consider the effects of the Tariff under the present Administration. We find that from Great Britain there was imported \$12,183,666, duty collected, \$304,487, or an average duty of 25 per cent. From the United States there was \$9,560,637, and a duty collected of \$2,247,436, or an average duty of 24 per cent. The hon. the Finance Minister then failed in properly forecasting the effects of his Tariff. The late Finance Minister was perfectly accurate in forecasting it, as is proved to a demonstration by the figures laid upon the Table of the House. Under the Cartwright Tariff, I repeat, the dutiable goods from the United States were charged $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more than the goods from Great Britain, while, under the Tilley Tariff, goods from Great Britain are charged 1 per cent. more than those from the United States, making $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. difference in the Tariffs of the two Administrations.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: What about free and dutiable goods together?

MR. PATERSON: I quite understand how the hon. the Finance Minister arrived at the conclusion he did when he made his statement to the House the other night. But I would have thought that the hon. the Finance Minister, having endeavoured in that sly way to gain his point, would have hesitated before openly risking his reputation by calling attention publicly to the fact that in estimating the operations of his Tariff he was forced to the subterfuge of combining the free with the dutiable goods. Let me through you, Mr. Speaker, ask that hon. gentleman a question. In those free goods from the United States what do you find? You find free breadstuffs. Is there a British farmer that will complain to the hon. the Finance Minister if he puts \$10 on every bushel of grain that comes into this country? What do they care for that? How are they interested in the free goods? The only question that affects them is the one in which they themselves are interested. No breadstuffs, no grain, ever comes from England here. The only goods in which they are interested are the dutiable goods, the manufactured goods, the only goods they can send off, the only goods in which they compete with the States for our trade. I am glad the hon. the Finance Minister has confessed openly that he was forced, in order to show a balance of trade in favour of Great Britain as against the United States, to link in \$14,000,000 of free goods, mostly breadstuffs, of which the British public do not send one cent's worth into this country. I defy the hon. gentleman to contradict it. I defy the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) to controvert the fact that, from the figures he has furnished himself, on the goods in which Great Britain is interested, there is $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more levied against them than against the United States; $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. directly placed against them by that hon. gentleman as against 1 per cent. in their favour under the Mackenzie Administration. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman's attention to another fact. It was claimed that in the introduction of this Tariff, we were to have a scientific Tariff, that the Cartwright Tariff was not prepared upon anything like scientific principles at all. But the hon. the Minister of Finance did not assume that lofty tone that was assumed by the hon. the Minister of Railways, in regard to the late Finance Minister, that he was an utterly incapable man, that he was perfectly paralysed, that he had no idea of figures, or how the operation of duties would affect the prosperity of the country. Those hon. gentlemen wanted a Tariff that would shut out all foreign goods imported into this country, and yet give just as much revenue as it did before. They were going to produce all the goods that were used in the country without levying any internal tax, and raise all the money required by some wonderful means, of which they professed to possess the secret; the wonderful device being to fill our Treasury out of the pockets of the Yankees. That was to be their scheme, and, when we look at it in detail to see what this wonderful, scientific Tariff was, we find it in the one that was presented to us last year: a Tariff that was launched as the acme of perfection last year; and now, when it is amended in a hundred points this year, the amendments are still introduced as the everything that was wanted to make it perfect and complete. I dare say, as the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) said, "that every year this Tariff will have to be tinkered." The late Finance Minister must not be sarcastic. The charge against him was that he was a "fly-on-the-wheel," and those hon. gentlemen, to show that they are not "flies-on-the-wheel," will keep adding a little more every year to their Tariff. Now, let us look into the operations of this Tariff, and I would ask the hon. the Finance Minister, if he thinks it worth his while, to follow me in my calculations, and, if I am not correct, let him set me right. It is a very important calculation. It is taken from the figures furnished us in the comparative statement of the value of goods that were imported for the six months ending December 31st, 1878, and for the six months ending December 31st, 1879. It is one of those returns that are so valuable to the Opposition at this moment, for I have not seen a comparative statement brought down by the Orders of the House that has not told strongly against the hon. gentlemen that have been forced to bring it down. In the six months of the Cartwright Tariff ending December 31, 1878, there was imported of dutiable goods \$28,472,595, and there was collected on them a duty of \$6,320,862. There was an average duty levied upon them, in order to secure that amount of revenue, of 22¼ per cent. Under the operation of the present Finance Minister's Tariff, for a like period of six months, we find this result: Importation of dutiable goods, \$24,845,742, with a revenue derived from them of \$6,678,191, or an average duty of 26¾ per cent. I am now coming to the scientific point. There is this difference of 4½ per cent. in the burdens that have been placed upon the people of this country. But what I want to call the attention of the House to is this fact, that 4½ per cent. additional burden laid upon the people under the Cartwright Tariff, instead of under the scientific Tariff of the hon. gentlemen opposite, would have produced—what result? Why, that 4½ per cent. on the importations under the Cartwright Tariff would have given for that half year \$1,281,266 more revenue. But, in one year, the rate of duty levied by that hon. gentleman opposite—the 26¾ per cent. he has charged on every dollar of dutiable goods that the people of this country consume—if levied, not under his scientific Tariff, but under the Tariff as arranged by the late Finance Minister, would have given more revenue than he gets to-day by \$2,562,532. The same rate of duty would have given that much more. Now, where is the science? The point where the hon. gentleman thinks he has got me is this. He will say: There have not been as many goods imported this year as under the Cartwright Tariff, and I grant that, but is not that one of the effects the hon. gentleman promised by his Tariff, that it would decrease the importation of these goods? But under the classification of the goods as made by the late Finance Minister, if it had been necessary to increase the average rate by 4½ per cent. in order to increase the revenue, he would not have stopped the importation of goods into the country; they would have come in as they did before, and, that being the case, we would have had, under the Cartwright Tariff, without any more taxation than we now have, two millions and a half more revenue instead of having, as the hon. gentlemen opposite have, a deficit of from one and a-half to two million dollars. But I have not pointed out all the merits of those hon. gentlemen's Tariff yet. It is an important fact that under the Cartwright Tariff we would have had two millions and a-half more money without any increase in the burdens on the people, and we would have had, in addition, free coal, free flour, free breadstuffs of all kinds, sugar for 1c. a pound less and tea for 10 per cent. less. And yet those hon. gentlemen talk to you about a scientific Tariff, so arranged that a tax of 4¾ per cent. additional means \$2,500,000 less of revenue, besides taxing the prime necessities of life in fuel and food. The statement is there; the hon. gentleman can see for himself the proof of my reasoning. Perhaps he will be able to controvert it. The only argument he can advance is that, if the late Administration had increased the rate of duty by 4½ per cent., there would not have been so many goods brought into the country. Sir, there would have been. The importation of goods has not been stopped by the 4½ per cent. added by that hon. gentleman under his Tariff. The late Administration might have put on 4½ per cent. more, and the imports would not have been diminished. They have every reason to believe the importation would have gone on, and they would have had two and a-half millions more in the Treasury, and, as I stated, free coal, free breadstuffs, and 1c. a pound less on sugar. The hon. gentleman can determine it for himself. In the matter of sugar alone, under the operations of the scientific Tariff of the hon. gentleman—and here again I speak from official figures furnished by the hon. gentleman himself—10,000,000lb. more of sugar have been imported during the last six months than were imported during the last six months of the Mackenzie Administration. How much more revenue did he get? He has a decrease of over a quarter of a million on revenue. But there was an increased importation of 10,000,000lb. of sugar; that means a loss, by the higher rate of duty on sugar, of about \$600,000 by way of revenue. Has it gone into the pockets of the people? If it has been left in the pockets of the people, there has been no wrong. But if this half a million dollars is lost to the revenue, and is not in the pockets of the people, where is it? If it is in the pockets of persons to whom it does not belong, and if it was not given voluntarily by the people, but was taken by Act of Parliament, I ask what name shall be given to the hon. gentlemen who passed the enactment that took \$600,000 of the people's money out of their pocket to put it, not into the public revenue, but into the pocket of some individual in this country? It has been asserted by hon. gentlemen opposite that sugar has been lower in this country than in the United States. I happen to handle sugar considerably myself, and I know that, during nearly the whole time which this Tariff has been in operation, the ruling price of our refined sugars has been from $\frac{3}{4}$ c. to $1\frac{1}{4}$ c. per pound higher than we would have had to pay for them had the Cartwright Tariff been in force, under which we got half a million more revenue than under this. Let us remember the fact that there are only one or two refiners in this country. The hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault) said the other night there were two competing keenly. There are two there now, but they are virtually one. The capacity of the refinery of Redpath and Son is over 60,000,000lb. per year. This is the amount turned out by them, with an increase of from $\frac{3}{4}$ c. to 1c. per pound to the ordinary legitimate profit. It means that, in addition to the ordinary and legitimate profits to which they are entitled, they have been enabled by the enactments of the hon. the Finance Minister to take out of the pockets of the people of this country \$450,000 to \$600,000. I do not blame Redpath and Son. There is not an hon. gentleman in this Chamber that would not do the same thing. The St. Lawrence Refinery Company are not to be blamed if they combine with Redpath and Son, as they will do, and then they will have the people of this country at their mercy. If the hon. gentleman sees that such is the effect of his Tariff in the one item of sugar, he will readily understand me when I say that, if we had the same average increase of duties under the Cartwright Tariff, and as adjusted by that hon. gentleman, we would have had \$2,500,000 more revenue, besides having sugar for 1c. a pound less, and our coal and flour absolutely free from taxation. Now we pass on to consider the claim that was made by those hon. gentlemen that, by their restoration to power and the enactments they would place upon the Statute-book, manufactures would increase and everything would prosper. Those hon. gentlemen manifest a good deal of uneasiness, a good deal more uneasiness at hearing the utterances of their right hon. leader read than I see them manifest sometimes when that right hon. gentleman has addressed them. I do not know why it is that, when the words of that right hon. gentleman are read, and read from the organ of his own party, they should manifest so much restiveness. I do not know how it is that, when a sentence of that famous Parkhill speech of his, that was so loudly cheered when it was delivered, is read now, the hon. gentlemen opposite should become so restive. It cannot be that it is simply because it is read by a member of the Opposition. The words are there, uttered by their worthy chief, and he has promised there distinctly that, if the people would place him in power, prosperity would return, confidence would be given back, stocks would increase, the country would become prosperous, even before their Tariff was submitted. The very next day he said that would take place, but 540 days have elapsed since then, and still the cry of the hon. gentlemen opposite is: Give the policy time to develop itself; it has not yet had time to produce its beneficial effects. Well, that may be, but the country is not disposed to look at it in that light. A man who should obtain a loan of money from another man, promising to return it next day, would be considered to have forfeited his honour as a man if, after 540 days had elapsed, he failed to make good the return of that money; and, if, when asked for it, he turned round and said: You must give me time in order to do this, what could be said of that man? What is the difference between such a man and those gentlemen who said: If you will return us to power you will have prosperity on the very next day; and, after 540 days have passed, they come to this House and as suppliants, as insolvents, ask us to compromise our claim with them, or at least to give them an extension of time? Sir, they need it. In all the operations of this Tariff it has failed to do what those hon. gentlemen promised of it. They claimed it would stop disaster and give confidence, and they claim now that it has realised those expectations, because there is more confidence in the country now, and things are in a better state now than a year ago. Will the hon. gentlemen be prepared to listen to me while I make them an admission in reference to this point. A peculiar state of affairs reigns in Canada at the present time. On the one hand, there never was more misery than there is now. There never were more men out of work. There never was greater suffering and destitution among certain classes than at the present moment; yet I am free to admit that, while that is the case, there is an undertone of confidence and buoyancy that we were strangers to two years ago. I believe that we are now to have better times than we have had. I believe there is to be a revival in business. I make this admission designedly, for this reason, that the people of the country, when that revival comes, may know that it has not been brought about by the legislative enactments of hon. gentlemen opposite. I invite the attention of the House to the consideration of the following figures also furnished by the hon. the Finance Minister. I find that, for the six months ending 31st December, 1878—the last six months of the Mackenzie Administration—the exports of the produce of the forest amounted to \$9,257,471. I find for the six months just ending, under hon. gentlemen opposite, the exports of the same article were \$10,304,081 I find that the exports of animals and their produce for the last six months of the Mackenzie Administration were \$8,494,872. I find that, during the last six months, they amounted to \$10,840,190. I find that the exports of agricultural produce in the last six months of the Mackenzie Administration were \$12,689,000. During the last six months of 1879 they amounted to \$14,801,652. That means that we have had an increase of the exports of those three articles during the last six months, over the last six months of the Mackenzie Administration, of \$5,504,565. Are these figures right?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Yes.

MR. PATERSON: I am glad at any rate that I have hit on some figures that the hon. the Finance Minister admits are correct. They are correct, and I rejoice with the hon. the Finance Minister in the hole they fill. It can be no satisfaction to any Canadian to know that this country is suffering under reverses. It can be no satisfaction to any Canadian, I care not what political stripe he may be of, to see the continuance of hard times and the depression of trade exist in the land. When I find an increase of $5,500,000 in the exports of three articles alone, there is ground for greater confidence in the minds of the people. But it should be borne in mind that the legislative enactments of the hon. gentleman have not influenced that matter in the slightest degree. The hon. gentleman surely is not impious enough to claim that by his legislative enactments he has caused the rain to fall from heaven and the sun to shine on the earth, or that he has caused it to produce more trees, or that he has enabled the cow to give more milk, and thus enabled us to obtain more butter and cheese. He tells many strange tales, but he will hardly allow his imagination to carry him away to that extent. The hon. gentleman will hardly claim that he has been the means of sending up the lumber market of Albany $2 per thousand, or that he was strong enough to force up the butter and cheese market of Great Britain.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I thought butter and cheese had not increased in price.

MR. PATERSON: The price has increased, but the hon. gentleman will hardly claim, that the National Policy has succeeded in doing that.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is a question of fact. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) said that the price of nothing but, wheat had been increased.

MR. PATERSON: I will leave the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for West Middlesex to fight that matter out between themselves. I was saying we have had increased prosperity, and that is the reason that there is more confidence in commercial circles. What would hon. gentlemen have done if they had had a year like that of 1876, when the Mackenzie Administration was in power, and when there was almost a famine in this land? Then, instead of being able to export $8,000,000 worth of breadstuffs, the balance was turned against us and we had to import more than we exported. Hon. gentlemen were cognisant of that, yet they did not hesitate to play the rôle of demagogues, and actually blame the late Administration because there had been a famine in the land and because Providence withheld rain. I pass on to notice the commercial interest which it was promised would be benefited by the Tariff. What has been the effect of the Tariff in reference to commercial matters. It is this; it has removed the tea trade in a great measure from the hands of wholesale dealers in Canada, and almost centred it in the cities of Boston and New York; has taken away from Canadian wholesale merchants their opportunities for operating in sugar in foreign markets, and centred the business in two firms in Montreal. It has also taken away their opportunities of buying woollen and cotton goods in the foreign markets. To the agricultural interest the Government promised high prices, but I defy any hon. member of this House to show how the price of one single article of agricultural produce has been enhanced through the operation of the National Policy. We never denied that wheat, oats and barley might advance. We never denied that if there was a famine in Europe there would be a greater demand for wheat, and that it would go up in price. It will be within the recollection of the House that we got $2.25 for wheat when there was no duty on it. What we claim is that the present rise in prices is due entirely to the rise in foreign markets, and that it is uncontrolled by the combined wisdom of this Government of ours. The cry of the hon. gentlemen was: We will give the farmers a home market, and they asserted that it was a shame that millions of bushels of American wheat should come into the country without paying any duty, while we have to pay a duty of 15c. per bushel on all Canadian wheat going into the United States. I find, however, from an Order in Council, that any miller in this country can go to the United States and bring in the whole wheat crop of the United States in bond, and grind it in his own mill, instead of grinding Canadian wheat. But he can do more under that Order in Council. When wheat is getting scarce in the Canadian market he can bring in American wheat, grind it, and sell it on the Canadian market. Then, after the Canadian harvest has been gathered in, and the price of wheat has gone down, he can grind Canadian wheat, and export it in its place as an equivalent. Hon. gentlemen went through the farce of putting 15c. a bushel on wheat, and they opened the door through this Order in Council to all the surplus wheat of the United States.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. gentleman has not quoted the Order in Council correctly.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: But we know how it works.

MR. PATERSON: It will afford me a slight rest to read that Order in Council. It is as follows:—

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE, OTTAWA,

“Thursday, 10th day of July, 1879.

“HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL.

“On the recommendation of the hon. the Minister of Customs, and under the authority given and conferred by the 125th section, clause 1st of the Act 40 Vic. cap. 10, intituled: an Act to amend and consolidate the Act respecting the Customs,—

“His Excellency the Governor-General has been pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the grinding and packing of wheat, maize, and other grain, in bond, shall be done and conducted under the regulations and restrictions following, namely:—

“1. The Collector of Customs at any port of entry, shall receive entries of foreign wheat, maize, or other grain to be ground and packed in bond for exportation or consumption, and such Collector shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, such wheat, maize, or other grain to be forwarded on to the port of destination, where may be situated the mill or mills at which the said wheat, maize, or other grains to be ground and packed in bond as by law permitted.

"2. The wheat, maize, or other grain shall be so forwarded under bonds to be taken either by the Collector of the port of entry, or by the Collector at the port of destination, as may best suit the convenience of the importer, which bonds shall be taken for an amount that will cover the duties chargeable upon the said wheat, maize, or other grain, and be conditioned for the due payment of such duties should such wheat, maize, or other grain go into consumption; or for the due exportation of such wheat, maize, or other grain, or the equivalent thereof in flour and meal; and on proof of the payment of such duties, or of the due exportation as aforesaid, within one year from the date of the said bond or bonds, the said bonds shall be duly cancelled; and if such bonds shall be given at the port of destination a certificate of such payment or exportation, under the hand of the Collector of Customs at such port, shall be forwarded to the Collector at the port of entry at which such wheat, maize, or other grain shall have been imported or entered for manufacture in bond.

(Signed) "W. H. HILSWORTH,
"Clerk, Privy Council."

I think hon. gentleman listening must see that I have correctly interpreted this Order in Council. What the Order says is that American wheat may be imported into Canada and its equivalent in flour exported within one year, but it does not say that that flour must be made of American wheat. Canadian wheat can be used as the equivalent, as I have no doubt it is.

MR. BOWELL: That is not correct.

MR. PATERSON: Very well, we have the document here, and the farmers will be able to interpret it for themselves. I have taken the trouble to ascertain what effect the imposition of the duty on wheat has had, and I glean these facts. I find that, from the 15th of March to the 30th of June, a period of three months from the enactment of the Tariff, 559,968 bushels of wheat were imported from the United States. The farmers, in the simplicity of their hearts, thought that 15c. a bushel would be levied on these 559,968 bushels of wheat, in order to give them Protection. Now, I have to tell every farmer how much money went into the public chest in the shape of duty on those 559,968 bushels of wheat. There was placed in the Treasury, by way of duty on that wheat, $210 altogether. In calculating the average per bushel I could hardly find decimals small enough, but, as near as it could possibly be ascertained, it amounted to about one-thirtieth part of a cent per bushel. It is thus that the farmers have been scientifically and deliberately deceived by hon. gentlemen opposite; and they need not be surprised that there is a feeling of indignation, scorn and disgust, and that it found its manifestation in sweeping away the candidates that were supported by them in the last Ontario elections. They could not content themselves with what they did; it was surely enough contemptuously if I might be allowed to use the term, without adding insult to injury, by coming down as they have done with a proposition to put 3c. per pound on wool, but only on the kinds of wool of which we do not import one pound. It is the last straw that breaks the camel's back; and the hon. gentleman is advancing in years, and having got where he is, he cares very little for the back of the camel, or whether it is broken or not. We pass on now to another interest—the lumber trade—which has to be developed. But the lumberman has received no benefit whatever; he is taxed, and heavily taxed. A heavy tax is put upon his provisions, and upon the implements he uses, but, in respect of his timber, which is dependent upon the foreign markets, the hon. gentlemen opposite were utterly incompetent to help him in the least degree. How has their policy acted in reference to the fisheries? Has it given us any more fishes to the sea? What are the ominous words uttered here by the representatives from Prince Edward Island, representatives that support the present Government? They show clearly that that Province does not reap any advantage whatever from the National Policy; and already we hear from the people of that Province, deceived and exasperated as they may well be, the ominous word, "secession." With regard to the shipping interest, we need not do any more than recal to the attention of the House the statement made by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) to show what disastrous results have overtaken that interest in this country. The agricultural interest, the lumber interest, the shipping interest and every interest is in a worse condition than ever before. There is, however, one interest which gentlemen on the opposite side took specially under their wing; an interest which raised the clamour for the National Policy in this country, in order to secure the prosperity of that one industry which they pre-eminently wished to encourage. What has been the effect of the National Policy with reference to the manufacturing interest? Here, Sir, at any rate, we have to bear testimony to the fact that a few manufacturers in certain lines have benefitted by the legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite—and not many of them. We have a benefit derived by the sugar refiners. There are but two of them in existence. One of them is a small one: I wish to refer more particularly to the Redpath establishment.

MR. PATERSON.

MR. PLUMB: We have heard that before.

MR. PATERSON: It possibly might do to hear it again. There would be something for the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), having heard it so often, to explain, why legislation has thrown all the profit into the pockets of one firm. Will he give as his answer that the people have been recouped by getting additional employment? Will that be said? We have the testimony of one of the proprietors of that establishment that, counting the porters and draymen, and all the men that make the barrels, all the men that cart their sugar and all their employes of every description, they employ 300 or 400 men. But, in giving these 300 or 400 men employment, what opposite result has been produced? I tell the hon. member for Niagara that, since the introduction of this Tariff, there have been as many thrown out of employment by the numerous steam-baking and confectionery establishments that have gone into insolvency in consequence, in part at least, of the change in these sugar duties. By these failures of confectionery establishments there have been as many men thrown out of employment as the Redpath sugar refinery has given employment to. With reference to woollen materials and cotton goods, it is said that there has been a benefit, and also that there has been a benefit in the rubber establishment. The hon. the Minister of Finance is in possession of a circular, signed by certain manufacturers, stating that the Tariff has damaged their industries.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: My strongest case is that very petition.

MR. PATERSON: In what respect is it the strongest?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I will tell you when I speak of it.

MR. PATERSON: I would like to hear it now. The hon. gentleman stated in his Budget Speech that, when he went on that pilgrimage of his, he found that manufacturers were discontented in some places, and from that he judged that his Tariff was not too much in their favour. I would ask him if he has any reason to believe that Redpath and Son are dissatisfied with the Tariff. If they are fully satisfied, then he should then feel, according to his own reasoning, that he had unduly favoured them. It is not only true that agricultural implements and the iron trade have suffered, but also the boot and shoe trade, and every industry that employed ten or a hundred times as many men as were employed by all the sugar refineries that can be in this country. One hundred and twenty million pounds of sugar a year is the whole amount required to be manufactured. Sixty million pounds are produced by Redpath's establishment. Two refineries of that size will supply all that is wanted. We would then have only 600 or 700 men employed; there would be $1,000,000 more paid out of the people's pockets for sugar, and half a million dollars less revenue. This would be the result, if my figures are correct, and anyone can decide for himself. Now, I say that, if the hon. the Minister of Finance would take every one of these sugar refinery employes, and buy for each a farm of the best land in Ontario, and give him in addition $500 per annum to take his ease, he would save money to the people of this Dominion. Divide up that million and a half dollars taken out of us between these 300 or 400 men, and see how much money it would give each. If in order to make a home market it is necessary to keep in the country these 300 or 400 consumers of our farm produce, the plan I have suggested would save the country half a million. If there be anything that is unjust and oppressive it is the tariff on sugar. What I most deplore is that trade and commerce and the Tariff should become an issue between the two political parties. Party objects and party ties carry away gentlemen opposite to the support of a policy that they must know to be wrong. I am surprised that a gentleman of such intelligence and capacity as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who is not in his seat just now, should be carried away in this manner, and that gentlemen from Montreal and other commercial centres should allow their party prejudices to so pervert their judgment. Is there any one of the hon. gentlemen opposite that does not know that they are fooling and insulting the people of this country by persisting in this policy. They must be all aware of it; but, because it is denounced on this side of the House they will not recede, and the consequence is that we shall have to go on another year, with six or seven million dollars taken out of the people of this country, the large proportion, if not all of it, going into the pockets of a certain few instead of going into the Public Treasury. That is what we have had and what we must continue to have as the effect of the National Policy. We are told they bargained for this result, but the people of this country will not say they bargained for this. They bargained for what hon. gentlemen opposite promised; but this is not what they promised. Depression existed in trade. They said it was caused by the Government, and that the remedy to apply was to turn out that Government and give the reins of power to themselves. Having been seated on the Treasury Benches, they remind me of the quack doctor in a western town, who was asked to prescribe for a child in a low fever. He said: "I do not know much about patients in that state, but give the child this medicine; it will throw it into fits, and I am first-rate in curing fits;" the remedy being to stop the medicine. The hon. gentlemen opposite found the country feverish; they found it in a low state, and they asked to be allowed to apply the remedy. Now they say: "We thought we knew the remedy, but we were mistaken in the disease; but we can give you fits, and we are good in curing fits." The people think they have got "fits" in the taxation which has been heaped upon them, and the Opposition say that in order to cure the evil results they have entailed on the country through the operations of their nostrum, in the shape of excessive taxation, that taxation must cease. Let the people pay into the Treasury no more than is required for the wants of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite, and the hon. the Minister of Railways especially, have declared that the country is still with them. I have to tell them that they sit there virtually by the fact that Parliamentary life in this House is five years. They sit there by virtue of hanging together, and they will sit their time out because they are banded together for that purpose. But they must be cognisant of the fact that their official life will cease just as soon as the people have an opportunity of pronouncing judgment on their policy. It will be remembered that this question came up last Session, and I want to allude to the result of the Ontario elections, for I consider they bear upon this question. I consider that they ought at any rate to give premonitory warning so hon. gentlemen opposite that the course they have pursued is not one regarded as purely beneficial to our interests. That policy was emphatically condemned by the people of Ontario, so far as they had any power to condemn it, when the Local Government appealed to them in June last. During the Tariff Debate last year, I made some remarks in reply to an hon. gentleman opposite, which will be found on page 1532 of the Debates, 1879. On resuming my seat I was taken to task by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. The position taken by myself was that the June elections would be a test of the popularity of the National Policy, and it was accepted by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. The Mail newspaper, the organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite, in commenting on my remarks, said, editorially, on April 28, 1879:

"Mr. Paterson, of Brant, is as good a finger-post in political matters as any other. In his speech on Thursday night he was frank enough to tell the House that he was of opinion that the people of Ontario were watching the proceedings of the House, and that at the coming elections the popular feeling against the Tariff would make itself felt. It is now somewhat satisfactory to know that Mr. Paterson and his friends are desirous of bringing Dominion issues into the Local elections; perhaps the people of Ontario will give the matter their consideration. The Reformers are desirous of testing the earnestness of the people of Ontario in favour of the National Policy—the people would, perhaps, prefer to be tested.

MR. PATERSON.

We believe the people are as fully in favour of the National Policy now as they were in September last. Messrs. Paterson and Mowat seem disposed to join their voices in declaring that the National Policy is oppressive and unpopular, perhaps the people will accept the issue and undeceive these gentlemen."

Well, the people accepted the issue, and some gentlemen were deceived, but it was not Messrs. Mowat and Paterson—it was the hon. gentlemen opposite. Then we find the right hon. the leader of the Government, the hon. the Minister of Railways, from the distant Province of Nova Scotia, the hon. the Minister of Finance, from the distant Province of New Brunswick, going post-haste into the centre of Ontario in order to cast their influence on the side of the Conservatives at those elections. In the amphitheatre in Toronto, three nights before the polling, we find, by the Mail of June 3, that the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) said :

"He warned all friends, and those of the opposite party who approved of the National Policy, that if they voted for the support of the Mowat Administration they would be voting for the maintenance and continuation of a Government who had tried to defeat the National Policy, and to crush down the infant and struggling industries of Canada."

On the same occasion Sir Samuel L. Tilley said :

"Let them, as electors, discharge their duty in such a manner as to sustain this policy."

Then there was a belted knight, the hon. the Minister of Railways, who hastened up to Hamilton to address the electors, and what did he say, according to the same newspaper ?

"He knew too well that at such a crisis the people were so patriotic that they would sustain their unanimous decision of the 17th September last."

What do these words mean ? They mean that this entire Government threw its heart and soul into the Ontario elections, and told the people that, if they cast a vote against the Opposition in Ontario they were voting against the party in this House which gave the country the National Policy. And what was the verdict ? Thirty-six seats won by friends of the Opposition of this House, while they only lost three—a change so great that, if it were made here, it would amount to sixty-six votes, would make those hon. gentlemen tremble in their seats, and would crumble their Administration to the ground. Now, they claim that the people of Ontario did not consider that issue. They say that the Globe and Mr. Mowat said that the National Policy did not enter into the elections. Well, what did the Mail say ? In an editorial on June 7th, two days after the elections, it said : "Until within the last three days the Toronto Globe protested against the introduction of the National Policy into the contest." There is an admission of the fact that the Globe did not always say that the National Policy had nothing to do with the elections. Did the National Policy give Mr. Mowat his sweeping victory ? Hon. gentlemen opposite know that their friends in Ontario are one with themselves ; they know that they will take the cue from this Government. What was the character of the Mowat Administration, as portrayed by the hon. friends of the gentlemen in power ? According to their statements, it was the most corrupt Administration that ever sat 'on the Treasury Benches ; they had wasted $12,000,000, and were guilty of direct acts of corruption. Senator McPherson, one of the great authorities of this party, wrote a pamphlet, in which he proved that the Mowat Administration was not only the most incapable but the most corrupt and extravagant of any Administration. Well, how did that Government get their majority ? Hon. gentlemen opposite are on the horns of a dilemma. They must either admit that the Ontario Reform party went in on the strength of the failure of the National Policy, or they must admit that Senator McPherson and his colleagues in the Dominion Government have villified Mr. Mowat and his supporters. They can take which horn of the dilemma they choose. In conclusion, I desire to say a few words upon a matter I think it is time for us to pause and consider. I am willing to admit that the hon. the Finance Minister had some strength in his argument when he pointed to the fact that he had negotiated a loan in the London market on better terms than had been obtained for many years previous—when he pointed to that as proof that his Tariff was not regarded by the people of Great Britain as hostile to them. It is pleasant, when we have to find so much fault, that we can award a meed of praise

when it due. I am free to admit the fact that the hon. Minister effected a good loan, and he is entitled to all the credit such a transaction should bring. It is not with a desire to detract from that credit that I make this observation, but I make it because it seems to point out to my mind a consciousness of something which the hon. Minister is aware of. He told the people of Great Britain that, if this Tariff operated against them, he would give relief in relinquishing certain duties which bore upon them. But he has not done so, and it seems to me significant that the hon. gentleman is conscious of the fact that, though he made a good loan, he cannot, with the Tariff standing as it is, go a second time to the London market for money, and consequently we have this forced loan of $8,000,000 from the Canadian people in order to relieve him. If he went there with such success the first time, why does he hesitate to go again, and why is it necessary to come here to propose legislation for this forced loan? It seems as though the hon. gentleman is conscious that, so long as the Tariff remains as it is, he dare not go to London again for money. He may also be conscious of another fact, that the people of Great Britain are watching the finances of this country, and know that, while the hon. gentleman is doubling taxation on many articles, there is a greater deficit than ever before. They can see that the Public Debt is being run up to proportions beyond the strength and endurance of the country—that the debt has gone up to $155,000,000 under those hon. gentlemen, for they are responsible for the whole increase of that debt. The increase that took place under the late Administration was for works the country had been pledged to. The present Government have augmented the debt from $75,000,000 nett to $155,000,000; they are now forcing a loan on the people of $8,000,000 more—a National Debt, altogether of about $40 per head. It is time the House should ask itself, and the country also: Whither are we drifting? It is time to insist on the brakes being put on the wheels of State, and that no outlay should take place but such as is imperatively demanded in the development of the country, and as will speedily repay itself. I am a Canadian, above all things, and wish well to Canada; I have no fault to find with the existing arrangements between it and the Mother Land. I do not desire the severance of the connection in any sense; but, if there be any danger to that tie and of a new connection being formed with the people to the south of us, it is likely to arise from the enormous, sudden, rapid increase of the Public Debt. The moment you give the people to understand that our debt is greater in proportion than that of the United States, you snap one of the strongest cords that binds us in allegiance to the Mother Country. Should a change in the relations of the Dominion to the old land in future take place, I desire that Canada may have so managed her financial and other affairs as not to be willing to transfer her allegiance to the Republic, but to take her destinies into her own hands; and, on this continent, more than half of which she owns, to build up a name that would be a credit and an honour to any nation. I hope we shall cultivate the sentiments that will bind us firmly together, and help us to achieve such a glorious result. If this is to be done, it can only be by guarding against rushing up our Public Debt to such an extent as would drive us to the neighbouring Republic to get rid of burdens and evils the country could not otherwise shake off. To these considerations I hope that hon. Ministers will address themselves, and that for the next few years they will ask for only such expenditure as will be found necessary to the development and material progress of the country. I hope that we shall not engage in any enterprise that would not only sink much money, but entail the management of costly public works, which would add millions in a few years to the present heavy burdens, and cost, like some existing works, hundreds of thousands a year more than they produce. I thank the House for its kind attention to my remarks, and assure hon. gentlemen that, if I have given any offence to any of them, it was through no improper, unjust or malicious motive. If my arguments and figures can be controverted, I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will address themselves at once to the task. If they succeed in setting me right, I shall appreciate the benefit, and thank them as the instruments of so much good to myself.

MR. ORTON: It is not my intention to prolong the discussion on the National Policy, because I do not think there is anything to be gained by it. The time will come when we can approach it with far more profit to hon. members and the country. I believe that then some of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have made long speeches on the subject will regret very much what they have said. We have witnessed before, with certain hon. gentlemen opposite, extreme regret for the eloquent speeches made by them on the trade of this country. I recollect the speech of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in 1874, when he, with all his eloquence and peculiarly forcible manner, tried to impress the House and get his sentiments circulated through the country, to the effect that, in order in order to benefit it, and advance its best interest, we should adopt a high Protective policy. But party exigencies required him to change his base; and we witnessed the facility with which he could not only change his base, but the boldness with which he could express his regret for having given utterance to sentiments in favour of Protection. There are other hon. gentlemen on that side who have also been obliged, for the sake of party, and without any regard to the public interest, to desert the principles they first advocated in the House, the principles which they believed then were in the best interests of the people. I remember the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) making one of the most powerful appeals ever made in favour of Protection, and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) uttering sentiments in favour of Protection, not only to manufacturers, but the agricultural interest. But, when their leader adopted a different idea, and told his followers they must favour Free-trade—that it was necessary, as the friends of Free-trade in Canada were strong—they deserted their honest principles in the interest of their party. I could not help making a few remarks on this occasion, after the anecdote of the hon. member for South Brant in reference to fits. When I saw his struggles and violent contortions, I felt he was suffering from fits, and, being an expert on fits, I felt it my duty to give him a remedy for his trouble. In the first place, his speech referred to the increase in the Estimates.

He will find, however, no scandals in them; no money wasted on Goderich Harbour, or on Fort Frances Locks and the water-stretches, or on Anglin printing jobs or Palen contracts. There have been no hundreds of thousands thrown away on steel rails long before wanted, or on rails presented to the Canada Central Railway, without benefit to the country. The hon. the Finance Minister stated very good grounds for a judicious increase of the expenditure. He told the House that, in consequence of the impulse recently given our trade and commerce, a large increase of immigrants was expected, a large portion of our vast North-West Territory settled, and that our revenue would be consequently augmented. New roads and post-offices would be necessary, with similar improvements, as a preliminary to increased settlement; trade and the public income for current year warranted this increase. The hon. member for South Brant was kind and pleasant enough to say that the Government possessed supporters of intelligence, and that their friends represented any amount of wealth; but in the next breath he attempted to make the House believe that those independent gentlemen, like the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Hay), and others, who had, during a long lifetime, co-operated with hon. gentlemen on the opposite side in politics—that those independent men, who were driven out of the Reform ranks, and were obliged, out of patriotism, to act as they have done, had not acted a proper part. Does he mean to insult them, by stating that they would sit here and give utterance to sentiments that they did not believe? Does he mean that intelligent Conservative members came here after hard struggling to carry their elections for the paltry purpose of supporting a set of men in office, without higher sentiments or worthier ideas to influence their course? The hon. gentleman made a very violent attack on the hon. the Minister of Railways, the reason for which I can easily understand. If there ever was a speech that utterly exposed the hypocrisy, the entire want of patriotism, and the petty character of the principles which guided the Reform party in the past, and in its conduct in this House since the last elections, it was the speech of that hon. gentleman in reply to the late Finance Minister. I can easily imagine how the late Finance Minister must have felt that effort, and also how his followers, who admire his peculiar romancing faculty, must have felt it. The hon. member for South Huron said he had a sort of affection for romance, and I am sure we believe he prefers it to truth, if we judge by his long, rambling speech on all sorts of matters beside the questions at issue, and that he is a worthy follower of the late Finance Minister. Compare the course of the present with that of the late Finance Minister, who, twenty-four hours after he brought down the Tariff, saw all the corridors of the House crowded with deputations, from all quarters, who came to beseech him to give more consideration to the welfare and business requirements of the country. He was obliged to occupy a very humiliating position, and change that Tariff to such an extent as to put it almost beyond his own power of recognition. I also recollect the years that we on this side sat in Opposition, pleading the cause of the country, and the deaf ear that hon. gentleman turned not only to us, but to the most active and energetic business men who came to pray that he would consider what the interests of the country required, and relieve its struggling industries, and try to rescue the country from the despair into which it was falling under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. I remember, with what self-satisfaction, and arrogant assumption of superiority, peculiar to him, he motioned them all away, seeming to say: I know everything. His great object seemed, not to enter into the views and feelings of the people, but to show that when he gave his opinion it had to be followed, at whatever risk to the interests of Canada. How different has been the course of the present Finance Minister in all respects. I could not help thinking, when listening to the long tirade of the late Finance Minister, that when he passes away—a fate I hope far distant—the epitaph that Robert Burns applied to “Jamie” might well be inscribed on his tomb:

“Beneath these stanes lies Richard’s banes,
Oh, death, in my opinion,
Ne’er took such a blathering one Into his dark dominion.”

We have heard him indulging in long-winded speeches, night after night, regardless of the people’s wants and interests, and of the fact that himself and colleagues were driven ignominiously from office by an indignant community. When the present Finance Minister and his colleagues received such an overwhelming expression of the confidence of the people of this country, what was their course? Did they say they knew what was better for the people of Canada than the people themselves? No, but the hon. the Finance Minister was willing to receive advice from all classes, and day after day he received deputations with courtesy and kindness, to obtain from them information with reference to the different industries of this country, and the result was the bringing down of the Tariff, which is not only an honour to that hon. gentleman, but a credit to our country. It will, I am convinced, raise our country from that condition of dependency into which it was brought by the maladministration of the former Government. I believe that the policy of this Government is one eminently in the interests of Canada. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) stated to-night that Protection, as a principle applied to the improvement of trade, was a long exploded doctrine. But can he say that such is the case when we find that almost every nation advanced in civilisation is protecting itself against Great Britain, the only Free-trade country in the world? They are all protecting themselves against Great Britain, and that country is obliged, through many of her leading men, to acknowledge, though strongly wedded to Free-trade, that it will be impossible for her to hold her supremacy unless she adopts Protective measures. Protection is one of the very first impulses of man; it means self-defence, and is there a nation under the sun with any spirit that would submit to have their industries destroyed and their trade taken away from them without attempting to defend their position? I think not, and I believe the time is not far distant when even Englishmen themselves will be compelled to admit that their Free-trade policy has been a failure. I believe in the abstract that the principle of Protection is the only one by which Free-trade can ultimately be obtained among different countries. In order to secure fair trade relations with other countries, it is necessary for us, first, to adopt Protective duties against those countries that raise barriers against our trade. Canada is placed in close proximity to the great American Republic, which has adopted a high Protective Tariff. We were obliged in self-defence to put on Protective duties, believing that we would by that means show the American people that, though we were small compared with them, we were yet possessed of some enterprise and public spirit, and would not tamely submit to have our trade destroyed and our interests sacrificed for the benefit of that Republic, and that we would not be driven into annexation by their high duties; and so we determined to put on Protective duties and defend ourselves in a manly way. We hope our vast territory will, by this means, ultimately become the home of a nation as great and powerful as the United States. I believe to-day that many of the leading statesmen in the United States recognise that it would be to their advantage to have fair trade relations with Canada, and that the day is not far distant when they will apply to us to enter into a Reciprocity Treaty, by which fair trade relations may be secured between the United States and Canada. I believe that, if Great Britain were to exercise the influence she possesses, she could induce the United States to give, in self-defence, as it were, entrance to her manufactured wares. If Great Britain were to put a duty upon agricultural products from the United States, and receive only those coming from her Colonies, what would be the result? In a few years the farming population of the United States would become discontented, and large numbers would come over to our North-West, and fill up our vast and fertile Territories. But it would not be long before the shrewd people of the United States would see that it was to their advantage to enter into some fair trade relations with Great Britain, and eventually such relations would result to the great benefit of both countries. I believe it is the duty at the present time of our Government to instruct their agent to Great Britain, who is a gentleman of very great ability, to use his influence with the British Government to consider this matter, for it is one of very great importance. I believe that, if it were fairly laid before the workmen of Great Britain, in whose interest the Corn Laws were abolished, they would see that it is to their interest to have the duty put upon American breadstuffs and meatstuffs and to allow Colonial breadstuffs and meatstuffs to come in free, because they can see that it would give them by that means an immense market for the manufactures of Britain in her Colonial possessions; it would increase her market ten-fold, and give employment to her masses without adding to the cost of breadstuffs. The United States and other countries now produce a surplus of breadstuffs, and if they were shut out of the English market, they would be compelled to grant Reciprocity in order to secure a market for their surplus breadstuffs. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) referred to the lumber business. It is true that much money is made by a few individuals in this country, who cut down our forests, which nature has given us, but the welfare of the lumbering men is of little general importance. But we all know that a vast improvement has taken place in reference even to the lumber business. I do not mean to say that it has resulted from the National Policy altogether, but I do mean to say that the inauguration of this policy has given confidence to the people of Canada; it has given confidence to the capitalist, and people are now ready to invest their means in building operations, in which lumber is used, and in manufacturing industries generally. I think this has something to do with increasing the prosperity of the lumbering interest. When I listened to the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) to-night, I could not help feeling that he was possessed of a degree of presumption and boldness that few men possessed. Does he not reflect that this National Policy is not carrying out merely the views of a Ministry or of a Parliament, but that it is carrying out the strongly expressed wishes of the intelligent people of Canada. Instead of decrying or denouncing this policy, he should, as a patriotic Canadian, endeavour to give it a fair trial. When hon. members on the other side of the House are denouncing this policy, and trying to show that their country is still suffering from depression, they are acting in a very unpatriotic way. They are destroying the confidence of the capitalist, and preventing him from investing in new enterprises to the same extent that he would otherwise do. I say that we should give this policy a chance to develop itself, and, if, at the end of four years, it is found that it has not been in the interests of the people of Canada, then will be the time to get up in this House and denounce it, as we have heard it denounced to-night. But I believe that four years hence this policy will have proved so great a success that no one in this House will dare to denounce it. I wish now to consider the agricultural part of the question. The hon. member for South Brant endeavoured to show that the policy had been of no advantage to the farmer. I am sure if he took a tour through the agricultural districts of Ontario, and told the intelligent farmers such a story as he has told to-night, he would be laughed to scorn. I can point to one article alone from which the farmers have derived more profit than they have lost through the increased taxation which that hon. gentleman says has been imposed upon the farmers of Canada by this Tariff. He says there has been an advance of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon manufactured woollen goods, hardware and cotton goods. Now, what does that amount to? An ordinary farmer's family is composed of, say, five individuals. I think they will require about \$21 worth of manufactured woollen goods, \$25 worth of cotton goods, and about \$40 worth of hardware in the year. Now, I think that is a very liberal amount of manufactured goods to allow to a farmer and his family for one year. At $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of additional taxation upon these articles, he would have to pay on woollen goods $94\frac{1}{2}$ ¢ per year; on cotton goods, \$1.12 $\frac{1}{2}$ per year, and on hardware \$1.80 per year. Now, we will take the hon. gentleman's own figures on sugar. One hundred pounds will be a fair allowance for each family in the course of a year, or a little less than one pound for three days. At a cent a pound, the increased taxation would amount only to \$1 per year. I shall shortly show he is incorrect in reference to this. However, we will allow 1c. per pound increase upon tea, and what does it amount to?

MR. ORTON.

A farmer's family, I think, will consume about 30lb.; that means 30c. a year. The whole amount of the duties therefore come to $5.17. I said I could show conclusively on one article alone that the farmers were benefitted by this Tariff, even supposing that they did not get an increased price for another article. You will recollect that a year ago wool was only 20c. per pound. The country was overstocked, and it could not be sold, even in the United States, because we were shut out of that market by high duties, consequently wool accumulated to a large extent in Canada. The effect of this National Policy, however, has been, not only to consume that large accumulation of wool, but we have been compelled to import it for the first time from Scotland and England to supply our manufacturers. The price of wool to-day, instead of being 20c., as it was a year ago, is now from 30c. to 35c. I think I am not guilty of exaggerating when I state that the average farmer of Ontario will have a flock of twenty sheep; the wool from each sheep will weigh about five pounds, making 100lb. in all. Receiving 15c. per pound for his wool more than he did before the inauguration of the National Policy, he makes $15, or three times as much as the whole tax that the hon. member for South Brant claimed the farmer was obliged to pay? The whole influence of the Globe newspaper to-day is used to frighten the farmers of Canada, and in trying to make them believe they have been taxed down to the earth; that they are obliged to pay the piper, as they say, and that the "bloated" manufacturers are living on the proceeds of their industry. But what is the fact? If we pursue the subject a little further, you will see that the profit of the farmer on cattle alone, in consequence of the increased duty on cattle, is advanced to a large extent. The whole market in this respect is better than it ever was before. At our large distilleries immense numbers of cattle are fed. Before this National Policy was inaugurated a large proportion of these cattle were brought in from the United States; now Canadians have to supply these cattle, and the farmers derive the benefit. The result has been that meatstuffs have advanced at least a cent per pound, and I think every farmer will have two head of cattle to sell, which will weigh 1,000lb., taking a low average; that means a profit of no less than $20. Then again, with reference to oats, which were about 25c. before the Tariff was imposed. We remember, however, immediately afterwards, before a new crop came in, the price of oats advanced 10c. We find to-day, that notwithstanding that we had the largest crop of oats that ever was produced in Canada, notwithstanding the fact that the average yield was from 50 to 60 bushels an acre—in my own county I know of an instance in which 90 bushels was taken from one acre of ground—notwithstanding this enormous yield, we find the price of oats has kept steadily up to somewhere about 35c. a bushel. Taking 300 bushels as the product of one farmer, the benefit he will derive on oats will amount to $30. With regard to wheat, I claim that, notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the result of giving our farmers a market for the flour used in the Lower Provinces, has been to benefit the Canadian farmer by increasing the price of his wheat about 5c. per bushel, and the benefit the farmer will derive on his wheat, putting it at 200 bushels—this is a small average I think—will amount to $10. In countries where rye is raised, the benefit has been immense, and on every class of produce raised on a farm there has been an increase of profit, and on these other articles we may fairly place it at about $8 of increase. That will make a total profit to every farmer in Canada over and above what he could make out of his farm produce previous to the operation of the National Policy, a sum of no less than $83 as against $5.17 of expenditure which that policy, according to the hon. member's assertion, has involved. We all know, however, very well, that woollen goods have not increased in price to any appreciable extent. On my way to Ottawa, I had occasion to go into a wholesale warehouse in Toronto, and I had some conversation with one of the proprietors, I said to him: "Are you importing a large quantity of woollen goods?" His reply was: "Before the introduction of the National Policy we hardly had a piece of Canadian cloth amongst our stock, but since the National Policy has gone into force, we have almost wholly used woollen goods of Canadian manufacture, and we find that our trade has greatly increased." I asked him if the price was increased to the consumer. He replied that it was not. He said that there might be some difference in the finer quality of goods, but that the coarser could be produced as cheaply here as in England, and that the bulk of the goods used by the masses of the people have not been increased at all. I think this is a very satisfactory condition of affairs. We have heard from a practical business man in this House, and one who knows something about the trade in this country, that the increased cost of cotton goods to the farmer is very small. I think it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that, as far as the farmer is concerned, he is benefitted to an enormous extent by this National Policy. If the great wealth-producing power of this country, the agriculturists, are benefitted, every class of our people is benefitted, and our country must go on advancing in prosperity. The increase of five millions in our exports, which has been referred to, does not give anything like a full index as to the increased prosperity of the farmers and the people of this country. It is not only the amount that is exported that we have to consider, but it is the amount that is consumed at home. We have heard from a gentleman here, whose testimony cannot be doubted, how greatly the condition of the workmen has improved. They are enabled not only to get employment more readily, at higher wages, but they are able to spend more and live better, to the great benefit of the farmers of Canada. The hon. gentleman referred to the sugar refineries, and said that in the time of the late Government the people had free coal, free flour, and free sugar, but he forgot to tell us also that the capital employed in mining the coal was spent in a foreign country—the United States. He forgot to tell this House that the capital expended in manufacturing flour for the people of this country, while we had the free flour, was spent to a very large extent in a foreign country—the United States. He also forgot to tell us in reference to sugar that the money that was made, and that is being made by refining sugar, was not made by a Canadian and distributed among the people of Canada, but it was made by the refiners of New York, of Glasgow, and of other places outside the Dominion. Although, Sir, we may have to pay the Messrs. Redpath the sum of $600,000 per annum for manufacturing our sugar, we have the satisfaction of knowing that that money will remain in the country, and assist in developing our internal resources. It can do no good to the Redpaths unless they distribute it, and it must naturally be distributed for the benefit of the people. We have the satisfaction of knowing that confidence has been restored in the country. Before this Government came into power, the people were sinking beneath a load of despair, and at times they lost hope entirely. But, after the memorable 17th of September, there was rejoicing from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In every town, village and hamlet in this Dominion, the people heartily rejoiced because they were delivered from the slavery of a bad Government. The hon. member was compelled to admit that there would be a revival of trade, but, with a strange inconsistency, he stated in the same breath that there never was so much distress in this country. He then referred to the Local Elections, but we know that they were not carried in opposition to the National Policy. We know that was not a question that was brought before the people. We know that Mr. Mowat is generally known as the Christian politician, and when he states a thing to the people of Canada they believe what he says. They believed him when he stated that the National Policy had nothing whatever to do with the contest that was going on in Ontario. The question was whether Mr. Mowat had acted honestly and fairly in the management of their Local affairs, and they felt that there was very little fault to find with his Administration, consequently they gave him their overwhelming confidence. The people then felt that the National Policy had only been inaugurated for a short time, and they could not form an idea as to whether it would be a great benefit or not. I do not know what the Government of Ontario have to do with the Customs duties, or anything of that kind, except when the members of that Government take tours or trips into the North West Territories, when they may feel the duties operate heavily upon them in the matters of cigars, brandy, corkscrews and things of that kind. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) referred to the difficulties experienced by the candy manufacturers of Canada. I was rather astonished by the remarks of the hon. gentleman, considering that he himself has succeeded to so great an extent as a candy manufacturer himself. He has a large manufactory in Brantford, and another establishment in Belleville, and he at any rate has not much need to complain. In conclusion, I cannot help hoping that our neighbours on the other side of the House will see the error of their ways, and endeavour to pursue a patriotic course. I believe there are some gentlemen on that side of the House who do feel that their friends have been pursuing a very dangerous course. I have not yet heard the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was always ready to speak on this question. We have a painful recollection of his having changed his views on a former occasion, and I believe he foresees now that the Reform party will have to change their principles and become Protectionists before they will again receive the confidence of this country. I thank the House for the patient hearing which they have granted to me on this occasion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RELIEF OF THE DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

REMARKS.

MR. GAULT: I have observed a cablegram, stating that the money voted by this Parliament for the relief of the distress in Ireland is to be devoted to the purchase of fishing-nets, boats, etc., for the use of the distressed fishermen. I did not understand that the money was to be so applied, but that the Home Government would immediately apply it to the purchase of food and clothing for the famine-stricken population.

MR. ANGLIN: I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought this matter before the House. If the telegrams are correct, the Mansion House Committee of Dublin do not approve of this mode of distributing this money, but say that if they must take it on those conditions they will take it. There is an immediate, pressing demand for food and clothing, particularly for food, and I think it was the intention of this Parliament that the money should be applied to the relief of those suffering for want of food.

MR. McCUAIG: The money voted by this Parliament has been transmitted to the Colonial Secretary, and I have every confidence that the British Government will see that the money is distributed for the purpose intended. I think it is improper to raise such a question now.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It is not at all improper, Mr. Speaker. As a member of the Government, I have no information, except the cable received by the Governor-General, which was read by the hon. the leader of the Government in Council a few days ago, asking to which of the two funds—the Mansion House Fund or the Duchess of Marlborough's Fund—it should be handed over. I think the answer of the Government was that the Government had no choice between them, and they would not object if the funds were distributed between the two organisations.

MR. ANGLIN: The objection is that the money should be diverted from the purpose for which it was originally voted—the relief of those actually famishing from want. The object of the British Government is a good object, and, if the demand for food were not so urgent in many parts of the country, there would perhaps be no objection to it.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: I know the first cablegram sent contained these words: "For the immediate relief of those suffering," but I will make enquiries and see how the matter stands. This is the first intimation I have received of the matter.

MR. RYAN (Marquette) moved:

"That the petition of D. M. Hagarty, M.D., and others, a Committee appointed at a public meeting, held at Portage la Prairie, Manitoba; praying that a Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the advisability of taking steps to relieve the suffering peasantry of Ireland by the encouragement of Irish immigration to Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and secure to the Government of Canada the repayment of any loan for the purpose above mentioned, as in the case of the Mennonite immigration, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Immigration and Colonisation."

MR. BLAKE: The concluding paragraph of the motion would seem to indicate that it was a proposal for advancing public funds. I do not know whether there has been any recommendation to the Crown.

MR. SPEAKER: The petition has been received, but I am told it was in such general terms that there could be no objection to it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not know whether it is exactly contrary to order to make such a reference, but I do not think the Government can consent to such a reference.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) for the second reading of the Resolutions relative to duties of Customs and Excise, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means (March 9th).

MR. WELDON: In addressing the House on the question of the Tariff, I desire to confine myself more particularly to its relation to the Province I have the honour to represent. There is another reason why I desire to do this, because the constituency the hon. the Minister of Finance represents forms a part of the city and county of St. John, the constituency my hon. colleague and myself represents, and I desire to show whether he represent or misrepresents the views of that constituency. In calling attention to the matters referred to by the hon. gentleman, particularly in regard to manufactures, and the condition of the city, it would only be right to call the attention of the House to the position of the Province when it was induced to enter the Confederation. I felt that the interests of the Province were not sufficiently guaranteed by the scheme proposed, and made my opposition against that scheme. My hon. colleague differed with me on that subject. The grounds that were put forward to the electors of New Brunswick were that they should have a good commercial route of railway and a moderate revenue Tariff. The Tariff of Canada was reduced as if a pledge to show that that intention was to be carried out, but I will show how far the objects have been carried out by the Government both in that respect and with regard to the Intercolonial Railway. We were to receive all foreign merchandise, we were to be the seat of the manufactories of this great Dominion, but all this has been entirely falsified. I am surprised that the hon. member for King's should go far away to build a road through a foreign country to do away with the Government railway. The hon. the Finance Minister has called attention to the fact that our Province has sustained great difficulties and trials, that St. John was totally destroyed by fire two years ago, and that the lumbering interest, and the shipping interest—two great interests in that Province—had not been so remunerative as in days gone by, and that the sufferings of the people of that Province had been very great. Now, in accounting for this distress and these difficulties under which we have laboured, the hon. Minister and the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) attributed them—the one to our having ceased to be a commercial centre, and the other said this depression of our shipping and lumber was owing to the great fire at St. John. The memory of that calamity will long remain in the remembrance of the people of New Brunswick, but no one who knows the position of our city will attribute the difficulties of our shipping and lumber trade to that fire; these were in no way affected by the fire; no one can venture to say that, in regard to the trade and staple manufactures of our country, they were affected by that fire. After that blow had been struck, after our business places had been destroyed in that fire, after we began to realise our position, the energy of our people began to display itself. I feel proud of the energy that was displayed; we commenced to rebuild our city, to start our trade, and regain a portion of our prosperity; and in a moment our efforts were crushed by the imposition of the Tariff of the hon. the Minister of Finance. That Tariff has borne upon us in a very heavy manner, and is a violation of the pledge on which we entered into Confederation. It was understood that it was imposed merely for the exigencies of the country; but it now must be brought forward, not for revenue, but for the purpose of protecting a few manufacturers. I regard it as a breach of faith. The petition presented by a large number of inhabitants of St. John, by the electors of that city and county—many of whom were friends in bye-gone days of the hon. the Minister of Finance, among whom many a name would strike him as very familiar—contains the following clause:—

“That your petitioners would also call especial attention to the fact that the Dominion of Canada is mainly composed of a number of Provinces, which, before the accomplishment of Confederation, each possessed the power to regulate commercial dealings with the others and with foreign countries, and that each Province, by the Act of Union, surrendered this important power, upon the understanding that the legislation of the Central Parliament should have impartial regard to the industrial and commercial interests of each Province. That your petitioners contend that the present Tariff, so far as New Brunswick is concerned, is a direct infringement of this understanding, and of the compact of Confederation.”

That is the expression of 2,800 electors of the city and county of St. John. Let me digress for a moment, to refer to the remark made upon it by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville), that it was got up by the Opposition. True, it was got up by an opposition—by the opposition of a large number of men who, in 1878, had supported the hon. member for King's and the hon. the Finance Minister, men who lived on the principal streets of business; and you will not find wanting the names of many of the men who, in 1878, were deluded and carried away by the misrepresentations of the hon. member for King's and the hon. the Finance Minister. That telegram, sent with regard to the Tariff, stands forth in glowing colours, in scarlet letters of shame. When a telegram was sent in the heat of the contest, what was the reply of the present leader?

“It is an absurd falsehood. Neither at London or elsewhere have I gone beyond my motion in Parliament, and have never proposed an increase, but only an adjustment of the Tariff.”

“J. A. MACDONALD.”

The hon. the Finance Minister, in commenting upon this petition, designated it as a piece of political clap-trap. Now, no member has a right to apply such an epithet to a petition with regard to the policy of the country, with regard to a burning question like the Tariff, even if it were signed by only half-a-dozen electors; but the language is grossly unjustifiable, nay, it is an insult, when applied to a petition bearing more than 2,000 signatures. The hon. gentleman asked why it was not presented before. I will tell him. The citizens of St. John felt remonstrances would be unavailing, as the Government had not heeded other remonstrances, both from friends and foes, and they sent their petition here so that it might appear on the records as a protest and a challenge to the assertion that they approved of the policy. In calling the petition clap-trap, the hon. Minister forgot that, when he occupied the position of Lieutenant-Governor of the Province a certain petition was circulated quietly for months in St. John, and was sprung upon the public only the day before election. I think the term "clap-trap" is more applicable to the remarks of the hon. Minister than to the petition he referred to. The hon. gentleman said:

"When I visited the city the other day, though I did receive (though the hon. member expresses some surprise that I should have been met with a limited cordiality), a dinner, at which forty-seven sat down; but we had two dinners. The hotels we have there are not large enough to give dinners to 200 persons at a time. I will venture to say at the two dinners we had as many guests as the hon. gentleman had on the occasion of his visit as Premier."

Well, the hon. member certainly had two dinners or banquets, whatever they may be called. One, however, was given to him as a member of an order, at whose head he was for a long time in the Province, and as an earnest, consistent advocate of the principles of temperance. The temperance people of the city met him in the parlors of the Young Men's Christian Association, for the purpose of presenting him with an address. On that occasion, political friends and foes were present for the purpose of doing honour to a distinguished representative of the temperance cause, and not to a member of the Government. I have no doubt if the hon. gentleman looked carefully around the room, he would have missed many familiar faces of fellow-workers in the cause in the days gone by, who felt they could not attend under the circumstances. At one of those banquets, seventy or eighty persons were present. It was not presided over by a citizen of St. John, or a supporter of the Government, but by an American citizen, an upright, honourable man, and one as zealous in the cause of temperance as the hon. gentleman opposite. I have no doubt he will be much astonished when he reads that the banquet over which he presided had a political significance. The vice-chair was occupied by a man who does not share the political views of the hon. Minister. The next evening there was a political banquet, so declared by the Government papers, at which ninety persons were said to be present. Five of those said to be present by the local organ declared that they were not there; six or seven were not residents of the county, and one man so far forgot his position as Judge of the Supreme Court as to descend into the political arena and attend that demonstration. Nearly one-half of those who attended were either office-holders or office-seekers. The hon. gentleman said the dinners were divided in order to accommodate those who wanted to take part in the demonstration. They were, as a matter of fact, divided in another sense. One was a cold water banquet, and I believe, if the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) came down to St. John, he would receive as great an ovation, if not a greater one. At the other dinner they had sherry with their soup; sauterne with their fish; they washed down the entrées with champagne; they had hock and claret with the game, and wound up with sparkling Moselle, port and ale. The hon. member boasted that he received as large and hearty a reception as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). When that hon. gentleman went to St. John, a dinner was given in the hotel, at which from 160 to 180 persons were present, whereas the political dinner given to the hon. member opposite was only attended by ninety persons. I think the word "clap-trap" might appropriately be applied to the remarks of the hon. gentleman about the dinners given to him. With regard to the bankruptcies, the hon. gentleman said:

"It has been attempted to be shown that the bankruptcies of the Province have exceeded those of any Province, and I was surprised to find an attempt made to attribute these bankruptcies to the operation of this Tariff. I will say here, and I think without fear of contradiction, that there are not more than two Provinces in the Dominion, taking into consideration the population and amount of business done, that have had fewer failures and fewer bankruptcies than the Province of New Brunswick."

Now, I think the hon. the Minister of Finance knows that, so far as the business men of St. John are concerned, they are as a rule well covered with insurance. It was not the business men who suffered; it was those men who had saved a little for rainy days and old age, who were impoverished. I can point to many business men who came out of the fire with a large surplus, and are in a better position than they were before, because the insurance enabled them to realise the full value of their property, that have been started in business, and the wholesale trade of St. John started again. I would ask the hon. the Finance Minister where are now the men who started in business at the end of 1877? Most of them in the Bankruptcy Court, their business driven away by the heavy impositions of the Tariff. One after another our wholesale houses have suffered, until only two are standing, and it is said that even they require an extension of time. I believe this Tariff has been a heavier blow to us than even the fire. Houses, whose names were as familiar throughout the Province as household words, have had to succumb through the operation of the Tariff. With regard to the exodus of the people, the hon. the Finance Minister asserted that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) made misleading statements. The contradicted statement of that hon. gentleman was that, in 1877, there were less vacant houses in St. John and fewer unemployed than to-day, while wages were better than to-day. "That was not fair," said the Finance Minister. "He should have said: The great fire took place in 1877, that thousands were therefore employed in works of restoration, increased wages being the result. Now that the city has been re-built, is it to be wondered at that thousands are leaving and that wages are lower?" True, in 1877, after the fire, a great many came to the city, but not so many labourers as contractors, who came to make engagements to build, trade being dull in the States. By the end of 1878, most of the American and Upper Canadian contractors, with the labourers they had brought, had left. That does not account for the great exodus we complain of. I knew good men, who have been in St. John twenty-five years, attached to the place, obliged to leave, the bulk of the emigrants being stalwart young men and women, inferior to none who have gone to seek a living in the States. I would ask the hon. the Finance Minister whether they did not leave for the Republic, and not the Canadian North-West? Just before the House opened, I took up a St. John, N.B., paper, of March 18th, in which I read:

"ST. JOHN, N.B., March 18.--The steamer Falmouth, for Boston, took away over 150 passengers this morning. Out of this number not over a dozen hailed from St. John, the major part of them consisting of young men and women from Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and from the country districts of New Brunswick."

Was it the great fire that sent those people away? I am sure that to-day the Census would show that the natural increase of the population would not make up for the loss by emigration. With respect to the recent duties imposed on the country, I will read from the petition in my hands:

"That your petitioners would call attention to the following provisions of the present Tariff as being entirely opposed to their interests, and as calculated to impoverish the city of St. John and the Province of New Brunswick, for the possible advantage of a limited number of Canadians elsewhere, namely:—The duty on wheat, wheat flour, corn meal, Indian corn, and other cereals. The duty on sugar and tea. The duty on cotton and woollen goods of all kinds, including ready-made clothing. The duty on materials used in ship-building; on iron, including pig, scrap and manufactured; on zinc in sheets; and on coal. The duty on books and stationery. The duty on certain carriage materials, namely, second growth ash in planks, and on ash, oak and hickory, sawed in strips, split and rough. The duty on varnishes. The duty on machinery and mechanics' tools. The duty on earthenware, white granite or iron stoneware, and C. C. or cream-coloured ware. That your petitioners also object to the several provisions of the Tariff whereby the duty upon imported goods is ascertained and adjusted by weighing and measuring combined; as causing much needless contestation, delay and expense to the importer, and as adding largely to the cost of consumers, particularly of the poorer class, against whose interests the Tariff practically operates."

This is a complaint from the city and county of St. John. At one of those banquets, the handy Mr. John Boyd said he had spoken to the hon. the Finance Minister as to our position at present, and had been told by him, with tears in his eyes, that he would do what he could for St. John. The people, including the hon. the Finance Minister's best supporters, would tell him, any moment, that every word of the petition was true; that day by day we are being impoverished by this National Policy. I claim that, so far as the principle is concerned, even for the manufacturers, the Tariff is based on no sound principle whatever. Though arguments may be adduced for protection to manufactures, a duty on raw materials is objectionable to this interest. The policy is designed or calculated to build up the interests of a limited number at the expense of the many. With regard to our lumber interest, it is true there is at present a revival, and that we look with confidence to a busy spring; but this advantage is not due to the National Policy, but to the rise in the English markets, and large purchases by English merchants last winter. Without that impulse, the lumber trade would almost have had to be abandoned. On the other hand, everything the lumberer buys is increased in price by the Tariff. One of the largest lumber merchants in New Brunswick, formerly a member of Parliament, who employs 400 men in the woods, told me that his supplies this year cost 25 per cent. more than last year. With reference to our shipping, we heard a great deal last Session about the duties being imposed only to enable a drawback to be granted on ships, and that it would equal the duty. How many times have drawbacks been obtained in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia? So far as I am aware, not once. Some Order in Council was issued, that 50c. a ton would be allowed as a drawback; but, when the hon. the Finance Minister was in St. John, visiting the factories, he was met by a deputation of shipowners and builders, and what did they tell him? They included some of his best friends, who had voted for him in 1878, and they told him the duties on building materials amounted to $1.85 a ton, and that $1 a ton ought to be returned on every ton sent off.

AN HON. MEMBER: What did he tell them?

MR. WELDON: He said: "Write to Ottawa." At a time when we have to compete with the iron ships of other countries, and the greatest efforts are being made, in connection with the navigation of the Suez Canal, to divert trade from our fleets, every ship of 1,000 tons that leaves St. John has to pay $1,800 in duties, of which $1,000 is the addition made by this Tariff. I have vainly looked to see where the country was deriving any benefits from this vaunted National Policy. We were told during the electoral campaign of 1878: Only let the hon. Premier be restored to power, only let that party again resume their places on the right of the Speaker, and the prosperity of the country will return. We met last Session, and the prosperity had not arrived; if anything, the condition of affairs was a little worse. It was said that, as soon as the Tariff was brought down, business would revive, and here we are to-day with the prospects of the country nearly as dark as ever. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) said last evening that we were unpatriotic because we decry this Tariff. We do not decry it now more than ever we did, because we have always been opposed to it. It is not we who are chargeable with a want of patriotism, but rather those hon. gentlemen who support a policy whose effects are so disastrous to the country. Those gentlemen deluded the people, and made them false promises, to induce them to return those gentlemen to power. The hon. the Minister of Finance, last autumn, visited several parts of the Dominion to observe the effects of his Tariff upon industry. I can only allude to the flying visit he paid in December to the factories in his own constituency. He visited a number of factories there, and left unvisited a great many others. Last year that hon. gentleman said there was a clock factory started in Hamilton, I believe, but we have not heard that he visited it. Did the hon. gentleman visit the Coldbrook Mills, that on the 17th of September, 1878, were flourishing, and from which the men were taken to the polls to vote for the hon. gentleman, and against my colleague and myself, under penalty of dismissal if they did not? Those mills are silent now. Did he go to the Ashburne Mills, and see his friends who took so active a part in promoting his election? I would like to know the conversation that passed between those gentleman and the hon. the Finance Minister. Did he visit the paint-shops of G. F. Thompson and Son, or the shops of Jones and Emery? I use those names because they were all supporters of the hon. gentleman; but I could mention a great many others. Did he visit the ship-yards of Fraser and Company, of Dunlop, of Lynch, and see what was going on there? The shipbuilding business is the most important one for our city, and when that is gone all other kinds of business suffer. The Protective policy of the hon. gentlemen, instead of cheapening the articles entering into that industry, has augmented the price of every one of them, and crushed the business out of existence. It has fallen upon the tools the workman uses, upon the bread he eats, upon the clothing he wears, upon the blankets in which he wraps himself at night. All these articles have been put under a duty of 40 or 50 per cent., and in many instances are beyond his reach. My hon. friend from Queen's said, last year, wages would increase, and in that he was mistaken. So far, wages have not increased, while all the articles of consumption the workingman has to purchase have largely risen in price, and scores and hundreds of the working classes have emigrated to find refuge in another country. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he visited the marble factories. I will read, with the permission of the House, a letter I received from a plain workingman the other day. He does not use very choice language, but I am satisfied it came from the heart:

"Your attention is referred to my letter respecting unfinished marble, which was always admitted duty free till the cursed National Policy came into operation. The duty on the raw material is so oppressive as to make it utterly impossible to do business till there is a change in the Tariff. * * * The Cape Breton marble is only fit for candy and butchers' slabs; if exposed to the weather in cemeteries would crack, crumble, grow black, and moss over in ten years. * * * Before the National Policy, there were seven marble shops in this city, and today there are only two at work, and they both did not sell $40 worth for the last five months. The marble-workers are migrating to the States daily."

There is a letter of a workingman, showing how the National Policy has worked in regard to his trade. The hon. gentleman last year promised that a bolt factory would shortly be established in St. John. To my knowledge that bolt factory has been starting for the last five years. We were told that a cotton mill was to be built, and a million dollars put into it. Now, with regard to that cotton mill, I have a letter from a gentleman, in which he says:

"That cotton mill was only got up to make a split in the county. It is a dead letter now."

Seven thousand dollars out of the million were subscribed for that cotton factory. I was startled the other night by the statement of the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver), who said that, while the public debt of the United States was $46 per head, ours had already reached $43 per head. At the same time it is well known that our resources are in no way comparable to those of the United States, to enable us to meet our liabilities. I notice that, by the last Census of the United States, over half a million, or nearly one-seventh of the entire population of the Dominion, were put down as natives of Canada. I believe that emigration from Canada to the United States will be still greater this year than it has ever been before. It is time we should look this matter fairly in the face. This habit of denouncing the United States by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side I protest against. What we want is Canada for Canadians and for emigrants. I am proud of being a Canadian, and expect to remain here all my life. No one is more interested in the prosperity of the country than myself, and I do not think we ought to be carried away by unfulfilled prophecies and fanciful delusions. Let us endeavour to reduce our taxation and make this a cheap country to live in, and thus offer an inducement to those who have been obliged to leave us to return and live beneath their own flag, and obviate the necessity of emigrants to this country renouncing their allegiance. By that means we will be able to carry on the business of the Dominion, and by that means we shall be able to fill up our unoccupied lands. But if we continue, year by year, to increase our taxation, we should not complain if our young people and the emigrants from the Mother Country seek a foreign share and a foreign clime. What we have to consider is the best means of making this a home for our own people, and for those who cross the Atlantic in search of a home.

MR. DOULL: I desire to say a few words on the question now before the House, but before doing so allow me to say that I think too much of the time of the House, at a very heavy cost to the country, is occupied with long-winded speeches, which are very little more than a re-hash of the stump speeches made by hon. gentlemen previously to the last election, and which were again served up to this House last Session. The House and the country are undoubtedly nauseated with them no matter how skillfully they may have been remodelled. The question of Protection as against Free-trade has already been settled by the country in favour of the former, and until the country reverses its decision it is the duty of this House, on both sides, to accept the decision of the country, and assist the Government in carrying out the expressed wishes of the people in the way that to them appears best calculated to promote the general interests of the Dominion. In order to do so it is absolutely necessary to lay aside sectionalism. I regret, however, to find that in this discussion sectionalism shows itself cropping out everywhere. When a gentleman belonging to a certain Province rises, his arguments and statements have reference to nothing but the Province to which he belongs. I think that in a matter of this kind we should rise above our particular Provinces, and look at the question as it affects the whole Dominion. I am aware that there are interests in every Province that the members representing those Provinces have a right to see are respected by the Government in the Tariff they have submitted to the House. But I do not think we should set up the particular interests of one Province as against all the interests of the other Provinces. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, in speaking of the effect of the National Policy upon the Province that he has the honour to represent, has said much in regard to which I can agree with him. He has spoken of the National Policy as having driven our mechanics and young men out of the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and even out of the county I have the honour to represent. I deny that the National Policy has anything to do with the number of persons who are going from the Lower Provinces into the western part of the Dominion and into the United States. It is true that many have gone from Nova Scotia into the western Provinces and the United States during the past year, but I deny that the National Policy had anything to do with it. I have no hesitation in saying that I think the policy inaugurated by the Government is a sound and wise policy. The Government have endeavoured to the utmost of their ability to meet the views of the several Provinces, and it has been a very difficult matter for them to reconcile the conflicting interests of the several Provinces. When I say that, I may state, as a representative of the Province of Nova Scotia, that I am not fully satisfied with the consideration they have given to the industries of the Province to which I belong. At the same time, I believe that the difficulties that they have had to contend with were such that it was almost impossible for them to give us all we asked for. But I have this to say, that, notwithstanding we have not got that protection for the great industry that I have been advocating more particularly in this Parliament which I consider it deserves at the hands of Parliament, I am proud, however, to say that the effect of that duty on that industry has been such as to give us an increased market. When I spoke on this subject last Session, I expressed my dissatisfaction with the smallness of the duty placed on coal, and said that I feared it would not give us a large market. I said, however, that it might to a certain extent increase our market in the Province of Quebec. I am glad to say it has very materially increased our market in the Province of Quebec, and, had it not been for the duty of 50c. a ton, we would not have had a market for one-half of the coal we sold during the past season. That duty has not only retained for us the market we had in the Province of Quebec, but it has given us a largely increased market there. I may state that, if, in the later part of the season, we had been able to obtain shipping to carry our coal, we might have sent a much larger quantity to Ontario and Quebec than we did. So, instead of the National Policy affecting the coal trade injuriously, it has really affected it very beneficially. I am proud to say that the prospects for the incoming season, taking into consideration the additional duty given us by the hon. the Finance Minister, together with the increased price of coal in the United States, are that we will have a much larger market in Quebec, and I hope a very considerable part of the Ontario market, for our bituminous coal. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have said that the National Policy has materially interfered with the shipping industry. I am interested in shipping, and I would like those hon. gentlemen to point out in what respect the National Policy has interfered with that industry. I am not aware that it has even increased the cost of the construction of vessels. I think that the National Policy has affected the shipping interest beneficially, instead of injuriously, and that it has restored to the Lower Provinces the West India trade which had been previously taken away from us for the want of that Protection necessary to our shipping industry. The mine owners are so much impressed with the benefits that are likely to accrue from the Tariff that they are putting forth efforts to raise a larger quantity of coal than they have done for many years past. And I believe that, upon the opening of navigation, we will be in a position to ship coal in larger quantities than we have in the past history of our coal mines. The hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Weldon) has said that, in consequence of the National Policy, merchants and brokers in the city of St. John have been precipitated to bankruptcy and ruin. I cannot, as a business man, see how the National Policy could have that effect. If such is the case, St. John must be an exception, for we have not heard of any other city in the Dominion being similarly affected. He has also stated that the National Policy has seriously affected the lumber interest. It may have done so as far as the cost of getting out the lumber is concerned, but in no other way. I am of opinion that the National Policy has a great deal to do with the increased price of lumber, and that it has stimulated trade generally throughout the Dominion, and that it has been successful in restoring that confidence in the commercial community which existed before the party now in opposition acceded to power. A good deal has been said by Opposition speakers to the effect that the prosperity promised by the Government before the elections had not arrived. It is childish to expect that that prosperity should come all at once. The country is already in a more prosperous condition than it was before the present party came into power, and I have no doubt that before the end of the year we shall find the country in as prosperous a condition as we can reasonably expect in so short a time as that which will then have elapsed since the present Administration came into power.

MR. BOURBEAU: I am desirous of offering some remarks on the important subject which has engaged the attention of the House for some days. Has the National Policy—in other words, the system of Protection adopted by the present Government—had the effect of increasing prosperity in the Dominion of Canada? Hon. gentlemen opposite maintain that it has not; their speeches tend to show that the affairs of the country are going from bad to worse. I rise to declare that the system of Protection adopted last Session has already produced good results. Intelligent electors can see for themselves that prosperity has increased in the country. Even the electors who sent to this House the hon. members opposite to represent their interests are well aware that many of their products are now selling at more remunerative prices than they did when power was in the hands of the Liberal party. We now see that trade is assuming proportions which inspires confidence in the future. What did we see, barely a year ago, in the villages as well as in the towns of the Dominion? We saw empty houses, real property depreciated in value; and he who was desirous of disposing of a portion of his property was compelled to sacrifice it for a price considerably below its value. And now we see with satisfaction that the value of real property in the country has begun to increase, not very rapidly it is true, because, as has been stated by the hon. member who has just sat down, the business of the country has been subjected to such extreme depression that the National Policy has not yet had time to produce the effect of increasing the value of property to a considerable extent. But, if, while hon. gentlemen opposite governed the country, from 1874 to 1878, we saw the value of property diminish from year to year, until a proprietor could no longer sell for more than two-thirds of the value, the same rule applying to the letting of property, is it surprising that it takes a little time for the country to awake from its dejection, and will not hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party have the patience to wait yet a little longer until the country again attains that prosperity which we enjoyed when those hon. gentlemen were called to power. Now, owners find tenants for their property, and in our manufacturing centres we see great preparations going on for the reopening, to the great satisfaction of unemployed artisans, of factories which have long been closed. In the county which I have the honour to represent, the putting in force of the National Policy has produced good results, and I say so with the knowledge that my words will be recorded in the archives of Parliament, and that I may be reminded of them hereafter, and asked whether I stated what was the truth. I say, and I say it with satisfaction, that the electors of my county, even those of them who are in the habit of voting with the Liberal party, see and acknowledge that prosperity is beginning to reign in the land. They acknowledge that the aspect of affairs is brightening, and they attribute that fact to the policy of the present Government, without fear of injuring their party. We have seen trade receive a considerable impetus, and those of our farmers who engage in lumbering operations are actively occupied in getting out saw-logs, and in putting in order the saw-mills which will convert them into planks and boards in the course of the coming summer. We have, in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, extensive sawing establishments, which for the most part for some years past have been idle, and such is especially the case in the village where I reside. Now, only yesterday, I heard it stated in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite that the lumber trade was not prospering in the country; it was admitted that there was a considerable foreign demand, and it was contended that, if the lumber trade was beginning to improve, it was not in consequence of demand arising in this country. But I can state that on the Arthabaska piling grounds for some years past there stood several million feet of lumber, and, although it was not of a nature to be shipped abroad, not being of merchantable quality, yet the piling grounds are now empty; the lumber, in the course of last summer, was sold for a reasonable price, and sent to Quebec and Montreal, to be used in the construction of new factories and other buildings of a like description. I may point out that proprietors of factories at Montreal and Quebec have made extensive additions to their buildings, and have sent in heavy orders for lumber, thereby giving us an opportunity of clearing our piling grounds of wood which was in a fair way to become valueless, and at the same time to make room for new lumber of a superior quality. But not only have we the satisfaction of seeing our wharves relined thus rapidly, but we have also the prospect that later, when the mills are in full operation and activity, workingmen will find employment at remunerative wages, and be enabled to live in comfort and abundance. It is well known that for several years past the poorer classes in the country districts, and in towns and cities, have been a burthen on the wealthier class of the community, no one being in a position to utilise the labour of the poorer classes. The latter were, nevertheless, most anxious to earn enough to support their families, but found it useless to look for employment, which was not to be found. It is, therefore, most gratifying to witness the large amount of logs sold this winter, and the mills getting ready to cut them up, when we know that hundreds of families derive their means of support from those mills. This will also stimulate trade and secure for the farmer a reasonable price for the produce of his land. The railway companies, shipowners, and all those whose business it is to carry the lumber to foreign markets, will be greatly benefitted. The agricultural classes will also benefit largely, because they will find a market for their produce in the manufacturing centres. I can testify that from 1867 to 1874, when trade was brisk in Canada, and we had so many mills in operation, our farmers had a good profit on their grain and other products they had for sale. Then prosperity reigned in the country; the farmers were contented; the labouring class found employment, and trade was in a flourishing condition. But, since 1874, when the policy of the Liberals, by the effect of their ruinous Tariff, closed the doors of the manufactories and turned the workmen out upon the streets to starve in idleness, we have had farmers, labourers, mechanics, and traders, uttering complaints and condemning the policy of the Liberals as the cause of their distress. The National Policy adopted by the present Government has intervened to put an end to that distress, and I can testify that that policy has been most cordially approved of. When I visited the electors of Arthabaska and explained the Tariff to them in detail, they manifested the greatest satisfaction. The electors of the united counties of Drummond and Arthabaska have always been in favour of a National Policy; they have always supported a policy of Protection. When in 1871 the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) stood for those counties, he himself accepted also, notwithstanding his other political principles, the doctrine of Protection, and, in consequence of so doing, gained a splendid victory, having been elected by a majority of over 800 votes. Does not that clearly prove that the electors of those counties were in favour of the policy of protection? In 1877, when I offered myself as a candidate before the same electors, I myself adopted the same policy. I spoke publicly in every parish in the two counties, proclaiming the advantages of Protection, and the electors, notwithstanding that the gentleman who then represented them had just been called to fill an important position in the Government of the day; notwithstanding this, and because he had renounced his policy of protection, because he had failed to grant Protection to the farmer, to the manufacturer, to the workman and to the trader, the electors rejected him and elected the candidate who had declared himself to be in favour of the National Policy. I had the honour of being elected then to a seat in this House. During my first Session in this House, the hon. the leader of the Opposition of that day presented to the House a motion calling for the adoption of a National Policy, for the purpose of promoting the interests of trade, agriculture, and our national industries, and of more fully developing the wealth of our forests and our mines. I had the honour to vote for that motion, though it was not adopted by the House. In 1878, we went to the electors on the principles asserted in that motion; we adopted a policy based on that self-same motion of the hon. the leader of the present Government, and from end to end of the Dominion of Canada the electors endorsed that policy by an overwhelming majority. About that time the Eastern Townships were honoured with a visit from two eminent gentlemen, I mean the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. Minister of Finance of the day (Sir Richard J. Cartwright). Those hon. gentlemen thought proper, on the eve of the elections, to travel through the country, from one end to the other, in order to show their faces and declare their policy. Mr. Speaker, I think, if anyone ever desired to be thanked, we owe a debt of gratitude to those gentlemen for having come into our counties to hold public meetings as they did. Still, I do not thank them, for they had no intention of benefitting us in the manner they succeeded in doing. No sooner had they exhibited themselves in our townships and set forth their policy, than the electors were enabled to come to a decision, and determine that they should not vote for the policy of those hon. gentlemen. I think they produced a like effect in the other parts of the country visited by them. When those gentlemen went all over the country during the General Elections, they had no idea of the harm they were doing to themselves. In the same way now, when they are delivering speeches in this House against the National Policy, they are unable to see the result of those speeches. I myself reside in the country, and having had daily opportunities of meeting a large number of the electors, I know that all but those who are inveterate partisans, acknowledge the benefits of Protection; all but these admit that the policy of Protection has produced the happiest results. It is asserted that the prices of products generally have been raised to the consumer. Hon. gentlemen opposite are striving to convince the people that the effect of the National Policy is to increase the burthen of the consumer. Now, in reply to that, I would say that the prices of articles of consumption has not changed much. Being in trade myself, I am in a position to mark the fluctuations in the prices of the various articles of merchandise and produce that enter the country. I am in a position to state that the prices are not such as to ruin the agricultural class and the working class. In the first place, tweeds manufactured in this country have not increased in price, but rather diminished. I maintain that tweeds have never been as cheap in this country before as they have been of late. Thanks to the encouragement given to our manufacturers by the National Policy, the latter now offer us a more abundant variety of patterns, they furnish us a superior quality of article, and are striving to furnish threads of equal quality and pattern to those we used to get from Scotland. We have quite a number of manufacturers in this country well able to stand competition in the article of tweeds with the most skilful manufacturers in other countries. And, if, thanks to the policy of Protection, foreign tweeds can no longer compete with those manufactured by us at home, how can it be said that the consumer is obliged to pay dearer for his tweeds? But the most important point is that tweeds manufactured in this country are infinitely superior in quality in many cases to those imported from abroad. Our home-made tweeds are made of good wool, honestly, and in such a manner as to render good service to the purchaser. The tweeds which come to us from Europe are often made up with shoddy and cotton; they are imported by jobbers, and are only suited to deceive the purchaser and cause him to lose his money. But when tweeds manufactured in this country are bought, then good cloth is had for the money, made of the wool of the country; the manufacture of which yields a profit to the manufacturers and satisfaction to the buyer. The farmer also is befriended by the National Policy, because he sells to greater advantage his wool, which enters into the manufacture of tweeds. We find that wool is selling to-day 10c. dearer than last year. There may be some articles, which the farmer does not produce, which have increased in price, but this is certainly not owing to the National Policy. It is alleged that the price of sugar has risen on account of the National Policy. Well, never for twenty-five years have we bought syrup so cheaply as we did last summer. In Canada, our country merchants have never been able to buy syrup for less than 35c. to 45c. per gallon; but last autumn only from 27c. to 30c. per gallon was paid for syrup of the first quality coming from Bermuda, syrup which is highly prized by the consumers in Canada. I spoke, a few moments ago, about the tweeds. I can say as much for the cloths which are manufactured at Montreal, thanks to the National Policy. Up to a recent period we imported a great quantity of heavy cloths, which were used to make overcoats and other garments necessary in the rigorous seasons. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have at Montreal cloth manufactories which turn out better fabrics than those which reach us from abroad. Inasmuch as the manufacturers of Montreal have not to pay transport and Customs duties, as the importers do, and, furthermore, as they have not to pay Customs duties upon the raw material, they are enabled to sell cloths cheaper than the importer can do. This also is due to the National Policy. This is the advantage gained by Protection. By buying cloth produced in this country rather than cloth imported, one acts in a patriotic manner; by so doing encouragement is given to the industries of our own country. I may bring forward another important argument. Last autumn our counties were overrun by the agents of manufacturers of axes, scythes, and other farming implements, in order to introduce their commodities. Now, we have in our own country immense manufactories of implements of this kind, which can defy foreign competition. Our farmers generally look out for agricultural implements made in this country, finding them to be of good quality. Last autumn a duty of 35 per cent. was imposed upon tools coming from foreign countries. In order to prove to the gentlemen of the Left that this duty of 35 per cent. has not increased the price of these articles, I may mention one fact. It is this: that the American manufacturers, wishing to injure the Canadian ones, come and offer us their axes and their scythes at the same price that we can procure them from Canadian manufacturers; and furthermore, they offer to pay the freight and the Customs duties into the bargain. One day I was about to give an order for axes and scythes to a manufacturer in the Province of Ontario, and on that very day there came into our townships a manufacturer from the United States, who offered to sell his goods at the same price which the Canadian manufacturer had offered them for, and he undertook, besides, to pay the duties at the port of entry and to pay the freight also. Nevertheless, we bought these goods cheaply. We purchased them on more favourable conditions than during the previous year. It is evident that the Americans took advantage of us, thanks to the policy inaugurated in 1874 by the Liberal Government; they discovered a veritable bonanza in this country of ours, and for a long time they have secured exorbitant prices for their goods, after having caused our manufactories to shut down. In the case I have mentioned, like a good patriot, I refused the offers made to me by this American agent, giving the preference to the Canadian manufacturer, because I wished to encourage Canadian manufacturers, in order to provide employment for the workmen, and to make families happy who would not be so if we went for our supplies to foreign countries. By acting in this way, we likewise encourage the agricultural class, who find in the manufacturing centres a ready market for their products. Were I to give advice to the hon. members of the Left, I would say to them: If you do not wish to do wrong, discontinue speaking ill of the National Policy; cease to disparage a thing which all electors, including your own, acknowledge to be profitable, not only to themselves, but to all the inhabitants of this country; your supporters, who are selling their produce at a dearer rate to-day than they did last year, are able to form a correct opinion of the opposition you are making to the National Policy; the farmers, who to-day are selling their butter at from 15c. to 20c., 22c. and 25c. the pound, while last year they only sold it at 8c. or 10c., who are selling now their pork dearer by one or two dollars the hundred pounds, cannot be deceived as to the effects of the National Policy, and you cannot make them believe that their profits at the present moment are not more advantageous or greater than those made last year. Well, it is the same thing as respects the greater part of agricultural produce; it acts in a similar way for all classes of society. Never in the Eastern Townships did we see a more lively trade than that prosecuted in the months of September, October, November and December last. We saw then, throughout all parts of the country, agents buying grain, buying live stock, and other agricultural produce; and, what was better than all, the agents carried sufficient money to pay cash for what they bought, and the farmers were able at once to secure the price of their property, which they were never in the habit of doing for several years previously. Before the adoption of the National Policy, the farmers endeavoured in vain to sell their produce for cash; they could hardly sell it on credit even. And yet, notwithstanding the fact that trade has revived, that payments are made more easily, and that business is more brisk, I hear every day members of the Opposition stating that the National Policy has ruined the affairs of the country. Am I not right in saying, Mr. Speaker, that, if I were to offer them advice, it would be: Refrain from speaking against the present policy of the Government; because the electors follow their movements closely, they hear them, they read their speeches, and they are in a position to pass judgment upon them.

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton): I propose to make a few remarks in reference to the question which is engaging the attention of this House. I confess that I would much prefer doing so at a later hour of the evening; it is not satisfactory to make a speech to a House, naturally reluctant to hear a young member, and particularly when, at the beginning, it must be broken in upon by Recess; but, as it appears there is no disposition to continue the discussion by other hon. members at this time, I feel it incumbent upon me to offer a few reflections on the subject now under consideration. I do so with some reluctance, because I feel that the question has been pretty fully and minutely discussed already. I cannot say, however, that it has been fairly considered by the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Opposition Benches. One would suppose that the spirit of patriotism, which pervades the breast of every lover of his country, would be so deeply implanted in the constitution of every gentleman who occupies the proud position of a representative of the people in Parliament, that it would be his last resort to detract from the importance of the country, or to make little of its effort towards material progress and national greatness. But we know it is said "we live and learn," and we have learned to know that,—although we had, through the Session of 1879, the views of hon. gentlemen opposite antagonistic to the policy, which the country pronounced itself so decidedly in favour of on the 17th September, 1878, these hon. gentlemen are still dissatisfied, and we find them, after a year's experience, still loudly denouncing that policy; although Sir, their chief leader, the Hon. George Brown, as I shall show, declared from his place in the Senate that the National Policy should have a fair trial at the hands of the party. If these gentlemen were honest men, and desirous of doing that Policy justice, they would now freely admit that it is gradually and surely raising the country from the "slough of despond" into which the hon. gentlemen opposite had plunged it. In discussing the question, it is necessary to make some reference to what the state of the country was previous to and during 1878. We found it, then, in such a depressed condition, that it was a difficult thing for artisans to get employment. We found it completely prostrated. We found large manufactories shut up and capital lying idle. We found artisans and skilled mechanics willing to settle down to the ordinary work of common labourers, in order to get the means of keeping body and soul together. That was the state of things when the late Government were sitting here in full power, and, as they flattered themselves, in full possession of the confidence of the people. We found those gentlemen, who possessed, or ought to have possessed, a full knowledge of the state of the country, declaring that they could do nothing—declaring their utter inability to do the first thing to place the country in a proper position or to give a helping hand to avert the impending issue. That idea went abroad throughout the width and breadth of this Dominion, and people began to enquire: Why have we a Government? For what purpose have we a Government at all? That question was asked; and the Conservative party felt that it was high time to bestir itself. Sir, that party then occupied but a small corner in this House; but they were a little band of heroes; they, it is true, occupied that corner, which is now so much more properly filled by the gentlemen opposite. Well, Sir, the Conservative party responded to the call of the suffering country, they struck the chord of public sympathy, and, like true statesmen, perceived what the country required, what the necessities of the case demanded. They were received with open arms, and, in the short space of eight hours, they hurled the incapables from place and power. They left that Government and their adherents to wallow alone in that same "slough of despond" which they themselves had created. We have heard a good deal about depression; we have heard from the members of the Opposition of nothing else but depression; we have heard of it and nothing else, ever since the people left them to their wretched fate. And why need we wonder that these hon. gentlemen should speak so much of depression? Are they not depressed? Is there any chance of their ever being in any other state so long as the people of this country keep them where they are? No, sir. They are utterly crestfallen; they see the country through the highly-smoked glasses of their own depression; they cannot see the sun shine through the clouds of their despondency; they are unable to console themselves with the faintest ray of hope that the day will ever dawn to usher them to the Treasury Benches. That being the case, of course we must expect, and be prepared, to hear from hon. gentlemen some of the most extraordinary tales of suffering and destitution, of misplaced confidence and broken promises, that ever were invented, imagined or came to pass. It is no new tale, however, for Canadians to listen to; for twenty long years the same system of detraction and villification was resorted to by hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs when they were in the cold shades of Opposition. It is the same old system revived; it was a system then, as it is now, of malignity and atrocious falsehood and villification. Everything was said and done that could be said and done to belittle the country and ruin its leading statesmen in the eyes of the Mother Country and the world—to pull us down and keep us down was apparently the great object of their ambition. In the course of time, by the foulest of means, they did obtain power. The people were wofully deceived, it is true, but that was nothing. The leaders had the reins of Government, and they governed us accordingly for five years, during which time the people received such a lesson that they will not soon forget it. The country was all but ruined, and was, year by year, going to destruction; but the time, came when the people showed their abhorrence of such a Government, but it was only in the effluxion of time, for the hon. gentlemen, having got possession of the Treasury Benches held on to power as long as possible, governing in a manner to which it is not necessary for me farther to refer. After crying out for twenty years: Give us the reins of Government; give us an opportunity of carrying on the affairs of the country and we will show you such a state of affairs as was never seen before; they got the reins of Government, and we did see a state of affairs—such a state of affairs as we had never seen before. No one ever dreamt of seeing such a state of affairs as we saw during the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and, I may add, no one wishes to see a recurrence of that state of things. I might go on and say how it was they gained power, that it was by the treason of many sycophants, who turned traitors and became rats, deserting the political ship—men who had fawned on those who had warmed them into political existence. But well understanding the material of which they were made, the leaders of the Grit party knew that they could not trust them in their hour of need; and they planned what has been justly characterised “a midnight attack.” The House must be purged, they said, it had been elected under a corrupt Government. They succeeded in carrying out their atrocious plan, and they were returned here with an overwhelming majority. Results show too well how they obtained it; and, having done so, how they availed themselves of the misplaced confidence of the people. That great standard of “purity” which they hoisted and carried through the length and breadth of the land was found to be spurious. It was pulled down by its own godfathers and trampled in the dust. Well, Sir, as I have stated, the country rose in its might and drove these gentlemen out of power, and placed better men, I am happy to say, in their positions. Thus much of bygone times. Now, Sir, for the present; and permit me to say that I do not know that I would have said anything with reference to this question had it not been for some of the remarks I have listened to, and which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have singled out the city which I have the honour to represent as being one worthy of notice. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) was kind enough to speak of it in a manner that led one to suppose that, if there was one spot in the Dominion which should receive benefits from the National Policy, that spot was the city of Hamilton. Yes, Sir, and by way of showing why it should have improved, and how it had not improved, he had the goodness to read a small paragraph from that most veracious of all sheets, the Hamilton Times. To show how utterly destitute, how hard up the hon. member for Oxford was for an example to exemplify the want of prosperity in Hamilton, and how little the National Policy had done for that great manufacturing centre, he had to resort to that most unreliable authority, namely, the columns of the paper I have already alluded to. It is there recorded, he says, that during 1879 there were in the city of Hamilton 528 empty houses and that in 1878 there were only 377. Now, I say that that is like not only a great many other assertions taken from the same source, but like a great many that have been made on the floor of this House. It is possible that there are now 500 empty houses in that city, but before you can draw an unfavourable comparison, you must show how many there were empty in 1878. I deny that there were only 377 empty houses in Hamilton in that year. I have no doubt I can safely say here, and I believe I will be vindicicated by an actual count, that there were more empty houses in the city of Hamilton in 1878 than there are at this day, taking into account, as I submit in all fairness you must, the scores of houses that have been built within that city in the last year. And what class of houses have been built there? First-class, not little tenements 18x20, such as the hon. gentleman is accustomed to see in Woodstock, but handsome, well-constructed dwellings, with all modern improvements, showing clearly to my mind, and to every dispassionate mind, that the means of the people are becoming improved. We cannot doubt this when we see them leaving the houses of a more ancient construction and taking up the modern edifices with all the improvements of the present day. Now, Sir, I think hon. gentlemen should not make such a parade about empty houses, in any manufacturing centre, because the question arises: How did they become empty, and why were they erected in the first place? They were erected when the right hon. the leader of the Government was formerly in power, when the exchequer was overflowing, when times were good, when every mechanic could find labour at his hand, and was working full time, and had his well-earned wages always ready for him. It was thought that there was room for additional houses then, and that scores of families would be ready to take up their abode in them, and gentlemen who had means at their disposal fancied that they could see that these good times were on go on and continue, and they were induced to put up houses to be occupied, not by men of means, but by the artisan class, who were then flocking into all the centres of industry; and these houses at that time were fully occupied, and empty houses could with difficulty be found in the city of Hamilton. But what a change came. In 1874, after the General Elections, when the hon. gentlemen opposite obtained power, and began to promulgate their policy, these houses came, year by year, to be less and less occupied, until, in 1878, there were not much less than 500 empty dwellings, I will venture to say, in that city. But that is all changed now, and I propose to show before I finish that the city of Hamilton is now in a flourishing condition; and that its prosperity is a mere indication of the prosperity of the whole Dominion, and that it is due to the National Policy. However, before advertising to that portion of the remarks I intend to make, I propose to address myself to the consideration of another statement which has been made by some hon. gentlemen, and that is this: It is said here by hon. gentlemen now, as it was said during the last Session, that the Government had obtained power by the false representations of the leaders of the party—that the people were humbugged and befooled, as it were, in putting confidence in the Conservative party—that they, the people, had been induced to accept a policy of which they knew nothing, and they said that the local elections in Ontario settled that question, and proved their assertion to be perfectly correct—in fact, that the election which took place on 5th June last, showed conclusively that if the electorate had the power then they would have reversed the vote of the 17th September, 1878, by an overwhelming majority. That statement was made by the gallant knight for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright); it was repeated by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and reiterated by all the supporters of these gentleman. What was the fact? When the elections came round, I am quite prepared to admit, that the Conservative or Protectionist party, felt that it would be a great gain for them to wrest Ontario from the Mowat Administration, and the Conservative party was prepared to take up the gauntlet thrown down in this House by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and go before the country on that issue,—but could you get the Grit press to do anything of the kind? Could you get Mr. Mowat or the supporters of the Mowat Administration to take that question up and make it the issue? Not a bit of it. I admit that the Conservatives thought it dangerous to have a gentleman like Mr. Mowat, who was in accord with Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, and who travelled from one end of Ontario to the other with that hon. gentleman, making himself conspicuous on every platform in the Province as a most ardent supporter, returned with a majority at his back. We felt that they would have power to do a great deal of evil, and that it would be better if the Dominion and Local Governments were in accord, so far as the National Policy was concerned; and every effort was made on the part of the Conservatives to raise that issue.

MR. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

MR. ROBERTSON: The hon. gentleman says, "Hear, hear." Has he the temerity to say that the Reform party accepted that issue?

MR. OLIVER: We did.

MR. ROBERTSON: Nothing of the kind. I believe they did in Oxford, but that was certainly a nice place to try the question. "We did," because "we" thought "we" were all right there; but where there was the slightest chance of there being a difference of opinion, "we didn't." But as to the question in the city of Hamilton, the hon. gentleman read a resolution that was passed at a convention of Conservatives previous to bringing out their candidate, which declared that that was their policy. But did the Opposition have the courage to say: "We accept that as the issue. You took this city under false pretences before. You made a midnight charge upon us, and took us by surprise when we were asleep, and we are prepared to show you now that Hamilton is not for Protection, but for Free-trade?" Not a bit of it. I will give some evidence on that point, which, I think, will clinch the matter. I hold in my hand the address of the hon. gentleman who ran in the interest of the Mowat Administration in Hamilton, Mr. J. M. Gibson, a talented young lawyer, who succeeded in carrying the city. He commenced his address to the people in these words:

"The true issue before the people of this Province at the present time, and which you are to pronounce upon is, whether the Government of the Hon. Oliver Mowat has by its past record established a claim to a renewal of public confidence, or whether that confidence, having been forfeited, they should be compelled to give way to a new Cabinet, with Mr. Meredith, of London, as its head."

That was the bugaboo—"Mr. Meredith, of London." He was to be the gentleman, residing in London and not in Hamilton, who was to frighten the electors of the latter city from voting against Mr. Gibson. There are sixteen paragraphs in Mr. Gibson's address, but not one of them touches upon the National Policy.

MR. ROBERTSON.

But what does his organ say? Giving him credit for being discreet enough to say nothing about that question previous to his address, which, I think, was published on the 20th May, I find in the Hamilton Times, that veracious paper I spoke about a minute ago, a short paragraph to this effect:—

FREE TRADE vs. PROTECTION.

"Our contemporary (the Spectator, May 19th) is rapidly acquiring the peculiarities and characteristics of Rip Van Winkle—presumably asleep for many months. The Spectator has apparently not heard that during its slumber the 'National Policy,' that grand ultimatum and ne plus ultra of every Protectionist, has ceased to be for a time a living issue, having from a burning and exciting theoretical question, become merged in the rugged reality of an Act of Parliament. If the Spectator * * * * * desires to continue the warfare, let it postpone the battle until at least the legitimate practical issues now before the electors are disposed of, etc."

I think that is a little in advance of the address; but when we turn to the next issue of the paper, we find an editorial eulogising the candidate highly. The article reads:

"We have great pleasure in calling the attention of every elector in Hamilton to the address to the electors * * * issued by Mr. J. M. Gibson, * * * we think * * * that he will admit, that as a manly exposition of a liberal candidate's views upon the record of the Government" (Ontario Government) "and upon the live issues of the day, it could not have a superior."

So far, I have spoken with reference to that question, and after recess I shall enlighten the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Opposition Benches, and who have spoken so much and so eloquently thereon, as to whether it was or was not "the live issue in the June elections," in a way that will satisfy any impartial mind. I shall show that "we did" not raise that question, because "we did" not dare to take up the gauntlet.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 25) To authorise the establishment of Superannuation, Provident and Insurance Funds by the Great Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 35) Respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 17) To incorporate the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, reported, read the third time and passed :—

Bill (No. 33 To amend and enact as amended, the Act incorporating the Dominion Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of Canada.—(Mr. McCallum.)

Bill (No. 40) To incorporate the Mail Printing Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 29) To amend the Act intituled an Act to incorporate the Anchor Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Cameron, South Huron.)

Bill (No. 5) To amend the Act 36 Victoria Chapter 108, intituled an Act to grant additional powers to the Quebec and Gulf Ports Steamship Company.—(Mr. McGreevy.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time :—

Bill (No. 73) To amend an Act respecting the Port Whitby Harbour Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 78) (from the Senate) Intituled an Act respecting the President, Directors and Company of the Bank of New Brunswick.—(Mr. Burpee, St. John.)

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY ACT INTERPRETATION BILL.

(Mr. McCarthy.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. ANGLIN: I think it would be better to delay this Bill until the hon. member for Lambton and other hon. members interested in its provisions are present.

MR. MCCARTHY: The Bill is merely to declare the meaning of the 12th section of the Act of 1877, saying that these shareholders are to vote separately, and not with the bondholders and other stockholders. I see no reason for delay.

MR. ANGLIN: This is much the same as the Bill of last Session on this subject.

MR. MCCARTHY: No; this Bill is designed to declare that the intention of the Act of 1877 was that the private shareholders should vote separately, and be entitled to a director representing themselves.

MR. CAMERON (North Victoria): I have another objection to the second reading besides that of the absence of the hon. member for Lambton and other hon. members interested in this Bill, namely, that it seeks to introduce a vicious principle of legislation, in making this Parliament a Court of Appeal from the ordinary Courts of the country, to try legal questions. This Bill is nothing more or less than a writ in the nature of a quo warranto, setting forth that one gentleman, the rival of another, should be declared duly elected instead of him to the board of directors of this company. The Bill proceeds on the assertion that such and such a thing was the intention of the Act of 1877. This assertion I totally deny. If the parties concerned in this case cannot vote as private stockholders they cannot vote at all. This Bill proceeds on the assumption that they have no right to vote at all, or to any representative on the board. If what the author of the Bill states as to the intention of the Act of 1877 be correct, which I deny, let the parties in favour of this view take proceedings in our Courts. Do not let us turn this House into a tribunal to try contested elections in a private company. Objection should properly be taken to this Bill now; it should be allowed to stand until the hon. member for Lambton, who knows best the intention of the Act of 1877, is in his place.

MR. MACMILLAN: I remember very well, when this Bill of 1877 was passed, that it was almost universally understood in the Committee that the original stockholders should have a representative and one director on that board. Those stockholders got up the company and put their money into it, and, with the present arrangements, unless some explanation is given with reference to this Act, they will have no representative on the board. The managing director, who ought to be the servant of the stockholders, controls stockholders, directors and the whole board. It is very little that the original stockholders ask—one representative or director on the board—which I have no doubt it was the intention of the Act of 1877 to give them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I really do not know whether these shareholders have a right to a director or not, but the discussion already commenced shows the necessity of this Bill going to the Committee on Railways, which is the only authority for the settlement of the question, after hearing both parties. I can see no object in delaying the measure.

Bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed the debate on the motion for concurrence in the resolutions, reported from Committee of Ways and Means (March 9th).

MR. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) : When the House adjourned, I was reading some extracts from a Hamilton paper in proof of my contention that the National Policy was not an issue in the late local elections, and I propose now to continue that course. I wish, if it is possible, for ever to set at rest this question ; although I may have but a vague hope in that respect, knowing with whom we have to deal. We know that the snake is often "scotched," but it is not always killed ; and so long as hon. gentlemen can find time to get up in their places and address the House, and so long as the Grit press throughout the country announces the fact, it will be stated hereafter, as we have it stated now, that that was the question in Ontario, and that the people of Ontario reversed their verdict. Now, I propose to set that matter at rest, and to prove it out of the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite and from the columns of their own press. I propose to read still from the paper called the Hamilton Times. That paper stated, on May 21st :

"We had hoped that when Mr. Hugh Murray ascended the public platform, he would have condescended to have informed the electors of Hamilton as to why it is he seeks to pull down Mr. Mowat and set Mr. Meredith, the Londoner, up in his place. But we have been grievously disappointed. Last night, at his first public appearance, Mr. Murray repeated his tactics of the night he was nominated. * * The nonsense he talked about the National Policy, which is not an issue at all, completely disgusted those of his friends who are not working for him in the hope that Reformers will be turned out of office by Mr. Bowell to give them warm berths at the public expense. Mr. Mowat has no control over the 'N. P.' or anything akin to it, and it is the veriest rubbish for an intelligent man to stand up before intelligent electors and tell them anything else."

I hope the hon. gentlemen opposite will take the hint and not talk any more "nonsense."

"The workmen of Hamilton are not the simpletons Mr. Murray evidently gives them credit for being. They know that we have the 'N. P.' for five years at least, and that it will have a fair trial. They understand they have nothing to fear from the Reform party in that behalf."

Now, what I object to is that they are not carrying out their promises in that respect. They are not giving the "N. P.," as they chose to call it, a fair trial. They detract from it in every way possible, not only in their places in this House, but throughout the press. Then, Sir, on the 22nd of May, we find that this same paper made use of these remarks :

"It is the fashion for the Tory canvassers to cry out 'George Brown!' to the electors of Hamilton, as if he or his name were a patented bug-a-boo calculated to frighten them to vote at any or all times for the Tory party. It is just now being circulated that he is doing all he can to destroy the 'National Policy' and ruin Canada. This is a very favourite cry in Hamilton, where, as the Spectator seems to think, there are people who imagine that the names of Mr. Brown and his newspaper are synonymous terms for the arch enemy of this city. Would it greatly surprise these people to know that in a speech in the Senate upon the Tariff, Mr. Brown, while he exercised his right as a citizen and a legislator to criticise that measure, said :—'I hope that the right may succeed, and that the good times will return. I shall not say a word that would prevent the Protectionists having a full chance to show what they can do by their policy.'"

I ask hon. gentlemen if they themselves will tell us now, in the face of this, that the Hon. George Brown is carrying out that policy? Is he not, on the contrary, using the influence of his powerful organ for the purpose of preventing it from receiving a fair trial? Hon. gentlemen may say, "Oh! that is only the Hamilton Times." Well, I admit the Hamilton Times is not the most veracious authority, in fact, I am willing to admit that it is the most scurrilous and unreliable newspaper published. I have said that before, and, in order that there may be no doubt as to the correctness of the position taken by me in this matter, I beg to refer to the reports of the speeches made by the Hon. Oliver Mowat when he was on his missionary trip through Ontario, to make good the ground he thought he was losing. The hon. gentleman made a speech in the city of Hamilton in reference to this policy, showing conclusively to my mind that he did not dare to take up the question either in Hamilton or anywhere else, and make it a test question before the electors. Mr. Mowat on that occasion said:

"The great reason which is urged, why the people of Ontario should withdraw their confidence from us on this occasion is, that on the 17th of September last, the majority of them declared in favour of what is called the 'National Policy,' (Hear, hear and cheers,) and it is urged that, having expressed that opinion then, they should vote against us now. I accept the compliment which is paid to the present Government in urging this as the prime reason why the confidence of the people should be withdrawn from us, because it shows that our opponents feel that they have no solid ground on which to object to the present Government. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) This shows that on all matters which ought to be taken into account, that they are very weak, and they are afraid that the people will see and feel and pronounce that they are weak. Therefore it is that they ask you to bring in an element which ought not to be introduced here, and which ought to have no bearing on the matter which you are about to decide. (Hear, hear.) The question of a 'National Policy' is one with which the Provincial Legislature and the Provincial Government has nothing to do, and which they cannot influence in the slightest degree. * * * We have no jurisdiction whatever over the Tariff. We can neither put on nor take off duties. We cannot interfere in any way with the action of the Dominion Government nor with the action of the Dominion Parliament upon that subject. * * * The Dominion Government, as I have said, has a majority of from two or three to one in the House of Commons at Ottawa. They have a large majority from every Province but one in the Dominion and they have that majority secure for five years. If with all that advantage, if with the advantage of that enormous superiority in numbers in the House of Commons—a superiority secured for five years—the 'National Policy' would be endangered by the Ontario Government not being in political accord with the Administration at Ottawa, then there must be certainly something very wrong either about the Government at Ottawa or about the 'National Policy.'"

So much for Mr. Mowat's own statement. I need only now refer to the nomination speech made by Mr. Elliott who nominated the hon. gentleman. Mr. Elliott made it quite plain as to whether the question of the National Policy was to come up before the electors on that occasion. Everyone in Ontario knows, at any rate those who reside anywhere near the city of Toronto know, that Mr. Elliott was and is a life-long Reformer. His father was a Reformer before him. Mr. Elliott is a true Reformer, not of the class of so-called Reformers which we have here. He is a man willing to sink party differences and personal squabbles, and act for the general benefit of the country. Mr. Elliott gave his thorough support to the party at present in power in this House, and at the same time he became the nominator of Mr. Mowat when he was offering for East Toronto, in opposition to my hon. friend the Hon. Mr. Morris. Mr. Elliott said:

"He proposed Mr. Oliver Mowat as a fit and proper person to represent the Division in the Legislative Assembly. In doing so he said that if the questions now before the electors had reference to Dominion politics, he would heartily and fairly support Mr. Morris, and just as heartily and fairly oppose Mr. Mowat. The duties of the Dominion Parliament and the Legislative Assembly being different, however, he could see his way clearly to giving Mr. Mowat his hearty support on the present occasion. He (Mr. Elliott) could claim for himself that he had been a supporter of a National Policy when a great many men who had since obtained popularity on account of it turned a very cold shoulder to it. Shortly after the Reciprocity Treaty with the United States was abrogated, it was seen by himself and a number of others, that we in this country were placed at a great disadvantage as compared with our neighbours. Some of them approached the Government with a recommendation that something should be done to remedy that state of affairs; and Sir John Macdonald said, 'Agitate the question in the country, make it an issue at the polls, send men here favourable to such a policy, and we will adopt it and carry it out.' The Conservative party had adopted that principle and carried it out in good faith, and for that he gave them credit. He (Mr. Elliott) declared himself here to be a firm supporter of Sir John Macdonald in regard to the National Policy, so long as he continued to carry out that policy, but when he came to consider our local politics he found that a very different set of interests had to be dealt with."

And so Mr. Elliott goes on to show why he gave, as he said he always would give, the right hon. gentleman, who now leads the House, his hearty support so long as he carried out the policy which was then in force in this Dominion. Now, I submit that I have proved beyond a doubt that the question of the National Policy did not enter into the discussion, and was not a factor therein during the last Ontario elections. I have proven it out of the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite, and out of the columns of their own press; and I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will show that they have at least one spark of political honesty in their composition, and will admit the fact, and forever hereafter hold their peace on that subject. Mr. Speaker, I must apologise to the House for having taken up so much time on this matter, but, as I had been personally referred to in connection with the subject, I trust the House will consider that sufficient excuse for my having called attention to it. I propose now to refer to a matter of much greater importance, namely, to what the National Policy has done for this Dominion. It has been well and truly said that Hamilton is a large manufacturing centre. I am proud to say that that city is now reaping the benefits which the wisdom of her electors saw would accrue from their action on the 17th of September, 1878. At that time the city was in a most deplorable condition. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) in his speech the other night, could not refrain from following in the questionable style of speaking which has been followed by the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition; and he referred to the pledges that had been made by the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government, and said that he was willing to give the Government a reasonable time to work out this policy, and then, in his grandiloquent style and windmill fashion, cried: "We have waited a whole year." Why, does the hon. gentleman not know that it is easier to destroy than to build up, and what has taken five years to destroy under the Government which he supported cannot possibly be built up in one year. But when we have brought it back to the state in which it was five years ago, we will have accomplished a task which the country will be grateful for. What was stated previous to the last elections has already been verified, because the supporters of the right hon. gentleman knew well that the country was so thoroughly disgusted with the incapacity of the late Government that any change would be for the better, and would be followed by restored confidence. On the 18th of September, when the telegraph carried from one end of the Dominion to the other that the Mackenzie Administration had been hurled from power, men felt at once that confidence had been restored, and a great incubus withdrawn from the progress of the country. Every man walked with his head erect; he felt that the good time was now coming, and that the sun was rising. The only exception to the general feeling of satisfaction was to be found in the few clear Grit circles—here and there these gentlemen wandered, disconsolately bowed down, and feeling that the country had deserted them. Scores of men who had been accustomed to vote with the Reform party were delighted when they heard the result, and they said, "Well, I had to vote with my party, but, thank God, they are out of power now, and the last link is broken which bound me to them." The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) contrasted the manner and expression of the hon. the Finance Minister when he brought down his Budget last year, with that of the Finance Minister this year. "On the last occasion," said the hon. gentleman, "gloom and despair overspread the features of the hon. the Finance Minister." For my part, I thought the hon. the Finance Minister spoke with a confidence that he felt that he had succeeded in carrying out his promises to the country, that his policy, and that of his Government, had succeeded. If there was any "gloom" on his countenance it was but the shadow thrown across the floor, by the darkness which prevailed on the opposite side of the House. I now propose to give a few facts showing the effects of the National Policy in Hamilton, and I think that what is the case in Hamilton will be found to be the case in the other cities of Canada; it will be admitted to be a fair indication of the whole. I hold in my hand a statement taken from the reports published by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, and the facts it contains have been furnished by a gentleman whom the hon. gentlemen opposite can say nothing against, for he was appointed to the office of Emigration Agent in Hamilton by the leader of the Opposition, and still enjoys the confidence of the Mowat Government, I mean Mr. John Smith. He is a well-known gentleman in our part of the country. Now, Mr. Smith, in his report for the year ending 31st December, 1879, says:

"There has been a large increase in the number of factory operatives arriving during the season, for whom there has been a steady demand at the current rate of wages.

"Owing to the large crop of cereals there was a good demand for farm labourers during the harvest at a high rate of wages; and a large portion of this class of emigrants have met with steady employment.

"There has been a large expenditure upon public works in this district during the year, consisting of drainage, canal and railway construction; which has created a demand for unskilled labour at remunerative wages, the average being $1.00 to $1.25 per day.

"The past year has been one of productiveness to our agriculturists, and there has been a good demand for all kinds of produce with increasing prices; the dairy products participating in the general advantage, butter and cheese having fully recovered from the low prices ruling at the opening of the season.

"There has been a large interest in the North-West Territories during the past year, a great number having availed themselves of the provisions for the settlement of the public land. The numerous enquiries through this agency show that the public mind is being directed from the North-Western and Middle States of the Union towards the lands of the Dominion, which has had the effect of closing up the American land offices of this city."

I wish to inform the hon. gentleman that in 1878, acting, I presume, on the high encomiums passed upon the State of Texas by the hon. the leader of the Opposition, the Americans actually had the audacity to open an agency in the city of Hamilton to attract emigrants to that State. They exhibited in the windows of their office the products of the soil, corn, oats, barley, etc., and induced everybody they could to take up lands there. That was the time when our people found it necessary to leave the country and seek a home in foreign lands. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the emigration returns of that time they will find that the exodus from all parts of the Dominion was far in excess then, of what it is now. The hon. member for North Oxford spoke feelingly of the depreciation in the price of farm lands in Ontario. He spoke about farms being sold some years ago at $75 or $100 per acre, and now being reduced to $60 per acre. Now, I know that so far as Ontario is concerned, the price of land does not range so high as it formerly did; that is not a subject of congratulation. But what is the reason that these lands have depreciated in value? It is because the Great North-West has been opened up to our sons, who go there in great numbers to find homes. The farms which they leave behind them will, in consequence of the wisdom and foresight of the policy of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, be bought and occupied by the tenant farmers of England and Scotland, who will bring out their capital with them, and thus contribute to the general advancement and wealth of the country; and in a few years we will see, what is now but ordinary good farms, bloom and blossom as the rose, and under the beneficial effects of the National Policy, and the general management of the present Government, this country will take such a position among the nations of the earth as her resources and her people are capable of placing her in, and entitle her to. But hon. gentleman opposite—should we judge from their conduct in this House, and the writing in their press—have no wish to see such a state of affairs. They would rather see a black desert. Mr. Smith proceeds:

"There has been a marked improvement during the year in the industrial and manufacturing interests; there have been many new industries and manufactories opened up in this district, and the elements of success infused in those already established; this is particularly the case with the establishment of the rolling mills here for the purpose of manufacturing iron; also, the nail works in connection with the same establishment. The Britannia Company from Meriden, Connecticut, have also erected a factory here for the purpose of manufacturing plated-ware, being a new industry in Canada; the Forge Company have enlarged their shops to double their former capacity, and are now running night and day to keep pace with their orders. The Dundas and the Lybster Cotton Mills Companies have both increased their capacity, and the mills are running to their fullest capacity in order to supply the demand made upon them and to keep up with their contracts. The result of this increased activity has given an impetus to the labour market, and has largely tended to the increased population and the influx of people from the United States. There has been a restored confidence in commercial circles, and with the high prices ruling for all kinds of farm produce to supply the foreign demand, I anticipate an increased demand for all kinds of labour during the current year."

Now, before this policy was inaugurated we had no rolling mills in Hamilton; we had no nail factory. We had a forging establishment, with one trip-hammer, which was working a force of eight men, four days a week. So Mr. Smith goes on pointing out the different industries that are being fostered by the admirable working of the National Policy. There are statements attached to his report which, among other things, show the amount of capital brought in by emigrants and settlers at the Hamilton agency, for the year ending December 31st, 1879. He shows how much was brought in during each month in 1878, and during each month in 1879. We find that during the latter year $199,000 more capital was brought into the Hamilton agency than the year before. That is a fact which proves, I think, that the people have not turned their backs upon Canada. Now, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) in the most feeling way imaginable, alluded to a letter written by the great John Bright. My idea is that it was not very "bright" on the part of the hon. member to do so. You might as well read from a letter written by the Hon. George Brown, the gallant knight for Centre Huron, or the hon. the leader of the Opposition. But what does Mr. John Bright say: "I regret the course taken by the Canadian Government." We are aware of that. Of course, the leader of Free-trade in England would like us to send our raw material over to England, to be manufactured and sent back to us in that state, and thus compel us to pay for the manufacturing. "I regard it as the first step in the direction of separation from the Mother Country." Poor man. He is much to be pitied if he regards it in that light. Judging from the way he treated this country before, I do not think he would worry himself very much in case of the separation. In this very letter to Mr. Forbes, he shows that his love for this country is measured by the number of ducats he can take from the people of this country and put in his own pocket. "I have no belief in the maintenance of the Empire on which the sun never sets." That is a nice kind of man to dictate to us Canadians. He has no faith in the maintenance of the Empire on which the sun never sets. "It grieves me to see the Colonies departing from the principles which all sound theory and our experience have shown to be wise." Now, in my humble judgment, as well as in the judgment of many far better and wiser men, it is a question whether Free-trade has been a wise policy for Great Britain; and there is a discussion in progress as to whether it is not advisable to return to a policy of Protection. "If the Colonies were wise they would follow our example." Well, we think we are capable of judging for ourselves. Being on the spot, we know what the situation is. Mr. John Bright, writing from his desk in the Old Country, knows little or nothing about our affairs. "If they will not do so, we must leave them to their own courses, but I think they should not come here for loans or the guarantee for loans." One would suppose that we were in the habit of going over there, hat in hand, begging Mr. Bright and his countrymen to lend us money. The loans are a matter of business arrangement and negotiations, and if it did not suit the purpose of the London money lenders to let us have money, we would not get it. We have to give good security, and pay as good a rate of interest as they can get from others. It is simply a business transaction. The people have money to lend, and, unfortunately, we have to borrow, and we get just the same terms as other people. I dare say Mr. John Bright's friends, in the money market, will not thank him for his gratuitous suggestions. I have alluded in general terms to the effect of the National Policy in Hamilton, and I wish now to refer more in detail to a few of the leading industries that have either been created since the inauguration of the Tariff or were completely subdued under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. The rolling mills is a new enterprise. In the building and plant, $200,000 are invested; there is an active capital of $100,000; the wages paid per month amount to $9,000; the output of work per annum amounts to $600,000, and 200 hands are kept employed. For the benefit of my esteemed friends from Nova Scotia, I may state the consumption of coal at that establishment is 25,000 tons a year. The nail factory is another new enterprise; it has $25,000 invested in buildings and plant; active capital, $50,000; wages per month, $2,500; output per annum, $200,000, and the number of hands in constant employment, fifty. There are two glass factories in Hamilton. Three or four companies became bankrupt in trying to continue operations in one of them under the splendid regime of hon. gentlemen opposite. One of the factories which was closed previous to the introduction of the National Policy, has now $40,000 invested in buildings and plant; monthly wages, $4,500, and number of hands employed, 135. Previous to the change in the Tariff the forge works were only running half time with a force of eight men. Since the alteration took place, they have increased their capacity over 50 per cent., and are now working day and night to meet their orders. They have $25,000 invested in buildings and plant; the monthly wages amount to $2,000, and forty hands are kept in constant employment. In connection with this I will read a letter from the esteemed president of the concern, Mr. James Walker, than whom a more worthy and true gentleman does not exist either in the city of Hamilton or elsewhere. In answer to a letter I wrote him on the subject, he says :

" You ask me about our work, and the effect the National Policy Tariff has had on our forge? From the time of its coming into operation we have been kept occupied. We have doubled our power, and now work our two hammers with a day and night gang of men. We are paying about $2,000 per month in wages, and other supplies in proportion. And whilst we have Canada market for our axes protected, we sell in Hamilton at a lower price than either Buffalo, Detroit, or Cleveland, showing that we do well for the railway interests of Canada."

That, I think, is a satisfactory report so far as the forge works are concerned.

MR. PLUMB: It is not satisfactory to the Americans.

MR. ROBERTSON: No, I have no doubt it will tend to add to their depression. Then there is the spoke and hub factory, which is newly established in Hamilton; It was formerly in operation on a small scale, about eight or nine miles west of the city, but the proprietors were obliged to come into town in order to increase their capacity so that their establishment could keep pace with the demand. They have $50,000 invested in plant and buildings; monthly wages, $1,250, and they pay to farmers $20,000 a year for blocks. Hon. gentlemen opposite who take such an interest in the down-trodden farmer, will do well to note that item. At present thirty-five hands are employed, but as soon as they get up their new machinery, which is now on the way, about as many more will be engaged. Another important industry which has been established since the inauguration of the National Policy is the Meridian Britannia Metal Works. This company has $100,000 invested in buildings and plant; active capital, $25,000; monthly wages, $1,500; hands employed, fifty; output $200,000 per annum. An increase in the machinery will enable them to keep a hundred men employed. Then there is another glass factory, which was shut down by the policy of the late Administration. The proprietors were life-long Reformers, but the same kind of Reformers as Mr. Elliott was. They felt that true reform consisted in the inauguration of measures for the benefit of the country first, and taking care of the party afterwards; and when the present Tariff was suggested, they became strong supporters of the party now in power, and were among the most enlightened and enthusiastic supporters my colleague and I had at the last election. They are reaping their reward; and I have no doubt how they will go, when, the day comes, for the representatives of the people to give an account of their stewardship, by going back to the country. The tobacco factory of George Tucket and Company is flourishing. It always has been a prosperous concern; it was one of those lucky industries that was protected before the present Tariff was adopted. It is prospering, however, still more in consequence of the general diffusion of prosperity throughout the land, and now employs more hands than ever before. Then we have J. H. Killy and Company's machine shops—a large establishment. The Tariff does not do that concern as much good as we all wish it might, since certain raw material they use is taxed, but it is reaping a benefit from the general prosperity of the country. The firm have been obliged to double their capacity, and are working with all the power they can bring to bear on their orders. We have a number of extensive foundries and other establishments, altogether too numerous to mention, which are running to their full capacity, and the general average of wages has increased 10 per cent., and there has been an increase of at least 100 in the number of hands employed in these different establishments. With regard to the building trade, more buildings have been erected than during any previous year, and the edifices are of a better class. In the town of Dundas, two or three establishments are now flourishing, one of which, the Canada Tool Works, was all but snuffed out during the operation of the old Tariff. That concern has largely increased its capacity. It gives employment to eighty hands; the monthly wages amount to $3,000, and there are $80,000 invested in buildings and plant. The Dundas Edge Tool Works or Axe Factory was closed before the present Tariff was adopted. That industry has revived. In buildings and plant $10,000 are invested. Only fifteen hands are now employed, but the foreman is in the United States endeavouring to bring skilled workmen over, and it is intended to increase the working force to fifty men. The Dundas Cotton Mills have increased their capacity very materially. They have $400,000 invested in buildings and plant; active capital, $100,000; output per annum, $450,000; monthly wages, $8,000, and number of hands employed, 450; number of bales of cotton manufactured per annum, 200,000; the increase of looms and throstles is 103. So far I have spoken of the larger class of industries; but I can assure this honourable House that the great benefit which the people of this country are receiving in consequence of this great and fostering policy is not confined to these by any means. The fact is there is hardly a trade or calling which is not experiencing day by day advantages from its influence; and I should not be doing amiss in this connection to allude to one more enterprise, although small, comparatively speaking, which affords a good illustration of the general state of affairs, and that is the Canada Whip Company. I have it from the senior partner of the concern, that during the last two years of the Government of the hon. member for Lambton, this establishment was reduced down from one of considerable importance to a small affair, employing only eight hands for four days in each week. It now gives constant employment to nineteen, and cannot fill its orders as fast as required; and while it formerly was obliged to send travellers out to solicit orders, now it has not, nor has it for three months past had one on the road. That is the way in which the "hum" is to be heard in and about Hamilton and neighbourhood, and, from all I can learn, that is only a fair index of what is to be found in other parts of the country.

MR. RYMAL: Tell us how the clock establishment succeeded.

MR. ROBERTSON.

MR. ROBERTSON: In order that the hon. gentleman may have some comfort, I will tell him all about it. I have no doubt his radiant countenance will be as bright as noonday when I tell him that the clock establishment is not started yet, but will shortly. The clock was wound up so completely by the late Government that it could not get started again. It is there still, and it is due to the conduct of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and the doings of the Globe and its satellites, that it has not started before. That clock establishment, however, is in the hands of gentlemen determined to push it on, and, no doubt, in the course of a few weeks, if I am not misinformed, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rymal) will have to go about the streets of Hamilton, with head down, and saying, "Well, well, there is another reason why we should be depressed."

MR. RYMAL: We will wait till that happy time comes.

MR. ROBERTSON: I wish to refer to a matter, more of a personal nature, though not to myself, but to the great good done to this Dominion by the hon. the Finance Minister, in his recent peregrinations through the country. If there is one thing more than another which has inspired the people of this country with confidence in the present Government, it is the interest manifested in the working of the new policy, by that hon. gentleman and other members of the Government. The present Ministers have not followed the questionable example of their predecessors in office; they have not shut themselves up in their Departments. When gentlemen would come to see them, prepared to offer suggestions as to what was really required by the country, or to offer some hint which their practical knowledge made valuable and of great benefit to the country, they did not shut themselves up within their inner selves, compress their lips, put their hands in their pockets, or treat their visitors as if they were not honest men; on the contrary they received them courteously, and expressed themselves ready to hear everything they had to say, and to act upon what was considered beneficial. His progress throughout the country, not only gave him the knowledge of what was actually going on, but gave the people to understand that the members of the Government were willing to learn from men experienced in the industries of the land, and who must of necessity know something of what was required. The hon. gentleman has taken the trouble to go from factory to factory to see for himself, and to inspire the people with confidence and the name of Sir Samuel L. Tilley is to-day a household word with the people of Ontario, while the name of his predecessor in office is such as no hon. gentleman would feel great delight in carrying. Of course this is said and meant in a political sense only.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT: It is not the slightest consequence to me whether it is said in a political sense or any other.

MR. ROBERTSON: I quite understand that remark. It illustrates exactly what I have been speaking of; it is in this style that the honourable and gallant knight from Huron, treated all those who dared to approach him—it was this beautiful exclusiveness—this self-importance—this touch-me-not—I know everything—you cannot teach me—policy, that has so endeared the gallant knight to the great majority of the people of this country. It is “of no consequence,” of course it is not, he was always telling them that their complaints were of “no consequence”; he shut the door of his office to them, on the ground that they were of “no consequence”; he refused to see them, averring that they were people of “no consequence”; he put aside with quiet contempt their views when they did reach him as of “no consequence”; and let me tell the hon. gentleman, that on the 17th September, 1878, the people of Canada deliberately weighted him in the balance, and found him and declared him of “no consequence”—And it was that high and mighty exclusiveness that sent the hon. gentleman to seek a seat where he was personally but little known. Sir, the people of this country believe that there ought to be some community of feeling between the governed and the governors, and they have found it in the persons of the hon. gentlemen who so admirably fill the Treasury Benches, and who have, since they took office, fulfilled every pledge made to the people of Canada.

MR. CASEY: The hon. gentleman who has just sat down began his speech with the remark that young members were not generally well received. In this he is mistaken; young members are generally well received, but on this condition: that they refrain from making themselves particularly offensive to older members, and are a little moderate in tone and language in treating subjects generally. I can hardly say the hon. gentleman (Mr. Robertson) has fulfilled these conditions. The first instance of the breach of that courtesy due from a young to an older member applies to my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Oliver). He charged that hon. gentleman with using a subterfuge, because he quoted a statement from the Hamilton Times, which the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) stated, in a sarcastic sense, was very “veracious”—in other words, frequently told fibs. He (Mr. Robertson) admits one half of the Times’ statement, namely, that over 500 houses in that city were lately vacant. He stated that, though there were that many vacant now, there were more vacant in 1878 than the Times stated, and he challenged an actual count to decide between himself and the Times. It is very strange the hon. gentleman should have admitted the half of the statement capable of verification, and denied the half which was not so. An actual count of the houses vacant last year is impossible. I think that the evidence of the reporter on the subject of the number vacant a year ago is as good as that with reference to the number now vacant, which the hon. gentleman admits to be correct. He has not helped himself much by his reference to those houses, but has practically admitted the Times’ statement. He explained that the reason why houses are now vacant is that, when people get better off, they build new ones—out of the city, perhaps he means under the mountain. In other words, the increase of population does not keep pace with the increase of houses in Hamilton. He admits the population is not increasing, or the houses vacant would be filled. He went further, saying that a great many of the idle houses were built in prosperous times, when the right hon. leader of the Government was last in power, about 1872 or 1873, perhaps, which is to say that, under the Revenue Tariff of 15 per cent., Hamilton was extremely prosperous, while now, under the high Protective Tariff, an enormous percentage of houses lie vacant. That is not a strong argument for the benefits of Protection. Not content with casting slurs on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver), the hon. member for Hamilton has slighted Woodstock, which, so far as I know, possesses a very fine class of houses—I think finer than most towns of its size in the country. I think the hon. gentleman will not help his case by insulting a whole town in regard to its houses, in this manner. He passed on to another matter—to prove that the National Policy was not an issue at the last Ontario elections—to do which he asserted that Mr. Mowat and friends did not make it an issue, and were not willing to accept it as such. I think Mr. Mowat followed a perfectly consistent course. It has always been a Reform principle to separate Dominion and Local affairs. Mr. Mowat said: We go to the country on our merits; we believe we governed the Province properly, and ask your support, if you think so. But, as the hon. member for Hamilton said, the Opposition were not content with this issue; they thought the National Policy would be a great advantage, a source of strength to them, and dared Mr. Mowat to make it a question. They said that, if the electors supported Mr. Mowat, it should be taken as a condemnation of the National Policy, that would shorten its duration. I think that, when a party like the Ontario Opposition insist thus in dragging in a question, and making it an issue for their own advantage, they should honestly accept the popular verdict upon it, which, in this instance, was overwhelmingly in favour of the Reform party. What would they have said had the elections gone the other way? Does anyone suppose that the hon. member for Hamilton would have stated that the carrying of the elections by the Conservatives, last summer, did not mean a verdict of Ontario for the National Policy? But almost the cruellest thing in his remarks was that his party thought it necessary to make this an issue. That is desperately hard on the Ontario Opposition. They had no hope whatever in the intelligence and influence of their representatives in the Local House, and believed their only prospect of carrying the elections was to drag in the cry so successful a year before. They forgot the difference, however, between the two occasions; that, on the first, the people did not know what the issue meant, and on the second, they did. The hon. gentleman also says it is easier to destroy than to build up, and in about five years he hopes to see prosperity restored. The time of renovation is lengthening out. During the General Elections, the restoration of prosperity was to come immediately the Conservatives gained power. Last Session it was to come, perhaps, in a year; this Session it is to come in five. When the next elections approach, we hardly dare think to what future period the restoration will be postponed. The hon. member for Hamilton told us, also, that the American Land Office in that city had been closed, in consequence of the good management of the present Government. I think that a very natural consequence of that management. Why should the Americans keep a Land Office, there, and advertise their western country, when the Dominion Government does it for them gratuitously in such pamphlets as the "holiday trip" of the Hon. Peter Mitchell.

AN HON. MEMBER: Is there anything about corkscrews in it?

MR. CASEY: The pamphlet contains sixty-three pages, and about forty are devoted to Minnesota, Texas, Indiana, and other western States, and twenty-three to Manitoba, a great portion being rather abusive of that country. The hon. gentleman also stated that there had been an increase of about 10 per cent. in the wages of iron-moulders in Hamilton. It had been stated in the press that this occurred just after the visit of the hon. the Finance Minister, last fall, was allowed for seven weeks, and then withdrawn, leaving the rate as before. It seemed necessary to show the men some shadow of the realisation of the pretty things said to them by the leaders of the Government in their travels. Next we were treated to a comparison of the personal popularity of the present with that of the late Finance Minister—the name of the first being described as a household word, while that of the second is hardly mentioned. As to the personal popularity of the present Finance Minister, no one grudges it to him, but of his political popularity it is better not to say too much. It is quite possible that any Minister who went round visiting the manufactories, and saying pleasant things to masters and men, patting them on the back, and promising them good things all round the next Session, a gentleman with such a pleasant face and manner of saying things, as belong to the hon. the Finance Minister, would be well received; nor should I be surprised if they continued to believe his fine promises for another year or two, if not disappointed before. What the hon. member said about the "hum" in Hamilton is as good an introduction to what I intend to say further as anything else. He is the first member who has had the courage in my hearing to locate the "hum" at home, and I give him credit for the possession of that courage; but whether he will feel so comfortable after the matter has been investigated, I do not know. The hon. gentleman, however, resembles other hon. gentlemen on that side who have addressed the House, in so far as he has not given any statistics to prove that there has been a substantial increase in the general manufactures of the country under the National Policy. The hon. gentleman, I think, has mentioned two new industries, glass-making and silver-plating, and that is more than I have heard any other hon. member claim. Hamilton must therefore be a favoured place. But there has been no claim by my hon. friend that there has been a general increase in the manufactures of the neighbourhood, and, if there has been a claim made, no proof has been offered in support of it. I desire now to make some reference to the manufactures of western Ontario, and I say unhesitatingly that those who had no active foreign competition before this Tariff was introduced, agricultural implement-makers, stove-makers, carriage-makers, etc., instead of being benefitted by this Tariff, have been injured thereby. A first-class firm of agricultural implement-manufacturers in my own county, state that they are out of pocket to the extent of $3,000 a year by the operation of this Tariff. This loss is due to the increased tax on raw material, while they obtain no increased price for their goods. They never had any foreign competition, and consequently they required no protection. Previously to the adoption of the National Policy, they exported threshing machines to the United States, which they cannot now do; and while now they export somewhat to Manitoba, the protection they derive there from the National Policy does not recoup them to any appreciable degree for the loss on the home trade. A large firm in St. Thomas, that of Messrs. Haggart and Cochrane, make the same statement in regard to the home trade, but expect to gain something on the Manitoba trade. In reference to London, a neighbouring city, and one in which I take some interest, I will read you a statement I have received from a very prominent gentleman there, who is a large carriage and wagon-maker. He tells me the National Policy has increased the cost of material but not the price of the finished article, and has destroyed their trade with Australia altogether, as they could hardly compete with the Americans before the National Policy, as Boston manufacturers could slip at the manufactory while they have freight to seaboard to pay. This gentleman was one of the largest exporters to Australia.

MR. MACMILLAN: Name.

MR. CASEY: The name is Mr. John Campbell, and it must be remembered that this trade with Australia cost the country thousands of dollars to open up, and it seems certain, from all I can gather, that the National Policy is preventing our merchants from taking advantage of that trade. I give the name of this gentleman because he has made statements publicly in the London press, and I suppose he has no objection to have his name used here. It is true he is a Reformer, but he is a man of business, who built up his business from a small beginning, and he would not allow any party feelings to interfere with his trade interests. When the hon. the Minister of Finance visited his factory in London, he told him some of the same facts: The only alternative these manufacturers have now, is either to combine for the purpose of raising the price of the finished article in proportion to the increased price of raw material, or they must deteriorate the quality of the article they sell. Perhaps the latter will be the most likely adopted, as it will be the most popular course. The wages question also comes up in London. In reference to that, Mr. Campbell says: He never knew the wages of skilled workmen to be as low as at present, and that they are undoubtedly much lower than a year ago. He never saw so many labourers unemployed as at present. Many are in abject poverty, begging bread for their children to eat; others are satisfied if they can get work enough from the corporation to enable them to earn $2.00 per week. This Tariff discriminates against the carriage manufacturer in favour of the upholsterer. Moss, which enters largely into the manufacture of carriages for stuffing, has to pay 20 per cent. duty, while the same moss, imported for stuffing furniture, comes in free. I may, perhaps, suggest this to hon. gentlemen that there are among their supporters those interested in the furniture trade, which may be the reason why moss for furniture comes in free, while the same moss for carriages has to pay a duty of 20 per cent. Repp is also free for cabinet work, while it is taxed to carriage-makers and others. I am informed that carriage-makers will have to commission cabinet-makers to import their goods for them. It is worthy of remark that no new trade has been started in London under the National Policy. I have a list here of the industries started in that city under the Administration of my hon. friends on this side of the House, as compared with the utter lack of new industries started under the National Policy, and the House will see that many of those industries, which are claimed to be so prosperous now, were started long before the National Policy came into existence. The complaints of agricultural implement-makers do not come from London alone. I have here a copy of a circular that has, I believe, been sent round to members of the House, emanating from a number of leading agricultural implement-makers, who have clubbed together to make these representations. It was presented to the hon. the Minister of Finance before the Session commenced, and is to the effect that their business suffered from the increased cost of raw material under the National Policy, and that specific duties on finished articles were needed to protect them in Manitoba. I think, Sir, it is clear that the Tariff discriminates unfairly against agricultural implement manufacturers. Another hon. gentleman, the member for Lincoln (Mr.

Rykert) told us that there was somewhat of a "hum" in his constituency. He told us that the increase of business in St. Catharines had been 50 per cent. during the past year. Some gentlemen in that town have taken the trouble to send me a few items of information in regard to the business of St. Catharines, which I am inclined to suppose are correct; but which, of course, the hon. gentleman will have to disprove if he can. These credible and well-informed parties tell me that, instead of there being an increase of 50 per cent., there has been a decrease of 75 per cent. The list is as follows:—

"St. Catharine's wheel-works, employing usually 80 men has been shut down, and is advertised for sale.

"St. Catharine's stove factory—50 men—for sale.

"Oille's foundry, formerly 60 men, now 10 men.

"Yale and Company's foundry and machine shop closed—for sale.

"Abell's foundry and machine shop, shut down; and two of the brothers left country.

"Dolphin Manufacturing Company (paints), in hands of official assignee.

"Shickluna's ship-yard, usually 200 men, now 20 men, and this will be a large average for the year.

"Simpson's ship-yard, closed.

"Sullivan's planing-mill and lumber-yard, in hands of assignee.

"Twelve master builders, who used to keep 200 men in 1875-6, have now not over 10, and not a shop is open."

The hon. gentleman claimed credit last year for a cotton batting factory that had been started there, as the result of the National Policy. I am told that it was an American who started it; but, finding it did not pay, he sold out. I am also told that only one man was employed there, and that he now is working on half time. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not deny that.

MR. RYKERT: I do, and I also desire to state that three of the firms in the list read failed four years ago.

MR. CASEY: The list continues, as follows:

"R. H. Smith's saw-works, well protected, and with raw material free, and likely to make money, applied in December for remission of taxes for five years, which was granted.

"The Welland Vale Works have not half as many men working as before."

The mowing-machine knife works are prosperous, because they are the only works of the kind in the country. Two thousand five hundred people left

St. Catharines for the United States in the year, and fifty farm people left by the Great Western Railway in February. Many St. Catharines mechanics are working at Cleveland, Buffalo, Lockport, and elsewhere, and their families will low them in the spring. If the hon. gentleman can show this statement to be untrue—

MR. RYKERT : If you will allow me, I will.

MR. CASEY : You cannot speak again in this debate ; but you can take some opportunity of contradicting this by proof. You must understand I only give these facts on my belief in the credibility of these gentlemen, and if they are shown to be incorrect, I will admit their incorrectness. The book trade have complained that the Tariff is unfair ; they say that 15 per cent. is a very heavy burden. It is unnecessary too, since the home publisher has perfect protection under the Copyright Act. I have in my pocket a letter from a book dealer, urging reasons for reducing the book tax to 5 per cent. I have another communication from a dealer in sewing machines at Halifax, to another member, who has handed it to me for use, making serious charges in regard to sewing machines. He says that cheap hand sewing machines are taxed 50 per cent., while the higher priced ones are taxed about 35 per cent. This is a tax on poor people who have to earn their living by using these machines. The sewing machine makers here do not need this protection, since one at least—the Williams' Singer Company, Montreal—has a branch in the United States and sells there cheaper than here. But leaving the question of how manufacturers and dealers in manufactures are affected by this Tariff, I wish to call attention again to the position of the farmers, whom I specially represent, under this Tariff. Throughout, it shows a discrimination against them ; their interests must yield whenever they clash with those of the manufacturers. The farmer expected that he would be encouraged as much as any other class. It is quite unnecessary to argue the point whether he gets any benefit from this Tariff on peas or barley or wheat or on beans. As to corn, on which he might be said to receive a benefit, we have to notice an imposition of 7c. on corn imported by farmers and feeders.

while the starch-maker pays only 2½c. on corn imported to make starch. To come to pork, the farmer was told that he was to get a good profit on his pork ; but a discrimination is made against him in favour of pork-packers, who are allowed to pack American pork in bond and export it. Pork-packers are manufacturers, and the farmer is deprived of his only home market for his pork by this invidious discrimination. Then in regard to wheat, again a distinction is made in favour of the miller. He is allowed to grind American wheat in bond, on the ground that certain qualities of American spring wheat are necessary to make good flour. Why not raise it in Canada ? Indeed, the same quality is raised in Manitoba. The professed object of the National Policy is to induce us to grow and make things here which have not been made and grown here before. In regard to hides and leather, the farmer is still left in the cold. The tanner is allowed to put on an increase on the price of his leather ; but the farmer does not get any more for his hides. The farmer gets no more for his wool, because it is a kind that is not imported. The cabinet-maker is largely protected, but the farmer of Western Ontario, who produces the wood used by the cabinet-maker, is not benefitted at all. When I urged these points on the hon. the Finance Minister, last year, I was told that the wood was the raw material of the cabinet-maker, and therefore could not be taxed. Well, so is pig iron the raw material of the implement maker, and there are several raw materials that are taxed, and, therefore, that argument has no weight, at least it is not allowed to have weight except where the interests of the farmer and the manufacturer clash, and there it is brought to bear against the former. We have excellent black walnut wood in Ontario, but black walnut wood of an inferior quality is brought from the United States ; black walnut, I notice, is even imported from Bulgaria. It is a crying injustice to the farmer that he is not protected, while everybody else is protected all round. The farmer has grown disgusted ; a stronger proof of this than the Ontario elections is to be found in the fact that a large exodus of farmers is taking place from Woodstock and Ingersoll westward—a large exodus to the western States. It is within my own knowledge that more farmers have gone from my own neighbourhood last year than in any year I can remember. Fifty farmers left St. Thomas on one train; a large number have gone west, and some have gone to Manitoba, but very few have gone to Manitoba. Why these do not go to Manitoba may be best explained by the emigration document sent out by the Government. The Hon. Peter Mitchell relates of the American Consul, who had been in Winnipeg, but in now in Minnesota, the following. After admitting the richness of Manitoba lands, he said:

"But yet your settlers won't stay with you—there were some thirty families came away last summer that I know of, and it is all because they have no faith in your giving them railway facilities."

And so on in the same strain. He goes on to give other reasons why settlers do not stay in Manitoba, and I think they are very good reasons. Perhaps the Government thinks it will save the rush of emigration into Manitoba before the country is ready to receive them. I must, before closing, make a few general remarks on the principles of the Tariff. I will go into no further details, because they have been gone into very fully already. The true aim, the whole tendency, of this Tariff is to create monopolies. It is impossible for a Tariff to foster a number of moderate-sized manufactories under Protective duties. There are periods of high prices, tremendous over-productions, then a glut, a break-down of the markets and the manufacturers, except a few, and those few who remain, reap the spoils. Such a course of events is fatal to small manufacturers, and the bulk of the manufacturing trade will remain in the hands of a few monopolists. We have not reached that yet here, because manufacturers have not been stimulated so much as was expected. In the case of the sugar-refiners, however, there is a monopoly already. In cottons and woollens there is a monopoly in a few hands. We know how all monopolies were looked upon in bygone days; we know that wars and revolutions were brought about by them in the Mother Country. In those days the monopoly was granted by the Crown in return for payments of money. But a monopoly is none the less odious because it is granted in return for political influence instead of for cash. These have been so granted, for the hon. leader of the Government promised that if they would put him in he would do all they asked him; he would do whatever each trade required. These monopolies will go on becoming more burdensome, and they will be hard to get rid of. It will be their interest to sustain the Government which gives them their privileges by the most corrupt means. At the last elections, they hired agents to support hon. gentlemen opposite. At the next they will subscribe to an election fund, and the Government will not hesitate to use their money. Has not a Government of the same party, comprised of identically the same hon. gentlemen as the present one, received large sums of money from a public contractor and disbursed it to many persons.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. CASEY: The then Premier of the Government disbursed some of it personally, and another member of that Government took some to disburse. We have an assurance that this conduct will not be repeated; we have had no disclaimer of the moral wickedness of that act. We have had no disclaimer of that affair from the virtuous Minister of Finance; but we have had something from the present Premier, at a nomination speech at the town of Kingston; and here it is:

"With reference to the Pacific Scandal—

An Hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with the Tariff?

MR. CASEY:

"With reference to the Pacific Scandal, if the thing had to be done over again, I would not make the same mistake. In England, where there is a higher political morality, the elections were managed by the Carleton Club for the Conservatives and the Reform Club for the Liberals."

An Hon. MEMBER: Keep to the point.

MR. CASEY:

"In Canada there was nothing of the kind, and when subscriptions came in to aid in elections they were sent to the leader of the party. I received money, and I am sorry I did, for we should avoid the appearance of evil. I, however, distributed the money I received all over the country, and not one cent went to Kingston. So conscious am I of mistakes having been made in this respect, that when I went to Toronto the first thing done was to start the United Empire Club, which has received and distributed the subscriptions."

He is sorry he received the money, because we should avoid the appearance of evil. This is the statement of the hon. gentleman who is now Premier when he went before his constituents asking for their confidence. The first thing he did was to organise a club to distribute the money for him. That club has been hard up; but when the woollen interests, and the sugar interests, and the cotton interest have contributed, there will be plenty to eat and to drink. We were told why it was established, and we see how a great interest has been created to supply the funds. The two facts fit nicely, and show one of the reasons for the existence of the National Policy; that is oppression, and the most odious form of oppression imaginable rules by purse power, and uses its power to make more money. It is not even as respectable as the tyranny of an old-fashioned despot. But, Sir, unless they are coerced by the sort of measures I have indicated, the people of Canada will not long submit to the tyranny of a few parvenu autocrats, who maintain power by the length of their purses, and use that power to make their purses fuller than they were before. The Tariff has created a war of classes and sections. There is a war against the manufacturing class and a war against the consuming class—there is a war between the Eastern and Western Provinces. We saw to-night that the hon. member for Pictou was not satisfied with the duty on coal, and he told us that it would have been increased but for difficulties that were thrown in the way of the Government. The most serious difficulty to which he referred was, no doubt, the resolution of even the Conservative members from the other Provinces against further taxation. We have yet to see the tremendous conflict that must take place between consumers and manufacturers. Consumers must combine and make their power felt, at whatever risk or cost. This will be done, sooner or later, and the country will be convulsed as it never was before. When that time arrives, the party which brought about the tremendous conflict will suffer forever from the stigma it will attach to its name. I have always felt glad that our leaders did not yield to the instigations of some of our Protectionist friends, who wished them to try measures of Protection to satisfy certain classes. I am very glad they went out of power rather than do that, because I felt sure that Nemesis would speedily overtake any Government that undertook to frame a Protectionist Tariff to satisfy all classes, and that Nemesis has overtaken the hon. gentlemen opposite. Only lately I heard this sentiment expressed in another form by a Conservative, who was opposed to me at the last election. He was an importer, living at St. Thomas, but he moved into another neighbourhood. A year ago, he supported the National Policy, believing it to be a good thing for the country, but he recently said to me: "Casey, it is the best thing for you fellows that you let our fellows try this. Taking up this job is the worst thing that ever happened to us." I think that gentleman's opinion was sound, and that it was a happy day for the Liberal party when the Conservatives undertook the impossible task of making everybody rich at the general expense of the country.

MR. HESSON: I will not trouble the House with many remarks on this worn-out subject. This whole matter was gone into at length on the introduction of the Tariff last year, and the debate this Session has struck me as a waste of time to the House and a heavy expense to the country. I had not purposed saving a word on the subject, but that some figures that have fallen from hon. gentlemen opposite are so misleading that I wish to avail myself of this opportunity of correcting the erroneous impression they may make. I am afraid that the task will be a pretty heavy one, but I think it is important and proper that the statements of some hon. members opposite ought to be refuted at once. In the very long, and perhaps it may be called able, speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Oliver), the other evening, there are some inaccuracies which it would be unfair to let go to the country as uncontradicted statements. I knew something of the figures he quoted, but in order to convince myself that I was not astray in my recollection of the facts, I examined the returns and took the figures, not from the Globe or Mail, but from journals like the Journal of Commerce and Canada Gazette, which give honest facts, and upon which the people can rely. The hon. member for South Oxford said :

“It was contended by Government supporters that the country was now in the enjoyment of great prosperity. He had been looking anxiously for that prosperity, but had been unable to find it. One of the best criterions by which to judge prosperity was the condition of the Savings Banks. He found that in 1876-7 the deposits in the Dominion Savings Banks amounted to $5,726,000, which in 1877-8 had increased to $7,427,000. But since that time $500,000 had been withdrawn, showing that poor people had found it necessary on account of hard times to draw upon their savings in order to pay current expenses of living.”

Now, that statement is misleading. On examining the Savings Bank account from 1878 up to January, 1880, I find figures which give a different result. In March, 1878, the total amount at the credit of that fund was $5,927,772. The deposits during that month amounted to $349,122. The withdrawals were $400,579, or $51,397 more than the deposits for the month. In March, 1879, we find a slightly better state of things. The total deposits were $6,170,685. During the month $354,792 were deposited, and the withdrawals amounted to $364,898, leaving an over draft of only $10,106 for that month. We will now see what the figures were on the 1st of January, 1880, ten months after the inauguration of the National Policy. The deposits for January of the present year were $456,021; the withdrawals amounted to $333,764, leaving a surplus of $122,256 for the month. The total deposits at the credit of that fund on January 31st, 1880, now amounted to $6,729,417, an excess over the previous year of $558,732.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : It is a million for the year.

MR. HESSON : I am told by the hon. the Finance Minister it is a million for the year. That is another proof that the National Policy is quietly but surely effecting its good work. The fact that this sum stands to the credit of the poor hardworking people, who are saving for a rainy day, is an evidence that the country is not in the deplorable state depicted by hon. gentlemen opposite. Turning to the deposits in the chartered banks, I find that on the 31st March, 1871, the total deposits amounted to $61,667,373. Now if times had got worse, as hon. gentlemen opposite claim, we would expect to see that sum decreased. On the 31st March, 1879, however, the total deposits in the chartered banks had increased to $62,566,840, an increase in the year of only $899,467. On the 31st January, 1880, there was no less than $68,916,089 of deposits to the credit of the people in the chartered banks, an increase for the ten months, up to January 31st, of $6,349,249. I think that constitutes a good, sound and logical reason for believing that the times have improved, and that the National Policy is working beneficially for the general interests of the country. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Pater-son) said :

“The occupants of the Treasury Benches grew very uncomfortable when their leader’s speech, as delivered at Parkhill, was read to them. He had pledged his word of honour then that prosperity would return as soon as they could secure power; but 540 days had gone by since then, and still they cried out for more time, trying, like bankrupts, to secure an extension of time from those to whom they had pledged such a marvelous change.”

I think it is only fair to go to the records and ascertain whether, if such promises were made, they have been fulfilled. I will not go to the Globe, nor will I refuse to give names, as the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) did just now. The authority I will give will be found in the editorials of the Monetary Times, from a man who is not friendly toward the Conservative cause, in which it is said :

“As the year draws to a close, and there is not much doing, it is satisfactory to hear the confidence expressed in commercial circles, that the improvement in business which has been experienced during the past few months will be more fully realised and developed in opening of next year’s business. Tweed and cotton manufactories are fully occupied, and prices advancing. New life and activity have been given to mining enterprise. In North Hastings several iron mines are being developed; outside of North Hastings iron mines are beginning to be developed. The Baldwin mines, a few miles from Hull, are producing 300 tons per day.”

Then we are also told, by the same authority, that the lumber trade was never so bright or promising as now. I will give another quotation, which I think will satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite that the Tariff is working well. The Monetary Times says :

and merchandise, accompanied by an altogether unexpected revival of trade. New life was suddenly infused into almost every department of industry, and, to the surprise of business men everywhere, a day of profits quickly succeeded to the era of losses, which had come to be regarded by many as only terminable through general bankruptcy. The change, which was radical and complete, was soon discovered to be well-founded. Money flowed in at financial centres freely, and, in consequence, the year closed with tradesmen wearing an unwonted look of cheerfulness, and predicting the future with no little confidence."

It would be most remarkable if the National Policy should have produced all this, or an extra crop of cereals should have produced it. But it is, after all, natural that a change of policy would in the minds of many business men create a presumption or impression that brighter times were in store—that they should have more confidence and enter into new enterprise leading to good results to themselves and the country. I will give another item that may be interesting to hon. gentlemen from an editorial in the Monetary Times also, under the heading "Mercantile Failures :"

"The last three months of 1879 show an improvement in the condition of our mercantile affairs, however, which is as gratifying as it is marked. The aggregate of failures among Canadian traders during that period is by far the smallest of the four quarters of the year, forming but 16·8 per cent. of the whole twelve-month, while those of the third quarter formed 23·8 per cent., of the second, 19·7, and of the first 39·7 per cent. The fourth quarter of 1878, 3·73, $5,013 941. The fourth quarter of 1879, 4 17, $4,923,367. It is here shown that the failures in the last quarter of 1878 were increased in number and amount over the three months ending September. This year (1879), on the contrary, they are 7 per cent. less."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I consider that is good evidence; and that for the last quarter of 1879 the improvement has been very rapid and positive. I believe that journal to be a good, reliable authority. Under the date of the 12th March, 1880, we have in it these remarks in an editorial, which I wish to read because the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) stated that the transactions of the pork-packers had not been satisfactory under the new policy, that is, for the city of Hamilton, at least, where ruin and decay had been so prevalent, and where we were told so many houses were empty. It is, at all events, agreeable to me, if not to hon. gentlemen opposite, that we have such a record as this journal gives, in relation to that particular industry :

"There are three good-sized pork packing houses in Hamilton, and, according to the Spectator, their proprietors are as one in declaring that the new Tariff has helped their trade. Mr. F. W. Fearman, who has been many years in the provision business in an extensive way, has between thirty and forty hands employed, and expects to handle 12,000 hogs this season, says that under the old Tariff, American dealers were able to rush their surplus stocks into Canada and this had a very bad effect on the trade. At present there is a very good prospect, since the Americans have been shut out. Mr. Thos. Lawry has a staff of twenty-eight men, and a heavy stock of hogs, having already handled some 6,000 of an average weight of 250lb., and expecting to turn out 2,000 tinnets of lard. He sends goods all over west Ontario and to Manitoba as well, two car loads being bound for Winnipeg this week. The Argyle packing house of Mr. John Campbell, exports goods, such as hams, side and roll bacon, and mess pork, to the West Indies and to Scotland. The bulk of its business is done in Canada, however, and the proprietor expects to do a very much heavier business this year than last, the duty enabling packers in this country to work to greater advantage."

So much for the Monetary Times. We shall now see what the Journal of Commerce, a journal also unfriendly to the Conservative Government says. It says, on the trade of Canada, under date of December 31st, 1879:

"The close of the year finds the general markets in a healthful and promising state. Surely there is no branch of trade but has found a better harvest than could have been expected in midsummer even if hoped for, and probably there is no line of industry, taken as a whole, but can look back upon this as at least a less unsatisfactory year than its predecessor. Nor is it necessary that the retrospect should be pictured entirely from a negative standpoint. There are positive occasions for trade congratulations, and these are neither few in number nor doubtful as to title. During the latter half of the year fortunes have been made in several departments, of legitimate industry, notably in hardware and provisions. In groceries, in leather and its manufactures, in furs, in oils, in chemicals, in coal, a good and profitable business has been done, and even in dry goods a general average would we think declare the year a satisfactory one. The shipping trade has been excellent, steady engagement of all tonnage offering at good paying rates from shortly after the opening of navigation to its very close. Farmers have been especially favoured with the double boon of good crops and high prices, and the outflow of their prosperity has percolated through our whole commercial system, infusing new life into every artery."

A revival was not unexpected to us, however, but was to hon. gentlemen opposite. I trust that, before another year passes, we shall be able to convince even them on the point. We have heard a good deal about the disadvantages of a Protective Tariff, and of the ruin and decay that must inevitably follow its introduction. I will now give a picture that I am sorry to have to exhibit, for it affects a country we all love—the land of our fathers—taken from an article in the Journal of Commerce on the cotton industry in England, the centre and heart of Free-trade :

“Accounts from Manchester give a gloomy description of the condition of affairs in that great centre of the cotton industry. Within a radius of thirty-five miles from Manchester is found the most densely populated district in Great Britain, taking in Liverpool, Leeds, Sheffield, Stockport, Oldham, Wigan, Blackburn, Bradford, and other important cities and towns. This district now suffers more severely than others in proportion to the denseness of its population and the greatly diminished demand for labour in all departments of trade. The stranger who walks through Manchester to-day finds there many silent mills, long rows of empty houses, and throngs of idle workmen. In and about the city there are clustered 2,000 cotton mills, employing from 50 to 2,500 operatives each. The Haworths Mill, of Salford, the largest in Great Britain, and employing about 2,500 hands, is running from four and a half to five days a week. One manufacturer states that he has not made 1 per cent. on his capital during the last year ; another manufacturer, employing but fifty hands, is losing $250 per week, but would lose $275 per week if he should stop altogether. A report has recently been prepared by the American Consul at Manchester, which sets down the year 1878 as a year of unprecedented depression in the cotton manufactures, but during 1879 the same causes have been at work in an intensified form ; and the condition is still worse. The high price of cotton, the low price of manufactured goods, the small demand for cotton goods in England, the smaller foreign orders, close competition, and the prevailing uncertainty of affairs are among the causes to which he attributes the present unrest and gloom. Good observers do not see any reason for anticipating improvement.”

Dr. John Watts, author of the article on cotton in the New Encyclopedia, is quoted as having said lately :

“I see no possibility for a revival of the cotton trade in the near future. The only circumstance that can aid the manufacturer is an increased demand for manufactured goods ; and where are your orders to come from ? I see very well the causes of the revival in the iron trade. Many cities are just at present building tramways on a large scale, and they consume large quantities of iron. Large orders are coming over from America, both from the United States and Canada, but where are orders for cotton goods to come from ? The recent famines in China and India have closed those markets almost entirely. The Protective policies of Germany and the United States drive away all foreign goods in the cotton line ; the great failure of the harvest in England has diminished to an alarming extent the home demand, and the same is true in regard to France. The notion that the present depression is a fugitive one is false. Only by a change of national and individual policy can matters be bettered. The rise of the cotton trade must be very slow, and it will follow far behind the advance in the other trades. A return to prosperity in general will of course bring up the cotton trade, but a long time must elapse before that is brought about.”

Even in good old England where, if Free-trade has any merit, it should be a panacea for the country's troubles, and where they have had such experience of it, and such skill in all the arts and industries, it is felt there can be no relief except in a change of policy ; and because we here are adopting a new policy to try and build up our young industries, we are charged with pursuing a foolish, if not a dishonest, course. Hon. gentlemen opposite can see that even a great or wealthy country like Free-trade England can suffer in such trying times as the present. Let us now turn to the cotton trade of Canada, and see what the Journal of Commerce says about it :

“The Montreal (Valleyfield) Company, which has been in existence about three years, paid its first dividend, six per cent., recently. The Canada Cotton Company (Cornwall) has been running some six years and has never paid a dividend. It began with a capital of $250,000, which was subsequently extended to $525,000. The bonds of the company, secured by mortgage on the property, were lately renewed for five years, and the stock has recently been sold as low as 12½ and even 10 per cent. The company has been making money during the past six months for the first time, and as one of the principle shareholders is now devoting his exclusive attention to the business, it may possibly, ere long, show better results. The Dundas Cotton Company, although not the least successful of our industries, have never paid more than 8 per cent. The Lybster has not exceeded 8 per cent. and has more than once been compelled to pass a dividend.

Why could not these factories have paid their first dividend some years ago, when hon. gentlemen opposite had their much praised Tariff in operation ? Why should it be left to the operation of the present Tariff ? No new industry like it could then have yielded a fair dividend, and this was the first seen of a dividend for the Cornwall Cotton Company for six years. Another article from the same source says, under date of February 5th, 1880 :

“As the tide of time floats us on towards the season of activity, waifs of promise are discovered here and there, pointing to the realisation of current expectations. The hardware market, which has so long exhibited phenomenal strength, still leads the van, and again a higher notch is tallied in the scale of prices. The trade is buoyant and one might almost say presumptuous in its confident assurance of an active and profitable season; yet it must be admitted that the horizon is altogether free from cloud-like auguries of reactions. The dry goods trade now also gives a good report. The accounts from travellers are highly satisfactory. Spring goods are meeting with fair to eager demand, and we hear of orders coming in with a rush.”

We had reason to believe from hon. gentlemen opposite that the Dundas Company was rolling in wealth and making large profits through absence of competition; this establishment, amongst others, was described as charging high prices for its goods and accumulating wealth at the cost of the poorer classes. Yet, here we find, on the very best evidence, that it has never, at any time, paid more than 8 per cent.—not too much for capital invested in such an enterprise, with all its consequent risks. Every Canadian ought to be glad to know the country's industries are prosperous. Men should not, as hon. gentlemen opposite have, try to sow distrust among the people and make them feel discontented and unhappy with their country. I could furnish other quotations to establish the view that times were improving, were it necessary. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), in a tiresome, two hours' speech, the other evening, strove to prove that evil resulted from our Tariff policy upon the trade with Great Britain. As I should have regretted such result, I looked into the matter to see if he was correct; and I am glad to learn from the public records, and not from a scrap-book, such as the hon. gentleman used on that occasion, that his conclusions were unfounded. I would advise the hon. gentleman not to attempt to pass off upon the members of this House items from a scrap-book, made up of clippings from the Globe, Hamilton Times, and such like bad authorities, as reliable information. I find by the public Statistics that the total imports from Great Britain for the last six months ending December 31st, 1878, while the late Government was in power, reached $16,768,776; the duty collected, $2,835,378, being an average of 17 per cent. on the total imports. From the United States, in the same period, our imports were $21,411,150; total duty collected, $2,624,284, or not quite an average of 12¼ per cent., a difference of no less than 4¾ per cent. in favour of the United States as against Great Britain. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) said on this subject, that the new Tariff showed no less a difference than 4 per cent. against Great Britain, while the Tariff of the late Administration gave her an advantage of 2 per cent. I should have much regret at any such result; but I find one wholly different: instead of 4 per cent. against her, the difference is now more nearly in her favour, as, I think, can be shown from the imports of the last six months ending December 31, 1879. The total imports from Great Britain at said date amounted to $15,514,358. The duty collected was $3,014,487, or a duty averaging 19½ per cent., or an increase over the old Tariff of 2½ per cent. The total imports from the United States for the same period were $14,331,918; the amount of duty collected, $2,247,436, an average rate of duty of 15¾ per cent., or increase of 3½ per cent., as against an increase of 2½ per cent. upon imports from Great Britain. These returns show there has been under the new Tariff an increase of only 2½ per cent. over the old Tariff of the late Administration on British imports, and of 3½ per cent. on American, an improvement in favour of imports from Great Britain of 1 per cent. These figures are correct, and can be verified by any hon. gentleman who will take the trouble to verify them, as I have done. I find these are the correct results and I have nothing to be ashamed of in supporting a policy that produces such a record. I find that, while the general trade has been developing, we have made improvement in other directions. Under the late Administration there was admitted from the United States during the last half year of 1878 no less than $9,600,000 worth of goods free of duty; for the same period only $4,771,281 worth came in from Great Britain free, or just about one-half. What has been the result under the new Tariff? I am happy to point to the results in that direction, because I felt that our trade with Great Britain was being hampered by the course of the late Government in admitting so many American goods into our market without raising any revenue out of them, while, at the same time, a very small quantity was admitted from Great Britain free. During the last six months of 1878, under the Mackenzie Administration, free goods from Great Britain amounted to only $2,287,100, against $9,662,354 from the United States. Now, under the new Tariff, for six months ending December 31st, 1879, free goods from Great Britain amounted to $3,020,696, and the free goods from the United States for same time had diminished to $4,771,281. I hope, therefore, that we have heard the last from those hon. gentlemen of the pretension that this policy has been discriminating against Great Britain. I consider it has been legislation in the right direction; and when the Americans are prepared to deal fairly with us it will be time to consider whether we shall allow free goods to come in to any greater extent from that country. I am in favour of taxing every article that they impose a duty upon going into their country from this. We are justified in protecting the manufactures and commerce of Canada, with her long frontier and comparatively feeble resources. I am satisfied that after a few years hon. gentlemen opposite will be compelled to acknowledge that Sir Samuel L. Tilley has done a great work for his country in introducing this Tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite acknowledge that business has begun to improve, but they deny it is attributable to the Tariff, and say that better times would have come in any case. Well, Mr. Speaker, if it is desirable that we should have better times it is the duty and the interest of the country to keep those men at the head of affairs who have the good fortune to fall in with good times. From 1867 to 1873 we had prosperous times, a rapid growth, and bright prospects in the country; but since that day, until the year 1879, it has been a period of reverses, gloom, financial and industrial depression. The hon. gentlemen now at the head of affairs are ridiculed, but the memory of the hon. the Finance Minister will endure when the hon. gentlemen opposite shall have been forgotten.

Mr. COCKBURN (Muskoka): I do not propose to trouble the House with many remarks, but I hope that what I say will be at least governed by common sense and not the mere drivelling style that I have heard from many hon. gentlemen. I like to hear the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite when they confine themselves to the point under discussion. I apprehend that it is tolerably clear from this discussion that we will have to agree to disagree; at the same time the debates on this subject may be fraught with good for the future. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend that we have now got back to the prosperous times that we had previous to 1874, and they claim that the National Policy has been a large factor in producing this result. Now, let us reason the matter. I am willing to confess that there is a better appearance. One of the chief causes, in my opinion, of this improvement was the rise last year in the price of wheat. What is the cause of the rise of wheat and farm produce generally? It was owing to the higher price in Britain, resulting from the failure of the crops there. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House mentioned that there was an increase in the price of butter, cheese, and some other articles, and he claimed that that was due to the National Policy. But we know the National Policy has had nothing to do with it, and it is puerile for him to stand up here and insult the intelligence of the House by repeating the old womanish stories of 1878. I am sure the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury Benches do not believe a word of it, although it comes from one of their thick and thin supporters. It is perfectly clear this is due entirely to other causes. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has spoken of the price of lumber being advanced. There is no doubt that the export trade to the United States has been stimulated a good deal. But I have letters here from most reliable men, showing that the price of lumber has not materially advanced in our local market, while the sales are duller than they have been during the past twelve years. But even were the Canadian markets more buoyant, I would not accredit that improvement to the National Policy, but to the stimulated export trade with the United States, which would naturally relieve our own market. In reference to the numerous statements, pro and con, which have been made in reference to the effect of the National Policy, it may have started up some small industries throughout the country, but at the same time it has extinguished others. In order to show that a great deal of trash is spoken, and a great many unreliable statements made in reference to the effect of this Tariff, I may say that a circular has been sent around by a crockery firm in this city, declaring that the National Policy has resulted in the establishment of a pottery in St. John, while, as a matter of fact, that pottery was established in 1874. The hon. the Minister of Finance seemed to glory in the falling off of our imports. I think the falling off in our imports is the reverse of a sign of national prosperity—because, if we have no imports, our producers will have to pay double freight for the transportation of their produce to market. A great many supporters of the National Policy always refer with mingled pride and satisfaction to the starting of a sugar refinery in Montreal. It is a well-known fact that that sugar refinery might have gone on well enough under the previous Administration and made a fair margin. Sugar refiners, however, have been accustomed to make very large profits, and nothing but very large profits will satisfy their rapacity. I am willing to grant that the starting of that sugar refinery in Montreal has given employment to about 400 men, but it cost the people of Canada $4,000 for each man employed in that refinery. Sugar is said by hon. gentlemen to be no dearer now in this country than it is in the United States, and a fair proposition is that if sugar were imported free we would have sugar laid down at 3½c. and 3¾c. per pound. At the present time we pay $3,500,000 for the sugar we annually consume, while only $2,000,000 goes into the Treasury, and the balance of $1,500,000 more than we should pay goes into the pockets of the sugar refiners, who give in return employment to 400 men, at a cost to the Dominion of $4,000 per man. One of the principle arguments in favour of the National Policy at its inception was that it would tend to prevent people from leaving our country. Everyone knows how it has failed in that respect. I was speaking to a resident of this city the other day, and he said that if the people of Ottawa left the city as rapidly in the future as they had during the past twelve months, the city would soon be disenfranchised of one of its present members. When the last United States Census was taken in 1871, there were 500,000 Canadians in the Union who left Canada under the rule of the present gentlemen. But if emigration goes on from the Dominion at the rate it has been going on, I am afraid that by 1881 the Canadians in the United States will amount to 1,500,000. It is strange that all the great periods of an exodus from this country should be while Conservatives are in power. I do not say this is altogether the fault of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, but we must take things as we find them, and there are a large number of Canadians settling in the United States. Very little credit can be given to the National Policy for what it has done. It is perfectly absurd for some hon. gentlemen to get up and make the statements which they have addressed to the House. In doing so they have merely wasted the time of the House. My intention was to offer to the House a few common-sense propositions, which I thought could not be gained, and I trust I have done so.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved, That when this House adjourns on Wednesday next, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 30th March inst.—(Sir Samuel L. Tilley.)

LAW AND TRANSLATION—AMALGAMATION OF PARLIAMENTARY DEPARTMENTS.

COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to act with a Committee to be appointed by the Senate to consider whether it would not be attended with economy and advantage to the Public Service, if the Law Department of each House and that of Translation, were respectively amalgamated; and that such Committee do consist of Messrs. McDonald (Pictou), Langevin, Mills, Kirkpatrick, Anglin, White (Cardwell), and Tasse.—(Mr. McDonald, Pictou.)

RIVIERE DU LOUP BRANCH PURCHASE CONFIRMATION BILL.

(Sir Charles Tupper.)

FIRST READING.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER introduced a Bill (No 81) To confirm the purchase by the Dominion of a portion of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the agreement made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada with respect thereto.

MR. ANGLIN: If this Bill is to confirm a bargain or sale, and to ratify a money transaction already authorised by Parliament, it is unnecessary; but if the Bill relates to the expenditure of money not so authorised, it ought to be introduced by resolutions.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: The Bill itself was introduced by resolution last year in the usual way. Parliament gave its consent to those resolutions and voted the money, and the money has been expended in conformity with the vote, and this is simply to confirm the action thus taken. It is not in relation to an application for money already expended, but is for the purpose of confirming a transaction done under the authority of an Act of Parliament.

MR. ANGLIN: Why is any confirmation required? If the Act of Parliament gives full authority, no other Act is required. It must be because the hon. gentleman feels that he has done something not so authorised that he introduces this Bill. The very fact of asking for the confirmation, implies that he has incurred some obligation which the previous Act did not warrant.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: Strictly speaking, there is no necessity for this Bill. But inasmuch as ten or twenty years hence some question might possibly be raised on the part of some shareholders connected with the Grand Trunk Railway, it was thought judicious to have the Act ratified after its conclusion. If the hon. gentleman, on the second reading of the Bill, thinks that it is not required or is not wise, it will be competent for him to raise his objections.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH: I doubt very much whether the Act of last Session authorises all that has been done.

MR. MILLS: The House cannot go behind the propositions the hon. gentleman submits for its consideration. He evidently proposes to deal with something that has not already been sufficiently dealt with by this Parliament, and I think we are bound to conclude that this is a matter that requires to be introduced by resolution. If the hon. gentleman's statement turns out, when the Bill comes before Parliament in proper form, to be well founded, then it may be a reason for not proceeding with the Bill, but the House cannot assume there is no reason for proceeding with the measure as a ground why the hon. gentleman should depart from the usual practice in its introduction.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It would perhaps be as well for the hon. gentleman to see the Bill before he undertakes to criticise it. If it is found that it is open to criticism, he will be better able to make it by raising an imaginary ground of objection. I think it will puzzle hon. gentlemen to lay their hands upon any precedent whatever for introducing resolutions a second time after resolutions have been already introduced, a Bill founded upon them, and the money voted and expended by the Government in conformity with an Act of Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hon. gentlemen will also search in vain for the precedent of a Minister introducing a Bill to do something that has already been done. Either this Bill means something more than the resolutions and Bill already passed, or it is unnecessary.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not see any objection to the introduction of the Bill. As it is only to confirm an agreement made by Act of Parliament last year, I do not think it necessary to ask for resolutions.

Bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—ALBERTON, P.E.I., SUB-COLLECTORSHIP.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. YEO: A few nights ago the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries brought a charge against me of having presented the resignation of Mr. J. F. White, sub-collector of the port of Alberton, Prince Edward Island, to the Deputy Minister of Customs, telling him at the same time to make a note of the fact, but that I intended to keep it in my own possession until after the election, when, if Mr. White was successful, I would give the resignation to the Deputy, but, if he was not successful, I would return it to Mr. White. This I emphatically denied at the time, and the next morning I went to see the Deputy, and asked him if he had ever seen me in his office on such an errand. He replied that he did not remember. I then asked him if he ever saw me in his office at all with letters or documents of any kind. He repeated that he had no recollection of ever seeing me there. I then asked him if he would give me a letter stating that he had not seen me in his office with Mr. White's resignation. He said: "I cannot well do that, as I have a dim recollection of two gentlemen coming into my office with a resignation." "That," I said, "might be true, but, as you know me very well, why did you connect my name with the matter?" His reply was that he could not keep these things in his head; he told the hon. Minister at the time of two gentlemen calling upon him with the resignation, but what he said he did not now recollect. I told him that the matter was very important to me, and that I would give him a day to think it over and make enquiries, and would expect a decisive answer from him at the end of that time. I got no answer, and I then wrote him the following letter, which I will read to the House:

"The Minister of Customs stated in the House last night, that last year I called upon you, stating that I had a letter from Mr. James F. White tendering his resignation as Sub-Collector at Alberton, Prince Edward Island; that I showed it to you; that I told you to remember that I had presented it, but that I declined to leave it with you. Now, as I did not call upon you last year for this or any other purpose, as I never was in your office, nor had I any conversation with you, I call upon you as an honourable man to give an explicit denial to what I cannot otherwise characterise in every particular as a malicious falsehood."

To this letter I received the following reply:—

"I beg to acknowledge receipt of your note of 2nd instant, respecting the alleged resignation of Mr. James F. White, and to say that your concluding remarks make it impossible for me to enter into the matter in reply. I have, however, written Mr. Bowell and sent him your note, and I presume it will be allowed to rest there as far as I am concerned."

I then wrote to Mr. James F. White, asking him if he had ever sent me his resignation, or had ever written to me in Ottawa on that or any other subject. I will read to the House an extract from that letter:

"In answer to yours of the 2nd instant, in which you say, in a recent discussion in the House of Commons, regarding dismissals of officials on this Island, Mr. Pope brought up my name, and said: 'At the time I was running my election, I sent my resignation as Collector of Customs at Alberton to you, and wished you to show it merely to the Deputy-Minister of Customs, and hold it till after the election, and if not elected to return it (the resignation) to me.' I have to say I am very much surprised to hear that Mr. Pope made such an assertion, for although opposed as I am to Mr. Pope in politics, I had too much respect for him, personally, to think he could make a statement so utterly at variance with truth. I never, directly or indirectly, sent or caused to be sent my resignation to you, for any purpose whatever, and think Mr. Pope must have been imposed upon by some of his very unscrupulous followers."

WELLAND CANAL—OPENING OF NAVIGATION.

QUESTION.

MR. MACKENZIE: I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, if he would answer a question without previous notice. I have received a number of very urgent communications within the last few days, respecting the opening of the Welland Canal. It is a matter of extreme importance. The ice in the lakes has about all disappeared, and navigation ought to open much earlier this year than usual, and the success to a great extent of the the year's operations down the St. Lawrence depend on that Canal being opened within a very few days if it could be done. I have observed a notice in the newspapers to the effect that it is not to be opened until May 1st, a date much later instead of earlier than usual. It would be a great calamity to the trade of the St. Lawrence if it should be found impossible to change that date. I have brought the matter before the hon. gentleman and the House with a view to obtain some expression of opinion, which I trust will relieve our merchants and seamen from the apprehension under which they at present labour. I have also received a number of communications about the accommodation at Montreal. From the basins at the mouth of the canals up to the large basin where the Government wharf is situated, the water is nineteen feet deep, and accommodation therefore can be had, for which charges of course will be made on a large number of sea-going vessels. I trust the hon. gentleman will make such arrangements as will enable shipping to take advantage of the accommodation to be obtained in those basins.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for putting the question he has, because it relates to a question of very great public interest and importance, and I am very glad to have an opportunity of stating to the House, and, through the press, to the country, the explanation that is required to be made in reference to the opening of the Welland Canal. Communications of the same urgent character as those referred to by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) have reached myself. I called upon Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer of the Department, to know what it was in my power to state in reference to this question. It was represented that a very great injury to the trade of the country would occur if we were not able to open the Welland Canal by the middle of April instead of May 1st. In some places it has been remarked that it would not be opened until a much later date. I regret extremely to find that it appears to be impossible to open the canals before May 1st. In explanation of that impossibility, Mr. Page says, that the contracts which were entered into by my hon. predecessor, in 1876, and which are still in force—I now refer to the contract with Messrs. Hunter, Murray and Cleveland at Port Colborne—expressly gives the contractors the right to keep the canal unwatered until the 26th day of April. And from the 26th of April, the time at which they are allowed to keep the canal unwatered, till the 1st of May, is required to remove the coffer dams. I have asked Mr. Page if we were bound under this contract not to allow the water to flow into the Welland canal till the 26th of April, and whether, seeing that the delay would cause a serious loss to the trade of the country, it would not be possible to take into consideration the question of rendering compensation, so as to compromise with the contractors for a violation of the contract to that extent, so that it might be possible to obtain the use of the canal before the 26th of April. He said that would not be practicable, because in the construction of the new works is involved the necessity of constructing a new bridge, to enable the Grand Trunk Railway to cross the canal; and, in order to obtain that, a diversion has been made, so as to have the bridge needed by the Grand Trunk Railway made at another part. The removal of the obstruction at Port Colborne would not accomplish that object, because the erection of the superstructure of the bridge required by the Grand Trunk Railway could not be begun until the 13th of April, and it could not be constructed before the 26th of April. Consequently, the first difficulty is the contract made with Messrs. Hunter, Cleveland and Company, giving them until the 26th of April before watering the canal; and, secondly, the bridge required by the Grand Trunk Railway, which could not be begun until the 13th of April. I regret exceedingly that these difficulties have occurred; but I am afraid there is no possibility of having the canal in operation before the 1st of May. I have called upon Mr. Page to make me a report in reference to these difficulties, and he is engaged on that now.

MR. MACKENZIE: And with reference to the Lachine.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: With reference to that, every facility will be given.

MR. MACKENZIE: Are the gates ready?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: It will be seen that it is inconvenient to answer off-hand questions relating to the details of the Engineering Department. I will ascertain and give the information at an early date.

MR. GAULT: I regret very much that there is no likelihood of the canal being opened before the 1st of May, because it will entail a very serious loss. I wish to impress upon the Government the necessity for trying by all means to make some compromise by way of pay as compensation to the contractors, so as to get the canal opened at an earlier date.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 31) To incorporate the St. Clair and Lake Erie Navigation Company.—(Mr. Stephenson.)

Bill (No. 47) Respecting the Great Western and Lake Shore Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Carlina.)

JORDAN BAY BREAKWATER, SHELBURNE COUNTY.

QUESTION.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to repair the Jordan Bay Breakwater, Shelburne county, during the coming season, and if so, what amount is to be expended upon this work.

MR. LANGEVIN: This matter is still under the consideration of the Government.

CAUGHNAWAGA FERRY BOAT—PIER AT LACHINE.

QUESTION.

MR. BERGERON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to build, during the coming season, a dam or pier at Lachine, with the object of preventing, as far as practicable, the ice-jam in that locality, and facilitating the passage of the ferry boat to Caughnawaga.

MR. LANGEVIN: The Government is giving due consideration to the subject, and will endeavour to provide the necessary means of meeting the difficulty.

WELLINGTON, GREY, AND BRUCE RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. GILLIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the current year, to extend the evening mail service by the Wellington, Grey, and Bruce Railway, to Paisley, Port Elgin and Southampton, which service is now enjoyed by the people of Walkerton, and has been so enjoyed by the inhabitants of that town and locality for years past.

MR. O'CONNOR: That matter is under the consideration of the Post Office Department at present.

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

QUESTION.

MR. KEELER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in the proposed issue of Dominion Notes, to provide that a proportion of such issue be in a fractional currency.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: There are at present something like $140,000 in circulation, and we have not yet decided how far we will extend that circulation. I doubt whether it will be extended materially beyond what it is at present. We may issue $20,000 additional, pending the receipt of silver coin ordered, in twenty-five, ten, and five cent pieces.

EASTERN TOWNSHIPS MINERALS.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to move for the appointment of a Committee to make enquiry as to our minerals in the Eastern Townships, and to cause pamphlets to be published in both languages, with a view to furnish fuller information as to the richness of our mines.

MR. POPE (Compton): It is not the intention of the Government to do so; we rely upon the report of the Geological Survey. Neither is it the intention of the Government to cause the pamphlets to be published as the mines are a matter entirely under the control and management of the Provincial Governments.

QUEEN'S, P. E. I.—BELLE CREEK HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. BRECKEN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision during the present Session for the improvement of the harbour of Belle Creek, in Queen's county, in the Province of Prince Edward Island.

MR. LANGEVIN: This matter is still under the consideration of the Government.

CANADIAN TOBACCO.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be published, in both languages, English and French, pamphlets giving information as to the best method to be adopted for the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, and as to the best manner of properly preparing it for consumption.

MR. BABY: It is the intention of the Government to give the best possible encouragement for the cultivation of Canadian tobacco.

CULTIVATION OF THE SOIL—PAMPHLETS ON.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause pamphlets to be published, in both languages, English and French, setting forth the best mode of cultivating the land for the raising of the various agricultural products in Canada, and giving information, also, as to the best quality of seed.

MR. POPE (Compton) : It is not the intention of the Government to do so ; the subject is one of great importance, both Local and Federal Governments being interested in it.

QUEEN'S, P.E.I.—RUSTICO HARBOUR ENTRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. BRECKEN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make any provision, during the present Session, for deepening and improving the entrance to Rustico Harbour, in Queen's county, in the Province of Prince Edward Island.

MR. LANGEVIN : The information the Government has in reference to this harbour is not sufficient to enable them to decide on this question. When an engineer goes in that direction, next summer, he will receive instructions to visit the locality in order to make a report thereon.

BRITISH COLUMBIA — CHARGES AGAINST B. W. PEARSE.

QUESTION.

MR. McINNES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send the Chief Architect to British Columbia to investigate the charges made last Session against Mr. B. W. Pearse, Local Engineer, respecting the British Columbia Penitentiary, Victoria Post Office, etc., and if so, when.

MR. LANGEVIN : Until quite recently I was not aware that there had been a discussion on this matter, and that charges had been made against this officer while I was away last Session. The matter is being investigated, and I hope to be able to have it submitted to the Privy Council on my own report without being obliged to send the Chief Architect to British Columbia.

MR. BOURBEAU.

MATANE WHARF.

QUESTION.

MR. FISET enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the completion of the unfinished portion of the wharf at Matane.

MR. LANGEVIN : The Government is not in a position to proceed to the completion of these works. Last spring two of the piers were injured by the high water, and it is necessary that we should see in the coming spring whether the water and the ice will produce like results before we can decide whether we shall proceed with these works or not.

AMERICAN RAILWAY DECOY AGENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. TASSE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt rigorous measures to prevent the practice now and every year carried on by a certain number of agents of American railways, for purposes of speculation, of decoying, in most cases by means of false representations, the inhabitants of our rural districts to go and work in American manufactories.

MR. LANGEVIN : The Government would be happy to find some means of overcoming this difficulty, but have failed to do so up to the present moment. We would be pleased if the hon. gentleman would indicate to the Government some mode of obviating it.

GOVERNMENT LANDS AT SOREL.

QUESTION.

MR. VANASSE enquired, First, whether the Government own lands and buildings within the limits of the town of Sorel, the extent of the said properties, and whether they have been constantly under lease since 1st July, 1867, and up to this date ; second, whether the Government is still the owner of certain islands in the River St. Lawrence, opposite Sorel, the name of the said islands, their extent, and whether they have been at all times under lease from the 1st July, 1867, up to this date ; third, whether the Government intend to sell all or any of the said properties.

MR. LANGEVIN : I must request the hon. member to substitute for this question a notice of motion calling for the production of this information in writing, as the supplying of it by word of mouth would be difficult, and would occupy too much time.

BAY ST. PAUL WHARF.

QUESTION.

MR. PERRAULT enquired, Whether the Government intend to construct, during the course of next season, or later, a wharf at the Bay St. Paul, in the county of Charlevoix, and to utilise for that purpose the pier which was there constructed.

MR. LANGEVIN : The Engineer has not yet made his report nor furnished his plans for this public work. If, however, I have been correctly informed as to the probable estimate for the construction, considerable modification must be made to allow of the Government considering the expediency of carrying this work into execution.

FISHERY AWARD—CLAIMS OF THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness) moved, That the House do now go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolutions :—

1. Resolved, That the sum of $5,500,000, paid by the Government of the United States to the Government of the United Kingdom, under the Fishery Award, was the ascertained amount of the excess in value of the privileges accorded under Articles 18 and 32 of the Washington Treaty to the citizens of the United States, over and above the privileges accorded by Articles 19 and 21 of said Treaty, to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty.

2. Resolved, That the privileges so accorded to the citizens of the United States, consist in the "liberty to them in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea coast and shores, and in bays, harbours, and creeks of the Province of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, and of the several islands, thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish, provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with British fishermen, in the peaceable enjoyment of any part of the sea coast, in their occupancy for the same purpose." It being understood by the high contracting parties, that the said liberty applies solely to the sea-fishery.

3. Resolved, That the said privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States, were territorial rights belonging to the different Provinces to which the fisheries in which they were granted are adjacent respectively.

4. Resolved, That the disadvantages and injury suffered by reason of the granting of said privileges to the citizens of the United States are of a local nature, and are suffered by the inhabitants of the several Provinces upon whose coasts the said privileges are enjoyed.

5. Resolved, That the Government of the United Kingdom have apportioned and paid to the said Province of Newfoundland the sum of $1,000,000 as the estimated portion of the amount of said award to which the said Province was entitled, for such of the said privileges granted to the inhabitants of the United States, as are enjoyed by them on the coasts and sea shores of Newfoundland.

6. Resolved, That the balance of the amount of the said Award, namely, $4,490,882.94, has been handed over by the Government of the United Kingdom to the Government of Canada.

7. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this House that the said other Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, notwithstanding that they form a part of the Confederation of Canada, have each claims and rights to distributive shares of the said amount of said Award, according to the extent to which the said privileges were enjoyed on their respective sea coasts and shores, on the same principles on which the claims and rights of Newfoundland were recognised—and that the said claims and rights of the said other Provinces have not been impaired by the fact that they form a portion of said Confederation.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : I wish the hon. gentleman would let this matter stand. Certain returns have been asked for which are really indispensable to the discussion of the subject.

MR. MACDONNELL : I am sorry that I cannot accede to the request of the hon. member. I recall to mind the treatment I received at the hands of the Government during the last Session, in reference to a Bill I introduced. I was requested then to allow the matter to stand from time to time, until it was too late to take action, of which the Government afterwards took undue advantage and thus defeated the consideration of the Bill. I think the safest course to pursue now is to press the consideration of this question, particularly as this is the third time I have been asked to postpone it. The subject of these resolutions is one to which I would ask the earnest consideration and attention of the House. It is a question of vast importance beyond the mere question of the money involved. It is a question which deeply affects the political position and well-being of this Dominion. It is a question which has arisen out of the Confederation of British North America and which could not be foreseen at the time of Confederation. It is a question which greatly agitates the public mind of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and New Brunswick. The question of the division of the Fishery Award is one which intimately interests those Provinces, and has been before the House on various occasions. It was brought before the House last Session by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin). At that time, however, I was displeased with the manner in which that hon. gentleman treated the subject. I felt aggrieved, as a representative of Nova Scotia, so deeply interested in this subject, to find that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fortin) brought that subject before the House on a Saturday, when not one-fourth of the members of the House were in attendance—a non-Sessional day. I was sorry to find on that occasion, instead of the Treasury Benches being filled, only three or four Ministers were in their seats, and that the Government had treated this subject with very great indifference on that occasion, as on every other occasion when the subject was brought forward. It is known that the Local Government of Nova Scotia, over a year ago, made application to the Dominion Government for a portion of this money; that an Address of both Houses of that Province was sent to this Government for that purpose, and that up to this very day the Dominion Government has not deigned to reply to these applications. This question was not foreseen at Confederation; it has arisen out of the Union, but is not provided for by the terms of Union. It is said the whole Dominion owns the Fisheries. I say the Fisheries of the various Provinces are territorial rights; that the Fisheries of each are part and parcel of its public domain, and that, without Confederation, each would have received a portion of the Award. In proof of this position, I need only point out that Newfoundland has received a portion of this money. What are those Fishery rights? How have we them? Is it not by virtue of their adjacency to the various Provinces. Otherwise the Dominion would claim to have no rights in those Fishery waters. The jurisdiction, the property of each Province, extends three miles into the sea—or a cannon-shot, as defined of old. What does "Phillimore's International Law" say on the subject? It says:

"Though the open sea be thus incapable of being subject to the rights of property or jurisdiction, yet reason, practice and authority have firmly settled that a different rule is applicable to certain portions of the sea.

"And first, with respect to that portion of the sea which washes the coast of an independent State. Various claims have been made and various opinions pronounced, at different epochs of history, as to the extent which territorial property and jurisdiction may be extended. But the rule of law may be now considered as fully established—namely, that this absolute property and jurisdiction does not extend, unless by the specific provisions of a Treaty, or an unquestioned usage, beyond a marine league (being three miles) or the distance of a cannon shot from the shore at low tide."

This high, unquestioned authority settles that this property, within the three-mile limit, is an absolute territorial property. The property of Prince Edward Island, for example, includes not only the dry land, but that and three miles of the sea all round its headlands, besides its bays. The Crown holds the title of this property as against all foreign nations. The Crown, as we know, is a mere fictitious term in this respect; the Crown is a mere trustee, holding property in every Province for the benefit of its inhabitants respectively. Although the Crown has a right to make Treaties and alienate or give away those fishing grounds, if it receive any consideration therefor, it is applied for the particular benefit of the people immediately interested in it. The case of Newfoundland, for instance, receiving the $1,000,000, and indeed the Dominion receiving the balance. I take it as an axiom or principle which all will subscribe, that each of the several Provinces composing the Dominion, previous to Confederation, practically owned the fisheries adjacent to each, as well as the Crown Lands within its limits; that, while the patents or grants of the Crown lands were to be made out in the name of the Sovereign, the price of them inures to the benefit of the people of the colony interested; likewise, when there is a grant of fisheries, of what are a territorial property, enjoyed by the people of the Province by right of forming a portion of its domain, then those people have an equal right to receive the price or consideration for the transfer of that right, on the same principle as on the transfer of Crown lands, I presume no hon. gentleman will gainsay or combat this position. That was the position before Confederation. Is there anything in the terms of Union or Act of Confederation which has divested the Provinces of those rights and transferred them to the Dominion? No. The Act is as silent as regards territorial rights in those waters as it is respecting the rights to the Crown lands. There is nothing in the Union Act transferring to the Dominion those territorial rights. What does the Confederation Act say in reference to the fisheries? Simply that the Parliament of Canada shall have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation, among other subjects, to the sea coast and Inland Fisheries. [Vide sec. 91.] There is nothing in this or any other section transferring the rights in those Fisheries from the Provinces to the Dominion. One of the principles of Confederation was that each Province was to maintain its identity and its rights, in every respect, as they existed previous to Confederation, except in so far as they were curtailed by and transferred to the Dominion by the Act of Union. All contracts are construed strictly against the grantee. The grantee cannot take more than has been transferred to him. There is nothing in the compact of union giving the Fisheries to the Dominion. Therefore, if we find those rights belonged to the Provinces before Confederation, and I have shown they were not transferred, I ask, by what authority or act on the part of the several Provinces does the Government of the Dominion claim them. The Act of Confederation is not silent as to the specific interests given the Dominion in the various Provinces; and it is an old maxim that the inclusion of one thing is equal to the exclusion of others. If the powers of the Union Act has undertaken to specify distinctly what Provincial rights and properties are transferred to the Dominion, then all such not so specified continue the property of the several Provinces. Section 108 of the Act reads thus :

“The public works and property of each Province enumerated in the third schedule to this Act shall be the property of Canada.”

Our railways, penitentiaries, and other properties mentioned in the schedule, went to the Dominion; but it is silent in regard to the Fisheries, except as already mentioned. It has been argued that the Dominion has to protect them. I admit it for argument's sake, although there is nothing in the Confederation Act to that effect. If the Dominion does so, very well. There is nothing in that Act to compel it to do so. The Act throws on the Dominion Government the duty or obligation of making laws for the good government and conduct of our Fisheries; but there is nothing in it as to the manner in which or by whom those Fisheries shall be preserved. The Dominion Government is vested with the power of making laws regarding all our Fisheries, whether private or public, although the former are civil rights. I admit, for the sake of argument, that the Dominion is under obligation to protect the Fisheries. I ask if that obligation can be discharged by, instead of doing so, becoming a party to their alienation or transfer to a foreign power? It is most iniquitous, wrongful and unjust for the Dominion Government, if while under the obligation to protect our Fisheries, it consents to a sale of them for $5,500,000, and deprive the parties immediately interested in them, the practical owners of them, of the money which it pockets itself. It is said those rights belong to the Crown. So they do, but for the benefit of the people of the Provinces adjoining them. The Crown has undertaken to deal with them. It has already given to Newfoundland its share of the Award, and had we not Confederation, the British Government, acting for the Crown, would transfer to the several Provinces their proportion of the money as it has to Newfoundland. Owing to Confederation, the British Government has not communicated with the Local Governments. It communicates with them through the Government of the Dominion, and it has paid over to it the money for a proper distribution. The Dominion Government now occupies the position, in regard to this money and to the rights of the various Provinces, that the Imperial Government occupied towards those Provinces before Confederation. The Dominion holds this money to-day as a trustee for the several Provinces interested. Those Provinces have suffered a loss, whereas Ontario and British Columbia have suffered nothing, while Quebec has suffered very little. It is the people of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and a portion of Quebec, who have suffered, because they depended upon the Fisheries largely for their livelihood. Not only the fishermen were interested in this great industry, but the merchants, the manufacturers, and others who came into business relations with them. It may be said that those Provinces have suffered nothing, that it does not diminish the value of the Fisheries, to have the Americans fish in them. In answer to this, I have only to read an extract from a speech made by the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, one of those powerful speeches in which he advocated in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, the Union of the Provinces. In 1866, that hon. gentleman said :

“The time has passed when these Provinces would not have to contribute largely to the defences of the country. Either the fishing grounds, so valuable to us, must be given up without a struggle to the parties who have been accustomed in the neighbouring States to use them for years, or the cost of defending them must be largely thrown upon those Provinces.”

Now it cannot be said by that hon. gentleman that the Fisheries have not been injured, for here he says that they have to be protected, that without Confederation we would have to protect them ourselves. The British Government have been protecting our Fisheries for years by her cruisers, and why should that be if they were incapable of being injured by the Americans fishing in them? The best proof that these Fisheries were susceptible of being injured is the fact that it has been deemed necessary to protect them. I would ask what the Province of Ontario gave in consideration for those fisheries? We have thrown into this Confederation, apart from the Fisheries, in proportion to our population, as much as Ontario has. What have the Upper Provinces thrown into the Union as an offset to our Fisheries if they now claim a portion of the money? Ought we to lose our Fisheries by this Confederation, when Ontario has lost nothing by it? When the delegates of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island met together to form a Maritime Union, and were interrupted by the arrival among them of the Canadian delegates, if, on that occasion, the delegates from old Canada had proposed that under this Confederation our Fisheries were to be alienated, and the price thereof, five millions and a half dollars, was to go into the Dominion Treasury, I ask, if there was a man in the Maritime Provinces that would have consented to that Union? There would not have been an elector in the Maritime Provinces to raise his hand in favour of Confederation with such a proviso. Even the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals himself would have recoiled from such a proposition. Hon. gentlemen have made strenuous efforts to get Newfoundland to enter the Union. They have courted Newfoundland, as they courted the Maritime Provinces, to get her to come into the Union, but the way these provinces are treated now is small encouragement for her to come in. The Fisheries are the birthright of the people of those Provinces; they were the source of livelihood to many when the country was a wilderness; and I shall be much surprised if I find one hon. gentleman from the great and wealthy Province of Ontario who would be mean enough to say that that Province wants a part of the price of the sale of those Fisheries, that were almost the sole resource of the poor fishermen of Gaspé, the iron-bound coast of Southern Nova Scotia, and of Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island. I do not expect to find an hon. gentleman in this House to record a vote to perpetuate such an injustice. As to the protection of our Fisheries, I say in all gravity we do not wish our Fisheries protected in this manner. We do not want them protected by selling them to aliens and depriving us of their price. It would be better for us to have our Fisheries used in common by the people of the United States and ourselves, without any Protection whatever. Our Fisheries were protected before we entered into Confederation, and I feel satisfied that the British Government would protect them still. Her men-of-war might as well hover around our coasts to protect our Fisheries and keep her marines employed at sea as to lie idle in the docks. We have had many grievances under Confederation, and I must say that the result of it, so far, has proved very different from what I myself anticipated, and I was one of those who took an active part in carrying it into effect. This is not the only injury that we have suffered under Confederation. It is well known that when the Treaty of Washington was being negotiated, Nova Scotia was most anxious to secure the admission of her coal into the United States free. Our Fisheries were the only lever we had to get the Americans to admit our coal free. What do we find to-day? We find our Fisheries taken from us, and bartered away, and for what? In consideration of our getting access to their markets with our fish, markets already glutted with fish caught in our own waters. We find that for the last twelve months the exportation of our coal to the United States has decreased by 36,000 tons, by reason of the high duties which have been placed upon the manufactures of the United States, which have diminished trade between Nova Scotia and that country. I hope hon. gentlemen will take a just and equitable view of this question. It is said we have no legal right to this money. I do not think that, in considering the various public questions that arise between this Dominion and the various Provinces thereof, we are to be bound down by the cast-iron rules of law. I believe these questions must be settled according to the immutable laws of justice and equity as between the people of the various sections of this Dominion. It cannot be denied that we have an equitable right to a part of this money. I go further, I say we have a legal right also. Our several Provinces are still separate and distinct, and have the same rights as they had before Confederation, with the exception of those particular subjects that are specified in the Act of Union as coming within the purview of the Dominion Government. I do not blame the gentlemen who promoted the Act of Union for having no proviso in it relative to this matter. It is one which could not be foreseen. The delegates from the Maritime Provinces never had any idea that their Fisheries would be sold for this sum of money and that it would be appropriated by the Dominion. Had they any foreknowledge of that fact, they would have had a provision in the Act for giving the several Provinces the share to which they are entitled and now claim. I say again that I feel that this money has been placed in the hands of the Dominion Government as a trust; and if this Government and this House do not make a distribution of it as demanded, and admit the right of the Provinces interested, there is but one course left for them, and that is to appeal to the British Government. I believe the British Government should not have handed this money over to the Dominion Government without first knowing how it should be apportioned. The money did not belong to Great Britain. The British Government were the trustees of this money for the people having claims upon it. To-day the Government of the Dominion are the trustees for the same purpose, and I say that these Provinces will take this matter to the foot of the Throne, if necessary, in order to obtain justice.

MR. RICHEY: As the Government have intimated their intention of bringing down the papers, and I think it is desirable to have all information possible on such an important subject, I move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. FLYNN: I am very much surprised that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) should have made the motion before the House. I should have thought he would have been most anxious for the discussion of that question, considering the extent to which the county he represents is interested in the subject. This motion has been on the Notice Paper for several weeks, and on two occasions my hon. friend from Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) has consented to the postponement of the discussion. If the motion for the adjournment of the debate is carried, it is questionable whether we shall reach the subject again this Session. That being the case, I do not think I should be doing justice to the Province of Nova Scotia and the county I have the honour to represent, if I did not take this opportunity of stating my views upon the question. At the time of the adoption of the Washington Treaty, it was considered that we were not getting an equivalent for conceding to American citizens the right to participate in the inshore Fisheries of the Maritime Provinces. By the terms of that Treaty we obtained the right to participate in the American Fisheries and to have our fish admitted free of duty to the United States. I need not say to the House, at all events I need not say to hon. gentlemen representing the Maritime Provinces, of how little value the right to participate in the American Fisheries was to Canada. The only other concession guaranteed was the admission of our fish free of duty. I contend that this was not an advantage of very great moment to the people of the Maritime Provinces. The advantage, if there was any, was obtained by the people of the United States. They alone paid the duty, and they, as consumers, naturally secured the benefits arising from its remission. Consequently, it was contended, and very fairly, that not having received an equivalent for the right of permitting American citizens to participate in our inshore Fisheries, we should get some compensation. The matter was left to arbitration. The sum claimed was $12,000,000, and the Award made was $5,500,000. This Award proves conclusively the value of the right to participate in those inshore Fisheries. When we look to the number of American vessels engaged in this Fishery, to the amount of capital embarked in it, to the large towns built up in the eastern part of Maine and Massachusetts, largely by those who fished on our inshore waters during the Reciprocity Treaty that existed from 1854 to 1864, and afterwards, under the Washington Treaty, we can see that the Award was largely based on the benefits derived by American fishermen. An important element in the consideration of that Award was also the loss sustained by the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. It was contended that by conceding the right to American citizens to participate in our inshore Fisheries, they were enabled to compete with our fishermen in the American market, and by making the supply more abundant so cheapen the fish that were caught by our fishermen. If they did not fish in our waters our fishermen would supply the American markets. If it had not been for testimony to that effect the Award would not have been anything like what it was. In regard to the distribution of this Award, I believe that the people of the Maritime Provinces alone are entitled in equity and justice to it, because their interests alone are affected by the privileges given to American fishermen. The other portions of the Dominion do not feel in any way the effect of this privilege. Under the circumstances I do not hesitate to say that this money should be disposed of in such a way that the people of the Maritime Provinces and the fishermen will get the benefit of it. It is not for me to point out the mode in which it should be expended. There are a variety of ways in which the fishermen and the Province generally might be benefitted. We are in great need of breakwaters and harbour protection in my county, and in consequence of our not having these our fishermen sometimes can only fish three days out of the six. During the time I have been in this House, I have always felt that it is a very difficult matter to get even a small amount for harbour improvements in Nova Scotia. It has been stated that the sum of $40,000,000 has already been spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway; we have had to pay in the past our share of taxation for the construction of that gigantic work, and in the future this taxation will be largely increased by the National Policy, from which the people of the Maritime Provinces, and particularly the fishermen, can derive no possible benefit. On the contrary, that policy has been ruinous to them by increasing the cost of everything they use in their arduous avocation. I trust that hon. gentlemen representing the Maritime Provinces, no matter on which side of politics, will oppose this motion, and demand that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces be accorded their rights. I trust this motion will not carry, and that we will now have a fair and full discussion of this important question.

MR. KILLAM: I do not propose to detain the House with any lengthened remarks on this question, but I do think that at the present time we should receive some indication of the Government policy. This question has been before Parliament for nearly two years now, and it devolves upon the Government to deal with it at once. I suppose hon. gentlemen will tell us by-and-bye that they have a policy, and that it will be brought down in due time. I think we should be informed, and that without delay, whether it is the intention of the Government to divide this Fishery Award between the Maritime Provinces—we, whose interests were traded away, and who alone are affected by the Washington Treaty, as far as this Fishery Award is concerned—whether this money is to be used in such a manner as will promote the interests of our Fisheries generally, as suggested by the hon. member for Gaspé last year, or whether it is to be sunk in the Pacific Railway construction. The people of the Maritime Provinces believe that their interests will not be sufficiently protected, if such large amounts are to be spent in the construction of railways in the North-West and in British Columbia. They are quite content to have any legitimate amount spent in that direction; but when we find that it is almost impossible to get a sufficient sum to establish steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the main land, and that the policy of the Government is rather to destroy and break down railway communications already existing in the Lower Provinces, our people are rendered dissatisfied and discontented. All the papers of any interest are now before us in the correspondence laid on the Table of the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, and accessible to any members of this House. They only show that the Dominion Government has refused to answer the repeated applications of the Provincial Secretary, and I believe the excuse of the hon. the Minister of Finance is only to enable him to get clear of the matter for this Session. I trust this debate will not be adjourned; delay is altogether unnecessary, and the question of the disposal of the Fishery Award should be determined upon at once.

MR. DALY: I believe we are now discussing the question as to the adjournment of the debate, and not the merits of the proposed resolutions. It is not my intention to yield to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), or to any other hon. member, in my desire to obtain from the Government that justice which the fishermen deserve at their hands in connection with this question; and I believe the real friends of the fishermen sit on this side of the House. But when a member of the Government has asked that this discussion should be adjourned for the purpose of bringing down papers, I do think it most unwise of hon. gentlemen opposite to urge on the discussion at the present moment, when it cannot be as thorough and exhaustive as could be wished. I beg, therefore, to second the motion of my hon. colleague, in order that we may be able at a future time to discuss the subject more fully and satisfactorily and with better prospects of attaining the object we desire.

MR. ROBERTSON (Shelburne): As one of the representatives of the Province of Nova Scotia, I think it a great injustice that the motion moved and seconded by the two members for Halifax should be allowed to pass. The consideration of this subject has been adjourned before on two or three occasions, at the wish of the Government, and now every effort is being made to stifle discussion, and, if the motion is allowed to carry, we will not be likely to have the subject brought up again during this Session. I believe, with the rest of the members who have spoken on this side of the House, that we have a strong claim to a portion of the Fishery Award. There are very few of the representatives from the Maritime Provinces—even the supporters of the Government—who do not strongly agree with this view. For the last three or four months the question has been agitated in my Province. At the annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, held in Halifax the other day, this question was fully discussed by the merchants of that city, and it has also recently been brought before the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia. One of the reasons put forth why Nova Scotia claims a portion of this award is that, while the fisheries of some of the Provinces, including Nova Scotia, were sold to the Americans, the fisheries of other Provinces remain. The fisheries of British Columbia, the fisheries of Ontario, and the fisheries of the North-West, in the Hudson Bay, remain in the possession of this Dominion, and the only Provinces affected by the Fishery Award are the Maritime Provinces. If a share in this award is not granted to them, I do not hesitate to say that the Confederation is in danger. The strongest supporters of the Government are advocates of this amount being given to the Maritime Provinces. Correspondence has been going on through the whole year; and now, when the matter is before the House, it is attempted to put it off. I believe that, if this question goes over now, it is the last we shall hear of it, and very little of the Fishery Award will find its way into the coffers of the Maritime Provinces. I hope that this debate will go on, and that we shall have a full and free discussion of this question to-day.

MR. YEO: I do not see why this debate should be stopped. I do not think that we could have a better opportunity of discussing the question. I feel surprised that any hon. gentleman from the Maritime Provinces would, after the motion has been put off so often, try now to hinder its being discussed. I do not see what other papers than those before the House are required. I am satisfied that Prince Edward Island has a just claim to a very large share of the Fishery Award. It is well known that if it had not been for the exertions of the able counsel from the Island, and the valuable testimony of fishermen from that Province, showing the great value of the fishing round its coast, the Award would not have been nearly as large as it was. Newfoundland has now its share of the Award, which was given to it without question; and Prince Edward Island stands, in as good a position with respect to the Award, under the Washington Treaty, as that Province did. I do not see any reason why the Government of the Dominion should not pay the money over to the Island as the Imperial Government did to Newfoundland, without hesitation or delay, as they must know that in withholding from the Island a share of the Award they are keeping from it what is its just right. The people of Prince Edward Island feel deeply on this subject, and are determined to have their rights. If the Dominion Government will not do them justice, they will apply to the Imperial Government for a share of the compensation for the valuable property that has been taken from them. It cannot be said that the Island has slept on its rights in this matter. In 1878 the Provincial Government forwarded an able Minute of Council to the Secretary of State, in which were set forth the grounds of the Island's claim to a share of the Fishery Award. In 1879 a second memorial was sent, fortified by a joint resolution of both branches of the Provincial Legislature, insisting upon the same claim. No notice was taken of these applications until very recently, when the Committee of the Privy Council reported on the claim, giving the Island a point blank refusal. But neither the people nor the Government of the Island will accept this refusal as final. They will, as I before stated, go for justice to the foot of the Throne. Last year I asked for returns with respect to the Award, and was the only member from the Island who then pressed its claim for a share of the Fishery Award. The reply I received from the Government was not at all encouraging. They, in fact, did not appear to wish to have the question raised at all. At the last part of the Session a resolution was before the House, proposing that the Fishery compensation be expended in harbour and other improvements. This I altogether disapproved of, as the Dominion Government are bound by the terms of Confederation to look after these works and to protect the Fisheries. I looked upon this proposition as a device to keep the Province out of its just rights, and considered those Island members who supported it were not acting in the interest of the Province they represented. Prince Edward Island was induced to enter the Confederation by promises, the greater number of which have been broken. We were then assured by the leading advocates of Confederation that the Tariff would never exceed 15 per cent., but now on nearly all imported goods it is double that amount. But, although this Tariff is now felt to be oppressive by the people of the Island, and two of its representatives supporting the Government have admitted this, they still support the Government that imposes these very duties, and will vote for their continuance in office. They ask for a share of the Fishery Award to compensate the people of the Island for the injustice done them by the Tariff. But the two subjects have no connection with each other. The Island bases its claims to a share of the Fishery Award on just and reasonable grounds, and not as compensation for the injury which the oppressive Tariff that the hon. members for the Island and their leaders have imposed upon its inhabitants.

After Recess.

MR. YEO: If Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have anything like a case, the Island must have a far better one. Prince Edward Island was an independent Colony when the Washington Treaty was negotiated. The right hon. leader of the Government by that Treaty sold the Fisheries of the Island over the heads of its people, and now he refuses to give them any share of the money he received for them. Being very anxious to see the grounds upon which this act of gross injustice was perpetrated, I asked for the report of the Sub-Committee of the Privy Council. When, after some unaccountable delay, I received it, I was surprised to see that the Island had been refused what the vast majority of its inhabitants believed to be their undeniable right on a mere legal quirk. Because the Island joined the Confederation on the very day that the law enacted by the Congress of the United States confirming the Washington Treaty took effect, the Government of the Dominion consider that the Island has lost its right to any interest it then had to a share of the compensation to be awarded it for the loss of its Fisheries. The Island was a party to the Fishery provisions of the Washington Treaty. The consent of its Legislature was required to give effect to those provisions. That consent was given, and a law was enacted confirming that part of the Treaty. The Island had done its part, and it had no control over the action of the American Congress; it is therefore unjust that the mere accident of its appointing the 1st day of July, 1873 for the Treaty to go into effect, should deprive the Province of any right that it possessed before it entered the Confederation on that day. If the right hon. leader of the Government takes shelter under a technical point like this, which an honest man in his private dealings would scorn to resort to, he would do the people of Prince Edward Island a very great wrong. I did expect to see in the report of the Sub-Committee some reply to the arguments and representations contained in the Minutes of Council from the Island, and some opinion on the justice and reasonableness of the application of its Government, and I certainly did not expect to see in it what looks very much like a pretext to deprive the Island of what the framers of that report seemed to regard as its just right. For my own part, I do not believe that the Island ever gave up to the Dominion the rights which as an independent Province it possessed in its inshore Fisheries. The inshore Fisheries were always regarded as the property of the Colony, and the Imperial Government protected their rights from invasion from the fishermen of foreign nations. They were a source of wealth to the Colony, and afforded many of its inhabitants their only means of support. So fully was this right recognised that even the Imperial Government did not permit the Americans to use the inshore Fisheries of the Island without first gaining the consent of its Legislature. The Dominion Government is now acting with Prince Edward Island in a far more high-handed manner, and with less consideration for the rights of its inhabitants, than ever the Government of the Mother Country did. I wish it to be understood that the people of the Island do not wish their representatives to come to the Dominion Government begging for a share of the Fishery Award. They ask in this matter no favour from the Dominion Government. All that they want is justice. Neither do they ask for a share of the Fishery Award as a compensation for the injury done them by the Protective Tariff. That is quite another matter, and as soon as they have an opportunity they will call their representatives to account for the action they have taken with regard to it. What their opinion is with respect to the National Policy, and how they will treat those who have helped to impose it on the country, may be inferred from the altered tone of some hon. gentleman from the Island with regard to it.

MR. MUTTART: One would think, to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition from Prince Edward Island speak, that he is the only representative from that Province who is interested in the Fishery Award. He talked about servile followers, and he said a good deal about being the only one standing up for the rights of Prince Edward Island. This is one of those truths of his, like his denial of the transaction in connection with James White's resignation. I, for one, am particularly anxious to see this matter go to a vote, to see who is for and who is against a division of this Fishery Award. It has been insinuated by some of the hon. members of the Opposition that they would give us a share of this Award if they were in power. This I doubt. However, this has been said, I think by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr.

Robertson); at any rate something has been thrown out to that effect. I would, therefore, like to see a division taken upon this question, no matter what the result might be. There is no doubt the Island has a special claim over and above the other Provinces; and we are prepared to join hands in any undertaking to bring about a fair division of the Fishery Award. I hope that the hon. member for Prince, P. E. I., (Mr. Yeo) will confine himself to facts, and not take credit to himself above and beyond all others. He left last year before the Session broke up; and in this way he may not have been aware that other hon. members stood up for their rights on this question in this House. For my part, I do not intend to give up pressing our claims. We do not come in the capacity of beggars, hat in hand, asking for what does not belong to us; but we believe that the Maritime Provinces being the only sufferers, they should be remunerated in proportion to the loss sustained by them. Prince Edward Island's claim to a share of the Fishery Award have been already fully submitted for the consideration of the Government; and I trust that, although so far efforts in that direction have not been successful, we will yet obtain for our Province remuneration for the loss we have sustained in having our valuable Fisheries handed over to the Americans for a term of years. Acting on the principle that what was obtained from the Fisheries should be given back to the Provinces where those fisheries belong, it is hoped the Government may yet decide to give the interest, at least, of the amount so obtained to the several Maritime Provinces in proportion to their just claims.

MR. HACKETT: I would like to make a few remarks on this question. I have already addressed the House on a similar motion, but I think it my duty now to make a few remarks upon this important matter. When I last addressed the House I was not aware that a Committee of the Privy Council had decided that Prince Edward Island had no special claim to a portion of the Fishery Award. On that occasion I expressed myself strongly in the contention that Prince Edward Island should receive a special portion of the Fishery Award; and I based my argument on what was understood previous to our coming into the Confederation, and that our coming into Confederation by a mere accident should not prejudice our claim to a portion of this Award. Since then the papers have come down, and I see the reasons for objecting to this. With all due deference to the opinion of the hon. gentlemen who composed this Sub-Committee, I must say that they did not give that attention to the matter which its importance demanded. It is well-known that this particular clause of the Treaty was to be agreed to by the Parliament of Great Britain, the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, the Legislature of Prince Edward Island, and the Congress of the United States. The Commissioners said that on account of Prince Edward Island coming into Confederation on the 1st of July, she had no right to a portion of the Award. It is clear to me, however, that our claims should not be contingent on the legislation of any other country. The mere reason of the Island coming into Confederation on July 1, 1873, is no reason why its rights should be overlooked in this respect. I hope the Government will reconsider their decision, and will yet give the Island its just rights in this matter. I was a little surprised to hear my hon. colleague from Prince, P. E. I. (Mr. Yeo), state that he was the only member who had pressed this matter. He must have forgotten what passed at the last Session of Parliament, when he only made one small speech in support of this proposition. A motion for the distribution of the Award was made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), and I looked in vain in the Debates for a speech in rebuttal from the hon. gentleman for Prince county. If the House had agreed with the hon. member for Gaspé, the Award might have been distributed, and Prince Edward Island would have been left out in the cold. I believe it was the intention of the hon. gentleman to make this a party question; but it is not a party question. It affects the whole people of the Island without regard to party. We do not base our claim on the National Policy or anything of that kind. We think our claim is an equitable one, and we want it passed on its own merits. I trust the Government will come to the conclusion that Prince Edward Island is entitled to a fair proportion of the Award.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY : The hon. mover of the motion appears to be under the impression that the object of the Government is to postpone this matter indefinitely. I may say that the Government have no such desire. They think that this matter should be settled during the present Session. As I stated before, however, there are reasons why this debate should not have taken place to-day, and I am in favour of the motion of my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Richey) for the adjournment of the debate. The Government will be prepared to take up this matter at an early day.

MR. MACKENZIE : The hon. member has had the notice on the Paper for weeks, and he has been put off night after night. He is obliged to be absent from the House for awhile, and yet the hon. gentleman (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) is opposed to the debate proceeding, without assigning any reason whatever. The hon. the Finance Minister has not stated what papers he wants to have down. Now, the principle on which the Government must act must be perfectly well-known to Ministers, and I do not see any valid reason for postponing this matter.

MR. MACDONNELL (Inverness) : I was surprised to find that this discussion was desired to be adjourned, and I was more surprised to find that the hon. member for Halifax had the hardihood to rise and move the motion. It was not enough he should do so, but his colleague had to second the motion. If there is any constituency that is more interested in this matter than another, it is that of Halifax. It is the centre of the trade of Nova Scotia, and its population is largely interested in the Fisheries and the resolutions before the House. I can easily understand why the Government want to shirk this question. Their silence, ever since the money was paid, shows that they do not wish to grapple with it. But notwithstanding the dubious attitude of the Government, and all their ingenuity, the electors of the county of Halifax will not have the wool drawn over their eyes. They understand this question, and will refuse to be hoodwinked by their representative or the Government. The hon. members for Halifax are afraid to vote against the resolutions, but more afraid to vote against the Government. I listened with amazement to the remarks of the hon. member for King's, P.E.I., (Mr. Muttart) and for Prince (Mr. Hackett). The hon. gentleman whom they attacked (Mr. Yeo) is the body and soul of the representation of the tight little Island. He alone fights truly for its share of the Award money. He is a unit on the subject. His position is no ambiguous one. He is more than equal to all the other representatives from that Province together, who, instead of assisting him and standing together, shoulder to shoulder, to compel the Government to disgorge this money, they have pounced upon him with furious abuse. They never moved from their seats to speak on the subject, and were about to let the motion to adjourn pass sub silentio, till they were wakened up by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Yeo). It is an absurd and cowardly proposition for the Government to adjourn this debate. Three weeks have elapsed since I introduced the resolutions before the House. Three times did I postpone their consideration, at the request of the Government, who, ever since they received this money, have treated the applications of Nova Scotia for a share of it with silent and supreme contempt, instead of taking a manly and frank position, and, if opposed to the claim, not to shrink from announcing so. When the subject was before the House during last Session, there were but three of the twelve Ministers composing the Cabinet in their seats. The hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals did not deign to move out of his office and was not seen at all in the House that day. Sir, I awaited some action on the part of the Government on this important subject for over a year. I awaited this Session until it was well advanced and seeing that their policy was to shirk the question, I thought the time had come to bring it before the House, as I have done by the resolutions on the Table. I hoped that if the Government declined to bring the matter forward, some supporter of it, who had more influence with it than I have, would do so. I waited in vain, Sir. The people, the Government and the Legislature of Nova Scotia are looking with anxiety for a speedy decision in this matter, and I regret exceedingly that the Government and their supporters are playing a double and cowardly game. I believe I have done my duty in connection with this important question, and only wish that hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, would do theirs. I have brought the subject squarely before the House, and trust it will deal with it as becomes its dignity and honour.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I am a little surprised at the tone given this debate by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. In my experience in Parliament, I do not remember an occasion on which a member of a small minority, anxious to obtain favourable consideration for a measure in which he thought his constituents were interested, ever attempted the line of discussion pursued by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) to-night. We are now discussing a motion for the adjournment of the debate, and not the substantive proposition itself, and I do not intend until this motion is disposed of, to refer to the very important question in the resolution. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the very extraordinary position he has taken: when met by a proposal from a gentleman just as deeply interested in this question as himself, and representing constituents as deeply interested in it as those of the hon. member for Inverness, to adjourn the debate—and when informed that the Government were prepared to give it the fullest and fairest consideration, but wished a postponement of the discussion till they could lay on the Table certain papers that are believed to have an important bearing on the subject, the hon. gentleman instead of at once accepting the statement of Ministers, which is always accepted on such occasions, persists in his motion. What is the conclusion such a course suggests? That the hon. member for Inverness is not sincere, and only seeks an occasion to assault the Government, and place his own views in such a position of antagonism to hon. gentlemen on the Government side as to render it impossible for any suitable consideration to be given his proposition; that, in fact, his object is not to subserve the interests of the fishermen or the Maritime Provinces, but purely and simply to endeavour to obtain a little party advantage at the expense of the parties whose interests he has magnanimously taken under his charge.

MR. MACDONNELL.

That hon. gentleman says, most plaintively, that for years this matter has been allowed to rest. Let him say why, when a member of a party, possessing the Government and a large majority in this House, he sat dumb, not having a word to say in behalf of his constituents in relation to this question.

MR. MACDONNELL: Does the hon. gentleman say the money was paid by the United States during the time of the late Canadian Government?

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: If the hon. gentleman thinks he is going to escape by an insignificant quibble of that kind he is mistaken. I say the Fishery Award was met then, and there was every reason to suppose it would be paid.

MR. MACDONNELL: The matter was still in doubt.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No doubt that left the hon. gentleman quiescent when his advocacy of that claim would have given the late Government embarrassment, when he was giving zealous support to a Minister representing Nova Scotia and the city and county of Halifax. Why did he not then press that claim, if he thought it just? He says he is going to appeal to the Imperial Government; was it not the time to appeal before the money was paid over? He had no word to utter or question to put to the late Government on this subject, for fear of troubling it and its member from Halifax. The hon. member for Inverness did not then ask, would the money go into the Consolidated Fund, or be divided among the fishing interests in virtue of their special claims. He supported very quietly a Government that had as much power to deal with it as the present. He will have to speak longer and louder, and adopt a still more violent tone, in order to convince the most ignorant and benighted of his constituents that he is sincere at present or has any other object than raising a party issue and dealing with it from a party standpoint, in the manner best calculated to defeat that professed object. He mistakes the intelligence of the people and the House if he thinks he can, at this late hour, adopt this highly offensive tone—a tone calculated to damage beyond measure, the very question he deals with and the interests he pretends such anxiety to promote.

MR. ANGLIN: We must all be surprised at the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Railways on the alleged offensive tone of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell). The peculiar fashion and special faculty of that hon. Minister is to charge hon. gentlemen on this side with a want of sincerity, honesty, intelligence and courtesy—in fact with a want of all the qualities which gentlemen ought to possess. I cannot understand how the hon. member for Inverness, even if he desired it, could use this question for a party purpose, or with any view of embarrassing the Government any more than the Opposition. The assertion that that hon. gentleman should have made this motion in 1878, is, I think, utterly preposterous. The Award had been made, but the money was not paid over; and there was much room to doubt whether the United States Government would or would not pay it over. The United States Secretary of State had protested strongly against the Award to the British Government. Under those circumstances it would have been utterly improper for any hon. member of this Parliament to raise a question as to how this money should be appropriated, as it would have been improper on the part of any Government supporter to have assumed that the Government would not distribute that money justly, properly and fairly. What passed between the hon. member for Inverness and the late Government on this subject, is not known to any of us. If he had raised the question, he would have been acting within his duty, perhaps, as the representative of a fishing district; but he would not have been neglectful of his duty if he had hesitated to press that matter under those circumstances. Hon. members cannot be divided on this question by party lines. Hon. members from Prince Edward Island united in saying that that Province holds a peculiar position with reference to this money, having different claims from those of any other Province. Again, the hon. member for Inverness, in his able presentation of his case, raised an entirely new question—that of the territorial rights of the various Provinces. I believe that if before Confederation the various Provinces possessed, as he alleged, full territorial rights over the waters within three miles of their coasts, these waters remain still within provincial territory; and we have no more right to dispose of any of those rights than of any portion of the lands within any Province. But there is very strong reason to doubt that the waters on the shores of the Provinces were ever made a portion of their territory respectively. I think, notwithstanding the able argument of my hon. friend (Mr. MacDonnell), that the old Imperial doctrine was, that the provincial territory extended only to low-water mark, and that all beyond formed a part of the Province before Confederation. My impression is that the first provision as to the jurisdiction of Canada over our Coast Fisheries is found in the Confederation Act itself. I think it may be fairly presumed that this question has received the full consideration of the Government by this time. New Brunswick has also applied for a portion of the Fishery Award, as the price of her Fisheries, and so have Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. So the whole question must necessarily have engaged the attention of the Dominion Government more than once within the last year or two; and when we are asked to postpone the debate, because the Government are not prepared to take part in it, we are entitled to have a little further explanation before the debate is postponed. If Ministers are prepared to say that they have not yet made up their minds as to whether the Lower Provinces have or have not any claim, or to ask time to arrive at a conclusion, I will say they are entitled to it, and that the debate should be adjourned; but to ask us to adjourn a debate, which has been postponed time and again, in order that some papers may be brought down, of the value of which we know nothing, and which we cannot imagine to have any value, is asking too much of us at this time. I believe that, in all equity and justice this money, obtained as the price of our Fisheries, ought to be used for the benefit of the people living on our coasts, who make their living by fishing, and who, by the pursuit of their arduous and hazardous occupation, add so much to the wealth of the Dominion. I see nothing in the Estimates for the benefit of this class. While the Government are pouring out millions on the North-West and the Pacific coast, all the services in the Lower Provinces are absolutely starved, and especially those from which the fishermen would have derived advantage. Not a dollar is to be spent on the fishermen of New Brunswick, and scarcely anything on the Nova Scotians; though, thanks no doubt to the care of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, there will be some expenditure for the benefit of his Province, Quebec. I cannot see any evidence that the Government have come to the conclusion that the fishermen have any special claims on this fund, or on their consideration, by reason of the fact that this large amount of money has been paid for privileges which were practically enjoyed by the fishermen only, and for that which, if anything was taken away, was really taken from the fishermen.

MR. BRECKEN: I agree with a good deal of what has fallen from the hon. the Minister of Railways, with respect to the very extraordinary course which the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) has pursued in introducing this important subject. I did hope that the hon. members from the Lower Provinces, when they braced themselves up to meet this question, would forget party feeling and band together in such a way as to convince the Government that they really and truly believed in the justice and equity of the cause they were advocating. I was surprised and disappointed when such a fierce attack was made upon the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) for moving the adjournment of this debate. At once hon. members from the Maritime Provinces, whose interest it should be to strengthen our hands, pounced upon my hon. friend from Halifax, and charged him with having moved the adjournment of the debate for the purpose of indefinitely postponing the discussion of this question. Even the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I., (Mr. Yeo) charged his fellow-representatives with being servile followers of the Government, ready to do their bidding at the cost of the interest of their constituents on the Island, and that we were hollow-hearted in the advocacy of this cause. Charges of this nature, coming from the hon. member for Prince county, are not very disturbing. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) had not been on his feet five minutes, attributing most unfairly and unjustly partisan and unpatriotic motives to his fellow-workers, when I discovered he was describing his own case exactly. The hon. member for Prince, (Mr. Yeo) has been eloquent in describing his valorous conduct and great services to Prince Edward Island on this question. This is the first I have heard or known of the valuable services of that hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Inverness has undertaken to lecture my hon. colleagues who support the Government, and has attributed to them unmanly motives. If he wanted to destroy his case, and convince this House that he himself was acting the role of a partisan, he could not have taken a more effectual course. The hon. the Minister of Railways stated common prudence should have dictated to the hon. member for Inverness a different line of action. He, the member for Inverness, was a member of a small minority in this House, and while he pretended to base his case upon the broad principles of equity and justice, rather than on the strict rules of law; he, instead of appealing to the sense of justice of the Government before he had any evidence of insincerity, charges them with an attempt to prevent discussion on this vital question, and refuses to take the assurance of the hon. the Finance Minister that the Government in asking for a postponement, did so simply that documents now in course of preparation, which have reference to this subject, should be laid before the House, and that the Government had no desire to evade the discussion, but, on the contrary, were desirous that it should be debated this Session. For myself, I may say I would like to see the promised documents. I am familiar with the correspondence that has emanated from Prince Edward Island, and the answer of this Government thereto, but I am not familiar with the documents that have emanated from the other Provinces. Notwithstanding the taunts thrown out by the hon. members for Inverness and Prince, I intend to vote for the adjournment. I have sufficient confidence in the sincerity of the hon. Ministers of Finance and Railways when they tell this House that they are desirous of having this question disposed of this Session, and to take them at their word; and I tell the hon. member that if he really wants some substantial results to flow from the action he has taken in bringing in his resolutions, he had better be less violent in his attacks, and not jump at the conclusion that we are likely to see this discussion indefinitely postponed. I have already urged the special and peculiar claims of Prince Edward Island upon the consideration of this Government to a share of the Award; but as we are now speaking to the question of adjournment, and as there will be another opportunity, I will not detain the House at present, further than to urge a point that has not as yet been noticed. I would direct the attention of the House to the position of Newfoundland. It is urged by those who oppose the distribution of the Award among the fishing Provinces, that the fishing territory within the three-mile limit is a Dominion interest and not a provincial right. At present I do not express an opinion one way or the other, but even admitting that the authorities established the point that these Fisheries are Dominion and not territorial rights, still I contend that the fact of the Imperial Government with the consent of the Dominion, having apportioned $1,000,000 to Newfoundland, shows that the fishing interests bordering on that Province were considered practically as territorial and provincial property; and that by the rights conceded to the Americans under the Treaty, the Island of Newfoundland had suffered a loss to the amount paid her. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the position is a correct one that these Fisheries are not territorial rights, then, before Confederation, they would be considered Imperial. If so, why was not the $1,000,000 received by Newfoundland paid into the Imperial Treasury? I submit that the Dominion practically stands in the same relation to the different Provinces which compose the Dominion as the Imperial Government does towards Newfoundland. Of course this must be taken in a qualified sense, and is applicable to the settlement of this question. If the Mother Country treated the Fisheries of Newfoundland as a source of trade belonging to that Province, why should not Canada take the same view of it, and indemnify the Maritime Provinces out of the Award? Five millions and a-half has been declared to be the measure of benefit gained by the Americans for their advantages under the Treaty, and the amount of damages sustained by the Maritime Provinces under that compact. I submit that the inhabitants of Ontario and the Great North-West have no greater interest in our Fisheries than have the inhabitants of Great Britain in the fisheries of Newfoundland. The Dominion Government have stepped into the shoes of the Imperial Government. Newfoundland has been indemnified for her loss; why should not the Lower Provinces have the balance divided among them in proportion to the loss that they have sustained? The hon. member for Inverness has been very rash and imprudent in the manner in which he has approached this case this evening. I suspect he has been too anxious to make political capital at the expense of those interests which it is his duty to advocate. I hope that the Government will overlook the reckless conduct of my hon. friend, who has constituted himself the champion of the Lower Province men in fighting this battle, and that his blundering mismanagement will not injure our cause, and that his sins will not be visited upon the heads of unoffending members who are anxious to see justice done in the premises. I trust that the Government will re-consider their determination as affects Prince Edward Island, and will see substantial reason which will justify them in awarding that Province compensation for the loss she has sustained by the serious destruction of her Fisheries, a property which I submit practically belongs to her.

Motion made, and question proposed:

That the Debate be adjourned—(Mr. Ritchey.)

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 92) To prevent fraud in the manufacture and sale of agricultural fertilisers.—
(Mr. Landry.)

NEW BRUNSWICK — CATTLE TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury), in moving for an Address for copies of correspondence with the Government relative to subsidising a line of steamers to ply between St. John and Liverpool, for the purpose of promoting a trade in cattle and farm produce between the Province of New Brunswick and Great Britain, said: I regret that the Government will not allow the motion stand until the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. King), who had given the notice, could move it. I desire to say, in moving the resolution, that it is a subject exciting some interest in New Brunswick at the present time. At a recent meeting of the New Brunswick Agricultural Association, they passed resolutions to memorialise the Government to give a subsidy to a line of steamers from St. John to Great Britain in the interest of the exportation of agricultural productions, such as cattle, potatoes, hay, etc. Several of the county municipal councils have passed resolutions in the same direction, and the Municipal Council of the city of St. John have been moving in the same matter, and, I believe, presented a memorial to the Finance Minister, asking for a subsidy for the same object, on his recent visit to St. John. There is no line of steamers at present plying between St. John and Great Britain regularly, the want of which is being very much felt, especially for the exportation of the productions of the soil. Several cargoes of potatoes were shipped from that port to England last season in sailing vessels, but the length of the voyage and consequent delays which sailing vessels are subject to, act very prejudicially on the trade, and are a serious drawback to the development of that industry. A very large surplus of potatoes are produced, and could frequently, as was the case last season, be made a profitable article of exportation to England, if steam vessels were available from St. John to Great Britain. The fattening of beef cattle suitable for the English market is now receiving increasing attention by the farmers of the Province of New Brunswick, who would be greatly benefited; and no doubt an impetus would be given to that important branch of agriculture, if steam communication were to be had direct from St. John to Liverpool or other ports of Great Britain. If the Government would decide to give a moderate subsidy for the object stated, it would materially assist the maintenance of the much-needed communication. There was at one time a line of steamers which made regular trips to that port, and had been discontinued for want of sufficient business; and it may be said with some force that if the trade of St. John will not support a line of steamers, it is useless for the Government to attempt to do so by giving a subsidy. The trade at the port of St. John has no doubt fallen off the last few years, which is attributable to various causes and circumstances, not least of which is the location of the Intercolonial Railway on a route which had the tendency of turning the volume of traffic from the port of St. John, and which the hon. gentlemen, now occupying the Treasury Benches, are responsible for. Had the Intercolonial Railway been located by the Valley of St. John, steamers would no doubt have continued to do a profitable business, without a subsidy, from Liverpool to St. John, a consideration which should have some influence with the Government. I fear that I will have very little influence upon the Government in pressing this claim. It has become too apparent during the Session, and especially within the last few days that there is no disposition to hear any Opposition members on the grievances of their constituents. There appears to be an indifference shown to hon. members on this side of the House when advancing the interests of their constituents, but I must remind the Government and the hon. the Finance Minister that we have constituents behind us, whose interests we must represent, although the Government may turn a deaf ear, and treat us very cavalierly. Yet the time will come when the country will speak, and I hope that, in this instance, at least, where the constituents of the hon. the Finance Minister are so greatly concerned, the Government will give attention to the wants of St. John, and grant this subsidy to assist in the development of the agricultural interest of the Province of New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT BANK INSPECTION.

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN.

Order for Committee of the Whole to consider resolutions to amend the Banking Acts, so as to provide a system of compulsory inspection by Government Officers, read.

MR. ORTON: In consequence of the loose manner of the management of banks, and the exposures that have been made under recent failures, both in Canada and Great Britain, a widespread distrust has arisen, and a feeling that there is something wrong in our banking institutions. On that account I propose to put these resolutions on the Paper. It is not my intention to go into any long discussion of this question. It is one that deserves the fullest consideration on the part of this House, and of the Government in particular. The object of my motion is to draw the attention of the House and the Government to this important matter, so as to allay, if possible, feelings of distrust existing in this country. I hope the Government will give their serious consideration to this matter, and, as I understand they are introducing a Banking Bill, I will not push this motion any further, but will withdraw it.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE STEAMERS "GLENDO" AND "NORTHERN LIGHT."

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

SIR ALBERT J. SMITH, in moving for an Order of the House for a return showing the services performed by the steamer Glendon, since the 1st of January, 1879, to the present time, including the number of light-houses and fog-whistles supplied; with a statement of the time occupied in going to Sable Island and returning, in connection with the wreck of the steamship State of Virginia, with the number of persons brought from said Island, and the quantity of cargo; also, a return showing the services performed by the steamer Northern Light, since the 1st January, 1879, up to the present time, the number of trips made, together with the number of passengers and quantity of freight carried during that period, said: During the last Session, a very violent attack was made in regard to those steamers. I was not very much exercised on the subject, for I felt that time would rectify the wrong. There is no doubt that the Glendon was not adapted to the service for which she was originally intended; but it was stated that she was utterly worthless, and that the money expended on her was an absolute waste. I thought that was not the case, and that my hon. successor would bear me out in that opinion. I observe that he has done as I expected he would, continued the steamer in the service, and I think he has acted wisely. From the report this year, I find that the Glendon has been attending to the Halifax buoy service, and supplying light and fog whistles. I find that she was also sent to Sable Island to bring off the passengers of the State of Virginia, a large steamer that was wrecked there. I think that the steamer is doing good service, and that the money expended upon her was not wasted. With regard to the Northern Light, I think that the policy of the late Administration has been fully vindicated. The Prince Edward Island members spoke in the highest terms of her.

Motion agreed to.

YAMASKA RIVER NAVIGATION.

MOTION FOR ENGINEERS' REPORT.

MR. GIGAULT, in moving for an Order of the House for a copy of the report of the Engineer who surveyed the River Yamaska, in the year 1878, with a view to render it navigable, said: My object in giving this Notice of Motion was to draw the attention of the Government to the importance of the scheme for rendering the River Yamaska completely navigable. I am informed that in 1878, an engineer made a survey of this river at its mouth, and I am desirous that that survey should be continued as far as St. Césaire, in my county. The river is navigable throughout the greater part of its course. It is navigated every summer by steamboats from the St. Lawrence to St. Aimé. During some years three steamboats have passed from St. Césaire to St. Hyacinthe at different times, and have also gone as far as St. Pie, in the county of Bagot, by way of Black River, which falls into the Yamaska. If those undertakings did not succeed, the want of success was due to the fact that the boats could not run up the stream, in consequence of the rapids at St. Hyacinthe and St. Aimé, which are only a few arpents long. We are desirous that the Government should do away with these obstructions to navigation, by constructing locks or short canals alongside these rapids. The cost would be small, bearing in mind that this river from its mouth to St. Césaire is sixty or seventy miles long, and that the advantages resulting from these works to agriculture, trade and industry, in the counties of Rouville, St. Hyacinthe, Bagot, Richelieu and Yamaska, would be immense. A rich and fertile plain extends on each side of the Yamaska; on its banks are situated the important and populous city of St. Hyacinthe, and other localities remarkable for their trade and institutions. What we need is an easy, rapid and economical means of communication for the transport of our agricultural and other products, and that means the Yamaska will afford us if the Government will expend the amount necessary to make the river navigable throughout. Upwards of $8,000,000 have been expended by the Government in the interests of navigation upon the river St. Lawrence, and the way to render that expenditure more useful is to improve the navigation of the affluence to that great river; and the Yamaska is certainly one of the important tributaries of the St. Lawrence. There is therefore not only local interest connected with this work but public interest also. We are expending in the west large sums of money for the construction of the Pacific Railway, and other national undertakings, which will powerfully contribute to the development of our resources and the increase of our population, and thereby of our public revenue. I am far from being opposed to those public works, which are destined to place Canada in the position which it deserves to hold, but I would not have the Government neglect the interests of other parts of the country. The five counties through which that river runs contribute largely to the public revenue, and have received hardly anything for public works from the Federal Government. I therefore trust that the hon. the Minister of Public Works and his colleagues, animated, as I am sure they are, with the desire of doing justice to all parts of the Dominion, will take my request into favourable consideration, and will order a survey, so as to obtain an approximate idea of what the necessary outlay would be.

Mr. VANASSE: I do not desire to take up the time of the House uselessly, by speaking on the subject which the motion of my hon. friend has introduced. But in my position as a representative of one of the counties traversed by the Yamaska, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without reminding this House of the importance of the territory watered by this river, and also of the richness in an agricultural, industrial, and commercial point of view, of this section of the country. The River Yamaska flows out of Missisquoi Bay, and falls into the River St. Lawrence after passing through the counties of Rouville, St. Hyacinthe, Bagot, Richelieu and Yamaska. Its width almost throughout its entire length—which is nearly eighty miles—varies from 800 to 1,000 feet, and its depth from 4 to 10 feet at high water. The population on the river banks was estimated in 1871 to be more than 130,000 souls. In order to give the House a sketch of the resources of this portion of the country, I will venture to reproduce some figures taken from the official returns in the last Census. The superficial extent of the counties traversed by the Yamaska amounts to 1,170,198 square acres, of which more than 500,000 acres are under cultivation. In 1871, there was harvested in this territory 241,764 bushels of wheat, 1,656,076 bushels of oats, 347,786 bushels of peas, and more than 129,000 tons of hay. I pass over the yield, which is considerable, from the other cereals. The products of the workshops and manufactories established in these various counties rose, in 1871, above the value of $875,000. The River Yamaska again furnishes the means of transport of a considerable quantity of cordwood. There is, besides the trade in saw-logs, and that in hemlock-bark, the building of barges and lighters, of which I was unable to obtain any authentic returns. The proprietors of the rich iron mines of St. Pie de Deguire, in the county of Yamaska, export annually by means of this river more than $50,000 worth of minerals, while they export them to a considerably greater value by the River St. Francis. In 1857, several influential citizens of the counties of Yamaska and Richelieu, formed themselves into a partnership for the purpose of creating a Navigation Company, in order to develop trade in this part of the country. They had built for them a splendid steamboat, called the Yamaska. From the first year the returns from the manager's office of this company show that they succeeded in obtaining, during the season of navigation, receipts to the amount of over $10,000. In 1859 the receipts amounted to $12,137.80. Later on the powerful Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, discerning the importance of this commercial highway, purchased the property and rights of the Yamaska Company. They now maintain a regular line of steamboats between the town of Sorel and the village of St. Aimé, in order to assist the trade of the rich parishes of St. Michel, St. David, St. Pie de Deguire, St. Aimé, St. Guillaure, St. Bonaventure, and the others surrounding parishes. Such, in a few words, is the history of this part of the country, and a hasty sketch of the important trade which is annually carried on there. When I consider the fertility of the district, and the spirit of its industrial population, I do not hesitate to affirm, Mr. Speaker, that this trade would be a hundred times larger after the removal of the obstacles encountered in the navigation of this river during the months of July, August and September, in each year. It is for this reason that we ask the Government to come to our assistance, if such a thing is possible. This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that the present question has engaged the attention of the friends of agriculture, industry and commerce, in this section of the country. In the month of April, 1859, the Government of United Canada gave instructions to the Montreal Harbour Commissioners to have a survey made of the River Yamaska, and an estimate calculated of the amount required for its improvement. The engineer, Mr. Forsyth, made an examination. He states in his report that the desired improvement might be effected by dredging, costing the sum of $10,800. No action, however, was taken on the recommendations of this engineer. About 1860, the Trinity House of Montreal, also caused surveys to be made of this river, with no better result. Finally, in 1878, a short time before the last

General Elections, the hon. leader of the Opposition, then Minister of Public Works, ordered a third survey of the river, of which we have never heard a word. It is in order to get some information about it that my hon. friend has just made his motion. Well, we take up to-day, in our turn, the work of improvement so often commenced and so often interrupted by the badness of the times. We respectfully invite the Government to leave the great deserts of the west to the influence of the great impulse of progress, which has been given them to such a favouring extent, and pay attention to the fertile plains of the East. The River Yamaska is the natural channel of commerce of a fine and rich country. It represents a large amount of capital, which ought not longer to be left unproductive. It is really the duty of the skilful and practical men, who at the present moment manage public affairs, to labour to improve it gradually by dredging and a system of canals. Besides this, it is to be hoped that the Government will remember, when they are distributing the public funds, that the noble Yamaska river is the only one in this part of the country which has never yet been favoured by a grant from the Treasury for improvements, at once necessary and easy of execution. For all these reasons, on behalf of progress and of justice, I second with pleasure the motion of my hon. friend.

MR. LANGEVIN: The Government has no objection to the motion which has just been made. As to the works of which he speaks, a fresh examination must first be made before we can tell what amount it would be necessary to expend, and whether the Government would be in a position to request Parliament to vote it. The Government which preceded the present one had surveys made in order to ascertain whether the river could be made navigable in such a way as to be used in the exportation of the products of the five counties crossed by it. That policy must evidently be the policy of the present Government. Before coming to any decision, however, the nature of the work to be done must be ascertained. In any case the Government is well disposed to meet the views of hon. members in this respect and will promise to look into the matter during the recess following the present Session.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—DEPUTY INSPECTORS.

MOTION FOR REPORT PROPOSED.

MR. CASEY, in moving for an Order of the House for a copy of any report or memorandum made by the Chief Clerk of the Weights and Measures Branch of the Department of Inland Revenue, since 10th October, 1878, concerning the efficiency or standing of the Deputy Inspectors of Weights and Measures, said: This motion grows out of a former discussion on the subject of the dismissal of the late body of Inspectors of Weights and Measures. The question of the efficiency of these gentlemen was raised on that occasion and created a general impression that their inefficiency had something to do with the dismissal and retention respectively of those men. The contention of the Government was that the reason they did not keep as many of them as were required to fill the smaller number of positions created by the new law, was that they were not considered competent to fill those positions. I have been informed since that debate that the Government had in their possession, shortly after they came into office, a report made by the head of the Weights and Measures Branch of the Inland Revenue Department, as to the efficiency of every Inspector in the service, a report made after actual inspection of the different agencies. I ask for that in my motion. I was also told, on very good authority, that the Deputy Inspectors in the Province of Quebec received notice in May or June last that they would be required to pass an examination in ten days from the date of that notice, which examination, however, did not take place, although, I believe, the papers were prepared. Taking all this into consideration, it seems, to my mind, very probable that the Government did intend to carry out the idea suggested, and retain as many of the old Inspectors as were found fit to fill the smaller number of places under the new law, but the pressure of friends asking for places compelled them to turn out the whole batch and create a set of vacancies. I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister to a few discrepancies in his statements. On a former occasion the hon. Minister told us that there were 125 Inspectors under the old law, but it was shown at the time that there were only ninety-seven. He also stated there were only forty under the new Act; I have been told that there are sixty unemployed under the new Act. He also said that twelve of the old Inspectors were retained; now I have been informed that only six have been retained, namely, Drummond, of Cape Breton; Freize, Fredericton; Grégoire, Quebec; Young, Waterloo; Simard, Saguenay; and Pennoyer, Sherbrooke. Of course there may be others, and if so, the hon. Minister can give their names. The hon. Minister told us that those Inspectors all got six months' notice. Now, I know that the Inspector in my county did not? As I understand the matter, the only notice those officials got was given on June 12th, 1879, and was to the effect that their services would be dispensed with on the 1st July. The argument of centralisation could not have influenced the dismissal of one gentleman and the appointment of another in the city of Ottawa, for the Inspector who was dismissed lived in the city, and the new official came from Carleton Place. The Inspector at Hull, I understand, is mayor of the city, and his official duties would certainly incapacitate him from performing the duties of Inspector of Weights and Measures. He was also appointed by the Quebec Government as clerk of some Court.

MR. BABY: I would have a great deal of pleasure in responding to the motion of the hon. gentleman, but the report in question, being made by an officer of the Department to the Minister, is confidential, and ought not to be published. This question was ventilated before. I may state that the Department intends to call upon the Inspector and Assisant Inspectors to undergo the examination. The Board will meet next July for that purpose. There was, I admit, a little discrepancy as to the number of officers found in the Weights and Measures Branch and those appointed in their stead. There are about fifty-four to fifty-six Inspectors and Assistants instead of the number I stated before. I had left out the former.

MR. CASEY: I do not think I can agree with the hon. gentleman that the report should not be brought down because it is of a confidential nature. It was insinuated that those officers were dismissed on account of inefficiency. The report would clear up that question. It would, I admit, be improper to ask for the report if the officers were still in office; but I do not think the objection applies to men who have been dismissed. It would be as proper to bring it down as to bring down the papers about the dismissal of a postmaster or any other officer. The paper contains information to which the House is entitled.

MR. BABY: There are certain things in the report which it would be injudicious or distasteful to those connected with the service to publish. I have no objection to bring down the other papers.

MR. CASEY: There surely can be no more objection to bringing down the papers in regard to the whole of the beneficiaries than to one or two. It cannot be hurtful to their public usefulness; and, when there have been wholesale dismissals, it appears quite proper to ask for the proof of the case on which they have been justified. For justification it must be shown that the parties dismissed were less efficient than their successors. Of course if the hon. gentleman persists in his objection to bring down the report, there is no use in pressing the motion; but it would be a refusal of information the House is entitled to. This report might be looked upon as proof of the case against the dismissed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Baby) did not answer my question as to how it happened that the Inspector of Weights and Measures in Hull was limited to the exercise of his municipal office.

MR. BABY: The Inspector for Hull, Mr. Leduc, since he was appointed, was tendered the position of Clerk of the Court, and he tendered his resignation as Inspector, which has since been accepted. He is now Clerk of the Court only.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue has given us no reason why the Inspectors of Weights and Measures received such short notices for dismissal. The notice to one of them was, that on the 1st July his services would be no longer required. If the hon. gentleman intended to deal candidly with the officials not incompetent, who were officers of the Department, he would at least have given them a longer notice. It seems they looked forward, hopefully, to a re-appointment, when, at the last moment, some more fortunate competitor, whose political principles were more in harmony with those of hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches, received the honours and emoluments of office. By the Superannuation Act of 1870, those discharged officials have a pretty strong claim on the Government for compensation for the abolition of their engagements. This Act provides that any person removed from office, because of its abolition, may receive certain remuneration. I would like to know whether the hon. the Minister of the Interior is disposed to deal as kindly with the Inspectors of Weights and Measures as the Act contemplated—to give them any remuneration or retiring allowance, considering they were dismissed with a view to the economy of the service. They were not removed for incompetence, but presumably for reasons of State, and without any regular notice, except one of only a few weeks, and they naturally complained that they were severely and unjustly dealt with, receiving no opportunity of providing for themselves before discharged.

MR. BAIN: A previous Inspector, after a recent discussion in this House, drew my attention to the fact that there must have been a mistake on the part of Ministers with regard to the length of the notice of dismissal given—as to six months being the notice. This former official states, in a note to me, that the notice to him is dated 12th June, 1879; that he thinks he received it on the 14th, stating his services would be dispensed with at the end of the month, and about the 18th June the instruments in his office were taken possession of by the Government and his office closed—making, in his case, about one week between the notice and the close of his office. He says that about the middle of the preceding March, he received a copy of an Order in Council requesting the Inspector to confine his attention to the duties of his own office, without travelling, and referring to the probability of future instructions being given them. But he says distinctly that there was nothing in that circular conveying the remotest impression that the services of the Inspectors were to be dispensed with on the 1st of July last. On the contrary, it seemed to point to the probability of future employment in connection with that office. I think, under those circumstances, it is only due to those former Inspectors, summarily dismissed, that the circumstances should be brought to the attention of the House. Though we are all prepared to admit that the Government have authority to dispense with those officers, I think, taking the circumstances into account, they have been rather hardly dealt with.

MR. CASEY: There were elections in Ontario on the 5th June, and it might have been very awkward to gentlemen on the Conservative side to have this notice go out.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

IMMIGRATION PUBLICATIONS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. TROW, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of all publications issued by the Government; also, of all publications, copies of which have been purchased by the Government for distribution, with a view to encourage immigration into the Dominion, with a statement giving the names of the authors of such publications, the number of copies of each, whether printed by Government or purchased already printed from the authors or publishers, and the expense incurred or to be incurred in respect of each such publication, said: As the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and Immigration, a few evenings ago, taunted me with having received money from the Government for my pamphlets on Manitoba and the Great North-West, and used very strong, unguarded, and malicious expressions respecting my participating in profits for the work, I think it would be proper for me to say a few words now an opportunity presents itself, in reference to the manner information is being circulated by that hon. gentleman in advertising the Great North-West. On that occasion I made a selection of several copies of pamphlets on immigration but have unfortunately left those I selected, with but one exception, at the hotel. The one I hold in my hand is not as complete as I would like; I find eight or ten pages clipped out. I would like to know from the hon. the Minister of Agriculture the number of those pamphlets that have been purchased and circulated, and whether it is those clipped or unclipped that are in general circulation. He had better undertake a second clipping, in order to make the pamphlet acceptable, because I find the first page, the title page, is very objectionable, and should have been taken out. Most likely it has been unobserved by the officials of the Department. I have been informed that some dozen officials have been employed clipping and mutilating those pamphlets for several days, but they have neglected the main part, as the very title page reads thus :

“Fertile lands, cheap and healthy homesteads, in the famous Red River Valley, State of Minnesota. The St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company offers for sale, to actual settlers, about 2,000,000 acres of the best wheat lands, chiefly in the Red River Valley, and contiguous to their lines of railway running from St. Paul to the Manitoba boundary line, at prices ranging from $3 to $5 per acre, and easy terms of payment.”

We find in this pamphlet a very large map of Dakota, Minnesota, and other Western States, with only about three-fourths of an inch space on the corner devoted to Manitoba and the North-West. Then it advertises the sale of 3,000,000 acres of land in those States. The pamphlet is got up by the Hon. Peter Mitchell, who travelled very extensively round Chicago, St. Paul, and Minneapolis. It gives a minute description of the various dinners he had in those cities ; minutely describes the different railway routes, the hotels, and so forth. He says Minnesota is a perfect Paradise for sportsmen, and observes also that there are large tracts of prairie lands, plenty of fuel, and desirable localities for persons to settle upon as to water. He had always understood that it was a great drawback, but he had tasted it from several streams, and pronounced it very good ; that the soil was a magnificent black loam—as black as his silk hat—and capable of being cropped with wheat year after year, indefinitely, without manure. There are thirty pages in this beautiful pamphlet, of which I do not know how many thousand copies have been circulated, taken up with descriptions of Chicago, Minnesota, Dakota, etc., before he landed in Manitoba. When there a friend drives him to Portage la Prairie, and states that they were seven hours in going sixty-three miles, and may have returned in seven hours, but being overtaken by a storm were obliged to remain over night. Then he gives a description of the city of Winnipeg, and condemns the route of the Pacific Railway. The writer then enters into politics a little in condemnation of the previous Administration ; and says he does not know what Mackenzie was thinking about in railway construction. He certainly must be a reliable scientific engineer, because he says if the road had been constructed a few miles to the north or south from where the line is now located, it would have saved hundreds of thousands of dollars, and yet he says that he is not influenced by any political associations or friendships. There is also a great deal of information respecting the weather. It says it is warm in summer and cold in winter, and the sun shines by day and the moon by night ; but a good deal of important information has been cut out. I would like to know the object of the hon. gentleman in eliminating that information. I notice that one of the advertisements in the un mutilated volume was a whole page showing the accommodation and convenience for travellers at the Russell House, Ottawa ; another page descriptive of the Rossin House, Toronto, and also the Queen's Hotel. The Hudson Bay Company's lands for sale, eligible locations cheap, etc., were also inserted. Instead of the Government advertising Hudson Bay property, my hon. friend the member for Selkirk should have purchased and circulated the pamphlet. I consider the hotel-keepers and others who paid for advertisements should be recouped for damages sustained by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture clipping and mutilating the pamphlet before circulation. With regard to the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture on a former occasion, that I received money for writing a pamphlet, I may say while on my feet that I defy him or any other man in the Dominion to say that I ever received a single cent for what I did. So careful was I that nothing should be done that would look like payment to me of any kind, that when Mr. Lowe, Secretary of the Department, sent me a dozen pamphlets rather better bound than those for general circulation, I sent back $6 to pay for them, for which I have a receipt. Instead of receiving money, I paid out $2,000 in travelling expenses, for which I never received any return.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: I would like the hon. gentleman to explain why, if it is such an objectionable pamphlet, he should give it such a widely extended advertisement as he has done by the attention he has drawn to it in this House. I am a little surprised at the new-found zeal of hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to the importance of preventing any information being given respecting the United States. I have laboured under the impression that a large number of gentlemen opposite were more zealous in their advocacy of American interests than they were of Canadian interests. I have been sneered at again and again by hon. gentlemen opposite, for the extravagance of my statements, when I ventured to express an opinion that we had the most fertile and valuable description of country that was to be found in the world in our North-West. Many of the people who go to the Western States are attracted to Manitoba, since we have succeeded in drawing the attention of the world to that country as it has never been before. I find we are not only holding our own against these American States, but that thousands are induced to emigrate from Minnesota, across the border, to our own country. So if people should be attracted to that section of the country, they will be only brought more nearly to the point where sound and correct information regarding our North-West is to be obtained. In reference to this pamphlet, does the hon. gentleman know that the writer of it was the special correspondent of one of the leading political organs of hon. gentlemen opposite? Does the hon. gentleman not know that every word of that pamphlet was published in the Montreal Herald. Every word of censure the hon. gentleman has uttered here in reference to this publication falls upon his own party and the organ of his own party. The hon. gentleman knows that the strongest advocate of the interests of the United States, of their institutions, of their country, of its character, and everything in relation to it, have been found among leading gentlemen on the opposite side of the House; and I rejoice to know that our efforts have at last brought these hon. gentlemen to a proper sense of the unpatriotic character of their conduct in the past, and in the future I trust we may rely upon them to sustain us in the efforts we have been making for the purpose of placing our own country in a proper position in relation to this question. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, forgets that a gentleman who was elected an independent member of this House, the gentleman who was claimed by hon. gentlemen as one of themselves, in his place in this House, stated that he was not prepared to say that hon. gentlemen opposite were in the pay of the United States, but this he would say, that their whole policy in reference to the management of the public affairs in this country indicated that had such been the case, they could not have laboured more zealously to deserve the reward they were receiving. I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on the change of tone on their part. I am glad the hon. gentleman goes so far as to hold up to obloquy the conduct of the leading organ of the party in Quebec, in circulating a pamphlet extolling the advantages of the Western States.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman has found it necessary to make an effort to cover the retreat of the hon. member behind him. It would have been better if he had explained to the House why the Government has spent the money of this country in advertising a foreign country, the United States. He has given no explanation of that. The hon. gentleman has been caught. The Government have been caught.

AN HON. MEMBER: Where?

MR. MACKENZIE: They have been caught in Minnesota—in every place but where they ought to be caught. Why, Sir, last year when I challenged the land policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, when I stated that land could be obtained on more advantageous terms in several of the States of the neighbouring Union, I was asked “where?” I mentioned Texas as a place, where, on account of the unwise laws of the hon. gentlemen opposite, land could be obtained on easier terms than in Canada. I say that now, and I say it is a most infamous thing, that hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured in the first place to have an unwise land policy, and then to publish pamphlets containing most glowing advertisements of better lands in the United States. Now the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals gets up to defend the pamphlet, to defend his colleague.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER: No.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, the hon. gentleman's whole speech was an apology for it. The hon. gentleman says: "I have passed a glowing eulogy on Texas." I challenged the head of the Government. I challenge the whole pack of them to find one word of mine, in any part of my addresses, public or private, where any eulogium was passed on any part of the United States. But here is the Emigration Department, purchasing pamphlets by the thousand, and circulating them. To be sure there is an emasculated edition of that pamphlet published, but the whole of the evil matter is not eradicated. I see that there are advertisements of some of the Departments in this pamphlet. Are those advertisements paid for, and who got the money? Let us have a full statement instead of the hon. the Minister of Railways slanderous attacks. To be sure, to use an old proverb, the hon. gentleman's tongue is no scandal, but we know it is always at the service of his colleagues, if any of them are unable to present a tolerable case. When the hon. the Minister of Finance broke down in his attempt to present to the House a decent Budget Speech, the hon. gentleman was allowed to come up behind him, using the foulest weapons of speech he could lay hold of, and throwing a mass of filth across the floor of the House. Now the hon. the Minister of Agriculture finds himself in a scrape; the hon. the Minister of Railways is ready again with his old weapons. Well, I pity the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. He is a respectable, decent sort of a man. My own impression is that he was imposed upon by his ex-colleague, but he ought to make a proper apology to the House. He ought to state frankly he was imposed upon, and tell us who did it, how many copies of the emasculated edition have been published, and how many of the complete one; what was the cost, and whether the advertisements of the Government Departments, which are utterly useless, were paid for at the regular rate. This information will be of some use. The speech of the hon. the Minister of Railways was of no earthly use that I can conceive of.

MR. WHITE (Cardwell): I think the hon. gentleman is exceedingly unkind to his own friends. If he will look behind him, he will find the gentleman who is chiefly responsible for the publication of this pamphlet. What is the fact with regard to it? It is the result of a trip made by the Hon. Peter Mitchell in the United States, for the inspection of an enterprise of which the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) is a promoter and strong supporter. That trip, if I mistake not, was made in company with the hon. gentleman. The letters were published by the Montreal Herald, and I believe that 50,000 copies of the pamphlet were paid for, not by Mr. Mitchell, not by this Government, but by the hon. gentleman who sits practically as a supporter of the Opposition. If there is anything wrong in the pamphlet, the hon. gentleman is practically responsible for it.

MR. ANGLIN: If anything further were wanted to condemn the publication of this pamphlet by the Government, it has been furnished by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). He tells us that the Hon. Peter Mitchell, the writer of this pamphlet, was employed by a member of this House largely interested in a railway running in a foreign country. I do not know that we have any right to accuse Mr. Mitchell with having done anything wrong, if he has written only what he believed to be the truth; but certainly the Government should not invest the public money of this country in the purchase of tens of thousands of these pamphlets, written for the purpose of furthering the interests of a railway in a foreign country. The hon. gentleman when he thought he was making out a case against an hon. member of the House, has proved beyond all question that the conduct of the Government is entirely indefensible, and that the money of the country has been worse than wasted.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): As my name has been brought forward so prominently in this discussion, it will not be deemed out of place for me to say a word or two. It is true that I have an interest in the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, and the lands in Minnesota.

MR. MACKENZIE: Three million acres.

MR. SMITH: Yes, perhaps there are three million acres, but I hope that does not make me less a Canadian than other wise I would be. I have been in this country now for upwards of forty years, and can therefore claim to be as much a Canadian as most hon. gentlemen in this House. I regret that the hon. member for Montreal West is not in his place in the House, because I can recollect when he and the hon. Peter Mitchell—who wrote these very pleasing and interesting letters, which have so engaged the attention of hon. gentlemen, and in which he speaks in high terms of the lands in Minnesota, and still more favourably of those of Manitoba—I can recollect when those gentlemen and myself were on the train between Winnipeg and St. Paul, on our return from Manitoba, we met the Emigration Agent of the Dominion Government, and this gentleman whom I then saw for the first time, on being asked if any efforts were made by the officials of the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway to keep back emigrants on their way to Manitoba, replied: certainly not; but that on the contrary every possible assistance and facilities were afforded these emigrants for going through to their destination. He did say that some other American Railway Companies acted differently, but that had nothing to do with the road referred to. That such is the conduct followed by the people of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway has been fully substantiated by others, including the agents of Canadian Railway Companies, who have gone up in charge of parties of emigrants for Manitoba; and it is perhaps fortunate for this country, that that Railway Company, and their lands in Minnesota, are controlled by those who are so friendly to Canada, and so anxious to give every reasonable facility for sending emigrants into the North-West of the Dominion. Their instructions to their officials are, that no attempt should be made to keep back these people on their way to Manitoba, but on the contrary, to aid and assist them as far as possible, and I believe that these instructions are honestly carried out. The settlers both on the Government and Railway lands along the St. Paul and Manitoba road, are principally farmers from Wisconsin, Illinois, Michigan, and other Eastern States, who, having sold their farms there at good prices, take up wheat lands in Minnesota, and each in possession of capital, ranging from $1,000 to perhaps $50,000, contribute to building up the country at once. These are Americans who very naturally prefer their own institutions to ours, and so remain under their own Government; and the hon. gentleman from Cardwell is aware that the great majority of Canadians proceeding beyond St. Paul, who do not go to and remain in Manitoba, become settlers in the Territory of Dakota, and not on the lands of the St. Paul and Manitoba Company. The letters in question, written by Mr. Mitchell, I read when they appeared in the newspapers, but in their present pamphlet form have not seen them, nor was I aware what advertisements that pamphlet contained. I know the letters to be very racy, pleasing and interesting reading, affording a great deal of information both about Minnesota and our own North-West; speaking highly of the former, and still more so of Manitoba; and although they were not written at the instance of the St. Paul Railway Company, the gentlemen connected with it were, I believe, so very well pleased with them as to wish to have them re-produced in their present form. The publishers of this pamphlet were no doubt very willing to take advertisements from any quarter; it is, I believe, the ordinary course of trade to do so, and the hon. member for Cardwell himself (Mr. White) would not formerly have hesitated to do the same thing as a matter of business. I certainly am not the apologist of the Government in this House, but my impression is that the expense of publishing these letters was borne principally outside of any contribution from the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues. Now, a word with regard to myself. No one can say that I have ever put forward the claims of the United States for emigration in preference to Manitoba and the North-West Territory. Quite otherwise; and when recently in England, on the question of the resources and development of Canada being brought forward at a meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute, I took occasation there to speak in the most marked terms of the advantage Canada had over the United States in this respect. The hon. member for Cardwell, in the course of his observations asserted, that had the hon. leader of the Opposition remained in office, the whole carrying trade of the North-West would have been controlled by my associates and myself, but he must know that the facts of the case point to an entirely different conclusion; and it is now acknowledged by every candid man, who fully understands the question, that it would have been greatly to the advantage of Canada and the North-West had the arrangement proposed by the late Government for the working of the Pembina Branch been carried out, because the saving to this country would have been very great, while the work would have been much more promptly and more satisfactorily performed than it has been up to this time, or than was possible for the Government to accomplish with the limited supply of rolling stock at their disposal then. I do know, but so thoroughly convinced are the proprietors of the St. Paul Railway, that the odds in that agreement were all in favour of the Government as against their own pecuniary interests, that they would not now entertain any similar proposition as that they then agreed to, nor have they ever considered themselves under any obligation, personal or otherwise, to the then Government in respect of that agreement, which the hon. member for Cardwell affects to consider as having been conceived, not in the interest of Canada, but in that of a foreign corporation. I would not have spoken now had I not been so markedly referred to in this debate, and I close by repeating that, while I have interests in Minnesota, I also have an interest in Manitoba perhaps as large as most other people in the country, and I believe that I have as much regard for and am as anxious to promote everything that may be for the advantage of the Dominion and our North-West as any other gentleman in this House.

MR. POPE (Compton): I am afraid that my hon. friends on the opposite side will not take a great deal of comfort from the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith). The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) said, however, that the hon. the Minister of Railways got up to apologise for this pamphlet. But that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) did not apologise for it. He did not say it was a good pamphlet, or anything at all by way of apology. But I must try to take care myself, since the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has paid me the compliment of saying that I am a very decent fellow. I will explain the matter to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman, to that of this House, and to that of the country, which have been so led astray by publications in the Toronto Globe. In the first place, with respect to a map which was produced in this debate—that was simply a map of a railway company to show the road over which every emigrant has to travel to go to Manitoba, and it is absurd to attempt to blind them to the fact, or to attempt to make them think that they are not travelling through the United States; or to think that they will not know where they are, and not find what sort of country they are going through. So much for the map. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) goes further, and publishes to the world: he tells the people of this country—that they will do better to go to Texas than to Manitoba. Why, the fact is that men have been induced to come out from Lancashire and Yorkshire, and, finding no advantages, returned to the Old Country. I can further tell the hon. gentleman that there is not a single State in the Union where lands are sold on as advantageous terms for settlers as in Manitoba. This is apart from the lands given away in Manitoba. With respect to the mare's nest, with reference to the scrape that I have got into—this dreadful catastrophe which it is alleged has befallen me—what is the result? It all amounts to this, that I have never paid one single sixpence for this pamphlet. I have never given any order for one single copy of it, and I wish this fact to go through the length and breadth of the land. Where are the tens of thousands of dollars, the hundreds of thousands of dollars, that has been alleged were spent on this pamphlet? Not one single dollar has been spent on it by the Government; not one single order has been given; and, in so far as this pamphlet is concerned, no money will be paid on that account, and no order will be given for it in the form in which it is now published. I do not want to go to the hon. member for Lambton for a recommendation as Minister of Agriculture. My course as a promoter of immigration is known to this country, and is known to the hon. gentlemen opposite. I am willing to stand by the past, and in the future I intend to be guided by the principles which have guided me in the past. All these foolish and nonsensical assertions, that the people's money has been spent on these publications, are unfounded. There is not a word of truth in them.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman say if the Department paid for the advertisement.

MR. POPE: I have never paid for an advertisement in that pamphlet. But I am told there are advertisements in that pamphlet that were never ordered, and that they would not be paid for. Is there any other question that the hon. gentleman wishes to put? I take it for granted that there is no other question. If there is no other question, then let hon. gentlemen forever hold their peace.

MR. ANGLIN: I have a question. Why were not these particular statements made before? Why is it that the hon. gentleman's colleagues appear to have been in the dark on the subject? Why was it that when this matter was under consideration before the statement was not made, that no money had been paid? But what he now says, does the hon. Minister of Agriculture only mean that no special order had yet been given, or that no precise number has been named? Will he say that the pamphlet has not been received at his Department?

AN HON. MEMBER: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

MR. ANGLIN: No. I am asking questions which the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has invited us to ask.

MR. BANNERMAN: I was surprised at the assertion made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith), a few moments ago—that none of the employes of the road in which he is interested—the St. Paul and Minnesota Railway—act as emigration agents. I was over that road in June last. The passengers were largely emigrants, and I noticed that all the employes of the road, from the brakeman to the conductor, acted as emigration agents. An article appeared in the Toronto Globe, a few days ago, in which it was stated that 400 emigrants had left Ottawa for Dakota, and that only three persons on the train were bound for Manitoba. Now, on that train there were thirty or forty acquaintances of mine, who were going to Manitoba. The reason that most of the emigrants were going to Dakota is easily found. For the five years that the hon. gentlemen opposite held the reins of power, they did nothing for the colonisation of our own territory. As a result of their policy, a large number of people went to the States, and they have sent back letters to their friends, urging them to go to Dakota rather than to Manitoba.

MR. CASEY: It is all very well for hon. members to talk about that railway. The question under discussion concerns certain pamphlets, and I have no doubt the hon. the Minister of Agriculture would be glad of an excuse for replying to the remarks made from this side of the House. The hon. Minister told us that he issued directions for certain matters to appear in the pamphlet. What has the Department to do with the pamphlet unless it was ordered?

MR. BOWELL: The hon. Minister said nothing of the kind.

MR. CASEY: I remember the peculiarity of the expression. The hon. Minister said he gave instructions that they were not to be put in.

MR. POPE (Compton): I said that I had given no orders, and that the Department would not pay for the pamphlets.

MR. CASEY: I was referring to another remark of the hon. gentleman which bears no other construction than the one I placed upon it. The questions the hon. member has to answer are these: Did he order the pamphlets; does he intend to pay for them, and if not, how did they come to be distributed as emigration pamphlets? Is it to be supposed that the Hon. Peter Mitchell is printing them out of his own pure generosity?

MR. POPE: The hon. member is not quite fair in his statements. I stated plainly that I never ordered the pamphlets.

MR. MACKENZIE: Were the pamphlets in the Department?

MR. POPE: I never ordered them. I think that statement is enough.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo): I may state that I for one never got a copy of the pamphlets referred to. If they have been distributed among members or promiscuously round the country, I would like to know why I did not receive copies.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I sent to the Department the other day for a dozen copies of each pamphlet that had been printed. Among those sent to me early in the Session I found a dozen copies of the pamphlet referred to. Later on I found another instalment of the same pamphlets with the leaves cut out. It is not really a matter of importance whether money was paid for them or not. They came from the Department with its imprimatur upon them, and they were sent direct to our constituents to give them information about the country. On page 49 I find the following:

"In the State of Dakota the Government gives twenty years to pay for the land, and charges $1.20 per acre and 6 per cent. interest till paid; and if the settler plants ten acres of trees on his quarter-section the State exempts him from taxation for ten years. This is a more liberal policy than that laid down by the Government of Canada, who only give eighty acres of a homestead and a right to pre-empt a like additional quantity, but none of it within certain distance of the railway, called the six-mile belt."

It is possible the hon. gentleman has allowed the innocent and guileless Peter Mitchell to get on the blind side of him; but now that he knows the nature and tendency of these pamphlets, he should go further, than cutting out the advertisements, and withdraw them from circulation altogether.

MR. BAIN: I am prepared to accept the statement that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture did not order those pamphlets, and did not pay any money for them. But somehow those pamphlets have been largely distributed from his Department. The hon. member (Mr. Thompson) who complained about not getting copies, ought to know that to secure them he should make application to the Secretary of the Agricultural Department. There is something singular about the fact that those pamphlets were circulated from the wrapper-room, and under the auspices of the House. It must be satisfactory to the House to learn that no money has been expended thereon. The hon. member from South Renfrew (Mr. Bannerman) stated that the employés of the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway, and agents of other railways, having lands for sale, waylaid passengers to Manitoba, and induced them to go to Dakota. It was only this evening, that in conversation with a reliable gentleman, just returned from the North-West, he stated that of the last excursion train that went out from Ottawa, the greater part of the passengers went to Dakota, and that increased numbers were going there this season compared with last; but he stated most emphatically that the officials on the trains of the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway were instructed not to interfere with or attempt to influence emigrants passing through to Manitoba, and that they did not do so, leaving them free to go on their way unmolested. But this emigration to the Western States is only the legitimate results of the policy just enunciated by the hon. the Minister of Railways, and defended in his usual vigorous style, and the practice of his colleague in the Department of Agriculture, in circulating pamphlets, advertising Minnesota and Dakota lands; and in proof that their labour on behalf of the Western States is bearing fruit, I beg to read a short extract from a recent copy of a Tory organ, in my Riding, that is not guilty of copying such articles from Opposition journals, such as the Globe, and which reads as follows:—

"Large numbers of Nova Scotians continue to leave for the Western States. The distress in Guysboro' county, as well as in the city of Halifax, is severely felt, and the calls upon the charitable societies are heavier than can be met. An appeal, issued by one of these societies, says that unless it is furnished with means at once it must suspend work. The emigration is chiefly from Cumberland county."

I cannot help thinking that the explanation of the hon. the Minister of Railways, in reference to the pamphlets, goes to establish these facts. I suppose that some of the pamphlets must have found their way eastwards, and are now bearing fruit. I think I may fairly challenge the hon. gentleman opposite to look back over the record of their predecessors the present Opposition, in emigration matters, and look at the result of the labours of the Emigration Committee during that time; they will search in vain through the publications of the Department during that period for anything that can be construed into the least eulogy or advertisement of the western States. I think it will be in the recollection of hon. members that it was while my hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow) was chairman of that Committee that he inaugurated a new system by which a large amount of valuable information was collected respecting the Canadian North-West, and the unoccupied lands of the newer countries of Ontario and the districts of Muskoka and Parry Sound. Facilities were also given to members of the Eastern Provinces to lay before the Committee useful information for the purpose of attracting emigrants to their shores. I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to point to any record in which during so short a period so much valuable information was collected as during the time that my hon. friend presided over that Committee, upon the deliberations of which he bestowed so much care. It was printed with our annual reports and we all know how eagerly they were sought for and how widely they were circulated. No hon. member will deny that that information was of the greatest value to all connected with schemes of emigration to this country. It was used by officers of the Department, and condensed, and was circulated through our Emigration Agents in the Mother Country. I defy the hon. gentlemen opposite to point out a single page of these reports in which the authors praise our North-West Territories by this left-handed method of giving information with regard to Minnesota and Dakota, through pamphlets like the one under discussion. It was quite consistent that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) and others, owners of the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway, should circulate this pamphlet written by the Hon. Peter Mitchell. It was a legitimate business enterprise for them to purchase and circulate these pamphlets for the advertisement of their lands, but I cannot help feeling that it looked somewhat negligent on the part of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to have allowed the circulation of that class of literature under the auspices of his Department. While bound to accept his denial of any personal connection with this pamphlet, it seems strange indeed that such large numbers of it have been circulated through the agency of this Department, and it reflects no credit on his management or care in supervising its officers.

MR. BLAKE: I think that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture omitted one important point. I refer to the appeal made by the hon. member for South Perth with reference to the hon. Minister's statement on a former occasion, made no doubt in the heat of debate, as to the pamphlets of my hon. friend being purchased by the Department. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture alleged that my hon. friend had been a pecuniary profiter by some purchase of his pamphlet. The denial of my hon. friend from Perth, made at the time, has been repeated to-night, and the hon. member has called upon the hon. Minister to state whether he deliberately asserts the contrary; and if not, to make the retraction due under the circumstances. Now, there is no humiliation in a gentleman who has been betrayed into an inaccuracy admitting the fact and acknowledging his error; but it is, in truth, a humiliation to persist, either by silence or by speech, in an inaccuracy affecting the personal honour and standing of another, after attention has been directed to it and the opportunity for enquiry given. I am sure the hon. the Minister of Agriculture will not let the debate close without stating whether he intends deliberately to charge my hon. friend, in the face of his denial, with having been a pecuniary profiter by the pamphlet. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture has been asked several questions several times without any response being elicited. It is material to know what answers can be given.

MR. POPE (Compton): You do not give me a chance.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman has had several chances.

MR. POPE: No.

MR. BLAKE: It will be convenient to know how many copies of the Mitchell pamphlet were received by the Department of Agriculture; how long they remained there; what has become of them; whether they have been in whole or part distributed to members or to the public as emigration literature; what number has been distributed; whether they were all distributed in complete form, or some in a mutilated state; whether there remain any copies and what is going to be done with them?

MR. POPE: There are not any in the Department. Perhaps three or four hundred copies of this pamphlet found their way to it before I knew anything of them. As soon as my attention was called to the fact I stopped their reception, and had what was left sent back.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where to?

MR. POPE: To the parties who sent them.

MR. MACKENZIE: Where to?

MR. POPE: To the Montreal Herald.

MR. BLAKE: Could you not tell how many came to the Department?

MR. POPE: No. I presume many found their way here direct from Montreal. I know nothing of these pamphlets. With regard to the personal matter alluded to by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) I am glad he has referred to it. I intended to have noticed it before. I have nothing to retract. I did not say the hon. gentleman from South Perth (Mr. Trow) made money out of his pamphlet, but that he might have made money. I will say now that I have enquired into the matter, and find that the hon. gentleman did not make money out of it.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): I think it is no more than justice to the Hon. Peter Mitchell, whose name has been brought forward in this debate, to state that, so far as my knowledge goes, he never benefitted to the extent even of one sixpence by the publication of these pamphlets, or by his trip to the North-West, and I am certain that he did not receive anything in the way of remuneration from the Railway Company. In short, the pleasure he derived on the journey was all he got by it, and this pleasure I am glad to say, was shared in equally by those who were fortunate enough to be his companions; as it is well-known to all who are acquainted with Mr. Mitchell, how genial and agreeable he is as a travelling companion. At the time he left Montreal for the North-West, those who accompanied him had not the slightest idea that he would write even one letter for publication, nor was it until the second had been written, that any gentleman connected with the railway became aware that he intended doing so. These letters were so very racy, and withal so very amusing—telling, as one of them did about a threshing and self-binding machine, which, having been run away with by the horses in one of the immense wheat fields of Minnesota, continued to reap and bind a succession of hundreds of sheaves, which went on circling the air for half a mile together, with much other matter perhaps not quite so amusing, but more instructive, and his friends encouraged him to add to them, and to send them for publication to some of the Montreal papers. I believe the hon. member for South Renfrew to be in error in saying that train conductors, and other people in the pay of the St. Paul Railway, constitute themselves missionaries for retaining in Minnesota passengers who intended going through to Manitoba: and I repeat, that the instructions of the officials connected with that Company were, that no such effort should be made in their behalf, and that the Emigration Agent of the Government, himself, told one of the hon. members of this House that these officials strictly refrain from so acting. I have in my hand letters received this evening from the Vice-President and General Manager of that road, which speak of the difficulty they had to contend with in consequence of the unusual severity of the winter—on one occasion 59° below zero at Pembina—in sending through settlers for Manitoba, and of the great exertions that were used to do so. Now, what better opportunity could have offered itself for keeping these people in Minnesota, had the wish been to do so; and yet unusual efforts were made, and heavy expenses incurred, in rendering them with as little delay as possible at their journey's end.

MR. BOWELL: Everyone must be gratified at the disinterested conduct shown by the proprietors of the Northern Pacific Railway, as exhibited in the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk. It is asking the House to believe a little too much to say that people owning millions of acres in the north-western States are not interesting themselves in having them settled and in placing on these lands as many emigrants as possible. I have an indistinct recollection of a debate in this House a few years ago, when the late Government was entering into arrangements with the Northern Pacific Railway Company for the leasing of the Pembina Branch, and I was under the impression that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) then made a distinct statement that he was not interested in that road and had nothing to do with it.

MR. SMITH: I never made that statement in this House. What I stated was that I was not interested in the Steamboat Company spoken of at the same time.

MR. BOWELL: I bow to the explanation. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that I read the paragraph from a St. Paul paper at that time, in which the name of the hon. member for Selkirk was mentioned in connection with that enterprise, as being interested in it—he was accused, perhaps improperly, of being interested in the lease then about being made with that road for its operation, and in the carrying of passengers. On behalf of the Customs Department, I desire to say, most positively, that although there is a page advertisement in connection with the Department of Customs attached to the pamphlet under discussion, it was put in there without my consent. On the contrary, I refused that consent to Mr. Mitchell, telling him that it was not my business to give advertisements to assist in publishing a pamphlet which had for its main object the encouragement of the settlement of the lands of the United States. Why he copied, and why he published that advertisement, I know not, except, perhaps, in the hope of getting paid for it some day or other. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not seem to relish the explanation made by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. No doubt they fancied that they had discovered a mare's nest. Finding that they were being caught in their own trap, the hon. the Minister of Agriculture allowed them to go on and make wild statements, such as that made by the hon. member for Gloucester, about the "tens of thousands" of pamphlets, and thousands of dollars of the country's money being spent in advertising American lands; he allowed them to proceed, and now they are chagrined to find that these charges are without foundation in fact. It matters not, however positively my hon. friend made the denial, it has been refuted over and over again. The hon. member for North Wentworth (Mr. Bain) and the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) stated positively that no member of their party, during the continuance in office of the late Government, ever said anything deprecatory of the Province of Manitoba, nor in favour of the United States. The hon. member for Lambton repeated, what I have heard him repeat in this House over and over again, to-night, that he never said anything in disparagement of Manitoba in contrasting it unfavourably with Texas. Let us hear what he said, as reported in the Official Reports of this House, when I will leave it to him to say how far it is borne out by the record.

"I do not understand why the hon. gentleman anticipates a large revenue from the lands to be sold, because it is absolutely indispensable, in order to induce settlers to come into the country, that we should furnish them with land free of charge. Does the hon. gentleman imagine that settlers will go to the North-West, and buy land at $2 an acre, when there are millions of acres of land offered for nothing in the United States?"

"MR. PLUMB: Where do they give land for nothing in the United States?"

"MR. MACKENZIE: There can be no question about that.

"MR. PLUMB: I think there is room for question.

"MR. MACKENZIE: Well, my hon. friend from Niagara is exceedingly wise, but I doubt his possession of information on that point. If the hon. gentleman will examine the condition of the State of Texas, he will find that that State alone will furnish more land free than he has any idea of. The very fact that they are pouring ten or twenty times the number of people into these new territories that Canada is able to do, proves conclusively that it is true. If the hon. gentleman is proceeding on the hypothesis that in Canada alone is there any land available, he will find himself greatly mistaken. We have found it very difficult indeed in Canada to promote settlement, even where the land was given away by the Government. It is still more difficult to send settlers to the far-off western country, where they have the initial difficulties of a new country to contend with, not less in amount, though different in kind, than the settlers of our own wooded districts. They have a long winter, absence of lumber and building materials, and difficulties of transportation."

Now, if any one can read those sentences and say that there is not a glowing picture—that is the expression used by the hon. gentleman himself—and an invidious distinction drawn between the State of Texas and the Great North-West, then the English language means nothing. We that we cannot expect to effect settlements in our own country when settlers can get land down in Texas for nothing. We are then told of the state of the climate in the North-West, the disadvantage of the great distances, of having no lumber for building purposes, and the difficulties of transportation, and that all these disadvantages are not found in Texas. One country is held up as possessing the advantages of free land, while the difficulties of transport, the want of lumber, and the cold winters, are set forth as bugbears to frighten the people away from our country. Now we are being told that nothing has ever been said either in the past, or likely to be in the future, which would injure the settlement of the Great North-West.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is quite true.

MR. BOWELL: Quite true. No doubt the hon. gentleman will deny all that he has ever said about the comparative advantages of emigration to Texas over the North-West. I have no doubt that this discussion, as far as the Government is concerned, will do no harm.

MR. ANGLIN: It will do good.

MR. BOWELL: I am glad this discussion has afforded an opportunity to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to set himself right, so that the people may no longer be under the supposition that these pamphlets had been purchased and paid for and sent through the country in tens of thousands by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. I am not aware of the fact that large numbers have been distributed to the hon. members of this House. Such may be the case. It may be true that they may have been furnished to hon. members for circulation by the parties most interested in the settlement of these lands. It is not at all improbable. I have seen that done in the past; pamphlets have been circulated by hon. members with no knowledge of where they came from. I do not know that the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) has any knowledge of this fact, but it is not at all improbable that those who published this pamphlet were those who circulated it, and have sent them to their friends for circulation. They are acting quite in unison with their former declarations in favour of the United States Territories rather than British domains. Now they would like to fasten the act upon my hon. friend, and the responsibility upon the Government. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that I do not find fault with the company for trying to settle its own land. Nor will anyone be surprised who have gone to Manitoba and taken the route over the western railways, that many persons who might leave here with the intention of settling in the North-West, would stop in Minnesota or go beyond Dakota, and I have no doubt that such will continue to be the case until our railways are run into the interior of that country and supplemented by steam navigation. But after the same facilities are afforded in our territory for getting to market with the produce of their farms and their cattle, the tide of emigrants which has been flowing into that western country, and a large proportion of British and Canadian emigrants, at least, will settle under that flag which they revere, and the institutions for which they have the most respect. Now, it is well to know—and the hon. member for Selkirk knows it as well as any man—that the remarks made in England by the first statesman of that country are literally true. I have experience of that myself. When I was in the west, and saw people coming in the Custom House making enquiries as to what was dutiable goods, I asked them where they came from, and I found that they were American citizens coming from Ohio and other States, who were about settling in our country. I have no doubt that as it becomes developed, and the people have a better knowledge of what that country is capable of producing, there will be a larger emigration from Minnesota and Dakota, into the North-Western Territory than in the past; and I speak from personal experience, when I say that the remarks made by Lord Beaconsfield in reference to that matter were literally true.

MR. PATERSON (South Brant): I dare say the hon. the Minister of Customs would like the discussion to close at that point where he read an extract from the Debates, in order to fasten upon the hon. member for Lambton, (Mr. Mackenzie) a charge which is untrue, and which has been attempted to be fastened upon him by the press which supports that hon. gentleman. It were enough that the press had undertaken that task ; it surely is unworthy of a Minister of the Crown. The hon. gentleman tells us that if the extract he has read does not bear the construction he places upon it, then the English language means nothing. It is possible that the people of the country, having read the extract and the comments of the hon. gentleman thereupon, might naturally be of the opinion that the English language does mean something, and yet entertain doubts as to whether the hon. Minister rightly understands that language. What is the hon. member for Lambton speaking of in that connection? He is speaking against what he considered to be the unsound policy of the hon. gentlemen that administer the affairs of this country in placing such exorbitant prices upon the lands of the North-West. He points out to them that it will be disastrous in its results, because we may not expect emigration into our country under such hard conditions, when the United States are offering lands free. He is asked by an hon. gentleman of the House "where?" He does not say Texas then. He says: "There can be no doubt of the truth of what I state." The hon. member who interrupted him presses for something definite on that point; the hon. member for Lambton then points him to Texas as one part of the Union where this can be, where any amount of land can be had free. Then going on to speak further, he enters into a comparison of the difficulties attending settlers in the North-West as compared with those attending settlers in Ontario and the older Provinces not as compared with Texas at all. I perhaps may do no injustice if I say the hon. the Minister of Customs knows that right well, but he is driven into desperation, feeling, as we have all experienced to-night, the utter incapacity or want of knowledge that pervades the Department of Agriculture now, in sending out hundreds of these pamphlets glowing with eulogiums upon the advantages possessed by the United States. But if the hon. gentleman who made these statements in this pamphlet was liable to the charge of want of patriotism, what shall be said of the Head of a Department of the Government of Canada that permits his Department, knowingly or unknowingly, to circulate those pamphlets by scores and hundreds? There is a passage in this pamphlet that I desire to read bearing upon another question not exactly pertinent to the one now before the House, but it effectually controverts the position taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to another matter, that is, the emigration that is going on from Canada to the United States. I would like the Department of Agriculture, officially, to give us its authority for the statement here made:

"The settlers in the Red River region are of the most substantial character, well-to-do farmers from the older States, from Iowa, Wisconsin and Canada, and especially from the best parts of Ontario. The dominant nationalities settling on the Minnesota farms are Americans, Scandinavians and Canadians, in about equal proportions."

We have here a statement emanating from the office of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture that the State of Minnesota is being populated by Canadians from the best parts of Ontario.

Mr. HESSON: This debate has elicited the important information that this pamphlet, with which so much fault has been found, was introduced in a surreptitious manner into the office of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. Now, it appears the hon. gentleman knows nothing about it except that it was published in the office of the Montreal Herald, and that as soon as the hon. Minister found it contained anything objectionable, he properly and promptly withdrew it from circulation. I think the whole discussion points strongly against an hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, a gentleman who now supports the hon. leader of the Opposition. I mean, Sir, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith), in whose interest, I believe, more than in that of any other man in the Dominion, that pamphlet has been circulated. We are in possession of evidence that there is a large emigration of Canadians to the North-West. The Stratford Beacon, published in my county, under the heading "Another Exodus," says:

"Quite a number of persons from Stratford and vicinity left for the North-West by the Grand Trunk excursion on Wednesday. There were no less than three special trains, containing between 700 and 800 passengers, and any quantity of implements, household goods and live stock. A large proportion of the people were men of family, but there were quite a number of young men, and all full of bright hopes for the future. On the same day some ninety persons, principally from the county of Huron, left for Dakota, preferring to seek their fortunes under Uncle Sam's protecting wing." So it appears that, after all, we have got a very much larger share of the emigration that has gone west from this country than the United States have got. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) said that a large number of persons had emigrated from the county of Cumberland, represented by the hon. Minister of Railways. Well, Sir, they may have gone west to better themselves; but I desire to remind hon. gentleman of the Opposition that it is unwise to taunt members on this side and charge them with the exodus of our people to the United States, as I observe by the quotation I have just read that the hon. member from South Huron is also losing his voters, as no less than ninety have gone to Dakota during the last week from Huron.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) : I desire to say that I was not aware that any of these pamphlets were being circulated among hon. members of this House, or in Ottawa; and as reference has been made by the hon. the Minister of Customs and other hon. members to the arrangement with the St. Paul and Pacific Railway for the working of the Pembina Branch, which came before the House during the Session of 1878, and was afterwards carried into effect by the late Government, I cannot doubt but that the hon. Minister of Railways will frankly admit that, notwithstanding the opposition of himself and some of his friends to that measure, when proposed by his predecessors in office, he himself, after carefully considering it, was so fully convinced of the advantages it would have given to Canada in respect of rates, and in many other ways, that he would gladly have renewed it exactly in its original form with the Railway Company; but as the Government, through their contractors, failed to carry out their part of the covenant, to have the road completed and in working order by a certain date the Railway Company was liberated from the agreement, and, knowing how much it would be to their own disadvantage to renew it, declined to do so. It is only fair to the hon. leader of the Opposition, and his colleagues in office, that this should be perfectly understood by the country.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following Motions for Returns were severally agreed to :—

Order of the House—Copies of instructions given the Indian Superintendent, the Inspector of Indian Farm Instructors and all Indian Agents in the North-West Territories, with reference to the purchase of supplies either from the Hudson's Bay Company, or other persons.—(Mr. Drew.)

Address—Correspondence between the Government and the Hudson's Bay Company or its Land Commissioner respecting lands on Hudson's Bay, and with respect to their acquisition by any railway or steamship company, or to the Company's alleged rights in said lands.—(Mr. Drew.)

Order of the House—Copy of all correspondence respecting a subsidy to a line of steamships between a port or ports in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces and a Port in British Columbia, via Panama; and also, a copy of all correspondence respecting a subsidy to a line of steamships or sailing vessels between the said ports via Cape Horn.—(Mr. DeCosmos.)

Order of the House—Return showing the number of Free Passes issued on the Intercolonial Railway and its branches, during the year 1878 and 1879, and the names of parties to whom such passes have been given.—(Mr. Burpee, Sunbury.)

Order of the House—Return showing number of nets seized on the Miramichi River and its tributaries, during the year 1879; the number sold, and whether by public or private sale, and the amounts they realised; the number and amounts of fines imposed, and how many are paid; also, the name of each lessee of a net in that district for same year, the number and nature of license each held, and the amount paid therefor.—(Mr. Snowball.)

Order of the House—Detailed statement of accounts of steam dredge St. Lawrence, while at work at Miramichi, for the years 1878 and 1879; the time she was employed there each year, and the quantity of work done.—(Mr. Snowball.)

Address—Statement of the amount of money that was deposited with the Government under the Insurance Act by the Atlantic Mutual Life Insurance Company of Albany, New York State, and the amount now held by the Government, with accrued interest, to the credit of the said company; copies of all correspondence between the office of the Canadian Insurance Inspector and the officers of the said Atlantic Mutual Life Insurance Company, and also with the Assignee, Receiver, Court officers, or other persons, regarding the settlement of the affairs and the distribution of assets of the said company to the Canadian creditors and policy-holders; and further, a report from the said Insurance Inspector, Professor Cherriman, as to the delay in dividing the said deposit, held by the Government of Canada, between the bona fide creditors and policy-holders of the said Atlantic Mutual Life Insurance Company who reside in Canada.

—(Mr. Casey.)

Order of the House.—Detailed statement of account of Indian Commissioners for the Province of New Brunswick, for the years 1877-8-9; showing also, in detail, the amount received from Indian Lands and other sources, within that Province during these years.—(Mr. Snowball.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

House resumed adjourned Debate on the proposed motion (Sir S. L. Tilley) to concur in the resolutions adopted in the Committee of Ways and Means (March 9th).

MR. WHITE (Cardwell) : Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the discussion of the subject which has chiefly engaged the attention of the House during this debate, that is, the National Policy as it is called, the policy adopted by this Parliament last Session, and the effect it has produced on the country, I desire to refer for a moment to the financial aspects presented by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) and by the hon. the Finance Minister. I think it is well that at the close of this the first year, we should have an opportunity of contrasting, at any rate, the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite with the policy of the present Administration. I think it is especially well that we should judge by the record of hon. gentlemen opposite as to their right to assume the tone which the hon. member for Centre Huron assumed the other evening in replying to the hon. the Minister of Finance. Sir, what was the financial record of the late Administration? How did they conduct the financial affairs of this Dominion? The hon. member for Centre Huron, in the first Budget Speech he delivered in this House, imposed upwards of $3,000,000 additional taxation upon the people. He declared at that time that it was wrong, as undoubtedly it is wrong, to permit continued deficits to occur between the revenue and expenditure of a country like this; and in imposing this additional taxation he took the ground that he would be able, by means of an economical administration of the affairs of the country and by means of the additional revenue which he would derive from the new measures which he had introduced, to carry on the affairs of the country in the future without in any way causing deficits between revenue and expenditure, and would be able, generally speaking, to show a surplus. Well, Sir, in the next year, in 1875, speaking within five months of the close of the then current year, he said: "I have every reason to believe that we shall have a reasonable surplus upon the Estimates of the current year." What was the result? Within the short time of a year after this promise made to Parliament and the country that there should be no deficits, he opened his speech with a wail of disappointment, acknowledging the utter failure of his Estimates. He admitted that in the matter of Customs duties alone he was nearly $2,000,000 lower than he anticipated. Well, in 1876 further changes were made in the Tariff, with the view of again closing the balance between revenue and expenditure. In making his speech he estimated that for 1876-7 the revenue would be $23,250,000 as against "an expenditure of somewhat less than that amount." One would imagine that with the experience of the two previous years that hon. gentleman ought at least to have acquired some degree of wisdom, that he ought to have had some knowledge of the probable revenue resources of the country. But what do we find? In 1877, referring to 1876, he used these words:—"The net result is this: that whereas our expenditure during the year amounted to no less than $24,486,000 in round numbers, our total receipts fell to about $22,587,000, being a total deficit of no less than $1,900,000." After the imposition for the second time of additional duties, in order to secure the required revenue, the expenditures of that year exceeded the Estimates which he had submitted to Parliament, by upwards of a quarter of a million dollars; so that he had not only not succeeded in estimating correctly the revenues he was to receive, but he had, as was shown by the result of the year's transactions, been reckless in the expenditure as well. Well, Sir, he was then speaking within a few months of the end of the year; he was speaking as one supposed to have a fair knowledge of what was likely to be the results of the year 1877, in which that speech was delivered, and he claimed that for that year there would again be a small surplus of revenue over expenditure; and yet, in the speech of 1878, coming to deal with the previous year, he had to acknowledge another disappointment, and another deficit of $1,446,000. Those were the last three years of the Administration of the hon. gentlemen, and during them were these differences between estimated and actual revenue. He had in 1875-6 estimated a revenue of $25,250,000; the actual revenue was $22,587,587. For 1876-7 he had estimated a revenue of $23,250,000; he had an actual revenue of $22,059,174. For 1877-8 he had estimated a revenue of $23,400,000; he had an actual revenue of $22,275,000. So that the hon. gentleman who ventures now to lecture the hon. the Finance Minister upon the disappointment which may have occurred in connection with his Estimates, is the same who, during three years had estimated his revenue at an aggregate of $76,210,872, and had received an actual revenue of only $71,100,000, a difference of nearly $5,000,000, or an average annual difference between estimated revenue and actual revenue of no less than $1,626,042. Now, I would ask whether, after a record of that kind, it ought not to become the hon. gentleman to be somewhat more modest, at any rate, in his censures and criticisms upon the hon. the present Finance Minister? Well, what was the record in relation to the deficits of those years? The hon. gentleman assumed office by proposing an increased revenue, with the view of preventing deficits. He made the declaration that it was little less than criminal for a Finance Minister to go on from year to year with increasing deficits. And what do we find? In spite of two changes in the Tariff, one realising, or expected to realise, somewhere about $3,000,000, and another over $1,000,000, we found in 1875-6 a deficit of $1,900,785; in 1876-7 a deficit of $1,460,027; in 1877-8, $1,128,146; in 1878-9, $1,948,009; or, in all, deficits which are not and cannot be disputed—which are established by the records of Parliament—amounting to $6,436,967. While this is quite clear, as established by the statements of the Finance Minister, and by what everyone knows in relation to the affairs of those years, all are equally aware that the last deficit would have been very much greater, but for the changes made in the Tariff last Session. The Estimate of the hon. the Finance Minister has not been impugned by hon. gentlemen opposite, so it is very evident that, but for the recent changes, there would have been an increased deficit from Customs of $700,000; and from Excise of $600,000, making in all an increased deficit of $1,300,000, so that the actual deficits, instead of being the amount I have named, would, but for those changes, have reached about $8,126,968, or not less than an average of $2,031,742. I omitted from this amount another item which, as clearly established by the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), ought to have been added, $390,000, which was charged to capital and renewal account, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and which, properly speaking, and according to Mr. Tims, the Auditor of that road, ought to have been charged to ordinary expenditure. Then, as to the ordinary expenditure under the hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we must, in the nature of things, look forward to a somewhat increased expenditure almost every year. We are a growing community; new interests are springing up and new obligations must necessarily fall upon us, which will, in the very nature of things, involve a larger expenditure. But that was not the view taken by hon. gentlemen opposite when they formerly sat on that side of the House. Their charge against the Conservative Government and party was that they were extravagant, reckless; that, if careful in the administration of public affairs, they might largely reduce the annual expenditure. We have, therefore, a right to hold them responsible and judge them now by their own standard. What do we find? In 1873-4, hon. gentlemen opposite made it appear by the Public Accounts that the expenditure for that year was $23,316,316. But I think I may say that the argument of the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), when sitting on the other side of the House, in relation to the expenditure of that year, relating to the items charged to ordinary expenditure which ought to have been charged to capital account, has never been impugned, much less answered. Of items included in the ordinary expenditure of that year, in order to afford basis of comparison, I venture to think, with other years, and enable them to make an exhibit more favourable to themselves with subsequent expenditures, we find no less a sum than $1,022,823, made up of $69,330 re funds made by hon. gentlemen opposite on the eve of the General Elections, to an important railway in this country, and which, certainly, were not fairly chargeable to the expenditure of that year; $545,625 in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, which had never been before, and was not properly chargeable to ordinary expenditure; and $407,868 spent in connection with the Dawson route, while similar expenditure afterwards, under the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, was always charged to capital account. So the actual expenditure of that year, instead of being $23,000,000 odd, was but $22,493,423. Did those hon. gentlemen reduce that expenditure, or so act as to justify the confidence they claimed from the country as strict economists in relation to public expenditure? They did not. In 1874-5 they increased the expenditure over the highest of the previous Administration by $1,417,678; in 1875-6, by $2,152,179; in 1876-7, by $1,223,908; in 1877-8, by $1,203,156; in 1878-9, they increased it by $2,155,381, or an aggregate increase of expenditure in those five years, over what they themselves had declared to be an extravagant expenditure on the part of their predecessors, of $8,153,092, to which must again be added $390,000 which Mr. Tims declared properly belonged to the ordinary expenditure of the country, when we have no less than an average of $1,708,618 a year expended by hon. gentlemen opposite in excess of the highest expenditure of the extravagant Government that preceded them. But the ex-Finance Minister, referring to the Estimates for the present year of $25,000,000, tells us that these Estimates are enough to fill every hon. gentleman who desires the welfare of the country with serious alarm and misgivings, for the amount which the Government considers the least with which they can carry on the government of the country, those Estimates, which he puts at $25,000,000. What were the hon. gentleman's Estimates the first two years he was in office? Here are the appropriations actually made for those two years, from which it will be seen that the statement of the hon. member for Cumberland the other night was strictly in accordance with the Appropriation Act, and cannot, on any ground, be impugned. Here is this statement: In 1874 the amount voted in the Appropriation Act was over $26,000,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Does the hon. gentleman suppose that was the original estimate?

MR. WHITE: I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said, but this was the sum of money he obtained for that year, although he did not spend it. The next year he asked for even a larger amount towards defraying the general charges, namely, $27,117,107.20. So the first year the hon. gentleman brought in an appropriation he asked for $26,000,000, the next year he asked for $27,000,000, but now he is horrified at the fact that the hon. gentleman asked for $25,000,000. It is quite true he did not spend all these sums, but the very next year, although he asked for $23,000,000, he spent $1,250,000 more than he asked for, showing that when he asked for too much he got alarmed at what he asked for and spent less, but when he placed the appropriation at a lower sum he spent $1,250,000 more than the Appropriation Act involved. So much for the financial aspects of the late Administration. So much for the taunt of the hon. gentleman opposite, that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House display a want of skill and ability and carefulness in the administration of the affairs of the country. Now I come to the broader question which has been engaging the attention of this House; and if the House will permit me before I enter into particular details in reference to it, I desire to refer for a moment to a purely personal matter. I sat for two or three Sessions in the gallery where those gentlemen are industriously employed in reporting the debates of the House, and I was compelled to listen to hon. gentlemen who considered my opinions, although I was not a public man, of sufficient importance to make them the subject of quotation and discussion on the floor of Parliament. Last year, although I did not happen to hear it, one hon. gentleman, an ex-Minister, did me the honour to refer to those opinions also. The same hon. gentleman, in a quiet, genial, joking way, last night, suggested to me, when I told him I did not propose to answer everything said on the other side, that perhaps I would consent to answer what I myself had said in former years. Now, I propose to take up the time of this House for a few moments in dealing with these charges, once for all. I do not introduce this personal matter out of consideration to myself, because I think my course a consistent one; but I know how these things are used for the purpose of influencing public sentiment outside, and it is for that reason I propose to refer to this matter. It is charged that while a member of the Dominion Board of Trade I expressed Free-trade opinions, that I was a pronounced Free-trader. In support of this, hon. gentlemen have quoted from the report of the proceedings of that Board. When I went into the Library to get the volume containing that report, I found everywhere ink-marks emphasising particular phrases and words, and I think I can hear hon. gentlemen as they came to these precise words giving them the desired emphasis, having prepared the emphasis in advance, in order to convince the House and the country that I formerly held these Free-trade views. It would have been honest on the part of hon. gentlemen if they had read the first sentence of the speech from which they have so often quoted against me. What is the difference to-day between the two parties of this House? What was the issue successfully fought by hon. gentlemen who now control the majority of this Parliament? It was this: that it was the duty of the Government, in certain conditions of the country, to adopt such fiscal legislation as would promote the prosperity and well-being of the country, as would give life and energy to its industries, and as would promote its commercial prosperity. What is the view I took in 1873?

How did I define my position? Here are the first words of the speech from which hon. gentlemen have quoted. I will read them and ask hon. gentlemen to say if they do not embody the issue presented to the people at the last election as between this party and that. I said:

"I wish to adduce some reasons for voting against the resolution which has been proposed by Mr. Wilkes, and why I think the Board ought to accept the amendment I have placed in your hands. I have no hesitation in saying that I am a Protectionist to this extent: I believe it is possible for the Government, by the adoption of a fiscal policy, to nurture, protect and promote the industries of the country. The Free-trade principle, on the contrary, is that just in proportion as it does interfere, it injures rather than benefits the manufacturing interests. From this doctrine I entirely dissent. It is quite possible for the Government to promote the manufacturing interests of a country; and especially in a new country like this, where there is not much accumulated wealth, where manufactures must be started on a very small scale, and where the market is limited, it is the duty of the Government to do what it can to promote them, by the adoption of a fiscal policy on the principle of incidental Protection."

These, Sir, were the initial words of the speech the hon. gentlemen have referred to, and what was the appreciation of it at the time? Let me give Mr. Wilkes's reply. He spoke immediately after me, and you will see what was the impression that my remarks made upon him. Mr. Wilkes said:

"The end of all such systems as Mr. White advocates is 'Protection all round.' One man wants his 'raw material' free of duty; but his raw material is the 'manufactured article' of some other person, therefore there must be Protection all round."

That was the answer of the gentleman with whom I was discussing the question. It followed immediately after the speech I had made, and he declared that he regarded it as a Protectionist speech, and one which involved Protection all round. It was therefore certainly not open to the charge hon. gentlemen have since made in relation to it. I have nothing to recall in connection with the ground I took on that occasion. I warned Protectionists, Protectionist as I was myself, that in the then condition of the country any attempt to get a higher duty than 15 per cent. would cause public agitation on the subject of increased taxation, and result in a want of permanence and a danger of reaction, and that a reduction back to or below 15 per cent. would do more harm than an increased duty would do good. What, Mr. Speaker, was the position of the country in 1873? We had had large revenues and a series of surpluses; upwards of $10,000,000, saved out of the revenue of the country, had gone into public works, or in other words in the reduction of the Public Debt. We were in a condition of prosperity so great that the hon. member for Centre Huron declared that we mistook inflation for prosperity. Every industry in the country was flourishing, every branch of commerce was flourishing, and every man in the country, who was willing to work, had the opportunity of working; and the argument I used then was that at that time, under those circumstances, it would not be desirable to have an increase of duty. More than that, the influence of competition from our friends on the other side of the line had not yet commenced to develop itself; they had not got over the effects of their terrible fratricidal war. A large amount of smuggled goods went into that country out of this; tourists every year took back with them by the underground railway enough to do them for the rest of the year, and saved in the difference of price the cost of their trip. That was the position in which we stood at that time; and if that speech is examined, it will be found by any man who knows anything of the commercial condition then, and the change which has taken place since, that the argument which had force in 1873 could have no force in 1878. Will any one pretend to say that the conditions were in any way the same, at the two periods; in 1878 we found every industry in a state of prostration, we found every commercial interest in such a state of depression as was never seen before. The proposition I laid down in opening that speech was that being in the power of the Government, it was their duty to adopt such a fiscal policy as would improve the industries and enhance the prosperity of the country at large. That was the doctrine that was carried out in 1879, and that was the doctrine I advanced in 1873. There was no inconsistency; there was no going back on one's-self, even supposing a going back on one's-self would have been a crime. What do we find in Canada to-day? Many men who were strong Free-traders in 1873, men who were Cobdenites of the Cobdenites, who looked upon Free-trade as an axiom, as a dogma, that could not be departed from without committing sacrilege, we find such men as these in 1878 and 1879 coming into line as Protectionists. Before the hard practical facts of our position, all these theories of Free-trade had to be cast to the winds; and we find these men, convinced and constrained by solid facts, giving in their adhesion to the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury Benches. But it is a curious fact that, at the same meeting of the Board of Trade, Mr. Harty, of Kingston, brought up the question of the 10 per cent. differential duties upon tea, and what I said then was this:

Is not that precisely the same argument as has been used by me ever since? But for the fact that the statements to which I have been replying, have been used to the prejudice of my political friends—I am indifferent to them myself—I would not have troubled the House by referring to them. And now, Mr. Speaker, what has been the result of the National Policy for the last year? It is premature to attempt to judge of such a radical change after the few months of its operation. If we were unable to point to a single specific case of great advantage resulting from it, I venture to say that all sensible men would admit that it should have a fair opportunity of developing, whatever the result. But what is the fact? Fortunately this policy has acted almost with magical influence in changing the position of things in relation to a large number of industries. At first there were difficulties in connection with the working of the details in the Custom House. It was a radical change; it involved at the beginning certain difficulties in the making out of invoices and entries in all those practical operations connected with the passing of goods through the Custom Houses of the country; and there is no doubt that at the outset some difficulties had to be encountered. There may have been some importers, there may be some still, who regard it as a nuisance, just as all men may be supposed to regard all Custom Houses as a nuisance. There is scarcely a traveller who has his luggage overhauled and tossed about who does not regard Custom Houses as a nuisance. But, notwithstanding these difficulties, I venture to say that the feeling in favour of the policy to-day will be found as strong, nay, stronger after the experience of those months of its working, than the proposition to adopt it was in 1878. There are one or two subjects that I desire to refer to specially, as these proved to be important topics of discussion, and particularly one subject on which some most extravagant statements were made by the gentlemen on the other side of the House. I allude to the effect of the duties on sugar. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) said the other day that the effect of these duties was to add from a cent to a cent and a half a pound to the price of sugar to the Canadian consumer; and the hon. ex-Minister of Finance went so far as to say it had increased the price from three to three and a quarter cents per pound. There is nothing like going it strong when one is at it; and the hon. gentlemen understand that maxim perfectly. But what are the facts? The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) should be the last man to attack us on this side for having adopted these duties; they are not a whit more protective than the policy he himself introduced in 1874; scarcely more protective than the Order in Council by which he tried to protect the sugar-refiners in Montreal. And it was only when having tried to do so then and in his failing to do it, not having the knowledge that he was trying to do what he was not legally permitted to do, it was only after that, that he became so bitter against the "legalised robbery" about which we have heard so much. But I repeat, what are the facts with regard to this alleged increase in the prices of sugar? I have the prices of granulated sugar in Canada, and so that there can be no doubt about it, I will hand this to the reporter, so that everyone can verify it for themselves. The fact is that the average price of granulated sugar in 1876 was $9.50; the average price in 1877 was $10.66; the average price in 1878 was $9.34; the average price in 1879 was $9.00. Here are the figures, so that hon. gentlemen can verify them if they please:—

Wholesale trade prices of granulated sugar for the last four years in Montreal:—

The average price of sugar was, then, lower in 1879 than in any of the three preceding years. The hon. gentleman, the member for Lambton, will thus see that instead of an increase we have had an actual decrease in the price of sugar.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman allow me? What I said was this: that the Tariff had the effect of raising the price of sugar from half a cent to over a cent a pound more than it would have been under the old Tariff.

MR. WHITE: I know what the hon. gentleman said; I know the hon. gentleman's argument; and I have not ventured to address this House without being fully prepared to meet it. These are the prices of the wholesale dealers. I will repeat them: $9.50 in 1876; $10.66 in 1877; $9.34 in 1878; and $9.00 in 1879; it came down to $9 after this "legalised robbery" came into operation, after we had taken to "washing our sugar," which is the highest conception that the hon. member for Centre Huron has of the business of sugar refining. In 1879, after the adoption of this policy, the refinery in Montreal re-opened its doors to the great joy and delight of many workmen who had been hoping against hope that the time would come when they would be earning a fair day's wages for an honest day's work. The first effect was to lower the price of sugar. It was argued that this was owing to the large amount of sugar in store, which had been brought into the country in anticipation of the new Tariff. The refineries were then blamed for dropping the price 1c. per pound. But another effect was produced. Not only was the price last year less than it was three years ago, but in times of scarcity and speculative excitement in regard to sugar, the home industry has kept down prices. In November last, a fact which will probably answer the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), sugar was quoted in New York at $8 per 100lb., net cash in bond, after the drawback was deducted. Under the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite the cost in New York would have been $8; 25 per cent. and 1c. duty, and freight and the other charges would have made the total cost of the sugar in Canada $11.35 per 100lb. The highest price reached in Canada last year was $10.33, and that, I think, is a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman. Then I have another illustration to give: in June, 1877, when there was no refinery in Canada, a sharp rise took place in sugar. In New York, at that time, granulated sugar was quoted at $7.84, net cash in bond, and the price in Canada, under the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, rose to $11.62 per 100lb. Last year, however, when the price in New York went up to $8, the price in Canada was only $10.73. The fact, therefore, is that the people of Canada, instead of having their sugar increased in price, have got it 1c. cheaper than they would have done had not the present Tariff come into operation. But there is another view. The price is higher than it was a few months ago, but it has gone up in sympathy with the increase in the cost of raw sugar. Here are the facts: Between April and November last year raw sugar advanced 49½ per cent. in New York, and refined 31 per cent., while refined in Canada only advanced 27½ per cent. The facts I have given are not mere suppositions, not mere deductions from assumed conditions, but literal facts, and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot shut their eyes to their true significance. I am aware that you will see in the Globe, and other organs of hon. gentlemen opposite, from time to time, figures to show that there has been a large increase in the price of sugar, figures comparing things which are dissimilar, refiners' prices in New York with merchants' prices in Canada; but the facts I have submitted are not based on calculations or suppositions, or mere estimates based upon some form of argument, but are actual facts, showing that we have lost nothing but gained vastly in consequence of the establishment of the refinery. And that being the case, let us ask if the country has been benefitted in other respects by the establishment of this industry. The hon. member for Centre Huron talked about the 300 people engaged in the refinery. Now, there are 400 male adults employed therein. The employes are not, as in some industries, boys, children, and young women, but male adults, many of them being heads of families. And there are other industries connected with the sugar refinery. There is the stave industry, and I may state that a large market has been opened for staves in consequence of the re-opening of the refinery. Then the coopers who make the barrels are benefitted, and the coal-owners receive no small amount of benefit; since for every ton of sugar that is made, a ton of coal is consumed. That fact should encourage our friends from Nova Scotia. But, above all, a trade is being established with the West Indies, which will certainly assume large proportions. One peculiarity of this industry is, that it not only employs the people of the country, but it tends to establish a foreign trade of the best and most valuable kind. Last year I quoted from the American apostle of Free-trade, Mr. Wells. I will not repeat the quotation, but will simply remind hon. gentlemen that that gentleman—whose opinions ought to be accepted by them as gospel, whose opinions are of such importance that when the Depression Committee met some years ago, the first evidence taken was a letter from Mr. Wells—states that the sugar industry, from the point of view of developing and building up a foreign trade, ought always to be maintained and promoted. It will be admitted that anything that develops the shipping interest of Montreal is a matter of Dominion concern. That will be admitted by all parties; and I am sure, therefore, that the House will be glad to learn that this policy has had an important influence in that direction. I quote from the report of the Chairman of the Harbour Trust of Montreal, as follows:—

“It may not be out of place here to say that in looking whence the increase in revenue was derived, the first large item was from sugar. The imports of this article were via the St. Lawrence, in 1878, over twelve million pounds, Say 12,289,843 lbs.
And in 1879 64,375,656 “

and which yielded to the revenue $7,800 more than the previous year.

“To bring this quantity of sugar to our wharves there were employed (besides partial cargoes) no less than 45 vessels laden with sugar, aggregating 29,731 tons, and whose tonnage dues yielded to the harbour a revenue of $4,552, while it may be safely estimated that the outward wharfage dues paid on these vessels was not less than $5,000 more.

“Coal is another large item of increase. The imports via the harbour for 1879 being 183,231 tons, and for the previous year, 142,754 tons. The quantity from the Maritime Provinces last year, 55,917 tons, and this year, 117,256 tons; an increase of 61,339 tons.

“The additional revenue derivable from this source is on coal, $4,600; and the increase of tonnage and wharfage outward will make this item at least as much more.”

That is one of the results of the adoption of the National Policy, and everyone must admit that it has been beneficial to the shipping interests of the St. Lawrence. I saw a petition of the Board of Trade of the city of St. Catharines the other day, which referred to the practical benefits to internal navigation which would result from cheapening the charges on shipping at Montreal. Then there is the question of the West India trade, the great importance of which may be inferred from the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite were negotiating to give a direct money subsidy to a steamship company to carry the mails to those islands, and thus promote the trade with them. I think that was a wise policy, for I regard the West India trade as perhaps the most important feature in connection with the development of the foreign trade of this country. We have just had laid on the Table a return of the imports for the six months ending 31st December, in 1878 and 1879 respectively. Taking sugar of all sorts for the sake of my argument, I find that the imports from Great Britain in 1878 amounted to 19,038,564lb. In 1879, they were about 9,961,195lb. The imports from the United States in 1878 were 36,635,630lb., but last year they were reduced to 8,227,462lb. The imports from the British and Spanish West Indies were 4,517,857lb. in 1878, and last year they were increased to 36,030,051lb. Thus from Great Britain we imported a little more than over half as many pounds as we had imported the corresponding six months of the previous year. From the United States we only imported a little less than one-fourth of what was imported before, while our importations from the West Indies were about eight times more than they were the preceding year. Will anyone undertake to tell me that this is not an advantage to the interests of this country? But there is another fact which I ought not to omit. We find that from the Spanish possessions in the Pacific, from Brazil, and from the Dutch East Indies, the imports had passed out of existence in 1878, but in 1879 we find that no less than 5,368,256lb. of sugar were imported from those countries. I venture to believe that that trade will assume important proportions. As a market for lumber we know that the South American countries will become important traders with Canada, and the fact that we have been able in one year, as the result of the policy adopted last Session, to establish an import trade from those countries, indicates another form in which this policy has been of great advantage to this country. But we were told, I think by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) in those magnificent tones in which he addresses the House, that Messrs. Redpath and Company have cleared $600,000 in a single year by the operation of this Tariff. How he managed to get the exact figures of their profits must puzzle most hon. members. It is not usual for merchants to give their account books to members of Parliament for the purpose of enabling them to state their exact profits. They did not make that amount, though I wish they had; but if they had made it, the simple question arises, whether we had better not have, after the results I have shown to flow from this policy, $600,000 made in a single year by Canadians, added to the wealth of the people of this country, to be used in it, than made by Americans, to be added to their wealth and strength, and to be expended in the United States. The strength and wealth of the country are, after all to be found in the wealth of its individual citizens, and just in proportion as we can build up trade, and make it profitable for capitalists to come here and make fortunes, instead of going to the United States, spending them there, and thus adding to the resources of our civilisation, just in that proportion will we make the country desirable to live in and promote and foster its best interests. From sugar to tea is an easy transition. I come, therefore, to deal with the tea duties. The Toronto Globe, I think on Saturday last, was kind enough to say that I was in some way responsible for the adoption of this policy. I make no such pretence. I take my share of the responsibility, like every other other hon. member who votes in favour of it. But if responsible for it, I should not in any way regret that responsibility. What was the tendency of the former Tariff in connection with tea? It was to centre the tea distributing trade in New York, while the object of this Tariff was to centre it, so far as regards this country, in the Canadian cities instead. Let me ask, judging by the statements laid on the Table, what has been the practical result? It is this: the imports during the six months of 1878, from Great Britain, were 2,056,520lb.; last year they were 3,171,212lb. Considering that this Tariff was to destroy our trade with Great Britain, that is a tolerably good exhibit. This tea probably came in ships from England, thus contributing to build up our trade with it, and helping to establish our export trade as well. From China and Japan our imports of tea in 1878 were 575,529lb., and last year, 1,486,349lb. From the United States in 1878, imports were 3,516,314lb., and in 1879 they fell to 1,415,092lb. That is to say, our imports from Great Britain increased for the six months some 54 per cent.; from China and Japan 158 per cent., while from the United States they decreased 60 per cent. Yet in face of these returns, the Globe asks us today with the 10 per cent. duty in order to prevent the tea trade being centred in the United States. It has had the effect intended, that is, of centring in Canadian cities the tea distributing trade of the Dominion, instead of centring it in New York. I am aware there is a strong disposition on the part of certain New York merchants to establish brokerages and send tea from China and Japan, specially shipped, directly to our Canadian cities—to Toronto, Montreal and Hamilton; and that some of our Canadian merchants feel that that would be a practical evasion of the law. This is a matter which I am sure will engage the earnest attention of the Government, as to whether it is an evasion of the law. If there is a means of preventing it, I am quite sure that the merchants can depend on Ministers giving a fair and candid ear to any of their complaints—in this respect, as in many others, proving a striking contrast to their experience under the late Government. The distributing centre for us is now this country, the tea coming here direct from the place of production to those brokers. The only difference is simply this: whether the question of nationality can be in any way made a bar to the importation of goods to this country, or whether the question of ownership may be made a qualification for their importation. I offer no opinion in relation to the subject, but simply content myself with drawing the natural conclusion from the results of the last six months.

There was another subject a good deal discussed last year, and to some extent this Session as well, namely, the effect of the duty on coal. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite, who seize on every evidence of depression, as if it was a sweet morsel to be rolled under their tongues, who seem to revel in the idea that some industries are not as prosperous as they might be, and that some people are still poor, depressed, down-trodden by commercial disaster, that the fact is that, in spite of the 50c. per ton duty put on coal, the output in Nova Scotia, or the sales, have decreased about 4,000 tons. Now, the output has increased about 18,000 tons. There was an issue of fact raised the other day between the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron). The hon. members opposite, who are so ready to charge the hon. member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) with inaccuracies, generally find that he never makes a statement in Parliament unless he has the assurance that it is founded on fact. The hon. gentleman stated that there had been an increased sale in Canada of coal, and this statement was vehemently denied. Well, the facts are these: In Nova Scotia, the sales in 1879 were 688,626 tons, and in 1878, 693,511 tons; in British Columbia in 1879, they were 228,974 tons, and in 1878, 190,640 tons, making the total sales in Canada in 1879, 917,600 tons, against 884,151 in 1878, or an increase for 1879 of 33,449 tons. But, after all, perhaps the hon. gentlemen opposite were not so much to blame for not remembering this fact; they scarcely realise that British Columbia is a part of this Dominion. I do not wonder they forget altogether that there are sources of wealth, enterprise, and natural advantages in the Pacific Province which will, I believe, in the near future, make it—and I sincerely hope my prediction may turn out correct—one of the most important and wealthy Provinces of the Dominion. But what would have been the effect, but for this duty of 50c. per ton?

MR. MILLS: In British Columbia?

MR. WHITE: The hon. member for Bothwell wants to know something about British Columbia. He will have an opportunity of answering me, and if we have the same result from his answer as on a former occasion, when he was dealing with commercial questions, the House will not be very much edified. It is well known that the new residences and other buildings erected in St. John, New Brunswick, have been so constructed, as to furnaces, as to largely use anthracite coal, where formerly bituminous coal was used. As a consequence, chiefly of this, the export to New Brunswick of Nova Scotia coal last year decreased 31,000 tons. Last year coal everywhere was cheaper than for years before. We of the cities, who were alarmed at the predictions of the hon. gentlemen opposite last year as to the frightful price we were to pay for our coal, were relieved to find that we got it cheaper—I do not say on account of the National Policy—than for years before. The result of the low price of coal in the United States was the closing of that market to the Nova Scotia coal-owners, the actual decrease of their exports of coal to the New England States being 36,000 tons. Will anyone pretend that that was a result of the National Policy? The result is simply this: the sale of 67,000 tons less to New Brunswick and the United States, was made up to the coal-owners of Nova Scotia, in consequence of the 50c. per ton imposed last year, enabling them to send that quantity additional to Quebec and Ontario, thus compensating for the decline elsewhere. We know that the cotton industry, also, has improved under the National Policy; that in Montreal the Hudon cotton factory has doubled its capacity; that the Stormont factory has been built in Cornwall; that the factory in Valleyfield has succeeded for the first time in paying a small dividend to its shareholders; that in Hamilton contracts are let for a new cotton factory, to run on special lines of coloured cotton; and in the town of Coaticooke, in the county of Stanstead, so worthily represented by the hon. gentleman who sits beside me (Mr. Colby), another cotton factory is being established. Hardly a newspaper that comes to us but brings intelligence of new industries springing up in different parts of the country. Then, Sir, what was the effect of the Tariff on the importations of cotton? The imports from Great Britain in 1878 were 1,528,364 yards of cotton; in 1879, 787,542 yards; from the United States, in 1878, we imported 3,962,625 yards; while in 1879 the imports decreased to 1,619,814 yards. The decrease from Great Britain was 49 per cent., and from the United States 59 per cent., all of which was filled up from the products of our own cotton factories, employing our own people, expending money in our own country, and giving courage to the various commercial enterprises of the land. I shall not refer at length to the question of agricultural Protection. I believe, however, our agriculturists will derive their chief advantage under the Protective policy adopted, from the building up of prosperous centres, affording ready and convenient markets for the perishable products of the farm. But, after all, something appears to have been done for agricultural Protection when we examine the returns to which I have referred. The imports of Indian corn which were 1,412,575 bushels, deducting imports for re-export in 1878, decreased to 548,973 in 1879, the difference being made up by the consumption of the coarse grains grown by Canadian farmers themselves. The quantity of oats imported from the United States in 1878 was 1,598,001 bushels, deducting imports for re-export, which decreased in 1879 to 26,759 bushels. One of the effects of the policy of the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite was, when there was a surplus of oats in Chicago or the Western States market, that it was brought into Canada, to the prejudice of the Canadian farmer. One of the first results of this Tariff has practically been to exclude American oats from our market, undoubtedly to the advantage of the Canadian farmer. Of rye there was imported in 1878, 73,243 bushels; in 1879 that amount was reduced to 918 bushels. In the article of wheat, I deduct that imported for re-exportation, and I find that in 1878 a little over half a million bushels of American wheat, 4,203,911 bushels, were imported into Canada for consumption, and last year it was reduced to 6,466 bushels, a fact that I venture to think, had some influence upon the prosperity of the farmers of this country, in view of the large crops which happily they were blessed with last year. Last year we heard a great deal about the destruction of the oatmeal mills, yet I find that though those mills had all been destroyed, the year before last we imported 739,000lb. of oatmeal from the United States, while last year we only imported 78,548lb., and that in spite of the fact that the oatmeal mills had all been closed up. Where the people got their porridge heaven only knows. As to flour, we find that there were imported for consumption into Canada 225,906 barrels in 1878, and only 50,478 barrels in 1879, the difference being made up with flour from Canadian wheat, ground in Canadian mills. Now, these facts taken from the official record of the first six months of this policy, are such as to show that the Government which introduced the policy has no reason to go back upon it, and the people who sustained them in its introduction have reason to be glad that they did so. We were told last year that one of the effects of this policy would be to destroy our export trade. We were told that the Government had placed such impediments upon the export trade of grain by the St. Lawrence that it would be entirely destroyed. What is the fact? In respect to the port of Montreal, I take the facts from the report of the Secretary of the Corn Exchange of Montreal, than whom there is no man more careful in his statements, and I find that in 1877 the shipments of grain from that port, including flour and meal, amounted to 17,346,678 bushels; in 1878 they were 20,899,187, and in 1879, 22,725,246. Of this the wheat receipts at that port increased 53 per cent. over those of 1878, and the shipments increased 53·77 per cent. over the shipments of the previous year. There are those who say that this is entirely the result of the better crops that we have had not only in Canada but the United States, and it is said that there was also a larger export from American ports generally of grain than during the preceding year. That is true. They tell us that although our exports have increased largely, the increase is not proportionately as large as in the exports from American ports. What are the facts? Unfortunately, Mr. Patterson, the Secretary of the Montreal Corn Exchange, was not able to procure for me the exports from all the American ports during the last year, but I have the exports from the port of New York. I find that the receipts at Montreal show an increase in grain of all sorts of 5.74 percent., and at the port of New York an increase of 6 percent. But there is a difference between the receipts and shipments that ought not to be overlooked. In the city of New York, as in all the American ports, a large part of the receipts of grain that go there is for local consumption, and not for exportation, while at the city of Montreal, all but 2 percent. of the receipts are seen in the shipments. I have not the returns from the city of New York as to their shipments in 1879, but I have as to their shipments and receipts for 1878, and if that be a criterion, then the shipments at the city of Montreal show a higher percentage of increase than the shipments at the city of New York. In the latter place there is a difference of 29 percent. between the receipts and shipments, and in the city of Montreal a difference of 2 percent.; so that, taking, as I have said, this as the criterion by which to judge of the results of last year, the increased percentage at the port of Montreal is actually greater than the increased percentage at the port of New York. Now, we had some other predictions relative to this policy. We were told it was going to cause a feeling of irritation in England, that it would inevitably loosen the tie that binds us to the Mother Country, and that, in fact, it was a first step towards the severing of that tie altogether. What has been the result? I will ask hon. gentlemen of this House on either side whether there ever was a time in the history of England or of Canada when Canada stood better in England than it does at this moment? Why, when the hon. the Finance Minister went home to get his loan he made a loan that hon. gentlemen opposite are compelled to say was a good and favourable one; and when the hon. member for Centre Huron is forced to say a good thing of a political opponent we may make up our minds that the thing is very good indeed. We find that the Premier of England made Canada the special subject of one of his speeches in Great Britain, directing attention to this country as the future home of thousands of the people of Great Britain. We find that the tenant farmers of England, sending out their delegates to this country, have received reports back which point out this fact, which, I think, as British subjects we may be proud of, that in moving to Canada the Englishman simply crosses the sea, but does not change his institutions or his flag, still remaining under the aegis of the British Crown. Then we have the Commissioners from the Royal Commission, appointed to enquire into the subject of the agricultural depression in England, visiting Canada and going back with the most friendly declarations, and with the most friendly reports in relation to the present and the future of this country. So that, so far from there having been a loosening of the tie, I believe, the tie is being steadily strengthened; that so far as England is concerned, this Colony never stood in higher estimation in England than it does to-day. It is quite true that we had read to us the other day, a letter from the Right Hon. John Bright, saying that he regarded this Tariff as a very bad one, and that it would lead to a severance of the connection between the two countries. But it is well known that Mr. Bright has never been very favourable to Colonial connection. I can remember when in England a few years ago there was undoubtedly a tendency towards an anti-Colonial feeling, no man was more forward in the expression of that feeling than the right hon. gentleman whose letter was read to us the other day. I venture to think that, with all respect for the Right Hon. Mr. Bright—and no one has a higher respect for him than I have—I venture to think that we in Canada understand our business and our interests as well as he does. We find many men coming to this side who, before they came here, were as firm as Mr. Bright in their Free-trade opinions, and who in England were regarded as authorities and apostles in Free-trade principles. But finding themselves here and face to face with the position of this country, its relations to the neighbouring Republic, its peculiar commercial position, they have admitted that the policy we have adopted is the only one that can save us from absolute commercial annihilation. I think we may fairly offset the opinion of Mr. Bright by the opinions of such gentlemen as these. But we were told also that this policy was going to produce a feeling of irritation in the United States, that they were certain to resent our action, that the moment they found this policy adopted here they would pass laws to retaliate upon us, and that as forty-five millions were so much more powerful than four and a-half millions on this side, it was folly for us to enter upon so unequal a struggle. What has been the result? Has there been any such feeling on the other side? So far from that being the case we find things going on just as they were. A few weeks ago they had put an embargo upon the importation of Canadian cattle into their territory, and everybody who looked upon our National Policy as a bad one, immediately said that that was evidence of their intention to retaliate. Well, they have removed the embargo, our Government having been able to convince them that there was no danger to American cattle from Canadian cattle going into their territory. Only last week I had a letter from a friend, who is a member of the Massachusetts Legislature; he takes a great interest in Canadian affairs, and is Honorary Secretary of the Board of Trade of the United States. In this letter he encloses a resolution passed by the House of Representatives of the Protectionist State of Massachusetts, showing very clearly that there is no feeling of irritation, but, on the contrary, a growing disposition that better trade relations between the two countries are in the interests of both. Here is the resolution, passed on St. Patrick's day—the better the day the better the deed:

“Whereas, A joint resolution has been proposed in the National House of Representatives for the appointment of a Commission, to confer with a Commission to be appointed by the Government of Great Britain, and thereby to ascertain and report on what basis a treaty of reciprocal trade can be negotiated for the mutual benefit of the people of the United States, and of the British Provinces adjacent to our northern frontier, therefore,

“Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in General Court assembled:

“That the renewal of reciprocal trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada and other British Provinces of North America, will be of great benefit to the people of this Commonwealth; and this Legislature desires that Congress may provide for a competent Commission to co-operate with the State Department under such regulations as shall be deemed expedient, with a view of applying principles of Reciprocity to so much of the trade between the two countries as may promote their mutual interests.

“And His Excellency the Governor is hereby requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress for their earnest consideration.”

That, Sir, is the resolution passed only last week in the Protectionist House of Representatives of the Protectionist State of Massachusetts, showing that far from there being any disposition to retaliate, there is a disposition to draw nearer and closer the bonds of commercial connection between the two countries, with a view of bringing about that free interchange of such articles as may fairly be interchanged between the two countries without injury to either, but on the contrary to their great mutual advantage. So I think we may say that as to these particular predictions they have not up to the present time been realised. But there are some objections which hon. gentlemen have urged to this policy. They tell us that prices have gone up; they tell us the poor man has to pay much more for everything he purchases, and that he gets no more for his labour. Well, Sir, I might satisfy myself on this point by saying that the testimony of hon. gentlemen opposite is that increased prosperity invariably brings higher prices. I might refer to the fact that the hon. member for Centre Huron, in his speech only the other night, admitted that he trusted to increased prices in his last Budget speech, for an increase of revenue which would enable him to bring the revenue and expenditure to an equilibrium. Here, from the speech of the hon. gentleman, is what he said:

“We have been blamed for not imposing further taxes in 1876. What was our position then? We had recently imposed heavy taxes. We knew that we were very close to the true effective limit of indirect taxation, and also that a very slight revival in the price of ordinary staple articles would suffice to restore our revenue, and therefore we determined that it was our duty to practice the strictest economy, and to exhaust all reasonable means before adding any further to the burden of the people.”

So that that hon. gentleman himself actually based his hopes of a restoration of the equilibrium between revenue and expenditure upon the coming better times, and the coming of better prices as the consequence of those better times, which he looked forward to in the early future. Not only that, but he also said, accounting for such prosperity as he admits we are now enjoying:

"The facts are that while we have been blessed with a remarkably good harvest, there has been a great scarcity, amounting to positive famine, existing through a large portion of Europe; that prices and wages have gone up in the United States, and, as a consequence, there is an improvement in that country—an improvement which gives us better sales for our lumber, and, in certain cases, better rates of transport for our transportation companies."

Thus we have the hon. gentleman, who only the other night told us that higher prices are evidences of increased prosperity, at the same time telling us that higher prices are a curse to the people of this country. But I happen to have here another authority—a couple of extracts from the leading organ of the Opposition, to the same effect. On February 3rd, the Toronto Globe was urging the importance of the immediate construction of the Ontario and Quebec Railway, and concluded its argument in these words:

"It is unnecessary to add that now is the time to proceed with the business. We are on the eve of a revival of business all the world over. With the revival will come a general rise in the price of material and labour by means of which the cost of railroad building will soon be almost doubled. At present labour is to be had in any quantity for very little money; but if time is lost, and the work of grading, and so forth, only entered upon when the good times come, the company will be competing for labour in an understocked market, and the great opportunity now presented will have passed away."

Then again, in a later article on the conduct of the hon. the Finance Minister in adopting to some extent specific instead of ad valorem duties in his Tariff, the same authority said:

"All these undesirable features are, in Sir Leonard's eyes, offset by the capacity of specific duties to prevent the revenue from falling in hard times, when the values of foreign merchandise is falling, and thus to avoid the necessity of the Government entering upon the same course of economy which circumstances have forced upon the people."

That is a statement that hard times means falling prices. The writer then points out the necessity for the Government adopting a course of economy, and proceeds:

"His specific duties will yield him no more because of the very great increase of values of the importation which has taken place and is still proceeding. Fortunately for the revenue, he has left a portion of his taxes in the ad valorem shape, and consequently he has not entirely thrown away the increased revenue to be obtained from rising values. But he has done enough in this direction entirely to vitiate any conclusion that the increase of revenue will accompany the increased value of importations as it formerly did. As we are now undoubtedly in the presence of a rising tide, the grand effect of the National Policy on the revenue is seen to be that it will again prevent us from reaping benefits which we should have reaped if the Tariff had been left alone."

There is a statement that the prices of importations are increasing, and the increase is still proceeding, not because of the National Policy, but because of the restoration of better times. And what prices are going that is made against the hon. the charge Minister? That while on the Finance up, in consequence of better times, the hon. gentleman is not going to tax the people additional on the ad valorem principle, on these higher prices, but he is going to leave their taxation at the same rate as before the increase took place. That is the argument used against the hon. gentleman. Then we are told that there have been a great many failures under this system. Well, unfortunately, I believe there will always be failures in commercial transactions. I heard a merchant of wide experience in commercial affairs say that of all the men who entered business not more than 10 per cent. succeeded. But, Sir, whether that is true or not, what are the actual facts with regard to the failures of last year? Are they due in any way to the National Policy? Are they not, on the contrary, due in the first instance to the fact that men, who had been hoping against hope, who had been struggling under the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite, were compelled at last to give up. And, in addition to that, the announcement made in this House last year that the Insolvency Act would be repealed within a year, induced many men who had doubts about their position to go through the Insolvency Court, in order that they might start afresh with the revival of trade. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) made the statement the other night, which it is worth repeating, that of the failures of 1879 nearly 40 per cent. occurred before the National Policy was adopted at all. Surely it will not be pretended that the National Policy was responsible for those failures. During the last quarter of the year, when it may be fairly assumed the National Policy had commenced to have some influence on the trade of the country, only 16 per cent. of all the failures of the year took place. Yet these hon. gentlemen aggregate the figures and throw them broadcast through the country, in order, if possible, to show that there had been no revival in the commercial condition of the country. Now let me give you as a proof that the knowledge of the fact that we were going to repeal the Insolvency Law had something to do with the number of failures, the experience of our friends on the other side. I find that in 1878, when, as everyone knows, times were beginning to be better in the United States, there was a larger number of failures than had ever taken place in one year in the United States. I find in that year there were 10,478 failures and the aggregate sum involved in those failures amounted to $234,383,132. What is the remark made by the compiler of the work from which I quote, Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress, in relation to those figures? He says: "The larger proportional number of failures in 1878 is attributable to the repeal of the National Bankrupt Law taking effect September 1, 1878, and availed of by many seeking a discharge from their obligations." That, Sir, is precisely the same experience as has taken place here. A statement was made by one of the hon. gentlemen opposite giving some specific facts in regard to the failures that had taken place. When hon. gentlemen deal in generalities, it is hard to meet them, but when they come down to specific facts, as they did on the sugar question, in regard to which I think I have successfully met them, they are readily answered. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) undertook to go into some specific facts in relation to the National Policy. His speech was in reply to the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) and the hon. member for Lincoln took the trouble, as any hon. gentleman should do, when the merchants, business men and manufacturers of his constituency are traduced, as these were by hon. gentlemen opposite, to enquire into these statements, and he has been kind enough to give me the result of his enquiries in the replies of those gentlemen. Now, Sir, what do we find? The hon. gentleman said that Yale and Company had failed, as the result of the National Policy. And yet we find that the attachment in insolvency was issued in 1877. He stated that the Dolphin Manufacturing Company was in the hands of an assignee, and yet, Sir, we find that the attachment was issued in April, 1878, when the hon. gentlemen opposite, to the great misfortune of this country, still occupied seats on this side of the House. Then we were told that Simpson's ship-yard had been closed as the result of the National Policy. The attachment was issued in 1877, when hon. gentlemen opposite were still in power. Then we were told that R. H. Smith and Company's saw works had applied for exemption from taxation for five years, that so oppressed were they that they were compelled to apply for some little modicum of relief from the National Policy in exemption from municipal taxation. Now, here is a telegram from Mr. Smith. He says:

J. C. RYKERT, M. P.:

"Letter received. Have employed one-fourth more men last six months than same period in five years. Exemption was agreement in 1873 for ten years, when new shop started. Worked over-time this winter. Believe National Policy a good thing.

"R. H. SMITH & CO."

Then we were told that Collinson, Burch and Company had a monopoly, and were, therefore, making a living in spite of the National Policy. Here is their statement:

"March 22.

"We have been benefitted very much by the National Policy; have increased our capacity nearly double, and are employing a larger number of hands.

"COLLINSON, BURCH & CO."

Then we are told that the Cotton Batting Company were going out of business, and that one man only was employed. Here is their statement:

"March 22.

"Tell the members of the House of Commons that the St. Catharine's Cotton Batting Company would not be in Canada to-day had it not been for the National Policy, and if the duty is taken off they will take the machinery back to the other side, as we can get cotton cheaper and save freight, which is quite a consideration. Americans are trying to run us out of Canada by selling lower than the real cost of the goods, and if they shut us up will raise the price in twenty-four hours. We are able to judge, as we sell more cotton batting in this part of Canada than all the factories combined. We would ask for a further increase of duty.

"GEORGE B. TOWERS,

"St. Catharine's Cotton Bating Company."

These men who were destroyed by the increase actually want a further increase. It cannot, therefore, be said that the high duties have injured them. The next statement is in reference to Oile's foundry. I know Mr. Oile very well, and used to meet him in connection with the Board of Trade. He was a pretty sound Protectionist, and a good sound Clear Grit. We were told by the hon. gentleman from West Elgin that he used to employ sixty men in 1878, and that he only employed ten now. Well, here is Mr. Oile's statement, which I suppose the hon. gentlemen opposite will accept :

"March 23.

"September, 1878, nineteen men employed ; September, 1879, seventeen ; now until May next, thirty-seven !

"GEORGE N. OILE "

We were next told that the St. Catharine's Stoves Works were for sale ; but Mr. Merritt, who is interested in this concern, says :

"March 23.

"National Policy had nothing to do with stove works closing. The directors felt the policy was decidedly beneficial to their business.

"THOS. R. MERRITT."

We were also told that the St. Catharine's Wheel Works were closed, and that eighty men formerly employed there now owe their want of employment to the terrible burden of the National Policy. Well, what we find is this, in a letter from a gentleman connected with the works :

"March 22.

"DEAR SIR,—The closing of the wheel works here arises solely from the fact that, owing to the death of one of the partners (the one who attended to the business), and the inability of the other, from press of other business, to attend to it, the partnership had to be wound up. The business is upon a much healthier footing than it was two years ago, and to anyone who will attend to it and run it, it will pay a very handsome return, thanks to the market that the N. P. has now secured for it. Had the Mackenzie Government remained in power and adhered to their same policy, the winding up of this business would not have been solely contingent on the death of the managing partner.

"Yours truly,

"WM. CHAPLIN,

"For JOHN DEWE & Co."

Then the Welland Vale Works, we are told, did not employ half the men formerly employed there. Here is the reply to that statement :

"ST. CATHERINES, Ont., March 22nd, 1880.

DEAR SIR,—I am in receipt of your letter of 19th instant, informing me that 'Mr. Casey and others have asserted in the House that the National Policy has injured us severely, that the number of men employed has decreased, that we only run about half time,' and requesting me to state in reply what effect the National Policy has had on our business.

"I suppose we should be grateful to Mr. Casey and our other Free-trade friends for the great interest they now manifest in our welfare ; but when we remember how they treated us during the time they had the power of practically demonstrating the genuineness of that interest, we do not take much stock in their expressions of sympathy. You may, however, safely assure them that we can endure a good deal of such injury as the National Policy is doing us without any great outcry on our part. You may also venture to say on our behalf that we are employing 50 per cent. more men now than we did during the last year of the existence of the Mackenzie Government, and would and could employ a still greater number if we could now get them. It was during the days of the late Government that we ran half or part time. You may still further say, and no doubt this will be news to Mr. Casey and the others, that notwithstanding the exclusion of American scythes forks and hoes to a very great extent, these goods are being sold by Canadian manufacturers at less prices than the manufacturers in the United States are getting in their own market.

"WM. CHAPLIN,

"Manager."

Then, Sir, we were told Mr. Sullivan's machine shop was in the hands of an assignee. Mr. Sullivan writes that this was due to losses sustained in other respects, and he gives strong testimony in favour of the National Policy. Then we have the statement that the Lybster cotton mills had been shut down for three months, and that the wages were reduced 10 per cent. The answer to that is :

"MERRITON, March 23.

"The National Policy our only salvation. September, 1878, employed one hundred and eighty-five hands (185), fortnightly wages sixteen hundred dollars ($1,600) ; September, '79, two hundred hands (200), wages seventeen hundred dollars ($1,700) ; March, '80, two hundred and ten hands (210), wages seventeen hundred and fifty dollars ($1,750).

"JAMES PRIOR."

ticulars and challenge us to give them evidence of increased prosperity, we can answer them as soon as the telegraph can bring the information. Another argument which is used is that a great many people are moving from the different Provinces into the Western States, and many into our own North-West, and we are told that this is the result of the National Policy. Those hon. gentlemen, however, know that the exodus from the different parts of Old Canada is in no way due to the National Policy. It is largely due to the fact that the farmers have become involved, that their families were growing up about them, and that they see no prospect of getting for their boys and girls farms in their immediate vicinity. Consequently, they go off to the Western States or our own North-West where they have better chances of beginning over again. This exodus is the result of years of depression. But there is another fact to which it is also due, namely, that on this continent there is a restless migratory spirit which induces the people to move from one part of the country to another. We find that hosts of people who had settled within the last decade in Kansas and Texas have moved to other portions of the Union, and the same process is and has been going on on this side of the line as it has been going on on the other side of the line. Take the Census of the United States for 1871; and what do we find? Canada at that time had lost half a million of her population; that is, half a million of Canadians were found in the United States, or nearly 14 per cent. of the Canadian population were on the other side of the lines. But we find this fact, that twelve States of the Union had each lost a larger proportion of its population than had Canada. The same migratory spirit existed there as existed here. The ten States east and south of Lake Erie all were prosperous and all looked upon as most important, yet these had lost 27 per cent. of their population. They had lost population that had gone into other parts of the Union. New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania were all prosperous States, and yet from the State of New York over a million of the native born population of the State had left, or 24 per cent.; from Ohio 800,000 people had left, or 30 per cent.; and Pennsylvania lost 690,000 of its native born population, or 19 per cent. In fact, it is well known that the Western States absorbed the whole of this exodus, and have been largely built up by it. We had then, practically, no North-West. We had up to within a year or so no means of ingress to that country, so that people preferred to go into the Western States of America. But I believe that this story of emigration to the Western States of America—which is one of the most marvellous stories in the history of the movements of populations—I believe that that same story will be repeated on this side of the line in these Western territories of ours. How have the Western States developed themselves in the last half century? By the last Census in the Western States, including the State of Michigan, there were 12,298,381 people, and the statement is made that now the population of those States is 18,000,000. Fifty years ago only five of these Western States appeared in the Census Returns, namely: Michigan, Indiana, Missouri, Arkansas and Wisconsin, and these had only a population of 702,958. Forty years ago, two more States—Wisconsin and Iowa—had been added, and the aggregate population of the seven States had reached 1,929,589. Thirty years ago, four more States had been settled—Minnesota, California, Oregon and Texas, the favourite State of the hon. member for Lambton. There were in that year 3,951,346 people in those eleven States. Minnesota, which to-day has 800,000, had at that time only 6,000 people. Twenty years ago, all the fourteen States had 8,241,841, and ten years ago the population of these States had increased to about 12,398,381. If you take some special examples of increase in population on that side, we may fairly anticipate what may be done on this side of the line. Kansas, in 1870, had a population of 364,399; in 1879, it had 849,978, or an increase of 133 per cent. In 1870, Nebraska had 122,993; in 1879, it had 386,410, or an increase in nine years of 214 per cent. Minnesota had, in 1870, a population of 439,706; in 1875, 597,407, an increase in five years of 36 per cent. What are the lessons this enormous increase teaches us? They teach us if we are true to ourselves in connection with the development of the North-West, we may repeat the wonderful story in this country. We have a territory that is in all respects equal to those Western States to which I have been referring. On this point we have the testimony of Mr. Taylor, the American Consul at Winnipeg, a Minnesotan, who states, in relation to the development of this territory, that three-fourths of the grain-producing area is north of the line. We have the testimony of Mr. Macoun and others connected with the Geological Survey; we have the testimony of travellers who have gone through that country, all to the effect that there are there fields for extensive settlement. We have in the North-West a territory greater in cultivatable area than that of the fourteen States of the Union to which I have made reference, and we have it ready to open up, if we are but true to ourselves. I was sorry and pained to hear, and every reflecting man must have been pained to hear, the remarks that fell from hon. gentlemen opposite, as to our inability to bear the responsibility that the opening up of that country will impose upon us. In answer to these observations, I give them the remarks made by their own colleague, the hon. member for Centre Huron. In 1875, he referred to the responsibilities and obligations which this country had assumed. I will read the statement he then made, because his remarks were in such marked contrast to the position now taken by him and other members of the Opposition. He said then:

“One thing we may fairly say, that the sacrifices which we are called upon to make—if sacrifice; they may be called—are such as we are asked to make, not from a selfish point of view, but in the interest of the whole of the Provinces of the Dominion. We have chosen to take upon ourselves a truly imperial task—a greater task than was ever undertaken by a nation of our age and resources—that of colonising and developing a most enormous extent of country, not so much for our own benefit as for that of the generation to come.”

That is the responsibility we have undertaken, the sacrifice if you will; but it will produce great benefits in the future. If we go on that country will be filled with hundreds, and thousands, and millions of people from this and other countries; and we may see the wonderful story repeated, on this side, which our friends on the other side of the line have taught us in connection with western development. But what we want is faith in our own country. Faith is important, it is essential not only for matters hereafter but for matters here. Men and communities can no more accomplish great results on earth without faith than they can obtain eternal salvation hereafter, without it. This development of our western Provinces is a development, not in the interest of one Province, but in the interest of the whole Dominion. The National Policy which has been adopted will secure to us those markets as the country comes to be filled up. Everyone knows that to-day Canadian goods are found there in that territory where a few years ago none but English goods had found their way. Just as in the Western States, they had markets for the products of their Eastern States, our Eastern Provinces will find markets in our North-West Provinces. If we are true to ourselves we will be able to build up a country immense in territory, wealthy and prosperous, of which we and our children and our children's children may well be proud.

MR. CASGRAIN: I have listened with attention to the very able speech of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). I do not intend to follow him on all the line of argument he took, because it has been repeated over and over again by others; but I shall claim the indulgence of the House for a short time while I make a few remarks on the subject under consideration. When the policy of the hon. the Minister of Finance was first expounded, last year, it was thought that he was promising a little more than he could give: the fact is that when he brought down his Budget he took very good care to leave a margin on one side as to his estimates, and on the other side as to his expenditure; but this year when he comes before us he finds that he is mistaken in both respects. It is true that he has for the current year found a certain specific, in the shape of paper money, in an issue of \$8,000,000, by which he expects to make good the probable deficit he will have to meet next year; but I am sorry to say that this expedient, in my opinion, and in the opinion of many others in this country, will not call forth that expression of approval which he hopes to win. The hon. gentleman is proposing an additional issue of \$8,000,000. When I see that we have already \$12,000,000 of this paper currency; that we owe to Savings Bank depositors nearly \$10,000,000; that there has been absorbed of the Indian fund about \$3,000,000; that the running accounts, including some other deposits for the current year, amount to \$2,000,000; when I find in all a total amount of \$35,000,000 representing the credit of the country, based and backed upon about \$3,000,000 of bullion, I am naturally much alarmed. I confess I would prefer, like the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), to look at the bright side of the medal; but I feel bound to look at things as they really are, and obtain an insight into the real position of our affairs. With this three millions of bullion to back up this thirty-five millions of liabilities, we have about 8 $\frac{1}{10}$ per cent. cash to meet our liabilities. Well, Sir, I will give to the hon. the Finance Minister the idea which the astute financiers of the sound institutions in the United States, in England, in France and in Germany, think ought to be the proportion of cash to liabilities. If the hon. gentleman will refer to Bagehot, who has written a very valuable work on the subject, entitled "Lombard Street," published in 1873, a summary will be found of the liabilities due to the public by the Bank of England, the Bank of France, the Bank of Germany and the National Banks of the United States, and not one of them will show such a small amount of cash to represent the liabilities. The Bank of England shews 11·2 per cent., the Bank of France 25 per cent.; the latter has one hundred and twenty-five millions sterling of liabilities, with thirty-two millions of solid cash, besides there being other deposits to an immense amount, for which it does not pay interest, and which is available at any time to the Bank. In Germany, the banks have eighty-eight millions sterling of liabilities, and forty-one millions of cash, or 47 per cent. The National Bank of the United States, 12 $\frac{3}{10}$ per cent., or twenty-six millions of cash and two hundred and twelve millions of liabilities. And yet in a small country like this, which has in prospect, however, the immense Territories of the North-West, which yield such enormous revenues, and which we are told are going to flow with milk and honey, and so forth, and pour it into this Dominion, we are to have only 8 per cent. cash on liabilities. I say we cannot, and it is not safe to put the credit of the country in such jeopardy as it will be if we go on at this rate. In looking more closely into our expenditure, which this Tariff is going to increase, I have endeavoured to place the matter in a clear light before the public by showing what are the actual daily expenses of the Dominion Government. Nobody, perhaps, has thought it necessary to make a calculation in this way; but everyone will understand it better in that than in any other way in my locality. I see an item in our Estimates for about ten millions for interest; that will make, for interest alone, something like \$1,400 per hour or \$33,000 per day, merely on account of interest. What is the total expenditure proposed for this year? We have twenty-five millions and some odd dollars; and that will make something over two millions a month, or over \$69,000 a day, or \$2,900 per hour, or \$55·50 per minute—assuredly a very small amount for so large a country as ours, so promising in future resources. If I understood the hon. Minister of Finance correctly, he stated that the former Tariff gave 16 per cent., less a small fraction, of average duty. The increase by the present Tariff is 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which added to the former rate is about 25 per cent. The hon. member for Cumberland looks at our condition in his own peculiar way. Sometimes he puts a microscope in one eye and a telescope in another. When he looks at the expenditure he finds it dwindled to nothing, but when he looks at the resources he finds them very much magnified and distended. He states the North-West Territory is a land of promise. Last year he ventured to prophesy a little more than he could realise; this year he declares he is no prophet nor the son of a prophet. I think the facts prove that he is neither the son of a prophet nor a prophet himself. I see the matter in a very different light from that in which the hon. gentleman views it. I would be very glad if there were the resources in that country that he endeavoured to make out. I think that if there is anything which will make this country drop quietly into the United States, it is the extravagant, foolish policy that has prevailed in Canada for the last twenty years. In 1871 there was already an exodus of half a million people to the United States, and I venture to assert that there are now 600,000 Canadians in that country, five-sixths of whom are of French origin, the people who compose the bone and sinew and true blood of our country. I will not say that the emigration has been due to the National Policy, but I think it is due to the policy of former Governments. We all admire the prosperity of France. What is the cause of that prosperity? The main reason is that the money of the country remains within it instead of being sent to other countries. The policy in this country, however, will have the same effect as the absenteeism complained so much of in Ireland. Every dollar in gold will be turned from this country to the other side of the Atlantic. We are going fast to ruin at the present rate. The expenditure is increasing every year. The Pacific Railway, of which we hear so much, is not yet built. It will take many years to complete that work, and some hundreds of millions will be spent thereon. I have not been able to ascertain the average cost per mile of that work, but I will try to give some facts that will perhaps open the eyes of hon. gentlemen on this question. In my opinion the enormous expense in working the railway and keeping it in repair, will be such, that we will not be able to reap any advantage from it, if indeed we are even able to work it at all.

After Recess.

MR. CASGRAIN: Before recess I was explaining my views on the magnitude of our debt. I propose now to lay before the House a few statements in regard to our future expenditure. The Estimates for this year, without taking the Supplementary Estimates into the account, amount to $25,000,000. The outlay for the Pacific Railway will run this year between $11,000,000 and $13,000,000. Indeed, the expenditure on that work will average something like $100,000 a day. But this view has been expressed by an editor in much better terms than I can do it. He writes as follows:

"Only in private does prudence venture to whisper that the resources of Canada are really limited, that her wealth must depend in her frugality, and that an unambitious happiness is her lot. Public Debt is piled up heedlessly, because a couple of hundred millions can matter nothing to those who are about to enter into a fabulous heritage of opulence and grandeur. We are ready for a mere freak of ambition, to spend a hundred millions of dollars in the incorporation of British Columbia. This will probably be the awakening, and we shall find that we have been forestalling not only the actual future of our country, but a magnificent dream."

I am afraid that these words are too true.

AN HON. MEMBER: Give the name of the author.

MR. CASGRAIN: The name of the author would not add to the weight of the reasons. A former member of Parliament was once deceived in that way. A false name of an author was given to him, and he found the statement all right; when the true name was given he found it all wrong. I contend that the country will not long be able to afford this expenditure. For the last fifty years we have enjoyed perfect peace in the country, and made savings for a rainy day; and I would like to know in what predicament the hon. the Minister of Finance would find himself if there was an appearance of or a war on the Continent of Europe or in this country. I hope we shall never be placed in that predicament; but, if the day ever does arrive, we cannot expect to fare better than the United States during the rebellion, when their paper money was quoted between 280 and 300 for gold. We commenced Confederation in 1867, with a debt of $84,000,000. We have now doubled that amount, and what have we got to show for it? There are some improvements in canals and railways, but I think we have not got the value of all our money. It is the same thing that happened in the time of Louis XIV when there was a demand for money for war purposes. The cry then was, "Money, money." This system of Government demands money—more and more—every day. Look at the first page of the Estimates. There is an increase of $57,277 in the first items on the first page. It is true that you will find a small decrease on the other side of the column, but the good Conservatives are not able to carry on the affairs of the country without more money, and plenty of it. And with all that lavish expenditure, last year I happened to ask for a small trifle for a station in the county of L'Islet. The amount would only have been $300 or $400, but it was thought I was begging, like Lazarus, at the table of the rich, and I could not even get that small sum for a necessary improvement. Now, I do not see why such improvements should not be made in the Province of Quebec, especially in view of the fact of the immense expenditure in connection with the Pacific Railway. We of Quebec form part of the Confederation, and are entitled to proper consideration in that respect. When this vast expenditure is made on the Pacific Railway, I am afraid that we will have to repudiate, like some of the States of the Union. I do not wish to become an American citizen, but the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite is driving us in that direction whether we will or not. It will not then be a cry of annexation, but a cry of necessity. It is intended to build the Pacific Railway, respecting which one of our former respected members, now no more, said this near end will be rotten before the far end can be built, which is true, considering the progress so far made. An idea of the magnitude of our debt might be formed from the fact that if the hon. the Minister of Finance were to live twenty-five years longer, or till one hundred years of age, he would not, counting all that time, be able to enumerate $100,000,000 let alone the $167,000,000, due by this Dominion. Our ancestors were more prudent and carefully counted large sums, and their cities were much less encumbered with big debts than are ours to-day. We have granted $100,000 to the Irish poor, and I am very glad we have been able to do it, out of our bountiful harvest. I suppose that this large and munificent donation did not deprive Ministers of the opportunity of making private subscriptions to that fund, or exercising private charity. Charity by power of attorney, or by Government, does not appear in the same light as individual charity. I refer to this for two objects: first, because the grant was an act of justice to our Irish people; and second, because the Irish people to-day are beginning to have a voice in the counsels of the Empire, and to show their strength after having been so long crushed and trampled upon. Reference was made by the speaker who preceded me (Mr. White) to the tour made by the Commissioners. This leads me to look at the effect of our emigration system since Confederation. We have been spending an average of $234,000 a year on this service. As a citizen of Quebec and the Dominion, I say we have not derived one dollar of advantage from that expenditure; we cannot point out, in any of the various localities, any solitary case of settlement therein through this colonisation agency. Can the hon. the Minister of Agriculture point out in the Province of Quebec any result from this emigration system. Let us curtail those expenses, and strive, so far only as necessary, to people our North-West Territory, after all our only land of promise. As was proved from the mouth of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), not only have we not benefitted from the expense thus incurred, but we have lost every year large numbers of our own population. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) has been trying to find some cause for this exodus. The principal cause was this: under the system of Conservative Government, whatever might have been the case, then—I do not suppose the National Policy sent our people away—the only true explanation of their departure is this: the soil is less productive, less advantageous than that on the other side of the line. In the United States they find better wages and better living. What are we doing at present to repatriate those Canadians in the States? I wish that the money which is to be spent for the colonisation of the North-West would be expended in bringing back those emigrants to their old homes, or settling them in the North-West. I have been trying to ascertain what may be the working expenses of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I will take first the estimates of the hon. the Minister of Railways, of the working expenses of the Intercolonial, which, in 1879, were $2,817 a mile, and in 1878, $2,536. I hold in my hand a statement of the expense per mile of the Railways of the State of New York, from 1858 to 1878; and upon the basis formed by them, and the expenses of the Intercolonial, I have calculated the probable cost of the working of the Canadian Pacific. The average cost of the maintenance of the road per mile for repairs, machinery and operating the road would be $8,950 per mile, according to the American returns. That sum appears excessive, but it is based correctly on American experience. Calculating on this basis and on that of the Intercolonial Railway, the working of our Pacific Railway could not cost less, at the lowest possible estimate, $2,000, than $7,000,000 a year; if we add at least $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, interest on the $100,000,000 of capital, we shall be saddled with an expense of $12,000,000 a year for this Pacific Railway, and what advantage shall we derive from it? We will unite, with the rest of the Dominion, British Columbia with its population of about 10,000 whites—I do not count the Chinese—and this white population is so thinly scattered over the country, that at present I defy the Minister of Agriculture to take an exact Census in that Province. Out of that white population, how many are Yankee adventurers, who are going to reap all the benefit of this large railway outlay? For that sparse population, why should we spend $12,000,000 a year? Even were the road built from Thunder Bay to Burrard Inlet, I say that on the north shore of Lake Huron and Superior it is physically impossible to build that road. I have gone over part of that country, and know the enormous difficulties it presents to railroad construction. I have some little taste for landscape painting, and more particularly animal life, and I recollect seeing a splendid picture of Landseer's, admired by all the English artists. Barring comparisons, the picture represented a fine large English mastiff, seated in his kennel, and alongside him a little Scotch terrier just coming out and barking, with the following inscription below, "Dignity and Impudence." The impudence of the terrier reminds me of the impudence of the hon. member for Cumberland, who has done all the barking on this subject of coal. We have none in Quebec, and so have to submit like all the others to the National Policy and pay our duty of 50c. a ton on coal, now 60c. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was kind enough to prescribe for friends from the Lower Provinces. He coated a pill for them, and said, "they have got an equivalent for it. You pay a duty on flour, but we grant you a duty upon coal." I would like to ask my hon. friend if he could not likewise prepare a little pill for us in the Province of Quebec. We are between two fires; we are between the flour duty in Ontario and the coal duty in the Lower Provinces, and I do not see what advantage we reap from either. If the hon. gentleman could give us, for instance, a little aid in relieving us from the embarrassment of the debt incurred in building the North Shore Railway, that would be something, and we would accept it gratefully. Perhaps he may receive a demand for help one of these days. I would also call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to the duty on flour. I can tell him that this duty is felt as an onerous one in the Province of Quebec. That Province is not a wheat-growing country. We import an immense quantity of flour, quite as much, proportionately, as the Maritime Provinces. In my county alone, from what I have been able to ascertain, there is an annual importation of 15,000 barrels of flour. That amount pays a duty of $7,500 into the Dominion Treasury, quite a considerable tax for one article alone. The people understand it perfectly well. When they buy a barrel of flour they have to pay half a dollar extra for it, or one-tenth more. In other words, they do not get a baker's dozen for their money. Every tenth loaf is taken from their children's mouth. I hope some of these days the hon. gentleman will see his way clear to give a small equivalent to the Province of Quebec for what we have lost by this Tariff. In making a demand for such equivalent, I have no doubt I shall have the unanimous support of my friends from the Province of Quebec. No doubt they will exert a pressure on the Treasury Benches to that end, a gentle pressure that will perhaps compel the hon. gentlemen to hand over a few million dollars. If the Government is governed by majorities all that is required is to secure a majority in demanding an equivalent for our Province. I will conclude my remarks in assuring the House that it is with deep regret that I have felt compelled to make these strictures on the policy and conduct of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not alone in my Province in holding these views. Many others are whispering in secret what I have just expressed openly, and many Conservatives on the other side know it and feel it also. I hope that I may be mistaken, but I believe that a persistence in its present course of folly and extravagance by the Government will result in the ruin of this country. On the other hand, if this National Policy should succeed in retrieving the country from the state into which it has fallen, I would be the first to accept it and to acknowledge that I had been wrong. As a citizen who desires, above all things, the welfare of his country, I can only hope that my predictions may not be realised.

MR. COURSOL: Mr. Speaker, at the risk of displeasing a certain newspaper published in the interests of the Liberal party, a paper which takes so unflinching an interest in everything I do, and manifests so great a solicitude in my behalf, I cannot comply with its desire; for there is no need of making a long speech in order to meet the unceasing assaults of the Opposition on the National Policy. I must, nevertheless, say a word as to the economical and industrial position of the city I represent. I must point out the benefit already conferred by the policy of Protection we have adopted, and express my conviction and firm assurance of its final success; for in matters affecting industry and trade, when you speak of Montreal, you speak of all Canada; Montreal being the great centre of business, cannot prosper if the rest of the country is suffering. If we take Montreal as the test, we shall know the true and real position of, at all events, the old Provinces of the Dominion. Let us do so then; let us interrogate the commercial metropolis of the Dominion, and hear what she tells us by the voice of her business men, her manufacturers, her bankers. All of them admit the beneficial effects which Protection has already begun to produce. New manufactories are being opened within the limits of the great city and its suburbs. Those which the disastrous policy of the Liberal leaders had compelled to suspend operations and close their doors, have resumed work, and give, as in former times, employment to a multitude of workmen, and bread to thousands of families. Capital has once more taken confidence, and, no longer in dread of foreign competition, is producing in our own country, by the hands of Canadian workmen, a host of articles which but yesterday we were compelled to purchase abroad. In wages alone the workshops and factories of Montreal are distributing more than $50,000 a week. This money, which supplies the needs of over 8,000 families, helps the local trade, and prosperity is springing up all along the line. These beneficial effects are experienced, not in Montreal alone; from all parts of the Dominion we have similar good news. Business is reviving; a degree of activity which augurs well for the future is manifested, as many hon. members of this House have already pointed out, and the hon. the Minister of Finance has been enabled to witness for himself. Differing in that respect from his predecessor, he desired to examine for himself the effects of the National Policy. He did not believe that the Government could do nothing, and should do nothing for our industries and manufactures. He visited the manufactories in order to see things with his own eyes. He conversed with the workmen and enquired into their wants, and was enabled to learn directly from the men themselves the effects already produced by the operation of the Tariff, and the great results expected from it. The hon. member from Lunenburg (Mr. Mackenzie) for whom no one has more respect for his integrity, his talent, his industry than myself, and the hon. member from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) would have considered it derogatory to their dignity to have done this. In fact they maintained the doctrine that the Government had nothing to do with the prosperity or decay of our manufactures. They went so far, in fact, as to deny the existence of the evil. Like the Sybil of old, they hid behind a curtain in order to deliver their oracles in favour of Free-trade. They covered their heads in order to avoid the sight of the ruin spreading throughout the country. There is none so blind as the man who does not wish to see. The same obstinacy, the same set purpose, the same prejudices, produce the very opposite effect now that those gentlemen are seated on the Left. To hear them talk, nothing is prospering in the country; they see nothing but ruin in every direction, and heavy burdens imposed upon the unfortunate people. They are determined, at any price, that the predictions made by them eighteen months ago before the people shall be realised. Facts are staring them in the face from every direction, and confounding them; but they deny those facts. They are simply repeating what they have been saying since 1878. At that time they may have gained a very few adherents, but to-day the number has so diminished that those hon. gentlemen are preaching in the desert. But, Mr. Speaker, there remains for the Liberal party—and I address myself specially to the hon. member for L'Islet, who this evening stands forward as the leader of that party—a means “ever ancient and ever new,” which may serve their turn for a certain time, but which in the end invariably results in the discomfiture of those who use it. That means consists in a systematic abusing and insulting of their adversaries, and a distorting of facts. Such was the course pursued by those gentlemen in the late General Election; such is the course they are still pursuing. In Montreal East, for instance, there are large numbers of workmen of the building class. Now, that class have not as yet experienced the beneficial effects of the National Policy. We all know that in consequence of the terrible financial crisis through which we have just passed, a large number of manufacturing closed their doors and put out their fires. The workmen, finding themselves thrown on the street, and unable to obtain employment, went elsewhere to earn bread for their families, and their tenements remained unoccupied. In fact, in manufacturing centres many vacant houses are still to be seen. So long as this state of things shall not have completely changed, the need of new buildings and new houses not being felt, it is impossible that the building industry should prosper as it did before. But let the factories resume activity, as they cannot fail to do soon, let the demand for labour recall those who have gone—and of this there is already a beginning—and builders, carpenters and masons will soon know the benefits of Protection. Besides, the season now opening begins under happier auspices. I am glad of this for the sake of the deserving workmen of Montreal. Their intelligence, industry and honesty entitle them in the very highest degree to the sympathy of our Government. It was that class who, in September last, sent me here to defend their interests and to support the National Policy; it is for that class and in order to take advantage of its temporary distress; that hon. gentlemen opposite and their henchmen are keeping up their factious clamour. But the people are too honest, too intelligent, to be caught in so clumsy a snare. The workmen have judged those hon. gentlemen, and estimated them at their real worth. The Liberals knew this so well that they had to disguise their candidate as a Protectionist in Montreal East. They are now swearing at Protection, after having hypocritically cloaked themselves with it in 1878. Were it not for that the people, whom they are now again trying to deceive, would have driven them with shame from every hustings in the country. They may asperse characters and distort facts, but the venom they emit will be fatal only to themselves. I was selected by a majority of 1,500 votes in 1878, over an opponent who called himself a Protectionist, and my successor will be elected by a majority of double that number should those gentlemen face the fight. The people, I repeat, are too intelligent, too honest to be deceived by demagogues, and I have faith in their good sense as they themselves have faith in the National Policy.

Mr. CHARLTON: In rising to address the House upon the question of the propriety of the policy of Protection which has been adopted by the Government, I am willing to confess that the experience of the country as regards that policy, has not extended over a sufficient length of time to render that experience a very satisfactory one. The policy has had but a partial trial. Nevertheless, I think that we may, in looking at the result of this partial trial, find reasons quite sufficient to warrant us in the belief that the policy has thus far been injurious to the country, and is likely to prove still more injurious in future years. We had the pleasure this afternoon of listening to an address from an hon. member of this House, who is always listened to with pleasure. The hon. gentleman has a reputation, perhaps not as high as the reputation for superior knowledge which Elisha had among the sons of the prophets, or Gamaliel in the schools of Jewish law, or Plato and Socrates in the classic groves of Greece, when the glory of her palmiest days rested upon her; but the hon. gentleman has had a wide experience in public affairs. For many years he has been a prominent journalist. For many years he has engaged in Board of Trade discussions and matters of that kind, and he is considered, and justly so, a very good authority. However, I was surprised to find that hon. gentleman on this occasion take my hon. friend the member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) to task, and make a very serious mistake in reference to the expenditures made by the late Government. That hon. gentleman informed this House, with reference to the statements made by those who had the honour to lead this Government some years, that in the year 1875 the expenditure of that Government was larger than had been claimed or acknowledged by the Government. He took the Supply Bill for 1875, and informed us that the expenses of the Government under that Bill amounted to $26,168,244. The hon. gentleman neglected to scrutinise closely this Supply Bill. He fell into some two or three mistakes, which I will take the liberty to point out to you. He neglected to ascertain that $13,107,625 of this amount was chargeable to capital account. Had he deducted that amount from the amount of the appropriation, he would have found the balance to be $13,060,619. Had he added to this sum the sums payable under the Statute, such as Subsidies to the Provinces, Interest on the Public Debt, etc., he would have arrived at the expenditure for that year. The three mistakes the hon. gentleman fell into were these: first, he did not know what to deduct for the Supply Bill; second, he did not know what to add; and third, he did not know anything about it. In the same way the hon. gentleman might have taken the Supply Bill for the following years. He might have asserted that the expenditure for this Government was $27,117,000 in 1876.

AN HON. MEMBER: He did.

MR. CHARLTON: He did assert it, whereas there were $13,737,000 chargeable to capital account that year, and the balance was $13,379,982, to which, if he had added the sums to be expended under the Statute, he would have arrived at the expenditure for that year. These blunders, on the part of so prominent a member as the hon. member for Cardwell, lead us to look with some suspicion upon the other statements he has made, and naturally lead us to look with some suspicion upon the deductions arrived at. The hon. gentleman took occasion to forestall remarks that I suppose he thought would have been made in reference to the positions he had formerly taken, as recorded in the records of the Board of Trade. I believe that he had sequestered the book that referred to these matters, as I was unable to find it. However, I was enabled to get a little information, and what information I have I will give for the benefit of the House and the hon. gentleman himself. I find that, at the meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade, in 1873, Mr. Thomas White moved,

“That this Board of Trade is further of opinion that permanence in the fiscal policy of the country is most important, alike to its commerce and its manufactures, and that no change should be made in the Tariff not demanded by the absolute necessities of the revenue.”

At that time, Sir, we had a 15 per cent. Tariff. I find that in 1877, four years later, a motion was made—I am quoting this from memory, because I could not obtain the book, but I think I can give its substance correctly—declaring “That the present Tariff (17½ per cent.) was fair and equitable, and afforded fair protection to manufacturers.”

This motion carried unanimously, and Mr. White was present and made no objection to its passage.

MR. MACKENZIE: He approved of it.

MR. CHARLTON: In January, 1875, at the meeting of the Board of Trade, Mr. Francis Clemow, of Ottawa, moved, seconded by Hon. James Skead:

“That the Executive Council urge upon the Government such a line of action as shall conduce to the development of the great iron deposits of the Dominion, by royalty or otherwise.”

Moved in amendment by Mr. Henry Fry, of Quebec:

“That all the words after ‘that’ be struck out, and the following substituted ‘that the paper now read be received and placed on the minutes.’”

Mr. Thomas White voted for the amendment, and consequently voted down Protection to the iron industry. I find in June, 1876, Mr. White, in some remarks made before the Board of Trade, is reported to have said :

"I hope, Sir, that the resolutions with one exception will pass. I do not believe, and have no hesitation in saying it here, and I propose to move an amendment with a view of striking that point out. I do not believe that it would be to the advantage of this country to put a tax say on the wheat coming in this country. I do not see the possible necessity for it."

I cannot understand how if he did not see it then he is able to see it now. The hon. gentleman informed us that it was the duty of the Government to adopt such a fiscal policy as would promote the interests of the country. I can most heartily agree with him in that statement, and the question that arises is what is the proper policy to be adopted to promote the interests of the country. Hon. gentlemen contend that the National Policy is calculated to promote the best interests of the country, and I contend that it is not. In reference to the tea duties, the hon. gentleman defends the present policy of the Government. It was noticeable, however, that he practically admitted the charge recently made, that the great bulk of the tea trade of Canada is passing through the hands of American brokers, which I believe to be the case. As I understand it, Canadian importers are not able to import what are known as chops of tea. In importing a cargo of teas from China or Japan there would be a large quantity of teas of a quality not saleable in Canada. American importers import chops of teas as all qualities are saleable in that populous country, and send such qualities as are suitable for the Canadian market; they are sending into this country, through their Canadian agents, ostensibly as direct importations, and are rapidly monopolising the tea trade of Canada and to the great detriment of our own merchants. With reference to the differential duty upon teas, it is of great importance to our merchants to have new teas at as early a day as possible—new teas can be obtained via San Francisco and the American Pacific Railway one or two months earlier than by any other route. Consequently the differential duty is a vexatious one to the tea dealers of this country, and is avoided by the American importers, who have agents in Canada professing to be importing merchants bringing their teas through the United States in bond. The hon. gentleman lays great stress on the fact, if it be a fact, and it is a matter of little importance whether it is or not, that sugar is lower now than it was one or two years ago. The prices of commodities in the markets of the world are constantly fluctuating. The real question is, is the price of sugar relatively higher than it was before the adoption of this Tariff. I hold that the assertion made by hon. members on this side that sugar is higher than it would have been under the old Tariff, is incontrovertible. It matters not as to whether it is actually lower, the question is is it relatively lower than under the old Tariff.

MR. WHITE: The facts are simply these: Raw sugar in New York has increased $49\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and refined sugar 31 per cent. Refined sugar has only increased in Montreal $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

MR. CHARLTON: The question we have to do with, Mr. Speaker, is what could we bring it in for under the old Tariff. I noticed that the hon. gentleman in the whole course of his speech forcibly reminded us that he was the member for Montreal by way of Cardwell. He laid great stress on the interests of Montreal and upon the fact that this Tariff had created industries in Montreal that were beneficial perhaps to that city, but a source of great expense to the rest of the Dominion. By putting $600,000 or $800,000 into the pockets of one firm in Montreal, by bringing a few cargoes of sugar to that city, by giving employment to a few hundred labourers in that city, Montreal was benefitted at the expense of the rest of the Dominion, including the constituency he represents on the floor of this House. The hon. gentleman came in due time to agricultural protection, concerning which he very prudently declared he would not have much to say. He thought that the greatest advantage the farmer would realise from this policy would be from the building up of consuming centres. As I wish to refer more fully to this matter of a home market later on in my remarks, I will pass that over for the present. The hon. gentleman next goes on to the consideration of the charge made that the adoption of this Tariff would produce a feeling of alienation in the Old Country. He asserts that that assertion is false, and the proofs he offered are these. In the first place, we obtained a favourable loan there. Well, I do not suppose English capitalists inquire very seriously as to what the fiscal policy of the country may be that is applying for a loan on the English market. The United States can borrow money there. Turkey could borrow money there once. Almost any nation can borrow money in England. The fact that a nation can borrow money on the English money market is not an indication as to what the state of feeling may be in reference to the fiscal character of the nation which is the borrower. The hon. gentleman next cited as a proof that no alienation has been produced, the fact that the Premier of England has made Canada the special subject of a speech, and it is reported that some one prompted the Premier to make that speech. It is not as much to his credit as some other speeches he may have made in the course of his life. He gravely informed us that the North-West was drawing off the whole population of the west, that the emigration of the country was all setting in that direction, that emigrants were deserting the prairies of Minnesota and Dakota and other western States, and flocking into our North-West. Almost exactly the reverse is the case. Who the hon. gentlemen obtained his information from, I do not profess to say, but that the Premier of the British Empire should have made a speech, in which he displayed singular ignorance upon Canadian matters, is certainly not a very strong argument to bring forward to prove the assertion, that no feeling exists in England against our National Policy. The truth is, the feeling does exist in England. The great mass of English people feel that the fiscal policy of the present Government is one of hostility to England. The feeling of cordiality that has existed and still does exist to a great extent, has been weakened by the policy of the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury Benches. The hon. gentleman referred to the question, as to whether the policy has produced a feeling of irritation in the United States, and he tells us it has not, and he cites as one proof of this assertion that the cattle embargo has been removed. It is, however, no proof that no such feeling exists. The cattle embargo was, perhaps, put on as a gentle reminder, that we would do well to modify our own cattle regulations. We have no assurance that it will not be imposed again. Is the hon. gentleman aware that in consequence of the absurd policy first proposed by the hon. the Finance Minister of imposing a higher duty on malt imported from the United States, although we actually imported no malt from that country, that a Bill has been reported, and is now before Congress raising the duty on malt to an extent that will ruin the malting industry of Canada? Is the hon. gentleman aware that there is a movement on foot in that country for prohibiting the transportation of produce and merchandise passing between the western and the seaboard States by railway lines passing through Canadian territory, on the ground that such trade is a practical infringement of the coasting laws of the United States? Is he aware that there is a feeling of soreness there that we will do well not to increase to a greater extent than necessary. He tells us that resolutions have been passed about Reciprocity recently in Massachusetts, the Protectionist State of Massachusetts. Now, I was not aware that any of the States of the American Union fixed their policy as regards Protection in one way or the other. I suppose the State of Massachusetts, in common with all other members of that Confederation, were under the Congress of the United States in this respect, that Congress fixed the fiscal policy of the Union, and that Massachusetts was merely one of the States which must bow to the behests of Congress. What kind of Reciprocity do you suppose they expect to offer us? They are willing to enter into a Customs Union or Zollverein. That is the Reciprocity alone that we can obtain from the Americans. In reference to the fact that a large emigration is going on from Canada to the American States, we are told that same movement is in force in the Eastern States of America, that thousands have been leaving and going to the western States of the Union; but there is a difference between the two movements. The movement in the States is a movement from one part of the country to another part of the same country; but the movement in Canada is a movement from this country into a foreign country. These men are leaving us, and cease to be a portion of the population of our Dominion, and their leaving us is a calamity. We were told, by the way, that the National Policy would correct that evil, but it does not seem to have been a corrective. The evil does not seem to have diminished; the volume of emigration increases day after day. Then the hon. member for Cardwell gave us some interesting statistics with reference to the growth, prosperity and and greatness of the western States of America. He gave the population of Minnesota and Wisconsin, and he told us about the States west of Lake Erie. He evidently had fallen into the same line as the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, who permits the insertion of advertisements of American lands in the pamphlets circulated with the professed design of encouraging immigration to our own country, and also of the hon. the Postmaster-General, who has permitted the insertion of advertisements of American land companies in the Postal Guide, which advertisements advise Canadians to leave the rocks and stumps of this country and go to the fertile lands of the Arkansas valley. The Government of this country has evidently become a great advertising agency for promoting emigration to the western States of America. So much for the remarks of the hon. member for Cardwell. I do not wish to occupy the attention of the House at too great a length, and I will therefore come to something more immediately concerning the question before us. The hon. the Finance Minister has found it necessary to propose numerous changes in the Tariff, and so it is with all who attempt to frame a Protective Tariff. They find it necessary from year to year to come down and propose numerous changes. Such has been the history of Protective tariffs in the United States. From the beginning changes have been made in that country almost every year, important changes, numerous changes, and continued changes to suit this interest or that interest or the other interest, as one or the other might happen at the time to predominate in influence. This question of the Tariff is necessarily a threadbare question; the ground has been traversed again and again; it is almost impossible to say anything new on it; but it is possible to go over the ground again, and give some salient truths that will bear to be reiterated, that ought to be reiterated again and again, till they are so thoroughly impressed on the people of this country that they will never be forgotten. What led the hon. the Minister of Finance to grant Protection? In arranging the Tariff and perfecting the details, who stood at his elbow? Who influenced him? Was it the millions who pay the sums extracted by that Tariff? Or was it the representatives of the monopolists that sought to wring their unjust gains from the sweat of the poor labouring men? Was it not their representatives that dictated the terms of this National Policy? It cannot be denied that it was their representatives. Protection is, under every state of circumstances, a loss to the many for the gain of the few. It can be nothing else, it never has been anything else; and it never will be anything else to the end of time but legalised, organised robbery under the forms of law. Has the hon. the Minister of Finance found that this policy, at the end of the year, has added materially to the revenues of the country? He has not; and he has still further lessons to learn, as this policy develops itself; and he will be enabled more thoroughly to appreciate the fact that while adding to the burdens of the people, it destroys the revenue. If the manufacturers are to have the monopoly by excluding the goods that compete with them from the country, what revenue are you to get on the goods? The source of revenue is dried up by the very same act that compels people to pay largely increased prices to the monopolist. And you cannot make a Protective Tariff an equal benefit to all manufacturing classes; it is not and can never be made such; you cannot devise a Protective Tariff that will work equally and evenly; it will benefit one class more than another class of manufacturers. You can only point to three classes of manufacturers who derive from the National Policy unmixed benefit. These are sugar refiners and cotton and woollen manufacturers. All engaged in the manufacture of iron are taxed by duties on coal and iron. And nearly every other manufacturing industry save those of the three classes I have named have had additional taxes imposed upon the articles that constitute their raw material. This Tariff is positively a poorer Protective Tariff than the one it has replaced. The old Tariff really conduced in a greater degree to the healthy development of the manufacturing industries of the country than the present one does. Will the hon. the Finance Minister claim that in this scientific policy of which we have heard so much he affords protection to the labourer—the labourer whose wages have been reduced who will receive no increased pay, but diminished pay, and who had to pay more for the necessaries of life? Will the hon. gentleman claim, and will he assert to this House, that this scientific policy affords Protection to the lumberman in prosecuting the greatest manufacturing industries of the Dominion? No. It affords him no protection, but adds largely to his cost of production. Will he claim that this scientific policy affords Protection to the fisherman, that great class in the Maritime Provinces, whose labours add so enormously to the wealth of this Dominion? No. In no way does it benefit the fishermen. It injures them very seriously—no more unjustly than other classes—but it works detrimentally to them. Will he claim that this scientific policy promotes the shipping interests of this country? Will he tell us that that great branch of industry, ship-building, has increased? What do the returns show? In 1877, they show 46,329 tons built, valued at $1,576,244; in 1878, they show 35,200 tons built, valued at $1,236,145, and they show in 1879—when the shadow of this National Policy had begun to creep over the land—19,318 tons built, valued at $529,824. Does this scientific policy afford Protection to the farmer? Will the hon. gentleman have the hardihood to venture to assert that it affords Protection to the farmer? I think he hardly will. I think I will demonstrate so clearly that the hon. gentleman will be unable to deny that the farmer is one of the greatest sufferers by the enactment of this policy. He is to have a home market, the hon. member for Cardwell says. He is to have enormous advantages flowing to him from this Tariff. Well, Sir, what progress has been made up to this time in the creation of a home market that is to absorb the surplus productions of the farmers of Canada? Does the hon. the Minister of Finance expect that he will be able to develop the manufacturing industries of the Dominion, to increase the population of Canada, to improve the agricultural interests of Canada, by such a policy as this, the results of which we have seen during the twelve months it has been in operation. I will take the last six months of 1878, and the last six months of 1879, and we will see how rapidly we are approaching that point where the population will consume the surplus productions of the farmer. In 1878, our exports of produce the growth, of Canada, amounted to $12,689,015. Now, there would be naturally a falling off in 1879, when the creation of a home market should have begun to operate. Let us see how great a diminution there was. In the last six months of 1879 there was exported of produce the growth of Canada, $14,801,000, against $12,619,015 exported in the corresponding six months of the preceding year. The total exportation of produce for 1878 amounted to $17,866,000, while the total exportation of 1879—under the National Policy, when we were supposed to be progressing to that state of things when we shall consume our own productions—the total exportation then was $22,668,000, against $17,866,000 in 1878.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: That is a very conclusive argument.

MR. CHARLTON: We are rapidly approaching the realisation of our dream; we are rapidly approaching the point of perfection when we shall be quite independent of the rest of the world, when we shall live under our own vine and fig tree when Canada shall indeed be Canada for Canadians; and when we shall consume all the surplus produce we raise. To what extent have we progressed towards that vast increase of population? All the new industries that have sprung up—and not all due to the new policy—do not add ten thousand souls to our manufacturing population, and to overbalance this, it is estimated 100,000 souls have drifted away from us; the bone and sinew of the land, our young men, are leaving our shores; and the result, if this estimate if correct, is that we have 90,000 less to-day than twelve months ago. Now, I think I alluded to a fact last year that I will allude to again, and it will bear alluding to, again and again. I said, and I say now, that the humbug and the delusive promises, that will not bear investigation, do not originate with the hon. gentlemen opposite. They have been borrowed from another country where they have made use of for years. These promises have induced the American people to submit to taxation for the purpose of creating a home market, and that policy has been carried out to its utmost extent. Protection cannot be carried further, and cannot be more perfect than it is in the United States. But did that policy produce the results promised by its promoters? Have the people who have submitted to it, in order that the country might be ultimately benefitted by the creation of a home market, realised any of the promised benefits? No, Sir, the promises were false, one and all. There was not a modicum of truth in them. The exports of produce have swelled year by year, and were never greater than they were last year. After twenty years of the most efficient Protection, the country exported the largest agricultural surplus that it ever had. The promises made to the people were false, but no more false than the promises hon. gentlemen opposite made to the people of Canada. If any man would stop to examine this question, and make figures as a business man would do in calculating whether he should engage in a business enterprise or not, the fallacy would become at once apparent. We do not import goods enough, that, were they manufactured here, would employ 75,000 souls. The assertion of the hon. gentleman opposite in that regard is as foundationless as the baseless fabric of a dream. If we go back to the history of the United States for thirty years we will find that exactly the same arguments were used in reference to this policy. Now, has there been any agricultural Protection in the United States? Has there been any duty on barely, corn and wool, not combining wool exclusively, but all kinds of wool? Such duties were levied for the purpose of making the farmer believe that he was being protected. We are bound to have agricultural surplus, except in exceptional years, and I think it must be generally recognised that agricultural Protection is delusive. That the surplus must govern the price may be set down as axiomatic. I propose to give some figures which will give at a glance an idea of the extent of the surplus productions in 1879. In that year we exported 5,393,212 bushels of barley; we imported 43,233 bushels. Will the hon. the Finance Minister tell the House that the duty on barley had any effect whatever on the prices in this country. We would like to know whether this is humbug, or whether there is anything in it. Well, let us see whether the duty on beans had any effect on that which was exported. We exported last year 59,175 bushels, and imported 7,187 bushels, leaving a surplus of 51,992 bushels. With regard to oats, we exported 3,535,758 bushels last year, reducing oatmeal to bushels at the rate of ten to the barrel, and imported 2,125,319 bushels. Will the hon. the Finance Minister, in view of this fact, assert that the duty on oats had any effect on the price that year. Last year we exported 12,381,146 bushels of wheat, reducing flour to wheat at the rate of 4½ bushels to the barrel, and we imported 6,176,432 bushels. The surplus exported, reducing wheat to flour at the rate of 4½ bushels to the barrel, was 6,204,714 bushels. Will the hon. Minister inform us whether the duty on wheat had any effect on the price in Canada. In 1879, we exported 641,694 bushels of rye, and we imported 74,248 bushels. Did the Tariff have any effect on the price of rye? We cannot get a response for the hon. the Minister of Finance. We exported 2,715,252 bushels of peas, and we imported 2,343 bushels. How was it in regard to the duty on peas? We have had twelve months' experience of this Tariff. The American people have had twenty years' experience of theirs, and each year they have found the same unsatisfactory results that we have experienced of late. They never found that the duty on grains, of which they had a surplus, added 1c. to the price; neither will the deluded friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1879, we imported 8,614,116 bushels of corn, and exported 5,434,759 bushels, consequently, 3,179,357 bushels of the Indian corn imported that year was consumed in the country. This being the only grain of which we imported more than we exported, it was the only grain in the entire list of cereals which was affected in price by a duty. Of course there has been an increase in the price of wheat during the past year. Prices were constantly fluctuating in the markets of the world; but while there had been an actual increase in price of wheat in this country, it could not be shown that there had been a relative increase as compared with the price in the United States. The increase in price is due solely to the fact that the short harvests in Europe have created an unusual demand; but, with the exception of wheat, there is little, if any, advance in the price of cereals. I would like to ask the question again, whether Protection has made Canadian produce higher than American produce by the amount of the duty? There is no response. I made the assertion that it had not on the hustings. Many believed that it would, and I want the hon. Minister to reiterate the statement to-night that the produce of the farmer has advanced proportionately to the duty. This assertion was probably made in the belief that the intelligence of the people was so low that they would believe it. I propose to show that the policy of the hon. Minister, in imposing a duty on grain, has borne no fruit whatever, except in the case of Indian corn. I propose to show, by a series of quotations, that grain has been relatively lower in Canada since the adoption of this policy than it was before. I will take my figures from the Toronto Mail, so that my hon. friends opposite will not complain about the authority. Before looking up these market quotations, given for the purpose of comparison of prices before and after the inauguration of the National Policy, I selected the dates and determined to take for the period before the adoption of the National Policy the market quotations of September 17th, 1878, November 16th, 1878, and December 31st, 1878; and for the period following the adoption of the National Policy the quotations of June 30th, 1879, the end of the fiscal year, and December 31st, 1879, the end of the current year. I have made comparisons between Toronto and Detroit in fall wheat, as the quality of that grain in the two markets are quite similar, and the cost of transportation to the seaboard is only a trifle higher from Detroit. On September 17th, 1878, the best grade of fall wheat was quoted at 101 in Toronto and at 104 5-8 in Detroit, or 3 5-8c. higher in Detroit than in Toronto.

MR. MCCALLUM: What was the

price of wheat in New York at that time?

MR. CHARLTON: I am talking about the Detroit market. Winter wheat was worth 3½c. more a bushel in Detroit than in Toronto. The two places are selected for purpose of comparison, because of similarity in situation and quality of fall wheat sold in each. On the 16th November, 1878, the best quality of fall wheat was quoted in Toronto at 93c., and in Detroit at 96¼c., 3½c. higher than in Toronto. Does the hon. the Finance Minister think there was any great necessity for duties then to keep this American wheat out of the Canadian market?

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The balance was really in favour of Canada; the quotations in the Globe are wrong.

MR. CHARLTON: I have taken them from the Mail, thinking, perhaps, some hon. gentlemen opposite will take their market quotations, the same as their politics, and say that they are correct or not, according to the paper in which they appear. Well, on the 31st December, 1878, the best grade of fall wheat stood in Toronto at 93c., and the same grade in Detroit, 96c. Was there still a necessity for the imposition of a duty to keep this higher priced American wheat from depressing the price of wheat in the Canadian market? These are the three periods in 1878, before and after the elections, and now we will take the two periods in 1879, after the imposition of the National Policy. Again, on the 30th June, 1879, the best quality of fall wheat was $1.01 in Toronto and $1.10 in Detroit, or 9c. higher in Detroit, although there was a duty of 15c. per bushel to keep this low-priced American wheat out of the Canadian market. On the 31st December the best grade of fall wheat was $1.22 in Toronto, and $1.27 in Detroit, 5½c. higher in Detroit. Could anything demonstrate more perfectly the utter absurdity of the claim that the duties were necessary to keep the American wheat from depressing the prices of Canadian in its own markets? Now, I will make the comparison between Chicago and Toronto in the prices of No. 2 spring wheat, which is the standard grade in the Chicago market. On the 17th September, 1878, No. 2 spring wheat was in Toronto 97c.

and in Chicago $88\frac{3}{4}$ c. or $8\frac{1}{2}$ c. higher in Toronto, or about the price of the freight to Toronto. On November 16th, 1878, it was 83c. in Toronto and $80\frac{1}{4}$ c. in Chicago or $2\frac{3}{4}$ c. higher in Toronto, much less than the cost of the freight between those cities, which made it relatively 5c. higher in Chicago than in Toronto. On December 31st, No. 2 spring wheat was worth 81c. in Toronto and $82\frac{1}{4}$ in Chicago; this was before the inauguration of the National Policy. Now, take the quotations of spring wheat on the 30th June and 31st December, after the National Policy was adopted: No. 2 spring, in Toronto, free on board, on 30th June, 1879, was 97c.; in Chicago it was \$1.07 in Chicago, or 10c. higher, when we had a duty of 15 per cent. to exclude it from our higher market; and on the 31st December, spring wheat, free on board, at Toronto, was \$1.30, while in warehouse, in Chicago, it was worth \$1.31. These quotations of wheat prove, conclusively, that so far from our duty having any effect on the price of wheat, it had none whatever, because the quotations, taken at random, show the price of wheat was relatively higher in the United States than in Canada, even under its National Policy. Let us now take oats, and in making the comparison between the quotations in Toronto and Chicago, I wish it to be borne in mind there is a difference of 2lb. in the standard measure, it being in Canada 34lb. and in Illinois 32lb. For the comparison I have made the Illinois equal to the Canadian bushel. On the 17th September, 1878, oats were worth in Toronto 30c., and in Chicago $20\frac{7}{8}$ c.; on the 16th November, 1878, 32c. in Toronto and $21\frac{1}{2}$ c. in Chicago, or $10\frac{1}{2}$ c. higher in Toronto; on the 31st December, 1878, 31c. in Toronto and 21c. in Chicago. These three quotations were made before the Canadian duty was imposed to exclude those cheap oats from the Canadian market. Now, take the quotations on the 30th June and 31st December, after the adoption of the National Policy. On the 30th June, 1879, oats were 38c. in Toronto and $34\frac{3}{8}$ c. in Chicago, or about $3\frac{7}{8}$ c. in Chicago, or less than one-half the freight between the two points. On the 31st December, 36c. in Toronto was the price, and 38c. in Chicago, or 2c. higher, and this, while we had 10c. a bushel duty on American oats, to exclude them from the Canadian market. Could anything demonstrate more completely the fallacy of the assertion that these duties can have any effect upon the prices of grain than those quotations? Do they not prove clearly that all the assertions and theories of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the effect of such duties, or agricultural Protection, were merely fallacious, if not worthy of a harder name? I propose to consider the case of barley, and I am sorry the hon. First Minister is not in his seat, as I think he promised the duty on barley should raise its price. On 17th September, 1878, the best grade of barley was worth \$1.05 in Toronto and \$1.25 in Oswego; on 16th November, 95c. in Toronto and \$1.25 in Oswego, and on 31st December, 1878, 90c. in Toronto and \$1.20 in Oswego. There was then no necessity for a duty to keep that \$1.20 barley from being brought over to Toronto, to sell it there at 90c. These were the quotations under the Free-trade in grain. Take the two quotations under the National Policy, and see if the result is materially different, with the duty of 15c. a bushel. On 30th June, 1879, the best grade of barley was worth 60c. in Toronto and 80c. in Oswego, and on the 31st December, 73c. in Toronto and 91c. in Oswego. Well, there was no danger of that 91c. barley being brought to Toronto to sell at 73c. The duty had no effect on the price, and the hon. the Finance Minister knows it well. Let us look at rye. It is an article that the hon. the Finance Minister has little interest in, and less in the product. On the 17th September, 1878, it was 56c. in Toronto and 45c. in Chicago, or 11c. less in Chicago; on the 16th November, 1878, it was 52c. in Toronto and 45c. in Chicago, or 7c. less in Chicago. On the 31st December, it was 50c. in Toronto and 44c. in Chicago, or 6c. less. These are our quotations under Free-trade. Let us see what effect the duty had. On the 30th June, 1879, rye was worth 50c. in Toronto and $53\frac{1}{2}$ c. in Chicago, notwithstanding the National Policy; on the 31st December, 76c. in Toronto and 81c. in Chicago. With reference to cheese there has been no change in the Tariff. It was claimed when our friends opposite were inaugurating the National Policy as a new thing, this duty on cheese. It had really had so little effect, though it stood for years before on the Statute-book, that the great mass of the people were ignorant of its existence. On 17th September, 1878, the highest quotation in Montreal was 8½c. per pound, and the same in New York; on 16th November, in Montreal, 8½c., in New York, 8c., highest; on December 31st, 1878, highest quotation 8¾c. in Montreal and 9c. in New York. This was before the National Policy. Now, afterwards, on 30th June, 1879, cheese in Montreal was worth 6c. and 6¾c. in New York; on 31st December, 13½c. in Montreal and 13c. in New York. This clearly shows the price of cheese is regulated by the common market that takes the supply of Montreal and New York. The highest quotation of butter in Montreal, September 17th, 1878, was 17c., and in New York 25c. per pound, the highest in Montreal, November 18th, 1878, 17c., and in New York 27c.; the highest on December 31st, 1878, in Montreal, was 18c., and in New York 30c.; on the 30th June, 1879, in Montreal, 15½c., and in New York 15½c. In New York the highest quotation on the 31st December, 1879, was 37c., and in Montreal 28c. There was no necessity for a duty on American butter, because it was not likely to come from a higher to a lower market. So in relation to the whole list of duties on agricultural commodities: a more fallacious, more palpable humbug, never was palmed off on any people than this Tariff, on which the reputation of its author, the hon. the Finance Minister, stands or falls.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings): How then has the Government increased the cost of living to the poor if there is no rise in prices? You said a few minutes ago we had taxed the poor man so much more.

MR. CHARLTON: The poor man's interest is affected in this way: he has been induced to consent to being further taxed on various articles, such as sugar, cotton goods, woollen goods, coal, etc.; to get his consent to these taxes he has been induced to believe that in the case of the farmer, produce should be higher, and in the case of the labourer, wages should be higher, promises which I have shown have not been redeemed. In the line of agricultural Protection, the hon. the Finance Minister proposes to add to his laurels. Not content with informing the people that they were to benefit by his duties on grain, of which this country constantly has a surplus to export, he proposes to grant an additional boon to the farmers, a duty of 13c. per pound on a class of wool we never import a pound of, and of which we have an enormous surplus, yearly, to export. This is adding insult to injury. The hon gentleman must entertain a very low opinion of the intelligence of the farmers, if he supposes they will be taken by that sort of chaff. I would rather rest my expectation of being considered wise upon the proposition of a duty on whistles made of pig's tails; the absurdity would not be more palpable in the one case than in the other. The truth is this, agricultural Protection is a cruel deceit practised on the farmers, which answered its purpose for a time, but which they understand perfectly well to-day, and that fact the hon. the Finance Minister will understand when they come to pronounce their opinion on the promises made them. When he learns the decision of the people, I venture to predict he and those associated with him upon the Treasury Benches, will find the best expression of their feelings in the language of Bigelow:

We're clean clean out o' money and most out o' lyin',
Two things a young nation can't manage without
If she wants to look well at her first coming out;
For the first supplies physical strength, while the second Gives a moral advantage that's hard to be reckoned.”

What are the only circumstances under which a duty would raise the prices of products in this country? If this country had to import for its own use, its own productions being insufficient to supply the demand, under such circumstances only would duty affect prices. If wheat had to be imported, for example, the farmers here would reap the benefit of the duty. But was there not some time ago a motion brought up in this House, setting forth the fact that under such circumstances it would be a case of extreme hardship for the consumers of Canada to pay more for their wheat than they otherwise might, and did not the First Minister promise that under such circumstances the duty would not be exacted. Thus, as to the circumstances under which the farmers could derive a single advantage from the duty on wheat, we have the pledge of the Government not to consent to their receiving that advantage. Is there any hon. gentleman on the opposite side able to deny this statement? Can the hon. the Finance Minister deny it? I wish now to call his attention to some other points with respect to which I am really a little in the dark. I understand he is going next year to hunt up that "hum" in the agricultural regions which he found last fall with the manufacturers. I come now to the consideration of Indian corn. As I have always predicted this duty on corn has had some effect; while largely diminishing the quantity entered for consumption, it has increased its price to those who have had to use it.

MR. PLUMB: It is imported, among other things, for the purpose of making whiskey.

MR. CHARLTON: I do not know so much about whiskey as my hon. friend from Niagara, perhaps. I find the importation of Indian corn, for the six months ending the 31st December, 1878, was 5,472,000 bushels; for the ten and a-half months expiring on the 1st of February last, under the National Policy, 5,398,994 or 73,006 bushels less than for the last six months of 1878 under Free-trade. The importations for export, for the six months ending 31st December, 1878, were 4,059,000 bushels, and for the ten and a-half months ending 1st February, 1880, 4,411,356, or an excess of only 351,941 bushels. Thus the percentage of excess for ten and a-half months over the six months export, under Free-trade, was only about eight and a-half per cent. I find that in respect to the exports, by making a calculation for the ten and a-half months ending February 1st, and continued upon a scale equal to that for the six months ending 31st December, 1878, they would have amounted to 7,103,638 bushels, the actual amount being 4,411,366 bushels. We are justified in arriving at the conclusion that the export trade in corn was diminished during that time by the amount of 2,692,000 bushels. Now, this diminution in the export trade, represents a serious loss to the forwarding and other commercial interests of the country.

As I learn from the trade and navigation returns, the difference between the cost of corn imported, and the price received for corn exported in 1878, was 9 $\frac{3}{4}$ ¢, and upon that basis, I arrive at the conclusion that the loss to the forwarding interests of the country through the diminution of the export trade, consequent upon the adoption of the National Policy, was \$255,768 for ten and a-half months. Then I find that there was entered for consumption in the six months ending 31st December, 1878, 1,412,578 bushels, and during the six months ending December 31st, 1879, 548,973 bushels, or a diminution of 863,602 bushels, entered for consumption during the six months ending with 1879, as compared with the six months ending with 1878, a falling off of 61 per cent. in corn entered for consumption. I find that there was entered for consumption between March 15th, 1879, and February 1st, 1880, ten and one-half months, 987,628 bushels, showing that the amount imported for consumption in the ten and one-half months ending February 1st, 1880, was less than the amount imported during the six months ending December 31st, 1878, by 434,947 bushels, being a percentage of 31 per cent. less. The amount that would have been entered for consumption in the ten and one-half months ending the 1st February, 1879, if it had bore the same proportion to the volume of the business in the last six months of 1878, would have been 2,472,004, the amount actually entered for consumption being 987,628 bushels. There was consequently a diminution in the amount entered for consumption compared with what would have been entered, if a duty had not been imposed, of 1,484,376 bushels. Now, it was claimed by the hon. member for Cardwell that the shutting out of this large amount of corn would be a benefit to the farmers of Canada. I hold, to the contrary, that the exclusion of these 1,484,376 bushels of grain for consumption during these ten and one-half months was a great loss to the farmers of Canada, and I think I can demonstrate that such is the case.

MR. ROCHESTER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to give the House the benefit of his knowledge of what the price of rye was in 1878 and 1879.

MR. CHARLTON: I have done that already, and if the hon. gentleman wants that information, and will read the reports to-morrow, he will get it. I do not care to traverse the ground I have been over already. When interrupted, I had just made the assertion, and I now repeat it, that the exclusion from Canada of 1,484,376 bushels of corn, which, but for the duty, would have been entered for consumption in the last ten and a-half months, which amount I arrived at by comparing it with the volume of business of the last six months of 1878, was a serious loss to the farmers of Canada. I propose to demonstrate that assertion. The duty paid upon the 987,628 bushels imported for consumption in the last ten and a-half months of that year was $74,076.34.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Nearly a year's supply was imported in the months of January and February.

MR. CHARLTON: I am making a comparison between the last six months of 1878 and the ten and a-half months commencing on the 15th of March, 1879, and ending on the 1st of February of the present year. As I was about to say, the average price of corn, free of duty, laid down at Toronto, may be estimated at 45c., by the returns of 1878, when no duty was levied. Upon that basis I propose to make a comparison between the feeding value of corn and of other grain at current rates. To this calculation I ask the careful attention of the hon. the Finance Minister, because upon this calculation my whole case rests, when I assert that the exclusion of that large amount of corn, which otherwise would have brought into Canada for feeding purposes, was a disaster to the farming community of Canada. Now, Sir, 34lb. of oats are worth 39c. a bushel at the present in Toronto, and at that rate 56lb. of oats are worth 64c. Now, I assume that 56lb. of corn are worth just as much for feeding purposes as 56lb. of oats; it is said to be more, but I assume it is worth as much. If 56lb. of corn can be bought free or duty for 43c., and the farmer can buy that corn and sell 56lb. of oats for 64c., do you not injure that farmer if you prevent him from doing it, because he makes in such case 21c. upon every bushel of corn? Let the hon. the Finance Minister controvert that, assuming the quotations I give are correct. If we take barley at 70c. a bushel for 48lb., 56lb. is worth 81c. Now, 56lb. of corn is worth just as much for feeding purposes as 56lb. of barley. If 56lb. of corn is bought at 43c. a bushel, and the farmer sells in place of it 56lb. of barley at 81c., how much is he making in the transaction? Will some of you figure that out. He is making about 38c. from the 56lb. of barley he sold. Would you blame that farmer for buying American corn at 43c. and selling an equivalent amount of barley at 81c. If we take 60lb. of rye at 80c. a bushel, 56lb. of rye would be worth 74½c. Now, if a farmer buys 56lb. of corn, worth just as much for feeding purposes as 56lb. of rye, he gets 56lb. of corn for 43c., and he sells 56lb. of rye for 74½c., consequently he makes in the operation 31½c. upon every 56lb. of rye he sells and buys corn to replace. If he takes 56lb. of peas, worth at present quotations 68c., 56lb. are worth 62½c. If he buys a bushel of corn at 43c. and sells 56lb. of peas at 62½c., he makes 20½c. in the transaction. Do you see the point? If the prices of these grains vary from the quotations given, of course the result will vary somewhat. But the hon. the Finance Minister has inflicted a great injury on the farmers of Canada by imposing this restriction on a profitable business, and preventing them from selling coarse grains for a relatively higher price, and replace them by American corn at a much lower price. The result of this scientific and beneficent National Policy in ten and a-half months, ending 1st February, was the exclusion of 1,484,000 bushels of corn, at a loss to the country of $311,715. What then is the nett result of this National Policy, so far as relates to the importation of American corn. The forwarding interest, as I have shown, has lost $255,768 in commission and freight upon the diminished quantity of corn exported. The duty paid upon what has been imported for consumption is $74,076, the difference between the price of what we can assume has been shut out by the duty, and the price that would have been received for the coarse grain, which this corn if imported, would have enabled the Canadian farmer to sell is, as I have shown, $311,718, and the net result for the ten and a half months is a loss to the country of $641,562. That is a brilliant result to be accomplished. Will the hon. gentleman acknowledge the corn? He does not do it. He is non-committal. Has anyone been benefitted by this corn duty? I represent one of the ridings in the corn belt of Canada, and it is for that reason, perhaps, that I have given particular attention to this corn question. There are a few counties along the north shore of Lake Erie where corn can be raised successfully. The county of Norfolk is one. Has the duty of 7½c. on corn benefitted my constituents or any of the constituencies along the north shore of Lake Erie? I answer most emphatically it has not. In the first place it has not increased the production of corn. It has practically afforded no additional inducements for producing corn. The duty of 7½c. amounts to very little more than the difference between local and through rates of freight. Another reason why we would derive little or no benefit from the duty on corn is that the farmer in the corn belt who raises corn is exactly in the same position as the farmers who do not raise corn. It pays him to feed his corn and sell the higher priced coarse grains. It is estimated that in my county, where there is a population of 36,000, there is a surplus of corn, year by year, of 10,000 bushels sold. Admitting the county of Norfolk, with its surplus of 10,000 bushels was benefitted to the extent of $750, the amount of the duty on that surplus, what do my constituents pay for that trifling benefit. Did they pay more for their sugar, more for their cotton goods, more for their woollen goods, more for almost everything they need to buy, in order to get the beggarly advantage, it such advantage there be, of $750 for the whole county. So much for the corn question. Now, I wish to refer, Sir, to a certain Order in Council, which illustrates the way in which deception is practised upon the farmer. I am sorry my hon. friend the Minister of Customs is not in. I think when you go carefully into the consideration of the matters connected with this National Policy, it affords one of the richest mines in a certain direction I have ever met with. During the six months ending 30th June, 1870, the aggregate importation of wheat was 559,968 bushels. In the following six months there was a wonderful increase in the amount of wheat imported. While the importation of wheat during the first six months of the year was 559,968 bushels, it increased during the next six months to 6,515,000 bushels. A very remarkable increase. I hold in my hand an Order in Council, passed on 10th July, 1879, which will explain to a certain extent why this increased importation occurred. That Order in Council will demonstrate pretty conclusively the insincerity of my hon. friends opposite, who led the farmers to believe that they were levying a bona fide duty in good faith. I will commence with the first clause of the Order in Council. It is as follows:

"1. The Collector of Customs at any port of entry shall receive entries of foreign wheat, maize, or other grain, to be ground and packed in bond for exportation or consumption, and said collector shall deliver or cause to be delivered such wheat, maize, or other grain, to be forwarded on to the port of destination where may be situated the mill or mills at which the said wheat, maize, or other grain is to be ground and packed in bond as by him permitted.

"2. The wheat, maize, or other grain shall be so forwarded under bonds to be taken, either by the collector at the port of entry or the collector at the port of destination as may best suit the convenience of the importer, which bonds shall be taken for an amount that will cover the duties chargeable upon the said wheat, maize, or other grains, and be conditioned for the due payment of such duties should such wheat, maize, or other grain go into consumption, or for the due exportation of such wheat, maize, or other grain, or the equivalent thereof in flour and meal, and a proof of the payment of such duties or of due exportation as aforesaid within the year from the date the said bond or bonds, the said bonds shall be duly cancelled, etc."

"Equivalent thereof;" why does it not say "the product thereof?" What does that mean? Will the hon. the Finance Minister not tell us whether there is not a catch there? No answer. I never saw so non-committal a Minister of Finance. I assert that there is a fraud in this thing. I assert that this Order in Council was passed in the interest and at the dictation of certain large millers, and that it was designed for the purpose of allowing these men to import wheat at pleasure, hold it for twelve months, and then export its equivalent. The hon. the Finance Minister will not venture to deny that millers can import wheat under the Order in Council, sell it at pleasure in Canada, and then export the amount equivalent to amount imported ground from any wheat whatever. The amount of duty paid on this 6,500,000 bushels of wheat was \$964,93, and but for that my hon. friend would have had to face a much larger deficit. I propose now to pass on to the statistics of grain importations for the ten and a-half months, ending 1st February. In these ten and a-half months we imported 7,151,462 bushels of wheat; entered for home consumption, 7,951; duty paid, \$1,187.83, which amounts to exactly 16c. and 6 mills on every 1,000 bushels. What a magnificent source of revenue. What a protection to the farmer. We imported during that period 214,102 bushels of oats; entered for home consumption, 80,518; duty collected, \$8,051.88, or an average of $3\frac{3}{4}$ c. per bushel. The amount of corn imported during the same period was \$5,398,994; entered for home consumption, 987,628; duty collected, \$74,076.34, or an average duty of $1\frac{18}{100}$ c. per bushel. The total number of bushels of corn, barley, peas, oats and wheat imported during that period was 12,776,730; value of American grain imported \$10,112,442; total amount of duty collected, \$84,745.91; average duty per bushel, $\frac{68}{100}$ of one cent. This shows that the importation of grain has not ceased. It shows that the duty on grain is a absurd one. It shows that the surplus products of the country still govern the price and are doing so now under the National Policy as they did when there was Free-trade in grain. I think I have demonstrated that this Government has given an advantage to millers under this Order in Council. I challenge hon. gentlemen to deny the truth of this. In this connection I may mention the case of a small mill, which came under my own notice in western Ontario, where nothing but white wheat is produced. The owner desired to procure some spring wheat to mix with the white wheat, but this Order in Council was not framed for him; he was not a large miller; he could not import his spring wheat without paying duty; but a large miller, grinding thousands of bushels, could import his wheat by giving his bonds, and he could grind his wheat or maize and export anything not product of that wheat or maize, and sell in the markets of Canada; and if he at any time within twelve months exported an equivalent amount in flour or meal, his bonds were cancelled. The same is true of large oat-meal millers. Is not this encouraging a monopoly? And is not this a monopoly involving an expense to the many for the benefit of a few. I shall not detain the House much longer. I thank the House for the attention that I have had given to me. I know that I have been somewhat tedious; but I do not trouble the House very often with speeches, and I ask its indulgence to the conclusion of my remarks. I may say that the Reform party is not opposed to the development of manufactures in Canada, but that they are friendly to such a development; and that they are anxious by any legal, just, honest method, to encourage such manufactures. We are not in favour of benefitting one class at the expense of others; that is unjust, but we are in favour of such a development of manufactures as can be reached by honest measures. It affords us unbounded satisfaction to see them prosperous; and I claim that that Tariff which was in force when the gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury Benches came into power was a just Tariff, and one as well calculated to promote the interests of manufacturing industries as the one now in force. Under that old Tariff the growth would have been more healthy and more enduring and substantial, than that mushroom growth produced by the new Tariff. Were our manufacturing industries languishing? Did not our domestic manufactures amount to \$211,000,000 in the year 1871, when the last census was taken? When the present Tariff was enacted, Canada was manufacturing at the rate of \$275,000,000 annually, though it was a period of great depression throughout the world. The fact is they were developed, they were in a healthier condition than in the United States, and for that matter, than in almost any other country; and if this was the case, there was no excuse even in the interest of the manufacturing industries to introduce such a policy. I think I could show—I will show—by the movement of the export trade in domestic manufacture that our manufacturing industries are in a less healthy condition than three years ago. In 1877 this country exported \$4,105,000 of domestic manufactures under the $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. revenue Tariff.

This has fallen in 1879 to $2,700,000, and for the six months ending December 31st, 1879, to $1,495,000. What does that indicate? Does it not indicate that our manufactures are in a less healthy condition now than before, and that the new policy is not working favourably as the hon. gentleman asserts even for the manufacturers themselves. I want to show—and I will show—that the exportation of Manufactures for the last two years under the regime of the late Government, was larger from Canada than from the United States, in proportion to population. The American statistics of exports of manufactures include lumber, staves, heading, and refined petroleum; very properly so, as these articles are clearly entitled to be classed as manufactures. If we adopt this rule of classification in making a comparison of the export of domestic manufactures from the two countries, the following will be the result, which will show that our exports of manufactures are relatively much larger than those of the United States, and that they are declining very rapidly under the National Policy. Under this rule of classification, the export of domestic manufactures from the United States, in 1877, was $144,482,400, from Canada, $19,198,000; in 1878, from the United States, $135,171,000, and from Canada, $17,447,000; in 1879, from Canada, $12,852,000; returns from United States not received. These figures show that the export of manufactures from Canada in 1877 and 1878 were much larger, in proportion to population, than from the United States, and is very far from indicating a languishing condition of our manufacturing industries at that time, and the great falling off for 1879 does not show an increase of prosperity under the National Policy. All these facts, I think, warrant me in saying that the manufacturing interests of Canada did not require a greater measure of Protection than they had. It was not, then, in the interest of the manufacturers, much less of those who had to pay increased prices for manufactures. I say the farmer, especially, was drawn in by delusive promises, which are all proved false in the first ten months the policy was in force, and the men who made these promises, if they are men of intelligence, knew they were false when they were made. Do you doubt that we shall come to the same decision as Victoria, the only other British Colony that has adopted Protection? I have not the slightest doubt that the great masses of the people of Canada will spurn the dictation of the monopolists, who have succeeded in inducing the Government to frame a policy for their special benefit. I have no doubt that the policy accepted on the assurances of these gentlemen, accepted on their false promises—I have no doubt—and I assert it again—that it will be rejected by the people. I have no hesitation in saying that the people of this country will pronounce that this thing is a swindle, and when these gentlemen appear before the court of the people, to have their verdict passed upon their conduct during the period that they remain in power, the verdict of the people will be that they will no longer entrust to them their interests.

MR. PLUMB: I have been pleased with the eloquent address of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). We all know the great skill with which he is able to present arguments based on figures; we all know the great skill with which he is able to present arguments on either side of a question which he chooses to adopt for the time being. We have heard him struggling with a mass of figures, which I do not think any man can attempt to follow, much less to follow the tortuous line of argument that he seemed to think they strengthened, and which I shall not attempt to answer seriatim. The gist of the hon. gentleman's speech is to prove that the policy which has been adopted by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, which has been sanctioned by this House, which has been approved by the country, which has been brought about by the revolution which took place in 1878, is, to use his own language, a deception and a failure.

AN HON. MEMBER: No, no.

MR. PLUMB: Well, yes. He used more severe language than that; and it is strange that a gentleman, usually so courteous in his language, who usually weighs his words cautiously, and who, during all the debates for the many years I have been in the House in which he has taken part, has been noted for his guarded manner, should use such expressions as he has used to-night. There must be something in the atmosphere surrounding him to tempt him to go beyond the course he has been accustomed to pursue in addressing this House. Before proceeding to reply to his arguments, I will, if the House will bear with me, read some remarks which may throw some more light upon the subject on which the hon. gentleman has addressed the House at such great length. I find that an hon. gentleman, who was at one time addressing the House upon the subject of Protection, and seemed to be its very earnest advocate, made use of the following language, which I will read to the House before proceeding to answer the arguments brought forward to-night :

“ We have been told that a Protective policy is one which could only be adopted by a patriarchal Government—a Government which could not only protect industries but also limit production. I hold that a Protective policy, on the contrary, runs through the whole legislative system of any country. To afford protection of life and property is the duty of the Government, and armies are raised and navies built to protect the nation. Prisons are erected for the protection of the public, and free grants given for the purpose of increasing the public wealth and adding to the population.

“ It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufactures without having, in the course of its history imposed exactions and restrictions. This has been notably the case with Great Britain herself; and I think the assertion that the development of various industries is necessary to the cultivation of the self-defensive power of a nation is incontrovertible. We have had an illustration of it in the neighbouring nation. The Southern States were without manufacturing industries while the Northern States were filled with them, and the advantage this gave them resulted in the suppression of the rebellion.

“ No person will assert it is proper to protect industries that are not naturally adapted to the country, but when they are suited to the land it is the duty of the Government to foster them. Arts and manufactures do not spring up readily on a virgin soil. In the first place, trade has a tendency to remain in beaten tracks. Then the advantage is on the side of a nation in which manufactures are established, because money is always more easily obtained there than in a new country.

“ Then, again the possession of organised and skilled labour is an advantage that the manufacturers in a country where manufactures are established for a long time possess over a new country. But, although it may be conceded that Protection is to the advantage of manufactures, unless it can be shown that it is also an advantage to the other classes of the community and the nation at large, all arguments in favour of Protection fall to the ground.

MR. PLUMB.

It must be shown that the agriculturists are to be benefitted by Protection before it is incumbent upon the Government to adopt a Protective policy. I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious Protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by Protection, and that the manufacturer, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away. With a home market of this kind established by Protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops. The purchasing power of money is not a correct measure of the purchasing power of labour. A farmer raises a bushel of corn, which he sells for 50c. in a foreign market, and with the proceeds he can buy three yards of cotton; but supposing the manufactures are brought to his door, and the better market which it creates increases the price to 60c. or 70c. per bushel, and although impost duties are levied on cottons from Manchester so as to add largely to its price, still he may be enabled to buy four yards of cotton with his bushel of corn instead of the three yards it was able to purchase before, as the purchasing power of his labour is increased.

“ We have at our own doors all the illustrations and experience of Protection and its benefit; required for our government and guidance. The United States have adopted a Protective policy under which their manufactures have been fostered and promoted, until, in 1870, their products reached the sum of $4,253,000,000, giving employment to 2,000,000 operatives, and disbursing over $775,500,000 in wages.

“ It has been charged that Protection has prevented the extension of foreign commerce in that country. That may be true; but it is estimated that the domestic commerce of the United States last year reached the enormous proportions of 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing without the fluctuations of risks of foreign trade? Look at the progress of the cotton trade in that country. Previous to the import duties on foreign cottons in 1824, British manufactures crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the Republic; but the imposition of 25 per cent. duty on foreign cottons had the effect, in a few years, not only of building up manufactures, but led to the production of an article better in quality and lower in price than the Americans received from British manufactures before their own industries were established. In 1860 the United States were exporters of cottons, exporting nearly 10 per cent. of the whole amount manufactured. The same way with the iron trade. All attempts to establish iron industries were crushed out by foreign competition, and high prices were maintained at intervals—higher, on the average, than the percentage necessary to produce them in the United States at a profit. But when a Protective duty was imposed, iron manufactures were established, and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton, and it is now sold cheaper than the British iron ever was offered for on that market. The shipping interest of the United States was one of the most signal illustrations of the benefit of a Protection policy that could be produced. Under a Protective tariff the ship-building of the United States had grown, till in 1860 it was nearly as great as that of England, and there came two causes to ruin it. First, the war, which placed the United States shipping at a disadvantage with all other common carriers; and the second cause was the revulsion in the ship-building trade, caused by the substitution of iron for wooden vessels. Under these combined influences, the shipping trade fell into the depressed condition in which it now remains. Why is it that we are so desirous of selling to the United States articles of food? It is simply because they have by Protection built up manufacturing cities with a numerous population, that consumes not only the vast products of their own country, but also afford a better market for our products than we in the Dominion possess. The issue in Canada to-day is not an issue between Free-trade and Protection; the issue is, is the Protection now afforded adequate for the promotion of our industries?"

It may astonish gentlemen to know, but it is a fact, that these eloquent remarks were made by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, and that he made that Protection speech in 1876.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: No, no; it is impossible.

MR. PLUMB: It is a melancholy fact; and no less strange than true. Every word of that argument was then used by my hon. friend on the opposite side of the House, who has treated us to an eloquent discussion on the Free-trade doctrine, which he has imbibed from his friends on the front benches, under the inspiration of the grand old Reformer, who is a power behind the throne, and dictates the policy of the party he is leading to ruin. He stated that the farmers are not realising the advantages of a home market. Now, I do not think it was ever argued in this House that putting a duty on wheat would raise the price. It has always been conceded that the English market controlled the price, and we commend this contention, which we do not dispute, to the attention of our friends in the Maritime Provinces. There has been a time, however, and it may come again, when a duty on wheat would be a Protection to the agricultural interest. There is no doubt that a duty on corn has two objects. As corn enters very largely into the production of spirits, it is right to put a special duty upon it. That was a point which used to be urged without reference to the Protective Tariff. That duty was not expected so much to affect the corn raised in this country as to increase the consumption of the articles that could be substituted for corn. The figures the hon. gentleman gave us on that point are untenable, exaggerated and misleading. He undertook to show us that a diminution in the imports of 1879, compared with 1878, of 1,484,396 bushels of corn had cost the country $641,562, or 47c. a bushel. I do not acknowledge that corn. The hon. gentleman has never condescended to state what has taken the place of that quantity of corn? He has used extraordinary language for a gentleman who is usually so careful. He stated that we have swindled or hoodwinked the people by this nostrum of Protection. It is not the first time that I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite reflect upon the gullibility or stupidity of the people of the Dominion. I think the people had discrimination enough to hurl those hon. gentlemen from power after their five years' effort to ruin the country. I have watched this debate with a great deal of interest, and I know that not a remark has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite which has not been satisfactorily answered either on the floor of the House or in the press of the country. I liked the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I have heard it so often that that I greet it as an old friend. The speech of the late Finance Minister was also familiar. The key note of both speeches was that the policy of the Government was plunging the country into ruin. We have had that repeated ad nauseam by every member of the Opposition who has spoken on the subject. The desperate struggles of hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that the country, which their policy did so much to injure, is utterly ruined, and their heroic and self-sacrificing, but hopeless efforts to obstruct and resist the movement which is bringing about the return of prosperity, reminds me of a story that I will venture to relate, the application of which will be obvious. Some time, about twenty-five years ago, certain enterprising English capitalists and contractors obtained concessions from the Spanish Government for the construction of a system of railways in that romantic and mountainous country. The first line was built, if I remember correctly, from Madrid northward, towards the French frontier, through formidable passes; and a section of forty or fifty miles having been completed, it was determined to run the first train over it with appropriate celebration and ceremonies. Previously, as will be known to everyone conversant with the country, all the travel and traffic had been in the hands of the muleteers, very estimable men, of much earnestness and solemnity of character, but, from a life-long and most intimate association with the useful animals referred to the other day, sympathetically no doubt, by the late Minister of Finance in his speech against the policy of my hon. friend who had succeeded him in office, the muleteers have imbibed and assimilated to themselves the firmness, the temper and gravity of demeanour for which those animals are celebrated. The muleteers watched with much solicitude the progress of the line, and came to the conclusion that it would destroy their occupation, and that trains must not be permitted to run upon it, which would spoil their passenger traffic and empty their pack-saddles. They met in many an anxious consultation, and their head man, who might be called the Grand Old Muleteer—who had grown gray in the mule traffic, and had been buffeted by storm and tempest, until his long visage resembled that of the Knight of the Rueful Countenance, immortalised and pourtrayed by the pen of Cervantes—harangued them in excited language. “We cannot permit this intruder to interfere with us,” he shouted; “it is progress in a direction that we do not believe in. Let us all turn out, mules, donkeys and all, range ourselves on the track on the opening day, and prevent the passage of a train.” Well, Sir, they dressed themselves in their best velvet jackets and silver-buttoned trousers and crimson sashes and broad sombreros, and invited all their neighbours and friends to accompany them and see the glorious triumph of principle. They selected as the place of operations a difficult pass in the mountains, on a heavy upward grade, with ravines and precipices on each side of the track. The engine, decked with flags and wreaths, drawing a long train of carriages filled with the chief personages in the Government and their friends, came rushing on, when the engineer discovered at some distance ahead, upon the track, an immovable mass, which, on a nearer approach, proved to be a concourse of six or seven hundred muleteers, mounted on their faithful animals, whose more than Roman firmness is sometimes stigmatised as obstinacy. Their tails were turned towards the approaching train, and the gaunt form of the chief could have been seen in characteristic position—a leader in the rear of his party—astride of the biggest mule, with the longest ears of the whole, and with feet thrust in the largest stirrups. In vain the signal was rung and the whistle screamed, the mules kept their position and the train came to a momentary pause. The engineer then, upon a brief consultation with the manager, backed down to a convenient spot, uncoupled his engine from the train, opened the throttle valve, and, at full speed, rushed upon the obstructionists. It was more than mules or riders had bargained for; there was a general stampede, and mule-meat was abundant in that vicinity for some time afterwards. The road was successfully opened for traffic, and trains have been running regularly ever since. This is an illustration of the obstacles presented to the National Policy by hon. gentlemen opposite. They are trying to stop the Government train, but I am afraid, if they persist, that mule-meat will be plentiful for the next few months. If I have overstated the case or overdrawn the simile, I apologise—to the mules. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr Ross) deludes himself with the idea that there has been a tremendous reaction since 1878. That hon. gentleman was elected by acclamation in 1874, when he had a number of influential persons to assist him, as an Inspector of Schools, under the pay of the Ontario Government, and a leader of the temperance agitation; but he got in by the skin of his teeth in 1878, when he was elected by the small majority of thirty-five, although he still had those aids.

MR. MILLS: How large was your majority?

MR. PLUMB: The hon. gentlemen have often insinuated that I was elected by a majority of two. The hon. leader of the Opposition, I understand, inspired an Irish Catholic to run against me. No aspirant in the neighbourhood could be persuaded to undertake the task. Our opponents, it may be noticed, never nominated an Irish Catholic in Ontario where they had a chance to succeed. Mr. Hughes ran against me; he bought up all the loose fish in the constituency, and got a majority of two, and he has stated that he spent $17,500, as I have heard, during the election. I contested the case and claimed the seat. He was unseated, disqualified, had to pay all costs, and he consented that enough of the votes that he had corruptly obtained should be stricken off from his list to give me a majority, whether it was greater or less made no difference. By claiming the seat I left it open for him to proceed against me for bribery, and convict me if I had been guilty, and he could proceed without depositing $1,000, as I did, in the Court, or any other sum. It was open to him to keep me out if he could, and to disqualify me, as I disqualified him, if he could do so, and I knew that his counsel would press the case against me to the bitter end if he thought there was a chance of success. I warned my opponent before the polling day not to spend money. My own position was an impregnable one, or I would not, by claiming the seat, have given him the opportunity of proceeding against me. As it was, I unseated and disqualified him, and I obtained my seat, it mattered not whether by striking off four corrupt votes or forty; and I think it is unfair to the candidate they have slaughtered to throw the insinuation across the House that I was elected by a majority of two, and compel me to repeat the story of his very unsavory contest, a contest which, I think, he was forced into by the strong urgency of the late First Minister and a greater power. I do not think my friends opposite gain anything by reminding me of that election, whenever I speak of election matters. They are welcome to all the honour of the reminiscence, and so I shall be happy to repeat this little story whenever my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) refers to it, as he did just now. My hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), addressing the House the other day, in those stentorian tones for which he is famous, and which go over our heads like the boom of the bittern, reminded us that he was one of the latest converts to Free-trade, as he is now with new-born zeal one of the loudest-mouthed denunciators of the policy of the Government. He was not always the fierce opponent of Protection he is now. There is a sort of mesmeric influence in the great leader of his party, who led it to destruction, which the hon. gentleman cannot resist; it will keep the party where they are now if they continue to follow his lead. The hon. member for South Brant, in 1873, when my hon. friend the Finance Minister held the office he now holds, and made that Budget Speech which has been the subject of vain criticism of hon. gentlemen opposite, but which I believe is one of the clearest and most perfect summaries of the financial condition of this country ever presented, uttered an appeal to him ad misericordiam, which I find reported in the following words. I am not responsible for the grammatical beauties of the extract:

“Mr. PATERSON, (South Brant), expressed his astonishment at the hon. the Finance Minister having announced that no change would be made in the Tariff, and he hoped the Government would fulfil the pledges given by the Premier to introduce a Protective Tariff in the country.”

It is a little surprising—but those are his words. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman made his appeal with all the touching language and manner usual with him, and so familiar to those who stay to hear him when he addresses the House with that irresistible persuasiveness, with that wonderful logic which he is master of, and which may be described by a well-known quotation from Shakespeare: “Tales told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signify nothing.” But he has, I know, a special grievance, as we heard the other night, that the Tariff has ruined the confectionery business. The hon. the Finance Minister has made bankrupt the dealers in sugar-sticks, in the particular vicinity of the hon. member for South Brant. I am sorry if it is so, because there are worthy, honest men in the trade. I do not believe it is so; but if it is so, there are a great many anxious mothers who will bless the hon. the Finance Minister for having lessened the number of infantile stomach aches and the demand for soothing syrup. The hon. gentleman's touching reference to the ruin of a special industry is not unnatural. The exhibitor at a country fair, although he may conduct you to the stalls of the Durhams and the Duchesses, and to the horse-rings and the sheep-pens, will not fail at last to lead you to his own little litter of Berkshires, where they lie huddled beside their recumbent mother. There centres his interests; as for the rest he cares nothing. But we must come to the consideration of more serious matters. We have heard the constantly reiterated and constantly refuted statements from the late Finance Minister, pronounced in the dulcet and courteous sympathetic tones which he always employs when addressing his successor—we have heard, besides, many other hackneyed statements which have also been disproved time after time, but which crop up again, exactly as Anteus, when thrown to earth by Hercules, the bruiser, arose again with renewed vigour. It is no use to bring the late Finance Minister to grass; he rises and strikes out again with the blind and reckless ferocity always exhibited by him from the very first day we heard him as Finance Minister address the House in 1874. He has learned nothing, has forgotten nothing. He tells us again and again that the Conservatives increased the expenditure from $13,700,000 in 1867 to $23,316,316 in 1874—an increase of nearly $10,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite are never weary of saying this. They roll the statement like a sweet morsel under the tongue on all occasions. The hon. member for Lambton has repeated it in almost every speech he has made on the hustings, and again he reiterates it in this discussion. I took the pains, last year, to analyse this increase, and stated then, as I can now, that not one of the items of increase was seriously objected to by hon. gentlemen opposite, when on that side, between 1867 and 1873. It is only an afterthought to call the Conservatives to account for this expenditure. It is childish to say that the expenditure of 1867, when this Dominion was in its infancy, was any criterion for the expenditure of 1873-4, when Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, and British Columbia had been added, and when developments necessary for the Dominion, for the protection of the North-West, and expenditures growing out of the purchase of the North-West Territory from the Hudson Bay Company, with the interest on that outlay, had to be provided for, when the enlargement of the canals, erection of lighthouses, construction of harbours, building of the Intercolonial Railway, and other necessary things for the development and consolidation of this great Dominion, had to be provided for, and all this was done out of an overflowing exchequer and a constantly increasing surplus. When I see the expenditure incurred by the late Government upon a declining revenue, with yearly increasing deficits, I often wonder what they would have done, if unfortunately, one may say, they had had a surplus. They would soon have made an end to it, for they would have made it an excuse for squandering every dollar that entered the Treasury, instead of being able to state, as was the late Finance Minister when he went to borrow in England and showed the silver face of his shield, that the Government which preceded him had spent $10,000,000 on works, properly chargeable to capital, out of income. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if they charge us with extravagance, can be told that they increased the expenditure beyond the most extravagant year of the Government which resigned in 1873—increased it, too, year by year, in face of the great commercial depression that overwhelmed the world, and notwithstanding that they starved certain Departments—for instance, the Militia, and Public Works and Buildings chargeable to income to the extent of over a million dollars in 1877 and 1878. When they quitted office they left the present Finance Minister an accumulation of deficits reaching $6,000,000, with no possible provision for that exigency. They left it after doing what they could to damage the country's credit, and to anticipate unfavourably the efforts of the present Finance Minister to negotiate a loan to meet a debt of £1,500,000 in January, 1879, falling due, and for which the late Government ought to have made provision during the abundance and plethora of money in June and July, 1878. The late Finance Minister was then, however, engaged in making those harangues which have earned him the reputation of the most reckless and slanderous speaker who ever faced a public assemblage in Canada. The present Minister of Finance went to England in December, 1878, at a time when the failure of the West of England Bank and the City of Glasgow Bank had paralysed the capitalists of the country, and had given a most damaging shock to credit and commerce; and when the charge of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the present Government was about to initiate legislation prejudicial to the interests of the country and disloyal to English interests, was ringing in everybody's ears, and he negotiated upon unguaranteed debentures the best loan ever placed by the Dominion in Great Britain, notwithstanding the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to disparage him and defeat his plans. Most unpatriotic efforts were made by them with this object, but in vain; the charge that he was attempting to sever the golden bond that connects us with the Mother Country fell harmless. I congratulate my hon. friend on the brilliant success of his loan. The present Finance Minister realised for that loan a higher price, in my judgment, by 6 or 7 per cent., than was realised by the hon. gentleman in his loan of 1876. I have examined his loan of 1876; made the deductions that were acknowledged to be correct and in accordance with the prospectus, and I do not believe I have got at the bottom price of it yet, for the hon. gentleman has never disputed my figures. I made out that he got less than 89, probably 88½, for that loan, making allowances for interest and instalments from the time he negotiated it, allowing instalments to run on until the following July. He has never taken exception to my statements; he has been glad to accept them, for fear I would make worse ones for him. When I asked him to allow Mr. Langton to give me the figures of that loan, I was never able to get anything but an evasive letter. We were told by the hon. member for Centre Huron, the other day, in his sneering way, that my hon. friend did really make a very fair operation. Of course, it was not anything like what he (Sir Richard) could have done; he, a heaven-born financier, who was discovered accidentally in 1873 to have acquired great financial skill, although the same paper that then eulogised him had denounced him six months before as a mixer and muddler of figures, and supported a rival candidate at his election. That hon. gentleman did really condescend to say that the hon. the Finance Minister had made a tolerably creditable loan; and true, he quoted at that time Australia and certain other countries as having made before loans, which I deny, and he insinuated that the United States were borrowing money at a comparatively lower rate, which is not the case. Why, the hon. gentleman used to spend his whole time in denouncing the system of the United States, by which it had risen to unparalleled greatness, and he used to tell us that that country was utterly ruined by a Protective policy, although the depression which passed over the United States and all other countries, affected Free-trade and Protective countries alike. Every country fell for a moment under its blighting influence. There never had been before such wide-spread commercial desolation in the history of the business world. There were deep-seated and far-reaching causes that had nothing to do with a Protective or Free-trade policy. Gentlemen of high ability, who have made it their special occupation to look into such matters, declares that the general depression was not due to the fiscal policy of any country which has been effected by it. There was a great inflation which followed the discovery of gold; there was a vast improvement in machinery, which brought about an enormous increase of production in manufactured articles; there was the opening up of new railroad enterprises throughout the world, which brought out and developed the iron interest in England to an unparalleled extent. There was the creation of enormous loans upon the public credit of Foreign States which found markets in England and stimulated trade and industry there, and when these causes culminated, and the demand fell below the supply, there was a general crisis, and a general depression, from which we are now slowly, but sure at recovering. It may be to the advantage of hon. gentlemen on the other side to tell them that the depression, which first began in the United States in September, 1873, by the failure of Jay Cooke and Company, and then extended itself over the whole commercial world, although that depression first fell with frightful severity upon the United States, a country which my hon. friends were never tired of quoting as being a horrible example of Protection which we were bound to shun, it is the first to recover in advance of Free-trade England. That country is now again going on in its career of prosperity with giant strides, and we do not hear the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—although they are very monotonous in their utterance, and give us the same old story every time they rise—we do not hear of them talking now about the United States; they have struck off their docket their references to the ruin of that country. I am sorry that it has been eliminated from the catalogue which the late Finance Minister used to bring forward, because that was his chief argument; and now that the pins are knocked out from under him, I do not know with what he is going to replace them. I was in the United States not long ago, and I found that the great iron industry in the State of New York had been revived and was working full time. Business had everywhere taken a new impulse, confidence had been restored, the people were again preparing to go forward in those enterprises which distinguished that country. I found there an universal feeling of hopefulness; but I did not find that their horrible Protective Tariff had been changed. I found that it remained almost exactly as it had been since 1861, and was still the impassable barrier—the Chinese wall—which my hon. friend had been obliged to deal with when he stood face to face with the deficiencies that were left in the Treasury by the management of the hon. gentleman opposite. It is useless for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that the people are hoodwinked; that the labouring classes do not understand their interests. The labouring classes do not need to be taught by unsympathising, supercilious men like the late Finance Minister. They do not need to be instructed by such as he as to what is their interest, for they are very quick to see it, and he vastly under-estimates the intelligence of the people when he speaks of their ignorance and delusion in regard to the policy which has been given them, in accordance with their votes, deliberately recorded in its favour. In the United States, under the system of universal suffrage, whenever a new Congress is elected, the people have an immediate remedy in respect to anything which they desire to change. They can send such representatives to Congress as will effect their wishes. Yet they have endured the frightful bondage of a Tariff, which we are told renders them worse than slaves, since 1861; and I have never heard that they have made a real and earnest attempt to shake off that bondage, of which the hon. gentlemen opposite are never tired of talking. They are proverbially quick-sighted, shrewd and careful of their pockets. At every election in the United States, the Protective system is put on its trial, and it has been affirmed at every election, since it was adopted by great majorities. At the last session of Congress but one, Mr. Wood, a Democrat from the State of New York, and a Free-trader in a limited sense—for there never were any Free-traders, in the English sense, in the United States, except the people from the South, who formerly coalesced with the Democrats to keep down the schemes of the Northern manufacturers—proposed a modification of the Tariff, and I heard hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House exulting in the idea that, after all, the destructive fabric which had been reared by the Protectionist policy in the United States was to be overthrown. But Mr. Wood only proposed a reduction, even in the extremest point, to 35 per cent., and to that point upon a very limited list. It has been charged against my hon. friends that the legislation of the majority of this Parliament, of which I am a humble member, has been unpatriotic, disloyal and unfavourable to England. Why, there never was a more unfair statement made; and I, in my turn, may say, as my hon. friend on the other side did not hesitate to say—although I will not use the precise language that he used in speaking of us—I will say that I do not believe that the gentlemen who have reiterated that assertion on the other side of the House are sincere in making it. I will not insult their intelligence in such a way as to accept their statements as sincere. I would as soon believe that the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) was honest when he attempted to fix responsibility for the vagaries of Mr. Perreault, of Montreal, upon the Conservative party, as to believe that he and his friends are sincere and honest when they make the statement that our policy is a blow aimed at England. I know that the gentlemen on the other side do not believe for one moment that the great Conservative party of this country, represented by a vast majority in loyal Quebec, by a vast majority in loyal Ontario, by a vast majority in nearly every one of the Provinces of this Dominion, has deliberately set about adopting a policy which would be an insult to the great country to which we owe affection, loyalty and allegiance. The accusation is preposterous. We never have accused the leaders of the Liberal party of holding disloyal sentiments, though they were sometimes in very suspicious company, and we ought to claim from them protection against the charges which their underlings bring against us. The figures which the hon. the Minister of Finance has given us in his Budget Speech ought to have convicted the hon. gentlemen who made such statements on the floor of this House, and ought to have put them to shame. They tried to prove too much; they tried to prove, on the one hand, that the policy is unfriendly to England, would put a tax on the British manufacturer, and would sever the bond which unites the two countries. They asserted that it was but a step towards annexation or towards independence. On the other hand, they say that the policy is a menace to the United States, and is likely to bring about reprisals from that country, which had already raised its Tariff quite as high as it intends to do. Now, the calm resignation with which the United States has received our Tariff is a rebuke to those gentlemen. My hon. friend (Sir Samuel L. Tilley) has shown that the drain on our revenue was constantly flowing into the United States. The balance of trade was constantly in favour of that country. Our exports were decreasing, and our imports were increasing. We had in the year 1879 a balance of twenty-five or twenty-six million dollars in gold against us, which we had to pay them, and we bought from them everything which represented skilled labour, at its highest rate. We gave them in exchange either gold or the productions of our labour, representing 75c. to $1 per day. The greater parts of what we gave them were agricultural products, or the products of the forest, which we had to win from the soil with the greatest labour, and with the very smallest return for that labour. That was our position, and we were met at the frontier at every point by a hostile Tariff wall which had been thrown up against us. My hon. friend found that as our imports from Great Britain were gradually decreasing, our export trade with that country—our best customer—was increasing steadily and far exceeded our imports; that it was desirable that we should make an effort to check the drain to the United States, and do something to bring down the enormous balance which we were sending across the border to the impoverishment of our own industries. Anybody who looks at the returns of my hon. friend will find that his Tariff has had the desired effect. Anybody who looks at the returns will find that those figures cannot be successfully disputed. I do not care how many hon. gentlemen get up on the other side with their columns of statistics prepared to prove that this percentage, or the other percentage, has been affected by this Tariff. The great result of the Tariff is there, and we understand perfectly well that we have made it in the best interests of this country. I defy anybody to prove that it has been in the slightest degree hostile to the British manufacturer or the British merchant; and the British manufacturer and the British merchant are not all of Britain. We hold here enormous amounts of British capital which has been entrusted to us; it is our duty to make that capital productive and to protect it; it is our duty to protect everything we can to promote the success and prosperity of this country, and thereby we shall certainly enhance the value of the investments that have been made in this country by our friends on the other side of the Atlantic. But, in any case, my hon. friend had no other alternative except to raise his Tariff. He found himself in a sea of deficits, from which there was no other means of extrication except by direct taxation. We have never heard from the hon. gentlemen opposite what they intended to do to fill the Treasury, which they had depleted, if they had remained in office. We have heard every sort of denunciation. We have heard every kind of abuse which, with some members, passes for argument, but we never have had from the late Finance Minister, or from the late Premier, or from any of his followers, the slightest intimation as to how that abyss would have been filled, which they created by their persistent extravagance, and worse. I might, perhaps, venture timidly to follow the example of the hon. member who has just spoken, and quote here a few lines of verse which would aptly apply to some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and their late colleagues, but I almost fear to do so, lest I should incur the sarcastic sneers of those refined and intelligent gentlemen who have manufactured very limp verses for me, put my name to them, and then heaped their scurrility upon their own banflings.

MR. ANGLIN: Give it to us; let us have it.

MR. PLUMB: If you insist, here it is. It relates to the events of the last Parliament:

“There were scandalous jobs in the East and the West,
In which men high in place were chief actors;
Corruption whose current no check could arrest
In a Parliament packed with contractors.

“The members, ^{saw} returned in the Commons we
By gold of the Government minting,
Who chattered, defiant of honour and law
For Supplies, Transportation and Printing.

“A nation beside us, who made us its spoil,
For Canada's rulers had taught her That she could not protect her own children of toil,
Or keep her own markets from slaughter.”

That was the record of hon. gentlemen on the other side. I believe that the Tariff which has been introduced in this country is the first step in a new era of its development. I believe that notwithstanding the croakings from the other side, notwithstanding the efforts which are made to keep down the prosperity of the country, and notwithstanding the menaces of hon. gentlemen which are intended to prevent capital from being introduced into the country, manufactures from being established, and those enterprises that are already in existence from being pushed forward, they will be powerless to effect their object, as was the old woman on the coast to sweep out with her broom the flood-tide which deluged her cottage. I think we are to be congratulated that we have now a Government that have fulfilled, in every respect, the promises they made when out of power. They are not like hon. gentlemen opposite who falsified every promise they made while so long in opposition. We have attempted, in good faith, to do all that we promised, and to rescue the perishing industries of the country; and I believe that, notwithstanding all we have heard from the other side of the House, we are succeeding, and we shall succeed in doing it. I have no idea that Canada is in the condition hon. gentlemen have pourtrayed in the speeches we have heard ever since the Budget Debate begun, and, in fact, before the debate began. No single question has come up that has not been made an opportunity, in some way or other, for hon. gentlemen to attack the industries of the country, the prosperity of the country, and the National Policy. Even my hon. friend the late Premier, who has language enough and ideas enough to speak to the question on any subject without wandering from it, cannot refrain from uttering a diatribe against the National Policy whenever occasion offers. I did not intend to have occupied so much of the time of the House, when I rose to reply to my hon. friend who has just sat down, and who has exhibited a specimen of political inconsistency which is astounding to those who have not heard the extract I have read to this House. I say that that hon. gentleman is the boldest man that ever stood up in this House, in the face of his record, to press in language which I refrain to characterise, the argument that he has brought forward to-day. It is in very bad taste, to say the least, for the hon. gentleman to advance such arguments in such a manner. I think he must put himself rectus in curia; he must put himself right in court before he talks about the Free-trade policy. The Free-trade policy was forced upon England under circumstances it is not necessary here to state; but I believe there is a reaction going on there now, and if it would be possible for England to retrace her steps, she would take her position in accord with other nations who have a Protective policy—a policy that has enabled France to meet, without distress, the heaviest and greatest exactions that any country was ever subjected to, since Brennus threw his sword into the scale, and cried Væ Victis. It is a policy that has made her rich, when other nations were becoming poor—a policy that has stimulated her industries and will enable them to hold their own against the competition of the world. A case was told to me by a gentleman the other day, which illustrates exactly what that policy tends to. It was in regard to the manufacture of a certain kind of thread. French manufacturers had been compelled to go to England to get that thread. He suggested to the French Government that if they would give him a moderate protection, he would undertake to introduce the manufacture of it into France. The protection was given to him, and within ten years, whereas they had been paying twenty to thirty millions of francs per annum for that material, they were manufacturing from seventy to eighty million francs worth per annum. The same system has established the beet culture in France, and now they produced some 450,000 tons of beet sugar in a year, and in addition to this, in the region where beet sugar is manufactured, thirty-two head of cattle are now raised where one head was raised before. It was argued by Free-traders that the system of beet culture would kill the foreign commerce which depended on the sugar trade. It was 35,000 tons a year all told. That same commerce now is over 300,000 tons, growing out of the beet culture alone, and the beet sugar has come to be so large an article of daily use that at this moment 40 per cent. of all the sugar consumed in the world is manufactured from the beet root. In 1876-77, 3,000,000 of tons of sugar were consumed in those countries, in regard to which we have statistics, and of that quantity 1,200,000 was made from the beet root. The refuse of the beet root forms the richest and best cattle food of any other agricultural product, and, in addition to that, the culture of the beet cleanses the soil and prepares it thoroughly for a rotation of crops. France protected the beet culture sedulously, in spite of the sneers of Free-traders, in spite of the same kind of arguments, which are revamped from Bastiat, diluted by being passed through feebler minds, and pressed upon this House. France protected it against the advice of economists, and against the advice of many experts, who said it could not chemically be refined so as to compete with the product of the cane. We now see the result. This is one of the evidences that our friends upon the other side of the House have not observed with candid minds the course of other countries, and have not monopolised all the knowledge in the world, although they arrogate it to themselves. I trust that the country will receive and approve, as I know it will receive and approve, the financial statement which has been brought down to this House, and which is now the subject of debate. I believe that the country fully appreciates the honest efforts which the hon. the Finance Minister has made in the direction of trying, by actual observation, to ascertain and understand what are the necessities of the country. He has not hesitated to go among the people to take counsel with them. Note what he says, that as there is complaint in some manufacturing quarters, it shows conclusively that he has not made his Tariff entirely in the manufacturing interests. It is the custom of gentlemen on the other side of the House to denounce manufacturing industries. It is their custom on every occasion to denounce and decry and slander every industrial enterprise of this country; but my hon. friend took an entirely different course. He did not arrogate to himself that universal knowledge which it is claimed as the specialty of my hon. friend who conducted the finances of the country with such wonderful success before my hon. friend came into power. He set about in a practical way to understand the workings of the business interests of the country. Hon. gentlemen, with their customary tactics, have sought to ridicule and belittle my hon. friend's efforts. I can tell them that the people appreciate and will honour him for the trouble and care, and interest that he has taken, and for the labour which he has performed in that direction. I can tell hon. gentlemen that it is not a light task for a man who conducts a laborious Department such as my hon. friend administers, to leave his duties here and to make the extended tours he has made through the country in ascertaining what the true position of things may be. I may say that he was not willing to accept the statements of the Globe, and of the gentlemen the Globe inspires, in regard to the condition of this country. He chose to see for himself, and all honour is due to him for having taken the course which the gentleman who preceded him scorned to take. The hon. gentleman who controlled the finance in the late Government brought down a Tariff which he was compelled, by universal clamour, to withdraw. He, however, added 2½ per cent. to the 15 per cent list. The opinion of the hon. gentleman evidently is that that Tariff should never be touched again; that no man must lift his hand against it; that no man should presume to say that 2½ per cent. did not represent with the most mathematical accuracy the measure of burthen which could be put upon the people of the country, and that anathemas would fall upon any man who presumed to lay his sacrilegious hands upon it. Hon. gentlemen who harangue us upon this policy imagine in some mysterious way that their utterances will have the effect of restoring them to power. The jaunty attitude of the hon. member for West Middlesex reminds me very forcibly of one of Mark Twain's sketches, in which a western editor gave an account of a little difficulty in which he was placed by an irascible gentleman whom he had slandered. "That unfortunate, misguided man," he wrote in a leaded column, "rudely burst into our office; he addressed to us improper language; we thrust our right eye against his fist; after he had stood paralysed with the shock, we thrust our nose firmly between his teeth, fell on our back, placed our throat vigorously in the grasp of his right hand, following up our advantage by pressing our left eye against the thumb of his left, and vanquished him for ever." This is a fair parody on the brags of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). If he thinks his party in a victorious position, it is the victorious position just described, he is welcome to it. No figures or argument that have been brought forward against him disturbed or disparaged the postulates and conclusions of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance for a moment; no figures that can be brought forward on the other side can injure his position as an honest, candid, practical statesman, carrying forward a successful policy. He is firmly rooted in the affections of the people of Canada; and he and his policy are destined to be sustained by the people; and it will be long ere our friends on the opposite side will have the opportunity of reversing his policy, or of inflicting upon us a revival of the political crimes and blunders which brought shame and disaster upon Canada during the time they held the reins of power.

MR. SNOWBALL moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: Before the hon. the leader of the Government left, he mentioned to me his conversation with the hon. the leader of the Opposition.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; we arranged that it should go on after six o'clock to-morrow.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: In looking over the Order, I see we cannot reach it after six.

MR. MACKENZIE: We can reach it by consent.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: The hon. the leader of the Government did not think of it being Wednesday when he made that arrangement with the hon. gentleman opposite; and, if we proceed with the Order, we shall not reach it.

MR. MACKENZIE: But I mentioned specifically to him that we only had until six.

SIR SAMUEL L. TILLEY: It might be objected to by private members.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think, if he assents, any one will object.

Motion agreed to, and Debate adjourned.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS REPORTS.

TIME EXTENDED.

MR. LANGEVIN moved:

That, in accordance with the Fourth Report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines, the time for the reception of reports on Private Bills be extended for a period of three weeks from the 25th instant.

MR. BLAKE: I do not rise to object to the motion, because I think that it is a necessary consequence of the delays already allowed, but to say that the necessity for this motion indicates in the most pointed manner the inconvenience and dangerous consequences of permitting, in future, these delays in the progress of Private Bills. We are now informed that the main bulk of the Private Bills is to be disposed of during the stress and strain of the latter portion of the Session, when it is utterly impossible for many members, who would otherwise be quite willing to devote time to their consideration, to give them proper attention, considering the late hours we keep and the vast variety of business that comes before us at this stage. My suggestion is, the evil being so great, that it is the duty of the Government to propose, some time during this Session, a resolution which may be pointed out to the promoters of Private Bills next Session, showing the determination of the House to sustain in their rigidity the Rules which prescribe that these Bills should be ready before the commencement of the Session, and introduced at an early fixed day. Our Rules are sufficiently elastic, as more than once pointed out, to enable the House, on any reasonable excuse, to do justice in any particular, pressing case. But the mass of the Private Bill legislation, as we know from the circumstance that notice is given of it in due season in the Gazette, might just as well be ready before the beginning of the Session, were it not for the delays and negligence of the promoters and their lawyers. We now invite the continuance of this evil practice. Unless some step is taken this Session in the direction to which I refer, we shall find that it will recur and grow worse next Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with every word that has fallen from the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). It is absolutely necessary, in the interest of private as well as public rights and for the prevention of injustice, that there should be strict supervision over our Private Bill legislation. Our country is so rapidly growing that we may expect every Session more and more subjects and applications for Private Bill legislation. As the hon. gentleman observes, the very fact of its being known that we insist on due notice being given in the Gazette, and on those Bills being ready at the opening of Parliament, will materially tend to abolish the present evil. The parties who prepare the notices can just as well prepare the Bills for the opening of Parliament. It is owing to the laxity of the House and Parliament generally in this respect for many years that it has been supposed that, no matter how stringent the Rules may be, the House will, on a motion, be good enough to dispense with them, and allow the Bills to be brought in at a period much later than that prescribed. I think this debate will have that effect in the future upon persons who are likely to come before Parliament for legislation. It will have the effect of warning them that, if they do not carry out the resolutions of the House, Private Bill legislation will be set aside. There is no excuse in these cases for delay. It is simply negligence, arising from the belief that the House will not enforce its own Rules.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is just this to be said, that, no matter what resolutions are passed, unless those who govern the legislation of the House take this matter up, nothing will be done. Nothing could be stronger than what we have already in our Rules in respect to this. All that is wanted is thoroughness on the part of the Government in enforcing them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is quite true. We shall endeavour in the future to imitate the great rigidity with which my hon. friend opposite carried out those Rules during the last five years.

MR. LANGEVIN: In answer to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I would add that, no matter what the Rule is, and supposing we had adhered to it strictly, a motion of this kind would be necessary, because the Railway Committee and other Standing Committees, have such a large number of Bills before them that they require a good deal of time to dispose of them. If we want these Bills to be properly examined and discussed, we must have the time to do it. It is not easy to go through more than two or three Bills in a day, and we cannot have more than two sittings per week of each of the Railway, Banking, or other large Committees. We therefore see the necessity for the Rule relative to the reception of reports to be changed, in order that the Committees may have sufficient time to examine the Bills and report. Of course I concur entirely in the remarks made about adhering strictly to the Rules in the introduction of Bills. It is a most dangerous thing to allow Private Bills to come in without ample notice having been given. We sometimes allow a Bill to be introduced when only five or six weeks' notice has been given, and this has prevented parties who had objections to the Bill from presenting their objections. The Bill passes, and then the objection is made, but it comes too late. I have seen instances of this even during the present Session, and I certainly think it desirable that our Rules should be strictly adhered to.

MR. PLUMB: I think that, in view of the enormous and increasing quantity of Private Bill legislation which is coming before us, there should be some effectual means of providing that persons who wish to obtain private charters should obey certain regulations applicable to all. There may be occasional exceptions, which can be taken into consideration when they arise, but the constant practice of departing from the Rule as to notice and as to the time when Private Bills can be introduced is pernicious. The practice, which seems to have become a matter of course, of extending the time, does not give a fair opportunity to parties who may be affected to appear and be heard with respect to legislation that may affect their rights. I believe it would be greatly in the interest of this country, and greatly facilitate the proceedings of Committees and of the House, if there were certain cardinal principles laid down by law in respect to Bills which constantly come up for legislation here and which are of kindred character, and upon which the same kind of discussion constantly takes place. Most of the clauses of Acts chartering railway, banking, trust and telegraph companies, and all that class of legislation could be settled upon certain established principles and put into a form of words which could apply to all. The promoters of Private Bills should be compelled to have them drawn in that form. I have seen a Bill for chartering a private company brought into the Committee of Banking and Commerce, in which its promoters seemed to have deliberately extracted from every Act of a similar nature that was on the Statute-book its loosest and most objectionable clause. Something should be done to prevent that. Precedents are always cited in every kind of Private Bill legislation that is brought before the House, and, whenever we allow to slip past us an objectionable clause, it remains on the Statute-book, and is used as an excuse for coming here and asking for the same thing.

MR. CASGRAIN: If I can draw any conclusion from what has been said, it is that there should be some remedy to this kind of legislation, and the proper remedy would be for every Private Bill to be submitted to the hon. the Minister of Justice before it comes before Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That would be to burden unduly the Minister of Justice. But, if the proposition of the Senate is carried out, we shall have a joint body of law clerks by whom all these Bills may be examined before coming before the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

CHINESE—PETITIONS IN RELATION TO.

RESOLUTION.

MR. DECOSMOS moved:

That all petitions respecting the Chinese presented to this House during this Session be printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think that is a very objectionable course. I do not object to these petitions being printed, but I think their being printed in the Votes and Proceedings would be a precedent that should not be established. Every member would think that he would be entitled to the same privilege.

MR. DECOSMOS: They are very brief and I think it desirable that they should be so printed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There will be no objection to having them printed for the use of members, but we must not get into the habit of overloading the Votes and Proceedings which are draft copies of the Journals of this House.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

Resolved, That all petitions respecting the Chinese presented to the House during this Session, be printed for the use of members.—(Mr. DeCosmos).

MR. LANGEVIN.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 83) Further to amend the Act respecting cruelty to animals.—(Mr. MacDonald, Pictou.)

SUPERANNUATION FUND.

QUESTION.

MR. KEELER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to examine into the state of the Superannuation Fund, the working of the Act, and the amounts granted under it, as was proposed to be done by Special Committee of last Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is the intention of the Government to examine into the state of the Fund.

COMMERCIAL UNION WITH THE UNITED STATES.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether any correspondence has taken place between the Dominion Government and Mr. Wharton Barker, of Philadelphia, on the subject of a Commercial Union between the United States and Canada.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There has been no correspondence between the Government and Mr. Wharton Barker on the subject. Mr. Wharton Barker, I believe, has sent every individual member of the House, including myself, copies of his own views, but there has been no communication with the Government.

OFFICIAL ASSIGNEES' RETURNS.

QUESTION.

MR. GUNN enquired, Whether it is true that a large number of official assignees have failed to comply with the law as to Government returns, and other matters; and, if so, whether it is the intention of the Government, before the Act respecting the Insolvency Law receives the Royal Assent, to make efforts to compel such defaulters to make good their omissions.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): There are a number of official assignees who have made no returns of their statistics, although they have been urged to do so by the Department. I may add that the provisions of the Insolvency Law providing that assignees having funds in their hands should pay those funds into Court are excepted in the repealing Act, and immediate action will be taken to carry these provisions of the law into effect.

MANITOBA LANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide a more expeditious machinery, by which letters patent for lots of land in Manitoba may not remain so long in their passage from one Department to another before finally reaching the applicants.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Government has taken every step possible to expedite the issue of patents.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVE CRIMINALS.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED.

MR. BLAKE moved that the House do now go into Committee to consider the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That in April, 1877, both the Houses of Parliament of Canada unanimously adopted a Joint Address to Her Majesty in the following terms:—

“To the Queen’s Most Excellent Majesty:

“MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

“We, Your Majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate and Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to approach your Majesty for the purpose of representing:

“That the Parliament of Canada has all the power necessary for making provision for the extradition from Canada of Fugitive Criminals.

“That the Parliament and Government of Canada have all the powers proper for performing the obligations of Canada, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign States, arising under Treaties between the Empire and foreign States.

“That several Extradition arrangements extending to Canada have been made between Your Majesty and foreign States, and that other such arrangements may from time to time be made.

“That it is proper to make provisions by one Canadian law, for the execution, as respects Canada, of all such arrangements.

“That a Bill has passed both Houses of the Parliament of Canada, and now awaits Your Majesty’s assent providing for the execution, as respects Canada, of all such arrangements so soon as the operation of the Extradition Act of 1870 of the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall have ceased or been suspended within Canada.

“That by the said Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom certain provisions are made for the extradition of Fugitive Criminals, and by the 17th section it is enacted that the Act when applied by Order in Council shall, unless it is otherwise provided by such Order, extend to the several British Possessions in the same manner as if throughout the Act the British Possessions were substituted for England as the case may require, with certain modifications, and by the 18th section it is enacted that if by any law or ordinance, made before or after the passing of the said Act, by the Legislature of any British Possession, provision is made for carrying into effect within such Possession the surrender of Fugitive Criminals who are in or suspected of being in such British Possession, Your Majesty may, by the Order in Council applying the Act, in the case of any foreign State, or by any subsequent Order, either suspend the operation within any such British Possession of the Act, or of any part thereof, so far as it relates to such foreign State, and so long as such law or ordinance continues in force there, and no longer, or direct that such law or ordinance, or any part thereof, shall have effect in such British Possession, with or without modifications and alterations, as if it were part of the Act.

"That the provisions of the said Act of 1870 are unsuitable to Canada.

"That, when the said Bill now awaiting Your Majesty's assent becomes law, it will be expedient that the said Act of 1870 should not extend to Canada.

"We, therefore, humbly pray that Your Majesty will be graciously pleased to invite such legislation in the Parliament of the United Kingdom as will cause the operation of the said Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to cease in Canada, and that in the meantime your Majesty will be graciously pleased by Order in Council to suspend the operation within Canada of the said Act so far as it relates to any foreign State with which there may be an extradition arrangement."

2. Resolved, That the Canadian Bill referred to in the said Address, received the Royal Assent on the 28th of April, 1877.

3. Resolved, That the said Canadian Act has not yet come into operation, because Her Majesty has not as yet been pleased to comply with the prayer of the said Address.

4. Resolved, That the inconveniences which led to the passing of the said Act and the adoption of the said Address are still subsisting, and it is in the public interest that the said Act should become operative without further delay, and to that end that the prayer of the said Address should be complied with.

5. Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Most Gracious Majesty, embodying the foregoing Resolutions, and praying that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to comply with the prayer of said former Address.

He said: It will be recollected that the law with regard to the extradition of criminals is in a very unsatisfactory state. The Treaty with the neighbouring Republic described certain classes of crime for which extradition was obtainable, but, being of a very old date, it was framed before more liberal and reasonable notions of extradition law prevailed, while the facilities for communication were not so great, and when crimes against property were not so numerous as to-day. Representations have been made from the Government of Canada to the Imperial Government as to the importance of an extension of the Extradition Treaty with the United States, and the negotiations to that end had reached a certain point when they were interrupted with by the unfortunate difference of opinion between the two Governments, and, as far as is known, although that dispute terminated practically by the abandonment of the position of the Imperial Government, these negotiations have not been resumed, and the result is that, with reference to the classes of crime for which persons may be extradited, both countries remain in an absurd position. That position will not be affected by the success of this motion, but I think it important that some reference should be made to it, so as to show that we are still alive to the situation, and still desire an improvement, entirely irrespective of the question now in hand. I do not propose to go into the intricate and involved state in which our Extradition Law stands further than to point out, as was well observed by a learned Judge, that it is necessary at each step of each case "to decide how much of the Canadian law is consistent with so much of the Imperial law as is consistent with the Treaty." That is the involved operation which is to be performed in each case. Several Canadian Acts have been attempted; some were reserved, and in one case the Royal Assent was proclaimed, but another assent was necessary, and that has not been given. This particular Act it was thought better to pass here, but to provide for its coming into operation only when the operation of the Imperial Act of 1870 should cease or be suspended in Canada. By the Imperial Act of 1870, it was contemplated, as convenient and expedient, to carry out the Extradition Treaties in the various Colonies and dependencies of the Empire by local machinery, and it was provided that, in case satisfactory local machinery were provided, it should be competent for Her Majesty to suspend the operation of the Imperial Act. Canada has always been ready to provide sufficient local machinery; and the Act of 1877 was carefully devised with a view to give, in one single legislative enactment, without reference to any other law, either of Canada, or the Provinces, or the Empire, in a manner comprehensive in its principle, and at once elastic and precise in its details, all the procedure necessary to dispose of any case of extradition that might arise under any Treaty with any power. That Act passed both Houses unanimously, and was followed by an Address of the two Houses also unanimously adopted, praying Her Majesty to cause steps to be taken for the cesser, and meantime for the suspension of the operation of the Imperial Act in Canada. Difficulties of the most grievous character exist owing to the confused and contradictory state of the law. It is within my own knowledge that the ends of justice have been thwarted in a grievous manner. Applications for extradition occur but rarely; so that those who dispose of cases which do arise have not the advantage of that familiarity with the provisions of the law which would exist if such cases were frequent. The professional gentlemen who have to conduct such cases lack the same advantage, and the few cases that arise occur not unfrequently before judges not of the highest grade. It would not be surprising, under such circumstances, to find an occasional mishap in the administration of justice, even when the law is clear and unconfused; but, with the existing confused and difficult enactments, it is not to be wondered at that justice should frequently fail. I have a knowledge of more than one case, within a very short time, in which criminals, who certainly came within the extradition law, have escaped, because the confused and difficult state of the law rendered the initiatory proceedings abortive; and, after some thousands had been expended in procuring extradition, the parties have been released, the persons pursuing them having exhausted their money or their patience, and thus paying expenses and letting the criminal go. That is not a state of things which should continue. Our law should not remain in this state, and particularly a law which affects, not our own citizens, but the cordiality of our relations with other States, and therefore our Act of 1877 should be brought into operation. The answer to the Address of 1877 was that a Royal Commission had been issued to consider the whole subject of extradition, and that it was desired not to take even this action pending the report of that Commission. I confess I was disappointed when the Colonial Secretary announced that conclusion, because this particular Act was prepared in concert with, and received the assent of, the Imperial authorities. It was utterly impossible that the suspension, which might be revoked at any time, of the Imperial Act, would interfere with any ultimate action under the Commission. But that is by the way. That reason for delay ceased in May, 1878, when the Royal Commission presented its report. Before advertent to some of its recommendations, I wish to mention one which is directly material to this question. The report states that no change is necessary as to the regulation of the extradition relations of the Empire and the Colonies, that that question was satisfactorily settled by the Act of 1870; and thus, so far as the motion is concerned, we are left upon the old lines. If efficient local provision is not made for the carrying out of Extradition Treaties, the Imperial Act prevails, but, if such provision be made, the local provision ought to be allowed to go into operation unembarrassed by the Imperial Act. I think, therefore, that we should once more address Her Majesty, the reason for non-compliance with our Address having disappeared in 1878, and request her to allow our carefully prepared Act to go into operation. The Royal Commission reported many important views in reference to extradition, and I think the principles laid down will be generally approved here. They conform to those which the late Government of Canada had pressed on the Imperial Government. One proposition is that it is the interest of each State to get rid of all criminals from other countries taking refuge within its borders. It follows that it is reasonable that legislative provision should be made giving authority to the Executive, under proper precautions, to deliver over offenders to the justice of the State in which they have offended, even though that State does not act in the same way. In this matter, at any rate, it is not essential that there should be reciprocity. If any country should foolishly decline to make provision for the surrender of criminals, it is not a sensible revenge

to refuse to surrender to that country its criminals flying within our bounds. If we cannot get back our own rogues, let us at all events deliver up the rogues who come to us from other countries. If the adoption of the suggestions for an enlarged treaty with the United States is much longer delayed, it may be important for us to provide for the surrender of criminals from the United States so as to prevent our criminal classes being increased by the immigration of the criminals from the South. The next proposition is in regard to the question of "nationals," and it is that the surrender should not be confined to subjects of the demanding or other States, but should be extended to subjects of the surrendering State, so that a subject who, having committed a crime in foreign parts, returns to his own country, will be by it surrendered to the State in which the crime was committed. The third proposition is one of great importance to us. It embodies the general principle that extradition offences should embrace all but political or purely local offences, provided that they are crimes under the law of the surrendering State. For convenience sake, the classes of extradition crime should be stated either specifically or by general reference, but the statement is to be based upon the broad and general principle to which I have referred. The adoption of this principle would enable us to get rid of many criminals who now secure a safe refuge in Canada, and punish many others who, having committed grave crimes here, find an asylum in the United States. The next suggestion is that persons surrendered for an extradition crime should be liable to be tried for any other crime not being a political or local offence. A great deal of discussion has taken place on this subject, which indeed was the point on which there was a disagreement for a time between England and the United States. The Commission decidedly lays down the view that there should be no limitation of the right to try persons once surrendered for other, not being local or political, offences, and that a sufficient safeguard would exist against the abuse of extradition—first, in the declaration that the persons returned should not be tried for political or local offences; and, secondly, in permitting the person whose return is demanded to show, if show he can, that in point of fact the object for which his return is sought is that he may be tried for some such offence. The last provision to which I refer is one specially pertinent to this motion. The Commissioners thought it of importance to lay down the rule that all extradition legislation should be contained in one single enactment, just as I am now contending for. Owing to the peculiar circumstances, the rarity of its administration by any one person, the rapidity with which it must be administered, and the infamiliarity with the process, there should be the utmost possible measure of simplicity as well as of certainty, which is certainly not to be obtained when we have to look to various Statutes and Treaties of different degrees of authority, and to gather from this mass the possibly conflicting and ambiguous provisions, what is the true procedure. Therefore, in so far as the Commissioners touch on the objects of this motion, in their two propositions, that the extradition relations of the Empire and the Colonies should not be changed, and that the legislative provision should be in one enactment, we find nothing against, but everything in favour of it. I think then that we should once more gently call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the fact that a unanimous Address of both Houses of the Legislature was presented in 1877; that the reason given for non-compliance with that Address ceased in May, 1878, and that, as yet, we have heard nothing whatever of any step having been taken to give effect to our wishes, and thus simplify what is now confused, and render relatively certain what is now doubtful and obscure, to prevent such failures of justice in the future as have occurred in the past, and which may be expected to recur with increased frequency so long as the law stands in its present position.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As the hon. member for West Durham truly says, the Bill of 1877 was fully considered in the House. It was carefully prepared under the auspices and supervision of the hon. gentleman himself, who bestowed on it all the care he always does in matters of this kind. It was passed unanimously in each House, and stands now awaiting the action of Her Majesty's Government in the issue of the Proclamation. Since the hon. the Minister of Justice took office, however, there has not been, fortunately, an application for the extradition of a criminal, and therefore the subject has not been prominently pressed either on his attention or that of the Government. However, he has taken occasion to communicate with Her Majesty's Government on the subject, and they have informed us that they have considered that before the issue of a Proclamation they desire to invite the reconsideration of the subject by the Dominion Government. The particular subjects of reconsideration have not been fully communicated to the Dominion Government as yet. We are in early expectation of receiving the communication promised on the subject. Until it arrives, the hon. gentleman will see it would be well that his motion should stand over. He has fully and correctly pointed out the inconveniences that have arisen from the confused and inadequate state of the law. I think that inadequacy and confusion were both removed by this measure, and that it would have been greatly for the advantage of this country had the Proclamation been issued, and the law of 1877 been put in full operation. I still hope it will be so. We expect the communication before the Session ends. I hope it will come soon; in which case we shall early communicate to the House the subjects for reconsideration.

MR. BLAKE: After what has been said, I assent to withdraw the resolutions, for the present. But I may say to the hon. the Minister of Justice and the First Minister that I believe that applications have been sent by the United States Government for extradition, though they may not have reached his office. I know, as a matter of fact, that preliminary proceedings have been several times taken in the Courts, and that justice has failed.

MR. McDONALD (Pictou): That is quite likely.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

INTERCOLONIAL AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAYS—FREIGHT RATES.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

MR. HACKETT, in moving for an Order of the House for a return giving a comparative statement of the rates charged on the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways, for carriage of 20,000lb. of oats, potatoes, lumber, wood, coal and salt, for the distance of twenty, forty and sixty miles, respectively, on said Railways, said: My object in moving for this Return is to ascertain whether or not the rates for freight are higher on the Island than on the Intercolonial Railway. It is the general opinion in the Island that they are, and I have been strengthened in that opinion by looking over some figures of the rates on different railways. I find that on the Intercolonial a ten-ton car-load of lumber is carried fifty miles for $9; the charge on the Prince Edward Island Railway is $11.50. This is considered by the Islanders very unfair. I think we ought to carry freight of that description as cheaply on the Island as on the Intercolonial Railway. The Island road is one of the cheapest built and operated roads in the Dominion. We do not put that fact forward as a reason for cheaper rates, but we do believe that if they were reduced, the traffic would be increased, and, consequently, the revenue to the Government. The principle articles of freight on the Island Railway are farm products, which are weighty and of no great value. The producers find it would not pay them to move those articles any considerable distance over the Railway, and, consequently, they haul this produce to the nearest harbours and ship them. This should be considered, in framing a tariff for that Railway, that the Government has to compete with the carriage by water. They should encourage farmers and traders to send this produce over the railway. Oats, now very largely shipped by rail, might be increased to double the extent if the rate was lower. At present farmers will haul their products fifteen to twenty miles, to a port, because, the railway rates are too high. Our products not being of very great value need to be carried at very low rates. The expectations of many farmers, that the Railway would equalise prices all over the Island, have not been realised, those living at a considerable distance from stations or harbours being still at a disadvantage. Farm-stuff and lumber cannot be sent over fifty miles on the Railway at a profit; so in the interest of both the people and the Government it should establish cheaper rates. This season a large reduction has been made in the transportation of mussel-mud, one of the most valuable fertilisers in the Province—a reduction of $1 a car for twenty miles—and the people taking advantage of it, are sending this manure a distance of fifty miles. The result will be a very large increase of the revenue from this article alone, and a great benefit to the farmers using it in increased crops. There is not sufficient station accommodation on the road. In my county, three important villages, the centres of extensive farming districts, Miscouche, Freetown and Conway Station, need first-class stations. I hope the hon. the Minister of Railways will enquire into this matter, when he will see that increased accommodation to the people in this respect, would secure, among other benefits, an increase of the public revenue.

MR. LANGEVIN: I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for calling the attention of the Government to this matter. The interest of the Government is the same as the interest of the people in this case, provided the rates are not made too low, as the hon. gentleman remarked. When my hon. colleague (the hon. the Minister of Railways) returns, I will call his attention to these rates, in order that he may see if we can, consistently with our duty, reduce them. But we should remember that these railways have cost large sums, and we must deal with them in the same way as private companies in fixing paying rates. I agree with the hon. gentleman that, if these rates are too high, the revenue will not be in proportion to these rates, but they must, nevertheless, be high enough to remunerate the Government for the outlay. In respect to station accommodation, I am not aware that my colleague has had his attention called to it. I would recommend the hon. gentleman to be more explicit in his communications to the Department, in order to satisfy the hon. the Minister of Railways where the additional accommodation is required. I have no objection to the motion passing.

MR. JONES: This is a very important question. I think there would be no great difficulty, in so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, in giving pro rata rates on these railways. I desire to remark that grain, flour, wheat, etc., are brought from the Western States to Montreal, nearly, or quite as cheaply, as from Western Ontario to eastern points. Also, freight is carried from Montreal by the car load to Toronto as cheaply as from Montreal to Kingston. Now, this operates against the farmer in Western Ontario. It operates against the miller in Western Ontario, and in favour of the Western States, in enabling the farmers of those States to get their grain to market quite as cheaply as our western farmers can. Consequently, it operates in the way of building up the Western States at the expense of our own people. A farmer can get his produce from the Western States as cheap to the port of Montreal as the farmer of Western Ontario; therefore, the farmers in Michigan, Minnesota, and other States, are brought into competition with the farmers in Western Ontario. Consequently, the price of a farm in Western Ontario is not so high as it would be in proportion to the distance from seaboard. So also with regard to freights from Montreal west. The Government of the country should endeavour, if possible, to regulate freights, both east and west bound, within our own Dominion.

MR. BRECKEN: I am glad the hon. member has brought this matter before the House. The chief benefit which the people in Prince Edward Island derive from their Railway is the facility afforded them for the transport of agricultural produce, lumber and mussel-mud; the latter, a very valuable manure, much sought after by our farmers. The soil of the Island is very soft in the spring and autumn. The great traffic caused by the carriage of produce to our shipping ports renders our roads almost impassable, knee-deep in mud. The Railway is a great boon to our farmers, and as the work is intended for the benefit of the people, and not as a source of revenue, I submit that it would be wise to fix the tariff at such a rate as will induce our farmers and shippers to make use of the road. A lower rate of carriage than at present prevails would much increase the carrying trade, and add very considerably to the receipts of the Railway. Before I left the Island,

I was in conversation with several leading farmers, and they pressed upon me the necessity of seeing the hon. the Minister of Railways on the subject. I have little doubt that if the tariff were reduced the business transacted on that Railway would largely increase. I hope the hon. the Minister of Railways will take the matter into his consideration, and see what can be done in the direction of lowering the rates.

Motion agreed to.

MR. MUTTART, in moving for an Order of the House for copies of petitions, correspondence, and all other papers relating to the lowering of rates charged on the Prince Edward Island Railway, for carrying farm produce, firewood, lumber, coal and salt, said: I have no desire to trespass upon the time of the House to any unnecessary extent, but the importance to the whole country of the subject referred to in the motion, as well as its special importance, when considered in relation to the interests of the Island, form a sufficient apology for any little demand I may make on your patience and attention. I am pleased to be able to state that in reference to its railway the Island has few grievances to lay before Parliament. The chief object now sought to be attained is to procure a slight diminution in the amount of the rates charged for freight and passenger traffic. At the inception of the road it was exceedingly unpopular with the people. But that unpopularity is a thing of the past. And so great has been the convenience to the public, and so manifold have been the advantages of the road, that the people in the settlements remote from the main line are now petitioning for branch railways. East Point, Rustico, Campbellton and Cape Traverse, are all seeking to participate in what is now generally recognised to be a great public benefit. I trust that at no distant day the Government will see fit to listen to the prayer of these petitions, and extend branch railways to these settlements. Under the late Administration the people never entertained any very sanguine expectations that these branches would be constructed; chiefly from extravagant management, number of officials, and lack of economy the expenses of the Railway under the late Government far exceeded the receipts. The people could hardly expect under these circumstances that the
